But that's not really the thrust of the amendment. We'd be willing to work at this stage even with the Children's Advocate office we have. Although the mandate of the office may be flawed, I have the greatest respect for the men and women who work in the Children's Advocate office in Edmonton and Calgary, because they are professionals and they are motivated by the best interests of children.

Madam Chairman, we're presented here with an amendment which just says that every year we get a bit of a window to look in and see what kind of job we're doing to protect those children on the streets of the province. Why would we not want to afford that window? What possible reason would there be?

This has nothing to do with legislative drafting, so the Minister of Justice cannot get up on this amendment and say: we don't like doing it this way. It's about more transparency. I remember a time when the current Premier was an advocate for more transparency in government. I remember a time when he thought it was important that more Albertans be able to see what government does. There's nothing more important than what happens with the children of this province and no children more deserving of our attention than these 13- and 14-year-old girls on the streets of our cities. The amendment is no more complicated than what you see here.

I may have some colleagues that wish to indicate what they think about this amendment. I may be getting close to my time, but I do want to say that of all of the amendments I've put forward, my view is that this is maybe the most important and also I think one of the ones that would be easiest for government to embrace, because it simply is a reporting on desperate children in desperate circumstances. To vote against this amendment – I'd really have to think that, firstly, if people couldn't step outside party discipline on an amendment like this and couldn't put children ahead of whatever the whip or deputy whip may tell them, I'd be disappointed. If any member thought it wasn't important that this kind of annual report be done, I'd look forward to seeing them come up and at least have the courage to register that vote in a way that people can see and test, because I think people would have some explaining to do to their constituents to vote against a proposal like this.

Madam Chairman, I look forward to further debate. We have the office there; there's no new bureaucracy. All this does is help to strengthen, hopefully stiffen the spine of MLAs but also to do what I think Albertans want to see us do. Those are the comments that I wanted to make with respect to this amendment.

Thank you very much.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

MR. SHARIFF: Thank you, Madam Chairman. I'm just looking at the amendment as proposed by the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, amendment A4. In principle I agree with the amendment. I feel that this additional advocacy is important for our children, and personally I do not see any difficulty in having that office report back in a summary format.

However, my understanding is that there was a review of the mandate of the office of the Children's Advocate that recommended expanding the office's role. I believe that the Minister of Children's Services has a responsibility to review what other services the Children's Advocate should be providing and to make it more comprehensive in terms of all the changes that should take place and what should be included in the mandate of the Children's Advocate. So while I support the concept, I believe it may be a little premature to bring it into this act.

However, I would strongly recommend that the minister take all these points into consideration and come back before this House with that added responsibility being assigned to the Children's Advocate. I'd be very happy to support it at that point in time. However, at this point in time I'd like to see this bill passed ASAP so that we can carry through with the mandate of protecting our children from the streets. I will support this motion when it comes forward again in a new format.

Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Are you ready for the question?

The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you, Madam Chairman. I was listening to the Member for Calgary-McCall, and I thought he was going to support it. In a nutshell, he'll support it if the minister brings it forward but not the Member for Calgary-Buffalo. I know that's just part of it, because you're waiting for a review.

In the meanwhile what happens to those children? How do we evaluate if this bill is working? It could be a year before we have time to change that kind of legislation, a year before anybody has a chance to change the role of the Children's Advocate. You're willing to not follow this bill, to not track what's happening to these young people. You're willing to let it go for now instead of doing something that you actually fundamentally agree with. You actually agree with it, yet you're not going to support it.

I have a little trouble with that. I can't help but think that it's a partisan move rather than a practical move that will serve children better. He'll only support it once the minister brings it forward, and I have trouble with that. That does not serve democracy, and most of all it does not serve the young children on the streets. So I'm disappointed in that, Madam Chairman.

MS EVANS: Madam Chairman, just briefly. Clearly it's not a matter of partisanship. It is a matter of looking responsibly at what we're doing with the office of the Children's Advocate. It's a matter of looking today at the fact that we are reporting almost on a monthly basis about what's happening with the child welfare statistics, particularly as it relates to those statistics gathered under this piece of legislation.

If I could make an observation, it is not the number of children that are apprehended or confined that matter. It is what is happening within those communities. Both Calgary and Edmonton are quite different. More here in Edmonton are wards of this government than they are in the city of Calgary, and in Calgary many more have parents and guardians. I believe currently we're striving to get a common reporting mechanism that can work.

That's it for now.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thanks, Madam Chairman. It never ceases to amaze me when it comes to raising the issue of what is or what isn't partisan. We have worked very hard on this side to put forward a series of amendments that would support legislation that we are primarily in favour of. We made that clear in the earlier debates. We made that clear when the government brought forward its own amending legislation.

We have commented from the beginning of this debate that we are in agreement with the thrust and the intent. We are very, very committed to doing the right thing for children, and we are very, very committed to ensuring that legal rights are not put aside. Now, this government does not have the same ground to stake claim on. This government has on several occasions tried to limit or truncate or set aside the legal rights of individual Albertans.

Now, in this particular case we are dealing with some of the most vulnerable, most at risk citizens of this province, and all we are asking for in this amendment is a recognition – we already have what in my opinion should be a legislative officer. We already have an official of the government whose job it is to look over the shoulder of those men and women who are implementing child welfare laws and regulations and programs and make some determination on their behalf whether or not the best has been done for them.

As we've extended the role of child welfare legislation in this province to the point where we are apprehending young men and women off the street for their own good because they are involved in street prostitution, I can think of no better time spent by the Children's Advocate than making sure that the operation and administration of the Protection of Children Involved in Prostitution Act has been done in a way that is consistent with what is clearly the intent of this Legislature. There is nobody on either side, the government side or the Official Opposition side or on the part of the third party, that is suggesting that we set aside these rights arbitrarily. I'm not suggesting that the government is doing that in an arbitrary way, but what I am saying is that they are abandoning a responsibility to have as neutral a third party as we have at this point in time, the Children's Advocate, look over their shoulder and make sure that it becomes part of the public record, to make sure that in that report some scrutiny is brought to bear on the operation of this legislation.

The Member for Calgary-McCall indicated that he's not opposed to the notion. Even the Minister of Children's Services didn't clearly say that she was opposed to the notion. Haven't heard from other government members. So for the sake of these children, if you're not opposed to it, then support it, and please do not be distracted that it is an amendment that is brought forward by the Justice critic and the Opposition House Leader. It would be a shame to be distracted by that thought, because this would make . . .

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I hesitate to interrupt, hon. member, but under Standing Order 4(3) the committee stands adjourned until 8 this evening.

[Mrs. Gordon in the chair]

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We'll reconvene the committee. I'll call the committee to order.

Bill 29

Protection of Children Involved in Prostitution Amendment Act, 2000

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are dealing with amendment A4 The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Madam Chairman, thank you very much. Just before we broke at 5:30, we had the benefit of hearing the Minister of Children's Services following the Member for Calgary-McCall in explaining why they thought amendment A4 didn't warrant support at this time. Now, as I understood the two members – and I'm sure they can clarify if I misheard. I heard the Member for Calgary-McCall say that this is the subject of a review now, that we're reviewing specifically what should be done with respect to the Children's Advocate office, what kinds of changes or modifications ought to apply to that office. The question was: why would we go and add this responsibility onto the mandate of the Children's Advocate while that study was under way? Then the Minister of Children's Services got up and said that this was something that would be looked at in the future and so on but that there would be no government support for the amendment at this time.

I don't have the Blues, so I don't presume that my memory has captured everything that those two members said in opposing the amendment. But I just would say this. The government may make all kinds of changes to the Children's Advocate office. They may shrink the mandate; they may expand the mandate. But there would be absolutely nothing that would prevent us as a sovereign Legislature tonight from expanding the jurisdiction in this respect.

All of the submissions that I'm aware of that went into the Children's Advocate review talk about an expansion of jurisdiction. I'm not sure I heard very many groups calling for a contraction, a reduction, a diminution in the range of things that the Children's Advocate could do.

There's a vigorous debate about whether the Children's Advocate office should be independent, like one of the other legislative officers, like the Ethics Commissioner or the Auditor General or the Information and Privacy Commissioner or the Chief Electoral Officer. I believe that that person should be independent in that fashion and accountable to the Legislative Assembly rather than to a minister of the Crown. But how could that in any way be adversely affected by making this change?

You know something, Madam Chairman? If as a consequence of the government's review they decide to do something different with the Children's Advocate office, it certainly will not be the first time or the only time that we've seen consequential amendments that would change other things. So all we're saying at this point, knowing what we know – I think of the report my colleague from Edmonton-Riverview presented not so long ago, Lost Promise and Potential, talking about a review of fatal inquiry reports involving children in care.

Madam Chairman, there's a huge and compelling need for a Children's Advocate that is independent, that can do own-motion investigations, that's not restricted to dealing with children in care, who can deal with children at risk wherever they are in this province.

You know, do we have to be paralyzed? Do we have to deal with inertia because we don't have the wherewithal to make changes that strike us as appropriate today? I don't think so, and I find the argument, as I've heard the other arguments, put forward by the Minister of Children's Services not only not compelling but not sort of persuasive in any respect.

Madam Chairman, I think there's got to be some better reason than simply the fact that there's a review of an office. I think there's no good reason why we couldn't start this reporting immediately. The point would be, as I had said before the dinner adjournment, that there's an educative element to this amendment. That's part of what we do. We don't just make laws of coercive power, coercive authority. There's also a leadership role, an educative role. That's one of the advantages in these kinds of reports when they come forward: they inform public debate; they encourage public scrutiny. Those are positive things, surely; are they not? They're positive things.

In any event, I'm not sure what else I can say to this other than looping back again to that Catch Them before They Fall conference. My colleague who has been our social services critic may have some comment on that and perhaps other aspects of the amendment as well, but it just struck me that those of us who were at that conference heard really strong arguments about how useful this role is and how much more effective it could be for protecting children. I'd hope that that would be perhaps a primary responsibility for every one of us in this Chamber in terms of protecting children.

I'm going to defer to others who may wish to speak but just register again my sense of disappointment and I guess say, as well, that when the protection of children involved in prostitution bill came forward, there were certainly many who said: you know, much of this could be done in the Child Welfare Act. Judge Jordan said that much of this could be done in the Child Welfare Act. But the path the Legislature chose was to hive off this niche area and develop a specific bill to deal with it. I think that if we're going to go down that road, then it means that to be consistent, we build in the protection to deal with that hived-off, segregated specific element.

So if we choose not to simply deal with amendments to the Child Welfare Act but to create a brand-new statute, then surely it's incumbent on us to build in corresponding safeguards and checks and balances and reporting mechanisms. In some respects you have the worst of all worlds. You're going down a sort of uncharted road, and you've forgone the kinds of reviews that are provided by the Child Welfare Act, specifically section 2.1.

One of the other things I might say is that if the minister feels constrained because there's a review going on with the Children's Advocate, I wanted to challenge her to tell me: who else should exercise this responsibility to oversee this important area? If she thinks it shouldn't be the Children's Advocate, tell us who it would be. Would it be the Ombudsman? What other officer would do this function? I just find that we're left with a most unsatisfactory situation.

I think I've made the points I wanted to with respect to the amendment that's before us. I think that people who follow the Hansard debate will form their own judgment in terms of the merit or lack of same of any of the proposed changes. I suppose, also, that people who review the Hansard transcript will have to test and assess and analyze the response that we've heard from the government to these amendments, and we'll see what sorts of judgments people come to on the basis of the strength of the arguments they've heard.

In any event, I look forward to further debate on the amendment before us, A4. Thank you very much, Madam Chairman.

8:10

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Before we proceed, can I ask for unanimous consent to revert to Introduction of Guests?

[Unanimous consent granted]

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Go ahead, Edmonton-Manning.

head: Introduction of Guests

MR. GIBBONS: Thank you, Madam Chairman. I'd like to introduce to you and through you to the Members of the Legislative Assembly 17 visitors tonight, two of them being teachers and the rest being English as a Second Language students. They're new immigrants. Most of them have been in Canada for less than six months. They're in the process of completing or have just completed their postdoctoral work. They're in the public gallery. The two teachers are Mrs. Janet Kan and Ms June Fong. With your permission I'll have them stand and have everybody welcome them here tonight.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Thank you, Edmonton-Manning.

Bill 29
Protection of Children Involved
in Prostitution Amendment Act, 2000

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Edmonton-Riverview.

MRS. SLOAN: Thank you, Madam Chairman. Well, despite being somewhat under the weather with the flu and a cold, I have to say this evening that I'm really rebounding, because the report of a strong Liberal majority across this country just does my heart proud. It gives me a great deal of passion and energy to talk about another topic that's very close to my heart, and that is the treatment of children in Alberta and the government's treatment of them.

Early on in my tenure as social services critic I made a trip to Calgary and actually spent an evening and early part of the morning with a mobile unit operated by Wood's Homes in downtown Calgary. Its primary purpose was to build relationships with young women who were on the street working in prostitution and to try and encourage those young women to leave that and reintegrate themselves either into school or some other type of employment.

I found it a fascinating experience. I found many of these young women were bright, articulate. Many of them were educated. A couple of them had children at home. They were doing this, Madam Chairman, because it was a very lucrative form of employment. They were making a lot of money, far, far more money than they could have if they had been working at a minimum wage job. Many of them had cars that were paid for. They owned condos or had condos which they had made substantive down payments on.

The reality of their lives was: well, should I take a minimum wage job at the substandard rate that it is in Alberta, or should I resort to something where I can really actually make an income and make a decent living? And they chose that.

I had a great deal of admiration for the workers in this mobile unit. Over the course of time and going out night after night, they were building relationships with these young women and attempting to slowly but surely influence them to look at the dangers involved in prostitution.

In the context of the amendment that's before this House tonight, that the Children's Advocate would "prepare and submit annual reports to the Legislative Assembly respecting the operation" of this act, I think that is a very, very prudent recommendation. The reason is that if we simply pass this act and implement it, operationalize it in strictly a justice sense, we're missing out on so much information about these young women.

What type of information you might ask? Well, one of the things of course, a huge risk for them, is HIV or other types of infection. In the way in which I hope one day to see the Children's Advocate office operate in this province, in an independent capacity, that office would be in a position to look at and study what the incidence is of HIV amongst this group. What is the incidence of teenage pregnancies within this group? Also, if in fact there are births, what is the incidence of low birth weight? We know in Alberta that we have had consecutively very high incidences of both of those: teenage pregnancies and low birth weights. Is there a correlation between that and prostitution? At this point in time we can't tell that.

Another interesting bit of information that the advocate could look at is: what are the demographics of prostitution? Well, certainly having, as I said, toured in downtown Calgary, we know that the urban centres are magnets for that type of activity, but how widespread is the problem? Do growing communities with high transient populations like Fort McMurray have a growing prostitution trade? Are there issues in parts of rural Alberta? These types of things and coming to a real understanding about what prostitution is in Alberta and why people resort to it are going to be lost, because the act as it exists now will simply operate in a justice sense if we do not pass this amendment. And that, Madam Chairman, I think would be a travesty.

Another very relevant piece of information that could be examined by the Children's Advocate is how many of the young women who are turning to prostitution have in fact left home because of abuse, attempted to find funds through SFI or some type of government program and been turned away? As long as the Children's Advocate office has been operational in Alberta, we have seen consecutive advocates talk about the lack of programs and funding for 16- and 17-year-old youths, and this is also an age group that we see engaged in prostitution. Is there a correlation, Madam Chairman? That, I think, would be very, very relevant to know.

It's not good enough that we scoop them off the street. Even with the amendments to make this bill Charter compliant, we will one at time help these individual young women, but in order to actually prevent young women from going into this dangerous occupation, we have to understand: what are the factors that prompt them or force them to engage in this activity? We're not going to understand that unless we engage an office like the advocate into doing this type of reporting on an annual basis for the operation and administration of the act.

Now, if you think about it, the amendment's not going to cost the government really any money because we have the advocate in place. He's required to do an annual report. This would simply mean that in the context of his annual report, which he's already doing, one aspect of his reporting would be on the administration and operation of the prostitution act. So it's not a high-cost amendment, and really, Madam Chairman, I can't see any reason why the government would choose to not support this amendment this evening. It certainly is in the best interests of children. It's preventative. It makes us better equipped to reduce and prevent growing numbers of women resorting to this occupation and I think in the long term will serve the Assembly well.

So with those comments I am pleased to have had the opportunity this evening and look forward to perhaps hearing some government discussion about the amendment.

Thank you.

8:20

MR. DICKSON: Madam Chairman, I appreciate the observations of my colleague from Edmonton-Riverview, and I'm glad she was able to attend and participate in the debate, notwithstanding the flu.

One of the things I was going to say is that there's another reason why I think this amendment is important. Members will recall that on January 13, 1999, the Premier wrote the Prime Minister expressing Alberta's qualified support for the objectives and principles of the UN convention on the rights of the child, and the comment by the Premier was as follows:

As a further indication of our commitment to children and families, we would like to extend our formal support for the federal government's ratification of the U.N. Convention on the Rights of the Child. Our support is based on the understanding that the U.N. Convention does not usurp or over-ride the authority of parents and that any interpretation of same with respect to Alberta will be undertaken as though a reservation had been placed at the time of ratification in that regard.

Well, that's a representation by the Premier on behalf of the provincial Legislature, and what that means, then, is that we're entitled to look at the extent to which this bill complies with the UN convention on the rights of the child. It's interesting, that report I referred to earlier, UN Convention on the Rights of the Child: How Does Alberta's Legislation Measure Up? by Anna S. Pellatt and the Alberta Civil Liberties Research Centre. On page 32 under recommendations for improving compliance she says:

The jurisdiction of the Children's Advocate should be expanded to include children who have applied for but been denied protective services under the Act as well as those who have registered reports of abuse and neglect.

This is something that should be done, and that expansion of jurisdiction is surely what we're talking about. Instead, what we have is the Minister of Children's Services, virtually by implication if not expressly, saying that the Children's Advocate office may in fact have curtailed responsibility.

We have to look at the following articles to determine whether we're in compliance, and I suggest that the amendment would ensure that we were in compliance. Let me just back up and say that one of the challenges of the UN convention on the rights of the child is that it requires that states parties monitor the progress of implication efforts and report to the United Nations committee on the rights of the child. That's the body charged with responsibility for monitoring compliance at regular intervals.

In 1994 Canada prepared and submitted its first compliance report. The next report was due in 1999, and 2004, presumably, is the next one. What we're going to have to be able to demonstrate is that article 3, which is directly engaged by this bill – article 3 has to do with:

States Parties undertake to ensure the child such protection and care as is necessary for his or her well-being, taking into account the rights and duties of his or her parents, legal guardians, or other individuals legally responsible for him or her, and, to this end, shall take all appropriate legislative and administrative measures.

Well, this amendment actually speaks to one of those appropriate legislative and administrative measures.

Also in article 3:

States Parties shall ensure that the institutions, services and facilities responsible for the care or protection of children shall conform with the standards established by competent authorities, particularly in the areas of safety, health, in the number and suitability of their staff, as well as competent supervision.

Well, what better way of measuring and assessing compliance with article 3 than having this form of annual reporting mechanism.

Article 19 of the UN convention on the rights of the child talks about:

States Parties shall take all appropriate legislative, administrative, social and educational measures to protect the child from all forms of physical or mental violence.

Now, some members may be concerned, because they were members for such an embarrassingly long time, that the province refused to do what every other province had done, which was to affirm the convention. But, as I read a short time ago, that letter on January 13, 1999, from the Premier of this province to the Prime Minister expressed Alberta's support for the objectives and principles of the convention. [interjection] Yeah, well, actually if Alberta were a sovereign state, we would have an expectation that they'd be signing on, and the next best thing is a form of endorsement. I think we've got that now, although it was very late.

Anyway, article 20. I'm not going to read the whole thing, but if members look at it, it makes the case in terms of ensuring that a child temporarily or permanently deprived of his or her family environment, or in whose own best interests cannot be allowed to remain in that environment, shall be entitled to special protection and assistance provided by the State.

This is perhaps the most important one, Madam Chairman. I should have dealt with this one first. I apologize for not dealing with it immediately. Article 25 says – and this is particularly important:

States Parties recognize the right of a child who has been placed by the competent authorities for the purposes of care, protection or treatment of his or her physical or mental health, to a periodic review of the treatment provided to the child and all other circumstances relevant to his or her placement.

Well, does this proposed amendment not directly serve that objective?

Judging by the scowls of some members opposite, I take it that the news is disheartening in terms of the federal election campaign.

But, Madam Chairman, I think the point is: we have an article here that would very effectively be addressed with the amendment. Also, article 27 deals with "appropriate measures to assist parents and others responsible" for children and recognize the right of every child to a standard of living.

Anyway, the only other article I thought might be relevant would be article 37. I just emphasize article 37(d), which says:

Every child deprived of his or her liberty shall have the right to prompt access to legal and other appropriate assistance, as well as the right to challenge the legality of the deprivation of his or her liberty before a court or other competent, independent and impartial authority, and to a prompt decision on any such action.

So this probably would be equally instructive in terms of the first two amendments, A1 and A2, and we've dealt with those, but it still speaks to the importance that the UN convention attaches, notwithstanding the curious view proffered by the Minister of Justice, that if your end is a noble one, it doesn't matter what the effect of the law is, which, as I say, is just plain erroneous.

In any event, I can't think of anything else to add, other than again to refer members to the UN agency report of November 20, 2000, sexual commercialization of children. If one reads through that and you look at the extent to which Canada in fact has not even done what it undertook to do in terms of compliance with this United Nations protocol to deal with the sexual commercialization of children, I think adopting an amendment like this would at least help to ensure a higher level of compliance than we have now.

Those are the observations I'd like to make. I would still look forward to any further debate, and if not, then to the vote, Madam Chairman.

[Motion on amendment A4 lost]

[The clauses of Bill 29 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Opposed? Carried.

Bill 20
Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2000

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We have an amendment that has been brought forward, amendment A1.

Hon. Deputy Government House Leader, are you standing?

MR. HAVELOCK: If I understand correctly, the Minister of Justice has moved all the amendments. Has he not?

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The table has an amendment, A1, which is a very lengthy amendment. Yes.

MR. HAVELOCK: Okay. No, I have nothing to add, Madam Chairman. Thanks.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Madam Chairman, I do have something to add, a couple of things I think it's important to put on the record. I think the opposition has been supportive of the bulk of the elements of the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2000. I want to acknowledge that the Minister of Justice approached my former colleague, Sue Olsen, in the spring session and outlined for her what he was proposing to do. I appreciated his candour and the information he provided at an early date and an early enough date that it allowed us to do some consultation and review with respect to the elements of it.

I think it has been advantageous that in fact the bill didn't proceed faster in the spring, because we now have what looks like about 10 pages of amendments which have come forward to it. I wanted to spend a minute simply going through those elements we did not have a difficulty with.

I wanted to say that one of the sections that has been so contentious had to do with section 74, and certainly there has been some recent public discussion around this. I know there's an argument that the plaintiff's counsel hadn't been heard from until recently and that those are the people principally interested in the change. I'm not sure that's entirely accurate. I think this whole business of compensation on death for loss of future income is a difficult area.

I encourage people to read the Alberta Law Reform Institute's final report 76, Should a Claim for the Loss of a Chance of Future Earnings Survive Death? If you look at page 3 of that, you have the words of Chief Justice Brian Dickson. In talking about the exercise, if I can describe it that way, of assessment of damages for loss of a chance of future earnings, former Chief Justice Brian Dickson had referred to:

"gaze . . . into the crystal ball;" engage in "speculation;" rely on actuarial evidence the reliability of which is "illusionary" in relation to a specific case; and engage in "arbitrary" determinations.

This is a quote from the report of the Law Reform Institute.

Such a process is justifiable in order to ensure that a living plaintiff is properly compensated, but it is not justifiable when the damages cannot go to compensate a living person.

I know that my friend from Calgary-Glenmore will be familiar with this, because at the time this was written Alan Hunter was probably head of the Alberta Law Reform Institute.

I think I'm sympathetic to the concern identified by the Alberta Law Reform Institute in terms of how to deal with this, but I think part of the problem for any of us who have ever practised law and had to explain to parents who have seen their son or daughter killed, whether it's in a motor vehicle accident or some other kind of injury, is how you explain to them that there's really no significant compensation for that loss. Now, the finding of the Law Reform Institute was that you can't ever compensate for the loss of a child anyway, but if you get into this business of dealing with lost anticipated earnings, it's so speculative, and there are huge elements of speculation with it. We have a court system that, frankly, doesn't usually spend a lot of time dealing with conjecture and surmise and speculation and a legal system that looks for certainty and predictability. That becomes a real problem when we're dealing with loss of prospective earnings.

So what am I saying? Well, I think it was appropriate to undertake further review of this and perhaps some further consultation, but I think I simply wanted to record that at least this legislator, as Justice critic for the opposition, understands that the status quo isn't particularly satisfactory either, from what I might describe as a philosophical or a conceptual approach to dealing with these kinds of damages. I think the minister has done an appropriate thing, and I was encouraged that he didn't simply dodge something that attracted some flak and some contention by saying: "Well, that's it. It's out of the bill." What I heard him say was: we're going to look at this again and see if there is perhaps a more satisfactory way of dealing with this than just eliminating it altogether. I don't know exactly where he's going to go with that, but I think it's important we don't lose sight of the recommendations in report 76.

The other thing I might just note is that there was an interesting decision that came out of the judicial district of Calgary – that's where lots of interesting law is made, Madam Chairman – in the action Lemke and Pottie. It was a judgment by Mr. Justice Lomas. He wrestles with and applies the law insofar as we have a death claim. This was a case where the plaintiff's daughter, age 35, had been killed in an automobile accident near Ponoka. She was an unmarried person not living with another individual. The parents commenced a claim against the tort-feasor, the wrongdoer, and they claimed damages for their daughter's death pursuant to the provisions of the Fatal Accidents Act.

As one reads through the case, I think we're reminded again of the difficulty in providing compensation in cases like this. Justice Lomas, as he always does, takes us through in his reasons for judgment I think a thoughtful analysis of the legislative history and makes significant mention of report 24 and report for discussion 12, June 1992, titled Non-Pecuniary Damages for Wrongful Death Actions. I just would encourage members to read the analysis of Justice Lomas, who deals with the very issue that is before us and certainly before the Justice minister in dealing with this.

It might be appropriate to make this quote from Justice Lomas. It says at page 31 of his judgment:

In its Report No. 26 the Institute . . .

I say parenthetically that he's referring to the Law Reform Institute. . . . comments "Grief flows from love of the child and this does not depend on the age of the child . . ." It also comments "No award or an insignificant award for their grief and loss of guidance, care and companionship of the deceased is a signal to the surviving families that the law sees their loss minor, trivial or insignificant."

I'd just leave it to others to review that analysis from Justice Lomas's decision.

As we go through the other provisions, we see an increase in the jurisdiction of the threshold, the jurisdiction of Provincial Court, and I think that is a positive thing.

I'm not sure we ever got an answer, Madam Chairman, to the question: what's the cost going to be of additional judges? I mean, what is it going to do to the caseload if you expand the small-claims ceiling to $50,000? If we ever got a response from the minister to that, I'm sorry, but I didn't hear it.

The clarification of "in contempt" to "in civil contempt" is, I think, useful.

The section 12 amendment. What we have seen is a lessening of the standard for service. So we now get to a point where

(1.1) For the purposes of subsection (1)(c),

(a) a copy of a dispute note . . .

This would be in a small claim procedure, Madam Chairman.

. . . may be sent to a party by ordinary mail addressed to that party at that party's last known address.

You know, I have to record that in a constituency like Calgary-Buffalo the average stay of somebody in an apartment at an address may be four or five months. The voters list that's done for Calgary-Buffalo is probably already out of date, and I think it's only being produced by the Chief Electoral Officer this week.

So what happens is you're going to have – and I assert this caution – more people being sued in small claims court, and they're not going to know it because they're not ever going to get served with a copy. It's one thing if somebody is served personally. We know that they've got it. It's another thing when you send it double-registered mail or whatever or by certified mail. I can't keep track of all the things Canada Post now offers in terms of communicating material, but I think just to send it to the last known address is a very, very low threshold, and I want to register that concern.

I'm not going to go through each of the other changes that have been made. We've never heard, to my knowledge, an explanation of whether there was payment of the fees that were ordered to be paid by the Court of Appeal and the Court of Queen's Bench, one case involving a Provincial Court judge who was going to be reassigned by the chief provincial judge, and there was a determination by the court that – this is just a paraphrase because I don't have those decisions in front of me. There was a concern that this was something that went beyond the power of the Provincial Court. So we've spoken, and we've raised that concern in terms of the impact on judicial independence. I continue to have that concern.

As we go through the other elements, many of them have been requested or at least are satisfactory to the Law Society and the people who are directly involved.

The legal aid plan. Since I first became Justice critic in 1992, I had always suggested that the legal aid plan should be created as truly a separate society and have a kind of independence it hasn't had in the past. So I think that's a positive thing, although it's really important that government not see this as a chance to reduce their public responsibility to provide the funding for legal aid. Frankly, I'm quite worried about the future of legal aid, because I find that there's certainly a number of members in the government caucus, from their comments that I hear, that don't appreciate the value of the legal aid program. I didn't say all the members of the government caucus. I'm talking about the comments that I hear expressed to the media and at town hall meetings and things like that. If anybody would like to come, we can attend some of those meetings, Member for St. Albert, through the chair, when some of your colleagues talk about justice issues and talk about their concerns about legal aid. So that's part of the reality, and that certainly happens.

I continue to raise questions about the divisions of the Provincial Court into a sort of a homogenization of the Provincial Court. I've thought there were some great advantages that accrue to having different divisions. We've seen that just like many lawyers don't like to do family law, many judges don't like doing that kind of material. I've always thought that those decisions that you make around custody and access are arguably some of the most important decisions in the life of those children. It's important that you have judges doing that who have a genuine interest in what they're about. But I've expressed that concern before.

I think in the course of what's been a very long debate, we have registered many of the concerns with respect to Bill 20. We are in a situation where the government has the numbers, so they're going to pass it as it comes forward with the amendments, but I hope they will pay some attention to the concerns that have been expressed, because I think there are some worrisome areas with the amendment package.

So those are the comments I wanted to make. I guess I just wanted to say that as we finish debate on Bill 20, I can't help thinking of our former colleague for Edmonton-Norwood, whose future political fate is in the hands, I guess, not of the electors; they've already registered their vote and handed it to the vote counters. I'd just put on the record my admiration for her courage and wish her well and hope there's a successful outcome for her.

Those are the comments I wanted to make at this point in speaking to Bill 20, Madam Chairman. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

MRS. SLOAN: Thank you, Madam Chairman. I did have actually some important issues that I would like to get on the record, if I may, this evening that relate to Bill 20. This bill, in bringing forward quite a potpourri of amendments, I believe warrants some thorough debate.

To begin, I'd like to talk a bit about what I see as the amendments proposing the regionalization, if you will, of the courts, that being that we would do away with the separate divisions, be they currently criminal, youth, family, et cetera. You know, we've adopted that approach in other sectors in this province, and child welfare comes to mind immediately. We've seen the complexities of trying to force people, in this case judges, to become generalists. In child welfare and in health care for the last two years at least the Auditor General's report has been riddled with issues and problems about the inability of those systems to operate in a regionalized structure, and that is really what these amendments are proposing for the justice system; that everything be melted down and cases heard in that respect.

Now, albeit in health care we saw different discipline, we saw, when health care was regionalized, an approach taken that required anesthetists to become generalists. Prior to regionalization anesthetists would specialize and perhaps do obstetrics or they'd do ear, nose, and throat or they'd do general surgery. When the health care system was regionalized here in Edmonton, all of a sudden anestists had to be required to do procedures. I'm certainly respectful of the fact that there's a huge, huge difference in the practice of an anesthetist and the practice and judgment of a judge. However, I think there can be strong cases made for expertise and knowledge of the law in each of these divisions that the government's amendments are proposing to wipe out.

I haven't heard – and I read back through the debates to see what kind of consultation the government had done about this – what people that would be impacted by this change were saying about it. I don't believe there's been anything put on the record, Madam Chairman, that speaks to substantive support for that. I can't help but wonder: is this designed in some way to serve as retribution for those judges that caused the government embarrassment when the government tried to roll back their salaries by 5 percent and the judiciary pointed out, and rightly so, that that was not within the government's purview to do?

Just to move to another section of the bill, section 74, which really deals with the ability of survivors to make claims against the government and the ceiling that the government's proposing to put on that through this amendment. I couldn't help but think that in the past we've certainly had some cases in this province, i.e. the sterilization cases, where if this had been in effect, obviously, perhaps from the government's viewpoint, they would have saved the taxpayers a lot of money. What we see really now is that there was a crime committed and judgment needed to be achieved. This type of amendment would have ensured no justice for the victims that suffered that abuse, Madam Chairman. So I think that when we reflect on that in the historical sense, it's important to consider it but also consider what is being proposed in this amendment in the context of using an example from another provincial jurisdiction, the contamination of water in Walkerton.

A number of people died as a result of that, directly linked to the provincial government. This in fact would limit the legal actions that could be taken if such contamination occurred here. Is that partially what's motivating the government? We certainly know that in the southern part of this province, where we have intensive livestock operations, there is absolutely surface water contamination, and in many communities south of Calgary, in the Lethbridge area, the communities are having to boil their water or have bottled water on a regular basis. Are we in fact saying to those Albertans that if some type of outbreak occurred and there were deaths, their ability to litigate would be restricted by this amendment? I think that's a very important question, one that needs to be answered.

We also know that there have been many studies conducted relative to the Bovar waste treatment plant, the amount of contamination that that plant has caused both in wildlife population and in humans that are residing within proximity of that plant. Is the government saying through this amendment that if in fact in the future that plant and the fallout were linked to deaths, deformities, et cetera, the government is not responsible? Is that the intention of section 74? Difficult to support that, if in fact that is the intent, Madam Chairman.

Now, I wanted to also speak to section 21, and I did reference some of the subsections in 21 in my earlier comments on this bill. I should also note that I referred to Judge Reilly as Justice Reilly, and that was an omission on my part, which I'd like to make the point of correcting for the record this evening. With respect to 21.1(7), which is specifically the section in which the bill proposes that any decision or action by a Chief Judge would not be subjected to any form of judicial review, I don't profess to be any type of judiciary expert or legal expert, Madam Chairman, but I am aware that the Chief Judge is a government appointment. So why would we say as government, if we're appointing someone, that that person shouldn't be required to make decisions and actions that are fully compliant with the law, and if there's reason to believe that they have not done so in that manner, that their decision should not be subjected to some form of review?

I'm thinking that the government appoints a number of other positions in this province. All of them would be most certainly subject to judicial review. Whether they be perhaps the chairman of a regional health authority or the chairman of a child welfare authority, they most certainly could have judicial review actions. But in the case of the Chief Judge, the government is saying no, and I don't understand why that person should be exempt. The power of the Chief Judge over the other judges in fact constitutes a serious threat to the judicial independence because the Chief Judge is appointed by the government and has the ability to use his statutory power over judges to control them according to the wishes of the government. Because of the crucial importance of judicial independence to the preservation of freedom in a democratic society, the exercise of any authority over judges should be exercised according to the highest standards of reasonableness, openness, and strict adherence to jurisdiction.

An alternative, Madam Chairman, if the government were open to considering it for this section and not to only criticize what has been proposed, is that it would be most easy to amend the section to say that every decision of a Chief Judge in relation to a sitting judge could be subject to judicial review and, if reviewed, should be reviewed on the principle that judicial independence requires that authority over judges should be exercised according to the highest standards of openness, fairness, and strict adherence to jurisdiction. I don't believe it's unreasonable to expect the Chief Judge to act and to rule to the highest standard. I don't think we should expect anything less.

Now I'd like to turn to just a couple of comments that arise out of a report which was produced by the National Council of Welfare titled Justice and the Poor. It was published in the spring of 2000. There were a number of recommendations in this very, very thorough report, Madam Chairman, that dealt with the treatment of the poor by the justice system. Because we have a bill before us tonight that has initiated the review of a number of aspects of the justice statute, I think it's relevant to question the government on why, in fact, some of these recommendations were not given more consideration and incorporation.

I found it very interesting that on page 77 of the report – we see amendments in the package that talk about the payment of fines. In fact, in the National Council of Welfare report they surveyed the different provinces for the number of adults admitted to provincial prisons in '97-98 for the failure to pay fines, including fines for federal criminal offences and for quasi-criminal provincial and municipal offences. Now, of all provinces, Madam Chairman, Alberta was in the position of ranking the second highest in the country, second only to Quebec. We had reported 12,709 people who were in prison because of their failure to pay fines. In contrast, Ontario only had 679; Manitoba, 72; Saskatchewan, 195.

In the research that the national council did, they looked at who went to prison for the nonpayment of fines and the offences they committed. There was very little recent information on this available, they found, and absolutely none available on young offenders. The only thing they could find about the situation in Alberta is that more than three-quarters of the imprisonments for fine default in that province in '97-98 were for violations of provincial laws and municipal bylaws. A study of women inmates in the late '80s and early '90s found that the fine default played a major role in their incarceration, especially for aboriginal women in the prairie provinces. In Alberta we had 39 percent of female inmates admitted for fine default. That was the demographic.

The amendments before us tonight really do nothing to address that. I know that my hon. colleague from Edmonton-Centre spoke earlier on in debate about the implications and their effect on women, but I think this gives more credence to the need to examine our approach to fine collection and the imprisonment of those who default.

I also wanted to raise from this report what I also believe were very prudent recommendations, and they related to the issue of youth crime. We know that young offenders and the issues of youth crime and youth gangs are very prevalent on the minds of Albertans, and we'd like to see the government doing something proactive to address it.

Let me just quickly read these for the record. The National Council of Welfare supported the approach of Quebec authorities towards minor crime and recommended that all jurisdictions adopt a policy of minimal police intervention except when absolutely necessary. What they found in their review was that again we were overzealous in incarcerating young people. In a similar sense they recommended that there be an establishment of a multidisciplinary team approach to deal with the multiple problems of many street people who end up in the criminal justice system with substance abuse and mental health problems. This also constitutes a large portion of our demographic population in prisons. We don't see that type of approach being taken, Madam Chairman, nor is it incorporated within the statute itself that is before us this evening.

So I think there is a need for a broader examination of some of the issues Bill 20 touches upon, Madam Chairman. With those comments I will adjourn my remarks this evening.

[Motion on amendment A1 carried]

[The clauses of Bill 20 as amended agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Opposed? Carried.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. HAVELOCK: I would like to move that the committee do now rise and report.

[Motion carried]

[Mrs. Gordon in the chair]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

MR. SHARIFF: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following: Bill 27, Bill 29. The committee reports with some amendments Bill 20.

Madam Speaker, I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in this report?

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Tuesday, November 28, 2000 1:30 p.m.
 Date: 00/11/28
 [The Speaker in the chair]

head: Prayers

THE SPEAKER: Good afternoon.

At the conclusion of the prayer would all hon. members please remain standing.

Let us pray. O God, grant that we the members of our province's Legislature may fulfill our office with honesty and integrity. May our first concern be for the good of all of our people. Guide our deliberations this day. Amen.

Michael Maccagno July 15, 1914, to November 25, 2000

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, it is with sadness that my office learned today of the passing of former member Michael Maccagno on Saturday, November 25, 2000. Mr. Maccagno was first elected to the Alberta Legislature in the general election of June 29, 1955, and served until May 27, 1968. During his years of service he represented the constituency of Lac La Biche for the Liberal Party and also served as leader for the Alberta Liberals.

During his years in the Legislature Mr. Maccagno served on the following committees: the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture, Colonization, Immigration, and Education; Municipal Law; Municipal Law and Law Amendments; Private Bills; Privileges and Elections, Standing Orders and Printing; Public Accounts; Public Affairs; Railways, Telephones, and Irrigation. Mr. Maccagno also served on the special committees on Centralization and Consolidation of Schools, Collective Bargaining between School Trustees and Teachers, Commercial Fisheries, Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, Electoral Boundaries, Ombudsman Search, and Preventive Health.

With our admiration and respect there is gratitude to members of his family, who shared the burdens of public office. Our prayers are with them.

In a moment of silent prayer I ask you to remember Michael Maccagno as you have known him. Rest eternal grant unto him, O Lord, and let light perpetual shine upon him. Amen.

Please be seated.

head: Presenting Petitions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

MR. YANKOWSKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table nine petitions containing 527 names from the Cardston-Taber-Warner constituency, 22 names from the Leduc constituency, 160 names from the West Yellowhead constituency, 54 names from Red Deer-South constituency, 36 names from the Livingstone-Macleod constituency, 97 names from the Vermilion-Lloydminster constituency, 200 names from the Whitecourt-St. Anne constituency, 20 names from the Peace River Constituency, and 167 names from various Alberta constituencies.

Mr. Speaker, the petitioners are urging the Legislative Assembly of Alberta to introduce amendments to the Alberta human rights act "to allow Alberta health professionals to opt out of those medical procedures that offend a tenet of their religion, or their belief that human life is sacred."

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

MRS. TARCHUK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to present a petition signed by 32 residents of Banff-Cochrane requesting the Legislative Assembly to allow health professionals to opt out of medical procedures for reasons of conscience.

Thank you.

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 110 Edmontonians opposed to the Liberal Bill 211, which would require any tax increase to be subject to a provincewide referendum.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader of the third party.

DR. PANNU: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have a petition signed by 754 Albertans, most of them postsecondary students, and the petition reads as follows:

Whereas, post-secondary education is the key to Alberta's future prosperity,

And whereas, post-secondary education is becoming unaffordable for most families

We the undersigned residents of the province of Alberta hereby petition the Legislative Assembly to urge the Government of Alberta to reduce post-secondary tuition fees by 30%.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

head: Reading and Receiving Petitions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Redwater.

MR. BRODA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to have the petition I presented last Wednesday now read and received.

Thank you.

THE CLERK:

We, the undersigned residents of Alberta, petition the Legislative Assembly of Alberta to urge the Government of Alberta to introduce amendments to the Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act to allow Alberta health professionals to opt out of those medical procedures that offend a tenet of their religion, or their belief that human life is sacred.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

MRS. LAING: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request that the petition I presented on Tuesday, November 21, be now read and received.

Thank you.

THE CLERK:

We the undersigned residents of Alberta petition the Legislative Assembly of Alberta to urge the Government of Alberta to introduce amendments to the Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act to allow Alberta health professionals to opt out of those medical procedures that offend a tenet of their religion, or belief that human life is sacred.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

MR. MARZ: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask that the two petitions I presented on November 22 be now read and received.

THE CLERK:

We, the undersigned residents of Alberta, petition the Legislative Assembly of Alberta to urge the Government of Alberta to introduce amendments to the Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act to allow Alberta health professionals to opt out of those medical procedures that offend a tenet of their religion, or their belief that human life is sacred.

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the petition I presented on November 27 be now read and received.

THE CLERK:

We, the undersigned residents of Alberta, hereby petition the Legislative Assembly not to pass Bill 211, which would create social division and threaten long-term, stable funding for schools, hospitals and other important services.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview.

MR. YANKOWSKY: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would ask that the petition I presented yesterday be now read and received.

THE CLERK:

We, the undersigned residents of Alberta, petition the Legislative Assembly of Alberta to urge the Government of Alberta to introduce amendments to the Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act to allow Alberta health professionals to opt out of those medical procedures that offend a tenet of their religion, or their belief that human life is sacred.

head: Notices of Motions

THE SPEAKER: The Associate Minister of Health and Wellness.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise pursuant to Standing Order 34(2)(a) to give notice that tomorrow I will move that the following written questions that appear on the Order Paper be called for consideration, being questions 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, and 37.

I am also giving notice that tomorrow I will move that the following motions for returns also appearing on the Order Paper be called for consideration. They are 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, and 58.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

MS LEIBOVICI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise this afternoon to give notice that at the start of private member's business today I will be seeking unanimous consent of the Assembly to advance Bill 221, the Public Health Care Protection Statutes Amendment Act, 2000, to be the next bill dealt with in private member's business. I would stress that there is urgency in debating Bill 221, which repeals Bill 11.

Thank you.

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

MR. STELMACH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to table the appropriate number of copies of the School Facility Evaluation Project Final Results along with the summary of the audited results of all 1,463 schools. The individual reports are currently being loaded onto Alberta Infrastructure's web site and will be available next week through our home page by following the links.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

MR. PASZKOWSKI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to table a copy of a letter that I sent today to the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar responding to the question that he had asked in the Legislative Assembly on November 23, 2000.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, I would today like to table eight copies of the Department of Environment's response to Motion for a Return 18 as requested by the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development.

MR. LUND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a number of tablings today, the first being six copies of the Alberta Opportunity Company's annual report.

Second, six copies of the Agriculture Financial Services Corporation.

Also, six copies of the Livestock Identification Services Manager's Report for the period April 1, 1999, to March 31, 2000, which under its delegated agreement includes annual reports for the following four acts: the Brand Act, the Livestock Identification and Brand Inspection Act, the Livestock and Livestock Products Act, and the Stray Animals Act. The audited financial statement for the year ending March 31, 2000.

Lastly, I'd like to table the following information item: six copies of the Alberta Grain Commission's annual report 1999-2000.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment.

MR. DUNFORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to table with the Assembly the 1999-2000 annual report for the Association of Professional Engineers, Geologists and Geophysicists of Alberta.

Then on behalf of the hon. Minister of Learning I'm pleased to table with the Assembly the 1999-2000 annual report for the Alberta Apprenticeship and Industry Training Board.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

MRS. SLOAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today and table the Social Care Facilities Review Committee investigation report arising from the death of Mr. Wayne Oles at the Herb Jamieson Centre on August 7, 1998. This was obtained under the freedom of information act by the Member for Edmonton-Riverview on September 29, 2000.

My second tabling is a notice of motion filed in the Court of Queen's Bench between Ms J and the province of Alberta, which clearly cites that Ms J's failure to testify will result in her imprisonment, a fine, or the striking down of her suit.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

MR. WICKMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have another set of tablings from the association of brain injury outlining their concerns in the form of a questionnaire. I will table the appropriate number of copies in the House today.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have five letters here today from constituents of Red Deer-South, Calgary-Varsity, Calgary-Currie, and Medicine Hat, and I'd like to table the appropriate number of copies of the letters. All of them are talking about the lasting educational, social, and economic benefits of the arts in Alberta and, in particular, asking the government to increase funding to the Alberta Foundation for the Arts.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have five copies here of a letter sent from Doug Clavette to the minister of health. He's battling cancer, he lives in Calahoo, and he is requesting payment for the MRI that he had to pay for that was medically necessary. He wrote in June and has still not received a reply from the minister.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glegarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. With your permission I would like to table the appropriate number of copies of letters from 15 tourism operators in the Solomon Valley area northwest of Hinton. They object to plans by Weldwood Canada to cut timber in the area known as Athabasca 4 in the Solomon Creek watershed. They wish to remind the government of the importance of a maintained land base for tourism activities in this area.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader of the third party.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have four tablings today. The first tabling is a document prepared by the Northern Alberta Alliance on Race Relations. It's called All Colours are Beautiful. This booklet is a teacher's resource kit which uses literature to illustrate situations of racial discrimination to young people and allows an open discussion of racism and its implications.

My second tabling, Mr. Speaker, is a copy of a letter from Paul Boisvert to John Pilipchuk, a board member of the Lakeland regional health authority. This letter seeks "full explanation of the events leading up to the disposal at the sanitary dump of totally functional computer equipment" from St. Therese health care centre in St. Paul.

The third document, Mr. Speaker, is a news release from the Flagstaff county area. It's a letter that's written by citizens opposed to the hog plant development in the area. The letter protests the approval by the appeal board of a large hog plant operation there.

The last tabling, Mr. Speaker, is a copy of a letter of November 14, 2000, addressed to the hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane in which Janet Brygger and Anthony Neilson of Exshaw express their concern over the already high pollution levels in the Exshaw and Bow Valley areas and over Lafarge Canada's proposed coal conversion.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The chair would like to table five copies of a memorandum from the hon. Member for Calgary-Fort requesting that Bill 209, Employment Standards (Parental Leave) Amendment Act, 2000, be brought to third reading on Wednesday, November 29, 2000.

head: Introduction of Guests

THE SPEAKER: The Associate Minister of Health and Wellness.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's indeed a great pleasure for me to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of this great Assembly some very special visitors who are here today from Julia Kiniski elementary school, which is definitely one of the best schools on the planet Earth. They are accompanied by teacher Janis Parrott. Yesterday they were here with Donald Douglas. They are participating in the School at the Legislature at the behest of yourself, Mr. Speaker, and we're very grateful for that. They're having a wonderful time. I'd ask them to please rise and receive the very warm welcome of all members of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me great pleasure today to introduce to you and to all members of this Assembly 30 members and their guests of the Probus Club of central Edmonton. Probus Club is a group of professional and business persons who gather together for the purpose of fellowship and certainly of lifelong learning. They are seated both in the members' gallery and in the public gallery, and I would ask them to please rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to welcome and introduce to you and through you to all hon. Members of this Legislative Assembly 11 students from Concordia University, Gold Bar campus, and their teacher, Dr. Linda Kerr, who are visiting the Legislative Assembly this afternoon. They are going to come to the public gallery at 2 o'clock to observe question period. I would now ask all hon. members to please welcome them when they visit the Assembly.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

MR. WICKMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my privilege to introduce to you and through you to Members of the Legislative Assembly 90 grades 5 and 6 students from one of my favourite schools in the riding of Edmonton-Rutherford, Richard Secord elementary school. The 90 students today are accompanied by five teachers, Mr. Bryan Rosychuk, Miss Jan Scammell, Mr. Milles Collins, Mrs. Renee McLaws, and two parents, Mrs. Jayne Bawden and Mrs. Janice Peters. They are in the public gallery and the visitors' gallery. I would ask them to all stand at this time and receive the warm welcome of the House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader of the third party.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two introductions. The first one. I'm very, very pleased to introduce to you and to all members of the Assembly Ms Lan Chan-Marples, who is the executive director of Edmonton Chinese Community Services Centre and a board member of the Northern Alberta Alliance on Race Relations. She's also working on her PhD degree at the University of Alberta. Ms Chan-Marples is strongly committed to the promotion of human rights and elimination of racism in Alberta. Her organization, the Northern Alberta Alliance on Race Relations, is commemorating International Human Rights Day on December 8, 2000. I'll ask Ms Chan-Marples to please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly. She is sitting in the public gallery.

Mr. Speaker, my second introduction. Again, I'm very pleased to introduce to you and to all members in this Assembly Merrill Stewart, who is a New Democrat candidate for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan. I'll ask Mr. Stewart to please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

MR. STELMACH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to introduce to you and through you to members of this Assembly special guests that will be arriving in the Assembly at 2 o'clock. These are 29 students from Lamont high school. They are accompanied by teachers Mr. Blair Charlton and Mr. Todd Eistetter. In their absence may we welcome them with warm applause.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Redwater.

MR. BRODA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to the members of this Assembly 27 grade 6 students from the Thorhild school in my constituency. They also will not be arriving until 2 o'clock but will be observing question period. They are also accompanied by two teachers, Mr. Mike Popowicz and Mrs. Linda Ewaskow, and by parent helpers Mrs. Petra Roche, Mrs. Deb Hamilton, Mrs. Teri Green, Mrs. Sherrie Kapach, Mr. Kevin Kapach, and Mr. Harold Hamilton. I would ask that we please give them the warm welcome of this Assembly.

head: Oral Question Period

Electricity Price Fairness Review

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, this morning when I was thinking about my questions for today at 1:30, I was trying to think of what the government was going to do to bring down electricity prices that are skyrocketing on January 1. I decided that the government's answer was either going to be that they were going to intervene in the marketplace or they were going to subsidize a market with taxpayer dollars. Well, it's clear now from their announcement that they've decided to do both. So why did this Premier under his KEP mislead Albertans that prices were going to go down and has decided to intervene in the marketplace now that prices are clearly skyrocketing?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, we still believe that prices will go down in about a year and a half, when more power comes onstream. It's a simple fact that supply and demand dictate price, and that indeed will happen. Deregulation is going ahead.

I would remind the leader of the Liberal opposition that this government always said – always said – that it would monitor prices and listen to consumers and respond accordingly. We have always said that, Mr. Speaker. We made two major announcements earlier this fall in anticipation of rising prices under a regulated environment. We introduced the energy tax refund and the electricity option rebate. This latest announcement, this announcement today, provides further relief from short-term – and I stress: short-term – price fluctuations.

MRS. MacBETH: Will the Premier admit that his deregulation plan, his KEP, is a disaster now that he has decided to try to re-regulate the market?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, absolutely not.

MRS. MacBETH: How will this Premier's intervention in the marketplace solve the fundamental problem of lack of supply of power in this province?

MR. KLEIN: That, Mr. Speaker, is a good question. It is a good question. If the leader of the Liberal opposition has the answer, if she can snap her fingers like this – you know, just as she thought this morning, if that bright light can go on just as quickly as her mind went into gear, we would have absolutely nothing to worry about.

Mr. Speaker, you simply don't bring on power overnight. You have to build generation plants, and that is a huge capital endeavor. We have indications now that the power companies plan to bring on more power. We've had announcements from EPCOR. We see Luscar now contemplating a major power project in southeastern Alberta. We've had some indication from TransAlta Utilities that they plan to bring on more power. We see a lot of cogeneration coming onstream, but I have to reiterate: it does not happen overnight.

MR. CARDINAL: Mr. Speaker, in relation to electrical capacity, as you are aware – and I have indicated this in the House before – the peak demand in Alberta at this time is 7,247 megawatts. We presently have access to over 9,400 megawatts. So the capacity is balanced presently. As far as new generation, we have over 400 megawatts that's on-line now and another 1,600 megawatts that will come onstream in the next two or three years. As the Premier said, when this stuff comes onstream, no doubt the electricity rates will go down.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to that, on a day-to-day basis we are getting inquiries as to people interested in putting electricity in Alberta, and we'll continue meeting with those people.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, will the Premier admit that his actions today are going to create more not less, more uncertainty in the marketplace and that prices will rise accordingly?

MR. KLEIN: No. As a matter of fact, by law and through regulation prices will not rise. The announcement made today is to enhance the reliability of the Alberta electricity supply and to stabilize prices. There are some reasons, Mr. Speaker, and it's not deregulation. It's a matter of electricity that we have to import from B.C. Hydro, the good cousins of the NDs to the west, that is causing some severe spikes in rates. We're going to deal with that problem.

I'll have the hon. minister respond.

MR. CARDINAL: Yes, very briefly, Mr. Speaker. Today's announcement was part of the ongoing monitoring of the process of deregulation. It is only one part of the 10-point action plan we announced. We will continue monitoring the situation and make adjustments accordingly to serve Albertans the way they want to be served.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, when did this Premier change his mind about being back in business and become such a massive intervenor in the marketplace of this province?

MR. KLEIN: I am astounded. I am astounded. Here they have been chirping away for the last two weeks now saying: you've got to do something to protect consumers. We do something to protect consumers, Mr. Speaker, and they don't like it. Anything that we do that is good, they think is bad. Anything that we do that is bad, well, they think it's good. I mean, this is not the role of the opposition. The role of the opposition is to offer constructive criticism and to work with the government. The role of the opposition is to work with the government to make sure the consumers of this province are protected. That is precisely what we are doing, and they refuse to help.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, could the Premier answer the question as to how many other businesses in this province he intends to intervene in in the coming years?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, this is a situation that is very unusual, a situation that has occurred in a regulated environment, and we have an obligation. Our first step was to introduce the energy tax refund and the electricity auction rebates. We said that we would monitor prices and we would take, if necessary, appropriate action to protect the consumer. That's exactly what we are doing under this very severe circumstance.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, how much will it cost the taxpayers of this province to intervene in this manner that the Premier is proposing today?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I don't know what the costs might or might not be. Perhaps the hon. Minister of Resource Development has a better handle on that.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. minister.

MR. CARDINAL: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It shouldn't cost the taxpayer any more than what we have, because we have existing staff doing the work that are paid already.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, could the Premier just explain for Albertans what is going on here? Is he continuing with deregulation, or is he back into re-regulation? The power suppliers of this province would like to find an answer.

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, we are continuing with deregulation. Those people who want to buy power in a deregulated environment will be able to do so after January 1. Those residential consumers and farm consumers who want to stay in a regulated environment can do so after January 1. What we have done today is we have announced that the prices are going to be held virtually constant for the next year while the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board conducts a full price fairness review. I think that that is a reasonable and responsible action on the part of this government in terms of protecting the marketplace.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, the Premier can use all the bravado that he wants, but how much is he is going to spend to make sure that businesses and the economic cycle of this province generate more power rather than government intervention in the marketplace?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, one has to assume that if there is power to be used, there is power to be generated. Because of the tremendous economic growth and prosperity of this province it stands to reason that the power companies will be generating more power because the demand is already there and it's going to be increased in the future. So if there are buyers out there for the power, the power generators will make sure that there is power to sell. It's as simple as that.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members appear to be rather charged today.

Electric Utilities Deregulation

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, the government promised Albertans lower electricity prices under the deregulated regime. The opposite has been the case so far. Even the term deregulation is a misnomer. Prior to the so-called deregulation there were only four regulations governing the entire system. Until today under deregulation there were 32 regulations. I have them here. Today the government approved three more, bringing the total number to 35 regulations under deregulation. Will the Premier admit that the current regime is so complex that not even the government can understand it and that the only way to bring power prices under control is to completely reverse themselves and re-regulate prices as they have done today?

MR. KLEIN: Well, we're in a regulated environment right now. Mr. Speaker, if anyone should know about regulated price increases and raising rates without going through the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board, simply going to city council – this hon. member knows all about raising rates in a regulated environment because he's been part of it for at least the past three or four years as a member of the EPCOR board.

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, the Premier is as usual completely wrong. His facts are not correct.

How can the Premier pretend that when the government is intervening in the marketplace, it is not re-regulating?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I think there is a vast difference between re-regulating or going back into a regulated environment and protecting consumers from rising electricity costs under a regulated regime.

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, after today how can this Premier look Albertans in the eye with a straight face and pretend that this government knows what it's doing in the electrical industry?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that all of the rate riders applied for by companies and in many cases approved, including EPCOR, were approved under a regulated environment.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder.

Doctors' Fee Negotiations

MR. JACQUES: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last Friday many of my constituents were astounded . . .

AN HON. MEMBER: And outraged.

MR. JACQUES: And many of them were outraged, Mr. Speaker. They're very concerned to learn about the Alberta Medical Association taking job action in the form of withholding services only some four months prior to the current contract expiring and despite an offer by the government of 28 percent over two years. All of my questions are to the minister of health. The first question is: how do the existing fees for doctors in the province of Alberta compare with those in other provinces?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, we've done a survey of the 263 most frequently used fees in five provinces, the four western provinces and Ontario, and in 62 percent of the cases Alberta's rates ranked either first or second. Of course, that means that the other fees are not in the top two, but we have made a fair offer that keeps Alberta's fees competitive.

Mr. Speaker, currently our medical services budget, out of which physicians are paid, is approximately $1 billion. Our offer currently is to increase that by $263 million, or 28 percent, over two years. That compares with the Alberta Medical Association's opening position asking for $644 million. Currently their position is $525 million.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

MR. JACQUES: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to know what component of that government offer is with respect to specific physician fees.

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, the $263 million relates to a number of different areas. With respect to fees, the portion of that that relates to fees, the 28 percent increase is 13.4 percent over two years.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. member.

MR. JACQUES: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Based on comparable taxable incomes for the next taxation year, as a result of the single-rate tax and other tax initiatives how much lower will income taxes be for Alberta doctors as compared with other provinces?

2:10

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, with the fee increase that has been offered by the provincial government in these negotiations, the average billings for a physician will go from $195,000 to $221,000 a year. That would be the average billings. In answer to the hon. member's question about the tax position of such a physician, physicians in Alberta in that range would be taking home between $10,000 and $30,000 a year more because of tax savings in this province compared to other provinces in Canada.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder, followed by the hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

MR. WHITE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta Energy and Utilities Board is supposed to be a quasi-judicial body set up to be an independent review of the amount of regulated oil, gas, and utilities in Alberta. Last week this government through the Premier was to intervene in these hearings. This week and today he is ordering the hearings to do something that we're not sure of. Sir, what has changed from last week to this week other than yesterday's election?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would read the act – he doesn't need to read all the act, just one page or so. Under the Electric Utilities Act the government of Alberta has the authority to direct the EUB to conduct fairness reviews. All we are doing is using our authority to make sure that what is done is indeed done fairly and in the best interests of the consumers of this province.

MR. WHITE: In that the board is currently under the understanding that they're doing exactly that, reviewing all the inputs for the costs for the stable rate option and for the proposed rider rate surcharges, what's different between what they're reviewing now and what we are proposing they review for the next year?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I'll have the hon. Minister of Resource Development supplement. The AEUB now is dealing with specific applications for rate increases. This is more of an omnibus kind of action that really in a more global and more generic sense studies and reviews the fairness of electricity prices in general.

I'll have the hon. minister supplement.

MR. CARDINAL: Yes. Mr. Speaker, today's announcement, of course, was part of our 10-point action plan. It covers a number of areas: the rate riders, which the hon. member is asking about, and the import prices and also direct sales.

As far as the EUB's function, the EUB doesn't only deal with electricity. It deals with a broad section of responsibilities out there, and they continue to do a wonderful job. We are very confident that in the end they will do a good job of this added process that they are going through.

MR. WHITE: In that the minister continues to say that he has listened and responded to the needs of the province of Alberta and that there's the knee-jerk reaction of today's announcement, is that simply not another way of saying that you're flying by the seat of your pants in this electricity deregulation plan?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I have to reiterate that this government said back in September that we would carefully monitor this situation, that we would continue to monitor prices, that we would listen to consumers, and that we would respond accordingly. We said that back in September. That was deemed to be appropriate action on the part of this government, and I didn't hear the opposition squealing at that particular time.

At that time and in anticipation of rate increases under a regulated environment, we made two major announcements. Well, actually we made three. We made the energy tax refund rebate, we made the residential electricity auction rebate, and we made the auction rebate announcement relative to municipalities, farm communities, industry, and so on. I simply reiterate that this latest announcement provides further relief from short-term price fluctuation and serves to protect the consumer. What could be wrong with that?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead, followed by the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Coal Marketing

MR. STRANG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As members of the House are well aware, the recent closure of Smoky River Coal north of Grande Cache and Luscar Ltd.'s Gregg River Resources mine south of Hinton and the unprecedented high cost of electricity raises an interesting question about the use of coal to generate electricity. In fact, the price of natural gas and the power demands both are rising. Some Albertans are questioning: why not coal, as it would be the sensible way to go? Could the Minister of Economic Development tell the members of the House what is happening in the coal industry and what the department is doing to respond to these closures?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Economic Development.

MR. HAVELOCK: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Essentially there are two markets for Alberta coal. There's a domestic market for our thermal coal and an international market for our metallurgical coal.

Now, on the minus side unfortunately Alberta's international coal markets are in decline due to low world prices. However, we've seen some stabilization in some smaller markets; for example,

China, Egypt, and Brazil. That's been going on since 1999. We expect that trend to continue. Also, coal prices are stabilizing in Europe. So hopefully that will firm up the international market.

On the plus side, Mr. Speaker, the local coal market has increased its share of production as a result of stable demand from Alberta's electricity industry.

Now, with respect to Luscar and Smoky River Coal specifically, we are assisting both communities to address their long-term planning. Alberta Economic Development, for example, cosponsored the Yellowhead Regional Marketplace to identify opportunities for regional co-operation on economic development issues, and that includes the idea of forming a regional alliance.

In Grande Cache we sponsored a study to verify the viability of their proposed development as a tourism and retirement destination. We're working closely with the departments of Resource Development and also Human Resources and Employment.

Mr. Speaker, what we're finding is that if you take care of the small things, the larger things will also take care of themselves. For example, in the Grande Cache area our department helped facilitate the first ever tour of the dinosaur tracks located at the closed mine. In fact, there were two Japanese tour groups that came through. They were absolutely thrilled that we were able to get them on-site. They very much appreciated our assistance. So while we're assisting and planning at a much broader economic level, we're also trying to get the smaller things accomplished.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. member.

MR. STRANG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My first supplemental question: in light of high electrical costs, could the minister say what the potential future is for coal-generated electricity?

MR. HAVELOCK: Well, Mr. Speaker, I know this is going to upset the opposition, but this really is a good-news story. We are fortunate because Alberta is home to the lowest sulphur content coal found anywhere in the world, and as I just mentioned, the local coal market has increased production as a result of stable demand from Alberta's electricity industry. Further, domestic demand for thermal coal may well increase if selected Alberta companies go forward with their plans to actually convert from natural gas to coal.

By way of another example, the proposed Brooks power project provides a logical step in continuing to use coal for our electrical needs. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that we need to ensure that the Brooks project receives equal treatment in terms of both the regulatory and environmental processes to ensure that competition between natural gas and coal-fired generation projects offer the lowest cost electricity options for Albertans.

So, Mr. Speaker, it's very clear that the domestic market for coal in Alberta is very strong. The future of the industry generally is strengthening every day. We are very supportive in encouraging additional electrical capacity in this province either through natural gas or through coal, but certainly we see a tremendous future for coal and electrical generation in that regard.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

MR. STRANG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My second supplemental question is to the Minister of Environment. There are a number of environmental concerns associated with coal-fired facilities. In light of these concerns, would an increase in coal-fired power negatively affect our environment?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, power plants are among a wide range of industrial facilities in this province that are regulated by Alberta Environment under the Alberta Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act. Alberta Environment applies very stringent standards, standards which are ranked and recognized across Canada as being the most stringent or near the most stringent of any particular province or territory in this entire country. This set of regulations is diligently enforced by Alberta Environment, and we would do so, of course, if there are applications for expansion of coal-powered electrical generation in this province.

Mr. Speaker, I think it's really important to point out that at this point in time in the province Alberta Environment is involved in continuing to monitor and regulate the emissions coming from a number of coal-fired plants in this province currently. We are continuing to enforce those high standards with respect to the existing generation that is present in the province, and we are certainly committed to doing the same with respect to any future capacity in terms of new plants that might be proposed and come onstream in this province.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East, followed by the hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Electricity Auction

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The re-regulation of the electricity industry to control price increases has created uncertainty in the electricity sector, especially in the area of prices. Later this week the government intends to auction the last 2,200 megawatts of power held in the power purchase agreements. My question is to the Premier. Is it the government's intention to cancel this auction?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, the simple answer is, no, it is not our intention to cancel the auction.

If the hon. member will permit, I'll have the hon. Minister of Resource Development supplement.

MR. CARDINAL: Mr. Speaker, the Premier is always right. We're not going to cancel the auction, but once it is completed, we will carefully analyze the outcome and make adjustments or decisions at that time.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One of the things that potential purchasers through this auction must know is the price that is the alternative. How will they determine that alternative price that they have to use as a benchmark to determine what they will bid in this auction when we're going through a reasonableness review now which could take two or three weeks, maybe two or three months, maybe till after the election to get put in place? How are they going to get a benchmark to judge what price to bid tomorrow and the next day when they don't know?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, it is still market driven, and we're talking about people who wish to purchase power to provide long-term stability. We're dealing with a very specific situation relative to extreme price hikes under a regulated environment.

I would point out that the government has had an exceptional response to the pre-auction workshop, with over 70 companies and 150 people in attendance. So the auction will proceed as planned.

DR. NICOL: Mr. Speaker, the issue is that they have to know where the future is. This auction is a one-year contract that they're selling. They need to know the price next year. How are they going to have a base for that price to accurately bid in these auctions?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, they'll have to factor today in, and that is a good factor.

I'll have the hon. minister supplement.

MR. CARDINAL: Well, Mr. Speaker, in addition to that, the consumers as of today's change will have access to direct sales between supplier and users.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

School Infrastructure

MR. SEVERTSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One of the main recommendations of the School Facilities Task Force was to have an extensive audit of all the province's K to 12 schools. Today the Minister of Infrastructure has tabled the results of that audit. My question is: could the minister explain what the findings were?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure. [interjections]

MR. STELMACH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The school audit that was . . . [interjections]

THE SPEAKER: I really don't know what there is about the personality of the hon. Minister of Infrastructure that causes such disarray to occur, but we'll go back again to recognizing the hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

MR. STELMACH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for intervening.

What we did was complete a full audit of all 1,463 schools in the province. These audits were conducted by electrical and mechanical engineers following a very rigid set of criteria. They rated all of the schools according to priority in condition. Of the 1,463 schools about 689 were rated in good condition, about 639 in fair, and there are about 135 that were rated in poor condition. As a result, those are the first schools that we're going to work on in modernizing.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

MR. SEVERTSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: can the minister tell me how the modernization needs of the schools, particularly those in poor condition, are going to be met?

MR. STELMACH: Mr. Speaker, I have to give great praise to all of the school boards across this province, because during the summer they met with our staff to review the results of the audit. Now the school boards are conducting public meetings throughout their various divisions to see if all the schools audited are actually viable. Once we get back that list of priorities from the various school boards, we will then look at those schools that are put up for modernization. So the worst raw score is the first school to be done.

With respect to the new schools that are necessary, we are currently working on a utilization formula, but like I said, the trigger is 85 percent utilization in the school division to trigger a new school.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. member.

MR. SEVERTSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final question is to the same minister. Is there sufficient money in the new century schools plan to complete the necessary work?

MR. STELMACH: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is. It's $1.07 billion over three years. It's $635 million new money: $235 million this year and $400 million additional next year. We would want to move our meetings through with the School Buildings Board so that we get as many projects approved in principle so we can start as many projects as possible next year in the province of Alberta to catch up with the backlog.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-East.

MR. SAPERS: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Resource Development avoided taking responsibility for the mess in power deregulation and avoided answering questions in this House because he said that the issue was before the board. In fact he said, "On this particular issue" – and I'm quoting from Hansard – "we'll have to wait until the decision is made." Will the minister please explain why he has contradicted himself by today ordering that the EUB suspend its current hearings?

MR. CARDINAL: Well, Mr. Speaker, the Premier answered this issue very clearly earlier, and I did too. We will continue monitoring the situation. [interjections] I know you don't like that.

We will continue monitoring the situation, Mr. Speaker, and we will make adjustments as fast as we can once we determine there have to be changes. This is exactly what we've done.

I'm still waiting for their plan in relation to deregulation. About two weeks ago I asked for your plan to help us move forward and design a good electrical system for Alberta. We haven't seen anything yet. We're still waiting.

THE SPEAKER: The Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If the government was really interested in listening to the Official Opposition's plan they wouldn't have invoked closure on the 1998 legislation.

Mr. Speaker, given that the government has now said that the hearings will be interrupted pending a review, will the minister please tell us what the timing of this review is? I guess the real question is: are Albertans going to get the answer to this review before or after the spring election?

MR. CARDINAL: Mr. Speaker, the press release today and the documents provided identify that process as to what the timing is. It's very, very clear.

MR. SAPERS: So to make it clear, that means after the election.

Mr. Speaker, earlier the Premier said that there was going to be a price reduction in a year and a half. So I'm assuming that the Minister of Resource Development will table the order to the EUB about this review, and while he tables that, he'll table all of the studies that have shown what the supply curve is, what the demand curve is, and how it is that these prices are going to go down and exactly what the price points are going to be a year and a half from now.

MR. CARDINAL: Mr. Speaker, only the Liberals would do something like that when the process just started. We will continue monitoring the process, and we will file documents at appropriate times, keeping in mind that it would be in the best interest of the consumer out there. Not like the Liberals. They'd file it today probably.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-East, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Workplace Health and Safety

MR. AMERY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On November 15 Fiesta Party Rentals was fined $100,000 in Calgary Provincial Court for breaking a safety regulation which resulted in the death of one of their workers. Can the Minister of Alberta Human Resources and Employment tell us if the fine reflects a new awareness of the importance of workplace health and safety and the responsibilities employers have to protect their workers?

MR. DUNFORD: Mr. Speaker, in regards to the fine, of course no amount of money can ever compensate for the loss of a life and the loss of a family member. My sympathies again go out to the family of the young fellow that was electrocuted on that site.

Having said that, I do believe that fines such as the amount of the fine that the member indicated in his preamble really do send a rather strong message to employers that the health and safety of our workers cannot and, of course, will not be compromised. We expect employers to take their responsibilities seriously. They must do everything they can to make sure that their workers perform their jobs competently and safely. This means ensuring that workers are properly trained, use the proper safety equipment, and, perhaps as important as anything, know and understand that they can refuse to perform unsafe work.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

MR. AMERY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell us if prosecuting employers who violate the Occupational Health and Safety Act is a successful deterrent in reducing workplace injury?

MR. DUNFORD: Mr. Speaker, I'm a very strong believer in proactive education. I believe in proper information being provided to people. The fact is that preventative health and safety programs are really more effective to make our workplaces safe.

We in this province, as we relate ourselves to any other jurisdiction in this country, I believe have shown that with voluntary compliance we have had success in reducing incidents in the workplace that have led to injury and illness. But we want to make that sure everybody understands, including all hon. members here in this House today, that if all else fails, we will prosecute violations of our health and safety provisions.

There is a clear understanding in this particular province about the mutual responsibility of both employers and employees to work safely. Our partnership program is one of the techniques and one of the programs that we have in place that we believe is showing a high level of success in actually reducing injuries and illnesses on the job. I want to use this time in question period today to encourage all employers and employees who might be listening to investigate that partnership program and get themselves involved.

We know this approach works. There are something like 3,200 Alberta employers that are currently under this program. We estimate that this covers 20 percent of the Alberta workforce. There are clearly differences in lost time injury statistics between those that are in our partnership program and those that are outside the partnership program.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. member.

MR. AMERY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: what is your department doing to help increase awareness about health and safety issues with employers and employees?

MR. DUNFORD: Mr. Speaker, we're looking at some different ways in which we might be able to further communicate awareness to employers and employees here in the province. First of all, of course, I've challenged our partners and my department to identify where we could make the most difference in selected workplaces as we try to create more safety. We're looking at initiatives like a call centre. Of course, we're going to be employing web sites, looking at educational and promotional activities to really drive home our message that safer workplaces make Alberta businesses stronger.

Now, we're also increasing our focus on compliance. We're adding more inspectors, and we're giving them more time for inspections, and we're starting now to target high-risk industries.

MS CARLSON: Mr. Speaker, with his announcement today the Premier has finally admitted that his electricity deregulation scheme, better known as the KEP, has resulted in inadequate supply to meet rising demand, critically low reserve margins, and skyrocketing prices. After five years of bungling and mismanagement this announcement is an acknowledgment that the KEP has been a dismal and fundamental failure. When utility companies have spent millions to go before the EUB on regulated rate option tariff hearings, can the Minister of Resource Development tell us why this government failed to consult with utility companies before making this announcement?

MR. CARDINAL: Mr. Speaker, the government has a responsibility when consumers are asking us to look at an issue very carefully, and the opposition has done the same. We've indicated before that as we move forward with this deregulation, we will make adjustments when they're required to address the issue of consumer need.

These announcements today are part of the 10-point action plan. We will continue making further announcements. We will continue monitoring the situation and make adjustments as we move forward. We are not changing. That is the direction.

MS CARLSON: Mr. Speaker, when the fundamental problem is supply, what will that one-year grace period do to increase supply when this minister just said this afternoon that it will take two to three years to increase supply generation? This government just doesn't know how to plan.

MR. CARDINAL: Mr. Speaker, I indicated earlier that the existing capacity of electricity in Alberta is at 7,247 megawatts at peak demand, and we have presently more than 9,400 megawatts. So it generally addresses the issue that there is a reasonable balance.

In relation to new generation there are 1,400 megawatts that are on-line already. In addition to that, there are another 1,600 megawatts that will come onstream within the next two years. In addition to that, on an ongoing basis, either through the transmission administrator or through our department or through Economic Development and others, companies are approaching us discussing the issue of electrical generation in Alberta. We are very, very optimistic that we will have the supply that you over there do not want to see because you don't want to see the process succeed.

MS CARLSON: Mr. Speaker, nobody believes they know what they're doing. Why did this Premier and this minister change the rules just 34 days before deregulation is supposed to start when they have had over five years to care and listen?

MR. CARDINAL: Mr. Speaker, the rules are not being changed. We said that we will continue monitoring the whole situation of deregulation, and we will make adjustments. In fact, if the Liberals would come up with some good ideas, we could probably incorporate them in some of the changes we're making. If they're good ideas, only good ideas. So if you have good ideas, please forward them to my office.

Mr. Speaker, I'll have the hon. Economic Development minister maybe supplement that particular issue.

MR. HAVELOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you, hon. minister. We need to keep in mind that there's going to be ample opportunity for companies to generate a reasonable rate of return over the next few years.

To go back to what the hon. member across the way was referring to regarding capacity, just this morning I was meeting with a company that's looking at a very significant investment in this province, in excess of $400 million, to build a very advanced natural gas fired electrical generation facility that will generate over 500 megawatts of power. So what I'm hearing from the industry, generally, is that they have a great deal of confidence in Alberta, that they have a great deal of confidence in the economy, and quite frankly they have a great deal of confidence in this Premier, which drives those guys nuts.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Little Bow, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Rural Electricity Costs

MR. McFARLAND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've talked to constituents in Little Bow and residents in the city of Lethbridge who are business and residential owners. I've looked at their billings for the past couple of months, and I want to indicate that they're very confused about a dramatic rise in the consumption that's graphically illustrated in their Enmax and Utilicorp billings, which of course means a significant percentage increase in their cost of power. My questions today are to the Minister of Government Services. What assistance, Madam Minister, does your department offer to the residents that I've referred to in my preamble to clarify or validate the actual kilowatt consumption that's showing on their billings and the dramatic increase?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Government Services.

MRS. NELSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is a very valid question. We have had constituents from the riding of Little Bow contact our department with concerns about massive spikes in consumption. As most people will look at their utility bill, there's a little chart at the side that shows the last year, the change from the estimate to the actual on the consumption of their electricity and their water on a monthly basis. In this particular riding there was a massive spike in the consumption of electricity, particularly so far in what we've seen from this constituency.

We have gone and made some calls based on these concerns and complaints to the electrical companies, utility companies, to ask them if there was a flaw in the system or if there was some sort of an oversight that would cause the unbelievably unprecedented spike in consumption on these consumers' bills. We've asked them to validate the bills, because it is very, very strange to see three times the usage come up in one month that would be there for the previous year's registration on the charts.

We are working with that, and we hope that the companies will contact those consumers directly and have a resolution come between their consumer complaint group and the company. If they don't, then we will assist the consumers, with our own people working almost as an arbitrator between the consumer and the electrical company.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Little Bow.

MR. McFARLAND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for the answer.

With respect to the one specific utility, Enmax, Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Government Services indicate just what exactly she and the Enmax officials have found out in their initial discussions on this consumption increase?

MRS. NELSON: Again, Mr. Speaker, we have been in contact with the officials from Enmax. There has been some concern that because of the new transition between the distributing companies this last little while there may have been some errors made, and these disputes may in fact be real between the consumer and the retailer of the electricity.

We looked at other scenarios that may have occurred down in the city of Lethbridge area. There was some concern with some water meter readings that had gone a little off-kilter and were overcharging and causing some difficulties. That ended up being the result actually, quite frankly, of faulty meters that had been installed in that area.

So we are looking at all angles of this along with Enmax, and they're very co-operative in the process. They want to have the dispute and the discrepancy resolved very, very quickly. We will, again, keep on with the program, and if more consumers come forward – I'm sure your constituents aren't the only ones, because they seem to span 100 miles apart – we will look at all complaints that do come through.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Little Bow.

MR. McFARLAND: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Instead of blaming everything on deregulation, then, is it possible for the minister to convey to these customers if it's possible to have an actual monthly reading on their meter rather than an estimated reading?

MRS. NELSON: Well, as the hon. member knows, most utility companies work on an estimate and then do a reversal to the actual once they have the meter reading done. Some utility companies read the meter every month. Others do it every second month. We have asked the question and inquired whether it could be consistently every month that the meters are read so that if there is something that goes astray, it can be picked up immediately.

We had some that said that they were going to read meters only once a year, which we were a little surprised at and thought that's not going to be really quite acceptable, I wouldn't think, to consumers. We asked them to come back to us with a plan and to reconsider doing a reading more frequently as opposed to less so that if there are problems that do arise, they can be addressed between the utility company and the consumer very quickly.

head: Members' Statements

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, in 30 seconds from now we'll call upon the first of three members to participate.

In the interim, birthday greetings to the hon. Member for Leduc.
The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Friends of Seniors Foundation

MS KRYCZKA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As chair of the Seniors Advisory Council for Alberta I have heard that only seniors know what is best for seniors. I've also heard that seniors prefer to be only with seniors. I disagree with these statements, and I will use a truly wonderful example that supports my position.

The Friends of Seniors Foundation in Calgary is the brainchild of Brenda Wood, an intelligent and active parent who is also a constituent in Calgary-West. The foundation is a charitable organization and under Brenda's leadership provides intergenerational programs which help create caring partnerships between teens and seniors in care centres. In 1999-2000 five schools and five care centres participated with 150 students and 75 seniors visiting with each other on a regular basis.

The foundation has a present waiting list of 25 schools and care centres, or approximately 1,100 students and seniors, a strong indication of the demand for this fresh approach in meeting the needs of both generations. A few of the many benefits to youth are to dispel myths of race, culture, disability, aging, and other stereotypes and to acquire community service and job experience. For seniors a few of the many benefits are to alleviate loneliness, give them something to look forward to, and a sharing of life skills and experiences with youth.

Mr. Speaker, we must encourage the Brenda Woods in Alberta who dare to envision and to persevere. Seniors needing continuing care will increase in unprecedented numbers within the next 10 to 15 years. The Friends of Seniors Foundation provides our youth with training in dementia and Alzheimer's disease, creates awareness of seniors and aging, and influences youth who will be our future caregivers, builders, and architects of the future. The foundation is helping to ensure that the decision-makers of tomorrow will have experience, empathy, respect, and knowledge as to the aging process and will know what changes are required in order to improve the quality of life for seniors.

Brenda Wood, I strongly applaud the foundation and its goal to be able to offer its programs to every interested school and care centre in Calgary. Congratulations.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Intensive Livestock Operations

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The last year has seen a number of cases where communities have been divided over the merit and the approval process for the planning development of large-scale livestock operations. The divisions have arisen because of a lack of a clear process and from a lack of flexibility at the local level in planning and land use decision-making.

In October the Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development announced the appointment of a committee, headed by the Member for Leduc, to address the issues of the development of an appropriate process for the approval of intensive livestock operations. The committee is made up of Ben Thorlakson from the Cattle Commission and also Roelof Heinen, a past president of the Alberta Association of Municipal Districts and Counties.

The challenge for this committee, Mr. Speaker, is to incorporate a balance between the environmental needs of all Albertans and the local community and also the local development approval process that gives the local communities the choice to implement and to develop the kind of community that they really want. In order to do this, they're going to have to look at the need for provincial level intervention or supervision of the environmental process, but they're also going to have to look at the ability of the local community to develop the appropriate level of planning processes, which includes zoning, which includes development of a process that will allow them to, in essence, have the final say in whether or not an intensive livestock operation actually is established in their community. This will also require, then, some changes to the Municipal Government Act.

Mr. Speaker, I would encourage this committee to look at those options, because we have to have a system that will allow for the flexibility for community control but also give our agriculture sector the opportunity for growth so that we can reach the $20 billion of value-added and the $7 billion of primary production that's the target by 2005.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

Reidun Tatham

MS GRAHAM: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased today to rise and recognize a very uniquely talented and accomplished young athlete from my constituency of Calgary-Lougheed. That young person is Reidun Tatham and is one of Canada's finest synchronized swimmers. She represented Canada at the 2000 Olympic Games in Sydney, Australia, in September. Reidun returned to Calgary with her head held high, wearing her latest and most cherished accolade to date, an Olympic bronze medal.

Mr. Speaker, 22-year-old Reidun has been involved in synchronized swimming for 15 years. Since taking up the sport at the early age of seven, she has demonstrated an unwavering commitment to her sport. In her lifelong quest for Olympic glory she has not only developed outstanding athletic skills, but her sport has also helped her acquire the character traits and life skills necessary to succeed in life.

For the last two years Reidun joined the top 10 Canadian synchronized swimmers at the Centre of Excellence in Toronto to prepare for the Sydney 2000 Olympics. The training was intense and often demanded more than 50 hours per week, but the hard work of Reidun and her teammates paid off in a big way: international recognition on the Olympic podium for their bronze medal win. Mr. Speaker, I'm told that according to the team coaches, who are likely the harshest critics, they described the team's performance in both the long and short programs as the best swims ever for their athletes.

On behalf of all members of the Assembly I wish to extend our congratulations to Reidun and her teammates on their outstanding performance in Sydney and to say to these young people that they brought great honour to our province and to our country.

Thank you.

head: Orders of the Day

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, prior to proceeding, we had notice of motion today given by the hon. Member for Edmonton-

Meadowlark dealing with a motion that she wanted the Assembly to address, so we'll take it under consideration now.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

MS LEIBOVICI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Earlier this afternoon I provided notice that I would seek unanimous consent of the Assembly to advance Bill 221, which is the Public Health Care Protection Statutes Amendment Act, 2000, so that it would be the next bill dealt with during private members' business. Now, while I recognize that all private members' bills are important, it is also important to note that Bill 221 will put forward the repeal of Bill 11, which in fact opens the doors to private, for-profit health care in this province and was one of the most contentious bills in Alberta's history. Also, as we are all aware, it was opposed by a majority of Albertans.

MR. HANCOCK: Point of order.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader, briefly, because I was going to interject anyway. Go ahead with your point of order.

Point of Order Relevance

MR. HANCOCK: Mr. Speaker, yes. Under 23(h), (i), and (j) this is a request for unanimous consent, not an opportunity to debate the merits of the bill or anything else.

THE SPEAKER: That's absolutely correct, hon. Government House Leader.

Hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark, quickly.

Debate Continued

MS LEIBOVICI: Thank you. The authority under which I move this particular request is Beauchesne 18, wherein it states:

Within the ambit of its own rules, the House itself may proceed as it chooses; it is a common practice for the House to ignore its own rules by unanimous consent.

Therefore, I am requesting that unanimous consent be given to move Bill 221 forward on the Order Paper.

Thank you very much.

THE SPEAKER: Thank you, hon. member. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark is requesting unanimous consent from the Assembly, so there'll be one question.

[Unanimous consent denied]

Government Bills and Orders

head: Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

THE CHAIRMAN: I'll call the Committee of the Whole to order.

3:00

Bill 209
Employment Standards (Parental Leave)
Amendment Act, 2000

THE CHAIRMAN: Are there any amendments, comments, questions arising out of this bill?

MR. CAO: There is no amendment to be introduced here, sir, but I would like to speak further on it, Mr. Chairman, to answer a few questions. I will try to keep my comments brief today so that we can hear from as many members as possible in the limited time we have remaining at this committee stage.

However, there are two important subjects I would like to address. First, I would like to respond to a couple of the questions and concerns that were raised by my colleagues during the debate last week. Secondly, I would like to share with everyone some of the recent developments in the province of Ontario that I think are quite relevant to this debate. The general concern that I hear brought up on this time and time again is that this bill is potentially harmful to Alberta businesses, particularly small businesses. I don't know how much more I can say to respond to these concerns, but I will attempt once more, again, to clarify my argument on this issue.

First, as I have pointed out, the number of people actually taking leave in any given year is likely to be absolutely minuscule in comparison with the overall size of the Alberta workforce. Furthermore, I must emphasize that this leave is not mandatory. In fact, many parents may choose not to take it or at least not to take the full amount. Even the existing maternity leave provisions are not fully used by all eligible mothers. This legislation simply ensures that sufficient leave is available to those parents who assess their own family situation and decide to do it if needed. I don't see how the small number of parents who make this decision each year is likely to be too onerous for Alberta employers to bear.

Not only that, the cost of employers to locate, hire, and train replacement workers will remain the same whether the leave is extended or not, and even if we keep maternity leave at the current level of 18 weeks, the replacement worker must still be found and trained. Similarly, any administrative or planning costs associated with this leave are already being paid to administer or plan existing maternity leaves. Simply expanding the length of leave is not likely to substantially increase these costs.

I think that is all I will say on this issue, Mr. Chairman. I believe the potential negative impact of this legislation on Alberta businesses has been somewhat exaggerated, and it should not be allowed to distract us from considering the potential positive impact of this legislation on Alberta children and families.

I would, however, like to respond to a couple of specific questions that were raised by my colleague the hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert. She noted her approval of the fact that under Bill 209 adoption leave is to be amalgamated into the 27 weeks of parental leave. Then she inquired as to whether parental leave could be taken by adoptive parents regardless of the age of the adopted child. Could it be taken, for example, if the child being adopted was as old as 12? The short answer to her question is yes.

It was my intent with this legislation to give adoptive parents the same rights as birth parents. It seems to me that it is important for parents to establish a lasting bond with the new child in the first few months, regardless of whether the child is a newborn infant or an adopted child of any age. Even if they are not babies or young children, adopted children face the same difficulty of adjustment, and they can only benefit from having the parent close by their side as they experience that transition.

The opposition Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert also inquired as to whether two parents could split the 27-week leave between them. Again, the answer to her question: yes, they can. The intent of this legislation is to allow parents the freedom to determine for themselves which of them should take leave and for how long. Each family has its own set of values and its own unique economic circumstances. This legislation allows them to take all that into account and make their own decision on how they will divide the allotment of parental leave.

Having addressed this question, I now would like to move on to my second purpose here today, which is to inform this committee of some recent and exciting developments in the province of Ontario. In fact, while we were debating this legislation last Wednesday afternoon, Ontario was announcing sweeping changes in its own Employment Standards Act. Ontario was already ahead of Alberta in the area of parental leave, offering 17 weeks of pregnancy leave plus an additional 18 weeks of parental leave. Now Ontario will allow birth mothers to take up to a full year, 52 weeks, of leave. This would be composed of 17 weeks of maternity leave plus an additional 35 weeks of parental leave. Other parents, natural or adoptive, would also be permitted to take 37 weeks of unpaid parental leave.

Clearly, by changing the Employment Standards Act to bring parental leave provisions in line with the federal EI benefits, Ontario is moving even further ahead of Alberta on this issue. This is particularly interesting given that Ontario has always shared our concern for maintaining a positive business environment. For example, Ontario implemented a series of business tax cuts very similar to our own. Obviously, Ontario's commitment to a sound business climate has not disappeared overnight. Instead, it must be the case that the Ontario cabinet has reached the same conclusion I have on this issue: extending parental leave is not likely to have a substantial negative impact on business.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I understand why business owners and some of my colleagues have concerns about this legislation, but I believe that if they examine the issue more closely, they will reach the same conclusion as the government of Ontario did: these concerns are largely unfounded. Extending parental leave would not be overly harmful to the employers' interests. It would be greatly beneficial to the interests of children, parents, and families.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. [interjections] I appreciate the support from my colleagues.

I've gone back and read the Hansard on this debate, and it was interesting to see the kinds of concerns that were raised on this. Certainly the Member for Calgary-Fort has done everything in his power to try and calm those fears and alleviate the concerns that have been raised. One of the substantive concerns that was raised against the bill was from Calgary-North Hill. I have to admit that in the year 2000 I was really surprised to hear that sort of a concern being raised, but I'll accept it as legitimate. The hon. member seems to feel very strongly about it.

Essentially his point was that somehow this legislation and lengthening the amount of time of parental leave that would be available would impact badly on women in the workforce because businesses would hesitate to hire women at all and that that would result in a hiring discrimination against women. I'm struggling for words to . . .

MS CARLSON: Unbelievable at the very least.

MS BLAKEMAN: Unbelievable at the very least. Tsk, tsk. The member should know better at this point.

Later on in his debate the member . . . [interjection] Well, yes. That's what he deserves for that kind of comment. I mean, given that sort of thing, the hon. member wouldn't be sitting in this House. That's ridiculous.

Later on he goes back to say that he doesn't support the bill because he thinks the marketplace should decide this sort of thing.

Well, I have to disagree with him, because I think if we had left it up to the marketplace to decide, we'd have no defined hours of work for a start. The marketplace was pretty darned keen, if I remember, on about 80-hour workweeks and no lunch hours or coffee breaks for any of the workers. They just wanted them to work. We certainly wouldn't have any minimum wage, because the marketplace would prefer to almost not pay workers if they could possibly get away with it, certainly in some cases. We certainly wouldn't have health benefits, probably not pensions. We could be in a situation where we'd still have child labour, because we do see that in other countries where there are no restraints on the marketplace whatsoever. So I don't know that kneeling before the altar of the marketplace is really going to move us forward here in this millennium.

The marketplace certainly hasn't addressed the wage gap between men and women, for example. I think we're still struggling with a wage gap of somewhere between 63 cents for women and a dollar for men. It's just done nothing to address that. The only thing that has addressed it is pay equity legislation.

So what other things can we look at that the marketplace did not address and isn't ever likely to address? They don't want to address it. That's part of the purpose and the point of government: to enact legislation or to provide benefits and remedies that will protect the workers or in some cases the consumers. In that, this is very appropriate legislation to bring forward. We do now recognize and value the contribution that women make to the labour force, their ideas, their perspective on things, the creativity that can be brought to the workforce. I really did not expect to be standing in this Assembly having to debate the merits of this in the year 2000. For shame.

So I simply do not accept the argument that the marketplace should decide this. I think it's perfectly appropriate that we do have legislation that covers this. Let's look at a couple of examples then. We've got some sectors that are dealing with a gender inequity, and they're not doing anything to address it. Therefore the inequity is continuing to pose a problem. I'm thinking specifically of the legal sector, where we now have well over 50 percent – I think it could be toward 75 percent – of the graduates from law school that are women. Well, they get out into the workforce, and given that climate, that marketplace, if you want to call it that, women are leaving. We've got trained lawyers who are leaving those professions in droves, just saying: "Sorry. We're not going to play this kind of game. This is not in our interest or in our family's best interest." They don't seem to be jumping up and down and rushing about trying to correct that imbalance in that situation in the legal profession. Frankly, it's to their loss, and I hope they do start to address that soon.

One of the other accusations leveled was that somehow this legislation was an intrusion into people's lives. This government is more than willing to intrude into people's lives in economic policy, deregulation policy, in all kinds of things they're willing to do without batting an eyelash. So I don't know why extending parental leave by a few weeks would be considered any great intrusion into someone's life. I think it's improving quality of life, and if we really are talking the best interests of the child, then that certainly is attempting to address that.

When I spoke in second reading, I was urging the member but I think more to the point urging the wider government members to look at the other programs and legislation that exists to try and improve a number of the other parts that come into raising children in this day and age. I had talked about covering midwifery services under health care, the issues of child poverty, the issue of minimum wage, which certainly affects quality of life and the best interests of the child. Employment and pay equity is another area that could certainly be addressed that would help families and working families. Health care. Housing is a huge issue. There was a symposium today on seniors' housing, and within the last few weeks I've been at other symposiums for social housing. It's a huge issue. Really, if we're going to talk about the best interests of the child and raising good children and all the information that I read in Hansard that was raised around the discussion of this bill – how we've got to get involved in prevention and spend more time with children at a younger age and all those good things – well, boy, if they don't have good housing to be doing that in, there's another area the government could be working on.

I talked about education and availability of education, the size of classrooms, additional costs associated with K to 12 education in this day and age, how much parents have to work to subsidize that, and I talked about higher education.

I thought about it some more, and I thought: well, if we were taking it from the angle of the best interests of the child, as the Member for Calgary-Fort suggested, I think there are a few other things that could be looked at. For example, it is in the best interests of the children to have a much stronger and much more rigorously enforced but, let me add, fairer maintenance enforcement program. Now, that's in the best interests of the child. We could have pay equity, where people were earning better wages. That would be in the best interests of the child. We could have better prevention programs like Head Start. That would be in the best interests of children.

I can't get Head Start programs. I can't get additional or new Head Start programs in my constituency because the funding is limited for it. We've got one on one side of the constituency. Well, tough beans for any kid living on the other side, because we can't get one in the school that's closer to them. So, you know, you want to talk about the best interests of the children? There's something. Let's look at the funding for Head Start programs and other prevention programs.

This bill is trying to do a simple thing, which is to extend the parental leave to parents so they have more time at home with a newborn or with an adopted child, and that's an admirable thing to attempt. I'm certainly willing to support it. As far as I can see, there's no hidden agenda here. I certainly hope I'm not proven wrong in the future. It appears to be a very straightforward attempt here to make it possible in this world, in this day and age, for parents to spend more time with their children. It's not a difficult concept. It's certainly not difficult to implement. We've got most of it in place already. This is a matter of extending the amount of time that is available and making it available to both mothers and fathers.

The Member for Calgary-Fort has already answered some questions about whether parents could each take time, that one could take 10 weeks and one could take 17 weeks, and yes, indeed we're being told that that was part of what was being planned here, which I think is a great idea.

So we should be able to support this bill. As I said before, I simply don't buy the arguments that somehow this is an intrusion and that the marketplace should be left unfettered to somehow come up with this, because frankly they're not going to come up with it. It's not going to happen.

I do underline that this is about unpaid leave, and for most of those families who are in poverty or struggling, this legislation isn't going to help, because they can't afford to take the leave. There's another huge issue that should be seriously looked at by this government if programs like what's being proposed by the Member for Calgary-Fort in this Bill 209 are to flourish. We really need to be addressing seriously the whole issue of child poverty and poverty in general. I mean, poor children are not Cabbage Patch dolls. They come from poor families, and we're not doing much to address those issues here.

A look at my e-mails and the letters and notes that are being dropped through my mailbox on the effect of electrical deregulation on people in my constituency is telling me right away that it's having a huge effect on people. One of the problems with that is that if parents can't afford to be paying the electrical bill or the gas bill and they're looking to then put their children in care of the government, to give them up into custody of the government because they can't afford to provide for them, what kind of situation is that where we trap people into making those kinds of horrible choices? They certainly don't want to be there.

Now, I did look through the definitions. I'm not too sure on this one, but as far as I can tell, the definition of "parental" is not spelled out here. So I'm assuming, in fact, that it could cover or include gay and lesbian relationships, if they're choosing to adopt, for example, because there's nothing in here that precludes that. If indeed that's the case, then I commend the Member for Calgary-Fort on his inclusion, which is very nice to see.

I view this bill as an investment, and I think it could be the start of a series of preventative programs. I certainly encourage the government to view it that way, where it's the beginning of a longer trail, an expansion of an attitude towards the people in this province from the government recognizing that people are an asset and the government's willingness to invest in them. Part of that is in bills like this. But I strongly encourage the government to consider the rest of the society that this exists in and to understand that prevention is a key part in keeping families healthy, a key part of the best interests of the child. We need to view this bill in the context of what exists today and what is possible in the future and move forward on it.

I don't want to take up too much time today, because I'm aware there are others that want to speak to the bill. I'm interested in following the rest of the debate to see what other possible objections could be brought forward from members opposite.

I'm certainly willing to support it at this point, and I look forward to further comment in third reading. With those words, thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray.

MR. BOUTILIER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity to provide comments on this private member's bill, sponsored by my colleague from Calgary-Fort. I didn't have an opportunity to contribute during second reading. As you well know, as this is a private member's bill, there is only a limited amount of time, so I'll make my comments brief before the time actually expires. I'm going to take the opportunity at the committee stage of this bill to discuss what perhaps could have been brought up in second reading, but I ask the indulgence of the chair on this matter because I feel my comments have considerable bearing on the debate at the committee stage as well.

It seems to me that Bill 209 is a highly admirable initiative that could make a real difference in the lives of some Alberta children and families. We have the opportunity to commit to our children and to invest in the future so that they can turn out physically and mentally healthy. All of the research I have seen indicates that when children get the kind of care they need during the first year of their infancy, they have better physical, mental, and social health outcomes. When that happens, it almost goes without saying that we will have lower health care costs, lower educational costs, lower social program costs, and even lower, perhaps, justice system costs.

I know that those who have gone before me have touched on similar themes, as my colleague before me has mentioned, but there is one important point about this legislation that I don't think has been mentioned yet. It occurs to me that Bill 209 could be an important way to ensure that rural – and I use the term “rural” – Albertans enjoy the same early childhood development opportunities as their urban counterparts. Mr. Chairman, this government has clearly demonstrated through initiatives like the supernet high-speed, broad-band network that it is committed to giving all Albertans, regardless of where they live in this province, the same access to government programs and services.

I believe Bill 209 has the potential to accomplish the same kind of thing because it will place parents across the province on a level playing field, and a level playing field is important. Currently, for those parents who do not live in or near major urban centres, child care facilities may not be realistically accessible or affordable, and in most remote areas of this province there may not be another family member, close friend, or neighbour available to provide the care that is needed for a newborn child. Obviously it would be particularly important to those areas for parents to be able to remain home with their newborn or recently adopted children for as long as possible.

In the course of reflecting upon Bill 209, by my colleague from Calgary-Fort, I have come to realize that it conforms with many of our government's other objectives in addition to the goal of providing equal access to services across the province of Alberta. The objective that stands out the most in this regard is expressed in the Alberta children's initiative.

Now, the question here today in having a clear vision and policy framework is to support the healthy development of Alberta's children. It has produced an important policy document entitled An Agenda for Joint Action. The very first, substantive line of that business plan reads as follows:

The Government of Alberta has made a commitment to putting children and young people first. All ministries in government have a role in ensuring that Alberta's children thrive in a healthy, safe and supportive environment.

The children's initiative document goes on to note:

Research shows that a complex range of physical, mental, emotional, cultural, and spiritual factors influence how a child develops. Preventive supports early in children's lives can help avoid more serious and costly interventions later [in life]. The healthy development of children is vital to their lifelong well-being and healthy functioning as individuals, family members and [also] community members of our great province. As I read over the passage, I just kept nodding to myself in approval, because it seems to me as if it were written with this very bill in mind. It definitely seems that child care experts and senior policymakers within this very government have acknowledged the fundamental importance of a strong parental presence in early childhood development.

Having said that – I know my time is growing short – no matter if the number is 27 weeks or perhaps is 30 weeks or 34 weeks, I believe this initiative is a positive one for the future of young Albertans in this province.

With that, Mr. Chairman, I'd like at this time to move for adjournment of debate on this particular bill.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'd move that the committee rise and report.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Egmont.

MR. HERARD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration and reports progress on Bill 209.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in this report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Opposed? So ordered.

Pension Reform

514. Mr. Hlady moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to examine its future in the Canada pension plan or explore other options, including a made-in-Alberta pension plan or a mandatory personal retirement savings plan.

[Debate adjourned November 21: Ms Carlson speaking]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

MRS. SLOAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased this afternoon to rise and make some remarks relative to Motion 514, “a made-in-Alberta pension plan.” My reading of the history of this motion's inception takes us back to cover a bit of landscape in the history of this province, and it gives rise to the prominence of an individual who was quite prominent in last night's federal election. He didn't fare overly well in that election, and I would be hoping that his brainchild of a made-in-Alberta pension plan would also not fare well in this Assembly this afternoon.

My reasons are that when the hon. Provincial Treasurer past, the Member for Red Deer-North, first conceived the idea of having a pension plan, it really was sort of a reactionary thought, because the federal government had brought about Bill C-2, which was enacted to try and address the concerns that were being raised that the Canada pension plan over time, because of the population demographics, was not going to be able to provide pensionable earnings to those that were insured. So the federal government in a very accountable manner brought this bill forward to increase contribution rates. That raised some angst in Alberta, as quite often federal government actions are prone to do in this province, and it was that bill that then spurred the Provincial Treasurer of the day to say that we should develop our own pension plan.

Now, again, just to bring some of the history to light, we attempted at the time to obtain some of the documentation that the Provincial Treasurer was using as justification for why a provincial pension plan should be drafted. He refused to release documentation that was in his possession, some 18 pages that had been prepared between July '97 and October '98 which spoke to reforms to the Canada pension plan or options to replace the Canada pension plan. In an August 21, '98, letter the former Provincial Treasurer had said that the Cowell committee, which is John Cowell, did not prepare separate reports on the feasibility of establishing a made-in-Alberta pension plan or the merits of turning the retirement component of the CPP into a mandatory or individual RRSP-style account.

We did learn, though, Mr. Speaker, that on December 1, 1999, the past Provincial Treasurer met with a group of policy analysts and academics to discuss the feasibility of the pension plan. So even though the analysis wasn't fit to be made public, in his estimation, he continued to fantasize to some degree with this concept. Although there was agreement that as a result of Alberta's younger population and high employment rates it could deliver a pension plan that would be similar to the CPP, with somewhat lower contribution rates, at least initially, there was concern about the portability of benefits, the costs of initial setup, and the overall and ongoing administration costs that the province would be forced to incur.

There was also concern about a determination of and agreement on the distribution of assets and liabilities of the Alberta portion of the CPP if in fact Alberta had proceeded to disengage themselves from the federal plan. Noting that history, Mr. Speaker, for the record I think it's an honourable thing that the past Provincial Treasurer has moved on to greener political pastures, some might say. The landscape, even in eastern Canada, is a bit bare at this time of year, so the green may have to wait for another day. I acknowledge that this was his concept and that the motion that's before us this afternoon is in fact in some respects being further debated, instead of being pulled, out of respect for his service to the province. In that respect I'm happy to provide my thoughts and my voice of opposition to the proposal.

In reality, those things aside, Mr. Speaker, with due respect to the right of members to bring these types of initiatives forward, however far fetched they may be, would the creation of an Alberta pension plan really result in more benefits than costs, or, put another way, would the costs not outweigh the benefits in this scenario?

Even in thinking through some of the very simplistic repercussions of doing this, I was prompted to think about the rates that employees and employers pay under the CPP. While perhaps in its initial inception the Alberta type of plan might be able to offer some type of enticement to have lower contribution rates for employers and employees, we know that our economy is very diverse. It's also very prone to booms and busts. I in my time in this province have definitely been through one major one, in the mid-80s. We've now rebounded from that bust, and we're in a boom phase. In logistically thinking about how a pension plan and contribution rates would be customized to weather that boom/bust cycle, if you think about how that affects the number of employers, the number of employees, I'm really not sure, Mr. Speaker, that this is really a logical or achievable initiative.

We in the opposition believe that there are some alternatives that the government could be pursuing in this regard. If truly there's concern about the ability of the CPP to cover Albertans within the next several decades, then certainly the past Provincial Treasurer is well situated to voice alternative suggestions and to, respectfully, provide some concrete alternatives. Now, what might those types of alternatives be? Well, certainly we could encourage the federal government to take steps that would encourage Albertans to use the private pension plans that exist, retirement savings plans, without having to go the course of eliminating the CPP or disengage Alberta from the federal plan.

Other examples of concrete suggestions that could be made would include increasing contribution limits for investments in individual RRSPs, indexing those higher contribution limits to inflation, as well as increasing the amount of foreign property that Canadians and Albertans can hold in RRSPs from the current limit of 20 percent.

We believe these measures would encourage contributions to individual retirement savings plans and thereby generate a higher rate of return on contributions. Mr. Speaker, once you take the politics out of it, if you take the antifederal factor out of this bill, really I believe that the end result, the pure intention is to try and protect Albertans from a potential day when the CPP might not exist to be able to provide a pension benefit. If that's the case, these other mechanisms could be avenues that would achieve that end.

The scenario that was proposed by this motion – and I'm certainly anticipating it's not going to be passed this afternoon. But in the event that some force should strike the government caucus to propose it, I think there are other flaws within the proposal that need to be pointed out, and let me just include those into the record.

If we look at taking the route of mandatory self-directed RRSPs, as has been suggested, there are still a number of questions about the feasibility of defined-contribution retirement savings plans. These issues include things like the investment risk which is placed on individual contributors, the impact on long-term rates of return from low-risk investment, the incidence of administrative costs, the impact of higher female life expectancy on the level of retirement benefits, and the development of adequate transitional provisions which ensure that contributors do not have to pay twice to fund new individual savings retirement accounts.

Mr. Speaker, to something that I'm little bit more familiar with. It also strikes me that if this government was sincere in wanting to ensure that Albertans were able to access pensionable support in retirement, they would look at trends that exist in this province; as an example, the increasing exploitation of part-time workers for the primary purpose of not having to pay those employees benefits or pensions. Actually, I should qualify that in the part-time category those would be nonpermanent positions or using the casual or temporary classifications, as is rampant in the health care sector, in the social care sector, and in the disability sector.

We have widespread use by employers, because of the financial cutbacks of this government, of casual or temporary employees that are not in a position to receive any benefits or any pensions. They are also not in a position to earn sufficient money that they can put any money away into RRSPs. So, you know, while we could go to great lengths to design some made-in-Alberta pension plan, I think our purpose here in this Assembly is to really seek to respect and defend and protect the interests of Albertans, and I believe those would be best served through addressing some of the demographics of our workforce.

Another example of a demographic that requires addressment is the increasing number of women in the workforce, many in positions that are also not receiving an employer-provided pension plan. The demographics are across the map. Many of them are women who are approaching their senior years. Many of them are single parents. Many of them are of an ethnic background. These are another component of the workforce which is not going to benefit from a made-in-Alberta pension plan. They're basically scraping to get by as it exists now, and these are some examples of where I think our energies this afternoon and in the years to come would be better placed.

Now, I did read through some of the literary attachments of analyses that have been done by people who certainly have much more expertise on this issue than I do, and one that struck my eye was a study that was conducted by Robert Brown entitled Alberta Opting out of the Canada Pension Plan: Can It Be Done; Should It Be Done? In that study Mr. Brown said that Alberta would face financial implications for opting out of the CPP: while Alberta would be able to claim some $4 billion in assets of the CPP invested in provincial government bonds, it would also be responsible for the actuarial liability within the CPP of the benefits that its workers have accrued to date. Mr. Speaker, in my review of the debates on this bill I've not seen the government respond to that reality. So what is really the balance sheet analysis of this bill? What's the cost?

With due respect, I believe we have to be prepared to do a bit more research if we're going to put something on the agenda of this Assembly that gives all members the benefit of knowing whether or not it's realistic to even contemplate the scenario. In the case of creating a made-in-Alberta pension plan, Mr. Speaker, I think it's absolutely integral that there be, at least in a preliminary way, some estimation of the costs.

Mr. Speaker, I also could not refrain, in debating this bill, from referencing some of the Auditor General's remarks from 1999-2000. There's quite a substantive section in his report this year about Treasury, which I would direct the hon. member to. In a number of areas what the Auditor General found was that Treasury was having a bit of difficulty managing their business as it was. Again, if we want to be responsible legislators, I think we've got to look at: what's the capability within our public service to take this on? What I read in the pages of the Auditor General's report is that we have a public service that is barely making ends meet, and in many respects the ends are very frayed and are no longer holding the rope together.

Now, specifically on the Alberta pension plan issue, on page 278 of the Auditor General's report he talks about the administration of our existing Alberta Pensions Administration Corporation. He pointed out that the audited financial statements for the Management Employees Pension Plan (MEPP) were not issued until August 2000, over 190 days after MEPP's fiscal year-end. The delay in the issuance of the audited financial statements was mainly due to the performance of an actuarial valuation as at December 31, 1999 to determine whether the pre-1992 unfunded liability was eliminated.

So there were issues about timely reporting even with the pension plan that exists through the administration corporation. That was significant enough to cause the Auditor General to comment on it in this year's report.

Well, my time is up. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Before I call on the hon. Member for Fort McMurray, I would like to remind hon. members that we're dealing with a motion and not a bill and that we're dealing with a private member's public motion. We're not talking about a government motion or a government bill.

The hon. Member for Fort McMurray.

MR. BOUTILIER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Relative to my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View's motion, Motion 514, I feel compelled at the outset of my comments in this debate first and foremost to say – the hon. colleague on the front bench on the opposite side made comments relative to barely making both ends meet. Certainly I take exception to that. I am very confident and proud of our public service in Treasury in terms of the administration of whatever this government presents to it. They have proven themselves in the past and, I'm quite confident, will continue to prove themselves in the future. That's why so many other provinces are looking at the taillights of Alberta this day, because of that competence that is going on here.

Relative to the point of Motion 514 by my hon. colleague from Calgary-Mountain View, I believe this motion really appears to be a very prudent response to a very evident problem with the Canada pension plan. This problem is indeed severe. We do not want to understate the situation that presents itself to us today. Albertans have never put their heads in the sand and said: we don't want to take and deal with the problem. That's why I applaud the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View for his initiative today relative to Motion 514.

It is quite possible, perhaps even probable, that the Canada pension plan could in fact collapse in my lifetime. In fact, to support this evidence, the Fraser Institute survey of independent investment managers found that no fewer than 98 percent of respondents thought it likely or very likely that the Canada pension plan would face a major funding crisis sometime in the next 25 years.

Just this past January the Association of Canadian Pension Management issued its own very disturbing report. Its primary message – and I quote the vice-president of the association – was: don't rely on the government to look after you. The association also noted that there are currently four working taxpayers for every pensioner in this country, and even at that ratio the CPP, the Canada pension plan, is struggling to stay afloat. Given the demographic trends by the year 2030, just to provide some insight, there will only be two working taxpayers for every CPP beneficiary. Even if one does not conclude from this that the CPP is inevitably doomed, one must consider and certainly concede that a serious and urgent consideration of its future is absolutely essential. That's why I applaud Motion 514 by my colleague for Calgary-Mountain View, because that's exactly what the purpose of Motion 514 is all about.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, rumors of the CPP's demise have become so prevalent that a conference was held last year to discuss the issue. Presenters at the conference were asked to respond to just one question and one question only: should there be a separate pension plan for Alberta? The delegates engaged in spirited discussions and identified a number of important factors. I think it's important to recognize that Albertans are very strategic in terms of how they lay down a financial plan for the future, and in doing so, there is not always agreement. In fact, one distinguished presenter quite accurately likened the CPP to a huge, unstable pyramid scheme on a national scale.

Conference participants were not always able to answer the single question with clarity in a simple yes or no answer. The inconclusiveness only underscores the point of Motion 514 by my colleague, that the future of the Canada pension plan is an ambiguous one. We all know the importance of uncertainty in the marketplace, and ultimately there is lots of uncertainty in terms of the future of the CPP. It is incumbent upon us in this private member's motion to be responsible to explore its future in the plan as fully and extensively as possible.

My colleague's motion also suggests two possible directions should it be determined that Alberta's best interests lie outside the CPP. The first of these options would be to establish an APP, an Alberta pension plan, with roughly the same structure and level of benefits as the CPP. This is the current situation in Quebec, a neighbouring province, which established its own QPP back in 1966, I believe. However, from the beginning the reserve fund of the QPP was managed – and this is a key and relevant point – by an independent provincial investment agency. Nonetheless, the QPP also has fallen victim to some of the same problems as the national CPP, forcing it to enact similar serious reforms just three years ago. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the experiences of the QPP offer a number of useful lessons for Alberta to consider if we are to pursue the APP option, the Alberta pension plan. I should mention that for many of the following points I'm drawing on the excellent and thorough work of Francois Vaillancourt, an economist who participated in the conference that I just made reference to.

The first lesson to be learned from the QPP is that a separate provincial plan generally offers far greater flexibility in terms of social policy. Yes, that's social policy. For instance, Quebec was able to offer reduced pensions to those aged 60 to 64 in order to counteract the incentive in most pension plans for employees to work right up to retirement age. This innovative policy was eventually copied by the CPP in the late '80s. I'm not suggesting that under an APP plan this province would necessarily want to offer retirement incentives one way or another, but the point is that we could if we wanted to, adding that greater flexibility to the challenges that face this country, and certainly Alberta once again wants to be out in front of those issues.

A second lesson of the QPP is that a provincial plan might not create costly incentives for people to take advantage of disability benefits. One of the most important factors in the recent rise in the CPP payments has been a dramatic increase in disability payments – interestingly, this increase has not occurred in Quebec – and one reason is that there is an incentive for most other provincial welfare programs to offload disabled recipients onto the CPP disability program.

Now, this is an important point, because it would not be the case in a province where the provincial government was responsible for the programs. The likely result is that disability payments would be much less of a drain on retirement savings and therefore would not create the same pressure and reason to raise premiums. Of course, that is an important component in the sustainability of any program.

A third possibility suggested by the QPP example is that a large public pension fund would have the effect of encouraging the development of the local financial services industry, a made-in-Alberta solution once again. Once developed, this financial expertise would be an easily marketable resource and an excellent way to extend the Alberta advantage.

In today's society I believe that in Alberta we want to continue to look for vehicles to be able to attract the venture capital that's required in the province, but we need a vehicle to be able to attract that venture capital. Rather than being at the beck and call of those on Bay Street or Wall Street, why don't we have the billions of dollars that are presently coming from Alberta invested in Alberta? Why can't Alberta have its own Bay Street and its own Wall Street in terms of investing Alberta resources to be able to attract and be able to use that financial vehicle for the benefit of all Albertans?

Mr. Speaker, a second option suggested by this motion is the creation of some type of personal mandatory retirement savings plan, or as I refer to it, an MRSP. Such a plan would have the potential for considerably greater investment returns. In fact, the first year that the limited CPP reserve fund was invested on the Toronto Stock Exchange, it earned a return of nearly 40 percent on a $2 billion investment. That is a substantial and reasonable return by any account in terms of measurement. But this fully funded, privately managed MRSP option is also one that is favoured by several interested parties, including the Canadian Taxpayers Federation.

The CTF advocates a plan that would be mandatory in order to limit the financial strain on noncontributory benefit programs. It also favours defined contributions rather than the current system of defined benefits. The current system also forces the government to intervene or raise premiums in order to maintain the guaranteed benefit level. Ultimately what we are talking about here is the sustainability of those who invest. But if only contributions were defined, benefit levels would be determined by each individual's chosen investment strategy.

The MRSP option also has been utilized in other jurisdictions around the world, so it is not a new concept. In 1981 Chile replaced its pay-go system with a privatized MRSP system. Under the Chilean plan employees were required to contribute 10 percent of their salaries.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I can say that I support the motion. I think it's an important Alberta initiative.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: I'm required to interrupt the hon. Member for Fort McMurray because under Standing Order 8(4) I must put all questions to conclude debate on the motion under consideration.

[Motion Other than Government Motion 514 carried]

Snowmobile Trails

515. Mr. Coutts moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to establish a pilot project in partnership with the recreational snowmobile industry that would include such initiatives as a cost recovery fee system, i.e., registration and user fees, to support the development, maintenance, and promotion of safe, multi-use trail systems for snowmobiling in the province's green zone.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

MR. COUTTS: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today to speak to Motion 515. This, in essence, does wish to just examine the development of an industry sustainable, multi-use trail system for the recreational snowmobile industry in Alberta.

The necessity for snowmobile enthusiasts to define their role in the tourism industry is greater than that of some other recreational pursuits. This is because of the potential hazard of snowmobiling resulting from the extreme speed of the sport. There is also a large potential benefit for tourism in Alberta's smaller communities, as snowmobiling could bring excitement to touring rural Alberta during what is otherwise considered as a low or an off-season.

Unquestionably, there is a role for snowmobile enthusiasts to play in this development of tourism marketing, and positions such as tour guides, outfitters, language and trail interpreters will all need skilled and enthusiastic snowmobilers to help fill those positions. This value-added component – and that's what I'm looking at, the value-added component – to our tourism industry would contribute to local economies, which could mean more than just offsetting the costs of a trail network.

Mr. Speaker, many of the trails in the Crowsnest Pass area and the Pincher Creek area have historical significance as old trapping and ice fishing trails, each with an individual character and a certain amount of myth. Today, in the last 40 years, many cut lines and logging roads provide a very well co-ordinated trail system potential for southwest Alberta. One advantage of a trail network would be to begin the development of what are otherwise unused and remote areas throughout Alberta and provide greater economic and geographic diversity to our ever-expanding tourism industry.

In 1999 our own Pincher Creek-Crowsnest Pass area was ranked by SnowRider Magazine as the best overall snowmobiling area in western Canada. It was also ranked highest for the area where people would most like to ride in the future. So with increased tourist traffic, regular trail grooming becomes necessary in order to maintain the region as a competitive tourism destination. Trail grooming consistently ranks high in importance to vacationing snowmobilers in market demand surveys. With over 1,200 kilometres of designated trails in the Pincher Creek-Crowsnest Pass area and with that overall ranking, a pilot project would be appropriate in the green area in the southwest corner of our province.

There is an expressed need to separate snowmobiling from some of its current, unofficial venues because of measurable harm being done both to property along particular routes and to the snowmobiling enthusiasts themselves. Snowmobiling is the root of much unintended harm to third parties, an issue that must be addressed as the popularity of the sport increases. Some of the negative aspects to nonusers include but are not limited to damage to farmers' crops, disturbance to farmers' livestock, as well as endangerment to other outdoor recreationalists.

The potential for ill will, worry, or even real harm to a sizable group of Albertans could be avoided by a separate designated trail system for snowmobiles. Not only would the snowmobile community welcome exclusivity over their trails, but other outdoor enthusiasts such as cross-country skiers, hikers, and winter campers could also enjoy the resulting peace. Farmers would be relieved of a major source of aggravation in real damage to their crops or to their livestock, and snowmobilers would no longer be prone to injuries such as the situation of being snagged suddenly by barbed-wire fences and that type of thing, which is devastating. The safety to our public health system alone would be substantial, not to mention the pain, suffering, loss of wages, and the potential loss of life to the snowmobilers.

Mr. Speaker, the cost of trail maintenance should be borne by the snowmobile community, as a lack of safe and well-mapped trails is primarily a safety issue with direct consequences to the snowmobiler. Harm to third parties would also be averted by separating snowmobile trails from other industrial and recreational venues, and the cost borne by the snowmobilers would represent a fair cost of participating in this activity.

Although it has long been the practice for snowmobilers and landowners to agree on land use for recreation, there is not always consensus. By co-ordinating activities provincially, there would be an assurance of a venue for snowmobilers and a greater assurance of safety. In some cases private landowners have been held responsible for damages suffered by trespassing snowmobilers. Because of this extraordinary capability for speed and manoeuvring, a snowmobile is capable of taking the life of a rider or causing serious injury. If for no other reason but safety, it is these types of incidents that cause trail development, maintenance, and mapping to demand our attention. I would hope that in the future there would be more discussion on the inherent risk of snowmobiling as well as a method of regulating those who have had the privilege of snowmobiling on designated trails in the province.

There are many issues surrounding snowmobiling that cross over into other areas involving dirt bikes and all-terrain vehicles, or ATVs, in the summertime, and it is reasonable that these similar pursuits could be and would be governed by a similar process. If these two sporting groups would come to an agreement, there could be a cost-sharing agreement for trail development. There could be some maintenance issues resulting from mud during the spring thaw, for instance, but these specifics could be left to the users to determine and to eventually settle and eventually participate in making the trail better for all concerned. Even if there were some issues that were difficult to resolve, with some initial guidance and the mechanism for the snowmobile industry to generate funding, problems could easily be addressed by the users themselves.

Mr. Speaker, even with Motion 515 there would still be a safety concern as new trails often have hazards. It is important that snowmobilers understand the risks involved with the trails where they are riding and that individuals are not placing themselves at risk unless they choose to. An unfamiliar trail or cornering too quickly at an accelerated rate of speed can cause a snowmobile to tip and possibly harm not only the vehicle but the rider or others that are following. This problem could be avoided by offering adequate mapping as well as a simple rating system for the trails. Neither of these options pose a great cost but would nevertheless enhance the safety and reliability of trails.

It may also be necessary to address issues of determining how costs could be shared, where trails are to be developed, how trails would be maintained in remote areas, and how to incorporate the continued role of volunteers in this industry. Thus it is necessary to investigate these issues thoroughly and facilitate a consensus between users to solve the problems.

The Alberta Snowmobile Association has been actively seeking positive ways to increase the safety and the popularity of their sport, and I commend them for their participation so far and their concern for the industry. Many of their ideas have been developed into a limited trail system throughout the province. The focus on safe and well-maintained trails initiated by this fine organization could be extended to all potential users of the trails in the hope that they could also play a role in their maintenance and safety.

The lack of a co-ordinating policy has stifled growth in the snowmobile industry for far too long, and Alberta is behind nearly all other provinces in facilitating a snowmobile or multi-use trail system. Small clubs have attempted to create trails for the enormous demand, but they are unable to do so because they lack the resources and the volunteers for the task. Although the trails that have been developed strictly by volunteer units at this point in time are serving their needs, with the extra demand there is a need to go further.

Mr. Speaker, Marvin Eckert from Alberta Beach is an entrepreneur in the snowmobile industry, and he has expressed some very insightful points of view. Mr. Eckert is the chairperson of trail development for the Alberta Beach Snowmobile Club, and he is continually approached by people wanting to know where they can access new trails. The Alberta Beach Snowmobile Club has been given a mandate by its members to attempt to create a snowmobile or multi-use trail from Edmonton to Whitecourt, but so far they've succeeded in placing only seven kilometres of trail. Snowmobilers feel extremely frustrated in that they have no links between the trail system and they are forced to ride their snowmobiles along roads. Riding on roads and in the ditches is actually illegal.

Mr. Eckert, when asked, feels that there's great support for the province to take a leadership role in providing a pilot project for a self-sustainable multi-use trail system. He expressed a hundred percent support for increasing his registration fee if it were to include funding for a co-ordinated plan for a safe network of trails. The current system of snowmobiling along highways and ditches and on private property is limiting, and there are many voices and participants willing to change this situation if given the opportunity. Mr. Eckert from Alberta Beach likened the current situation to the registration of cars and trucks. It is, he said, the equivalent of providing registration but no roads to drive on, at least not legally.

He also described the incredible growth and the potential in the industry. Currently his shop, Ecko Marine, in Alberta Beach employs 14 people, all of whom stay there during winter months exclusively because of the snowmobile enthusiasts. The Alberta Beach Snowmobile Club has a hundred members, most of whom are involved in the club because of their interest in creating trails for recreational enjoyment. There are hundreds of others in the area not belonging to the club but who are equally interested in safe, well-maintained snowmobile trails.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there is a multitude of uses for a trail system other than snowmobiling. The possibilities are almost endless if we consider the number of activities that take place in Alberta's remote areas. I mentioned dirt biking and ATVs earlier, but trail use does not have to be limited to vehicles. If some trails were to be specifically designated for use in the summer months by fishermen, naturalists, botanists, bird watchers, and foresters, I'm sure these people would make use of them. Almost any summer or winter recreational activity would benefit from good trails.

Mr. Speaker, improved access to more remote areas of the province through a trail system would create a truly unique experience for those seeking adventure in Alberta, and surely the opportunity for a hinterland adventure would be a further selling point for Alberta's tourism industry. I encourage all members of this Legislative Assembly to vote in favour of Motion 515 and increase recreational opportunities for all Albertans.

Thank you.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. What a pleasure and a thrill and a delight it is for me to get up and speak to the motion put forward by the Member for Livingstone-Macleod on snowmobiling, my favourite topic. He's raised a number of interesting points that I'd like to respond to. I remember that a few years ago – I think it might have been '97 – the same member brought forward a similar motion, perhaps a little wider in scope than this one, and we had a good debate on this at that time. Oh, it might have been a bill.

I have a couple of questions for the member, if we could get a bit more specific about what's being proposed here. The motion says, "in partnership with the recreational snowmobile industry," and I'm wondering if the member had in mind any particular group. He did refer to the Alberta Beach club, and he also referred to the Alberta Snowmobile Association. Was he anticipating that there was a partner already picked out to do this with? When it says "industry," I'm wondering if this was meant to be a coalition of suppliers, dealers of snowmobiles. I listened carefully to what he was putting forward, and that doesn't sound like where he's going with this.

Part of my asking those questions is: why are we not working with the Alberta Trailnet system, which is the Alberta component of the Trans Canada Trail, which is already set up to be a multi-use trail? This is now trying to go off and establish a new set of trails. That may well be a good idea, and it may well be fine. I'm just wondering why Alberta Trailnet didn't get considered in this equation. Maybe if he gets a chance, he can answer me on that or perhaps answer me in writing.

Now, what sort of fee was this "cost recovery fee system"? I'm wondering what sort of fee the member was anticipating there, because snowmobiling is not a cheap sport. I think that the smallest machine you can buy in this day and age is probably around $5,500. You could easily drop 10 grand, and you wouldn't be buying top of the line with that amount of money. By the time you get suited up with the helmet, the suit, and the boots, you're probably looking at another couple of hundred, up to $500 more if you want the leather outfit. Then you can get into all the accessories, things like the two-way radios in the helmets, the electric defogger on the helmet mask. So this is not a sport for the thin of wallet. Having said that, as snowmobilers – and it must be clear to everyone by now that I'm actually a snowmobiler and proud to have been one for 36 years – we're also willing to spend money to ride, to go places where there are good trails, well mapped and groomed.

The last time we debated this, I talked about how I was unhappy that I was having to take my snowmobile tourism dollars out of Alberta because there really wasn't any place for me to do that kind of recreational riding here in the province, how I had gone down to Montana and Wyoming and specifically to Yellowstone park to ride there. They really lay out the red carpet for snowmobilers. The park is open to snowmobiling for almost half the year. The town welcomes you. You can ride through the town, with a few restrictions as to which roads you're not allowed to be on. The hotels certainly cater to it. You can rent machines there. That's where a lot of Alberta riders go when they're looking for a week-long snowmobiling holiday. There really isn't any equivalent place to do that here in Alberta.

There have been various attempts over the years to try and establish that, so I'm wondering if the member is aware of or what happened with the government-funded snowmobile trail loops that were put together by the government just outside of Calgary. I'm going to stumble on the names. I think one of them was McLean Creek and the other one was Sibbald Flats, or I might have those reversed. One was a fairly short loop, maybe 30 K, and the other one was even shorter than that. You know, those trails were made, and I think they were supposed to have been groomed for a time.

I remember hearing last winter, I think, from a grand snowmobiler, a master snowmobiler named Bob from Calgary, and he was right ticked off, because he would take his motor home and park it in the staging area there and ride from the staging area, and all of a sudden there were all these fees. He was being charged, and he was being charged a day fee, but on the other hand they wouldn't allow him to stay overnight there. So he just kept getting charged this day fee, and it was adding up to a fair amount, but he felt he wasn't getting any service. There was no plug-in; there was no electricity. There was no nothing.

So the government has in the past put money into snowmobile trails in this province. What has happened to that investment, and can we not go back to that and continue the work that was originally envisioned? If we're looking at giving support to this industry, frankly it's a smart idea. There's lots of possible tourism there. As the Member for Livingstone-Macleod pointed out, there are lots of possibilities for small centres and tourism dollars there. Why don't we have a look at what we've already invested in and see if there's any way that we can continue with that work?

Also, speaking of work that has been done in the past, when I was the executive director of the Alberta Snowmobile Association, about 1984 or '85, one of the projects I did was a map of all of Alberta which showed all of the different areas where there were clubs and riding areas, with contacts. So if you were going to go to Bonnyville, you could tell by the map that there was riding there, and it also had a phone number to contact so you could call up the local club and see if you could arrange to go out riding with them. That sort of thing was not a very expensive project at the time and might be something else to be done in conjunction with what the member is suggesting here.

He's right in saying that in order to be attractive to riders, you need to have trails that are interesting and long enough. Given the snowmobiles we have today, a 100-kilometre ride, 150-kilometre ride: nothing; that's easy. So a 30 K loop just isn't going to cut it; that could be done before coffee break. Then what are you supposed to do? Load up the trailer again and go back to town? No. So we do have to consider, if we're looking at a project, that it is long enough and interesting enough to keep people coming back to it.

Trail grooming is really important, and that's a huge difference between Alberta and everywhere else. B.C. has put a lot of money into trail grooming there. They help their local clubs buy the big groomers, and we're not talking some piddly little thing that you pull behind a machine. These are great, honking big tractors that have proper grooming apparatus on them.

AN HON. MEMBER: Honking?

MS BLAKEMAN: Yeah, honking. Sorry about that, Hansard. They'll figure it out. Big, big. Okay?

AN HON. MEMBER: How big are they?

MS BLAKEMAN: They're big tractors, and the grooming blades are about 10, 15 feet wide for the trail.

AN HON. MEMBER: That's not 10 feet.

MS BLAKEMAN: No.

I am so glad that I have engaged the other member.

Speaker's Ruling Decorum

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The chair hesitates to interrupt this, but, hon. member, when you engage across the floor, that's precisely what happens: soon the people on the other side drown you out.

We would remind all hon. members that only one member is being recognized at this moment, and that member is the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Debate Continued

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Actually, I'm delighted that everyone is so engaged in this particular debate because snowmobiling is important to Alberta and it can be far more important to Alberta. It is a growth industry; it is value added. We really haven't paid very much attention to it here in this province, and I think that has been to the detriment of all for a number of reasons. Because there aren't a lot of known trails that are mapped and groomed, people tend to strike out on their own. It's very hard to get clubs together here, and certainly clubs are the backbone, as with a number of sport and leisure activities. They're the backbone of the sport. They're the ones that teach the kids safety. They're the ones that help sort of enforce with the adults that there's a safer way to do things and make sure that people don't drink and drive, for example, and don't cause damage to people's property, that there are trails laid out and carefully marked, and there are guides that will take you on the rides. That's the kind of thing that clubs can provide for you, but that's hard to get going in a small centre if everybody can just strike out on their own across the field somewhere because there are no trails to go on. So I think there's a lot that this province could be doing to really capture this, and they're not, so I'm encouraging them to do that.

Now, I was talking about trail grooming in B.C. That government has put money into assisting the local clubs to purchase these big groomers, and they do groom those trails. They are nice and flat and wide, and they have a maintenance schedule. There may even be money to pay an honorarium or perhaps a salary to someone to groom these trails. Again, B.C. has got a roaring tourism business during the winter in snowmobilers. They make a lot of money off Alberta snowmobilers going to B.C. because we don't have anything in Alberta. The grooming is really important, because I hear about it. People come back and go: oh, the trails on Clemina, they weren't groomed. There'll be a lot of complaining about it, and next time they go out, they may not go up that particular mountain because they feel it wasn't groomed very well. So this is more than building the trails; it's also marking the trails and grooming the trails for usage.

Then beyond that could be mapping them, and that's certainly a possibility for a commercial venture. Mind you, I know that in Yellowstone everybody just hands the maps out. Any restaurant, any coffee shop, any souvenir shop, they'll all happily give you a map. Then other people make money by laminating them so when you drop them in the snow, they don't get wet, and things like that. There are all kinds of value-added things that are possible.

I do have a question about why this is being approached as a complete user-pay system. When I look at other sports and recreational activities, I go: hang on a sec. You know, there are a lot of them that have direct or indirect government support or community support for what they're doing. It could be municipal support. So I'm wondering why the insistence that the total cost be borne by the snowmobiler in this case. For example, ski hills get development money. NHL teams get money; that's hockey. Communities build arenas, and in the arenas then you can have curling and hockey and skating. So why this insistence that the entire cost is borne by the snowmobiler?

I'm now paying 35 bucks for snowmobile registration, and what am I as a rider getting for that 35 bucks, I'd like to ask. Now, I don't begrudge that; okay? I'm perfectly willing to obey the law and pay the fee. But this is 35 bucks, and I can only use this for less than six months of the year. So why isn't part of that fee being used to supplement the cost of building and marking and grooming and mapping these trails? Why is it now expected that I'm going to fork out even more money for this specific project? I'd like to know a bit more about where my snowmobile registration money is going first, thank you very much.

The second thing is that it can be a bit of a deterrent, and I'll fess up to this one. Because I'm now riding in central Alberta in the Athabasca area, I wanted to do the right thing and join the local club and support them. Now, the ASA has got a new scheme going whereby you now pay $50 a machine a year, $40 if you do the advance payment. You know, I rode once with that club up there, and I just thought: a hundred bucks for one ride; that's a bit steep, even for the snowmobile-loving person that I am. So I think we've got to be really careful about that.

The other issue that hasn't been dealt with here is occupier's liability. With decent occupier's liability we would have it made.

I'm going to get adjourned here, but I will come back.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: I'm required to interrupt the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre. The time limit for consideration of this item of business has concluded for the afternoon.

4:30

head: Government Bills and Orders

head: Third Reading

Bill 3 Statute Revision Act

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure this afternoon to move for third reading Bill 3, the Statute Revision Act.

We've had some discussion on this bill at second reading and in committee, so I won't dwell on it other than to say that this act provides an opportunity for us to become a much more modern jurisdiction with respect to how we deal with statute revisions by bringing forward not only the full and complete statutes revision for the year 2000, which is necessary, which is needed by all of those who refer to the statutes of the province of Alberta from time to time in the course of their business or in the course of advising Albertans about the law, but also providing for the unique opportunity to do revised statutes on a statute-by-statute basis, where appropriate, where statutes have been amended from time to time and prior to the general revision, which would happen on a 10-year or 20-year basis.

So by approving this act at third reading and by passing it into law, Madam Speaker, what we're doing is providing the opportunity for our statutes to be dealt with in a timely manner and consolidated and official versions provided on a revised basis, which will provide access to better and more timely revisions and which will give Albertans a useful tool in knowing the law that applies to them.

I would just conclude my debate, Madam Speaker, by thanking the Official Opposition. This is a bill which truly has been a model of co-operation. I had the opportunity to sit down with the opposition Justice critic from Edmonton-Norwood, as she then was, and the Opposition House Leader to deal with issues and concerns related. We even, I believe, consulted with the third party with respect to concerns that were raised and worked out wordings, which were passed by amendments in the Committee of the Whole, to deal with concerns that were raised so that we could truly work together to achieve a situation where Albertans would have access to updated laws on a timely basis.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Madam Speaker, thank you very much. I'm pleased to join debate, albeit briefly, at third reading on Bill 3.

It's interesting. The bill has actually been before the Assembly for a long number of months but hasn't consumed a lot of debate. The reason is that in fact the government and the Justice minister in particular exercised some tremendous leadership here in terms of responding to what I still believe to be legitimate concerns raised from the opposition side, worked on and instructed his officials to draft amendments to basically address the concerns that the opposition had raised. I think it's fair to say that the opposition is quite satisfied now that Bill 3 as amended in fact is consistent with other legislation in provinces like Ontario, British Columbia, the federal government, and consistent with its earlier antecedents, the Revised Statutes of 1980, 1970, 1955, 1942, and even the Revised Statutes of Alberta of 1922. So I'm glad we've made those changes.

The only thing that might make this a perfect exercise in legislation would have been a referral of the regulations to the Standing Committee on Law and Regulations. But absent that, I understand we then get into a collision of different philosophies between the opposition and the government. So we might yet even have some opportunity to talk about my favourite amendment on other bills before we see the end of this fall session. I know the minister of natural resources is anxiously awaiting that debate, riveted to his seat, absolutely riveted, Madam Speaker, and looking forward to that clarification.

The other thing I just want to say, because I'm in some respects just the cleanup guy on this bill, is that I think something should be said about Sue Olsen, the MLA for Edmonton-Norwood. I think Bill 3 in many respects exemplified her leadership in the Assembly, her focus on being an advocate for constructive change, her role, I think, as a tough and assertive legislator but always a fair one, and one who I think was quick to point out and to thank the Justice minister when he did the kind of disclosure and sharing of information on a timely basis as is the practice of the current Justice minister.

Maybe I'll see if I can get the signature of the Justice minister on a copy of the bill and be able to send it off to our former colleague from Edmonton-Norwood. It's simply a very small tribute to a small bill, but it exemplified, I think, her approach to this Assembly and to her job as an MLA.

Those are the comments I'd want to make to Bill 3. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 3 read a third time]

Bill 27
Miscellaneous Statutes
Amendment Act, 2000 (No. 2)

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I move Bill 27, Miscellaneous Statutes Amendment Act, 2000 (No. 2), for third reading.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: I'd just make the observation, Madam Speaker, and restate the opposition commitment to continuing to work with government to expedite the passage of the miscellaneous statutes acts on the basis that the items in them are noncontentious, that they don't raise important issues of public policy, and that they're widely and strongly supported by those Albertans that as individuals and groups would be affected by those amendments.

I think we're making some headway. I'm not sure, Madam Speaker, but it seems to me that a number of years ago I remember seeing miscellaneous statutes acts the size of a Drumheller telephone directory or darn close to it. I think the fact that perhaps the government is being a little more selective in terms of those elements they propose to include is a very positive thing.

I hope the government and the next government, if we don't meet again, will adopt this model. For those members that are back, I know that ministers will choose not to take the easy way by saying every time they see a piece of legislation that it's easier to toss it into miscellaneous statutes than it is to take it through the convoluted internal bill review process of the government caucus. I know that the ministers of the current government wouldn't want to do that. Hopefully, their successors will have the same view of using the words "sparse" and "cautious" when they decide what comes forward for inclusion.

Those are my comments on Bill 27, Madam Speaker. Thanks very much.

[Motion carried; Bill 27 read a third time]

Bill 29
Protection of Children Involved
in Prostitution Amendment Act, 2000

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

MRS. FORSYTH: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to once again speak to the Protection of Children Involved in Prostitution Amendment Act. I would like to reiterate the importance of this bill, the importance of this bill to our children. Our intent, our focus is and always will be the protection of children, children who have been sexually abused and exploited at the hands of adults. These children have had their lives torn apart by sexual predators. With the Protection of Children Involved in Prostitution Act, or PCHIP, as it's commonly known, and these proposed amendments to it we are protecting these children from abuse.

In essence it's child protection legislation, legislation that works to ensure that all children in Alberta are safe, safe from this abuse and safe from any harm in this province. With this legislation we are protecting vulnerable children and youth from sexual predators, johns and pimps who use and abuse them for their personal gain. Our current legislation is solid, and we know that it is working. With it we've helped many young people break free of abuse and begin rebuilding their lives, but the time is right for making improvements to this act. We're taking good, useful, important legislation and we're making it even better.

With these amendments we can strengthen the law and enhance its effectiveness, making it an even more powerful tool in our fight against child prostitution. First and foremost, these amendments enable us to provide even more support and assistance to these victimized children. Extending the initial confinement period and allowing for up to two additional longer term confinements allows us to provide more extensive counseling and support to children who are leaving prostitution. This additional time also provides for a longer recovery period, helping to certainly and clearly stop the cycle of abuse in which they are held. Breaking free of prostitution is an extremely difficult process. It takes time, it takes patience, and it takes perseverance. These children need the time to begin making the transition. We need the time to help them to take the first step.

These proposed amendments also ensure that children's rights are protected. As soon as a child is confined, the child will be informed in writing as to why he or she is confined, the duration of the confinement, and the rights to legal representation. The child will also be given the telephone number of legal aid and the opportunity to make their call to a lawyer. In addition, each child will be told that he or she may request a court review of the confinement. The review must be heard at the court's earliest opportunity. These amendments ensure that while we are protecting them, their rights are provided for and are protected.

The abuse of our children through prostitution is an increasing and pressing social issue. We cannot simply say that it doesn't affect me, or it doesn't happen in my community. Quite simply, it would be naive to make these assumptions. Youth have clearly told us that they are young people at risk. Whether it's street prostitution in Calgary or exchanging sex for food and shelter in Fort McMurray, no one is safe from this crime. We know these children could live in urban Alberta. They could live in rural Alberta. They could come from virtually any socioeconomic background, religion, or culture. They could even be your children or my children or our grandchildren. It's a chilling thought, and that's why we introduced this revolutionary new legislation last year and now the improvements to it today. We need to take a stand on behalf of our children.

I urge you to continually support and keep firm. We're talking about the vulnerable lives of our young people, the loss of innocence that can never be regained, the loss of hope, trust, and dreams. Our children need and deserve every possible means of support we can offer to protect them from their personal violation or devastation. It is up to us to ensure that they get it. I urge everyone in the Assembly to support this bill and watch over and protect our children. We want to keep them safe.

Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hundreds of people that have written and phoned, the people that have participated in the amendments. From the children in the safe houses to the police, to the street workers, to all of those people I just want to say a simple thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thank you, Madam Speaker. On Bill 29 there has been actually considerable debate, although the bill has moved very quickly through. It moved quickly because the opposition, as we did when the original child prostitution bill was in the Assembly a couple of years ago, acknowledged and recognized that this was a serious problem and a blight in terms of the social landscape of our province. It was an issue, in fact, that the Liberal opposition had pressed the government on since at least 1992, as various studies were done in the city of Calgary. There have been motions that have been debated in this Assembly focused fully or at least in part on the pernicious evil of child prostitution and child exploitation. I acknowledge again, as I think my colleagues readily have throughout the debate at different stages on Bill 29, the work done and the leadership provided by the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

I might say, though, that as I listened to her comments just a moment ago, it was almost as if she hadn't been participating in the debate we've had on the bill. Her comments were very similar to what she said when the bill was first introduced at second reading. That's fine. I mean, I don't disagree that there has been feedback from frontline workers and police and services and agencies involved, but something has happened since this bill was first given first reading. We have, I think, been able to look at the bill that the government brought forward and recognize a couple of things.

The first one. The Member for Calgary-Fish Creek I still don't hear acknowledge that the primary reason we're here with this bill is because a judge in the Calgary family and youth court found that some elements of the existing law offend some provisions in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That's why we're here, and that's why we're dealing with this bill. That's not to say that there aren't other things that were not directly in response to Judge Jordan's decision. Clearly that is the case, and there are a number of those elements.

I didn't hear the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek ever acknowledge that we, meaning the Legislature, got some tremendously useful instruction and advice from an experienced and knowledgeable family court judge doing what judges are supposed to do, which is applying the Charter. It's the one thing that puts some kind of brake on the powers of big, powerful governments, and on behalf of who? On behalf of individual citizens, because children have rights too. I think it's the position of my caucus that you don't assist children who have already experienced often huge personal challenges and injury of different kinds and different kinds of distress by then compounding the problems they've experienced by not treating them in a respectful fashion.

If I could just reflect a little bit on some of the debate that we've heard in the Assembly. We've recognized that the government has taken an extremely passive approach in an act which is absolutely activist and interventionist when it comes to the provision of legal assistance. The government has gone, then, in a 180-degree different direction and become amazingly passive. We've attempted during the course of the debate to suggest that this isn't good enough, and I remain of that view. Notwithstanding my respect for the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek and the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Children's Services, all three of whom I genuinely believe are motivated by trying to advantage children in distress – that's not an issue – I had difficulty with their reasoning in terms of not requiring that every one of those children have not just the opportunity but active assistance to ensure that they could speak with legal counsel in terms of what the processes were under the act, in the bill we're dealing with now, and to offer some advice to children who are in distress, because that's why they're apprehended in the first place.

I continue to believe, Madam Speaker, that this is a significant weakness in the bill, and I guess that as there is an implementation and an application of the statute, we'll have to find out how it plays out. But I'm going to be encouraging MLAs to ask questions and to find out, and part of it may be a form of exit interviews of young women who go through this program. We'll find out how easy or how difficult it was for them to get legal assistance when they should have had it at an early stage.

Let's not forget that what we talk about here is taking children off the street and putting them in a safe place. We saw the other day the Justice minister talk about: well, my motivation, my government's motivation is to protect children; therefore, somehow that means we've got a different view of rights. I've already made my observation that that was a bit of a distressing thing for the top law guy in the province to say, because it seems to me that what the courts do is look at results and impacts, not simply a purpose. Judges only tend to look at the purpose and intent of legislation when there are areas of ambiguity, when there are things that require difficulty in construing and interpreting. As a legislator, as an Albertan I wouldn't want to rely on that means of trying to provide clarity around the bill.

The other thing that I notice with the bill – and we've talked about it in this Assembly; in fact, we talked about it just yesterday afternoon – is the very strange approach taken by the Minister of Children's Services, who says that for purposes of this child prostitute bill we simply say that the best interests test will govern, but we don't want to particularize that and give specific criteria that a court must look at in applying the best interests test. Yet the very same minister who stood in this Assembly and said it less than 24 hours ago also manages, implements, and enforces the Child Welfare Act. We saw yesterday that in section 2 of the Child Welfare Act they talk about best interests, and then they go on and particularize specific factors and criteria that the court must look at in making a decision under the Child Welfare Act. We have all the way from (a) through (m) of subsections that set out particulars.

So we're left with, I think, a very strange situation, with the government having a Child Welfare Act for the protection of thousands of children – and I look across at the minister now responsible for the mess that we see electrical deregulation has become. I remember when he was a minister of family and social services about 1993-95, in that time, and, you know, all that time there's been talk about children involved in prostitution and how we deal with them. I never, ever heard anybody say: we've made a huge problem with the Child Welfare Act; we're going to have to start whacking a great big section out of section 2 and take out the elements.

So we're left with a bit of a puzzle and a conundrum, Madam Speaker. To the extent that the opposition has tried to explore that and test it and try and find some coherent plan, reason, or rationale, we've been unsuccessful. So it will be Albertans, those who work with this bill and the act, the young people involved, the judges and the courts and that sort of thing, who are going to have to deal with this.

I also want to comment, as we're here, that the opposition has always felt that not only is this issue so important, but it's sufficiently important that it warrants some special attention, at minimum on an annual basis, in the Legislative Assembly. We've attempted to work with government and certainly to propose, Madam Speaker, an opportunity that would require an annual report on the application of this statute as it will be amended soon, because we thought it was important that MLAs at least one time every year have to confront the reality that child prostitution continues on the streets of our communities. Also, we would be challenged implicitly every year to ensure that we've got the appropriation of resources and dollars and programs to ameliorate this pernicious evil in our province.

We weren't successful in persuading the government of that. We've heard some talk that there are ongoing reviews and that something may change down the road. But once again we have a government that will move with alacrity when it seems to be fashionable to do that, yet when there are other meritorious needs that require important attention, the government seems to lose its resolve or its focus or its commitment.

The other comment I'd make – and I loop back to something I said at second reading. You know, I try to understand the logic and the plan that the government had in dealing with this bill. After Judge Jordan rendered her decision in the summer of 2000, I recall the Leader of the Official Opposition challenging the Premier to come back into this Legislature in late August, September and rewrite the bill, taking into consideration the advice and direction that we've got from a judge, applying sections 7, 8, and 10 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The government chose not to take that advice. Instead, they did something very peculiar. They launched not an appeal of the decision but a judicial review application. In fact, this is so rare that when somebody first asked me about it, I said that there must be some mistake. I'd forgotten that there was such a provision in the Criminal Code. Now, maybe that speaks more to my lack of knowledge, but it's a curious, curious route for the government to have gone.

We don't yet have the decision from Justice Rooke of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta. While we're at third reading, let's recognize, assuming we pass this bill today, that we may yet have a superior court judge, Justice Rooke, telling us that this doesn't pass muster, that this doesn't go far enough. And do you know what, Madam Speaker? We're then going to be in a position where the government's going to bring in a third attempt to sort of patch this thing up. [interjection] Well, I still prefer the route that was mapped out and promoted by the Leader of the Official Opposition. I think that as we look at the uncertainty – and I'd go further and say that it's been a long time since I've argued a case in court, but it seems to me that some counsel are going to jump on the fact that with this bill I'm not sure that we've taken adequate protection. I'm not sure that we've gone far enough in the area to make this act genuinely Charter-proof, and I believe that's part of our job here.

You know, this government has sort of a modus operandi that what we do is we pass what are often clearly deficient laws. At least from the perspective of most of us in opposition we think they're clearly deficient. Then what happens is that it's almost as if the government is setting this up. There's some sort of Rod Love type sitting near, giving government some advice on terms of how to do this thing. So what happens is that you get a judgment from the court, and then of course you get the chorus of backbenchers saying – the Minister of Justice wouldn't say this – “You've got to invoke section 33 of the Charter. That Charter is the problem. If we can just use the notwithstanding clause, we'll hit this gnat over the head with our sledgehammer and be done with it.”

Well, you know, we saw in last night's election result, I'd like to think, a clear signal that Canadians understand that it's not the sledgehammer to eliminate the gnat, that they expect legislators to have specific targeted programs and responses to specific issues and challenges.

Madam Speaker, my time is almost at an end. I know there are some other people who want to speak to it. I'd make the observation, though, that the opposition has been in a bit of a conundrum on this bill also from a very practical basis. The bill came in last week, and as we always do, we have sent out copies of the bill to people in the province that we think are interested and would have good advice for us and good information. As you'll appreciate, very few people and certainly not very many nonprofit organizations work on the basis of the kind of turnaround that's required with the speed of bills that move through the Assembly.

So the conundrum is this. As an opposition do you drag the debate out so that the Elizabeth Fry Society in Calgary and their advocacy group, which is specifically studying teen prostitution, has a chance to register their comments on the bill? Do you wait until the Alberta Association of Social Workers tell us what they think? Well, if we do that, the risk is that we finish the fall session and the bill is left outstanding. As an opposition we didn't think that was a risk we wanted to put the children on the streets to, so that's why we agreed to co-operate to move the thing through.

MRS. FORSYTH: Vote against it if you don't agree with it.

MR. DICKSON: Madam Speaker, the suggestion was made that I should vote against it if I don't agree with the bill. I would have thought that in the course of debate we had made it abundantly clear we supported the principle of the bill. We're prepared to join with members on all sides of the Assembly to ensure children are safe, but if the suggestion is that it's all or nothing, that somehow government has found a means of perfecting legislation where in every single bill they bring forward they have the absolute perfect model, well, that has not been my experience. In the nine years that I have been in this Assembly, that has not been my experience at all.

So I think that somewhere along the way we have to learn that opposition plays a role here, and part of the job of opposition is to point out what we think are weaknesses. Our perspective – and I can't speak for all of my colleagues, but I don't think most of my colleagues view things as black and white and bad or good. We recognize that you can have a good purpose in a bill and that the bill can still be flawed. Notwithstanding the comments from the sponsor of the bill, we continue to believe that there's a role to play to try and improve legislation. I'm sorry, Member for Calgary Fish-Creek, through the Speaker. If she thinks this is the perfect bill, then I don't think she has been in the Legislature listening to some of the debate that has gone on in the last couple of days.

You know, we may agree to disagree on this. It will be for others to judge who's right and so on, but I do expect that there has to be some understanding that this bill is still, in my view, flawed. It is not flawed to the point where I'd recommend as the Justice critic that we vote against it, but my prediction is and I guess my expectation is that this bill is going to be back in front of the Legislature again. It's going to come back in. I think if members don't like hearing constructive suggestions or that at least are offered in a constructive spirit from the opposition and want to push on ahead because they think they've got the ultimate bill, well, recognize there may be a risk we run that we have to do it over again another time.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks very much, Madam Speaker. I'm glad to be able to have the opportunity to join in the debate on third reading on Bill 29, because I didn't get as many opportunities to speak on this as I had wanted to. It has been an interesting journey watching this bill go through because I think there was a genuine desire on behalf of the sponsor of the bill to identify a problem and to attempt to address part of that problem. I hope it's clear to everyone in here that we're certainly not addressing the entire problem of prostitution or, more specifically, prostitution involving children. This is taking a small chunk out of the side of it and attempting to try and do something.

The idea of the apprehension of children is fine. You know, everyone is allowed their day in court. Everybody needs their opportunity to say that there's been a mistake made here or whatever they want to say to the courts. Their access to that process is important, and it wasn't incorporated in the original act. Indeed the Member for Calgary-Buffalo has spoken at length about Judge Jordan's ruling on the act and the need to bring it back into this Legislature and put amendments through that would in fact make it comply and be acceptable under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I think what's interesting about this is that at the time we were first debating this, all of these issues were brought forward. In particular, I remember the former Member for Edmonton-Norwood raising all of these points. That's part of my frustration with this process in here. There's a lot of talk about how boring it is for the government members to listen to the opposition, but in fact a lot of times we know what we're talking about and the suggestions we're bringing forward are valid and they're researched and they're backed up and supported by members of the community. I wish that we could have done this right the first time, but we did do it right the second time – or almost right. I'll get to that.

So we have, through these amendments, now addressed the need for the access to the judicial system. In reading the Hansard, one of the things that sprung forward to me was: well, yes, once a young person has been apprehended, they'll be told in writing why they've been apprehended, and then they'll be told in writing that they or the lawyer could access the courts if they wanted to. I thought: we're assuming a lot of things here like there's literacy and that there's literacy in the English language. In reading back through the Hansard, the Minister of Children's Services in fact answered this question and said: well, no.

When a police officer apprehends a child, the officer immediately explains why the child was apprehended and [then] tells the child that he or she has a right to a lawyer.

So as soon as the child is apprehended, they're told about it. When I read that, I thought: there are a lot of assumptions being made here. I mean, if you have a child, a young person that's working as a child prostitute, a policeman is not your friend. A policeman is going to arrest you, and then you're in trouble. So to assume that a young person who's now been apprehended by a police officer is going to turn to them and go: right; I'd like to take advantage of that offer of a lawyer, please . . . I could be wrong. I don't have a lot of experience. I have no experience in this business, but it strikes me that, you know, a kid is just going to keep their mouth shut and go along with it and try not to call any more attention to themselves.

I know we're in third reading and we're talking about the effect of the bill, but I sure wish that this suggestion had been taken. Maybe I do hope that we in fact have to come back and put that into the bill later. It's such an easy thing to deal with. I sometimes question the intransigence of the members opposite. It just seems they don't want to take the idea because it came from this side. That shouldn't be what this Legislative Assembly is about.

Now, I had raised the question about the literacy. The Minister of Children's Services seems to be addressing that question by saying that if the child was under the influence of drugs or alcohol and incapable of understanding the information, the worker is expected to give the information to the child again as soon as the child is capable of understanding it. So I'm assuming that they're trying to deal with this. But, you know, in the couple of experiences I've had in dealing with someone who was illiterate, they were pretty darn clever about not showing that. So we've got high expectations of these workers being able to figure out that the kid in fact couldn't comprehend what was written on that piece of paper and be able to explain it to them. I just think it would have been so much more straightforward and effective to have had the lawyer on-site, right there, offering those services, but it doesn't sound like it's going to happen this time.

One of the other issues that was brought forward by members of the opposition was defining the best interests of the child, and there was a list of criteria that was brought forward. I notice again that the minister responded by saying, "When you fetter any formula with additional criteria, you run the risk of not anticipating the criteria that would fit a very specific case." Well, I'm afraid the Auditor General would disagree. I mean, if you're going to have something, you need to have criteria defining whatever that means, because we could have a long and vigorous debate in this Assembly about what everyone's interpretation of best interest is. I think there are many differing views of what best interest is. I think eradication of poverty would be in the best interests of children. I think education would be in the best interests of children. I think programs targeted at societal acceptance of prostitution would be in the best interests of children, but that doesn't seem to be incorporated in this piece of legislation.

So why wouldn't you accept the criteria against which you can plan and measure the way you're interpreting this or whether you're going about it properly? To just throw it out there as best interests of the child strikes me as not as efficient as it could have been. I wonder if we aren't going to have more children fall through the cracks because of that, because we've got different views of what best interest is. You know, everybody's got a different view of what best interest is, and if you're trying to be specific about programs and services that are being offered – anyway, the amendment didn't pass, so I'll move on.

The effect of this bill is it does allow the apprehension. With the amendments now it's incorporating the suggestions from the courts to make it compliant with the Charter and the Constitution. I also note that there was response to the workers who have actually been working with the program around longer times in which the young person could stay in care and have access to counseling, which I think is a great idea, but we didn't go for the gold here. We didn't go for the blue ribbon, and I guess there are just no Olympic champs here that really wanted to make this an outstanding piece of legislation. I've already talked about the criteria, and I've talked about the lawyer.

The other thing that I think should have been done – and it's already been pointed out by my colleagues that this in fact would have been helping us comply with a number of other suggestions from other areas – is to have the Children's Advocate involved with this program and being able to access that and being able to report directly to the Legislative Assembly on it.

My compliments to the sponsoring member. I know it isn't easy to follow legislation through and get it through all of the various committees that approve bills like this and get it as far as she has.

So points for tenacity on that one.

We all know in this Assembly it is addressing a very small part of what is troubling children today and the barriers that children today are facing. We're all struggling when we read in the newspaper or see on the news that a child has hurt another child or there's been violence used in the schools or kids have been beat up outside of school. I mean, there are a lot of issues. What's in the news right now are those Inuit children and the gas sniffing. We think: how did this get so out of control? I had one guy say to me: well, where's the responsibility of the parents in all of this? Well, I think for any of us that really look at it, the parents are probably in just as much trouble, and part of what's happened to the young people is that they haven't had the guidance they needed.

The temptation there is to punish the parents and somehow just leave the kid out there, but in this case the legislation has tried to I think go as close to the heart of it as they can. We haven't been terribly effective in actually dealing with the johns. We haven't been terribly effective in dealing with societal acceptance of prostitution. But this was an attempt to deal with what could be dealt with or what was doable, I guess is another way to put it. I think it's important that you do tackle that legislation or tackle those programs that are doable, or we would never move forward in waiting for it all to be perfect, but that's not going to stop me as an opposition member from continuing to lobby for improvements in the bill. That's certainly what I've attempted to do today.

I have been impressed to see how quickly the bill has moved through the stages of readings, and I think that that is a compliment to everyone in the Assembly and is showing everyone's dedication to this issue. It's actually quite speedy passage, and I'm glad to see that. It has certainly been all parties pulling together on this one.

Those are the comments that I wanted to bring up in third reading. I appreciate the opportunity to speak at this stage of the bill. I'll be happy to see the passage of the bill and the implementation of it. Perhaps there's a way when the government is actually putting this amending bill into place to include some of the suggestions that have been raised by the opposition and indeed were put forward as our amendments, because I think they still are really good ideas and worthy of consideration.

With that, I will let the floor go. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to take a brief opportunity to comment on Bill 29 in third reading. Bill 29 is a very important bill because this government has had the objective right from the time when the PCHIP legislation was introduced as Bill 1 in a previous session of protecting children who are at risk, protecting children who are being exploited by perverts, protecting children who are engaged in activity which is demonstrably – and I think everyone would agree – not good for their health, not good for their well-being, and leaves them in a position where they have no self-respect.

It provides an opportunity for street teams working with these children to take these children off the street, out of the hands of the people who are exploiting them and into safe houses, into safe places where they can get a decent meal, get an opportunity to get some rest, and get an opportunity to get some counseling which will perhaps turn their lives around.

Now, we've had the opportunity, partially as a result of a case going before the courts and a decision of the courts, to review the act in its operation and work with the people who are in the front line of this operation working with these unfortunate children and get feedback from them as to how the act can be strengthened so that those people can have a better opportunity to deal with these children and have a better opportunity to have an effect at changing those children's lives. That's what Bill 29 is all about, Madam Speaker. No more, no less.

It's an opportunity upon an early review of the operation of the act, which by accounts from all of the partners that have been involved – and I was at a youth justice forum at St. Thomas More church not a week ago and heard a sergeant with the Edmonton city police force describe to that forum, to the kids that were involved there and the parents that were involved there, what a good piece of legislation the Protection of Children Involved in Prostitution Act is, what a useful tool it is in the hands of all the caregivers, all the people who cared on the street who were working together in a co-operative fashion and how it brought them together in a co-operative fashion and what a useful tool it was in their hands in order to be able to deal with this unfortunate situation where children are being preyed upon. So I was very pleased when I heard that description.

I was very pleased when I was able to attend with the Minister of Children's Services a meeting that we held in August with people from all aspects of the implementation and use of this tool as to what a good act it had been, what a useful piece of legislation it had been for those people in their attempt to take these unfortunate children off the street and give them the opportunity for a better life.

So I am very pleased that we're able to bring forward the amendments to that act in Bill 29 to make that act even stronger with the benefit of the input from those people in terms of how we can make it better. It is stronger by having the five-day period instead of 72 hours. I think everyone acknowledges that in 72 hours sometimes you barely have the opportunity to have the child sober up, have a good meal, have a good sleep. There's very little time left to provide counseling or to intervene in any way, to provide the child with guidance and an opportunity to move into counseling, to move into some other form of treatment, those good opportunities.

MR. DICKSON: Or phone a lawyer.

MR. HANCOCK: The Opposition House Leader says: or phone a lawyer. That's where I think we get off track in this whole discussion. Yes, children have rights, and in this province we're very conscious of rights that children have. But we're also very conscious of the need for parental responsibility and the need for parents, in this case parents in the form of government, to provide guidance, to provide help, to assist when children go astray, to assist when other people are abusing children. That's what this act is all about. It's society providing that parental authority to help provide guidance to children in need and to help protect those children from people who are abusing them.

So this act has been a very useful tool, and the amendments that are being brought forward in this act are going to make it even stronger.

Now, there have been comments made that perhaps we're not going far enough, that in fact we're not reaching for the gold medal. Quite frankly, Madam Speaker, I think the assumption has been made that because one member of the court makes a pronouncement, that's the be-all and end-all of the issue. I prefer the interpretation which suggests that there is an interim discussion between the courts and the Legislature on this whole question of rights and the balance of rights and how those rights should be balanced.

We've made a very sincere attempt, I believe, to meet the suggestions that were made about the need for children to have the opportunity to have that confinement reviewed by the courts if they feel their confinement is inappropriate. But we don't want to take this to the stage where children are being treated like criminals, where every child who's apprehended and confined needs to be taken before the courts when they don't need to be taken before the courts and in fact they don't want to be taken before the courts.

What many of these children need, from the experiences that we've heard from street teams and from people who are working with these kids, what many of these children really want is an opportunity to get out of the hands of their abusers, an opportunity to get that treatment. They don't want to be going to court. They don't want the interaction with the court. They want the help that's being proffered. Those that do, have that opportunity available to them, and that's the important part. That's where their rights are protected. We don't need to codify in law some fancy process whereby everybody has to have something before their rights are protected. Their rights are protected in this act. That's what was called for. That's what's here.

There was also a reflection in earlier debate about section 1. One can always go back and determine whether or not a case has been appropriately argued before the courts. I tend not to second-guess counsel in court as to strategies that they use when they argue cases. I think the counsel that we had in putting this case before the court, both in terms of the initial situation and in terms of the review process, put a very, very able argument forward. I think the judge perhaps did much in obiter which was not particularly necessary, but it was interesting, and I think we've made every attempt to take those comments into account in drafting this amendment.

What we're attempting to do is to meet the needs of the Charter, meet the needs of children's rights in an honest and proactive manner, in a manner which will allow the people who are on the streets trying to help kids get out of the hands of people who are abusing them and to get the help that they need to have the tools that are necessary. If that requires us to come back time after time after time to improve the act, then that's what we as legislators should do, and we shouldn't be ashamed of it. We shouldn't think it's a bad thing. Laws are not things that you design and you put in a crystal case and say: "There. That's done." Laws are things which are an iterative process, that you improve as time goes on, that you make changes and amendments to as they're required. We have no need to be ashamed of that process. That is the process that we're elected to engage in, Madam Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thanks, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to have an opportunity at third reading to make some comments about the implications of Bill 29, the Protection of Children Involved in Prostitution Amendment Act, 2000. I'd like to go back to some comments I made when I spoke to the bill at second reading, and that's to start with the proposition that if the problem of child prostitution is truly to be addressed, it's going to take much more than Bill 29. Child prostitution exists in our community because there are some members of the community that believe it's acceptable, and that's the only reason it exists. There are some people across this province who believe that having children ply part of the sex trade is an acceptable thing to have happen.

Certainly a law such as Bill 29 can rescue some of those youngsters from an immediate situation, but I don't think that in any way we should fool ourselves that it handles the problem or takes care of the problem. That's one of my fears, that having passed this bill, we'll leave this Assembly, and there will be those who feel that the problem has been dealt with.

I was reading some comments by Etzioni about the relationship between moral regeneration and legislation. He was trying to tease out a balance, and I think he came up at the end with a balance that said that what really has to change is the moral order. Laws can help that move along, but overwhelmingly if a problem is to be addressed, it's going to be because public morals have changed, the public position, the public acceptance on a particular issue has changed.

There are a number of examples that we have seen in recent times, Madam Speaker. The whole business of drunk driving. When I grew up, the slogan was: have one for the road. It was quite acceptable that you would drink, and in particular if you were male, it was acceptable that you would drink. Well, that's changed quite dramatically now, the slogan now being: friends don't let friends drink. I think that captures the difference in public attitudes and our stance towards drinking in our society.

I think it's going to have to be a change of the same magnitude and probably even more to change the public attitude towards prostitution. It is abhorred by a large majority of the population, but still it exists, and it only exists because there are people in the community who think it's acceptable.

I go back to Etzioni. He tried to balance off the difference between law enforcement and moral voice. He said that law enforcement, if he was going to come up with a measure, would account for about 30 percent of any change, but 70 percent, the overwhelming percent of any kind of change like this, has to be because moral voices have been raised.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Tuesday, November 28, 2000

8:00 p.m.

Date: 00/11/28

[The Speaker in the chair]

THE SPEAKER: Please be seated.

head: Government Bills and Orders

head: Third Reading

Bill 29

Protection of Children Involved in Prostitution Amendment Act, 2000

[Debate adjourned November 28: Dr. Massey speaking]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to continue comments on the implications of Bill 29. I'd like to pick up where I left off in terms of the notion that Bill 29 is not going to be the solution to child prostitution. It'll help in terms of temporarily getting these youngsters off the street and trying to get them started in the right direction. I think we all applaud that bill for that, but I think we would have to be very careful, as I said before, that we don't leave this Assembly smug in the notion that we have actually solved the problem.

I think a number of writers and a number of authors have talked about the problem, and one notion is that we have to start and create a community where children don't fall into prostitution or aren't leading lives that are less than we would wish for them. We have to blame ourselves I think, Mr. Speaker, for much of what has happened.

I was revisiting The Growing Gap, a report on the growing inequality between the rich and poor in Canada. The report is rich with information on what's happened to families in our country, Mr. Speaker, and I'd like to just touch on four or five of the items from the report. They make the comment, for instance, that the rich are richer in our country. In 1973 the richest 10 percent of the families with children under 18 made 21 times more than the poorest 10 percent of the families, yet by 1996 the richest 10 percent of the families made 314 times more than the poorest 10 percent of the families.

The middle class has been shrinking, Mr. Speaker. In 1973 60 percent of families with children under 18 earned between $24,500 and $65,000. By 1996 that middle class had shrunk, and only 44 percent of families with dependant children made between $24,500 and $65,000. Most of the change has happened to the middle class. More importantly in terms of this particular bill women at work have increased, and families have increasingly had to rely on more than one income to get by. Two-thirds of mothers with children under three are in the labour force compared to one-third a generation ago. That's a marked change in family lives, and the absence of those mothers has to have an effect.

The report goes on to make some observations about the economy that we've created and the whole notion of a trickle-down policy, which had been so widely adopted, where the wealthy accumulate more and more in the belief that they'll make the investments that will eventually trickle down and make some benefits for people who are not so well off. These are parts of the kind of community, the milieu we're creating and into which we insert Bill 29.

One of the other observations they make talks about taxing and how the tax burden has shifted in the country, the notion that there's been a marked change in who pays the bills from the corporate income tax payer to the personal income tax system. For example, the corporate contributions to paying for Canada represented 25 percent of all federal revenue in 1955. In 1973 they were at 17 percent, and in 1996 they accounted for only 12 percent of federal revenues, so a marked shift and that burden being picked up more and more by middle-class and lower income earners.

I guess the argument I'm trying to make, Mr. Speaker, is that we are responsible for creating the kinds of communities in which our children are raised and live, and some of the things we do are counterproductive in terms of making sure that child prostitution cannot flourish. If those children were in homes that fostered the kinds of values we would like all our children to have, we wouldn't have this law before us.

A final point, Mr. Speaker, is the whole notion of the inconsistencies, and I think those inconsistencies were pointed out by previous speakers on this bill. If you look at this bill and then compare it to some of the provisions in the Child Welfare Act, there doesn't seem to be a lot of consistency, and as other speakers have indicated, I suspect we'll be back here in the future making changes to the act so that it is more consistent with the ones we find in the Child Welfare Act.

In spite of the announcement the other day of additional funding, I'm concerned that the needed resources will be in place for this program to grow and to do the job that we expect of it. I think we all recognize that taking these children off the street is an emergency action, but that momentary action has to be part of a long-term plan to make sure that these children get the support and have the resources so that they are not led back into those conditions on the street.

So I think that with those comments, Mr. Speaker, I would support the bill and conclude my remarks. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise this evening and get an opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill 29. When the court case became public news this past summer regarding family court judge Karen Jordan in Calgary, my first response was that I was certainly part of the problem with this legislation because I was a member of this Assembly. I think that in some way all of us, all hon. members regardless of which side of the House they're on, are responsible for certainly this series of amendments.

There were certainly cautions from this side of the Assembly on whether or not the whole bill, the original bill, Bill 1 from the spring session of 1998, in effect would survive a court case and a Charter challenge. We all know that the Charter of Rights had been violated, Mr. Speaker, section 7 certainly – I won't go into detail – and section 8, where "everyone has the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure." We failed in the original Bill 1 to ensure that this had been looked at. So we all have to have an acceptance of the responsibility for this. We just can't get angry with the judge, in this case Judge Jordan, and bash the judiciary. It just is not appropriate. We cannot express outrage or indignation and use any means to condemn the family court judge's decision.

If we want to be responsible, Mr. Speaker – and I believe hon. members on this side of the House were responsible when we called on the government to reconvene the Legislative Assembly in September to deal with these changes immediately, but all members of the House realize and Albertans do as well that this idea was refused or it was dismissed, and instead we embarked in the province on an application for a judicial review through Justice Rooke of the Court of Queen's Bench. I think this decision has yet to be delivered.

However, when we look at this problem, Mr. Speaker, again I have to say that the only people to blame are ourselves. Sometimes we're in a hurry to leave this Assembly. Now, I'm not talking about this bill, originally Bill 1, and the use of closure, but perhaps this is a lesson for all of us that we should not be hasty in our decisions in this Assembly. We should have a good look at every piece of legislation, and when an hon. member stands up, regardless of what side of the House they're on, and expresses a caution in debate, well, perhaps we should listen more seriously.

Now, the whole idea, Mr. Speaker, of Bill 1 certainly is sound, and there's not an hon. member of this Assembly that would tolerate any form of child abuse. That certainly would include the sexual exploitation of teen prostitutes. Now, I know that everyone worked together in 1998 to pass this law, and that's why, as I said before, we have to accept some responsibility for revisiting this. I am willing and my colleagues are willing, certainly the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo with his very sound amendments, which I was disappointed weren't added to this bill, to work to improve this bill. But we have to respect the role of the courts in protecting the rights of children.

What we have is a kind of dialogue on this bill between the Legislature and the courts. I know there are some hon. members of this House that have different views than I on the role of the courts, but it is up to our government to respect the very clear direction we get from the court and make the appropriate modification of a law that has been found in this case to be deficient.

Now, I heard, particularly on radio programs, where the original Bill 1 had removed child prostitution from the streets. It was removed visually, I should say, from the streets of Edmonton and Calgary and our bigger centres, but where did it go? Was it just removed from view? Out of sight, out of mind, so to speak. I certainly hope this is not the case.

This spring I recall talking to the hon. Minister of Justice during the Justice estimates about massage parlours and whether the province was going to do anything to regulate them. The hon. minister in due time – and I'm grateful for his response on this – informed me: no; it is a municipal jurisdiction. I cannot understand, for the life of me, why we're so keen on this, but another piece of the problem is the massage parlours, because I don't believe there's any regulation to police exactly who is working in there, what they're doing, and what age they are.

Now, I've conducted some research on this, Mr. Speaker. When you look at the licensing requirements of the municipalities – let's say Calgary and let's say Edmonton, and we'll use as an example also St. Albert – all three municipalities are different. The licensing course that you have to take in Edmonton is different than the one in St. Albert, and it's different in the hours that you need before you can get your licence. Calgary has no licensing requirements, as I understand. You can just walk in and have employment in a massage parlour.

Now, one part of the requirement was that you had to be over 18. I asked who was policing this. No one, Mr. Speaker, could answer. No one is doing this. I'm concerned that with their removal off the street, which is a very, very good idea, these same young prostitutes are winding up plying their trade, so to speak, behind closed doors in the massage parlours. I think that if we're serious about this – and I know we are – we have to encourage the government to also look at this as a provincewide problem, because each municipality can set up their own regulations, and they have.

Now, we have to look at this in the problem of teenage prostitution. The police forces across this province do not have the resources. They simply do not have the resources to go in and check to see who is working in these establishments and check even to see if it's a legal or an illegal activity. They just don't have the resources. If we have shifted from public view this whole trade, I would be very, very disappointed.

We need to have procedural safeguards that in no way prevent the apprehension of young women, but we at the same time have to realize that we have a responsibility. We have a responsibility to parents and their children. We also have a responsibility to the neighbourhoods, regardless of which city it's in in this province, because everyone deserves to grow up or to live in a neighbourhood where they can peacefully go about their business. This is a very difficult and vexing problem.

Now, where does the solution lie? I would hope that very quickly the government has a look at the role of these massage parlours and the role that perhaps – and I hope I'm wrong – underage prostitutes play in them and what sort of employment is going on there. This is a problem across the province. I can only hope that the hon. Minister of Justice will have another look at this, because when I asked about this before, I was not satisfied, of course, with the answers that I received. When we think of the young people of this province, we don't usually think of young girls being apprehended and placed under care, whether it be of a social worker or whether it be a police officer. We don't think of that, but unfortunately it happens.

Summing up my remarks this evening, I would like to say that this amendment, this Bill 29, this Protection of Children Involved in Prostitution Amendment Act, should serve as a warning to all hon. members of this Assembly that perhaps we're not being as keen in our duties as we think we are. Some hon. members may get upset whenever the judiciary questions legislation. Well, in this case I would have to say: too bad if Members of the Legislative Assembly had their feelings hurt whenever this decision came about. I would encourage all members to in the future take their time and have another look.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

MRS. SLOAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise at third reading to speak to Bill 29. We've had a significant amount of debate thus far on this bill, and we've had a series of government announcements relative to the amendments proposed and the new funding that's to be provided.

It's quite extraordinary in many respects that we've focused the amount of resources and energies and commitments on an issue which demographically, I would say, affects somewhere in the neighbourhood of 500 or less children in the province. In fact, I may be significantly over in my estimate. In contrast we had on average last year approximately 12,000 children in the care of this government in some type of status – PGO, TGO – and we have yet to see the type of focused attention placed on those children's well-being that seems to be orientated towards the protection of children that are involved in prostitution.

I have raised at earlier points in the debate my concerns that this bill doesn't really address the root causes. In fact, last evening I spoke about some of the ways in which we could utilize this bill beyond a justice sense if we were truly concerned about addressing and preventing young women from becoming prostitutes. The bill doesn't really embody that intent, Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, but I have come across a piece of legislation that in fact does.

I was quite impressed by the statute that was created this year also in British Columbia entitled the Secure Care Act. Interestingly enough, the Secure Care Act in B.C. does propose to address the same issue as Bill 29. It does target prostitution, but it also is designed to address other forms of self-harm, such as severe drug addiction, it could be suicide, or other situations where a child or youth is placing themselves at risk. The act in B.C. creates an independent secure care board and a director of secure care within the Ministry for Children and Families. The ministry there committed over $10 million to support a range of intervention after care and secure care services.

Now, I got looking at the specifics of the bill, and it occurred to me that had we had the foresight to design our bill in such a manner, this type of legislation could have in fact addressed and protected a great deal more children, Mr. Speaker.

I'd like to speak to a document that I obtained through freedom of information this year. In essence, the information is a summary of deaths of children in the care of child welfare from 1994 to March of 2000. We had a total of 108 children die during that period of time while they were in some form of government protection. This includes foster care, parental care, residential care, extended family, or independent living. A total of 108. Of those, Mr. Speaker, there were a number of children who went through a large number of placements during their course of time in care. Unfortunately, the records don't show what the cause of death was, but it seems to me that given the reality that the children died and if we exclude those who died from a medical condition, deaths that were anticipated, it is my belief that there would still be a significant number of children who perhaps in this situation could have benefited from a secure care type of legislation.

One child, in particular, in the document had a total of 49 placements from 1994 to 1998, a total of 49 placements. So in four years' time the child was placed 49 times. You've got to wonder . . .

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Egmont.

MR. HERARD: Yes. Mr. Speaker, we're in third reading of a bill, as I understand it, and . . .

THE SPEAKER: You're rising, sir, on a point of something?

Point of Order Relevance

MR. HERARD: Yes. Relevance, Beauchesne 459. It seems to me that when we're dealing in third reading with a bill, we're dealing with what has been already debated in principle, has been amended or not amended. We are dealing with what we've got before us as a result of the deliberation of this House. I'm listening to this discussion that the hon. member is bringing up, and I find no relevance whatsoever to what's between the first page and the last page of the bill that we're dealing with. You know, I think I've heard this particular speech before on some other occasion. At least, it sounds familiar to me. But it certainly isn't relevant to what we're doing here.

MRS. SLOAN: I think, Mr. Speaker, I would accept that as some points of clarification. I'm most certainly speaking of the secure treatment of children. The bill before us speaks to confinement of children that are practising dangerous activities. I believe that it's prudent as legislators that all points of debate contemplate other statutory alternatives that are available to us in this country to guide us in making the best form of legislation possible.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, before the House is Bill 29, Protection of Children Involved in Prostitution Amendment Act, 2000. Let us continue on that bill.

Debate Continued

MRS. SLOAN: Thank you. I was referring to the contrast between Bill 29 and the Secure Care Act of British Columbia. One of the other significant differences in relation to this is that in the B.C. act a parent can in fact identify a child and request that the child be placed in secure treatment. In my reading of Bill 29 it doesn't appear that a parent has that ability, Mr. Speaker.

I would also reference that in my review of fatality inquiry recommendations that have been made about the deaths of children in care over the course of the last 10 years, time and time again throughout these fatality inquiries judges have prompted legislators to look at the critical shortage of secure treatment beds for children and youth in Alberta. There have been some very compelling examples, even from the hon. member's own constituency and the city in which he resides. In 1997 a young man by the name of Isaac Mercer died by hanging himself. He was in the care of government. He had been placed in Hull Home. In the fatality inquiry arising from his death, the judge pointed out that there was a need for more attention to be paid to the placement of children, in hand with numerous other recommendations relative to that child's care and the gaps in it.

Olivia Calfrobe was another where, again, had there been an appropriate placement for her in secure treatment, it was believed she would not have been successful in overdosing on morphine and, as a result, committing suicide at the age of 15. My point, Mr. Speaker, is that we could be doing so much more than what we're here tonight debating. There is, albeit, some political appeal in addressing the issue of prostitution. It's an occupation, as much as we might like to discount it or as distasteful as it is to us. It has been upon this Earth for some generations. It is laudable that the government is going to attempt to curtail prostitution, at least when it involves minors, but in that respect I think we could be doing much more.

Just to summarize and complete my comments on the B.C. legislation. Under that authority young people will be able to be detained for up to 72 hours in a secure care facility without board approval. The child or youth will be able to be referred to the director of secure care by police, the Ministry for Children and Families, family or friends, and community service providers. Inherent in that act they have already incorporated in that province safeguards to ensure the protection of the rights of young people and guarantee that the child is aware of their rights: aware of the right to legal counsel and the right to express their views. There's also inherent in that act the provision for the child to appeal. I think that's really the summary of my point with respect to that bill this evening.

Just to continue on the point of secure treatment, we know there has been for some years a secure treatment shortage in this province, and I referenced that earlier. The question now is: where is the ministry planning to detain these young women? There's been an expressed concern about not placing women who are partially rehabilitated with young women who are being taken off the street. I would suspect there is probably a desire to not mix these young women with other young women who may be vulnerable to falling into the same trap. So I guess I will be looking for further information about how in fact we're going to, from a facility standpoint, accommodate these children.

If in fact we're willing to make that accommodation, then let's also make the accommodation for other young people that require secure treatment and are in the care of child welfare. As was referenced in a fatality inquiry, it's been common practice for social workers in child welfare to not designate the child as being in need of secure treatment simply because they know the reality is that there is not an adequate amount of beds and therefore there's no point in making that notation in the records.

If we say that as a standard we're going to provide for a high level of intervention, secure treatment, really the best we can provide for minors who are engaged in prostitution, then let us set that same standard for other children who are suicidal, who suffer from mental illness. Let's deal with the waiting lists we have in this province for children's mental health services. They have existed for at least two years, and I know there's some angst about these issues being repeatedly raised, but when they're not addressed, Mr. Speaker, what alternative do we have on this side of the House?

Really, if you will, it's the responsibility of governing. Right from the very onset when the government regionalized child welfare, they said that they were going to implement provincial standards in an accountability framework for child welfare, and this particular act will fall under that. Now, we don't see within the articles of Bill 29 any reference to that accountability framework, nor do we see any reference to the standard of accommodation. This bill is simply written as – well, how should I say it? It's primarily for justice purposes in many respects. The clientele are the clientele of child welfare, but the application, the implementation of this bill is largely going to be in the hands of the justice system.

What I don't find in this bill, which is what causes me concern this evening, is what child welfare is going to be doing relative to the treatment of these young women. There are going to be, unquestionably, issues of mental health. There most likely will be histories of these clients being sexually abused or having a history of violence in the home which has prompted them to leave home and enter this dangerous activity. So however we choose to implement the bill and however the treatment facilities are enacted, these young women are going to need services from other ministries of the Crown.

You know, this is the complexity of governing. You can write a bill that will perhaps dot all the i's and cross all the t's in a justice sense, and politically perhaps it may take you some miles because you'll be able to say that we did something about child prostitution, but behind the door it's not so easy for the public to see exactly how these victims are going to be cared for by government. The minister has made an announcement, made an announcement last week in fact, about the reinvestment of moneys into child welfare, and that's very promising and long overdue. I didn't hear, though, in there that we were going to hire and train staff to specifically deal with the care of children who fall under the confines of Bill 29.

The child welfare caseload growth report, which was completed in August 2000, this year, examined very, very closely the reasons why the child welfare caseload has grown to its highest level, on average 12,000 children in the care of government last year, the highest in the province's history. It cited a number of reasons, Mr. Speaker, which I won't be able to go through tonight, but one of the key areas that was focused on in this report was about the staff in the child welfare system. The authors went through in quite significant detail, which is most readily available to government members, that we have a workforce within the child welfare sector that is significantly undertrained. Alberta is the only province in the country that hires child welfare staff with less than a bachelor of social work. In addition to that, our turnover rate for staff is very high. Since 1993 over 900 child welfare workers have terminated or transferred out of their position while combined with the hiring of new staff to respond to growing caseloads, recruiting to the vacated positions results in a chronic significant inexperience on the front line.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, there are no numbers available about staff working for First Nations agencies, and that raises another issue relative to the treatment of clients under Bill 29 who are aboriginal. Will the government in fact be planning to uphold their commitment to allow for the provision of services by First Nations communities to their own children who are in need of the care of child welfare? Will that commitment apply to the application of Bill 29? I am not sure.

I regret that my time is over, Mr. Speaker. I had a great deal more to say.

Thank you very much.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is indeed a pleasure to rise this evening and speak to Bill 29, the Protection of Children Involved in Prostitution Amendment Act, 2000. I would like to make a few comments and a few observations in regards to this bill.

Of course, what we are dealing with here is an issue in society that's felt by all people. It's an issue that most people in society have very strong views about. This, of course, is about children prostituting themselves. This is something that the majority of parents certainly do take as a very, very serious issue. Not only parents but society as a whole realizes the awesome responsibility we have to protect children.

We're here at this particular time debating Bill 29 primarily because in Bill 1 there were a number of shortfalls, and these were pointed out in a ruling by Judge Karen Jordan. Now, when Bill 1 was introduced, certainly everybody was happy. We cheered. We thought we had much more protection for our children and that as a society we were certainly fulfilling our responsibility to some degree to these young people. But in her ruling Judge Jordan certainly indicated that Bill 1 fell short. So here we have Bill 29, which does address many of those issues that Judge Jordan outlined in her ruling.

Certainly one of the clauses I notice in this bill is that the 72-hour period has been extended to five days. Again, when we're looking at children who are in this particular position, where they are out prostituting themselves, then certainly an increase in time is desired. That was a positive step here as well.

In this innovative legislation, in Bill 1 and now the follow-up Bill 29, we still see, though, that there is a shortfall in the legislation, and this shortfall is in the area of accountability, in the fact that there is no power in the bill to produce a desired or intended result. I think this is one area, Mr. Speaker, where we certainly could have strengthened this bill an awful lot.

When we're looking at this, we're talking about the apprehension of hundreds of youth and how their behaviour is changed because of this bill. Now, our stated goal for the bill is the protection of children, and we're looking here at children that are hard core. We are looking at children where the success rate for behaviour modification is certainly going to be much lower than it would be with your average child.

When we look at behaviour modification for this type of child, we certainly have to look at a much more intensive program. We certainly have to draw on many, many resources that we do have in the community, and we certainly do have to involve many of the departments in government, but the desired outcome then would certainly have much more of an opportunity of success. So when we look at this and we're looking at a success rate, nowhere in the bill do we have any measurable outcome as to the success rate of apprehending these children that are prostituting themselves.

We don't have, for an example, any answers to the question: how many of these young people, after they are apprehended, will return to the streets? How many of them will go back and recommit? Of course, we know there are many, many factors out there that do impact these children enormously. Certainly a controlling pimp is one of the issues here, yet we don't have in this bill enough regulation to address this issue.

As well, for many of these young people this becomes easy money, money they couldn't make at any other job in the amount of time they would spend. As well, we'll find that many of these young people also have a great dependency on drugs. So it's a vicious circle that they're caught in, where they prostitute themselves to get their money, they buy their drugs, and the wheel keeps going around and around. This is why I would have liked to have seen in this legislation something to assess whether the law is achieving its desired outcome.

Now then, there is a way of doing that, Mr. Speaker, and that is a Children's Advocate office. We do have an office in this province, and it is responsible to report on Children's Services. Earlier in debate on Bill 29 the Member for Calgary-Buffalo stated in his comments how the jurisdiction in section 2.1 of the Child Welfare Act certainly has many recommendations and many parts to it that impact how we can deal with youth. Particularly what I enjoyed about his comments was that certainly this jurisdiction is there under the Children's Advocate office. We are not proposing anything new. It is something that is existing at this time, and there is no additional cost. The office does exist. It does have a mandate, and that mandate is to encompass what happens to children under this bill.

As well, there were some excellent suggestions as to how we could have strengthened this bill. One of those suggestions that came up I would have liked to have seen accepted when we were debating the bill, and that would be that the Children's Advocate would have to every year table in this Legislature their report. What that would do is identify many of the problems that we encounter as the authorities attempt to work with this act, and they would certainly be able from their hands-on work with these young prostitutes have the opportunity at that point to see what parts of this act are deficient, certainly make very good recommendations as to how we could strengthen this act. Certainly this act would be a work in progress where we are constantly striving to make it better for the youth of this province.

As well, we wouldn't only be identifying the problems with this act. What would also happen here is that we'd identify problem areas, for example, with the prostitutes. Certainly there are many, many questions out there that do beg an answer. We would by the statistics that the Children's Advocate could collect in this regard see how we could best address the problems at hand.

Of course, the first question would be: how many of our youth in this province are apprehended under Bill 29? Once we have gauged that, there are so many other questions that could be asked. Do we have a predominant number of females or males that are prostituting themselves out on the streets as minors? If it does indeed happen to be one sex or the other, then at that point we can target that as a problem area and target that particular sex.

Now, as well, I think what we have to look at here is the age. Is there a certain age when these child prostitutes are most vulnerable, when their attitudes, when their behaviour can be influenced by others such as a pimp, such as an older person who would have some influence on them? Is there an age when we would have to target them again for a greater chance of reaching them and pulling them off the street at a much earlier stage in this particular problem.

Another thing we can look at here as well is: is this a rural issue, an urban issue? Do the populations we're dealing with here occur more in one of those areas or another? Certainly that would be another area the Children's Advocate in fulfilling their responsibilities could seek out.

I also think another area we could look at is: how many of these young prostitutes come from a single-parent home, or how many have both parents? Maybe something else we want to look at is the work habits of those parents. In other words, how many of them have to work evening shifts or afternoon shifts or whatever where they aren't at home when these young people are out of school.

MS CARLSON: Do the kids have adequate life skills?

MR. BONNER: Yes. Certainly when we look at a bill of this nature I think it's very, very important that we know what sort of life skills those young people have. Are they streetwise, or are they being taken advantage of by some older, more influential person in their lives?

Something else that I think the Children's Advocate would be able to do in reporting which would be so much more valuable is: what happens in the home? In other words, how many of these children come from an environment where violence in the home is quite prevalent? How many of these homes have there been complaints to the police about or the police have had some contact with because of some issue? So, again, all these factors certainly would help in determining how we could best protect the child.

Of course, we hear so often that many of these children that are out prostituting themselves do come from a background where there was some type of inappropriate behaviour in the home. Usually they have been molested by family, by someone they know. Again, this is another area here where I think this report by the Children's Advocate would make a big, big difference. It would certainly give us the tools and the information so that we could strengthen this bill.

As well, I think another great advantage of having the minister table the report of the Children's Advocate in this Legislature each year is that it brings awareness once a year to the minds of the members in here, to the minds of the media, and certainly with their help we can keep bringing attention to this big problem that we do have in our society, one that we would like to fix.

What this would do as well is remind the MLAs in here on an annual basis of this problem and this bill. It was a couple of weeks ago that I was looking at the pictures of the group that was elected in '93, and I went through the little brochure that we have of our seating arrangement in here for the group that was elected in '97. Then I checked to see just how many of those members from '93 will be available for the next election. The maximum number we could have elected that would remain after those two elections is only 50 percent. That's assuming that everybody that's running or seeking re-election gets elected. So, again, I think it is critical that we do have reminders in here, that we do have information that hon. members in this House could review from year to year, and that we do look at ways of doing this.

Now then, if teen prostitution and sexual exploitation is a major issue, why don't we make this bill much, much stronger? Why don't we use the enormous resources we have as a province, that we have as legislators to assist these youths in changing around their lives? What we want to do is turn around their behaviour, and the sooner we do that, certainly the more success we're going to have. So those are some of the comments that I wanted to make in regards to accountability.

This is another way as well, Mr. Speaker, by this report being tabled in here, that we bring the issue to the front. It's not dealt with as it has been for so many years in this province, when we've had sexual exploitation of our youth. It is something that we don't hide. It's something that we bring to the front, and we combat the issue of child prostitution. We know that in this trade, as people have talked about here — the hon. members for Edmonton-Riverview and Edmonton-Gold Bar certainly talked this evening about how in their areas, whether it be in massage parlors or children in care, things can change very quickly. We do know that child prostitution is one of those moving targets. The people involved, particularly the adults, get extremely creative, and we require everything that we can to fight those people.

It is not inconceivable to think, Mr. Speaker, that the legislation we hopefully will pass in this session will have to be changed and updated as we move along. There is no perfect legislation in this regard, and we should be prepared to change it from time to time to make it much stronger.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo also brought out that in the provinces that border us, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, they go much further in their legislation to protect the children. I would certainly hope that as we progress down this road, we also can strengthen our legislation here. I think a major part of that strengthening of this bill would be the inclusion of the reports we get from the workers, the people that have to work with these children. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I certainly don't knock the people out there, the men and women in this province that are trying to deal with child prostitution. They are dealing with a very, very unique group of young people, young people who, for whatever reason, do end up on the street, and they do have an enormous task in changing their behaviour.

A number of us went on a tour here shortly after we were elected. We did happen to go down to the Remand Centre, we did go down to the police holding cells, and it was quite an eye-opener for myself. Whenever they were dealing with youth, they would put them in handcuffs, they would shackle their ankles, and the reason, the guards told us, was that young people, more so than anyone else, are very skittish. They will react before they stop to think. This was another excellent suggestion that the Member for Calgary-Buffalo brought up, that this would be an ideal time, a superb time to supply duty counsel, where they would have the opportunity to talk to a lawyer, for these young people that obviously have made some very, very bad decisions in their life for whatever reasons, people who probably at this stage are not in a very good state to make good decisions or to make any decisions.

So with those comments and observations, Mr. Speaker, I thank the Assembly very much for this opportunity to speak to Bill 29.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I welcome this opportunity to speak one final time to Bill 29, the Protection of Children Involved in Prostitution Amendment Act, 2000, at the stage of third reading, where what we have is an opportunity to review the bill in its final form after the shaping it has received in earlier stages.

Mr. Speaker, it's unfortunate that at this particular stage we see, with this bill having gone through the various stages available to us, that there has been no additional shaping to it. In fact, that outlines the major concern I have with regard to this bill, and that is the kind of attitude we have seen from the government when we talk about this bill, first in its initial stage as Bill 1 and now in its amended stage as Bill 29.

What we've seen the government bring to the floor of this Legislature and through every stage of drafting and throughout the debate that we've seen from members of the government is a real paternal attitude that has been incorporated into the drafting of the legislation. It's a we know best kind of attitude: it's our way; it's the right way; it's the only way. But in fact, Mr. Speaker, where this bill is concerned, we have seen already that it is not the only way and not necessarily the best way. Had it been the best way, we would have not seen Bill 29 hit the floor of the Legislature at all, because it is in fact amendments to the original bill, Bill 1.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Now, we in this House supported Bill 1. It's a case of where you have to take a look at the legislation and decide: is it mostly better than what we had, or is mostly not better than what we had? Certainly that bill was better in terms of addressing prostitution with minors than what we had before, which was virtually no legislation, so it was an improvement. Did it go as far, Mr. Speaker, as we thought was necessary? No, it did not. In fact, some of the very concerns that we see brought forward in Bill 29, which is the amendment of the Protection of Children Involved in Prostitution Act, address the concerns that we had brought forward in the original drafting of the bill.

Does it now address in its amended form all of the concerns we have? No, it doesn't. The paternalistic attitude that we see from the government means that they're not prepared to take a look at amendments from anyone other than themselves, and they have not seen fit at this particular stage to bring any in. So unfortunately we don't see any kinds of changes or shaping in the bill at its final reading.

The last opportunity I had to speak to this bill, Mr. Speaker, was in second reading, and at that time there were a number of excellent comments and recommendations made from many of my colleagues here in the Assembly that we certainly hoped we would have seen incorporated in the committee stage in amendments brought in either by us or by government. We would have been quite happy to see some strengthening of the bill, but we didn't see that. We brought forward excellent amendments that addressed some of the key issues that were missing from this bill, yet they were all defeated.

This portrays, I think, the next stage of this paternalistic attitude that we have seen from government members on this bill, where they move into a phase of smugness that I believe has clouded their decision-making process on this bill, Mr. Speaker. That's really unfortunate, because we're seeing a bill that I believe, as the Member for Calgary-Buffalo stated earlier today, we are going to see again in another amended fashion next year or the year after, because there just are some situations here that have not been addressed that will become issues, I think, as this bill unfolds.

With that in mind, I would like to take a look at some of the comments made by the Minister of Justice earlier this afternoon with regard to that, when he was provoked to address some of the concerns that were being outlined, where we saw the government become quite prickly about some of the concerns we had outlined. When he talked this afternoon in defence of not accepting any amendments or changes to the legislation, he said that this government was in the process of reviewing the act in its operation and working with the people who are in the front line of this operation working with these unfortunate children and getting feedback from them. He states that that's what Bill 29 is all about.

In fact, part of that feedback, Mr. Speaker, talked about what's missing in the bill. That's the process that I'm primarily concerned about, in terms of these minors taking a great deal of responsibility for decision-making processes after they have been taken into custody. The minister went on to talk about acknowledging a change in the bill in terms of 72 hours being the initial recommendation for the young people and it being made stronger by having a five-day period, which we agree with. Seventy-two hours was a major concern of ours in the original drafting of the bill. We felt that often in cases it wouldn't be a long enough time period.

The minister goes on, Mr. Speaker, to talk about why they lengthened it to a five-day period, and he talks about how you barely have the opportunity to have the child sober up, have a good meal, have a good sleep. There's very little time left to provide counseling or to intervene in any way, to provide the child with guidance and an opportunity to move into counseling, to move into some other form of treatment.

Well, he's right. There's no doubt that those are very good points. Those are also very good arguments for the amendments that we brought forward in this legislation. If 72 hours is not enough time to provide an adequate opportunity for the minor to even sober up, then how can it be enough time to expect the minor in custody to have the ability or the capabilities to make decisions in terms of whether or not they should be accessing a lawyer, whether or not they should be having a court hearing, all of those really good points that were brought up in our amendments? The Justice minister in fact made our argument for us in accepting the amendments, yet he was one of the people who spoke against them and who defeated those amendments in this House.

So my concern still is that those issues haven't been addressed, that these kids are not in a position to do good decision-making themselves, that they need some assistance. He in fact painted a picture for us here of minors who are incapable of making those rational decisions that are going to be life-changing decisions for them and that they're going to need definite guidance on. That was one of the reasons why we thought duty counsel was so important, so that we really talk about the best interests of the child in a comprehensive, inclusive fashion, which is not just handing them a piece of paper with a lawyer's phone number on it, Mr. Speaker. We just don't think that's adequate.

We believe that in practice that's going to be an issue, that this bill will be back here for more amendments. The Minister of Justice said that that's okay, that legislation is living and breathing documentation that should be amended. Well, we don't disagree with that either, Mr. Speaker, but the fact is that when you know you've got the problem up front, why not address it? Take a look at how long until this legislation has come back for amendment now and come back for amendment under the pressure of a judge's ruling. Even then it took many months. The ruling came down in the summertime. We're now talking about the very end of November. That's a time lag wherein we've seen a number of minors whose lives could have been affected in a much more positive fashion than they have been with the loss of this amended legislation. If we were to strengthen that legislation now when we have the opportunity, when we have it on the floor of the Assembly, we would have a chance to make a difference in many more young people's lives, and that's what I'm concerned about.

Finally we see a piece of good legislation that addresses some of the social issues that are at the core of the problems in our province, and we don't do everything we can to make it the best possible legislation available to us. That's really a pity. Time after time we have seen legislation or regulations from this government where symptoms are addressed, where the government hasn't had the courage to actually address the causes of the problems. Once again we're seeing symptoms addressed here, but they're starting to scratch the surface of some of the causes. They've been talked about in this Assembly, Mr. Speaker, and that's a very good first step. We would have liked to have seen that role expanded with more debate, stronger legislation, amendments passed that would have really enabled the legislation and this government to move forward in terms of protecting minors in the most comprehensive fashion available. It's too bad we haven't seen that.

I hope that I am around and available to talk to this amended legislation when it comes before us again in the future, because as my colleague from Edmonton-Glengarry said, by the time of the next election we'll have had a 50 percent attrition rate since 1993. If you think we may not see this legislation for some years in the future, then certainly there will be very few people here who will remember what it looked like when it was first brought before this Assembly. We will have to go through the process of re-educating legislators on all the shortfalls and shortcomings of the kinds of social legislation that is needed and necessary in this province. So it's too bad, Mr. Speaker, that we've missed an opportunity.

With that, I'll conclude my remarks on this bill.

[Motion carried; Bill 29 read a third time]

Bill 20

Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2000

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to move Bill 20 for third reading.

Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, as we've discussed at second reading and in committee, will result, in my view, in a significant improvement of access by Albertans to their courts and to dispute resolution processes within the province. It will provide us with a framework to have an opportunity to improve the level and amount of civil court jurisdiction in the Provincial Court as well as other jurisdictions in the Provincial Court, which will allow Albertans easier access to dispute resolution processes there. It will allow the court to organize itself in a manner which makes the most efficient use of its resources.

In addressing some of the issues that were raised at second reading and in committee with respect to the sections of the act which do away with the outlining of specific divisions of the Provincial Court, I neglected to address the concept that while we're doing away with the formal divisions in the Provincial Court, it's not intended that that will in any way, shape, or form require the court to lose any expertise in any one area. For example, in the family and youth division there will still be judges sitting who have expertise in family and youth matters.

What doing away with the divisions will accomplish will be to allow us to appoint members to the Provincial Court as a whole rather than to any specific division and, again, will allow the court to orient its resources so the Chief Judge of the court will be able to ask members of the bench to move into a particular area. If, for example, family and youth court in any particular region or section has a long time to trial, a long period of time before issues can be dealt with, those resources can be marshaled and put into that area by the Chief Judge to deal with that particular issue. Once again, the concept is not to interfere with the organization of the court or to interfere with the court's ability to address particular expertise to an area of jurisdiction or an area of the court's affairs but, rather, to allow for the easier movement of people by the Chief Judge into places where there's a particular need at a particular time.

I just wanted to add those comments at third reading because I had neglected to address that particular question when it came up from Edmonton-Strathcona at earlier readings.

Mr. Speaker, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act is a good bill. It deals with a wide range of justice issues, very important and significant issues – for example, dealing with the Surrogate Court and other issues – which will allow for better use of the resources, better access by Albertans to the courts, and I would ask the House to support it.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Bill 20 has been an interesting bill, and it culminates in actually a fairly lengthy consultation process. I'm thinking how many months ago it was that I was invited to meet with the Minister of Justice and, to my recollection, Sue Olsen, the former Justice critic for the Official Opposition, to review at that point a number of suggestions that the Justice minister was looking at and contemplating in terms of updating a series of Justice-related statutes.

Both Ms Olsen and this member had an opportunity to offer some commentary at the time, and I remember my initial reaction was that many of the changes that the minister signaled he was contemplating bringing forward in legislative form were changes that were important, that were remedial for the most part, that clarified, improved, and streamlined elements of the justice system, the biggest focus here being in terms of the civil justice side. So I thought that was a very positive initiative and, I say again, in the style that the Minister of Justice has become associated with and in some respects distinguished himself by an advanced consultation with opposition critics, as he did this afternoon when we talked about his earlier consultation on Bill 3, and then his readiness to deal with opposition-proposed amendments to make that bill clearer, stronger. Bill 20 reflects very much the minister's same kind of approach to what I describe as constructive lawmaking. It's a treat as a legislator to be able to dialogue with the minister outside this Chamber as well as inside in terms of trying to remedy omissions, deficiencies, conflicts, that sort of thing that exists in current legislation.

I'm encouraged somewhat by the minister's comment that he understands the importance of some of the specialized skills and experience being built up by having separate divisions of the Provincial Court. I take his comment that he doesn't plan on homogenizing the entire Provincial Court – certainly there had been some concern around that – that the intention is that we will still have a number of judges, men and women, on the bench who will be able to do what Judge Jordan did in the child prostitution bill we were talking about earlier; in other words, discharging her responsibility in an area where she has built up some specialized knowledge and experience in terms of dealing with children in distress.

There are provisions in terms of regulations – and I'm thinking of 5(a)(ii) and some of those other provisions – that invite my customary criticism that subordinate lawmaking in this province continues to be done for the most part in secret, tends to be done for the most part without Albertans or their elected representatives, unless they happen to be part of the government caucus, knowing anything about those regulations coming forward. One would have hoped that in the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, if ever there were an occasion to charge the Standing Committee on Law and Regulations with the responsibility to review this subordinate lawmaking . . .

MRS. SLOAN: One last attempt.

MR. DICKSON: Yeah. One of my colleagues suggests this is Calgary-Buffalo's last pitch for the Standing Committee on Law and Regulations. I hasten to say that there may be another opportunity, but I do take some modest satisfaction in knowing that those government members who are fortunate enough to return to this Assembly after the next provincial general election will sort of anticipate this amendment when they look at a bill. If the Member for Calgary-Glenmore and the Minister of Justice are back in their respective positions and they're reviewing government legislation, maybe, just maybe, somebody may say . . . [interjection] Well, I'm just indulging in the conceit of the government caucus that thinks they're coming back on the other side.

Mr. Speaker, it just occurred to me that just maybe somebody in the government caucus might say: "Hold it. You know, we're going to get beat up yet again for another four years by the opposition because we make regulations in secret. We're tired of being pummeled. We're tired of hearing the opposition take these shots at us. We're going to inoculate ourselves. We can wrap ourselves in kind of a cozy cocoon."

MRS. SLOAN: Like the flu shot.

MR. DICKSON: Very much like the flu shot. The flu shot would be simply taking that famous report written by Justice Cote and some other people who did that wonderful report, I think in the 1980s, on how Alberta could clean up their subordinate lawmaking, and we could have all those regulations vetted. And what better place to do it? What better minister to take the bold initiative? What better kind of statute to start regulating regulations in public view? Let's take it out of the secret lawmaking chamber. Let's bring it in here. This is the chance to do it.

I was sort of thinking the government caucus would be so happy to be rid of the Member for Calgary-Buffalo that to sort of hasten my departure, they might serve up a big, fat amendment that would in fact charge the Standing Committee on Law and Regulations, but alas it has not happened, and time runs out.

AN HON. MEMBER: We're scared you're going to change your mind.

MR. DICKSON: Well, I'd be prepared to make an irrevocable commitment: I will not come back if on Bill 20 – and a Mr. Edy might have something to say about it as well – the government were prepared to do that.

You know, if they don't, I want all members to know and I want the Minister of Justice to know that this is one of those arguments that works as well on the first bill as on the 40th bill or the 25th bill, any bill that deals with regulations. All of those Albertans are watching and waiting.

I can tell you that when the Liberal opposition marches in with those dozens and dozens of MLAs on that side of the Chamber, that's going to be one of the first things they do. We're going to repeal Bill 11. We're going to repeal Bill 40. Then what we're going to do, hopefully, is we're going to move to instruct the chairman of the Committee on Law and Regulations – in fact, I will come back. I will attempt to get a seat in the public gallery so that I can watch that auspicious occasion when with great fanfare – in fact, it could be like a new member being inducted into the Assembly – the chairman of the Standing Committee on Law and Regulations could pound on the door, symbolic of all of the years that he's been shut out and never able to enter the Chamber and do business in public. He could be marched forward. It could be all party leaders linking arms with you, Mr. Speaker, as they march forward to the front, and there would be a tumultuous thumping of tables as we would with a single, united chorus . . .

MR. SAPERS: Don't forget about the trumpets. Don't forget about the fanfare of trumpets.

MR. DICKSON: And trumpets. Anyway, I'm getting carried away, Mr. Speaker, and you've been very kind in indulging me here as we focus on but one element of the bill.

You know, one of the other things that I want to say is that I've never been able to persuade a Justice minister to deal with an innovative idea that came forward – one of the partners at Bennett Jones had mentioned to me one time a number of years ago in terms of video: with the video capability we have, why we don't have a video record of trials. As I looked through Bill 20, I thought this might be addressed someplace. [interjection] Well, the typical civil trial may be a day or two days.

As I look through, we have a number of changes being made to our civil process. The Member for Calgary-Foothills, you know, I'm sure has got some observation to make on this very issue. I just think that what would make sense is that in 2000 we have the capability of having a video record of trials. I think of the Court of Appeal. When the Court of Appeal sits, instead of having to rely on appeal books and factums, they would have the opportunity to be able to view witnesses giving their evidence. [interjection]

You know, I really stood up with the view of just making a couple of comments. I always start out, Mr. Speaker, trying to make the most direct point from the start until the finish, but I'm not strong enough. I am simply not disciplined enough. When I hear an invitation to meander off on a bit of a side route, I take it every time. But I'm going to try hard and be more disciplined.

I think if you look at the latest newsletter from the Canadian Bar Association, there's a focus in there where they talk about courts examining technology. There's much to consider in terms having a video record. [interjections]

Speaker's Ruling Decorum

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Hon. members on the front bench and the second bench and the third bench, I wonder if we could hear the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo out without all the additional helping comments and encouraging comments and if the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo could address his remarks to the chair, as he is wont to sometimes wander.

Debate Continued

MR. DICKSON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for that intervention. It may be that our colleagues in the Assembly have forgotten that in fact we have 30 minutes to be able to debate this bill instead of the customary 20.

But I wanted to make another observation that one of the things that I'd hoped could have been identified and addressed more strongly in this bill – you know, I think we have a very farsighted Minister of Justice, a tough guy to criticize because he clearly brings a sense of fairness and a sense of . . . [interjections] There's some suggestion that I may be discrediting the Minister of Justice with my praise in front of his colleagues, so I'll go no further other than to say this. Mr. Speaker, the point I wanted to make is this: why has this Minister of Justice not seized the opportunity that Bill 20 would afford him to be the first Justice minister in the history of this province that would say that the province has a responsibility for public legal education?

You know, one of the biggest problems we have with people getting access to justice is the cost, the cost of hiring a lawyer, the cost of going to the court system, and one of the most effective ways of addressing that is giving citizens more information. Give citizens more information about the system. The Court of Queen's Bench has recently produced a series of booklets. They're actually very good booklets in terms of information, and what they do is empower citizens to be able to find remedies and to be able to know how they're going to do some of those things.

I wasn't going to say, but, you know, I've thought there's some delicious irony every time I go in and see the Alberta Divorce Guide on the stand at McDougall Centre, because they've decided they haven't quite produced enough material to be able to assist people to do their own divorce but people are still asking for it. So there they actually have McDougall Centre – you go down there, and you find the Alberta Self-Counsel Press Alberta Divorce Guide smack in McDougall Centre. I can only suspect that the Premier hasn't been looking through the publications office. To see that displayed in fulsome fashion practically in the lobby of McDougall Centre is richly ironic and deserves some comment.

In any event, we have a chance to do something in terms of public legal education, and I've said it before, but we have in Alberta arguably one of the finest public legal education networks anywhere in Canada. The leadership that's provided with funding from the Alberta Law Foundation and the work that's being done by my old classmate Lois Gander and people at the Legal Resource Centre in Edmonton and Calgary Legal Guidance and Student Legal Services – it is amazing work, yet you know they don't get a nickel of money from the provincial government. We don't provide any provincial money in terms of public legal education, and I think we ought to do that.

Mr. Speaker, the other comment I wanted to make is in terms of legal aid. I wanted to say that I very much support the notion that we're now going to constitute legal aid separately. It's been always a strange, strange situation to have the Law Society of Alberta having to negotiate and be involved in this odd three-legged stool: you've got the Justice department, you've got the Law Society, and you've got legal aid. It's actually a big advantage in this bill to give legal aid some independent role and some independent status, and I think that's important. The difficulty is that legal aid funding still comes from the provincial government, and I get nervous because from time to time I hear members of the government saying some things that suggest to me they don't understand the importance of legal aid in terms of ensuring full accessibility to our legal system.

We've seen some adjustment in terms of legal aid rates, and I think that's a positive thing, but I think it's important that the government continue and in fact do better in terms of their funding for legal aid. I'm most anxious that as legal aid has a new governance structure that this is not seized upon by the government as some excuse to reduce funding or at least not increase funding to keep pace with the fact that we're growing as quickly as we are in the province of Alberta.

There are some questions that have been asked that I'm not sure have ever been fully answered in addition to the concern with respect to regulations. Some of the questions had to do with the kind of control that the Chief Judge will have with respect to the administration of the courts and, I guess, the privative clause, which will protect the decisions of the Chief Judge with respect to the administration of the court and insulate it, in fact effectively prevent any review by a superior court.

You know, I still wrestle with that, because the judicial independence is such a fundamental element of our legal system – and I haven't read the full trial judgment when Judge Reilly had gone firstly in front of a judge and then later in front of the Court of Appeal, but I had some very strong concerns, Mr. Speaker, around that. It seemed to me that it was important at the time that that opportunity be available. It certainly cost the province some money, and I understand that not being a very pleasant experience for them. They lost in front of the lower court judge, and they lost in front of the Court of Appeal.

Nonetheless, Mr. Speaker, I continue to question whether the privative clause is appropriate. The privative clause, of course, effectively eliminates what happened in the case of Judge Reilly.

I just want to signal also a concern I'd raised the other day, and I noticed that the Justice minister hasn't addressed that tonight. It had to do with the reduced standard in terms of proof of service of documents. We've gone from a position where we now can send a document by ordinary mail to the last known address, and that will be deemed to be good service. That's troublesome, because in some parts of the province it may not be a problem, but I think of downtown Calgary where typically many people live on average about five months in an apartment and then move somewhere else. It's easy to imagine that an attempt is going to be made to serve a defendant with a small claim summons and they've moved.

Now, when the limit was $3,000 or $7,500, the prejudice was not huge, and there's always the opportunity, I suppose, of going to the Court of Queen's Bench and trying to open up a judgment that was obtained if there was a defect in the service. But we're talking about increasing the jurisdiction of small claims court to $50,000. Fifty thousand dollars is a significant amount of money. If somebody sues me and if somebody thinks my address here in Edmonton is my last known address and of course I clear out as soon as the Legislature ends and the mail doesn't come to me right away because it was sent to what somebody thought was my last known address, I may not find out that somebody is suing me for $50,000. If they don't hear from me and in fact they proceed to an assessment of damages, the next thing I may know is that when the bailiff shows up at my door to seize my wife's computer, that may be the first notice I have, and that's the first installment on a $50,000 claim against me.

You know, I think that's the sort of thing we have to think about. Is that a process we want? I can think of lots of people who don't get mail on a regular basis and move and change addresses. In the normal course when you had to sue under the rules of court in the Court of Queen's Bench, you couldn't get away with just sending a document to the last known address. This is something I haven't heard the Minister of Justice address. I think creditors have an extensive array of remedies, and it's not a question of trying to make it easier for debtors to avoid process, but if people are going to be sued for up to $50,000, shouldn't we try a little harder to make sure they've got notice of the action, rather than just allowing the plaintiff to send it to the last known address?

In any event, it's one of those concerns I have in Bill 20. I understand the Law Society has reviewed this, and my information is that this wasn't something they had concern with. I don't know whether that's because too many plaintiffs' lawyers were offering commentary. I remember as a young lawyer starting out, as most young lawyers do, doing a collections practice. Boy, you know, it's not uncommon. People just don't get notice of those claims right away. So it's something I'd invite the Minister of Justice to review. It's not reason enough to vote against Bill 20, but I think it's very troubling to reduce the standard.

When I look at what happened with the federal voting list – and we may see this with the provincial voting list. I was one of those people who thought it was terrific to have sort of a universal voting list. We didn't have to go through the enormous cost of an enumeration, but you know we found in downtown Calgary, in Calgary-Buffalo very significant problems because you've got so many people that are moving. In fact it got to the point: I was sitting on the Legislative Offices Committee, and the Chief Electoral Officer told us that he, in effect, had to go in and not do an enumeration but do some fairly exhaustive checks and attempts to update the list.

Well, it's the same kind of problem. What we find is that lots of things can happen because people move around, and it potentially means people may end up with judgments of up to $50,000 and the first they'll know of it is when their car is seized or their cheques start bouncing because they have no money in the bank account because it's been cleaned out by a garnishee. Things to consider, in any event.

I've talked about legal aid. We've identified the issue in terms of looking at a video record of trial proceedings to enhance the scrutiny by the Court of Appeal. I remember asking the former Minister of Justice, the current Minister of Economic Development, and it was something that he said he wasn't looking at in particular. I think he said that he'd take it under advisement, but we've never heard any further. I'm not sure I've asked this of the current Minister of Justice. I suspect I have and notice that hasn't been addressed.

We've talked about the need for the Justice department to recognize that they have a huge public responsibility in terms of public legal education. I think we've talked about that as maybe the single most empowering thing that we can do. When Calgary Legal Guidance was started in Calgary, when Student Legal Services was started in Edmonton, what you found were lots of people who didn't qualify for legal aid and yet couldn't begin to afford a lawyer on a private retainer. So what do we say to those people? What happened was lawyers in this province with help from the bench created the service. We created a model in Calgary, Calgary Legal Guidance, that now there are attempts to replicate in other places, and it has expanded far beyond what it was in 1973.

I think it identifies that there are needs there. I think the Justice department and for that matter the provincial government have been getting a kind of free ride, if you like, because organizations like the Alberta Law Foundation have been providing funding, and organizations like the Public Legal Education Network of Alberta and the John Howard Society and all those organizations that do important kinds of public education are really carrying the ball. I think it's high time in this province that we accepted there was a public responsibility in terms of providing that education.

The Minister of Community Development I think is signaling that he'd like to hear more. I was going to sit down, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I expect that we may not hear a lot more from other members on this bill, and that's why I'm trying to be as comprehensive as I can. So I hope that allays the concerns of members that are watching the clock.

The provision in terms of management of exhibits, I think, is a positive one. I think the prospect of providing clear provision for civil contempt in Provincial Court is good.

One of the questions we haven't heard answered yet – and I'm sure one of my colleagues has asked this – is when we said to the Minister of Justice: tell us what sort of costs we're looking at. We have the chair here in the Assembly this evening of the task force looking at a unified family court. I've had a chance to attend one of those hearings, and one of the things I haven't heard and I think Albertans want to know, Mr. Speaker – I understand there being some cost analysis done in terms of the cost of the unified court.

Those are my comments. I'm out of time, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. The Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2000, has probably attracted a little bit more debate than the Minister of Justice would have anticipated, but it just is an indication of how important members of the Liberal caucus feel the whole area of justice is, appropriate responses to crime, dealing with some of the issues that contribute to criminality, and, of course, the administration of justice. These have always been priorities for the Liberals in this province and will continue to be a priority focus of ours.

I just wanted to make a couple of comments about Bill 20. As I read through it again in preparing for third reading debate and I had the chance to review the minister's business plan, the minister from the Department of Justice, I was trying to find how Bill 20 would fit into this business plan, and I note from the justice . . . [interjections] I thought the Minister of Gaming was making an intervention, Mr. Speaker.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Hon. member, I think the hon. Minister of Gaming, in fact, is reading aloud. Hopefully, so he doesn't interrupt you further, he will go back to silent reading.

MR. SAPERS: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. As I was reading through the minister's business plan, I noticed that the starting point on the minister's business plan is the justice summit and the justice summit report. The justice summit was held in about January of '99, I guess. A hundred and thirty-six delegates got together. The government, I know, made a real effort to gain a variety of opinions on a number of very important issues.

There were 25 key recommendations that came out of that justice summit, and those 25 key recommendations were in eight theme areas. I would like to just refresh the memory of those in the Chamber on what those themes were. Number one was to improve public knowledge, education, and awareness. Number two was to simplify the justice system. Number three was to increase sensitivity and cultural awareness. Number four was to enhance community partnerships. Five was to increase the role of victims. Six was to clarify accountability. Seven was to take action on previous studies and reports on justice, and the last one was to increase funding.

Now, I think there are parts of Bill 20 that address the second theme area; that is, to simplify the justice system. There may even be some attention being paid to clarifying accountability. But I'm very confused because I can't find how Bill 20 addresses the other six theme areas out of the justice summit report, which was supposed to influence the entire business plan this year for the minister.

I'm particularly concerned that the very first theme area, the one that calls for improving public knowledge, education, and awareness as it regards the administration of justice, hasn't been addressed at all. Now, there has been some discussion of the need for enhanced public education activities, and my colleague for Calgary-Buffalo has referred to the Public Legal Education Network of Alberta. I must say that made me feel a little nostalgic. Having been a participant in the Public Legal Education Network of Alberta for some time and even having had the privilege of chairing that organization, I'm somewhat familiar with the endeavours and with the member agencies.

You know, part of the discussion – and I'm not sure if it would be picked up in Hansard or not, Mr. Speaker. When Calgary-Buffalo was making reference to the good work done by the member organizations of the Public Legal Education Network of Alberta and he asked, not rhetorically, about the lack of funding, there was some suggestion: well, if they do it for free, why should they be paid? Well, in fact, they don't do it for free. There's a real cost. It's just not a cost that the provincial government has recognized, even though one of those theme areas for the recommendations is to increase funding, including funding for the first theme area, which was to improve public knowledge, education, and awareness.

So we would have had an opportunity, we would have thought, for the minister to clarify that, perhaps even in this legislation, to build it in instead of relying as it were on the kindness of strangers, in this case the strangers being the Alberta Law Foundation, which is set up by the Law Society of Alberta.

I heard some rather disparaging comments from some members in this Chamber in regards to lawyers. I must say that if it wasn't for the lawyers of this province making a commitment to public legal education and ensuring that the Alberta Law Foundation was there and that its mandate was to pay for public legal education, it wouldn't be happening at all.

I think, you know, it's easy to take shots at members of the legal profession, but I just want to remind members in the Chamber that in most public opinion surveys lawyers rank just slightly above politicians in terms of the public perception of honesty and trustworthiness. Now, perhaps if you're a lawyer and a politician, it means you're in double trouble, Mr. Speaker; I'm not sure. My point is that it's easy to point the finger at the legal community and say they're not doing enough, but that sure sounds hollow when the finger is being pointed by members of this government. If it weren't for the legal community, very little in this area would be done at all.

Now the other sort of general comment I wanted to make had to do with another one of the goal statements in the Justice minister's plan. Goal 3 is "to provide access to justice services for persons in need," and it goes on to say that families and the community are principally responsible for protecting the vulnerable, but critical contributions are made by the justice system. Access to justice services for Albertans in need is provided through maintenance enforcement, public trustee services, victim assistance, and the support for legal aid.

For the minister's reference I'm reading goal statement 3 on page 221 of the budget document that was provided to every member of this Chamber.

I guess I was looking for some more clarification as to how this particular goal was being achieved through the changes in Bill 20. Perhaps in the minister's closing comments he can let us know how these issues are being addressed, particularly when I look at some of the measures having to do with the collection of maintenance, maintenance payments, client satisfaction with the Public Trustee's office – there have been some questions raised about the Public Trustee's office that have not been satisfactorily answered – also to do with the number of persons receiving legal aid. Seeing as these are the measures, I would expect the minister would have paid some attention to how they may be impacted by his Justice Statutes Amendment Act.

Now, the one goal statement that is probably most on point is goal statement 5, which is "to improve access to civil and criminal justice." The ministry business plan goes on to explain that "the justice system is responsible for providing the infrastructure to resolve criminal and civil disputes" and then talks about, as the only goal statement, the "median elapsed time from first to last appearance." There is no measure in the document for the most recent past year, '98-99. We're told that the target is the Canadian average, but we don't know what the Canadian average is because the department doesn't report it in this document.

I would expect, of course, that the minister has asked officials in his department to prepare some sort of briefing or a synopsis of how this goal statement will be achieved through the changes made in Bill 20. If we are working towards the Canadian average for the median elapsed time from first to last appearance and we are seeing a major reorganization of the courts, then I'm expecting that this must have something to do with the speedy access to civil and criminal justice. If that's the case, then I would invite the minister to tell us what his expectations are and to do it in such a way, Mr. Speaker, that informs us not before he adjusts his business plans but prior to when this Assembly is being asked to vote on his plans. He asked us, when he moved third reading, to please give his initiatives our support.

I would like to give this minister my support in these plans. I think he's got a very difficult portfolio, and one that he has done relatively well in achieving a balance between those who see the justice system as being too lax and those who are seeing the justice system as being too punitive. I think being Minister of Justice means you never make anybody particularly happy, and this minister is – well, I was going to say this minister is doing exactly that: he's making nobody happy. That may be a clever quip, Mr. Speaker, but I really meant to say it in a more complimentary way. I think this minister is achieving a reasonable balance between all the competing demands that are inherent in his portfolio.

So with that in mind, I would like to support this minister's initiatives in terms of reformation of the system, particularly if it will truly improve access to the process, but he hasn't given us any indication that these changes actually do address the goal statement. Now, this is troubling specifically because we're being asked to approve something, but it's troubling in a more general way as well, and that is it reminds me of the Auditor General's most recent report, when the Auditor General points out that department by department governmentwide there is a real mismatch between goal statements and the activities of ministries and that often we don't see money being attached to measurable outcomes and don't see any real accountability thread that is woven through the actions of the ministries and the goal statements and the outcome measures, if there are any, and the legislative initiatives.

I share the Auditor General's concern. I think that if a government is going to in part stake its reputation on its business planning, then there ought to be some consistency, there ought to be some accountability, and we certainly ought to see some relationship between the money that's being spent, department by department, and the stated or the hoped-for outcomes and of course the measures we would employ to determine whether those outcomes are met or not.

So, Mr. Speaker, those are my concerns about the Justice Statutes Amendment Act. We've had lots of time in debate on this statute, and we've raised, I think, some very legitimate concerns. I do appreciate that the minister has taken some time to answer some of the concerns, but really the answers have not been forthcoming to the more serious issues that have been raised in debate in second reading, in committee, and now in third reading. This would be the minister's last chance to stand up and get on the record and clarify his position and his government's position on these matters before we're called to vote, and of course the nature of his comments will have direct bearing on whether or not this member can support the minister's request for this bill.

Thank you.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

MRS. SLOAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thought I would begin my comments on Bill 20 at third reading this evening by utilizing a quote that was made by the Church Council on Justice and Corrections in 1999. They said:

Let's end the talk about getting tough or being soft on crime, being for victims or being for offenders, as if you can only be for one . . . These young people in conflict with the law are members of our communities, not aliens. They come from our families, as do their victims. They are coming back to our communities. What we do with them in the meantime through serious interventions that stress positive and meaningful accountability and services to their victims will make the difference in whether we are a strong or weak community.

Mr. Speaker, I spoke to this bill last evening and talked about the aspect of the bill that relates to fines and the high incidence in Alberta of incarcerating people who default on fines. This evening I would like to continue to raise some issues on this statute and the broader issues related to it from the Justice and the Poor report produced in the spring of 2000 by the National Council of Welfare.

Just continuing on in a general sense, we have, as I indicated earlier, a statute which is bringing forward a number of different amendments. I'm cognizant of the fact that this may be the last bill I speak to in this Assembly. Probably in most respects, Mr. Speaker, I would have preferred that it would have been a health care bill, because I would have certainly felt much more competent to be analyzing and categorizing the effect of these amendments, but as fate would have it, tonight we're talking about amendments to the justice statutes.

I certainly have to admit that the debate on this bill has proven to be educational for me. I've learned a number of things. I've also learned in my time in the Assembly that the debate and the discussion that goes on in this process is not simply about the words or the paragraphs or the pages of the bills before us, but it is very much about the intent of those bills, what effect and what change they will bring about, and how that will affect our citizens individually and collectively.

We have had much good debate on Bill 20 already in this Assembly. In reviewing the Hansard and the issues that have been brought forward, I think that in summary there's certainly a good deal of support for the bill. There are some reasoned questions that have been made and await answers.

I have in my time in the Assembly been responsible for the portfolio of family and social services and under that category have become very familiar with this government's record on the treatment of the vulnerable in this province, whether it be the people who are utilizing disability programs, welfare programs, services for the homeless, child welfare services. In that context, Mr. Speaker, we have amendments before us, amendments about facilitating payment of fines through registries and, through that process, the incorporation of an additional surcharge. We know that certainly there's a large degree of fines that are levied that are municipally based and that there is also in the demographics of those fined a certain degree of those people who would fall into a vulnerable category.

Now, logistically I don't know how many government registries are right in the downtown core, but it would seem to me that if you are going to make it compulsory that people pay their fines at a registry, somehow for those people who don't have transportation, who can't afford bus fare, the government shouldn't be trying to make it additionally difficult for those people to pay their fines. But de facto that may be the case. We may have by agreeing to this amendment – while for many people in the province it won't pose undue hardship, for those who are of limited means it perhaps may, both in terms of the surcharge and in terms of the location of the registry.

MR. DICKSON: It's a tax.

MRS. SLOAN: It is very much a tax, and that's been stated clearly before. I won't restate the obvious, but there's certainly been a long history of that type of hidden taxation in the policies of this government in my tenure.

I wanted to just raise a couple of other observations that were made in the Justice and the Poor report. Haveman in 1984 said that "the persistence of jailing in default of a fine as a Canadian problem is astounding." Going back much earlier to the Archambault Commission in 1938, the following statement was made:

Imprisonment for non-payment, when the convicted person has not the means or ability to pay, is, in fact, imprisonment for poverty . . . Your Commissioners are of the opinion that many . . . criminals receive their first education in crime upon being committed to prison for non-payment of fines.

That was evident, Mr. Speaker, to that commission some 60 years ago.

While we're in the process tonight of discussing how we pay fines – and I've stated the reality that we have a very high imprisonment rate for defaulting on fines – we don't have the political will within this Assembly tonight to address those issues. Mr. Speaker, we simply want to create another avenue to additionally tax people, through a surcharge on fines, and create more business for the private registries. In fact, that's another valid point, that again de facto this bill is generating business for private registries. It's taking the fine payment and basically in some ways telling these private registry owners: listen; this is going to be a market that you ought to be ready to accommodate. So in that respect I have concerns about that particular section of the justice statute that's before us.

I stated in my earlier comments as well that I'd like to continue for a bit on the lack of addressment within the amendments relative to their effect on women. We talked about the regionalization of the court system, the requirement for judges to become generalists. We talked about, I guess, the lack of consultation that has occurred in advance of this. We also talked in an earlier section about the lack of government respect for the judiciary, the historic issue of the 5 percent rollback and the angst that caused between the judiciary and government.

I have a great deal of respect as well for the Minister of Justice, and I think many of these amendments are well intended. However, I've come to learn in my term of office that there's an ideology embedded within this government that goes back far beyond the current Minister of Justice, and we write our laws to symbolize or give current reality to that ideology: pull up your bootstraps; children are parents' responsibility; if you can't make it on your own, don't expect government support. Some of those very, very callous and hard-nosed ideologies I've run headlong into, Mr. Speaker, as I've fulfilled my role in this Assembly. If we're going to take the opportunity to significantly amend the way in which our justice system operates, which in fact Bill 20 does – it talks about quite a significant reorganization of the court system – why not also look at the potential impact of that and the impact this ideology has had over time on certain segments of our society?

Again citing from the Justice and the Poor report, the observation that was made in the report was:

Even if judges treated men and women equally in handing out sentences, the impact would be harsher on women. Because more women have incomes below the poverty line than men, they cannot afford to pay the same fines.

We don't have a tiered structure of fines in this province that takes that gender disparity into consideration. Most imprisoned women are poor mothers, and the worst offence many of them commit is shoplifting. The study of women who appeared before Halifax courts between 1984 and 1998 found that the major crime they were charged with, accounting for 42 percent of all the charges, was theft under $1,000. Overall 68 percent of the charges were for crimes against property, and the number of charges for theft over $1,000 started to increase in August, when children needed school clothes, and peaked in December around Christmastime.

So, Mr. Speaker, in the context of talking about fines, why not talk about this reality, the reality that in the demographics of those charged with crimes and fines levied, this demographic exists and incorporate within the bill something that speaks to that? We have certainly seen the statistics. The municipalities in Alberta have studied the concentration of poverty in Alberta communities, and these statistics are related to the same demographic I'm speaking about tonight. In fact, the reality may be that the justice system is perpetuating those women's poverty.

Again speaking about who is affected by imprisonment for the nonpayment of fines and what offences they committed, I haven't seen anything in Alberta relative to statistics on this issue, but the minister may have information that he will make available to me. This was a reality: about three-quarters of our imprisonments are for violations of provincial laws and municipal bylaws in Alberta, and we are second highest in the country for the incarceration of women for fine default. The only province that has a higher rate of incarceration of women is Saskatchewan, and that is at 47 percent. Alberta is at 39 percent.

That's probably information that many members of the Assembly weren't aware of, Mr. Speaker, so I think it's important to make those issues to give this bill some context. Simply, if we were here tonight to do a finite analysis of the sections and the amendments within it, except perhaps for the esteemed lawyers amongst us, it would be a discussion which for most of us would not have a lot of relevance.

I've certainly learned a great deal from my colleague from Calgary-Buffalo, and I've considered it a privilege to sit beside him in this Assembly. He's a fine member of the legal profession, and I am so compelled by his campaign to activate the Law and Regulations Committee that I really think a motion should be brought forward to rename the committee the Dickson Law and Regulations Committee. [interjections] I would definitely vote in support of such a motion, and I hear the hon. members and minister on the other side expressing their support for that as well. Let's make it happen.

One of the last issues I'd just like to raise on a similar vein is relative to how the offences break down for people that are sent to prison. The top 10 offences that send the largest number of people to prison include two small offences: a minor assault and theft under $1,000. Why are such small offenders sent to prison? There are many reasons, and all of them work to the disadvantage of the poor. When an Ottawa duty counsel was asked whether poor and affluent defendants received equal treatment in the court where she worked, she indignantly denied any possibility of discrimination. On second thought, she admitted that poor defendants had less negotiating power in her bargaining sessions with prosecutors over less time for more fine. Because poor people have no money for more fine, they routinely end up doing more time for the same offences, an aspect which again Bill 20 does not address.

This reality that more poor people are sent to jail when better-off people are fined is confirmed by a Winnipeg study which examined more than a thousand cases heard in provincial court. The following conclusion was reached. Whether income, social status, or type of job is used as a measure, similar results emerge: those of lower socioeconomic status are treated more harshly. The best measure has proven to be employment status. The pattern is clear. Those who are employed pay for their crime with money, and those who are underemployed with a relatively short loss of freedom.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, because there's a very relevant part in this report on the sentencing of aboriginal people, which I think applies in a number of amendments contained within Bill 20, most specifically the reorganization of the court system. I know that for those courts that have reserves within their boundaries, the location of the courts is most certainly what warrants our attention and discussion. You know, I've heard of judges who routinely pick up members of aboriginal communities on the side of the road and give them rides to the court hearings. That's not something which, perhaps, members of the Assembly would think to consider, but we have to ensure, as we make these laws, that they're going to be functional, that they're going to be operational in a manner that serves all people in this province well. That's really one of our primary responsibilities.

With those thoughts, Mr. Speaker, I am most thankful to have had the opportunity to have spoken on Bill 20 this evening and, in a similar vein, to have had the opportunity to serve in this Assembly. Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 20 read a third time]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The fall session has been very productive, so it's now my pleasure to move that pursuant to Government Motion 25, agreed to by this Assembly on November 14, the Assembly stand adjourned.

[Pursuant to Government Motion 25 the Assembly adjourned at 10:25 p.m.]
