DR. OBERG: Sure. I'll start with your last comment first, about the school board trustees being under the gun. I feel that they should be under the gun, because quite frankly we're giving these people a little over $3 billion to handle. We're giving these people the lives of our children to look after when it comes to education, and it's an extremely important job. So I think they do need to have pressure. To take all pressure off them so they can shrug their shoulders and say, "Well, you know, it happened," I think that is wrong. I think they have to be accountable. They are elected by their electorate, and I think they have to be responsible to their electorate. I think they have to do a good job. I think it's way too important a task to just take it lightly and to not be accountable for it.

With regard to school boards in general, I think school boards are critical. Most people in this Assembly have heard me talk about local decision-making. It's something that I believe strongly in. Whether it's children's services, whether it's health boards, whether it's school boards, it's something that I believe very strongly in. Quite frankly, what happens in Brooks is a lot different than what happens in Edmonton as opposed to what happens in, you know, High River, High Level. They're all different, and you need that on-the-ground approach to find answers to the problems.

With regards to Parkland specifically, what is happening in Parkland is a very unfortunate incident where you have two communities, from what I understand and from the letters I get, that are in essence at each other's throat. On one hand, you have a community that is attempting to take their school out and make it a charter school. They've written letters to me about that. On the other hand, you have a different town that is saying, "Oh, everything's fine, and we want these people," et cetera, et cetera. So when I talked to Parkland – and again I think everyone in this room has seen examples of communities becoming entrenched. I've had it in my constituency, I've had it in my own community where you get two sides on an item, and rationale tends to be gone. It tends to be all emotion. That's what's happening presently in Parkland.

What I suggested to them is to bring in an objective third party and find out what the best way is that things can be done, what the best way is that it can be done for both sides. I said that there's no way that I know, because I'm not involved in that situation, nor would I want to be. But we do have experts, people who have dealt with this, and what I said to them is that we need to try to get a win/win scenario for everyone involved. I have no idea what that is. I get extremely disconcerted when I have two towns that are quite literally on opposite viewpoints or I have school boards that are, in essence, on opposite viewpoints, and I need to give them a way out, Don. That is what is needed right now.

DR. MASSEY: How does that square, then, with autonomy of a local board? It's going to happen all over the province. They're going to try to close schools, and you're going to have community against community. It already happens. Where does that leave local boards if every time the loser on one of those votes – and there's always going to be a loser; one community is going to come out not having their school – goes to the minister? What does that say about local autonomy?

DR. OBERG: Well, first of all, ultimately in the jurisdiction of Learning in the province of Alberta I have the ultimate authority and the ultimate accountability. So to say that the Department of Learning and myself in particular are not a party to this is wrong.

DR. MASSEY: I didn't say that. I guess you can talk about local autonomy and say it's important, but if the actions don't follow that, does that not really undermine a local school board?

DR. OBERG: No, it doesn't, Don, because the issue becomes: I'm not going in on a whim saying that you must do this or you must do that. The only thing that I have said, in Parkland in particular, is in all essence exactly the same thing I said in my own constituency, that we need to bring someone in who is an objective third party to have a look at it. I gave my pledge to the school board that if that objective third party comes out and says exactly what they're going to do, I will back it one hundred percent. But when tempers run high – you know, from the letters that I read, there seemed to be some question about process. There seemed to be some question about the decision. Consequently, I have opted for an independent third party. As I say, if that independent third party agrees with the school board, fabulous. Then they have one hundred percent of my support behind them. I'm trying to get a win/win scenario for that school board.

DR. MASSEY: Okay. Are there plans afoot to look at the role of school boards in the province and to do any kind of adjusting in looking at their role?

DR. OBERG: There is no formal plan afoot at the moment. I think the school boards play a very important role, and I'm hoping they will continue to play that role. As you know, in this budget, Don, one of the key points is the flexibility that is given to school boards. I could have gone in and targeted exactly where all this money is going to go, but I didn't. I didn't put in new programs. I didn't start any new programs, apart from the AISI, which was actually started before. I felt that the flexibility given to the school boards is very important, and I hope to increase their flexibility that they have through this whole outcome measurement.

DR. MASSEY: Thanks very much.

MR. DICKSON: Good morning, Mr. Minister. I guess 1998-99 was the first year that we saw ESL funding extended to Canadian-born children who had some challenges in English. A great move. I was delighted to see that happen, but that still leaves, in my respectful view, one other major shortcoming with our ESL funding. It is, you know, manifest if you look at the dropout rate at a high school like Forest Lawn high school in Calgary, where you're looking at something over a 70 percent dropout rate for high school ESL students, something that I hope causes you as much concern as it does me. There have been numerous recommendations to you, Mr. Minister, or at least to your predecessor, to provide some flexibility with ESL funding. The three-year cap seems to be wholly arbitrary. It may be perfectly adequate for . . .

DR. OBERG: There is no cap on ESL.

MR. DICKSON: Okay. Well, that's very good news. My understanding had been – and I was even talking to school trustees – that there was still a three-year limit on ESL funding.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: We asked them to look at the three-year limit, but there's no official cap on it.

MR. DICKSON: Oh, okay. Well, that's good news as well.

DR. OBERG: We did that last summer actually, Gary. We took that off.

MR. DICKSON: Okay.

The other thing I wanted to ask. Just one encouragement. There's an excellent program at St. Monica school. St. Monica school has a number of children that have come from the former Yugoslavia. They have an excellent partners in peace and education program that deals with children who actually come with some pretty disturbing experiences and memories. I hope that's a program your department is going to be able to support, because it meets a real and pressing need for children who come from war areas.

Another concern I've heard. I understand there's still a cap on administration, a 4 percent cap, and I'm thinking of the four larger boards, the public and separate boards in Edmonton and Calgary. An issue that's been raised with me is a concern that when you get to a board particularly the size of the CBE, the Calgary board of education, just because of the complexity, the size of their student population, the range of issues and needs that children present with, there may have to be some additional flexibility in that cap. I understand it's a 6 percent cap for some of the smaller boards. So I relay to you and would be interested in your thoughts in terms of whether we're ensuring that with those very large boards, with some different kinds of challenges qualitatively and quantitatively than some of the smaller boards, that's something there may be some flexibility on, Mr. Minister.

I have a number of questions in terms of what I observe in Calgary, and I'd be interested in any specific plans you've got to deal with them. There was the Calgary teachers' convention recently. I had a chance to spend a day there. I talked to lots of teachers, school principals. Some of the things that I heard: a lot of concern around teacher stress and low morale in the Calgary public system, and it may be true in the Catholic system too; you've got a high rate of absenteeism; you have a number of teachers choosing to leave the profession. I was told, for example, that we don't have enough teachers coming out. Right now the University of Calgary Faculty of Education has but two students graduating with a mathematics major. If in fact this information is accurate, I'd be interested in knowing what kinds of short-term plans your department has to address some of those needs around a shrinking experienced teacher base.

I'm just going to keep going, Mr. Minister, unless there's something you'd like to jump in and offer some observation on. I'd appreciate that.

DR. OBERG: Sure. You know, so far, Gary, you've asked me four questions that I can answer here. Do you want me to?

MR. DICKSON: Absolutely. Why don't we have a go at dealing with those, please?

DR. OBERG: Sure. First of all, the partners in peace program I think is an excellent program. One of the issues – when you ask about support, absolutely, we will certainly give support. We will not give monetary support, and the reason we aren't going to give monetary support is because this is the flexibility the school boards have wanted. This is the flexibility they will get to put in these different types of programs. What we will do is give them the basic grant and the programs that are needed.

This goes back to Don's question a little bit, too, about the flexibility and autonomy of the school boards. I believe they must have that autonomy to put in programs that are needed in specific situations, and this is a specific situation. I'm confident that the school boards will respond to those particular situations. When it comes to any support administratively, clerically, et cetera, curriculum-based support, anything like that, we will certainly help them. Again, though, I think it sets a bad precedent when this department goes and funds specific individual programs around the province. There would be a lot of recourse, for example, for the Grasslands school division in Brooks to say, "Well, we have one Yugoslavian child; I want you to fund that program in Brooks," despite the fact that it may or may not be needed. Still, it's very difficult.

The cap on administration. The cap on administration is something that I hear a lot about as I go around the province, and I hear it diametrically opposed on two different sides. On the school board side they say that there is not enough money for administration, yet when I talk to the public, when I talk to Albertans, they say we absolutely have to keep that cap on. When I talk to MLAs as well, one of the issues has been that with a lot of these schools boards, especially the large ones, too much money gets put into administration and not enough into the classroom. By keeping the cap on, what we can do is ensure to parents, ensure to Albertans that the dollars are going into the classroom as opposed to administration.

I think, in talking to some of the larger school boards especially, that they're doing well when it comes to administration. The case I'll use is Edmonton public. Edmonton public tends to be doing quite well in how they distribute it out. The other thing we have to remember is that as we go to school-based funding, school-based budgeting, the amount of central office administration that is needed is actually decreasing, as more of the administrative functions are going out, so we hope there's a saving.

In all fairness, Gary, I don't see the cap changing at the moment. One thing I will say, though, is that there has been a 3 percent increase on that as well. As we increase the budget, their dollars go up as well.

Teacher stress and low morale. Absolutely that's a problem, and I think it's quite a serious problem. When I first became minister, within basically a week or 10 days of becoming minister, I sat down with the Alberta Teachers' Association and addressed this exact issue. One of the things I said was that I believe a lot of the issues about stress, about low morale, about the negativity surrounding the education system is because that's all everyone talks about. The commitment I gave them at that meeting was that they would never hear a negative word about a teacher out of my mouth. In talking to the ATA, hopefully you may have noticed that things have changed slightly over the last six or seven months as we try to elevate this profession.

I use the example – and it's exactly the same thing with me, being a medical doctor. I hear a lot of stories of doom and gloom. We say, we being physicians, what the medical system is like, et cetera, et cetera, and what that does is degrade the work atmosphere that we work in ourselves. I'm not saying, you know, that we wear rose-colored glasses for everything, but on the flip side I don't say that we look at everything in a negative sense. I think there are a lot of positives in our education system, and that certainly has something to do with teacher stress and low morale.

Time may prove me wrong on this, but specifically on the Calgary public I will say that I think the new school board is doing an absolutely excellent job. They are very cognizant of their teachers. They are attempting to increase the morale and lessen the stress in situations that are involved there, and I think they're slowly but surely doing it. I have been very impressed with the Calgary board.

Your fourth question, Gary, was about teachers graduating. This is going to be a critical issue. As we look four or five years down the road, the number of teachers we see – first of all, a lot of teachers in the 45- to 55-year-old age group obviously, as they move forward, are going to be retiring. There are not as many people that are coming in. Plus, obviously our student population is increasing, so we're going to be needing more teachers there as well.

A couple of things. We've talked to the universities specifically about this. One of the issues I have personally with the universities is that Lethbridge, for example, is now at a five-year teaching degree, Calgary is at a six-year teaching degree, the U of A is still at a four-year teaching degree, and I've expressed my displeasure with this to them. I think objectively, as I look back, I understand the rationale, and the rationale in Calgary is that it's a four plus two. You do a degree, and then it's two years on top of that degree for your teaching certificate. This is great for people that don't know exactly what they're doing, that go in and take a science degree, an arts degree, et cetera, et cetera, and then go into teaching. I think it's great for that.

The University of Lethbridge has decided they have an excellent teaching program, which I think everyone acknowledges, and they feel they can get more excellence out of their teaching program if they go to five years. The University of Alberta has stayed at four years. What I'm recommending when I go around the province is that if you want a teaching degree, if you're completely confident that you want to be a teacher, then probably the University of Alberta is the best place to go rather than the University of Calgary, six years, and the University of Lethbridge, five years.

One other thing I've done is that I've served notice to the rest of the ministers of education in Canada that Alberta is going to be moving towards accepting their accreditation of teachers. What is happening right now as we look across Canada is that every province has various barriers up to teachers coming into their province. What I'm now saying – and I served notice a couple of weeks ago at the meeting I was at – is that Alberta will very soon move to accepting their accreditation carte blanche.

I had an example of a priest moving here from Manitoba who had been teaching for 22 years, had been doing an excellent job, and could not get a teaching certificate here to sub, and that just is not acceptable. We are looking at that, and again I've served notice that we are looking to attract teachers from the rest of the country as well, so we're hoping some of this will continue.

The second part of that is the whole idea of a math major, and I think that's an excellent point, Gary. I think we have to find a way to get more of these teachers into especially mathematics and science, where there seems to be a demand for it. One of the things that can be done is through the access funding in universities, where they can specify that these positions are held for teachers. Again, I see that as a problem upcoming in the future that we have to look at very seriously and deal with.

MR. DICKSON: Thanks, sir. I know my colleagues have questions too, but since you've sort of taken us to the universities, I spend lots of time talking to people at the University of Calgary, and I'm told, Mr. Minister, that if you look at the salaries paid to instructors, to professors across the country, the University of Calgary would rank about number 22 out of the 25 largest universities in Canada. That's information I haven't been able to check independently, but you know, I'm always struck with what seems to be a disconnect between our talk about all the high-skilled, high-paid jobs we want to develop in the high-tech sector in a knowledge-based economy and what seems to be some fairly significant pressures, strains. It looks to me like manifest underfunding, certainly at the University of Calgary, and I wonder, Mr. Minister, if you can address that. I mean, I was also at that meeting when you met with the board or maybe it was the senate of the university, and it was a raucous meeting. I wasn't quite sure what I'd stumbled into.

DR. OBERG: Neither was I, Gary.

MR. DICKSON: You know, there was lots of passion, there was a lot of concern, and it wasn't just on the part of students. We saw some of the leading businesspeople in the city of Calgary register concern with what's happening at the University of Calgary. I invite your comments on what we're doing to ensure that our universities – I'm talking about that one, but some of this applies to all our universities – are leading the way to take us where the government says it wants to take Alberta.

DR. OBERG: Sure. Absolutely, Gary. First of all, on the overall grants – not grants at specific institutions but overall – the funding went up 7.7 percent this year to postsecondary institutions. That's the money that goes directly to the institutions, so that's a fairly large whack of money. I will give you a proviso on that, and the proviso is that some of that money is tied to the access fund. So in essence what we're saying is that here's the money, but you also have to incur more expenses to get that money. There are 1,200 spaces, for example, that have been funded across the province, so there's a little bit of proviso in that.

The point about the professors' salaries is an absolutely excellent point. There is a recent study that came out a couple of weeks ago, and it basically said that Alberta professors were going down in real dollars as opposed to going up. I see that as a real challenge in my department. It's something I'm very seriously looking at and attempting to find ways to bring back up, because your point about the knowledge-based economy is absolutely correct. We can't have a knowledge-based economy if we don't fund our professors, so that is something I am very seriously looking at. I think my caucus colleagues around here know the kind of passion I display when it comes to postsecondary funding. I think we'll continue on, and I'm sure we'll get that one done.

On postsecondaries as well, though, interestingly on Thursday I was at a sod-turning ceremony in Calgary – this is a little bit of an aside here – and I came to the realization that since my short tenure as minister that's the fourth building I have taken part in turning the sod for, and that's in about eight or nine months.

So it is coming, but I won't say we're completely there yet.

MR. DICKSON: I think the CBE would say they'd like to see that same rate of sod-turning in their K to 12 area too, Mr. Minister.

Just a couple of other questions. Specifically now looking to program 1 of the budget, there are some questions in terms of element 1.0.4. What's the intent? There's an 8.5 percent increase.

DR. OBERG: Hang on. At what? At 1.0.4?

MR. DICKSON: Yes, 1.0.4. You've got an 8.5 percent increase for finance and administration. I'd like you to particularize what the intent of that is, and I've got a couple of similar questions. If you look at 1.0.5, similarly, what would be the intent of the 7.2 percent increase for human resource services? And at 1.0.7, what equipment will be purchased with the $575,000 additional funding requested for IT? Then if you look at support for adult learning in program 3, 3.1.3, can you give us a justification for the increase in funding for learning television? What programs will this fund? Why is it being funded almost entirely by lotteries? Then just while we're in program 3, look at element 3.1.5. There's a 115.4 percent increase in the budget for other program support. I've given you probably enough questions to have a go at.

DR. OBERG: Okay. Let me start off with 1.0.4. That's finance and administrative; it has gone up 8.65 percent. There are several reasons for that. The first one is a salary increase in 2000-2001. There's also a provision to support the Imagis core team, plus there are some funds reallocated from the administrative system support for unfunded but occupied positions between AECD and HR and E.

With regards to 1.0.5, which is human resources, we're seeing an 18 percent increase. This is one FTE for human resources. The account was introduced in '99-2000, and it was underutilized due to the reorganization in '99-2000. What we're saying is that it was artificially low because of the reorganization in '99-2000, so this is bringing it back up, plus there's one FTE that was added to it in the Learning account.

Okay; learning television, 3.1.3. The reason the operating expense was funded by lotteries is that we felt this would be a good position for lotteries to be in. We are entering into a service-based contract with learning television, which means they have to provide the service in order to get paid for the programming. I think we've all seen the Access programs that are on, where there are courses with Athabasca University and things like that. That's where those dollars have gone. The $7.6 million again just purely comes from lotteries into our budget. It was allocated from lotteries into our budget, so it's included in our budget. Apparently lotteries felt that this was a good area to put the money into.

The other thing was 3.1.5, which is other program support. What this is is there are some dollars in there, in the support for adult learning, that have not been allocated yet. This is one of the potential areas where we are looking at allocating this for professorial salaries, and we are attempting to find a way to put some of these dollars into that. These dollars have not been fully allocated.

MR. DICKSON: Okay. Thank you.

MRS. SOETAERT: Actually I'd like to revisit your discussion with Don about the Parkland school division. With all due respect, I think the board has done a great deal of homework. It has documented it. In fact, it was a unanimous decision to amalgamate all three programs, not an easy decision. This is a very responsible group of people who care very much about the entire area. I think some local people have blown it out of proportion, which is very hurtful and divisive between two communities that have a history of working very well together.

Part of my concern. The reality is that funding won't accommodate three programs, so they've had to make this decision based on: we cannot support three programs in three different locations. But if the independent study goes through, my understanding of that is it will be based on not only finances but community impact and educational impact. Well, the board doesn't have that flexibility in making the decision. They only have the funding flexibility, so I think they feel like this is a setup to show they can't make a good decision. I feel badly about that. I also know there has been local interference by their local MLA, trying to barter something for something else. Two different issues entirely. So there is resentment on that board about the involvement of the heavy-duty government coming upon a board that has tried to make and has made very responsible decisions and in the past has not run a debt, has had to amalgamate programs, cram 33 kids in grade 2 French immersion into one classroom in a very old building. I have always given them respect due to their decisions.

I feel that because half of it is in a different political riding, if you like, as opposed to another, this has been part of the stirring of the pot. My fear is that you may be getting caught in the middle of it without all the cards on the table. I guess I caution you because this is a strong board that has made, I think, very sound decisions for their areas, and they're very upset. They're very upset with the lack of autonomy to even deal with program location, and I share their concern.

DR. OBERG: Okay. A couple of points on that. First of all, if it shows on the financial documents that they have to do this in an effort to save money, then I have absolutely no problems with this. What the people from – is it Stony Plain?

DR. MASSEY: Stony Plain.

DR. OBERG: What the people from Stony Plain have been saying, when questioned, is that they will not show them how they have saved money, how this is a money-saving procedure. That has not been done. I take full account of what you say, and the issue to me is that if there's any question, as there is – and I think you're absolutely right. It is tearing apart two communities, and from my way of thinking the only way to get a correct answer on that is to have an objective third party come in and take a look and see what is right based on finances – that would be first and foremost – based on the communities, based on perhaps busing, based on a lot of different issues. But I don't see any problems with having an independent body come in and either reaffirm their decision by saying, "Yes, this is the correct way to go" or saying, "No, we could do this better."

That is the type of thinking where we as politicians get into a situation where we can never relook a decision. Because we've made that decision despite the fact that further evidence comes forward I think is an extremely scary thought, and I think it's scary for both us as MLAs and for school boards. Those school boards and myself are in this to do what is right for the kids, and if we get an objective expert in who says that this is not right for the kids, then I think we have a problem. If he says yes, it is right for the kids, then . . .

MRS. SOETAERT: How do they fund it?

DR. OBERG: What's that?

MRS. SOETAERT: The reality is: how do they fund it? They have everything you've mentioned, busing and where students are located and the funding of it. I know that information is there, and I'm surprised you don't have it, because it's there.

DR. OBERG: I don't have it, and the people of Stony Plain don't have it. That is one of the things this person will be looking at, and if there's a huge financial argument, then the case in point is not there. It is a moot point.

MRS. SOETAERT: Because it's easy to say it's always nice to keep your child as close to home as possible. Even studying that is a moot point. You know, the reality is that it's nice to stay near home. For them I believe most of it was a practical funding reality, and the best way to offer a program was combining it.

DR. OBERG: Then it should not be a problem at all to bring in a third party and they show them the financial figures and say: for this reason and this reason and this reason we're doing this. That was not given out to the people of Stony Plain, and what I'm attempting to do is bring an objective opinion to a huge rift between two communities.

MRS. SOETAERT: I don't know if it's a huge rift, maybe between the 20 families who may have to move.

DR. OBERG: You know, I just received a petition with something like 350 or 360 names on it.

MRS. SOETAERT: Yeah, I'm aware of that, Lyle. I'm hoping you're not missing an element that is there. I caution you on that one. I think the board is really upset with the interference. This was not an easy decision, and it's not easy for them to make this decision.

DR. OBERG: Then, if I may, Colleen, it should be much better for them if they get the backing of an independent report that says that what they did was correct.

MRS. SOETAERT: The independent backing, they fear, is just a setup to make sure that local MLA is happy.

DR. OBERG: It's not a setup.

MRS. SOETAERT: Well, then, that has to be made very clear, because when you talk about educational community and funding to that community, we just said that's a moot point. I caution you, because if we talk about the autonomy of boards, I think this will be seen as very offensive. I tell you this because I know it. What's happening I have real concerns about.

DR. OBERG: If I can just comment on that statement about the offensive part. My job is not to try and smooth everything over for the school boards. My job is to do what is correct for the kids of that community, and it's my job to ascertain what is correct for the kids of that community when I see a rift. There is a rift there now, and I am not going to go in and say I think you guys should go there or I think you guys should go there or I think you should do this. I'm not an expert in education, nor will I ever profess to be one. But I have experts that can go in there, and if they say, for example, that they're going to save this amount of dollars that can be shifted to somewhere else, they have 100 percent of my backing on this issue and I will go out to Stony Plain and talk to them and do whatever is needed. So I have no problem at all in doing that.

MRS. SOETAERT: Okay. They do feel there has been political pressure from other areas that have nothing to do with board decisions. That's for you to know. I seem to be in a hotbed of controversy in my riding.

Another issue that has Sturgeon, St. Albert Catholic, St. Albert Protestant all very concerned for all different reasons is . . .

DR. OBERG: What are you doing out there, Colleen?

MRS. SOETAERT: Just having so much fun.

Of course, you know the four-by-four issue. If you want to talk division in community, that has certainly happened in Sturgeon. I had a parent call me and say: now kids are picking on my son because he's going to the St. Albert Catholic, and they've lost his classroom somewhere else in Sturgeon. I am very concerned about what this does to the planning ability of school boards. They don't know if they're going to have X number of children at a certain point in the year. I also know that it's divisive in communities. I'm a Catholic. I went through a Catholic system. I live in the country. Realizing that, I knew my children would not get a Catholic education. So I sit in the middle of this with all kinds of feelings about it, but I am very worried that it is divisive in communities, that it may undermine one system because of this. I don't think there's an easy answer to this, because when I look at it, I say: okay, what would I do? I think this needs a great deal of work, and I think the way the four-by-fours were formed has people questioning the democratic procedure of that as well. Between three boards that truly get along very well with wonderful people on all of them, this is not good. So I guess my question is – good luck – now where are you headed on this one?

DR. OBERG: Well, if I can just back up a little bit to about 1902 or 1905. As everyone knows, in the Constitution it is the right of Catholics to form four-by-four votes. This goes back to a time and age which was a lot different than what it is now.

I would say to you, Colleen, that I am probably the most experienced person in Alberta when it comes to formation votes in that there was recently a vote, about four or five years ago, in Brooks which absolutely tore apart the community. Those scars are still healing, and whenever one little thing is done, the scars become that much deeper and that much worse. This last fall there was a vote in Strathmore and exactly the same thing happened in Strathmore.

This is a horrible situation, and you are absolutely correct. We have to come up with an answer. I will say to you that I am that far from coming up with an answer, and I'm actually meeting with the affected parties again tonight to deal with this issue. It's been something that we have been working on for about the past six or eight weeks with the affected associations. The one thing I will say is that one of the issues we have is this may need legislation, and we have to see what kind of legislation it may need. In all fairness, though, it may be very minimal legislation. I'm not attempting to prejudge this, but if we get to the point where the Public School Boards' Association and the Alberta School Boards Association and the Catholic School Trustees' Association and all their boards and the bishops agree with the process and everything we've done, I would ask for your support if we have to bring this through. Obviously, anything we bring through would be with the unanimous support of all these institutions, so I would ask for your support in that, because I think we all know the horrible situation this causes.

We'll see. We may not get it, but I'm hoping we will. As I say, if we do, I will ask for your support, and I will certainly come and talk to you before that time.

DR. MASSEY: Mr. Minister, will we be able to talk about 215, creating a lot of support for 215?

DR. OBERG: About what, sir?

DR. MASSEY: Bill 215, class sizes?

DR. OBERG: Oh. That's right. Politics is the art of negotiation, Don.

MRS. SOETAERT: Okay. Thank you for that. I look forward to seeing that one percolate up.

The AISI funding. I expressed concerns over it in its original form. I realize this is a bit better form. You know that my background is in teaching, and at the end of the day I would rather have a meeting with my colleagues about how to help a certain student, about a program, about what our school should do to build morale, or a thousand things other than, "Okay; what can we put in here that will get us more money?" Maybe I'm wrong, but I'm just looking at it as a practical use of my time as a teacher.

I'm not against creativity and new ideas and the whole bit, but I don't know if that's the best way to get them, chasing a dollar. You know, if you're setting up a program so you can get a dollar, I guess I feel: just give me the money to run with a decent education program. Take three kids out of my class so I only have 27 instead of 30. Don't make me spend four meetings within two months with my entire staff trying to figure out how we can get more money. I know that wasn't the intent of it, but I think in some places that's what it's coming down to.

Of course, then we get situations where people who have more time to meet and plan figure out a good something to apply for. I just see it as: in all my day of making sure that Johnny's parents know he missed second block, I've got to now meet to find out how we can get more money. You see my concern about it. Don't make me jump hoops to teach kids. Just let me teach the kids.

DR. OBERG: But if I can, though, I respectfully disagree with your statements. First of all, I believe that this program will be probably the most effective and best program we have seen in Alberta in the last 50 years. This will be a program that will allow us to use measurement, to actually measure some of the results we are getting, actually look at what are better ways to improve our schools. What we're drawing on is the creativity of teachers; we're drawing on the creativity of school boards. We're giving the school boards the autonomy and the flexibility that have been asked for already as to how to do that.

We're taking it actually one more step. We're saying to the school boards: what is it in your school system that you want to improve? For example, in Northland school district probably the biggest method of improvement is if they actually get kids to go to school. In the school that Gary was talking about, if they get ESL kids to finish high school, that's a huge improvement. What these dollars will allow the schools to do is put in different programs in order to look at them. Quite frankly, if they find programs that are effective, then I have no problem in putting them across the province.

The other thing that we're doing is setting up web sites so we can monitor as programs are going on, so we can monitor exactly what is happening in programs, what results are being seen. I have stressed to school boards that I don't care if these programs fail, and the reason I say that is that we learn just as much about the school system if a myth is broken down as opposed to actually finding something that works.

A good example is the early literacy program, where that went out and is absolutely working famously. What I'm hoping is that we get 20 or 30 or 60 more early literacy type programs with this. I think the day when we can say we'll just sit down and work with the student and do the best job is gone. We have to find ways to use technology. We have to find better ways to use technology optimal ways to teach these kids, and if it means changing what we do in universities, all these things, that's what this program is about.

The other thing I will say is that it's not about competing over dollars. These dollars are secure to the school boards. They are receiving $120, I believe it is, per capita, per student, that they can use with this funding. So it is not about competing. It may be competing between schools for programs, but that money is guaranteed to the school boards.

MRS. SOETAERT: They don't have to come through you and say, "This is the program we're setting up"?

DR. OBERG: They do have to come for the program approval, but if that one program is not approved, then they still have the money that they can put towards another program.

MRS. SOETAERT: Okay. And that's the time-consuming part.

Could, then, a school say, "Listen; we want to hire a teacher to work with all our home schoolers and try to convince them to come back into the school"? Would that be approved?

DR. OBERG: Absolutely. If they have something there to measure that, if that's something they feel is an issue.

MRS. SOETAERT: Yes. Even if there are 140 kids in the area?

DR. OBERG: Absolutely.

MRS. SOETAERT: Okay.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: Excuse me. There needs to be a measurement around how the children coming back into the system would improve their performance or overall schooling. It can't be just . . .

DR. OBERG: Or improve the kids' performance too.

MRS. SOETAERT: Okay. Since I'm on this one, home schooling is growing in some areas of this province. I mentioned this, I think, last year at this time. As a parent, if you are educating your child in the way you see fit, I respect that, but I have real concerns about, I guess the word is, evaluating some of those children.

I have seen where children have not been learning. I don't think they have been evaluated. I also have some concerns with – dare I say it without being sued for something – the one school that I don't feel does any follow-up, yet courts students to come into their program at the bonus of a computer or whatever it is. I am really concerned that we have children at home who are not getting the best education. I'm not saying that you can't work with those parents. Actually, Parkland has set up a pretty good person who is working with those parents. It's a concern of mine that some of the home schooled kids – and I don't mean to insult any parents who are doing that, but I have real concerns over not evaluation but the . . .

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: Achievement tests.

MRS. SOETAERT: Yeah.

DR. OBERG: Achievement, period.

MRS. SOETAERT: Well, yeah, and the evaluation of it, because I know some parents give the test right there and help them with it. I knew one man who was in a literacy program, and his children were being home schooled.

I just don't know the answer to it. I don't know if we need to evaluate those programs that are going out and what they do to follow up with evaluation and if those parents are getting the bang for the buck in those programs that they're in. So I guess I have concerns about it. I support the right to do that, but I also think there's a responsibility to show that your child is learning.

DR. OBERG: Colleen, if I can comment on that, I think you and I agree completely on this one. I certainly have concerns as well. One of the things we have tried to move towards is virtual schooling, which I believe is an improvement. It still has some issues when it comes to, for example, the parents helping out when the test is there. You're absolutely correct.

Parents do have the ability to make the choice to home school their kids in Alberta, and hopefully the majority of parents make that choice on a very sound basis and for sound reasons. But home schooling is a concern. My concern is not home schooling per se. It's for the students, ensuring that the students are getting a proper education. I will be completely frank with you. In some situations I know they're not. This has been brought to my attention by the Taber school board, where they have a very difficult group of people who believe that education is not important for their children, that their children should not be educated.

These are very difficult issues. We attempt to go in, but quite frankly in this society we cannot go in and seize the kids and put them in school. We're certainly working to improve our virtual schooling, our home school programs. We're working to improve it. We're working to have the school boards with more contact with the children involved. Is the system perfect? No. The system isn't perfect, but we recognize that it's something we have to be diligent and vigilant about, and we'll hopefully continue to do that and continue to find better ways to do it.

MRS. SOETAERT: A couple more things before I give it over to our critic. I was pleased to see the money going into scholarships for advanced ed. I'm always concerned, though, about that average kid who isn't an honours kid. Often those who are very strong academically come from advantaged homes, not always but often from what I have seen. They come from a home that values education, that will make sure their children have the money somehow to go, or actually it isn't an issue that they have the money. So I'm thinking of the average kid from a home that isn't as financially advantaged as others. That child, I'd venture to say has a real grind to get through university when you're doing it totally on your own without parental support.

I think all of us here with kids in university have given parental support because it's a priority, and no matter what we're going to make sure they get through. The kids who don't have that who also aren't an honours type student, I just see them catching the biggest load of the debt and not having the financial support from behind.

I guess if I were to weigh out more scholarship money – and I'd hate to choose. I would say , then, don't increase tuition rates. Maybe that's just peanuts compared to not raising tuition rates. I see the student who walks away in high school with about $5,000 to $8,000 worth of scholarship money. That is wonderful. But the reality is that then she gets another $1,000 or he gets another $1,000 and this other 65, 70 percent kid is still without access to those dollars at all.

I don't know the balance, but I think I would choose trying not to increase tuition rates and hold off on new scholarship money for the very, very top, because some of them do get a good healthy chunk coming out of high school. Those are great. I support them. I support all the scholarships but, I've got to tell you, not at the cost of keeping tuition rates stable.

DR. OBERG: If I can comment on that. Your argument is a little bit on both sides of the coin, because when you freeze tuition fees, you actually freeze it for the people you just talked about, the people who can afford it, the people that have an interest in education, the people who will find the dollars to put their kids through school. You freeze it for both sides of things. You say that you shouldn't give a scholarship because the scholarships are going to people that don't necessarily need them. That's the rationale you just used.

MRS. SOETAERT: That's not quite how I would say it.

DR. OBERG: When you freeze tuition fees you do exactly the same thing. You're helping the people that don't necessarily need the help. Hence, that's why we put in all the money we were putting into the student loan side of things, so we can help the people that really need the help.

When it comes to tuition, we increased it $300 this year , which more than matches the increase in tuition, and we increased that remission amount. We kept the amount that you would owe after a four-year education at $20,000, and we increased the amount you could get. So we have increased the amount of remission. The whole idea behind that is so the kids who need the dollars can access the dollars.

With regards to the scholarship, we've had some successful programs, but I would say that one of the most successful programs we have ever had have been the Rutherford scholarships. This scholarship will be designed on exactly the same formula as the Rutherford scholarship. This is also something that CAUS, the university students, and the college students actively lobbied me for: more scholarship money, more scholarships in the way of the Rutherford scholarships. They were the main ones that did this and said that that's what they wanted.

The other thing. If you noticed on the student loan side, we increased the amount of scholarship that each student can get before they have to declare it against their student loan, and for that exact reason: to promote the excellence. Again, I must say that this is the exact thing the university and college students asked me for.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: And their earnings. We increased the level of earnings they can keep as well.

DR. MASSEY: I looked at the accessibility study put out by the students' union at the University of Calgary, and one of the questions they asked 12th graders was: when I think about the amount of debt I'll have when I finish and how long it's going to take to pay it off, do I have second thoughts about whether I continue my education? Then they looked at how students from different household incomes responded to that. Of those students from household incomes of less than $30,000, 57 percent said that was a factor and they had reservations, while of those from families of $50,000 or more income, it was 29 percent.

The large loans and the large tuition have a differential effect, depending on your family's income. If you come from a family that's low income, those big numbers scare you off. It's sticker-price shock. I think there's some pretty good evidence. The Harvard litigation journal or one of those journals did a study on the actual number of students that start making different choices at different levels. I guess it's been a concern, and I know the department has a study under way with the University of Calgary. What's the progress of that study?

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: We've just undertaken it, and we're doing it in conjunction with the student associations. We're concerned that there is that sticker shock and with some of the real issues there, about how you inform potential university students about the real costs and a number of other things. We're undertaking that. The terms of reference are being written, and we're in dialogue with the student associations to start that process.

DR. OBERG: If I may, Don. I think that process is absolutely critical. We don't want to deny access to anyone. I guess I have a little bit of an issue when we take a look at how after a four-year degree, if you qualify for the maximum in student loans, say, if you're at the lowest socioeconomic base, you're going to owe $20,000, which is roughly the same as a new car loan.

DR. MASSEY: But what did you borrow before you ended up at the $20,000?

DR. OBERG: Well, at $20,000 you will have received about $42,000.

DR. MASSEY: It's the $42,000 that scares them off.

DR. OBERG: I know, but I guess what Maria was saying is that the issue is we have to put forward more about remission and ask: what is a better way to do that? You're absolutely right, Don. It is the $42,000 that's the issue, but the $42,000 is not what they have to pay back. I'll give you an interesting anecdote. Since the fall I've been talking a lot about student loans, a lot about remission. Our remission rates, because you have to apply for them, have gone up dramatically. We are getting more money out to students through remission purely by communication. We're looking at changing our web site, changing our web page about student loans to get that information out to people that these remissions are available and that student loans are accessible. We haven't done a very good job of that up to date.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: Dr. Massey, only 50 percent of the students who were eligible were making use of remissions.

DR. MASSEY: Some of them, when at the banks, couldn't find the remission forms.

MRS. SOETAERT: I don't even know about the remission forms, and I've got kids with that. You're saying that if they hit a certain debt load, they can get . . .

DR. OBERG: No. It's variable on each student loan. The maximum amount is $5,000 per year that anyone will owe.

DR. MASSEY: It's not that students from low-income families are being denied access. It's that they're opting for cheap, short programs, something where they can get in and get out. You know, I don't think either one of us would ever want students making life career decisions based on how cheap the program is and how short it is.

DR. OBERG: Absolutely, Don. That's why we're entering into this study with the students' associations, to take a look at this and see what the actual effect of it is, and we'll see what happens.

DR. MASSEY: They're going to look at grade 10, 11, and 12 students from a variety of communities?

DR. OBERG: Yes.

DR. MASSEY: Great.

The other part. Colleen talked about it a little bit. You know, the scholarships are great. If you're a bright student, I don't think you can be denied an education in this province. There are all kinds of opportunities. But it's the 65s to 80s that I worry about in terms of their opportunity. I think there is a real struggle for some of them because they don't have access to the scholarship funds. They can't earn during the summer, like we could, enough money to pay tuition and board. Those kinds of jobs are not available for most of them. So it's that middle group that I have some concern about.

If I could, while we're on tuition, is there any thought of reviewing the 30 percent cap? We had a 20 percent cap as our proposal. I wonder if we aren't both wrong-minded in terms of trying to set caps. Once all the institutions get there, there'll be a period, I suspect, when they start playing around with: what does 30 percent mean? They've already done that. What does it include, and what does it exclude? It seems to me that 10 years down the road the long-term problem of financing postsecondary education won't be resolved unless we now start thinking about it and looking at some alternatives to tuition caps. The institutions are, I guess, going to be up against it once they hit that limit.

DR. OBERG: Yeah. Just two points. First of all, when it comes to the funding, we are again putting in a funding review, starting within the next week or so, about postsecondary education, looking at the different funding envelopes. One of the issues the universities and colleges came to me with was that they didn't like the funding envelopes. I said: "Okay I'll get rid of them. Give me the outcome indicators, and I'll get rid of them." This is what we're in the process of doing: looking at ways to better fund, to more fairly fund.

I'll give you another example, Don. I have some institutions that are decreasing significantly, like a 20 percent decrease, in enrollment, yet they're still getting the same amount of grants. We have to take a look at how changing the funding system would affect these different universities. They don't have a whole lot of control over their enrollment, so we have to take a look at that.

The second point I wanted to make is the whole idea of the cap. I think the cap is a good idea. I think the individual cap on tuition fees is a good idea, where we say that it can be at most – $243.50?

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: Yes.

DR. OBERG: That's the most it can go up on average within a year. Within an institution certainly there can be some programs that go up more than other programs, but the average can only be $243.50. I think that's good.

I've talked to the people who put in the tuition cap at 30 percent, and I think they did not necessarily look beyond the 30 percent. We actually have our first institution that has reached the 30 percent cap, and they are still one of the lowest tuition fees. So what they have done is reached it through efficiencies, through cutting down their costs.

That leaves another school of thought: that we in effect are punishing them for their efficiency. This is something we have to deal with. I believe in the tuition cap. I believe it sends the right message. I believe in the individual cap. But when the universities get to that 30 percent, if they get to that 30 percent, we also have to take a look at that and find out the reason they got to that 30 percent. If it's because their expenses have come down, perhaps we need to take a look at something, because they're doing the right things.

DR. MASSEY: While we're on the universities, one of the figures in one of the staff bulletins was the loss of full-time professors and the very large increase in the number of sessionals now being used at universities to deliver instruction. Is that a concern to the department?

DR. OBERG: Well, first of all, when it comes to the loss of full-time or sessional, I will say to you that my concern is with the students' education. How the universities elect to do that is up to the universities. It's my job to look after the students' education and ensure that they're getting an education. If the universities find that they are better to use sessional instructors, then that's their decision. It's their autonomy on how to do that.

DR. MASSEY: You know, it sounds good, but what if they're forced into that because of finances? When you think of going to university, at least I would hope students would be exposed to some of the best thinking in the field that they've chosen. Sessionals are great, but the study I looked at showed there is a huge increase in sessionals, and a lot of those were part-time. I think the commitment to an institution is quite different than when they're there for a course or two courses a week.

DR. OBERG: Again, if I can, it is up to the university to make that distinction between full-time and sessional. Do I see a day when everyone is sessional? No. Do I see a day when everyone is full-time? No. It's a matter of getting that mix. I'm sure you know this, but I will say that the ICORE funding, which I believe is $10 million a year – it's not in my department but through Dr. Lorne Taylor's department – is to recruit and retain professors. That's solely what that is for. There's the chairs program that was recently announced by the federal government, which, again, I believe we're going to be receiving the lion's share of actually. Are we 50-some?

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: Oh, at least 60 in the University of Alberta alone.

DR. OBERG: I think that's the University of Alberta alone that will be receiving funding for those chairs. The other thing is the science and research endowment of $500 million. All these things will certainly allow there to be more professors and more full-time professors.

Again, what I will say, Don, is that I'm not going to enter into that issue, because that is the university board of governors' decision, and it's their autonomy on how to do it. If the point is on the dollar side, then that is my issue, and that's why we increased roughly 7.7 percent overall. Some of the institutions got the lion's share of that or got more than that. The University of Calgary, for example, received about a 10 percent increase in funding over the last year. These are the types of things that are there.

DR. MASSEY: Do you have the same information on constant dollars for the secondary institutions as you do for the K to 12 system that you said was available, where you go back to '93? Do you have that information?

DR. OBERG: I don't have it with me, Don, but I can certainly get it for you.

DR. MASSEY: I'd be interested in seeing that.

DR. OBERG: If I can, though, on that. The one big difference between the postsecondary and the K to 12 is that the K to 12 only dropped the cumulative 4.77 percent over the two or three years of cutbacks whereas the postsecondary was at 21. So there is a difference in that. We are not as good in the inflation and enrollment figures in postsecondary as we are in the K to 12.

DR. MASSEY: You're still doing catch-up there.

Can I just bounce over to something? One nice thing about this format is you get to touch on some issues and come back to some of the questions.

First, on the Catholic boundaries. If you pull that one off, you can be assured of our support, if you can get that resolved. I'm saddened to see it come to this, having worked in the city with a Catholic board and a public board that just worked very well together. We just had things very, very easy between us.

DR. OBERG: I may hold you to that, Don.

DR. MASSEY: Yeah. Okay.

One of the complaints I hear from boards is on earmarked funding. It's the same complaint I hear from you and your colleagues about federal funding being earmarked.

DR. OBERG: You mean it doesn't just work one way?

DR. MASSEY: No, it doesn't just work one way.

The literacy. They're always quick to say: "Oh, yes, we think the money's great. AISI: it's good to have the money, but it's all earmarked." Is that a concern? I'm sure it's been raised by the associations.

DR. OBERG: Yeah. Absolutely. Do you want me to comment on these?

DR. MASSEY: Yes, please.

DR. OBERG: The literacy funding is being rolled into the general grant, and that will be after three years. The AISI funding I hope will do exactly the same thing, that it will be rolled in. What this is, first of all, is an attempt to get boards to do the initiatives and get the results, and then we will roll these into the overall dollars.

You're absolutely correct. We can't have it both ways, and in this budget especially I'm trying to give as much flexibility as possible to the school boards to what they can do with those dollars.

DR. MASSEY: The health initiative. When I looked in the budget – I haven't got the figures in front of me – it looked like the reporting was that there was $25 million and about $14 million of it had been spent. Is that . . .

DR. OBERG: That's purely on the school year issue.

DR. MASSEY: Okay. Twenty-five million will be spent.

DR. OBERG: Right. It's a school year versus a budget year.

DR. MASSEY: Okay. Good.

The fetal alcohol syndrome students. The old manual – and I haven't looked at the most recent one – wouldn't allow students to be coded. Is that still the case?

DR. OBERG: Two things, Don. First of all, they can be coded on fetal alcohol syndrome. Actually, I just talked to a school board on Friday. I spoke at a fetal alcohol syndrome conference, and they are being coded more. The other thing I will say is that I am extremely unhappy with all our special funding issues. We're in the process of looking at that, and we hope to have a resolution by September. I think there's a huge amount of problems with our special-needs funding, and we have to look and find a better way to do it. As I've talked to teachers all over the province, they've all said the same thing. So there has to be something wrong with it, and we have to find a better way to do it.

DR. MASSEY: They're spending too much money trying to access the funding, too much time and effort and paper.

DR. OBERG: And money, Don. An average assessment costs about $1,000. Certainly from the school board's point of view, if they spend $1,000 and get $12,000, it's a good budgetary item, but from my point of view that's $1,000 that isn't going into the classroom. These are the issues we'll be looking at, and hopefully we can find a better way to do it.

DR. MASSEY: You mentioned administration. I heard from the Lethbridge board that one of the things that's happened with the cutbacks and the envelope is that there was a whole group of experts across the province, mathematics supervisors and early childhood specialists, whom boards had employed. I talked to the Lethbridge board some time ago, and they were pulling a 10th grade math teacher and asking her to take on some responsibility for district leadership in terms of the changes in the math program and all that trouble that went around the applied and pure mathematics. Their lament was that they had lost that ability and they had lost those people that had provided leadership. Is there any thought of how that can be accommodated? It just isn't very efficient in terms of the way the money's being spent.

DR. OBERG: Yeah, there are two things. First of all, particularly in the Lethbridge area they've hired two part-time people to go around and sort of be the mathematics experts. I've talked to them, and they're actually wonderful people that are doing it. Their contract unfortunately expires I believe this year or next year, and we have to look at that.

You know, for every cloud there's a silver lining. The cloud of course is the math curriculum. The silver lining is that we've learned an awful lot about the math curriculum. We did not do a good job when we put it in. We did not do good in-servicing. We have learned from that, and that won't happen again. We're still trying to catch up to the issues that were raised with the math curriculum, and we have to find a better way to in-service teachers.

We kept up the money to the consortia, which was $900,000 we gave to the consortia. In talking to a lot of the school boards, though, there still seems to be a better way. One of the things I will be approaching the department with is whether or not there's a sort of regional team of experts that can be called upon or something along those lines, but I feel that those people are best employed by the department to go out and troubleshoot with the individual school boards on specific issues around curriculum. That's one of the things we will be discussing and will be looking at.

As I say, we do have to do a better job when it comes to getting the curriculum across to our teachers. The math experiment was a huge example of that, and we've learned a lot from it.

DR. MASSEY: Okay. We have to be careful about the enthusiasts that you have within the department, how much they have to say in terms of a new program.

DR. OBERG: No, no.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: They have learned a lot as well, Dr. Massey. That's why it's a Learning department.

DR. OBERG: They've been forced to learn an awful lot.

DR. MASSEY: Looking at the university requirements for teaching, the four-year program versus five years versus six years, most American states now are at a five-year minimum before you're credentialed, but the pressure of course on those institutions has been more with content. The push, the demand by boards and just the general public is that those people going into classrooms have strong content backgrounds, and the only way they end up being able to accommodate that is to extend the program. I wondered if there was any thought in terms of making it a minimum of five years?

DR. OBERG: No. I'm leaving that up to the institutions. I think what we have right now is a very good mix between the four-, five-, and six-year programs. I think they each serve a purpose. The danger in moving everyone to a five-year program is that we would have one year where there in essence would be no teachers put out or very few teachers put out, and that would cause a lot of chaos within our system.

The University of Alberta is quite content that they can put out their students in four years, and I think that serves a very good purpose. I'm not sure, and I don't know when I say this, but I think perhaps what we need to look at is: what is a better teacher? Is the five-year teacher a better teacher than a four-year teacher, better than a six-year teacher? I think those are some of the evaluations that have to be done to find out exactly what is the optimum time.

DR. MASSEY: Those are the same arguments we had when we went from one year to two years to three years to four years.

DR. OBERG: Yes. Five years to six years.

DR. MASSEY: We survived it.
Just one last thing and then I'll let Colleen . . .

MRS. SOETAERT: Just on that one . . . Sorry.

DR. MASSEY: You should never give her an entry.

MRS. SOETAERT: You can see I'm well loved.
Just on the concern that we most likely could have a shortage of teachers in this province in a while. There used to be an old bursary program where if you committed to teaching in the area you came from or committed to – I don't know if that was a school board or a government initiative, but it gave the opportunity for people to go back to their community or to a community and commit for two years and often end up staying there for a lifetime. So areas in this province that already have a hard time keeping teachers – I don't know. Does that make sense?

DR. OBERG: Some of the northern school districts still have that, but it is a school board type of bursary. I'm a little philosophically opposed to that. That's been stated in health care as well with physicians.

I think physicians and teachers should have the ability to move wherever they want within the province, and if they want to come back to their home community, then it should be done because they want to be there as opposed to the monetary issue. I have no problem giving bursaries to students to become teachers, but I think it's very difficult for us to keep a teacher against their will someplace where they don't want to be, and in effect we may be doing that.

MRS. SOETAERT: Well, I mean, you could take the bursary on that condition, knowing that you are going back there. So I wouldn't see it as against their will. But that's splitting hairs, I guess. I'll let you finish.

DR. MASSEY: Go ahead. Start on your list.

MRS. SOETAERT: Okay. I had a few things. One of the things that concerns me, that has been an issue, for example, in St. Albert protestant, is the utilization rate. We have Bellerose comp at 10 percent, and then we have other older schools that are at 45 percent, which I know is a problem across the province. One of the suggestions they had was: could you have three levels of utilization rate; like, one for high school? Because you cannot – well, I guess you could if you had too, but splitting up a high school program to go to an elementary school isn't practical. Do you know what I'm saying? You can't have the grade 10s from Bellerose at Lorne Akins. It's not practical, and it wouldn't work. Well, I don't think it could be done. So they're wondering if that utilization rate could be based on high school, junior high, elementary.

DR. OBERG: I don't know on that, Colleen. That's under the Department of Infrastructure. They're the one's who look after that formula completely.

MRS. SOETAERT: I've had different comments about the split of the school buildings going to Infrastructure on both sides. One guy finally said: well, maybe they have somebody who understands buildings. I don't know. I've heard both. All right then. So utilization isn't within your department.

DR. OBERG: That's right.

MRS. SOETAERT: Transportation funding, however, is. I was at an Alberta school transportation advisory council convention, and one of the questions and concerns one of the major bus lines had was the reality of hiring good people for 9 bucks an hour. When we talk about the safety of our kids and the importance of getting to school safely and the responsibility of those bus drivers, this person was saying that in good economic times people have jobs that pay better than 8, 9 bucks an hour. She said that to keep regular drivers, when you consider they're paying 9 bucks an hour and they work two and a half hours in the morning and two and a half in the afternoon, it's really difficult to keep steady, good staff. Now, I realize that is an allotment from the school boards. But have you had that concern raised? [interjection] Well, that funding comes from the boards, I know. But have you had that concern expressed to you? Plus the rising fuel costs are an issue.

DR. OBERG: I haven't had the concern about the qualifications of the school bus driver. I haven't had that one raised. I've certainly had the issue raised about the cost of fuel. The bottom line on this is that the school boards have contracts, and they renegotiate their contracts each year. It's up to the school boards to take the contract which is best for them as opposed to cheapest for them. If they feel it is an issue with the amount that their bus drivers are paid, they have the ability to put that into the contract. This comes down to, you know, whatever system is providing the best service for that school board.

MRS. SOETAERT: This was the bus contractors paying their employees and being able to keep them at the money they got. That was just something I hadn't heard until then.

One of the things I was interested in – and maybe I haven't had a chance to totally read through all the plans – is the dropout rate. Where are we at with that? Are there incentives looking at that? I'm pleased to see somebody going yes, yes, because to me part of the dropout rate is being able to give those kids that need those different programs – I think of an example in one high school where they have somebody hired to phone home when somebody's not at school, and then funding cuts happen and that person's gone. I know in the big picture they think, "Oh well, that one can be gone," but they have no idea of the implications of phoning home and somebody following up on certain students. I think keeping them in school is just the wisest thing. I know everybody agrees on that. As far as saving dollars, I know we save dollars when we invest in them getting their education. So if there are any initiatives on that, I'd love to hear it.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: It's 235.

DR. OBERG: It's 235 they tell me.

Basically what we're looking at is increasing the rate of kids that finish high school, and I think that's absolutely critical. Obviously, we aren't going to increase postsecondary diplomas and the number that go through university unless we increase the number that graduate from high school. So this is something we measure, and it is something we are looking at increasing.

With regards to your question about phoning home, from what I understand the majority of schools actually do that now. They either phone home or many of them have an automated thing that calls after hours and says that their kid wasn't there, so most school boards recognize that as an issue and are doing something about it. I guess one of the problems is: should the principal be spending his time phoning home, as a high-paid person who has a lot of other responsibilities?

MRS. SOETAERT: What about teachers?

DR. OBERG: What's that?

MRS. SOETAERT: Well, if you're teaching four classes a day totaling 228 students, how do you do it?

DR. OBERG: Hence that's why a lot of school districts have gone to the automatic phoner after hours, when the parents are home.

MRS. SOETAERT: Yeah.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: We're also undertaking a major study in trying to increase the number of completers of high school, and the target we want to hit is 75 percent completion rates. That's an improvement of 5 percent over our 70 percent right now.

DR. OBERG: The other thing on that is that I'm hoping some of the AISI money will be targeted towards that as well. As I said, the school boards have the ability to use that money there, and if one of their issues in a particular school is that their graduation rate is low, then what they have the ability to do is put in different programs or find different ways to increase the graduation rate from that school. If it means, you know, putting more programs in or talking to the students or guidance or anything like that, they have the ability to do that.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: One other area that is of real concern for us is the completion rate of aboriginal children in school. If you take a look at the statistics, you'll see that's a much, much higher noncompletion rate. We right now have an aboriginal education funding policy review in the works, and those recommendations should be coming back to the minister in the fall. Hopefully that'll address some of those issues in terms of not only completion rates but getting aboriginal parents more involved in children's education and a few other things like that.

DR. OBERG: Potentially we could see – and it's still in negotiation – the opening of the first aboriginal high school in Edmonton in September.

MRS. SOETAERT: That is an issue for me; the Alexander band is within my riding. In the last couple of years they have had an administrator, and I would recommend you call him. I can't remember his last name. His first name is Art. He has a really tough attendance policy that the board has bought into, and they've hired a community liaison whose function is to keep kids in school. They truly celebrate those graduations with great ceremonies and recognition in the community. It's been quite significant the last few years at that school: the graduation rate is going up, and it's with a real commitment to learning from the community. So if you're looking for a school that's in the middle of doing it, I'll gladly recommend the one in my riding because they're just doing an amazing job.

MR. OBERG: Colleen, if I can, that in itself is one of the issues we have in education right now. We have school boards that are doing innovative and creative things, and they're not sharing it with other school boards. That's why under the AISI initiative we're having central data banks, so we can share it with all the different school boards and share their successes, because there are people that are doing this. People in southern Alberta, for example, aren't doing that, and they're having problems. We need to share that information around.

MRS. SOETAERT: Aren't they funded, though, through federal money?

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: Yes, they are.

MRS. SOETAERT: So then that communication probably isn't as free flowing as others. Do they qualify for AISI if they're funded? No, they don't. So that's probably why . . .

DR. OBERG: No. That may be why, but on the other hand they're more than welcome to use this system if they so wish, and I think it's essential that they do to find some of these things.

MRS. SOETAERT: Can you give me a reference? I know you have several, but certainly that school . . .

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: Treaties 6, 7, and 8 are involved in the research we're doing.

MRS. SOETAERT: Okay. So they'd be involved then?

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: Absolutely. Same with the Métis Nation; also involved.

MRS. SOETAERT: Okay. Anyway, good news out there.

I had a concern from a smaller school with low enrollment. It's in Parkland Village, which is a mobile-home area just outside Spruce Grove. However, I know I speak for several other communities with low enrollment, yet the reality of keeping that school in their community is very important, what it means to them. I know in isolated rural parts it's the same issue. Is there anything looking at those types of schools that now have low enrollments but are essential to the community? Have you looked at that, the special low-enrollment schools that are probably, but not in Parkland Village's instance, isolated but certainly a community unto itself, where it does a lot for the families as well as the whole keeping kids in school and involved in the community.

DR. OBERG: One of the components of the funding formula is a sparsity and distance component.

MRS. SOETAERT: This doesn't qualify for sparsity.

DR. OBERG: They may not, but the issue comes down to the priorities the school boards have. Many school boards will keep these small schools open despite decreased enrollment. For example, I've a school in my constituency that has an enrollment of probably about 25 people, but the reason it has 25 people is because quite literally it is 60 miles from anything. That's one of the issues. Do the rest of the school kids subsidize that school? Yes, they do, and we recognize that.

On the other hand, the school board has made a commitment to those parents and those students that those kids in K to 6 are not going to ride the bus for two hours, and I think that's an absolutely valid, valid issue. Where there's low enrollment and there's another school very close, then I think we have to take a look at that and see exactly: should these two schools be combined to get the economies of scale? Those are the tough decisions the school boards have to make.

MRS. SOETAERT: It's interesting, Lyle, that on one hand you support local autonomy when it's a difficult decision like, "Oh, they have to decide which school's gone," and on the other hand, "Well, I'm going to interfere with where the program is." So I just caution you that you're playing both sides of the fence there, and you get a sore butt sitting on the fence.

DR. OBERG: On the flip side, Colleen, so are you, because you're asking us to get in and do these certain programs that are school boards' responsibilities. School boards have responsibilities.

MRS. SOETAERT: And funding is required for programs; right? I mean, there's no doubt.

DR. OBERG: Absolutely.

MRS. SOETAERT: So it's just an interesting relationship that I think elected officials at all levels have with each other. It's a fine line we walk because if it seems that it's hot, we can pass it to the school board, and if it's not, we can take the credit for it. I mean that collectively, so it's just interesting.

One other thing that one school in my riding was talking about is the funding for a blind child in their school. The funding they get is just not sufficient to cover the costs of providing for that student at a local school level, and the ethics of taking from other programs to support that one has administrators in a quandary. I mean, they do, they provide the education for that child, but it is at the cost of funding coming from other education programs. I guess the issue we are looking at as we educate high-need students in local schools is a funding issue, to be able to properly provide for it without affecting the other students.

DR. OBERG: Yeah. I guess until I see the exact circumstance, I can't really decide.

MRS. SOETAERT: Okay. Could I get that to you?

DR. OBERG: Absolutely.

So right now what they get is a little over 12 and a half thousand dollars. Again, that's expected to be an amount that is averaged over the school board, so there's nothing stopping the school board, if they want to, from putting more money into it. Actually, it's not $12,000 they get; they get $12,000 plus $4,000. So they actually get very close to $16,000, or a little better than $16,000, per student. That's what the school board has to work with for that student.

Where there are problems – and this is one of the reasons we're looking at a review as well – is where there is only one student in a school that needs it. I will certainly admit that there are problems there, but that's what we need to look at. Perhaps we can free up funds somewhere else to provide for that kid where there's only one kid. If there were two kids, there probably wouldn't be a funding shortage. So these are some of the issues we have to look at.

MRS. SOETAERT: I see under 3.2 that there is an increase for private schools of 3.9 percent and public schools . . .

DR. OBERG: Just hang tough.

MRS. SOETAERT: Sorry; 3.2.

DR. OBERG: At 3.2?

MRS. SOETAERT: Grants to postsecondary institutions, 3.2. Then the private colleges got an increase of 3.9 percent and public colleges an increase of 3.2. I'm just wondering about the discrepancy there.

DR. OBERG: Basically what some of this issue is is to do with access and is to do with performance, and that's how it's given out.

There are no such things in postsecondary as you getting a standard grant. Perhaps what happened this year is that some of the private universities received a little bit more in access, or perhaps they received more in performance, but it's all formula driven as to how those dollars are given out. There is not a set "they get 3 percent increase." It's going to vary from year to year.

MRS. SOETAERT: Okay. Thank you for explaining that.

I'll let you go, Don.

DR. MASSEY: Okay. I couldn't leave without asking about class size. It was mentioned in the throne speech, yet there doesn't seem to be any one initiative in the budget that addresses it.

I've looked at class size legislation in some of the American states, and some of it is very, very prescriptive and has resulted in a number of problems. I guess I would like you to talk about class size, particularly K to 3. Again, I was talking to a kindergarten teacher at the convention on Friday with 28 students in her kindergarten in the morning, 29 in the afternoon. In the meeting we were at with Rob Loughheed, a kindergarten teacher there stood up and said she had 52 students in total, morning and afternoon. Very large. In that little survey we did, with about 80 percent of kindergarten children, from that sample anyhow, 17 or better in terms of class size. So I guess my question is: why was there not an initiative? I mean, there are other earmarked initiatives: early literacy, AISI, those things. Why was there not a specific, you know, program or target set?

In considering it, it seems to me that if you look at what happened south of the border, they ended up with some other problems. For instance, they didn't have enough school space. When they put in a class size reduction program, they had youngsters in all kinds of double shifting and all kinds of bad situations. I don't think it's a simple thing to deal with, and I can understand that. It has implications. They didn't end up with enough teachers to teach the classes, and in some cases the suspicion was that it caused more difficulty for children than it actually helped.

So I just wondered what your thinking is now on class size. If I could have predicted before the budget, I would have predicted that you would have had something that was earmarked.

DR. OBERG: Yeah. Again, though, this goes back to the point I was making about the earmarked funding. What I attempted to do in this budget was give the school boards as much flexibility as possible. With the AISI funds, that's where I see a lot of work being done on class size, especially in the K to 3. I'm sure you've heard that wherever I talk, I talk about K to 3 class size and getting that class size down. I really strongly believe in that. You know, I've read those issues as well, and there are a lot of issues that are out there. Perhaps the most confusing one for me is that in the study that was done in Tennessee, at 17 you saw improvement, but at 18 you didn't, and when you get specifically to that number, to me it seems like it's very dependent on the kids that are in the class. If you have, for example, two to three special-needs kids in a class, perhaps the class size should be 10 or perhaps it should be 12. If you have all upper socioeconomic kids who are very motivated, perhaps it should be 21 or 22. The other thing is that that study was done in Tennessee, which obviously is a different population than ours.

What I think we need to do is to get some studies out there. We need to see exactly what happens in different areas across the province, and we need to be able to validate this. If we can validate this, Don, I will be the first person out there pushing for legislation or pushing to have it earmarked in the budget that the class size must be down, and I'll give you my commitment on that. But I've looked at all the different things as well, and I'm just not a hundred percent sure on the validation that is out there. I think there are still some issues that need to be looked at. For example, the class size project in Edmonton has actually dropped the classes down to between 13 and 14, somewhere in there – and we'll see what happens with that – in the high-needs types of schools.

MRS. SOETAERT: Sorry to interrupt, but I know one of the teachers that was hired there, a young second-year teacher, who said that it's just amazing what they can do with these kids and how they like to come to school because they get fed as part of it. Truly. We're talking kids that truly need a smaller class size, so I'm hoping the results of that – I mean, to me they're a given, but I'm sure it will be documented.

DR. OBERG: Yeah, absolutely. But if I were to mandate 17, what you would see is every school board aiming for that 17 figure. I prefer to give them a little bit of flexibility until it's proven, give them the flexibility to go down to 12 in some high-needs schools, you know, 18 or so in some schools that are not high need. Let's get the evidence in, and then let's do something about it.

DR. MASSEY: The Tennessee and the SAGE project are one of the first where they really had control and experimental groups so that you could have some confidence.

I guess one of the things that concerns me is – you know, achievement has to be what you look at, but there were so many other things that weren't factored in that teachers in those projects talked about, the number of youngsters who said: I don't get distracted as often when there are 17 as when there are 25. So a lot of other things are going on too, and I'm sure the Edmonton project will pick some of that up.

DR. OBERG: Absolutely.

DR. MASSEY: I've looked at the figures. School boards report numbers in grades. They don't report class sizes to the department. You can't tell how many grade 1 classes there are in a jurisdiction.

MRS. DAVID EVANS: PTR ratios is all we have.

DR. OBERG: But just on that, though, the PTR ratio I never use, because it's completely unreliable.

DR. MASSEY: I agree. I think it's been a false sort of comparison.

MRS. DAVID EVANS: Dr. Massey, if I could add, the pilot project that the minister has funded in the Edmonton area is also going to look at teacher methodology. One of the things we know is that if you maintain the same kinds of teaching techniques when you have 28 kids as you do for 17, it's not going to give you the maximum value for the 17. The other thing it's going to look at is what kinds of techniques need to be implemented with different class sizes, different populations. The other thing that I would just add is that under AISI, 60 percent of the measures are local measures, and if the measures in the local area feel that kids are coming to school and liking it more or whatever those measures are, they will be taken into consideration as well as the achievement tests.

DR. MASSEY: You talked for a minute about charter schools. Where do you see them going? It's certainly not been the kind of success story that we had hoped it might be when they were first introduced. I look at the Auditor General and his criticism of the boards. The department, I understood, took some measures to try to work with those boards in terms of what it means to be a trustee.

Where do you see the movement going? More charter schools for the province?

DR. OBERG: I'll sort of cross that bridge as we come to it. As you know, we're sitting at 10 right now, of which nine report directly to the department, directly to me, so there is no school board or school trustees that look after these.

DR. MASSEY: Parent groups.

DR. OBERG: Parent groups involved, absolutely. The other interesting point is that the parents are extremely satisfied with these charter schools.

Are charter schools going to be eliminated? No, I don't think they are. Are charter schools going to expand dramatically? No, I don't think they are. What I like and what I would prefer is the concept of magnet schools, which is what is taking place in Edmonton and hopefully will soon take place in Calgary, where parents have the choice as to where they send their kids, and I think that choice component is extremely important.

I think that if Calgary moves to that concept, the number of charter schools seen will go down. As you know, we're in the process of looking at all the regulations with regard to charter schools, and we'll be making some decisions about the issues that are out there. But when you talk to the parents in charter schools, they are extremely, extremely happy about what is happening to their kids, and I think that has to be something we take into consideration as well.

DR. MASSEY: How are we for time?

THE CHAIRMAN: We have one minute.

DR. MASSEY: Before it goes, I wanted to really thank the minister and his staff and our colleagues across the table. I'm sure some of this is old hat to you, because you discuss these issues in caucus, but this is our first chance to get that same kind of firsthand information from the minister. We really do appreciate being allowed this kind of a format, Mr. Chairman, and certainly the patience of the colleagues across the table.

MRS. SOETAERT: And I think we've been polite.

DR. MASSEY: Colleen has even been polite. Now, that's a first. That's progress.

I would like to ask about parent fund-raising and Campus Alberta and some other things, but there'll be some other opportunities.

Thank you again.

THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you.

Now that we're at the end of the Official Opposition section, we move on to the next, which is specifically allocated to the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona. Hearing no questions from the member, we then move directly on to the last section, which is dedicated to government members. Could those who wish to ask some questions just give me an indication by raising your hand so that I can make a list, and we'll proceed to identify you.

Mary.

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Minister, I wanted to ask you two questions. They are not related. The first one has to do with the allocation of funding for chairs, specifically at the universities and to be more specific at the University of Alberta.

DR. OBERG: The new chairs program?

MRS. O'NEILL: The new chairs program. Could you explain it a little bit further?

The second one was: could you articulate in layperson's terms how the formula for the remission of loans to the maximum of $20,000 actually works – it used to be $19,000 and something – and whether that amount of money is totally remitted or how it is factored in, et cetera. Those are things that I'm finding even when meeting with the members of the student governance particularly at the universities. They don't quite frankly understand it either They aren't conveying it as I believe they should.

DR. OBERG: First of all, the new chairs program will result in between 50 and 60 chairs at the university. These are full-time, I assume tenured, positions that will be added to the university from the professors. This is funded out of the program from the federal government, and the money goes directly to the university to fund these. It is up to the university as to where these chairs go. They had to put in an application form to get the number, and again, as I said, the U of A and the U of C got by far the lion's share of the chairs from across Canada.

MRS. O'NEILL: May I interrupt you to just ask: is that a onetime allocation, or is it a trust?

DR. OBERG: It is a onetime allocation with continued funding. So, for example, they just don't pay the chairs for one year. The chair position is continued on, but there will not be 50 this year and another 50 on top of the 50, for a total of 100 next year.

MRS. O'NEILL: Is it an endowment process?

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: The federal government hasn't come out with all the regulations around this, and they're working with the universities across Canada to come up with the regulations, so we're not able to answer all your questions simply because the regulations around when and how much haven't been all identified yet.

DR. OBERG: With regards to the student loan remissions, perhaps I'll let Maria answer that one.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: The remissions are based on financial need, and I think that's the critical key in terms of layperson's language. In other words, if you graduate from university with a $40,000 debt, let's say, and you are a professional who is earning $40,000 or $60,000, you may not have the capacity to move your remission back. If you graduate from university and the income that you're making – because it's based on the income you're making – is half that amount, then you can look at remission. Remission is graduated, and it takes into account each individual person's circumstances.

The point that I think is really important to make here is that if you've borrowed fully and you've not had good marks and you've got a job that is paying you really well, you probably won't see much remission. If you've had an opportunity to make use of bursaries and grants, if you still had to borrow over $5,000 a year to $8,000 and you didn't have anything kick in in terms of scholarships and you're making a low salary when you graduate, then you have an opportunity to address the remissions, and that will be based on each individual person's income.

MRS. O'NEILL: So when you quote the amount $20,000, you're not saying literally that that is remitted. For me, remitting something means you don't pay it.

DR. OBERG: Yes, we are. What Maria is not quite correct on is that if you borrowed $40,000 and the reason you would have gotten the $40,000 was because of financial need – at the $40,000 level the most you will have to pay back is $20,000. So the most that any student will have to pay back in Alberta is $20,000. The rest is remission.

MRS. O'NEILL: The most for someone. So it's over and above the $20,000.

Now, I'm sorry, but it's something I have to try to explain very frequently. If, for instance, an individual has accumulated a debt of, say, $18,000 after four years and they're really struggling, is there any way that there's any remittance of a portion of the $18,000?

DR. OBERG: I'm sorry. If they've already had the remission and they owe $18,000?

MRS. O'NEILL: No. They have a debt of $18,000 when they finish their four years. So no matter what their circumstances are – in other words, they're also going to have to work out a payment plan, but they don't get any of that remitted? Is that what you're saying?

DR. OBERG: No. If it's $18,000, they will still get a partial remission, yes. We'll get back to you on that.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: We'll get you a real good explanation.

MRS. O'NEILL: It's in order to give those entering the postsecondary institutions a bit of a heads-up, first of all. Also it's to eliminate those who are going in – because there is a little bit of a buzz around there that, yes, you can borrow up to $20,000, but it's remitted in Alberta, so you won't have to pay it back.

DR. OBERG: It's not full remission.

MRS. O'NEILL: And that's what I'm trying to figure out.

DR. OBERG: The other thing I must say as well is that there is remission on the Alberta student loan, but there's no remission on the federal student loan.

MRS. O'NEILL: But we are the ones who administer it.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: But there is no remission on the federal loans.

DR. OBERG: Yeah. The federal government does not remit their loans.

MRS. O'NEILL: But we administer the loans.

DR. OBERG: Yes.

MRS. O'NEILL: So that's where it always gets confusing.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: Yes. They view it as ours.

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you.

DR. OBERG: You're welcome.

MRS. O'NEILL: If you would get back to me, I'd really appreciate it.

DR. OBERG: Yes.

THE CHAIRMAN: All right. LeRoy, then Jocelyn.

MR. JOHNSON: I found this to be a very informative session, Lyle, and a lot of positive things are coming out of your department which I'm very happy to hear. I want to follow up on a couple of things though. One is the teachers' certification. I was happy to hear you talk about certification of I guess the imports, those coming here from other provinces, without difficulties and without having to take extra courses necessarily. But is it working both ways? How about our students that complete their degrees going to other provinces? What's happening there?

DR. OBERG: No, it isn't, LeRoy; it isn't working both ways. But what I'm hoping is that on the federal scene, by us doing that and accepting their accreditation, it will put pressure on them to do the same for us. I'll speak very callously here, but realistically we need more teachers, so if they put barriers to our teachers going elsewhere, it helps our teachers to stay here. Again, I'm speaking very callously, but that's exactly the message I gave to the rest of the ministers of education of Canada, so it's up to them to respond to us as opposed to us responding to them.

MR. JOHNSON: I guess in that sense it might help if we were a little more consistent in our own province in terms of the number of years of training we require. You mentioned that the U of A has four years, Lethbridge five, and Calgary six. My daughter was caught in that, and then she took four years at the U of A and went to B.C., where they required five years.

DR. OBERG: Yeah, that's right.

MR. JOHNSON: Those are some problems, I guess, that have to be worked out.

Another question. I was happy to hear what you had to say about teacher morale. I think that is an issue, and I'm glad to hear it is being addressed, so I applaud you for that.

The last point I would like to make or question is about SHIP, the student health initiative program. I would like to tell you that in my area it's going very well, and I think that as we have decentralized to a large degree and established children's authorities for the first time, there has been a challenge out there to bring the fragments together. The SHIP has done that very well in that particular area, and the children's services, education, and the rest are working together very well in our area. I'm very happy to see that, but in that regard I understand that SHIP is just one part of the Alberta Children's Initiative. I guess the fetal alcohol syndrome program is another part, and of course AADAC is very much involved in that. I've seen the groups work together very well, but I'm a little confused on what we really mean by Alberta Children's Initiative. What does it really include? Is it to be an umbrella program over many other programs? Can you just clarify that for me?

DR. OBERG: Sure, ask me all the tough questions. First of all, the Alberta Children's Initiative is meant to provide a macrolevel approach to dealing with children's issues. One of the problems we have had in government in general is that we've had a lot of silos of service delivery, and often these people don't talk to each other; often they give duplicate programs. All these types of issues are there.

What we're attempting to do is break those silos down; hence the new Alberta Department of Children's Services. All these issues are intended to break those silos down. We are an important component of the Alberta Children's Initiative in that we look after student health. The reason we look after student health is because it's in the school, and it seemed kind of ludicrous to have the health authority providing speech, to have social services providing community liaison, the Learning department doing something else and the school board doing something else. So we brought it together under the initiative in the schools. There are a lot of other children's initiatives going on. Preschool, for example, in many cases is through this. It's an attempt to break these down.

MR. JOHNSON: So who's actually in charge? Which department is in charge of the Alberta Children's Initiative? Is it Children's Services?

DR. OBERG: Children's Services is in charge. We are one component. It's a multilevel, multidepartment issue between I believe about five or six departments.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: Six or seven now, actually.

I think the important point is that the Alberta Children's Initiative provides a cross-government direction for all departments that are involved with children. It provides for the same goals that all departments need to meet, and that's safe, healthy, successful-at-learning kinds of goals. Within those goals are a number of initiatives, and just in our business plan you'll see the same initiatives included in all the departments that are involved in this. They are everything from student health, the fetal alcohol that you mentioned, to the children's mental health program, which, I might add, is piggybacking on the student health program. The same partners are involved.

When the minister talks about the partnership on student health, the funds don't flow unless all the partners are jointly signatory in a co-ordinated plan for those particular areas. There's a new one, conception to age 6, that we're looking at as well because there are many issues around that, and our department is jointly co-chairing that with Health and Wellness. Certainly the Premier's Task Force on Children at Risk is another initiative under there. So there's a number of initiatives that all produce a measure of direction for all government departments involved with children.

MR. JOHNSON: Well, I certainly applaud the partnerships that are taking place. I think it makes for much more efficiency out in our areas.

DR. OBERG: Yeah. The other thing I'd like to say is that we're allowing the flexibility at the regional level for them to determine how that partnership will occur.

THE CHAIRMAN: Jocelyn, then Butch.

MRS. BURGNER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Lyle, I just have one question relative to St. Mary's College, which is a private Catholic college operating in Calgary now. They have contacted me with respect to degree granting in their future. When we met with the colleges and technical institutes the other night, I raised the question about what legislation might be coming forward with respect to private colleges, et cetera. You indicated at that time that there would be something coming forward in I think you said the next 18 months from a legislation point of view, a review of all their acts. I may have misunderstood you in that.

DR. OBERG: We're reviewing their funding, but we're not reviewing their acts.

MRS. BURGNER: I had asked them the question: did they require anything in legislation to meet their needs in the future? The answer

– I thought there was something you spoke to that said you'd be reviewing their legislation in the future, because Alberta College of Art and Design is certainly looking for a slightly different model. Maybe you could clarify (a) what you might be looking at from a legislative point of view, and (b) what is the plan for St. Mary's?

DR. OBERG: Sure. First of all, I'll do it in reverse. What the plan is for St. Mary's is that they have to go through the Private College Accreditation Board, and each independent degree they choose must be approved by the Private College Accreditation Board through significant criteria that they have to do.

With regards to the legislation, there will be a review. I believe it's by 2001.

MRS. BURGNER: That's good, referring to that.

Is there anything in the process of the accreditation regarding St. Mary's – I guess my concern is: are they having any difficulties, or is it moving forward? Are you aware of any?

DR. OBERG: I am not aware of any difficulties. It is not what I would call an easy approach, nor should it be. There are a lot of criteria they have to get, and it's the same criteria that's applied provincewide to degrees. We had our first degree granting probably about 3 or 4 months ago. I believe King's college was one.

MRS. DAVID-EVANS: Yeah. Some of them have actually had it for a while.

DR. OBERG: So they have to go through the private college . . .

MRS. BURGNER: They have to go through it, and they do it for each degree. The fact that one has been affiliated with another college outside the province, that speaks to what you were saying earlier. You want to make sure that there are some standards and that things are all acknowledged and at a certain level.

Okay; that's my question. Thank you.

THE CHAIRMAN: Butch.

MR. FISCHER: I think I'll just pass.

THE CHAIRMAN: All right. Any other questions from government members? Seeing no further questions from government members, I'd call for a motion to conclude discussion of the estimates and to rise and report.

MR. FRIEDEL: I move that under Standing Order 56(8) the designated supply subcommittee on Learning conclude discussion on the 2000-2001 estimates of the Department of Learning and rise and report.

THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you, Gary. All in favour? Opposed? Carried. Thank you very much.

[The subcommittee adjourned at 10:28 a.m.]

head: Introduction of Bills

Energy Statutes Amendment Act, 2000

MR. HLADY: Mr. Speaker, I request leave to introduce Bill 13, the Energy Statutes Amendment Act, 2000.

Mr. Speaker, the amendments will provide for the implementation of an expansion of the existing orphan well program. This proposed legislation will clarify and strengthen the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board's, the EUB's, authority to hold the oil and gas industry accountable for managing the abandonment and reclamation of oil wells and production facilities in a responsible manner that protects the environment and ensures public safety. Implementation of the expanded orphan program will protect the public purse by ensuring that industry funding is available to clean up orphan wells, production facilities, and pipelines.

Mr. Speaker, the bill is the result of a joint government/industry committee which developed the proposed amendments contained in the Energy Statutes Amendment Act. The bill has strong industry support – the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers, the Small Explorers and Producers Association of Canada – and the concurrence of the EUB, DRD, AENV, and the AFRD.

As well, Mr. Speaker, a number of interested landowners and surface rights groups have been provided with information regarding the expansion of the orphan well program and the proposed legislation and are supportive of the proposed changes being put forth.

[Motion carried; Bill 13 read a first time]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would move that Bill 13 be placed on the Order Paper under Government Bills and Orders.

[Motion carried]

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Gaming.

MR. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased today to table the appropriate number of copies of the Alberta Gaming and Liquor Commission for the year ended March 31, 1999.

MR. DAY: Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to table five copies of Scotiabank's regular economic market survey of February 25, which gives a very positive review of the Alberta budget. It highlights the fact that we will be increasing our lead in the economy, increasing our lead in responsible fiscal management and economic reforms, and highlights our increasing debt payment, our spending in priority areas, and our groundbreaking tax system.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, I would like to table five copies of a letter dated December 10, 1999, to the federal Minister of Health, the Hon. Allan Rock, responding in detail to his questions regarding the Alberta government's policy statement on the delivery of surgical services, including an offer to a face-to-face meeting to discuss any further questions or concerns Mr. Rock might have.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to table five copies of a letter to Mr. Rock dated March 2 of 2000 providing a copy of Bill 11, the Health Care Protection Act, and another offer to meet with Mr. Rock to answer any questions he might have.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Little Bow.

MR. McFARLAND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure today on behalf of 41 residents from Picture Butte and area to present a letter to the Premier of Alberta strongly objecting to a proposed conversion of emergency and acute care services in Picture Butte by the Chinook regional health authority, and 439 letters to the hon. Minister of Health and Wellness saying no to closure of our emergency rooms, signed mainly by residents of Picture Butte in southern Alberta.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings this afternoon. The first one is a letter dated September 28, 1999, from the Hon. Stephen C. West. In it he confirms to me that he has "no intention to initiate such a provincial review of gasoline prices" that I advocated.

My second tabling is the official program from the Music of A Thousand Years, the 37th annual night of music put on by the Edmonton public school board at the Jubilee Auditorium.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

MRS. MacBETH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to table a letter to the Premier which was copied to us from the Lamont health care centre noting, interestingly, that their total costs for cataract surgery were about $200 per case, whereas a similar surgery performed in a private facility is at $600 per case. Interesting data: Alberta solutions.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I'm tabling five copies of information about the Edmonton composting facility, which had its grand opening this weekend.

MR. SAPERS: Do you have an extra copy for Ralph?

MS CARLSON: And an extra copy for the Premier, Mr. Speaker.

This facility, a project between the city of Edmonton and TransAlta, is the largest composting facility in North America and will account for 10 percent of all composting done on this continent.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. What I wanted to table at this time were copies of a written submission to you, sir, with respect to matters relating to alleged contempt and privilege discussed on Thursday, March 2 in this Assembly.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Norwood.

MS OLSEN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two letters to table today. They're both addressed to the hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General. The first letter is signed by Marie Gordon from McBean Becker, barristers and solicitors, asking him to reconsider the decision to abolish the use of court reporters in Alberta courts.

The second letter is signed on behalf of the firm of Royal, McCrum, Duckett & Glancy, and it, too, asks the Justice minister to reconsider his decision on pulling court reporters from the courts.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

MR. GIBBONS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings today, one being a copy of documents put out by the Canadian Mental Health Association and the Alliance on Mental Illness and Mental Health association of Alberta called Good People, Good Practice: No System, accompanied by information documents.

My second tabling is five copies of a news release named "Alberta returns to the 'dark ages' of mental health care," put out by the Canadian Mental Health Association.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have 11 letters to table. These letters are written by Albertans who express their opposition and outrage with respect to this government's attempt to legalize private, for-profit hospitals.

The first one is from Reverend Don Mayne from Edmonton. The second one is from my constituents Margaret and Peter McKague. The third one is from Rosilda Girard and one from Emilie Girard, also of Edmonton. The next one is a letter from Allison Yarmoloy, again expressing her opposition. The next one is from Vicky and Roger Morin; three letters from Diane Poynter from Lethbridge, one to the Premier, one to the minister of health, and one to the Lethbridge Herald. The next one is from Terry Dashcavich from Peace River, one from Don MacNeil from Leduc, another one from Mr. Clay of Red Deer, and the last one from Hazel Corcoran of Calgary.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table five copies of a report approved by the Alberta Rural Physician Action Plan Co-ordinating Committee. This deals with Rural Medical Education.

head: Introduction of Guests

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, today it is my pleasure to introduce two grade 6 classes from Our Lady of Perpetual Help school. They are in the French immersion program. Mrs. Castillo and Mr. Dupont accompany them as their teachers. I would ask that this Assembly give them the warm welcome they deserve as they rise and are acknowledged.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Innovation and Science.

DR. TAYLOR: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I don't often have constituents here for a visit, but I'm pleased today to have six individuals from the southeast Alberta water co-operative. They were up here today letting myself and some other ministers know about a severe water shortage that is in existence in southern Alberta today. The president is Ron Harty, and Len Mitzel is a director. I might say that both Ron and Len are from Etzikom, and if you have the opportunity, there's an excellent windmill museum in Etzikom that Len Mitzel was largely responsible for, so I'd encourage you and any other colleagues to go down and see it. It would be great. Ben Hofer is a director of the water co-op as well, Harold Halvorson is a director of the water co-operative, Byron Haugan, a director of the water co-operative, and Ray Simanton, a director of the water co-operative. Would you all please stand for a warm welcome from the House.

THE SPEAKER: Actually, hon. member, I've had many, many journeys from Etzikom to Manyberries. It's one of my more familiar parts of the province of Alberta. In a previous life I was involved in building the road from Bow Island to Etzikom.

The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Calmar.

MR. THURBER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly today some home schooled students from Drayton Valley. They're a very bright, polite group of young students, and they're accompanied here today by a Mrs. Teresa Kisser, Mrs. Esther Robson, Mr. Derald Kisser, and Mr. Stuart Robson. I'm not sure which gallery they're in at the moment, but I would ask them to rise, wherever they are, and receive the warm welcome of the House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure today to introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly two constituents of mine, Pauline Zeschuk and Olga Mattis. They're here today to observe the proceedings of the Legislature. They're seated, I believe, in the members' gallery. I would ask that they stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you to all Members of the Legislative Assembly a constituent from Edmonton-Gold Bar, Kathryn Buchanan. Kathryn Buchanan assists on fund-raising efforts in the community to provide food for the unfortunate, and we welcome her contribution. She's sitting in the public gallery, and I would now ask her to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder.

MR. WHITE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today and with great pleasure introduce to you and through you to Members of the Legislative Assembly 28 students from grade 6 at McArthur elementary school. They are here to spend a whole week in the Legislature to learn firsthand by hands-on learning how the Legislature actually operates. If they can do that in a week, they're better than most of us, I'm sure. They're accompanied today by their teacher, Mrs. Carter, and the helpers are Mrs. Marshall and Mrs. Duval. If they would be so kind as to rise in the gallery and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to introduce to you and to all members of this House three persons sitting in the public gallery. They were all present today at noon hour at the citizens' vigil and rally outside the Legislature Building protesting Bill 11. They are Malcolm Smith, Bob Settle, and Kathryn Buchanan, who has already been introduced. I'll ask them to rise once again and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased to rise today and introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly a very well-known constituent of Edmonton-Centre. He's well known for a number of things, but today he is here in his role as a Big Brother, and with him is his little brother, Ian McLeod. I would ask Mel Hurtig and Ian McLeod, who are sitting in the members' gallery, to please rise and accept the warm welcome of the Assembly.

head: Oral Question Period

THE SPEAKER: First Official Opposition main question. The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Private Health Services

MRS. MacBETH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The question Albertans are asking about the Premier's private hospitals scheme is: why? Why is the Premier prepared and determined to ram his private hospitals legislation down the throats of Albertans with an approximately $3 million propaganda campaign paid for by the taxpayers when he hasn't presented a shred of evidence that private hospitals won't be more expensive? All the facts presented in study after study show that private hospitals are more expensive and have lengthened waiting lists. My questions are to the Premier. Why is this Premier proceeding with his private hospitals scheme when the Lamont health care centre offers cataract surgery at $400 less than the same service being provided at private clinics?

MR. KLEIN: That may or may not be the case, Mr. Speaker, but are all the people in the city of Edmonton who need cataract surgeries going to drive to Lamont? There have to be options, and regional considerations have to be taken into place.

As to why, the hon. Minister of Health and Wellness has explained why many, many times. It has something to do with the College of Physicians and Surgeons, and I'll have the hon. minister explain one more time.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to comment directly on the example that was just being quoted. Certainly I would be interested in seeing how those figures were generated, but in terms of evidence – and I think that was the question – the Calgary regional health authority, which has a great deal of experience with cataract surgery, indicates that today, under the current arrangements that they have with contracts under our policy, which, by the way, needs the backing of legislation to really be firmly in place, in Calgary they are doing 500 more cataract operations annually than they did before. That is being done with exactly the same budget as was the case in years previous.

MRS. MacBETH: I sent the letter over to the minister, Mr. Speaker.

Why is the Premier proceeding with his private hospitals scheme when contracting out for cataract surgery has resulted in higher costs according to the Consumers' Association of Canada, right here in Alberta?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, there is some doubt as to the validity of that report and the information on which the report was based. Again, I'll have the hon. minister give the opposite side to that report.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, my information is that the statistics that the Consumers' Association are using are from about 1994-95. Members of this Assembly may recall that this was about the time we put into place a policy which we want to confirm in legislation with Bill 11. Nevertheless, we put in place the policy which required the contracting of cataract surgeries to the regional health authority under the regional health authorities' auspices, and there would be a clear assessment by the health authority with respect to the charges and costs being levied. So I think that is the background to that one.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, when they point their finger at someone else, they've got three pointing back at them.

Mr. Speaker, why is this Premier saying that private hospitals will be reducing waiting lists when the president of the 1,700-doctor medical staff in Calgary says that it will not reduce waiting lists?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, as I understand the head of the Calgary branch of the AMA, he said: the answer is more doctors. That may be part of the answer. It may be part of the solution. That's why we have put in our budget very significant dollars to hire more doctors and other frontline medical staff workers.

The Premiers from all across this country have said that the status quo is not an option. We have a situation now in Newfoundland and Quebec where they're actually sending people who need heart surgery and cancer operations down to the United States to for-profit hospitals, Mr. Speaker.

I quote from the Premier of Newfoundland, Brian Tobin, on a CBC program. He says:

In Newfoundland and Labrador today, we're sending people into the US for both cardiac surgery and for cancer treatments, that's happening all . . .

MR. SAPERS: Nobody in Newfoundland voted for you.

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I thought that they would like to hear from a Liberal.

He said:

That's happening all across this country, we already are supporting private health care in another country, its time to deliver the service here in Canada, to Canadians who want to be cared for at home in a quality, accessible, public health care system.

I couldn't agree with him more.

THE SPEAKER: And I gather that the document in question will be tabled.

Second main question. The Leader of the Official Opposition.

MRS. MacBETH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For the past six months this Premier has been telling Albertans that his scheme to bring private hospitals to Alberta was based on reducing waiting lists for surgical procedures, especially hip replacements. However, on Friday the College of Physicians and Surgeons stated that hip replacements would not be approved procedures at the Premier's private hospitals. Albertans won't be fooled by this Premier's rhetoric and his manipulative $3 million propaganda campaign paid for by the taxpayers of this province. The truth is that Bill 11 is a Trojan horse filled with private hospitals. My questions are to the Premier. Why did the Premier misinform Albertans when he said that his private hospital bill was designed to reduce the waiting lists for hip replacements?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, it could very well do that by moving other procedures to contracted services. It could free up in public hospitals operating theatres and hospital beds for people who require more complex surgeries. I alluded to joint replacements generally. The college says "may." It doesn't say "won't." May.

Mr. Speaker, since the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition alluded to propaganda, I'd like to read some of her own propaganda. This was a town hall meeting apparently that was attended by the hon. Associate Minister for Health and Wellness. This is a letter that was distributed to people attending that town hall meeting. A suggested letter that these people write to the Premier, and it says:

Dear Premier Klein.

You have said that your government will pass contracting out legislation. This legislation would allow regional health authorities to contract out the delivery of major surgery to for-profit firms.

Currently some regional health authorities contract out day surgery to for-profit firms, but these for-profit clinics as well as physicians' offices are mediclinics and are limited to providing day surgery.

Allowing for-profits to do major surgeries and secure public funding would expand for-profit health care.*

That is clearly misinformation. That is clearly propaganda. It says quite wrongly that Bill 11 would allow regional health authorities to contract out delivery of major surgery to for-profit firms. I'm going to read the bill. Bill 11, page 3, section 2(2) clearly states that "No person shall provide a [major] surgical service . . . except in a public hospital."

Mr. Speaker, that is misinformation. That is propaganda, and that's what we're faced with.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, will the Premier admit that he was wrong when he promised that the pain and suffering would stop when his private hospitals legislation was introduced?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, what we want to do is explore and examine ways within the publicly funded health care system and under the parameters of the Canada Health Act of alleviating pain and suffering, ways of alleviating waiting lists, the kinds of waiting lists to which Premier Tobin alludes, the kinds of waiting lists to which Premier Bouchard alludes and Premier Harris and Premier Lord and Premier Binns and Premier Hamm and Premier Romanow and Premier Doer, and the new Premier in British Columbia, the kind of waiting lists to which Mr. Rock from time to time alludes. We have to find those new and better and more efficient and more effective ways of doing things, and we still have to do it within the parameters of the Canada Health Act and obey both the spirit and the intent of that very important law.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, when Albertans are suffering from waiting for hip replacements, why won't this Premier spend the estimated $3 million from his propaganda campaign on hip replacements in the public hospitals? It would significantly lower wait lists in this province.

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, we are putting now well over $5 billion into the health care system. That is almost $15 million per day. Really, all politicians in this country are saying that if we keep on spending the way we are and if we don't find those new and more effective ways of doing things, our health care system will be bankrupt. This hon. member knows all about it. She was the minister of health at one particular time. Unfortunately, she did absolutely nothing to address the problem.

Speaker's Ruling Decorum

THE SPEAKER: I had great difficulty hearing the last question addressed by the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition. There seemed to be a lot of thundering or something. So I'm going to ask the opposition whip to take some direction and some authority in controlling the enthusiasm so that in fact the question can be heard, the question being addressed by the Leader of the Official Opposition.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, rural Albertans are asking why this Premier is pushing ahead with his private hospitals scheme and a $3 million spin campaign using their tax dollars. They know that the Premier's private hospitals will locate in the city, where there is money and concentrations of population, leaving rural Albertans with less access to health care services than they have today. My questions are to the Premier. What evidence can the Premier show that his scheme to subsidize private hospitals won't divert dollars away from public hospitals in rural Alberta?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, first of all, she talks about the private hospitals scheme. One of the first lines in the legislation after the preamble says that private hospitals will be banned in this province. [interjections] Well, what does it say then? It says, "No person shall operate a private hospital in Alberta." That's pretty much the same thing.

You know, this speaks to the misinformation. In the last three sets of questions the leader of the Liberal opposition has been kicking around this figure of $3 million. Where does she get that information? Would she like to table in this Legislature today that information? We have said that when the bill goes out tomorrow to all the households, we will be releasing the costs associated with the mail-out. She alludes to $3 million. That is a figure I have never heard before.

MRS. MacBETH: Perhaps the Premier would like to say how much it is.

Mr. Speaker, how many rural public hospitals will this government be shutting down in order to promote private hospitals in Calgary and Edmonton?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, there's no intention to close down any hospital to allow something else to happen. Regional health authorities consider the need for a hospital. It doesn't matter where that region might be. Certainly some hospitals have gone from active treatment centres to long-term care centres. Yes, in some cases some hospitals have been closed down so that the use of other larger and more sophisticated hospitals can be taken advantage of. These are the kinds of things that regional health authorities have to deal with virtually on a day-to-day basis.

If the hon. member wants more information, I'll have the minister reply.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, I think one of the things that should be kept in mind here – and this is very clearly spelled out in the legislation – is that there must be a contract with a surgical facility that is arrived at and recommended by a regional health authority. So the overall needs of the predominately rural regions of this province I'm sure will be one of their top priorities. They are not going to be weakening or harming their system by entering into any contracts that do not meet the needs of rural areas.

*This quote could not be verified at the time of publication.

Mr. Speaker, with respect to some of the highly specialized surgical services that are offered and potential for these contracts, they are centered in the cities, and they would be beneficial to rural people as well as to urban because the major urban centres are used by all.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, why doesn't this Premier just listen to Albertans and call an election right here, right now and let Albertans decide the future of our health care system? Or are you chicken?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, we aren't even into year 3 of our mandate. We have some important legislation to consider in this Assembly, and I would hope that we engage the opposition Liberals in reasonable debate. She'll get her chance, you know. It won't be for a while yet, but she'll get her chance. As I said before, you know, we had a little contest a while back, and she didn't like the outcome. I know she won't like the outcome of the next election; that's for sure.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. interim leader of the third party.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Bill 11 defines facility services that will be allowed in so-called approved surgical clinics as beds, meals, nursing services, diagnostic services, drugs, and operating rooms. The Canada Health Act defines hospital services as beds, meals, nursing services, diagnostic services, and operating rooms. The Alberta Hospitals Act, too, defines services that can be done in approved public hospitals as beds, meals, nursing services, diagnostic services, drugs, and operating rooms. Starting to notice a pattern here? To the Premier: how can the government, on the one hand, use the same definition for facility services in Bill 11 as the definition of hospital services in the Canada Health Act and, on the other hand, try to fool Albertans into believing that approved surgical facilities are anything other than private, for-profit hospitals?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I'm not sure quite sure where the hon. member is coming from. It really doesn't make any difference as long as the procedure is applied under the very, very strict rules of medical conduct and as long as they're provided under the parameters of the Canada Health Act and within the publicly funded system. I mean, we have it happening right now. There are numerous surgical clinics now operating for cataracts, for plastic surgeries, for diagnostic surgeries, for therapeutic abortions, and they're all funded under the publicly funded health care system here. They're all funded under Alberta health care.

DR. PANNU: Mr. Speaker, I'm willing to repeat the question. Maybe the Premier can get it now. How can the government, on the one hand, use the same definition for facility services in Bill 11 as the definition of hospitalization in Alberta's own Hospitals Act and, on the other hand, try to fool Albertans into believing that approved surgical facilities are anything other than private, for-profit hospitals?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I'll have the hon. Minister of Health and Wellness respond. The definition, to my understanding, is quite clear relative to what is a hospital and what a hospital provides as opposed to a surgical facility. I'll have the hon. minister supplement.

MR. JONSON: Well, yes, Mr. Speaker, and the legislation lays out the range of costs that can occur in a health care system. I believe the hon. member is reading from the section which indicates what will be covered overall by the health care system, and I think he's particularly referring to the section where another of the controls in the legislation is being dealt with, and that is that there shall not be charges for the normal range of services that are covered by the Canada Health Act. Yes, when people are under hospital care, they do eat and they do need a place to sleep and so forth when they're in a public hospital, and that's the section that I think you're referring to.

The other thing is that in the Canada Health Act, the reference is to these particular services, Mr. Speaker, but the Canada Health Act in section 8 makes it clear that there is the flexibility for a number of agencies – that's the actual word that's used in the Canada Health Act – to deliver the services under a publicly governed, publicly financed system that complies with all five principles of the Canada Health Act. That is all being honoured in the legislation known as Bill 11.

DR. PANNU: Mr. Speaker, if Bill 11 were a business investment prospectus, it would be thrown out for making false and misleading claims. How can the government justify making a fraudulent claim about banning private hospitals when the facility services that will be done by approved surgical clinics are exactly the same as what are defined as hospital services in both the Canada Health Act and the provincial Alberta Hospitals Act?

MR. JONSON: I really do not follow the logic of his question unless he is trying to indicate that every single fork and knife and bedpan and whatever has to be in a publicly owned facility and owned by the public. Now, I realize that the NDP is consistent. They feel that there should be no private element or volunteer element at all in the health care system of this province, unlike the Liberals, of course, who would accept a system where the doctors would opt out and practise in the private system and also, Mr. Speaker, that you could evidently have facilities operating completely in the private system as well, which is a true two-tiered system. At least I have to admit that the leader of the third party is consistent. He's saying that nothing should be owned or operated by anything but a totally government-run entity.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek, followed by the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

MRS. FORSYTH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Critics of the government's policy and proposed legislation to protect Alberta's publicly funded health care system continue to produce what appear to be instant studies designed to support their particular point of view in opposition to the proposals. An organization known as the Caledon Institute released a study last week claiming that Alberta's proposals could bring the North American free trade agreement into play and force all provinces to admit foreign, for-profit health companies. To the Minister of Health and Wellness: what is the Caledon Institute, and hasn't this NAFTA claim already been shown several times?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, it's my understanding that the Caledon Institute is based in Ottawa, and they seem, at least in this case, to go back and pick and choose various statistics from various studies. Also, they pick and choose in terms of what they put into the reports.

The allegations or claims specifically with respect to NAFTA, Mr. Speaker, have been addressed in this House. There are clearly provisions in the North American free trade agreement, a section known as the carve-out provision, and I would ask, if I could, the minister responsible for intergovernmental affairs to comment on that further.

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, I would be frankly very surprised if anyone relies on this paper for any kind of detailed debate around the NAFTA provisions, because certainly it would appear that the institute has totally disregarded the actual text that's in NAFTA when they prepared this paper. I think the institute may be well positioned to make comment on general social programs or on health policy, but clearly, by virtue of the information in this paper, it doesn't have the background that's related to trade policy or the knowledge of the NAFTA agreement that's necessary to comment on that, so I would discount it entirely.

Speaker's Ruling Questions outside Government Responsibility

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, on more than one occasion today the questions have basically zeroed in on asking about something that has nothing to do with the administration of the province of Alberta. Some institute located in another part of this country does not fall within the administrative jurisprudence of this particular Assembly, so phrase the question in such a way that the real rules of question period are observed. Now, this is not the only member. Not the only member.

MRS. FORSYTH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this study also claims that there is clear evidence of higher cost for cataract surgery in Calgary, where it is done at private clinics, compared to other jurisdictions where it is done in public hospitals, what clear evidence exists to support that conclusion, Mr. Minister?

MR. JONSON: It's my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that the data that the Caledon Institute is referencing is in the period 1996 to 1997, perhaps as early as 1995. I won't repeat the whole history of that particular period of time with respect to cataract clinics and clinics generally, but it was before we had our policy in place, and we did recognize we had a legislative gap. We used the policy as much as we could to deal with this area.

As I indicated, I think a good piece of evidence, Mr. Speaker, that comes from 1999 is that once we had the contract arranged and within place in Calgary with cataract clinics, the Calgary regional health authority indicates that they have kept their budget at a flat line. It has not increased for cataract surgery, and they are today contracting for 500 more cataract operations per year than before.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East, followed by the hon. Member for Redwater.

Rural Physicians

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The minister of health has put a lot of stock in the Physician Resource Planning Committee process. In September the committee tabled a report to the minister which showed the need for 35 new positions in the rural physician training stream. It noted that the rural physician stream is most effective, with up to 50 percent of the graduates staying in rural practice. We need more doctors, not private health facilities. My questions are to the Minister of Health and Wellness. What is the minister planning to do to meet the gap in rural physician needs identified in the rural physician action plan?

MR. JONSON: First of all, Mr. Speaker, we have already done a number of things. The first thing, of course, was to establish a rural physician action plan physician committee to advise us on the needs as far as rural physicians were concerned.

Secondly, two and a half years ago now, Mr. Speaker, we put in place and funded an overall recruitment process and some assistance to isolated areas in the province to recruit more physicians. That was a very successful program, adding, as I recall, some 80 physicians to needy rural sites across the province.

Further to that, Mr. Speaker, one of the major issues with rural physicians that was identified prior to the last round of AMA negotiations was that of there needing to be a payment system for on-call services of rural physicians. We put that payment program in place parallel to the discussions with the AMA on their agreement at that time. That has worked well, and I've had many compliments to government overall and to the people who have worked on that initiative.

Further, Mr. Speaker, we have been in discussions with the Alberta Medical Association rural physician action plan committee and working back and forth with universities to look at future recruitment needs and particularly the whole matter of where you locate people for their internship or practical experience. I just recently had a discussion with Dr. Tyrrell, dean of the faculty of medicine at the University of Alberta, and he indicates that they have a rural placement component in all of their internship programs now, which is proving to be quite helpful.

DR. NICOL: Mr. Speaker, my first follow-up question is: of these 35 positions that the report recognized as being needed in rural Alberta, how many of the 20 new positions announced for this year will be dedicated to meet that 35 need?

MR. JONSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, if the Member for Lethbridge-East is referring to the recent announcement with respect to funding an additional 20 internship positions this year and 40 next year, if that is the announcement, I would indicate that there is no specific announcement of any of those positions to rural areas, although with the overall additional internship positions and the fact that we are retaining more Alberta-trained physicians and in the overall internship program you have a definite rural experience or rural component, I think that particular area shows promise of retaining more physicians in this province.

DR. NICOL: Mr. Speaker, if he's not going to dedicate any of those to satisfy the needs of rural physicians, what is it that rural Alberta can look forward to in this new plan they're talking about that's supposed to solve all of our needs in health care? There's no dedication of these positions to rural Alberta. Will they please do something?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated, I think there's been a great deal taking place in the province with respect to the recruitment and retention of physicians. For instance, it was indicated to me recently, verbally, mind you, but by people from the faculty, that we have a higher rate of retention of our medical school graduates here in Alberta than almost any other province in this land.

As I've indicated, we have recruited about 80 physicians for rural areas. We have had very few concerns lately with respect to general practitioners. We seem to have an adequate supply in rural areas, although not ideal, Mr. Speaker.

Yes, in some of our regional health authorities we do need additional specialists, Mr. Speaker, but we are making a considerable amount of progress in this regard. I think our overall increase in the number of physicians last year, about 170 in this province, plus the overall rural recruitment program, which has focused many physicians on rural areas, indicates our very sincere commitment and action that we've taken in this regard.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Redwater, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder.

MR. BRODA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Allan Rock, the federal Minister of Health, has been quoted as saying that he has some concerns about the government's proposal to protect the publicly funded and publicly administered health care system. To the Minister of Health and Wellness: has the federal minister conveyed any of the concerns expressed on a weekend radio program to the government, and has there been a reply?

MR. JONSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, as would be indicated if hon. members had an opportunity to peruse the tablings earlier in this afternoon's session, one would note that we have had an exchange of correspondence over the initial policy statement being released. When that was released, the hon. federal minister replied to me indicating that he had a number of questions. Those questions were answered in considerable detail, and I've heard nothing official since with respect to any difficulty that the federal government or the federal minister had with the policy statement.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have gone through the same process, which I think is a good one, and that is sending a copy of our legislation to the federal minister and asking for his comments and his reply. To date I have not received a formal reply, but I think the federal minister may need some time. I hope not too much time, because we do want to get on with the legislation and be moving along.

We are in contact; we are communicating back and forth. To date there have been no specific issues, violations of the Canada Health Act raised with this minister.

MR. BRODA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister. The federal minister seems to be particularly concerned about patients being pressured into buying services they don't need. Don't the government's proposals specifically deal with this situation in clear and unmistakable language?

MR. JONSON: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That may be one of the concerns of the federal authorities if one can go by the media coverage. I know it's usually reliable, but occasionally it is not. We feel that it is much better to deal directly with the federal authorities.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, Bill 11 has a very, very specific section designed to prevent the overcharging, the up-charging without medical necessity and without informed consent from patients, and if there is a violation of this section, there are penalties which are quite substantial. I've not looked at all the health legislation in the country, but I think we are probably the only province that has that kind of tough provision in a proposed piece of legislation for protection.

MR. BRODA: My final question, Mr. Speaker, to the same minister: hasn't the federal minister himself asked the Alberta government to pass legislation containing the very principles included in its proposal?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, going back to the time during which Bill 37 was before the Legislature of the province, the federal minister at that time definitely agreed that we had a legislative need or a legislative gap, I think it was called, which Bill 37 was designed to close. That was verified by the blue-ribbon panel report that some of the members across the way may have read. Finally, in Bill 11 that particular issue is being definitively addressed.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-Egmont.

MR. WHITE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government is spending an estimated 3 millions of taxpayers' dollars on a massive propaganda campaign designed simply to manipulate public opinion. The Premier and his government are acting as public relations agents for private hospitals: HRG, Gimbel Eye Centre, Surgical Centres Inc., Enterprise Universal Inc. My questions today are to the Premier. Why, sir, are you as Premier pushing headlong ahead with this $3 million spin campaign for something that Albertans (a) didn't ask for, and (b) simply don't want?

MR. KLEIN: Well, first of all, I'm not so sure, Mr. Speaker. I think that Albertans want their government to find ways to shorten waiting lists, to ease pain and suffering, to find these ways to do them within the confines of the Canada Health Act and under the publicly funded system as we know it today. That's what Albertans are telling us they want. I would venture to guess that I get the bulk of the mail on health care, not so much on this bill but people complaining about waiting lists and having to be shipped out of their regions and so on. It's not acceptable, and every Premier in Canada agrees that it's not acceptable.

Relative to the $3 million, obviously the hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder wasn't listening. The leader of the Liberal opposition alluded to $3 million about three times in her first three sets of questions. Well, the costs of this honest, open campaign, of a bill – what is dishonest about sending out a bill to the people of Alberta? The only person who has cast doubt on Albertan's ability to read and understand the bill is the leader of the Liberal opposition, and that is shameful. She has said to Albertans: you won't understand the bill; you can't understand the bill. I find that to be shameful, presumptuous, and an insult to the people of this province.

MR. WHITE: Mr. Premier, if you're not going to spend the $3 million alleviating that suffering that you were saying you wished to do and you will not explain in this House precisely what is included in that $3 million, when will you explain to the citizens of Alberta why and how much this campaign is going to cost?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the member that the cost associated with mailing out the bill and some very minor advertising simply advising Albertans that the bill is available and where to call and so . . . [interjections] This is not the kind of propaganda that the Liberals have been sending out. This is propaganda. This is propaganda. This is a suggested letter. Again, you know, the Liberal opposition presumes that Albertans can't even write their own letters, actually prepares a letter based on misinformation for Albertans to send. They have insulted Albertans to the point of saying: you aren't even capable of writing your own letter; we'll write the letter for you and give you a copy so you know what to say to the Premier even if it is wrong. That is another insult to Albertans.

MR. WHITE: Mr. Speaker, how does the Premier answer my barber when he says: if it costs $3 million to sell that load of fish, then the fish must be rotten? [interjections]

Mr. Speaker, the Premier was unable to hear my question. I'm sure he's able to listen.

THE SPEAKER: Please sit down. The chair was not able to hear the question either, and it was this ear that was blocked. [interjections] No, no, no.

MR. WHITE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Premier, how do I answer or you answer, for that matter, my barber when he says: "Why does it cost $3 million to sell this barrel of fish? If that barrel of fish is so good, why does it need $3 million to sell it? It must be rotten."

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, yes, some dollars have to be spent to mail the bill out – this is unprecedented – and let Albertans decide for themselves without all the political rhetoric and the propaganda and the misinformation that is being spread by the Liberals. This is an important piece of legislation, a very important piece of legislation, and there's been so much misinformation relative to this piece of legislation being spread by the Liberals, being spread by the NDs, being spread by the Canadian Union of Public Employees, being spread by the Friends of Medicare: you name it. The best way is to let Albertans decide for themselves. Let them see the bill.

The Liberals don't believe that Albertans can decide for themselves. The leader of the Liberal opposition has questioned the intelligence of Albertans to read and understand the bill. Last week she insulted Albertans. She insulted the intelligence of Albertans. We're not doing that, Mr. Speaker. We're saying to the people of this great province of ours: you read the bill and let us know what you think.

THE SPEAKER: Actually, hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder, when you addressed your question with reference to your barber and the question went to the hon. leader of the government, my greatest fear was that the hon. leader of the government was going to respond, "I sincerely hope that your barber is not the same as that who takes care of the hon. Provincial Treasurer."

The hon. Member for Calgary-Egmont.

School Violence

MR. HERARD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Violence in schools unfortunately knows no boundaries, and wherever it happens, it causes great concern and serious questions. To the Minister of Learning: do our teachers and school administrators receive training specifically to deal with violence or threats in our schools?

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Our department, together with the Alberta Teachers' Association, started a project called Safe and Caring Schools roughly three to four years ago. What this project was designed to do was to enable teachers to deal with the violence that we could see coming.

Obviously, in Alberta we had an absolutely horrific incident last year. It's something that we absolutely do not want to see happen again, and it's something that we will do our utmost to ensure will not happen again. More so, we will do our utmost to ensure that teachers are prepared for what to do if incidents of violence occur in the school. It is no longer just an American phenomenon, and it is no longer just a joke.

MR. HERARD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: are there dollars in the funding formula for school boards so that they can appropriately prepare their teachers and administrators to deal with this potential problem?

DR. OBERG: There are dollars in the budget in a couple of places. First of all, we have contributed $900,000 per year to what is called the regional consortium. This is a consortium between the Alberta Teachers' Association, the school boards, and Alberta Learning to provide professional development. I'm happy to tell the hon. member that there is a considerable amount of professional development that is taking place with regards to violence in schools.

Mr. Speaker, there is also the student health initiative, which, again, is to deal with the student, to deal with what happens when these members of society see it as a problem and see it as an issue where violence causes itself to come out. There are several places in the budget where we are looking at this very serious issue.

MR. HERARD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: is there a compulsory policy or regulation that requires our school principals in all of our school districts to report occurrences of violence or threats?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, first of all, there is nothing specific that says that if there is an act of violence within a school, it is reported to a central agency. One of the things that we do pride ourselves on is that our school boards tend to talk to each other and, if violence occurs, certainly can take a look at making sure that other school boards know about this situation. It is not compulsory, for a lot of privacy concerns, for a lot of privacy issues. It is something, though, that we absolutely have to communicate better to our school boards and among school boards so that violence does not happen in Alberta schools.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, in a few seconds from now we'll call upon the first of six members to participate in Recognitions.

I'd also ask that those members who feel that they have to make a contribution to the point of privilege, that we'll deal with in a few minutes from now, all remain in the House, and all those individuals who were named the other day who have something to add to this particular concern should be here.

While we have the 30-second break, I'll call on the hon. Minister of Gaming for an introduction, if that meets with approval. Agreed?

[Unanimous consent granted]

(reversion)

MR. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me real pleasure today to introduce through you to the balance of the Assembly a councilman from my home city, Red Deer, Alberta. He is also an active, vibrant member of the business community and owns 67 Street Liquor Store. He is actually a good friend of mine from the '80s when we were in the oil patch together and both plied the free-enterprise placards together. I'd ask Bill Hull to stand and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

MR. STRANG: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to introduce to you and through you a hardworking constituent of West Yellowhead, the mayor of Grande Cache, Mr. Floyd McLennan. I'd ask him to kindly stand now and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

head: Reading and Receiving Petitions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Women of Distinction Awards

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise today to recognize five remarkable women who will be honoured as recipients of this year's women of distinction award, given out each year by the St. Albert Baha'i community in conjunction with the United Nations International Women's Day.

These remarkable women are Ada Curial, who is an educator and a founder of the Lo-Se-Ca Foundation, which is dedicated to improving quality of life for disabled people and their families; Gillian Hansen, a grade 12 student at Paul Kane high school, for her community volunteer efforts; Fran Preston, also a volunteer at the Community Information & Volunteer Centre; Millie Seitz, a volunteer with the International Year of Older Persons Celebration Garden; and Wendy Stiver, who in 1989 began working with St. Albert Special Olympians and has continued her wonderful and indomitable effort in leading and organizing all Special Olympics meets and gatherings within St. Albert. I would ask the Assembly to recognize these five remarkable women.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

CIAU Volleyball Championship

MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my very great honour and privilege today to recognize the University of Alberta Pandas volleyball team, the CIAU national champions for the sixth consecutive year. The Pandas defeated the hometown University of Manitoba Bisons Saturday in a cliff-hanger five-set match. Panda centre Christy Torgerson was named tournament MVP, and another fifth-year Panda, Jenny Cartmell, was named to the all-tournament team. Special recognition should also go to interim head coach Lorne Sawula, who was named the 1999-2000 coach of the year, and to head coach Laurie Eisler, two individuals who have built Panda volleyball into the powerhouse program it is today.

The sixth straight national title puts the Pandas in the history books, tying the record for consecutive women's national volleyball titles. These hardworking and dedicated young women deserve tremendous respect and admiration for their accomplishments and for bringing the CIAU banner home yet again to the University of Alberta. Congratulations, Pandas.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Team Alberta North

MR. McFARLAND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's indeed a pleasure to rise as a volunteer member of the Alberta Sport, Recreation, Parks and Wildlife Foundation to recognize Team Alberta North and its members participating in the 16th edition of the Arctic Winter Games. Team Alberta North consists of 232 individuals composed of athletes, coaches, cultural delegates, and staff. They are currently participating in the games that are running from March 5 to March 11 in Whitehorse, Yukon.

The goal of the Arctic Winter Games is to foster competitive opportunities for northern athletes, who due to lack of facilities and a limited pool of athletes are unable to successfully compete against their southern counterparts. Team Alberta North has participated in the games since 1986, and the town of Slave Lake hosted the international event in 1994. Now held every two years, the friendly games, as they are known, continue under the mission of athletic competition, cultural exhibition, and social interchange. I invite all members of this Assembly to join me in wishing the fine athletes from the Northwest Territories, Nunavut, Yukon, northern Quebec, Alaska, Greenland, and Russia well-deserved applause from this Assembly.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder.

National Engineering Week

MR. WHITE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The week of March 4 to 12 is National Engineering Week in Canada. The Association of Professional Engineers, Geologists and Geophysicists of Alberta has subtitled this week: Engineering – Anything's Possible. From the depths of the oceans to the edges of outer space, Alberta engineers, geologists, and geophysicists make anything possible. They turn novel ideas into practical, feasible solutions that address our basic needs, from harnessing new resources for fueling your car to designing more ergonomic work environments.

Engineers, geologists, and geophysicists are creative, innovative thinkers working behind the scenes of a $9.3 billion industry helping Albertans meet the needs of a modern world. Their ingenuity and problem-solving skills contribute to local and international economies and play a role in influencing the careers of today's youth. In Alberta, sir, engineers believe that anything is possible.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

RoseNet

MS PAUL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to recognize the fine work of the University of Alberta legal studies program in partnership with Changing Together in establishing a web site called RoseNet.ca. This web site has much-needed, pertinent legal information for abused immigrant women.

RoseNet is a web site for immigrant women developed by immigrant women. The project has several objectives: to empower immigrant women by enabling them to develop skills in using the web for nonformal learning and to collectively develop a safe, virtual place for immigrant women to learn relevant legal information on spousal abuse. It is educational projects of this nature that will in the future help stem the tide of family violence, improve the quality of life for immigrant women, and make Alberta the society of choice.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

Dr. Aleksandar Kostov

MS LEIBOVICI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On February 25, 2000, Dr. Aleksandar Kostov passed away at the age of 42 years. He was an accomplished scientist, researcher, and biomedical engineer at the University of Alberta who valiantly fought a rare form of cancer, only to be felled by a stroke. His daughter wrote this tribute:

To those who knew my father,
I was once told,
that a person never ceases to exist,
if one always remembers them.
I know that my father left more than a thought.
He left behind a rich legacy.

He lived twice too fast, and died twice too early.
What he had done for this world, was far too great already.
He was not given permission to do more.

He taught those close to him,
the passion of achieving,
and the desire to perfect every art.
Above all, though, he was just my dad.

He is survived by his wife, his two daughters, his sister, two nieces, and his parents.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, March is also Asthma and Allergies Awareness Month, Help Fight Liver Disease Month, National Kidney Month, Nutrition Month, Red Cross Month, Spay/Neuter Month. March 3 to March 26 is Easter Seal Mail Campaign. March 3 was the World Day of Prayer. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder has correctly pointed out that March 4 to 12 is National Engineering Week. The hon. Member for Little Bow has correctly pointed out that the Arctic Winter Games are being held March 5 to 11. March 5 to 11 is also National Dental Assistants Recognition Week. March 5 to 11 is also Suicide Awareness Week. March 6 to 12 is Pharmacy Awareness Week. March 8 is International Women's Day. March 8 is also the launch of the World March of Women 2000, and March 8 to 15 is National Farm Safety Week.

Privilege Contempt of the Assembly

THE SPEAKER: Now, hon. members, on Thursday last several hon. members participated in a point of contempt, a point of privilege, and I indicated, after hearing very, very preliminary statements from the Opposition House Leader and the Government House Leader, that we'd return to this matter at this time on Monday afternoon. For the purpose of what will take place in the next few minutes, I would like to advise all members that everything should be stated in the record. The fact that someone may want to table something, regardless of what is said in the tabling – it should be in the record of this parliament and this House so that it's here for future reference. I would invite all members who wish to participate to participate.

First of all, we'll recognize the hon. Opposition House Leader.

MR. DICKSON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that I'd given verbal notice on March 2, 2000. What I now want to do is particularize that notice, and I would just say that I had attempted to distribute a copy of some written material to your office, sir, to the Government House Leader, to the leader of the New Democrats, to the independent member, and also faxed copies to the three members who are specifically named.

The circumstances are this. I'm alleging, sir, that there's been either a contempt of the Assembly or, alternatively, a breach of the privileges of the members of the Assembly or at least of some of the members. I've cited as authority Standing Order 15, which is something you're very familiar with and that I think other members are as well.

Now, the facts that are the basis for the claim would be as follows, Mr. Speaker. Bill 11, the Health Care Protection Act, appeared on the Order Paper for Wednesday, March 1, on notice for first reading. Now, on March 2 at approximately 9:30 a.m. my colleague for Edmonton-Meadowlark and health critic for the opposition phoned the office of the Minister of Health and Wellness and asked for an opportunity to attend a technical briefing on Bill 11 prior to its introduction in the Assembly later that day. Neither the minister nor his executive assistant were available. She was advised by someone in the minister's office that her request would be considered. She'd received no response as of 1:30 p.m. on March 2, 2000.

Now, on Thursday, March 2, the same day, certain individuals, including members of the legislative media gallery, were invited to the media room in the basement of this building at approximately 12:15 p.m. for, quote, a technical briefing, close quote, on Bill 11. Those individuals were advised that the Premier would meet with them in the same room at 1 p.m. to discuss Bill 11.

At 12:28 p.m. the office of the Leader of the Official Opposition received by fax a letter from the Minister of Health and Wellness inviting her to a technical briefing on Bill 11 at some unspecified time and place. A copy of the letter I've attached to the materials I provided to you, sir, and the other House leader. It had also been tabled on Thursday, so it will be a sessional paper. I would note that it would have been physically impossible for that invited briefing to have occurred before Bill 11 had been presented for first reading in the Assembly, and in the circumstances submitted, there could have been no reasonable expectation that such a briefing would have occurred prior to 1:30 p.m. on March 2.

At approximately 12:58 p.m. the opposition leader attended at the media room in the basement of this building. There was no sign or particular notice on the door. She entered the room through the double doors. Once inside, a government employee, presumably working under the instructions of the Minister of Health and Wellness, told the opposition leader to leave. Mrs. MacBeth then asked the Member for Calgary-Glenmore, who was apparently chairing the meeting, whether she could stay. That member replied that she could not stay. She then exited the room.

Now, the media representatives and others in attendance in the media room were given materials including what's understood to be the final copy of Bill 11. Further, I'd note that in the Edmonton Journal on March 2 an article entitled "Health law debate starts new phase" references sections in the bill such as the following: "A section of the bill obtained by The Journal says . . ." I'd end the quote there. The substance of the quote is not germane. It certainly appears from that article that the daily newspaper had secured a copy of Bill 11 prior to its introduction in the Assembly. Bill 11 in fact received first reading on Thursday, March 2, 2000.

The issues, Mr. Speaker, I'd respectfully suggest, are these. Why is the government of Alberta releasing a public bill to the media before it is tabled in the Assembly and given first reading? Can the Member for Calgary-Glenmore and the Minister of Health and Wellness provide nonmembers with a copy of the bill after the bill appears on notice on the Order Paper but prior to its first reading by the Assembly? Is the answer to that question different if representatives of the opposition are also provided with the bill on the same or equivalent basis and at the same time? Further, can the Leader of the Official Opposition be denied access to a briefing on a public bill that is on notice to be introduced later that same day? Finally, the question of who controls the media room in the basement of this building: can the government and the media make private arrangements to deny other MLAs access to that facility without the Speaker's express approval?

Let me just very briefly highlight the authorities. I propose not to go through them word by word because all members have access to them. Standing Order 15 I've cited before. Just while I'm dealing with that, although you received no written notice the other day, I notice that Standing Order 15(5) makes provision for something to be raised verbally, and I'd suggest that's in fact what happened last Thursday.

On February 24, '99, you, sir, dealt with a claim that the Premier and the minister of health had committed a contempt of the Assembly by not allowing members to attend or participate in a health summit, and that was discussed in Hansard, February 24, page 163. You held, sir, that a question of contempt – this is as I understood your ruling – should be raised in the same fashion as a question of privilege, and that’s what brings us here.

I might make note of the fact that you ruled on those facts at that time, in 1999, that no contempt had been made out on the facts since the summit was a matter of government and not an act or event of the Legislative Assembly. Beauchesne in articles 123, 124, 125, I think, is germane. It talks about the privileges of parliament existing to be enjoyed by individual members and by each House for the protection of its members and – I’d emphasize this – for the vindication of its own authority and dignity.

Then you also have provisions which talk about control over documents in its possession. Beauchesne 174: “The Speaker has the control of the accommodation and services in that part of the Parliament Buildings and precincts occupied by, or on behalf of, the House.” That’s from Beauchesne, of course. It talks in article 221 about the Clerk being “responsible for the custody of all legislation during all its stages and proceedings.”

My argument, Mr. Speaker, would be as follows. It’s my respectful submission that the Premier, the minister of health, and the Member for Calgary-Glenmore took steps to introduce media to the contents of Bill 11 in advance of first reading with the sole purpose of influencing the public messages around this bill without any opposition perspective and commentary.

The tradition and parliamentary practice of not publishing or releasing bills before they are first introduced in the Assembly serves a couple of purposes. Firstly, sir, you would prevent any nonmember from taking advantage of, quote, insider knowledge, close quote, to further private interests. Secondly, it underscores the important role played by elected legislators. It invests both the Assembly and the work of members of the Assembly with the gravity and respect needed in a parliamentary democracy.

Now, I’ve made a quick survey of other Canadian provinces since last Thursday, and what I’m relating to you, sir, is what I’ve been able to unearth to this stage. A review of processes in other provinces supports the convention that public bills are not disclosed prior to first reading in the Assembly. I was unable to find any disclosure similar to the facts of this case in Nova Scotia. An official with the Clerk’s office in Ontario, a legislator with some 11 years’ experience, has told my office that they could remember no such prior disclosure in that jurisdiction. We received similar information from British Columbia. In Manitoba an official in the Clerk’s office advised my researcher that in the last nine years there was no recollection of incident similar to what is an issue in Alberta. In Manitoba apparently the minister needs to, quote, sign off, close quote, by letter before a bill can be publicly released.

Now, in Saskatchewan – and once again, I’m just relating, Mr. Speaker, the best information I’ve been able to obtain. If somebody has more detailed information, I’d like to hear it. Apparently in the province of Saskatchewan the Speaker has dealt with a similar case. In attempting to obtain some particulars, the information I have to date suggests that the Speaker may have held that prior disclosure was not a breach of privilege since it occurred outside the Assembly, but in the case that I’ve been told of, the Speaker apparently cautioned the government about the unfairness of such actions and the need to respect the role of the Assembly. In any event, I suggest to you that I’ve mentioned the case because I want to make full disclosure, whether it’s helpful to my case or not. I’d say that the Saskatchewan decision may be distinguishable, and I’ll come back in a moment and talk about what’s different about Bill 11. Hard to imagine a bill that would have achieved larger notoriety or public attention than what’s accrued to Bill 11.

Now, I also understand there’s been a similar objection raised in the House of Commons. I had received and I’ve passed on to the table just moments ago some material which wouldn’t have been made available but half an hour ago. I just received it. In the House of Commons there was a question of privilege raised by the Member for Calgary Centre, and this had to do with the disclosure of Bill C-23. This is the bill colloquially known as the same-sex benefits bill, Mr. Speaker. The concern raised there was that a Mr. John Fisher, a member of a special interest group, had sent an e-mail via the Internet outlining in detail his analysis of Bill C-23 before it was actually introduced and read a first time in the House. The argument there was that he had to have had possession of the bill beforehand, and the argument was that the Minister of Justice, the Hon. Anne McLellan, had leaked information, and this is contrary to parliamentary practices.

Now, that was raised on February 15, 2000, and on Monday, February 21, 2000, the Speaker gave his ruling on the question of privilege. The note I have is as follows. The Speaker stated that although the members of the House should always be the first ones to examine legislation after it has been introduced and read the first time, this rule must be balanced against the need for the government to consult both experts and the public when developing its legislative proposals . . . The Chair must rule that the matter raised by the hon. member for Calgary Centre does not constitute a prima facie case of privilege nor a contempt of parliament.

That’s in the House of Commons Debates, 3766-7.

I might say that I think there’s a way of distinguishing that. In fact, in the situation that I’ve put in front of you, Mr. Speaker, one can scarcely say that this is about developing a legislative proposal. The bill had been printed, and that would have been the case when we had notice the day before. This has nothing to do with developing a legislative proposal; it’s a question of putting it forward.

Now, I would distinguish this from the case you dealt with when I’d raised the contempt matter with respect to the health summit. We’re now dealing with what I’d describe as the stock-in-trade of this Assembly, namely a public bill.

It’s been held also – and I’ve cited some authorities, sir – that the Speaker’s jurisdiction extends outside this particular Chamber we’re speaking in now. I reference a letter dated July 2, 1992, from Speaker Dr. David Carter to a reporter. I’ve attached a copy of that letter where the Speaker there exercised jurisdiction with respect to the office of the Clerk Assistant. So it did extend outside this building. Further authority for that notion of extended jurisdiction can be found in the incident of April 29, 1992, when Speaker Dr. David Carter reportedly shoved a cameraman, not in this room but in the Legislature hallway outside. So I think there are authorities, sir, that you have jurisdiction outside this building.

Throughout the fall 1999 session of the Assembly the Premier repeatedly talked about his new private health care bill. He discussed at length the policy document upon which the bill was based. The Premier and the Minister of Health and Wellness continued to, I’d suggest, trumpet this anticipated private health care legislation. The Speaker, I suggest, can take notice of the enormous public interest in the issue.

Mr. Speaker, on March 2, 2000, the Premier described Bill 11 in these terms:

Mr. Speaker, this is a bill. This is a very important document. This is the most important document that this Legislative Assembly can receive and consider, and to refer to this as propaganda is absolutely shameful.

I’m skipping ahead:

I point out again that this is the result of one of the most intensive public consultation exercises in the history of this province and certainly of this Legislative Assembly.

I just mention, sir, in terms of context, that I had read something the other day and was reminded of the comment made by R.B. Bennett on May 30, 1938, when he was talking about the abuse and undue advantage of power which political fortune has temporarily placed in the hands of the majority. I'd ask you to in fact share some of this sentiment in the exercise of your considerable powers. R.B. Bennett said:

I occupy a position in which I am placed by statute, and one of my duties is to do exactly what I am doing, to try to safeguard the liberties of Parliament from encroachment by the government of the day. That is my duty. That is one of the difficulties of the position which I occupy, and I will discharge that duty whether it be on behalf of a member of the Opposition or of any other party when there is a tyrannical exercise of power on the part of the Government by reason of a great majority, enabling the administration to destroy the liberties of this Parliament, which have been secured in the manner we all know. When that happens it is my unfortunate duty to protest against such an encroachment upon the liberties of members of the House and I propose to do it so long as I am here.

Mr. Speaker, you have witnessed, as I and other members have, a host of things which have weakened the esteem and the stature of this Assembly, whether it's the throne speech, which has become anticlimactic because of the Premier's now annual televised speech, whether it's the budget speech, which amounts to a reiteration of previous spending announcements, whether it's Conservative caucus standing policy committees being passed off as committees of the Assembly, whether it's a host of summits which are all extralegislative exercises, whether it's a budget process and the A, B, C, D committees that dramatically reduce the opportunity for opposition MLAs to scrutinize estimates. One of the few things we're left with in this Assembly is the process dealing with public bills.

I suggest, sir, that you are in a position to take notice of the opportunities of the $8 million budget of the Public Affairs Bureau, the advantages that that affords the government to communicate with and reinforce its message to the Alberta public. But when it comes to public bills, I think it's important that we respect the process.

The reason I've cited the three members. The Member for Calgary-Glenmore chaired the technical briefing provided March 2, 2000. Typically, technical briefings are provided by department officials. Is it appropriate for a member to provide a technical briefing which will likely be seen as a political message because it's coming from an elected member? The Minister of Health and Wellness I've named because he's the sponsor of Bill 11. He's responsible for all legislation to be administered by his department. The government workers who participated in the technical briefing which excluded the Leader of the Opposition were identified as employees of the Department of Health and Wellness.

The Premier is cited largely on the basis of his comment on February 22, 2000, in question period where he said:

You know, in my political career that spans almost 20 years now, I have never looked forward with more enthusiasm to the time when this bill will be tabled so I can debate in this House in front of the television cameras this Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Speaker, with an independent referee like yourself, sir, to make sure that it's absolutely not stacked, that's it's unbiased, that's it's done in the most revered Chamber of this province, right here in the Legislative Assembly.

It's inconceivable, given the importance of the bill to the government, that the treatment of this bill, including the technical briefing, would not have been completely within the knowledge of the Premier. Then the Premier did, I understand, meet with reporters at approximately 1 p.m., immediately after the technical briefing, to discuss the bill.

So the relief sought is a declaration that a prima facie case has been established that one or all of the Premier, the Minister of Health and Wellness, and the Member for Calgary-Glenmore have committed an act that constitutes a contempt of the Assembly or a breach of the privileges of the members; secondly, further or in the alternative, a referral to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for a formal hearing and a recommendation as to penalty; further or in the alternative, a direction that Bill 11, the Health Care Protection Act, has been improperly introduced in this Assembly, a declaration that there be no further proceedings on that bill; and then further in the alternative, such other relief as may be appropriate upon the decision of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Finally, my last point. I'd also just received and shared with the Government House Leader a ruling of February 16, 1996, which I've just come into, which has to do with budget briefings. I've provided it to you and the Government House Leader. I'd respectfully suggest that other than talking about the importance of budget secrecy – I think it's something different from a bill. I think it's important to note that the opposition in fact is included in embargoed briefings on the budget. We weren't included in embargoed briefings on this bill.

So, Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for your patience. Those are the submissions I wanted to make.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

MR. STEVENS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to deal with the statement of facts that's contained in the tabling from the Member for Calgary-Buffalo and his statement of facts that was given orally here this afternoon. It seems to me that the hon. member referred to fairness when he was talking in terms of laying everything before you, sir, as it related to argument. The same should be true with respect to the statement of facts. When I look at this statement of facts, what I see is not only a statement of facts but a statement of facts omitted. So what I wish to do is to speak briefly to some of those material omissions of fact which should be on the record.

The briefing in question did take place over the noon hour on March 2. It was set up exclusively for the media. It was a technical briefing. I had some involvement in drafting the Health Care Protection Act, so I and others from Alberta Health and Wellness attended this technical briefing.

The technical briefing was embargoed. In other words, the information was provided under certain strict and specific conditions. One of those conditions was that a draft of the Health Care Protection Act was provided to the media. The draft legislation was marked "draft." It was provided to the media on the basis that it would be returned by the members of the media when leaving the briefing that afternoon. To my knowledge that was done. It was also clear that the purpose of the technical briefing was to provide an understanding of the legislation in question. That was the purpose for it.

I notice on page 2 of the tabling by the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, and I believe he repeated words to this effect in his presentation this afternoon:

Ms MacBeth then asked the Member for Calgary Glenmore, who was apparently chairing the meeting, whether she could stay. The Member for Glenmore replied she could not stay. She then exited the room.

Now, both of those statements are correct, but there was an intervening passage of time between my comment and the exit. The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo was present at the time, and I must say that the absence of an explanation of that intervening period of time strikes me as being unfair.

Be that as it may, members of the media at the briefing had a discussion regarding the request, and it appeared to me that the media assumed ownership of this particular issue. A discussion ensued. Comments were made among members of the media, and I observed that members of the media determined that it was not appropriate for the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition and those attending her to stay in the room. The hon. leader, to my knowledge, was privy to this discussion, as was the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, and was specifically requested to leave by the media. From my vantage point the exit was following the direction of the media.

Now, my background, Mr. Speaker, is in law. There is in law a contempt application, and in law the rule is that it is a very serious application. In law it is incumbent upon the person who brings the application to be studious in putting forward accurately the facts upon which such an application is predicated. In this particular case I think it is material that the media had that discussion. It is material that they assumed ownership of it. It is material that they made a decision. It is material that they told the Leader of the Official Opposition that she could not remain. From my perspective, it is material that it is absent from this statement of fact that was tabled and it was absent from the hon. member's recitation of facts here today.

Those are my comments, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have before us a very serious allegation of breach of contempt and breach of privileges of the House, and I think it's important to be clear as to what's happened. I thank Calgary-Glenmore for adding his personal knowledge of the information.

In fact what he's indicated is that there was a technical briefing and a news conference on March 2 and a media notice went out to the media inviting them to it at 12:15 p.m. and it was "an embargoed technical briefing of the legislation, for members of the Legislature Press Gallery." The notice said:

The technical briefing will be immediately followed by an embargoed news conference with the Premier and the Minister of Health and Wellness at 1:00 PM.

The technical briefing is not for attribution. It is not an on-camera session and recordings are not permitted. Materials provided during the technical briefing cannot be removed from the TV Room and must be returned at the end of the session. Media are not allowed to discuss the contents of the material with anyone outside of the TV Room until the embargo is lifted.

The embargoed news conference is for attribution and recording is permitted.

The embargo is in effect until the Minister of Health and Wellness formally introduces Bill 11 in the Legislative Assembly.

This is scheduled for approximately 1:45 PM.

I'll table copies of the news release for the record. So what we've had, what the issue is here, is an embargoed technical briefing, an embargoed news conference with respect to Bill 11.

I think it's common knowledge now that a letter was sent to the Leader of the Official Opposition and to the interim leader of the New Democrat opposition inviting them, if they so desired, to have their own technical briefing on Bill 11. Instead of taking advantage of that opportunity and calling back, they chose to stage an entrance to a private, embargoed meeting. They had not asked if it was appropriate for them to attend it, and they had not agreed to the terms of the embargo.

The media present were asked for their determination, as the hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore has indicated, and the media decided that it was not appropriate. The president of the press gallery has advised me by note that he was the one who told the Leader of the Official Opposition that she was excluded from the technical briefing and asked to leave. I can provide copies of that note for the records of the House.

The decision, first of all, as to whether she could stay after she had staged her entrance to a private, embargoed meeting was left to the media, and they made the decision and advised her to leave. It was clearly a private meeting, for which those present had agreed to terms of an embargo. The Leader of the Official Opposition was clearly not invited to the meeting but had been invited to her own briefing. She clearly staged the event, with cameras following her, with other members of her caucus, who then chose, I would submit to you, to use inappropriate and inflammatory language to try to create a media event.

The long and short of it, Mr. Speaker, is that an incident which happened outside of the Chamber, outside the purview of the Speaker, only exhibited bad form on the part of the Leader of the Opposition and is not a breach of privilege or contempt of the House.

Much more serious, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest, is the allegation of assault which was made in this House against a member of government staff relating to that, for which no evidence has been brought forward today. No apology has been made for that allegation, and I think that's a much more serious allegation, which should be dealt with.

With respect to Bill 11. At the technical briefing, as the Member for Calgary-Glenmore has indicated, a draft copy, stamped "draft," was distributed for the purposes of allowing the technical briefing to proceed and for people to go through the bill. It was distributed under the terms of an embargo: that it not be on camera, that recorders not be permitted, that materials not be removed from the room, and that people who'd agreed to the embargo would not discuss the contents of the material with anyone outside the TV room.

Draft bills have been circulated to the public in the past for discussion, for comment, for input. In fact, this government is known for its consultation process, its consultation with the public. Bill 40, or its predecessor, was circulated to the public. The health protection act was circulated to the public in draft form. In fact, Bill 202 in this Legislature session, it's my understanding, was distributed to the public in its final and printed version prior to its introduction in the House. No question of privilege was raised with respect to that matter.

Consultation, as I've said, has been the hallmark of this government. In fact, since I've been House leader and I know that my predecessor as House leader as well – we have encouraged all members of Executive Council to meet with their opposition critic prior to introducing legislation to discuss the contents of the legislation with them so that they would be well informed prior to it entering the House. I know that doesn't happen in all cases, but I know that it has happened in some cases, and the opposition has never complained about that particular practice.

Beauchesne 31(10) clearly allows such things as technical briefings.

"The question has often been raised whether parliamentary privilege imposes on ministers an obligation to deliver ministerial statements and to make announcements and communications to the public through the House of Commons or to make these announcements or statements in the House rather than outside the chamber. The question has been asked whether Hon. Members are entitled, as part of their parliamentary privilege, to receive such information ahead of the general public. I can find no precedent to justify this suggestion."

The Opposition House Leader had indicated in his comments, I believe, and certainly in his written argument which he filed that a bill on notice was the property of the Assembly. That's one of his contentions. In fact, Mr. Speaker, a bill on notice is not the property of the Assembly until it's introduced. Just because a bill or a motion has been put on notice does not mean that it has to be proceeded with. It does not mean that a member of Executive Council or any other member of the House has to bring that motion forward when called. In fact, bills don't come forward until they're actually put on the Order Paper by government. So just because it's on notice does not mean that it is the property of the House.

Clearly it's in all members' interest – and this goes to the root of the question of whether an embargoed discussion on a bill prior to its entry into the House is appropriate. As I understand, a breach of privilege is about whether somebody has been interfered with in their ability to carry out their duty as a member. Clearly, in order for members to do their job as members, what makes it easier for us to carry out our duty as members is if the public is well informed.

Was the bill released to the media prior to it being entered in the House? I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that it was not. There was certainly a review. There was certainly a technical briefing. But released? No, it was not released, because first of all they were not allowed to have it in their possession when leaving the embargoed conference. They agreed not to discuss it, not to interview on it, not to do anything with the information until it had been introduced in the House. That does not constitute a release.

The practice of this government has been to be open and forthright with the people of Alberta, to involve them in the discussion of public business in a meaningful way, and the hon. Opposition House Leader in his argument both in the written argument and his statements today has indicated quite clearly that that in fact is what has been going on. We have had a much more modern approach to discussion of the public agenda now than ever in the past. So, yes, the contents of the Speech from the Throne, for example, what is discussed in the Speech from the Throne, is not a surprise to the public and should not be a surprise to the public. The contents of a budget are not a surprise to the public and should not be a surprise to the public, and I would suggest that the contents of discussion of issues, bills that come before the House are not a surprise. In fact, Bill 11 and the contents of Bill 11 have been well known for a long time. In this House in question period the Premier, in response to questions, has been outlining exactly what is in Bill 11 for the members when they ask their questions.

What's happened is that a bill has come forward embodying exactly what the government has been saying, and for the purposes of better informing the public, a technical briefing was held. That briefing was embargoed until the actual bill was tabled in the House. No harm has been done to the privilege of members in this House. In fact, we've all been well served, because we serve the public, who should be well informed in order to give us their suggestions, ideas, and comments before we get into debate on a bill.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, this is not retraction time or debate time. Do you have something further to add to this point?

MR. DICKSON: I was going to add simply two very quick points, Mr. Speaker, if I might.

The first one is that the Member for Calgary-Glenmore talked at length about the media and what they decided and what they didn't decide. I didn't see an election when I was there; I didn't see a vote. The point is this. We are talking about the role of members and the role of this Assembly, and it's surely for this Assembly to decide who gets access to bills and what the rules are going to be, not members of the media. They have their role, which is an important one, but it's wholly collateral to the role of the members.

The other point I'd just quickly make is this, sir. This is not a question of looking at a draft of a bill two months before the session starts. This is minutes before the bill is in fact passed out for first reading. To talk about the public consultation, that is over long before we get to that stage.

Those are the observations I wanted to make, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, on this point?

MR. SAPERS: Yes.

THE SPEAKER: Of privilege?

MR. SAPERS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: Please, citation and everything else.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you. I'd comment on the facts as I understand them, Mr. Speaker. First of all, judging by the invitation that came out to members of the press gallery, it was clear that this was a meeting that was set up by the government, not the media. So it's really irrelevant what the pleasure or displeasure of the media was during that meeting, since it was at the government's beck and call that they were there.

A second point I'd like to remind you of, Mr. Speaker, is that there was some mention made of the fact that this was an embargoed session, as though that would give it some particular meaning. I will remind the Chamber, of course, that there is precedent of having opposition members present during embargoed sessions. It happens with the budget.

Mr. Speaker, the third point I'd like to make is that this infamous invitation to the Leader of the Official Opposition to participate in a briefing came at 12:28, hardly time to respond in a formal way, and the government would have you and everyone else believe that there had been no response and that there was no response intended. In fact, I think the willingness of the Leader of the Official Opposition to participate in a technical briefing at the earliest opportunity is evidence of a response.

I will make a further comment with regard to the House of Commons ruling in a similar matter recently and will note that the Speaker in Parliament referred to the role of experts in the creation of legislation. I think that while it's true that the media have a role to play and they may be expert journalists, I don't believe that members of our press gallery are content experts in health care. So I think that there is an important distinction to be drawn between what happened in the House of Commons and what has happened here in Alberta.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you consider the possibility that a ruling that the members of the press gallery should be privy to public bills on any basis ahead of elected members of this Assembly – I'd ask you to reflect on whether or not that would be ascribing to members of the press gallery, who come and go at the whim of their employers and not of the electorate of this province, whether that would be giving them privileges well beyond the privileges in certain cases of elected members of this Assembly, who represent the taxpayers and the electors who sent them here.

Thank you for allowing me to participate, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, we're dealing with this matter under Standing Order 15, a case dealing with privilege. Standing Order 15(6) states:

The Speaker may allow such debate as he thinks appropriate in order to determine whether a prima facie case of breach of privilege has taken place.

I'm quite prepared to hear any and all arguments that the hon. members want to make with respect to this matter before resting.

Well, then, hon. members, I'll take all this information which has been provided to me here this afternoon under advisement and would hope to return to the House tomorrow at the conclusion of question period with some kind of assessment after consultation with the appropriate authorities and experts. It would probably not be of great benefit now, having given all hon. members an opportunity to make their comments known and to make their comments known through Hansard, for me to receive in the ensuing hours bits of paper and other annotations and anecdotes with respect to this matter. I've probably received enough, having given the House opportunity and warning last Thursday to come prepared today, so I need not receive a fax at midnight or 3 in the morning on this matter.

Bill 12 Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2000

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour and privilege to move for second reading Bill 12, the Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2000.

The act has had discussion in Committee of Supply, so it's of no surprise to the members of the House that the supplementary supply asked for under this bill serves Community Development, Environment, Health and Wellness, and Justice, for a total sum of $31,103,000 plus nonbudgetary disbursements to be voted under section 2 of $1,470,000. We've had good discussion in Committee of Supply on the rationale and the reasons behind the need for this supplementary supply, and I would commend it to the House for their approval.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you colleagues. We have had some debate in committee on this supplementary supply request, and unfortunately the debate didn't provide answers to a number of questions. This is a circumstance that members of the Official Opposition find themselves in all too often. We have asked that at the very least some explanation of how this new spending will contribute to meeting defined outcomes and performance criteria, such as reducing health care waiting lists or opening up hospital beds or reducing classroom size, be brought into the debate. We have asked the members of cabinet who will be spending this money to explain the relationship between these additional dollars and the outcomes that Albertans can expect for the expenditure. We haven't been given any answers. Now, that makes it very difficult to support Bill 12.

We recognize, of course, that funding is needed in these areas, particularly in health care, but we would like to make sure that new funding, particularly in health care, goes to meet the needs of Albertans and not the needs of the government.

[Mrs. Gordon in the chair]

If it's not clear what that distinction is, Madam Speaker, I'll explain it like this. There are Albertans who are waiting in pain for access to surgical services in this province. Frankly, those Albertans don't really care, while they're waiting in pain, about this debate in the Legislature. What they want is quick access to the public health care system that they've helped to build and to pay for all of these years. So they would expect that their elected representative would stand in this Chamber and with alacrity and dispatch vote in favour of any supplementary supply request which would open up more access in the health care system.

I'd be happy to vote that way, Madam Speaker, but you see, I have this nagging suspicion that this money won't be used to relieve that pain and suffering, that that money is instead going to be used to further a propaganda campaign of the government when it comes to promoting its very narrow agenda. Earlier today in question period the question was put several times to government regarding the cost of their campaign to convince Albertans that they are wrong to question the government, and the government didn't answer the question. So while we're being asked to vote a supply of some tax dollars to government, how can we be certain and how can we provide certain answers to our constituents that this money won't be used for the wrong purposes?

In previous debates about interim and supplementary supply we've had government members stand up and try to intimidate the Official Opposition by saying: are you going to vote against spending on a long-term care centre here or there, and are you going to vote against a school renewal project here or there? While we're on the topic of school renewal projects, I can't tell you how happy I am to see the allocation go to Westminster junior high in my constituency. It will be money well spent. Maybe they'll be able to finally open the windows without the window frames crumbling. Anyway, I do digress, Madam Speaker.

The issue here is that of course no member of the Official Opposition would speak against or vote against appropriate accountable spending on identified priorities. But what we also won't vote in favour of is willy-nilly spending based on some political barometer of the provincial government without the appropriate accountability measures being put in place.

Now, in case anybody is concerned that maybe I'm overstating my case, Madam Speaker, let me just remind the Assembly of a couple of facts. First of all, this current Treasurer has brought in more supplementary supply requests than the previous two Treasurers combined, I believe, and if not exceeding it then certainly darned close to exceeding that total.

This is a particular problem because we have a government that likes to pride itself on its business acumen. This is a government that talks about its reliance on the private sector, even when it comes to dismantling the sacred trust of health care. This is a government that likes to pride itself on small government and on making sure that there's just no more government business being involved in business. Yet I can't imagine a business that would actually operate the way that this government does. I can't imagine a business that would be successful if they were so far out on their financial forecasts.

It's easy for this government to look like fiscal heroes when you have oil at two or three times the price it was a year ago. It's easy for this government to look like fiscal heroes when you have a federal government that has been passing along real tax relief to all Canadians for the last couple of years. It's easy for a government to look like fiscal heroes when the world economy is such that you will benefit if you are an exporting economy, such as Alberta is. While the government wants to bask in the glow of all of this good fortune, they can hardly claim to be responsible for it. What we do, however, ask the government to be responsible for is their own spending plans and the accountability measures that should be put in place.

Now, I won't bore the Assembly by reciting all of the concerns of the Auditor General over the past couple of years when it comes to government reporting, and I certainly won't retell the story in this Chamber about the need for a fiscal stability fund, but I will comment briefly that the government has made some moves recently that should give anybody pause for thought when it comes to whether or not this government is capable of keeping its word. What I'm referring to, of course, is the Fiscal Responsibility Act.

The Fiscal Responsibility Act would have seen a 75-25 percent split in how the surplus was used within a year, and that split of course was going to be: 75 percent of the surplus towards debt, 25 percent to within-year program spending. Well, what's happened, quite apparently, is that the government found that their law, which was, I guess, set up to try to convince some people that they were going to be tough and aggressive about the debt, became inconvenient politically. So at the very first opportunity what the government did is they scoffed at their own law, repealed it for the time being, and then – and they'll never say this in the Assembly – they followed the lead of the federal government, which said that it would be much more reasonable to look at a balance, more of a 50-50 approach, in terms of how the surplus was spent, some towards debts, some towards program spending. In fact, that's what this government has done. They've allocated spending much closer to that 50-50 formula.

So we can only look at the government's words and then their actions and then judge whether or not they say what they're going to do and they mean what they say when they say it. I'm not convinced, Madam Speaker, that this government does mean what they say when they say they're interested in being open and accountable. I'm not convinced that they mean what they say when they want to tie spending to performance measures and outcomes, and I'm certainly not convinced that they mean what they say when it comes to providing a balance to Albertans when it comes to the expenditure of their tax dollars. In fact, what we've seen is that this government wobbles back and forth between frenzied cutting and frenzied spending, and of course in between all that wobbling are the taxpayers of this province, who tend to get bounced off the walls as this wobbling government bounces them from pillar to post.

What we would much prefer is some stability, and that of course ties into earlier comments that I've made and my colleagues have made regarding the fiscal stabilization fund. After all, if you ask anybody in business in this province, anybody that provides a public service in this province, what they'll tell you is that stability is the key to their planning and their success. We can only expect that same stability from the provincial government.

Madam Speaker, I've talked before about economic and fiscal strategy reports, using long-term trends as far as 10 years. I've talked about annual performance reports that have meaningful measures. I've talked before about monthly budget updates instead of quarterly updates and of course about the fiscal stabilization fund. We have yet to see a satisfactory response from anyone in government to these matters, yet what we see time after time after time are more and more requests for this out-of-budget, unplanned spending.

Will the money be put to good use? We can only cross our fingers and hope for the best. We know that there has been some identified spending in Community Development, in Environment, in Health and Wellness, and in Justice. We certainly hope that the money will be tracked. We hope that the government will break with its tradition of just trying to pretend that they've done the right thing with this money and actually report on it in ways that the Auditor General will be happy, and we will look forward, I suppose, to next year's report. Of course, it's a year late. We really won't have an opportunity until it's all over, but we'll look forward to next year's report and to seeing whether or not this government has the capacity to listen and learn and whether or not they will respond to these very responsible suggestions that come through the Official Opposition but, I'll emphasize, really on behalf of Albertans.

These ideas to improve the budgeting process and to improve performance measures and to ensure that tax dollars provide valued services are not inventions of the Official Opposition. They are the considered responses of Albertans when we have met with them and talked with them and listened to them about what it is they expect from their government.

So while the government may think that they're being clever in ignoring the Official Opposition, what they're really doing is snubbing the taxpayers of this province. They should not be so cocky as to think that they've got the monopoly on good ideas, and they should clean the wax out of both of their ears and not just listen to those Albertans whom they believe voted for them, but they should listen to all Albertans because, after all, it is each and every taxpayer's dollars that they are spending.

Madam Speaker, I've heard the Premier say in this Assembly just a few short days ago – I think he made reference to the 70 percent of Albertans who voted for the government, an unbelievable suggestion. Unbelievable for two reasons: one, because it's not true; secondly, because it is remarkable that a government would be so awash in its own bathwater that it would think that they have this huge majority support in everything they do.

I'm here to tell you, Madam Speaker, that that's simply not the case and that the government really should start listening. They've taken some really, really good ideas from the Official Opposition in the past, and while they still have their hand on the reins, it wouldn't hurt my feelings if they took these really good ideas too and tried to market them as their own, as long as they get on with doing the right thing.

I'm confident, Madam Speaker, that the Alberta Liberals will have their opportunity to put their own ideas to use in good time on behalf of the people of the province, but in this short interim period before we get that chance, I would ask the government to seriously consider these changes to the budgeting process and the financial accountability process. I'm convinced that if they do, we'll all be better served.

Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Just a couple of observations I wanted to make. I had appreciated the other night, when we were dealing with the estimates, that the Minister of Justice with his customary forthrightness assisted us in understanding the Justice operating expense and capital investment of $5.7 million. But since we have the opportunity here in terms of dealing with the bill, I just wanted to remind the minister that notwithstanding his explanation the other day, I still have some concerns with what we're doing with the new court reporting system.

Madam Speaker, I just want to go back and say again that the Minister of Justice and his department have chosen a new approach to court reporting, and they've done that without consultation with the Canadian Bar Association. They've done that without prior consultation with the Law Society of Alberta. They've done it without prior consultation with the men and women who make up the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta, the level of court that most typically hears civil actions.

The minister has given us some information I didn't have before. I understand that now we're looking at the Halifax technology, but I continue to have the concern that when the requests for proposals go out, which I understand to be imminent or at least within a matter of months, the province isn't wedded to a particular technology. We know the problems that have existed – and we talked about this in estimates – in a number of U.S. jurisdictions, and there's no difficulty finding lawyers and court reporters and judges in the province of British Columbia that were not particularly impressed with the experiment there. The Minister of Justice says that we're going to use better technology, but I would have felt more comfortable if I'd felt that there had been a degree of support and buy-in from the men and women who are actually going to be directly affected, the men and women who practise in our civil courts in particular and the men and women who occupy positions on the bench.

The other observation I make is that unless we're able to be very, very lucky indeed and have an excellent type of technology, which maybe is going to be a little more expensive than some of the technologies other provinces have tried to get away with – short of that, we end up with that situation where the well-heeled litigants, the two resource companies in Calgary, will continue to go out and hire top-notch court reporters who will come in and make a very excellent transcript of every word and virtually every breath that's taken in the course of a civil trial, but people involved in that smaller matrimonial property action or personal injury claim or one of those things aren't going to be able to afford that.

I just register again the concern that we end up with a degraded quality of court reporting for litigants of modest means. It's a concern. We've raised it before. Hopefully the Minister of Justice will be reviewing that carefully, but I do think that we have sort of lurched into this process without adequate consultation, and one always gets a little nervous when we don't see the appropriate kind of consultation at the front part of the process. The minister has been certainly chided in this House, urged, prompted to do more of that. I'm always the optimist, Madam Speaker. I'm hopeful he's going to follow up and make sure that the technology is first-rate, but it has been very troublesome in terms of the way the idea was announced in the early stages. I'm going to be watching carefully and I think many other Albertans are going to be watching carefully to see what impact it's actually going to have on the quality of reporting.

I just make that observation, and this isn't, to be fair, something to dump in the Minister of Justice's lap, because he's relatively new to cabinet. I think in a government that could perhaps be characterized this way, a government where since 1993 virtually every single decision has been based on how cheaply any service can be provided, not what the impact is going to be, not the quality, and not what the outcomes are going to be, just how cheaply the service can be provided in the current budget year, there is huge, huge suspicion, and I don't think it's just shared by members of my caucus. I think it's shared by a lot of Albertans out there that we're sort of forgetting that government is also about providing quality service, and court reporting is one of those things that warrants nothing less.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 12 read a second time]

Bill 2

First Nations Sacred Ceremonial Objects Repatriation Act

MS CALAHASEN: Thank you very much. Madam Speaker, it is a great privilege today to rise to move second reading of the First Nations Sacred Ceremonial Objects Repatriation Act, Bill 2.

This is a brief act intended to accomplish three important things. First, the act establishes some very basic principles that will enable, or allow, Alberta to legally repatriate sacred ceremonial objects. This is very significant, Madam Speaker, because it sets out the very principles that will allow us to be able to do the right thing, which is what I think is needed to be done relative to this, the repatriation of sacred objects. I know that many times in talking to the elders as well as First Nations leaders in the past 10 years since I've been elected – and I'm sure previous to that – there has been a real need to be able to establish that and for them to be able to do this. I really appreciate the fact that we are at least moving in that direction, and I think it's a very important principle for us to be able to ensure that these things happen.

I really appreciate the fact that the Leader of the Official Opposition has indicated that there will be speedy passage to this. I think she also recognizes the fact that this is something that needs to be done and to really make sure that we continue to move in that direction.

Second, the act sets in motion a consultative process in which staff members from Alberta Community Development as well as Aboriginal Affairs will work with First Nation communities to learn how they would like to proceed with the treatment, loan, or repatriation of sacred ceremonial objects as communities themselves wish. This is a very important principle, Madam Speaker, from the perspective of the aboriginal community. First of all, they have indicated that, whatever happens, with anything that is going to be repatriated, it must be taken with great care, that they have to be ready within the communities to be able to accept these objects once they have identified them and be able to ensure that they're going to be kept in a safe place. It's very, very important that whatever we do, we work with those communities and we continue to work in that vein. They feel that it's a very important concept in order for us to be able to move in that direction, and they'd like to see this done in the right way. Coming from an aboriginal community, I appreciate that fact. Many communities in my constituency have felt that whatever we do, we have to put those processes in place.

Finally, on January 14 the Premier committed this government to amending the Glenbow-Alberta Institute Act so that 251 Blackfoot sacred ceremonial objects could be completely repatriated to the Blood tribe, the Peigan Nation, and the Siksika Nation. The act does this, Madam Speaker, and I believe that with what has happened in the Peigan Nation – my colleague from Livingstone-Macleod has had some hand in that respect, and I know he'll want to speak on some of these issues. I think it's a very significant act that we're doing and what needs to be done in order for us to be able to continue to work with the First Nations and to work with the communities that are going to be affected by this act.

The sacred ceremonial objects in these institutions have for some time been part of two worlds, Madam Speaker, one of museums and collections and one still reflecting First Nations' traditions. We've had such great working relationships with some of these groups, and they've also worked very closely with many of the First Nations. Examples would be the Provincial Museum of Alberta and the Glenbow. They've really worked very well with First Nations, and I commend them for the way they've been able to do the work that they've done to date, and I'm sure they'll ensure that they continue to work with the First Nations in the repatriation of these sacred objects.

By returning the sacred ceremonial objects, which are vital to the practice of traditional ceremonial life today, I believe Bill 2 sets us on a new and even more promising course in the year 2000, this millennium, Madam Speaker. I believe that Bill 2 certainly sets a course for aboriginal people.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Norwood.

MS OLSEN: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I, too, rise today to speak in support of Bill 2. I think one thing we have to understand is that for those who practise or have any religious base or spiritual practice, there are certain elements that come with that. I think it's very important for the aboriginal community to be able to have in their possession those elements that are critical to the practice of their tradition and their faith. I guess I think it's akin to Catholics having Easter without Lent – some do, I suppose – or Communion without the Host or saying the Rosary without the rosary. Those are all things that are part of the Catholic tradition, and you possess those items in order to carry on with your faith or your religious practice. I think this is important for that purpose.

It's also important because over the last few years we've seen the First Nations communities going back to their traditional practices and introducing their young people to some of those practices. I think that's an essential component of this. I certainly have talked to many, many young aboriginal people who have no idea what the traditions and practices of their band or tribe are. I think it's important to be able to increase that awareness for the youth, and I think this particular bill will help to do that.

I think it's important to note that in the preamble, under what I would state as the set of principles, the items desired for return are those "that are vital to the practice of . . . sacred ceremonial traditions." That's important because there are a number of artifacts in museums across this country and certainly in this province. Some of those artifacts are artifacts that have come from a time that speaks to the history of this province. They may be First Nations artifacts, but they may not be critical or vital to the practice of the sacred ceremonial traditions. I think that's an important delineation, because some of those artifacts will in fact remain with the current museums and those places. So it's not an attempt to take all of those items which have been in the possession of different museums and galleries and give them all back to the community.

I would like – and I think it's important – to talk about this as an educational process for the young people. I would be interested in seeing the regulations tabled in the House – I guess I'm as curious as many people to know what the artifacts are – so that we may all be enlightened by the regulations and the schedules just for our own knowledge, and certainly they're then accessible in an easy manner to all Albertans. I think that would be important.

I notice that the process that's laid out under section 2 is laid out with ministerial control. I think that's one of the reasons I'd like to see the regulations tabled. Also, of course, I may have to just for tradition itself put through our amendment on Law and Regulations. That's a standard tradition in the House. I would be remiss as a legislator and a member of the Official Opposition if I failed to do that. We're talking tradition here, and this is a long-established tradition that we have in this House. We'd like to do that. [interjections] Well, it may be sacred to the Official Opposition. In fact, democracy is sacred to us, and that's why we want to put those regulations on the table.

Maybe the hon. minister can commit to tabling the schedules and list those artifacts for us and tabling the regulations so we all know what they are. If, of course, the hon. minister isn't going to carry on the tradition of the government side and, you know, would like to convene a meeting of the Law and Regulations Committee, maybe it's time to break that tradition, and we could all sit down and have a look at those regulations.

Madam Speaker, with that I am very pleased to see this legislation come through. I think it's an important and historic moment in the Legislature in recognizing the spiritual needs of the aboriginal community, the First Nations community in this province.

The other thing that I think is important to recognize, Madam Speaker, is that ceremonial objects are important to different groups within certainly different cultures. It must be noted that these are artifacts of the First Nations community and that there is a difference between First Nations and the Metis community. Some of those traditions that are just assumed to be the same in fact are not. So I think that's an important part of all of this as well. Hopefully, this will provide an education to all members in the House and to all Albertans. Some of those delineations will be marked, and we will be much wiser for that.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

MR. COUTTS: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today and fully support Bill 2, the First Nations Sacred Ceremonial Objects Repatriation Act. I have had considerable involvement with First Nations ceremonies and some of their traditions over the years, having lived in Fort Macleod and having had the Peigan Nation to the west of me and enjoying many of those people from the great Peigan Nation and also my association with the Blood tribe. I was pleased to see that the Blackfoot confederacy came forward with this whole idea of repatriation, and it was called the Blackfoot agreement.

Now, as I'm a representative of that area, I have the Blood tribe and the Peigan Nation in my constituency, and it has brought home a lot of those things that I learned as a young boy working with and dealing with both of those great nations. The whole idea of giving back the sacred ceremonial bundles or, as they're referred to in the act, objects – and I will refer to them as bundles – to the First Nations has a special significance. I think it's very, very important to note that our museums, the Glenbow particularly and our Provincial Museum, kept these bundles for several years and held them because of their value, and now they are in a position to be returned back to their appropriate places under the condition that they be kept in a safe place. That is probably the most important part of this bill, because they will be referred to for generations to come.

Inasmuch as it means something to everyone on both reserves, particularly the Peigans and the Bloods, it has great significance for seniors. It has tremendous significance for the young people who have not grown up in, as our aboriginals say, the old ways. But, more importantly, it has a greater benefit to the young people who are growing up, and they will have a true education on where they came from. Each and every one of us likes to look at our ancestors and our lineage. We like to know where we came from, and these bundles definitely provide some of the secrets to the past of our great aboriginal nations.

Why is repatriation important? As I said, the bundles have meaning. Ceremonial bundles might not apply to today and they might not be necessary for the way of life, but originally they had a tremendous influence on the way of life of a particular aboriginal tribe. The bundles held significance. They held significance as far as wealth, as far as justice, as far as how a particular village might maintain its health. A ceremonial bundle also meant food, clothing, and shelter as it paved the way to go out and find the buffalo and push them over the edge. It also meant a lot about their transportation.

For health the bundles would contain certain objects that would provide secrets into certain herbs and certain plants that they could use to correct diseases amongst their people. In the justice bundles there would be certain objects that would pave the way of life for the people, and in their ceremonies they would use those objects to show what was right and what was wrong. The objects that came in children's bundles and youths' bundles would show a pattern of how the society developed and maintained itself.

As I said, the biggest things, of course, for any aboriginal tribe originally were food, clothing, and shelter. The spirit rock would be part of a bundle, and that would show the young runners exactly where the buffalo were. All of those things – food, clothing, and shelter – came from one thing, and that was the buffalo, and the buffalo was sacred to the aboriginal people. Back in the dog days – and that was before the coming of the white man and before the coming of horses and other modes of transportation – they would have bundles that would guide them on their journeys around the prairies that would offer them the food and the water and that type of thing. All of these bundles were of a ceremonial nature, but they also planned how a tribe would go through its fiscal year.

These bundles were representative of a way of life. Each portrayed by ceremony a decision and an action, and accumulatively they formed the basic symbols of how aboriginal people governed themselves, sustained their way of life, and maintained and controlled themselves as a society. All societies have basic principles and fundamental guides that help them form a firm foundation on which they continue to serve, build, survive, and sustain themselves, and although they were highly traditional, they meant a tremendous amount to the people. It guided them through life's journey, very, very similar to what we do today on this front bench with our department of health, our Department of Justice, our department of social services, our department of transportation, et cetera. They mean exactly the same things to us today as our symbols as what they did to aboriginal people.

Giving these bundles back to our aboriginal people is a great step in reaffirming our commitment to one society working together so that they can maintain and teach where they came from. I think this is the very basis of a very sound partnership. This is the very first step in a very sound partnership with First Nations communities. In my own region I know what Head-Smashed-In Buffalo Jump and the interpretive centre there has done for fostering understanding and getting rid of cross-cultural differences. It has gained a respect between the two cultures to work together.

I would like to thank the members of the Peigan Nation and all of the elders, particularly Joe Crowshoe Sr. and his son Reg Crowshoe, for bringing me into contact with the significance of what these bundles have meant, and the chief and the councils of both the Peigan Nation and the Blood Nation. It is my hope that with the passage of this bill – and this is why I'm so supportive of it – we can promote the living traditions of First Nations communities not only in my constituency but across the province. I believe that Bill 2 holds that potential and merits our support, and I wish all nations, when the repatriation is done, all the very best in securing those bundles in the name of the people that they represent.

Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I was looking forward to the opportunity to join debate on Bill 2, a bill that I certainly support. It strikes me that Bill 2 represents something of a maturation in our community, that we've come to the point of recognizing how appropriate it is that these sacred ceremonial objects be in fact returned to First Nations. I think it's a very positive thing. The fact that we have schedules dealing with the Blood, Peigan, and Siksika nations is a very significant step. I'd like to acknowledge the role played not only by aboriginal leaders in this province but also by the Glenbow Institute in Calgary. The Glenbow has probably one of the largest collections of artifacts in North America, particularly when we're dealing with the First Nations who lived in what was this great prairie region of western Canada.

I think the Glenbow has provided some really instructive leadership in terms of their recognition of the importance of dealing with repatriation. I'm not sure it's always an easy thing for an institution that has a reputation like the Glenbow does and this vast, vast collection. You're focused always in terms of acquisition and building the collection and showing the collection. This is something very different to talk about, in fact taking elements of your collection and turning them back. So I appreciate that leadership that's been provided by the Glenbow.

The one concern I'd register as I look at it is that the minister has to agree. We don't know who the minister is going to be. It will be the minister designated under the Government Organization Act. But when you look at section 2 – and I won't get into a really detailed analysis now of the bill – what one sees there is:

- (1) A First Nation may apply to the Minister . . .
- (2) The Minister must agree to the repatriation . . . unless, in the Minister's opinion, repatriation would not be appropriate.

Now, there are absolutely no criteria set forward on which that minister should base this, exercise his discretion. I think it's a pretty fundamental rule of administrative law that you typically don't give an individual, a minister or an administrative official, just discretionary power without giving some guidelines, some elements, some tests to use when and how that discretion should be utilized. I always find it offensive when I see it in a bill. I'm not sure that the First Nations people of this province would like to think that a minister – a minister – can say yes or no. "I exercise my discretion; I choose not to exercise my discretion, but I don't have to tell anybody on what criteria, on what basis, I've used that discretion." It seems to me that it's offensive, because it flies in the face of a spirit of generosity that animates all the rest of this bill. Madam Speaker, help me figure this out. How is it that a bill that is such a terrific idea and that is probably so widely supported would have this sort of retrogressive step with a minister having all this discretion?

Now, I'm reminded that maybe regulations may address it. I see the chairman of the Standing Committee on Law and Regulations is here, and whenever I see the Member for Banff-Cochrane, it gladdens my heart to know that there's always a prospect that Law and Regulations may be activated. I'm hopeful that the minister will give this member a chance to wrestle with some of the regulations. You know, the minister who spoke to the bill earlier on I think in jest had said: why would you want the regulations under this bill to be subject to the Standing Committee on Law and Regulations? What better bill to do it? A bill that not just the people in this province look at but people across the country and perhaps even beyond. This is the kind of bill that makes you proud to be an Albertan; doesn't it, Madam Speaker? You see this bill, and it makes you think: hey, this is a terrific thing that we do in this province.

You know, I've not been known to always be lavish in my praise of the government. I perhaps have been accused of being parsimonious in my praise of positive things that the government in this province has done, but I've got to tell you that this is something I'm very happy to support. I'd like to make it even a little stronger. The Minister of Community Development, you know, the man responsible for the Human Rights Commission, I'll bet he's probably a little offended by that section 2 as well and the fact that this discretion is given to a minister without any criteria set out there. Maybe the Minister of Community Development will work with me. The Minister of Justice understands the problem with having unfettered discretion. Maybe we can develop a small cross-party caucus here to work at fixing the problem in section 2. If we could do that, we could take a bill that's darn good and make it closer to being perfect.

So section 2 has got two problems with it. The first one is that repatriation has to be appropriate in the minister's opinion, whatever the heck that means, and then it also has to be "in accordance with the regulations." Now, what that suggests is that even if the regulations are satisfied, the minister has some discretion over and above that. I don't think that's what was intended. When we had all of the aboriginal leaders in here, if you said to those men and women that we're going to do this repatriation but only if it meets the regulations, we have no idea of what's going to be in regulations, and over and above that it has to be the thing consented to by the minister – in other words, in the minister's opinion it's got to be appropriate – I think some people would say, well, that sounds a little paternalistic. That sounds like the whole thing we're trying to get away from with a bill like Bill 2, and, you know, we don't need to go back to all the things that Harold Cardinal has written about so powerfully and persuasively in Alberta. I think the First Nations people deserve to know what the rules are going to be, and if there's going to be a refusal by a minister and some discretionary power exercised, I think they're entitled, like all Albertans are entitled, to know what the criteria are going to be.

So, Madam Speaker, it's a very good bill, it's a bill I support, but I just serve notice on the Associate Minister of Aboriginal Affairs that I think we have to deal with that discretion thing. Either we take it out altogether and just leave it at regulations, or we say that discretion can only be exercised on the basis of four or five criteria, A, B, C, D, whatever, and then we just have a much stronger bill.

I look forward to further debate on the bill, but those are the observations I wanted to register at this time. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

MS KRYCZKA: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I, too, endorse Bill 2, the First Nations Sacred Ceremonial Objects Repatriation Act. Speaking mostly in my capacity as chair of the Seniors Advisory Council, I would echo the Premier and many others in noting the significance that elders hold for First Nations society. During my review as chair of the First Nation court proposal submitted by the Tsuu T'ina First Nation and noting that the report has been accepted and is being implemented by this government, I came to appreciate from firsthand experience the respect paid toward their elders. I think very important was the role of the elders, for instance, in the community-based peacekeeper component and the pride with which I saw them complying to carry out and develop this component with the expectation that this report would be accepted.

Elders, who may be seniors, definitely possess the wisdom, experience, and leadership that is so important to their people in many ways. For instance, the cultural and spiritual heritage of our indigenous peoples should be valued by all of us as citizens of this great country. We encourage and allow all immigrant groups to Canada to remember and practise the beliefs of their country of origin, and the same respect and appreciation for indigenous, or First Nations, cultures should also be given.

Also, I feel that we cannot undermine the significance of our roots and the importance of preservation and possession of traditional objects which are vital to the essence of indigenous cultures and which are necessary in supporting traditional values and building strong, confident First Nations communities. That is whether the cultural objects are presently housed in a museum or whether they have been identified within an archeological site.

[The Speaker in the chair]

The right of ownership of objects which signify tradition is the crux of the matter in this bill, Mr. Speaker. Ownership will enable elders and all members of the First Nation community to learn more about their roots and be able to stand taller with pride in that knowledge.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this legislation will enhance the ability of elders in the First Nations communities, as I've said, to pass along to new generations the legacy of aboriginal traditions and very much deserves our support.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

4:30

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-North Hill.

MR. MAGNUS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today as well to offer my support for Bill 2, the First Nations Sacred Ceremonial Objects Repatriation Act. You know, it occurs to me that in my time in this Legislature one of the things I've been doing is trying to bring forward the concerns that we as Albertans and as Canadians have with some of our history, some of our traditions, and just the way that we look at certain things. As examples, thanks to your office we now have hanging in this Chamber the flags of all the provinces and the various territories of this country, and I believe we're the first Chamber in the country to in fact do that. We have recently begun to sing the song O Canada on Mondays or on the first day of session in this Legislature, and I'm aware that the federal government in fact does it on Mondays, once a week, in their Legislature.

I guess the point I'm trying to make, Mr. Speaker, is that while we consider our history and our symbols very, very important, I don't think the First Nations peoples would be any different. In point of fact, just the nature of the title of this bill, where it talks about the First Nations Sacred Ceremonial Objects Repatriation Act, to the First Nations people gives even more importance to these objects than in fact our customs and history. I shouldn't say more importance, but at least the same level of importance as our history has to us.

So with that in mind, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the government has a strong commitment to supporting the First Nations communities and their long-standing traditional values on this. I think all sides of the Legislature at this point in time would agree with that. The only bone of contention that I would have today is listening to the Member for Calgary-Buffalo talking about the regulations. When I read clause 5 within the bill, on regulations, it's very straightforward. It talks about "respecting the process and procedures." It talks about "respecting who is to represent a First Nation for any purpose relating to the repatriation" of these objects. It talks about "respecting the consultations with a First Nation that must be completed for the purpose of section 2(3)."

Well, 2(3), Mr. Speaker, simply says that "repatriation may occur . . . only after consultations"; in other words, with agreement. I really don't have a problem with this. I think it shows a great deal of respect from both sides of the argument; as an example, the Glenbow Museum, which I understand is more than happy to give up these objects at this stage of the game to their rightful owners and to the people that it means the most to. When I look at the regulations, they certainly show that same kind of respect, and I'm hoping for co-operation down the road to ensure that all this happens.

Thank you very much for your time, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to make a couple of points. As has been indicated, we're going to support fast passage, or quick passage, of the bill because we believe it's the right thing to do, but I think there are a couple of questions. On one I have to admit to some ignorance. I'm not quite sure how the Crown obtained title to a lot of the artifacts that are referred to in the bill. I have experience with a few. If they were acquired in a manner where they were items that were just taken by collectors and then donated to museums or were objects that were actively sought by museums in native communities and then incorporated into museum collections, I think somehow or other that title, that ownership should be made explicit.

I think the bill is a part of the evolution along the way to a huge change in perspective vis-a-vis other people and other cultures. I look back, for instance, at the treatment of aboriginals in the textbooks that have been used in this province for the last 50 years, where aboriginals and other cultures were really treated as museum pieces. If you look at the treatment of the Japanese, if you look at the treatment of the Inuit, if you look at the treatment of people from other lands – in fact, some of the books used to be entitled: children in other lands. They were presented as if they were museum pieces, and most of us, I would suspect, can remember having outlines of Dutch wooden shoes and natives in traditional garb being given to us for colouring or for pasting into social studies books. But there's been a huge shift in perspective away from the kind of paternalistic Eurocentric view of the world that was embodied in those textbooks and that reflected what I think the general view of those people was in society, and this is all to the good, of course.

I, too, looked at the bill and questioned not the regulations but section 2(2). I think that if I were in the native community, it's the section of the bill that I might like the Legislature to revisit and maybe amend, because section 2(2) says, "The Minister must agree to the repatriation of a sacred ceremonial object unless, in the Minister's opinion, repatriation would not be appropriate." So we still have that power residing in the Crown to decide whether or not it's appropriate for an object to be repatriated, and I wondered if that's the spirit of this legislation. I would be interested, before the bill passes out of committee and is finally passed, if someone from the government side would comment on that particular provision, because it does seem to be a throwback to the notion that somehow or other we are letting the native community, the aboriginal community, have objects, but we will be the ones that will make the determination under which conditions they can have their own possessions.

With those comments, I look forward to some clarification from the government side. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Community Development.

MR. WOLOSHYN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to make a few supporting comments, obviously, with respect to Bill 2, the First Nations Sacred Ceremonial Objects Repatriation Act, as this particular area falls under the responsibility of my ministry. I'd like to point out a couple of things that happened, as the Premier pointed out, during a signing ceremony for the Blackfoot agreement, which becomes verified within this bill, back on January 14 of this year.

The museums work very hard to preserve these sacred ceremonial objects over time so that today, when the time is right, we can move forward in a positive, improving relationship with our First Nations peoples. Museums like the Provincial Museum and indeed the Glenbow help us to teach about the proud history and the traditions of the aboriginal peoples, all aboriginal peoples, and we must look at this repatriation in this overall context. In fact, I was very pleased to learn from the hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake that she was able to join eight elders from treaties 6, 7, and 8 to take part in a pipe ceremony blessing this legislative initiative before first reading. But the important thing is that while this historic ceremony went on inside the learning circle of the Syncrude Gallery of Aboriginal Culture at the Provincial Museum, schoolchildren watched and visited surrounding exhibits. What better way to bring a melding of the two cultures and an understanding.

Working in partnership with First Nations communities, museums need real and historical artifacts to do just this kind of work, yet this government and this minister also believe that museums should not extend their role to the point of holding sacred ceremonial objects vitally important to the practice of First Nations ceremonial life.

As Minister of Community Development I was interested to learn about a story that goes back a few years, from the making of the Syncrude Gallery of Aboriginal Culture at the Provincial Museum. In a planning meeting for the gallery one member of the aboriginal advisory committee observed that perhaps the elders of a few decades ago had shown great foresight by putting sacred ceremonial objects in museums. He didn't mean this simply in the sense that it would preserve these objects. He meant this in the sense that the elders had created an enduring relationship between aboriginal peoples and museums. I think this in fact is the case and that we've gone one step further, to where we're going to be working to bring them back. Not many people know how far some of those efforts went. In fact, in what is perhaps the only such example in North America some medicine pipes and bundles were transferred to the Provincial Museum in accordance with Blackfoot ceremonial traditions.

Regardless how sacred ceremonial objects came into museums, though, they left communities at a difficult and trying time for First Nations peoples. Today, as First Nations regain their vitality in so many ways, we can honour the elders of an earlier generation and make that story come full circle. The First Nations Sacred Ceremonial Objects Repatriation Act will bridge the gap between the educational and preservation roles of museums and what First Nations communities need today. With this act we can all work together to protect sacred ceremonial objects for generations to come, and we can ensure that they continue to play their role in the living traditions of First Nations people.

Some of the speakers went on, Mr. Speaker, about regulations and so on. I might point out that we hope to keep regulations minimal, and they will be created in consultation with the First Nations people to whom they apply. The whole key to this repatriation is that we currently have these articles in our trust and will return them upon request of the appropriate representatives from the First Nations peoples.

There is also a desire to table schedules. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, other than the Blackfoot agreement, which has some 251 objects identified – we will table that schedule in the House; that's not a problem – we don't have them identified because they haven't been properly identified. That will take time, and that's where the consultation with the First Nations people is extremely important.

I would say that this is a bill that's entered into in good faith. I'm very pleased to see that there is support from both sides of the House for this particular bill, and I look forward to seeing us go ahead with the passing of it. As we go on with this bill, it will go a long way to meld an even stronger positive relationship between the First Nations people of Alberta, the people in general, and indeed the museums with whom they work so closely.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a real honour this afternoon to stand and address the issues of Bill 2, the First Nations Sacred Ceremonial Objects Repatriation Act. I spent quite a number of years when I was at the University of Lethbridge working with the First Nation communities of western Canada and in fact all of Canada. We developed a number of curriculum- and issue-directed learning materials for the First Nation communities in co-operation with the First Nation communities. One of the things that came up in a number of discussions we were having over the development of tourism alternatives and tourism options for some of the First Nation communities was that very awareness, that a lot of the really important parts of their community, the sacred objects of their community, were not in their possession and not under their control. This act will now go a long way to addressing those issues.

I know that some of the materials, because of the practice that the First Nation community has, may not end up being on public display in the same way that they were in a public museum. Still, they'll be now returned to the First Nation community to deal with as is appropriate for the object they're dealing with. For some of them this will now mean that potentially they may not be as publicly available for the rest of us Canadians, but it's important in the end that these objects, which mean so much to these communities, be used, be handled, be exhibited, if necessary or if appropriate, under the guidance and under the wishes of those First Nation communities.

Mr. Speaker, there's only one comment I'd like to make with respect to the process. That is that in discussions with many of those First Nation communities we would talk about how the objects came into the possession of the nonnative community as we were dealing with them. In a lot of cases families or elders transferred those materials or those bundles to a member of the Canadian community through a process of trying to achieve a means of supporting themselves. In other words, they were sold because it was necessary for the well-being of the individual's family a lot of times.

Now, what I would like to suggest, as these items are repatriated by the First Nation community, is that we as the Alberta holders of those objects look in some way at recognizing the family or clan from which those objects originally came. What in effect is happening now is that an object that was under the control of an individual family or a clan may now be transferred to the control specifically of the band, the tribe, or the nation, and if some mechanism is not there to recognize the history of it, I hope that that is taken into consideration.

It's also important to note the precedent that gets set with this kind of action. I think it goes a long ways now to increasing the ability that we as Canadians and non First Nation members have of understanding the significance that these items mean to them. These are the same kinds of things that we value in our culture and in our processes, like our Mace here, the things we do, the objects we have in our churches. This provides almost a sense of coming home to the First Nations community.

So, Mr. Speaker, just with those few comments I would like to congratulate the staff and members of our museum community and members of the government but most of all the members of the First Nation communities for taking the initiative to open negotiations and in effect get back in their community the items that belong to them.

Thank you very much.

[Motion carried; Bill 2 read a second time]

Bill 1

Alberta Heritage Foundation for Science and Engineering Research Act

[Adjourned debate February 23: Dr. Massey]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose.

MR. JOHNSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to be able to add my endorsement and support to Bill 1 today. This is a bill that clearly sets Alberta apart. It stakes a claim for our province, and it makes a definitive statement about where we are headed.

Bill 1 is something that represents a major step forward for Alberta in our efforts to become a major force in the new knowledge-based economy and a recognized global leader in science, research, and technology. This bill reflects Albertans' pioneering spirit. I believe it was best summed up a few weeks ago as the Lieutenant Governor was reflecting on the very nature of Albertans, when she stated:

Albertans are confident, confident in their province, in their ability to succeed, and in the strength of their province. Albertans are entrepreneurial people who believe that citizens should have the freedom to pursue their goals. They also value innovation and are not afraid to take risks or try new ideas if the goal of these actions is worth while.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 1 is about innovation and confidence in our abilities now and in the future. The legacy which Bill 1 creates is one more way we are going to show that we are pioneers and to truly open new worlds of opportunity for our children and our grandchildren. The bill we have before us creates the new Alberta heritage foundation for science and engineering research, a $500 million endowment, which is a substantial investment – and I stress investment – in the prosperous future of our province. If provincial finances permit, an additional $100 million will be added to the fund each year for the next five years, meaning the endowment fund could possibly be worth $1 billion by the province's centennial of 2005. There's no doubt this permanent endowment creates a legacy for our children and grandchildren, as it will enable Albertans to launch a whole new age of innovation.

The Premier and his government recognize that innovation will be the key to prosperity in the 21st century. This endowment will help us attract investment, recruit top researchers from around the world, and give our young people at universities and colleges the chance to train with some of the best minds in science using the latest technologies. Every industry in this province will benefit from this endowment: from farming, which is so important in my constituency, to forestry, to energy, to information and communications technology, to the environment, to biotechnology, and of course health.

No other province has a fund quite like this. This endowment is an investment in Alberta's strong science and engineering base in our postsecondary institutions throughout our province and in the industrial sector. It is also a vital part of the province's strategy and commitment to build the province's emerging knowledge-based economy. It builds on the recommendations of the Alberta Science and Research Authority to grow the knowledge-based economy from 7 percent to 25 percent of our GDP and to grow the research and development currently occurring in Alberta to $3 billion by the year 2010. The recommendations of the 1998 Growth Summit and the 1999 Roundtable on University Research both recognize the need and call for the creation of an endowment for science and engineering.

Through minisummits in my own constituency of Wetaskiwin-Camrose the need for research initiatives was frequently mentioned and encouraged. Many in my constituency concluded that stable, long-term funding for research and development is critical to long-term sustainable prosperity in the new century. Bill 1 is this government's response to that call.

This endowment fund will be modeled after the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Medical Research, that was established in the year 1980. The government originally invested $300 million in that endowment fund, which is estimated to be worth over $1 billion today and has been an outstanding success and has made us a world-recognized leader in the field of medical research. In the year 2000 the fund will generate over $39.5 million in direct funding for medical research here in our province. Experience with the medical research fund shows that every fund dollar invested can be expected to attract another $2 to $3 from other sources.

That's great news, Mr. Speaker, as I have every belief that the new science and engineering fund will be used to lever even more research and development dollars from the federal government and, of course, from the private sector. That kind of leverage of external dollars is a significant vote of confidence in the value of research.

Speaking of confidence, I'd like to share some comments from some well-known individuals in international circles. As you know, last November the Premier announced the appointment of the External Advisory Council on Information and Communications Technology. It consists of some very respected people in the world of research and technology, all ex-Albertans and alumni of the University of Alberta and the University of Calgary. Two of them, Dr. James Gosling, the inventor of Java, and Dr. Richard Taylor, a Nobel laureate in physics from Stanford University, have made some interesting comments. I quote first of all from Dr. Taylor. He states:

Over the last 50 years, many new and profitable industries have grown up near universities where such excellence in the quest for new knowledge is common. I applaud the efforts of the Government of Alberta for this and other recent initiatives designed to move the province ahead in this technological world.

To quote Dr. Gosling, he says:

This is amazing. Much of the current prosperity in the United States can be traced back to visionary long term funding of research in the 70s and 80s that led to modern booms in materials, computers and the internet. In a similar way, by creating this new fund, the Government of Alberta is sowing the seeds of future discoveries that, based in Alberta, will bring prosperity for years to come. Bottom line – the creation of the Science and Engineering Fund by the Government of Alberta is a wonderful thing. Its encouragement of the development and commercialization of new technologies will add a new dimension to Alberta's economy. In the years to come it will leave a legacy of prosperity that will benefit all Albertans.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, this endowment will benefit all Albertans. These quotes illustrate the response that is coming from the international community, and I believe Albertans are expressing their full support as well.

Again I want to thank the Premier, the Minister of Innovation and Science, and all my colleagues for their support and vision in bringing this bill forward. This is a proud day for all Albertans, and I encourage every member of this Assembly to proudly support second reading of Bill 1.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's amazing that a government that could bring in Bill 11 could also bring in Bill 1. In Bill 1 we have an example of a government doing the right thing, and unfortunately I can't say that about Bill 11. I'd also say that with Bill 1 we have an example of truth in advertising. It's called the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Science and Engineering Research Act, and of course when you read the bill, what you find is that it will establish this foundation with an endowment of half a billion dollars and it will carry on some good works. Again if you contrast that with Bill 11, it's called the Health Care Protection Act, which is of course exactly the opposite of what Bill 11 really is.

Mr. Speaker, what I will say about Bill 1 is that when I heard the minister speaking to the press and when I heard the Premier introducing the legislation in this Assembly, I was reminded of other debates that we've had in the Chamber, including of course the science, research, and information technology budget estimates debate from February of 1998.

I think that if members go back and review the Hansard of those debates, they'll find an interesting dialogue that in part took place in an exchange between myself and the minister. Part of that dialogue had to do with this notion of the creation of a maximum wage economy as opposed to focusing on a minimum wage economy. I was flattered because after making those comments about the maximum wage economy, the minister pulled me aside. He said: you know, that's a really good line; I'm going to use it and I'm going to use it without attribution, so I hope you don't mind. But whenever you hear me talking from now on about how science and technology is going to be the leverage that Albertans will use to catapult themselves into the future and the creation of this maximum wage economy, he said, you can smile a little smile to yourself.

So, of course, Mr. Speaker, I have, and I've been watching the minister to see whether or not he's been pursuing that agenda, and I have to congratulate him, because there are some bold initiatives that are coming out of that minister's shop, including this target of increasing the role of science and technology in Alberta's economy. At present somewhere between 6 and 8 percent of our provincial GDP comes about as a direct result of science and information. The government's stated goal is to raise that to fully 25 percent. One dollar in every four that is created in this province will come out of that sector. I'd like to work in my capacity to help assist that goal to the best of my ability, and I think supporting Bill 1 is at least one positive step that I can take in that regard.

Mr. Speaker, the role of science and technology and engineering can't be overstated. For so very long in this province wealth has often been quantified as something that has happened as a result of either something that we've extracted from the land or something that we grow on top of it. Wealth has been seen as something that comes to us because of our natural resources. What has really played second fiddle to that is a conception of wealth creation as something that comes about as a result of our people, something that happens because of some neural activity between the ears, or something that has happened because we recognize that funding things like university research is an investment in the truest sense.

So to see the government as part of its policy move towards creating this endowment that's in part modeled after the very, very successful Alberta Heritage Foundation for Medical Research shows me that this government, in spite of some evidence to the contrary, can from time to time wander across a really good idea and implement it in a way that I think all Albertans can be proud of. Now, of course, the example of the medical foundation is a good one, because it talks about peer review and being international in focus and status and really being cutting edge, and I know that we can count on exactly the same kind of orientation for this new foundation.

Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of concerns about this foundation. First of all, it concerns me that the government may be looking at the creation of this foundation as something that they can point to and say: see, we're serious about supporting science and research. They may look at this foundation and say: look, here's an example; we've done what we can do in terms of supporting basic research. And that would be a shame. I mean, I hope that this foundation doesn't become in any way any kind of a political touchstone, other than to give credit to the government where credit is due.

The creation of this foundation does not address the tuition crisis that's affecting Alberta's postsecondary institutions. Just here in Edmonton this last week the University of Alberta had to raise tuition over 6 percent. Students are graduating with degrees from university with debts equivalent to a mortgage, Mr. Speaker. I don't think the government can be proud of its track record in addressing tuition pressures.

So I would say as a challenge to the government: you've done the right thing when you've made money available for science and research through this foundation and attracting world-class researchers, but let's remember that we want to attract these men and women to facilities that we can be equally proud of, to postsecondary institutions where the library resources and the laboratory resources are second to none, not second class. We want to make sure that when these scientists from all over the world come to Alberta to further innovate and to refine their science, they will be attracted to universities, for example, that will be competitive in their salary structures and able to retain these scholars beyond simply the terms of their foundation-funded research.

Mr. Speaker, the government is also challenged by its policies of the past; you know, when Alberta advanced education institutions were hit with those 20 percent across-the-board cuts. We see that we still haven't recovered, and there are lots of ways that you can measure that. We can look at library collections and periodical subscriptions, and we can look at retention of tenured faculty. We can look at innovations and patents and see that we have lost some ground. So while I'm very, very positive and want to be sincerely congratulatory to the government when it comes to the creation of the foundation, I do issue these challenges and these cautions to the government to please be as farsighted with the overall support of advanced education as they have demonstrated they can be with the creation of this foundation.

Mr. Speaker, I have another suggestion for the government when it comes to the foundation, and that is that I hope the minister will make sure that he does everything in his power to see to it that this foundation supports primary research first and foremost, that we don't look at this simply as another vault full of money that can be used to commercialize existing research or that can somehow be used as backdoor venture capital. Not that venture capital isn't an important issue that needs to be addressed, but frankly, I think it's more of an issue for the Provincial Treasurer than it is for the Minister of Innovation and Science.

Some strategic changes to tax policy, some leveraging of government activities when it comes to managing government-controlled investment funds I think would go a long way towards making more venture capital available to Alberta-based companies and scientists. So I'm not diminishing the need for venture capital. I'm just saying that that should not be the use of this foundation.

I'm also hoping, of course, that when this government looks at that continuum of science from the idea finally through to application of the outcome of research, they make sure there is a weighting towards the discovery of new knowledge here in Alberta and then leave it to the private sector, because I believe it's really the private sector's role to figure out ways to commercially exploit this new knowledge. We have to get back to a position where we value learning for learning's sake, Mr. Speaker. We have to get back to a position where we understand that the value of knowledge is really in its discovery, and the wonder of knowledge is then in its sharing. The public good, of course, is best served when the government puts public money in at that very front end, at that primary level, and then creates policies that make it attractive for private capital to come into this process when it comes to, as I say, the application.

Mr. Speaker, there are a couple of other comments that I'll share at this point in second reading. In reading the legislation, I was pleased to see that there's going to be a board selected. In fact, just today in the mail I received correspondence, as I believe all members may have received correspondence inviting them to submit names of potential board members. I'm hoping that, of course, this board selection and appointment process will be arm's length, that the government won't taint this foundation at the get-go by hand-picking individuals who may be friendly to the government.

The one thing that we know, Mr. Speaker, is that science in its truest form, of course, is apolitical, and there are many, many examples in history of when government tries to control, corral, and direct science for political purposes, and I think the dangers are well known to most members. So I'm hoping that the appointment process will stay arm's length. I'm hoping that it won't be seen as a political process, and I'm hoping that the government will see this as an opportunity to engage all Albertans in something that's very exciting and not simply those Albertans who may define themselves first and foremost by the party membership card they carry in their hip pocket.

Mr. Speaker, a couple of other concerns about the board. The number of people on the board may or may not be an appropriate number, and I think that there's a series of opinions that could be offered on that. The issue is not necessarily with the absolute number but in the complement of individuals that fill out those numbers. I note that agrologists and engineers are the only two named scientific groups that will be appointed. Well, I have nothing against agrologists or engineers, but you know, we have IT professionals and we have a number of other scientists who could be appointed. Perhaps in Alberta, considering our close history with natural resources, we would want to look at somebody with an environmental specialty being on the board. While I understand that that could also be an engineer, my reading of the legislation is that the engineer that will be selected on the board will be a member of the engineering profession that will be selected by the government, not by the profession. So maybe we'll have a chance, when we come to committee, to take a look at specifying some other individuals representing other specialties who may be named to be on the board.

I'm going to now argue the other side of the coin as well, Mr. Speaker, because not only would I be looking for some other specialties being named to be on the board, but I take a look at the section that allows for up to six other men or women to be appointed to the board. I question: why isn't it specified that some of those six be members of the general public, be Albertans from any other walk of life perhaps than from a scientific walk of life, be a constituent of mine or yours who has an abiding interest in the future of this province and a willingness to contribute but who doesn't have a particular specialty? I think that perspective would be very valuable. I think a member or two of the lay public on this board would be exceedingly valuable. I always marvel at the sage advice that my constituents provide me in my day-to-day work. I know that whether or not they have a specialty or a specialized knowledge in the area that we may be chatting about, they have a clarity of vision about what it is that concerns them on the issue, and I think we can see that same clarity brought to bear when it comes to this newly formed foundation. I mean, after all, no matter how you cut it, this foundation is going to be backstopped with 500 million taxpayers' dollars. So why not have a couple of ordinary taxpayers sitting around the table when investment decisions are being made? I use the term investment decisions quite on purpose, because, first of all, there'll be the management of the endowment, and then there'll be the investment of the income from that endowment when it comes to making decisions on what projects or initiatives are funded and which ones are not.

Mr. Speaker, a couple of other general comments about the fund. While I note that the fund is going to be a new feature, I hope that there will be some formal relationship with the board and the activities of the foundation for medical research. Sometimes it's not a broad, well-defined line but a rather narrow and fuzzy line between what might be considered basic science research and what might be considered life signs or health research. So I think those two foundations are going to have to work together, and I would like to see some thinking going into how those relationships are going to be defined.

In addition, I would like to see a document perhaps coming out of the minister's department which will clearly outline the role and relationship of all of the players in Alberta's research and scientific community. We have private-sector research. We have public-sector research right now going on in many places. We have hospital-based research. We have the AHFMR program, and of course we have all of Alberta's postsecondary institutions. So I think that array of research-focused organizations demands that there be something on paper that talks about how they're going to work together, what their relationships will be, and how conflicts, if any should arise, will be resolved.

An additional point that I'd like to make is on the role of the Alberta Research Council. Of course, the Alberta Research Council has its own board, and it's going through its own transitions and has much more of a business orientation today than it had certainly just a year ago or a year before that.

While I'm, generally speaking, a fan of the Alberta Research Council, particularly in terms of its heritage in this province, I must say that I'm increasingly hearing voices raising concerns about the current and future role of the Alberta Research Council.

I've had comments from scientists in this province that tell me that the Research Council is somehow getting altogether too much attention to the detriment of other research-led organizations. I'm also hearing, Mr. Speaker, that there are scientists who are also businessmen and businesswomen in this province who believe that the Alberta Research Council stands as a competitor to them in both what they do in terms of research and also in terms of what they do when they are trying to add value to that research, when they go to commercialize what it is they've discovered at the laboratory bench.

So while we're creating this new player, this new foundation, I would hate to see this new foundation just sort of get thrown into the mix without some more clarity and some refining of the role of what already does exist. I've had an opportunity to speak with some of the men and women involved with ARC. I know they're aware of the concerns, and I know they're sensitive to them. I know they want to alleviate the concerns, but they also want a chance to make their case and make it crystal clear what it is they're up to and what it is they're trying to accomplish with their particular orientation in their business plan.

I in no way would purport to speak for the ARC, but I know that they are people of good intent and goodwill, and I want to make sure that they have the opportunity to make expressly clear what it is they're up to. I also know that they will listen to these voices of concern, and to the extent possible they will correct their way.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Egmont.

MR. HERARD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure indeed to stand and speak to Bill 1, the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Science and Engineering Research Act. I can say that I've had more calls about this act than I have had on the health protection act, which is kind of interesting. The constituents of Calgary-Egmont believe, as does their government, that the future of Alberta will depend on the ability to innovate and improve on approaches to business, education, health care, and just about every other area that affects our daily lives. We must be alert to changes in the global economy and be quick to ensure that Alberta becomes and remains competitive within all of its changing and emerging industries. We must ensure that Alberta remains the best place in Canada, indeed in the world to do business and call home.

Now, remember that in the throne speech Albertans have always been confident, innovative, self-reliant, and entrepreneurial people. We've never been afraid of hard work or making changes to how we look at and interact with the world. I think it made it very clear that the world of new technology and the knowledge industry are part of the new economy and will receive the attention that this sector deserves. Albertans are leaders, Mr. Speaker, a fact which is both celebrated and relied upon in our bold new plans for the future of this province.

There's also been a report issued on the implementation of a new economic strategy for our province. Part of this strategy involves Alberta's maturation into a global leader in information and communications technology and in conducting leading-edge research. We have heard for many years about the brain drain that is happening across Canada, despite the denial of our federal government, a brain drain with a postal code and an address somewhere in the United States. Here in Alberta we're now well on our way to a brain gain strategy by taking steps to ensure that Alberta is competitive and attractive to both businesses and professionals

One of the most important strategies contained this year is the creation of the Alberta heritage foundation for science and engineering research. Here, Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague for Cypress-Medicine Hat, the minister responsible for making this foundation a reality for Alberta. This action will surely be recognized by future Albertans as the initiative that put Alberta on the R and D map of success for the 21st century.

Created with an initial investment of $500 million, this endowment fund recognizes the power and value of knowledge for Alberta's future. It will attract investors, researchers, and graduate students to our universities. It will give Alberta students the ability to tap into some of the finest minds in the world and to be mentored by those specialists. It will assist in the expansion of Alberta's knowledge-based economic sector. It will assist in halting the brain drain and turning it into a brain gain for our province. Not only will we encourage more bright and talented Albertans to stay, but we'll also encourage talents from across the globe to come to our province as well.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the time I think I would move that we adjourn debate.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay. We'll proceed with the Provincial Treasurer and the department of Treasury. I just might mention something that one might consider. I did have the opportunity the other night to chair a meeting in 512, and it was the Minister of Economic Development. The way we worked it – and it worked very well; I think everyone would agree – the members that wished to ask questions took their time and the minister actually answered their questions within the 20 minutes and then they started again. It worked very, very well, and I thought a lot of the questions were answered. Those who were in attendance at that meeting, did you think it worked well? It's just an idea.

With that I will call upon the hon. Provincial Treasurer to lead off the debate.

MR. DAY: Thanks, Madam Chairman, especially for those who have packed the galleries tonight.

MR. MAR: The seat is jammed.

MR. DAY: My colleague the Minister of Environment said, "The seat is jammed" . . . with four people.

I would just like to advise members, though I don't think they need the advisement, that of course the estimates of the department are like the estimates done with every department. This is not a presentation of the entire government business plan. This is the estimates and the involvement of the Treasury Department. Its scope of activities is wide, covering everything from the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Medical Research endowment fund; the Alberta heritage savings trust fund investment practices and protocols; the Alberta heritage scholarship fund; the Alberta risk management fund; issues to do with the Alberta Insurance Council; the Alberta Municipal Financing Corporation; the Alberta Pensions Administration Corporation; the Alberta Securities Commission; the Alberta Government Telephones Commission; the Alberta Treasury Branches, albeit arm's length from government; the Credit Union Deposit Guarantee Corporation; and on it goes.

The breadth is considerable, Madam Chairman, and the responsibility also that Treasury officials play in working with every department of the government in terms of helping them to monitor and account for the revenues and the expenditures; then the reporting that is involved with Treasury Board in terms of the ongoing workings of government on a month-to-month basis, day-to-day basis at times; the involvement in putting together the quarterly reports, which is really like minibudget preparation, every 90 days and is a vital part of the ongoing operation and reporting of the overall government business plan.

The ministry itself expects to bring in an increase in revenue overall this year of about $674 million over the '99-2000 budget, yet program expenses continue to decline, with decreases of $36 million, or about 5.3 percent, for the '99-2000 budget and down $17 million, or 2.5 percent, from the forecast. Debt-servicing costs are down by $109 million, 10.1 percent, for the '99-2000 budget and $59 million from the forecast.

Ministry capital investment is also decreasing by about 21.4 percent. So there's the ongoing maintenance and overview and the work that goes on with all the departments in terms of maintaining the government business plan and doing that in a way that I believe continues to be seen as fiscally responsible.

I can say that I don't mind at all just reflecting a sentence or two on those who at times probably feel like it's a sentence working in the department, with the demands that are put on the many employees in the department of Treasury, the reflection from outside. It's all fine and well to talk amongst yourselves about how well you think you're doing or performing, but the toughest criticism come from those outside, and I consistently and continually get reports from those outside of government who for whatever reason deal with the Treasury Department who report on their high level of commitment, of professionalism, of dedication, and excellence. I also hear that from other provinces when we work on, for instance, finance ministers' meetings with other provinces and with the federal government, and I'd just like to acknowledge that publicly.

Many of the officials that I work with in the department, it is as if they don't own clocks or watches. They work early in the morning and late at night. Whatever the task is that needs to be done gets accomplished and always with that high degree of excellence. I publicly commend the employees, the public servants, in the Treasury Department for the high level of commitment to task in serving Albertans.

I could go on at some length, Madam Chairman, and I know members would want me to, but I want to give time for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and of course my own colleagues who have, I'm sure, many things to add to the overview and advice. It's an important time in the Assembly to hear from our critics and from those who would also constructively support and give us advice on how better even to manage the estimates in the year ahead of this department of Treasury and that which we have spent over the past year.

So with that I would yield the floor to the official critic and to others who may feel so moved, Madam Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thanks, Madam Chairman. Thanks to the Treasurer for being uncharacteristically brief. I appreciate that.

The department of Treasury does provide us with a rather interesting smorgasbord of issues in terms of the responsibilities of the Provincial Treasurer and the men and women who toil in his department. I'd like to echo some of the first remarks of the Treasurer regarding the service of the public servants in Treasury. I know that they are called above and beyond the call of duty to do work, and I can only imagine what it would be like working with this particular minister.

You know, Mr. Minister, I actually had a very pointed comment to make about the experience during the 1997 election campaign when Treasury officials were called upon to do some work that was political. Having said all these nice things, though, about the staff there, I won't make the comment in the pointed way that I had originally intended, but I will ask this. I remind the Treasurer that a commitment was made in writing, I believe, that there would be some investigation and follow-up on that suggestion or that allegation, and I don't think that any report has come forward.

I also note at the same time that the number of full-time equivalent positions in Treasury is slated to increase to over 740 positions. I think it's an increase of some 50 or 60 FTEs this year. As we get closer to an election, certainly closer to one than we are to the last one, you can imagine how the imagination of an opposition member would run wild about the increase in FTEs, given the experience in the '97 election. So I wouldn't mind if the Treasurer did comment, in fact, on that increase in person power in his department.

I have some particular questions regarding growth in the Alberta Securities Commission. I know that it's going to be about a 16 or 20 percent increase in personnel in the commission, and while I understand that a fair bit of this activity may be because of the increased economic activity in Alberta, the number of individuals and corporations who are relying on the commission to bring offerings to the table, et cetera, I have to say to the Treasurer – and I would appreciate his reflections on this.

Increasingly over this last year I've been hearing from members of the Alberta business community about the frustrations they have in working with the commission. One gentleman in my office just the other day referred to it as the Bre-X chill. What he meant by that was that ever since Bre-X, it seems to be very difficult to carry on the legitimate work of bringing a company public, and he was talking about increased levels of bureaucracy and red tape and costs and compliance issues.

I'm not going to for a moment suggest that we shouldn't be vigilant, and I'm not going to for a moment suggest that we have to do everything possible to make sure that scandals do not rock particularly this new exchange that we've got going here in western Canada and going at some great pace as well, something for us all to be proud of, but I do want to hear the Treasurer's comment on these concerns that have been raised, and I wonder aloud whether he's heard the same concerns and if he has some suggestions on what he may do through his department and through whatever influence he does have with the Securities Commission in terms of resolving the concerns of excess bureaucracy, red tape, compliance conditions, et cetera.

Now, I will note that as we've mentioned last year and the year before that, there is some information lacking in the Treasury business plans. Once again there's no information in the plans for 2001 through to 2003 for the gross operating expenses and capital investments by program vote and by subprogram vote. The last time this was provided was actually the 1995 budget, and I believe every year since then the critic for the Liberal opposition has asked the Treasurer to explain that change in presentation and transparency and the subprogram votes. We're faced again with the same issue.

Now, to assist the Treasurer in answering the question, let me say that one of the issues is that there's no comparability year to year when you don't have it broken out by subprogram vote. Also, if you don't have the estimates of the ministry with the consolidated income statement, you can't really hold the minister responsible for in-program spending variance.

Now, I will note that other ministries do provide a comparison of operating expense by program and subprogram over the three years of their business plan, and it occurs to me that Treasury really should be the trendsetter here. Let me say this. As often as I will criticize the government for what I see as failings in transparency, I will say that things have gotten better over the years and that I believe this Treasurer is sincere when he says he wants to be as open as possible. He and I may quibble about what the boundaries of "as possible" may be. While I will appreciate that efforts have been made, I will say that I would look to Treasury to set the example. If other departments can do these estimates, provide the comparisons by program and subprogram, I would expect Treasury could do the same.

In order to emphasize the government's commitment to three-year fiscal planning, it would certainly be advisable to present comparable three-year projections for Alberta Treasury in the main estimates and the three-year ministry income statement found under the business plan, as I say, as is the case in all other departments.

Now, in the Treasurer's comments to follow, I hope he'll explain why Alberta Treasury business plan still does not provide a three-year expense profile by program and subprogram. I'm also hoping the Treasurer will assist readers of the business plans and estimate books to compare gross operating expenses by program and subprogram within the ministry over a three-year time frame by providing a three-year spending profile of the department by program area for the years 2001 and 2002. Mr. Treasurer, what I mean by this is: operating expenses and capital investment, again, broken down by program and subprogram.

I'm also hoping the Treasurer will provide information on the plans for the full-time equivalents in the department of Treasury, the Alberta Pensions Administration Corporation, the Alberta Insurance Council, and the Securities Commission for the end of the planning cycle presented in his business plans.

Mr. Treasurer, I'm also hoping that you will be providing the Assembly with a breakdown of departmental expenses by object for 2000-2001 through to 2002-2003 in each of the following: salaries, wages, employee benefits, travel expenses, advertising, telephone and communications, contract services, and hosting.

Mr. Treasurer, under the general headings of communications and contract services, something that I've been puzzled with is: where exactly is the government going to be recording the expenses in this latest communications campaign regarding the private health legislation? I note, in looking at Executive Council, that PAB has an overall budget of around $8 million. Now, we don't need to get into the debate that took place in question period today of course, unless you want to, regarding the total expense for this communications campaign, but it's going to be a considerable chunk of change. It could be easily $3 million or more. I doubt that it's all coming out of PAB. I doubt that it's all coming out of Alberta Health and Wellness. Maybe you can tell me what direction Treasury has given departments in terms of accounting for this expense. My information is that it was not anticipated during the budget planning process. Therefore, it must be in-year spending that's going to be taken from someplace that it wasn't originally designed to meet.

Madam Chairman, one of the issues that the Treasurer and I have had some discussion on has got to do with the collection of fees, licences, and premiums. I do note that the government has made a start in rolling back some of these premiums and in fact has made a $60 million commitment in terms of the reduction of fees, and many of them are now in place. We still haven't seen the report that was done I believe under the chairmanship of the Member for St. Albert. We still don't have cost-of-service data for any of the fees, so we really don't know which of the premiums, fees, and licences exceeded cost of service and how cost of service was defined and whether the same definition was used across government. I'm hoping that the Treasurer will provide us with that information as well as a breakdown of all the premiums, fees, and licences for the planning cycle by type of premium, fee, and licence.

I'll note that within his own department the amount of revenue generated by premiums, fees, and licences ranges from about 26 and a half million dollars through the end of the planning period to just shy of $33 million. Again, that's a considerable amount of money. The Treasurer does talk about how the only way that taxes are going is down. I submit that many of these premiums, fees, and licences are things that in other jurisdictions are covered through people's tax contributions. Since this government tends to collect that revenue in the way of user fees instead, is this growth some evidence to the contrary of the Premier's assertion about taxes only going down, or is this based on increased business or population growth in the province? I'm certain that the Treasurer will answer that it is based on increased business and population growth and that in fact it's not an increase in the fees, but it does sort of look suspicious when you see an increase of some $6 million or $7 million over a three-year period on something that many would hold to be a regressive form of taxation.

Also, in the Treasurer's estimates he has other revenue listed for some 35 and a half million dollars. I'm wondering if he will provide us with a breakdown of exactly what that other revenue is by source and by amount. Most interesting to me would be some sense of history as well: is this up or down?

I would appreciate if the Treasurer will explain why program expenses under fiscal planning and accountability are increasing from just shy of $9 million in last year's budget to just shy of $11 million in the coming budget cycle. This is an increase of over 20 percent in three years. It seems to be a little out of keeping. In the ministry income statement, Mr. Treasurer, I reference you to page 281. You'll see that the program expenses under fiscal planning and accountability are slated there to increase over the planning cycle from $8.8 million to $10.614 million. Again we see that expenses under the tax and revenue collection line item are increasing by about 12 percent over three years. The same question. That's also in the income statement on page 281.

Furthermore, I would appreciate an explanation from the Treasurer as to why program expenses under investment management are increasing. This is a fairly dramatic increase, Mr. Treasurer. Unless I have the numbers wrong, it's about a 65 percent increase over three years. These are investment management expenses. Now, are some contracts up for renewal, or does it have to do with the dollar volume? How do we explain a two-thirds increase in that expense category over the three years?

Also, Mr. Treasurer, I'd appreciate an indication as to why program expenses under the government risk management and insurance line item are increasing from $6.7 million in '99-2000 to $7.8 million in 2002-2003. This is an increase of over a million dollars, or 15 percent, and I'm just wondering if you can shed some light on that projected increase.

Mr. Treasurer, I think I'm going to run out of time before I get through the majority of my questions. Maybe I'll have a chance to come back since this is committee.

I did want to ask you as well about the impact of the tax plan. I know you cautioned us in your opening comments that this is really about your department's estimates and that we shouldn't be dwelling on the overall fiscal plan of the government, but I would be interested to know where in your department you will be doing the analysis to determine whether or not you've met the feedback targets on your tax plan. How quickly will that information be prepared? Have you calculated the flow-through impact of the latest federal budget? Are you looking at perhaps making some changes mid-stream now because of some surprising moves by the federal government in terms of their tax relief? I guess I would probably be on safest ground, Madam Chairman, if I limited my comments about the tax plan to those general questions. Maybe we'll get a chance in some other forum to discuss the relative merits or problems with the flat-tax proposal.

Looking at vote 3.0.2, finance, I'll note that this is where the government manages all of its financial assets and liabilities, including arranging the financing for the province and monitoring loans and loan guarantees. I have a number of specific questions to do with this rather staggering list of existing loans and loan guarantees, but I want to start off by asking the Treasurer to explain the 5 percent increase in operating expenses for this unit within his ministry. I understand that it's going to be going up by nearly a half million dollars in the coming fiscal year. Is that where we're going to see some of the increase in the FTEs, and if so, what new positions are being created to provide what valuable work?

I'll also note that under finance, capital investment is planned at about $300,000 during the year. I'm wondering if the Treasurer will tell us what Albertans are going to receive in the way of assets for this $300,000 and also of course the information on FTEs, that I referred to earlier, across the whole ministry.

Will the Treasurer table the latest interim and annual financial statement analyses prepared by the loans and guarantees division under sections 5.2 and 5.3 of the loans and guarantees manual as it relates to the province's financial involvement in Ridley Grain, Centennial Food, Vencap Acquisition Corporation, and the Centre for Frontier Engineering Research Institute? These questions should be familiar to the Treasurer as I believe I asked for them last year as well.

Will the Treasurer provide a breakdown of the $22 million estimated liability for loan guarantees for 2000-2001 as contained on page 57 of Budget 2000? I would also like to know about the $42 million provision for doubtful loans, advances, and implemented guarantees as of the end of the fiscal year contained on page 56 of Budget 2000. Together we're looking at about $64 million, $65 million just in those two categories.

I would appreciate the Treasurer providing a breakdown of the $11 million forecast provision for loans, loan guarantees, and indemnities for 1999-2000 as contained on page 46 of Budget 2000. Along the same lines I would request that the Treasurer provide a breakdown of the $2 million provision for loans, loan guarantees, and indemnities for 2000-2001 through to the end of the planning cycle, as of March 2003. A $2 million provision is disclosed on page 46 of Budget 2000.

Hon. Treasurer, this is my opening round of questions. I hope that you'll have a chance to answer some during this debate this evening and will trust that those that you don't get to tonight, you'll provide written answers to in time that I can review them before we're called upon to vote your estimates in the Assembly.

Thank you very much.

THE CHAIRMAN: Do you wish them to continue, hon. Provincial Treasurer?

MR. DAY: Well, I'm always anxious to get as much input as possible from the members opposite, so I'll ask them the question: do you want me to respond after each speaker, or do you want me to cover what I can when you've depleted your speakers and then get the rest back to you in writing? I'll give you the choice on that.

MR. SAPERS: I'd certainly appreciate some preliminary responses now, Mr. Treasurer. It might save some questions from some of our colleagues during the course of the evening.

MR. DAY: Okay. Madam Chairman, I'll try and cover some of the ones I can immediately get to. The list as usual is a detailed list, which I appreciate, and I think I usually do a reasonable job of getting back on the details. On those details that we don't get back on, we like to hear about that.

There were some questions regarding the FTEs. I'm not sure where the 700 number came from that the member was using, but he is correct in saying that overall we report a full-time equivalent increase of 8.7 percent. That's 59 positions. The Alberta Pensions Administration will have an increase of 17 of those, and they're just in the business process right now of re-engineering. There's a whole process going on of a project and various special projects related to APA, the Alberta Pensions Administration. Of those 17, a certain number will be temporary in nature, so you will see them drop. Certainly it is indicated that there will be an increase of 17 there and a 16 FTE increase in the Alberta Securities Commission. Now, as you know, those are not direct employees, but we report on the consolidated picture in those areas which are under our responsibility, so it's included there.

That leaves, then, just 25 FTEs, and those are primarily going to the tax and revenue administration, to the audit and compliance areas. The economy, as you know, has expanded so incredibly over the last several years, with far more reporting going on, far more incorporations. As we have indicated, taxes are only going down in Alberta, and as I think the member knows, we have launched the business tax review to see how we can keep taxes going down even more. However, with a veritable explosion of corporate activity over the last several years we are hard-pressed to actually audit and monitor the compliance of taxes that are due, albeit at a lower rate. We're not sending out hoards of tax storm troopers, but just our ability to bring on new mainframe equipment and also to move in the area of audit and compliance has resulted in an increase of 25 FTEs on the tax administration side. The others, as I've indicated, are outside of the department.

The member asked if I'm hearing about the Bre-X chill effect, as he was saying. This is one of the constant challenges in terms of not just policy but a regulatory regime being established in any area: to monitor how policy is being followed. It's always a balance. How far do you go? Certainly after something that gets the sensational type of reporting that a Bre-X does – and there have been other incidents that will always happen as people either deliberately or accidentally fail to comply with regulations. The Securities Commission above all wants to maintain the integrity and the stability of what's going on in the province in terms of the investment community. I haven't myself been hearing to any degree of alarm concerns about it becoming burdensome or overregulatory.

I can think notably of one case several months ago where a certain company found themselves in that position and thought that was the case, and we made sure that there was follow-up done with the Securities Commission, an assessment done to see if indeed there wasn't some overzealousness on the part of the commission. But other than that one case – and I will check with department officials and also pass the concern on to the Securities Commission in terms of: are we being too exuberant, and is it having a chilling effect? I'll follow up on that.

If the member has cases like that, by all means feel free to alert us to them so we can also do some follow-up. On issues like this, however they vote in the province is not a factor. We want to make sure that they can be part of the Alberta advantage, so if you have situations like that, I would say to the member: let us know so that we can do the follow-up.

I want to get back on the specifics. There was mention of the capital investment and operating costs and the types of breakdown. I will try to provide what dollars there are. I'm not aware of other ministries reporting on some things that we aren't ourselves reporting on in Treasury, but I will do some follow-up again with senior officials on that and see if there's some detail that we can provide that would be valuable. I would ask the member then to let us know if he thinks we're avoiding some areas or if there are some specifics that we should be getting into. I'll do some work on that.

I believe that last year we did provide further breakdowns on things like salaries, benefits, telephone charges, and things like that. I think we did that last year, and we can comply if the member will tell us specifically: is that right across the entire department you're looking at? Is it the deputy's office, minister's office, across the department you're talking about? All right. We'll see if we can provide some details there. It may not be available.

Without igniting a debate, because I know we don't want to do that, we have no expenses at all going into communication related to something that the member referred to as private health care legislation. We don't have any such legislation before the House. So if there's something like that that he'd like us to report on, I'd be happy to know, but we have no private health care legislation before the House.

In terms of the fees and charges, yes, the report will be coming soon to a theatre near you. I don't know exactly what date. I will check with the member who's been chairing that and doing a good job of it. Yes, there will be a breakdown of costs. It's very detailed; some of it may be seen to be exciting reading. We'll have a breakdown there, and I hope it will meet the demands of our critics, and if not, we will do some more work to get more detail.

I just was able to jot down quickly a couple of the questions, if the member will give me a minute to find the pages that he was referring to. There was a question about increases in the investment management section, and I'm referring to the $19.3 million increase in 2000-2001 expenses over the 1999-2000 budget. That's primarily for increased transfers to the Alberta heritage foundation for science and engineering research of $11.6 million, the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Medical Research of $5.5 million, and Alberta Learning for heritage scholarships, $1 million. So that makes up that $19.3 million increase. That's reflecting those transfers.

Related to the tax situation, yes, we are tracking and we will begin to track what we will eventually – the reformed legislation that we're introducing has attracted a lot of interest both provincially and nationally. So we will certainly track revenue flows and revenue patterns, as will, I'm sure, the academic community and the business community. It'll be interesting to see what we can directly attribute to being a result of the income tax decrease.

The macrostudies certainly show that in other jurisdictions when taxes have gone down, there's been a corresponding invigorating of the economy. I know that the academics will argue whether that was because the taxes went down, but there is that amazing coincidence of activity. It happened with the follow-through on the 1961 tax reductions of John F. Kennedy in the United States. There's a comparable upswing in revenues from the Reagan tax reductions in 1981, 20 years later. We see it in different jurisdictions. Certainly the experience in Ireland seems to reflect this coincidence, and whether you're talking about Ontario or Alberta, there is a coincidence. We think the two events are directly related, but we will track that and obviously try to make our case, as will others.

Will we do some changes midstream as a result of the federal budget? There's no question that with the federal reductions – and I've given credit to the federal government, limited credit, for some of the reductions that they're doing. We won't get into the tax debate here, because I know the chair would rule us out of order. Yes, we are prepared to make adjustments. You may call it midterm.

There have been some reports recently that once the federal deductions fully flow through in their four-year plan that they're talking about – there's some question of: would our 11 percent plan then mean that people would pay less provincial taxes in four years than they would be in our present system? We respond to that by saying that we're not going to wait four years for the federal deductions to flow through in entirety. Our entire plan comes through next year.

Now, we will track it, and if in four years the federal government – we don't really think they're going to be there in four years, but if they still are and those projections flow through and if it can be shown that our 11 percent single rate and the exemption levels are not returning more to Albertans than the present plan that we have, then obviously we will be prepared to either lower the single rate from 11 percent or raise the basic exemptions or do a combination of both. We've said that the only way taxes are going is down, and we will maintain the integrity of the single rate system and make those adjustments should the next federal government maintain the four-year commitment to tax reductions.

I'll get to the member the breakdowns of the loan arrangements that I can related to Ridley and Vencap and Centennial and Frontier research. We'll try and make that available to him and also the details that we can on the $22 million of loan guarantees. I think it's exciting really to note when you do the comparisons on what was on the table and owing in 1993 in terms of loans and loan guarantees and then following the Klein commitment to get out of the business of being in business and bringing in the business limitation act, when you take the full list of what was there in 1993 and now look at what's there today, how greatly diminished that is. We're down to literally a handful of commitments, whereas before it was an arm and a legful, those of course being accounting terms which I know the member is familiar with. We'll get the full breakdown of that and show the very positive progress that's been made on those.

I'll listen now to more advice from across the way.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

MR. WICKMAN: Thank you, Madam Chairman. I want to make some general comments on the Treasury as the department of course relates to the budget, because we are talking budget. First of all, I have to compliment the Provincial Treasurer for standing up when he gave the budget. It appeared to me that he didn't have any notes. He didn't have the budget in front of him. He gave a 40-minute spiel from what must have been well instilled in his mind. You know, I think he deserves a compliment for that particular one.

I also want to take this opportunity to wish him well as he charts his course towards the chair of the federal Official Opposition. Some may compare it to a deckhand bailing ship when it starts springing some cracks, but I'll let Albertans make that judgment.

Getting on to the documentation we have in front of us, my first comment is to deal with the flat tax. Now, it's referred to as a flat tax, but in reality it is not a flat tax. A true flat tax is a flat tax that doesn't allow for exemptions and credits and such. This is what I call a single rate tax of 11 percent.

I analyzed the figures, and I had other people analyze them for me, and the federal minister, according to comments in the paper, appears to agree that the people that are going to feel the least benefit – maybe everybody will feel some benefit – are the middle class. Those that live below the poverty level will feel some benefit. No question about it. Those that are above the middle class, the really high-income earners are the ones that will really reap the rewards of the single rate tax.

Now, Madam Chairman, I'm really, really curious as to why the Treasurer is so gung ho on proceeding with this plan when it in fact is not going to really benefit those that have been asking for some consideration during the last few years. They're the ones that have been basically asked to pay the price. Like I say, they may feel some marginal benefit but not to the same degree as the high-income earners. Maybe it's to do with the brain drain, maybe to try to entice high-income Albertans to stay. Possibly the Treasurer will respond to that.

The employment tax credit. I've always had a bit of a problem with the way it's implemented. The concept of it is good, but it does overlook a segment of the population that is in a position where they cannot possibly benefit from the employment tax credit. That's because they're persons with disabilities to the degree that they're deemed to be unemployable. As much as they would like to get out there and work and benefit from the employment tax credit, they can't. The very nature of their limitations doesn't allow them to benefit. I wonder why the department of Treasury has never, never taken into consideration trying to revamp that program to realize that there are those that can't get the benefit of that particular program, which otherwise is not too bad of a program.

The gas tax has been talked about. The Treasurer has talked about it, but I've never seen anything come out in writing. I noticed today when I was watching the news and they had the world price of oil, over $32 U.S. a barrel, if I remember right. The gas pumps went up again, I think another 2 cents a litre. I'm not advocating that there is a magical solution to this. I just wonder if the Treasurer has been serious when he's made these comments that possibly money could be funneled down to the motorist. There was some anticipation that possibly motorists would see some benefit.

Now, Alberta is in a very, very unique position when it comes to the gas tax. First of all, we're in that position where we can what I used to term double-dip: the increases in the royalties, which have increased at a tremendous rate over the last 12 months, a tremendous rate and, of course, continue to collect that gas tax. We're also in that position of not having the provincial sales tax. There isn't that tax on top of that tax. Now, there is the GST, I acknowledge that, but there isn't provincial tax that is taxed on the gas to even increase the flow to the government. So that part of it is unique.

I thought it was an opportunity for the Treasurer. Is he seriously considering a break at the pumps, I guess is the expression used, or is that just some talk to sort of appease the lineups as people probably buy less gas each time they buy gas because filling up a tank now can be quite costly?

Another area that I listened to the Treasurer talk about, not only the Treasurer but the Premier as well, is the criticism of the federal government for the reduction in the so-called transfer payments; in other words, the downloading. There was downloading that occurred from the federal government to the provinces. We all acknowledge that. Some of it really concerns me. For example, the reductions in the health care transfers concern me, education and such. But at the same time as the government likes to be so critical of the federal government for downloading, they're doing the same thing to the municipalities. It has cost the city of Edmonton, for example, millions and millions and millions of dollars in terms of revenue. So, on the one hand, the Treasurer likes to be critical of the federal government for downloading, but at the same time – I guess the expression is: if you live in a glass house, one shouldn't throw rocks.

I'm not sure of the exact figure. Maybe the Provincial Treasurer could provide us with that figure, exactly how much has been downloaded by the provincial government onto the municipalities, who have no place to pass it on other than to the local taxpayer. They can't download it to another level of government. They have to pass it on to the taxpayer, and that's why when the two other levels of government, the feds and the provincial government, are under stress to reduce taxes, the municipal taxes by and large throughout the province are going up, at a fairly small rate but they're still going up. That's the reason why, because of the downloading and the fact that they can't turn around and transfer that downloading to another level of government.

We see a reference in the Treasury budget, as we do in most departments now, of lottery funds. In this particular case, if I recall correctly from reading the documentation, it's something like $50 million of lottery funds that goes into the Treasury I guess through general revenue. My question to the Treasurer would be: is that $50 million specifically earmarked to reduce debt? Is it just put into general revenue and becomes part of that overall revenue picture that is then divided between the various departments and such? Most departments already get some lottery funds. I'm not sure if it's lottery funds on top of lottery funds that are given to the various departments.

I thought it was quite interesting going through the documentation of references. I realize there are no estimates this particular year on areas like N.A. Properties and Gainers and such, but I guess it's a reminder of when this government – the Provincial Treasurer was part of the caucus, and the Premier was part of that cabinet – was in the business of compensating big business, providing concessions and such. For the government to get out of it was the right thing to do. Unfortunately, it took them a long time to come to that realization, probably after $3 billion of taxpayers' dollars were spent.

The Member for Edmonton-Glenora talked in terms of user fees, and I echo his thoughts. User fees to me are another form of taxation. Our user fees, I would say, on a per capita basis probably rank amongst the highest in Canada, particularly when we take into consideration that there are only two provinces in Canada that impose a user fee on health care in addition to what they pay through taxation. Even for things like camping we see user fees. Registration now for a vehicle is $53; $48 of that goes to the Treasury; $5 goes to the registry company. To dissolve a corporation – I had to dissolve a corporation a couple of weeks ago – $186.75. The bulk of that of course goes to the Treasury, and the user fees go on and on and on. People don't realize in most cases that the user fees do go to the provincial government, the biggest portion of them, that they are in fact another form of taxation.

The Provincial Treasurer did say that that report will be coming down shortly. It will be interesting to see the impact of that report and how the Provincial Treasurer follows up on that report. There are some reductions in the budget that was tabled a few days ago. I'm not sure if we're going to see a continuation of those reductions when the report comes down, but it will be done with some interest.

The pension liability when I look in the documentation is of interest to me from the point of view that when the government talks in terms of its various forms of debt, its net debt, for example, which we no longer have, its overall debt – now, when they talk in terms of the overall debt being $12.6 billion, if I recall correctly, does that include the pension liability, or is the pension liability on top of that $12.6 billion? If so, then the true debt of the provincial government, the gross debt, whatever you want to call it, would be considerably higher than the $12.6 billion.

The last point I'm going to make before I pass, because there are other members of the caucus here that want to speak. The one thing that really astounded me – and it's a simple little item, really, in terms of the big picture, but it's important to the hundreds, the thousands of people, former students, that got letters from a division of the Treasury Branch saying that they had obligations for student loans that occurred in some cases 10 years ago, 15 years ago, 20 years ago. A number of them, I think, were squared away. There was a great deal of confusion, because in a lot of cases the federal portion of the loan was squared away through a collection agency in terms of a settlement.

I was involved in one case, negotiated a deal on a student loan that was paid off. The fellow involved was facing financial hardships. The mother stepped in and said: look; I can afford so much. The collection agency settled for it, and as far as he was concerned, it was all paid. That was the end of his student loan. His mother had bailed him out, and that was in October of 1989. A couple of months ago he got a letter saying that his income tax refund is going to be withheld for the student loan. In that whole period of time he was never once sent a notice or a letter saying that he even owed this provincial student loan. He didn't know he owed this provincial student loan.

Now, the Treasury Branch must have felt somewhat guilty, because they didn't impose interest on that 11-year period that this loan was unknowingly outstanding, and when I contacted the division, they did agree that once that refund is held back, for the balance they would be prepared to work out a monthly plan so that it could be paid back over a period of time. But, still, it was a shock to that individual. It was a shock to hundreds of others that out of the blue, many, many years after they thought – in some cases I'm convinced that in fact the student loans were fully paid and they weren't accounted for. I notice the federal government sent out letters in error to thousands of students as well, which is just going to compound that fright, that concern that was held.

I don't understand how those types of things happen. You know, I can't just blame the provincial government because the federal government is guilty of the same thing. But how can it possibly be that that many years would go by and there's no acknowledgement of his student loan and suddenly at one point, with no notice, they're simply told, "Your income tax refund is going to be withheld"?

Madam Chairman, thank you for the opportunity to add my thoughts to the Treasury budget estimates, and I'll pass to the next speaker.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Provincial Treasurer.

MR. DAY: Yeah. Just some brief comments, Madam Chairman, if I may. The member is quite right, of course. In our tax reform this is not a flat tax. Sometimes in the vernacular of the day it is referred to as such, but it is in fact a single rate tax, and we do make that point. One of the significant reasons that it is – the member talked about certain credits and refunds being available, but with the very significant increase in those basic exemption levels, low-income earners, of course, are spared from paying any tax at all. So their progressivity is very dramatic at the low end, and we don't make apologies for the fact that progressivity drops off after that.

That's to acknowledge the fact that people who are working hard and wanting to work harder should not be punished for that at an ever increasing rate. The nurse who wants to take that overtime shift should not be discouraged from doing that by the fact that she or he is sensing that they will be moved into, quote, a higher bracket, and then the incentive to work overtime, whether it's at a hospital or at the packinghouse or on the construction site, whatever it may be, that becomes diminished, and people are treated equitably and not punished at a higher rate because they want to work harder or stay on a particular job longer or, in fact, get more education or experience. Why should they be incrementally punished at a higher rate? We make no apologies for that.

I think it's important to recognize, and we can't go through the entire range of every person's income and are they single, married, how many deductions, but in general terms. For instance, if you were to take a family income, a single income-earning family, $50,000, their saving under this plan is going to be $907. To me $900 is a lot of money, and the families that are earning $50,000 tell me that $907 is a lot of money to them.

Now, if you add the federal reduction on top of that – it's not as large as ours, but it's significant, and it goes up and down, again depending on income, et cetera – there's one family that is going to be saving approximately, next year, some $1,500. That's a significant amount of money. Should it be even lower? Should taxes drop even lower? Well, it would be great if they could, but I don't think this is insignificant, and that's right to the middle income.

If you want to cut a broad swath through some different categories. If the family income range is approximately $100,000 – and that would be two teachers, for instance; their family salary would be $100,000 or more – they're going to experience an approximate decrease in income taxes at the provincial level of about 9 percent. In the middle income range it will be a decrease of about 18 percent. Of course, as the member has already acknowledged, at the low-income end they won't pay any income tax at all.

So is it perfect? No. Would it be nice if we could cut it even more? Yes. I still talk somewhat dreamily, I admit, about the day when possibly there's no provincial income tax being paid in this province. That's another day, but it is not so far out of reach that it's never-never land.

The other thing I want to say to the member. If year to year there are adjustments in the federal plan, which diminish the savings on the provincial plan, we can either drop that single rate, because it's very transparent, or in fact we can raise exemption levels or a combination of the two, resulting in a maximum number of Albertans benefiting by that.

When the member said the family tax credit, I believe he's referring to the employment tax credit. I am not making an apology for the fact that it is called an employment tax credit. It is meant to be an incentive to work and to move beyond a certain level. Now, for those who are persons with disabilities – though many persons with disabilities obviously do work. For those who are unable to do so, there are programs there for them to be able to sustain a quality of life that allows them to live with dignity. But we don't make apologies for the fact that this is an employment tax credit. You need to work to get it. That's the whole reason that it's in place.

There were reflections on the gas tax and the price of oil, of course. It is still definitely north of $30, some $32, in that range. Most leading analysts feel that it is not going to stay there. There is about a 76 percent compliance rate right now with OPEC nations, and that is seen to be under some strain. The offsetting effect, of course, is that we are coming up to the summer drive season, and we know that's affecting contract and futures prices right now. But most analysts are saying that it is going to come down.

I would say that the member should stay tuned for some of the work that the minister of agriculture is involved in right now in terms of looking at costs to farmers, especially as they come up to spring seeding, and there may be something – I am underlining “may be something” – coming forward in an enhanced package, whether it's under the farm income disaster program or something similar to it, that reflects severe input increases like costs of fuel. So there may be something there that we can do on the agriculture side.

It's difficult to put in a per barrel sensitive policy that would say that if oil hits a certain amount per barrel, then the fuel tax would drop and that if the price of oil drops, then the fuel tax goes up again. If I can use that just as an example, let's say that we had a policy where if oil hit $30 a barrel and stayed that way for a certain period of time, then we'd take, just for argument's sake, 3 cents off our 9 cents per litre. Then when it hit $25 or $20, pick a number, the 3 cents would go back on. Well, everybody would shout for joy when we took the tax off, and when it hit $20, with the agreement that it goes back on, of course everybody would forget that it had been reduced, and we'd be in the position of being seen to raise people's taxes when we said that the only way taxes are going is down. I think the members opposite would be faithful to remind us of that at that point. It becomes difficult if you try to do a volume purchase situation, where all consumers maintain their receipts and their invoices. That becomes an administrative situation. What we would look to at this point is the longer term. If oil stays at this over a long term, obviously that improves our overall revenue picture, and maybe then we're able to do something on the tax side long term from that 11 percent rate as we see that we can sustain that out over two or three years. So that's where we are.

I would remind the member that our per litre tax is the lowest in the country and that when the price of oil per barrel goes up, the Treasury of the government does not take in more revenue. We only get 9 cents per litre. That doesn't increase, as you know, when the price of oil goes up. If anything, consumers purchase a little bit less gas when the price is going up. It is interesting – and maybe the member could join us in a communication to the federal government – that the federal government has a 10 cents per litre excise tax, and on top of all taxes and all other costs then they add the GST. So the federal government, in fact, does collect more percentage-wise when the price goes up. I'd think the member would be happy to communicate with us to the federal government and say: hey, could you put a lid on things there as far as that GST goes?

[Mr. Severtson in the chair]

MR. WICKMAN: I'll see Paul Martin tomorrow.

MR. DAY: Yeah, we'll see him at that fund-raising dinner tomorrow. I'm probably too late to get a ticket.

MS CARLSON: I'll give you one.

MR. DAY: You'll get me a ticket? Okay. The member says she would give me a ticket for the event that the federal Finance minister is coming to. If you want to send that over, I'd be happy to see if I could adjust my calendar.

N.A. Properties. I think I heard the member correctly. That company was put together of course to dispose of mortgage and real estate that had been acquired from troubled financial institutions in the late '80s. As you know, the bill for doing that was very high. Most of that has been moved through the system now, and we have divested ourselves of those mortgages. Up until November 30, 1999, the company was actually managed by Canadian Western Bank. From that date onward, because the amount of property is so diminished now, Treasury employees assume responsibility for managing that particular portfolio.

The company itself may have to be retained for a period of time just for legal reasons related to commitments to the credit unions and to Canadian Western Bank indemnities and to deal with some of the remaining assets that are very difficult to dispose of. I think you'll see NAP in existence for some time, with what's left of it managed through the department of Treasury. I think it is an example of what happens over time when government becomes too heavily involved with business. There's a great area of caution there, and the member quite rightly reports on that.

The debt vis-à-vis pension liability. The debt that we report, that $12.6 billion figure, is the result of accumulated deficits through the years from approximately '85 to '93, when there were deficits adding up to some $22 billion. The Auditor General has quite correctly said that pension liabilities – if those pension funds are actuarially sound, we still record those. We show what those amounts are. As you know, with a number of the pension plans, because of the increased contributions which we put in and the employees put in in '93, this in fact resulted in a surplus a little over a year ago, which resulted in a decrease of the contribution rate. We were able to lower the contribution for employees. Those plans are actuarially sound and are fully listed in terms of the long-term actuarial requirements. That is a normal accounting procedure. You don't see at the federal level the CPP liability tacked onto the $577 billion debt, for instance. We're fully aware of what those figures are, and they are both accounted for clearly and in separate columns.

I can't comment on the federal loan notifications. We've heard some interesting stories with the program now under the federal government jurisdiction of contacting people who had thought loans expired. I can't comment on that other than to say that there is a program going on for both provincial and federal loans in terms of getting in touch with those people and saying: the requirement is to pay; please get in touch with us so that we don't have to hold back any possible tax that may be coming to you. Some of them, I've heard, got contacted and in fact have taken care of that loan, and it's cause for some heartburn there. We hope that gets cleared up. I've also heard from people who have either paid off their student loans or are still paying them off, and they say that they feel it is appropriate that people who haven't need to do that. In the present budget, which I can't get into in detail because it's not my estimates, of course, there are some very significant increases in student loan assistance, but that's not my area, so I won't boast about that for too long.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm happy to put a number of questions that I have about this department on the record, but first of all, I'd like to answer one of the Treasurer's concerns. He was stating that he was having some problems, as I heard, connecting with the federal minister. Certainly we're happy to arrange that on this side of the House. If he has time early in the morning, he can join the Member for Edmonton-Glenora at a breakfast. If that doesn't fit his schedule, I can arrange for him to be at the reception in the evening, and if that doesn't fit his schedule, I'm sure that between those of us meeting with the minister tomorrow, we can arrange a meeting with this Provincial Treasurer so that he can get his questions asked and his points raised. Certainly there's no doubt that there's a great deal of accessibility available in that regard.

Now, my questions today with regard to the Treasury budget will all centre around financial management and planning, Mr. Chairman. That's program 3, as a reference, on page 390. This program talks about supporting programs and services of government by providing planning management and reporting of the government's financial affairs and by maintaining a sound financial services industry. This is the area of this department where I have the most concerns.

When we're talking about a budget of $19.1 billion and spending $17.7 billion and we have a department that cannot bring in quarterly budgets and adjust accordingly given the volatility of the incoming dollars in this province, then we have to wonder what it is that this department is doing. We always have some concerns that they are not operating in the same kind of responsible fashion that we're seeing from private industry in terms of making market adjustments and bringing updates to the people of the province, as they are required.

Instead, they bring in these huge surpluses. They're unaccountable in terms of both the revenue and spending side, and we think that's a real problem, Mr. Chairman, and we think that the people of the province also think that's a real problem. As a result of that, we've got a number of questions with regard to the various sectors of this particular program that we're hoping the Treasurer will answer for us, and we'll try to find out, since the Treasurer doesn't seem to be able to do it, where the problems are in that department.

Is it the department itself, or is it the mandate of this government now? I know some of those department staff, and I know they work very hard and they're very competent. So I tend to believe that the problem lies with the mandate of the government. They don't truly want to be accountable to the people in terms of what they spend and the dollars they take in, but perhaps with the additional information we will receive from these debates, we will be able to get a better handle on that.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, in general, I would like to get a breakdown of the projected gross operating expenses, capital investment, and dedicated revenues for the years 2001-2002 and 2002-2003 for the financial management and planning subprograms. If we could get that detail.

All my questions are somewhat detailed in nature, and perhaps the Treasurer could just undertake to provide those answers to us in writing in the very near future. I say in the near future because it's quite customary to get questions answered long after the budget has been voted on. I hope that won't happen in this particular instance.

We heard the Treasurer talk about the FTEs in general in the department, but if he could specifically break down what those projections are for the years I just mentioned, that would also be helpful.

Specifically on the office of budget and management I've got some questions. We see some situations here where budgets were exceeded. In the office of budget and management in the '99-2000 budget the costs were exceeded by 9.5 percent, and I'm wondering if the Treasurer could tell us in some specific detail, not just a general overview, what accounted for those increases. Perhaps he could even table a list of the variances by category so that we can see why it is that in this particular department, which should have a better handle on their expenses than any other department in this government, they exceeded their budget by nearly 10 percent.

Then I'm sure there's a very easy answer to this question, and perhaps the Treasurer can respond to it immediately; that is, if he could tell us why dedicated revenues in this line item are expected to fall by almost 31 percent in the 2001 year. Perhaps there have been some changes in departments. I'm not sure. We don't have enough detail here. If he could address that, that would be helpful.

Speaking of detail, Mr. Chairman, that seems to be a problem throughout these departments. These days this government likes to squeeze us on the budget debates in terms of the amount of time that's committed to them and splits the committees up so that some people are in a different room debating a different department at the same time that we are here. That's a problem for us, because the way the budgets and the business plans are presented, there is a lack of detail in terms of finding out where the expenditures and revenues come from and those expenses are made. If we could get more detail prior to getting into these debates, that would be very helpful.

Some of the questions in terms of the lack of detail presented in these budgets are consistent from year to year, and certainly the very excellent staff in these departments can anticipate some of the kinds of questions and some of the kinds of detail that we're going to need to be able to make adequate judgments before we can vote on these budgets yearly. Perhaps they could provide that to us prior to our entering into debate, and then I wouldn't be as concerned that other budgetary debates were ongoing at the same time as I was committed to another room, in this case this evening the Assembly, to ask the questions that I have concerns about. So perhaps the Treasurer would be prepared to take that under advisement and give us some sort of a comment in terms of whether we can see greater detail in the future.

My next question is under the gross operating expenses. We're seeing an increase of 12.8 percent there for 2000-2001. Mr. Chairman, once again, my question very simply is: why is that increase there? We would like some details on that.

We'd also like to know some explanation on the dedicated revenue that will be generated by the office of budget and management in 2001 and the basis on which those projections were made. So some detail on that would be helpful.

I think the next question that I'd like to ask is: what standards and guidelines have we seen being established to allow the office of the controller and the office of budget and management to ensure that individual departments follow consistent internal audit financial reporting procedures? It is always a concern when we're talking about these large dollars. I'm sure that there is a process. We would like to know what it is, because to have consistent and ongoing reviews made on the reporting procedures and the financial procedures and ensuring that even outside – the Auditor General's office isn't enough when we're talking about this. There needs to be some internal checks and balances. I'm sure that the Treasurer has them, so it should be quite easy for him to provide that information.

Next I have some questions on benchmarks for the same line item, and the questions I have on the benchmarks are around performance indicators. With regard to the accuracy of recording the department's financial information, timeliness of reporting departmental financial information, adherence to legislative compliance, and department budgets, can we have some information on that? Specifically what benchmarks have been established, and why don't I see those in the business plans? Maybe I've missed them. If so, the Treasurer can point them out to me. It seems like those are pretty important benchmarks to talk about, and it would be helpful if we had some more information on those.

MR. DAY: Which area?

MS CARLSON: We've got a bunch of them: the recording the department's financial information, timeliness of reporting departmental financial information, and adherence to legislative compliance. That would be helpful.

Consulting projects, Mr. Treasurer. Do you have any undertaken in this area of budget management for the upcoming year and if so specifically what areas? This is a volatile market. There are lots of things happening out there. We'd like to know if you're using the services of outside consultants, the mandate of those projects, and the process by which consultants are chosen in this particular area. That would be helpful.

Also in this area, Mr. Chairman, what review criteria and guidelines have been established by Treasury in consultation with the Auditor General that will permit formal audits of ministry performance measures in annual reports? Once again, I don't see this information anywhere, and it would be very helpful for us when we're reviewing the performance measures. Along with those guidelines, there must be some time lines for implementation, so we'd like to know what they are too.

When we talk about guidelines, I think it's very important to remember that when we take a look at the business plans, the formatting and the numbers that are compared from year to year often change, and that does create a problem in terms of being able to monitor performance from year to year. I'm wondering if the Treasurer would comment on why they do that. We think they do it on purpose, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps there's a better reason than that, and the Treasurer perhaps can give us some information about that.

Budget and management. With regard to the Auditor General's recommendations to provide financial results for each of the four quarters of the fiscal year, what steps is this department taking to comply with that request? It's a very important recommendation, Mr. Chairman, and it's interesting to see that this Treasurer is not prepared at this point to comply with it. We hope that that's going to change. We hope that he can make that commitment to us this evening. We really would like to see financial results for each of the four quarters of the fiscal year within the consolidated budget.

You know, it's impossible to compare actual financial performance against any of the benchmarks for the quarterly budgets without this information, and I would suggest that it's also irresponsible of the department not to do it. So if we could get some comment on that, and if the Treasurer could tell us what the time frame is for including quarterly results in the annual budget. Critical information. Unbelievable that they don't provide it. Never get away with it in private industry, but a Treasurer who's in charge of over $19 billion of revenue and the equivalent disbursements does get away with this. Madam Chairman, I suggest that this only happens in Alberta, that it could never happen in any other province in this country. A Treasurer who would operate in that kind of manner would likely be tarred and feathered elsewhere, but here he gets away with it. Well, isn't that true? It's a big concern. Unbelievable.

MS CARLSON: The image, yes. Well, that image goes with his new haircut, Madam Chairman, but I won't comment any further on that.

I think this comes within this budget item here. In terms of the capital assets, Madam Chairman, what steps is the Treasury contemplating as it relates to including capital assets in the consolidated balance sheet? I know that this has been a discussion in terms of government financial statements, whether or not this should happen, but I think it's a good idea. We would like to see that debate happen inside the Legislature or anywhere we would have some ability to participate in it. I think it's important for people of the province to know the kinds of capital assets the province has on the balance sheets. So if he could give us some information about that, that would be really good.

Also, I have some questions with regard to issues that still have to be resolved that have prevented Alberta from including RHAs, school boards, and postsecondary institutions within the consolidated financial statements. We haven't heard a good argument on that one, Madam Chairman, and certainly we think it would be the responsible thing to do. Certainly we hope that it's under discussion at this point in time. We would like an update on that, particularly with regard to those issues that are still outstanding.

We'd like the question answered about why Treasury believes that consolidation would add to the complexity and confuse relationships between government and these organizations. I don't think anything could be further from the truth, Madam Chairman. They're an extension of the government in many respects. We see other organizations that are extensions included within the budgetary review process. So what's the rationale behind this? If we could get some information on that, it would be very helpful.

Also, with regard to that, what impact would consolidation of these entities have on the consolidated surplus and the net debt of the province? You know, you just can't say that the net debt is reduced or gone or whatever the latest catchphrase is for the Treasurer. I think to be responsible you have to give a full and complete information flow in terms of all of the areas. That information would be very helpful to us. We want to know why he doesn't do it, other than saying that it isn't convenient. That isn't a good enough answer.

To get a complete information flow and for people to be able to evaluate not only issues like what the real debt is or what the real surplus is in this province but what the performance of the government is – this information is essential. We are asking the Treasurer to tell us why he won't do it. By him telling us, we'll be able to tell Albertans.

This information is very important to be included within the consolidated financial statements particularly. I don't believe there is a school board or a postsecondary institution in this province that wouldn't think that the right thing to do is to have that included in there. They are extensions of what the government does by virtue of where the majority of the revenue funding comes from. We see that happen in many other foundations that receive the majority of their funding from government, so why don't we do it in this particular instance? We think that would be a responsible position to take.

Madam Chairman, I have quite a few other questions to ask. Maybe I'll just touch on a couple of them. Could the Treasurer tell us how much of the project management and transition budget will be allocated to fee-for-service consultants? This ties into my earlier question about asking about any consulting projects that they have ongoing. If we don't get the information, we'll pursue it through other avenues, but I am hoping that he'll be happy to tell us what's on the books for the next year, because it's important to us to know which direction this government is taking.

Particularly we would like them to take a look at the way they make the presentation of their financial statements and the way they calculate surpluses and contingency funds and economic cushions. We think the way they are doing it is not correct. I would say deceitful, but that wouldn't be a correct term to use, so I won't use that, Madam Chairman, but certainly what they're doing is not open and accountable. It does not properly represent a government that wants to be open and accountable to the people, and for us that definitely is a problem.

Thank you.

MR. DAY: Just reporting on some specifics, and then I want to address some of the gross generalities that were entered into the debate here.

As far as office budget management, there has been a $902,000 increase there in gross expense from '99-2000 to this budget. That consists of $500,000 for the internal audit of all the investment and debt portfolios, the type of audit which the Auditor General looks for and which is necessary in making sure we're maximizing our investment opportunities there and also maximizing on the debt portfolio. All but the GRF debt portfolio component, which is $50,000, is actually recoverable as dedicated revenue, so that should be noted there.

In '99-2000 the projected gross expense was $672,000 over budget due to implementation of an internal audit function, and in August 1999 the Treasury Board approved a dedicated revenue initiative of $750,000 just for that purpose there. There was also a $300,000 capital investment for the entire replacement of the telephone and communications system to keep that up to date both for internal purposes and for communication purposes with our external partners outside of government.

A couple of areas I think need to be addressed. I was tempted just to let these areas go, but some of the statements the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie was making, in fairness, I think were unfounded and ill thought out. Even my critic from Edmonton-Glenora, though I think he would disagree with me on methods of forecasting, has never hinted or insinuated that anything deceitful has gone on. Certainly we probably disagree on process in how we should do the forecasting. So I really think it was improper to try and bring the debate to a lower level, especially when it's not based on fact.

Madam Chairman, the assessment of our books in Alberta is done not just by ourselves, not just by the Auditor General, but by national and international credit rating agencies, national and international investment companies on whose livelihood is based the soundness of their analysis. And one after another, whether we like it or not – and I tabled them here in the Assembly to the silent cheers of the opposition – comment about how we do things like forecasting and how we do our reporting.

So if the member is taking issue with how we report and how we forecast and how we reflect our prudent fiscal management, she is taking offence, then, and should be offended by every credit rating agency in North America who gives us the top credit ratings in the country. She is taking issue with the people who put their livelihood and their reputation on how they assess other governments. So if you're going to make remarks like that, then stand and say: I am making a remark that is based on nothing in fact; I'm just blowing steam off the top of my head, and I have nothing to base it on.

I say that obviously with some feeling and passion on this topic, because it is a painstaking task not just for myself but for every member of this government and for members of Treasury to account in such a way that we get that type of national and international recognition. So disagree on how we do it, but please don't suggest that there is a lack of accountability. There's full accountability.

To suggest that quarterly reports be included in the annual report, I wonder if the member has any idea of what would be involved. Contrary to what she just said, if you've ever attended the annual general meeting of any corporate entity, you will see their annual report. You will not see a compilation; in many cases, breakdowns of the quarters but not an assumption of the quarterly reports.

Now, we could do that. We could take those and print them. In fact, Madam Chairman, we report approximately every 90 days. It's a very detailed report, and each quarter it reports where we are in terms of the forecast from the last quarter and where we are in terms of the forecast when the budget was tabled. The member might not like the quarterly reports, but to say that they are not done in an accountable and transparent way is to simply be ignorant of the process that we have put in place, largely a process that is expected and respected by the private sector, the only differences being those cases where general accounting principles are changed or adapted for public service accounting. So I would ask her to consider her remarks and temper them when she is talking about accountability and transparency and the method in which we do our reporting. It is recognized as being second to none in the country.

The consolidated budgeting issue is one on which we have an ongoing disagreement, and we were quite open about that with the Auditor General. To include in our consolidated report the budgeting and the budgets of every school board and regional health authority would be for us to intrude unnecessarily in a micromanaged way into those particular entities.

Now, school boards have to have full audits, and they do have full audits, and those audits are reported. Every regional health authority has to be fully, completely, and totally audited by an external audit source, and those are reported. So we always know the state of affairs of our regional health authorities and school boards.

If we were to report them on a consolidated budget, then the Member for Edmonton-Glenora, quite rightly, could stand up, as he did, and say: why is there an increase, for instance, in the Alberta Securities Commission; why is there an increase in the Pensions Administration Corporation? Do you think school boards would want us giving an account of why they have a certain number of employees, why they hired some more, why they let some go? Do you think the regional health authorities would want us intruding in their particular areas saying: why did you have an increase in activity in this area, and why did you purchase certain equipment there? Those entities have boards which have responsible people and have a reporting chain of command in which they have to report all their activities.

Or universities? Can you imagine if we were here giving an account and I was coming into the Assembly tonight, my phoning the president of a university or a dean of a department and saying: "Why on earth did you teach that, and why did you have so many undergrads teaching this program? What are you doing for your purchasing here? What are you doing for your purchasing there?"

Those entities and the people that occupy the responsible positions in those entities would quite rightly say: what is the government doing micromanaging our affairs? That's one of the reasons we don't put them under the consolidated reporting picture. Do we know where they are at all times in terms of their own finances? Yes, we do. As a matter of fact, last year in recognizing the deficit positions of a number of school boards, we allocated $151 million to deal with those deficits, as we did with the regional health authority deficits. We didn't come in telling them how to manage the intricacies of each of their departments. They're held accountable to do that.

Now, the discussion that's been going on with the Auditor General. We've actually taken that to the national level, and we have asked the public accounting associations to engage in this discussion with us to see if there are ways in which some kind of reconciliation can be had in terms of the debate. Let it be clear that these entities are fully audited, fully accountable, and fully mandated in terms of the protocols of all their auditing procedures.

To bring them into the government consolidated picture and treat them like the Department of Environment or the Department of Justice or any other government department is simply untenable. They themselves would not stand for it. I would ask the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie to go talk to the chancellor at the university and say, "Hey, how about it? Do you want to get dragged into the government consolidated picture? Do you want the Treasurer stomping through the hallways here and telling you what to do and how to spend the money?"

Now, when we send those grants out, we do have certain broad parameters, but in terms of the decisions that have to be made at those levels, I would ask the member to go talk to the board of governors at the U of A, talk to the U of C and say, "Hey, I've got a great idea for you folks. We're going to drag you into the government consolidated reporting picture, and we're going to have the MLA committees swarming through here and telling you when you're paying certain division heads too much or professors too much or whatever it might be or allocating certain programs to students." I ask the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, before she addresses this question: bring those folks in here. I want to hear them clamour to be a part of our consolidated reporting picture. I'd like to see that happen, and then maybe we'll give it some consideration.

I thank her for her remarks.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thanks. I thought the Treasurer was just getting warmed up. He caught me by surprise.

A number of comments. One thing to preface this, my second round of participating tonight in estimates debate, is: after a particularly heated exchange in the Assembly about a year ago during budgets, the Treasurer and I bumped into each other in the rotunda by the fountain. He commented to me that he wasn't entirely satisfied with the way that the debate had gone, that it seemed to be personal. I think if you read Hansard from about a year ago, you'll see that there were some things that had gone on. You know, there's always the danger, when you're talking about something that you so are personally and emotionally committed to, as the Treasurer is in terms of his policies and priorities and as members of the opposition are to their policies and priorities, that debate can tend to get heated and personal. I wanted to compliment the Treasurer this time around for not adopting the tactic that he has used in the past, and I will acknowledge that the comments from this side tended to be very pointed.

But I can tell you, Mr. Treasurer, that it's not because there's a disagreement with those organizations that earn their livelihood by commenting on other people's forecasts. It's because there is a deeply held belief on this side of the House that government by policy does some things with the presentation of the forecasts and the projections that one may describe as prudent and another may describe as shading the truth. So please be advised that the measure of the forecast and of what the experts say about the forecasts is ultimately their accuracy and not really how people talk about them or what use they may make of them.

I'll also say on the issue of consolidated reporting that this is a long-standing argument. The Auditor General and the Treasurer have had the debate and the Treasurers that preceded this one have had the debate and this member and this Treasurer have had the debate. You know, there is a disagreement, and it's an honest disagreement, but I think it is far too easy to dismiss the substance of the argument by then saying: well, should we go micromanage and stomp down the halls of a university?

In fact, Mr. Treasurer, I think that you could say the same thing, that the Alberta Treasury Branches' statements are consolidated with the government financial statements, yet you always argue that you don't micromanage ATB. So it seems to me that there's a way to reflect consolidated statements without treading down this path of micromanaging and telling other people what to do. You know, we consolidate the Alberta Securities Commission in your own department's reports, and I haven't heard anybody from the commission accusing the Treasurer of stomping down the hallways of the ASC and micromanaging. Of course, this would be a good opportunity to do so, because they're in the middle of an executive search right now. I mean, what better opportunity?

So, Mr. Treasurer, please don't overstate the case. I mean, it is an honest dispute in terms of where we can go with consolidated reporting, but it really doesn't advance the debate at all to go down that path of trying to strike terror and fear into the hearts of school board administrators everywhere.

Also, Mr. Treasurer, in my first round of questions I asked about the government's health privatization bill. I forgot that it's called the Health Care Protection Act. So for all of my questions replay the tapes: ditto, insert Health Care Protection Act where I said privatization, and the same questions. If you could provide some substantive answers, I'd sure appreciate it.

The other thing. You know, when the Treasurer is talking about accountability – and I even heard the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie say that there were some things that were positive in terms of the government's reporting – it often stops short of where it could be. When any member in the opposition talks about the shortcomings, including the suspicion that they're not accidental shortcomings, that they're purposeful – certainly I've said to the Treasurer that I suspect that revenue projections, for example, are low on purpose, and then I think the Treasurer said: well, would you want me to make them high on purpose? That's not really the point. We want them to be as accurate as they can be on purpose.

When we talk about whether or not the government is doing everything it can to live up to its own claims about accountability, let me quote the Provincial Treasurer himself in the document A Plan for a Debt-Free Alberta, dated March 1999, where the Treasurer says that "business plans are one of the cornerstones of Alberta's prudent fiscal management." Now, with that statement in mind regarding the business plans being the cornerstone of Alberta's fiscal management, let me quote what the Auditor General has said about the government's record with business plans.

In the Budget 99 cycle, information on Alberta's economic outlook for factors such as population, unemployment rate, exchange rate, and interest rates were not provided to Ministries until October 1998, several months after some Ministries began their business planning . . .

In Budget 99, core businesses are still defined variously in terms of goals, strategies, activities, or performance criteria. Strategies are sometimes defined as desired results rather than broad actions to achieve them. Goals are sometimes defined in terms of activities rather than end results . . .

In our review of the Ministry business plans in Budget 99, we found that over half the Ministries had at least one goal that did not have a performance measure associated with it. Overall, 24% of all the goals in Ministry business plans did not have a performance measure. In addition, in many business plans where performance measures were included, the linkage between the goals and the performance measures was not apparent.

I could go on. The Auditor General comments on how "some performance measures are not measured annually." He goes on to say that "82% of the performance measures had targets. However, two thirds of Ministries had at least one performance measure that lacked a target." The Auditor General notes that "in Ministry business plans, output and outcome measures are not always well defined, measurable, and clearly related to core business goals." The list does go on.

I know the Treasurer is familiar with the Auditor General's report, but my point of repeating this in the Assembly now is to say that it is not a universal analysis that there is tremendous accountability in government reporting. In fact, there are some serious deficiencies in the business planning process, and while it may be better than other jurisdictions – and that in and of itself is very subjective – it is still not as good as it can be. So let's make sure that we don't get simply carried away with defending what it is that we do and, instead, pay some attention to how it can be improved, because that is, after all, what a large part of this process is supposed to be all about.

I do have a couple of other rather specific questions for the Treasurer. The Treasurer and I have had this conversation about Centennial Food in the past, and we've got quite a healthy correspondence file, but I'm going to ask some questions in the hope that Albertans can gain just a little bit more insight into what's happening with their money in this regard. Will the Treasurer provide further information on the terms and conditions of repayment of the $13 million loan provided to Centennial Food Corp? Will the Treasurer indicate how much in cumulative interest payments have been made on the loan between August 1 of '97 and the end of February 2000?

I do note that interest rates ranged from 3 to 10 percent during this time period, with the actual interest paid dependent on the amount of cash flow generated by the company. Maybe the Treasurer can confirm my understanding on this payment schedule, which is that if cash flow was inadequate to permit payment of the minimum interest of 3 percent, then interest accrues at 3 percent and is due at maturity, which is 2003. How much of the unpaid accrued interest has accrued on the loan from March of '91 to the end of February 2000, and what are the terms and conditions of the cash flow thresholds required for the company to trigger the sliding scale of interest payments on the loan, the scale of between 3 and 10 percent?

In addition, I'm hoping the Treasurer will tell us how much of the $13 million owing on Centennial Food's loan is contained within the $42 million allowance for doubtful loans, advances, and implemented guarantees and indemnities which I referred to earlier, which are found on page 56 of Budget 2000.

I also know that the Treasurer had some discussions with Centennial Food back in June of '98 relative to the loan agreements. I don't think those discussions have ever been made public. Can the Treasurer help us in this regard? It is a considerable amount of money, and it's one of those chapters that I think we'd both like to see come to a close.

Now, the Treasurer also has in his department some 143 pages of documents that have been identified through freedom of information requests, et cetera, that pertain to valuation reports, fairness assessments, workout and exit options, term sheets, and letter agreements between March 25, '98, and April 6, '99, pertaining to the loan agreement between the government and Centennial Food. I've never received a satisfactory explanation as to why these 143 pages of documents are being withheld from taxpayers. I know which exclusions of the freedom of information act have been cited, but I'm not satisfied that the public interest wouldn't be better served with more complete disclosure.

Mr. Treasurer, there are a couple of questions I wanted to ask you about the investments of the provincial government. One question I have is: will some action be taken in terms of ensuring that the various investment portfolios managed by the government of Alberta or on behalf of the government of Alberta take into consideration providing access to capital or investment to Alberta-based business, particularly emerging businesses? What can we do with our portfolio of tax-funded investments to help grow Alberta businesses, and is there room to be more aggressive in that regard?

What type of advice does the investment and debt accounting group provide on accounting treatment and reporting presentation? What role does the investment and debt accounting group play in reviewing internal policies and procedures and monthly performance measurement regarding investments and liability portfolios?

I'd be interested to know what criteria are used by the Alberta heritage fund Investment Operations Committee to determine whether various heritage fund investments should be outsourced and managed by external managers. Will the Treasurer agree to release the investment policy manual of the Alberta heritage fund Investment Operations Committee? Now, if it's true that Alberta Treasury uses external managers to invest in certain asset classes, such as small cap companies and U.S. equities or global equities, what is the role of the external advisors, and why would we not see this manual?

I note that at a press conference a couple of weeks ago the Treasurer was asked a question regarding the future of the Alberta heritage savings trust fund, and it had to do with the announcement of the $230 million, the inflation-proofing in essence, that went in this year. The Treasurer's response I found intriguing. What I heard him say – and this would be his chance certainly to clarify my understanding – is that, yes, the future of the Alberta heritage trust fund is being reviewed and that if there was going to be a major policy change, that policy change is something that Albertans would have to be consulted about and that it's possible that such a major policy change could be in the future of the Alberta heritage savings trust fund.

While I'm mentioning the decision to retain $230 million of the trust fund income in the fund in the third quarter so that it would be inflation-proofed, I'm wondering if the Treasurer will consider amending the Fiscal Responsibility Act to ensure that there is a mandatory provision that the fund be inflation-proofed on an annual basis. I know we've had this discussion before, but I think the time is right to make that commitment. Certainly, as the Treasurer always says, while legislation can't necessarily bind one Legislature to another, it certainly sets a direction and a goal and a standard, and the government will at some risk circumvent or change its laws when it comes to matters of fiscal responsibility. I'd appreciate the Treasurer's updated comments in that regard.

The Treasurer hasn't talked for a while about the investment management mandate to be established for portions of the heritage fund that are externally managed, and I'd appreciate him providing us additional information on this mandate. If these mandates are going to vary by certain parts of the fund, will the Treasurer provide copies of the investment management mandates when they're compiled and completed? While I'm asking about those, will the Treasurer refresh my memory as to the process of how these mandates are being constructed and ultimately approved?

I have some other questions about the fund. Why is the policy weighting of the real estate holdings in the endowment portfolio being increased from 7 to 9 percent? What real estate holding acquisitions are planned for this fiscal year and for each of the fiscal years during the planning cycle? Will the Treasurer provide a breakdown of the $357.1 million fair value of holdings in the private real estate pool and the ownership percentage as of the end of the calendar year last year?

What is the frequency of reporting of Alberta Treasury and external managers to the Alberta heritage savings trust fund

Investment Operations Committee, and what are the contents of these reports? For example, do they report on amounts invested in various classes of investment, on an amortized and unamortized basis, on unrealized gains and losses, and on the amount of each class of investment as a percentage of the portfolio, on the average life to maturity of securities, et cetera?

Will the Treasurer provide a breakdown of the investment management fees paid to the following heritage fund external managers in 2000-2001: Guardian Capital, Bissett & Associates, Standard Life, Mawer Investment Management, Van Berkom, Bolton Tremblay, AMI, JP Morgan, Morgan Stanley, Pyrford International, Baring Asset Management, Morgan Grenfell, ABN Amro, UBS/Philips & Drew, Fleming, Bankers Trust, Stein Roe & Farnham, and GE Investments? If I've missed some of the external managers, maybe the Treasurer could add those into the list as well. That's the list that I could compile, and I acknowledge that it may not be exhaustive. Also, while the Treasurer is providing that breakdown, maybe he can tell us what the custodial fee is that will be paid to State Street Company of Canada in the year 2000-2001.

Madam Chairman, I know that that's a number of very detailed questions, and we do have more. In fact, that only touches on about a quarter or a third of the questions that I have. That brings me to perhaps my closing comment, which is just some reflection on this process.

Tonight has gone better in examining this minister's department than other nights have in examining this minister's department, I believe. I think it's because there was, with exception but with rare exception, a willingness to listen and provide a reasonable response. One of the difficulties, however, is that tonight at this very same time there's a budget examination committee looking at the Department of Justice. Now, both the Treasurer and I have an abiding interest in Justice issues, and I'm sure that we both could have used our time well upstairs in room 512.

It was the Treasurer when he was Government House Leader, I believe, who created or at least implemented this process where we break into these subcommittees and we accelerate the budget review. I think time has now proven that this is an unsatisfactory way to do business. It may serve the government's interest in that you get through the 28 days more rapidly, but I don't think it fully serves Albertans' interests when it comes to disclosure and careful budget examination.

Thank you.

MR. DAY: I'll endeavour to reply in detail to the detailed questions, especially those related to the Alberta heritage savings trust fund.

Just a couple of comments on, again, some of the broad reflections. I'd like to say that when we do the revenue projections, we do not project revenues – and I'll quote the Member for Edmonton-Glenora – we don't make those low on purpose. For instance, the present budget is projecting for the year ahead, till March 31, 2001, that for that budget year the price of oil will actually average $19. Now, when it's floating around $32, that seems a little bit out of whack. However, members will remember that a year ago when I tabled the budget, February 24, '99, we were projecting $13.50. On that particular day oil was $12.61, and we were saying $13.50. In fact, it was $12.61. Some people thought we were being optimistic. The Liberals in their estimation were slightly above the $13.50.

In fact, when we make these projections, we consult with leading analysts provincially, nationally, and internationally, those investment houses and those industry experts who, again, propose and purport to have some sound fundamental principles in doing those estimates. We survey the waterfront, as it were, and then consult again with our own unique economic conditions. Then we make a projection based on what we actually think that figure will be; for instance, $19 this year, and last year it was $13.50. We actually project that. We don't go low on purpose so that we can be guaranteed to have a so-called surplus or economic cushion.

The way we make sure there's an economic cushion just in case prices drop is that we do all our revenue projections as realistically as we can, whether we're talking about oil or gas, the different fees that are coming in, or transfers from the federal government. We take all that into consideration at the start of the budget year, and then we take 3.5 percent of that and set it aside as an economic cushion just in case things turn on us, global commodities or some other issue beyond our control. Then we can draw from that cushion of 3.5 percent of revenues. It's a savings account, as it were, if things crater and they start to move downwards. Then we don't have to reduce spending on health and education and other departments. So we don't use our revenue projections to deliberately lowball so that we've got a cushion or a surplus. The cushion is right up front, set aside in that 3.5 percent.

Now, we may miss it in terms of where our projection will go. If we miss it, we usually miss it with the rest of the world, as we did with oil. We were saying $13.50 last year. Some people projected $12.75, some were saying $14.50 or $14.75, but we were all kind of in that same band together.

When we tabled the budget, did our preparations, some of the investment houses and other analysts were saying that it was going to be a little bit below $19, some were saying $20. I think averaging out about $20.35 is where people are. So we're just a little bit below that average, but we think it's going to come down to that. If it doesn't, then of course we will have more of an economic cushion, 75 percent of which goes to the debt. So I just wanted to make that point.

This will be a difference of opinion, but I'd like to say that over, I think, the three or four years since we have had this type of estimates process, where we break into different committee rooms and simultaneously can be considering different parts of the budget process, even as the federal government does – as a matter of fact, that's where we got the idea from. When they get into their committee process, especially on legislation, they break into any number of committees at the same time. I think it actually has resulted in a better process of questioning. There's a closer feeling that you can see now as members come in.

This is the way it used to be: a lot of members on this side, some members on the other side, a lot of background noise. In fact, I think it took away from the process.

So whether it's here in this particular Assembly room or in one of the meeting rooms or actually around the table, I think it raises the quality of questions and puts more pressure on the quality of response. Now, that's my view, and we will differ on that.

On the questions which we have not answered, I will get back to you, Madam Chairman, in writing to the members.

At this point in time I would move that we rise and report progress.

THE CHAIRMAN: Having heard the motion by the hon. Treasurer that we now rise and report progress of subcommittee A, all in favour, please say aye.

HON. MEMBERS: Aye.

THE CHAIRMAN: Opposed, please say no. Carried.

[The subcommittee adjourned at 10:04 p.m.]

THE CHAIRMAN: I'd like to call the subcommittee to order. Before we commence this evening's deliberations on the estimates of the Department of Justice, a couple of things. One, it might be suggested that we go 20 minutes and the questioner ask the questions and the minister have responses within the 20 minutes and then move on to the next questioner and so on. Is that item, first of all, agreeable to everyone concerned?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay.

The second is that we have had in the past a senior civil servant, a deputy minister or ADM, sit next to the minister so that they can better answer the questions or whatever. Is that agreeable to everyone, or does anyone have any objection to that? Agreeable?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIRMAN: Objections? Okay.

With that, then, I think we're ready for this evening. Mr. Minister, do you want to say anything at the outset and then go to questions?

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Yes. I'm pleased to present Alberta Justice's proposed business plan for the period 2000 to 2003. First of all, I'd like to introduce the people with us tonight: first, my deputy minister, Mr. Paul Bourque, who's joined us at the table; in the gallery Mr. Dan Mercer, who's executive director, strategic services; Mr. Shawkat Sabur, director of financial services; and Dr. Randy Petruk, director of corporate support services; as well as Jack Janssen and Betty Ann Hicks from my office.

The 2000-2003 business plan is my first as Minister of Justice, and it's the result of a good deal of hard work by Alberta Justice staff, stakeholders, and the broader community. I'd like to acknowledge at the outset the work that was done by my predecessor in the department, the Member for Calgary-Shaw. This business plan is really derived from the results of the justice summit which was held in January of 1999. You'll see, if you've read through the business plan and pursued it at all, that we very much tried to track the results of that justice summit and the issues and the concerns that were identified by the people of Alberta through that summit process. The summit brought together a broad cross-section of Albertans and representatives from many different sectors of the system to discuss justice issues and concerns. The final report was published in March. In May government formally responded to the summit, and as I said, the business plan is based in large part on those responses.

In preparing the business plan, we attempted to re-examine all aspects of our core businesses. As a result, we've restated our core businesses more succinctly this year, but I'd like to emphasize that these changes are really a clarification of where our key businesses are rather than a shift in business focus, with one possible exception. We believe that supporting victims of crime should be acknowledged as a core business of the ministry, so this has been emphasized in the plan. Otherwise, we continue to provide police services to Albertans and legal services to government. We continue to provide support for resolving disputes in the courts and other forums, and we continue to protect the public by prosecuting the accused and holding offenders accountable under the law.

We've also restated our goals and re-examined our performance measures. I won't go into detail, because I know that you've had the opportunity to review them, but I do want to mention a few highlights and talk about some significant changes from previous years. I know there'll be questions on this, so I want to hit it straight up. We've eliminated the goal of partnering with outside stakeholders to support the administration of justice from our business plan this year. That does not mean that we intend to stop partnering or stop collaborating. We continue to work in partnerships as we always have, but we've discontinued it as a specific goal, because it's standard practice and should permeate everything we do in the department.

We've removed public satisfaction with the justice system as a performance measure. From our surveys we've learned that over 90 percent of Albertans do not realize that crime in their communities is strongly decreasing. Almost 70 percent are unaware that the province is responsible for administering justice in Alberta, and because of these findings we're recommending a more effective measure of public satisfaction with the justice system. Instead of asking the public how satisfied they are with the job that Alberta Justice is doing, we plan to ask them what we believe are more important questions, and those are: how safe do they feel in their homes, and how safe do they feel in their neighbourhoods? We will also ask how satisfied they are with the level of policing their communities receive. These questions provide a truer picture, we believe, of how satisfied Albertans are with the administration of justice in the province. In other words, we're talking about the outcomes rather than how they feel the job is being done.

The final change is that we've added a performance measure specifying the number of community service hours provided by offenders. One objective of our corrections program is to challenge offenders to give something back to their communities. As a result, we'll measure how many hours of service Alberta offenders provide to nonprofit organizations, community groups, municipalities, and other government ministries. Again, this may not be the most effective way of measuring in this area, but we think it's a better way of measuring than we previously had and are always open to suggestions that you might have as to how we can improve our measurement of that particular area.

I'd like to spend just a moment elaborating on key results we intend to achieve in the coming years. Many of our initiatives, as I said, respond to what we heard in the summit. Others recognize and respond to the ever changing social and economic climate in the province. All of these initiatives are broadly based and will result in a justice system that is more sensitive to the needs of Albertans.

Before I begin, I'd like to review the financial context of our business plan, which recognizes the recent decisions of Treasury Board. Members will note from our spending profile on the last page that our spending targets are approximately $457 million, $447 million, and $452 million over the next three years. This represents an increase of about $45.5 million for the year 2000-2001. Of this amount, $30.5 million is committed to nondiscretionary expenditures such as judicial and general employee compensation and contracted services' increases. Approximately $6.2 million will be cost recovered from either the federal government or through self-funded programming and directed to victims of crime and Youth Criminal Justice Act program implementation. The remaining $8.8 million represents discretionary funding increases and will be used to implement recommendations of the summit on justice. This includes funding for provincial criminal and family and youth courts, additional Crown counsel, court mediation programs, First Nations policing, and restorative justice programs.

Family law reform was recommended by our MLA review on the maintenance enforcement program and child access, by the federal report of the Special Joint Committee on Child Custody and Access, and by the Justice summit. Family law reform is an ambitious undertaking that will require a great deal of sensitivity to deal with the legal community, the judiciary, and all stakeholders in the system. We intend to improve access to family law by consolidating and streamlining the appropriate legislation and improving how we do business in the courts. One million dollars per year in new funding will be directed towards establishing more family and youth courts to reduce the case backlogs. Family and youth mediation will be addressed with the transfer of the mediation program to Justice from Children's Services and the allocation of 2 million additional dollars for that program.

Youth justice initiatives. Recently the federal government proposed the new Youth Criminal Justice Act to reform Canada's youth justice system. Although our government still has concerns with the legislation, some of its elements offer greater flexibility and better prospects for rehabilitating young offenders. In the next three years we'll spend $3.1 million, $2.7 million, and $2.9 million respectively to deal with youth justice initiatives. We'll partner with children's services authorities and the aboriginal communities to increase options available for diverting less serious young offenders from the formal court process, but for those individuals who are clearly predisposed to antisocial behaviour, we will also have better options and resources for dealing with them.

Some other youth justice initiatives that are planned: funding will be directed to the city of Calgary's existing probation program to assist them in delivering their services, a group home for female young offenders will be established through the reallocation of program funding, and funding to implement the new Youth Criminal Justice Act will occur by cost recovery from federal sources.

Our business plan contemplates spending about $2.3 million a year for a major initiative to make the justice system less complex and eliminate court delays to provide victims with a more meaningful role in an attempt to resolve cases appropriately at the earliest possible time. We will do that by screening police charges better, using alternative measures more aggressively, and encouraging early guilty pleas.

In support of victims we will establish specialized public assistance units to provide information, referrals, and assistance. We will expand our early alternative dispute resolution programs in the coming year, which will ensure that citizens have access to equitable and efficient reforms for resolving disputes.

The fines collection project for the collection of outstanding Criminal Code fines will be expanded, and moderate increases have also been added which will cover only the security needs in new courtrooms.

Restorative justice will be a key issue for us this year. It's a key message from the justice summit that the system must be flexible enough to deal with the different circumstances of different offenders. We clearly heard that restorative justice must be employed to rehabilitate offenders, involve victims and communities, and respond to diversity. We believe that healing for both victims and offenders and restoring the balance of society in a humane and fair way should be important priorities for the justice system.

In introducing restorative justice approaches, it's important to note that we're not going soft on crime. Serious and violent offenders will remain a key focus of the ministry through vigorous prosecution of crime. However, we are committed to using whatever approaches are best for the individuals and communities involved while keeping in mind our mandate to ensure public safety. So over the next three years we will be spending money to fund selected community-based restorative justice programs on a pilot basis and support selected aboriginal restorative justice programs in order to leverage further resources from the federal aboriginal justice strategy, should that program be renewed. Not all deserving community programs can be supported from our budget, so we will be seeking private-sector funding and partnerships to assist those programs so that we can lever our investment.

Alberta Justice is also committed to enabling First Nations police services to provide law and order in their communities. The First Nations should have the opportunity to provide services to their citizens in the same way other communities do in the province. This business plan proposes the use of native liaison prosecutors to provide culturally sensitive prosecutions for First Nations people. Alberta Justice also intends to improve staff training to increase awareness of aboriginal people and culture. These initiatives will cost $1.2 million, $1.3 million, and $1.4 million per year over the next three years.

The business plan emphasizes that police officers should be recruited and trained so that they reflect the social and cultural diversity of the communities they serve. There will be more community involvement in reviewing complaints against police and in disciplinary decisions concerning police behaviour. We are also examining the feasibility of developing a single-source training curriculum for police recruits.

In addition, our ministry will remain focused on crime prevention. We'll support the federal DNA Identification Act, which will allow the use of DNA to help police link offenders to serious crimes. Funding for this will not be required next year, but we'll plan to assume the costs of $1.1 million for the last two years of the plan.

Under the Public Trustee it should be noted that there are currently 6,300 private trustees appointed under the Dependent Adults Act. This act requires the Public Trustee to be served when a private trustee is appointed. It also requires private trustees to return to court to have their appointments reviewed. Approximately 2,500 persons out of those 6,300 private trustees have failed to do so. The ministry proposes to establish a system of informing private trustees that they must return to court to have their orders validated to follow up on that particular issue and also to include notification of next of kin to attempt to address that problem.

One of the key messages from the summit was that victims need more opportunities to become involved in all stages of resolving a criminal act. I talked about the number of ways in which victims will be more involved. In addition, we will be reviewing current legislation and evaluating the services provided under the Victims of Crime Act. A new funding model for grants to victims programs will be implemented, and guidelines for making offenders pay restitution will be developed. Over the next three years we will spend $2.9 million, $3.1 million, and $3.2 million, all of which will come from the victims of crime fund and not the general revenue fund.

As well as the objectives that have already been outlined that are directly linked to the summit, there are a number of other initiatives that we'll undertake to improve support for our programs. Because of the demographics of the public service it's imperative that we focus on developing leaders to replace those managers who will be leaving our employ over the next three to five years. It's a high priority for us to ensure that we have people in place to run our programs effectively. This will not require additional funding, but it does place a focus on education and training within the department, and we're putting a high priority on that area. We'll also work, of course, with the shared services model and examine innovative approaches to partnering with the private sector through common-purpose procurement agreements to support our information technology needs.

Finally, we'll develop an improved communications strategy to ensure that Albertans understand how their justice system works. Public education is the key to giving Albertans a better understanding of their protection under the law and helping them sort out the various roles and responsibilities of justice partners. We'll be working on a variety of ways to educate the public about justice in Alberta. A total of $615,000 per year will be allocated for communications initiatives. We will also be launching a new Justice web site this spring to help us better communicate with Albertans.

In addition to the spending items listed above, there are a number of funding allocations that will be directed to nonsummit spending pressures that the ministry must deal with. This amounts to about $30.5 million in the year 2000-2001. The allocations include funding to deal with various lawsuits facing government, increases we had previously agreed to for corrections services contract providers, judicial compensation and pension increases, and general employees' salary increases.

I'd like to conclude my comments by pointing out that the administration of justice is so basic to our Alberta way of life that we sometimes run the risk of taking it for granted. Like any other asset of value it requires us to employ the effort and investment necessary to keep it working the way it was intended. This business plan, which springs directly from our dialogue with Albertans through the justice summit, is an approach that I believe is ambitious yet appropriate. So I'd urge you to support the business plan and the course it sets for us, and I'd be delighted to answer any questions you might have.

THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you. The first person on our list is the hon. Member for Edmonton-Norwood.

MS OLSEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think we probably will have lots, so just tell me when the minister wants to stop and answer a few questions along the way. Just let us know.

MR. HANCOCK: Anytime you wish. If you want to stop partway through, I'd be delighted. If you want to go for your 20 minutes, I'd be more delighted.

MS OLSEN: All right. Don't worry. Mr. Minister, don't go to sleep on us here.

I think what we'll start with are just some of the administrative things, and then we'll get into the meat of some of the subjects here. A 649 percent increase in the communications budget. You know, Bob Scott may be good, but can you maybe help us out as to why your budget has increased that dramatically? Where do you anticipate spending that dramatic increase over the next year? I'm just looking at all the areas of Justice needing funding, and here you have this huge increase. So to me that needs some explanation.

Management information services. You're going from $50,000 to $2.2 million. That would be under ministry support services. I'm wondering why another such huge increase in that particular area. What kind of new systems are you bringing on line that would require those kinds of changes? Is it in relation to any of the changes that are happening with the federal system? The Canadian police information centre is making some changes federally. Are you tying into that at all, or do you have a role in supporting that particular program?

If you move down to court services, again we see another dramatic increase in program support services, line 2.1.1, a change of about 473 percent. Again, what are you offering? Obviously it's not salary because it's program support services. So I need to know where that money is going.

Also, Fort Saskatchewan. Is this where some of the transition is going to occur with opening more courtrooms? You alluded to opening more family court and young offender courtrooms. We see a 66 percent increase in the regional court operations budget in Fort Saskatchewan, 2.4 of the program, and I'm just wondering if you can explain that increase, what that is for.

I guess what I could do while we're into court operations is talk about the issue of court reporters. I'm concerned. I've received a tremendous amount of material over the past little while, and none of it supports this radical move to remove court reporters from the courtroom. It seems to be a cost-saving project, and sometimes that's not exactly the aim of removing court reporters.

There's the issue of what happens. Hopefully the minister can help us out here, but to my knowledge there isn't any technology available to date that would allow for the digital recording to pick up accents, heavy accents, maybe those folks who stutter, who have speech impediments, speech problems, issues in relation to those people having even things as simple as colds so that those recordings aren't clear. What about simple things like people not speaking into the mike? How would you know that's not going to be a problem? Also, some very grave concerns I have about missing court testimony and readbacks in court. Who's going to do the readbacks if in fact that needs to be done? Unless you're going to go to real-time recording in the courtroom. So I'm concerned that we're going to miss the boat here.

I recognize that the government has done some study with Halifax, and I'm wondering what the long-term impact has been with that particular process. What has been measured in terms of the ability of that system to do the job? Is it just digital voice? Is there some consideration of going to real-time recording in the courtroom? If that's the case, you're still going to need somebody who's able to do the court reporting.

What's the process on the outside? Are you just going to hire transcribers to transcribe off a tape machine? I think that's an issue as well. There is a real role for court reporters in a courtroom. I think we see other governments moving back to bringing court reporters in because of some of these issues and concerns.

What technology are you using? Has it been put out to tender? Do we know what's the best? Does somebody have to configure this technology for the government, or has it been configured? What tests have been done on it, and what are the outcomes as a result of that? I think that before we jump and risk having some serious issues come up in the courtroom – and I would suggest that mistrials as a result of this issue are important.

How much is this transition going to cost beyond what's in the supplementary estimates, beyond what's been outlined already? What's the cost of upgrading the data technology, and what's the cost of keeping people up to date? As we know, right now court reporters supply their own equipment, and that equipment is supplied to the tune of $11,000 to $15,000 per court reporter, and then when it's upgraded, it's about $8,000. That's not an output that you have to worry about right now. So I'm wondering how that's all going to be managed. Quite frankly, I wouldn't want to be the first cases in court with this new technology rolling and be the accused in the box or the victim, for that matter, who may have to come back if there's a mistrial declared because of the technology in the courtroom.

I think there's still a need to have people in a courtroom, and I think that for all the reasons the minister has seen outlined by many people, including the judiciary, including the Canadian Bar Association, including the Criminal Trial Lawyers Association, all of those folks – why are we dismissing their concerns? I hope there's a really good reason for that.

So leaving there, I'd like to move on to legal aid. We haven't seen an increase in the legal aid budget, I don't think, since I've been elected, and this is my third year coming up. I'm a little concerned. You know, last year there was the issue of tariffs and an increase in tariffs that the Law Society was looking at. What resolution has your ministry come to with the Law Society in relation to an increase in the tariffs? Are we certain that they won't withdraw their services from the legal aid program as a result of the ongoing problem?

I might make a note to the minister that about 1996, I think it was, or '95 I had arrested an individual for sexual assault, and that trial took place in Westlock. I happened to make more money on that trial than the legal aid lawyer who was defending the accused. That was something that shocked me dramatically. It didn't hurt my pocket, but when you recognize the role of a defence counsel and the important role they play for an accused, I think the whole issue of tariffs and the appropriate remuneration is something that needs to be discussed.

I'm wondering why, if we have an increase in the population across this province, we're not planning ahead for the potential increase in the number of users. Also, what has the minister done in relation to increasing the number of lawyers who will take on legal aid family law? I've had many lawyers say to me, "No, I won't touch it. I'll do one pro bono case a year, and that's it." But there are many, many people out there who in fact don't get the services of family legal aid because the services aren't there. So I'm concerned about that. What kind of undertaking has the minister made to increase that particular ratio of lawyers who will take on those cases?

I'd like to move through to the medical examiner's office and just ask about the capital investments. Now, we see a 69.2 percent increase here, and I'm wondering what that particular increase is required for. Are they going to increase the building space required by the medical examiner's office? Are you going to be bringing in new technology for the ME? What sorts of things are going to happen there with that increase? It is for capital, not operations, so I'm just wondering if you can clarify that.

I'm happy to see that over my time here the crime prevention budget has increased from $25,000 to $1.5 million. I'm rather happy to see that. It was a little bit of a bug for me, but we now have an increase this year of 73.5 percent.

Now, the minister talked about some victim services programs. Are those programs going to come out of that crime prevention funding, or are those going to be funded through the 15 percent surcharge that was allocated, I believe it was last year, for fines? That is program 7.2.1. I'm just curious as to what would actually be construed as crime prevention programs under this government's mandate.

I'm wondering also, Mr. Minister, if you view projects such as Success by Six and some of the other early intervention programs as crime prevention programs, as I do. I think that if you're talking about just target-hardening programs, then I think we're missing the boat. If we're including some of those social elements that need to be included, then I think that's a move in the right direction. I'm a little concerned about $1.5 million going into just target-hardening programs throughout the province. That would concern me.

I also see very little increase – and this is a bit of a problem, I think – only a 1.5 percent increase, in the provincial policing programs element. I have to say that after what we've seen in this province over the last year, I'm wondering if this is going to adequately cover the issues and concerns we have. We have policemen around this province who are working virtually for nothing, Mr. Minister. They're putting in volunteer time to get their reports done. These are the guys and women who, regardless of how many hours they work, are making it out to the schools to deliver the DARE program that has been so widely received in this province yet not funded. I'm just wondering at what point you think all of that volunteer policing service just might come to an end, the workload of, among other things, answering calls on a night-to-night basis. Especially when you look at the RCMP and the numbers out in the community, the population-to-police ratio is very high in some of those communities. I think in Strathmore it is 1 in 1,400. It's certainly much different out in the rural areas than it is in the cities and the large municipalities.

I think the testimony that's coming out of the current case before the courts – and I'm not asking the minister at all to comment on that, but I will make this statement. Last year when I found out that money was diverted through the south Peace crime prevention agency and I confronted the Minister of Justice of the day and I confronted the RCMP assistant commissioner, I was told flat out that only public money was going for public policing. This is a great way of laundering money. Have we learned from the organized crime syndicate in this province how to launder money? I'm very concerned about this particular undertaking. This is not public money going to public policing.

I recognize that there are times when corporations will donate money. If they want to donate money for crime prevention programs such as Block Parent or Neighbourhood Watch – and they have done that for years – or for programs such as the rural service, Crime Watch, that the oil and gas companies were all a part of over a number of years, that's fine, but when it comes to funding police officers, that is not fine. I'm wondering why this is happening in this province, and if it's happening here, what other actions are we going to find out about in the near future?

I'll be honest with you, Mr. Minister. I cannot blame Alberta Energy in this particular instance for wanting to put money forward for policing, given the shortage.

MR. HANCOCK: Mr. Chairman, just on a point of order, if I may.

I think it's entirely inappropriate to go on at length on something which is clearly a reference to something which is before the courts, not just in a general sense for decision but in terms of hearing evidence. The hon. member knows that I can't comment on that, that I can't respond in any way to the comments that she's making at this point in time, and it's inappropriate for those comments to be going on the record. I'd be more than happy to deal with this issue. It's unfortunate that it coincides with the hearing of our estimates tonight, but it really is inappropriate to deal with that when it's so blatantly before the courts.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think you've had your answer.

MS OLSEN: I'll take my guidance from the minister. Certainly when all things are done and past, I would like to hear from him on the issue.

I'm going to ask this question: are there any other Crime Prevention Society schemes to funnel third-party money into our police forces in this province? That is something that I think Albertans need to know about. How many new police officers, Mr. Minister, have in fact been hired in this province over the last year? I'm very concerned about that population ratio outside of the large urban centres, although there it causes me some concern as well. When will you increase funding to cover some of these more serious deficits that occur within policing organizations?

We also know that there was a problem in Fairview. Fairview is a small community. Again, Mr. Chairman, this matter is before the courts, so I won't prolong this as well, but there was an issue in terms of a small community having access to the appropriate police resources to conduct an investigation. Those issues have been brought forward as well, and I'm wondering what the government is going to do to help out communities like that in the future. Again, I see that as a result of municipal downloading.

With that, we'll come back.

THE CHAIRMAN: Well, as hon. members can see, we haven't had within the 20 minutes the questions and the answers being given.

Hon. minister, in response.

MR. HANCOCK: Sure. I'd be happy to revert to that process at any time that members of the committee wish to.

Let me just deal with some of the questions that were raised. First of all, the increase in the communications budget. The member indicated, I think, a 649 percent increase. The bottom line was there was no communication budget in Justice previously. We had, I think, perhaps one person who was paid out of the Public Affairs Bureau, but essentially there was not a communications role in the Justice department of any magnitude. The justice summit identified very clearly concerns from the public in understanding the role of Justice, understanding what was happening in the court processes, so it's necessary to devote resources in that area just to have a better communication and understanding of what Justice does. If we're going to promote the concept of safe communities and promote the concept of partnerships and deal in areas with more involvement generally with the public through restorative justice processes, which involve very heavily and depend very heavily on the involvement of the public, there has to be a much better communication role.

There are also a number of initiatives that are being undertaken, including a review of the Police Act, which hasn't been reviewed since 1988. We're doing a review of family law, as I spoke to, and consolidation of family law. We're doing a review of the single-family law forum concept.

There are a lot of areas where we need to be in consultation with the public and have a good understanding and discussion of these areas, and a strong communications portion in the department is absolutely essential. I've talked publicly about justice as an acute care system and talked about the wellness side and how we go out into the community. That requires an ability for both communication of what we're talking about and hearing back from the public and involvement of them, a very essential part of the department in my perspective and one which was not adequately covered before. So that is the need for the relatively large increase.

Into the management information systems: $2.2 million. The bottom line there is that we had asked, I think, for some considerable amount more. The technology systems in Justice are not where they need to be. We don't have appropriate technology to allow for an easy transfer of information between all stakeholders or all participants in the justice system. We need to upgrade our technology rather considerably. This is a modest start on that upgrade. It'll probably provide for some case management technology at the Court of Appeal and the Court of Queen's Bench levels and other technology upgrades of that nature, but you can look, hopefully, if I have anything to say about it, to continuing increases in this area until we get appropriate technology and appropriate ability to deal with information-sharing.

On the court services side of the budget there's a bit of an anomaly for this year only, and that's because we're in the process of trying to resolve outstanding issues relating to the Provincial Court and compensation in the Provincial Court. You may have read recently that we will be establishing a Judicial Compensation Commission soon for the period commencing April 1. We will be making a recommendation to that Judicial Compensation Commission for increased pay, but we will also as a corollary to that be making some changes which the judges have long sought on the pension side, and we'll be funding that out of excess moneys currently in the judges' pension program. Those surplus moneys in the judges' pension fund are in the approximate area of $19 million to $20 million. That's a onetime in, although it doesn't show in our revenue. It's brought in from the pension fund as a surplus, and it will be paid back out to deal with some of the outstanding pension issues and hopefully resolve some of the outstanding lawsuits and allow us to really get on with the real work that needs to be done in reforming the court processes. So that's a bit of an anomaly.

The increase with respect to the Fort Saskatchewan court. Basically, there's been a new judge appointed out there, and that's the costs surrounding the appointment of a new judge and filling that position.

You dealt with court reporters, and there's not anything specific really in this budget which deals with court reporters. They are in the supplementary estimates, as you're well aware. As I mentioned in discussion on the supplementary estimates, there's approximately $3 million in those supplementary estimates for replacing the analog recording equipment that we now have with digital recording technology. This provides an opportunity for us, because we have to upgrade the recording technology that we have now in any event, and in looking at replacing that technology and going to the new digital technology, we made a determination that we would go to the higher level of recording systems.

I think, as I mentioned in the supplementary estimates, Justice personnel have gone to various locations including Halifax and, I believe, New Jersey and Tampa, Florida, to observe the digital court recording processes in action. They've attended conferences. This is not something where we woke up one day and said: you know, we want to make a change here. This is something that has been considered. The technology is there. I'm assured from the research that the Justice officials have done and from their on-site observation of it that it works and works well.

We have, as might be expected, feedback from members of the bar and members of the bench. As is always the case when you take in new staff, there will be people who say: no, don't go there. They'll be concerned about whether it's going to work. People will say: well, I don't want to be the first one. But, quite frankly, somebody always has to be the first one. We are in fact the last jurisdiction to go to recording technology in place of court reporters. I'm constantly given the feedback from people who say that in other jurisdictions it hasn't worked, but I'm satisfied that the recording technology we're going to be implementing is state of the art, is ahead of what other jurisdictions have. The feedback we've got is that it has worked much to the satisfaction of the bar and the bench in those areas where it's been utilized.

I have spoken with a number of members of the bar just on a random basis to ask for their reaction. Quite frankly, I'm not getting the reaction from my random calls that I'm getting from the people who are writing letters from either the bench or the bar, so I think there's a bit of a mixed message there.

We had been moving toward real-time recording. In fact, I think in the court reporters' job descriptions there had been questions or it had been a requirement that they move towards the real-time recording. The reality is that most lawsuits don't require that level of service. Most lawsuits don't require a same-day transcript or even a next-day transcript, so we're providing a really fantastic service which is used at a rather modest level. We think we can provide the same level of service with the recording. Yes, those recordings will have to be transcribed by typists when they're needed, as opposed to on a real-time basis in every courtroom where there's a court reporter.

We're keeping 16 court reporters to ease the transition and to make sure that in those cases where there's anticipated to be significant problems, that type of service can be available. The one example that I can think of might be where you have a testimony from someone who is deaf, and you might want some real-time transcribing so they can see the words across the screen. That's I think anticipated to be transitional, and we believe that once people see the recording processes in action, a lot of their fears will be allayed.

It has gone out to a request for quotation. At this stage we're looking at purchasing equipment I believe on or before the end of March for start-up at the beginning of July.

As I expressed during the examination of supplementary estimates, the main concern I have is how we deal with the people who have provided exemplary service in this particular area. That's why we have $2.7 million in the supplementary estimates. We want to make sure that they have the opportunity, if they so desire, either to continue on in the public service, albeit in another capacity, or to move to the private sector if they so desire. There was appropriate money available for retraining, for counseling, for severance, and those sorts of issues. We're very sensitive to the issue.

This isn't a downsizing question. This is a question of how we best utilize the resources that are available to us. We needed to upgrade the equipment, so we're going to upgrade it to the best equipment we can get, and then we're going to utilize the savings which come out of that. The payback period should be about two and a half years, and we'll have available to us then resources to do much more community-oriented justice projects.

The increase in legal aid. The last time it was increased was '96-97, I believe. We're dealing with issues relating to governance.

We're in mediation on the tariffs, and we're encouraging different plans for the provision of services; for example, a staff project on family law. Family law is an area where there's difficulty providing the number of services that are necessary. Funding on the same model as we've funded in the past might prove to be incredibly expensive, so we'd like to see the Legal Aid Society look at alternative service models and perhaps do a staff project in the family law area as an example.

Their budget does have built into it sufficient moneys to provide for certificate completion fees. Last year, as I recall, we released an additional $3 million that they had for payments on completion. While this remains an issue of concern to the bar, there are contingencies for issues like a major organized crime case. There's a built-in fund. This is an area that definitely needs some work, and we're in the process of talking with the Law Society and the Legal Aid Society about how this can be better operated.

Medical examiner. I think you may have missed a number or something because we're talking about relatively modest sums there: a $90,000 expenditure on a medic program, which is software technology for the medical examiner's office, and $150,000 will cover the increase in fees that are being paid to medical examiners across the province. A lot of our medical examiners are not full-time employees of the government. In fact, most of them offer themselves in their community, and they were being paid – well, if you thought the police officers were volunteering. They were being paid quite an insufficient sum. We've increased that sum by $150,000, a modest amount to cover that increase.

I might have missed the next one in terms of the direct questions that were there, but I think you were talking about victims of crime and crime prevention, perhaps more on the crime prevention side. I would certainly agree with you. In fact, I was hoping that somebody would ask the question in estimates as to why we hadn't increased the Justice budget for crime prevention more and I would be able to say that we have, because we've increased Health and Learning substantially. To me, those are crime prevention programs. If we have an educated population, if we have our kids well cared for – particularly you mentioned the Success by Six program. Programs like that do more for crime prevention than many other programs which we might have. I certainly am spending an awful lot of time talking about how we can improve our crime rate by dealing with kids early and dealing with the root causes of the problems in society that lead to the issue rather than, as I say, dealing with Justice as an acute care model and providing the equivalent of acute care hospital services once the problem is there.

A 1.5 percent increase in provincial policing programs. I think what's necessary to look at in that area is the fact that the federal government has not been meeting their commitment to provincial policing programs over the years. I'm hopeful; I haven't seen the final analysis, but in this year's federal budget it looks like they're finally stepping forward to top up their portion of the program to the extent it needs to be topped up. That will assist us I believe very substantially, together with the fact that they've now reopened their training centre in Regina and there will be more RCMP officers available.

That's of course the main area where we pay directly for policing, our provincial policing contract with the RCMP, and I'm delighted to see that it would appear, subject to further analysis, that the federal budget may have finally provided some of the funds that are necessary to meet their obligations with the provincial policing contract. That should go a long way to providing those extra police resources that are needed. We in turn, though, will be looking more substantively at the First Nations policing and some of the contracts we have there and looking at how that could be done more effectively.

The question about volunteer time is always a difficult one, because those of us who are very interested and active in what we do tend to go above and beyond the call of duty. I certainly appreciate the amount of time and effort that our police officers and other members of the community put in on a volunteer basis with respect to various programs and things they can do in the community to just make the community a safer place. So I don't want in my comments to diminish at all that volunteer service that's provided, but I'd also point out that community policing and crime prevention is a fundamental core business of police.

The job of police is not just to catch criminals after the fact. In fact, one of our main goals is safe communities. I've often said that I don't consider us to have a safe community if the object is to catch the people who break into our houses. The object of having safe communities is to have communities where people don't break into our houses. You do that by crime prevention. You do that by having better partnerships with the community, more people taking more of an interest in what's going on in their community.

You've talked about some of the early intervention programs, some of the diversion programs where one of the interesting things is that we have people, as I understand it, who come into our provincial correction services for an average of 46 days. Well, in those 46 days I'm not sure we're able to deal with some of the root causes of crime. The addictions questions, the alcoholism questions, we have to deal with those more.

To get back to your question on community policing, crime prevention is a fundamental core business of police. Should they have to do it on a volunteer basis? No, that shouldn't be the way it's provided all the time. Do I understand that the people who are committed to what they do and would consider themselves to be professionals work more than an eight-hour day usually and volunteer their time? Absolutely they do, and the community is always the better for it.

I'm not going to comment further on your comments about laundering money, only to say in the strongest possible terms that those comments in my view were totally inappropriate. We're not part of a money laundering scheme, never would be part of a money laundering scheme. And you, as a former member of the justice process, should know better than anyone that raising issues of that nature during a sensitive trial that's going on now would be inappropriate.

In terms of new police officers, I think I've dealt with the provincial side, where hopefully there will be new police officers available now that Regina is open for training and the federal government has committed their dollars back into the process. You alluded to what happened in Fairview, saying that there was a lack of resources, and I would have to correct that. There was no problem with access to police resources. They had all the resources they could use from a policing perspective there. The problem was that under our provincial Police Act the funding for overtime is paid for by the community. The basic policing is done under the basic policing contract. The problem that Fairview had and that some other communities like Cold Lake have had is that funding for overtime services is expected to be paid out of the community.

I expect that's an issue we will be addressing on a substantive basis under the review of the Police Act that's being undertaken right now, and we'll have to look at levels of service. We're looking at police training and police standards as part of it, and the whole question of how we pay for those overtime services, how we pay for policing and at what level in what communities will be, I presume, one of the things that's responded to in the Police Act review. There's also an AUMA task force which is dealing with that whole question. We'll be looking forward to it with interest.

I think that deals with all the questions I've had so far.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay.

Next person, the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thanks, Mr. Chairman. Good evening, Mr. Minister. Alberta children right now don't have equal claims to support from their parents when they separate. As you will appreciate, under the Divorce Act parental obligations in terms of support will continue till 18, but if the child is unable to be self-supporting because of illness or for any other reason, that support obligation may continue. Under the Domestic Relations Act support ends at 16 years under part 4 but at age 18 under part 7. Under the Maintenance Enforcement Act support ends at 16. Under the Parentage and Maintenance Act support ends at 18. So my question, Mr. Minister, is: why have you not acted on the recommendations of the Alberta Law Reform Institute? There are at least two reports that have addressed this. It is not, with respect, a difficult matter to resolve. If you are as interested as I am in making our legislation Charter-proof, can I ask why that matter is still outstanding?

MR. HANCOCK: We're reviewing in total the family law legislation, doing a comprehensive review of it, with the anticipation of bringing in one or two comprehensive acts hopefully next year. We believe it is more appropriate to do a comprehensive review and reform rather than to deal with things on a piecemeal basis.

MR. DICKSON: Excellent. I invite you to look at a private member's bill that had come into the Assembly three years ago, the Family Law Reform Act, that was a modest amateur effort to consolidate a number of statutes, and I appreciated the advice I got from the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek as I was drafting and putting that bill forward. That was very helpful to me.

Mr. Minister, will they also be actively considering then the unified family court, which is something else that the Liberal opposition has urged your department to address over the last five or six years?

MR. HANCOCK: The task force on the unified family court is in process. The Member for Calgary-Lougheed will be chairing it, and it will be formally announced in the next few days.

MR. DICKSON: Very encouraging.

Another recommendation I had made to your predecessor was to take advantage of the technology, afford the Alberta Court of Appeal a video record. You know, Mr. Minister, as somebody who's experienced with the way our civil system works, think of the amount of time that an appellate panel sits wrestling with books and books of transcripts trying to assess evidence and being stuck really with the trial judge's assessment, which is often skeletal and not all that helpful. The suggestion is: why wouldn't we look at providing a video record of viva voce evidence so that the Court of Appeal in appropriate cases would not be restricted to a transcript, whether an electronic format or hard copy, but be able to make full use of that kind of video technology? It's been suggested before. I won't characterize the responses I've received, but I'm still shopping for a minister who's interested. Could I have your response?

MR. HANCOCK: Well, I'm very interested in improving technology in the justice system. I think we're way behind where we should be. Of course, as you've noted from my comments tonight, we're pleased to take the next step and get into digital recording at the highest level possible. We sense resistance to that, so I'm not sure what resistance there would be to taking it a step further to video recording. The only comment I could make is that the Court of Appeal, in all of the technology requests they have before us, hasn't included that one.

We are, though, very interested in using video technology in other ways with respect to the courts in terms of allowing video conferencing processes, which will be both more convenient for the public in terms of their access to the courts and more convenient for Justice in terms of eliminating or reducing the amount of resources that are needed to move incarcerated persons around and that sort of thing.

I guess the short answer is that we're moving as fast as we can to upgrade technology. We've got a lot of priority areas. We could spend a lot of money on technology. Our important priority areas are in getting proper information systems together first. Certainly your suggestion of videoconferencing is one which should be on the table for future consideration, but it can't be up there at a priority level in terms of the need we have for technology improvement.

MR. DICKSON: Thank you, and I'll keep asking.

Mr. Minister, I compliment you. On page 218 of the business plan we've seen for the first time in my recollection an acknowledgment that public legal education is part of the responsibility of the provincial Department of Justice. I'm disappointed that it took the justice summit to highlight the need there, but I put to you one of the great ironies. In this province PLENA, the Public Legal Education Network of Alberta, probably provides the finest job of supporting, co-ordinating, and developing public legal education of any jurisdiction in Canada. I look at the kind of leadership provided with Alberta Law Foundation support. We're doing a terrific job, but I've always been struck - and this is the irony - that it's happened, frankly, in spite of our Department of Justice and despite what I regard as an abysmal lack of leadership on the part of your predecessor. So compliments to you and your deputy for identifying it on page 218.

Now, my question is: can you give me some concrete particulars? I mean other than simply studying it. This is not a new issue, Mr. Minister. I'd like to raise the threshold. Tell me: what concrete kinds of ways can you and your department provide some support and leadership to enhance, support, and leverage that very, very excellent public legal education program that already exists in the province?

MR. HANCOCK: Probably two key areas there in terms of initial action. The first will be the new Justice web site, which we hope will be comprehensive, interactive, and a valuable tool for public legal education, a valuable resource for teachers, for schools, and for everybody involved in the community in getting information on a timely and accurate basis. So the web site will be an important first step.

Secondly, as part of the increase in the communications budget we anticipate having a public education officer in Justice whose job will be to co-ordinate with the schools and community colleges to promote public education programs, to help co-ordinate the ways that we can be involved in public education. You might already be aware of the fact that the courts, particularly the Provincial Court, have engaged in a program of making judges more available to the schools to talk about the role of judges in the court system. We hope to dovetail with that, co-ordinate with that, so that programs can include understanding the role of Justice and the government.

The other thing which might be interesting to you is that the steering committee from the justice summit has agreed to stay on as a Justice Policy Advisory Committee. So with that group we have representatives from most, if not all, of the stakeholders in Justice and in the area of justice. We don't consider it the job solely of the Department of Justice to implement the recommendations from the justice summit. Quite frankly, neither do the stakeholders, and their advice to me is that this is something where we need to involve a broader cross section, a broader group of people, and each of the stakeholders has a role to play.

So that Justice Policy Advisory Committee will be playing an important role in identifying needed areas of public education, needed areas where we can partner with the community in providing a role for education. We and the dean of law serves on that committee have discussed at that committee, I believe - I'll have to check just to make sure, but I'll put this out anyway. We have checked on the question of having members of the education system other than the dean of the faculty of law involved in that Justice Policy Advisory Committee so we have better access to appropriate ways to do public education in the justice system.

MR. DICKSON: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

Can you give me some assurance that public legal education is going to be framed more broadly than it's described on page 218 of the business plan? To me I read that as trying to give people information about how the system works, but you know, you're talking to an old '60s activist who was involved when student legal services started at U of A and who was involved in starting Calgary legal guidance. I'm interested in people being able to get substantive information on how to access remedies too. It's not simply a question of giving them a better understanding of how, for example, the court system works and sentencing works and conditional release works.

A big part of that, whether somebody wants to be able to do their own divorce, whether somebody wants to be able to incorporate their own corporation - you know, I think it's important that we empower citizens to be able to find their own remedies in simple cases. So that, you'll appreciate, goes further than just sort of giving them a sense of how the system works. It's designing legislation so it's easy to read and understand. It's making forms accessible, either electronically or in hard copy. It's constantly looking at challenges involved in terms of accessing remedies in the system. So, Mr. Minister, can I ask you to address that somewhat broader view of public legal education and your department's role in it.

MR. HANCOCK: Well, we only have a 649 percent increase in the communications budget this year for that area, so I think it would be a bit of a stretch to expect us to go into almost the delivery or training for the delivery of legal services. I'm not suggesting that's not something that should be out there to be reached for, but I think it would be a stretch to suggest we'll get there this year or even in the next couple of years. I think what we really want to try and accomplish - and we see it, for example, through maintenance enforcement. It's very interactive in terms of assisting people with advice on where to go with the next steps.

We're going to be doing a lot more to simplify the court processes. We're hoping to be in a position where we can increase the limits, for example, on provincial small claims court so the average person can have access to those courts and use it themselves. I guess the corollary of all that is that every time you do that, it's necessary to make sure that there's good information available to the public as to how to access those courts or how to access those programs. So we will be spending more time, effort, and money on appropriate manuals, for example, and access to that process.

Again, I go back to the web site. I think electronic technology will be a boon to us. It is a work in progress. I can't promise that it's going to be delivering forms in all areas, but I would anticipate that that's a direction we would be going.

So I think we're going in that direction, and it's a question of how far, how fast, how much can you do, and what, really, should you be doing. Obviously we can't be providing legal advice, but we should be providing more and better access and the necessary information so that the public can make good use of that access.

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Minister, just moving on to page 223 of the business plan. The testament to my lack of persuasiveness is the fact that we still don't monitor the length of time it takes from the time a certificate of readiness is filed until the time a trial commences. We continue to track elapsed time from first to last appearance, but the biggest delays, where you don't have the advantage of Charter constraints to move things along, are on the civil side, and every year that I've come to query your predecessors, I've suggested that we should be monitoring delays and so on in terms of civil trials. I'm interested in your explanation in terms of why we don't do that.

Because I'm close to running out of time, I just wanted to get into another area quickly. You're obviously interested in technology. Mr. Minister, I've been watching with some interest in Ontario the integrated justice project which has e-filing capability. This is the thing with the SHL/Systemhouse consortium. This was in response to the 1996 CBA report of the System of Civil Justice Task Force. It's interesting. In Alberta we've had arguably the most technologically sophisticated Court of Appeal in the country for a long time. There have been lots of advances in different areas. You're interested in dealing with court reporting, but I'm interested in terms of why we haven't looked at something more comprehensive, as is evidenced in the Ontario jurisdiction, because there may well be some advantages that accrue to doing things in that fashion.

The other question, Mr. Minister, will be no surprise to you. We've seen the Ontario government deal with legislation dealing with same-sex partnerships. The federal government has now introduced legislation to deal with that. I always encourage the provincial government to make our legislation Charter-proof. My question is: when may we expect that the province is either going to accept what we'll call the Liberal model of domestic partnerships or come up with a Conservative government variation? The end is to make our legislation Charter-proof, be able to reduce those stiff fees we're paying out to the firms that we dispatch to the Supreme Court of Canada on a regular basis to do battle on behalf of the provincial government.

For those questions maybe I could look for a response from the minister, Madam Chairman, if I still have some time left.

MR. HANCOCK: With respect to the question of measuring the time to trial from certificate of readiness, I think you're probably as aware as I am, although I haven't practised in the civil litigation area for the last number of years in my practice, that that is not really a measure of the effectiveness of the system inasmuch as that's still very much in the control or partially in the control of the parties to the action as much as anything else.

What we are interested in doing, though, is providing for the freeing up of court resources by encouraging more pretrial processes of mediation, mediation earlier on files, looking at some of the things that are happening, for example, in B.C. and Ontario with respect to whether there should be a compulsory aspect to the provision of mediation or whether there should be at least a procedure whereby one of the parties could trigger mediation prior to trial. Those are, I think, more effective ways of dealing with the issue of utilization of our court resources than perhaps measuring the time between certificate readiness and trial.

The median time used in goal 5 that you cited is the only national measure there is. Sometimes that's one of the problems you have when you're trying to find measures which can be appropriately utilized in this sort of a context, where you're trying to find something, where you don't have to invent a whole new method of collecting data and you have something to measure it against. Personally, I guess I would like to see us move over time to inclusion of some more qualitative analysis of results and those sorts of things. I'm always open to suggestions as to what better measures we can have and where you would find the benchmarks to measure them against.

In terms of technology, the integrated justice project in Ontario that you mentioned I understand has been some four years and $200 million in the making and is still not up and running. We don't have those kinds of resources to put into that type of a long-term project. We are doing our own integrated justice review, and we are looking to get some information on that in the relatively near future as to what we might utilize. As I mentioned earlier, we are doing a technology plan for the department in terms of all of the issues, information sharing, a project which will bring together the information resources and the planning resources at all levels of the department and, in addition to the department, including the courts. So we're not sure that the Ontario model is a good one given the time and money that's gone to trying to develop it, but we are working in that area and are very interested in improving our own integrated information system.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Okay. Thank you. It's 20 minutes.

The next member up is Drumheller-Chinook.

MRS. McCLELLAN: I just have a couple of rather quick questions. One I'm interested in is the youth justice committees and the process for those, if the Minister would like to give just a wee bit of information on that. Also, just an update on the transfer of the community corrections program to aboriginal communities. I'm interested in the amount of interest that the minister is finding here.

MR. HANCOCK: Sorry; I missed that.

MRS. McCLELLAN: The community corrections program that's available to aboriginal communities. I'm wondering what the take-up on that is.

The public perception of safety in the neighbourhood was of interest to me, and I wondered if you might have some information on that by region. I sense in my community that the policing is working out quite well. There was a period of time where we had a number of concerns on rural policing, but that seems to have leveled out, and if you had some regional information, it would give me an indication. I don't expect that now but when you would have an opportunity.

I'm interested in any progress that's being made or initiatives that are being taken to address some of the concerns with the Young Offenders Act, which seem to be ongoing.

A question was posed to me on Friday, and I don't know whether you have the answer, but maybe you could just indicate by nodding your head if you're responsible for the highway traffic police. Is that the Minister of Infrastructure? The question was posed to me, just for the member's use, as to what role special constables have in policing on secondary roads and if there's going to be a duplication or an overlap. I'm sure I'll get an opportunity to pose that to the Minister of Infrastructure if and when his estimates come up. Certainly we don't need duplication, and I think it is important that we define what responsibility or jurisdiction special constables have. Many municipalities have put these in place. It's working very well. Obviously it's a big province, and we don't really want you to send out a bunch more people into an area where it is working. We might need them more in more heavily populated areas.

Those were really my questions. I didn't want to take a lot of the committee's time, Mr. Minister. Oh, I had one more. I apologize.

There were pilot projects in place working with young people in young offenders' institutions in Calgary and Edmonton. I believe in Calgary it was linked to sports, and in Edmonton it was linked to the arts. They were given some exposure and training, I suppose you might say, while in the institution and then linked to community people when they left the institution. The first indications I recall were that it was positive and that the principle of it, of not allowing the case where young offenders simply go back to the situation that sort of got them in there in the first place – I'd like to know if those projects are still going and, if they are, what indications there are as to their success.

Those are my questions, Mr. Minister.

MR. HANCOCK: Well, I'll try and answer them quickly. We have youth justice committees covering about 75 percent of the province now. There are 80 committees in place. They're formed under the auspices of federal legislation; that sets up the criteria. They basically are volunteer organizations coming forward from the community, and then we appoint them. We have some resources in our budget this year to provide some support for them. I feared in the past that we didn't have the resources to provide the support they needed, but we're moving in that direction because they do good work.

MRS. McCLELLAN: Any questions that you don't have the immediate answer for I'd be happy to have you just drop me a note.

MR. HANCOCK: Okay.

Community correctional services currently has some $6 million in contracted aboriginal services, including the operation of camps and a correctional centre by and for aboriginal people. I'll get you additional information on that.

I don't have stats for you at hand about the safety by region. I think one of the things that's very clear is that – for example, I was down in Calgary recently assisting with the kickoff of the new Block Watch program – those types of programs where the community takes some responsibility for seeing what's going on in the neighbourhood are very important in the urban areas. Rural Crime Watch fits into that area, as well, for rural areas. But in terms of statistics by region, I'll have to get you those details later.

The Young Offenders Act. As you know, the federal government has introduced again its Youth Criminal Justice Act. We've had commentary on that. We've had concerns about how far it goes. The justice ministers met in B.C. in early December and again raised some concerns. Ontario has basically taken the position that the Youth Criminal Justice Act should be scrapped. Quebec has taken that position as well. They've taken it from opposite ends of the spectrum. We've taken a position that we should play a positive role. We've encouraged the federal government to make changes to that act to deal with some of the issues and concerns we have, but we're also moving forward to implement some of the provisions of that act and some of the alternative-measures programs and those sorts of things which we think are effective for those young offenders who can be rehabilitated or otherwise dealt with outside the system.

We think there should be access, for example, for younger children, not because we want to throw kids under 12 in jail but because there needs to be some way of bringing them into the process so that they can be dealt with in the alternative processes. We think there should be an easier access for kids over 16, for example, to move them into the adult court system. By and large, we're saying that we want to work with it and do what we can to implement some of the positive things that are in it as well.

The role of special constables particularly on secondary highways. We're negotiating, working with Infrastructure as we speak and with other stakeholders to determine what the role will be, who will do the policing on secondary highways, and how that will be integrated with the overall system. One of the things I would want to mention is that we do not expect that special constables should do policing. Policing is something that should be done by persons who are trained in policing. Special constables have their place for bylaw enforcement processes, for other things, but they shouldn't be acting as police on our highways. That's an area of concern. If there's going to be a secondary level of policing, then there needs to be appropriate training and appropriate resourcing for that.

In terms of projects for young offenders, I don't have the data at hand specifically relating to the program. I remember the program you're talking about. I'll have to get you that information. We are working more in terms of those types of programs. For example, there's a transition program with the city of Edmonton whereby the city has agreed to provide work experience for young offenders so that they can build up their résumé, so to speak, and have a positive work program in place, because we want to make sure that young offenders coming out of a correctional facility or coming out of our system have an opportunity to stay out of the system.

The city of Edmonton, for example, has taken the initiative on a program which may well do that, where they'll hire a young offender. They don't have to be people that are in the correction system, but they'll hire a youth, give them work experience, and give them something on their résumé so they have something to take forward. I think those programs are very positive.

We've got to appreciate that everybody that comes into our system, into a provincial correction centre, whether they're seniors or youth or non youth, is going to come back out into the community. Unless we have a positive experience for them and we've somehow added to their ability to deal with their particular issues in the community, we haven't done anything for the safety of the community. So we need to deal with those.

MRS. McCLELLAN: Thank you.

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have a number of questions this evening, and my colleague for Edmonton-Norwood is anxious to get another chance to ask more questions. I see there is a substantial change in the budget of the medical examiner's office. I've been advocating for some time, and I'm wondering if it is not a plan of the government to conduct now – my question would be:

are you planning a fatality inquiry whenever there is the unfortunate circumstance of an Albertan losing his or her life on a work site? Is this something that your government is planning: a fatality inquiry every time there is someone fatally injured on a work site?

Now, I have a few questions also regarding the courts. What are the current backlog statistics for the province? What is the major hindrance? Are the prosecutors finally being paid enough, and are there enough of them?

MR. HANCOCK: Sorry. What was the first part of that question?

MR. MacDONALD: What is the major hindrance? Are the prosecutors finally being paid enough, and are there enough of them?

I'm quite agreeable if the hon. minister would like to respond at a later date by letter, as well, if he does not have the time or the resources, perhaps, to answer some of these questions this evening, Mr. Chairman.

Regarding the new supercourtroom that has been announced for Edmonton to be completed by September 1 of this year, out of what budget will this funding come?

What are the government's plans, also for the hon. minister, with respect to court reporters, and how are those plans reflected in this budget? Is there going to be a digital court recording system installed in every courthouse throughout the province, or is it going to be a system that's probably going to fit in the trunk of someone's car as they go from courthouse to courthouse in rural Alberta?

I have a number of questions concerning organized crime. Everyone of us around this table, I believe, would be concerned and would certainly be offering words of encouragement to the hon. minister if he can fight organized crime in this province. What is the extent of organized crime in the province now, and what is this government doing about it? The laundering of money in casinos has been an issue that has certainly been brought to my attention by worried constituents who have visited the constituency office on more than one occasion. How much money is laundered through casinos and other government gambling businesses?

Can the hon. minister say who controls the importation and distribution of illegal drugs in the province? I am sure there's monitoring going on regarding these activities and the gangs or organizations who control heroin, cocaine, marijuana, ecstasy. If he can divulge any information to me, I would be very curious and grateful as well.

Also for the minister: what is the global budget provincially to combat any further expansion of organized crimes? Given that new Canadians and new Albertans are often victimized by organized crime in their community, it is often important that there are community police officers able to communicate with and gain the trust of those citizens. Further, to move into gangs of a specific ethnicity, it is important that the composition of police forces reflects the ethnic composition of the communities they serve. To that end, will the minister advise the committee on the number of police officers of, for instance, Vietnamese ethnicity in the province, the number of police officers of Chinese ethnicity, of native Canadian ethnicity, of Sikh ethnicity? Is there any direction or incentive for municipal police services to ensure that their police forces are a reflection of the community that they serve?

I have another question for the hon. minister. We worry about language services for health authorities to ensure that non English speakers are able to communicate for their health services. What funding or programs are in place to ensure that police services in larger centres have the linguistic skills necessary to serve all citizens properly? Can the hon. minister indicate the number and in which languages the RCMP, the Calgary Police Service, and the Edmonton Police Service offer services?

I also have a question for the hon. minister. Are there any more initiatives for creative sentencing in the provincial courts?

The issue of pine shakes of course. Many constituencies have been victimized by this scandal but some constituencies more than others. There are some constituencies in the province where it is stated that up to 3,000 homes are victims. Now, if there are legal opinions that the Department of Justice has received, legal opinions existing that free the government of any involvement in this, I believe it would be in the interests of the province, in the interests of courtroom time, and in the interests certainly of the homeowners if those legal opinions could be released to the public. I wonder when that will be done.

Now, we all know that this is very expensive, and homeowners in some cases have been victimized twice by the government. There's been mismanagement and misinformation, and there's also the issue of the treated pine shakes. Hopefully we're not going to go down the same road as the untreated pine shakes, down the road to the courthouse. This is certainly an issue that we cannot see repeated. If the minister can shed any light on those legal opinions for us, I would be grateful. Also, what is the liability insurance carried by the province? If there is going to be a settlement of this, will that insurance policy cover it, or are the taxpayers going to be on the hook?

Also, I have a question on community volunteer policing. In my constituency – and I'm proud to be associated with these individuals – there is the Ottewell community patrol. It's a volunteer patrol. There are many patrols of this nature, of course, across the city and across the province. What measures does the hon. minister have to support these volunteer patrols in the future? They provide vital information to the police, and I believe they are very effective in allowing for economical policing to occur. They're very necessary. If the hon. minister has any programs that are going to help these organizations in the future, I would be delighted to hear about them.

Also, the Auditor General has been making observations on each department, as we all know. The Auditor General's office has recommended "that the Department of Justice report the results and costs of its fines collection activities," and I would like to know when the hon. minister's department is going to make these necessary reports public.

I have one more question, Mr. Chairman, and that's related to massage centres. I note the hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek and her initiative last year, the protection of children in prostitution. Before I came here, I saw on the evening newscast an update on that whole issue. The police were patrolling the neighbourhoods of the city of Edmonton here, and they were remarking that there was a notable decrease in the number of child prostitutes on the streets. That is certainly something that is positive. Now, whether this will be upheld in the courts, this whole idea, is another matter. I certainly hope that these activities simply have not been moved indoors.

As I am aware and as I understand – correct me, hon. minister, if I've missed something here – at present there are no provincial regulations regarding the practice of massage therapy in the province of Alberta. I understand that there are many groups with an interest in developing standards on a provincial level. The various cities at the present time within Alberta may set their own bylaws regarding requirements. I understand that in the city of Edmonton – and it may be similar in Calgary – you need a business licence, and you need permission from the police chief or his or her designate. I believe this is inadequate.

There has to be some sort of public consultation process here, I think. These centres seem to spring up overnight. Police resources are limited in patrolling them to see if they are operating within the confines of the bylaws. I was shocked when I looked into this that there were no provincial regulations, and I think there is a need for provincial consultations, particularly consulting the immediate neighbourhood as to the establishment of such a business, particularly since one not too far away here on Jasper Avenue has recently been visited by the vice squad, and I believe charges have been laid. I forget the name of this establishment, but this has been an event that has happened here in the last couple of weeks.

I would be very anxious to hear from the hon. Minister regarding this issue. As I said earlier, if he does not have the answers available now, a letter at some time in the future is fine.

Those are my questions at this time, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay. Hon. minister, in the seven minutes remaining.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Well, with respect to the first comment relating to the medical examiner's office and the increase in that budget, I think I answered that question fairly definitively earlier on, but I would repeat for your benefit that the increase in that budget is dealing with providing for technology, particularly software, a MEDIC program for the medical examiner's office, and for the increase in the stipends paid to the non-union employee medical examiners who are utilized around the province.

It's not our intention to have an automatic fatality review inquiry with respect to every death on a work site. There is a Fatality Review Board in place. The Fatality Review Board reviews every fatality outside the hospitals, I believe, across the province and makes recommendations as to when that fatality review inquiry is necessary. I believe that's a fairly comprehensive program, one that works very well for Albertans and one that we would anticipate continuing to use. Typically when the Fatality Review Board indicates that they feel there should be an inquiry, an inquiry is held, but that doesn't impact the medical examiner officer's budget in any way that I'm aware of.

In terms of major hindrances there's money in the budget which will allow us, subject to correction, to hire additional prosecutors so that we can move ahead with some of the initiatives that we have, one of which is, for example, early review of files so that we can get to an early resolution of some matters and thus take some of the pressure off the court system. One of the problems we have is a very high collapse rate. In other words, we overbook the courts on a daily basis. It's sort of like an airline. You overbook it because you know that certain ones won't show up or will collapse on the steps of the courthouse, so to speak.

We still are not making efficient use of the judges and the courtrooms that we have available to us now because of that high collapse rate. So it's necessary to hire some prosecutors. We're working on a pilot basis now to see what we can do at the early stages of a file to resolve some of those things so we don't have as many getting to the courthouse and collapsing. That's one of the issues that we really have to deal with, and we're going to devote some resources to doing that.

In terms of the new courtroom there was an announcement made I think last week that a courtroom would be provided in the courthouse in Edmonton. We're renovating some space which is currently being used for other purposes, so there will be an additional court facility available. It's already accessible to the lockups and the other security provisions, so it's an appropriate way to deal with the issue.

I'm pleased to say that it's being paid out of Infrastructure's budget, not our budget, at a relatively modest cost in comparison to what other jurisdictions have done. I think the sum is about $1.5 million. We'll end up with an appropriate court facility which can be utilized both for this particular set of charges that are coming forward in September as well as for ordinary court utilization. And yes, it will have digital recording equipment available to it.

You raised the question of court reporters, court reporting, and digital recording equipment. Yes, every courtroom in the province will be equipped with appropriate digital recording technology. We will not be having the court clerk or the judicial clerk or the judge carry around the tape recorder in the trunk of his car. We will have state-of-the-art technology, and it'll be available to Albertans in every courtroom in the province.

Organized crime. A very interesting question, and one which I'm sure I'd like to be able to provide the answers to and I'm sure the police would like to provide the answers to in terms of how much organized crime there is in Alberta, quantifying it, how much money is being laundered through casinos and that sort of thing. Those are very interesting questions but I'm not sure are ones which we would do anybody any service attempting to stab at answers for.

The bottom line is that we are working very hard with the police services both in the province and nationally to co-ordinate information sharing and to make best utilization of the resources we have available to us to counteract organized crime. At the ministers of justice and attorneys general conference that I alluded to earlier in B.C. at the beginning of December, we spent the better part of a day on presentations from various police forces, the RCMP and other police forces across the country, to give us a better concept of the magnitude of the problem they're dealing with, where it sits. It's a huge problem. It's one where, with the advent of technology and the Internet, the organized crime situation is moving with the speed of light or at least the speed of fibre optics. Some of the traditional tools which have been used to combat organized crime such as wiretap, for example, don't apply on the Internet. Encryption technology is a problem that police forces are having to deal with in terms of how they combat organized crime.

So suffice it to say that it's a serious problem. It's not limited to any one particular group of people. There are eastern European organized crime syndicates. There are Asian gangs, of course. There are now aboriginal gangs coming into play. There are a number of different sectors, and they don't stick to any one commodity anymore. They'll do anything which they can make money at, so police forces are reorganizing themselves. Instead of being commodity specific, they're now looking at overall global contacts relating to the crime syndicates themselves. Of course, it would be nice to be able to identify who exactly is behind these and get the information so they could be arrested. That's the job the police are conducting on an ongoing basis.

We have committed $8 million over three years to CISA, Criminal Intelligence Service Alberta, which is basically a program of . . . My 20 minutes aren't up already? My gosh.

MR. WOLOSHYN: Yes, they are. You're some talker.

MR. HANCOCK: I think that was the end of his 20 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

In any event, basically the global budget for combating organized crime – again, that's difficult to put a specific figure on. As I say, provincially we have specifically targeted $8 million over three years to this information sharing process, but you'd find the organized crime-fighting budgets in each of the police budgets for both the city of Edmonton and the city of Calgary, the RCMP provincial policing contract, as well as the federal RCMP presence in the province. So it would be difficult to sort of pick one number, isolate that out, and say that that's how much is being spent fighting organized crime.

In fact, one could argue and I often do take the opportunity to point out to people that when their kids are buying drugs in the neighbourhood or in the school, they are contributing to the profits of organized crime. So we can't take lightly – I've heard people say and I know you've heard people say that, you know, it's just marijuana; why make such a big issue of it? But that is the source of funds for organized crime. That's the real attraction. Those are the issues we have to deal with. We have to deal with them right in our community. So fighting organized crime is dealing with the drug dealers, it's dealing with the people who buy drugs, right from that level all the way up to the sophisticated electronic monitoring that we have to do and that the police need to have the technology to do.

There's a number of other questions that have been asked, some of them very interesting but not necessarily getting to really the root of my business plan.

In terms of the planning issues surrounding the location of massage parlours, we don't deal with planning issues at the provincial government level. That clearly is a civic issue.

I'd like to express appreciation for what I heard was support for the Protection of Children Involved in Prostitution Act and the need to make sure that that act stays in place. I think I heard you say that it's been very effective in keeping young prostitutes off the street or getting them off the street. I share your concern about, you know, we haven't really solved the problem if we just get them off the street and they move indoors. I would hope that licensing criteria that cities use would prohibit anybody under the age of 18 from being involved in providing massage services, but that clearly is a matter for the municipalities, and it's not one that we contemplate getting into provincially.

With those comments, I'll leave the rest of your questions.

Mr. Chairman, I would move that the committee now report progress.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay. The hon. Minister of Justice has moved that the subcommittee do now rise and report progress to the committee. All those in support of this, please say aye.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Aye.

THE CHAIRMAN: Opposed, please say no.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: No.

THE CHAIRMAN: Carried.

The committee therefore will reassemble downstairs.

[The subcommittee adjourned at 9:59 p.m.]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Community Development.

MR. WOLOSHYN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Since 1911 March 8 has been identified as the date to recognize the achievements of women. I'd like to table an information bulletin on International Women's Day, which as we all know happens tomorrow.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to table five copies of the agreement between the Blood tribe, the Peigan Nation, and the Siksika Nation, the Glenbow-Alberta Institute, and the province of Alberta which was signed on January 14 in the year 2000. The repatriation of the 251 sacred ceremonial objects listed on the attached schedule will become entrenched in law following the proclamation of Bill 2.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, it's my pleasure today to table five copies of a document that all Albertans will be receiving in their homes this week. It is Bill 11, printed with laymen's descriptions of the various clauses of the bill. It is accurate. [interjections] It is accurate, and I challenge anybody in this Assembly, since there is some interest across the way in not having accurate information out there. I'm sorry for them with respect to that, but this is the bill. This is the bill, and I wish to table those copies with the Assembly.

Further, Mr. Speaker, just so we are open with respect to what we're doing here, I'd also like to table with the Assembly five copies of the accompanying press release, which is also accurate and . . . [interjection] Well, it doesn't seem to be of interest to those folks either. Nevertheless, I'm tabling it.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, I have two tablings today. The first is a letter to Jake Kuiken, president of the Alberta Association of Registered Social Workers, regarding National Social Work Week, honouring the outstanding efforts of social workers in Alberta, who make a huge contribution to the children of Alberta.

The second, Mr. Speaker, are two documents relative to the steering committee membership and terms of reference for the independent caseload review. This is in response to issues raised in the Children's Advocate report last year. The membership and the terms of reference, I believe, will do a thorough job and are committed to studying thoroughly beneath the surface as well as the usual caseload contained.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a document called Private Highway, One-Way Street: The Deklein and Fall of Canadian Medicare? This is a study that's been released today by the five top health economists in Canada: Evans, Barer, Lewis, Rachlis, and Stoddart.

Stripped to the bone, the Alberta proposal appears to be little more than taking lousy odds on very small payoff, and gambling with the health of Canada's health care system, for the sake of a few . . . health care providers who would stand to gain considerably in the short term. It is troubling that the rest of Canada has been so slow to take notice of Alberta, and that the premier has taken so little notice of Albertans' vehement objections.

MR. HANCOCK: Point of order.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am tabling the requisite copies of 11 letters. They were written by residents of St. Albert, Stony Plain, and Edmonton, and all of them are expressing their strong opposition to Bill 11.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I beg leave to table five copies of a report by an injured worker that outlines the serious contradictions between information provided by caseworkers to injured workers, the WCB Act, their policies and their procedures.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to table this afternoon two packages: the first one a set of messages from 283 Calgaryans opposed to the undermining of public health care and the second package made up of 499 messages from Albertans in Calgary, Edmonton, Vermilion, and St. Albert. With the petitions that makes 950 Albertans registering today they will not be bamboozled by this government's Bill 11 PR campaign.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

MR. WICKMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm tabling a number of letters from concerned Albertans which represent a tiny, tiny sample of the correspondence we're getting in the constituency office, a tiny sample. The first one is from Maureen Doucette. Then we have Karen Anderson. We have Baldwin Reichwein. We have Nabil Azar. We have John Zurawell. He's so concerned that he's twice written different letters. If I tabled them all, I'd be here for the whole afternoon.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table five copies of a transcript of a confrontation between Andy Marshall, CEP local 115A, and Conrad Black, owner of the Calgary Herald. Mr. Black's threat to decertify the union after two years is both an indictment of Alberta's unfair labour laws and an indication that Mr. Black is engaged in union busting.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have five letters here from E. Palichuk, Maureen Huson, Mr. and Mrs. Frasch, Joan Ambruck, and Valerie Parks, all expressing that they do not want their tax dollars diverted into profits for shareholders for private, for-profit hospitals.

head: Introduction of Guests

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-North Hill.

MR. MAGNUS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me great pleasure today to be able to introduce a longtime and one of my best friends in the world. He's in our gallery today. He also happens to work for the Alberta government within Children's Services. I would ask that my friend Mark Kastner stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of this House.

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce to you and through you to Members of the Legislative Assembly a good friend and one of the great entrepreneurs in this province. He's seated in the members' gallery, and I would ask Mr. Bruno Muller, president and CEO of Caron Transport, to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan.

MR. LOUGHEED: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to introduce to you and to the Assembly students from three classrooms in two different schools: from Win Ferguson community school accompanied by Mrs. Pat Sprague and Miss Joanne Hadley and also a group of students from Ministik elementary school accompanied by Mr. Arnie Duncan. I'd ask them to please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Gaming.

MR. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It was even money whether you were going to recognize me or not. So now that we've won that bet, it gives me great pleasure today to introduce to you and through you to the Assembly Mr. Al Browne, chairman of the Alberta Gaming Industry Association, an organization that got together on their own recognizance over a year ago, and they've all formed this Alberta Gaming Industry Association that works with government, with its stakeholders. With him is Mr. Don Waldorf, president and CEO of the association. I would ask that both take their chances and stand up and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure for me to rise on behalf of my colleague from Edmonton-Riverview and introduce through you to the Assembly 27 visitors from the constituency of Edmonton-Riverview. They are a grade 6 class from St. Martin Catholic school, accompanied by their teacher, Mrs. Natalie Harasymiw, and I would ask if they would now please rise and be welcomed by the Chamber.

MR. GIBBONS: Mr. Speaker, I have two introductions today. I'd like to introduce to you and through you to the Members of the Legislative Assembly Valerie Holowach, who is the past chairman of Lakeland community health council, presently a member of Lakeland regional mental health advisory committee, and currently a councillor of the city of Fort Saskatchewan. She's in the public gallery, and with your permission I'd ask that she now stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce to you and through you to the Members of the Legislative Assembly a group of people from the Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan constituency: Bob Fischer, past president and charter member of the Fort Saskatchewan Lions Club; Stella Chorney, a registered nurse with 40 years' experience, presently working in the Fort Saskatchewan health centre; Klaus and Renate Harder – Klaus is retired from the construction business and domestic engineer – Peter and Nancy Dolhaniuk – Peter is retired from the Capital health authority, and Nancy is a stay-at-home grandma – Orest Holowach, retired, entrepreneur, and president of Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan Liberal association. They're in the public gallery, and with your permission I'd ask that they now stand and receive the warm traditional welcome of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose.

MR. JOHNSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to introduce to you and through you to the members of this Assembly three guests from Lipany, Slovakia, one from Sherbrooke, Quebec, as well as my wife Dianne, who is accompanying our guests today. Jana Majtnerová is an exchange student at the Camrose composite high school, and she's also staying with us for the year. She's accompanied by her parents from Slovakia, Anna and Jozef Majtner, who are also taking the time to visit our great province, and also Amelie Fauchon, a participant in the Katimavik youth program, who is staying in Camrose at the present time. As I mentioned, my wife Dianne is accompanying the group. They are seated in the public gallery, and I'd ask them to rise and receive your warm welcome.

head: Oral Question Period

THE SPEAKER: First Official Opposition main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Private Health Services

MRS. MacBETH: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. The evidence against the Premier's private hospitals scheme in Alberta continues to mount daily. Doctors who know the health care system are telling Albertans that the Premier's scheme for private hospitals is wrong, that it's a prescription without a diagnosis. My questions are to the Premier. Why should Albertans believe this Premier when the spokesperson for 1,700 physicians in Calgary has said that the private hospitals scheme of the Premier will increase waiting lists and reduce the number of health care professionals who are available for the public health care system?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that this doctor take the time, read the bill, and understand that this is a protection of the public health system. As a matter of fact, that's what the bill is entitled: the health protection act. There are other doctors who have other opinions. I understand that Larry Ohlhauser of the Alberta Medical Association says that this is the route to go. So, you know, there are all kinds of opinions on all sides of this issue.

I would say: let Albertans decide for themselves what is right. The bill only went out today to all the households, and I look forward with a great deal of anticipation to the thoughts, the unfettered thoughts hopefully, of Albertans. Albertans don't need to be led by Liberals.

I know that the leader of the Liberal opposition is out there saying that Albertans cannot think for themselves. I know that she's out there insulting the intelligence of Albertans, Mr. Speaker, but let Albertans think for themselves. Let Albertans provide their honest opinions, and let them do it without the malicious untruths and misinformation that is being spread by the Liberals.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, this Premier has just insulted 1,700 physicians in Calgary.

Mr. Speaker, why should Albertans believe this Premier when a spokesperson for physicians in the Capital regional health authority says that the Premier's private hospitals will not lead to cost savings nor to improvements in the quality of care?

MR. KLEIN: I apologize. Dr. Ohlhauser is with the College of Physicians and Surgeons, but again this is the college that is deemed to be supreme in terms of determining medical discipline, medical expertise, the regulation of medical practices, Mr. Speaker. So if this hon. member over here is saying that Dr. Ohlhauser has no credibility, let her stand up and say so. I would like to hear that coming from her mouth.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, who did this Premier consult with other than vested interests and spin doctors to draft this legislation?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm glad she finally asked the question. We started the consultation process last November, when we put out the policy statement and asked Albertans to respond to the policy statement. We heard from medical professionals. We heard from health care economists. We received reports for; we received reports against. The Liberals certainly engaged themselves in a campaign. CUPE engaged themselves in a campaign. The MDs engaged themselves in a campaign. The Friends of Medicare engaged themselves in a campaign.

There have been almost four months now of public consultation. This follows a blue-ribbon panel report on this very, very issue that urged us to bring in legislation of this nature. So I would say that this bill has probably been the subject of more consultation than any other piece of legislation ever brought before this Assembly.

MRS. MacBETH: And he still can't get it right, Mr. Speaker.

We know the Premier's not listening to physicians in Alberta, so let's look a little bit further. Respected health care economists Robert Evans, Morris Barer, Steven Lewis, Michael Rachlis, and Greg Stoddart, most notable health economists in Canada, say that this government has made a completely wrong diagnosis on this bill, saying it's a Trojan horse private hospitals bill that the Premier has put forward. Deklein Klein's medicine seems to be their message. My questions are to the Premier. Why should Albertans trust a Premier's private hospitals scheme when renowned health economists are saying that it is nothing more than a prescription to dismantle medicare?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I don't know about the others, but I've heard the name Steven Lewis before. I don't know if it's the same Steven Lewis, but if it is, he is world renowned as being the socialist guru of Canada.

MRS. MacBETH: Actually, Mr. Speaker, this Steven Lewis is the head of the Saskatchewan hospital utilization commission, and this Premier would be smart to look at it.

Mr. Speaker, since these economists state that there is a great deal . . . [interjections] Settle down, you guys; just settle down. Since these economists state that there is a great deal of money to be made by wrecking medicare, will this Premier now admit that his private hospitals bill is a prescription for profit for his special-interest groups?

MR. KLEIN: The answer is no. But, again, I would repeat a statement I made in the Legislative Assembly a few days ago, Mr. Speaker. She alludes to special-interest groups, but she doesn't have the courage to stand up and name them either inside this Legislative Assembly or outside the Legislative Assembly.

As I indicated before, there are reports. There are some physicians who support the legislation. There are some physicians who oppose the legislation. There are some physicians, I would suggest most of them, who want to read the proposed legislation and understand what it says.

Relative to reports, as I said before, Mr. Speaker, there are reports and reports and reports. I recall last week the hon. Minister of Health and Wellness tabling a report from the World Health Organization. Is this hon. member suggesting that the World Health Organization is not a reputable organization? If she says the WHO is not a reputable organization, stand up and say so, because the WHO says that services may be offered by providers of all types. Provided that health practices and health facilities meet certain quality standards, which they will have to in this legislation, and that they are subject to several levels of managerial flexibility, their ownership status should not matter.

This is coming from the World Health Organization, one of the most prestigious organizations in the world. Does she believe that this organization is wrong? If she does, stand up and say so.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, is this Premier going to listen to our practising physicians, the ones that are right there on the front lines in Alberta? Is he going to listen to noted Canadian health economists? Is he going to listen to Albertans and withdraw this bill for the third time?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, you know, nothing in life is absolutely certain except taxes and death, as they say. But, yes, we will proceed with this bill. There may be amendments; maybe the Liberal would like to propose some amendments. But in this unprecedented exercise of consulting the public, all the people of this province, perhaps there will be some amendments as we move this bill through the Legislature. We want to make sure that it's absolutely right.

Mr. Speaker, part of this consultation process – certainly it's the medical community, certainly it's the federal Minister of Health: again, unprecedented to share our legislation with the federal government. But most importantly it will be the consensus and the thoughts and the wisdom, the wisdom of the people of this province, that will guide us and steer us as we work this legislation through this Assembly.

Speaker's Ruling Decorum

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, the key role of the Speaker is to preserve decorum in the House. Once again we are not getting off to a very good start, and I frankly do not believe that we are a good example to the citizens of Alberta nor to the children in this gallery. What is particularly disconcerting to the chair is if an hon. member is denied an opportunity to participate and to hear what is going on. This becomes a prime concern.

So the chair has just received this note from one hon. member, and the intent is to deal with the privilege of the hon. member: Mr. Speaker, I believe that you are aware that I incurred a significant and permanent hearing loss in both ears approximately 11 months ago. Accordingly, I try to manage my environment in order to offset the hearing loss as much as possible. For example, our whip arranged for me to sit in the middle of our seating in the Legislature, and the Sergeant-at-Arms kindly arranged for me to have an upgraded earpiece that ties into the Legislature sound system. Generally speaking, from a hearing prospective, I can function reasonably well in the Assembly. The exception to the rule is during question period. At the outset I acknowledge members on both sides are guilty of heckling. However, the volume by a number of members – and the member does go on to make mention of them – is very troublesome. In most question periods I have a very difficult time in hearing answers. Whatever you could do to lower the volume would be very much appreciated by this member.

It would also be very much appreciated by the chair, as I'm sure it would also be very much appreciated by the citizens of Alberta. I will stand again.

The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition. Third main question.

MRS. MacBETH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Premier has told us that he would be mailing out his private hospitals bill for Albertans to read. In fact, what he is sending out is a doctored version that puts his own spin on his private hospitals bill. You know, students who haven't done their homework have long known that they could use Cole's Notes to fake their way through the exam. Well, now what we have in Alberta are Klein's notes, which are in fact full of malicious misinformation. My first question is: why is the Premier insulting the intelligence of Albertans by putting his doctored spin in the margins of his private hospitals bill?

MR. KLEIN: No spin, no doctoring, Mr. Speaker. The only spin doctoring being done around here is being done by the opposition Liberals. The bill is there in its entirety. Yes, there are explanation points. There are explanation points, but we trust the intelligence and we respect the intelligence of Albertans to read the bill, to read the explanation points, and if they have any further questions to contact the appropriate authorities in government so that they can get an even better explanation.

Mr. Speaker, I would remind the leader of the Liberal opposition that she was the one who said that Albertans cannot understand legislation. She was the person who insulted the intelligence of Albertans. We're not doing that. We are saying to Albertans: "Provide us with your wisdom and provide us with your honest input and put all the political rhetoric aside. Put all the political rhetoric aside. We trust you to help us with this legislation. We trust you, Albertans, to help us with this legislation."

MRS. MacBETH: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do respect the intelligence of Albertans, and Albertans know that there is no difference between a hospital and a surgical facility which allows overnight stays. So how come the margin notes don't explain the significance of surgical facilities and surgical services?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the leader of the Liberal opposition would like to take advantage of the opportunity that was provided to her to have a technical briefing on this particular matter. [interjections] No, she doesn't want it, because she doesn't want to know the facts. She doesn't want to know the facts.

If she wants a short clinic on it right now, I'll have the hon. Minister of Health and Wellness respond.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, first of all, the legislation is there verbatim from what was tabled in the Legislature in Bill 11. I know that is somewhat troubling to the opposition, but it is important that this be provided to the public of the province.

Secondly, because there is necessity to use certain legal language in a piece of legislation, we have provided accurate explanations of any of the more complex parts of the wording in the margins of the presentation. If the hon. member across the way feels that any of those notations are inaccurate, certainly raise the issue.

What really is bothering, I think, the folks across the way, Mr. Speaker, is that they do not really feel comfortable about not being able to criticize and vet legislation, because we're going directly to the people on this particular issue. So I think that is the important approach that's being taken here.

In terms of the wording in the legislation, Mr. Speaker, and the commentary, I think it accurately portrays and explains the context of the bill. I'm hoping that the opposition will be supportive of initiatives such as this rather than trying to pick it apart.

MRS. MacBETH: Well, Mr. Speaker, let's quote another noted Alberta physician, this time Dr. Tom Noseworthy, who said last night, quote: let's call a spade a spade; an overnight stay for acute care service or intervention equals a hospital, end quote. Why does the Premier feel the need to try to fool Albertans on this legislation?

MR. KLEIN: I'll have the Minister of Health and Wellness respond, but again this is another example of misleading information. She talks about acute surgical care. We're not talking about the same thing. What she needs to do is read and understand and be honest about the bill.

I'll have the hon. minister supplement.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, the legislation is quite clear in defining a hospital as a facility which provides a broad range of service: emergency. It deals with the major surgeries which require a complex set of diagnostic procedures and backup procedures and may involve several days in hospital or not. That is, I think, a very well-accepted concept of a hospital. I would like to remind the folks across the way that the legislation is very clear. It's clearer than in any other part of this country in saying that there will be no private hospitals, no full-service private hospitals in this province.

Mr. Speaker, there is precedent all across this country with respect to there being specialized surgical clinics dealing with a particular area of treatment and expertise. We have in the province of British Columbia, for instance, the Cambie clinic, which is dealing with a whole set of surgical services. [interjections] I know that's not Liberals, but it's pretty close. British Columbia. Pretty close. [interjections]

I can go . . .

Speaker's Ruling Decorum

THE SPEAKER: I know that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark has indicated her intent to rise and to question today. I'm listening attentively to the responses because a gentleman has been recognized, the hon. Minister of Health and Wellness. I'd hate to conclude in my mind that the questions have now been raised by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark. If they have been, then she will be ignored later.

The hon. Minister of Health and Wellness, to conclude your response.

MR. JONSON: Well, just to conclude quite quickly, Mr. Speaker, all across the country there are examples where you have surgical facilities which are providing service for insured services, and some are also providing services for uninsured people. If anybody across the way wants to be fair about this particular legislation, we are actually putting in more protection, more assurances around this particular approach than any other province in this country. For instance, there's an extensive section of the legislation which deals with making sure there is not extra billing for services which are optional to the patient, and I could go on through the legislation.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. interim leader of the third party.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Klein government is spending about another million dollars in taxpayers' money to tell Albertans what to think about its private, for-profit hospital bill. The government has no interest in hearing what Albertans think. It has chosen rather to tell them what is good for them to think. To the Premier: how can the government justify sending Albertans misleading interpretations about what Bill 11 will do, such as telling them that section 23 will not affect their recourse to the courts, when in fact section 23 is designed to prevent legal challenges even when the minister can't show that contracting out to a for-profit hospital will save money or reduce waiting lists?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again I would say to the leader of the opposition third party: let Albertans decide. Let Albertans decide, and then we will have the full debate. We will introduce second reading. It will then go to committee. At that time, the thoughts of Albertans can be incorporated into the legislation. If there are appropriate amendments to be made, they can be made at that particular time. If this hon. member has some thoughts about how the section to which he alludes can be improved, then send them over. Help us with this.

You know, it's not simply the role of the opposition to get out there and spread false and malicious information and to oppose just for the sake of opposing, Mr. Speaker.

It's also the role of the opposition to help to make legislation better.

This is fundamentally good legislation. It protects public health.

It provides options. It sets down very, very strict rules and regulations for the operation of surgical clinics, rules and regulations that didn't exist before but could have been put in years ago when the leader of the Liberal opposition was the minister of health. She could have done that years ago, Mr. Speaker.

We're having to deal with these issues now because it is absolutely necessary according to all medical experts to find new and better and more efficient and more effective ways of doing things and at the same time protect public health and abide by the fundamental principles of the Canada Health Act.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Let me try and help the Premier understand what's wrong with the whole bill, but before that let me ask him another question on this privative clause. Why does the privative clause in Bill 11 give greater immunity from legal challenges to the minister of health than the Disaster Services Act gives to the minister responsible in the case of a natural disaster even though Bill 11 will be the biggest disaster to hit Albertans in generations?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the hon. member's comment: let me tell you what is wrong with the whole bill. Those are his words. Is he opposed to the first whereas?

Whereas it is the responsibility of the Government of Alberta to provide leadership and support in the delivery of quality health services in order to maintain and improve the health of Albertans.

Is he opposed that?

Is he opposed to this? "Whereas Albertans cherish Alberta's publicly funded and publicly administered health system." This is all part of the bill.

I mean, I could go through page by page by page and ask him to stand up and say clause by clause what he is opposed to. Is he opposed to the third whereas? Is he opposed to the fourth, the fifth, the sixth, the seventh, the eighth, the ninth? Is he opposed to all those whereases? Is he opposed to this very important clause, that "no person shall operate a private hospital in Alberta." Is he opposed to that? If he is, stand up and say so.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government has shown no courage in calling private hospitals private hospitals in this bill. That's what's wrong with this bill.

Let me ask the Premier the last question. Why is the government spending a million dollars to bury Albertans in misleading and one-sided information about his private, for-profit hospitals bill while making it difficult for Albertans to provide feedback on Bill 11?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I'm glad for one thing. At least this member is honest in the amount. In the amount. The Liberals yesterday were touting around, throwing around this figure, another example of misinformation, untruths, not telling the truth, throwing around $3 million, here, there, at least five or six times. At least this hon. member is close to the figure.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

MRS. BURGNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Since the release of the policy statement on the delivery of surgical services last November and now with the introduction of Bill 11, the Premier has consistently stated that he is looking for feedback from Albertans on the proposed policy and the legislation. From my constituency the accountability issue is the key concern identified. They are concerned about being charged for procedures they shouldn't be charged for. There are concerns that the restrictions imposed by the bill on facility fees, enhanced services, and queue-jumping won't be enforced. My question is for the Premier. What mechanisms are in place to enforce the provisions of Bill 11 once it is passed?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of mechanisms, and if there need to be more mechanisms, we will depend on the wisdom and the guidance of Albertans. That's why we're sending out the bill.

It's indeed an important question, because, as the member points out, Albertans want to be confident that they will be protected from any illegal or unethical activity on the part of health professionals or the operators of health facilities, be they surgical facilities or conventional hospitals as we know them today. So there will be several mechanisms in place that will ensure full and complete compliance with the requirements of the legislation. You have to remember, Mr. Speaker – and I needn't remind you because you're one of the finest lawmakers around; at least you were when you sat as a minister in this Legislative Assembly. I need to remind all members that the law is the law, and you do not break the law.

First of all, the College of Physicians and Surgeons will assess and accredit any facility that is contracted by a health authority to ensure that the facility has the trained staff, equipment, and support services to allow that procedure to be safely done in that facility. Mr. Speaker, I would remind hon. members that the college is the body that has the expertise. It is probably one of the most revered bodies in the field of medicine of any jurisdiction in the world. All jurisdictions have colleges of physicians and surgeons.

The college also has an ongoing role to monitor and enforce the ethical behaviour of any physician licensed to practise in the province, including physicians working in a surgical facility or a public hospital. The college can impose fines or even remove a physician's licence to practise in Alberta if that physician is found guilty of unethical or unprofessional behaviour.

The minister of health will be able to monitor the actions of surgical facility operators, and Bill 11 gives him the power to request any information necessary from a surgical facility, including the 47 that are now operating, including the 38 that were approved by the Leader of the Opposition when she was minister of health. He has the authority to . . .

THE SPEAKER: I think we could ask for a tabling of the document, hon. member.

MRS. BURGNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Knowing that monitoring and oversight are critical to my constituents, my second question is also to the Premier. How do we know that Bill 11 will work and do what it is intended to do?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, we certainly want the bill to do as it hopefully is intended to do. As I pointed out before, ever since we released our policy statement in November, we have undertaken a very full and vigorous dialogue with Albertans on this legislation. We have consulted. We have asked questions. We have had discussions not only with health experts and health professionals but also with everyday Albertans. The mailing out of the bill today is just one more step in that very intensive consultation program.

We have revised our policy statement proposals in the legislation to reflect the views and the concerns that we have heard. I believe now that we have a better piece of legislation because of it.

Mr. Speaker, I need not remind you that we went through this exercise once before with Bill 37. Subsequent to that there was the blue-ribbon panel, the consultation process, as I pointed out, and now the mail-out of the bill. I can't think of a more intensive public consultation program than that.

MRS. BURGNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final question to the Premier: in what way would the regional health authorities be held accountable for this legislation?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again I would remind this Legislative Assembly that as of the next civic elections two-thirds of those authorities will be elected.

Bill 11 clearly holds health authorities accountable for finding the best and most effective and most efficient way of delivering publicly funded health services to their residents, and it has to be done in accordance with the bill. Once the bill becomes law, they will have to do it in accordance with the law. It will be the health authorities that will have to clearly demonstrate to the minister that any proposed contract will be of benefit to the publicly funded system and to their patients. That is key.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark, any more questions?

MS LEIBOVICI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When Albertans take Bill 11 from their mailbox, they will find that the government has attached their own spin campaign, and contrary to what the Klein notes say, queue-jumping will remain alive and well in this province. Earlier access to diagnostic tests and uninsured services means earlier access to specialists. My questions are to the Premier. If the Premier is opposed to queue-jumping, why has he done nothing to stop queue-jumping in the public sector for people who can afford to pay for an MRI in the private sector?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, you know, without sounding personal, you can perhaps ask your boss over there. She's probably closer, at least related to someone who's very, very involved in private-sector MRIs.

Mr. Speaker, as to . . .

MR. SAPERS: Talk about sleazy. Answer the question.

MR. KLEIN: You should know about sleaze. You should know about sleaze.

THE SPEAKER: Actually this question period is due to adjourn today at 2:41. That's 16 minutes from now.

We do have options. We could declare a coffee break, take a recess. That's always an option. I could consult with the hon. Member for Edmonton-Norwood on how to keep law and order in the Assembly. Her background says that she was a law enforcement agent. I'm sure she would provide me with good advice as to how to keep decorum in the House in light of her record of participation in the House. Those are two options. Or we could continue.

The hon. Premier has the floor.

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, relative to the question, there are some differences relative to the rules that regulate MRIs relative to the operation of public hospitals and surgical clinics. I'll have him explain to the hon. member.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, very succinctly, first of all, this legislation provides very strong control and penalties actually for queue jumping, against any ability to pay for faster service in the system. I think that should be recognized by the opposition across the way because it is a very important control in legislation.

With respect to MRIs this is one of those anomalies, quite frankly, in the overall way the health care system in Canada has developed. Across this country the interpretation is that because the actual MRI service, the running of the equipment, is something that is conducted by technicians as opposed to doctors, this is a diagnostic service that is outside the parameters and requirements of the Canada Health Act. I think that is interpreted the same way across this country as I understand it in talking with my colleagues across Canada.

So what is happening in Alberta is consistent with practices across this nation. That is the situation with MRIs.

MS LEIBOVICI: If the Premier is opposed to queue-jumping, why has he done nothing to stop queue-jumping for an insured service if a person can afford to pay for an uninsured service at the same time, as is potentially happening in eye surgery in this province right now?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, there is one case involving Dr. Gimbel that is now under investigation.

Relative to queue-jumping, in the publicly funded system, whether it's in a full scale hospital as we know it or in a surgical clinic, for a required medical service queue-jumping will clearly be prohibited in this legislation. It's as simple as that.

MS LEIBOVICI: Well, if the Premier is opposed to queue-jumping, will you stop the current unfairness in diagnostic queue-jumping that's happening in this province?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. Minister of Health and Wellness did a good job of explaining the anomaly, as he put it, relative to diagnostic services, particularly MRIs.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the so-called issue of queue-jumping, we have provided in the legislation which is before the Legislature and the people of Alberta a process of being able to control and to police and to provide penalties if there is preference given to people on the basis of their ability to pay or to get some other type of special consideration, a control that is not there in other provinces, as I understand it. So this particular piece of legislation, I think, should be recognized as being very protective of the public health care system but, more importantly, very protective of the right of access on an equitable basis across this province of the citizens of Alberta to the insured services under our health care plan.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, my constituents have asked me about the timing of the proposed health policy regarding the contracting of surgical services within the administration of the public health care system. My question is to the Minister of Health and Wellness. Could the minister tell my constituents what it is in government policy that leads you to bring forth legislation at this time?

MR. JONSON: Well, first of all, Mr. Speaker, the minister of the day, the government has been working and has brought before this Legislature this overall issue on two previous occasions, as I recall. Our desire, of course, has been to provide in this province a good, publicly funded, publicly governed health care system to comply with the Canada Health Act, but as was identified in the debate on Bill 37 and subsequently by the report of the blue-ribbon panel, we do not have in existence in this province the legislative power, the legislative structure to deal with the whole issue of making sure that we have a system which complies with the Canada Health Act and is operating in the interests of all Albertans.

So, Mr. Speaker, in the fall of the previous year we initiated a policy paper to make sure that everybody was well aware of what our concerns and our plans were. We have followed that up, because there was very much interest expressed in us having the proper legislative structure in place, with the legislation which is currently before the Legislature.

Mr. Speaker, in direct response to the hon. member's question, this legislation, Bill 11, addresses a number of issues. I won't list them all. It addresses the whole issue of surgical facilities. It bans private hospitals. It puts penalties in place with respect to charging for or in any way giving people preference in a queue or in a waiting list. That should only be done on a medically required basis. It is very protective. It also recognizes the fact that in this country we do need to look at other options, better options, more efficient options in providing services to the people of this country.

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My supplemental is to the same Minister of Health and Wellness. Given that many surgical procedures are already contracted out by health authorities, could the minister tell us what, if any, benefits have been seen from this contracting process?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of examples, but I will just at this particular point in time mention one, and that is that in Calgary – I choose Calgary with respect to cataract surgery because that is a very high-profile example. The regional health authority in Calgary reports that under the contract arrangement which is in place right now, which was in response to our policy statement being issued a couple of years ago, although it doesn't have the force of law which it does in the legislation, they have gone into arranging contracts with, as I understand it, three different providers. Today they are able to fund 500-plus additional operations at the same amount of money as was the case three years ago. As I understand it, the people that have received that service are quite pleased with the quality, the success of the operations. I think that's a good example.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Norwood.

MS OLSEN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When Albertans take Bill 11 from their mailbox, they will find that the government has attached their own spin campaign, both with misinformation and missing information. My questions are to the Premier. Why do the margin notes in this handout contradict what the bill says with respect to appealing to the courts when the bill itself makes it clear that the minister's decision cannot be challenged? Why the contradiction, Mr. Premier?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, that section of the bill speaks to ministerial authority, and I'll have the minister respond.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, it is correct that there is one section of the bill which provides for ministerial approval being given with respect to certain decisions that are not appealable to the court system. I think that in this province – we're probably a little low in Alberta actually – we have about 15 or 16 other statutes where when it comes to administrative decisions that have to be made within a particular system or particular department, for the sheer practical need to get on with business and get things done, they are not appealable to the court.

For instance, one of the examples in here, Mr. Speaker, is that the minister shall through regulation approve the forms and format and the information that needs to be provided in the contracts that are devised and reported to the minister for approval. I think that's a very practical provision. We need to get on with business with respect to the health care system. It's very common to other legislation in this province and this country.

MS OLSEN: Well, hopefully the minister will read Mr. Klein's crib notes.

MR. HAVELOCK: Point of order.

MS OLSEN: My second question: why doesn't the Premier tell Albertans that the College of Physicians and Surgeons has no bylaws to describe what a major surgical service is? I don't see that in the Klein margin notes, Mr. Premier.

MR. KLEIN: What was the question? Well, you can go ahead and answer it.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, the hon. members across the way have – perhaps it is just something that happens with individuals. It could also be some selective loss of memory. When we were in this Assembly debating Bill 37, one of the concerns at that time from the opposition actually was that the College of Physicians and Surgeons were on the verge of approving a set of bylaws or regulations which would license and allow private surgical clinics to operate in this province.

At that time, our concern and their concern were somewhat similar, and that was that this Legislature, this government did not have in place the proper legislative power and provisions and protection to deal with that particular situation should it occur. It is quite clear that the College of Physicians and Surgeons sets standards. They deal with the issue of whether there is adequate medical expertise, whether a facility can deal with a particular procedure. There was considerable pressure on the college to proceed with that particular set of bylaws, Mr. Speaker.

At our urging and that of others they held off on this until we were able to put forward a comprehensive piece of legislation which addressed that legislative gap. That is a very important part of Bill 11.

MS OLSEN: Well, you can hurl all the insults you want at me, Mr. Minister, but that doesn't tell Albertans the contradiction.

Speaker's Ruling Oral Question Period Rules

THE SPEAKER: Hon. member, please. I think we'll spend the remainder of question period going over some of the rules. The number one rule that everybody agreed to – and the three House leaders signed a document to this effect – is that a question will have a succinct preamble, and there will be no preamble to the second question or the third question. Now, virtually everybody today who participated violated that rule.

The question is, I guess: what's the sense of having the rule if, in fact, leaders from all three parties get together, write the document, sign it with their names, and then they don't enforce it with their own member? They give it to the Speaker. What's the Speaker supposed to do with it if their own members themselves, who've signed it, don't want to enforce it? So, no preambles on the second question and on the third question. That's a given.

This chairman has accepted guidance from three House leaders with respect to a document. The Speaker does not have to do such a thing. The members in this Assembly may get together and amend the Standing Orders and change the Standing Orders. They have not done that. Pending such a decision, this chairman has said that he will abide by advice and recommendations provided by the three House leaders. But, in the end, decorum in the House will always take precedence over that.

Secondly, there are only hon. members in this House. There are no last names to be used in questions or answers, and once again a great variety of members in this House seem to just somehow violate this on almost a daily basis. There's no need to. There's no need to at all.

Thirdly, Beauchesne is very, very clear about what the questions are to be and how the responses are to be. One only knows by the experience in this House – this is only day 10, and today's a pretty good example of that – that if you ask an inflammatory or an argumentative question, well, you're going to get an argumentative response. It can't be both ways. This Speaker is not going to stand up and decry one member because of inflammatory words in one portion and then tell the other member to sit down when the other member wants to use a similar kind of language. You govern yourselves. As I indicated last week, it's like a hockey game, I guess. If you want to go around bashing yourselves in the head with hockey sticks, go ahead. Go ahead. The chairman will remain standing at the end of the match. He'll be the only one.

head: Members' Statements

THE SPEAKER: In 30 seconds from now we'll recognize three hon. members for participation today.

Sandra Schmirler

MS GRAHAM: Mr. Speaker, today it is with the deepest sympathy that I rise to acknowledge the passing of Sandra Schmirler, one of Canada's greatest ever women curlers. Sandra Schmirler died at the young age of 36 last Thursday in hospital in Regina, Saskatchewan. To Sandra's husband, Shannon, and daughters Jenna and Sara I express my deepest sympathy in their loss of a wife and mother. Sandra fought a courageous battle against cancer and remained hopeful to the end that she would return to the ice.

In her lifetime Sandra balanced marriage, motherhood, and a working career together with a very, very successful curling career. Sandra, the skip, brought together her curling team in 1990, and together they dominated women's curling throughout the 1990s both at home and abroad. Sandra led her team to win the Canadian and the world championship titles in 1993, 1994, and 1997, and then in 1998 her team brought home the first-ever Olympic gold medal awarded in the sport of curling at the 1998 Winter Olympics in Nagano, Japan. All of us were brimming with pride. I know I was. Sandra was a true champion in all respects, which won her the admiration of her peers and fans alike. Her Olympic foursome was voted the team of the year for 1998 by sports editors and broadcasters across Canada. Then in 1999 Sandra was inducted into the Curling Hall of Fame.

Mr. Speaker, not only is Saskatchewan proud of Sandra Schmirler, but all of Canada is proud of Sandra for her long list of accomplishments and the distinction that she brought to the sport of curling.

She always carried herself with grace, optimism, and that fierce determination until the very end. Through the media coverage of her curling matches and her interviews it was as if we all knew Sandra. Her legacy will forever remain in the hearts of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this Assembly I ask all Albertans to join me in expressing our heartfelt condolences to family, friends, and teammates of Sandra Schmirler.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Jackie Parker Park

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Mill Woods Presidents' Council, a group made up of the presidents of the community leagues in Mill Woods, continues to be a powerful force in community affairs. One of the council's original committees, MCARFA, the Mill Woods Cultural and Recreational Facility Association, has been instrumental in bringing facilities to Mill Woods. This afternoon I would bring the attention of the Legislature to their latest project in the development of Jackie Parker park.

Jackie Parker park centres on a lake used this time of year as a skating oval. Trails wind off into Mill Creek Ravine. The thousands of trees planted in the past now shape a woodland landscape. Under the leadership of Mike Middlestadt, chair of the Jackie Parker Project Committee, enhancement to the park, one of the few parkland sites in Mill Woods, is being undertaken. A copper-roofed pavilion overlooking the lake and the park will become the centre for community and cultural events. Featuring a great room and huge indoor and outdoor fireplaces, the pavilion will be used year-round. A terrace down to the lake surrounded by picnic sites, fire pits, benches, and trails will provide residents a place to walk, skate, picnic, and relax.

MCARFA has raised most of the million and a half dollars needed for the pavilion through casinos and golf tournaments. The city and the community lottery board along with community leagues have also helped. Still, about $175,000 is required to complete the financing. An invitation has been extended to the corporate community to join the project as sponsors.

On behalf of our constituents the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie and myself say thank you to the presidents' council, thank you to MCARFA, thank you to the Jackie Parker Project Committee and to your chair, Mike Middlestadt. You make Mill Woods a better place to live.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan.

Allegations against a Member

MR. LOUGHEED: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On Thursday of last week I rose and was recognized on a point of order during the tablings prior to question period. However, as is the current custom, the point of order was heard long after question period, and few of the viewers would have access to Hansard and read the comments or the subsequent apology offered by the Opposition House Leader.

Contrary to the allegations made by the opposition Environment critic, the record shows that I have acted on behalf of the constituents of Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan with respect to their concern about gas exploration and continue to do so. In fact, I met with a group the previous evening, and I understand that they will soon be having a meeting with the EUB. I expect and I believe Albertans expect that it's an elected member's responsibility to verify and fully portray the truth of statements made in this Legislature.

A second failure of this responsibility occurred when the Liberal

Environment critic stated that she was filing a petition signed by 102 concerned residents of Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan. However, the addresses clearly show that most of these residents were from Edmonton and other areas of northern Alberta and that only five reside in the constituency I represent. I believe it's the responsibility of elected members not to repeat unfounded, unsubstantiated, unvalidated, or untrue allegations, and in light of the apology offered by the Opposition House Leader, I trust that such false allegations will not be repeated.

THE SPEAKER: We have notification today of four points of order prior to the chair dealing with a ruling on a purported case of privilege.

We'll go in this order for the four points of order. First, the hon. Government House Leader. I've also recognized the Deputy Government House Leader. So this is the first point of order?

MR. HAVELOCK: Mr. Speaker, I'm handling the points of order today. I've actually discussed the first point of order with my colleague the House leader, and we will be withdrawing it.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Point of Order Allegations against a Member

MR. DICKSON: On behalf of the Leader of the Official Opposition. Sir, with respect to the exchange between the Premier and the Leader of the Opposition, there was reference to a report by the World Health Organization. My authority would be Beauchesne 417: "Answers to questions should be as brief as possible, deal with the matter raised" – and this is the important part – "and should not provoke debate."

The hon. Premier referred to a report that had been tabled in fact in this Assembly by the Minister of Health and Wellness, and that had been done on February 29. In fact, reference was made to it by that same Minister of Health and Wellness. It appears at page 152 in Hansard, where he says:

I think, a very credible, documented, supported set of arguments pointing out that a health care system, provided it is publicly financed and publicly governed, can benefit from a degree of competition from new ideas, from innovation that could be provided by the private sector.

Those of us who hadn't read the report took the minister at his word. It was later that we had the opportunity to read the report and found out that contrary to the authority that was represented by the Premier this afternoon, the report deals with developing nations, where public capital is short and governments have very limited options. The report in fact went on to praise Canada's medicare system as unique and serving Canada well. So the reference to private/public partnerships was restricted to Third World countries, impoverished countries.

The concern is that by the Premier looping back to cite a report that had been given a distorted kind of importance by the Minister of Health and Wellness on February 29, it could do nothing other than provoke debate and high feelings in the Assembly, which you've remarked on in another context, Mr. Speaker.

Thanks very much.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. HAVELOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It seems that every answer that was given today, no matter how innocuous, seemed to provoke debate, and it depends on the manner and the tone in which the question was asked.

With respect to the document which the Premier referred to, it is a question of interpretation. Often reports are used to support a particular position. I will also point out that while the report dealt with Third World and developing countries, one of the points that it made was that where there is a lack of capital, you need to look at options with respect to developing a health system.

We have a very good health system, Mr. Speaker, but it has been recognized nationally and by most if not all Premiers that we cannot continue to fund and operate this system as we have in the past. We need to look at new and better ways in which to fund health care and ensure that we alleviate pain and suffering and meet the needs of those who need to access the system.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is a question of interpretation, albeit there were some lessons to be learned from the report, and that's why the report was referred to. Again, it's a question of interpretation, and there is no point of order.

THE SPEAKER: It would appear to the chair that what we've just heard was a clarification of two positions with respect to this particular matter. There's absolutely no doubt at all that Beauchesne 417 says that the answer "should not provoke debate," but 409(1) says that "it must be a question, not an expression of an opinion, representation, argumentation, nor debate," and on several occasions today the chair interjected with respect to this matter.

Now, we're going to have these comments with respect to these points of order very, very narrow, and the reason the chair says this is that today is Tuesday and today is the day and an opportunity for private members to advance work and business of their own. It should not go unnoticed that private members' business may not be dealt with if we spend the whole time frame discussing points of order and the like. The chair would be quite concerned if in fact that was a strategy. I'm not suggesting for a moment that it is but if in fact it was a strategy.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. Every time I come to question period, my hope is that there's no need to raise points of order.

Point of Order Clarification

MR. DICKSON: The item I'm raising, Mr. Speaker, would have to do with when the Premier said in response to the Leader of the Opposition that she should have taken advantage of a technical briefing on Bill 11. You're going to be dealing with that in a moment with respect to the alleged question of contempt, of privilege, but it's clear from all of the material and evidence that you have heard in the last two days that the Leader of the Opposition received notice at 12:28 p.m. inviting her to a technical briefing at an unspecified place at an unspecified time. I made the submission yesterday that it was clear that there was no genuine intention of informing the Leader of the Opposition on the technical aspects of the bill before it received first reading. So for the Premier to come back, to loop back and throw it out, there may be some watching, listening who didn't understand that there had been no genuine invitation to the Leader of the Opposition to participate before the bill had received first reading.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. HAVELOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll be brief. There certainly was a genuine invitation open to the Leader of the Official Opposition. In fact, that invitation still stands, and to date she has not exercised that invitation. I'm advised that on Monday, I believe, the interim leader of the third party took advantage of the invitation and was provided a briefing. The invitation still stands.

As concerns your dealing with the matter later on, I'm well aware of that. However, Mr. Speaker, again there is really no point of order with respect to this. What the Premier indicated was that the offer was made. The offer is still open. The Leader of the Opposition has not yet taken advantage of it.

THE SPEAKER: I gather, hon. members, that again we're dealing with another point of clarification, not a point of order.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

MR. HAVELOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Hopefully, you will consider this to be a legitimate point of order. I refer to a comment made by the hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert where, when referring to the notes in the Bill 11 householder, which was the subject of some discussion today during question period, she stated: these notes are a blatant lie. I would refer you to Beauchesne 489, where it states very clearly that the use of the term "lie" is unparliamentary. Typically, as you have indicated to the House in the past, we are to take members at their word, and I would respectfully request that you ask the hon. member to apologize for that remark.

MR. DICKSON: I think the short answer to that is this. I don't think the Premier or the Minister of Health and Wellness individually authored that document. The lie refers to a document that was produced by a corporate entity, the government of the province of Alberta. There's no authority I'm aware of, Mr. Speaker, until you advise me otherwise, that says that saying that a government publication is a lie is in any way actionable within the context of Standing Orders or the rules of Beauchesne. This is referring to a corporate representation from the government of the province of Alberta, not with respect to an individual member, and I think that it can be dealt with on that basis.

Thank you.

MR. HANCOCK: Well, I can't let those comments go unchallenged. Everything this opposition member and everything her colleagues have done over the past few days that we've been in this Legislature has been to try to make the question of what is being put out on Bill 11 inextricably linked to the Premier and the minister of health. That's been their clear intention. It's been demonstrated time and time again. They're trying to put those words and trying to associate them personally with ministers. We've raised points of order in the past about dealing with issues rather than dealing with personalities, and now they're attempting to say: oh, no, we were just dealing with the words on paper that somebody else wrote, and we didn't have that intention at all. Mr. Speaker, you've got to call them to order on this sort of thing.

THE SPEAKER: The point of order has to do with something apparently that may or may not have been said. The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert was not recognized today at all by the chair. It's also true that on frequent occasions during this session there's a great deal of discussion going across the way. The chair has stood on numerous occasions – numerous occasions – and said that that's not to be permitted or tolerated in this Assembly. Yet members continue to want to pursue and have their private discussions when some hon. member has been recognized and another then would follow and be recognized.

The chair did hear some very atrocious language. The chair did not hear – did not hear – this particular phrase. The chair will check the Hansard to see whether or not it has been picked up in the Blues and if it is recorded in the Hansard, and the chair would be prepared to revisit this should it be recorded. But if it is not recorded, it's very difficult for the chair to deal with the matter. There has been no opportunity recognized to the hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

The chair did rise on several occasions today and point out that there was an absurd amount of heckling going on. The chair will be more aggressive tomorrow with respect to this and will name names. The chair will also provide to any citizen who has contacted his office in the last hour and a half wanting to know who appears to be the loudest of the hecklers the name of that particular Member of the Legislative Assembly. It will not be a badge of honour to wear.

THE SPEAKER: The chair is now prepared to deal with the question of privilege as raised by the Opposition House Leader and is now prepared to rule on the purported question of privilege raised by the hon. Opposition House Leader last Thursday, March 2, and argued yesterday, March 6.

As the chair understands the matter, the Opposition House Leader's purported question of privilege is twofold: one, that Bill 11, the Health Care Protection Act, was released to the public or at least the media before it was presented in the House, and two, that the Leader of the Opposition was not allowed to remain in a meeting with the media, referred to as a technical briefing session, which was held very early in the afternoon of March 2 and just prior to the introduction of Bill 11 in the House. This briefing session took place in the, quote, press conference room, end quote, which is found on the first floor of the Legislature Building next to the press gallery offices.

Last Thursday there was a third point about a possible assault on the Leader of the Opposition, but it is the chair's impression from what was said yesterday that the Opposition House Leader is not pursuing this matter any further, at least in this forum.

At the outset the chair notes that the Opposition House Leader provided notice of his question of privilege during the daily Routine on March 2. He did not provide written notice two hours before the start of the sitting, as required under Standing Order 15(2), but the events giving rise to the purported question of privilege did not occur until an hour or so before the House commenced that day. Accordingly, the chair finds that the notice was provided at the earliest opportunity.

On the issue of the purported release of Bill 11 prior to its introduction in the Assembly, presumably the Opposition House Leader is alleging that there is a contempt of the House. To refresh members' memories, breaches of privilege and contempts of the Assembly are treated in the same manner. Both are referred to in section 10 of the Legislative Assembly Act. These similarities were discussed in the chair's February 24, 1999, ruling found at page 161 of Hansard on another purported contempt brought forward by the Opposition House Leader.

Any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any Member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

In this case there was no supporting precedent referred to by the Opposition House Leader or anyone else who entered the debate.

The chair has reviewed a ruling by Speaker Francis in the Canadian House of Commons on January 19, 1984, with facts very similar to those now before this House. The 1984 incident involved some members of the opposition being excluded from a media lockup where it was alleged that a copy of a bill was released prior to first reading. In ruling against the purported question of privilege – and I quote from Hansard for January 19, 1984, at page 563 – Speaker Francis said:

There are any number of situations where drafts of Bills have been circulated and no further action has been taken with regard to them. Surely the Chair cannot be placed in a position of determining whether a document or a piece of paper, or whatever it is – it is certainly not a document of the House – can or cannot be circulated, or that the Speaker in some way should regulate the persons to whom such a document could be circulated.

In this case the Government House Leader and the Member for Calgary-Glenmore both indicated yesterday in the House that the media were provided with copies marked "draft," so it could not have been the bill introduced in the House.

The chair has scoured the authorities and has not found any instance where the purported release of a bill has constituted a valid question of privilege. As pointed out by the Opposition House Leader, the issue of the early release of a bill was raised as recently as a few weeks ago in the Canadian House of Commons. On February 21, 2000, at pages 3666 and 3667 of Hansard Speaker Parent found that there was no question of privilege with respect to the purported early release of Bill C-23. The chair would specifically note that he found four instances of this question arising in the Saskatchewan Legislature – in 1993, 1991, 1988, and 1975 – and in each case the Speaker has found that there was no breach of privilege.

Although there is no prima facie question of privilege on this point, the chair echoes the comments of various Speakers that it is in keeping with the role of the Assembly and the respect that it should be accorded that bills in their final form should first be reviewed by the Assembly after first reading. In the chair's experience this is the accepted practice in Alberta, and the chair would expect it to continue.

On the second issue raised by the Opposition House Leader, that the Leader of the Opposition was denied access to the technical briefing session, the chair notes that he does not have control over the press conference room. It is not booked through the Speaker's office, nor does the Speaker exercise any control over its use. It is not part of the precincts. This would be distinguishable from the office of the Clerk Assistant, which the Opposition House Leader alluded to yesterday, who is in her own right an officer of the Assembly.

Even in the federal Parliament, where the Speakers of the Commons and the Senate exercise control over the entire building, it has been held that restricting attendance at a media lockup does not constitute a question of privilege. To quote Speaker Francis' 1984 ruling at page 593:

The Chair obviously recognizes that the parties represented in this House may from time to time request rooms. They may or may not choose to invite members of the press. They may choose to invite their own supporters or include or exclude their own supporters. They may on occasion include members of other Parties or not include them. That is not a matter for the Speaker to decide.

Allowing or not allowing a member to attend a media briefing does not constitute an impediment or an obstruction to the member performing his or her parliamentary duties, which presumably is the privilege that the Opposition House Leader alleges was breached.

Accordingly, the chair finds that there is no prima facie question of privilege on this point either. The chair wishes to thank all members who participated in this debate.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Yes, Mr. Speaker. On a point of order with respect to the third matter, the question of assault, which the Opposition House Leader did not address in his point of order. I would ask that you consider in your ruling additionally asking for an apology. He referred to a person who is well known in the building, who has no opportunity to come here to defend herself, and I think not proceeding on that allegation leaves her in an unfortunate position. I would ask the hon. Opposition House Leader to withdraw that allegation.

THE SPEAKER: If the hon. Government House Leader chooses to rise on a point, as he did, and cite certain things, then we can have such a point of order debated and argued. At this point in time the chair did indicate that in terms of what was discussed yesterday, no matter was pursued. There was no matter pursued either, if the chair's memory is correct, by the Government House Leader at the time. But if the Government House Leader chooses to rise, as he just did, and pursue a point here today, I trust that he's made his argument. So we'll give opportunity to the hon. House leader of the Official Opposition.

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity. I'm not sure how to respond. I had framed the issue as clearly as I could. I told you the matters that we were pursuing. There's nothing that has been said in the Assembly by this member that I believe to be inaccurate.

I'd made it very clear yesterday the issues that we were seeking a ruling on. What the Government House Leader is asking for, I don't know what authority he has for that. I didn't hear any authority cited. He may be unhappy with the extent to which I had narrowed my argument yesterday, but, with respect, I'm the author of that. He had his opportunity, I suppose, yesterday. If he felt that the issues in front of you weren't expansive enough, weren't comprehensive enough, he had some options available to him, and he chose not to avail himself of them. So I would respectfully suggest that he's estopped now from being concerned that you didn't pursue in your ruling matters that would have been wholly irrelevant to the issues that were before you.

I'm not sure how else to respond to it, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader. I'd like some citations to deal with here in what we're talking about.

MR. HAVELOCK: Well, Mr. Speaker, you allowed the initial discussion, so I'm simply responding to the response of the hon. member across the way. If you're suggesting that at this stage I need to provide a citation . . . [interjection] Okay. Thank you.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that yesterday, during the time when this matter was debated, the hon. House leader did raise the issue of the assault and did make it something which he wanted you to consider. It's a fine technical argument to suggest, as the Opposition House Leader has done, that it wasn't officially raised. However, I am looking at Hansard from March 2, page 229. This is the hon.

Opposition House Leader, and here's the quote:

The Leader of the Official Opposition attended at the media room with this member. When she entered the doors of the media room, a young woman, an employee of the government – and I think it serves little purpose to embarrass the individual woman.

Too late, Mr. Speaker.

I take it she was acting on instructions of the Premier, the Minister of Health and Wellness, or the chair of this meeting, the Member for Calgary-Glenmore. This young woman came up, told Mrs. MacBeth that she could not enter the room. Physically, in terms of the Criminal Code, in my view, it would be an assault, because without the consent of Mrs. MacBeth she applied – it was a physical application of force.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member across the way did raise the issue, and the hon. member should do the honourable thing and simply withdraw the remark and apologize.

THE SPEAKER: The matter in question is, again, one that should remind all members that they are responsible for what they say in this House. If an hon. member wants to take liberty with the English language, any language for that matter, and make statements in the House which he/she feels they may not be accountable for either that day or sometime in the future, then others will judge other than the members of this House.

This matter is one that is perplexing. An accusation is made about an hon. member saying something, and one hon. member in fact quotes from Hansard that the hon. member said something. Then the hon. member, in this case the Deputy Government House Leader, is demanding an apology from the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo. I think that the chair will take all of this under advisement and review completely what has been said in the Hansard with respect to the matter. It was certainly not a matter that was raised and pursued by the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo yesterday in his remarks with respect to the request for a ruling.

The bottom line is that all hon. members should be very clear about what they say in this House. The fact of the matter is that others have written in a more public forum than this Assembly about the incident in question.

THE CHAIRMAN: I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Marriage Amendment Act, 2000

THE CHAIRMAN: When we last met to consider this matter, an amendment was proposed by the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, and we are proceeding from there. This amendment has been circulated and is known as amendment A1.

The hon. Member for Red Deer-South wishes to speak to the amendment.

MR. DOERKSEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I do in fact wish to address the amendment before us because the amendment strikes out section 5, which is the use of the notwithstanding clause.

There's been a number of members in the Assembly who have raised the question of jurisdiction. The Member for Edmonton-

Strathcona, the Member for Medicine Hat, the hon. Justice minister have posed the point of view that this particular bill is not within the jurisdiction of the province of Alberta and hence inappropriate. I want to make the record quite clear, Mr. Chairman. If you look at section 91 of the Charter where it talks about the distribution of legislative powers, it does say in there that the House of Commons has jurisdiction over marriage and divorce, but under section 92, where it outlines the provincial jurisdiction, you'll note under section 92(12) that the provinces have jurisdiction over the solemnization of marriage in the province.

Further, I would also refer hon. members to the Alberta Law Reform Institute's recent Family Law Project, which was released in October of 1998, where they note in a footnote that the federal power embraces the substantive law. By way of qualification of the above jurisdiction, s. 92(12), which I referred to earlier, grants exclusive legislative power to the provincial legislatures to enact laws relating to the "solemnization of marriage."

Again, the Law Reform Institute confirms that particular jurisdictional issue.

We've made several references to the Layland case, and when it comes to jurisdiction, I think it's important or useful to refer to that particular judgment as well. It is a court case called Layland versus Ontario, March 15, 1993, and I'm going to quote from the document.

The applicants, who were both male and who were cohabiting in a sexual relationship, applied under s. 8(4) of the Marriage Act . . .

And of course this is in Ontario, Mr. Chairman.

. . . for judicial review of the refusal to issue a marriage licence to them. They argued that the limitation which prevents persons of the same sex from marrying violated their equality rights under s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Here's a case where in fact two individuals applied for a marriage licence and it was clearly within the provincial jurisdiction.

I'm laying out the case that in fact the bill, as we have it, with respect to the powers of the province of Alberta does have jurisdiction over the solemnization of marriage, and in fact it would thus make it appropriate for us to be able to use the notwithstanding clause to make that particular case.

Moving now to the question of the use of the notwithstanding clause – and I might repeat some of the things I argued earlier on the point of order. I would point out to all members that this is a private member's bill; it was drafted by myself. It is a very simple bill. It lays out a definition of marriage in a preamble talking about the importance of marriage, and so far I haven't heard anybody really disagree with that particular notion. But it was also very clear and it was clear in all the debates of everybody in the Assembly in second reading that the notwithstanding clause was a deliberate insertion into the bill, a very important part of the bill and one that everybody understood when they voted on it.

In second reading, Mr. Chairman, there were a number of good arguments made about why we use the notwithstanding clause and in what circumstances. I want to refer you to another number of quotations from a research paper, a background paper on the notwithstanding clause. In this particular paper the Attorney General of Manitoba at the time made these comments. He said:

The rights of Canadians will be protected, not only by the constitution but more importantly by a continuation of the basic political right our people have always enjoyed – the right to use the authority of Parliament and the elected Legislatures to identify, define, protect, enhance and extend the rights and freedoms Canadians enjoy.

Allan Blakeney, who was the Premier of Saskatchewan at that time, also made these comments. He said:

It contains a Charter of Rights which protects the interests of individual Canadians, yet in several vital areas allows Parliament and Legislatures to override a court decision which might affect the basic social institutions of a province or region and this is fully consistent with the sort of argument we have put forward that we need to balance the protection of rights with the existence of our institutions which have served us so well for so many centuries.

Mr. Chairman, I would say that marriage is one of those institutions that deserves our protection.

The use of the notwithstanding clause in the bill. If this amendment is passed, it's akin – and I'll use the marriage analogy – to going down the aisle with your spouse-to-be, going in front of the minister and saying, "Yes, I believe in the importance of marriage and its use for society and the benefit, but I really don't want to make my vows today because I want to keep my options open." If we do not use the notwithstanding clause, we have left the door open for challenges. That's clearly why the notwithstanding clause was inserted into the bill to begin with.

Several members have said: well, that's never going to happen; that's unlikely. Mr. Chairman, I would just refer you to an article in the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, October 23, 1999. This is written out of Kingston. It says:

Gays and lesbians should go for broke and fight in the courts for marriage rights instead of accepting any compromises offered by governments, a legal conference was told yesterday.

In the same article it talks about a Supreme Court Justice and the comments that were made, and I'm quoting again:

Conference participants were bolstered by a keynote speech Thursday evening from Supreme Court Justice Claire l'Heureux-Dube, who asserted court fights for non-traditional couples are "full of promise" considering their legal gains over the last decade.

Going back to the Layland case, the dissenting opinion clearly indicated that there is a thought out there, there are people who hold the view that they want to push this matter further, and I think that for anybody to suggest otherwise would be naive.

One thing I haven't heard, Mr. Chairman, from the people who are opposed to the notwithstanding clause at the conclusion of this bill. While they are firm in the value of marriage, while they're saying that they don't want to change the definition of marriage, I've not heard one of them yet say in opposition that in the event there was a court challenge, they would use that mechanism. So what they say and what I hear don't seem to match.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is reminded that under Standing Order 8(2)(b) we're going to have to move to the next item of business, so the chair would invite the hon. member to consider moving at this point, so that we can get the committee to report to the Assembly, that we adjourn debate on Bill 202 at this time.

MR. DOERKSEN: I'd be willing to do that, but I'd also be willing to call the question.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: No.

MR. DOERKSEN: Okay. In that case, then, Mr. Chairman, I would move that we adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader to move that we rise and report progress.

MR. HAVELOCK: I'd be happy to do that. Thank you. I'd move that we rise and report progress, Mr. Chairman.

[Motion to report progress on Bill 202 carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

MRS. GORDON: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports progress on Bill 202.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in this report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Opposed? So ordered.

Canada Health Act

502. Mr. Shariff moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to reaffirm its commitment to the five principles of the Canada Health Act and ensure that all provincial health care legislation continues to comply with these principles.

[Debate adjourned February 29: Mr. Smith speaking]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fort.

MR. CAO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to discuss Motion 502. Public health care is very important for our country, our province. Perhaps every one of us should know that our first greeting to one another is about our health. Good health is the foundation of everything else in life. It is no wonder that health matters touch us at our core. If our health is vital to us, we need to have a clear understanding of the issues surrounding it.

The Canada Health Act with its five principles stipulates that the health care system must be publicly administered and operated on a nonprofit basis by a public authority. It also stipulates that insured services must be comprehensive. It also says that the system must be universal, that all individuals are covered under the system. The act says that people must be covered no matter where and when they move within the country and that there are no charges for insured services. It seeks to maintain a universal level of quality across the country. It means that all Canadian citizens are guaranteed a certain level of quality and accessibility.

The principles of the Canada Health Act are followed closely by Alberta laws, and Albertans have a high regard for these principles. This is one of the foundations or treasures of Canada. As I travel outside Canada, I'm very proud that we have a public health system that covers my worries, my concerns, for myself and for my relatives. It's also something that I feel assured that when I need it, I have it.

We should look at the health care system in total. The economy of our society today is heavily based on a service economy. Among the service delivery there are few options. Publicly owned and publicly operated, publicly owned and privately operated, privately owned and publicly operated, or privately owned and privately operated: those are the options in the general context of service delivery in our society nowadays. Each one has its pros and cons.

We are faced with a fast-changing and progressive world. We need to be adaptive and innovative. The health care system has been serving us very, very well, but it is under great pressure from utilization. The growing demands for services, the growing number of services, the long waiting lists, the cost rising faster than normal growth, the lack of staffing, constraints by organizational behaviours, new and costly technologies, and limited tax dollars all have been plaguing our system.

We have seen more tax dollars put into the health care system across Canada, but the problem still exists. A key government function is to get the most public good out of our limited tax dollars. We need to be pragmatic, trying new and innovative approaches in order to do so. Imagine that Alberta becomes well known for our excellence in medical services, that people from other parts of the world come here to be treated, bringing reputation and revenue to our locality. On the other hand, imagine Albertans having to go outside the country to find better treatment and paying for it.

I believe that our health care system should remain publicly managed and publicly funded with universal accessibility for every Albertan with high quality at an affordable public cost. In order to protect our treasured public health care system, the ways of service delivery should be pragmatic and flexible. It is common sense that there is more than one way of doing anything. When we talk about the Canada Health Act, again, this is core to our heart. The universal health care system was developed, as I recall, about 30 years ago, and it became the identity of Canadians. There is a comfort, a peace of mind that when the day comes that we need it, we'll have it. It's an insured program covered by public dollars.

I recall that in 1984 Parliament unanimously passed the Canada Health Act, and this act stipulated the five principles of the Canadian health program. It also established criteria and conditions for insured health services and extended health care services provided under the provincial jurisdiction. When we look at the system itself nowadays, we see that it has grown because of the technology, the number of people, the different professions involved, and the clients, or patients.

We need to look at it and see ways to keep it from bankruptcy, from going into ruin. The health care system with its five principles is highly regarded in Alberta and across the country. It's the envy of the world. In order to keep that, we need to look at ways and means of keeping it, improving it, making it better as the world changes, as our society changes.

When I look at the debate on health care across Canada, I'm encouraged because it has become a debate. There's a need to debate the public issues so that we can have input from our citizens, so that we can have the formulation of a policy based on public input. There are definitely different ideas of how to do things, but if you look at why we do things, we believe that we need the public health care system as, again, it is the identity of Canadians.

We need to keep it. But now what to do with it? What we do now is look at different aspects so we can improve it. Mostly what is different, while we have differences of opinions, is the how to do it. We should not forget that the whole objective is to uphold the Canada Health Act with its five principles. We need to have programs that uphold that principle to get to that objective. We also need to consider different ways of doing that, and the debate is more on ways of doing things. I think that in the general context in our society usually we get the blame for not doing or upholding certain things, not because we don't have the same objective but because we are doing it in a different way, the accuser usually using the way of doing things to destroy our common objective.

So when I look at the health care system in Alberta with the mandate saying that the government of Alberta is committed to the preservation of the principle . . .

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Member for Calgary-Fort, but under Standing Order 8(4) I must put all questions to conclude debate on the motion under consideration.

School Uniforms

503. Mrs. Forsyth moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to introduce a pilot project to examine the feasibility of a school uniform policy in Alberta schools as current research gathered from other jurisdictions shows a correlation between the requirement to wear school uniforms and a decrease in school violence.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

MRS. FORSYTH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and begin debate on Motion 503. This motion really started for me over two years ago when I received a call from a constituent asking me what I knew about school uniforms and the decrease in violence, the increase in attendance, and so on and so on and so on. So I started reading and researching the Internet and receiving correspondence from people across North America on school uniforms. In fact, I just received an e-mail from Barbados.

I will admit that in the beginning I was skeptical about the whole issue. I thought, like most others, that uniforms were an old idea brought back from the past to solve educational problems of today, yet as I read more and gathered more research, I began to realize that uniforms do have a place in our educational system. I think the motion I am proposing today takes into account the last two years, and I also think it's the right way to proceed in Alberta.

Motion 503 proposes a voluntary pilot project in a few selected Alberta schools to examine the feasibility and effectiveness of a school uniform policy in improving the school environment and decreasing school violence. Mr. Speaker, my purpose in bringing forth this motion is really twofold. First, I believe that school uniforms can positively influence the school environment. They are not a cure-all solution to school violence or other problems in our schools; however, there is data from across North America that seems to link uniforms to stability in schools.

Second, Mr. Speaker, I realize that in Alberta's public school system uniforms are not commonplace. This is why I'm proposing a voluntary pilot project. I want to get the debate on this topic going. One common concern that I've heard from my constituents and from people across Alberta is that there are not enough Alberta-based examples of data on public schools adopting uniform policies. If we can get a few schools to engage in this pilot project, I believe this will show that uniforms are a good idea for our schools.

I know that when people think of school uniforms, the first image that pops into their head is the old-fashioned Ivy League look of girls in pressed skirts and boys in a suit and tie. In fact, school uniforms of today are much different and much more casual. Take for example the Quinte secondary school in Belleville, Ontario, where the students wear khakis and a white T-shirt with the school crest, or the Sacred Heart elementary school in Calgary, where the students wear black trousers and a white shirt, or simply a school in the States where the students wear jeans and a T-shirt. The key to the effectiveness of school uniforms is not making the kids look formal and fancy. It is certainly a sense of community when all kids dress equally.

In the sense of community, students and schools can gain many benefits. I want to discuss these benefits, but I also want to supplement the discussion with examples of actual schools from across North America that have implemented uniforms. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important benefits of a uniform policy lies in the fact that all students wear them. This makes it much easier for principals and teachers to identify and act quickly when there are outsiders or intruders in our schools. Principals can point out and respond to who belongs and who doesn't. This can actually lead to unwanted outsiders not going into schools and creating conflicts within the school building. Also, in urban centres, where the student population can be in the thousands, uniforms can be an important tool to identify in the mass of teenagers those who are its students. Without uniforms there is the potential for teenage gang members or drug dealers to anonymously walk amongst students. Uniforms can make a real difference in fighting to keep unwanted elements out of our schools. Threats to students must be responded to quickly, and when intruders are easily identified, school staff can act quickly to either stop the situation or prevent it from occurring in the first place.

The Scarborough Academy for technological and environmental computer studies exemplifies this. Before a school uniform policy was implemented, it was on the Toronto school board's list of possible closures because the school had lost control of some of its students. Fights, drugs, and lack of respect were common. But, Mr. Speaker, when uniforms and a code of conduct were introduced, the school underwent a vast improvement in the school environment and culture. It is now off the closure list, and the students and teachers actually enjoy showing up for school. As well, in New York City, the largest urban centre in North America, half a million elementary students started wearing uniforms in 1999. A recent poll by the New York City board of education showed that over 80 percent of parents supported all students wearing uniforms.

Mr. Speaker, uniforms themselves cannot solve all the problems of school discipline and safety, but they are one positive contributing factor. Working with all stakeholders in a community – students, parents, teachers, principals – uniforms can be part of a strong overall safety program.

Another benefit of school uniforms is the curtailing of peer pressure. When all kids are in uniform, there is less focus on clothing and less competition relating to clothing among students. Mr. Speaker, when everyone is in a school uniform, students and their parents don't have to worry about keeping up with the latest fashions and spending hundreds of dollars during the process. Designer fashions are very expensive and can eat up the budget of a family, especially if a few kids are in school at the same time. Take for example if a child likes Tommy Hilfiger, a popular brand of clothes amongst teens. Well, a Hilfiger jacket will cost you, oh, maybe $150; a pair of jeans, around $100; and a shirt, maybe $65. That's well over $300 for one outfit. There are many parents who just can't afford this. I'm sure that all of those in the Assembly who have had kids in school know the economic pressures put on parents. Besides being expensive, when students are caught up with trying to wear the latest fashions, it diverts a lot of time that could be spent more productively on learning.

Since a uniform policy was instituted in 1998 at Nellie McClung junior high school in Edmonton to combat fashion-related pressures, many students have said that the school environment has become more stable and there has been less distraction caused by what students are wearing. Mr. Speaker, the students at Nellie McClung are being taught self-assurance, confidence, and how to be a responsible citizen in a team environment, and that sounds pretty good to me.

Mr. Speaker, conversely, when students focus on fashion, this can lead to some kids being ostracized, because their families simply can't keep up. Everyone knows how hard it is for students, especially teenage students, to feel that they fit in. Adolescence is a precocious development stage for kids, and many teenagers have limited reserves of self-esteem. What school uniforms do is eliminate one of the factors or reasons why a child would feel left out. It creates a level playing field for children at school.

In fact, in Calgary two students took the initiative to organize a petition to promote school uniforms. They felt too many of their peers, including themselves, were being made outcasts because of what they wore. These students felt that there was too much focus on clothing and economic differences. Mr. Speaker, this is exactly why I am fighting for this motion today. When kids are standing up and starting petitions trying to get us to fix problems they see as important, I am happy to stand up for them. I agree with these students. Uniforms are a great way to make students feel more included and to create a sense of community in the schools.

Uniforms do lower peer pressure. In fact, a 1998 study by the National Association of Elementary School Principals showed that three-quarters of the schools with uniform policies noted a reduction in peer pressure amongst their students after adopting a uniform policy. Three-quarters is a significant number. What it signifies is a lot of children not being picked on or pressured that otherwise would have been without the uniform policy. In my mind that is yet another positive effect of uniforms.

Peer pressure and isolation are such negative experiences for children in school. A student's emotional state can be really affected if they feel alone. Mr. Speaker, we as parents can try as hard as we can to help them and give them support, but sometimes that is not enough. It is their fellow students, their peers, that kids really want to associate with and feel welcomed by. I know that uniforms will not solve all the problems of school isolation, but they will help. Uniforms remove one aspect why a student may be picked on or singled out. The evidence is there. School uniforms promote stability in schools and contribute to students feeling safer and more included in their schools. I think it is a very positive thing.

Mr. Speaker, I have illustrated today the positive impact that school uniforms have on a myriad of school issues. I think Motion 503 is a fair proposal for Alberta schools because it is voluntary and seeks the co-operation of schools and information can be gathered.

I will close by again urging everyone in the Assembly to support this motion as a positive step towards an improved school environment. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I respect the intent of the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek with this motion. I'm not sure if it is – in fact, I'm quite sure that it's not – the answer we need for violence in schools. I respect the fact that you think it might be one of the things that may help, but I'm not sure it would.

I think back to my teaching days, and I think of some children that may have been ostracized or picked on. If it wasn't clothes, it was something else. The answer to that isn't everyone in a uniform. The answer to that is programs. It's intervention with families. It's school morale, school programs. It's a thousand and one other things that we can do in a school.

If we want to have a study that shows that it definitely decreases school violence and what you're saying is that you want to ask that provincially we set it up so that studies are done, that's quite a chunk of coin. If you really are serious about implementing this, why are we mandating it at this level? Shouldn't we be asking for volunteers? Shouldn't we be asking school boards to ask school councils and local communities? [interjection] I know that it's done in some private schools. The Nellie McClung school is one example. That's an all-girl school right here in the city.

AN HON. MEMBER: A great school.

MRS. SOETAERT: It is a great school. A great school.

This is something that starts at the local level, and a school board says: "You know what? Let's talk to this parent group, let's talk to these students and see if they would like it."

MR. DICKSON: A good example is Sacred Heart.

MRS. SOETAERT: A good example would be Sacred Heart in Calgary-Buffalo, where they did that. That was instigated by that community, by parents, and I would bet you that would have successful outcomes because it came from them.

Now, if we say, okay, Sturgeon comp, you're all going to wear uniforms – and you said that it could be just jeans and a T-shirt with no symbol on it, as I understand it – then you're going to walk in and a kid is going to have some emblem on the T-shirt. What are you going to do? Make him turn it inside out? I have done that in the past with some disgusting T-shirts, asked them to turn it inside out. Quite honestly, with jeans and T-shirts they say: well, that's not a dress code; we wear that all the time. So I don't think you've addressed that issue. It still may be the Nike runner comparison to the regular runners that I may buy somewhere for myself.

MS OLSEN: Loser.

MRS. SOETAERT: I know. I am.

What we should do is let it come from the local levels. Let it come from the schools who want to do it.

MRS. FORSYTH: That's what it's about.

MRS. SOETAERT: It isn't. This says that we're going to mandate it. At a time when this government is chronically underfunding public education . . . [interjections] I woke them up, Mr. Speaker. The truth hurts. The truth hurts. Maybe there are some truth squad members who'd like to hear this. Chronically underfunded. Kids are crowded into classrooms. Do you want to stop violence in classrooms? Let's present the rats in a cage comparison here. You don't put a bunch of kids in one small hallway at the bell during room-changing time. That's how you prevent violence. Give them some space. You don't put 43 kids in one classroom if you want kids to get along. If you want to talk about issues in violence, try funding education properly, and you'd see what kinds of programs would happen out there. Now I'm awake. Here we go.

You know, I think it's a pat on the head to say: "Oh, let's put them all in uniforms. I'm sure they'd really like that, and then all the violence will stop." What a bunch of baloney. The issue is funding in this province. The issue is not crowding kids in classrooms. The reality is that when schools need extra rooms added on, they need them not yesterday but two weeks ago, two months ago, six months ago. Let's take Bellerose comp, for example, a wonderful school. Absolutely crowded in there; 110 percent capacity. You know what? What those kids need is more space. They don't need uniforms. They need more space. When we're talking about inner-city schools, what do they need? Lunch programs more than uniforms, that's what they need. They need food.

You know, if a community wants to, if local councils want to do this, it should come from them. It should not be forced upon them by the government saying: "You're going to try this out. Oh, this is a school where we've got a high violence rate. We're going to put you all in uniforms." That's certainly not the answer. If we want to fund for enough counseling time, for smaller class sizes, for less crowded buildings, I think that would be a step in the right direction. You don't force people to wear a certain outfit and think that that will stop violence. So, Mr. Speaker, if this comes from the community and from the kids and it's their idea and they want to do it at the school, you bet it will work, or at least it has a chance of working. If we mandate this on some community, it certainly won't.

MRS. FORSYTH: It's not mandated.

MRS. SOETAERT: The member says, "It's not mandated," but somebody is going to be a pilot project, so I guess somebody would offer to do that. I would hope that that comes from the school.

They have it already. Vimy Ridge school has it already. So I'm just saying that the information is there, and if it's from a community that wants it, it may work. Otherwise, if this government were really serious about violence in schools, you would look at more counseling time, something that has been drastically cut, smaller class sizes, proper funding for inner-city schools that need lunch programs. That's what you would look at. That would be a sincere effort.

So just those few comments. I can't support it because I want to see it come from communities. If the students at one of my high schools or one of my schools support it, that would be fine. But as it is right now, no.

Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for . . .

AN HON. MEMBER: Livingstone-Macleod.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Livingstone-Macleod.

MR. COUTTS: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It does get a little confusing from time to time, knowing what last names and first names of constituencies are. That's the wonder of rural Alberta.

I'm really pleased today to rise and speak in support of Motion 503. I think it's a wonderful initiative anytime someone comes forward with an idea of how to help schools cope with the ever increasing problem of peer pressure and that type of thing, to bring forward a voluntary project that they themselves designed and that could be part of a research program.

I think that my colleague from Calgary-Fish Creek is definitely on the right track trying to urge our government to establish this voluntary pilot project by examining the effectiveness of school uniforms, and I stress "voluntarily." It's got to come from the grass roots. It's got to come not only from the students, but it's also got to come from the people that work within the school to make it an entirely complete school project.

There's a lot of pride that comes from being involved in a pilot project, a pilot project that can help maintain school decorum, and I think each and every individual school that would volunteer to be part of a pilot program would see the benefits of it and then institute that pilot project into school policy. It's a lot better to have it come from the individual. It's a lot better to come from the individual students, the grass roots, because that pride is instilled.

Motion 503 is a reflection of our commitment to engaging Albertans and guiding our policy through input from our communities. What I mean by this is that we are a Conservative government who listens to what Albertans have to say. This leads to better representation of the interests of Albertans, because instead of a policy being driven, as I said earlier, from the top down, it's based on stakeholder-driven consultation and, more importantly, community-based delivery.

I'd like to illustrate a few key educational initiatives that we have undertaken to improve our children's development and prosperity. The first is the Alberta initiative for school improvement. This is a new approach to support the improvement of student learning by encouraging teachers, administrators, trustees, parents, and the community to work together to introduce innovative and creative initiatives. What this means is that individual school boards will have the autonomy and the flexibility in deciding what areas of improvement they would like to focus on. For one jurisdiction it might be smaller class sizes. For another it might be early reading programs. The key to all of this is creating the right initiatives for each community and hence finding the most effective way to improve the learning environment.

Mr. Speaker, this $104 million investment in this program over the next two years will ensure that schools have the capital for the program to work and be effective. An example of our government's commitment to ensure safe and caring schools is reflected in First Things First: Our Children, the government of Alberta's three-year plan for education. An education system that helps Alberta's young people become self-reliant, responsible, caring and contributing members of society is a top priority of our government, and the well-informed, collaborative effort of all educational partners ensures that schools can prevent violence and become safe and caring communities.

Another example of our government's commitment to community-based initiatives was the Children's Forum held last fall. The forum was not an end but rather a starting point, a starting point for government and for all Albertans concerned about children. The forum involved stakeholders from across Alberta from various backgrounds and professions, all with a vested interest in the well-being of our children. The participants at the forum came up with several key recommendations which were delivered to the government by the chair of the event, Mrs. Colleen Klein. These recommendations will be taken and used to examine our government's existing children's services, and what will happen is that these services will be improved upon, strengthened, or in some cases refocused to better serve Alberta's children.

The initiatives that I've described lead to the key point that I'm just about to illustrate. We as a government are always striving to improve the prosperity and chances for success of all Albertans, especially for our young people. We recognize this can best be accomplished with the hard work and input of fellow Albertans. Listening to what Albertans say runs this government.

Mr. Speaker, one of the things Albertans are saying, especially in my constituency, is that we want our schools to be safe and to promote the best learning environment possible. That's why I'm standing here today in support of my colleague's motion, because it will make our schools safer and will promote a stable learning environment.

I understand that school uniforms are not a panacea in solving issues like school violence or peer pressure, but, Mr. Speaker, the data from across North America shows that the majority of schools who have implemented a uniform policy have seen a general improvement in the school environment. This includes schools like the Nellie McClung academy here in Edmonton or the Sacred Heart elementary school in Calgary. These are examples in Alberta, but there are not enough public schools undertaking uniform policies to make a reasoned estimate of their effectiveness. This is another reason why I support my colleague's motion. Motion 503 proposes a voluntary – a voluntary – pilot project in a few schools to gather the needed data, not done on a provincewide basis or as a province-wide endeavour.

The pilot project that the hon. member is proposing is the most logical and effective way to proceed. Rather than trying to force schools in Alberta to comply with some heavy-handed approach without any community consultation or any local school involvement, my colleague is only asking for a fair and balanced plan. The voluntary pilot project which a few schools may undertake will get the Alberta-based data needed to make a reasoned decision on uniforms. Motion 503 is an illustration of both the hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek and our entire government's commitment to community-based initiatives and constituent input into policy.

The school uniform policy my colleague is proposing will create other benefits for both students and parents. One such benefit is that more focus is given to learning and less to clothing. This happens perhaps because everyone is wearing the same thing. In essence, Mr. Speaker, the uniforms become the students' work clothes. Instead of worrying about fashions and hype, kids can focus on the reality of getting an education. Uniforms can promote good behaviour and an orderly learning environment. This means teachers can spend less time on discipline and hence more time on teaching.

School uniforms are a concrete and visible means of restoring order and discipline to the classroom, yet the uniforms of today are not overly stifling to a student's ability to express himself or herself. Uniforms today strike the right balance between instilling equality and order and keeping the school environment casual and fun. When implemented, school uniforms seem to make schools safer, decrease peer pressure, and stabilize the school environment. These are, of course, laudable and positive outcomes.

Mr. Speaker, I think we should support this motion as a positive step for school safety and remember our larger commitment to the prosperity and the development of Alberta students. This means getting enough teachers in our schools, having those schools equipped with modern technology, ensuring that the infrastructure of our schools is maintained, and of course keeping our schools safe.

I am happy to say that we have kept our commitment. This is illustrated in some of the initiatives I have mentioned today and especially in our recent budget. We have laid the foundation for future successes and ensured that our students will have access to a great system. Along with our investment in education we continue to use innovation as our compass.

Our government is always looking for a new and creative way of doing things to serve Albertans effectively. This is where community-based initiatives and stakeholder consultations are most important. This ensures that we listen to Albertans and develop good policy. Mr. Speaker, I think that Motion 503, if passed, will continue this commitment, and I therefore hope that all of my colleagues in this Assembly will support it.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Norwood. [some applause]

MS OLSEN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to my cheering fans here. I rise today to speak against this motion. Part of the reason I'm doing that is because this government allows for charter schools, and some of those schools have already decided that their students will wear uniforms. That's a criterion to get into the school. We have schools that have maybe no uniform codes, but you can't have coloured hair. I believe Austin O'Brien might be one of those schools. There are all sorts of limitations already put on kids. You can cite the Nellie McClung school, which actually from its inception has had uniforms. I mean, it's great. If people choose to send their kids there, that's great. That's their choice to do that.

However, to suggest that this should be the standard I think is wrong. I would suggest that violence in schools – and first of all let's not forget that peer pressure has been around for years and will exist. It exists in different forms at different times throughout changes in society, and we're not going to see that disappear. There's a lot of peer pressure now to not smoke, to not drink, those kinds of things, and those are things that impact violence in schools.

However, I become very concerned when we talk about the notion of suggesting that a standard be set voluntarily or not. If that's the issue the hon. member is bringing forward, then the motion is moot because that happens now. It happens now. There's a voluntary process that exists, so I'm wondering why studies can't occur with those specific schools that you've already talked about: private, public, charter, whatever. I'm wondering, you know, if the member has thought about undertaking some studies with those particular schools: Vimy Ridge, Nellie McClung, the Sacred Heart school in Calgary, and any of those other schools that have a traditional-type uniform.

I look back to the tradition in the U.K., where every school has kids in uniforms. I can tell you that a lot of those schools have a lot of similar problems that exist here. They all may wear the same uniform, but it doesn't mean that it's going to deal with the issues of poverty, the issues that a kid has coming from a home where alcohol and substance abuse exist or those kinds of things. With that comes some different issues for some of these children. It doesn't help kids with fetal alcohol syndrome if you're going to put him in a uniform. We have to address these issues in a different way. If you really want to address violence, let's look at poverty, let's look at putting programs in place. That's crime prevention, but uniforms are not crime prevention.

The whole idea of the safe and caring school program. My son was in a school, in fact, that was part of that program. Some great things were happening, and there were some great changes, but you know what? The kids didn't have to wear uniforms for those things to happen, for the changes to occur.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that many of the kids already have uniforms in school, and I think my colleague from Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert alluded to that, all those places in and around that area. I would not want to see money diverted away, especially with the schools in my neighbourhood, from breakfast programs, lunch programs, snack programs, peer leadership programs, mentoring programs and have that funding diverted into school uniforms, because many of the kids in my constituency need much more than that. I don't think it matters. You know, for some of those kids getting to school is a huge chore. What they come dressed in isn't an issue for them. Getting there is a huge challenge. So I can think of many more ways to address these issues than necessarily putting a child or a youth in a uniform.

I would suggest to you that if you're looking at where the violence starts, it's at the junior high school level, where you would find much resistance from those kids. And why should a kid have to travel outside of their school area because the school has decided to have uniforms?

There are all sorts of other issues, and I have yet to see anything tabled by the hon. member that suggests that all of these concerns would be addressed by the adoption of a pair of jeans and a T-shirt or a kilt and a pair of kneesocks and those kinds of things. Those are choices that people should make on their own. Those schools are there.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, very much.

THE SPEAKER: I hate to interrupt the hon. Member for Edmonton-Norwood, but under Standing Order 8(2)(c) the time allocation for consideration of this type of business today is now concluded.

4:30

head: Government Motions

Adjournment of Session

5. Mr. Havelock moved on behalf of Mr. Hancock:
Be it resolved that when the Assembly adjourns to recess the current sitting of the Fourth Session of the 24th Legislature, it shall stand adjourned until a time and date as determined by the Speaker after consultation with the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

THE SPEAKER: The Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. HAVELOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is primarily administrative. This side of the House expects that we will have a lengthy and interesting session. However, to give members opposite the opportunity to have full and complete debate on this, we feel it's necessary to move the motion at this time. Again I reiterate that it's mostly administrative so we can adjourn in the future, which I expect will be quite some time down the road.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just want to take a few moments to talk about this motion to adjourn already, so early in such a fun-filled session. Though it is administrative, in the words of the Deputy Government House Leader, I actually believe him. I really do, but I just want to express a few questions or concerns that maybe will be considered in the future; for example, actually set times for sitting in this Legislature. I know it's been something we've talked about for the seven years I've been here.

MR. HAVELOCK: I've been here 10.

MRS. SOETAERT: You've been here 10? No. You came in the same time I did.

MR. HAVELOCK: One-thirty to 10.

MRS. SOETAERT: That's a possibility, 1:30 to 10. From 1:30 to 10 could be a possibility.

However, one of the things I would appreciate and I think Albertans would appreciate and maybe those of us with a family life would appreciate is knowing the actual dates that we will sit in this Legislature. That's not uncommon across this country, to actually have set dates for when they start and finish. And you know what? Some places have a fall session every year. Yes, they really do.

MS OLSEN: Really?

MRS. SOETAERT: They really do. So, you know, that's a concept that maybe this government could think about. I'd be interested to know: are we going to have a fall session this year?

DR. TAYLOR: We had one.

MRS. SOETAERT: We've had one in seven years. I'm really glad that the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat is going to leap into debate any moment now, or he could point of order me if he's really upset.

Mr. Speaker, I think it would be neat to actually know when or if we're going to have a fall session and actually set that date every year. I think that would be quite a concept, which isn't known in Alberta, but certainly I think we could do that because there are other strides we have made in this Assembly, so I bet this one wouldn't be too hard for this government to leap to. I think certainly this year will be a hot year, that we will need a fall session, so it would be nice if I could see that motion put forward at some time, that a fall session will start on such a date.

This is an adjournment, so if we adjourn early in the spring session – heaven knows, it's on the table now. It could be done in what? How many days does this take to go through? Two? One? It could be done Thursday. Then certainly everything's been left on the table, unless of course they bring closure to a great many things. It could be an awfully short session, so the reality is that we should all be concerned. Will this go into the fall? Will there be a fall session in Alberta in the year 2000?

Ah, Cypress-Medicine Hat says no, but he's not the Deputy Government House Leader, so I'm not going to put my eggs in that basket. I am going to hope that the Deputy Government House Leader will bring that issue forward to his caucus and say: you know, guys, it's about time we really were democratic in this Assembly and set dates that we actually sit in this Legislature, start dates in the spring and start dates in the fall and really go from there. I think it would be a real concept. A real concept. And you know these parliamentary trips that each one of us is trying to get an opportunity to be a part of, which I think are very informative and very good? Well, then you'd actually be able to say, "No, I can't go in November," or "Yes, I can," but right now things are up in the air with all those kinds of things.

I think the people of Alberta would appreciate it. There are issues that they know could be tabled in the Legislature, talked about in the Legislature, but they say: "Oh, are you going to have a fall session this year? Maybe you'll present my stuff in the fall." Well, we're never sure in Alberta if there's going to be a fall session.

So I just wanted to express the concern that, number one, we've already got an adjournment motion and we're just starting. We're just starting, unless of course Bill 11 is scrapped, maybe Bill 3 is really fixed, and maybe we are out of here in a week or two. Sad, because there are a great many issues that people in Alberta want us to talk about. I'm sure that would be an exaggeration, and I don't think they have any intention of really using that adjournment motion right away.

In the meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, I'm very concerned that this motion is already on the table but with the hope that maybe next time we will actually have set sitting days in the Legislature. Some things have improved. I'm trying to think of one, and I will in a little while, I think. The election of the Speaker: there's one. Even though our side is outnumbered on that, the process is still there, and sometimes it's a pretty interesting election.

I just have to say that I'm disappointed this motion is already on the table. We've barely been here – what would you say? – 10 days. Those are a short 10 days. [interjection] I'm sure Calgary-Fish Creek is going to hop into debate pretty soon.

Mr. Speaker, with those few concerns I will take my seat. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I, too, have some concerns about Government Motion 5, the adjournment motion. Like the hon. member for the area of Riviere Qui Barre – that would be one of her areas in the constituency of Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert – we can only become alarmed at the haste with which the government introduces this adjournment motion. I myself have not even had the opportunity yet to respond to the throne speech, yet hon. members are anxious to get the adjournment motion on the Order Paper, and we have so much to do. We look at page 3 of the Order Paper, and we see there have been scarcely 13 government bills introduced.

I don't know what they're thinking. The only thing I can surmise is that they're afraid of something. And when this government is afraid of something, Mr. Speaker, I can only see Bill 11, the Health Care Protection Act – or, as some people say, the privatization act – and this is the reason for this hasty motion, this adjournment motion. When we look at the concern that has been expressed by Albertans, the government with this adjournment motion can fold their political tent, so to speak, and get away from the intense political pressure they are experiencing over Bill 11. Many Albertans, it doesn't matter where they're from, whether they're from Grande Prairie, Red Deer-South, Calgary, Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan – all over the province, including Fort McMurray, people are very, very concerned about not only the direction of health care. Suddenly people are just coming up in the streets and they're saying: "Mr. MacDonald, we can't trust this government anymore to deliver a good, sound public health care system. They cannot be trusted."

I'm sure all hon. Members of the Legislative Assembly must be hearing this, so this has to be the reason for skittering away and having this motion so soon on the Order Paper. Ten days into the session and here we are talking about adjournment. We have issues to deal with. We have issues, of course, relating to health care, Mr. Speaker. We have issues relating to education, whether it's in the elementary system or the high school system. We have the universities. Students are gathering, and they're protesting in a very sensible Canadian way about the high cost of university. We have a skilled-labour shortage in the province. We have industries that are very, very anxious to provide jobs for Albertans. They can and they will, but there are no skilled people to come forward and take these jobs. We have issues that are brought forward all the time by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning regarding municipal governments. We have issues relating to senior citizens of this province. We have seniors who feel that this government is making them feel guilty because they may require at some time in the future health care.

We have a very young population in this province. It is the youngest population in the country. There is less than 10 percent of the entire population that is over 65. It is not going to be for another generation yet, Mr. Speaker, the year 2016, before this province reaches the average age of retirement or, shall I say, 65, which is currently going on record in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and British Columbia. So whenever seniors are gathering – and they're gathering in large groups these days, particularly in this city, the city of Edmonton – regarding health care and Bill 11 . . .

Speaker's Ruling Relevance

THE SPEAKER: Hon. member, before the Assembly right now is a motion dealing with adjournment, and relevancy is always a consideration. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar is very eloquent, and if the fear is that should this motion go forward – the Speaker has to be very careful about intervening in the debate, but assurances should be given to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar that should this motion be approved, this House would not be adjourned until the year 2016.

Debate Continued

MR. MacDONALD: Goodness.

Mr. Speaker, all these issues, including the issues that are very important to seniors, issues on agriculture, environment, electricity deregulation, issues relating to user fees, have to be discussed at length before we should entertain an adjournment motion. This concept that 10 days into the session we should put forward our adjournment motion to me is almost a reflection of paranoia by the government. This is a snapshot. It's a snapshot in time. It's really a polaroid of what this government thinks. Do they want to have debate? Do they want to have debate on these issues? I think not.

We're always conscious that in the fall of 1997 there was no fall session of the Legislative Assembly. Before we go to the citizens of Alberta to determine who should form the next government, this may be the last opportunity to discuss this issue. It is very important that everyone from all sides of the Assembly gets to discuss these issues. With this motion, which I would describe mildly as a legislative guillotine, I'm surprised. I'm surprised that it would be brought forward, and I would be surprised that hon. members of this Assembly would support it at this time. Of course, if we don't have our adjournment motion now, the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, our House leader, in May or maybe in June is going to spot on the Order Paper some day the adjournment motion. He's going to be able to come to our caucus meeting and say: I believe we have a week or two left in this session.

Now, this could just be a parliamentary ploy, but I think it is an affront to all Albertans, Mr. Speaker. When we think of Albertans, when we think of the discussions we're going to have here this spring, we must think of the long term, not of schemes for re-election but think of the long term. We think perhaps to the year 2016, when 14 percent of the population will be over 65, or perhaps to the years in the future when we're not going to have enormous reserves of natural gas and oil from which to get royalties as we sell this gas and oil. The province is changing quite quickly. Last week, for instance, we talked about our land, particularly our land base and our land that's reserved for agricultural purposes. There are many long-term planning issues, and it is just not proper for those issues to be discussed after the legislative guillotine that Motion 5 really is introduced.

With those words, Mr. Speaker, I will cede the floor to any other hon. member of the Assembly, and the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo seems keen to engage in the debate. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, I can't help but think as I look across at the Member for Calgary-Varsity that there was a time when the member for that constituency would have had probably a very different view of the Legislature and when we'd shut things down and when we wouldn't. Actually, I'm thinking of the Member for Calgary-Varsity, the current minister of gambling, when he was involved in the Tuxis and older boys' parliament.

You know, I can't help but think that that member would have looked forward with great excitement to the prospect of another Tuxis and older boys' parliament resuming in Red Deer. He would have gotten in the car or on the bus to travel up, representing his area in Calgary, to participate in debate. I can only imagine the kind of excitement he brought to participating in that process and how disappointing he would have found it if the minute he got off the bus to roll into the Tuxis and older boys' parliament in Red Deer or wherever it was held that particular year, somebody told him, "Well, great to see you here, Calgary-Varsity, but get your calendar out, because we're deciding when we're sending you home." He would say to himself: "But, gosh, it's only a few days I get this little excursion away from home. I've got all kinds of new friends to meet in the parliament. I've got all kinds of new experiences to have. Surely you wouldn't deny me that by bringing down the curtain before we barely get out on the stage."

Mr. Speaker, that same frustration that I can imagine the Member for Calgary-Varsity would have brought to his first Tuxis and older boys' parliament may be akin to what some of us feel when we see this motion on there. I'm going to speak against it for a couple of reasons.

The first one would be the provision that the House stands adjourned "until a time and date as determined by the Speaker after consultation with the Lieutenant Governor in Council." Now, Mr. Speaker, I've certainly got no lack of confidence in either your office or in the Lieutenant Governor, and I know you do a fine job in terms of deciding when the Legislature should resume sitting. But how much better it would be if we went back to the plan that had been engineered by you, Mr. Speaker, and the gentleman who went on to become leader of the Liberal opposition for a time, when the two of you were House leaders and you negotiated a pact that had at least a fixed date when the spring session would commence and a fixed date when the legislative session would commence in the fall. We knew in advance that it might start a few days early, a week early, but we could intelligently plan our time and our business.

You know, what it is, Mr. Speaker? It's simply a measure of respect for individual members. It respects the ability of individual members to design their plans and their calendars in a way that most people do in the regular world. It makes sense that we take away this little bit of gamesmanship, this little bit of surprise that now is vested in Executive Council and the Premier in terms of determining when the Legislature should commence. I look forward eagerly to the day when we see one of these motions and it says, "You shall stand adjourned until a time and date as determined by the Speaker, which date shall be no later than October 15" or whatever.

I think we lost a lot when that agreement came to the end of its term. We've been able to continue some elements of that in terms of private members' business. We see some vestiges of the leadership provided in that initial agreement from 1993, but I must say, Mr. Speaker, that what we have now is but a shadow of the much bolder scheme that had been negotiated, agreed to, and implemented in that period from 1993 to 1997. So I just have that concern.

What possible reason, other than some narrow partisan advantage, would the government have for not committing to, if you will, a drop-dead date when the spring session would commence and a drop-dead date when the fall session would commence? It doesn't preclude the Premier from reconvening the session earlier. It just seems to me like such an intelligent way of proceeding. I'm disappointed we've lost that, and this is perhaps an opportunity to raise that.

Now, the other reason why I stand to register some concern is the notion of recessing the current sitting of the Fourth Session of the 24th Legislature. We discovered a couple of years ago that the government, Mr. Speaker, doesn't read their parliamentary authorities, because when they canceled the fall session in 1997, I think it was, we heard the Premier defend that by saying: well, ladies and gentlemen of the province of Alberta, we don't have any more legislation; we don't need a fall session because we don't have more legislation. That ignored completely the other huge reason why we sit as a Legislative Assembly. It's not always to pass legislation. Sometimes it's to hold government accountable.

You know, as frustrating as it is for you, Mr. Speaker, in terms of question period, in terms of riding herd on this bunch of cats, and as frustrating as it is for members here who sometimes would like a higher level of decorum and respect for each other and for other members in the Assembly . . .

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Aw.

MR. DICKSON: Well, there may be some who don't share that sentiment.

But, you know, it is the one time, it is the one place, it is the sole forum where Albertans can hold their government accountable. They hold it accountable through questions in question period, they hold the government accountable through written questions and motions for returns, when we're allowed to debate them, and they hold this government accountable through vigorous scrutiny of estimates and tough questions to ministers, who have to justify some $17 billion in taxpayer spending.

Mr. Speaker, those are also compelling and important reasons why the Legislature must sit. Yes, it's a light legislative program the government puts in front of us. Yes, it's disappointing in the sense that it misses so many of the issues that Albertans want to see addressed. I talked before about the gaps. We have yet to see the details of a vigorous public legal education program, the notion of how we're going to make our Alberta Human Rights Commission independent of government. There are so many issues, the issue of homelessness in Calgary, much of it in Calgary-Buffalo. Those are things that we should be discussing in here.

What we find is a government that rather is fixated on figuratively turning off the lights – oh, I know the lights aren't turned off here – locking the doors, and dispersing MLAs to their areas. We should have been tipped off to this when we saw when the throne speech was scheduled. Imagine the lunacy of bringing together 82 MLAs from all over the province, with all of the attendant costs associated with that, to sit for one hour, plus or minus, and hear a throne speech and have some cookies and some punch downstairs, and then we dispersed to our 82 constituencies again. What lunacy is that, Mr. Speaker? If you wanted to economize on time, why wouldn't you have the throne speech on a Monday so we stay the next day to start debate on that throne speech?

Mr. Speaker, the essence of this motion is that it reaffirms the monopolistic control that Executive Council has over the time of this Assembly, the management of this Assembly.

DR. TAYLOR: That's because there are 64 of us and 16 of you.

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Speaker, our minister responsible for innovation . . . [interjection] Science and innovation. It's hard to get the titles right, Mr. Speaker. He can't wait for the interesting questions we've got for him at 8 o'clock tonight. He wants to get involved early. He wants to know what some of those questions are. He wants to be tipped off, but he's not going to be. He's going to have to come back at 8 o'clock. We have so darn many good questions for that minister that we're going to keep him busy from 8 until 10 o'clock.

Mr. Speaker, the point I'm making is simply this. In this Assembly, as rough as it may be around the edges, as tumultuous as it may be for 50 minutes four days a week, as unsatisfactory as it may be to those of us looking for concrete answers to specific questions, it's still the very best forum Albertans have. It's the only forum Albertans have to try and ferret out how their tax dollars are being spent or misspent, how their resources are being managed or mismanaged, whether their needs are being addressed, and, if so, whether they're being addressed adequately. I wish government would put as much time, energy, and resources into representing the citizens of this province. You know, you may have 64 seats. The issue is whether this legislative agenda that we see here reflects the priorities of those Albertans.

DR. TAYLOR: We'll have 74 after the next election.

MR. DICKSON: You know, the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat already wants to make predictions in terms of the next election. Maybe, Mr. Speaker, that's really what this is all about. This little legislative session is but a very, very short hiccup on the way to the next election.

That's not what Albertans put us here for. That's not what they pay us for. That's not why they give us staff. They expect us to be wrestling with the issues like wait lists in Calgary. They expect us to be talking about long-term care facilities in Medicine Hat. They expect us to be talking about the access to mental health services in Airdrie, Alberta, and there's a whole bunch of other issues in Airdrie that citizens want to see addressed. Those people send me notes. People in Airdrie, Alberta, are sending notes to Liberal MLAs expressing their concern that they don't feel they're being represented on the private versus public health care issue.

MS HALEY: I don't think so.

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Speaker, because I know the member for the Airdrie area has got lots to say, I would think that she would have a lot to say about the issue of public health care. If she doesn't, that's for her and her constituents to resolve.

The point, Mr. Speaker, is that this is the forum for the rest of us who do want to take advantage of that opportunity to challenge the government to talk and to act and to commit resources to deal with those things like how we reduce wait lists in this province. Has there yet been a single opportunity in this House to address that? Has there been a question to talk about how we're going to reform primary health care in this province? No. But the government wants to lock the doors, bar the doors, get MLAs back out where it's safe, protect the ministers.

You know, the front bench in this House have what I call the armadillo complex. Mr. Speaker, it's all about protection. It's all about hunkering down. It's all about, you know, digging a little hole in the sand and hoping that all the pesky questions go away.

But they don't go away, Mr. Speaker. The only difference is that there isn't a forum outside of this place for the questions to be asked and for ministers to have to respond. I might say that the squeamishness we see on the part of the front bench, the Executive Council of this province, may be directly related to the intensity of the issues that Albertans are feeling and the strength of Albertans' sentiment. That's okay. I understand it's not comfortable for the front bench, but that just goes with the territory.

If you're chairman of the Calgary caucus, you know, there are responsibilities, too, and maybe in this place the chair of the Calgary government caucus doesn't get a chance to answer questions. It's too bad, Mr. Speaker. Maybe he should. Maybe he should. When we do that rewrite of the rules, maybe we should make sure that the representative of the 20 government MLAs in this place should have to answer some questions about those key issues in the city of Calgary.

The member for Three Hills has offered so much advice. I'm sure she's going to be taking her place in the debate in a moment, so I want to afford her every opportunity. It's only a couple of minutes after 5. She'll have until 5:30, and that should be enough to accommodate her 20 minutes' worth of comments.

Mr. Speaker, we've talked about the concern with respect to the process of scheduling sittings. I've outlined some of the concerns the opposition has. The focus of the government on adjournment is something that I lament, and we've talked about that each year when this particular motion comes in. I'd just like to challenge the government to maybe take this motion – why don't we just put this on a shelf? Why don't we just suspend this motion? Why don't we just leave this aside? Let's see if first we can earn the confidence of Albertans by talking about those issues that are important to them, by demonstrating our responsiveness to their needs and their issues and see this as a bit of a prize. This will be the treat at the end. If we do a good job on behalf of Albertans, maybe we take this thing off the shelf sometime in June, and if we've done a good job and we can justify to our constituents what we've done here, maybe it's time to revisit this question, and we could vote it then. It seems awfully premature to be dealing with it at this stage.

So I think those are the comments I wanted to make. I'd just finish by saying: before the guillotine comes down pursuant to Motion 6, will there be an opportunity to see in detail what the government's response is to the challenge from Claudette Bradshaw, the federal Labour minister, who's told us what the federal government would do for the homeless in our province? We haven't heard what the province is going to do. Is there going to be time to hear about whether we establish that independent Human Rights Commission? Are we going to be able to resolve that?

Are we going to be able to resolve the problems with Calgary schools? We're one of the biggest provinces; we've got a space utilization formula that doesn't work, and all members I think know that. We have too many communities in Calgary that don't have schools. We have other communities that are going to lose schools because of an absolutely arbitrary, capricious, school utilization formula. Are we going to fix that problem before we take our summer break?

Mr. Speaker, those are all concerns. I'd sooner see us debating this motion about Calgary Stampede time in July instead of doing it now, so I'm hoping that others will pick up that sentiment and suggest we hold the vote off on this until maybe early July, because then we will have determined whether we've earned the right to be able to leave here and go back to our constituencies.

Those are my comments, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to be able to join into this debate on Motion 5:

When the Assembly adjourns to recess the current sitting of the Fourth Session of the 24th Legislature, it shall stand adjourned until a time and date as determined by the Speaker after consultation with the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

Mr. Speaker, this is my fourth spring session since first being elected and the fourth time I have seen this motion or one very similar to it brought in before we've been in session for even a few weeks. This is the 10th day, day 10, that we have been in session, and we have this motion brought in. I am still trying to determine whether this motion is brought in by the government to make mischief or if it is demonstrative of its disdain for this Assembly and what we are to be accomplishing here.

I know that the mover of the motion said that it was purely administrative, but that kind of administration that far in advance I think perhaps could be calling into question an organizational deficiency if the end has to be put so close to the beginning. So I question that, but I think it's more perhaps mischief making in that they want to give the members of the opposition a chance to stand up and go through all the things, as my colleagues have done here earlier, that we see lacking in this process or that we would like to see agreed upon in advance. So perhaps they are doing us a favour by giving us this opportunity to speak to it, or perhaps it's mischief in having this motion hang over our heads like the sword of Damocles, because there it does hang.

This motion is now on the Order Paper, and it will stay on the Order Paper until the day they pop up and go: well, it's tomorrow. So I think there is an intention there that it stands as a bit of a threat to us that if all does not go the way the government had hoped, that's it. The guillotine would come down, as Calgary-Buffalo puts it, or the sword that's hanging over their head, the scimitar, as Edmonton-Gold Bar put it.

If it's not that sword of Damocles or the mischief making, then, unfortunately, I would see it as the disdain that the government has for . . .

AN HON. MEMBER: Democracy.

MS BLAKEMAN: For democracy, for what we're trying to do in this Assembly.

The first year that I was elected there was no fall session. There simply wasn't a fall session, and there was certainly a lot of business of interest to the people in Alberta that could have been discussed in a fall session.

So there's no element of trust involved, certainly on my part, with this government when I see a motion like this and I hear some reassurances: no problem; there'll be a fall session. Well, sorry, but for 25 percent of the time I've been in the House there wasn't a fall session. So that element of trust is not upheld here.

AN HON. MEMBER: It would have been a summit. Do you think a summit is going to be . . .

MS BLAKEMAN: Oh, well, yes. Summits can be called, but they do not replace the business that goes on in this Assembly with all members present.

So I would like to see some assurance, more than an assurance that there will be a fall session in this year of 2000. I think that would be a good example, a good way to start the millennium, that we do in fact have a spring and a fall sitting. This motion doesn't give me any indication of that.

I agree with some of the speakers earlier about fixed dates for when the session indeed sits. I for one make a point of going out and booking to go in and speak with all of the seniors' residences in my riding. They would prefer that I come in before July and August, but I have no way of knowing whether I can go ahead and book those visits at this point because I don't know when we'll be starting, when we'll be finishing, nothing. So I have to leave it to the last moment, and certainly I've had the request from the seniors' residences that they would prefer to have a better idea of when I might be coming or a bit more advance notice.

The work of this Assembly and this disdain for democracy or for the work of this Assembly I see coming through more and more often. There is the use of the standing policy committees, which are not available to members of the opposition. There's the entire budget process that we see, which I am shocked about, where we have a prescribed 20 days of debate, but the 20 days are really two-hour time slots, and they manage to run two of them at the same time so that counts as two days' worth of debate.

Well, we had a member in this Chamber earlier today who admitted that the public didn't access Hansard very much. So how is the public supposed to be keeping up with this budget debate? We have it brought forward on a Thursday. We're debating it the next sitting day. How is the public supposed to be getting their point of view through to their members to have it brought forward and included in the debate on the budget?

We have a throne speech now that has basically been televised and released through media releases and one-on-one media interviews long before the Lieutenant Governor gets a chance to read it out. Where is the respect for this Chamber in that process? We've got a budget speech that is for the most part released prior to our actually hearing it read out in here through all kinds of announcements and reannouncements and heavy hints and media releases and one-on-one interviews again.

So where is the respect for this Chamber? In my opinion, putting forward this adjournment motion on day 10 of the spring session is just another indication of the disdain held by this government for this Assembly.

MRS. SOETAERT: Good point.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you.

I'll conclude my remarks.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader to conclude the debate.

MR. HAVELOCK: Yes. Thank you. To simply close briefly, Mr. Speaker. It is customary – and this side of the House is certainly used to the opposition members railing against this motion. It's part of the gamesmanship which the Opposition House Leader so eloquently argued against, yet he's one of the masters at practising it within the House, and we do appreciate that.

It is political, because the members opposite know full well that we are facing a lengthy session. The members opposite know full well that we will be dealing with many of the issues which they have raised, and we'll be dealing with them seriously. But, of course, the opposition members have to commit to also dealing with them seriously so that we can get on with the business as opposed to simply being involved in the gamesmanship which I referred to earlier.

As concerns previous fall sessions, Mr. Speaker, I could be mistaken, but it's my recollection that since my election in '93 we have always had a fall session with the exception, I believe, of one year. Now, if I'm not mistaken, I think that was the unity debate, and it still gave the opposition the opportunity to call the government to account with respect to issues at that time.

Mr. Speaker, the opposition also knows full well in advance when session is going to start. That's well publicized.

As concerns what our constituents expect of us, they expect us to represent them effectively whether we are in session or out of session. Simply being in session does not guarantee effective representation, Mr. Speaker. In fact, quite often I find it much more effective to be dealing with my constituents directly on issues of concern.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I've tried to address very briefly the issues raised by the opposition, but to reiterate, I understand and they understand that a little bit of this debate is politics; it's gamesmanship. We have come to expect that. In fact, I quite enjoy the debate that often takes place around this motion, and I will enjoy raising with the Opposition House Leader probably in May or June when we're still here that they really had nothing to fear with respect to the passage of this motion.

Thank you.

[Government Motion 5 carried]

Spring Recess

6. Mr. Havelock moved on behalf of Mr. Hancock:
Be it resolved that when the Assembly adjourns on Thursday,

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. HAVELOCK: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is one of the breaks. I believe this coincides with the spring break taking place in both Calgary and Edmonton during that time. I don't believe this is a controversial motion in any way, and I would hope all members would support it.

Thank you.

[Government Motion 6 carried]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Tuesday, March 7, 2000

8:00 p.m.

Date: 00/03.07

head: Committee of Supply

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

THE CHAIRMAN: Good evening. I wonder if we might call the committee to order. Hon. members of the committee are reminded that we divide immediately into two parts. Subcommittee C will meet here and consider Agriculture, Food and Rural Development, and subcommittee D will meet in room 512 for Innovation and Science estimates.

Would those members who are part of subcommittee D please depart for room 512, and we'll see you at about 10 o'clock in the evening.

[The committee met as subcommittees C and D from 8:01 p.m. to 10:06 p.m.]

THE CHAIRMAN: I would like to call the Committee of Supply to order.

First of all, I'd like to call upon the hon. Member for Wainwright.

MR. FISCHER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Subcommittee C of the Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions of the Department of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2001, reports progress thereon, and requests leave to sit again.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the committee concur in this report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIRMAN: Opposed? So ordered.

The hon. Member for Lacombe-Stettler.

MRS. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, subcommittee D of the Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions of the Department of Innovation and Science for the fiscal year 2000-2001, reports progress thereon, and requests leave to sit again.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the committee concur in this report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIRMAN: Opposed? So ordered.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. HAVELOCK: Mr. Chairman, thank you. I move that the committee do now rise and report.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

MRS. GORDON: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions of the Department of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development and the Department of Innovation and Science for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2001, reports progress thereon, and requests leave to sit again.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in this report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Opposed? So ordered.

head: Government Bills and Orders

head: Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

THE CHAIRMAN: I would call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2000

THE CHAIRMAN: We'll call on the hon. Provincial Treasurer to begin this evening's deliberations. Hon. Provincial Treasurer, are you prepared to say anything? No? Okay.

MR. SAPERS: This is likely to be the last opportunity that I'll have a chance to speak to the Treasurer in Committee of the Whole. I was expecting him to stand up and have a bit of a speech. I mean, if it's a maiden speech when you start, is it an old-maid speech when you leave? I don't know.

Anyway, Committee of the Whole on Bill 12. We've had a chance to look at the history of this government when it comes to supplementary and interim supply, and there have been some comments made about the degree to which the government has been relying on supplementary and interim supply and the displeasure of the opposition on behalf of Albertans when it comes to the reliance of the government on interim and supplementary supply. Of course, Mr. Chairman, those comments are on the record, and I won't bother to repeat them.

What I would ask is that the Treasurer pay particular attention to three elements of budget planning that I think would help prevent us from being at this particular point again. I'm going to take some time to go over these three elements of what I think would improve the government's budget planning process so that we cease this reliance on interim, out-of-scope, out-of-budget spending. I don't think that that's the best way to be accountable to the taxpayers, whom I hear the Treasurer speak of so often.

The first point that I want to raise is the creation of an economic and fiscal strategy report. This would be a report that would look at 10 years. A 10-year economic and fiscal strategy report would build a greater element of strategic, long-range planning into the budget process and provide Albertans with an indication of the level of expenses and revenue required to sustain a structural balance over the entire planning period.

[Mrs. Gordon in the chair]

The economic and fiscal strategy report should meet the following objectives: one, specify the government's long-term objectives or principles for fiscal policy, program expenses, budgeted revenues, the consolidated surplus, total accumulated debt, total net debt, assets, et cetera; two, specify the broad strategic priorities for the upcoming budget and the short-term intentions of each of the long-term objectives or principles; three, specify any reasons for departure from the long-term objectives or principles, justification for that departure, or the approach that'll then be taken to become consistent with the time frame for implementation of the approach specified.

MR. DICKSON: Excellent idea.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you very much. I was just beginning, Madam Chairman, to feel like one of those characters that's just sort of speaking to a vacuum and that I could begin to say almost anything and nobody would notice. But I do note that my colleagues are noting the importance of these points, and I know they'll be in Hansard, so those members that are present that choose to talk amongst themselves will have a chance to review Hansard. Maybe we'll give them an exam in the morning.

MR. DICKSON: We'll take them to their constituents' doorsteps.

MR. SAPERS: That's right. And ask them about them.

The next issue that I want to recommend that the Treasurer take a look at that would help tighten up the budget process so that we don't find ourselves dealing with such a large volume of supplementary and interim supply requests is to implement monthly budget updates and quarterly performance updates. Now, this is not a new recommendation. In fact, I think it's at least the third time I've made this recommendation to this Treasurer. He has this one last opportunity, I guess, to heed the advice.

In order to ensure that the government is able to respond prudently to revenue shocks and to sustain program spending initiatives in strategic areas, a budget update similar to the quarterly budget update would be prepared and released to the public on a monthly basis. This will hold the government more accountable to taxpayers and reduce public cynicism about the size of the actual surplus. Now, I know it tends to suit government's purpose when they can at the end of the fiscal year go abracadabra and look at the size of the surplus, but I don't think it really suits the taxpayers so well to do that, particularly if somewhere along the way the government has been saying: the cupboard is bare, and that's why we have to cut back on spending.

Now, this monthly budget update process would also provide an early-warning signal that the level of program spending may not be sustainable in a particular year and allow for adjustments as required through allocations from the fiscal stabilization fund. Of course, the fiscal stabilization fund is the very first recommendation that this Liberal opposition has for the government, that we get away from these cushions that we build into the budget, call it what it really is, and then use it appropriately, that being the fiscal stabilization fund.

Along with the monthly budget update there should also be quarterly performance reports. Of course, quarterly performance reports would be dependent upon performance measures being real measures that are identifiable and tied to outputs. This would allow Albertans to hold the government accountable for achieving results for the expenditures of their tax dollars.

Now, for an example, Madam Chairman, what I can refer the attention of members of the Assembly to is this current PR campaign surrounding the government's private hospitals initiative. There have been reports published in the media that the government is going to be spending anywhere between $300,000 and $3 million on its PR campaign. The government won't tell us what the total bill is, although they did release some figures today that it hovers somewhere around $900,000 for a component of the campaign. So we know that it's about a million and may be more.

What we don't know is exactly who is paying for it, and when I say "who," of course we know the taxpayer is paying for it, but we don't know which department is spending those dollars on behalf of the taxpayer. Is the million dollars more or less that the government is admitting to all coming out of Health and Wellness? If that's the case, that's great. Then how much of it is coming out of the Public Affairs Bureau, which is administered by Executive Council, and how much is coming out of perhaps other government offices or even ministers' offices in terms of postage allowances and things like that?

It seems to me that if we tightened up the government reporting process and we looked at monthly updates with real performance measures, Albertans would be able to know the answers to these questions even before the Official Opposition asked them on their behalf. There would be this degree of transparency. Then when the government says, "Look; it's right there; it's in the published audited statements; it's in the monthly updates; we're not hiding anything," we could actually believe them, Madam Chairman.

The Premier promised Albertans on February 4, 1999, that his government would provide more detailed reporting on deeds, not just dollars, yet the list of so-called accomplishments released by the government three days after the 1999-2000 first-quarter budget update was nothing more than a distillation of government news releases since April 1999. I'll add that that list didn't even come out until the Official Opposition asked the government to match its words with deeds and in fact produce some results. I think the government had actually forgotten about the promise the Premier made, and not wanting to make the Premier appear to have been telling an untruth, the press release was rushed into production and we got this list on government's so-called accomplishments.

I'll further note that after the second-quarter budget update there was a presentation of what is called an activity report, but there was nothing relating those activities to outcomes and outputs. So, Madam Chairman, what we have is once again an example of the government saying one thing and doing something else. I think I've made note that it's a very poor legacy for a government to be known for the gap between its words and deeds.

Now, the third major recommendation I have to the Provincial Treasurer in regard to tightening up his budgeting process is the utilization of independent projections of revenues. The Treasurer talked over the last couple of days about his reliance on experts. He mentioned the Liberals and our projections and how different analysts peg things like the price of a barrel of oil or where interest rates or exchange rates would be. Of course, we believe that the government should rely heavily on the advice of experts, and we are somewhat taken aback when they get the advice and then they ignore it.

One of the major weaknesses of the current budget planning process is the large differential between estimated budget revenues and actual revenues achieved at the end of the fiscal year. Some of the differential can be explained by the variability of the province's revenue base in such areas as Crown leases, corporate income taxes, and crude oil royalties. However, there is an increase in criticism that the government is deliberately underestimating revenues in order to reduce expectations for increased spending.

Now, I will note again that even if we look at Budget 2000, this Bold Plans document, it's more of the same old stuff when it comes to lowballing projections for expected revenues, and the lowballing isn't just in the commodity prices. I submit it's also in the areas of income taxes, fees from premiums and licences, and also when it comes to gaming revenue. If it's not a purposeful strategy to lowball, then I guess I would ask the Treasurer to get new batteries for his calculator or something, because the degree of error seems to be growing year by year. Again I would say that it does a disservice to taxpayers.

In order to ensure that revenue forecasting is not conducted on the basis of political considerations, it's proposed that a firm such as the WEFA Group or perhaps DRI/McGraw-Hill provide an independent assessment of revenues. The independent assessments would appear in the annual budget and in the monthly budget updates. This would ensure that the sustainability of program spending could be reevaluated on a continual basis.

Now, Mr. Chairman, those are the major areas of advice that I have for the Treasurer. When we were speaking about Bill 12 in second reading, I concluded my comments by suggesting that perhaps one of the issues we need to take a look at as well is this whole budget review process. I would submit that the more time we spend on budget review with an honest exchange of questions and answers, where members of Executive Council take seriously their responsibility to account to Albertans through the Official Opposition in terms of the questions we ask on the budget, this too would minimize the amount of supplementary requests. I think every member of Executive Council if they were being honest and fair would say that they have been assisted in the discharge of their duties by a critic who does their job well. When questions are raised about priorities, about performance measures, about spending targets, even when errors are identified that departmental staff have missed – and there have been several examples of those – I believe that it has been helpful, I believe that it has been in the best interests of Albertans, that it has served the public good.

What we are faced with instead – and we had another example of it just tonight, Mr. Chairman – is a budget process that does not allow for an open exchange. In fact, it's a budget process that is very stifling. It's a budget examination process that splits members of this Assembly into committees and then subcommittees that would require that people be in two places at the same time. Even when you get to those two places at the same time, what happens is an imposition of rules that really don't exist: arbitrary time limits, sort of make-it-up-as-you-go rules of debate, and in fact an ad hockery that does not serve us well as legislators at all.

So when we're faced with this inability to fulfill our duties in terms of examining the budget in a detailed way and in a responsible way, I think one of the outcomes is more bills like Bill 12, interim or in this case supplementary supply. I would argue, on top of everything else I've said about Bill 12 and with the advice I've already provided the Treasurer, that I think we have to seriously re-examine this budget review process so that it can truly serve the public interest and not just simply the expedient needs of some members who really don't see much value in the process. I could speculate which side of the House those members sit on, Mr. Chairman, but that would perhaps be unfair, because we've agreed that we're not going to have a lengthy and a prolonged debate at committee on Bill 12, and I don't want to provoke that at this time.

But this budget review process has to be changed. It has to be reviewed, and it has to be made to work better. Thank you.

[The clauses of Bill 12 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

THE CHAIRMAN: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIRMAN: Opposed? Carried.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. HAVELOCK: I move the committee do now rise and report, Mr. Chairman.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Stettler.

THE CHAIRMAN: In subcommittee C this evening we're going to be considering the estimates for Agriculture, Food and Rural Development. To begin this evening, do we want any difference of procedure? Do we want to go with a period of time and have questions and answers within that period of time, or would you like to just go 20, 20? The chair is here to serve. What would be the understanding of the committee?

Hon. Member for Lethbridge-East, do you have a thought on that?

DR. NICOL: How I wanted to proceed tonight, first of all, was maybe start with 10 or 15 minutes, kind of an address on the business plan. It will be built around a whole series of questions, and if the minister wants to answer them at the time, that's fine. Otherwise, we can just go at it. When my 20 minutes are up, then we can go on to somebody else, and then if there's time left I can come back and finish on another 20 minutes.

THE CHAIRMAN: All right. Thank you, hon. member.

So we'll begin this evening, then, with an overview by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development.

MR. LUND: Good evening, ladies and gentlemen, and thank you, Mr. Chairman. Before I get started, I'd like to introduce some of the staff that are here with us tonight. Starting on my left: Les Lyster, ADM of sustainable agriculture; deputy, Jim Nichols; our financial guru and manager, Mike Mylod; then David Schurman, and his complete title is vice-president of finance and administration for the Agriculture Financial Services Corporation; Brian Manning, and of course he's the chair of that auspicious organization; and then my executive assistant, Michael Lohner.

In his televised address in January the Premier made a commitment to farmers that bears repeating, I think, tonight. Mr. Klein said:

Some family farms are going through a tough time because of low world commodity prices and rising input costs. But I want our farmers to know that we haven't forgotten you or the importance of your industry . . . We will be there with safety-net programs for farmers in trouble. We will help you develop new products and find new markets. We will promote your interests in world trade talks.

That commitment is reflected in our ministry's business estimates and plans that we are here to discuss tonight.

The farm income situation in many parts of the province has become a major concern. In general, crop receipts in 1999 are estimated to be down nearly 13 percent as compared to the five-year average. At the same time, overall farm operating expenses in 1999 are up more than 5 percent over the five-year average.

Many farmers, particularly those in the northern parts of the province, are experiencing significant income problems as a result of the multiyears of low grain prices, low hog prices, high costs, and continuous years of adverse weather. In the fall of 1999 we responded to the disastrous drops in income to farmers by increasing the assistance provided through the Agriculture Financial Services Corporation under the farm income disaster program and through a new Alberta farm income disaster loan program.

The farm income disaster program was enhanced retroactive to the 1998 claim year to enable farmers to (a) use the best three of the previous five years for their reference period rather than just the prior three years, (b) obtain a higher level of support when they expanded their production capacity or diversified during the claim year and during the reference period, (c) adjust negative margins in the reference period to zero, and then (d) deduct eligibility for government contributions to NISA for only the claim year rather than deducting contributions back to 1995. These changes are providing substantially higher payments to many farmers.

The 5 percent loans made under the Alberta farm income disaster loan program are helping many farmers with cash flow problems to weather the current low commodity price cycle in grains and oilseeds. They are also providing further help to hog producers on top of what was provided last year.

The estimates and business plan before us tonight extend our long-term commitment to provide a comprehensive and responsive safety-net package for farmers facing disaster. The amount, $449,553,000, to be voted on, on page 25 of the estimates, includes the funding necessary to do this. It includes an additional $96 million in funding for farm income support. You'll find that additional funding on page 35 of the estimates. In total, the budgets for lending assistance and farm income disaster programs have been increased by the $96 million. The budget for farm income disaster of $163,612,000 in reference 6.0.2 is more than double the 1999-2000 budget. The budget for lending assistance has been increased from $18,601,000 to $25,774,000 for 2000-2001.

For several years the Agriculture Financial Services Corporation has seen increased demands for its loan programs. Much of the increase has been in the beginning farmer loan program. However, producers experiencing a combination of weather-related problems and low prices, particularly in the northern part of the province, have been assisted by disaster loans and financial counseling services. The Agriculture Financial Services Corporation lending staff through financial counseling services has helped many farmers in the northern part of the province work through their financial problems over the past couple of years. AFSC provides this service to any farmer, not just those with loans with the corporation.

As well as the increase in the farm income disaster and lending assistance budgets three other items account for almost all the change in the department's total budget from $371,186,000 for 1999-2000 to $449,553,000 for 2000-2001. I'm referencing figures for the total vote on page 26 of the estimates.

First we are continuing to fund the municipal industrial wastewater infrastructure program for agricultural processing. Funding for this program is included in program 3, industry development. You'll find the details on page 30 of the estimates. Funding of $11.5 million appears there for infrastructure assistance for municipal wastewater for the next fiscal year, reference 3.4.5. That's an increase of $5.5 million over the 1999-2000 budget. Fiscal 2000-2001 will be the third year of the three-year pilot program announced by our Premier, Ralph Klein, in July of 1998 to assist municipalities . . .

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. minister, the Speaker has spoken to us today about making mention of our names. Here we either have positions or constituencies. I'd ask that if we're going to complain about one side of the House using names instead of their positions or their constituencies, perhaps we should do the same.

MR. LUND: Thanks for that very, very important message. So I'll talk about the esteemed Premier. Is that okay?

By the end of the 1999-2000 fiscal year program expenditures will have totaled $15.6 million. Second, the total 2000-2001 budget has been increased by $2.5 million to cover increased salary costs.

The third and final major change is the decrease in the 2000-2001 budget, shown on page 29, for planning and competitiveness, program 2. The 2000-2001 budget is lower than the 1999-2000 budget primarily because the 1999-2000 budget included $25.6 million for onetime industry reinvestment funding. As you can see from page 26, no major funding changes are planned for the department's other three programs: ministry support services, sustainable agriculture, and financial assistance to the Alberta Opportunity Company.

In addition to the items I have already mentioned, the ministry's expenditure budget appearing on page 42 includes $66.5 million for the following major grant funding programs: $33.5 million for farm fuel distribution allowance; $17.2 million for the irrigation rehabilitation program; $8.7 million for agricultural societies; $2.9 million for agricultural initiatives; $2.2 million for surface rights and land compensation; and $2 million for Alberta environmentally sustainable agriculture grants.

Turning to the revenue side of the estimates, you'll see on page 42 that ministry revenues show a decrease of $52.9 million from the 1999-2000 budget. Decreases in two items account for most of this change. First, the budget for funding from the federal government for farm income disaster assistance has been decreased by $44.4 million. Recently the federal government announced that it is extending its agricultural income disaster assistance for 2000-2001 but has not yet finalized the details of the cost-sharing arrangement with the provinces. The only arrangement in place at this time is for the federal cost sharing of 1998-1999 farm income disaster program claims. For that reason it was felt that it would not be prudent to budget for federal cost sharing.

Second, funding from the lottery fund has decreased by $31.2 million. Grants for irrigation rehabilitation and municipal industrial wastewater and rural development, which were funded from the lottery fund in 1999-2000, will be funded from the general revenue in the 2000-2001 fiscal year. These revenue decreases are offset by a couple of revenue increases. They are an $11.4 million increase in the Alberta Dairy Control Board revenue for the milk price equalization pool, which is offset by a corresponding expense and a $9.3 million increase in the Agriculture Financial Services Corporation's investment income.

Now I would like to take a few minutes to touch on the business plan for 2000-2003. If you look in the document on government and ministry business plans, on pages 29 to 43 you'll find the plan for Agriculture, Food and Rural Development. The plan builds on key directions from previous plans, although the structure of the ministry has changed with the government reorganization. The ministry no longer includes the Agricultural Research Institute. It was transferred to Innovation and Science, and the marketing function was transferred to Economic Development. It includes the Alberta Opportunity Company, transferred from Economic Development. The plan is tied to the government's overall direction and goals and is closely linked to the government's three core businesses: people, prosperity, and preservation.

The ministry's main purpose is to help the agriculture and food industry prosper. The mission explains that its core business is to enable the growth of a globally competitive, sustainable agriculture and food industry through essential policy, legislation, information and services.

To achieve its mission, the ministry works with its primary clients, those people and organizations interested and capable of contributing to a competitive and sustainable agriculture and food industry.

Agriculture, Food and Rural Development has set eight goals for itself. You'll find these goals on page 31 of the plan. I would like to bring your attention to a few of the major strategies my ministry proposes to pursue to achieve these goals: one, unbiased technology and knowledge will be transferred to our clients to help them remain competitive and responsive to growth opportunities; two, input to trade negotiations will be provided to support industry's needs; three, Alberta farmers will have an effective and efficient crop insurance program; four, Alberta farmers will also be offered effective and efficient whole-farm safety-net programs; five, public lands will be managed for agricultural, industrial, environmental, and public benefit; six, we will encourage investment in Alberta's agriculture and food industry; seven, the beginning farmer loan program will be strengthened to improve long-term farm viability. Beginning farmer loans have been on the increase for a couple of years at Agriculture Financial Services Corporation since the loan rate was dropped to 7.5 percent, and I must add that it is certainly good to see that we are attracting new young farmers into the industry.

We will support farmers in their stewardship of Alberta's soil, water, and air.

The food safety knowledge and skills of people working in Alberta's agriculture and food industry will be strengthened, and we will also support the agriculture and food industry in the development of protocols for safe food production.

The plan also outlines some key initiatives that will be undertaken. For example, the agriculture summit will be held in the spring to lay the groundwork for ensuring the long-term viability of our agriculture and food industries. A major review of Alberta's crop insurance program will be carried out, and it will include examining insurance coverage concepts that allow greater flexibility to customize insurance protection to business needs.

We will continue to advocate improved Canadian Wheat Board policies to allow more market choices, including dual marketing.

The Alberta Opportunity Company will approve loans to Alberta businesses that have viable business proposals when support is not available from conventional lenders. A more accountable and less costly grain handling and transportation system is something we will be striving for. Agriculture Financial Services will be providing or arranging financing for the agriculture and food industry for the development and expansion of value-added businesses in rural areas.

We'll be working with irrigation districts to develop an irrigation infrastructure management system to improve the assessment of rehabilitation requirements and plans.

Agriculture Financial Services will monitor the results of private-sector crop insurance over the next three years. In 2000-2001

Agriculture Financial Services Corporation will be entering into the third year of a three-year agreement to reinsure its crop insurance risk with private-sector reinsurance companies. This private reinsurance will minimize the financial exposure to the province if there are significantly higher than average crop insurance claims in the 2000 crop year.

Our education and extension programs will help producers adhere to the regulations and standards for livestock operations. We'll also initiate a peer review process to assist nonconforming operations. Client feedback will continue to be incorporated into the preparation of the plans and policies of the ministry, and we will be working with the Alberta Corporate Service Centre to implement governmentwide sharing of corporate services.

Those are a few examples of the initiatives the ministry will be undertaking during the period covered by the business plan. You will find more details about proposed initiatives under each of the ministry's eight goals on pages 32 through 39 of the plan.

Pages 40, 41, and 42 show the ministry's macro performance measures. Ministry measures are also shown for each key result under the goal section. The macro performance measures reflect changes at the industry and ministry levels. They record the direct and indirect effect the ministry has on the agriculture and food industry in Alberta. Of course, there are significant influences on the industry that are outside the scope of the ministry's programs and staff. The weather, federal government policies, and government policies of other countries are examples of outside factors that have a major influence on the industry. Perhaps most importantly, the demands of consumers in the northern Pacific Rim will have a fundamental influence on the industry.

The first measure shows how well Alberta farmers and ranchers are doing relative to other Canadian farmers and ranchers that they have to compete against. The ministry is forecasting that farm cash receipts will increase during the period 2000 to 2003. The target is $7.05 billion by 2003. Continued strong livestock prices and potential upside strength in grain prices are expected to push farm cash receipts higher over the next several years.

The second measure is "net cash income of Alberta farmers and ranchers." Net cash income is forecast to remain near the $1 billion level during the period 2000-2003. The forecast is lower than in the past three years because of higher input costs without a corresponding increase in receipts.

The third measure relates to Alberta's food and beverage industry. We remain confident that the industry will continue to grow during the period 2000-2003. The target is for shipments of $9.9 billion by 2003. While this target is ambitious, it is certainly achievable, and the ministry and industry will work hard together to meet or exceed that target. A growing processing industry is important because our traditional commodity markets are shrinking. Without a strong, vibrant processing industry, we won't have markets for our farm products. We anticipate that over the longer term Alberta's agriculture and food and beverage industries will continue to contribute to the Alberta economy.

The target for the fourth measure is for a contribution of 5.4 percent of Alberta's total gross domestic product by the year 2000. Although the agriculture and food and beverage industries only represent about 5 percent of Alberta's economy, their indirect effect on the economy is large when the contribution of business and industries that serve and support the agriculture and food and beverage industries are taken into account. Service industries in rural Alberta are particularly dependent on how well these industries perform. Employment in agriculture and food and beverage industries is forecasted to continue to grow over the long term.

The target for the fifth measure is for 112,000 Albertans to be employed in agriculture and food industries by 2003. However, employment in these industries is very sensitive to variations in profit levels, and annual changes can be dramatic, particularly at the farm level.

The sixth and final measure is the "Alberta land productivity indicator." The forecast is for Alberta farmers to continue to improve land productivity in the long term through sound business and farming techniques. The target is for output of .98 tonnes per acre by the year 2000.

That concludes my remarks, Mr. Chairman, and I would be interested in answering any questions.

THE CHAIRMAN: Good.

The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East, and thank you for your indulgence in the timing matter.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. First of all I'd like to say good evening to the staff up top and tell them that they're doing a good job in the department. It's quite exciting to watch some of the things that are going on in the agriculture community right now, and we appreciate the work that you do on behalf of the sector.

Mr. Minister, thank you for your introductory comments. It was a good review of the direction that Alberta agriculture is taking and that our industry is going in.

One of the things that we hear about as we travel – and I'm sure you hear the same thing as you go across the province – is the transition, the change that's going on in the sector. A lot of the farmers are wondering how they're going to fit into it and where their future is. Some of them are very excited about that future. Others are less excited. I took from your comments the idea that the major mandate that you're undertaking right now is to put together this ag summit process, that will bring the farmers into some type of agreement about the future direction and where agriculture should be going. I guess that started off with one of your comments about your primary target or your primary clients.

One of the things that a lot of the farmers ask me I will now pass on to you in the context of their comments and their questions. I basically can't answer it for them. What they want to know is: is the department prepared to give a vision of agriculture over the next 10 or 15 years in the sense of what the relationship is to this concept of, as you quoted, "those people and organizations interested and capable of contributing to a competitive and sustainable agriculture and food industry"? A lot of them are saying: "Where do we fit into that? We're small. We're family. We're in the latter part of our personal farm life." They want to turn the farm over to their next generation, whether it's a son or a daughter. They say: what kind of changes are they going to have to undertake or be prepared for as they think about taking over the family farm?

That kind of vision I hope will be part of the output of this ag summit so that people can get a sense of where both the government and the sector see themselves going. A lot of where it goes is up to the producers and the participants in the sector. It's not up to us as legislators, because we are the facilitators much more than we are the drivers of the machine that's going to take us into the future.

As they talk about the transition – and you mentioned it in terms of Ag Financial Services, the beginning farmer loan process – I would ask the minister in that context: are you looking at any kind of a change in the structure of that beginning farm loan program? Some of the comments I've been hearing now from the industry leaders in terms of size and technology adoption and that are that they're now getting to thinking about retiring and passing the farm over to their next generation.

I met one individual in southern Alberta who was saying: "We now have a big operation. I want out, but now nobody will finance the transition for us." Effectively what this farmer was saying was that he's going to have to personally finance the transition of that farm for his children or go outside the family and find somebody who can buy it and who has another source of capital so that they can buy it. This in essence is going to shut his family out of the continuation of one of southern Alberta's more successful farming operations. You know, they're at the point now where the transition to a new generation has to occur. So I would ask the minister if there are plans to review this whole concept of how Ag Financial Services, the beginning farm loan program, and some of these other transition options are in place so that the next generation can get a successful start in the agriculture area.

While I'm talking about Ag Financial Services right now, I'll just kind of stay there for a minute. In your business plan under goal 1, page 32, you talk about Ag Financial Services. One of your actions there is to "promote the crop insurance policy and administration expertise of [AFS] in Canada and internationally." I take it from that that this is in effect the amendment we made to the Agriculture Financial Services Act a year ago, where we allowed them to administer the B.C. FDIP equivalent program. They were going down to I think it was one of the countries in South America to help them put in place or to do the background work for crop insurance and that. I guess I'd like to ask the minister how that is going and how he sees that affecting the opportunity for some of the private business sector that's also involved in advising on structure for programs and for insurance, especially in the agriculture area.

While we're on the insurance area, you talked about the review of crop insurance that's coming up. I guess I would ask: are you thinking of looking at the whole package of – what shall we call it? – disaster assistance, disaster relief for the farm sector? You've got the crop insurance programs, which we have some public dollars in. You've got the FDIP program, which is right now provincial, but there are occasions when the federal government does give us some money on a cost-shared basis for that. Is there some process where this can be all tied together and maybe we can have, you know, one program instead of a whole combination of programs?

You talked about the changes you made last October to what would have effectively been I guess the 1998 FDIP year. I've had some calls from farmers in the last little while saying that the deadline for the application was the end of February, which was just last week, and they have to go in, they have to put down their $50 deposit to get their application on record, yet the criteria for the program haven't been fully defined. At least this is what they're saying. So they don't really know if they're going to qualify for this negative margin discussion that the federal government's been having, and if they do have negative margins, they've been encouraged to apply just on the chance that under this negotiation with the federal government they may be getting some. I guess what I would ask is: if through the negotiations with the federal government it turns out that these individuals are not going to be eligible, can they get their $50 back?

Mr. Minister, I'm not challenging that deadline. We have to have some mechanism of keeping an orderly process, because we're going to be dealing with next year's, the '99 year, probably on the first of March, and with the deadline being the 29th of February for the other one, we have to have an orderly process to keep our applications moving. But to have people make an application on an expectation that is still under negotiation and if we can't deliver on those negotiations – I guess a couple of them have asked for their

$50 back. So I'm passing on to you that it would probably be appropriate, because we've been leading them to believe one thing, and if we find out that's not true, then that should work.

The other thing I wanted to talk about. You're talking about improving the competitiveness of the industry, and as I was again reading page 33 in the business plans – I should have looked back last year to see if the same discussion was in there – under Strategies at the fourth point you've got "transfer integrated and unbiased technology and knowledge to industry." I was just intrigued by the "unbiased" word in there in the sense that I guess somebody from an industry could come along and say: gee, are they trying to say that a company out there trying to promote their product is not necessarily providing unbiased technology or information? So it was just kind of a word that caught my interest there as I was going through it, and I noticed that it was down again in the section where you're talking about actions. On the fifth or sixth action down there you use that "unbiased" adjective again, and I was wondering about it.

I guess the issues that come up on your Actions there – and I kind of put goal 1 and goal 2 together when I talk about them, because it's hard to talk about growth in the industry without dealing with competitiveness and the adoption of technology, the use of knowledge, and the new focus of agriculture. The issue comes up there when you're talking about this "accountable and less costly grain handling and transportation system," and I know the government is quite fascinated with the Estey/Kroeger end result, the recommendations that are in there. At what level is the government working to get those things – how many public dollars are being put in there to promote that kind of solution?

I've had a number of farmers, especially from the side of the ag community that's not supportive of that Estey/Kroeger recommendation process, say: "How can we challenge those recommendations when the government is using public dollars to fight against us? We have to come up with our own money." So they've been asking to find out how many public dollars are going into that process of support for the transportation reform that's kind of in front of the federal government right now, but I know the provincial government is active in dealing with it.

At the bottom of page 33 you've got $2 million that's being put into the farm lending budget for innovative business opportunities. The last line on page 33: "Allocate $2 million of the farm lending budget to innovative business opportunities". I was just wondering how successful that's been and kind of the criteria for what business opportunities you're looking at, or is it just something that's in the planning stages yet? Is this in the value-added area of primary commodities? Is it also in support of businesses, say, that are coming along with a new input technology from the service side as well? Or is it just in the value-added promotion? That's under goal 2 at the bottom there on page 33.

Under the third goal there you're talking about the "increased amount of value added to industry commodities, products and services." Under Actions, the second point, where you're assisting "municipalities to develop water and wastewater treatment," in your introductory comments you made reference to how this was a successful program that the Premier had introduced about two years ago. I guess what I was wondering is: what sectors are being influenced by that? I know the potato plants in southern Alberta got some of those dollars. Where are the dollars going? What industries, what value added, and what municipalities are being involved in that or getting some of the dollars?

I guess the next point you talked about there was advocating "changes to the federal policies that discourage value adding," and I would encourage you to work on the issues that are associated with the way the Wheat Board backs prices, commodities. You know, you have to buy back from the Wheat Board, and it creates a real bias in favour of export as opposed to local use of our products. I've had a number of farmers discuss that with me in terms of how that can be changed and wanting to know what your ministry is doing in connection with that. It's kind of something they're interested in finding out, where the provincial government is going in that direction.

The next item there. There's a term in there, and maybe I'm just out of date, but I don't know what it means. You're talking about "Agriculture Financial Services Commercial Financial Services." Is this a new division of Ag Financial Services? I probably have not been keeping up with the structural changes and the divisions that have been created in Ag Financial Services of late, but this was a new title for Ag Financial Services that I wasn't familiar with. So if you wouldn't mind explaining where that came from.

Down farther you talk about "develop and deliver needed capital and financial services through strategic alliances and partnering." I would appreciate some kind of a reporting on how that's going, some of the partners that are being developed, some of the general dollar amounts. I know specific contracts are hard to disclose, but how successful has it been? What directions is it going? What kind of effort and resources are being put into it from the provincial government side?

When we look at goal 4, a question has come up on a number of occasions when I have been visiting some of the drought areas. Your second action here was to "support expansion of irrigation to increase opportunities for diversification and value-added processing." I've had a number of questions from some of the farmers, especially in the northeast area, in terms of whether or not there might ever be an opportunity for them to have some options for irrigation and water supplementation, given the fact that they've had a number of years of less than what they considered adequate rainfall. On that as well, you talked in here about developing some new products, new technologies. I was wondering what you're doing in that area to help with crop development, commodity development for those farmers in diversification so that maybe they can have more drought-tolerant agricultural enterprises being supported or put in place in those areas.

Mr. Chairman, I think I must have about one minute left in my time period. Two minutes? All right. I'll get a couple more questions in.

The next section there, on goal 5. I think I've talked a little bit about what we wanted to do there in terms of what was going on with crop insurance and the farm income disaster program. In the last point in your actions there, you're going to "develop a federal/provincial framework agreement on safety nets post-2000." Is that something that's coming up as a Canada-wide negotiation? Or is this an initiative that you are undertaking hoping to bring the federal government and some of the other provinces into a real open public debate on what are the needs and support for risk management in the agriculture community?

I think that kind of covers the comments that I had on the business plan. If I can have some time at the end when everybody else has had their chance, I may have some more questions for you, Mr. Minister. Thank you for your patience in listening to me.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development.

MR. LUND: Thanks, Mr. Chairman, and thanks very much, Lethbridge-East, for those comments, particularly the complimentary comments relative to the summit. I hope you participate because I know you have a lot of very good ideas.

I'll try to answer some of the questions. I can't answer some of them very detailed, but I'll try to get in as many as we can.

You started off by asking whether we have a vision for the next 10 years, 15 years. Right today we're trying not to drive the summit, and I think it's really important that we don't drive it. We're going to set out suggestions. We're saying what we want out of it. Certainly we want a direction, a road map for the government, for industry, for the other partners that are participants in agriculture. I'm saying: look out 10, 15, 20 years; where do you want to be, and how do we get there? The government has a real role, I believe, in creating the environment. We don't drive it, but I think we have to be there to create the environment.

You talked about the intergenerational transfer of land, and you specifically mentioned the beginning farmer program. One of the things we did just not very long ago was increase the lending from $200,000 to $500,000. That was partly to address this issue, because with the size of farms, particularly when you get down in the Lethbridge area where there's a lot of irrigation, it doesn't take very much land and you're up to the $500,000. So it is a start, but you will see that out of the leaders' workshop in Red Deer that was one of the issues which was identified that has to be dealt with, along with the other financial issues there.

You asked about AFSC expanding into operating the crop insurance program in B.C., and yes, they are. As a matter of fact, they got the contract again and they're operating in Chile. This is, I think, a real feather in their hat, that they can compete in the world in setting these things up. Actually, it's providing a bit of funds to Alberta. We're making a little bit on it. We're not trying to make a lot of money, but we are making sure that it's all covered.

You asked about the crop insurance review and then the concept of putting together a package of safety nets. On the crop insurance review what we are saying – and I'm concerned by the take-up we have. There's something wrong. Something's not working here, and actually the numbers are not increasing.

What we've been saying and what we're hearing from a lot of folks as I travel around the province – people are talking about somehow tying the amount that you can insure to the input costs so that you are covered. We're telling people: bring those kinds of ideas forward; let's see what we can do. Right now in the negotiations – and actually it was part of the last comments that you talked about – with the federal government currently they've got them split out, the $1.1 billion that we're trying to work with. Up until today or yesterday those pots of money were split $600 million and $500 million. The $600 million was to cover things like the risk, like under crop insurance – and NISA would be under there – and then $500 million for disaster, where you get the farm income disaster program and AIDA. So they've got the two still split, but certainly it's something we've been looking at, and you'll see that's a topic for the summit as well. What kind of safety net do farmers need, what do they want, and what would it cost? We'd have to work that out.

FDIP and AIDA. Brian Manning is here this evening. He's not a member of the Legislature. I'm not exactly sure of it, but you talked about AIDA and the negative margin. It's my understanding – and Brian will correct me if I'm wrong – that the negative margin is only for the '99 crop year. It's not for '98. I get an affirmative nod, so that's right. So check with them whether in fact they . . . But the way the system works, they apply through us, and we send it over to Winnipeg to the AIDA people. But in 1999 Alberta farmers are eligible for 60 percent of those changes.

Now, I think the bigger change deals with the valuation of inventory. I think you're aware of that one. That's huge. If you're a fairly large farmer, that could be massive.

I'm biased. One of the things that we're trying to be very careful and cautious about – with this discussion of GMOs we don't want to be seen as discarding it or promoting it. We want to try to get the facts out and leave it at that. I think that's where most of that terminology comes from.

Estey/Kroeger, the dollars involved. We'll have to get back to you. I'm not aware, since I became minister, of us spending any amount of dollars. During the one trip that I made to Ottawa I met with eight ministers, the Prime Minister's office, the Privy Council, and Treasury, but it has been more on that lobby side, and I know there were some studies done on the effects. Now, what those numbers are, we can get you more of that information.

The $2 million that you referred to is a new program that we just started, and it's innovative opportunities.

Wastewater plants. Which plants are receiving it? We'll have to get that information back to you. As you know, the one potato plant in particular got it, but I don't have the complete list off the top of my head.

This whole issue about the Wheat Board buyback and what are we doing. We have been of course suggesting to the Canadian Wheat Board that they need to change their policies, and one of the things that we're suggesting – although we certainly don't have agreement among all of the grain companies – is that the Wheat Board should be considering getting out of the domestic market. That would solve the problem for the pasta, and it would really help the breweries or the maltsters. Once again, that's something we're pushing for.

AFSC commercial lending and the partnering thing. There is a section in AFSC that deals with commercial, but what they are doing is going out and getting the banks to cofund. Actually, in some cases AFSC does not put up the money. They simply back the loan. It's an arrangement, and it's working well. They seem to be doing very well with it.

Water in the northeast. We hadn't even considered it as far as irrigation is concerned, but we will be coming forward. Infrastructure, Environment, and our department are working to come up with a new water plan, and of course we'll be trying to work with PFRA, but their amount of money is so piddly now. It's my understanding that it's even all used for next year.

Oh, then the last one is the federal/provincial safety net, and I touched on that one earlier.

So the next round.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much. I just have a couple of questions that I'd like to bring forward, mostly around your stated goals and a bit of discussion around risk and stewardship. I'm ever aware that the Member for Lethbridge-East wants to get in a few more minutes, so I'll try and make this as quick as possible.

I have some questions around your goal 1, "Improved capacity to respond to opportunities." A couple of issues there. I know that when Bill 31 was introduced, there were some government press releases suggesting that the leaseholders might be getting $40 million a year in compensation from the energy companies, and later when there was a countervail charge brought in by some group in the U.S., the figure was then changed to $16 million. I'm wondering how the government arrived at the $16 million figure, and particularly I'm wondering if there are any other repercussions around this issue that we can expect to still come at us.

Further in that goal 1 there is a statement around opportunities in biotechnology. I'm wondering what the government is doing around assisting farmers who do not want to be involved in this or who want to be promoting products that are not involved in the new biotechnology. They're not GMOs and all of that. Is the government doing anything to offer advice or marketing strategies as to whether or not it's a genetically modified crop that they have? Do we know if this is going to have markets in different geographical locations? What is being done by way of advice or promotion or assistance to promote the independent certification, labeling, and marketing of these nongenetic crops? I think the federal government is doing something on this. Is the province working with the federal government on this?

I know there are a number of other issues around the cross-pollination that's come up, and I don't know enough about that, but I'm wondering what the government is doing there to investigate what this is going to do in the future. So that's goal 1.

Now I'd like to go to risk, which appears as goal 5. I'll note also, connected to this issue of risk, that in the most recent Auditor General's report, '98-99 – and I'll just quote from this because I think it's really good. The Auditor General notes that the development of a competitive agricultural industry presents certain risks to the Ministry. The increase in volume and diversity of agriculture products may have an adverse effect on the environment. Loans and grants provided to farmers and others may not be cost-effective. The Ministry may encourage farmers to grow certain crops based on expected markets which may never materialize. The move by the Ministry to outsourcing certain services may result in a loss in the effectiveness of these services. To be successful, the Ministry needs to manage these and other risks.

I note that in that same Auditor General's report there was a recommendation, recommendation 20, in which it recommended that the Department of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development evaluate the performance of the Farm Income Disaster Program on a regular basis, and at least annually.

Now I know the minister has spoken about this a number of times, but I have some more specific questions about that.

I'll also note that the Auditor General said that his staff had been informed by the department that "the Department intends to set targets and compare results against [these] targets annually." Specifically, was this done?

On to some of the specific questions around these. Goal 5, "Increased capability of industry to manage risk." That is again where the crop insurance program turns up. There is a review, but specifically what process is being used to conduct that review? Is any thought being given to the scope being wide enough to look at the crop insurance with FDIP? In other words, is there an integrated approach to this? What other risk management tools are being promoted, such as the use of a futures market? Are there any courses or assistance being offered to help farmers in this type of activity?

Goal 6, "Improved environmental stewardship." I've spoken a number of times in the Assembly about the importance of our role as legislators and as stewards of the environment, and one of the things I notice is that in the previous year there was a discussion that Alberta Agriculture work with Environment and other departments, and that discussion has disappeared out of the goals and strategies and actions from this year. What is happening around stewardship of public land and its use for agricultural, industrial, et cetera? So I guess I'm interested in a sustainable resource management plan and how that is being arrived at.

Also under this stewardship would follow the greenhouse gas emissions question. Again, last year the action that was listed was to increase efforts to understand the potential impacts of the Kyoto agreement. Now, can we then assume that the outcome of that action was to decide that there should be something done to reduce greenhouse gases? What's being done by Alberta Agriculture towards this goal, and what specifically are the targets?

That's something else I'm noticing from reading the goals, the key results, and the measures. I question sometimes the measurability of the measurers, if you'll allow me to destroy the English language in that way. I'm on a bit of a tangent here. I notice, back to goal 1, that one of the measures is "desirable changes in policy and legislation." I'm struggling to understand how that is an accurate measurement of improving the ability of Alberta's agriculture and food industry to respond to changing opportunities and challenges. It would strike me that "desirable changes in policy and legislation" mostly is desirable to the government, but I don't know how that is an accurate measurement tool. I'm getting more and more interested in exactly how we try to measure the outcomes we are seeking. I don't understand how you're using that as a measurement. So perhaps you can elucidate that point.

I'm going back again to stewardship, under goal 6. What is being done around intensive livestock operations and standards? That should fall under this stewardship goal, and it's not leaping out at me. I'm not seeing anything specific here, and certainly from my reading of the news, how these intensive livestock operations are being handled and where the government is going to take a leadership role strikes me as being critical, especially around stewardship of land and resources.

I suspect that the government really needs to show leadership in this area, because it's the only one that can bring together all the players in this. We have municipalities, we have commercial livestock, intensive livestock operations, we have local farmers, we have environmental groups, and we have the rest of the citizens of Alberta who are concerned about this issue. So I'm looking to the government as to where is the leadership that's being provided on this particular issue? I don't see it in this, so does that mean that we have to wait another year? Where does it show up in your three-year plan?

Oh, I took longer than I thought. Sorry about that. I will give way to my colleague for Lethbridge-East, because I know he has more issues that he wants to raise with you.

Thank you.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. minister.

MR. LUND: Thanks, Mr. Chairman. The first issue you raised was the controversy that arose when the department printed some information that came from groups like CAPP, where they said that there was about $40 million that had been paid to Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers. That is what CAPP stands for? Okay. Well, I thought that you were really asking the question, but I guess it was your researcher.

MS BLAKEMAN: No. I'm asking the question. I want to hear it.

MR. LUND: Okay. Okay. You must be really interested in the answer.

When the submission was made to the Department of Commerce in the U.S., the number that was used was the $16 million or $15.9 million – I've forgotten exactly – around $16 million, and that comes from multiplying the number of well sites by $1,100.

As far as other action, today we got word that our CAPP is dropping the charge, so that one hopefully is finished, and this issue won't resurface.

You talked about GMOs, and what is being done. We are trying to stay neutral on this one, and the reason for that is that government in the long run, particularly the federal government, is the regulator.

It's extremely difficult to be showing any bias if in fact you're going to end up being the regulator at the end of the day. So while we're trying to get accurate information out, we are not getting too closely involved in it.

However, having said that, we do have people in the department that are working on it. As a matter of fact, there's a committee the federal government has set up that is working on this whole issue. We have at the ministers' meeting said that we believe what should happen is labeling – quite frankly, it would be easier to label the products that are not affected rather than those that are – and let the consumer decide. Now, it looks like at the meeting the U.N. sponsored in Montreal that's the way they're leaning, and we would support that. That was our submission to the federal government as well.

You asked something about FIDP, and I didn't write down enough to make me remember what it was.

MS BLAKEMAN: It was under the section where we're talking about risk, and I was asking if what you were looking at was going to be more comprehensive so that it was a coupling of the crop insurance and the FDIP programs. It was in the context of the risk points that I'd raised from the Auditor General's report and under your goal 5.

MR. LUND: Okay. Now I remember it. I partially answered that question to Lethbridge-East, and I'll have to get back to you on what kind of issues we've dealt with on the Auditor General.

Lethbridge-East, that negative margin the feds are going to pay under AIDA does apply to '98, so the farmers you talk to should be getting the information.

Greenhouse gases. Currently we have a committee within government that is working on this issue, and we have a person on from our department. We are doing some things through the AESA Council. There are a number of groups out there: the Conservation Tillage Society, those kinds of people. They're all doing work, and we're supporting that work. But we are still saying: do what makes sense. Through Climate Change Central there will be some more research and things being done on this whole issue.

Then you talked about the stewardship issue. I just mentioned the AESA Council.

You talked about the intensive livestock issue. As you know, in 1998 there was a committee of stakeholders set up. It was to report to the minister. I was supposed to get it back in the early part of November. They've been around the province three times. I still haven't got the report.

There are some real difficulties. When they went around the province the last time, they found out that there was a lot of disagreement. It's not an easy issue. We're looking forward to the report. We should have it any day, and once we get it, we're not going to leave it sit. We will not be using legislation and regulation, but we will be putting forward probably some best practices. I'm not sure just exactly how we'll handle it, but we will be getting something out there to try to move this agenda forward.

I don't think it's going to be all lost. In fact, what'll happen is that we'll have an opportunity to try some things. Quite frankly, I have a little trouble with the regulatory approach, because what happens is that you have to make the regulations tough enough to make sure that the worst possible condition is met. That is not necessary. What you need to do is look at the outcome, what it is you're trying to achieve. Well, quite clearly, when it comes to groundwater, the thing we're trying to achieve is that groundwater would not be polluted, but that doesn't mean to say that if you are putting a lagoon on land that is impermeable clay, you need the same kind of liner as you do if you're setting it on gravel.

That's the problem with regulation; we're not looking at outcome. I think that'll be the way we'll be looking at it.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

MR. GIBBONS: Thanks, Mr. Chairman. I just have a few questions to the minister around municipal. Traveling the province and talking to a lot of different municipalities and it's actually very close to home: the amount of thistles in the ditches throughout the province. I've got a major problem in my constituency where it's government land around the tree nursery, the old Oliver site, and so on. I get a lot of complaints. On my own farm I spend the amount of money on thistle control, but it's blowing in from the ditches, whatever. The lack of funding to the municipalities, the downloading that has actually happened. That's their excuse to me and their concerns on that.

Then when I get talking with people, as well as my own farm, you've got canola resistance. You know, when you're trying to get rotation of crops and so on and you get the amount of costs and everything for pesticides and the fertilizer runoff, what's happening to the rivers? I have the Sturgeon River running through my farm and can see what's happened over the years, and I guess I'm just as guilty because we fertilize also. With that, just around infrastructure assistance on municipal wastewater, I asked the previous minister this question in the same kind of a committee that we've had before.

I do know from people that I know who actually work for the government that over the years they've actually had studies on rerouting water into different areas. Where the Sturgeon goes through my land, unless there's a lot of moisture or rain, that river goes right down to almost nothing, but at the same time there are more and more people being able to draw irrigation permits on that river. So the ones at the far end that have actually had them 20 years – the other ones are being able to draw them up river and get them in the last years, which seems to be unfair. I do know that there was a study back in the '70s and '80s on rerouting water from the Pembina. So there is movement.

The thing is that if we're going to be going more and more into market gardening – and what's been happening, especially when you look at the type of soil that's in my constituency, where you've got a lot of market gardens and so on, they do need water. Fortunately, there they can draw on the city water. They have the pump situation right at Evergreen Mobile Home Park. But if you're closer to Fort Saskatchewan, you're paying the heavy price through the county of Strathcona. If you're getting a little bit further out, you have to draw water from somewhere. Irrigation seems to be the trend, and a lot of people are asking about that because of the type of weather we've been having the last few years.

As I'm traveling throughout the province – this past year I spent quite a bit of time up in the north Peace country and to the northeast. I'm wondering whether or not it's a fair analysis, but their concern is that just like when we look at market value and education tax, the province is so large – I mean, we have a fantastic province, but it's so diverse. Down in your country we got the amount of rain last spring and floods, but then in the north you've got absolutely no rain. Where you've got cow/calf operations, they not only sold the calves, but they had to sell the cows because they can't even keep them through the winter because of the amount of hay and so on.

Maybe I'll get it on record. I'm wondering why it took so long to get a disaster policy in place. Why are we waiting until we try to make everybody in the province happy? Why aren't we working on areas where we do know – this is not the first year. The lack of rain has actually contributed to a few years. I do know from going to a parliamentary conference in Quebec this past summer and talking to a few of the elected members from Saskatchewan that they almost had a program ready to kick off. In some cases they didn't kick it off fast enough, because they didn't get re-elected in the rural area. Is there a program that they were working on with the farmers that actually had lack of moisture, and do we know anything in that particular case?

I know there are lots of questions to be asked, and I'm going to sit down and listen to those and leave our Member for Lethbridge-East to ask the last few questions.

MR. LUND: Okay. Well, just briefly, the thistle issue: I'm not sure if you're talking about municipal right-of-way or provincial.

MR. GIBBONS: It's the highways.

MR. LUND: Highways. Okay. Well, in most cases the municipality would have a contract with Infrastructure to take care of those, so we'll have to see what the situation is, why they would not be spraying and/or mowing. If it's thistles, they should be doing some spraying. On Crown land, of course, if it's under disposition, that's the responsibility of the lessee. Now, I don't know what the situation is that you're talking about. In environmental protection we started a program to make sure there were chemicals available so that we could contract with a municipality to take care of the problems on unoccupied Crown land.

The irrigation from the river: that's disturbing. If in fact people are drawing from the river, they should be getting a licence to do this. One of the things under the act is that we require so much water left in the stream, so it's disturbing if in fact the water level is getting so low that the minimum in-stream flow has not been attained. Now, one of the things Environment will be doing is that under the new Water Act we have to do a water management plan within three years of proclamation of the act, so for some of those rivers, like the Sturgeon, they would have to be doing a fairly detailed study to see what the minimum in-stream flow is and needs to be to protect it. We can't have them drying up. As far as a diversion, I'm not aware of anything there. I haven't heard of it, but that doesn't mean to say there hasn't been some work done. I just simply am not aware of it.

It's disturbing when you mention why it took so long for a disaster program, because in fact back in '95 is when FIDP was first instituted, so that program has been there. Now, one of the problems we've got in some of the area you may have been into is that on a lot of that land they grow hay and pasture. One of the things that's happened is that over the dry period their coverage has gone down so low that a lot of those people dropped the hay crop insurance.

When we did the tour in that area, we were looking for what the problem is and why FIDP isn't kicking in. One of the things that we discovered was that a lot of that area has had three years of very poor conditions. That's one of the reasons we changed to allow them to go back to the fourth and fifth year. Now, granted, there could be a problem even with some of those. It may not amount to a lot of money, because their margin, even going back four and five years, may not be that great.

Quite frankly, October 14 was the day that we announced the changes to FIDP. When we were looking at it in September, there still hadn't been a frost. Things still could change somewhat. It was a little early to jump out of the box, but we got working on it fairly early, and I thought coming out with the program on October 14 was really not that bad. It was fairly quick action to the problem.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks. There was just one question, which I was trying to clarify with one of my colleagues when you thought I wasn't listening to you with the absolute attention that of course I was, being able to multitask as we are in the opposition. Specifically I had asked you about what Alberta agriculture was doing about the greenhouse gas emissions and what were the targets. Part of what I was trying to clarify and got clarified was: is this government doing anything about the carbon sinks in trying to promote or get credit for the carbon sinks that are available in agriculture? That's an easy measurement. What is Alberta agriculture doing to get credit for this on our behalf?

THE CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development.

MR. LUND: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Well, you now clarified your question. It's a question that I've got a bit of experience in, having come from environmental protection, because of course that was the department that was doing a lot of work on it. You're right.

MS BLAKEMAN: Of course I'm right.

MR. LUND: Of course. Why would I question it?

In any case, through proper farming practices and different things that you can do, you can sequester carbon in the soil. There are a number of problems. One, carbon sinks in soils has not been accepted internationally, so no matter what you do, as far as getting credit for it, unless it's accepted internationally, you won't get credit. That's one of the reasons we've been very cautious in what we say relative to this whole issue. As you know, some utilities in Alberta have bought options for carbon credits from U.S. farmers. I don't know if any money has changed hands, but they've got those options.

The fact is that carbon sinks have not been accepted. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Environment told me, after being in Bonn last fall at COP 5, that forest sinks look like they might be accepted but that there still was great resistance to soil sinks. When I was in Kyoto at COP 3, the Japanese particularly were very opposed to either soil or forest sinks. We met with the Prime Minister and some of his cabinet, and they just wouldn't hear of it. Apparently they've moved off the forest a bit, but a number of countries are still very opposed. You can understand why. If they don't have any agricultural land to speak of, they're not going to support it. So that is a big problem.

There's another problem. This whole concept of purchasing credits hasn't been accepted yet either. So we have two problems there. It's creating some difficulty for us because farmers are wondering: why can't we get in on this? So we've got that problem.

There's another, bigger problem. The federal government has been doing quite a bit of work studying this whole issue, and agriculture accounts for about 13 percent of the greenhouse gas admissions. In that component, if you take the whole agricultural industry as a total industry and do all the proper things for carbon sequestering in soils, you may come to just about a wash. The problem we have is that even if this whole idea of sale of credits is accepted and we allow the sale to go outside of the agricultural industry, then the livestock industry could be hit really hard. In a province like Alberta if this whole concept of buying credits were to go ahead, you can imagine what the livestock industry would face relative to the oil and gas, because they're going to be needing to buy credits and so is the livestock industry. When you get into CO₂ versus methane, methane is four times as bad. If you get over and talk about nitrogen oxide, you have 16 times as bad. When fertilizer escapes, or even with the growing of forages or legumes, you'll get a certain amount of nitrogen oxide. So if you take the whole picture, it's not pretty.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. You know, this is one of my favourite estimates, agriculture estimates, because the finest farmland in Alberta is in my riding. There's just no doubt about that, and I have the floor, so no one can argue that.

MR. STRANG: It's all paved.

MRS. SOETAERT: It's all paved? No, no. That's the neighbouring constituencies.

Anyway, to agriculture. Mr. Minister, I appreciate the work your staff does for us. I know when we've had calls and stuff, they are appreciated, so I thank you for that. Working for this minister I'm sure some days is a real challenge but always a pleasurable one, I'm sure. Of course, they're being polite up there.

Mr. Chairman, to the minister. I was pleased and honoured to be part of the farm family awards this year. As you know, one of my big concerns about what we may be losing in Alberta is that farm family. I don't know the answers to that. I don't know what we can do as far as legislating issues like that, but as the number of farmers drops, I worry about what that means to our communities. It's one thing if a business goes down. I mean, it's tough, but people will usually stay in the city and find more work. If a farm goes down, those people are gone, and then the community is gone eventually. So I have concerns about the viability of the farm family, and I'm sure you do too, because the reality of what they give to our community I don't think can be measured in dollars.

If I may brag for a minute, the farm family from my riding was Joe and Thelma Sheehan, who just happen to be my aunt and uncle. I was quite proud of that. I didn't even nominate them, you know, so that says something. So that was good.

I want to comment on the 4-H program. I'm very supportive of that. I see that the budget for that is a bit up. I'm wondering what that entails. We have so many leaders that come out of that 4-H program. It's an absolutely wonderful program that many of us on this side . . .

AN HON. MEMBER: Six of us.

MRS. SOETAERT: Six of us have gone through that 4-H program on this side. That's almost half, and there are a few over there. So we're very supportive of that program and know the good things that can come from it.

You know, every time I think of rural development – I don't know; maybe it's something we can't do here – one of the things that bugs people in my area is that they're long-distance to the town that's 10 miles away. If we're thinking rural development and small businesses in rural communities, what a saving it would be in dollars.

Now, I realize that phone companies are privatized and we don't have AGT anymore, but I'm wondering if the minister has ever looked into the reality of – I don't even know how we'd go about it. If you live in Morinville, to phone Calahoo is long distance. From Calahoo it's long-distance to Spruce Grove. If you're in St. Albert, none of them are long-distance, and if you're in Bon Accord, all four of those places are long-distance. So in the reality of rural development if we're thinking practicality, then believe it or not, I think long-distance telephone calls are very expensive for some businesses out there. So I just leave that with the minister. I don't know if we can address that at all, but I think many rural communities would appreciate not having such a high long-distance phone bill for business matters.

I know that one of the issues coming up, though it may be under Infrastructure, is the reality that I have had several calls about licence plates in the front and back. It's been a real push from rural Alberta more than the cities. I realize that it's under Infrastructure, but I'm hoping your department will support that motion that is coming up or that you can have some part in promoting that one.

Just today I had a call from one of my hog farmers, who said: you know, in the Speech from the Throne was there anything for farmers? There was a commitment to revamp FDIP, but for them, right now, it's too late to help them. It's kind of hard to phone them back and say: you know, it won't change what happened for you last year. The reality of it is that they had added onto their barn the year before hog prices fell out of the market. For whatever reasons, they didn't qualify for FDIP and are in jeopardy of losing their farm.

So I'm hoping that the revision of FDIP will change and maybe help some of these people. I mean, in his case it was just bad luck, bad timing. I know people say: well, that's the luck of the draw in a business. I think we have to weigh: is farming just a business, or is it a way of life that we want to preserve in this province? I think that's a question that's worthy of debate in this Legislature at some point in time, because there are more elements to farming than just a straight business, as I see it.

I wanted to talk for a moment about game farming. I have a few in my riding. One person phoned me and asked: where is the whole process of hunting on game farms? [interjection] I see people are going, "Not a chance." I'm just asking her question. [interjection] Oh, we have another one there going, "Yes." So it'll be interesting to hear what the minister has to say.

I think I brought up some of my constituents' concerns. Oh, I must mention something else. I was at an agriculture forum sponsored by the Reform MP in our area. I heard many concerns about commodity prices and input prices and the loss of the family farm. One of the suggestions that came up in that was the reality that we have a generation of people in cities who don't know anything about farms or rural Alberta. I would say that a generation ago people would still go out to grandma's on the farm or to Uncle Joe's farm, but now in the cities, because they are so big and because we have so fewer farms, the reality is that people don't have the same opportunities to get out there. One person suggested a city/rural exchange. I know we go: oh, that's ridiculous. Kids come here to see the Legislature, but we forget that kids from the city don't go out to the country.

I know there was one – it was on a different level – set up by many volunteers in the Stony Plain-Spruce Grove area for kids from the inner city who had never had the chance to be out in rural Alberta. They arranged it. They'd just come out for the day. One group even saw a calf being born. These kids went back with just an amazing view of the world. They had never gotten out of the city. These kids were 10, 11, 12 and had never gotten out of the city.

Now, that wasn't the type of exchange that that farmer mentioned, but something on that basis, where we can get people to appreciate where food comes from and the work that goes into it. It's just an idea that your department can play around with. I think people from the city who just walk up and down the aisles of IGA and Safeway haven't got a clue what it took to get that loaf of bread there or that great T-bone steak. It was an interesting idea that I heard at that meeting, and I thought: you know, I think there's some potential in that. So I relay that to you from that meeting.

To be specific for a few moments, if I may, I've got some specific questions about the administration expenses from the Ag Financial Services Corporation income statement. Transfers from the government of Canada were budgeted at $50 million for the year '99-2000, but the forecast figure is $133 million. So if the administration expenses were $33 million in '98-99 and then it increased by $7 million – I should give you the exact number, if I can find it; anyway, I'll keep going and find it – and they're expected to increase by another $3 million in 2000-2001, really that's an increase of 30 percent in three years.

Now, last year we asked what these increases were due to, and the reply was that the additional costs were mainly for getting the corporation's computer system operational for the year 2000 and a forecasted higher volume of business both in lending and insurance operations. So that explained last year's increase, but I'd love an explanation for this year's increase, if I may.

One of the things I asked in this Legislature – in the heat of the moment I don't think I got the answer I wanted, so we'll try it again in this calmer environment. I think the Member for Wainwright was probably heckling so loud I couldn't hear you. He usually does that when I'm on agriculture estimates. He just doesn't appreciate my part of rural Alberta like he should, but one of these days I'll just show him the fine farms in my area.

The reality is, I think, that our farmers were shortchanged by about $25 million from this federal government transfer that we were not a part of. I'm wondering: is there a plan for this government to make that money up to farmers? Are we going to go to the table again, to the feds? Maybe we'll send Lethbridge-East to the feds. He might have more luck. I still find it disappointing that we were not at that table with those Premiers. So I ask: are you going to provide that money that they were shortchanged because you didn't sit down at the federal table?

I've gotten some of my concerns out here. I realize there may be others who have a few more questions, and I thank you for the opportunity, Mr. Chairman.

MR. LUND: I'm glad to hear you express concern about the family farm because that's one of our big concerns as well, and it's one of the issues that is going to be on the summit table, the whole issue. I was surprised you didn't have the answer for it.

Anyway, the 4-H program. Of course, we're extremely supportive. It's a great program; it's an outstanding one, as a matter of fact. The Alberta program is one of the best in the country, and it's expanding, which is great to see.

The long-distance calling rates. I don't know your situation. I don't know whether the people there had a vote at one time. It's not in our ministry, but I can tell you that it won't happen. The fact is that once the CRTC took control, you couldn't cross-subsidize, and that was the end of this flat-rate calling, the expansion of it. When they took over, everything stayed.

Licence plates: that's not in our bailiwick.

The issue about the hog farmer. I don't know when he applied, but we found that some folks had expanded. Yes, it was a problem, but that was one of the changes that we made on October 14 to deal with that expanding and/or diversifying of a farm.

MRS. SOETAERT: Should he reapply?

MR. LUND: Well, I guess it would be important to know when he applied, what the circumstances were. He should phone the AFSC, because I can't answer your question. I don't know how much he expanded; I don't know when he expanded; I don't know when he applied: all of those kinds of things. But one of the big changes that we made on October 14 was to deal with those expanding farms, because that hadn't been dealt with, particularly in the hog industry. That hit them. A combination of that change coupled with the ability to go back four and five years and build what it would have meant at that price makes a big difference.

Game farming. When I was minister of environmental protection, the folks were coming. At that time I said: when you get the Alberta Fish and Game Association members to agree, I'll agree. I still say that.

Urban education. Of course we support the farm in the classroom program. In some areas there are individuals that are taking some of this on, and I think it's important. But you've also got to remember that with education, as soon as you start adding, they feel that they're already jammed, that they don't have enough time. So it is a big problem, but we will be focusing more.

You asked a question about AFSC's administration, and we'll have to get that answer back to you. You lost me in all of the numbers. You were jumping around, so I didn't get what exactly you were talking about.

So you feel that we were shortchanged $25 million by the feds? Okay. That's good. I just wanted to make sure that was on the record. What are we going to do, and why wasn't I with . . . [interjection] Okay. Let's look at all the things that happened.

Prior to those Premiers going down, our Premier talked to the Prime Minister. I was in Ottawa lobbying for our farmers. Actually I met with the federal minister before Romanow and Doer did. So I was there lobbying for our farmers. We went to Ottawa on three other occasions, lobbying for our farmers. We were at – well, actually it started in Prince Albert – three ministers' meetings where we were talking about this crisis. So we've done a lot, I think, to try to get the federal people onside. But I would question: what has your leader done? Has she picked up the phone and phoned her kissin' cousins in Ottawa? I would love to have an answer to that. You know, it's easy to throw darts. We've been trying very hard, and I'm sure that the Member for Lethbridge-East has talked to the Senator down there. I'm sure that has happened. I meant to ask him about that earlier. I'm sure that he did. I'm sure that he did, and I mean that.

Anyway, I guess that covers those questions.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East. [interjection] Sorry, I didn't realize you were standing. Hon. Member for West Yellowhead, if you wish to ask a question, please do so. Otherwise, the Member for Lethbridge-East.

MR. STRANG: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I guess what I'd like to ask the minister is: on your farm income support, I notice on your first line item the comparable for 1998-99 is $104,049,000, but then when you go to the comparable for 1999-2000 on your budget – I guess the big concern I have is that when you go to your comparable forecast, you're at $299,004,000. With the way the family farm is and what's continuing to transpire, in this coming fiscal year why are we estimating such a low figure of $201,576,000 in our budget? I just wondered why we're looking at that. That's on page 43.

Thank you.

MR. LUND: Well, I'm sorry. I wasn't able to find exactly where the hon. member was reading from. I'll just have to get back to you.

Not knowing exactly where you're reading from – I've lost on that page what it was you were asking.

MR. STRANG: Okay. Thank you.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Good evening again, Mr. Minister. Just a few final questions that I wanted to kind of wrap up on some of the issues that we were talking about. In reviewing through my page of scribbles while I was sitting here after our first go, I'd overlooked a couple of questions on the business plan and the goals. One that stands out is under goal 7, excellence in food safety. That's on page 38 in the business plan. You're talking about the Alberta food safety emergency response plan. Could you just comment on where that's going, what input you're getting to it, the approach, and on some of the issues that people are asking about now with GMOs: what's there, how this is being dealt with, and a little bit of an idea of how broadly based the scope of that program might be? Is it just contamination and this kind of thing that you're dealing with in food safety as opposed to some of the concerns that might arise with the GMOs?

The other one that I wanted to just kind of touch on a little bit is under your management of the ministry's resources, goal 8. You talked about the functional review that you were going to undertake, and I was wondering if you had any targets or any projections on the impact that this might have on staff or on the relationship between administrative dollars versus frontline delivery dollars in terms of the overall budget. Do you have targets that you're trying to reach?

As you're doing that, do you make interministry comparisons to see how your ministry resources relative to the frontline delivery of service compares to some of the other ministries that deal with the same kind of community contact? You know, delivering services to the ag community is really the mandate of the ministry, and you have to see how effective it is in terms of getting that delivery out there relative to the staff and the cost at the administrative level rather than the frontline delivery component.

I guess the only questions, then, that I would have might be on some of your performance measures. First of all, just a little further part to a question that was raised by the Member for Edmonton-Centre. In the context of each of your goals you talk about the results and the measures. You made reference to those in your opening remarks when you talked about having these measures that are associated with each of the goals. Some of them are very, very interesting. It would be very appropriate if we could see the data that you were collecting associated with some of those measures. The only data that I find here are the macro performance measures. You don't see some of the measures that are associated with some of the goal-specific measures. I know this is a really good step in terms of getting, on some of these new measures that you're dealing with there, some indication of the progress you're making in terms of getting some of that information available for the public to look at.

In your macro performance measures I was looking at the net cash income projections. As I look at some of your targets, as far as the year 2003 you're seeing quite a change, a continued climb in the net cash income in Alberta as a percentage of Canada. What is it that's going on in Alberta that we may not be able to keep our relative position in Canada in the net farm income? Is this because we are a more crop-based agriculture economy as opposed to, say, Ontario or Quebec, where they've got a lot of livestock or some of the specialty crops? We've been up to 23.6 in '97, 22.5 in '98, down to 19.2 this year, but you continue to see a decline in the relative farm income as a percentage of Canada. That kind of surprised me. I thought that with the complete growth that we're seeing in the livestock sector, the growth we're seeing in some of the specialty crops in southern Alberta, we would not be seeing quite as much of a trend there. So some comment on why you see that decline.

I was also interested in your measure 4, the importance of Alberta agriculture as a percentage of the total gross domestic product of Alberta's economy. This is on page 41, Mr. Minister. I was noticing that that is projected to go up as a percent of the total gross domestic product in 1999. I would have expected, with the unbelievable prices we were getting in the latter part of '99 in the oil and gas industry and when you look at the low prices in especially the grain sector of Alberta, that we would have seen a drop in that percentage of the gross domestic product that's associated with agriculture just because of those. So some comment on that. Help me to understand where I'm missing something.

The next one, where you're talking about the employment of Albertans. We're looking at the basic trend in the total food and beverage sector. From 1989 to 1999 it's gone from 104.3 down to 103.0, yet now you see a turnaround, especially a big jump by 2000. What changes do you see in the industry that would reflect that bottoming out in our employment cycle in agriculture and the agrifood industry? With the low prices right now you look at what's going on and you'd expect to see either a stability in employment or even an exit of some of the farmers as we see amalgamation. I know that the auctioneers I've been talking to are basically telling me that their farm sales are booked for this winter and that there are enough people selling out that they're filled up. If those people are exiting the industry, the bigger farmers picking them up usually are more labour effective than the smaller farms, so you would expect some kind of a decline.

Mr. Minister, the last couple of comments, then, on the last macroindicator that you report there, land productivity. This is quite indicative of the success we've had in agriculture in Alberta reflecting our increased yields, increased productivity. I was wondering how much of that also is influenced by trends in summer fallow acreage or where we're actually cropping or getting more output off land that used to be fallow. I guess it would be interesting to see if those kinds of trends really are there. I know this is an indicator of productivity of land, and as you use land differently, that effectively increases its productivity. So a mechanism to help understand and see in what direction those are going.

That's the conclusion to my comments, Mr. Minister. I just want to congratulate you. I've really appreciated the way you've responded to the questions so far this evening, and I look forward to working with you the rest of the year.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. minister.

MR. LUND: Thank you very much. And thanks for those comments.

Food safety. This is one of the big issues coming up. When we talk to foreign buyers, food safety is extremely important to them. I think that in agriculture we're going to find that there are a number of forces out there in the marketplace that dictate what we do back on the farm, and this is one of them. So we have a choice: we either resist some of the changes that are coming and get ourselves out of the market or we stay in. My answer is that we've got to stay in because that's our future.

Now, dealing with a couple of things. The cattle identification: that's coming down the rail really fast. I guess you've probably seen what happened with Danish beef just recently and how that was pulled off the market. That's a prime example of how important it is that we are able to track right back really quick and isolate where the problem came from. That's the attempt that the Canadian cattle identification group is trying to implement. There are other diseases. I know that some of our folks are concerned about the dangers of some of the imports and what that might bring, and that just exemplifies how important it is that we have this track back.

The HACCP back on the farms. That's coming. The hog industry is out leading it right now. The poultry industry is getting into it. That's just another one of those things that the consumers are demanding, and it's critical that we be there.

The functional review. We did this in environmental protection, but one of the focuses was different. Here we're not talking about a reduction of expenditures. What we're talking about is assessing to make sure that everything we're doing is necessary. If the answer to that is yes, then can it be done in a different way? As you know, with the way technology is changing, we have to keep changing too. So while the exercise we're going through is a snapshot in time, what we're suggesting to staff is that a number of the things we're doing are the kinds of things that you need to be doing on an ongoing basis. As far as going into it with any kind of target that we're going to have a certain number of things happen, no. We're going in assessing everything, and hopefully coming out of it we'll have a streamlined system that is effective.

When you talk about comparing with other departments, we're not really comparing with other departments, but we continually do customer surveys to see if in fact we are doing what the customer wants and needs. That's how we're trying to measure what we're doing.

I lost you on the measures and goals question. I'll have to get back to you.

The net farm income. As I mentioned in my opening remarks, one of the problems we've got of course is that ever increasing input cost, and that's squeezing the margin. While the gross is going up, the margin is still getting squeezed, and it's a big concern that we have. Even with the high livestock prices, when you look at the purchasing power even at this so-called high market, it's very narrow.

The gross domestic product. That's a tough one. You're absolutely right about the increased price of oil. Of course, back when we were doing this, the price wasn't as high, so it'll be a challenge to meet that if in fact we're able to with the ever increasing price of our other natural resources.

The change in employment. You're right. There are people exiting the primary production, but there is a fairly healthy growth in the food and beverage industry, and that's where that growth in employment will occur.

I'm very pleased that you happened to mention the measure of production, whether that's a good measure of the soil. My staff will enjoy this, because that's the one measure that I've questioned all along. As a matter of fact, before I was this minister, I questioned it for the very reasons that you identified. I don't think it's a good measure of soil quality and whether we're preserving the soil. There are too many other things you can do. So this is one we're wrestling with: how do we really get good measure for this output? We're working on that one.

With that, I would move that the subcommittee adjourn debate.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development has moved that the subcommittee do now adjourn debate on the estimates of his department. All those in support of this motion, please say aye.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Aye.

THE CHAIRMAN: Those opposed, please say no.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: No.

THE CHAIRMAN: Carried.

The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Calmar.

MR. THURBER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'd like to move that when the committee reassembles, the subcommittee report progress on Agriculture, Food and Rural Development.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Calmar has moved that the subcommittee report progress when the committee reassembles. All those in support of this motion, please say aye.

HON. MEMBERS: Aye.

THE CHAIRMAN: I'd like to welcome the committee to room 512. We will be dealing with the estimates of the Innovation and Science ministry. I would just mention that the other night we had a very good discussion with a lot of input the way Mr. Havelock, the Minister of Economic Development, did it. What happened, and you might wish to consider it, hon. minister . . .

DR. TAYLOR: I've already considered it, Madam Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay.

DR. TAYLOR: Certainly if the opposition wants to be co-operative and work in exactly the same fashion that Mr. Havelock worked, I am more than prepared to do that. I'm more than prepared to speak for 20 minutes at a time, too, and would take great pleasure in doing so and not answering any of their questions. But I certainly am prepared as well to go in the interactive fashion, which I personally found very successful and which Mr. Havelock utilized the other night, so it's entirely up to the members.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay. Well, I guess we'll leave it with the members.

DR. TAYLOR: Can we use names here, Madam Chairman?

THE CHAIRMAN: No. This is the same as the Assembly.

DR. TAYLOR: Okay. Well, then, I apologize for using the hon. member's name.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think I did, too, so I apologize as well.

DR. TAYLOR: Yes, you started me on that actually. I was just following your example.

THE CHAIRMAN: I don't know whether it was necessary that you stood up and took a bow.

Anyway, we will start. Go ahead, hon. minister.

DR. TAYLOR: Well, are we going to go in an interactive fashion?

THE CHAIRMAN: You have to start with introductory comments, and then I'll ask the hon. members if they will.

DR. TAYLOR: Okay. I'll just keep my introductory comments very brief then, assuming that we're going to go in an interactive fashion. It says "Mr. Chairman" here, but I'm going to actually change my speaking notes and say Madam Chairman.

MR. HAVELOCK: That's good research by your department.

DR. TAYLOR: It's very good research by my department, as the hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw points out.

Anyway, I'm pleased to be here to talk tonight about my 2000-2003 business plan and in particular the estimates for 2000-2001. All of us know we have a rapid pace of change in our society, and it does make it more difficult to plan ahead. If I could just give you a little bit of a story, John Roth, who's the president and CEO of Nortel, talks in web years. In John's scheme of things there are eight web years in one year. He only plans three web years ahead because that's all he feels that a big company like Nortel can plan ahead, about three web years. So I guess the point is that with the rapid pace of change in society it does make it difficult to plan ahead, but I think the activities and investments that we outline in here this evening will help create a framework for sustainable prosperity for Albertans.

I believe one of the great keys to economic success in the future is innovation. I believe we have to embrace new ideas, we have to embrace new technology, and if Alberta is not going to be a perpetual hewer of wood and drawer of water, if we want to be leaders in the global knowledge-based economy, then we have to embrace innovation. I think a good example of how our government and my government is embracing innovation is the fact that we have just set aside $500 million in Budget 2000 for the creation of the Alberta heritage foundation for science and engineering research. You're all familiar with AHFMR, which is kind of a nice acronym. We're going to have to get a good acronym for this, so it will probably be called AHFSEER. You know, we can have before and 'afser'. [interjection] Thank you, Denis.

So what we have is a foundation that is going to create a stable investment in science and engineering for research. This endowment fund will help Alberta universities attract top scientists, and we know this from our experience with AHFMR. Also, we know this from the brief experience that we have had with ICORE, the informatics circle of research excellence that we just created last fall. We committed to put $10 million a year into that information and communications technology research excellence centre. They went out and started advertising. As you know, these people are very difficult to attract because of high salaries and so on. It was very interesting the way they did some initial advertising, because one of the personality profiles of these people indicates that they like extreme sports. They like the mountain climbing. They like the skiing. They like the mountain biking, hiking, and so on. So ICORE went out with some advertising with a big picture of mountains on it and then extreme computing over the top of the mountains. I thought it was a really creative way. That was just, as I say, created last fall.

I can tell you that as of today we're negotiating with two leaders in the world to come to Alberta to be part of ICORE. One is from Europe, and one is from the northeastern United States. Now, they've approached us after seeing what we're doing. Whether we'll ultimately sign a contract I can't say, but it looks very, very hopeful that we have these two leading individuals already taking notice of what's happening in Alberta with appropriate government funding for research and development.

So I believe that's what we can do with this, and that's only $10 million a year. You can imagine what we can do with a fund that starts at $500 million, and they tell us that you can spend approximately 5 percent of an endowment fund every year. So it will start this year with a $25 million investment, and then as that fund grows at a minimum of $100 million a year for the next five years, it will reach a billion by 2005, or it might even reach it before then, depending on budget conditions. Perhaps we might even be able to put $500 million in next year and reach the billion dollars next year. Certainly that's something that we will investigate, depending on budget conditions. I mean, this is all predisposed on a solid and healthy economy and a solid and healthy budget.

So I think, you know, we can create the right environment in Alberta for the top science to be here. Once you have the top science and the top scientists, the top graduate students, you get business here as well. The high-tech business will locate where the top science is, where the science they need is. Also, business will spin out of the science.

Just one quick example and then I'll conclude so I don't use too much time here and we can get into questions. One quick example is Silicon Graphics. They spun out of Stanford University in 1982 or 1983, and they have between 30,000 and 40,000 employees today. That is in a period of 17 years. That's the kind of business that can spin out of top science, and we can look at any number of businesses in the high-tech area. I mean, you can go back to the early one that everyone is familiar with, which is Hewlett Packard, which spun out of Stanford University. You've probably seen their commercials with the old garage and they're going back to the skunk works type of projects, or at least that's what their commercials say.

There are a number of huge businesses that have spun out of top science, so the goal is to create the top science. The goal is to get the best scientists here, and then the rest will follow. There's good evidence for that all over Europe and all over North America. You can look at North Carolina. You can look at Boston. You can look, as I said, at the Palo Alto area, and you can look around Oxford. You can look at any number of those areas. Where you have the top science, you get all kinds of business opportunities.

So that's what we're about. We're in the business of trying to get the best science we can here in Alberta, and from there the rest will happen.

I'll stop there rather than taking my full 20 minutes so that we can go on in an interactive fashion.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thanks, Madam Chairman. Good evening, Mr. Minister. It's always fun to ask questions of a minister who is so obviously enthusiastic about his portfolio. What I propose to do is ask some specific questions and afford you an opportunity to respond. Perhaps we can see how that goes in terms of time. As I say, I recognize your enthusiasm for your portfolio, and there's lots of information, so let's just see how it goes in terms of the back and forth.

Let me start off. I'll mention to you that I've got a number of questions that arise from responses you'd given on March 29 last year. So maybe while we're chatting before I get to that, you may have somebody here from your staff who will have that handy, because we'll loop back and discuss some of your expectations from a year ago.

Before we do that, just the one administrative thing I want to be clear on. Dan Bader, your ICT fellow, had been reporting to two ministers: health and public works, supply and services. Has that sorted itself out in the intervening time?

DR. TAYLOR: Actually, Dan is no longer with us. He's a deputy at Municipal Affairs, so it has sorted itself out.

MR. DICKSON: Okay.

The further question I wanted to take you to is in goal 6, specifically the whole information . . .

DR. TAYLOR: If you've got a page number, it would be helpful.

MR. DICKSON: Page 195 of the business plan book.

DR. TAYLOR: Okay. Thank you.

MR. DICKSON: What I wanted to ask you about, Mr. Minister, is what strikes me as some of that silo building that I thought we were trying to move away from. I'm referring to sort of the whole business of information management, information technology. We have Municipal Affairs in one corner, which is responsible for the administration of the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act. They have officials that they co-ordinate in every single public body, not just government departments. They have been building up some expertise, some experience in that area. Then we have Government Services, and we heard from the Minister of Government Services the other night. They're busy doing a bunch of planning in that area. Then we have the Chief Information Officers' Council, which is yet a third entity which is scurrying around looking at ways of marketing information, managing information, exploiting technology. Then we come to your department. So I wonder if you could just take a moment and help me understand how we're able to fully exploit the technology, the commercial opportunities of the technology when we've done such a great job of fragmenting responsibility in so many different areas.

DR. TAYLOR: When we started, as you know, we did undergo major restructuring, and the restructuring is continuing. What we are doing in my department is that we are going to be policy and strategy; all right? So we are moving out of the department anything that is transactional because, quite frankly, that is not where we are. So the transactional things we are moving out. The Imagis is in the process of being moved out, we have some data centres that we will move out, and all the transactional pieces, if I can call them that, are going to be handled in Government Services.

We will be the group that sets strategy, sets government policy through our chief information officer, who is part of us. Next year you will see that my staff complement will be substantially smaller than it is this year because we will have moved out a number of positions to either the private sector or to Government Services.

So we're trying to focus Government Services. The focus will be transactional bits, the paying of cheques and all the different transactional things. The focus of our department will be policy and strategy. If I can give you an example of that, one of the things we have in government, as we sit here and speak, is four different e-mail systems. Well, does that make a lot of sense? Not really. So what we are doing, the policy we have established is that we will go to a common e-mail system. Our policy is to move to common platforms across government. That's the policy and strategy bit. Then it will be up to the departments to implement that policy and strategy, and we of course will help them implement the policy and strategy.

Another example I might give you is desktops. I mean, we've got desktops all through government that don't talk to each other. So the question is: does that make sense? Well, not a lot. So we are through my department the policy and strategy is to go to a common desktop, go to common software throughout government. Now, that will take some time. Obviously we're not going to go out and buy everybody new desktops tomorrow, but as you know, the renewal period on these things is two to three years. So over a period of three years we'll move to common desktops, common software, and common platforms. Although we won't be in the business of operating all of those computers in each individual department, we will set the policy and strategy.

MR. DICKSON: Okay. If we had an archivist sitting here, they'd probably make the observation that optimal planning involves dealing with every single file from the point of inception to destruction, treating that as a continuous stream instead of sort of pods of information in different areas of government. What you haven't had a chance to address for me yet is an understanding of how you conceptually ensure that your information management is focused, co-ordinated, tight. I'm talking about systems. When you have the balkanization and the tension I see there, I don't see it being resolved just by focusing your department's energies on policy and somebody else doing information management.

DR. TAYLOR: The files that would exist in Municipal Affairs will stay in Municipal Affairs; okay? My department is not interested in taking over the files from Municipal Affairs or Health or anywhere else. All we're interested in is creating the common policy, the common strategy so that if somebody from, say, Health needs something from Municipal Affairs, they can easily access that information from Municipal Affairs.

MR. DICKSON: The challenge I see though, Mr. Minister, is that if you look at your business plan – it's the final bullet under goal 6.

Continue to streamline and simplify access to government information through the 'One-Window Access to Services' project, jointly with Government Services.

Well, surely that's driven by the kinds of information each one of those departments collects, the way they record it, the way they store it. This has been the problem, frankly, we've had in Alberta, with respect. There's not been enough integrated thinking that encompasses all government departments. The thing about FOIP, love it or hate it, is that it sure exposes the weaknesses in an information management system.

DR. TAYLOR: But you cannot have one-window access until you have common systems throughout government. So Government Services and my department and several other departments – we had a meeting just about two weeks ago; I can't remember the various departments that were there – are working on one-window access, but you can't have that until you've got a common platform. Once you have a common platform, you can access any department, anything you absolutely want from one window, but that won't exist until there's a common platform.

MR. DICKSON: Okay. Let me shift to a related but collateral area. We see what's going on in other provinces around Bill C-6, the fact that provinces like Ontario, Saskatchewan, and B.C. have developed, co-ordinated pangovernment positions on Bill C-6, the way they involve their electors in that discussion: public hearings and so on. It's not clear to me in this province. Is it your department that's responsible for co-ordinating the response to Bill C-6?

DR. TAYLOR: Actually, it's Municipal Affairs. I don't know if Municipal Affairs has had its time at the table yet, but you might want to talk to Municipal Affairs about that. We are advising Municipal Affairs, but it's their responsibility.

MR. DICKSON: Is there some plan for some operational integration of the information branch in Municipal Affairs with what you're doing in the current budget year?

DR. TAYLOR: Well, as we move to one-window access and common platforms, you will have that operational consistency throughout government, but you can't do it without.

MR. DICKSON: Okay.

The other question then. This is one that came up during the three-year FOIP review last year. How do we ensure that the chief information council and the chief information officer are able to take full advantage of what the information branch in the Municipal Affairs department has developed in terms of inventorying, cataloguing the kinds of records and data that the provincial government has, and so on?

DR. TAYLOR: Once the inventory, the data, is electronic, anybody can access it. We can't access it now because it's too darn much work if it's just in files, but once it's electronic, anybody with the appropriate clearances will be able to access the data inside government. So the chief information officer will be able to access data in Municipal Affairs. He'll be able to access data in Energy. That's what the chief information officer will be able to do with a common system. He can't do it now, and it will take, as I said, two to three years, maybe quicker. The CIO says that he can do it in 18 months, but he's perhaps being a little optimistic. We can do it, but it will take some time.

MR. DICKSON: Just before I leave this area, let me ask you this. In terms, then, of that whole business of the protection of privacy in the nongovernmental sector, the policy leadership is coming from Municipal Affairs and not from the chief information officer and the chief information council in your department?

DR. TAYLOR: That's correct.

THE CHAIRMAN: No. I'm sorry; we can't do that here.

DR. TAYLOR: Okay. The management of FOIP is Municipal Affairs, but we will work with Municipal Affairs in helping them to develop effective systems of management of information.

MR. DICKSON: Right. I'm trying to just identify where the locus is of decision-making.

DR. TAYLOR: Municipal Affairs.

MR. DICKSON: Not in terms of the existing policy. I've been listening to you carefully, and your future focus is contagious. I'm trying to look to 2000 and 2001 and 2002, and I want to be real clear in terms of where the leadership is coming from in terms of that issue of privacy protection in the nongovernmental sector.

8:29

DR. TAYLOR: Municipal Affairs.

MR. DICKSON: Then let me come back and ask you a couple of follow-up questions from last year. There had been an expectation – and this was the Hansard . . .

DR. TAYLOR: Make sure you read them clearly, because I can't remember that long ago.

MR. DICKSON: Well, Mr. Minister, that's why we expect you've got all of your capable staff here at your elbow practically.

If you look at page D36 in Hansard from March 29 of '99, the reference was the number of requests that you were expecting to get for funding. You were talking about the $60 million to $70 million, Mr. Minister, that you would see advanced in the current fiscal year, and I'm wondering if your projection was realized.

DR. TAYLOR: I'm going to have to answer that through a written response. I don't have last year's figures in front of me. I can tell you that we will spend between $90 million and $100 million strictly out of my budget this year on research and development in this province. That will be this fiscal year because we have that in our budget as we speak, so that's what we will spend this year. But as to the exact total dollars that we spent last year, I don't have that at my fingertips. We can provide you a written response for that.

I think it would be fairly close to that. We would have spent about $22 million or $23 million out of the science and research fund, and then we would have spent probably about the same amount out of the I2P2 fund, so there's $45 million. I'm just going by memory. Then we would have had the research excellence envelope, which would be about $4 million, and we would have had one other pile of money too – I've forgotten the official name of it right now – which would have been another $4 million or $5 million. So we would have been close to there, but for the exact figures I'll have to get you that information.

MR. DICKSON: Another item just following up from last year, page D36 and continued on page D37. You were musing that the government might commit $3 million to $5 million a year from the science and research strategic initiative fund. You were expecting substantial dollars to be raised in the private sector. How much money has in fact been raised from the private sector?

DR. TAYLOR: If I can say non Alberta government sector, for every dollar we invested our average last year was 3.88 to 1. So for every dollar we invested out of the science and research fund, other sources – and some of them are private sector, some of them are other government agencies, some outside Alberta, some are federal government, some are the national institutes of health, and some are companies. So it's $3.88 to $1.

If I could just give you one quick example of what's going to happen with the private-sector investment, we've been working on a deal with the major research-based pharmaceutical companies, and we announced last fall that they are committing a minimum of $150 million over the next three years to Alberta to sponsor and support research in Alberta. That's the kind of partnerships you can obtain if the government steps up to the plate first and says: yes, this is important for us; we will invest. So, as I say, that's just one example that I can recall offhand.

MR. DICKSON: Just reverting to goal 6 for a moment. The item I didn't raise was the whole business with health information, Wellnet. In fact, I remember last year that you talked about the importance of having Mr. Bader reporting to the minister of then health, and that was specifically to tie in the Wellnet project. Given the size of Wellnet, the minister of health in 1997 was projecting $300 million to be involved in health information technology. How are you making those links? How are you co-ordinating? What's happening within your goal 6 area with the many projects that are going on through Health and Wellness and through Wellnet?

DR. TAYLOR: Specifically in regards to Wellnet, Health and Wellness determines the strategies, the policies, the priorities. We are the technology suppliers. So Health says: "Can you do this? Is there technology to do this?" We say yes or no, and that is the relationship between us and Health. Of course, Mr. Bader responds now, I would assume, to Municipal Affairs and to Health.

It would be ideal from my perspective – and it's not necessarily a government position; this is my own personal opinion – that Wellnet have its own chief executive officer, because obviously Mr. Bader is very busy as the Deputy Minister of Municipal Affairs. I personally will encourage the appropriate people, and have done so, to establish a chief executive officer for Wellnet that is separate from a deputy minister in this department. That person could then interact both with my department and with Health.

MR. DICKSON: I know there are others who have questions, Madam Chairman. How much time would I have left?

THE CHAIRMAN: You have a minute and 35.

MR. DICKSON: A minute and 35?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes.

MR. DICKSON: That's fine. I'll forgo the minute and 35. Thanks. Thanks, Mr. Minister.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next person who has indicated that they wish to speak is the Member for Calgary-Montrose.

MR. PHAM: Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Minister. Your department certainly is a very important department because of what you do, and the policy that you create today will not only impact us but will also impact future generations of Albertans.

Since the creation of your department under the former minister, the hon. Dianne Mirosh, things certainly have changed a lot in some areas, and in some areas things haven't changed that much. One of the areas that has not changed that much is the question of how you would get co-operation from different government agencies. You can certainly create the policy, but having the best policy doesn't mean that you will get the best result. It is the first step, but certainly it is not sufficient to get there.

Your goal 6, trying to get access to all government programming and data through one window. Certainly you have to get co-operation from different government departments to make sure they are on the same platform and using more or less the same technology so that somehow they can hook up and talk to each other. One area I have been following and have a keen interest in and haven't seen much progress on is the area of how government data is being stored, if we have been successful in creating a common database for all the information that is needed by different government agencies.

One important thing that we should always remember is that the way we do business may change. Twenty years ago we did things most of the time by hand. Most of the time we did it manually. Now we do most of our stuff on a computer. So the way we do things can change, but the one core thing that has not changed since the dawn of history is the data. Whether you store your data on paper or whether you store your data in the computer, you still store more or less the same data. That's critical if we can have a strategy of how to get all these data under one roof and have a master dictionary defining which field to be stored and which environment they will be stored under and who will be the custodian of this information. Having that, we will make a significant advance in achieving goal 6 for the department.

Another area I want to touch on is the partnership with the companies and the nongovernment agencies out there. Certainly your department cannot influence all the success in science and technology by yourself. You have to look for partnership. The creation of the endowment fund is a very, very positive step, and you have worked very hard to create that. I commend you for that. However, as we move further and further into the 21st century, information technology becomes increasingly important not only for companies but for the average Albertan as well. I am still not a hundred percent sure that we have all the right stuff to create and foster these partnerships, especially in the education field. I think your department already has a close relationship with the Learning department, but I think your department should have a very important role in shaping what kind of education system we should have in Alberta to take advantage of these opportunities and also to explore all the potential for our youngsters in Alberta.

I know that you care very much about knowledge-based industry. For the last few years you have fought tirelessly for the benefit of this industry. We have to compete with many other players not only in Canada but internationally as well, and Alberta is a relatively small player. How do you feel about our advantage compared to the other jurisdictions in terms of attracting and retaining these top-notch players in the knowledge-based industry? I know the endowment fund was created to move in that direction, but is that enough? Do you have any wish-list items that you would like to achieve in terms of tax breaks, for example?

One of the other areas I wanted to touch on as well . . .

DR. TAYLOR: If I could just perhaps respond.

MR. PHAM: Okay. You can go ahead.

DR. TAYLOR: I've got four major points here. I'll respond quickly to them. Thank you for your comments.

Let me just start. The initial question you asked was about co-operation between internal government agencies. Certainly this whole department that we have been built on co-operation and a working co-operative relationship with other departments. For instance, Economic Development: we share staff. We've got 10 staff, I believe it is, that we share with Economic Development. The Minister of Economic Development kindly pays fundamentally a third of their wages, and we pay two-thirds of their wages. So we have co-operative relationships. Our relationship with Health and Wellness, you know, where they do strategy and policy, and we provide technology. So there are a number of co-operative working relationships.

There are also official kinds of relationships that exist. For instance, today if departments are going to purchase new software, new hardware, new information and communications technology systems, they have to be cleared through the chief information officer. That's not to say that we're going to stop things, but there is a clearinghouse new purchases have to go through so that we can move. If there were no clearinghouse, you know, we would not be able to move to common systems, common platforms. So there is that clearinghouse. There's the co-operative effort that's voluntary, and then there's the kind of official relationship. Each department has its own information officer. They have regular meetings with the chief information officer. Ultimately purchases of new information technology materials – software, hardware – go through there. Those are a couple of the ways we get interdepartmental co-operation.

With regard to data storage, it's very interesting. We have masses and masses of data out there on paper right now that would take years to convert electronically. But as we move forward, it is my goal to have more and more of our data stored electronically. There is some resistance to this, because we have to be very careful. A member earlier talked about FOIP. We have to be very, very cautious of FOIP requirements. There is some resistance by – I was going to say the Ethics Commissioner – the FOIP commissioner, same guy, and his office.

MR. PHAM: The Privacy Commissioner.

DR. TAYLOR: The Privacy Commissioner. Fair enough.

MR. HAVELOCK: You should know him on a first-name basis.

DR. TAYLOR: I know him as the Ethics Commissioner, not the Privacy Commissioner. Thank you for your comment, hon. member.

The Privacy Commissioner has some concerns. We have to work through all of those concerns as we move into electronic data storage. So it is a huge issue. Of course, it needs a culture change too. We've been storing data on paper for so long, and you know how significant it is to change cultures in a major business, a major government. In any big organization culture changes are slow, but we are working on it.

With regards to education, the importance of our being involved. Certainly at the universities, SAITs, and NAITs we're heavily involved because we have the control of the research dollars. We work very closely with Learning on this in terms of the direction research goes, so we are very closely involved with Learning on that.

Where we are not so involved is in K to 12. One of the things we are presently working on with Learning is what I would call a science awareness program. One of the difficulties we have right now in Alberta is that we don't have enough kids coming out of grade 12 that are skilled and that have the right sciences as they come out, especially females. We lose our females mostly, it seems, between grades 7 and 9, when they lose their interest in science. So we've got a whole population out there of females – and I know from my own personal experience of having a wife and four daughters that girls are smarter than boys – and we're missing a huge talent base.

What we're doing right now with Learning is developing a science awareness program that we will hopefully start this fall in the schools to bring the awareness particularly to young females and the opportunities in science to all people, but in particular young females, as they progress through the system. How will it work? I don't know. We won't know for a few years how it works until we see if there are more people, male and female, coming out of grade 12 with a stronger emphasis on science. In regards to our relevance to K to 12, yeah, we're relevant, and that's the way we're moving.

In regards to knowledge-based industries, you mentioned a number of issues there. From my meeting with several hundred of these over the last several years, the things they require most are not tax breaks. What they require are two things: venture capital and people. Okay? That's what they all tell me. We have today as we sit here about 1,500 vacant spots in the information and communications technology business in Alberta. In fact, last fall Nortel put out an advertisement, I think for 30 computer engineers, and got zero response. I mean, these are jobs that start at $45,000 to $50,000. These are not $20,000 jobs.

The problem is that we're not graduating enough people out of high school; we're not graduating enough people out of university. The big companies like Nortel will tell you very openly that unless we have a critical mass here, they can't expand any further. The small companies need the people as well. Now, really, I don't suspect that Nortel needs venture capital, but the small companies need venture capital.

We have a significant problem in Alberta. Depending on who you read, we have between 13 and 15 percent of the economy, we have 9 percent of the population, and we have 3 percent of the venture capital in this country. So we need to create an environment that will cause venture capital to locate here. What we know about venture capital and venture capitalists is that they will only invest their dollars in about a 50-mile radius of where they exist. In fact, in Silicon Valley that is even shrinking. Right now some venture capitalists are putting up their own buildings. If you want their money, you've got to be in their building, so that radius may even shrink. The radius used to be that, on the whole, venture capitalists would invest in a radius of 100 to 120 miles. Research is showing us now that, on the whole, venture capitalists only invest in a radius of 50 miles of where they presently live and work. So that's a big issue for Alberta.

There is venture capital in Alberta, but it tends to be oil related. People who have dollars, the angel investors, tend to invest in what they know. Since most of the angel investors are oil related, they tend to invest in the oil patch as opposed to some of the high-tech areas.

Another thing that I believe is going to help companies in Alberta is the Canadian Venture Exchange, that's been created in Calgary. That is very clearly talking about high-tech companies, but you have to be at a certain level before you can go public, so we still need that intermediate investment from the small company when they're supporting it on their own, out of their own pocket, mortgaging their houses and so on, to the venture capitalists. We need that stage in there, and right now we don't have it to the level we should.

MR. PHAM: Thank you. I will continue with my line of questions. One of the things you mentioned in your answer is the fact that the high-tech companies cannot find qualified employees to fill the vacant positions they have. I think many young graduates are facing today the cycle of not finding a job because they don't have the experience and not having the experience because they can't find a job. I encourage your department and the human resources department to come up with some kind of special program geared to help graduating students, especially in the high-tech area, to find the first job they can after they graduate.

Another area your department certainly paid attention to in the past – and I don't know how successful it has become since then – is the idea of marketing technology that we have in Alberta to the outside world. I think my colleague sitting right next to me, the MLA for Calgary-Mountain View, is chairing the committee. I certainly am interested in hearing any successes you have had in that area and what plans you have to further sell this technology outside of Alberta, because certainly you can market them and you can have more resources to do further development.

The area you talked about earlier that deals with the amount of information and the sensitivity of changing it from paper to electronic: certainly your answer is bang on. I hope the members of the opposition parties take notice of this. I remember last year, when we tried to pass Bill 40 in the House, and the amount of opposition and the amount of public outcry that we heard. It seemed like civilization would have ended at that time, but several months after here we are. We still haven't heard of any major screwups yet. The people are happy, and the system is turning very smoothly.

THE CHAIRMAN: Calgary-Montrose, I'd just mention to you that there are fewer than two minutes left in this segment if you want the minister to answer.

MR. PHAM: Okay. Thank you. Mr. Minister, if you didn't have time to answer, you can certainly ask for unanimous consent to extend your time.

DR. TAYLOR: Just in terms of marketing technology we have a team effort there. Certainly Economic Development is very, very helpful with marketing technology. The member you mentioned is chairing a committee on technology commercialization and marketing, and of course the Alberta Research Council is very active and actually selling marketing technology. For instance, they're just in the process of doing a joint venture with Singapore, and the Singapore Technology Corporation is interested in Alberta technology, because they apparently have access into Chinese markets. There are a number of ways that this is happening, and we will get better at this. We've got a long way to go just in terms of technology commercialization.

Another thing that is happening is that the technology commercialization wings of UTI and ILO – those are the two university tech commercialization groups – ARC and AHFMR are meeting. They're going to bring in Olds College. They're going to bring in some private-sector technology commercialization folks and develop a real strategic plan to do that.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay. Shall we move on? There are only 24 seconds left.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thanks, Madam Chairman. I think the enthusiasm for the activities of your department have been pretty well documented in Hansard.

DR. TAYLOR: I've got enthusiastic staff too.

[Mr. Renner in the chair]

DR. MASSEY: Even the opposition has been enthusiastic. The AHFSER project, the bill before the House, I think, has been very well received.

I had today – and I suspect that you may have too – an article sent over to me by Ken Norrie, the dean of the Faculty of Arts at the University of Alberta, on the invisible partner in Alberta's knowledge-based economy. He goes through and raises some questions. While he applauds the investment in science and technology, he makes a plea and makes the case in terms of the humanities and social sciences and indicates that technology is not enough.

You have objectives throughout your documents talking about creating a science and technology culture, trying to get more students interested in science, trying to make this a centre for people to come to, and his proposition is that the chances of that being successful are less and in fact in the past have not been successful unless it's accompanied by an equal emphasis and thrust in the social sciences and humanities. He talks about the importance, for instance, of languages. If you're going to operate in the world economy, then you have to go to them on their terms, and that includes languages as one part of that and understanding of cultures. He talks about the lag in our knowledge of social institutions, and you see it with the health care system, knowing where the aging population is going, accommodating for that, things we haven't done in the past.

He also talks about not being able to establish that community that you would have unless we have the Winspear Centres and the MacLab Theatres and the art galleries, because that is an important factor in the quality of life and, in fact, what helps draw . . .

DR. TAYLOR: And the football stadiums.

DR. MASSEY: Well, that too. Those are very important factors, yet as you look at the funding for advanced education, postsecondary institutions, and you look at the creation of Innovation and Science, your department, and the folding of postsecondary in with K to 12 and the underfunding of postsecondary – I think the minister in estimates the other day . . .

DR. TAYLOR: Well, I think if you want to talk about funding postsecondary, you're in the wrong place. That is the Department of Learning. I mean, I'll debate with you right here and now if you wish, if you want to make political statements about education being underfunded, postsecondary education being underfunded. I can be as political as you want, but I didn't think that was the purpose of this. I thought we were here to have some honest exchange and honest ideas. If you want to get into the political BS, I'll do it.

DR. MASSEY: If you'd let me finish, I have the question.

So my concern is the balance and to create the kind of culture and subculture that you talk about in the business plans. How much concern is there about the other part of that, the balance in those two kinds of investments?

DR. TAYLOR: Well, first of all, I haven't seen the article, but I will start by disagreeing with him when he says that you can't create a successful science culture without some of the things he's talking about. I would say that the AHFMR has created a very successful science culture in this province. We have attracted the top scientists. We have the best science in the world. We are recognized as a leader in medical research. If you are prepared to spend your money on research and science, you will do it.

That is not to say that those other things are not valuable. For instance, we have the Department of Community Development, that spends millions of dollars on these other issues. Now, I'm not familiar with the budget there, the exact dollars. We have the Alberta Foundation for the Arts and the millions of dollars that it spends yearly on some of these issues you're talking about. We have other kinds of foundations like various theatre societies that are funded by Community Development. As I say, I don't know what Community Development's budget is, but it is a huge budget. I don't know if anybody here knows what it would be.

MR. HAVELOCK: It's bigger than mine.

DR. TAYLOR: It's bigger than the Economic Development budget.

So what I would say is that we are already doing that. We are already creating the balance. We are already funding the arts; we are already funding culture.

I would point out that we fund professional arts, and we have no problem funding professional arts, but for some reason we have a problem funding professional sports teams. It seems to me to be a little bit of hypocrisy here.

You know, what I'm saying is that we are creating the environment through Community Development, the millions and millions of dollars that Community Development spends. So we do recognize it as a balance, and this government recognizes it as a balance and are spending appropriately. In fact, some of us might argue that we're spending too much.

DR. MASSEY: It's good to have that on the record.

When you look at the performance measures that you have, are you really responsible for these measures?

DR. TAYLOR: For some of them we are, and we're working on developing better performance measures. For example, the number of dollars that universities bring into the province in terms of research dollars: we encourage that by stepping up to the plate first and creating the right environment. Ultimately, you know, we don't control it. So there are a number of performance measures that are measures of the general science culture in our province that we don't control, but I think they're important measures to have, because if we don't report them, then where do they get reported, even though they are not performance measures that we definitely have absolute control over.

We are working towards other measures that you will see in our business plan this coming year that are more directly relevant to us, but these other things are important to know. If you look at some of the measures, some of them are StatsCan data. I don't know what page it's on right now. For instance, 1997-1998 is the last data that we can get from Statistics Canada. So how appropriate is that? On page 279, Total Sponsored Research Funding: it's all Stats Canada data. The last data we can get from Stats Canada is 1997, but we do know, for instance, what the government of Alberta is doing over this time period.

So one of the things we are working on with Stats Canada is to get them to have more appropriate data. In fact, there was an article in the Globe and Mail this past week, and it talked about StatsCan now looking at new ways to measure the new economy. We've certainly been instrumental in encouraging Stats Canada to do that. So as they improve their data collection, we will have better information, and in the future you will see provincial numbers in here. They'll have to be in a separate chart, but they will be provincial numbers based on our provincial dollars and the data that we collect, but for the rest of the country we've got to go with StatsCan.

So we need to do a better job of collecting data. We need to do a better job of developing performance measures, but these are still important measures to notice, even if we don't control them.

DR. MASSEY: It's encouraging to hear that you are going to have some other performance indicators in some of the other objectives. Really, if you look at these, if any one of these were to sour, I would wonder if you could rightly blame your department.

DR. TAYLOR: No. That's what I say. Most of these are rather the measures of what I would call the innovation system in Alberta, if I can call it that in that kind of broad term. Measures of the innovation system. We need to have that information, but as a department we need to develop measures that are specific to us as well.

DR. MASSEY: Okay. You talked about silos. In the creation of the department, with science and technology being hived off into the department, and postsecondary education, universities and institutes – are you concerned at all about having those activities located in two centres?

DR. TAYLOR: Right now I'm not, but it's something that we have to be constantly aware of. We do that through our business planning process. I'm familiar and my staff is familiar with Learning's business plan and business planning process, and they're familiar with ours. There's very good staff communication, a very good working relationship from the deputy minister on down. So although there's no formal process, there is a very close working relationship, a very informal process so that you don't see duplication in government.

Then, of course, we have the Government Reorganization Secretariat, which examines all the organizations inside the departments to make sure there's no duplication. We have the Member for Medicine Hat chairing a committee on agencies, boards, and commissions, looking at all the agencies, boards, and commissions of this government to make sure there's no duplication and, where there is duplication, suggesting that they be merged or something disappear.

So we have, I believe, not only the informal controls, but I believe we have the formal controls through the Member for Medicine Hat's committee on agencies, boards, commissions and also through the Government Reorganization Secretariat.

DR. MASSEY: Thanks.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: That's it? Okay.

Then we will move to the Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

MS GRAHAM: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Minister, this morning I flew up from Calgary on the same flight as Sherry Cooper, the chief economist for Nesbitt Burns. I think it's quite well known out here in western Canada of late. I know she's a big proponent of fiscal policies that would support a high-tech economy. She points to countries such as Finland and Ireland, which have achieved a great deal of success in developing their high-tech economies. I'm wondering if your department has analyzed what those countries have done in both their fiscal policies and other policies to promote this and if we are looking at doing some of the same sorts of things to achieve the big successes that those countries have achieved.

DR. TAYLOR: We've looked at successes all over the world, in France, Palo Alto, and looked at different methodologies of achieving success. As I said earlier, the big things that companies need is money and people and a competitive tax environment. When we move to the 11 percent flat tax – and the Treasurer might be able to tell this more accurately than I can – I believe that for individual taxes we will be comparable with the lowest taxed jurisdictions in North America. There may be one or two states that might be lower than us, but overall we will be comparable. So I think that individually we're moving in the right direction.

One of the things that these people look at individually of course, because they make big dollars – these are not poorly paid people. They look at individual tax rates and where they do well economically. In fact, if you take the fact that we only have to pay – I don't even know what it is. Say that it's $800 a year for a family for health care. Dave Buffet from Nortel, who just moved up from Dallas, told me that he'll be as well off here once we move to the 11 percent as he would have been in Texas when you start looking at the health care premiums and so on that he would have had to pay in Texas. So we will create the right environment for individuals.

opinion now, that we need to lower our corporate tax rates. If we do that and have the people and the venture capital here, the industry will be here. There's no doubt in my mind, and all kinds of big companies have told me that. John Roth, the president of Nortel, has told me that. Small companies have told me that. We need capital in Alberta. We need people in Alberta, and if we can do that, they will be here. But we're not there yet.

MS GRAHAM: What do you suggest we should do with our corporate tax rates then? What is the magic number?

DR. TAYLOR: Well, the Treasurer would know more what the magic number is than I would, but I think we need to move them down. I can't tell you exactly what the right rate is because we haven't got into that detail on research. But we do need to move them in that direction.

MR. DAY: Agreed.

DR. TAYLOR: Oh, good. The Treasurer is agreeing. Can I ask the Treasurer a question? Where do we need to be?

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Well, it's certainly up to the member who has the floor right now. There's a 20-minute allocation, and when the 20 minutes are up, we'll be moving to another speaker.

DR. TAYLOR: Oh, okay. Well, perhaps at some future date.

MS GRAHAM: Lorne, I'm happy to use my time to hear the Treasurer on this topic.

DR. TAYLOR: Okay.

MR. DAY: I'll leave it up to the members of the opposition. I don't want to do anything upsetting.

DR. MASSEY: If we can't talk about advanced ed, you certainly can't talk about Treasury.

MS GRAHAM: Fair enough.

All right. I'll move on to another area. I know that there's legislation that, if it hasn't already been introduced, will be introduced to amalgamate AOSTRA and a number of other agencies under your ministry's jurisdiction, and I understand that the new agency that will be created will be to promote and research and develop various sources of energy. I'm wondering if wind power will be one of those sources of energy.

DR. TAYLOR: Yeah, legislation has been introduced. What we're doing is changing the structure so that AOSTRA, AERI, and the Forest Research Advisory Council will be responsible through ASRA, because the Alberta Science and Research Authority is the science policy-setting body for this province legislatively. So it's necessary that these other agencies understand what the overall science policy is for the province.

Now, in regard to AOSTRA, of course that is the oil sands group. In the legislation we are drastically changing its mandate. It will disappear as AOSTRA and become the energy research council, because under their mandate AOSTRA could only work in the oil sands area. It will be the energy research council. They will have their own board, and that board will determine where the dollars are spent in terms of energy research. They will determine it on the basis of excellence of science. So if there's a wind research project that displays excellence of science, I'm sure that board will very seriously consider funding it, because we want to really expand the mandate beyond just traditional energy sources such as oil and gas.

We might look at fuel cells. I mean, the board might get an excellence-in-science project on fuel cells. That would be something that would be within the mandate of that board. So the energy research council will have a very broad mandate. The projects they fund will be based on excellence of science, and the board will make those recommendations.

MS GRAHAM: All right. Thank you for that.

Would it be fair to say, then, that under the current proposed budget there aren't any specific dollars allocated to the development of wind power energy per se?

DR. TAYLOR: It would be illegal today for AOSTRA to have dollars specified for wind power because it's outside the AOSTRA mandate. As soon as we get the act through and their mandate changes, then it will be up to AOSTRA to determine how their budget will be spent, and if they wish to allocate some of that budget for wind power research, it will be up to the board to do that.

MS GRAHAM: But as things stand now, there's no other venue or agency that could . . .

DR. TAYLOR: No. Theoretically, a good research project could come to the science and research fund very easily. There's nothing to preclude a wind power project from coming to the science and research fund, and it would be handled as any other project that we see: go through peer review, and then a decision would be made based on the peer review.

MS GRAHAM: But it would be something that would have to be proposed from outside. It's not something that government is promoting.

DR. TAYLOR: Oh, yes. The only group that really generates research in that way would be the Alberta Research Council, which is sometimes more directive in their research.

Now, this is a very interesting issue actually. It's one of the issues that we're dealing with now with the creation of the new science and engineering fund. It's going to have, say, 5 percent this year, so that's approximately $25 million this year, but obviously by the time it gets up and running, it probably won't spend that. That's going to create some freedom in my budget, because some of the projects that were coming to the science and research budget will now be going to the science and research fund.

Now, do we as a department and as the Alberta Science and Research Authority become more proactive with the freeing up of funds in the direction of the research that we want done? That's an interesting discussion that we haven't had yet but that we will be having as we move down this road. How proactive do we want to become in suggesting that a scientist or a group of scientists submit a project in wind power, for instance, or fuel cells or some kind of biomedical area? How proactive will we become? That's a very good question that I recognize as a question and don't have an answer for but recognize that we will be discussing it as we move down the road on this.

MS GRAHAM: A positive problem to have.

DR. TAYLOR: Yes.

MS GRAHAM: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Those are all my questions.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Thank you.

The next member who has indicated he wishes to have some questions is Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you. Thanks, Mr. Minister. I have lots of comments and questions for you this evening, and as usual I'm sure we'll have a good discussion.

I want to start, though, by talking about the scope of what it is that your department is up against. I read a statistic the other day that claimed that eight years ago there were only 50 pages on the Internet. There were 50 pages posted on the Internet eight years ago, and the estimation is that today there are 50 million. If that's not a bit of a wake-up call to anybody that's wondering about why it is that government has to pay attention to innovation and science technology and to IT in particular, I don't know what would be. Even the Prime Minister – I was reading notes from a speech by the Prime Minister, and he said that when he first became Prime Minister seven years ago, e-commerce was a typo. Of course, now we're looking at multibillions of dollars being exchanged in that way. [interjection] I didn't mean to provoke the Treasurer with that comment.

I mention these things because as we've talked over the last couple of years in debates on legislation sponsored by your department or in budget debates, I've talked about the absence and what I will claim to be a continuing absence of a comprehensive, pangovernment policy on science. I will say that you're getting closer. I think that the initiatives that will be bringing energy and agriculture and other research functions under one umbrella take us closer.

What I was really looking for in your business plans – and I have to comment just briefly on the exchange between yourself and my colleague from Mill Woods. Budgets themselves are very political documents, so of course there are politics involved in this discussion, but I think the essential point was: where are the linkages? Nothing in asking that diminishes the importance that our caucus attaches to appropriate science policy, including our celebration of the newly announced foundation. But building on that exchange, what I was looking for, to see evidence of real movement towards this across government co-ordination, would be some performance measures or even some strategy statements that said: these are the linkages.

[Mrs. Gordon in the chair]

We understand what our relationship is with Learning or with Justice or with Treasury, for example, and here are some strategies that we're going to put into place, and here are some performance measures so we'll know whether or not these strategies are appropriate. For example, I'm thinking of things in Learning, some joint performance measures. Same measure, same strategy, both departments looking at research inputs and outputs. We don't see that.

We don't see joint planning in terms of student retention. The goals and the strategy statements that I read – for example, under goal 1, "Increase the number of K-12 students who consider technology as a viable career opportunity." That's a great objective. Linking it to some of the strategies – unfortunately, the only performance measure that I can find in your business plan that links to it is the one that says:

Develop a measure showing the number of grade 12 students who have completed course requirements for entry into science and technology programs at the post-secondary level.

Now, that's a surrogate measure. I don't think it's a very strong one, and it's different again from those in Learning in terms of student retention and technology and career streams.

There could be some joint plans with Treasury. There is a brief discussion about tax policy. You know, certainly there are some things that this province could do that could be more aggressive when it comes to tax policy. So, again, to give evidence of that linkage and that sensitivity across government and that awareness that it has to be strategic and across government, I would have liked to have seen some things that say: yes, these are the tax-based initiatives.

In the last federal budget, for example, we saw a reduction in capital gains taxes. We saw a reduction in corporate taxes. There's been talk here in Alberta about perhaps reducing the small business tax or raising the threshold which defines what a small business is. Maybe we could look at some performance measures and initiate some things out of this department that would truly leverage the federal initiatives and build on what's possible, what's in the control of the provincial government, and put those right in the business plan in terms of targets.

We could also turn to Justice, which may not immediately come to mind as a department that you should be doing some joint planning with, but I would argue that with e-commerce comes e-crime with the challenges in terms of policing. We've just seen internationally some of the largest e-commerce sites in the world threatened and challenged by, we're told, a 15-year-old kid from Montreal, if we are to believe the FBI reports. Certainly electronic security, electronic signatures, fingerprinting, strategies in terms of enforcement, perhaps even definitions of crimes or interjurisdictional co-operation statements are all things that I would expect to see again that would give evidence of this awareness that it has to be right across the government. So when I offer the criticism that I'm still not seeing this, those are the kinds of things that I'd be looking for.

Let me ask you a question about goal 6.

DR. TAYLOR: What page are you on?

MR. SAPERS: Actually, before I get to goal 6, let me try to do this in some kind of order. I kind of mentioned goal 1 when I talked about the qualified workforce and some of the student initiatives, the K to 12 initiatives.

I look at goal 2, one phrase, one sentence. It's on page 192 of the big budget book. If you go down to the third bullet under Strategies, it says, "Leverage investment in the Alberta Research Council." That's a strategy tied to the objective of Alberta having "a quality science, research, and information and communications technology infrastructure." You've heard me talk about being a fan of ARC in the past, and that position hasn't changed, but I didn't quite understand what this meant. So if in your comments you could tell me what exactly you mean by leveraging investment in ARC. I know that ARC has its own business plan and its own set of strategic goals and objectives, but this wasn't really clear to me, and it didn't become clear as I read through the rest of your business plan.

Goal 6. I heard some of the previous discussion, and there was a good line of questioning from at least two other members of this committee in looking at goal 6, but what I heard I'm sure is not your intent. If it is, then it's new to me. My understanding has been that Innovation and Science is not simply the supplier of bits and pieces, that it's not a matter of just sort of being the public-sector CompuSmart. I could have picked Future Shop or any of the other suppliers, so I'm not putting in a plug here for one vendor or another. You're not simply a hardware or software consultant to government. You know, it's much more than that. It's really presenting a leadership capacity. In fact, I think those words are used in your strategy statements. The question about the role of the department when it comes to providing technology to other government initiatives is, I think, much more than simply responding to requests for hardware or software advice. So if I misunderstood your comments, maybe you could elaborate on them a little bit and talk a little bit more about that leadership role that I believe is really behind goal 6.

Goal 7, "Albertans recognize the benefits of innovation and science." One of the key performance measures there is to "continue to develop measure on public perception of the benefits of innovation and science." The first thing I thought of was Tang. You know, when NASA was challenged years ago as to what the space program has contributed to everyday life in America, I think the answer from one of the administrators at the time was Tang, that they developed a powdered orange juice. You know, it seems to me we've come a long way since then, so when I see that one of your key performance measures under such an important goal is to "continue to develop measure on public perception" – I guess what I'm asking for is a progress report.

If I can jump from there to some of the other performance measures. Because so many of your performance measures in the business plan are really under construction, maybe you could give us performance report updates as these measures are being developed and as they're being field-tested. You know, I haven't counted them up – and we could do that exercise – but I believe that a majority of the performance measures are under development, and I understand that. I understand that it's new and it's new to this government. Maybe you could let us know what ideas you're testing, how they're being tested, where you're getting feedback on performance measures, and what you're using as baselines for comparison. At some point you're going to have to present the data, so you're going to have to say: here's where we started, here's where we hope to go, and this is the measurement of difference and how we know we got there.

I could make the same comments, you know, as I said, for so many of the other goals. I would hope that next year we're going to get to the discussion of performance measures and will be able to actually look back and say: "Okay. Here's where we met or didn't meet or exceeded the goal, and this is how we know. This is how we're going to change it."

Also, Mr. Minister, I have some questions for you based on the consolidated income statement for your ministry.

DR. TAYLOR: What page is that?

MR. SAPERS: I'm looking at page 197, again in the budget book. It's the consolidated statement. It's not in the budget detail. I have some questions that I'm sure are easily explained, but the answers weren't that obvious to me at first reading.

If you look in terms of transfers, the internal government transfers . . .

DR. TAYLOR: Is it page 297 or 197?

MR. SAPERS: Well, it's 197 in the spiral-bound book. I think it's called New Century: Bold Plans. It couldn't say "maintaining the balance" anymore because that was too close to the Liberal plan, I think; wasn't it?

DR. TAYLOR: I've got it. Okay.

MR. SAPERS: Okay. If you look at internal government transfers, I think I understand the difference there. There's a pretty big variance between last year and this year, but what I don't understand is the variance in transfers from the government of Canada. Budget 2000 is showing zero expected transfers in that line item. The forecast is $150,000, and it's predicted to go up to $1.6 million in 2000-2001. So I'm just wondering why that big swing and if there's some assistance that we can offer in terms of letting the feds know that maybe they've ignored Alberta in one regard or another. When I see a million dollar swing in transfers, I want to know why.

Also, the investment income. I'm wondering why there's about a million dollar difference there as well. When we look at the energy, research, and development expense, it seems to be a pretty huge variation as well, and then it continues to go down. I would have thought that with the consolidation that line item actually might go up.

So those are some general questions I have. I don't know how much time I have.

THE CHAIRMAN: We're down to about four minutes.

MR. SAPERS: We're down to about four minutes? Well, the minister could always take 20 minutes now. He could be the next person recognized, because we don't really have a global agreement on this within 20 minutes stuff. I would hope that he'd have a chance to respond to some of those questions, and since I only have a couple of minutes left, I'll leave it at those initial ones.

Thanks.

DR. TAYLOR: Great. I made some notes here as you were going through, so I will follow through with them. If there are things that I miss, if you would provide us some written questions after, we will get you answers for them.

Let me respond. First of all, you talked about goal 2 on page 192, "Leverage investment in the Alberta Research Council." You asked a question about that. From my department to the Alberta Research Council goes approximately, roughly, $26 million a year. The question is: what is the leverage that we get out of those dollars to the Alberta Research Council? Unfortunately, Red Deer-South was supposed to be here this evening, but he got a stomach flu and was unable to attend. So I will comment on this a bit and then refer the question onward to him.

Last year the Alberta Research Council better than doubled the dollars that we gave them from private sources. That's one form of leverage. Also, there is the necessity for what I would call public-good research that the private sector will not support. I see that fundamentally right now in Alberta that is one of the roles of the Alberta Research Council. They have to have some funding to do that public-good research. There are a number of areas one might want to look at, maybe some environmental types of research that are so far away from commercialization but are necessary to be done and that a private-sector group will not sponsor, will not be a partner in it. So there is a necessity for public-good research.

With the science and research fund we average, as I said, $3.89 for every $1 that we invested last year, but that does not mean we're necessarily looking for that kind of leverage from the Alberta Research Council, because of the nature of the council and because of the fact that there needs to be this what I call public-good research being done.

I'll pass this on to the Member for Red Deer-South, who's the chair of the Alberta Research Council, and we will get him to provide a further response to you.

Goal 6. I think you mentioned us just being suppliers of technology. I was referring to that in the sense of Wellnet only. For Wellnet we are only the supplier of technology. Health and Wellness determines policy and priorities for Wellnet. They come to us and say: can it be done? Okay? So we are the suppliers of technology only for Wellnet.

On the broader government perspective we are the group that provides the strategic direction and the policy, through the chief information officer, to all of government. The chief information officer is the leader in that area in providing policy, providing strategy, providing direction. He's the ultimate the buck stops with him guy when it comes to this particular area. As I said earlier, there is the Chief Information Officers' Council. Each department has a chief information officer, and they meet regularly to solve and deal with the issues. So it's not just him arbitrarily saying: this is going to be the policy; this is the way we're going to go.

THE CHAIRMAN: Excuse me just a minute. I'm at the will of the committee here. We did make some decisions at the beginning of this. Is it the wish of the committee to let the minister continue before I recognize the next speaker? We were sort of going back and forth, hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. HERARD: Yeah. Let him go.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay. We'll start the clock again, and you finish off, hon. minister. Then I'll recognize Calgary-Egmont.

DR. TAYLOR: Okay. Thank you.

Goal 6. I think I've answered your question there.

The issue dealing with transfer of funds between the federal government and the government of Alberta. I would say that the federal government has not had a major presence in Alberta, for instance, with the National Research Council. They virtually have zero presence. In fact, I met with Art Carty several months ago, and on the advice of and after meetings with the university we had a very, very tough conversation with him. Art is the head of the NRC. Just this very evening, earlier – I think you were at the same function as I was at over at the Shaw Conference Centre – I had the opportunity to sit with Anne McLellan, who has been a good supporter of the science and research initiatives. The federal government is putting out a huge initiative in what they're calling genomics, what we're calling proteomics. They're going to establish five centres across Canada. After Toronto, we are recognized across Canada as the second leading centre in genomics in this country. Will we get one of the five NRC centres? I don't know.

I had the meeting with Ms McLellan tonight, and that was the topic of our conversation: how can you help us work with John Manley, work with Art Carty, to get one of these five centres here in Alberta. Now, she is very co-operative, recognizes the value, and has said that she will do that. But up to now, up to today, the federal government for whatever reason has been very slack in supporting science and research initiatives in Alberta.

I give you the example of the cyclotron which is going into Saskatchewan. I believe the federal government is putting $60 million – I think it's $63 million – into the cyclotron or synchrotron in Saskatchewan. I mean, it doesn't make sense for it to be in Saskatchewan because the science isn't there; okay? Maybe it should be in Toronto, maybe it should be in Vancouver, maybe it should be in Alberta, but it doesn't make scientific sense for it to be there. But that's where it's going. So there are political decisions made at the federal level on science policy and science investment.

What we need is some real action on behalf of the feds to see that we get one of these five centres, and I would encourage you, I would encourage Ms McLellan, I would encourage all of your colleagues to talk to your federal colleagues and say: "The science is here. We're recognized as the second in Canada. The science is here. This is where probably the second major centre should be." Because the centres apparently, from what we understand, are going to be funded at different levels. Now, if they give us the fifth centre, the fifth-funded centre, the lowest funded centre, it will be totally inappropriate to do that to us. Now, will they do it? I don't know. They funded Saskatchewan and Manitoba farmers. They didn't give us a cent for our farmers. So who knows where the federal government will go.

MR. SAPERS: But you don't want to make any political statements.

DR. TAYLOR: No. But I will encourage you to by all means encourage your federal counterparts to be sure that we get either the first or second funded centre in the country. That has to be in Alberta, because I can tell you that the synchrotron in Saskatchewan cannot exist without Alberta money. Saskatchewan has made it very clear to us that unless Alberta comes in and buys several light beams in that centre, they can't exist. They'll go broke. There will not be operating costs. The question is: how do we co-operate with Saskatchewan on the synchrotron? How does Saskatchewan co-operate with us on the genome project? I hope Saskatchewan recognizes the value of co-operation, and I hope the federal government recognizes the value of co-operation as well.

So those are a number of issues that we are dealing with. In regard to performance measures, there are a number of measures that I think are important simply because, as I stated earlier, they indicate the state of the innovation system in Alberta. We do not control those. For instance, the number of scientists and engineers in the province is very important. We actually have a chart on that someplace in here. I can't remember where it is offhand, but it is in here. We have more per capita engineers than any other province, more per thousand, I believe it is, than any other province in Canada, and that's an important measure of the innovation economy, because the innovation economy needs engineers. If you don't have the engineers, in particular – and that's computer engineers, electrical engineers, all kinds of engineers in various specialities – you will not have the science and the jobs in Alberta. So certainly there are some general measures in the innovation system that are important to note, although we do not control them.

I mean, we do not control in this department the number of engineers that come out of the University of Alberta or the University of Calgary. Hopefully we can provide young people with information so that they become more interested in science. But even as we go into the science awareness project which will start next fall – I mean, you did ask about that. We are presently drawing together, as we speak, the various organizations in Alberta having to do with science awareness, so that will include the Science Alberta Foundation, it will include the Alberta science hot lines. I don't know if you're familiar with those or not, perhaps if you have younger children; I don't have them anymore. The hot lines are where kids can phone up . . .

MR. SAPERS: Headquartered in Glenora.

DR. TAYLOR: Oh, perfect. You know all about it then, so I won't have to describe it.

There are private-sector groups – for instance, APEGGA has a science awareness program. So we're just in the process of identifying all of the science awareness groups in the province. We will pull them together over the period of the next several months and develop a science awareness program.

Now, does that mean that more kids will actually take engineering at university? I can't say. Maybe they will. Obviously we cannot force kids, as much as we want science awareness. Even if kids are very aware of science, we cannot force them and say, well, you're going to do engineering, or you're going to do a BSc in biotechnology, or you're going to do an MBA in technology management. All we can do is make young people aware of the opportunities, make them aware of the excitement around science. For instance, this summer there's a science camp down in the Drumheller region at Dinosaur park. I think it's called Dinosaur park science camp or something along that line. We are funding that science camp this summer because it brings young kids in from Alberta and theoretically it gets them excited about science and what science can do for them.

Does that mean more of those young people will do engineering or a bachelor of science? I don't know. Even if they don't, it doesn't make it a nonvaluable program. Simply because they don't go into it from a professional perspective does not mean to say that it's not valuable. It's like being aware of the arts. Because I'm not a professional artist doesn't mean that I can't go off to the Citadel Theatre and enjoy the Aberhart play, that has just concluded.

MR. SAPERS: Did you see it?

DR. TAYLOR: Yeah, I did see it and very much enjoyed it. I must say that I did buy the tickets at the ticket wicket there on the very day of the play, so I bought them perhaps a little cheaper than I should have. Always being a fiscal conservative, you see, I try and do things as cheaply as possible.

Just because I'm not a professional artist doesn't mean that I can't go and enjoy the arts. Just because a young person isn't a professional scientist or doesn't go into science and engineering doesn't mean he can't be made aware of and understand and enjoy the benefits of science. I guess that's what I'm saying, but we still need to have measures of the innovation system, even if we do not control those measures, even if we do not control those outputs.

Now, cross-government. In fact, we are working with other departments. We have a management committee that meets with Learning's management committee as we speak, just starting to meet with them to develop measures to develop cross-government initiatives. Now, that's the first one that we're starting. We will start and obviously are going to work with the departments that are closest to us initially, so Learning is the obvious one to start with and get it up and running, see how it works, experiment with it, and see what we can do with it.

Certainly Justice is a very important department, as you pointed out correctly, as we move into security issues. I know that the Justice minister – I've had a number of conversations with him about security, and one of the issues we're dealing with that Justice will be closely involved with is electronic signatures. How do we use electronic signatures in this province and make sure they're secure, make sure you can access information through your electronic signature and that only you can do that and not me? We're going to need legislation on electronic signatures eventually. So it's a very, very important concept, and certainly Justice needs to be involved with that.

In the various areas where different departments are involved, we will certainly be working with the various departments. In terms of Economic Development, we work very, very closely with Economic Development. As I said earlier – I'm not sure if you were here then – we have 10 staff that we share who work for both departments. It's a very unique relationship inside government, where you have staff who are co-operatively working for two departments and two deputy ministers. I'm not sure of the official title. It's a technology commercialization group headed by Mel Wong, and Mel Wong and his 10 staff members work for both departments. When the Minister of Economic Development needs to move forward with technology commercialization, that staff is there to help. So we have a very close working relationship with Economic Development as well.

So there are a number of cross-government initiatives already happening, and more will happen as we work through this.

You must remember that this department was just created in May of 1999. At that stage the Alberta Agricultural Research Institute was brought into this department. We are in the process of developing very close working relationships with the department of agriculture because some of the staff is still housed in the department of agriculture. Agriculture still has the research stations, so the question arises: what is the relationship between the Alberta Agricultural Research Institute, which is a research funder, and a research station, which is a research doer? It becomes a bit like the relationship with ASRA and the Alberta Research Council. The Alberta Research Council is a research performer. The Alberta Science and Research Authority is the group that determines science policy. That relationship has worked out, and it works very effectively.

As soon as we get a new organization like this AARI, then we're working on a new relationship. You know, what is the relationship of AARI to ASRA? What is the relationship of ASRA to the department of agriculture, of AARI to the department of agriculture? We can say the same thing about the Energy Research Council. What is the relationship of it to ASRA and to the department of energy? Just two weeks ago we had another group added to us, the forestry research council. We haven't even started, in a sense, thinking how the forestry group is necessarily going to fit in. Those are the questions we're dealing with. What is the relationship between the forestry research council and ASRA? What is our relationship to the department of forestry and the forestry research council? How does that relationship fit together so we have a system that is seamless and a system that works?

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. Member for Calgary-Egmont, do you have a couple of questions?

MR. HERARD: I have a couple of observations.

DR. TAYLOR: Could I just ask a question? What is the time frame we're working on, Madam Chairman?

MR. SAPERS: We've got all night.

DR. TAYLOR: Oh, no.

THE CHAIRMAN: It's, give or take, around 10 o'clock. When those that want to ask questions have finished.

DR. TAYLOR: Okay. Well, if anyone wants to submit written questions, we will provide written answers.

THE CHAIRMAN: Calgary-Egmont.

MR. HERARD: Thank you, Madam Chairman. I remember when the department was first started and there was no budget, there was no staff, there were people seconded from the research council, I believe, and here we are today. In sort of political/government terms not very much time has elapsed, because there are things that take forever to change and this is not one of them. So I want to congratulate you, I think, for being able to pull this off and to have brought some initiatives to this province that I think will pay tremendous dividends in the future. When we're in our rocking chairs, we can think back upon these years, and perhaps it'll be one of the more important things that have got done. I'm talking about the $500 million endowment fund as well as the ICORE initiative and so on.

I want to go a bit further on what you brought up – I didn't realize you were involved in this – with respect to trying to attract our youth to consider careers in innovation and science and information technology, in particular the girls. Your deputy minister will have heard this speech about six times now, and I hope that one of these times he'll take it upon himself to get it done. I really believe that you can attract kids by using the technology that you are trying to be a proponent of, and I'm talking about, you know, a web site that would turn kids on to careers in information technology and science and math and so on. I don't know how many times, like I said – the deputy minister says that it's 10 times. I really believe that it's important to do that, because most of our students don't know what is available in this province. If we could celebrate the tremendous opportunities that are available in this province, showcase them on a site and turn kids on, as you said, in junior high or even earlier, then I think we could attract more kids to those sorts of careers.

I think there's even a more important aspect to all of this, and that's the mentorships that we could establish via the web with professionals in those particular careers who are willing to take on the mentorship of our youth all the way to the postsecondary system. What you've done, then, is you've established a relationship with those young people who are probably then going to have some loyalty to you and in fact perhaps even produce a brain gain instead of a brain drain. So I think it's extremely important to use the tools that are there and to start using the web. Because let's face it; we have to be able to reach every single student in this province, and you're not going to do that with a little program here and a little program there. So I'm just appealing to you and your deputy to think about this one again. I know that there are corporations out there who have made overtures to me that they're prepared to mentor in this area and establish relationships, so I just want to encourage you to maybe look at that.

DR. TAYLOR: Could I just quickly respond to that? I have just in the last month – it'll be quick, Madam Chairman – challenged my communications director, Val Mellesmoen, with this task. So that's how recent this is. Certainly, as I said, we are going to pull together everybody, all the different organizations, and we have started to develop a kids' web site. It's just in its initial stages. It started during Science and Technology Week, and it is focused on careers, but as I say, it's just in its initial stages. So we need to flesh it out and keep going. As well, we have an ASRA web site that is quite creative. But this whole awareness issue that you're talking about we are just starting to discuss now, and we need to move forward with it, which we will do.

MR. HERARD: Good. That's exciting. Thank you.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Medicine Hat.

MR. RENNER: I was going to move that the committee rise and report.

MR. SAPERS: Well, I have a couple more questions.

MR. RENNER: Well, my understanding was that we agreed that we would rise and report at 10 o'clock. It is 10 o'clock.

MR. SAPERS: There's no standing agreement on that.

MR. RENNER: Well, I moved that we rise and report.

MR. SAPERS: I think you're being recognized out of order if we go back and forth.

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. member, we have for the last two hours worked very well going back and forth. I think everybody that indicated to the chair or the vice-chair that they wished to speak has done so. The minister did say that he'd put it in writing, that he would get back to you. You will have the opportunity in the House. The minister I think spent considerable time answering everyone's questions, and I think it's been good dialogue and good back and forth tonight. Let's leave it on a high note.

MR. SAPERS: It's not a matter of it being a high note or a low note. The fact is that it has been a useful discussion, and there's no particular . . .

THE CHAIRMAN: The point is two things. Everyone that identified they wanted to speak has done so and has had the appropriate time.

MR. SAPERS: I raised my hand and you didn't recognize me.

THE CHAIRMAN: I'm recognizing the Member for Medicine Hat. He is the one that is recognized, and I'm going to go with that.

Hon. member, do you want to repeat what you just said?

MR. RENNER: I move that the committee rise and report.

THE CHAIRMAN: All those in favour that the committee now rise and report?

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Aye.

THE CHAIRMAN: Opposed?

SOME HON. MEMBERS: No.

THE CHAIRMAN: Carried.

[The subcommittee adjourned at 10 p.m.]

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development.

MR. LUND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to table today six copies of the following four documents: under the Brand Act, the annual report of the delegated authority for 1998-99; under the Stray Animals Act, the annual report of the delegated authority for 1998-99; under the Livestock Identification and Brand Inspection Act, the annual report for the delegated authority for 1998-99; and under the Livestock and Livestock Products Act, the annual report of the delegated authority for 1998-99.

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to table today a letter that I've written to Mr. Murdoch Davis, the editor-in-chief of the Edmonton Journal. This letter is to correct some misinformation generated by a recent Caledon Institute of Social Policy paper that was in an article: "For-profit hospitals raise health costs, think tank says." This will cover NAFTA, WTO, and provincial jurisdiction and responsibility.

MR. LOUGHEED: I'm pleased to table five copies of the quarterly newsletter for the Premier's Council on the Status of Persons with Disabilities. A copy can be obtained by any Albertan by calling 1-800-272-8841.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've got two tablings today. I've got a set of 11 letters all written by Edmontonians to this government asking it to drop Bill 11 and ban private, for-profit hospitals under any name.

The second tabling is the appropriate copies and relevant attachments of a letter that I've written this morning to Robert Clark, Ethics Commissioner, asking him to investigate the possible breach of the Conflicts of Interest Act by the Member for Calgary-Currie. Your office has also been delivered a copy of it, Mr. Speaker, as I speak.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have three tablings today. They are from Diane Casimir and Sandy Schultz of Calgary and Gillian Cardwell of Cochrane. All three people are adamantly opposed to the proposed development in the Spray Valley.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

MS LEBOVICI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the appropriate number of copies of a letter that I've written to the Premier wherein I request that he clarify the contradiction by his caucus with regard to the five principles of the Canada Health Act.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the appropriate number of copies of letters from Michael Geis, Ruth Arkless, Dennis Faust, and Randy Laing, all expressing their concerns that they do not want their tax dollars to go to profits for shareholders of private, for-profit hospitals.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to table five copies of a document in which the Premier promises to continue his support of all seniors in Alberta, that promise made May 1, 1993.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings this afternoon. The first one is a letter that I wrote in August of 1999 to the Hon. Stockwell Day requesting that the provincial government consider a reduction in the 9 cent per litre provincial fuel tax as a means of offering Albertans tax relief from rising gasoline prices.

The second tabling is a very interesting document for all members of the House. It is dated September 16, 1991. It is from Alberta consumer and corporate affairs, and it indicates that both the Alberta Research Council and the department of labour were looking at the durability of pine shakes in that year.

Thank you.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to table five copies of a letter from Mr. Peter Lown, chair of the Alberta Law Reform Institute. This letter points out the very great similarity between Bill 11, the Health Care Protection Act, and the legislation passed in 1996 in Saskatchewan. The letter goes on to highlight additional protections in Alberta's legislation.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I would like to table five copies of the Health Facilities Licensing Act. The Saskatchewan legislation was passed in 1996 and proclaimed in 1998 and gives the Saskatchewan government the authority and process to license private health and surgical facilities in the province.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, I'd like to table an agreement by the House leader of the government of Alberta and the House Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and the interim leader and House leader of the third party in the House and the independent member for Edmonton-Castle Downs dated March 6, 2000, and entitled Designated Supply Subcommittee Agreement. The chair would remind all members that this agreement is to be read in conjunction with the Standing Orders of the Legislative Assembly of the province of Alberta, which of course take precedence.

To the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, the hon. member was in the House yesterday when the chair indicated very, very directly that henceforth in this Assembly individual names will not be used, and we will refer to the proper title and/or the constituency of the hon. member. I will interject and rise immediately when an hon. member says somebody's personal name. You know what the rules are.

head: Introduction of Guests

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly the Hon. Marc Racicot, Today's signing builds on a close and productive relationship between Alberta and Montana, and I'm pleased that Governor Racicot and his party are here today to mark the occasion. I would ask our honoured guests, seated in your gallery, Mr. Speaker, to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of our Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure today to introduce to you and through you to members of this Assembly a constituent of mine, Kunal Kaliandasani, who is job shadowing me today. Kunal is a grade 12 student enrolled in the international baccalaureate program at Harry Ainlay high school. He's seated in the members' gallery, and I'd ask that he rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

They're accompanied today by their teachers, Ms Rena Hanchuk, Mr. Ihor Karpa, and Mr. Luigi Cuglietta. I also would like to introduce parent and teacher aides Mrs. Debbie Caputo, Ms Marian Remenda, and Mr. Steven Yeo. They're seated in both the public and the members' galleries. With your permission I would ask that they now rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

MR. TRYNCHY: Thank you. On your behalf, Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce to the Legislative Assembly this afternoon 23 grade 6 students from the Neerlandia public Christian school. They're accompanied by teachers and group leaders Mr. Jim Bosma, Mrs. Shirley Blum, Mrs. Sheryl Krikke, Mr. Albert Mast, Mrs. Wilma Slomp, Mrs. Jeannette Bosma, and Mrs. Johanne Leonard with her preschooler daughter Stephanie Leonard. They're seated in the members' gallery. I would ask them to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

MR. JACQUES: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure today to introduce to you and through to Members of the Legislative Assembly two grade 6 classes from Swanavon school in my constituency of Grande Prairie-Wapiti. They are accompanied today by principal Lance Therrien, teacher Jay Smith, student teachers Christine Watson and Kerry Spicer, parents Mrs. Cunningham and Mr. Stretch, and teacher Marlyss Paszkowski, and yes, her husband is our colleague the MLA for Grande Prairie-Smoky and the Minister of Municipal Affairs. They are seated in the members' gallery, I believe. I would ask them to please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me great pleasure to introduce to you and through you to members of the House Maya Fujii, a 17-year-old Japanese exchange student who is spending a year in Edmonton as a guest of the Rotary Club of Edmonton Gateway. Maya is attending grade 10 at Louis St. Laurent high school, and in the true spirit of Rotary she is volunteering as a ski instructor with the Alberta Disabled Skiers Association and working with the children at the Garneau after school care program. I would ask that she now rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

1:50

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Gaming.

MR. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a great pleasure for me today to introduce through you to the Assembly a person I have a great amount of pride in, actually another elected official of the Smith family. She is a school trustee with the Foothills school division just south of Calgary. I would ask Kimberly to stand – she is accompanied by her mother – and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

MR. WICKMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to introduce through you to Members of the Legislative Assembly a hardworking individual, a businessman in the city who holds the distinction of being the current president of the Alberta Liberal Party. If Rick Miller would stand and receive the warm welcome of the House, all sides of the House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm delighted to introduce two young Albertans, both of whom are sitting in the public gallery. One of them, Melissa Johnson, is my constituent and a graduate student at the University of Alberta. Between her classes she was able to collect 354 signatures on a petition to this Assembly calling on it to ban private, for-profit hospitals. She is accompanied by Brent Tychy. I'm pleased to introduce him to the Assembly as someone who went to elementary school with one of my nephews. With your permission I'll ask the guests to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

head: Oral Question Period

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, let's please try and pay very careful attention to the rules of decorum.

The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Private Health Services

MRS. MacBETH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Premier claimed that he had consulted with health care economists about his private hospitals bill. Well-respected, impartial health care economists from across Canada are giving the Premier's private hospitals scheme the thumbs-down, just like Albertans right across this province. The only person deluded by this government's propaganda campaign of spreading malicious misinformation is the Premier himself. My questions are to the Premier. Why should Albertans believe the Premier when even these economists are questioning what his motivation is for putting the entire Canadian health care system at risk?

MR. KLEIN: Well, first of all, Mr. Speaker, there is no private hospital scheme. There is the protection of health care in this province, the publicly funded system as we know it.

Relative to the consultation I alluded to widespread consultation. There have been reports on both sides of this issue. There have been studies. There have been opinions. I would remind the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition that we initiated that consultation. We initiated first with the blue-ribbon panel report, then with the policy statement that was sent out for the comments of all Albertans and all Canadians for that matter. Indeed, there has been tremendous consultation on this particular bill.

I would remind the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition that this has nothing to do with private hospitals or private, for-profit hospitals as she so falsely proclaims, Mr. Speaker. It has something to do with the bill called the Health Care Protection Act.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, why should Albertans believe this Premier when these economists are saying that the only people who will benefit are a few health care providers who stand to make windfall profits off the taxpayer?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I don't know if these economists have read the bill, but the bill is quite clear. Quite clear. Anything, everything that is done in the context of delivering health care services has to be done within the parameters of the Canada Health Act and within the parameters of the very, very stringent rules of the College of the Physicians and Surgeons and the very strict and stringent rules and regulations related to Alberta health care.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, the Premier's deluding himself.

Given that doctors, economists, and Albertans all see through his private hospitals scheme, why would anyone believe this Premier?

MR. KLEIN: No. The only person deluding herself is the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition, Mr. Speaker. The proof of her delusions is in the statements that she and members of her party, aided and abetted by the Friends of Medicare and the NDs and the Canadian Union of Public Employees – the proof is in this statement. Two days ago she said that the government is spending $3 million to promote Bill 11. That's not true. That is not true. She must have gone to bed the night before and woke up and said: well, $3 million is a good number; you know, I can pick it out of my dreams and bring it to the Legislative Assembly the next day.

She said that Albertans want answers and the government is afraid to give them. Well, that flies in the face of our phone-line ads, our web site, and the what we've heard document that answers most of the frequently asked questions.

She says: it looks like private operators bleeding red ink are pressuring the government to ram this legislation through. Nobody is pressuring us. This legislation comes about as a result of a request of the College of Physicians and Surgeons. She has alluded to special interest groups, but she hasn't had the courage to name any of them.

She said that the Alberta government has reduced health care services and funding for health care. That simply is not true. We have increased health care spending by 40 percent.

Mr. Speaker, here's the greatest delusion of all. She says that the Premier is waging a propaganda campaign with public money on a scale never before seen in this province. Not true. The Getty government, of which she was a member, a member who spent over a million dollars promoting free trade – and, by the way, it's the same people opposing the bill that opposed free trade – and well over a million dollars promoting the Charlottetown accord.

Speaker's Ruling

Oral Question Period Rules

THE SPEAKER: A plea again. A plea again to the question of decorum and the rules that everyone knows are there: rules about not naming individuals; rules about no preambles to supplementary questions; shouting, I guess; heckling; short answers; long questions; nonconfrontational questions; no debate in the questions; no debate in the answers. Boy, we can go through this time and time again, but let's proceed and do the honour that we should do to the citizens of Alberta, who have placed their trust in us by electing us to come here and conduct their affairs.

The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, it's not only economists and physicians who are saying that this plan is fatally flawed. It's members of the Premier's own caucus. The Member for Calgary-Glenmore, a member of the truth squads, has admitted that the Premier's private hospitals bill will result in a whole new layer of bureaucracy and administration. My first question is: when will this Premier stop deluding himself and admit that his private hospitals scheme is going to cost the taxpayers more?

2:00

MR. KLEIN: I'm not deluding myself, Mr. Speaker, because there is no private hospitals scheme. There is the Health Care Protection Act.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, how much will the new layer of bureaucracy cost the taxpayers of this province to administer these private hospitals?

MR. KLEIN: No private hospitals, Mr. Speaker, so I assume there will be no new layers of bureaucracy.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, why should Albertans be forced to pay these extra costs just so the Premier can use tax dollars to subsidize a few private operators?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would read the bill, she will find out that no one under the publicly funded system will be denied health care services. The only card that they will need is their health care insurance card. So I don't know what she's talking about in terms of extra costs.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, Albertans know that their tax dollars are going to be going to these operators and it's going to cost them more.

Let's talk about special interests. Who's pulling the Premier's strings? Is it private hospital owners? Is it health care insurance providers? Is it the providers of private health care services? Who's pulling the Premier's strings?

MR. KLEIN: Quite simply, Mr. Speaker, nobody is pulling my strings or the strings of anyone else in this caucus. This bill is predicated on what is the right thing to do. I guess if anyone is pulling strings, it would be the College of Physicians and Surgeons, a very esteemed organization that encouraged us to go ahead with this legislation.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, will the Premier admit that these companies stand to make a windfall profit right out of the pockets of taxpayers?

MR. KLEIN: No, I don't think anyone's going to make windfall profits, Mr. Speaker. The legislation certainly isn't set up to allow that to happen. Windfall profits are reaped by those that have private hospitals, American style private hospitals, where people with a lot of money can jump the queue and get better treatment. That's what it's all about. We're trying to protect against that. The whole intent of this bill is to protect against that, but she doesn't like the bill, so she must be in support of private, for-profit hospitals.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, will this Premier call an election so that Albertans can decide between us, the party that wants to protect and innovate within medicare, and this Premier, who is setting out to destroy it?

MR. KLEIN: We're not setting out to destroy it at all. That's why we had the courage and that's why we had the openness to send this bill out to every household in the province, Mr. Speaker. If we had something to hide, if we had something to be afraid of, we would have kept this from the public. It would have been strictly limited to the legislative Chamber. We wouldn't have warned people that this was coming out. We wouldn't have engaged the people in the debate through the policy statement.

As to the election, Mr. Speaker, there will be an election soon enough. The last time I faced the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition was during the leadership campaign. She didn't like the outcome, and if we have an election, she won't like the outcome there either.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. interim leader of the third party.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The chief physician of the Calgary regional health authority, that is CRHA, has an ownership interest in a private, for-profit clinic that has a CRHA contract, as do the chiefs of ophthalmology and radiology. The head of orthopedic surgery at Foothills hospital has an ownership interest in HRG, and HRG is aggressively lobbying for CRHA contracts and for the approval of Bill 11. My questions are to the Premier. Mr. Premier, why does Bill 11 do nothing to put a stop to these blatant conflicts of interest?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, there are conflict rules that I believe apply to the RHAs relative to the specific instances to which the hon. member alludes. I'll have the Minister of Health and Wellness respond.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, when the chief of staff – I believe that's the title – for the medical profession in the Calgary regional health authority was appointed or even considered for appointment, he made it quite clear that he had interests in I believe it was a diagnostic clinic or radiology lab. That was made public in Calgary. It was well known. It was noted when the Calgary regional health authority deliberated over the various candidates for the job.

Mr. Speaker, the second thing is that the Calgary regional health authority has adopted a clear procedure or protocol whereby when it comes to any consideration of contracts, not particularly the doctors' but all contracts, he is absent from those particular discussions. He concentrates his work on co-ordinating and leading and being the chief of staff for the professional doctors in Calgary.

DR. PANNU: Mr. Speaker, the answer isn't given to my question. I'm saying: why is there no such provision in Bill 11?

Let me ask another question of the Premier. If the government wouldn't allow senior officials in the Department of Infrastructure to own companies bidding on paving contracts, then why is a comparable situation tolerated in the Calgary regional health authority?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. Minister of Health and Wellness pointed out, they have some rules within the Calgary regional health authority that deal with these issues of conflict or perceived conflict.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My last question to the Premier: how can the Premier justify letting the Member for Calgary-Currie pose questions designed to promote public acceptance of Bill 11 when the member's spouse stands to financially benefit from the approval of Bill 11?

Speaker's Ruling Matters Referred to Ethics Commissioner

THE SPEAKER: Hon. member, sit down. The hon. member tabled a document in the House, and I would refer the hon. member to the Conflicts of Interest Act of the province of Alberta, section 22(6)

Where a matter has been referred to the Ethics Commissioner under subsection (1), (3) or (4), neither the Legislative Assembly nor a committee of the Assembly shall inquire into the matter.

I understand that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona has referred a matter to the Ethics Commissioner, and in listening to the words of the question addressed by the hon. member, he would be in violation of section 22(6) of the Conflicts of Interest Act in this House.

The hon. Member for West Yellowhead, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

2:10 Gasoline Prices

MR. STRANG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Oil prices continue to rise even though we hear that OPEC will continue action to try and stabilize it. Yesterday the price of oil closed at $33.98 U.S. per barrel. Because of that high price of oil, gasoline prices are skyrocketing. For instance, in the town of Hinton today we're at 67.9. That causes a lot of concern for my citizens and I'm sure for the rest of Alberta. To the Minister of Resource Development: why is the price of oil continuing to rise?

DR. WEST: Mr. Speaker, this question is . . . [interjections]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Resource Development has the floor.

DR. WEST: Mr. Speaker, we have answered questions in this House regarding the price of a barrel of oil and a litre of gasoline, but I think the simple answer will be that it's supply and demand at the present time. On March 2 Venezuela and Mexico and the OPEC nations met and projected that they would increase production by 1.2 million barrels a day. It looks now as if this will not catch up in time to the undersupply that is in the world today. I think that the economists and those working on the volumes of oil that are present in the world have probably underestimated the demand that's going on, not only in North America but throughout the world. Some other measure is going to have to be taken in the future to curb the undersupply and therefore bring the price of a barrel of oil probably more in line with what consumers can afford, to say the short form of it.

The other thing is that – perhaps the Treasurer doesn't agree with me – these prices probably are not healthy for the industry either. We'd be better off with a stabilized rate of anywhere from $21 to $25 a barrel. I know that sounds like blasphemy coming from the minister of energy.

The world is going to address this, and I'll be interested to hear what the supplemental question is.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. member, there may not be a supplemental question if we're seeking another opinion, which violates 409.

MR. STRANG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My first supplemental question is to the hon. Treasurer. We know that there is a large component of final tax on gasoline. What are we going to do to try and reduce the tax on a litre of gasoline?

Thank you.

MR. DAY: Mr. Speaker, the member is quite correct. Tax makes up, depending on which province you're looking at, about 45 percent of the cost of a litre. You know, in Alberta we have the lowest tax per litre of any other government, but that still doesn't take the sting out of things at the pump when consumers are there. When we're filling our tank, you still feel the very clear pinch of those high prices.

We have in the province 9 cents per litre as a provincial tax. The federal government has about 10 cents for an excise tax, and then what is particularly odious is the fact that the GST federally is applied to all of the taxes and to all of the costs. So as the price of oil goes up, the federal government takes a greater share of that increase. In Alberta, as far as the gas tax, we don't take in more because the price goes up. We still only take 9 cents per litre. So there's a real difficulty there.

I'm hoping the federal government may be interested in a discussion. You know, they are often quick to come out with a matching program where they say: we'll spend this much; you provinces spend this much. Would they be willing to get into a discussion saying: "We'll reduce federal taxes this much. Will provinces reduce taxes with us?" It might be a good discussion.

MR. STRANG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My second supplemental question is also to the same minister. What has the Provincial Treasurer done to communicate this message to the federal government?

MR. DAY: Mr. Speaker, especially in this area of GST it's really irritating to think that the federal government would capitalize in an increasing way as the price per barrel of oil goes up and therefore gasoline goes up. By tacking on that 7 percent GST, they're just raking it in at an increased level, and we've got some problems with that.

I have recently communicated to Mr. Martin in writing on this to see if we can engage in the discussion. I understand that he's in his offices in Ottawa on Tuesday. He's been right here in Alberta yesterday and today, I think, and he's touring the country. I want to see what he thinks of some initial thoughts and proposals that I have already sent to him on that particular question.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Doctors don't want this private hospitals scheme. Economists don't want it. Albertans don't want it. The only conclusion is that the Premier's strings are being pulled by those special interest backers who stand to benefit from this policy. Albertans just don't trust this Premier anymore. To the Premier: given that all the evidence shows that waiting lists won't go down, why is this Premier doing it?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, there is no private hospital scheme. There is the Alberta Health Care Protection Act, a bill that has received first reading in this Legislature and a bill that will proceed to protect public health as we know it today, to make sure that all medical practices are within the parameters of the Canada Health Act, to make sure that there are strict rules and regulations relative to surgical clinics, including the 47 that exist today.

That's what it's all about. There is no private hospital scheme. As a matter of fact, the very first sentence following the preamble says: "No person shall operate a private hospital in Alberta." There is no private hospital scheme. Mr. Speaker, I will repeat it. There is no private hospital scheme.

MR. BONNER: Mr. Speaker, given that the Premier used hip replacements to justify private hospitals and now we learn that these won't be allowed, why does the Premier still insist on putting his approved surgical facilities, also known as private hospitals, in place?

MR. KLEIN: They are not also known as private hospitals. They are known as surgical facilities. Mr. Speaker, this is simply another untruth. This is part of the malicious misinformation campaign being conducted by the Liberal opposition. When they use "private hospitals," they are saying something that is absolutely contradictory to what is in this act, which specifically states that "no person shall operate a private hospital in Alberta."

Relative to hip replacements or any other procedure the bill quite clearly states that whatever is allowed in a private surgical facility, including the 47 that exist today, including the 38 that were approved by the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition when she was minister of health – it will be up to the college to determine what can be done in a surgical clinic.

This hon. member who asked the question is not a medical doctor; he doesn't know. I am not a medical doctor; I don't know. I can't offer a medical opinion as to what will be allowed or what will not be allowed. That's why the bill leaves these questions of a medical nature up to the people who are best able to answer them, and those people are on the board and are members of the College of Physicians and Surgeons.

MR. BONNER: Mr. Speaker, given that the only people who will benefit are private hospital owners, will the Premier admit that this is why he is doing it? For their benefit?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again the question is absolutely irrelevant because it alludes to private hospitals, and the bill before this Legislature now says quite simply that "no person shall operate a private hospital in Alberta." So the question is irrelevant.

THE SPEAKER: The Member for Calgary-Mountain View, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Federal Taxation of Resource Industries

MR. HLADY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again the oil and gas industry is under attack from the federal Liberal government. The federal government brought down its budget last week, and it appears that there are some changes with regard to corporate taxes that help other industries but not the resource industries. My first question is to the Minister of Resource Development. Could the minister please explain what changes the federal government has made in its budget that affect the resource sector?

DR. WEST: Mr. Speaker, the federal government on February 28 brought out a very covered up change to the corporate tax structure in Canada, moving it from 28 percent to 21 percent for all corporate entities but not including that in the nonrenewable natural resource industries. In doing so, they failed to realize a hard-fought battle that we had in June of 1975 in which the federal government acknowledged a resource allowance that put in place a 25 percent discount for resource industries for the risk and cost of production that also recognized the provincial government's room to impose Crown royalties and mining taxes and also recognized in Canada once and for all the provincial ownership and management of nonrenewable resources. Putting this in this budget was a sham.

MR. HLADY: Mr. Speaker, my second question is also to the Resource Development minister. Could the minister please advise the Assembly about the effect of this change on Alberta's oil and gas industry?

DR. WEST: Mr. Speaker, last night I talked to the Finance minister of Canada, the Hon. Paul Martin, and I indicated to him that if there isn't a reconsideration of this, this is going to cost hundreds of millions of dollars to this industry. The equity markets that are out there that invest in the stocks in these companies do not understand that we wouldn't recognize the risk of the cyclical nature of resource industries as far as the product price as well as the basin that they work in.

Mr. Martin said that they would reconsider this and talk with the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers tomorrow and on Friday. As well, I am sure the Provincial Treasurer will be having a severe talk with Mr. Martin.

MR. HLADY: My final question, Mr. Speaker, is to the Provincial Treasurer. Could the hon. Treasurer advise the Assembly what action he has taken in response to this action by the federal government and the federal Finance minister, who was in Edmonton yesterday?

MR. DAY: Mr. Speaker, I have had communication with the federal Finance minister on this in a couple of different ways. I have expressed a concern about how the whole problem has developed, the fact that we came across this problem literally in the late hours of the day on which the federal budget was tabled in going through the federal budget. We'd already given the federal minister credit for some of the positive things that the Liberal federal government did. In literally going through the appendix, here there was a footnote relating to the very problem that the minister of resources just talked about.

So I've communicated our concerns to the federal minister about how we found out about it, the lack of communication, and as recently as yesterday was on the phone with the federal minister while he was here in town. I'm going to take him at his word. He appeared to be very sincere in saying that a problem has developed and that he would like to sit down and work this problem out in all sincerity. So I'm going to hold him to that commitment.

I've also sent correspondence to him, which I can't quote here today in fairness to him, because I'd have to table it, until he has a chance to get back to his office. I want him to take a look at it. So we've got a clear commitment from the federal minister that we will sit down with officials and with industry experts to make sure we can get this problem resolved. [interjections]

THE SPEAKER: Hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert, hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry: I'll recognize either one of you if you want to get involved in the question period.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, followed by the hon. Member for Peace River.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, after six years of attacks on their programs the Premier is now threatening the single issue that means the most to seniors and their families: access to public health care, not higher costs and longer waiting lists. The effects of Bill 11 will hit senior citizens the soonest because the push is to have surgeries that affect seniors the most privatized first, surgeries like cataracts. My questions are to the Premier. Given that seniors who failed to anticipate and negotiate health care premium coverage in retirement packages six years ago are now paying over $800 per year in health premiums, what sort of private health care insurance premiums should current and soon-to-be seniors budget for in planning for their retirement?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that health care premiums for seniors are geared to income. By and large the minority of seniors pay full premium for health care services, and those are seniors who are deemed to be very well-off.

MS BLAKEMAN: My next question is also to the Premier. Given that in '93 the Premier promised to support seniors and then within one year had shredded the seniors' report, delisted over-the-counter drugs from Blue Cross, and slashed rent and property tax assistance, can the Premier give seniors a single reason why they should not expect to be double-crossed yet again?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, if this hon. member would take the time to travel the country, she'd find out that our seniors' benefits programs are the best in all of Canada. There's been an additional 10 percent in this year's budget for seniors' benefits programs. If she doesn't believe me, travel the country. I mean, they've been using money for malicious propaganda. Use it for something useful. I would challenge her to do her own study, and she will come back with the determination that we have without doubt the best seniors' programs in the country.

MR. WOLOSHTYN: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to add to that to some degree. Fully 180,000 seniors have their health care premiums looked after to some degree. That was brought forward early this morning in Public Accounts. We are the only province that addresses lower income seniors through our special-needs program.

AN HON. MEMBER: Broken promises.

MR. WOLOSHTYN: Those are not broken promises.

These are programs which were put together where the moneys were directed at the more needy seniors, and I can state unequivocally in this House – and I'll be pleased to share comparisons – that Alberta's seniors' benefit program is the best in the country by far.

MS BLAKEMAN: This question is also to the Premier. Since the Premier's Bill 11 mail-out does not include a return address and few seniors have Internet access, does this mean that the Premier does not want written responses back from them, or is it a case of: only the rich need reply?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again here is another blatant example of the Liberals questioning the intelligence of Albertans, another example of Liberals insulting Albertans by questioning their intelligence.

Mr. Speaker, the addresses and phone numbers of all MLAs are in the phone book. There is a toll-free telephone number that costs absolutely nothing. The number is 310-4455. Pick up the telephone. It's free. Or write a letter to your MLA: the Liberal MLA, the ND MLA, any of the Conservative MLAs. We're all in the phone book. Most people know how to reach our constituency offices. My gosh, they know how reach the Premier's office; that's for sure. They know how to reach all the ministers' offices, because we get tons and tons of mail.

What a ridiculous statement to make. Again she insults the intelligence of Albertans. I think it's shameful, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Forest Management

MR. FRIEDEL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This question is to the Minister of Environment. A number of my constituents rely heavily on the forestry industry for their livelihood. For that reason, they want to see our forested areas managed in a sustainable manner, not only for the protection of an essential industry but for our future generations. This is an ongoing concern. I wonder if the minister can tell us what he's doing in some of the new initiatives that ensure that the existing operations will stay viable and sustainable.

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, this province recognizes the economic importance of the forestry industry to Albertans. At the same time, Albertans are also recognizing that this resource must be managed in a manner that is sustainable.

In the province of Alberta, Mr. Speaker, our forest resources are abundant, but we have to manage them in such a way as to ensure that they'll always be abundant. To do that, the management of our forests is based on the best available science. We have to make sure that we have practices that allow for commercially viable forests in the province without sacrificing other nontimber values like recreation, like tourism, and, of course, like wildlife.

The science that we rely upon is based on a number of sources. The province of Alberta is a partner with the centres of excellence in sustainable forest management based out of the University of Alberta. We've also established the Alberta Forest Management Science Council, and we of course participate in other activities with forestry ministers from across Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the most important guiding principle – and I'll conclude with this – is that our forest management practices do not and will not allow the harvesting of forests beyond a forest's ability to grow timber.

MR. FRIEDEL: To the same minister, Mr. Speaker: I wonder if he can tell us what the ratio of Alberta's forested cover is compared to the rate of harvest.

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, my colleague is referring to the green area of the province. It comprises 53 percent of the province, and it is primarily unsettled forested lands that are not available for agricultural development. I'd like to point out that within this provincially managed area we do set aside areas that are not harvested; for example, to recognize that there should be buffers streamside, wildlife habitat, and, of course, recreation areas. Those areas are withdrawn from harvesting. Also withdrawn from harvesting are our provincial and national parks, natural areas, and ecological reserves.

As a result of all of those areas that are taken out from harvesting, only about 2 in 5 hectares within the green area are actually made available by the government for timber harvesting. Of these commercially available forest lands, only 1 percent of the net area can be harvested annually, and we are a long way from that target. The last full year available figures that I've seen show that in 1997 only .59 percent of these areas were harvested, well within the sustainable level that has been set by the government.

MR. FRIEDEL: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to direct my last question to the Associate Minister of Forestry. I'm wondering if he can tell us if he would see that any future forest industry projects could threaten the sustainability of Alberta's forests and the forest industry.

MR. CARDINAL: Good question, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Environment, of course, touched on that subject a bit earlier. The department has a policy of sustained yield management, which means that we will not be harvesting beyond what the forest would grow. That is why we work very, very closely with the Department of Environment. There has to be a balance between economic development and environmental management. I think we are doing very well.

Mr. Speaker, I would point out that in Canada the boreal forest covers over 500 million hectares, and of this area only .01 percent is harvested. [interjections] We are doing very well. The Liberals now are asking how many jobs and stuff are created. It is very . . .

THE SPEAKER: Please, hon. minister. It was the hon. Member for Peace River who had the floor, and it's to him via the Speaker that one will communicate.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Mental Health Services

MR. GIBBONS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Plans to revamp the psychiatric hospitals in Alberta have been described by the Canadian Mental Health Association as a return to the dark ages solution. A report entitled Best Practices in mental health reform, which was partially funded and endorsed by Alberta Health and Wellness, calls for community services inpatient beds at a local level and eventual downsizing of institutions. To the Minister of Health and Wellness: has the minister read the recommendations of the report that his own department is distributing?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, I am quite aware of it, if it is the report I think it is from the mental health alliance. I am quite aware of the report, and in total I do not think it portrays or gives credit at all to the changes that have been made over the past few years.

First of all, I think it's important to note that when reductions were made of necessity across government back in the 1993-94 period, the overall budget for mental health was not reduced in this province.

Secondly, it misses I think a very, very important fact, and that is that the amount of money in our budget in mental health for community services has been doubled over the last number of years to this year's budget, and, Mr. Speaker, the amount of money committed to hospital care has remained almost constant. So there's definitely been a shift in the resources to community care.

In addition to that, it fails to acknowledge that there has been a reduction of beds in mental health hospitals across the province. I believe the number, if I recall correctly, is 94 that it's been reduced, and in some of the capital projects that are planned, there's a further reduction of beds, although I would not say that that is a large further reduction of beds because the need is clearly there for institutional care, Mr. Speaker.

That is the direction in terms of the financing of mental health that we have been taking in the province, Mr. Speaker. I still firmly maintain that there is a need for hospital care for those people who unfortunately suffer from mental illness, but the shift and the direction is just not acknowledged in this report, and I think it should be.

MR. GIBBONS: My second question to the same minister: will the minister make a commitment and adopt a mental health system based on the recommendations of the Best Practices report?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, I've outlined some of the overall directions in terms of the budget. I think we are taking the right direction. I do not commit to taking all of the recommendations of that particular report, because I disagree with some of the basic premises on which it is based.

If the hon. member wants some more specific examples, I can provide a number of examples in terms of just what is actually being accomplished with the shift to community care. Perhaps the time available to us will not permit me to go over all the different initiatives, but right here in Edmonton there's been an increase in crisis services and psychiatric services available at our hospitals on an emergency basis. We have a crisis line that operates 24 hours a day. I could go on, but I will just cease at that point.

MR. GIBBONS: To the same minister. My concern is that there is no new money in the community for mental health. Why is the minister investing $95 million to rebuild a psychiatric institution in his own constituency when the community aspect is where it's needed?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, as I've indicated, there is a considerable increase in the overall spending for community care in this province. We've been very active through the Alberta Mental Health Board in linking up with the children's health initiative or the school health initiative. We've had compliments, quite frankly, on the engagement and the activities of the mental health system in working in conjunction with the school system on that initiative. So the direction and the innovation are there in the system.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I would not apologize for the fact that there needs to be a capital project in Ponoka. There is good care being provided there. It was the centre of starting telepsychiatry. The work it does in terms of brain injury is recognized across this province and across this country in terms of its quality. It provides good care, as I said, to a goodly number of people who unfortunately do need hospitalization. As far as the condition of the building, it needs to be rebuilt.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

School Building Utilization

MRS. FRITZ: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Recently the Minister of Infrastructure visited the Clarence Sansom school in Pineridge to consult with parents as to how the utilization rate formula was affecting their school. During the meeting Barb Hadford, Jo-Anne Teed, Enid Webster, and others expressed their concern that the Calgary board of education is closing classrooms and schools based on an archaic 25-year-old formula, where areas such as stages, labs, computer rooms, and even showers are calculated as classroom space. My question today is to the Minister of Infrastructure. Given that the minister is reviewing the utilization rate formula for school use, when will the review be completed?

MR. STELMACH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is referring to the recommendations that the government accepted coming out of the School Facilities Task Force, which was very capably chaired by the MLA for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake. In the report there were 41 recommendations, 39 of which we have accepted, and one of them is to review the utilization rates and the policy around utilization in all of their schools. The completion of that review will be done as soon as possible, but we're certainly looking at it for early summer so that we can put that into the next phase of the plan.

I wish to point out to the hon. member and to all members of the House that we've now started a school facility newsletter, and that newsletter has gone out to all school boards. I hope all MLAs have a copy of it. It also lists the membership of the committee that will be doing all of the reviews.

MRS. FRITZ: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the minister has said that options for revisions to the formula will be ready for the summer, will the new utilization rate formula be effective for September of 2000?

MR. STELMACH: Mr. Speaker, my own personal goal is that we reach conclusion and have it ready for the school year beginning in the year 2000.

MRS. FRITZ: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister. In circumstances where a school board rents out space to a charter school or a children's services authority, how is that space included in the utilization formula?

MR. STELMACH: Mr. Speaker, school boards are encouraged to make full use of their facilities. When a school board leases surplus school space to a charter school, the school is considered to be 100 percent utilized, and the board receives all of the regular support grants. If the school board leases surplus space to a public agency, for example a children's services authority, then the student capacity of the leased portion is removed from the school board's total student capacity, and the board's overall utilization of the schools in their jurisdiction increases.

MR. DICKSON: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

head: Reading and Receiving Petitions

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, in 30 seconds from now I'll call upon the first of five members to participate.

The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Joe Crowshoe

MR. COUTTS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Joe Crowshoe Sr. was a ceremonialist and spiritual leader from the great Peigan Nation. He passed away on October 28, 1999, at the age of 93 years. He and his wife, Josephine, had 11 children and loved their 40 grandchildren, 85 great-grandchildren, and four great-great-grandchildren.

Joe was raised in the Peigan traditional culture and participated at official ceremonies throughout Alberta and the United States. He served for 28 years on the Peigan band council. He was a founding member for the farmers' association for Peigan Nation, the Indian Affairs education department, and he advised the universities of Calgary and Lethbridge on native studies that promoted cross-cultural initiatives. In 1981 he was a spiritual and cultural adviser for the UNESCO world heritage site at Head-Smashed-In Buffalo Jump.

Because of his humanitarianism work the Old Man, as he was known, was the recipient of a Canadian citation for citizenship, the Alberta achievement award, an honorary doctorate of humanities from the University of Montana, the Order of Canada, an honorary doctorate of laws from the University of Calgary, and the national aboriginal achievement award for heritage and spirituality.

The Old Man was born in a teepee on the Oldman River and lived to use a cell phone. He would have welcomed the return of the ceremonial bundles to his people.

International Women's Day

MS BLAKEMAN: Mr. Speaker, today is March 8, International Women's Day, and the launch of the World March of Women 2000. Born from the movement to win the vote for women and the early trade unionists struggling for better working conditions and wages for women, International Women's Day came about after a series of events in different countries. Large women's rallies in the U.S. in 1908, the female garment workers' strike in 1909, an international women's congress in 1910 in Copenhagen, and advocacy from Russian, Swedish, Danish, American, Swiss, and German women all contributed to International Women's Day being held and recognized on March 8.

This year women from over 3,500 groups in 146 countries will be participating in celebrations, marches, art displays, parades, festivals, and forums to educate and advocate for improvements in women's rights, particularly as it affects poverty and violence against women. A signature campaign will run worldwide from March 8 until the 17th of October, when an expected 10 million signatures will be delivered to the United Nations. I urge everyone to support this and other International Women's Day 2000 initiatives.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Redwater.

Edmonton Burns Society

MR. BRODA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On January 25, 2000, I joined some 500 men of Scottish descent and supporters at an 80th anniversary dinner of the Edmonton Burns club. The club is one of many groups around the world that celebrate the life of Robert Burns, a Scottish poet, perhaps best known for writing the words of Auld Lang Syne. At noon that day the club unveiled a statue of Robert Burns in Oliver park, directly opposite the main entrance of the Macdonald Hotel. This is the first statue of Burns to be raised in Alberta and will serve as a permanent tribute to the Scottish pioneers in this part of the world.

I'd also like to recognize the sculptor, Mr. John Weaver, for his fine work. John's work can be seen throughout Edmonton, most notably the Wayne Gretzky statue. On behalf of all Albertans thank you and congratulations.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Chris Spearman

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Individuals can make a difference. Lethbridge had the distinction last fall and winter of having to pay 4 or 5 cents extra for our gas compared to the rest of the province. Chris Spearman got together a group of people in Lethbridge. They undertook a public relations campaign. They communicated with the oil companies. They communicated with oil industry associations. Over a period of weeks they managed to bring the price of gas in Lethbridge down to or almost equivalent to the price in the rest of Alberta. This shows the power that when one person decides they want to start something, they can do it.

So all the people of Lethbridge I think want to say thank you to Chris Spearman and the group that he eventually put together to bring the price of gas down. Now, I know that some people are complaining that essentially what he did was bring the price in the rest of the province up to the level we're paying in Lethbridge, but we like to think he did bring our price down. Thanks, Chris.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

International Women's Day

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today is International Women's Day. The origins of International Women's Day can be traced back to labour strikes by women working in the textile industry in New York City in 1857 and 1908. After the 1908 strike women's rights became issues of societal concern. Popular history tends to focus more on the opinions, actions, and accomplishments of men than on those of women. Women in historical accounts seem invisible, and this invisibility is not because there is an absence of women in public affairs. What I note is the absence of their stories being told. For generations women have been knocking over walls and negotiating barriers wherever they have found them, and they will continue to do so, even though their efforts are often not acknowledged.

Today a march that is an action that reflects women's determination to shake up the powers-that-be will take place. The World March of Women 2000, with more than 145 countries represented and over 2,000 groups signed up to participate, is itself born out of the experience of the Women's March against Poverty, which took place in Quebec City in 1995. Many events this week are planned around our province. I encourage all Albertans to take part in as many of these events as possible and reaffirm to us that women are not invisible.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: Two hon. members on points of order.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder.

Point of Order

Oral Question Period Rules

MR. WHITE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise firstly to point out to you that I raised the point of order as soon as possible under the rule outlined in Beauchesne 321. This member rises on three main questions, and they centre around ministerial competence and the administrative competence of the answerer, preambles, and urgency.

Sir, I bring to your attention a first main question. Under Beauchesne 409(3) "the question ought to seek information and, therefore, cannot be based upon a hypothesis, cannot seek an opinion, either legal or otherwise." The question centred around the world price of oil. Now, in the answer to that very important question, in another forum perhaps but not this one, contrary to our rules the answerer went on to say that it is not in his area of competence, that in fact if he had his druthers, he would have a lower price, and even went on to say that it would be heresy for this minister to say such things. It was in his opinion, clearly in his opinion. This is out of order and could have been called out of order immediately, but as I observed, the chair was trying to allow a full and complete answer and made mention of that fact shortly thereafter.

Then to compound things, the Member for West Yellowhead rose in his place for his first supplementary and proceeded with a preamble to his supplementary, contrary to the rules as set out and agreed upon by the House leaders. Now, this side of the House takes great care not to offend the rules of order in the preparation of these questions.

The answer to the question had something to do with tying oil price to the price of fuel in the province of Alberta. We're not sure how the question was interpreted, but the minister then proceeded to answer way outside of his area of administrative competence. Presumably, sir, when the rules say that the questioner must ask a question being within ministerial competence, then it should follow that the answer should be within that area. It clearly was not. We heard a diatribe – maybe it was opinion; we're not sure – about the effects of the federal tax, which was clearly not in the realm of competence of anyone in this House. This House does not and cannot pass federal law, whether it be excise or GST or anything else. Then to compound that again, the supplementary question came back to the same minister, and we were treated to more of the same.

Sir, the entire exchange offended Beauchesne 409(3), 409(5) under urgency, and 409(6) under administrative competence. It is difficult. I know you do the best you can to maintain order and to maintain some semblance of adherence to the rules, but today was not a banner day for that. I shall await your ruling.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. HAVELOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Let me begin by first saying that I actually do like and respect the hon. member across the way. However, I have never heard a weaker argument with respect to a point of order in this House since I've been elected.

On the first question which was asked that he's referring to, yes, Mr. Speaker, you intervened and pointed out that perhaps there was a response of an opinion in that answer and that perhaps it may have offended Beauchesne.

When we talk about the second supplemental question, the world price of oil, the Minister of Resource Development indicated that if he had his druthers, he would prefer to see a lower price, but it's not outside of his competence to make that statement. Clearly it's outside of his competence to fix the price of oil. He was simply making a comment. But the price of oil impacts very significantly his department, the revenues that are generated for this government, and of course the programs we can support through those revenues.

Mention of the preamble in supplementals. Mr. Speaker, every day the opposition has a preamble or a response to an answer mixed in with what they're doing. The comments you made the other day regarding the House leader agreement needing to be respected: yes, we try and do that on this side. But of course for someone to stand up, as the hon. member has done, and suggest in this House that they pay very close attention to the House leader agreement when they're asking their questions is not accurate. Just today they didn't follow the rules. In some instances, I will admit, our own members didn't follow the rules. So perhaps everyone in this House needs to read the agreement and stick with it.

The third question. I think this is the one relating to the federal tax, Mr. Speaker, and the fact that the oil sector was excluded from the reduction in corporate taxes. From what I understand, the hon. member is suggesting again that we aren't competent to respond – unless I'm getting the questions mixed up.

MR. WHITE: It's a different question.

MR. HAVELOCK: If I am getting the questions mixed up, then I apologize, but I thought it was part of the same line of questioning. If it was the same line of questioning relating to the tax, then we certainly are very competent, anyone in this House is competent to comment on federal taxation levels. Otherwise, for example, we couldn't stand up in this House and talk about personal income taxes, payroll tax, or whatever that may be imposed by the federal government and impact our industry in this province.

3:00

The issue of urgency. Again, I don't know where the hon. member has been, but the issue of gasoline prices is very urgent. It's raised every day on the front page of the papers. While oil prices are going up, gasoline prices are significantly increasing also. Now, for the hon. member to suggest that it's not urgent, I would like him to go out today and be interviewed by the media and say: "No one in Alberta cares about this issue. Albertans, we don't care." If that's what you're saying, that it's not an urgent issue for Albertans, then I suggest that you go organize a town hall, and I'm sure a few Albertans will come forward and tell you, hon. member, that it is a matter of urgency.

Mr. Speaker, there's no point of order with respect to this line of questioning. Had there been a point of order, I'm sure you would have intervened, as you did on the first question.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: Well, hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder, the chair would suggest that you've had an opportunity to exercise your parliamentary skills this afternoon. Whether or not they have been successful, though, awaits a few more comments.

It would certainly appear that the chair did rise when the original question was raised by the hon. Member for West Yellowhead as the chair viewed that there was a searching for an opinion with respect to a certain question and certainly provided caution. I think that anyone in this Assembly and anyone in the province of Alberta would be very, very hard-pressed to believe that a question with respect to the price of gasoline would be anything else but of great importance to the people of Alberta, particularly a question which has to do with taxation of a certain industry in this province. The chair would be in a very, very difficult position trying to explain to anyone in the province of Alberta that a question on such a subject would be anything else but in order in the province of Alberta.

With respect to the competency. As the chair understands the questions, the second and a third question, his two supplementary questions basically dealt with: what would in fact the government be doing about this particular matter? The chair listened very attentively and heard two different ministers respond that basically petitions had been made. After an assessment of the impact in the province of Alberta, petitions had been made, will continue to be made, and this is a matter of some degree of importance and urgency to the people of this province, including this Assembly.

I'm reminded at this point in time of a phrase which I think was written by one William Shakespeare. I hope I'm not giving credit to someone else but the great scribe. If I recall correctly, he once wrote: methinks thou doth protest too much. There is no point of order.

Point of Order Anticipation

MR. DICKSON: Standing Order 23(e) enjoins us from anticipating a matter that's going to be dealt with on the Order Paper later the same day. Now, like all members, I have lots of time for the conscientious Member for Calgary-Cross. She asked a very important question about an arbitrary school utilization formula that causes huge grief to parents and people in the school community in the city of Calgary. Mr. Speaker, I need your help. I cautioned my colleagues this morning to not ask questions about Infrastructure because it's on the Order Paper and it's coming up tonight. We're going to have the minister there for at least two hours answering questions. I told my colleagues, reminded them of the rule. I sat here while we went through an initial question and two supplementaries – good questions, every one of them – but those matters ought to be raised tonight. So that's the concern I have with respect to 23(e) and the exchange between the Minister of Infrastructure and the Member for Calgary-Cross.

THE SPEAKER: This question that the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo raises is an interesting one in light of earlier questions that were raised this afternoon during the question period. Not only are the estimates of the hon. Minister of Infrastructure up tonight, but if one looks at the Routine for the day, for days 10 and 11, at 8 p.m. in subcommittee A, in the Assembly, are the estimates of Executive Council. The leader of Executive Council was the individual in this Assembly to whom most of the questions were directed during the question period. It would strike me from the position of the chair that if I were to follow the advice I'm being provided now or the clarification requested now by the Member for Calgary-Buffalo with respect to the questions raised by the hon. Member for Calgary-Cross, then the chair might have taken the same kind of liberty in terms of ruling out all questions to the leader of Executive Council. Now, a number of those questions had to do with costs, information that's being issued by the Public Affairs Bureau and other agencies, and clearly, quite clearly, the leader and the minister responsible is the Premier of the province of Alberta.

So once again I wish to requote myself, "Methinks thou doth protest too much," and give credit to William Shakespeare. There's no point of order.

Speaker's Ruling Privilege

THE SPEAKER: There is one additional point today. Yesterday at the conclusion of question period and after the chair provided his ruling to the House regarding the Official Opposition House Leader's purported point of privilege, the hon. Government House Leader raised a point of order about the propriety of certain comments made by the Opposition House Leader in giving notice of and arguing a question of privilege. Frankly, the chair is of the opinion that the ruling given yesterday ended the matter, but the chair undertook to review Hansard and address the issue.

Essentially, the Government House Leader and the Deputy Government House Leader rose to demand an apology from the Official Opposition House Leader for comments that the Official Opposition House Leader made last Thursday, March 2, 2000, in giving notice about the purported question of privilege, concerning an assault that allegedly occurred in the press conference room at the technical briefing session for the media. At page 229 of Hansard for that day the Opposition House Leader stated: "a young woman, an employee of the government – and I think it serves little purpose to embarrass the individual woman." The Opposition House Leader did not identify the person in question by name and did not pursue the alleged assault when he made his submissions on the question of privilege on Monday. He never retracted them either. So in one sense it appears that we have a dispute about facts between members, in which the chair is not going to intervene.

To reiterate, the chair's view is that this matter was concluded yesterday when the ruling was given. The chair would remind members of the principles in Beauchesne at paragraph 493(4) and to exercise great care in making statements in the House about persons outside of the Assembly who are not able to respond. In the chair's view this matter is now concluded.

head: Orders of the Day

head: Written Questions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Proper notice having been given yesterday, it's my pleasure to move that written questions appearing on today's Order Paper stand and retain their places with the exception of written questions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6.

[Motion carried]

Highway Maintenance Costs

Q1. Dr. Nicol moved on behalf of Mrs. Soetaert that the following question be accepted.

How much did the former department of transportation and utilities spend in fiscal years 1990-91, 1991-92, 1992-93, 1993-94, and 1998-99 for work conducted by the department on primary highway maintenance with respect to direct operating and contract costs and supervision, inspection, and audit in the summer months, April to October, and winter months, November to March?

MR. STELMACH: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to accept Written Question 1.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East to close the debate.

DR. NICOL: On behalf of the Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert I'd like to thank the minister. This concurs with her discussion with me that the minister was quite open and willing to provide the information that she needed.

[Written Question 1 carried]

3:10

Forest Fire Fighters

Q2. Mr. White moved that the following question be accepted.

How many Alberta Environment staff and how many individuals on contract were available to fight forest fires on April 1, July 1, and October 1, 1999, and what were the equivalent numbers for the same dates in 1998?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, I accept Written Question 2.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder to close the debate.

MR. WHITE: Mr. Speaker, I will close debate on this matter. Thank you, sir.

[Written Question 2 carried]

Forest Fire Base Resources

Q3. Mr. White moved that the following question be accepted.

What base resources were available to fight forest fires in Alberta at the beginning of the 1992, 1993, 1998, and 1999 fire seasons, including the number and type of air tankers, the number and type of helicopters, and the number and size of wildland firefighting units?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, I accept Written Question 3.

[Written Question 3 carried]

Conservation Officers

Q4. Mr. Gibbons moved on behalf of Ms Carlson that the following question be accepted.

How many fish and wildlife officers and how many park rangers were employed by Alberta Environment on April 1 in 1992 and 1998, and how many conservation officers were employed on April 1, 1999, to carry out the duties previously performed by fish and wildlife officers and park rangers?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to accept Written Question 4.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning to close the debate.

MR. GIBBONS: I rise to close the debate.

[Written Question 4 carried]

Forest Management Staffing Levels

Q5. Mr. White moved that the following question be accepted.

During the calendar year 1999 how many full-time equivalent staff were employed in the entire land and forest service and specifically how many were employed in the forest management division and in the forestry regional and area offices, what was the total area of allocated Crown land held under forest management agreements and other forms of tenure on which forest management operations had to be supervised, and how many full-time equivalent staff were involved in monitoring in the field?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, I accept Written Question 5.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder to close the debate.

MR. WHITE: Yes, sir. This is the third in a series of questions that I put to the minister with regards to forest management of the fires in 1998 and 1999. I'm pleased with the response. These are the same questions that were asked numerous times of the previous minister, without response. This minister has seen fit to answer these simple and direct questions, that at least in part fall from many hours of debate here. We thank you, sir.

[Written Question 5 carried]

Forestry Staffing Levels

Q6. Mr. White moved that the following question be accepted.

How many forest officers with the working title or classification of forest officer, forester, agrologist, or manager in land and forest service were employed by then Alberta environmental protection on April 1, 1999?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to accept Written Question 6.

[Written Question 6 carried]

head: Motions for Returns

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Proper notice having been given yesterday, it is my pleasure to move that motions for returns appearing on today's Order Paper stand and retain their places with the exception of motions for returns 5, 6, 7, and 9.

[Motion carried]

Lloydminster Biprovincial Upgrader

M5. Mr. White moved that an order of the Assembly do issue for a return showing copies of all studies and reports prepared by or for the Department of Resource Development between May 25, 1999, and February 17, 2000, providing the yearly projection of upside interest accruing to the province from the operations of the Lloydminster biprovincial upgrader for the period 2000-2014 as specified under the upside interest agreement of February 7, 1995, between the government and CIC (Crown Investment Corporation) Industrial Interests Inc.

DR. WEST: I'm pleased to accept that motion, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder to close the debate.

MR. WHITE: Yes, sir. It's a pleasure to receive this kind of information. We haven't asked for this information before, although it is an investment in the province of Alberta. We thank you for the filing, sir.

[Motion carried]

Energy and Utilities Board

M6. Mr. White moved that an order of the Assembly do issue for a return showing copies of all studies and reports prepared by or for the Department of Resource Development between May 25, 1999, and February 17, 2000, evaluating the human resources requirements and funding framework for the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board, AEUB.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Resource Development.

DR. WEST: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I'm afraid I have to reject this motion for a return. Some of the recommendations from the phase 1 report are being implemented while others are still being considered, so it's impossible to give the complete answer for this motion. The other is on the human resources requirements. Currently they are being developed for the 2000-2003 business plan, and they are not complete as of this date. It would be redundant to try to file a partial answer to this motion. All I can suggest is that if the member wants to try to speculate on partial answers, he would have to submit a motion.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder to close the debate.

MR. WHITE: Thank you, sir. I rise to close debate and to make comments on the lack of forthcoming information. Some time ago this minister, when he became the minister of then energy, chose to restrict and actually move down the number of FTEs in the EUB, to the detriment of the management of that organization and to the management of the human resources there. The esprit de corps that the organization had was at least in part hurt. This information, if it were forthcoming even on a partial basis, would have proved this member's allegation that the slash-and-burn attitude at the time was so detrimental in all areas of government, particularly this area of government. If you refer to the members of the public that happened to be employed in this particular area of oil and gas, they found that it was exceedingly difficult to deal with an organization that was under such stress to turn out the approvals and the applications that they had to do at the time. It's a shame that the minister won't come clean and admit the error through this filing, sir.

Thank you.

[Motion for a Return 6 lost]

Gasoline Fuel Consumption Reports

M7. Mr. Gibbons moved that an order of the Assembly do issue for a return showing copies of reports prepared by Kent Marketing for the Department of Infrastructure on gasoline fuel consumption in Alberta for the period January 1, 1999, to February 17, 2000.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

MR. STELMACH: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to recommend that this Assembly reject Motion for a Return 7 as presented. I'm recommending that this motion be rejected because Alberta Infrastructure has never contracted with Kent Marketing to undertake an analysis of gasoline fuel consumption. Further, we have checked the records of both the former ministries of transportation and utilities and also public works, and we still have no such reports being prepared by Kent Marketing. No reports actually exist.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning to conclude the debate.

MR. GIBBONS: I asked this question at a previous time, and there was no such answer given back to us, that there was no such item. I did ask the question: why isn't this government using fuel tax consumption numbers contained in the Kent survey? The answers I got back before never alluded to that.

Seeing that this is a form of a grant and only to Edmonton and Calgary but not the Edmonton capital region, is the minister willing to expand this particular grant to other areas of the province like Airdrie, Camrose, Drayton Valley, Drumheller, Edson, Fort McMurray, Grande Prairie, Hinton, Leduc, Lethbridge, Medicine Hat, Red Deer, Wetaskiwin, Bonnyville, Brooks, Canmore, Claresholm, Cold Lake, Coleman, Fort Saskatchewan, Ponoka, Stony Plain, Taber, Vegreville, Wainwright, and Cochrane? You know, I could stand here all day. Why is it this particular area? Why aren't they looking at these other parts of the province? Expansion to these other areas would probably show a little more what has actually happened in the last few months based on the level of funding: about $60 per capita to the rest of the province and $25 per capita based on other funding.

You know, I question the negative on this particular item, and maybe we'll carry it on tonight in Infrastructure. Thank you.

3:20 Electricity Supply Task Force

M9. Mr. White moved that an order of the Assembly do issue for a return showing copies of all studies and reports prepared by or for the Electricity Supply Task Force or submitted to the Electricity Supply Task Force between June 2, 1999, and February 17, 2000.

DR. WEST: Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to accept this motion for a return.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder to conclude the debate.

MR. WHITE: Yes, sir. It's with great pleasure and shock, I might say, that I receive – this member has been asking for reports on electrical energy supply and generation. Gee, I'm almost speechless but not quite. I'll be pleased to study the information and return with further questions at the appropriate time.

Thank you.

[Motion for a Return 9 carried] head: Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders

head: Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

THE CHAIRMAN: I'd call the committee to order. This afternoon we deal with private members' public bills.

Bill 202
Marriage Amendment Act, 2000

THE CHAIRMAN: We are debating an amendment to this bill, amendment A1, as moved by the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo. The hon. Member for Red Deer-South on the amendment.

MR. DOERKSEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. To continue from where I left off yesterday on the amendment, I wanted to just remind the House of the points I made in those comments yesterday. One was to do with the question of jurisdiction. Yesterday I pointed out that under section 92(12) of the Charter solemnization of marriage is in fact clearly a provincial jurisdiction, and I would note that in my review of the legislation in the various provinces like Quebec and British Columbia, they all have acts pertaining to the solemnization of marriage. They all have rules with respect to ages at which people can get married and the kinds of consent and who can solemnize marriage. So, again, the act before us is clearly within the provincial jurisdiction and quite appropriate. I wanted to just make sure that I spoke to that point, that that question was clear, the question of jurisdiction.

The second point I raised yesterday was the question on the use of the notwithstanding clause and whether it's appropriate in a form such as that. In that debate yesterday I'd referred to a quotation by Allan Blakeney, who was the Premier of Saskatchewan at the time the notwithstanding clause was introduced and accepted, and I'll truncate the quote today:

This is fully consistent with the sort of argument we have put forward that we need to balance the protection of rights with the existence of our institutions which have served us so well for so many centuries.

I made the point yesterday and again today that the institution of marriage is one of those that I think is fundamentally important to our society. We have made that clear in the preamble to the bill, that it deserves the protection, the commitment by the use of the notwithstanding clause to ensure that we declare today and when this bill is passed at third reading that in fact in Alberta we intend for that to be so.

In closing my debate on the amendment, Mr. Chairman, I also want to remind the Legislature again that the act as we have presented it in the Legislature today is in fact consistent with government policy with respect to this issue. I know that doesn't bind the members of the opposition. The government had indicated that this was their policy, so I'd just remind them of that, because I raised that issue in my debate at second reading.

Also, just as of note, Mr. Chairman, yesterday in the state of California they had a proposition called Proposition 22, which put out very similar comments to the people of California. Their proposition was only 14 words long. It says: "Only marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California." That proposition was affirmed by a little better than a 61 percent margin. Over 4 million people voted in favour of that, and 2 million and such did not.

So, again, Mr. Chairman, the institution of marriage is something that is very important in our society, very important to the religious traditions, very important in our legal history and philosophical traditions. I think, with respect to our Legislatures, that we need to assert, by declaring ourselves with the use of the notwithstanding clause, that that is not something we are going to play with in the future.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I would encourage all members of the Assembly to defeat the amendment.

[Two members rose]

THE CHAIRMAN: I did have an indication, hon. member, that the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo had wished to speak next. It's usually back and forth, hon. minister.

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Chairman, since I've already had one kick at it, I wonder if I might decline in favour of my colleague from Edmonton-Centre.

THE CHAIRMAN: Regardless of whoever it is, should there be someone on the opposition side who wishes to speak to it, then it would go to them.

Member for Edmonton-Centre, would you like to begin?

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for allowing me to speak in support of the amendment put forward by my colleague from Calgary-Buffalo. Specifically, the amendment is to delete section 5 of the bill; in other words, to remove the provision to use the notwithstanding clause.

I am certainly willing and supportive of recognizing the importance to many of the solemnity of marriage. A number of my colleagues have spoken to this before. I've spoken to it before. I don't think anyone disputes that, but I absolutely cannot accept using the notwithstanding clause against a specific group of people in this country. It is totally unacceptable to me.

We have a jurisdictional question, and I recognize that the Member for Red Deer-South just tried to speak to that, but I think there is a jurisdictional question here. The issue of marriage and certainly dissolution of marriage is federal. The provincial jurisdiction is for the civil ceremonies and licensing; in other words, the solemnization. For many, many people the sanctity of marriage is involved in their faith communities and the importance of their union being recognized by family and friends.

Nobody is disputing that, but to use the notwithstanding clause against a specific group of people is really wrong, in my opinion. The amount that the state should intervene in people's lives and the choices in their lives, intruding on their individual rights, should only happen in the most extreme of circumstances. Many of those, I think, are already set out and recognized in the Constitution and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. For instance, a limitation upon freedom: if in fact you have been accused and found guilty in a court of law of some crime against society, then there is a reason that there's a limitation put on your freedom. But only in the most extreme circumstances in order to uphold peace, order, and good government. As important as marriage is to many, to most in this province, in this country, it is not something that needs to be protected in this manner.

I think the notwithstanding clause should only be used in very specific circumstances, not as a sort of blanket, global: if anything anywhere close to this issue comes up, then we'll snap it into place. I think I could even say that in sovereignty-threatening circumstances would the notwithstanding clause be reasonable to use. As I've said before, many here in Alberta felt very strongly that the province of Quebec was totally out of order to use the notwithstanding clause to entrench French language rights on their signs in Bill 101. When they put that in place, people in Alberta disagreed dramatically with that. So why would we now turn around and say that it's okay to throw this wide blanket of using the notwithstanding clause on a very specific group of people in Alberta? It is unacceptable to me.

So speaking certainly on my behalf and on behalf of many of those who live in Edmonton-Centre who have corresponded with me on this issue, I am very much in favour of the amendment put forward by the Member for Calgary-Buffalo and very much against having the notwithstanding clause included in this Bill 202. It's far beyond the powers that the state should be levying or restricting on individuals.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak in favour of the amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul.

MR. LANGEVIN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for giving me the opportunity to speak to Bill 202 this afternoon. I'd like to commend the hon. Member for Red Deer-South for bringing this bill forward, and I'm speaking on the amendment to the bill.

The intent of Bill 202 is to ensure that the institution of marriage is maintained in Alberta as a foundation of families, society, long-lasting legal and religious traditions, and as reflecting biological and social realities of heterosexual couples' unique ability to procreate. The bill also protects the institution of marriage from challenge under the Charter.

The conventional marriage of man and woman has proven the best model for society's advancement and the raising of children in a loving family. Marriage is unique in that it expresses a lifelong commitment to mutual care and the raising of children. There has to be a distinction between marriage and other kinds of relationships. Wherever possible, children are best off when raised by their natural parents. A father and a mother need to have an equivalent role. However, recognizing equivalent parenting does not mean that they play the same role. Men and women are biologically different, and children are best served by having the benefit of both male and female parents.

A survey, Mr. Chairman, held in 1998, undertaken by Feedback Research Corporation, found that 92 percent of Canadians surveyed rated the family as being very important in their lives; 78 percent agreed that children need both a father and a mother in the home in order to grow up happily, and that's up from 66 percent in 1991. Correspondingly, only 12 percent – and I repeat: only 12 percent – feel that the institution of marriage is outdated. This is proof that there is great support for the traditional family in Canada.

Studies show the negative effects of the dissolution of marriage and the family. Three-quarters of all women applying for welfare benefits do so because of a disruptive marriage or live-in relationship. Divorce reduces the income of families with children by an average of 42 percent. Married couples in their mid-50s amass four times the wealth of divorced individuals, and children in step-families and single-parent families are almost three times more likely to drop out of school than children in intact families.

Scientific research shows that there is a strong correlation between marriage and the well-being of both the adults and the children. In general, married people experience better physical and mental health. It is believed that this is because marriage provides a genuine emotional and physical protection from the vast number of pressures associated with day-to-day living.

Social science also shows the benefit of marriage on children: having both a mother and a father. Canada faces no social problem more urgent and important than the strengthening of the family, reducing the number of births outside marriage, and cutting the rate of divorce. In a society that fully values and celebrates marriage, claims that equal respect should be granted to marriage as to nonmarried relationships would appear almost incomprehensible. How could anyone compare the social importance of a lifelong commitment to mutual care and the raising of children to an impermanent, or temporary, sexual attachment?

Our laws used to insist that marriage is the only basis of legal couplehood. In 1999 MPs in the House of Commons voted on a motion brought by the Reform Party declaring that the only legal marriage involved a man and a woman. Justice Minister Anne McLellan was quoted in the Edmonton Journal as saying that marriage is a union between one man and one woman and that her party agreed that the institution of marriage is central, an important institution to the lives of many Canadians. Indeed, worldwide it plays an important part in all societies. The Reform motion was urging the House to state that marriage is and should remain the union of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others. The Liberals amended the motion to specifically say that it referred only to the areas of marriage covered by Parliament and not those under provincial control. The motion was passed.

In Alberta in a government news release in 1999 the government outlined its policy with respect to the use of the notwithstanding clause. This was a policy established following the Supreme Court decision of the Vriend case. With respect to marriage it said: the federal law presently allows for marriage only between man and woman; the Alberta government supports the status quo and would oppose any legal challenge to the law including, if available, the use of the notwithstanding clause.

Among enormous literature devoted to research on the benefit of marriage, one of the most consistent findings is that, compared to their unmarried counterparts, men and women do markedly better in all measures of specific and general well-being when they are married. In general, married couples are happier physically and mentally. They live longer and enjoy a more fulfilling life and have a tendency to take better care of themselves and others. Research shows that these tendencies are consistent over the decades.

Madam Chairman, marriage not only benefits the married couple but also the children that are created. Also, there is a great influence that reaches children living nearby as young people seek out role models. The best chance for having a successful, strong marriage is to grow up in a family with a strong marriage as its foundation. This does not mean that people in divorced families or single homes are unable to achieve their own strong family, simply that it is more difficult, since their role models do not reflect a two-parent, father and mother, family on a daily basis. I think that it's very important, to protect that family unit, that we defeat this motion.

I have elaborated on the value of marriage both for the married couple and, very importantly, for the children. I believe that we have to protect that institution of marriage, and it is very important that we use the tools to do so. One of the tools is the notwithstanding clause. Bill 202 invokes the notwithstanding clause of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in order to protect the institution of marriage from court challenges under the Charter. The notwithstanding clause of the Charter can be invoked to allow an act or provision within an act to remain valid even though it would otherwise be a breach of the rights and freedoms guaranteed under section 2 of the Charter. The notwithstanding clause of the Constitution, clause 33, can be used in relation to an act or a provision within an act.

The intent behind including section 33 of the Charter, as indicated by our former Premier of this province, Peter Lougheed, was to ensure the supremacy of the Legislature over the courts and ensure that public policy was being dictated by elected officials and not by nonelected judges. In Alberta Hansard of November 21, 1983, Peter Lougheed stated that the notwithstanding clause would be used when major matters of public policy were being determined by the courts as a result of an interpretation of the Charter. It was the view of those of us who expressed that position, which ultimately prevailed in the constitutional negotiations, that it should be the legislators and not the courts that should determine these matters.

Bill 202 is a correct application of section 33 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms because it fulfills the original intent of the inclusion of the notwithstanding clause within our Charter. Again, this intent was to ensure that when major matters of public policy are being interpreted by the courts as a result of the Charter, the legislative supremacy of elected representatives would determine that these matters are not judicial reviews.

The argument that marriage is solely a federal jurisdiction is weak at best. Federal statutes govern divorce proceedings far more than marriage. The Marriage Act simply prohibits marriage on the basis of the parties being related by blood or adoptive family relations. Provincial statutes govern the solemnization of marriage, are considerably more comprehensive, including provisions for obtaining a licence to marry, a licence to perform a marriage, age restriction, and more importantly, provisions for declaring a marriage unlawful, and penalties for unlawfully performing a marriage or making false statements in order to marry. Provincial statutes governing the solemnization of marriage are therefore more appropriate amendments to include the provision outlined in Bill 202.

Bill 202 provides a definition of marriage identical to that already contained in the Quebec provincial statutes. In addition, given that the licensing of marriage is under the jurisdiction of the provincial government, restrictions regarding eligibility to marry are a provincial jurisdiction also, based on the Layland case, that went before the Ontario Provincial Court. This is not a breach of individual rights, because no one is restricted from marrying. The restriction is that an individual must marry someone of the opposite sex. Invoking the notwithstanding clause on this basis sends a clear message to the court system that while legislators respect the individual rights and freedoms to the highest degree, any move to change the definition of marriage would be a mistaken interpretation of the intent of the Legislature and the Charter. There is no breach of right when marriage is universally available within the context of a defined term.

Madam Chairman, I urge all members of this House to defeat this motion so that we can include the use of the notwithstanding clause in Bill 202 and we can go for the protection of marriage.

Thank you, Madam Chairman.

MR. DICKSON: Madam Chairman, just a couple of observations I wanted to make before we get to a vote on the amendment. I expect that our friend for Cypress-Medicine Hat has some observations to make too.

You know, I want to start off by complimenting Red Deer-South, the sponsor of the bill, because in reviewing the Hansard, you know, I think he's tried very hard in terms of addressing the kinds of questions, issues, objections that have come up. I respect the amount of effort on his part to address in a meaningful, thoughtful way the concerns that have been raised. Now, I haven't been persuaded, but it's not for lack of effort or trying on the part of our friend from Red Deer-South.

The observation I'd want to make, Madam Chairman, is this. Why would we want to start using section 33 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in a prophylactic way? I mean, where do we stop putting this in bills? Why wouldn't we start tucking section 33, a little notwithstanding clause, in a host of legislation in all kinds of different areas? We could stick it in Bill 11. We could just put it right in there. It might require a little longer editorial comment by the Minister of Health and Wellness, but we could put in a little notwithstanding clause in Bill 11.

You know, there are lots of places we could put it in, but it would be wholly inappropriate. If there's one thing that I expect Allan Blakeney would agree with if he were here – the former Premier of Saskatchewan would say: "Hey, this is a howitzer; this is a big piece of equipment. You don't bring it out and use it unless and until you see the whites of their eyes. You don't bring it out until you absolutely have to." You don't simply go and tuck it in the back of a statute because it's kind of a nice thing and it establishes a little symmetry.

So, Madam Chairman, I've got a concern. I've got a concern with the way the thing is being brought forward. You know, the sponsor from Red Deer-South has suggested that this is a little bit like going down the aisle with your spouse-to-be, going in front of the minister and saying, "Yes, I believe in the importance of marriage and its use for society and the benefit, but I really don't want to make my vows today because I want to keep my options open."

What this member would do is have the mother-in-law with the shotgun walking down the aisle with the groom-to-be and the bride-to-be because he doesn't have enough confidence in the two people making their marriage vows. He wants that protection in the back. He wants that little measure of security. Well, Madam Chairman, I don't think we need the shotgun and the mother-in-law walking the bride down the aisle. I think we can trust in the bride and the groom. I think we can trust the groom to get down the aisle without being prodded by the 12-gauge in the ribs.

So, Madam Chairman, I love the imagery invoked by our friend for Red Deer-South in sponsoring the bill, but to me it demonstrates why we don't need section 5. I'd just ask members to consider for a moment that if we take out section 5, we've still achieved what the Member for Red Deer-South wants to achieve, which every member that I've heard in the Liberal caucus says: we support the sanctity of marriage; we don't want to redefine spouse. If and when a court of competent jurisdiction does what the Member for Red Deer-South seems to apprehend is just over the horizon, then it's perfectly appropriate for a sovereign Legislature to consider bringing the howitzer out of the armory, rolling it out onto the battlefield, and seeing whether we have to use it then.

In the meantime, let's just keep it sheathed. Let's just keep it tucked away in the back. If we bring it out for this bill, then somebody's going to say: well, we're going to do it for this; we've got some kind of a new language bill or we've got some wrinkle in public education or we've got some change over here in a different area. Let's leave section 33 for that extraordinary case where there's absolutely no alternative but to use that, where there's an absolute, clear, unambiguous collision between the interests of a Legislature and the interpretation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the equality provision by a court of competent jurisdiction. If and when we get to that impasse, that conflict, that is an appropriate time – I may still not agree with the use of it – to bring it out.

Madam Chairman, I just wanted to make one other point, and very quickly it is this. This is not the only way to make Alberta legislation Charter-proof. This is the lousiest way. This is the easiest and simplest, but it's the most unfair way of making our legislation Charter-proof. The Liberal opposition in government bills, even though we're dealing with private members' business, can surely reference the model – we'll call it the Liberal model – to recognize a domestic partnership. When we put that forward on Bill 12 last spring and when we put it forward last fall on the Insurance Act, we said that this is a model that with minimal adaptation can make Alberta legislation Charter-proof. The response was a resounding, a thundering silence. It was a deafening no. The government didn't want to go down that road. So we gave government a way to make our legislation Charter-proof. Even Ian McClelland, a Reform Member of Parliament in Edmonton, has got a notion which is not unlike this, not as good a model as I think we've got, with respect to Mr. McClelland, but it shows that there are lots of people right across the political spectrum who are looking for ways to make legislation Charter-proof.

Madam Chairman, I'll just wind up by saying that it's not that section 33 is the sole means of avoiding a court challenge. The other way is to craft your legislation so you provide equality of rights, benefits, privileges, and opportunities. If you do that, there is no reason under the sun why a court has to go and challenge the view of many of us in terms of what spouse should be or what marriage should be. It takes a little more work, I grant you that. You can't tuck it into a few words like section 5, which is at issue here. But we're doing a heck of a lot better job, with respect, because we succeed in protecting spouse, we protect the word marriage, and we provide equal treatment.

What this amendment would do is allow the government to protect spouse and marriage but not provide equal treatment, because that's the effect of this bill as it currently stands. I haven't heard members saying that there shouldn't be equal treatment. If you believe that, if you believe there should be equal treatment for everybody in the province and you want to protect spouse and marriage, there is really no alternative but to support this amendment. The second thing is let's talk about taking that Liberal model for recognizing domestic partnerships. If we do that, we've solved everybody's problem, Madam Chairman. We've solved everybody's problem. There may be some members not persuaded.

Those are the observations I wanted to make. I respect the sincerity of the sponsor of the bill, and I respect his sincerity in attempting to respond to some of the issues that have been raised. We may agree to disagree, but it's not fair to turn the debate into a labeling kind of exercise because I think that does a disservice to everybody involved in the debate.

Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. Minister of Innovation and Science.

DR. TAYLOR: Yes. Thank you, Madam Chairman. I wish to rise to speak against the amendment. When we look at what's happening in our society right now with judges constantly overruling legislation and legislators and Legislatures, then I think we have to protect something that is fundamental to our society. In fact, even former Premier Lougheed indicated that the purpose of section 33 was very clearly to ensure that public policy was dictated by elected officials, not by unelected judges. This is what seems to happen consistently in our society today, that nonelected judges overrule provincial Legislatures and the policies that those provincial Legislatures establish. So it is absolutely necessary that we have the notwithstanding clause as part of this bill.

In fact, when we look at what's happening with this bill and what's happening in the general judicial process, it is very clear why we should have some public participation in the selection of judges. The provinces need to be involved in the selection of the Supreme Court. The federal government should be pulling the provinces to the table and saying: you become involved with us in the selection of Supreme Court justices.

In fact, we can look to Alberta as a fine example of that. We have a very open and public process that the former Minister of Justice brought forward and was approved to select judges in Alberta. It's a process in which we have a public committee made up of good-thinking, sensible Albertans to review the judicial applications and then make recommendations to the Justice minister and to the cabinet as a whole.

I think that if we can urge the federal government to start taking a look at involving the public in the process, then we may at some future date not need this notwithstanding part of our legislation, but as long as we have nonelected judges overruling laws made by elected officials, then we need the notwithstanding.

In fact, in my constituency many of my constituents are just kind of discouraged, disgusted with this whole judicial process. A number of my constituents are coming forward and saying: "We should be electing our judges. If we don't like what you do as our member, we can fire you at the next election. You are responsible to us." Many of my constituents, including some who are lawyers, some from the legal profession, will say to me, "If we have a situation, as happens, when we do not agree or approve of a decision made by a nonelected judge, what comeback do we have?" Quite frankly, there is no comeback. The public of Alberta and the public of Canada have no comeback on a decision made by a nonelected judge. So many of my constituents are arguing and will continue to argue for elected judges because in that sense there is responsibility to the population.

So I just want to encourage all members to reject this amendment and support the total concept of the bill, which includes notwithstanding.

Bill 205
Emblems of Alberta (Alberta Dress Tartan)
Amendment Act, 2000

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

MR. STEVENS: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's truly with great pleasure that I rise this afternoon to open debate on Bill 205, the Emblems of Alberta (Alberta Dress Tartan) Amendment Act, 2000. If passed, Alberta will adopt a dress tartan that would complement the existing Alberta tartan as one of Alberta's official provincial symbols.

At this time, Madam Speaker, I would like to table the appropriate number of copies of both the existing Alberta tartan and the proposed Alberta dress tartan. I believe that the pages have previously provided to all members copies of the tablings.

I know members would agree with me that symbols are important in both our public as well as our private lives. Symbols represent our identity and how we understand each other and each other's values now and in history. As such, they are not simply reminders of the past. They are dynamic ideas that can inspire our imaginations with pride and guide us in how we continue to face the challenges of the present and the future.

Some may ask: why another tartan as a symbol for Alberta? How may a tartan, which is usually recognized as an expression of Scottish culture, be representative for all Albertans given the reality of our multicultural society? The answer to these questions is that an official tartan pays tribute to the many and varied contributions of Canadians of Scottish ancestry to Alberta and to Canada. Given the dynamic nature of the tartan itself, it can also form part of a meaningful heritage to those of us, myself included, who are not of Scottish ancestry. I might add, however, that my understanding of my lineage is incomplete, and I do note that my maternal grandfather was born near Carlisle, England, which is just south of the Scottish border, long after Hadrian's Wall proved ineffective.

Tartans are an ancient form of dress used by the Scottish Highlanders and were likely first recorded in history by Julius Caesar in France, where he first observed Celtic tribes. Consisting of a repeated checkered pattern of threads, a tartan was and is worn by members of Scottish clans for purposes of identification with both the clan and the clan's territory.

The tartan kilt, a pun or play on the word Celt, while looking like a type of skirt is actually a descendant of the earlier battle garb that was worn by Roman soldiers. The tartan can also be worn in the form of a dress, a sash, a scarf, or a tie, like the Alberta tartan I'm wearing. It's interesting to note that at one time the tie was simply a large bandage that crusaders wore around their necks to be prepared for any eventuality of being wounded.

There are different types of tartans that are used for different purposes. Dull-coloured hunting tartans were developed by clans to make them look less conspicuous. Mourning tartans are predominantly dark in colour and worn at all sad occasions. In contrast, dress tartans are designed by altering one of the background colours of the formal set to white. Kilts made of this pattern are usually worn for dancing, special celebrations, or as formal attire.

Apart from the familiar clan tartans, there are district tartans which identify a person's residence in a certain district, whether that person belongs to the dominant clan or not. There are many precedents in Scottish history and culture that show how people who are not related to clans by blood or ancestry can be identified with either clan or territory and may, as a result, wear the tartans associated with them quite meaningfully. Smaller clans which did not have their own tartans often sought refuge and protection under greater clans and were adopted by them.

Scots who came from the Lowlands or who were otherwise not entitled to a tartan of their own could always wear one of the universal tartans, including the Black Watch, the Jacobite, or the Caledonia tartan. It's perfectly legitimate for a subject of the Queen, for example, to wear the Royal Stuart tartan regardless of his or her cultural background. Since this is the Queen's own tartan, the wearing of such is a demonstration of loyalty to the Crown or to the royal Stuart line.

Both the Alberta tartan and the proposed Alberta dress tartan are distinct tartans. They represent not the cultural or other ancestry of the people but the district or territory itself and those who reside within it, regardless of their background. Since the Alberta tartan reflects territorial loyalties, it is as legitimate for an Albertan of Scottish background to wear the tartan as it would be for an Albertan of French, Ukrainian, German, or Italian background to wear it as well.

The Alberta tartan pays tribute to Canada's Scottish heritage and the impact of Scottish culture on our history and development as a nation. In fact, the tartan has always been numbered among Canada's official symbols, beginning with Nova Scotia, which received its armorial bearings from King Charles I. Canada's coats of arms have always contained Scottish symbols like the unicorn, the thistle, and others. The tartan is there for an historic 350-year-old Canadian symbol that belongs by right to the common heritage of all citizens of Canada.

The direct impact of Scottish culture on Canada has been and continues to be significant. Sir John A. Macdonald and other Fathers of Canadian Confederation, who laid down the legal and legislative basis for the new nation of Canada, were Scots. Our history, culture, laws, and government have all benefited positively by the impact of Scottish people. This is a heritage of which all Albertans of all cultural backgrounds can be justifiably proud. It's a heritage that contributed greatly to the development of Canada's modern multicultural society, defined by the values of tolerance, understanding, and mutual appreciation for our cultural distinctiveness.

It was this heritage that helped lay the foundations for our province's growth and stability, foundations upon which we are all privileged to continue to build upon. In paying tribute to our Scottish heritage, we are thereby also paying tribute to all others who likewise have made and continue to make significant contributions to the life of our province.

The structure of the proposed Alberta dress tartan, as you can see in the samples provided, is loosely based on the original Alberta tartan. By using the existing pattern and colours found in the Alberta tartan, the Alberta dress tartan adds a field of white-coloured stripes representing Alberta's clean, bright snowy days. The Alberta dress tartan remains true to the original colour scheme that represents the green of our forests, the gold of our wheat fields, the blue of our clear skies and sparkling lakes, the pink of our wild rose, and the black of our coal and petroleum.

The Alberta dress tartan was designed by two of my constituents, Gail Danysk and Ashley Stowkowy, in conjunction with Fiona Hall, a tartan designer with Locharron of Scotland at the Waverley Mill in London. I thank them very much for their beautiful and unique design. I'd also like to thank at this time Jeremy Chorney, researcher, who has provided crucial assistance and many hours to move this idea into bill form.

In fact, the design of the Alberta dress tartan has a lot to do with why this proposal was brought forward to me in the first place. On special occasions Highland dancers often wear an Alberta tartan sash and carry an Alberta tartan banner to represent their province. However, few of them chose the Alberta tartan as the fabric of their kilt or costume as it is an ancient tartan and therefore very dark in colour. Dress tartans on the other hand, which have brighter colours and a white thread block as part of the sett, are popular choices among Highland dancers due to their vibrant aesthetic qualities and formal dress appearance.

As a special project for the new millennium Ms Danysk and Ms Stowkowy came forward with the Alberta dress tartan proposal as representatives of Highland dancers in Alberta. They are seeking the adoption of the Alberta dress tartan, a tartan for a new century, which will give Alberta Highland dancers the opportunity to wear an officially recognized tartan pattern that is suitable to use in their dance costumes. Their request comes at an opportune time since the city of Edmonton is hosting the Canadian interprovincial Highland dancing championships on July 5 to 9, 2000. Should Bill 205 be proclaimed, representatives of Alberta Highland dancers have made a commitment to unveil the Alberta dress tartan during this major event by presenting the Alberta dress tartan to over 700 dancers from across Canada, the United States, and overseas.

It should also be noted that Tartan Day is celebrated annually on April 6 to commemorate the anniversary of Scottish independence in 1320. This Declaration of Arbroath, as it is known, is recognized as one of the earliest expressions of the rights of humanity to a peaceful and productive life free of oppression. The Federation of Scottish Clans encourages the wearing of tartans on this day as a reminder of what can be accomplished by hard work and loyalty, a proud tradition here in Alberta. I'm certain the Alberta dress tartan would be worn proudly next to the Alberta tartan on this occasion as well.

Madam Speaker, allow me to close by saying the fact that one need not be Scottish to meaningfully wear a tartan, that the Alberta dress tartan would in fact belong to all Albertans regardless of their background, is for me the most significant aspect of this symbol. Adopting the Alberta dress tartan would honour, once again, the contributions of one great community in Alberta and in Canada while at the same time allowing all Albertans to adopt it as their own.

Madam Speaker, I would ask that all members of the Assembly support this bill for all Albertans to show pride in their province. Thank you very much.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak on Bill 205, Emblems of Alberta (Alberta Dress Tartan) Amendment Act, 2000. It was interesting that when I first talked to people about this bill and that I was going to be debating it, the question was: well, why would you be spending time on this when there are so many other things that people are so interested in in Alberta right now? But the truth is that we have the process of private members' bills exactly so a private member, that being anyone who's not in the cabinet, can bring forward bills that are of interest to people in their constituency or people involved in groups they're affiliated with. So it's entirely appropriate that the Member for Calgary-Glenmore bring forward this bill, and I note that he was approached by a group in his constituency who were interested in having the brighter dress tartan added as an official emblem in Alberta.

I am a person of Scottish heritage. No surprise to anyone who looks at me. A stout, red-headed woman. Yup, got to be Scottish.

Seven of the eight of my great-grandparents are in fact Scottish, and I took a trip there in the early '90s to explore and find out something about my heritage.

Although we do have a substantial number of Scots who settled in Alberta and certainly contributed to the building of this province, I still felt a little odd, a little out of sorts. There's this Scottish dourness, as people call it, that I think sometimes makes us a little less hearty than we're used to in this province.

It was a wonderful trip for me, and I did go to each of the places where my great-grandparents came from. Of course when you're there, you get interested in the tartans. There are tartans all over the place. Sooner or later you wander in and you start to go through and find out which are your tartans and what your connection is. I'm lucky, I would say, that I was able to go through and actually find affiliations with family or clan tartans.

As the Member for Calgary-Glenmore said, there are a number of variations on the tartans and there are ways for anyone to be able to claim a tartan or to wear a tartan. I find it really interesting that tartans seem to have such a pull on people that those from many different backgrounds and faiths and other countries and cultures want to be able to access a tartan and wear it. It's an interesting anomaly that we see here, that sharing of the culture.

As I say, I did go and look up the various tartans, and because of my ancestors I actually had a couple of different family tartans to choose from. I found it really interesting that there is the formal tartan, which for us is the one we see on the guides here in the Legislature, and I think the member had a tie done in that Alberta tartan. You can have the dress tartan of that formal tartan, and they are meant to be related – they're based on the same concept in the way the blocks are built and the thread counts – also the hunting tartan.

Now, when these first came into existence, obviously your ability to access dyes was less than it is today in the modern age. We're able to have much brighter tartan colours come through – you can even get further away from the idea of a formal dress and a hunting tartan, and a mourning tartan as well was mentioned – when you start looking at whether you're going to have an ancient version of it or a modern version of it, because that of course is going back to what dye colours were available at that time.

I really like the Alberta tartan. I'm very proud of it, and I'm very comfortable with it. There's so much literally woven into tartans about what it all means and the symbolism for everything. The Alberta tartan has green for forests, gold for wheat fields, blue for lakes, pink for the wild roses, and black for coal and petroleum. It pretty much does capture our province, both in what we can see above it and below it, and I think it's a good emblem for us.

So how do we go from those tartans that are individual family tartans to something that's an official tartan for the province of Alberta? Well, it's back to what I was saying earlier, that people are really interested in this and want to be able to find a way to have their own version of it. In fact, we are seeing now that there are things like corporate tartans, where an institution or a company adopts a particular tartan designed for what used to be livery – I don't think we'd see very much of that now – but certainly for use in merchandising.

We also have things like universal tartans, and some of those were mentioned earlier. The Black Watch, for instance, is considered a universal tartan. Again, I have the right, if you want to put it that way – a number of my great- and great-great-uncles were in the Black Watch. It was a family occupation. Another example is the royal tartan, or the Royal Stuart tartan. There are modern ones we see, such as the Scottish National, the Braveheart- Warrior, the Flower of Scotland, and the Pride of Scotland.

We in Alberta in 1961 did choose to have an Alberta tartan, and now in the year 2000 we're looking at adding the dress tartan to that. Earlier I talked about what the colours and the pattern in our tartan symbolize. What we're really adding to the dress tartan is the white, which is entirely appropriate, I think, for this province. Certainly members in the House won't be surprised to know that I am supportive of this because of the snow. If you're going to live in Alberta, you'd better find something to do with the snow or you're going to be a miserable person. I'm a big proponent of winter sports, for example, and I'm sure many others are. So it's nice to see the white colour symbolizing the snow turn up in a dress tartan. As the Member for Calgary-Glenmore did say, the white background does make it a showier tartan to be using when, for instance, we have Highland dance groups in competitions. I think to a certain extent an analogy I could make is that it's the same thing as the home and away jerseys for sports teams.

Tartans can and I think should be registered. I'm assuming that the original Alberta tartan was registered, and I certainly encourage the member to make sure the process is followed to register our dress tartan. You can, in fact, have them copyrighted or patented, but I'm most interested in having it registered. With the advent of the Internet and those people that can get access to it, once again it allows people to find a little piece of Alberta on that worldwide web if they're going to be searching out tartans.

I'll go back to where I started, and that is the Member for Calgary-Glenmore sponsoring this Bill 205 in support of Alberta adopting the dress tartan as an official emblem. I think it's a nice idea, and I'm sure that many people in Alberta, both people living here now and people that will come here in the future, will be proud and pleased to be able to call this tartan their tartan, because anyone in Alberta could indeed do that. I think these two tartans would come under the heading of universal tartans, and I hope it's going to be registered, as I mentioned.

With those few words I am obviously in support of Bill 205 and of the member bringing forward this idea. I think it will benefit all of those in Alberta today and in years to come, and I congratulate him for doing that. It's another nice way for us to celebrate our pride in our province and to develop our own symbols, our own stories if you will, of what we value so much in the province.

So with those few words, Madam Speaker, I will take my seat if any of my colleagues have other comments. Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

MRS. LAING: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to speak in support of Bill 205 this afternoon. Creation of a dress tartan for Alberta is an important step for participants in the art of Highland dancing and will allow them to proudly represent their province when competing across Canada or internationally. Actually, the sort of Olympics for Highland dancing are in England and also in Ireland, and many times young people from our area go there to compete. To have a particular tartan that represents their province is very special to them, to be able to have their own tartan on as they participate with other dancers from around the world. I think this is a very unique and a very interesting idea, and I congratulate the Member for Calgary-Glenmore for bringing it forward.

We do have, as several members ahead of me have said, an existing tartan in place, and this is one of Alberta's many emblems. We're all aware of the wild rose as the national flower and, of course, the Alberta flag. Lesser known emblems are petrified wood as our provincial stone and the great horned owl as the official bird.

Each of these emblems is chosen for their ability to represent our province. Like most tartans the Alberta tartan is very representative of the unique characteristics of the people and the place that it represents. My hon. colleague across the way has certainly explained what all the colours are, so we won't have to do that again.

The dress tartan proposed by Bill 205 keeps with the original colour scheme of the Alberta tartan as well as the significance of these colours while adding a white stripe to make the design more suitable for a dress tartan. Appropriately, the white stripe has a significance as well as representing the bright snow which is so common in our province's winters.

Madam Speaker, tartans have long been synonymous with Scotland and its families and its clans. Given the importance of the Scottish culture in the people shaping Alberta's history, the tartan is an appropriate inclusion among Alberta's provincial emblems. In Calgary, for instance, other than the aboriginal people, the first settlers were Scottish, and today they are still the leading ethnic group in the city of Calgary. So it's very significant, I think, for this province. You've also mentioned Rutherford and other people from this area who represented the Scottish influence on our province. So it's very appropriate, I think, that the tartan is an inclusion among Alberta's provincial emblems.

Historically the tartans were intended to be a decorative style of cloth. They had patterns that were locally popular and relied on a limited range of colour dyes and were made of a local coarser type of wool. This led to the idea of district tartans as an association between the land, the community, and its cloth. Where there was a strong clan within the district, as was often the case in the Highlands, the tartan worn would be of the same pattern. In fact, a man might well be recognized as being of a certain clan from the sight of his tartan. It is this concept of clan tartans that today predominates, but the use of the tartan is yet richer.

We can see this association in the five colours of Alberta's existing tartan, which highlight the province's natural beauty and resources. Donning the Alberta tartan identifies the wearer as being an Albertan, at least among those aware of tartans and especially, for instance, in the Highland dance community. Also, there are today in Calgary and in Canmore, I know, Highland games at the end of summer, and you often see people wearing a sash or a shawl kind of affair around their shoulders as they participate in the different events. I had the pleasure of being at the Braemar Highland games this last September, and it was really exciting to see all the dancers and the pipers and everyone, all of them with different tartans. It was very colourful and certainly very exciting to see.

Madam Speaker, tartans were once forbidden by law, with the exception of the government's Black Watch pattern. This pattern was used by the regiments raised within Scotland and formed the basis of the regimental tartans. By the early 1800s many Scots realized the knowledge of the tartan's importance was being lost, and simultaneously there was a nostalgic movement concerning Scotland's past. This led to institutional and individual efforts to preserve the tartan designs. Tartans were reconstructed from portraits collected on pilgrimages, demanded from clan chiefs, and recovered from the weavers' notes, so they were able to reconstruct them.

The significance of tartans as national dress worn under various circumstances created clan tartans for every name, even those that previously had none, and these were often supplemented by hunting tartans of subdued character and dress tartan, which was brighter. Further variety was added by fashion, fancy, or trade tartans, including various colours of a single pattern and especially the more universal designs used for dancing. It's interesting to note that there were even some mourning tartans developed. So when a person has a death in the family, they put on a particular style of their tartan.

In recent years, Madam Speaker, corporate tartans have become popular, where an institution or a company adopts a tartan designed for livery and use in merchandising. Where no clan tartans exist, new family tartans have been designed. In fact, today it's big business in Scotland. You can go in and have your own family tartan designed, and you can be just like everyone else. So there's a real new wave of tartans over in Britain and of course the export that takes place to places like North America, where there are descendants of early Scottish settlers.

The ownership of a particular tartan is historically a matter of convention. However, in modern times disputes as to its use and production rely on the civil laws of copyright and in rare cases patents or trademarks. Manufacturers often offer a given tartan design in a variety of colour effects called modern, reproduction, ancient, and the like. An ancient and a modern tartan are often the same pattern and should not be confused with the design being considered.

Madam Speaker, Bill 205 recognizes that Alberta's current tartan has served well as a formal symbol of our province, just as the wild rose has represented Alberta as our provincial flower, but it isn't appropriate as a dress tartan. Such a tartan is worn by the members of Alberta's Highland dance community when competing abroad, so often a darker pattern isn't suitable. A dress tartan of another design with brighter colours and a white background is usually chosen instead.

Many of the members of this House may wonder what the difference is between dress and other tartans. Essentially, the brighter designs would be referred to as a dress tartan to distinguish them from the darker tartans of the same name. For example, the Royal Stuart will have a plain red undercheck changed to white in the Stuart dress tartan. This is similar to what Bill 205 proposes, as it changes the forest green undercheck of the Alberta tartan to a white undercheck in the dress pattern.

[Mr. Herard in the chair]

The result of this alteration is similar to the evening dress worn by both men and women, which were known as arisaid setts. The combination of a clan tartan with an arisaid type of design is essentially modern. In fact, some clan chiefs would not formally recognize the dress form of their tartan. Since tartans were originally a functional outdoor cloth, the dress tartans are a product of emerging social patterns, and we see quite a growth in the tartan industry.

Creating an official dress tartan for Alberta would allow Highland dancers from Alberta to demonstrate their pride in our province when competing outside our borders, internationally especially, and the hon. member has spoken about the upcoming world gathering of Highland dancing here in Edmonton this summer. It should be quite an exciting time. Indeed, the brightness of the design may be appealing to other Albertans who are not even aware of or attracted by the existing Alberta tartan. Increased knowledge and use of our provincial emblems will serve to increase Alberta's pride in our province's history and beauty.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Mr. Speaker, Bill 205 signifies a recognition of the importance of the Scottish heritage to our province's history and the importance of Highland dancing in the Scottish tradition. It provides a further source of pride and connection between Albertans of Scottish heritage with our province and its traditions. Bill 205 is a valuable proposal that offers an opportunity to highlight Alberta's official emblem while providing a means for Albertans to celebrate their pride in our province. I urge all members to support Bill 205.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

MR. GIBBONS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud to stand today to talk about Bill 205. Our Canadian and Alberta histories have benefited from the heritage of people from Scottish backgrounds. For the sake of my wife's family, which is named Benwood, I think it's exciting that Bill 205 is being brought forward.

In showing support to my province and in listening to the hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore, I think everyone should support this bill. Creating a provincial tartan is something to be proud of. I am not of Scottish background but of Irish, and I believe that the Irish also had tartan colours. Considering that the Romans wore different sashes, it has a long, long history.

Tartans are a tradition of clans, different symbols of identity to these clans of the past. These versions of the tartan that have been presented to us, one being the dress colours and one being the regular colours, are a nice way of actually illustrating this. Hopefully, like it was mentioned earlier, our Scottish dancers as they compete provincially or abroad will dress in our Alberta colours. This would be a fantastic way of actually standing out.

I must make a call to a past member of this Assembly, a member that represented Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan, my dentist when I was much younger, and see whether or not he will actually follow these colours when he golfs on his own golf course out at Fort-in-View.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I am totally in support of this, and I think it's a good bill to bring forward. Thank you very much.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Stettler.

MRS. GORDON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am very pleased to be able to speak to Bill 205 and to congratulate the hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore on bringing forward this bill. It's indeed an important occasion for us to celebrate the design of this wonderful dress tartan, and the fact that we are discussing it in this Legislature today further signifies the importance. This symbol brings us together, and it's important for people of Scottish descent.

The wearing of the tartan is one of the ways in which people express a sense of loyalty, pride, history, and culture as a people who have worked hard to make a living, raise families, and build communities. In recent years as we have become more and more aware of the necessity of including cultural celebrations in Alberta society, symbols of many other cultures have joined those tartans.

When we think about the kinds of traditions we have, it helps us to remember the history out of which they arose. Indeed, the wearing of the tartan goes back to Roman times at least. Of course, if you talk to people who have done studies of the settlement of Britain, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, they talk about the various ways in which the tartan has significance. The whole way in which it's worn has significance, depending on what your function is at that particular time.

Other members here today have talked about the various tartans. The meaningfulness of the different threads, the way they are woven together, and the way in which they join are all part of the symbolic meaning of the various colours found in tartans, and this can go back to the existing Alberta tartan today, as was mentioned by the last two to three speakers. It brought in everything that is relevant and important to Alberta.

Interestingly enough, Mr. Speaker, the Alberta tartan, the one that was identified on the hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore's tie, came to be because of the hard work and due diligence and commitment of a gentleman who happened to be my constituent. His name was Marwood Swain, and he was the owner/operator of Juniper Emblems and also, along highway 2, what used to be the Juniper restaurant and hotel. Mr. Swain was very, very active in tourism and promoting Alberta and saw the need many, many years ago to incorporate an Alberta tartan and register it. So it was thanks to him that we've enjoyed this tartan all these years.

A tartan pattern emerges out of a single list of coloured threads called a thread count. Reading a tartan requires a little practice and involves finding two unique points within the pattern called the pivots. Tartans consist of broader bands of colour called the undercheck which are often decorated or embellished with narrower lines of colour called the overcheck. Once the basic possibilities are understood, one can better appreciate designs that combine and extend the simple ideas.

The largest group of tartan uses the three-colour design of Black Watch as their basis, and we've heard a lot about Black Watch this afternoon as well as the Royal Stuart group. The Stuart family records its traditional descent from Banquo, thane of Lochaber, who makes an appearance as a character in William Shakespeare's Macbeth. Historically, however, the family appears to be descended from an ancient family in Brittany. They acquired lands in England after the Norman conquest and moved to Scotland when David I ascended to the throne of Scotland. The family were granted extensive estates, and the office of high steward was made hereditary in the family.

With a name like Gordon you can tell that that, too, is Scottish, and the clan Gordon also has a well-recognized tartan. In fact, it is one of my favourites, even if I am a little prejudiced. Our clan's Gaelic name is Gordan, and our motto is "remaining." We also have our own pipe music, the Gordon march. The Gordon clan is a territorial name, and the family who took the name are believed to have been of Anglo-Norman descent, moving from the Borders to Aberdeenshire. The wild boar's head appears on the Gordon arms because, legend says, the first Gordon saved a Scottish king from an attacking boar.

Mr. Speaker, it's very important for people to understand that the creation of a dress tartan which all the citizens of Alberta over time will learn to enjoy is something that will preserve this tradition of Scottish culture while encouraging a more inclusive celebration of its meaning to all Albertans more than before. I certainly hope that now Albertans will have a choice. They can basically decide either to continue using the existing tartan or look to the new dress tartan.

Because the British Empire spread far and wide across the world, it is not unusual in former colonies to see people who do not in their physical appearance resemble Scottish people, showing that their heritage has been adopted right across the world. I found it interesting when Edmonton-Centre said that you could tell that she was of Scottish descent. I didn't know we could – she'll have to explain it to me later – but that was very interesting, hon. member.

It's exciting to think that when we have special occasions in Alberta, it will be possible for us to choose, as I said, from the two different official provincial tartans. And, yes, hon. member, tartans definitely are registered, and these ones I'm sure will be as well.

One thing I would like to mention is that I think it is very important for us to realize how popular tartans are. If you travel to many tourist destination areas, you will often find a Scottish shop, and a number of people go in to look at the various tartans. I know, for instance, that for the clan Gordon there are six registered tartans. Some of them of course are ancient tartans that started with the beginning of time, and some have been updated over the years.

The Scottish tartan and looking at Scottish heritage is very big business across North America as well as Europe. I envy you, hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, that you've had the opportunity to go to Scotland. That is certainly on my list of things I want to do, to visit Scotland, England, and Wales and take a look for myself at where my husband's family were from, the ancestors. I think that would be a wonderful trip, if each of us could enjoy that.

So I want to thank the hon. member and the people he represents for bringing this bill forward. I think it's always delightful when we can stand in this House and together vote for something that's going to improve the quality of life and expand the multiculturalism side, when we can all agree that something here is important and should happen for Albertans. I, too, want to thank Mr. Chorney for his work involved in looking at these tartans.

If people want to see a very, very extensive display of tartans in this province, I suggest that you stop sometime at the Highlander Hotel on 16th Avenue in Calgary. The food is delicious there, and they have a very extensive wall display of all of the registered tartans. It's very, very interesting to see how varied and how different they are.

I will be supporting this bill and look forward to seeing a number of people wearing this tartan as early as July of this year. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: Now with great anticipation I invite the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake to participate in this debate.

MR. DUCHARME: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There has been a lot of discussion in the Legislature today about Scottish culture and celebrating by having Alberta adopt another official provincial tartan, the Alberta dress tartan, as a new tartan for a new century. I'm pleased to support Bill 205 since I'm always pleased to hear about having opportunities to embrace multiculturalism and pride in the province of Alberta.

From a cultural standpoint, especially, the Scottish people and their traditions and customs are as proud as they are colourful. For centuries a woolen cloth called a tartan formed part of the dress of Highland Scots. Tartans were worn in other parts of Scotland as well. However, it was in the Highlands that the patterns developed to the point where they identified the wearer as a member of a particular clan. The tartans that were worn several hundred years ago consisted of simple checks of two or three colours. The shades were obtained from dye-producing plants, roots, berries, and trees in the district where the cloth was woven.

The early form of the Highland dress was the great kilt, a piece of tartan about two metres in width and approximately four to six metres in length. This kilt could be used as a cloak by day or a blanket by night by wrapping it around yourself and fastening it at the waist with a leather belt. After the Scots were defeated in battle by the English in 1746, the British Parliament forbade them to wear tartan. The great revival in the use of tartan came 100 years later and was encouraged by Queen Victoria's interest in Scottish dress.

The chemical dyes which were coming into use by this time allowed weavers to enlarge the range of colors and to introduce more elaborate patterns. The design of the kilt had changed as well with the introduction of the little kilt, consisting of the lower part of the earlier belted version. Today it is universally accepted as the correct form of modern Highland dress.

Although the kilt has been traditionally regarded as male dress, one often sees young girls wearing kilts, especially in Highland dance competitions. However, a pleated skirt is the traditional female attire or for evening wear a tartan skirt of silk or other material with a sash of silk tartan.

Mr. Speaker, in any case, those who wear the tartan and the Highland dress take great pride in the fact that they are helping to preserve traditional Scottish customs, and by the looks of it, the Alberta dress tartan design in front of us would make for an elegant pattern for any dress occasion.

In Scotland since ancient times the tartan has had a strong connection with the clan system. A clan consisted of a group of families who believed they were descended from a common ancestor. They generally lived together in a particular region of Scotland, such as a small valley or an island. Scots liked to think of a clan as a family. The responsibility for raising children was sometimes shared, and arranged marriages within the clan were common. The clan served as a military organization as well as a social organization. Each clan had its own slogan and war cry and carried its own standard and colours. It also had its own military pipe music as well as a distinctive tartan. The chief was responsible for the welfare of his followers. On their part, the clansmen owed their loyalty to the chief. The linking together of all the members of a clan guaranteed their protection from enemies. However, it also meant that they were drawn into the many quarrels that involved their kinsmen.

Although the ancient clan system was breaking down by the 18th century, the Highlanders who immigrated to Canada took elements of it with them. The clan tradition generally assisted the Scots into their new land. Although some of the old quarrels were brought to Canada, they were usually soon forgotten. The clan system served Highlanders well as associations that gave them comfort in a strange new land and helped them to survive.

Mr. Speaker, I'd like to touch on Scottish Canadians for a moment, with respect to how they have become a part of our multicultural tradition. In recent decades the percentage of Scottish Canadians has declined in comparison to Canada's total population. Despite this, Scottish Canadians continue to exert a powerful influence on the nation's affairs. Scots continue to immigrate to Canada, and once here they usually adjust to their home away from home.

Although most people of Scottish descent no longer live in purely Scottish communities, their presence is still highly visible. St. Andrew's, Burns, and Caledonian societies are common from coast to coast. Such groups encourage traditional cultural activities and celebrate Scottish holidays. There also numerous clan societies which sponsor social gatherings and which work to maintain the Scots' pride in their origins.

Scottish traditions in Canada continued throughout the years in various forms. Universities with Scottish ties have pipe bands. Civilian volunteer groups such as the Fraser Highlanders and the Royal Highland Emigrants keep alive the old military traditions. Many Canadian armed forces militia regiments are proud of their Scottish backgrounds. Activities such as Highland Games competitions, golf, curling, Scottish music, and folk dancing are enjoyed by many Canadians, whether or not they are of Scottish ancestry. Many Albertans, indeed, many Canadians enjoy sharing in the festive holidays observed by Scottish tradition, whether it is a part of their family background or not.

St. Andrew's Day, which is celebrated on November 30, honours St. Andrew, Scotland's patron saint. Formerly, it was a religious holiday. Today Scots, particularly those living abroad in Canada and other countries, celebrate it as a patriotic festival. The main feature of the day is the St. Andrew's dinner at which traditional dishes are served, including a singed sheep's head. In addition, toasts are drunk to the glory of Scotland and the honoured memory of their patron saint.

Hogmanay, or Scottish new year, has been celebrated by the Scots since the 16th century. Its name is derived from a French phrase meaning "to the mistletoe, the new year." It was originally celebrated on January 11. Today it takes place on January 1. In the traditional Scottish household the new year is an important date. It was the time for housecleaning, the payment of debts, the returning of borrowed items, the mending of cloths, and the tuning of musical instruments. Most important, it was time for preparation for the coming year and of new hope for the future.

The Scots have carried many of their traditional new year's practices abroad to all the places they have settled. One of these is the practice of first-footing. According to the custom the first person to cross the threshold after midnight is regarded as an omen of the coming year. To ensure good luck, the caller should be a black-haired man, and he should bring a sprig of mistletoe with him. Additional Scottish new year's customs require that whiskey or a special blend of whiskey, ale, and nutmeg be drunk, and that visitors bring bread, salt, and coal to a home. These symbolize, respectively, life, hospitality, and warmth. There is often a noisemaking ceremony at the stroke of midnight, when guests bang on pots and pans, trays and irons, and shout chants in order to stave off evil forces.

Finally, all the guests grasp hands and sing Auld Lang Syne, a practice that has become commonplace throughout North America.

Perhaps the most recognizable celebration to those of us who are not Scottish is Burns night, celebrated with pride on January 25, the anniversary of the poet Robert Burns' birth in 1759. Hundreds of Burns clubs, Scottish societies, and Caledonian societies in Canada and around the world gather to honour Robbie.

A Burns night has certain traditional features whenever it is staged. First is the ceremony in which the haggis is paraded into the hall. This is a traditional Scottish dish made of heart, liver, and other organs of a calf or sheep minced and diced with suet, oatmeal, and seasonings and boiled in the stomach of the animal. The haggis is accompanied by a piper and kilted escort party.

Before he cuts the haggis, the chairman for the evening delivers a special poetic tribute, Burns' Ode to Haggis, as he holds knife in hand. He then thrusts the knife into the haggis as he recites the Selkirk Grace. The haggis is then served along with turnips and potatoes; chicken and leek soup and bannock are often part of this menu, too. Such foods represent typical Scottish dishes of Burns' time.

The evening's highlight is the immortal memory. This is a speech delivered by a local dignitary or an authority on Burns. In the speech the speaker talks about the poet, his work, the Scottish society of the period. The annual Burns' festival concludes with the singing of the traditional Scottish songs and ballads. The special evening serves as the major occasion on which Scots honour their distinctive culture.

Mr. Speaker, in sharing some of the very many aspects of Scottish culture with members of the Assembly, I was hoping to show that the tartan tradition is part of a much deeper set of customs. I think any of these occasions that I just mentioned would be heightened and brightened by the appearance of the Alberta dress tartan. It would be even more significant if people could take great pride in saying that this beautiful dress tartan pattern is an official provincial emblem of Alberta.

I am therefore asking all members to join me in support of Bill 205 and celebrating our multicultural Alberta. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

MS GRAHAM: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm just going to take a few moments to say a few words in support of this bill. I am Scottish, and I was raised in the Scottish traditions all of my life. I've worn a variety of tartans, and I thought I knew a lot about kilts and tartans and Scottish traditions, but I've learned a lot here this afternoon by listening to the very extensive speeches by members, and I thank them for their contributions in this regard.

I did want to say that one of the purposes of the introduction of this dress tartan is to allow our Scottish dancers who are competing at home and abroad to wear a dress tartan. Having danced competitively and been a Highland dancing instructor myself, I can tell you why it is important to have a beautiful, showy tartan, which this new Alberta dress tartan is, and that is that you get the attention of the judges if you have a showy tartan. So I'm sure our Scottish dancers will wear this with pride and they will catch the attention of the judges, and provided that their footwork and their style is up to snuff, they will do well.

I intend, myself, to have a kilt and a sash made in this new Alberta tartan. I would urge all members to do the same, female members to have a sash and men to have a kilt, because as we have heard, this is a district tartan; you don't have to be Scottish to wear the tartan. It's just very smart attire, especially for evening wear.

Without anything further, Mr. Speaker, I would just like to urge all members to support this bill, which I'm sure they will.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Highwood.

MR. TANNAS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just wanted to bring a little bit of personal life into it. Thirty nine years ago I married a lassie from Scotland, who was born and raised there and trained and came over here. [interjection] Thirty nine years ago, yes. Some few years later we went to Uganda, in east Africa, where I was teaching in a teacher training college, and the principal, who had been there before I arrived, was a Scot. He had taught the Africans how to do Scottish country dances. That was unique, seeing all of these people, who, naturally, were black, do Scottish country dances.

While I was there I had the unique experience of seeing Colonel Amin overthrow the government. We all know that Field Marshal Idi Amin Dada overthrew the government and brought in a very repressive regime. What I wanted to explain here in the context of what we're talking about today is that he had great pride in the Scottish regiment. Here you had all these blacks with their tartans, kilts, and even with bagpipes as an honour guard.

Mr. Martin, writing some 297 years ago, in 1703, made mention that every isle differs from each other in their fancy of making plaids, as to the stripes and breadth and colours; this humour is as different through the mainland of the Highlands insofar that they who have seen those places are able at the first view of a man's plaid to guess the place of his residence. The spirit of the idea has grown to the extent that Scots have come to believe that the pattern of woven coloured stripes has become an important part of their cultural identity.

I wish to offer a little historical comment which might add to the understanding of the structure of the Scottish society. Today it is generally accepted that clan tartans were well established some time at least during the 18th century. Prior to that time, while clan, district, and tartan were often closely associated, the idea of a single, uniform clan tartan had not yet emerged.

The natural development of the art of tartan manufacture in the Highlands was completely curtailed for many years following the battle of Culloden in the uprising of 1745, although the battle occurred in 1746, when Bonnie Prince Charlie and many clans were severely beaten at the battle by English forces. So angered were the British at this rebellion that they scourged the Highlands, burning many homes. Of course, with thatch for a roof it was quite easy to do that.

Many children and men and women were killed, and it was forbidden to wear the plaid. The proscription, ban, of the Highland dress could bring 100 lashes, which is enough to kill many people that may have received it. This was not repealed until 1782. The warlike reputation of the tartan, which was so ruthlessly crushed following Culloden, was put to great military advantage by the Highland regiments in their exploits abroad under the Union Jack.

By 1882, the year of the first royal visit to Scotland since the rebellion of '45, all the ingredients for a spectacular tartan revival were in place. So you got the royal tartan. In the capable hands of Sir Walter Scott the royal seal of approval was added to the now highly fashionable Highland Guard. This was worn by King George IV, whom you all know preceded Queen Victoria.

Hunting tartans, as their name implies, were designed in subdued colours, often greens or blues, to blend with the natural environment. Wearing of the tartans is not restricted to grouse moors but is intended for everyday use as well as formal and informal occasions.

Dress tartans, like the Alberta dress tartan, are designed by altering the background colours of the formal set to a white thread. Kilts made of this material are worn for dancing and other festive occasions. The Highland Society of London has a collection of tartans. Each sample is certified by the chief and bears their name and signature.

I want to thank the hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore for bringing this forward so that the Alberta tartan and now the Alberta dress tartan can be worn by our competitors in Scottish events wherever they may occur in this province, this country, or indeed around the world.

Thank you Mr. Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 205 read a second time]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. HAVELOCK: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In light of the hour I move that we call it 5:30 and that we reconvene this evening at 8 in Committee of Supply.

THE SPEAKER: On the motion put forward by hon. Deputy Government House Leader that the Assembly do now adjourn and reconvene tonight at 8 o'clock in committee, would all those in favour, please say aye?

HON. MEMBERS: Aye.

THE SPEAKER: Opposed, please say no. Carried.

[The Assembly adjourned at 5:17 p.m.]

head: Government Bills and Orders

head: Third Reading

Bill 12

Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2000

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is my pleasure, honour, and privilege to move third reading of Bill 12, the Appropriation (Supplementary Supply) Act, 2000.

I have made my comments with respect to the efficacy of the bill on earlier occasions and would ask the House to support early passage.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Madam Speaker. We do have some comments on Bill 12 at this stage. While ultimately we will be supporting it because we really have no choice in terms of seeing the need for additional spending in a variety of departments that this government, in our opinion, has not adequately planned for in terms of their resource allocation, we still have concerns about this process and how it moves along every time we see these interim budgets in here.

While this bill has been up for debate a number of times, we have asked many questions, Madam Speaker, and we have yet to see answers being provided to those questions. So it's once again a sad day in this Assembly when we are asked to vote on the spending of millions of dollars and we can't even get a few simple questions answered. We've certainly asked that we at least have some explanation of the new spending that's going to contribute to meeting the defined outcomes and performance measures that we've seen in the budgets and how this will address our specific concerns in this province at this stage, particularly with regard to health care funding, to education funding, to infrastructure funding, to environment funding, and to taking care of those in our society who are less able to take care of themselves than others. Those would be seniors, children, people living below the poverty line: all people for whom we have some responsibility that we don't see being addressed in an adequate fashion.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

With the addition of the spending of these moneys, we don't see the outcomes that are going to result from them, because we haven't had answers to our questions and because this spending is not done in the standard kind of manner that we would expect from a government. Certainly we see industry being responsible in terms of how they report to their shareholders. We would expect nothing less from a government. Instead, Mr. Speaker, what do we get? We get the current Treasurer, who has brought in more supplementary supply requests than the previous two Treasurers combined. That is, we think, definitely an appalling state of affairs and something that we hope will be rectified with the possible appointment of a new Treasurer, given the new career plans of the existing Treasurer.

Mr. Speaker, every time we speak to the interim supply bills when they come in, we bring forward a number of excellent recommendations, good ideas that we'd be very happy if this government scooped and implemented. It isn't that they don't know how to do that.

They've done it many times in the past with some of the good ideas we've brought forward as the Official Opposition in this province. It wouldn't hurt our feelings if they did it again.

We've talked many times in this Assembly and outside of the Assembly about economic and fiscal strategy reports, about using long-term trends, as far as 10 years. I know that this government's mandate is election to election, and we see these rolling three-year budgets, but any long-term strategic development certainly has a long-term component to it which is longer than three years. Hopefully they will be able to take that into account at some time.

We've talked many times about annual performance reports that have meaningful measures in them. We get reports that are sometimes questionable in nature in terms of the kinds of measures that are used and whether they give us specific reference points that are useful from one year to another. So we would like to see that.

My particular favourite recommendation, which we have brought forward many times, is monthly budget updates instead of quarterly updates, Mr. Speaker, a very responsible thing to do. If industry can do it, government can do it. Certainly there are adequate staff, well-skilled staff who have the ability to do it, but we don't seem to see that coming forward from this government. It would be a far more responsible way to address the kinds of fluctuations that we see in revenue than what happens now.

If we could pair monthly statements with a stabilization fund, Mr. Speaker, we would be well on our way to providing a kind of revenue monitoring and allocation system that would be world-class in nature instead of running the province like some rinky-dink operation that doesn't have enough resources to give us any kind of useful information. We wouldn't be seeing all these requests for out-of-budget, unplanned spending.

These are really good ideas that we've brought forward. Like I said, we'd be very happy if the government implemented them instead of having to come back in here time after time and having to vote on spending that really does not come into any kind of parameters of well-thought-out action. So in complete frustration, Mr. Speaker, once again I will have to support this bill, but it is an inappropriate way for the government to conduct the business of this province.

[Motion carried; Bill 12 read a third time]

[At 10:15 p.m. the Assembly adjourned to Thursday at 1:30 p.m.]

THE CHAIRMAN: I'll ask the Premier to lead off the debate on Executive Council.

MR. KLEIN: Thank you, Madam Chairman and hon. members. I am pleased to appear again before this committee in my capacity as minister responsible for Executive Council to resume our discussion of Executive Council's 2000-03 business plan.

At our last session questions from members of the committee began with a request from one member for more information about Alberta's tax plan, particularly in comparison to the federal government's plan. This was followed later on with a request for additional information about this government's plans to introduce a flat tax. I offered some initial information about the plan during our last meeting, and I believe the hon. Provincial Treasurer provided a more complete response during his time with the committee on Monday of this week.

Another question from the same member dealt with a new performance measure added this year to track revenue levels achieved by the Queen's Printer bookstore. The member suggested that the targets used are too low and that higher targets should be considered. Madam Chairman, I believe that members of the committee need to take into consideration the nature of the Queen's Printer bookstore and its business. The bookstore sells a very specific and limited range of products, primarily government legislation. That is the bookstore's mandate. There are a number of very legitimate reasons why revenues for the bookstore are estimated in a very prudent fashion.

Firstly, the number of new bookstore products available for sale in any given year is directly related to the amount of new legislation created here in the Legislature. The government staff responsible for determining bookstore revenues can't reasonably be expected to come up with exact sales projections for the coming year if they don't know how much new legislation they can expect to have on the shelf. This year the legislative list will be very light, so I would imagine the demand, if anyone really wants to read that stuff, is going to be very light as well. However, bookstore revenue projections do reflect any additional sales that can be predicted, such as the expected sales for the upcoming Revised Statutes of Alberta product. Revenue projections for 2001 will show a fair increase because it's reasonable to expect that the sales will be there.

Another question dealt with the bureau's goal of ensuring public satisfaction with information received from the government. I would like to first point out that this year's results for that question are up over last year's level, reaching 69 percent satisfaction. The goal was actually 70 percent, so 1 percent off isn't all that bad. Oh, I'm sorry; it's 75 percent, which is fairly high given the broad and far-reaching nature of the goal. It was set high to reflect this government's unwavering commitment to communicating with Albertans. I don't know that it's fair to say that achieving almost 70 percent satisfaction could fairly be described as being singularly unsuccessful, as one member of the committee suggested.

This government has been extremely successful in its efforts to deliver open and honest two-way communications with Albertans. In fact, Albertans have attended a wide variety and number of public consultations where they received information and shared their opinions. New programs like Alberta Connects, combined with communications resources like the Internet, have only served to increase the amount and variety of information available to Albertans. I believe that Albertans have come to expect immediate and comprehensive information from their government as soon as a new initiative or issue appears, and our efforts to meet and exceed those expectations will continue, the most current example being Bill 11, Madam Chairman.

Another question asked about collecting public feedback and performance measurements from other sources, such as the Internet or public consultations. As for consultations, any performance measures would fall under the responsibility of the ministry holding the consultation. As far as Internet goes, the bureau has already begun to post user satisfaction surveys on the government home page to ensure that the resource meets the needs of its users.

Another question from a member dealt with what government is doing to communicate with Albertans about priority areas like education, health care, infrastructure, and economic strategies over the upcoming three-year planning period. As I just mentioned, Albertans have come to expect comprehensive communications from their government, and we plan to meet those expectations. Communications branches across government continually develop and deliver communications as new initiatives and key programs are announced. This, of course, will continue in coming years. In addition to regular and ongoing communications within specific ministries, the bureau will also continue to use the Alberta Connects program to keep Albertans informed about the programs and services that matter most to them.

Another question about the bureau's performance measures dealt with customer satisfaction with the Queen's Printer bookstore products. A member asked if this was the same as the results shown for goal 2, which measures public satisfaction with access to government information through the Queen's Printer bookstore and the RITE telephone system. The measure for goal 2 deals with overall public satisfaction with both RITE and the Queen's Printer bookstore. The results show an average satisfaction level of 97 percent, which I would suggest is about as close to perfect as you can get.

It's possible the hon. member who asked the question confused the two different measures, since they both show the same very high satisfaction level. In fact, the measure under goal 4 relates specifically to customer satisfaction with the quality and range of products available through the Queen's Printer bookstore. That measure also happens to show a 97 percent satisfaction rating.

I should add, Madam Chairman, that all aspects of the bureau's measures, like all the government's performance measures, are fully reviewed by the Auditor General and are checked to ensure that they follow recognized standards for performance measurement.

A member of the committee also asked for an explanation of the $1.1 million increase to the budget for the Public Affairs Bureau in 2001. I did talk about the increase in my opening comments when we last met. I mentioned that there would be an increase in spending due to the Revised Statutes of Alberta project. If I recall, members of the opposition were quite pleased that that project was being undertaken. The Revised Statutes will require approximately $1 million in additional spending to complete. Revenues for the product are expected to fully offset the additional spending. I believe that members of this committee have already gone on record to express their support for the project. The balance of the budget increase for the bureau, which works out to approximately $100,000, is to allow for salary increases for staff. Members of the committee will note salary increases in every ministry budget this year.

Another question asked for a breakdown of the budget in full-time equivalent staffing in the bureau and also asked if there would be an increase in full-time employees. The bureau is currently staffed with 128 full-time equivalents, and that number is not expected to increase in the coming years. A breakdown of FTEs and budget by subprogram is as follows. Communications services, $4.7 million and 71 FTEs, and this includes professional staff seconded to government ministries. The Queen's Printer bookstores in Edmonton and Calgary, $1.3 million and 12 FTEs; the bookstores also account for $1.5 million in revenue. Approximately $900,000 and 11 FTEs are for administrative services, which includes overall bureau management and human resource and administrative services. Approximately three-quarters of a million dollars and 17 FTEs are for the RITE centres in Edmonton and Calgary. More than half a million dollars and 11 FTEs are for publishing services, which includes the Internet site, print and graphic design consultation, electronic publishing, news releases distribution, the Alberta Gazette, and so on. And $521,000 and 6 FTEs are for communications technologies.

Yet another question asked about the bureau dealt with plans to look for opportunities to deliver communications support through clustered services or shared resources amongst ministries. This initiative is simply looking at making the best and most efficient use of available resources. For example, communications branches that are housed in the same building are looking for opportunities to share administrative and public affairs officers' positions. Shared arrangements are already in place between communications branches in the ministries of Government Services and Municipal Affairs as well as between the ministries of Children's Services and Human Resources and Employment.

One member of the committee also wanted to know what kinds of courses are included in the bureau's in-house training program. Well, the bureau offers a variety of courses to ensure that staff are continually upgrading their skills. For example, staff are offered ongoing courses to keep up to date with the latest developments in computer software and other technologies. Other sessions are designed to upgrade specialized skills such as writing and editing and to develop general professional skills such as consulting and leadership.

One member of the committee wanted to know more about the bureau's use of new technologies in its communications with Albertans. I can tell you, Madam Chairman, that the bureau will continue to look at the latest and best uses of technology as they appear in both the private and public sectors and will continue to adopt those best practices for use within the Alberta government. This applies to the government Internet home page and to other new developments like the on-line discussion groups created as part of the recent Alberta Children's Forum. The bureau will also work to create more opportunities for Internet users to provide feedback about the government's home page and suggest new features and options they would like to see made available.

A final question about the bureau dealt with human resources' Intranet, currently under development. This initiative is quite simply an effort to improve the way human resource information is communicated to staff. I think members of the committee would agree that a paperless system that can simultaneously reach staff in some 20 different locations is preferable and more efficient than an endless stream of memos and mail-outs. The Intranet will include various types of information of interest and use to staff, such as pay and benefit details, training course announcements and registration, and internal phone lists.

Turning now, Madam Chairman, to the Alberta Corporate Service Centre. A member of the committee asked a question about the 11 FTEs included in this budget for the centre. At this time only the CEO and the administrative co-ordinator are permanent positions, all other staff are seconded to complete the design framework and proposed implementation strategy.

The design team has started sketching out the centre's organizational structures and identifying core human resources. Once that work is complete, approximately 11 full-time equivalents will be needed in the 2000-01 fiscal year to create a small corporate service core team and service delivery team.

A member also asked whether the PeopleSoft system was being recommended for the shared services initiative. I can tell you that the government continues to use the computer software provided by PeopleSoft for its financial and human resource functions. The program is used by all government ministries, and it will be used by the Alberta Corporate Service Centre.

I would like to conclude my remarks with some additional comments about the centre. As I mentioned to this committee last week, this is a new operating entity under Executive Council. In my remarks I outlined some of the administrative efficiencies and the related cost savings that would be reallocated within departments to frontline programs. But, Madam Chairman, it's much more than that, which is why I would like to elaborate more on our shared services initiative.

Shared services is really about changing the way we do business so that we are indeed more responsive to client needs and ultimately the needs of Albertans. It's about capitalizing and building on the professional skill base we have in our public service while partnering effectively with local businesses. The initiative means new employment and business opportunities, new investment in our technology infrastructure, more effective service delivery in regions throughout Alberta, and more money into programs for Albertans. It will also give us the ability to appropriately identify cross-government issues, expectations, and priorities and will create an effective climate for future change and innovation. We are committed to achieving those benefits with no net increase in funding, and we will not achieve those results on the backs of our employees. The public service has been essential to our past successes, and I am confident our employees will once again rise to this challenge and make the Alberta Corporate Service Centre a centre of excellence. In my view, this initiative is a win/win for government and for the people we serve.

Madam Chairman, that concludes my opening remarks to the committee, and I hope I've been able to answer many of the questions that were asked. Thank you.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Madam Chairman. I have some additional questions for the hon. Premier, but first I'd like to thank him for answering my questions from last Thursday afternoon. This evening I'm going to centre my questioning to the hon. Premier on some of the initiatives and some of the observations and recommendations that were outlined by the Auditor General.

My first series of questions for the Premier would be this. What steps are being taken by the Executive Council in the year 2000-2001 in conjunction with government departments to address the concerns and observations and recommendations of the Auditor General relating to capital asset management, particularly managing risks and costs, planning issues, reporting, and performance reporting as outlined on pages 6 through to 13 in the 1998-99 report? What steps also are being taken by the Executive Council in the year 2000-2001 in conjunction with other government departments to articulate best practices in business planning, including guidance on the definition of business plan components, more constructive feedback to improve the quality of business plans, and providing economic and fiscal assumptions at the start of the business planning cycle? For the convenience of the hon. Premier, this is in the Auditor General's report 1998-99, pages 21 through to 23.

What steps, Madam Chairman, are also being taken by Executive Council in the year 2000-2001 in conjunction with other government departments to develop a strategy to improve the quality of performance measures in the business plans? For the hon. Premier's convenience, this is in the 1998-99 Auditor General's annual report on pages 27 through to 31.

Now, on page 33 of the same annual report. My next question for the Premier is: what steps are being taken by the Executive Council in 2000-2001 in conjunction with other government departments to provide guidance to accountable organizations on best practices for annual report presentation?

Now, the Auditor General identifies a lack of consistent governance principles for appointments to agencies, boards, and commissions. A lot of hon. members of this House have discussed this in the past, and I'm sure it will be an item of discussion well into the future. In fact, I was at a public forum last night, and this whole issue was discussed by the panel members. But to ensure that there is effective governance, there must be performance expectations established for everyone and everyone must be held accountable, I believe. All government departments should be held accountable, and we should have a recognized method for analyzing and looking at results. The government needs to provide guidance to assist ministries in establishing and agreeing on governance practices.

Now, will the Premier indicate to members of this committee how many government ministries continue to use the directive introduced by the Premier in 1993 on appointment of members to these boards? The Auditor General on pages 49 through to 52 in his report from 1998-1999 is concerned about this.

Another question for the hon. Premier: why do government departments no longer establish review panels to select members of these boards, to establish selection criteria, and to screen candidates for board positions against established selection criteria? Now, the Auditor General is puzzled by this, and his auditors bring this up on pages 49 through to 52 of the '98-99 report.

Another question regarding the Auditor General's report to the hon. Premier: why is there failure to provide direction in establishing a process to ensure regular reporting on the governance practices and assessments whenever we're talking about effectiveness for any internal control system?

Now, we need to also continue here and ask about what steps are being taken by the Executive Council in 2000-2001 in conjunction with other government departments to ensure that employee performance management systems clearly support the achievement of government and department objectives. For the Premier's convenience, for reference, this is discussed on pages 43 through 49 in the Auditor General's '98-99 report.

Will the Premier also indicate to this committee how much, if any, money was spent on polling, market research, focus group research, and consulting fees from vote 1.0.1? I would be very interested to find that out, because we are of course in the process of debating in Bill 11 focus group research and how much of it there was and what exactly was done and by whom on these what are now becoming perhaps the most famous blank pages in the history of this province.

Also, could the hon. Premier provide copies of any reports, studies, and cost-benefit analyses prepared for Executive Council with respect to the government reorganization announced on May 25, 1999? Now, I understand there is a 28-page summary document which unfortunately Executive Council will not release under FOIP. I heard the Premier, and I was listening with keen interest whenever he was talking about FOIP and how members of the opposition are not FOIPable, I believe was the word he used. The only thing I can say to the hon. Premier is that I know he's very busy, but if one of his staff would like to come over to my constituency office and see how I deal with the money that the Legislative Assembly gives to me to run my constituency office, all my budget is entirely open for constituents.

AN HON. MEMBER: Is it filed?

MR. MacDONALD: It was filed, but constituents of mine can walk in any time and see what this hon. member does with every cent of that tax money that is acquired through the budget.

Now, FOIP is a very useful manner for me to do my job, and I'm glad it exists. I have FOIPed countless government departments, and I have been disappointed sometimes, but on many occasions I have received information that's very vital and of great interest to the taxpayers of this province.

I have a few more questions for the Premier. Will the Premier provide further information on any top-level planning document, any document or documents that were prepared for Executive Council by deputy ministers which discussed the government's long-term planning framework? Also, will the hon. Premier commit to providing a copy of this document to all members of this Assembly?

Madam Chairman, what steps were taken by the office of the Premier in 1999-2000 and in 2000-2001 to improve its handling and processing of freedom of information requests, as recommended by the FOIP commissioner?

Now, we're all aware of the Executive Council's handling of West Edmonton Mall FOIP requests, but earlier this evening in his response the hon. Premier was talking about a paperless trail and electronic filings, I believe he was discussing. I can't imagine anything more difficult to FOIP, and if I can go back to his words, not mine, I don't think that would be very FOIPable.

At this time, Madam Chairman, that is the extent of my questions, and I look forward to the hon. Premier's response. If he does not have time this evening, well, I can look forward to a letter. Maybe I'll be the 18,002nd letter that the Premier's office is going to deal with this fiscal year.

Thank you.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Premier.

MR. KLEIN: Madam Chairman, very few of those questions dealt with my estimates. As a matter of fact, most of them alluded to the Auditor General's report. There have been numerous reports of the Auditor General during my tenure as Premier. We get one every year, and I can tell you we do not sweep those recommendations under the table. I think this government has a record that exceeds the record of virtually every other government in Canada in terms of abiding by and accepting the recommendations of the Auditor General. I believe that in the case of the Auditor General's reports generally, we stand at about a 95 to 97 percent acceptance of all recommendations. So for all of the questions that the hon. member asked as they allude to the Auditor General's report, he can rest assured that we have either taken action on those recommendations, that action is now under way, or that plans are being made to take action to abide by the recommendations of the Auditor General.

We put a lot of stock into the Auditor General's examination of government operations and the use of government finances and, yes, how we select people to serve on the various agencies, committees, boards, and commissions. I don't have the Auditor General's reports in front of me, nor do I have the summary of all the recommendations that have been accepted, the recommendations that were acted on even before the Auditor General made a recommendation, or plans that are in the works now to comply with the Auditor General's recommendations, but I can assure the hon. member that we don't take his recommendations lightly, and all those we can reasonably act upon we do.

I would be pleased to provide down the road – it's going to take a bit of time to compile – all our responses to Auditor General's reports since I became Premier. I'm sure that over the fullness of time we can compile that information and provide that information to the hon. member.

Madam Chairman, I did allude to the opposition parties not being FOIPable. I wasn't referring to constituency offices. All of us make all the information available. We have to make that information available relative to the operation of our constituencies. What isn't FOIPable within the Liberal Party and the Liberal caucus is the expenditure of taxpayers' dollars outside of constituency activities, for Liberal activities for political purposes. How much do they use out of their communications budgets as a caucus for advertising? Who in the Liberal caucus takes whom for lunch? To whom is this highly-paid spin doctor from Toronto accountable? The list goes on and on and on, and we can't get that information. They won't supply that information because they don't have to be accountable. There's nothing in legislation that says the opposition has to be accountable.

Government has to be accountable, and we recognize that. That's why it was this government that brought in the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act. It was this government. We brought that act in so that the public could have access to certain government documents, government documents that might otherwise be kept secret, so that the general public could have access to this information. It was never set up to be used as a political tool, you know.

When we talk about FOIP, what is the cost? What cost have the Liberals put the taxpayers to in terms of some legitimate FOIP requests but many that have been nothing more than vindictive and vexatious, just fishing trips? We can't get that information from the Liberals because they don't have to be accountable and they aren't FOIPable. That's what I was alluding to. It wasn't the constituency allowance. We all get the same amount to run our constituency offices. The Sergeant-at-Arms has full control as to how each and every MLA in this Legislative Assembly spends those dollars. No, it has nothing to do with the expenditure of dollars within the constituency and in constituency offices. It has something to do with the expenditure of taxpayers' dollars by the Liberal caucus and whether the taxpayers of this province are getting value for the opposition they receive.

Madam Chairman, I'm just looking at my notes here. The hon. member alluded to top-level documents and whether I have any knowledge of top-level documents that pertain to all ministries relative to their plans. Well, yes, I do. They're called three-year business plans, and they're all made public. They're all made public. It's part of this government's policy of being open and being accountable and demonstrating to the people of this province that we are indeed planning not just year by year but three years down the road. So, yes, there are top-level documents that pertain to the planning processes related to all ministries, and they're called three-year business plans.

The hon. member asked a number of questions. Most of those questions, as I mentioned earlier, Madam Chairman, alluded to recommendations contained in various Auditor General reports. I will attempt to get him the answers to those questions, and I will go the extra length to provide him overall with a summary of all the recommendations we have responded to. I think he'll be pleasantly surprised and pleased to find that year after year after year we have a record of complying with about, as I said, 95 to 97 percent of all Auditor General recommendations.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

MR. DUCHARME: Thank you, Madam Chairman. It's certainly a pleasure to join in this evening's debate on the estimates. After reviewing the estimates for Executive Council, I have the following question to ask of the hon. Premier. Mr. Premier, the Revised Statutes of Alberta appear to be one of the most sizable projects under way for the Public Affairs Bureau. What does the project entail, and what costs, if any, are associated with it?

MR. KLEIN: Denis, what was the question again?

MR. DUCHARME: Mr. Premier, the Revised Statutes of Alberta appear to be one of the most sizable projects under way for the Public Affairs Bureau. What does the project entail, and what costs, if any, are associated with it?

MR. KLEIN: Thank you. Madam Chairman, as I mentioned in my earlier remarks, this marks the first time the Revised Statutes of Alberta have been consolidated since 1980. Literally there were volumes and volumes and volumes of statutes, so at some point or another they had to be condensed, had to be updated, and they had to be made to become relevant once again. This is a much-needed project that will greatly benefit Alberta's legal community as well as other industries affected by provincial government legislation and regulations.

To give you an idea of the scope of the project, consider that every year the Members of this Legislative Assembly debate and pass a number of pieces of new legislation as well as a wide variety of amendments to existing legislation. For example, last year the Legislative Assembly passed a total of, I think it was, 37 bills and enacted those bills into law. That translated into some 1,700 pages of legislation for publication in the annual volume. Now, consider that similar volumes and numbers of pages have been published by the Queen's Printer each year since 1980 in one or more annual volumes. That is a lot of reading. That is a lot of print, and a lot of it is very, very dry, to tell you the truth.

AN HON. MEMBER: Unless you're a lawyer.

MR. KLEIN: Well, only lawyers would appreciate it.

If you're someone doing research on a specific act, for example the Municipal Government Act, you would currently have to consult the original eight volumes published in 1980 as well as every annual volume published since 1980 to see every amendment related to that act. As it stands now, that would mean researching through more than 29 separate annual volumes that span an estimated 20,000 pages.

I know that when I was the mayor I had to become somewhat familiar with the Municipal Government Act, but I usually concentrated on I believe at that time it was section 3, the duties of the mayor. I don't know where it stands right now. But for anyone involved in municipal law, can you imagine the reams and reams of material one would have to read to fully understand it? Twenty thousand pages. I think it's fair to say that we're talking about a task that would consume a considerable if not an unreasonable amount of time, resources, patience, and money. Someone is paying for all this, whether it's a municipal legislator, a municipality, or whether it's just an individual hiring a lawyer to research a particular component of the law.

Over the past year the Queen's Printer bookstore staff has been working closely with Alberta Justice to consolidate all those 29 annual volumes into one comprehensive product, and that will be the Revised Statutes of Alberta 2000. When the project is complete, the current 20,000 pages in 29 volumes will be reduced to a single set of 10 volumes with approximately 12,000 pages. The effect: the current volume will be cut in half.

Now, Madam Chairman, there are two steps to the process. First, staff at Alberta Justice must do the revision portion, which deals with consolidating all the individual changes to laws into one comprehensive piece. This will certainly make the statutes more user friendly. The second part of the process is also aimed at making the product more user friendly. The second phase, which is being completed by the Queen's Printer bookstore staff, deals with converting the documents to a more user-friendly and readable software. Some examples of the types of things they're doing include changing the way columns are formatted in order to make the statutes easier to read and making it easier to move between different electronic formats. Staff have completed the initial steps of the project and are now on track to have it completed by the spring of 2001. Work to update related items such as the Alberta regulations, the Alberta Gazette, and specialty products will continue through to the winter of 2001.

Of course, Madam Chairman, a project of this magnitude does require some additional spending. However, as I mentioned in my opening remarks, with any spending increases in this business planning cycle you can also expect to see corresponding increases in revenue. In fact, we anticipate that due to high customer demand for the Revised Statutes 2000 and related products, sales will fully offset the approximately $1 million in increased spending for the projects.

I thank the hon. member for his question.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

MR. WICKMAN: Thank you, Madam Chairman. Let me say first of all that I wasn't here last Thursday afternoon, so if I repeat some of the questions or some of the information that's already been discussed, I pass on my apologies right off the bat. Secondly, I can understand that the Premier may not be able to answer all my questions tonight, and for those that can't be answered, I would hope he'd be able to provide written responses further down the road.

The Premier made reference to the Liberal caucus budget. I've always viewed our expenditures in the caucus budget as being very, very astute from the point of view that we try to ensure that those dollars are for the benefit of the Alberta Liberal caucus, not the Alberta Liberal Party.

As far as the spin doctor that the Premier referred to is concerned, I thought that all the spin doctors had already been hired by the government. I didn't realize there was still one floating around in Toronto.

MR. KLEIN: Who's the fellow who sits down there with Nancy and says: stay around, members of the media; Mrs. MacBeth will now . . .

MR. WICKMAN: Listen; this gentleman that the Premier refers to is a really good person. He's a good person, and he's doing his job extremely well. I'll bet your government would love to get their hands on him, but we're not letting him go, and he has no desire to go.

Madam Chairman, as I look through the documentation, the budget of the Executive Council, the business plans, the ministry statements, and such, I see a great number of references made to information being accessible and so on and so forth. At the same time, to get the information out is good. We see information going out right now on Bill 11, for example. One assumes that when information goes out, it's to provide Albertans with the opportunity to respond and that their response is going to be taken into consideration.

I found it very, very disheartening when I listened over the weekend in this particular instance, for example, and the Associate Minister of Health and Wellness had something like 21 media hits, and I heard him just blatantly say on TV that despite the opposition Bill 11 is going to go through. Now, to send out the information and make information more accessible is great, but is it benefitting Albertans if it's used to that purpose? Even the Premier himself now has readjusted his odds of Bill 11 going through.

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, with due respect, we are dealing with Executive Council.

MR. WICKMAN: Yes, and I'm going to concentrate on the communications services aspect of Public Affairs. When we're talking about communications, it's difficult to sort of separate, because the public affairs division, of course, works with all the various departments. But if I get out of line, you just tell me, and I'll step back in line, Madam Chairman.

I'm just concerned about information being accessible, because that is referred to. When we talk about information being accessible, there's more and more of a dependency on the Internet, which is good. We use the Internet to a great extent in the constituency office. Amazingly, when I was first elected in 1989, the same year the Premier was elected, we didn't have access to Internet in the constituency offices for communications purposes to access the government web site, for example. We've had that now for – what? – three or four years.

It's a marvel. It's of great assistance to constituency offices and staff. It's of great assistance to Albertans in terms of seeking out information. When I go through there, I can pull up Hansard. I can pull up minutes of meetings. I can pull up the bills. I can pull up the various government departments. I can go to those government departments and break down consumer affairs. I can go to workers' compensation, for example, and pull out the questionnaire that's just been developed for injured workers. So I find that a really, really good method of information becoming more accessible. As time goes on, Madam Chairman to the Premier, there is more and more of a dependency on the Internet and computer technology when it comes to communicating not only through governments but through business, through the private sector: the whole shot.

Before I get specifically involved with my questions on Public Affairs, just some general sort of questions and comments. In the initial stages, when I was first elected, the Premier's Council on the Status of Persons with Disabilities of course was created by the former Premier. Under his umbrella, under his arm it became a direct function of the Premier's office, and it was initially when this particular Premier took over. From there, it was downgraded – I'll use that expression – to a ministry. My understanding now, when I look at the new structure, is that it's been sort of downgraded to an associate ministry. I just wonder why something that held such status at one particular time seems to be falling down in terms of priorities, in terms of other departments and such.

At the same time I see that happening, I also see happening – and, again, if I'm getting into an area that's outside Executive Council, correct me, but I believe Executive Council would advise the Premier or consult with the Premier or the Premier would consult with them when there's discussion about how these cabinet departments, the various government departments are going to function and which ones should be expanded or added to or which ones should be decreased in significance like you see Learning now combining two former departments. That brings me to the question of the former intergovernmental affairs division, whatever it was called, which again was under the Premier's direction, within his area, and now has been transferred to a full-blown ministry. I wonder why the Premier would have taken that from the Premier's office and actually created it eventually as a full-blown department. The same situation occurred with Gaming, which has grown into a full-blown department.

I wonder if I can get into some specific questions here. When I look at the business plan for Public Affairs, on page 213, between the fiscal periods 2000 to 2001 and 2001 to 2002 we see a projected increase in Public Affairs spending of $1.140 million, or a 12.9 percent increase. Now, that's projecting a tremendous increase in a future year, and I'm not sure why those amounts of dollars are going to be anticipated to be required. These are the types of questions that I expect the Premier may have to respond to in writing further down the road. Of the $8.837 million we see in the current budget for the Public Affairs Bureau, I'd like to see a breakdown as to what portions of that go to salaries and wages, travel expenses, the advertising, communications, data processing, hosting, and outside contracts, consultants, dollars that are spent outside. The budget is very, very skimpy when we talk in terms of the actual details.

Likewise, the full-time employees show as a total of 128. We don't have the breakdown as to how many of that 128 are involved in the administrative services, how many in the communications services, how many in communications technology, in the Queen's Printer bookstore, the publishing, and for the RITE telephone system. I wouldn't mind that as well. If we look towards the next fiscal period after the one we're dealing with now, what projected number of full-time employees is there to correspond with the projected increase of 12.9 percent, or $1.14 million, in that particular budget?

In the Internet, which I referred to earlier, one of the things I look at – and maybe this is being a little too idealistic, but I'll read it in here. Of course, there are the two pages. There's the provincial government page, and there's the Alberta Progressive Conservative page. I don't want to mix the two up. If I recall correctly from looking at them, I'll see copies of the throne speech, for example, but I don't see any response to the throne speech that the taxpayer or citizen can access through that site that I assume is paid for by taxpayers' dollars and not the Progressive Conservative Party. It would be nice if the Leader of the Official Opposition was also given the benefit of having her remarks included when we talk in terms of the response to the throne speech or the response to the budget. I do say that that may be a bit idealistic, but I just say that it would be nice to do. We don't always have the opportunities to communicate on the same basis as government does, because of course they have certain advantages.

Again correct me if I'm wrong here, but even when we look at the amounts of dollars that are spent on the Premier's sort of fireside talk in January, do they come under the public affairs department? Do they come out of the Premier's office expenditures? I'd be curious as to how those dollars are achieved, because my understanding, of course, is that they are in fact taxpayers' dollars.

Now, one of the events that is coming up – I'm sure the Premier is looking forward to it just like the rest of us, and whether the Premier intends to be here at that particular time or if the taxpayers or Albertans choose to have him here at that particular time I guess is a question we can't address right now – is the year 2005, which is the 100th celebration of the province of Alberta. That's going to be a significant event, a tremendous event. A hundred years since the province was legally formulated is some good period of time, and it's got to be recognized in some fashion.

I recall – what was it? – the 75th anniversary, when the two auditoria were built, the one in Edmonton and the one in Calgary.

MR. MAR: It was the 50th anniversary.

MR. WICKMAN: I was just a young pup then, and I don't really remember it too clearly.

I haven't seen really any initiatives being taken, and I've had service clubs that have actually approached me and said: is the government making dollars available yet through lottery funding for projects, say, by the Rotary Club, which is already looking at the year 2005? I wonder if the Premier's office in conjunction with the Public Affairs Bureau is looking at ways of celebrating that very, very significant year and what they're looking at in terms of a legacy when that year comes to a conclusion. It is an ideal opportunity to leave a legacy behind for future Albertans which symbolizes the century that the province of Alberta has been legally in existence.

Again with Public Affairs. A great deal of the Public Affairs Bureau expenditures, I assume – correct me if I'm wrong – are spent outside the bureau itself. In fact, our dollars are sent out to various advertising agencies and that. Now, when we talk in terms of these dollars being awarded to various outside agencies – public relations agencies, advertising agencies, communications agencies, whatever – is there a tendering process? How does the Public Affairs Bureau determine which particular agency is going to get a particular contract or a communication that is occurring at the present time?

I wonder what role the Public Affairs Bureau plays in terms of communicating when it comes to assisting the Ministry of Health and Wellness, for example, on communicating the government's policy statement and legislation on the health care issue? I'm sure Public Affairs has to be involved somewhat. My understanding of Public Affairs is that it basically co-ordinates the activities in terms of communications, advertising, and such of the various government departments, although most government departments of course have their own small communications branch or communications spokesmen as well. How much of that $4.76 million that is under communications in the upcoming fiscal period has been allocated to assisting the Department of Health and Wellness, the Premier's office, whatever, in communicating the information pertaining to the changes in health care?

The communications services budget – of course I asked that question: how much of it goes to outside consultants, and how is it determined as to who gets it? The other group I didn't mention in there that I should have is the focus groups, because I assume the government uses focus groups, and also the polling. They do use polling, because I've been called myself as a citizen, as an Albertan just at random. It's nice to be called, because it gives one the insight as to what type of questioning the government is concerned about and what their priorities are. Now, who pays for the polling? Does that come under the public affairs division? What percentage of that is spent in polling?

For some reason I'm being asked to stop now.

MR. WHITE: Finish your sentence.

MR. WICKMAN: I'll finish my sentence but not my 20 minutes.

AN HON. MEMBER: You've only got another three or four minutes, Percy.

MR. WICKMAN: Okay. A few more questions here. I can always come back later too.

The Queen's Printer bookstore. That's an interesting one because with the amount of activity we see on the Internet now and the access to information on the Internet through the government web site in terms of bills and all that, I would have thought that would have meant a significant decrease in the demands on the Queen's Printer bookstores, yet when we look at the total expenditures for the year 2000-2001, we see an increase of 12.5 percent. I would have thought that figure would have gone down. With the Internet being as accessible and as used as it is now, I would think the demand would lessen considerably on that printed material, which, of course, you pay for. On the Internet it comes for free. I'm surprised we still have that kind of action.

This is my last line of questioning in this area. The RITE telephone system, of course, falls under the program too. We saw the consolidation of the former six regional RITE centres to the two centres in Edmonton and Calgary. My question here is: has it expanded the caller service options and, at the same time, improved the level of service efficiency?

Lastly, what is the total number of calls that occurred in the previous year and the current year or are projected to occur next year through the RITE system? It would be nice to have that three-year pattern to see just the increase in calls being made as a result of the supposedly more accessible RITE service. The RITE service, of course, just like the Internet, is a must. It's a means of taxpayers – we've got to remember that they're taxpayers – being able to access government departments, elected representatives, and such so that they can voice their concerns and so on and so forth.

As my 20 minutes is slowly coming to an end and the Member for Edmonton-Calder is anxious to do something, I'm going to conclude my remarks for now.

THE CHAIRMAN: Well, hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, that's the first time I've seen one of your own try to shut down the debate.

MR. MAR: Madam Chairman, I seek unanimous consent of the committee for a 10-minute adjournment.

THE CHAIRMAN: That's fine. We can seek the consent of the committee. We don't need it to be unanimous, however. A simple majority will do.

Having heard the motion by the hon. member that the committee recess for 10 minutes, all those in favour say aye.

HON. MEMBERS: Aye.

THE CHAIRMAN: Opposed? We will recess for 10 minutes.

[The subcommittee adjourned from 9:04 p.m. to 9:13 p.m.]

MR. KLEIN: Madam Chairman, a number of questions were asked. I'll attempt to deal with the questions asked by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

The last question was: has the RITE system improved since it was consolidated from six centres to two centres? Well, yes, it has improved. Consolidation has allowed the RITE system to extend its operating hours from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. That's an hour on each end, as I understand it. It's made it possible to introduce one toll-free provincewide number, which is 310-0000. About 6 million calls go through the RITE system every year, and as I alluded to earlier in my remarks, the satisfaction rate by Albertans with RITE is 97 percent. So that's a good indication that that service is well received.

Another question posed was: with the Internet why has the demand not gone down relative to written material from the Queen's Printer? Most of that material is legal material. It is law. It's not the normal kind of library material that one would reasonably access through a library system. It is very specific to the legal profession, and the legal profession wants and demands the original and written copy of all legislation.

The hon. member also asked the question: why has the Premier's Council on the Status of Persons with Disabilities been downgraded to an associate ministry from the Executive Council? Well, of course, what the hon. member is alluding to is: why is it not now under the Premier's jurisdiction, and why is it not under Executive Council?

We wanted to give this committee as much latitude as possible. As a matter of fact, the chairman of that committee, the hon. Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan, is in the Chamber tonight. He's done a fantastic job with the committee. The Premier's Council on the Status of Persons with Disabilities reports to an associate minister as well as the Minister of Health and Wellness, and I believe both ministers are capable of dealing with the Premier's Council on the Status of Persons with Disabilities, as indeed is the chairman himself.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford also asked for a breakdown of budget and full-time equivalents for the Public Affairs Bureau. Madam Chairman, I thought I included those in my opening remarks, but I can reiterate what I said ostensibly in my opening remarks and probably add a little bit to it.

First of all, the estimates for Executive Council for 2000-2001 total $15.3 million. He can see that in his own estimates book. The increases are related to two items: salary increases that apply to staff across government and funding for the new shared services centre. As I indicated, that funding over a period of time will probably save the government about $20 million, and these costs will be fully recovered from ministries, resulting in no net increase to government but over a period time, as I said, savings hopefully of up to $20 million.

With respect to the Public Affairs Bureau's estimate breakdown, $7.5 million goes to salaries, wages, and benefits; $1.3 million in supplies and services. There are 128 full-time equivalents. So the bureau's spending will total $8.8 million but will be partly offset by $1.5 million in revenue from the Queen's Printer bookstore.

Madam Chairman, relative to the Public Affairs Bureau a question was also posed related to polling. Well, it's my understanding that an agreement was reached with the Liberal opposition that the results of all polling by the Public Affairs Bureau would be made available to the Liberal opposition within a specified period of time. I'm not sure whether it was eight weeks or eight months, but it was a specified period of time anyway. The fact is that the agreement was reached, and it was signed off by the Liberal opposition as being fair that within a certain time limit all polling information would be made available to the Liberal opposition. So that information either has been made available or at some future date will be made available.

Earlier the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar asked a question related to the Auditor General's recommendations to Executive Council. Now, he asked a number of questions related to the Auditor General, but one related specifically to Executive Council, and that was the Auditor General's recommendation regarding cross-ministry co-ordination. I can assure the remaining members of the Liberal caucus that that is being dealt with by the deputy minister's committee and the various ministries involved, and I'm sure there will be a report on that in the fullness of time.

There was another question by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. The question was: who has been working with the government on the Premier's Advisory Council on Health and the Alberta foundation for science and engineering research, and how much did this cost? Well, Madam Chairman, the government of Alberta has engaged the services of Davies, Park, which is a human resources consulting firm, to solicit, interview, and help make a final selection of candidates applying for positions on both the board of the Premier's Advisory Council on Health and the Alberta foundation for science and engineering research. These are very important committees and authorities, and we want to make sure that the people responsible for making decisions and/or recommendations to government are, indeed, the right people and have the proper expertise.

I can't tell this Assembly at this time what the costs of the services will be. It will depend on the number of qualified candidates that are found and the number of board members each chair determines is appropriate for his or her board. Again, there will be an accounting. That is the law of this province. Everything eventually has to go through public accounts.

Another question from the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar was regarding FOIP requests. I have alluded to it. The question specifically would be: would a more paperless trail not mean that it would be more difficult to launch FOIP requests? I would remind all members of this Assembly that every document, communication, both written and by e-mail, pertaining to government business is FOIPable unless under the rules of FOIP it is exempt. Therefore, a paperless trail would pose no difficulties in responding to a FOIP request.

The question relative to polling was raised not only by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford but also by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. As I mentioned, all research done by the Public Affairs Bureau will be released according to our agreement with the Liberal Party. I would like to add that all research done by the Public Affairs Bureau relates to current issues, relates to business plans or performance measurements, and I can assure all members of this House that the bureau does not do blatant partisan political research. The bureau does not do research for other departments. Communications staff may advise departmental clients on research from time to time, but the information remains the property of the department.

How does the bureau collect its research? It does it through subscriptions, through reports like Focus Canada and the Angus Reid report. Like any subscription client we are required by law to respect the nondisclosure elements of the subscription content. We have, as I mentioned earlier, responded to the opposition's requests for information by obtaining special permission from research companies to share some of the requested materials. The research companies agreed that the opposition could examine requested material six months after publication. However, no copying is permitted, and this is required by law. We will continue to work with the opposition and research companies to find solutions that honour this government's commitment to open communication.

Madam Chairman, I'd like to point out that governments across the country use research to give the public a voice in planning programs and services and to measure whether or not those programs and services meet their expectations. Yes, part of the polling process and part of the process of gaining public consensus on issues is the use of focus groups, but again there is a confidentiality matter that has to be considered. When people are asked to participate in focus groups, their confidentiality is assured. It is guaranteed. Yes, we do publish the comments in various publications, saying that a person in the focus group said this, or a man in the focus group said this, or a woman in the focus group said this, or a child in the focus group said this. But we have to respect the anonymity of those people who participate in focus groups because they have for the most part asked for and have been guaranteed anonymity.

So basically our use of polling, research methodology, focus groups, and so on is no different than a private-sector business or a media outlet, for instance, using research to get feedback from its customers.

I think that just about answers all the questions that were put to me.

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan, I did indicate that I would recognize Edmonton-Calder, and then I will call on you. He had asked quite some time ago to speak.

Edmonton-Calder.

MR. WHITE: Thank you, Madam Chairman, and thank you, Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan.

The Premier is all refreshed from answering the questions, and I haven't started in on the hard part. I'll start in on the gentle part here.

First of all, the Premier's tie, looking from this side, is particularly attractive. I must say that I haven't seen one like that for a long time. Let's hang it out over the edge here. It's one of those days. It's probably the same tie he wore this morning, but I was looking at it with different eyes, I guess. I don't know. It looks better tonight.

Now, I do have to carry on here with a little story. There's a Tory and a Liberal talking, and it happens that in Alberta they actually do talk. The Tory says, "You know, that Ralph is going to go down in history as one of the best damn Premiers there ever was." The Liberal says, "How do you figure that?" He says: "Well, he's a real nice guy. He's a roly-poly kind of guy. He's one of those kinds of guys you can meet anywhere." He says: "Yeah, that's probably so, and you know what? He's going to go down in history as running the best damn Premier's bar in the history of Alberta." The Liberal says: "Yeah, that's probably so. You know, I wouldn't mind cracking a sack of beer with that guy and having a chat." He thinks about it for a minute. This is the Liberal still speaking; he says, "But I wouldn't want to have him run my bar." That's a little for both people, you see. [interjections] No, it's the way it is for a Liberal in Alberta, you see, because a Liberal in Alberta would like to have him as a friend, but I would sooner take care of my own money. [interjection] We shall do that. We shall do that. [interjection] It's about as good as you can get.

Mr. Premier, in answer to some of the questions earlier from the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, you referred to the Auditor General's report. It's with pleasure that I speak of the Auditor General's report because, as you well know, I happen to be the chairman of the committee that reviews those reports. Without being able to question yourself—I gather your time is called upon so heavily that you're unable to come and report to the committee. If that would be the case, if you're just unable to come, it's accepted, we don't complain about it, but it does bring up a question.

Earlier I believe you said something to the effect that across Canada your office is the most compliant or close to the most compliant with the Auditor General's recommendations. Well, page 333 of the 1998-99 report reads as follows, and this is the status of numbered recommendations. There are numbered recommendations, and there were 38 of them in '94-95. Of that, the number that have yet to be implemented is 26 percent, a pretty good rate. In '95-96 that number went up to 34 percent; these are yet to be implemented. In 1996-97 that same number, those that have yet to be implemented, went up to 46 percent. Because '97-98 is the last year of reporting the unimplemented numbers, last year this went up to 82 percent.

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. member, if the chair heard correctly, the Premier has already answered a number of questions to do with the Auditor General's report and talked about that. I think it was Edmonton-Gold Bar that brought it up, and he has answered the question.

MR. WHITE: Well, it seemed that there was an error in the page number or something that the Premier was reading from. So we'll leave that. The Premier will be able to answer that in his time if he so wishes.

Another area that the Premier spoke of in answer to some other questions was FOIP applications. Well, it's true that Liberal caucus documents are not FOIPable, but that occurs in virtually any FOIP legislation, and so it should. We would not expect nor should we expect to have your caucus documents FOIPable. Those are working documents in a caucus. In any caucus it's expected that ideas will come forward and they'll be kicked about. Sometimes they'll be implemented and sometimes they will not be, but those certainly aren't for public consumption nor should they be, I would think.

It interests me that this particular forum, this Legislature, has SPCs, which are a hybrid of a caucus and a legislative function. It doesn't fit well in either. It's sort of one of those critters designed by a committee. It just doesn't fit, and when telling other members of other Legislatures of this kind of function, it doesn't work. They can't understand how a committee can be only government members and then can exclude opposition members from meetings. It just doesn't compute. The ministries pay for these committees, but it's structured such that I assume it's at the Premier's behest.

The other question that comes to mind. The Premier spent a great deal of time talking about the $4.7 million in the Public Affairs Bureau and how all the findings were then reported to the Liberal caucus six months afterwards, after disclosure to the government, to Executive Council, I suspect. It may or may not be exposed to or allowed to be viewed by the government caucus. But six months is an awfully long time in the history of polls in that polls are always described as a snapshot in time, and of course snapshots fade rather rapidly, particularly in the polling industry. They're almost useless in six months. Quite frankly, I don't remember ever seeing one in my history here. So the value to the opposition would be next to useless.

In speaking of focus groups, the Premier went on at some length saying that he would not want to identify, even by generic description, 30 or 40 mail-ins from rural Alberta that may identify that person. Well, I would be satisfied and the members of this caucus would be satisfied to not even attribute those comments to any kind of descriptor but just the comments that came from the focus group and the summation by the monitor or the adjudicator of what came out of those meetings. We'd be satisfied with that, but that certainly won't be forthcoming, as evidenced by some 31 pages that came back totally and completely blank, which were less than useless except as a political battering ram, if you will, which is not a pleasant tool to use in this Legislature. But when you have no other information to deal with, that's the way it occurs.

There are advertising budgets, and the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford asked a number of questions about the Public Affairs Bureau with regard to the 2005 Alberta centennial. I should like to ask a similar sort of question, as to what the Public Affairs Bureau is doing in conjunction with the Friendly Games in Calgary or the 2001 games in Edmonton, what surrounds that with the visiting dignitaries and the like and when those budgets will be published. Surely there'll be some money spent this year in preparation for both those two wonderful events in our province.

The Public Affairs Bureau hires a number of agencies, and I think the member asked about what criteria were used. If he did, I'd like that answered at some point or other and whether in fact there are political overtones tied to these selections, as I'm told there are. If an organization has some political ties with either a government party or an opposition party, would that help or hinder their opportunity to bid for work and to lay their talents bare before the Public Affairs Bureau.

In relation to advertising budgets, why would the figures not be published as to how these budgets are allocated. I'm thinking of Highwood Communications, Calder Bateman, Hill & Knowlton, Palmer Jarvis, and like firms. Why would those numbers not be published such that one can discern whether in fact there is any political connection or not? It would be clean and open and accountable to do so, this member believes. The allocation of the advertising budget for those firms: it would be nice to have it be laid out in just one simple little table.

Further to the communications services, I assume there's an allocation for the polling between the various firms that do polling. It would be good to have a breakdown of that also to be open and accountable and completely above-board, with those numbers laid bare before the public. I would think that would be a reasonable position to take.

It would also be nice to know the status report on the specialized communication training program that, I gather, the departmental staff were put through. I gather the training programs for those staff, particularly in the regional offices, contained general communications, planning, writing, editing, and printing of graphic design and advertising. That's something that I'm sure the staff will know. That's not something the Premier would be expected to know.

A further question, sir. How has the consolidation of the six regional RITE centres into two centres, Edmonton and Calgary, improved the efficiency . . .

MR. KLEIN: I answered that, or similar.

MR. WHITE: Oh, did you, sir? I'm sorry. It must have been earlier in the evening. I recall your answering a number of RITE questions. [interjection] Hugh asked them. I'm sorry.

Well, the FTEs were asked and answered, as I recall.

Mr. Premier, for the moment those are all the questions I have for you. Thank you.

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. Premier, did you wish to . . .

MR. KLEIN: It's hard to answer questions that haven't really been asked. There was one question that was asked that's not specifically related to my estimates, but it could be. I think it's a legitimate question down the road. That is: what preparations are we making vis-à-vis protocol and so on relative to major events that will be coming? The protocol office is within Executive Council. As I explained earlier, it used to be in the department of international and intergovernmental affairs, but it's directly responsible now to my department.

Yes, there will be a protocol function for the Premier and I would assume for the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition, and we plan to have as many Members of the Legislative Assembly from both sides of the House participate in these events as possible. Without doubt, the resources of the protocol department within Executive Council will be used to co-ordinate some of these events, luncheons and so on.

I can't give the hon. member a breakdown right now as to how much of that budget will be allocated out of Executive Council. Basically, the use of the protocol resource will be spread around all departments and will come out of the general allocation that has been agreed to by government to host the world track and field games in Edmonton in the year 2001. We have committed $40 million to those games. That funding was contingent on an equal contribution from the federal government and, I believe, an equal contribution from the city in kind, and certainly matching dollars from the private sector. Within that budget I'm sure we'll be able to accommodate whatever protocol functions will be associated with those games.

The second major sporting event will be in the year 2005 in the city of Calgary. The city of Calgary has been awarded the right to host the Winter Goodwill Games. The expenditure there is not going to be nearly as much because most of the facilities are in place and the funding that has been requested of government is mostly for upgrading. The latest figure I've heard is $5 million, and again this will go to offset some of the protocol costs and costs associated with government activities as they relate to those games.

There was a previous question asked by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, and that was a question relative to the centennial. Without doubt, that is going to be the most significant year in the history of, well, this government, because I'm sure we'll be around in 2005. It is going to be very significant indeed.

As you know, there was a report prepared, and I'm pleased to say that my wife was also part of that report. A number of good-thinking Albertans were members of the committee, and they brainstormed a number of ideas for projects and reasonable expenditures to help celebrate Alberta's 100th birthday. That report was submitted some time ago to the Minister of Community Development, and he is in the process now of preparing business plans and identifying projects that will come to light and will be clearly identified as centennial projects, I would assume, starting next year, in budget year 2001-2002. They'll clearly be identified as centennial projects.

Just to give the hon. member an idea of some of the kinds of things we're looking at, certainly one of the major 50th anniversary projects was the Jubilee auditoriums in Calgary and Edmonton, so one of the projects is the refurbishing of those auditoria. Because, you know, it hasn't really been done in a major way for 50 years. [interjections] It will be 50 years. Another project that is being seriously considered is the Archives. As you know, that building needs upgrading. [interjection] Well, it's in rough shape. So there are projects of this nature that really will be reasonable and responsible expenditures, but we'll make sure the legacies that were created in the past are restored and maintained and are there for future generations.

That's about all I have in terms of answers to questions. If there are any I haven't answered, my staff are sitting in the gallery, I'm sure they've made notes, and we'll be happy to provide hon. members with answers to the questions in due course.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan.

MR. LOUGHEED: Thank you, Madam Chairman. I listened with interest to some of the comments earlier, and it seems that many of the questions relate to communication, which is certainly part of what I wish to address this evening as well.

I was pleased to hear the comments from the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford regarding the Premier's council and the recognition that was granted to the work of the council by the Premier as well. I had the opportunity today to rise in the Assembly and table Status Report, the quarterly newsletter of the Premier's council, which certainly is an attempt on the part of the Premier's council to get information out and receive communication back from the disability community.

This particular quarterly report talks at length about the disability strategy discussions throughout the province that are taking place, and communication is a major part of that as well. The council has been out and around the community, the province, talking with the disability community in six different locations during the past few months, seeking input and trying to determine what kind of direction the disability community wants the Premier's council to move in. We have some feedback from them, and we're seeking to carry on and come about with a disability strategy that includes that input.

In this particular issue members would be interested to know that there's a good article by an architect by the name of Ron Wickman, the son of the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford. This article talks about barrier-free building design, and it talks about parking spaces in parking lots for the disability community members and how best to design those. It's an interesting article, a mechanism for communication that the Premier's council seeks to utilize to give information out and receive information back from the community.

Anybody reading Hansard that may wish to get a copy of the Premier's council quarterly news report called Status Report can contact the Premier's council by phone at 422-1095 and order a copy. There is also a 1-800 number. The number is 1-800-272-8841, and they can request to be put on the mailing list. Currently the mailing list has about 6,000 addresses to which they're sent out, and that information is received by members of the community.

The other questions that were asked related in large measure to the use of the Internet and some of the mechanisms whereby people in Alberta are able to access that information. We know that many members even in the Assembly utilize the Internet during the times when we're able to listen and work at the same time and find out information that way. So the Internet certainly has become a very valuable tool. Like one of the members opposite mentioned, certainly in our constituency office for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan it's utilized to a great extent, and we find it to be a very useful tool. Of course, e-mails are another mechanism for quick communication, and we can even do that from within the Assembly, which we really appreciate being able to do.

Web pages, getting those constructed and set up, are a great expense if you hire a professional, but often we can get somebody we know in the community, a volunteer, to set those up, and we can have some really good information accessible, a web page and the linkages that we have to other pages, and then we can work away with community members in getting information from them and delivering information back to them.

The questions that I would have for the Premier regarding the Executive Council business plans, which like the government business plans make references to the needs and priorities of Albertans. I'd like the Premier to comment on how those needs and priorities of Albertans are determined from his perspective, and what he'd like to comment on and let us know about the determination of those needs and priorities. As well, if the Premier could identify how the government knows that those plans and initiatives are addressing the priorities of Albertans. Those are questions that are important to Albertans, and we know they have a keen interest in hearing what the government has heard from them and how they would see their communication being received. Of course, as I mentioned, the Internet had been talked about by some of the members opposite as being really important. I'd also like to hear to what extent Albertans actually make use of those different types of communication opportunities.

Those questions may take some time to answer, and in fact I would be willing to have those answers in writing if there is not time left. I see that we're near the end of the opportunity to ask and receive questions here today. So in light of that, Madam Chairman, if there is too little time for the Premier's response, I would go along with receiving the answers in writing.

I would ask that the committee rise and report progress, and then we can adjourn debate on the Executive Council estimates.

THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you, hon. member. Having heard the motion, does the subcommittee agree that we now rise and report progress?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIRMAN: Opposed? It's carried.

[The subcommittee adjourned at 9:57 p.m.]

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. members, a couple of things. One, as is our custom frequently in room 512, we've invited the deputy minister to come be at the table. Is there any objection to that? Please register that now, and you just know that you've lost a road in your constituency. No one? Okay.

Secondly, these signs are not for each other's benefit. These are for Hansard. So if you've got it in some way that they may be able to see it, that helps them.

We'll begin this evening's deliberations on the estimates of the Department of Infrastructure and call upon the hon. minister to begin this evening, and we'll go from there.

MR. STELMACH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and good evening to all. Before I begin, I would like to introduce the ministry staff that has joined us this evening. I would really sincerely like to take this opportunity to thank them for the excellent work they've done this year and in the past year as well.

Seated to my right, the most important position, is Mr. Ed McLellan, who needs no introduction to many of the people around the table. Seated in the audience are Mr. Ray Reshke, who is the ADM, corporate services; Gary Boddez, ADM property development. We have Mr. Bob Smith, ADM of property and supply management. Bob is right against the wall there. We have Gregg Hook, chair of the Transportation Safety Board and responsible for transportation safety services, and Brian Marcotte, executive director, infrastructure policy and planning. We have also Leanne Strangeland, director of communications. With us today we have Mr. Tom Hawnt, who is acting for Mr. Jay Ramotar, ADM, transportation and civil engineering. Welcome to everyone.

The business plan and the 2000-2001 estimates indicate how we plan to contribute to Alberta's economic prosperity. We're going to contribute to the prosperity by ensuring the provision of safe and effective transportation systems; managing the development of seniors' lodges and learning, health care, and water management facilities; and planning, operating, and maintaining government facilities. The government's prudent fiscal planning and management allows us to continue directing funds to a number of different programs and initiatives throughout the province.

Alberta Infrastructure continues to work with a number of ministries to address priority issues and ongoing initiatives and to increase our effectiveness and efficiency. Some of these initiatives include continuing to lead the cross-government Alberta capital planning initiative by working with other ministries on the development of a cross-government approach to infrastructure planning, information management, and project prioritization. This will ensure the most cost-effective and efficient use of infrastructure dollars.

We are working with Alberta Learning to plan and develop capital plans, programs, policies, and legislation for all learning facilities; with Alberta Health and Wellness to ensure that long-term regional capital plans are developed in partnership with the regional health authorities by March 31, 2001; with Community Development on the provincewide upgrading of seniors' lodges; and of course with Alberta Environment in protecting the integrity and effectiveness of water management infrastructure.

We support the provincial government's ongoing theme of strong financial management. In order to position the ministry to address infrastructure funding and management matters, we continue to seek more functional and accountable ways to accomplish our mandate. This is evident in the internal restructuring we did after the government reorganization last spring. We have reduced our FTE count by nearly 100, and we have also been able to reduce the administrative budget by approximately $4 million.

In fiscal year 2000-2001 in direct response to the Premier's Task Force on Infrastructure's recommendations several initiatives, including the north/south trade corridor, will receive accelerated funding. In fact, the task force recommendations have resulted in significant changes to the funding and management of our highway systems. The changes will also have a major impact on the engineering and construction sectors in this province. An additional $900 million is required over a three-year period to address these recommendations. The Alberta government is providing most of this additional money through the '99-2000 supplementary estimates and in the 2000-2001 fiscal year for several initiatives.

The Alberta cities transportation partnership program will receive a $256.3 million investment. The cities of Calgary and Edmonton will receive funding based on the equivalent of 5 cents per litre off on-road fuel sold within each city. In total this represents an increase of about $30 million per year for each city. Other cities will continue to receive basic funding of approximately $60 per capita per year and will also be eligible for a $50 million supplemental funding on a project-specific basis.

Rural municipalities will benefit from a $160 million investment, and the new resource roads program introduced last April will receive $34 million. Under the streets improvement program, towns and villages will receive $60 million. This program has now been expanded to include hamlets.

In our ongoing commitment to the development of the north/south trade corridor, $130 million will be invested in the rural portions of the corridor, $10 million in upgrades to Calgary's Deerfoot Trail, and $15 million to Edmonton's southwest ring road, for a total of $155 million. This continues the government's commitment to accelerate funding to the north/south trade corridor until four-laning is substantially completed in 2007.

Primary highway construction will receive $147 million. The province begins assuming responsibility for the construction, maintenance, and rehab of secondary highways as of April 1, 2000.

The 2000-2001 estimates show an increase of $70 million from '99-2000 to $160 million to cover the cost of all maintenance and construction for secondary highways. That results in significant savings to municipalities as they will no longer have to fund maintenance or their previous 25 percent of secondary highway construction.

As a point of interest, over the next three years the $900 million in transportation infrastructure funding resulting from the Premier's task force recommendations will create up to 13,500 person-years of work for Albertans.

There are some other aspects of this year's estimates that I would like to highlight. Pressures on other municipal infrastructures such as water and wastewater treatment facilities continue to be recognized in the 2000-2001 estimates with increased program funding of $29 million, which is $10 million more than last year.

Compared to the '99-2000 budget, spending on health facilities has increased by $53 million to $168 million to address health infrastructure upgrading needs.

School facilities funding allocations include $160 million for preservation and high-priority expansion to accommodate increased enrollments. As a part of this allocation $40 million includes block funding to school boards for minor preservation needs – that would be the BQRP – $40 million for new facilities, $10 million for innovation, and $70 million for preservation and modernization of existing facilities.

The 2000-2001 estimate for postsecondary institutions is $47.4 million. The funding provides institutions with the flexibility to address present and future renovation and replacement needs as well as program expansions.

The seniors' lodges will be provided with $17.1 million to be used for the upgrading of 15 lodges and the start of designs for 12 additional lodges.

In 2000-2001 we have an ongoing commitment of $95.6 million for the operation and maintenance of all of our government-owned facilities in the province. Approximately $76 million has been allocated to the leasing and operation of private-sector facilities for government program use. The government is targeting revenues of $100 million from the sale of surplus properties over the next three years. It is expected that about $35 million in property sales will be achieved this year, and the 2000-2001 estimates reflect the use of this revenue.

I would also like to mention some of the ministry's other major initiatives before concluding. Transportation safety services in consultation with stakeholders continues to focus on generating a stronger awareness of the role Albertans play in traffic safety. Work on the regulations under the new Traffic Safety Act will be completed. We will continue with extensive public consultation as these regulations are developed.

In 2000-2001, consultations will include discussions on graduated licensing, commercial vehicle equipment standards, and also off-highway vehicles.

Regulations will be developed in consultation with the railway industry and user groups prior to proclamation of the Railway Act. The objective of the new act and regulations is to provide for the safe operation of railways under provincial jurisdiction.

In collaboration with school facilities stakeholder groups, many of the recommendations from the School Facilities Task Force will be implemented this year in order to fulfill the government's commitment to improve capital funding practices. Using teams of private-sector consultants, we have completed phase 1 of a complete facility audit of all schools in Alberta. Phase 1 completed 433 schools out of the 1,460, and the audit looked at structural, mechanical, electrical, and of course the building envelope. When the audit is finished in the summer of 2000, we will have a complete condition inventory of all Alberta schools. We'll be bringing forward a funding strategy to address the backlog of modernization and upgrading while addressing the requirements for new student places in the form of new schools.

Alberta Infrastructure recognizes that we need to continue being innovative and forward-looking. Using a value-based focus, we're planning to look at new technologies and to review the ministry's processes as they affect our stakeholders and partners. We're reviewing roles and responsibilities in our relationship with these stakeholders, specifically with our consulting and contracting partners.

As you have heard this evening, Alberta Infrastructure is committed to the economic prosperity and development of the province and Albertans and to keeping up with the rapidly changing world around us. We will continue to face challenges as a result of economic and population growth pressures and the problems presented by an aging infrastructure.

I believe that the estimates for this year indicate that we have a renewed focus on infrastructure in this province. With the collaborative efforts of ministry staff, our partners, and our stakeholders we are addressing these challenges with creative and effective solutions that will lead us successfully through the 21st century.

I would be happy now to take any questions you may have. If, of course, I'm unable to provide any of the answers today, I assure you that you will receive written answers promptly.

I'd just like to add that the detail in the budget is considerable, and as we answer questions over the rest of the evening, I think we'll give you further examples of some of the reasons why we had to put the budget and our estimates in a format like that because of some of the restrictions we work with with respect to consolidated budgeting.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Norwood.

MS OLSEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome to the minister's staff, and I am hoping that we'll be able to get some answers. We were wondering, Mr. Minister, if you could define "promptly" for us before we get under way here.

MR. STELMACH: It will be as prompt as I've always returned responses.

MS OLSEN: We just needed to clarify that, because, you know, we're not the Infrastructure critic, and we wanted that on the record for her. [interjections] We're really interested, and I'm glad I have reinforcements.

You know, I have so many questions here. In my first questions today I'll take the minister to the program operating expenses category. Under vote 1.0.1 the minister's office has received an incredible increase, about 76.4 percent. Of course, the big question is: why would the minister's office need that kind of increase? What are you anticipating for changes in your office over the next year?

The deputy minister's office also has a significant increase of 19 percent. Again, what's going on that we see such a dramatic increase in those two areas?

Could we move down to the highway system and the north/south trade corridor. If we go to this year's expenditures, we're looking at doing a comparison between 1999-2000 and 2000-2001, a 969 percent increase. Now, I realize that there was a commitment to the north/south trade corridor, and you spoke about the rehab of secondary highways. Are you anticipating this work to be done on the north/south corridor next year? Is that why this over 900 percent increase in the budget in the capital investment? I think that obviously is very significant. I'll draw your attention to that. It's 2.2.1, Mr. Minister.

The rehab of the secondary highways. How many secondary highways are targeted, and how did you determine the priority for those highways? I guess I'm kind of curious. We see lots of lobbying going on for roads. I hate to say this, Mr. Minister. You're in the unfortunate position of having highways and roads, and you know how people feel about their highways and roads, especially in an election year. Overall, when we look at the transportation aspect of your department, there's a 126 percent increase, so that I think is important to explain.

I also have some other concerns, and they arose out of Justice the other night. Actually the hon. minister for intergovernmental affairs, I think, raised the issue in relation to the secondary highways and the policing of those highways. I'm just wondering if you could maybe try and inform us as to who is going to be policing those highways. There's been some discussion about having special constables police those highways and that kind of thing. Is there a move afoot to do that as opposed to having the RCMP contracted to do that? I have some concerns around that if that's the route you're anticipating going, and I think we should have a fuller discussion on that.

I want to talk a little bit about 2.4.2 under facilities infrastructure, the school facilities. A number of issues have come up. I think the most recent one is where the principal of the soon-to-be or hoped-to-be aboriginal school in the city of Edmonton is struggling with the lack of a facility. They've got 600 to 800 students that would like to register at the high school level in that school. I don't know if you're aware, Mr. Minister, but Edmonton also has the Awasis program at Prince Charles, I believe it is, and Ben Calf Robe under the Catholic system. Both of those programs are operating very well. One is an elementary, and one is an elementary/junior high. Ben Calf Robe is in the old St. Clare's elementary/junior high.

In the past students would go to Ben Calf Robe simply because they were expelled from both systems. Now the school is operating because parents choose to send their children there because they learn Cree; they learn about their culture and their heritage. You walk into that school now and you can feel really good about the fact that the students are there learning. They're not there because they have to be there or there isn't an alternative for them. They're there because their parents want them to be there, and their parents want them to carry on to the high school level being able to enter into an aboriginal program.

I have to look back and say, well, the government decided charter schools were going to be all right. The government has allowed for other schools such as Talmud Torah, that teaches Hebrew in the afternoon and English in the morning or vice versa, the French immersion schools, the Ukrainian bilingual schools, the German bilingual schools. So there are a number of programs going on. We've got Old Scona academic, and we've got athletic schools, and we've got Vimy Ridge, which is a military school to some degree.

So I'm wondering how the aboriginal community's problem will be solved. Their issue, of course, is the need for a facility, and they have apparently been turned down. I'm hoping you're going to give us some news that's going to change that. The notion of being able to house high school students all over the city in unused space isn't going to work for that program. There needs to be that cohesiveness in the school. They need the facility. I'm hoping you're going to give us some really good news and say: look; we're going to deal with that issue, and there will be high school for the aboriginal community. They've worked long and hard for this. They put this together, and I think it will be a highly effective program. Having the aboriginal community come forward is something we as legislators can be very proud of. It's their baby. So hopefully, as I say, we can get some good information on that.

The other problem that I'm getting phone calls on, and certainly I know some of the Calgary MLAs are as well, is that the Calgary board of education is at about 75 percent utilization rate – that's in the old formula – and they have been told that they need 85 percent in order to get new schools. Well, with the growth in that particular city, we understand a growth and density study has been done. It offers somewhat of a band-aid solution, and I'm wondering if there's going to be any fast-tracking for new schools down there.

Again, this whole utilization issue is a problem. You don't have space in a concentrated area, where you've got all of these new citizens into the province. Kids need a place to go to school. I'm just wondering what the long-term plan is that's going to provide for future growth and the existing growth now. There seems to be a need for somewhere in the area of 25 to 30 new elementary schools. That's a huge cost, but I'm wondering where you are going to start and how you are going to start without offering up just a band-aid solution, going now with some long-term solutions.

I want to go to the business plan now, if I could, Mr. Minister, and maybe page 171, traffic safety. Last year the government had a traffic safety performance measure. It was casualty collisions: the number of injuries and fatal collisions per 100,000 licensed drivers in the province. It doesn't exist anymore. I'm wondering if you could enlighten us as to why this particular performance measure was dropped. We know that the targets weren't met, but that's not a reason to drop the performance measure. I'm just wondering what's going to happen.

It doesn't seem that there was a need to change that particular measure. I'm just wondering about the new measure you're going to try and develop to gauge the effectiveness of the education programs and if that's going to replace this measure. I think they're certainly two different measures. I do think there's an advantage to try and capture that information on the educational programs, but there's no one variable that's going to have the answer for us in that. I think that specific measure is going to prove to have a multi-variable answer. I think it's also something that needs to be looked at long term, so a three-year business plan isn't going to capture that necessarily.

You need to look at driver attitudes or the education over 10 years. Are the kids now responding on a long-term basis, or is it just those 16 year olds, 17 or 18 year olds abiding by those rules because of the parental pressure expressed to them? Are those attitudes going to be a part of their driving pattern for the rest of their lives? I think there are other things, and I don't think it can be captured over one, two, or three years.

When we look at traffic safety, we also can look at the injury rate in this province and the fatality rate. The fatality rate in '98 for this province was the highest in Canada, and the injury rate was also the highest in Canada. I'm wondering what's been done to try and reduce that over the years. The last year we have the information for is '98. I don't know if you have last year's information available yet. Why has the injury rate remained so high? The accident rate has increased as well. What are other provinces doing that we're not? We know that Ontario and British Columbia have as much traffic as we do, or more in some of the concentrated areas. I'm wondering what initiatives they are undertaking that we're not or what we can learn from them. What are you going to do to try and reduce those rates?

Truck safety: you know the hon. Member from Spruce Grove-

Sturgeon-St. Albert will deal with this as well. We know that last year and the year before, the Edmonton city police had undertaken a very aggressive enforcement program, which proved to be very beneficial, I thought, in talking to the member from that particular traffic safety unit. They were feeling that this was an absolutely necessary undertaking. I'm wondering now what the regulations are. Are the regulations going to change in relation to truck safety? We seem to have, along with our neighbouring province Saskatchewan, the most lax truck safety regulations in North America. So I'm wondering what you anticipate doing about that.

There's also a pilot project, I believe, that's been undertaken in relation to fatigue management for truck drivers. I'm wondering what progress is being made with that particular pilot project and study. How long are you going to collect the data, what do you anticipate doing with the findings, and are you potentially going to change the number of hours that truck drivers can drive? I believe pilots have that specific type of safety code where they can only fly a certain number of hours during a week or a day. I was just wondering if that type of thing is going to happen as well.

The other concern I have. I think this is a good question. With the increase in fuel costs, are truck drivers going to be on the road longer just to get the job done, just to put more money in their pockets? This is hurting their bottom line. What are you doing in terms of, I guess, the whole enforcement aspect in relation to maintenance? I think there may be a correlation there between trying to cut some dollars. We know prior to fuel costs going up what the school bus situation was in this province. Are we now going to see truck safety compromised as a result of the fuel costs and less maintenance done on the vehicles as a result of that? The bottom line is an issue here, so maybe you could let us know if you have a plan for that.

The north/south trade corridor is going to be an interesting task. As I traveled in the northeast U.S. this past fall, I was just amazed at the number of trucks on the road. In fact, I didn't enjoy that drive at all. You could drive through the New England states and see all the colours you want providing you didn't take your eyes off the road at any given minute because of just the tremendous number of trucks. I understand the reason for that is that the transportation of goods by truck is much faster than rail. We have that same problem here. We're going to develop this north/south corridor. After driving on those roads, I really wonder how that's going to impact on general traffic north and south. It's actually quite a scary notion the way that whole business works. So increased truck traffic is not necessarily going to be good. It needs to happen, but what are you going to undertake to ensure the safety of everybody else on the road? I guess that would be my big concern.

Okay. I guess I'll stop now, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. minister, would you like to reply?

MR. STELMACH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Let me find all of the votes here first.

I think we were doing 1.0.1, the minister's office expenses. Although the minister's office is now handling all of the requests coming from the former department of T and U – all of the issues centred around public works, seniors' lodges, all of the environmental projects, including school facilities and postsecondary – our office is working with the same full-time equivalents. So even though the budget was put together here reflecting the anticipation of a larger office, you will see at the conclusion that the proof will be in the pudding in terms of what is spent, and it won't be the kind of increase that you see here.

So far we have been monitoring the calls, the requests not only from MLAs from both sides of the House but also from Albertans, and we try to get back to them as promptly as possible either by phone call or by letter. The last few months' experience I've been very satisfied with, and I don't see a need for increasing the staff. I suppose that if need be, there would be room for expansion, but to date I think we've been through the amalgamation, the restructuring, and this is the very same staff we brought forward from Agriculture. You know, Agriculture was a large department, but we didn't have the same kind of mix and varying degrees of interests collected in one office. I don't foresee a problem there, and if we save a little bit of money, maybe we'll pave another square foot of road someplace.

The same thing with the deputy minister's office. It's a stab in the dark. We're going to make do with the kinds of dollars that we have available to us and do it as effectively as possible.

Remember in my opening remarks that I referred to the complexity of the budget, the estimate presentation. As you know, in consolidated base budgeting we must expend the revenue in the same year that we collect it, and as a result of that, most of the money that will be going into projects with health facilities and school boards will be given to the school boards and health authorities by way of contract and the same thing with the municipalities.

Vote 2.2.1, the north/south trade corridor. I knew this question was going to come up. With respect to 2.2.1, the north/south trade corridor, the operating expense shows a $16 million decrease; the capital investment, a $140,500,000 increase; and the capital investment funded by lotteries is a $65 million decrease. This north/south trade corridor is a long-range provincial initiative that will provide a continuous divided highway route that will go from the border at Coutts to the B.C. border west of Grande Prairie. The key objective – and I may be covering some of the other items that you raised here with respect to safety on the north/south trade corridor – is to provide the safest and most efficient highway corridor to accommodate increased international trade and tourism flowing to the United States and Mexico. Without doubt, our markets are going to grow in the United States and Mexico.

Just as an aside, the issue with roads and moving product to market. We can do all of the manufacturing we want in the province of Alberta, but if you don't get the gadget to market, you don't create a sale. If you don't create a sale, you don't create wealth. If you don't create wealth, you have nothing to tax to pay for education and health. So the creation of wealth is paramount. You can't create that without getting to the market, and increasingly it is going to be more just-in-time delivery. That's not to bring something very, very new and innovative to you, but it's paramount that we get the product to market. Okay?

The highway is within our control. The ports are not within our control, and quite frankly that's where we're losing the highest percentage of sales. We're the most inefficient country when it comes to transporting our goods as compared to the other G-7 countries, and it's getting worse. So that's where part of the problem is. If you've been following some of the statistics coming out of the States, you'll see that they'll be generating a surplus of about $200 billion by the year 2010. So they're going to be in the market for more value-added products, and we will have an ability to deliver just in time many of our products.

In Mexico, a huge investment in education, and if you watch, many of the communications companies in the high tech are building their manufacturing facilities in Mexico. We're going to have to partner and do business with that country as well.

Now, in the operating expense the project costs for the sections of the north/south trade corridor that were constructed within the cities were budgeted as operating expenses as opposed to a capital investment since we as a government did not own the highways in those cities. But now we will be taking over the highway. We'll be maintaining it. We'll be building it. As a result, we're showing it as a capital expense in our budget.

The policy on priority setting and secondary highways. What we're committed to do and have done with rural municipalities is we've partnered with them and consulted with them on their planning and also on the kind of priority-setting they did in terms of what they found to be the most important secondary highways they would like to have paved in their county or municipality. We do have a rule that before a secondary road is paved, they must have at least 200 vehicles per day.

MS OLSEN: To be a secondary road?

MR. STELMACH: No; to be paved. A lot of these secondaries were designated back in the late '70s, early '80s. If I remember correctly, some municipalities, depending on the density of the population, designated secondaries at just about – what? – seven-mile intervals. Some municipalities have all of their secondaries paved, but others don't, depending on the sparsity of the population.

There will be some secondary roads, I'm sure, that will receive a final pavement that may have less than 200, but these will be roads that conduct a whole bunch of seasonal truck traffic especially. I can't pick one right off the top of my head. We look at the necessity of moving goods and services, so there may be some changes here and there, but generally speaking, we look at that target. The other is to tie regions of the province together. We look at that as well in terms of developing a good trade route.

The other thing – and we don't have much say in it – is that many of the companies have set up large grain handling facilities outside of the traditional small villages and towns. They've just plunked them out in rural Alberta. Yes, next to a railway but not necessarily in a village. Unfortunately in some of those situations there was very little consultation with the province, but we're now obligated to look at what secondaries have been designated and see if those secondaries that lead to these facilities require pavement.

Given the fact that we will be taking over secondary roads officially, both maintenance and construction, we're still committed to the municipalities, to listen to their priorities. So if the municipality prioritizes the secondary for either rehab or new construction or paving, we certainly will take that into consideration, because the local municipality is the one that I feel really knows best the kind of needs that they have to deliver on.

The secondary highway takeover is going to generate about $85 million for municipalities. They're going to save 25 percent off the paving, plus we will be doing all of the maintaining. So that is why there are some differences in the budgets here: they won't have their responsibility. We feel for a couple of reasons that really the secondaries should form part of the provincial highway network in the future. The reason we say that is because a secondary highway is the same colour as a primary highway. It's got the same lines. It has a different number. It pretty well has a three-digit number as opposed to a primary, with a single or double-digit number.

As well, we have had different regulatory regimes applied on secondaries. I used this example a number of times. If you take secondary 831 from Lamont north to Fort McMurray and if you are a trucker, you phone Lamont and say: "Well, what's your road ban?" "Oh, 90 percent." So you load pipe to 90 percent and drive through the county of Lamont. You cross the river and into the county of Smoky Lake. Their road ban may be 85 percent. Do you stop, unload pipe, throw it in the ditch? Do you turn around? There's basically no difference in weather conditions. It's just an imaginary line on a map, a different municipality, and many times no really significant scientific reason for the change in the road ban, only that it's our municipality and this is how we set our road ban. There were four municipalities that had secondary 831 going through them. So this is going to lead to a much better regulatory regime and a smoother transport of those goods.

As well, at the moment we're working with the municipalities and working out the kind of standards for grass-cutting, weed control, snow removal, crack-filling, et cetera. I think that probably in a couple of months we'll bring most of the negotiations to a close. The outstanding portion, though, is still centred around the policing, and we're working very closely with the RCMP. The RCMP is the provincial policing authority on all highways, and this will continue, but we will also be consulting with them in terms of how we're going to work with them in terms of enforcing some of the weights, dimensions, and many of the moving violations on those roads.

The authority of special constables on secondary highways will be phased out no later than perhaps September of 2001, but we'll be continuing to negotiate with Justice and Infrastructure and the municipalities.

I want to jump ahead to the areas of traffic safety and policing. I have to admire the RCMP for doing the traffic collision study done from Wetaskiwin south to the American border and to the B.C. and Saskatchewan borders. Clearly that study indicated that given the limited resources we have, we can't put police everywhere at any moment. It's impossible. Where do we focus those resources? The study indicated that the number one reason for fatalities and collisions in the province of Alberta is failing to stop at stop signs or going through red lights. The second is the whole issue of not paying attention to the road. I'm repeating myself for Colleen; I was at the same convention she was at.

The issue of not paying attention of course has many areas of concern, and there are many reasons for not paying attention. The first things that come to the minds of people could be cell phones, applying makeup, shaving. You know, hitting trucks parked on the side of the road tells me that somebody is not paying attention.

As well, in rural Alberta the higher ratio of fatalities and injuries is also related to the fact that fewer rural Albertans wear seat belts, and minor rollovers have resulted in fatalities and also serious injury. When I say minor, you know, at a slow speed a vehicle rolls over and it happens to roll over the occupant as they fly out of the vehicle because they don't wear a seat belt.

The other issue is centred around drunk driving. I heard some very good news today – maybe some lawyers don't like it – a little note from British Columbia that the Supreme Court did not wish to hear a case that was brought forward from B.C. in terms of the administrative licence suspension. They said that they don't have time for it, that it's not really a significant national issue, I guess. That, I hope, is going to reduce the number of drunk drivers and give the police another instrument to use on the road. They have also told us, this being the RCMP, that it takes quite a while to process a drunk-driving charge because many times they have to haul in the driver. It takes a number of hours, and in the meantime something else could be happening. So this administrative licence suspension is something that they really supported. We'll monitor it, and I hope that it reflects the same kind of reduction in drunk driving as we've seen in the provinces that adopted that policy a number of years ago.

The issue of speeding was way down the list in the study. Now, there are some people that will be looking at that information that they've compiled and, as I said before, starting to focus the resources. In the cities, as you know, with all of the cameras that we have at stop lights, the red-light cameras, there's hardly a complaint. There are nice big signs saying: camera up ahead. There's a tremendous reduction. You know, people actually stop. They've been forewarned, and if you go through, somebody is going to take a picture of you. So that has worked very well for us.

The other question was with respect to the aboriginal school in Edmonton. [Mr. Stelmach's speaking time expired]

THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Once again, I hate being in this room, but I'm happy to be in the Infrastructure estimates, so take one and leave the other.

I would like to start, Mr. Minister, by thanking your staff. I certainly appreciate the fact that we can call and get answers. They're very pleasant. I've had two constituents call me and sing the praises of Mr. Boddez, so you'll get that in a letter. Anyway, I would like to thank your staff, not only your staff here in the Legislature but out in Stony Plain and Barrhead as well. When we call, they're most accommodating to my constituents and to me as well, so kudos to them. It truly makes my job easier when we can get information. I don't think we've ever abused that either. So I thank you for that.

I have quite a few questions to ask tonight. I'd like to ask: if we don't have time, can I possibly give them to you at the end?

MR. STELMACH: Yes.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you. I appreciate that.

I'd like to start with Milk River. As you know – and you and I have talked about this before – I am very concerned. I think the wrong decision has been made to go on the west side. It's going on the west side now; isn't it? I'd really like to see a definite reason why you changed the plan from going on the east side. I've heard all kinds of things from the community. It has split this community. We have people saying that it was political influence rather than what was practical, that many farms are being disrupted, will be lost, whereas going on the other side, there would have been a hill and a graveyard that would have been affected. I know that those people are very distraught. They're now looking at legal action.

About the executive summary that I got. I think that's all you got. If there's a more complete study of Milk River done, I haven't seen a cost analysis that includes the price of the farms, buying them out, moving the railroad, all the things that it is going to take to change the route of that highway to the west side over the east side. So I urge you to rethink it, because this has split this community, and that's sad. It's a wonderful little community. I was down there this summer.

With the information I've received from you, just looking at it like that, I think the wrong decision has been made. Now, maybe there's a piece of this I haven't seen, that I can't get. I'd really like to see the real cost-benefit analysis that includes the part about buying out those farms. I'd like to weigh out the reality of uprooting generations of people from a farm as opposed to maybe interfering with somebody's vision of a dinosaur at a travel information station. I urge you to rethink that one.

I want to speak for a moment about highway 794. The first third of that was done: through Sturgeon county. My understanding of it is that the next third will be done and then the final third. As you're probably aware, there was a bus accident on it last week – it was a bit foggy – interestingly enough, at the very spot where a woman has been asking the county to put up a sign that there are children there, that it's a bus area. The county isn't moving on it, but I think that as of April 1 your department will be taking that over. I know there are criteria for signs, that it has to be a curve or a hill or where trees block the vision. This spot doesn't qualify for it. When we're widening highway 794, we might look at a different access to that farmer's home and the three mobile homes that are near it.

I'm hoping that when the design for 794 is done – I know that for the first third the community had input into it. The engineer said to me that this was the most agreeable community they've ever had to work with to build a highway. That tells you the demand there was for fixing that highway. That is nothing that should surprise anyone in this room who has heard me for seven years.

That one spot just north of Rivière Qui Barre was the scene of an accident this past week. Some of my family members were involved in it. Not that that makes a difference. No matter who gets hurt, it affects all of us. I'm looking forward to the completion of 794.

I want to speak for a moment about Queen Street school. You and I have spoken about that before. It's a tremendously old and inefficient building, and from my understanding it is slated for modernization, but the reality is that that wouldn't be practical. I know that the school board is asking for Grove Meadow school. They could sell the location at Queen Street school. They have a buyer for it; it's in the downtown area of Spruce Grove. Grove Meadow could be built. I know that is their request. That's their number one priority this year.

Interestingly enough, there was to be a sod-turning about four years ago, and political powers that be – it was stopped, which I don't think is very fair, but the reality is that it happened. Now, whether it's true or not, I have had a few different people come to me from the community and say that the Member for Stony Plain has said that over his dead body would that school be built. Now, I would like to know what influence any MLA, much less a member of the Crown, would have on the building of a new school. So I am asking you: how does a building get built? What are the priorities? I would like to know . . .

MR. WOLOSHYN: Point of order, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN: Point of order, and that would be what?

MR. WOLOSHYN: Standing Order 23(i) or (j), imputing motives. The school that she is referring to – and she has never been so far off base in her whole life as she is today.

MRS. SOETAERT: Are you saying that you never said it, Stan?

MR. WOLOSHYN: That is correct.

MRS. SOETAERT: Okay. I'll get somebody in here.

MR. WOLOSHYN: You get anybody you want in here. The school was not built because it didn't have the numbers to warrant it. [interjections]

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. members, you obviously have a difference of opinion. I don't know, hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert, whether bringing other people into the issues that you're attempting to deal with is getting you very far, but I would suggest that probably for decorum and efficiency purposes, it would be better to deal with your own issues without bringing other members into it.

MRS. SOETAERT: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The reality is that I'm wondering how priorities are set in the building of schools and what influence people have on those, so I'm asking. There must be a procedure through the department.

AN HON. MEMBER: There is a procedure.

MRS. SOETAERT: I realize that, and you can talk after me if you like. It's a very close room, and I usually create some heat in here.

The reality is that that buzz is out in the community, so I'd like a real commitment from the minister that school building construction is based on the priorities that Parkland school division has set and not political influence at the upper level. So that's the commitment I would like from you. [interjections]

I would like to continue on with the issue of licence plates. I know that motion is coming up. I'm hoping your department has talked about it. I'm hoping that your government will support that motion. I've had a lot of . . .

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. members. Hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert, we have a great debate going on down here, and some people have forgotten their manners as well as decorum. I wonder if the hon. members for Lesser Slave Lake, Edmonton-Norwood, and Stony Plain could resume their conversations outside the Chamber. It's a difficult room to work in, as the hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert reminded us in the first place, but it's even more difficult when we talk. This is not family dinner.

I wonder if Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert could continue, without the aid and assistance of other members.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was asking about licence plates front and back. [interjection] Either way you want it. Here we go. That's what people have been asking for. [interjections] I just bet Hansard has a hoot reading it when I'm in here.

However, I want to speak about the overpass at Campsite Road. That's been a priority of the city of Spruce Grove for a long time. However, the one at Stony Plain went up before the one at Campsite, though the original switch was planned. So you can tell that I could start to feel just a little frustrated despite all the little manipulations of the powers that be. You know, I got elected despite no school and no overpass, so maybe this time that wouldn't be a factor in it. I'd appreciate that.

The other thing. The overpass at Century Road. It's interesting. Coming off the Yellowhead, to turn left to go into Spruce Grove, you have to be out on the road before you can see if anyone is coming. So I don't know how they'd fix that. I hate to criticize an engineer with years of experience behind him. But try entering Spruce Grove from that way and it's actually quite dangerous. You have to get your nose right out there before you can turn.

Utilization rate of schools. I had a meeting with the St. Albert Protestant school board, and their question and concern was that overall the school division has a low utilization rate, that doesn't necessarily reflect the needs of the community. For example, Bellerose comp is at about 110 percent capacity, and some of the other ones are at, like, 44 percent. So they've got this dilemma of needing to upgrade Lorne Akins desperately – it's in bad shape – and they've got the reality of crowded high school kids. They're very crowded at Bellerose comp. Now, I know, thanks to the work of your department and the help they gave and the school/parent council out there, they will be adding on a portable and a wing that hopefully will address their needs by this fall. So that's good. That resolved the Bellerose comp issue, but they still have older buildings, and their question to me was: how does government pick a school in St. Albert and a school here? Do they take one from each school division? How do you prioritize which schools get addressed in which year, and how do you divide that amongst the different school boards? So that would be my question to you about that.

One of the things that you said the MDs would be doing now that they're not doing: the maintenance. You're doing all the maintenance of secondary and primary highways across them. [interjection] You will be? Well, now, what about those MDs who have their own equipment and want to do their own? I believe there are a few, and I'm wondering how you resolve that, because I don't think it's fair to send them with their equipment and their employees, et cetera. So I would ask you how you are addressing that.

I am pleased to see that they're finally not allowing people to ride in the back of pickup trucks. I know you caught a bit of flak over it, but that's one thing you didn't catch flak on from me or any of my colleagues. So thank you for having the courage to go through with that.

Also, while I was at the Alberta Safety Council, one of the bigger owner/operators of the buses said that the reality of finding good staff at 9 bucks an hour is pretty tough, because when the economy is good, lots of people have work. They can't get qualified people to drive for 9 bucks an hour, and they can't afford to pay them any more; I mean, the realities of running a bus. I realize the budget of bus transportation is not yours, but I know you're also responsible for the safety. That's pretty precious cargo that these people are carrying every day, and I would venture to say that we want people keen for the job. I would think consistency on the job would be important in that one because of the reality of the safety of the kids and the disciplining of kids on the bus. That was my part of the speech, I guess, that day. So I'd appreciate your input on that.

One of the concerns that I think I wrote you a letter on was that in one of the MDs they were paid to go down a road and then had to lift their blade through a Métis settlement and then put their blade down again. Is there an agreement with . . .

MR. STELMACH: You wrote to me?

MRS. SOETAERT: Yes, I'm sure I did. You know what? I'll look it up, because I'm sure I sent it – about the reality of those agreements, because it was foolish to have separate equipment go out for the Métis settlement in the Lesser Slave area, I think.

9:16

MR. STELMACH: Where?

MRS. SOETAERT: In the Lesser Slave area, I think. But you know what? I'll find the letter, and I'll send it to you.

I do appreciate, Mr. Minister, your prompt reply with your letters, the information that we get from your department, and the very amicable working relationship that we have.

I've raised some of the concerns about the reality of how Spruce Grove's feelings about things are very, very sincere and very worrisome for me. I would appreciate your assurances, particularly on those issues. So I thank you for that.

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. minister, do you wish to reply?

MR. STELMACH: Yeah. I'd like to get to the questions from the hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert. Maybe I'll cover some of the questions as we move along.

I just want to thank the hon. member for the recognition of our staff. I'm very proud of our staff. Many times they hear only the negative, and it's very refreshing to hear someone give them a nice pat on the back and praise, so I thank you. It makes my evening.

I'm going to get to the questions that you had, but I just want to deal with some of the issues raised by the Member for Edmonton-Norwood. It was one about fatigue management, the compromise in terms of are the truck drivers going to be longer on the road and the comparison to the New England state and whether we're going to have additional problems with the north/south trade corridor.

With respect to truck safety. With the volume of truck traffic, that has increased in the province of Alberta, I would submit that our fatality and collision statistics certainly can be improved upon, but given that huge increase, I think the stats at least are trending the right way, and that is down. We met recently with the partners in compliance people. This is a group of truckers who are members of the trucking industry working in partnership with government, trying to establish an authority that will get more truck companies to participate in their group, setting out very clear goals and strategies and helping them to accomplish them in terms of truck safety. It means training in simple things like how you check your load before leaving, wheels, dealing with fatigue. Those are very important.

We are going to be providing some resources for them in partnership. We'll be putting some on the table, and so will the companies. I think we realize that reputation is at stake here. Also, numerous times the companies do their own audits in terms of safety. Those suppliers that are using those carriers are very careful, and they look at those audits very carefully to ensure that they're using the trucking company that's providing the safest service, because it's key in terms of their reputation as well.

The compromise in terms of higher fuel costs: are they going to be on the road longer? If they're on the road longer, they just burn more fuel, so I would think they're probably more apt to be hauling more weight. You know, that's where we would have to be more diligent in terms of the measurement of the weights.

I did not drive through New England myself, but there's a significant difference in the load factor. I can't remember the statistic quite correctly from when I was in agriculture, but I believe the load factor in California at that time was maxed at 80,000, and we were at 120,000. As a result, yes, less load on the truck but more trucks on the road. That's the debate we're having through the Ministry of Justice and also intergovernmental affairs . . .

MRS. McCLELLAN: Relations.

MR. STELMACH: Oh, relations. I have rural affairs; you have relations.

MRS. McCLELLAN: Sad but true.

MR. STELMACH: . . . in terms of working out an agreement on what would be the common load factor in Alberta and the States. In talking to the Californians, they said that they wanted to keep the weight down as much as possible to restrict the amount of goods coming to California because the lighter the load, the more cost for volume of what's hauled. So it's more of a trade restriction than a safety issue. I think we will be able to resolve those issues. The heavier load does not necessarily mean that there's some safety issue attached to that.

The hours of service: the number of hours of service a driver can work is limited by federal regulation. Drivers are required to keep logbooks. Hours of service are enforced by the department. There is a proposal to clarify and to simplify the hours of service rules. There is a committee that's been meeting on that, but we are supporting the change in the rules.

With respect to fatigue management, a fatigue management program should be available as a pilot project by late summer. The purpose of implementing fatigue management is to ensure that drivers pull over and rest when they are tired, not just when they're obligated to do it by regulation. This will add greatly to highway safety, because I do believe some of the accidents are a result of fatigue.

I will deal with the question with respect to the aboriginal school in Edmonton. Presently in the Edmonton public system 57 out of approximately 200 schools are operating at less than 50 percent capacity. So more than a quarter of the schools: less than 50 percent capacity. The students for the proposed aboriginal school would all come from the Edmonton public region, which means that those schools that would be feeding students would be emptier as a result of those students coming to one central school.

The requests received for new school construction are in the area of $500 million to $550 million, and in this particular area it wasn't a request for a new school in terms of building a new school; they were looking at leasing a facility. The cost, if I remember correctly, would be about a million a year for 20 years, so that's $20 million. I think if you were to invest $20 million over 20 years in a building, you'd probably get more value out of it than in this particular case.

Now, there are some good examples of leased space like we have downtown in Centre high: 2,000 students, with approximately 1,600 students completing their courses. These are fourth and fifth year high school students. There are some very strict rules that are put in place for those students to attend. The performance and the achievement is quite good for those students in fourth and fifth year. Centre high really adapts to the needs of the students. Many of them are working. Some of them are alone in this city. They are here from as far away as the province of Manitoba, Ontario. We toured that school, and we did talk to some of those students. Being able to complete their high school program in a setting which allows them not only to work some hours a day but also to complete their studies helps them not only to complete grade 12, but it enables them then to proceed further in any other postsecondary institution of their choice.

There's about $40 million this year in the new school construction. Getting to the priorities, utilization is of course a key factor. I know that we are revisiting the whole utilization formula. That was one of the key recommendations coming out of the School Facilities Task Force. I'm certainly not going to prejudge what the decision will be. All I know is that we have to look at what the issues are in urban Alberta and also in rural Alberta. In rural Alberta attaining some of the high utilization we're asking for means closure of schools and in many cases transporting students great distances, and that's not, I believe, appropriate. What is considered an appropriate length of school bus ride? I don't know. I know I spent many hours on a school bus, and, I mean, I'm here.

MRS. SOETAERT: It was the bus driver. Didn't you say that you learned most of what you needed in the bus? I heard that in a speech.

MS OLSEN: What did you learn, Mr. Minister?

MR. STELMACH: I don't know whether it was academic or not. [interjections]

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. members, I think you're going to drive either the chairman or the Hansard staff crazy. There are about five people entering into a conversation, and we are still in committee. I wonder if the minister could continue without all the help he's receiving.

MR. STELMACH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. With respect to the Calgary board of education, I do have to say that the Calgary board is looking at rationalization of their underutilized schools. Seven of their schools that are underutilized are being closed. There are some issues. You know, to close an inner-city school, what happens to the land? It's considered almost to be park area, et cetera. How do you deal with the ever increasing expansion in outlying areas and the needs? So the Calgary board and the city of Calgary are working together.

We as the Department of Learning have representation with ASBA, ASBOA, which is the Alberta School Business Officials Association. We have CASS, which is the College of Alberta School Superintendents, and facility planners. I might have missed somebody else: ACSTA. Those particular groups. I know they've had one meeting for sure, if not two, and they will be proceeding on utilization. That's key.

By the time we get the utilization recommendations forwarded to us, we'll have most of the audit complete on the 1,460 school buildings. Then we'll be able to collate all of that information and start rolling out a long-term plan both in preservation and new school construction, with the goal of being as equitable as possible across the province, because that's important.

Okay. In terms of safety, I'm very high on walking the talk. That has been very positive. Really what that is is allowing parents to walk the route to school with the students and just highlighting what dangers there may be on that route. I'm also proud to say that at this time we are trending down in terms of the vehicles rendered out of service in the school bus inspections. In the PIC program the last inspection done, last quarter, was zero. Okay? If we can maintain close to zero, that I think is an excellent goal. It can't get any better than that.

I do realize the issue you had put on the table with respect to dependable drivers: who can you hire? The easy thing for me to say is: well, we fund school boards. I know there are some pressures there today because those bus drivers have to compete for qualified people, trained staff, and also they are paying considerably higher fuel prices now. We'll keep working with the school boards. We promised the contractors that we'll look at some options as to how to deal with this situation.

There are other things that came up. One is centred around the training of drivers and also the S3 endorsement. Most of the school boards do enforce the S endorsement, but there are some that don't. We want to work with those to see if we can get a common standard right across the province of Alberta.

With respect to fatality rates and injury: what are we doing? The province of Alberta is probably a bit unique. I don't know if I can give you any real scientific evidence on some of the reasons our fatality rates are unacceptable, but we do travel greater distances from community to community compared to some of the other provinces. I would say we are more affluent, with faster vehicles. We want to get there faster than what may be legal. We are also looking at the number of inexperienced drivers, no matter what age – we're just talking about inexperienced drivers – and looking at the graduated licence program and introducing that into the province of Alberta. Again, if it's anything like the administrative licence program, if we can get those same results: a 30-some percent reduction, as Ontario has seen, in collisions; I don't know about fatalities, but certainly collisions. Their insurance rates have really dropped considerably in Ontario as a result. That would go a long way in reducing some of those fatalities.

In terms of seat belts and the use of seat belts, you know, we'll just have to monitor that and enforce it. When I think of my own constituency this last year, we had a young lady who left four kids behind. In her case it wasn't a seat belt; it was just driving out of the yard early in the morning with her husband, not thinking anybody would be out that early in the morning on a country road, and not stopping at a stop sign. Boom. The same thing with another lady crossing highway 16. These were all stop sign violations. Now, whether they stopped and didn't see, I don't know. But stopping violations are the most serious, and we'll have to really concentrate on that.

With respect to Milk River, I will give you a response to Milk River only because it's part of the budget, not Milk River itself but the north/south trade corridor. As I said before, that was a very difficult decision for our department and for me personally, but we had to bring the decision to a close. We had to make it.

It didn't matter which side of the highway we went on, we would be uprooting families. As you mentioned, on one side there was a graveyard, and there is also a secondary highway on the other side. There is a sewage lagoon. The community was worried about another interruption on the secondary highway leading into Milk River. But I made a commitment to the families there that we will be working with them and be fair and equitable in how we acquire those purchases. We personally visited the landowners ourselves just to get a feel for the land and for the homestead.

The reason it was difficult is that I know people have lived there many years, and you can put yourself in the same shoes. In my particular case, I'd probably be feeling the same way. I'd hate to be uprooted from the same yard where we've lived for a hundred years.

We'll continue to listen. There were more areas where we'd be intersecting land on the opposite side, considerably more.

MRS. SOETAERT: But not farmsteads. Just land.

MR. STELMACH: I don't remember farmsteads, but a lot of partitions of land and stuff like that.

THE CHAIRMAN: Do we have unanimous consent to allow the minister to finish this particular series of questions?

No? It's okay. Unanimous consent means that we have to have everybody.

Thank you, hon. minister.
Edmonton-Norwood.

MS OLSEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Minister, I'm not sure I feel comfortable that you've answered the question around the aboriginal school. What I heard you say – and please correct me if my interpretation is wrong – is that you would have preferred to put the money into building a school but that it's not a priority and because 25 percent of Edmonton schools have a utilization rate less than 57 percent, then this just isn't a viable alternative at this time.

I'm quite concerned. You talk about equity, and sometimes initiatives that are undertaken by communities and are community-driven are going to fare much better than initiatives undertaken by government.

I'm going to give you an example. There are schools up in the northeast part of this province that haven't graduated an aboriginal high school student for 20 years; some, if ever. We're looking at the ability right now of having a very well-renowned PhD from the aboriginal community come in as principal of an aboriginal high school, and we don't have a building for that.

We talk about commitment to crime prevention. We talk about being willing to give back religious and sacred artifacts. The Premier is willing to wear his headdress into the Legislature. There is a huge problem here, quite frankly, in terms of priorities. I'm concerned that if we as legislators really mean what we say and if we really believe in what's coming out of our mouths, this is one of those times when biting the bullet isn't such a bad idea.

If we're looking at mentorship programs, if we want to see more young people in the aboriginal community, which is the fastest growing population in this country – those kids will be in line to be leaders 20 years from now. They'll be sitting around this table; they'll be sitting around other tables. They will be part of the leadership in this country.

What we're looking at is the potential for 600 kids to complete high school, 600 kids from the aboriginal community. To me $20 million over 20 years is a drop in the bucket to what you're going to pay for each one of those kids if they end up on the other side of the system. I'm not quite sure how you're weighing the cost of that: $20 million worth of capital versus the cost of many of those kids not making it in society.

I'm just wondering where the priorities are. If we really believe that education is a key component, if we believe in crime prevention, if we believe in addressing the issues of poverty, if we believe in all that – and I'm talking the global "we", the 83 of us that sit in that Legislature – we're going to miss the boat here if we say $20 million is just too much money over 20 years. So I really have a problem with that.

I'm hoping that the hon. member for Slave Lake, who is also . . .

MS CALAHASEN: Lesser Slave Lake.

MS OLSEN: Lesser. No, not Lesser.

MS CALAHASEN: Lesser Slave Lake.

MS OLSEN: I'm hoping that the hon. Member for Lesser Slave Lake will in fact come to bat for the community and stand up and say that a building is a building and in this particular case will do a whole lot more good than it would damage.

I think the total cost overall of having an uneducated population is far more excessive. You just have to go over and look at EYOC, and that's the cost. Add the cost of every kid in there. Forty percent of those kids are aboriginal kids. I have difficulty with this whole process. It's not a lot of money when you look at the long term. Maybe we should figure out what the cost of 40 percent of that population in EYOC is right now.

My next issue is that when you look at what's happened in the northeast United States in terms of the truck traffic and their trade corridors, part of the problem is the large distribution centres that have emerged everywhere. They're off those main truck routes; they're in small towns. It's been great in creating employment. Huge companies will create large distribution centres. I could not believe the truck bays in some of these places; they're phenomenal. There's no reliable rail transportation around there.

As we diversify in this province – you talked already about, you know, the large grain distribution centres going into the small towns near the railway – I'm wondering if there's an overall plan to look at the potential for this kind of thing to crop up down the road and what the government's, I guess, response to that would be. If you have large distribution centres emerging along the trade corridor, you're going to have a tremendous amount of truck traffic that you might not have anticipated. So just a thought. We're looking at our future in terms of growth and density.

A couple more questions. The issue about having one highway to and from Fort McMurray has come up, and I'm not sure what the secondary highway – well, I don't think that's a secondary highway, because it's not paved. It's the highway that goes from Lac La Biche to Fort McMurray, and I can't for the life of me . . .

MR. STELMACH: Eight eighty-one?

MS OLSEN: Is that it? Yeah, 881. Okay. That's the alternative route. Is that targeted for rehab, or is that going to be paved?

MR. STELMACH: We're paving, yeah.

MS OLSEN: Okay. That was just a concern I had. There were a lot of issues brought up about the closure of the other road between Fort McMurray and Lac La Biche.

9:46

The traffic safety review. Did the fines go up with the new Traffic Safety Act, the overall fines for traffic violations and that kind of thing?

MR. STELMACH: Some did.

MS OLSEN: I can get the specified penalties list; I just couldn't remember whether or not that happened.

In the old Highway Traffic Act, sections 123(a) and (b), which are driving without due care and attention or driving without due consideration for others on the highway, I think it was a $150 fine or compulsory court appearance. You talked about the review that the RCMP did, and one issue was driving without due care and attention. I'm just wondering if that might necessitate a compulsory court appearance as opposed to just the ability to levy a $150 fine, if that might be another option in terms of looking at dealing with some of those.

I'm not necessarily certain that you need to come up with another section to prohibit using cellular phones. I think that's covered. I think that fine is absolutely satisfactory in that area. I'm just wondering if the increase in fine may have occurred or just a straight compulsory court appearance might be an option to go to.

British Columbia has an incredible Check Stop program. What happens is that the RCMP are paid by the province for that special duty work. Wherever you go on a Friday or Saturday night in Vancouver, Victoria, everywhere I went anyway – I was glad that I wasn't somebody imbibing alcohol. They're sure to get caught, absolutely sure to get caught. It seems to me they have a huge program there. In fact, one of the RCMP officers did say that this was a provincial program where the province paid for the officers' Check Stops. I don't know what the cost of that program is, but in terms of reducing drinking and driving, impaired driving, I think that's an effective tool.

I understand that my colleague from Edmonton-Gold Bar has some questions. One more prior to that. You talked about red-light cameras. You've seen reductions with the red-light cameras. Well, the red-light cameras are static, so people are always going to know they're there. They're not moving around like photoradar. I'm a huge believer in photoradar, as are most police officers that I know. [interjection] Well, I used to belong to a gang of 1,100.

I would encourage this government to use photoradar. I do believe it is a safety instrument. I do believe that it does work. I don't believe it's a cash cow. I believe . . .

MR. STELMACH: On provincial highways?

MS OLSEN: Yes. I believe the cash is a by-product of a traffic safety program. Not that I spent a lot of time giving out radar tickets, because I didn't, but I do believe there's huge, huge merit in the program. It does work.

With that I'll leave it. Mr. Minister, I've taken a few moments of my colleague's time, and I'm just wondering if maybe you could answer me in writing or something.

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. minister, do you wish to respond either orally or in writing?

MR. STELMACH: Most of the response will be written, but I just want to clarify. I think the hon. member said that a quarter of the schools I talked about are 57 percent. It's less than 50 percent utilization.

I'm not arguing about the merit of the program. I think there's some opportunity there. On the other hand, we've got the empty space, so why not use some of that space? There may be a possibility of looking at it. We'll look at it. If it's a program similar to how Centre high works, it's got good achievement levels. But we'll be looking at it.

MS OLSEN: I'll be bothering you about it.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. . . . I'm sorry, Mr. Minister. Did you complete your . . .

MR. STELMACH: Well, they asked more questions, so we'll give them the opportunity.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay, but we do have other people who have indicated that they were interested in asking questions.

Was that what your hand was?

MR. STELMACH: I will say that we're supposed to bring this to a close in about five minutes, so if there are any outstanding questions that have not been asked, if they could be given to us in writing, we're more than happy to respond to them. I know some of our members didn't have much of a chance to ask, so we'd like to give everyone an opportunity.

I'd then just like to move that we rise and report.

MRS. SOETAERT: No, it's not 10 o'clock yet. If I may, Mr. Chairman . . .

THE CHAIRMAN: Actually, if you have a motion – did I hear the motion or did I not?

MRS. SOETAERT: Could the minister at least answer some of our questions for five minutes before we adjourn? I'd like to hear an answer about Queen Street school.

MR. STELMACH: Oh, sure. You will hear it in four minutes.

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. minister, if you wish to answer the questions, yes, you have time and you may do so. If you wish to listen to more questions, fine.

MR. STELMACH: Given that we have an agreement to bring this to a close after I answer the issue raised, questions with respect to Queen Street school in Spruce Grove.

I had the pleasure of visiting Spruce Grove with the hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert. Incidentally, thank you for supporting us on riding in the back of pickup trucks. I thought the lunch was worth while for that.

The criteria as exist today on new school construction – and I say as exist today, because we are reviewing the utilization rates and how that will apply in terms of the decision-making. But there are enrollment pressures in the system, looking at the required changes for new technology in the existing school and also the need for ancillary space like gymnasiums, et cetera.

I didn't visit Queen Street school personally, but I think one of the things we'll be looking at is just seeing – after we get this inventory, we'll have all the ages of the schools and also the kind of modernization, et cetera, that will be required. Sometimes there will be a saw-off in terms of if it costs X amount to modernize, what is the cost of replacement?

In this particular area I know that the school is situated in a place, in a community where the town looks at the space as being valuable for a seniors' centre. That's one of the positive advantages of this department because, quite frankly, when Spruce Grove as a municipality came to see us, after a few minutes of discussion – well, at first they came to us talking about a seniors' drop-in centre, not knowing that we were talking to the school board. We asked them to go see the school board. The school board now has talked to the municipality, and I think there's some pressure there in terms of: okay, now let's work with each other to see how we both might meet the needs. I don't recall Parkland's priority list though. [interjection] Okay, but they would have to have it on their priority list.

MRS. SOETAERT: It's their top priority.

MR. STELMACH: As replacement or what?

MRS. SOETAERT: Replacement.

MR. STELMACH: Okay. That's where we're at today.

MRS. SOETAERT: So does a school board have that priority then? Like, you listen to their priority lists?

MR. STELMACH: Yes. You know, we look at their priority lists, of course again looking at some of the other criteria in terms of the utilization factor, some of their space requirements, enrollment pressures. In this particular case, the school audit will also tell us the condition of the building, all of the buildings. We rated them from – I don't know what point we started at, but they go as high as 1,100. So we did the schools. The first 33 schools were the worst, at let's say 900 to 1,000.

MRS. SOETAERT: These were across the province?

MR. STELMACH: Across the province. Across school boards. Yes.

MRS. SOETAERT: Okay. So you decide which ones are done. The school boards all put them in, and you decide.

MR. STELMACH: For modernization, according to the audit, unless the school board wants to close a particular school. They may want to close one because of low enrollment, and of course we wouldn't be proceeding with the modernization. Okay? Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, I believe we'd like to rise and report.

THE CHAIRMAN: All right. The hon. Minister of Infrastructure has moved that the subcommittee do now rise and report. All those in support of this motion, please say aye.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Aye.

THE CHAIRMAN: Those opposed, please say no.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: No.

THE CHAIRMAN: Carried.

We'll reconvene in the Assembly in committee stage.

[The subcommittee adjourned at 10 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Thursday, March 9, 2000 1:30 p.m.
Date: 00/03/09

[The Speaker in the chair]

head: Prayers

THE SPEAKER: Good afternoon.

Let us pray. Lord, renew us with your strength. Focus us in our deliberations. Challenge us in our service of the people of this great province. Amen.

Please be seated.

head: Introduction of Visitors

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly Mr. Aart Verdegaaal, consul general of the Kingdom of Netherlands based in Vancouver. Accompanying him is Honorary Consul General Mr. Rikke Dootjes, based here in Edmonton.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta and the Netherlands have a longstanding relationship. Two-way trade between Alberta and the Netherlands totaled over $242 million in 1998, and the Netherlands is Alberta's 11th largest export market. Many companies from our province conduct business in the Netherlands, and we have many Dutch companies active in Alberta as well.

Mr. Speaker, members would know that Dutch settlers came to Alberta in the early 1900s, and today we have over 140,000 Albertans of Dutch descent. Next year Alberta will be sending between 20 and 25 delegates, leaders from the volunteer sector, to the World Volunteer Conference in Amsterdam.

On behalf of all Albertans I want to wish our honoured guests a very productive and enjoyable stay in our province. Mr. Speaker, they are seated in your gallery. I would ask them to rise and receive the customary warm welcome of this Assembly.

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

MR. STELMACH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to table this afternoon a response to Written Question 1 from the MLA for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

Thank you.

1:40

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Resource Development.

DR. WEST: Yes. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to table copies of motions for returns 5 and 9. These are the answers.

MR. DOERKSEN: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the MLA committee which is doing a service review of the Workers' Compensation Board, I wish to table copies of questionnaires that have been distributed to all members of the Legislature. We're asking them to help us in the distribution of these to injured workers. They will be receiving a covering letter in the next day or two which indicates that we'd like the questionnaires back by April 30, and an address is attached with that covering letter.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the result of a FOIP request I would like to table this letter from the hon. Member for Airdrie-Rocky View. It's a letter to a constituent regarding the government's role in the pine shakes issue.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm delighted to table this afternoon written summaries from a number of meetings held by the Calgary regional health authority in the city of Calgary. These include a town hall meeting at Glamorgan Community Association, February 19, a town hall meeting at Annie Gale junior high school on February 12, and a meeting with educational partners on February 16.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the appropriate number of copies of three separate reports prepared by the Liberal opposition, and I'd like to table them with the Assembly. The first is a report which shows the analysis of the 11 percent flat tax and its unfair distribution and how it is really a windfall for the wealthy in this province.

The second report, Mr. Speaker, is an analysis of the impact of the federal government tax measures in Alberta. What it demonstrates is that fully 52.3 percent of tax savings under the Alberta tax plan are attributed to actions taken by the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, the final report that I have today is an analysis showing the utilization of the fiscal dividend for the years 2000-2001 through 2002-2003. What this report demonstrates is that while the provincial government has spent 12 percent of the fiscal dividend on tax cuts, in fact the federal government has spent 42 percent of its fiscal dividend on tax cuts.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings today. The first tabling is from Lauderdale Community League, a letter to the Minister of Justice. In this letter they outline their frustrations over the number of adjournments that have occurred in a case that they are having with a former member of their executive board.

My second tabling, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, is an evidence package compiled by an Alberta injured worker. What he is mainly concerned with in this particular paper is discussion notes created by the CSRC, why these written notes are destroyed once the decision document is finalized.

Thank you very much.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

MS LEBOVICI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me great pleasure this afternoon to table an information package from the Canadian Union of Public Employees which indicates that there's a deadly virus on the loose, and that is for-profit health care.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I have two tablings. The first are letters from Nobby Sato and Carol Hechtenthal, who are very concerned about the provincial government allowing Genesis Land Development to develop a large resort in the Spray Lakes area of Kananaskis.

The second is a copy of a petition signed by 14 people from Calgary, Water Valley, and surrounding area. The petition says that they are "against commercial development, including the Genesis/Spray Lakes project in Kananaskis Country."

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Norwood.

MS OLSEN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the appropriate number of copies of a letter from Charles Davison of the law firm Abbey Davies Greaves Hunter Davison reporting his concerns about the loss of court reporters in Alberta courtrooms.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder.

MR. WHITE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the requisite number of copies of a letter that I sent to the hon. Minister of Resource Development outlining a potential policy change in the area of fuel tax that shows how the fuel tax could be reduced while still maintaining the treasury as it is presently.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table 11 letters from Albertans who are residents of the great city of Calgary, all opposing this government's policy on health care and Bill 11.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, I am pleased today to table five copies of a memo to all Members of the Legislative Assembly dated March 9, 2000, from myself regarding proclamation of amendments to the Conflicts of Interest Act.

head: Introduction of Guests

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Learning.

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you a gentleman from the constituency of Strathmore-Brooks. This gentleman goes to the University of Alberta, and he is the founding member of the first PC youth club in the high school which is in Brooks. I'd ask Kyle Franz to stand and receive the warm welcome of the Legislative Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray.

MR. BOUTILIER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Joining Kyle today is a constituent of Fort McMurray, Blake Robert. Blake is also in PC youth here in Alberta and also is heading up the leadership at the national level for communications. He attends Grant MacEwan College. I'd like to ask Blake to rise and receive the warm welcome of all legislators.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly a wonderful group of students from Brookwood elementary school in Spruce Grove. There are actually 79 visitors today. They're here with their teachers, Ray Shapka, Debbie McFarlane, Molly Benfield, Micheline Spencer; Bobbie Wandler, a student teacher; and also parent helpers Barb Kasper, Barb Baylis, Gaylene Gander, Daryl Cole, and Cathy Schoepp. They've had a wonderful tour today, and they told me that they're looking forward to coming back in the summertime. I would ask them all to please rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two groups that with your permission I'd like to introduce through you to all members of the Assembly today. The first is a group of senior citizens who have joined us today through the Canterbury Foundation. I believe they're residents of Canterbury Court and Canterbury Manor. I'm introducing them on behalf of my colleague from Edmonton-Riverview. I believe they are seated in the members' gallery, and I would ask our guests from the Canterbury Foundation to rise and be warmly received by this Assembly.

Also, Mr. Speaker, just over the noon hour I met with a group of, I believe, 34 visitors from Vegreville, who are all here as Friends of Medicare as well as friends of the public health care system. I believe they found themselves seats in the public gallery, and I would ask all of our guests from Vegreville who are here to help support public health care to please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly some students from NorQuest College in my constituency. That's formerly Alberta Vocational College. We have four students in all, Ellie Gray, Fania Streefkerk, Shannon Hopper, and Brenda Lands borough, and they're accompanied today by their instructor, Bruce Huebener. I would ask them to please rise and accept the warm and traditional welcome of the House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two introductions to make, with your permission. The first one is two persons, Jetta Badre and Colleen Taylor, who are parents of diabetic children and are here today to express their opposition to Bill 11 in various forms. I'll ask them to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

The second group of guests that I have the pleasure of introducing today is a large group of seniors from Vegreville. I would like to put their names on record, and once I've called their names, I'll ask them to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly: Harry Babchuk; Irvin Bablitz; Joan Bablitz; John, Bill, and Lil Czar; Lil Darling; Rosanna Decore; Pearl Decore; Ross Demkiw; Marie Dmytriw; Hilda Feschuk; John Garred; Mike Kavich; Caroline Knowles; Linda Haresevich; Albin Lukawiecki; Lil Lukawiecki; Olga Furkalo; and Alan Yaniv. I would ask them all to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly once more.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, it's totally unnecessary to introduce the same person twice.

head: Oral Question Period

THE SPEAKER: First main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Private Health Services

MRS. MacBETH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans are receiving their Bill 11 propaganda packages in the mail, even as we speak. The bill with the doctored notes in the margins and the accompanying public relations spin are all paid for with Albertans' own tax dollars. It is this Premier who is in fact sending out malicious information. So to the people who are watching on television, I'd ask them to turn to page 3 on the propaganda piece. My first question will be to the Premier. He says that he's going to ban private hospitals in section 1, but in section 2 he creates them. Does he actually think Albertans won't see through the trick in these two sections?

MR. KLEIN: Well, when you want to talk about untruths and misinformation, first of all, it is not a propaganda piece. There is no PR spin. It's very straightforward, Mr. Speaker. There is no malicious information contained in the report whatsoever. Again, those are just three points of the kind of misinformation that is being spewed out by the Liberals.

There is no contradiction, by the way, between part 1, section 1, "no person shall operate a private hospital in Alberta," and anything in section 2.

MRS. MacBETH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. So why does the Premier fail to explain truthfully that section two tier – sorry; that's a Freudian slip – section 2 will create a second tier of hospitals in this province?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, the bill clearly states that "no person shall operate a private hospital." So having said that and the bill having said that quite clearly, there can be nothing else in the bill that would ever purport to having a private hospital.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, why wouldn't the Premier just tell Albertans that "an approved surgical facility" is really a private hospital? Wouldn't that be being more honest with Albertans?

MR. KLEIN: Well, the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition should know all about private surgical facilities. Mr. Speaker, 37 surgical facilities were opened and operated when she was the minister of health. Thirty-seven. So if she didn't know what a surgical clinic was then, she had no business being the minister.

THE SPEAKER: Second main question. The Leader of the Official Opposition.

MRS. MacBETH: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We're not talking about surgical clinics; we're talking about private hospitals.

Last night at a town hall meeting in Calgary people wanted to know what Bill 11 will lead to. They don't trust the empty words and the vague assurances from the Premier nor from the chairman of the truth squads. So let's go to the bill itself again. I'd ask the people that are watching to turn to page 17 and the definition of private hospital in the bill. If a private hospital or a privately owned acute care facility, rather, were to deliver medical, diagnostic, and surgical facilities but not the emergency, wouldn't that be a private hospital in most people's minds?

MR. KLEIN: I go to section (q). It says a surgical facility "means a facility whose primary function is to provide a limited range of surgical services." That is happening right now in 47 surgical clinics, 37 of which were approved by the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition when she was the minister of health.

The kinds of services – I don't have the full range. I understand there are 140 different surgical procedures now being performed in surgical clinics. They range from varicose vein stripping to various ear operations, cataract surgery, therapeutic abortions. The list goes on and on. One hundred and forty different procedures are now performed in surgical clinics.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition was the minister of health. She was the minister of health, and under her watch some 37 surgical clinics were opened and operated.

Speaker's Ruling Decorum

THE SPEAKER: I'm sure that all those wonderful people who are watching would appreciate that when one hon. member is recognized to raise a question, there are no interruptions during the question. I'm sure that all those people who are watching will also appreciate that when one hon. member chooses to respond to the question, there should be no interruptions of that hon. member. All those wonderful people watching should also know that in fact is the rule of this Assembly.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, getting back to the Premier's own definition of private hospital in his own bill on page 17, under the Premier's definition if only three of these four services are delivered, that would not be a private hospital, and therefore that kind of facility would be allowed where there were medical, surgical, and diagnostic services delivered. Isn't that true?

MR. KLEIN: Well, I don't fully understand the question, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the Minister of Health and Wellness does, and I'll ask him to respond.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, I think the Premier has focused on it very well. The fact of the matter is that a surgical facility is described in the act as dealing with a limited, targeted, defined in a contract area of service in surgery. The references that are being thrown in for diagnosis and so forth: obviously there has to be a diagnosis before a surgery takes place. It is part of the process, and the hon. Leader of the Opposition, I'm sure, can gather that in.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, you know, the visitors here from Vegreville who've done an awful lot of work to take petitions around their community understand it. Does this Premier actually believe Albertans are so gullible that they won't see the loophole in this section that allows the door to be thrown open to private hospitals?

MR. KLEIN: Well, I find it very interesting that the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition is finally admitting that Albertans are intelligent enough to read the bill. A week ago she said Albertans were not intelligent enough to read the bill and understand it.

Mr. Speaker, if anyone has any questions relative to the interpretation of any section, they're welcome to phone. That's why we have taken the unprecedented step of mailing the bill out to every household, so that Albertans, if they're not clear on any section of this particular bill, can phone the toll-free number or write to their MLA, government or opposition, and get the clarification or phone the department of health and get the clarification. That's why we mailed the bill out.

You know, the Liberals have their spin on this particular bill, and their spin is that they don't like the fact that we have asked Albertans for their input. Right. They would rather . . . [interjections] Well, no. As I understand it, what he said: the only people who are to be believed are the Liberals. Well, that is dangerous, and that is very, very scary, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: Third main question. The Leader of the Official Opposition.

MRS. MacBETH: Well, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to selling this bill, it's not only the information that is missing; it's also this Premier who is missing in action. Is the real reason that the truth squad commanders are out there spinning this bill instead of the Premier because he's afraid of failing for the third time?

MR. KLEIN: The answer to that is no, Mr. Speaker. This bill is a government bill, and every member of this caucus is part of the bill. I'm doing my share every day in this Legislature. Well, today I got a note from, I guess, the question co-ordinator over there, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, saying, "Will you stay around? We have seven sets of questions for you." Right. Yesterday it was five sets. The day before that it was seven sets. The day before that it was seven sets of questions. I think I'm doing more than my job in speaking to this bill, because all of those questions are related to health care.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, given that the Premier couldn't be bothered to show up at two town hall meetings in Calgary and Edmonton this week, if this bill is going to supposedly protect public health care, why isn't he out there leading the charge instead of his truth squad commanders?

MR. KLEIN: Well, it's not a matter of leading the charge. The people who will lead the charge, Mr. Speaker, are the 3 million people of this province. They will lead the charge. They will be the final adjudicators of what is right and what is wrong.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberals can't stand the thought of Albertans, in an unprecedented move, having meaningful and wise input into a very important piece of legislation. They can't stand the thought, even to the point where the leader of the Liberal opposition said that Albertans aren't intelligent enough to understand the bill. I find that an insult.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are tired of this Premier's doublespeak, and they're tired of him missing in action on this bill. Will he come out to a town hall meeting with me in Calgary? He can pick the place. He can pick the time. Will he call an election or will he just keep hiding behind the people he promised to represent in this province?

MR. KLEIN: To answer the last question first: yes, I will call an election in the fullness of time, Mr. Speaker.

Relative to a debate, Mr. Speaker, I have said that when second reading of this bill is introduced, I will stand up in this Chamber – we have arranged to have the debate televised – and debate the bill in this Chamber.

I read back from Hansard the words spoken by the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo. It says:

Mr. Speaker, the point I'm making is simply this. In this Assembly, as rough as it may be around the edges, as tumultuous as it may be for 50 minutes four days a week, as unsatisfactory as it may be to those of us looking for concrete answers to specific questions, it's still the . . . best forum Albertans have.

And this is the forum I choose to use.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. interim leader of the third party.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Next to the definition of enhanced services on page 15 of the government's million dollar householder is a liner note which says, "People could not be charged extra for them." This liner note is either a deliberate attempt to mislead Albertans or a big time typo. In either case, it's a million dollar boondoggle. My questions are to the Premier. Is the government deliberately trying to mislead Albertans into believing that they won't pay extra for so-called enhanced services, or is this a big time typo that nevertheless misleads Albertans?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, first of all, the member is quite correct in that the line, not the text of the bill or the explanation, should be pointing to section (g) in the legislation. This, Mr. Speaker – and I think it's important to point this out – is one of the many very strong protections that there are in this legislation. The statement says, "These services would be part of delivering an insured service and people could not be charged extra for them," and that is correct when we talk about facility fees.

The facility fee section is another of the very important protections in this legislation, because it goes on to make very clear that in addition to the actual surgical services that people would be provided, they would not be charged for standard ward accommodation; they would not be charged for meals; they would not be charged for nursing services, laboratory, radiology services. The list goes on for another eight items, Mr. Speaker. So that is a very specific clause which outlines in black and white in the legislation what people will not have to pay extra for but will be provided with as part of the insured services.

DR. PANNU: Mr. Speaker, my next question is again to the Premier. I hope he will answer this one. Since this is not the only piece of misinformation in this householder – section 23, again, has a similar and even more misleading part to it – I ask the Premier: why doesn't the government recall this inaccurate householder, apologize to Albertans for the misinformation contained in it, and just withdraw it? What's wrong with that, Mr. Premier? Why won't you go ahead and do it?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the third party shows a total and absolute disrespect for this Assembly. A bill is the most important document that can ever be introduced in the Assembly. A bill. I remind the hon. member that a bill purports to become law, and there is nothing more paramount than the law. We have taken the unprecedented step of not only tabling the bill in this Legislature but mailing it out to every household to seek the guidance, the wisdom, the talent, and the education of Albertans to help us with this particular bill. To construe the most important document that can be tabled in this Legislature as a piece of propaganda is nothing more than an insult to this Assembly, and he should apologize.

DR. PANNU: Mr. Speaker, this is a rare occasion on which I will agree with the Premier: this bill is one of the most important pieces of legislation. But misinformation about it is also the most important precedent being set here. My question to the Premier: if the government can't be trusted to send out an accurate householder, how can Albertans trust the Premier and this government on anything he says about Bill 11?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, the question that really wasn't asked in the second supplementary dealt with section 23, and I will ask the hon. Justice minister and Attorney General to respond.

MR. HANCOCK: Mr. Speaker, the householder is entirely accurate. Section 23, which the hon. member refers to, is colloquially known as a privative clause, and that's what the liner note says. The comment that he disputes in the margin note says that "recourse to the courts continues to be available." That is entirely accurate. You can always challenge a decision that's made by any member of government if the decision is made outside the law, if it's not constitutional, if it breaks the rules of natural justice, if it's based on irrelevant considerations, if it fails to consider relevant considerations, or if it's done on the basis of bias.

What this section, the privative clause, does is make sure that a decision of the minister not to grant a licence to a private operator cannot be overturned by that private operator just because they didn't like the decision.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fort.

Advanced Education Tuition Fees

MR. CAO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In my constituency work I have met with student leaders given that higher education is a key investment for society. The issue for them is tuition fees. According to their numbers Alberta students pay higher rising tuition fees than other provinces. My question is to the Minister of Learning. Can the minister explain to Albertans government policy on student fees?

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. First of all, the tuition fees are set by the individual postsecondary institution. A couple of years ago we passed a law that stated that tuition fees could not rise higher than 30 percent of the expense level of that institution. As well, there is a maximum amount that tuition fees can be raised each year. This year that amount is $243.50. I must stress that that is an average among the different faculties of the institution. So one faculty could go up $300; another faculty could only go up $220. So the $243.50 is an average.

Mr. Speaker, the average tuition around the province varies considerably. In universities it's roughly $3,600, $3,700. At the numerous colleges and technical institutes the average is actually around $2,100.

I must remind people that when we talk about a tuition cap of up to a maximum of 30 percent, it still means that 70 percent is paid by the taxpayers of this province.

MR. CAO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Tuition fees are just one aspect of postsecondary education costs. The cost of study materials and the cost of living, especially for married students, are rising and heavy on students. Could the minister explain what government programs help students in this regard?

DR. OBERG: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member has hit upon the absolute key point to this whole discussion, and that is that net debt is the issue. Tuition fees are not the issue; net debt is the issue.

When we put forward the tuition fee program, what we are aiming at is decreasing the net debt of the student as he comes out of university. Mr. Speaker, last year the net debt dropped from $12,500 to $11,500, making tuition and university one of the cheapest in Canada.

We just saw a 22 percent increase in the student loan program in this budget. Mr. Speaker, over the next three years the student loan program will be increased 50 percent. Last night I had the opportunity of talking to some student leaders, and they were absolutely ecstatic about the changes that we've done to the student loan program.

MR. CAO: Thank you. My last supplementary question is to the same minister. Can the minister explain to Alberta's students: what is the Alberta government involvement with the federal student assistance program?

DR. OBERG: Well, Mr. Speaker, Alberta administers the millennium scholarship. I must say again that I find myself in the rather uncomfortable position of praising the federal government. The millennium scholarship has been great for students in Alberta. There have been problems in other areas of the country, but there have not been any problems in Alberta. That millennium scholarship goes directly to the student.

We work very well together. We are currently looking at harmonizing the two student loan programs.

One thing that I will say, though, Mr. Speaker, is that today we had a little bit of a blow to that with the decision by the banks of Canada not to take over the Canada student loan portfolio. So the federal government will still be continuing to operate that program. I believe that is unfortunate. However, we will certainly persevere and make sure that the students don't suffer.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

Private Health Services

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, this Bill 11 brochure is nothing more than a thinly veiled attempt to convince Albertans to support private hospitals. Well, Albertans are smarter than that, and when they see through this Premier's propaganda, they'll uncover the truth about Bill 11. And you know what? They're not going to like it. So my question – and it's very simply put – is to the Premier. Can you tell us the difference between a hospital and an approved surgical facility?

MR. KLEIN: Yes. Absolutely. Yes, I can. You know, what I would do is challenge the hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert that if she wants to know the difference, Mr. Speaker . . .

MRS. SOETAERT: So you don't have an answer; is that it?

MR. KLEIN: Well, yes, I do have an answer. The answer is this. I would challenge the hon. member to go down to the Royal Alex hospital and have a good look at the Royal Alex hospital. That is a hospital. Then I would ask her to go to the Morgentaler abortion clinic. That is a surgical clinic.

MRS. SOETAERT: Well, he never answers a question, but I'll try another one. Mr. Premier, how many rural hospitals are going to become approved surgical facilities under your definition of surgical facilities?

MR. KLEIN: I'm sorry, Mr. Speaker. If a rural hospital has an operating theatre, then it will be a surgical facility, or if it has an emergency. Most acute care hospitals, whether they're in rural areas or urban areas, have emergencies and have backup systems. Some rural hospitals do not have systems as exotic and as sophisticated as, say, the University hospital in Edmonton or the Foothills hospital in Calgary. There are different levels of hospitals, but all of them have the basics.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final question: if Bill 11 is supposed to protect public health care, why does it not include a requirement for a detailed cost-benefit analysis for every one of those new private facilities, not just some vague requirements for the minister's approval?

MR. KLEIN: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has not read the bill. If she has, she cannot understand it. Most Albertans can understand it.

I will have the hon. Minister of Health and Wellness respond.

2:20

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, it's another of those cases where actually the legislation is much stronger than the member across the way is interpreting it to be. If you look at the legislation, it indicates that the information on the contracts, when they are arrived at, will be made public. That is the whole ball of wax, far beyond the specific item they are focusing on. The whole contract would be available.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Income Tax

MR. DUCHARME: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The federal Minister of Finance has been critical of Alberta's new tax plan, claiming that it will hurt middle-income earners. Can the Provincial Treasurer tell us what kind of tax breaks Alberta's middle-income earners will receive under the new plan?

MR. DAY: Yes, I certainly can, Mr. Speaker. We've done comparisons to, if people are interested, the federal tax reduction, which we give some credit to the federal Liberals for bringing into play even though it's much more reduced than ours is. If you take a look at a family income of $55,000, two-income family, two dependants – now, it could vary with the type of other credits or refunds they may have coming. That particular family will receive next year when our plan is fully in place a reduction of about 18 percent on their tax bill. We think that's fairly significant.

It's something that people have been asking for, something that they've been expecting. We would have liked to move it along even more rapidly than we have. We have to give the federal government a year of notice as we are becoming the first province to unhook from the federal structure. We think it's pretty exciting and the people talking to us are pretty excited about it too.

MR. DUCHARME: Mr. Speaker, my next question is also to the Treasurer. Given that the federal government has announced a five-year plan for reducing taxes, would Albertans have seen lower taxes if we had remained hooked to the federal tax system with these federal reductions flowing through to them as it was in the past?

MR. DAY: Mr. Speaker, some of the work we've done in analyzing that shows some interesting things. First of all, it should be clear that we are not going to wait for four years, as the federal government is, to flow these tax benefits through. These benefits flow through to Albertans next year.

We remind people that low-income Albertans already enjoy the family tax credit, and they've been doing that for over two years now. A hundred and sixty thousand families in this province have been receiving a direct credit, directly into their bank account, depending on what their income level is, of up to $1,000 per year, 160,000 families receiving that. That's along with a tax deduction that went to all families in 1997, when we moved our provincial rate downwards.

Now that we're moving the full package into play, next year Albertans will receive the full benefit of that plan. We are not going to wait four years for the federal government to flow their reductions through.

If we do the analysis – there are a couple of assumptions that have to be made here. The first one is that the same federal government is still going to be there in four years. We're not convinced of that. The second assumption, Mr. Speaker, is that they will maintain a commitment to flow those through. If, however, the tax structure commitment, regardless of which federal government is in place, is still in place in four years and if you run the numbers from ours, you would see that by year 4 or year 5 in some income tax ranges some Albertans would be paying slightly more in provincial income tax than if we have left the old plan in place. Some would be paying slightly more.

But it is not our intention in this government to maintain our structure even where it is. We will be entering it at 11 percent, but our plan, of course, as the Premier says, is to continue to see taxes going down. You will see over time the 11 percent rate move perhaps to 10 and a half, perhaps to 10 percent, and you'll see the basic exemption rates rise. It's good news for Albertans. I don't know why the opposition doesn't like good news. This is great news for Albertans.

MR. DUCHARME: Mr. Speaker, my final question is also to the Provincial Treasurer. As both the Premier and the Treasurer have praised Ottawa for its tax-cutting proposals in last week's federal budget, am I and are the people of Alberta led to understand that Alberta is satisfied that Ottawa has gone far enough with tax cuts?

MR. DAY: Well the word "praise" is a strong word, Mr. Speaker. The Premier gave credit, as members of our caucus have given some credit, some small credit, to the federal Liberal government for following our example. We acknowledge that it is possible for other governments to do good things. We're not just blindly critical, as members opposite are, as the Liberals provincially, so we have acknowledged that there will be a reduction on personal income taxes because of what the federal government has done. We acknowledge that, and we say: good for you on those narrow points.

But I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we would have preferred to see a more rapid reduction; we would have preferred to see deeper reductions. We're not going to be overly critical. We'll continue to remind the federal government that they have a way to go to catch up to us. Next year we will take from Albertans as a result of our tax reduction plan $852 million less than we are taking now. The federal government will take approximately $450 million less. They take from Albertans a bigger portion; they're giving back a smaller portion. We take a smaller portion; we're giving back a much bigger portion.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On February 6 of 1996 Alberta's then deputy minister of health told an Edmonton meeting of the Canadian Bar Association, health law subsection, that the principles of the Canada Health Act should be replaced with five new principles: efficiency, effectiveness, choice, consumerism, and pragmatism. Well, here we are four years later, and what is this Premier using to flog his Trojan horse bill but the very same buzz words that the failed deputy used in her sales pitch. Dr. Fulton has gone missing, but the Premier and the special interests behind him remain, using new spin doctors and advertising agencies to sell what has been their agenda all along: commercialization of public health care and the establishment of private hospitals. My questions are to the Premier. Isn't it true that his plan is to introduce private hospitals, that this has been the plan all along from the start, and that his crippling cuts to our precious public health care system were necessary to create the impression, the illusion that the public health system couldn't deliver the service to Albertans?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, there was a restructuring that took place, much of it, by the way, in accordance and based on the recommendations of The Rainbow Report, which was commissioned by the then minister of health, who now happens to be the leader of the Liberal opposition.

Relative to the comments of Ms Fulton, those comments are irrelevant. What is relevant is what is in the bill and the bill . . .

MR. SAPERS: What is in it?

MR. KLEIN: Fine. The hon. member asked. It says:

Whereas it is the responsibility of the Government of Alberta to provide leadership and support the delivery of quality health services in order to maintain and improve the health of Albertans;

Whereas Albertans cherish Alberta's publicly funded and publicly administered health system;

Whereas the Government of Alberta is committed to the preservation of the principles of universality, comprehensiveness, accessibility, portability and public administration, as described in the Canada Health Act (Canada), as the foundation of the health system in Alberta . . .

Mr. Speaker, if this hon. member is opposed to those principles – I don't know if he was here or not for the vote on the motion upholding the principles of the Canada Health Act, but if he is saying today that he wants to change his vote, then stand up and say so.

MR. MacDONALD: My second question is also to the Premier. Exactly how do the choice, efficiency, and effectiveness of Dr. Fulton's private health scheme differ from the choice, efficiency, and effectiveness in the Premier's private hospital plan or scam?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again the question is absolutely irrelevant because there is no private hospital scheme. The question is irrelevant. All we have before us is a bill called the Health Care Protection Act. Any question relative to private hospitals is irrelevant.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My third question is also to the Premier. Will the Premier finally come clean and admit that his private hospital bill, Bill 11, the Trojan horse bill, only pays lip service to the principles of the Canada Health Act and that what's missing in this propaganda package are his real principles of privatization and commercialism so clearly laid out by Dr. Fulton four years ago?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I will repeat that there is no bill by the name of the private hospital bill. There is no bill by the name of the Trojan horse bill. There is the Alberta health protection act, the bill before this House. So any bill that is imagined by the hon. member – a Trojan horse bill? I don't know of any Trojan horse bills. Are there any Trojan horse bills? I don't know. Could the hon. member cite the number of that bill? The Trojan horse bill? He alluded to it, and I want to know the number of the bill, the private hospitals bill. They might be considering such a bill, but there is no consideration of any such bill by the government or by this caucus. The only bill under consideration is Bill 11 – that's the number – and the name is the Alberta health protection act, now in its bill stage.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Aboriginal Policy Framework

MS KRYCZKA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is to the Associate Minister of Aboriginal Affairs. On September 17, 1999, you released Alberta's proposed aboriginal policy framework for consultation with stakeholders. This is of interest to many constituents of Calgary-West and to Calgarians because the Paskapoo Slopes area in Calgary contains approximately 50 archeological sites with historical aboriginal artifacts. I would appreciate the minister providing an update on the status of this proposed aboriginal policy framework.

MS CALAHASEN: Mr. Speaker, since it has been released, I've sort of taken an Alberta break and toured Alberta, and I've gone to places where most people wouldn't go. In fact, I've had a little bit of bannock, a little bit of deer venison. I've had a little bit of moose stew. In fact, I've had a little bit of moose nose soup. We've had 52 public meetings with over 1,200 attendees, and we've sent out more than 2,000 copies of the proposed policy framework. Since that time, we've received more than 40 written responses. We've also logged about 120 Internet requests a month since that time.

MS KRYCZKA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My first supplementary is to the same minister. What was the content, generally speaking, in your preliminary responses to date?

MS OLSEN: She doesn't know.

MS CALAHASEN: Well, Mr. Speaker, despite what my critic says over there, I have an idea in terms of what we've been doing. In fact, not everybody agrees with what we've got in the proposed policy framework. However, generally what we're hearing is that there is a great deal of support to establish partnerships and relationships with aboriginal people. People are telling us that it's time to do something concrete. Words have to be turned into action and into results. We also need to build on successes. There is general agreement among aboriginal people, industry, and government groups that this is a worthwhile cross-government initiative.

MS KRYCZKA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My second supplementary is to the same minister. When can we expect to see this framework rolled out; that is, publicly released?

MS CALAHASEN: We are presently incorporating all the responses that we are receiving, Mr. Speaker. It's very, very important when we look at what it is that we want to put forward. We have, in fact, just recently sent out the information on what we heard from people so that they can respond to us and indicate whether all the information we've received is basically what they've told us. They will respond within the next few weeks or within a month. By then, we'll have a draft that we'll be taking forward through the regular processes, which are SPC, cabinet, and of course caucus.

MS CARLSON: Mr. Speaker, we've seen this government pull some fast ones before, but this one is over the top. They've become so arrogant that they believe they can bring in private hospitals simply by changing the name. This Trojan horse tactic will simply not work. Albertans will not be fooled. Can the Premier tell us: what is the exact mechanism for removing private hospitals from the public trough once they prove to be inefficient and costly?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again the question is absolutely irrelevant. There is no question, no hint, nothing in this bill that is related to private hospitals. As a matter of fact, section 1 clearly says, "No person shall operate a private hospital in Alberta." So the question is irrelevant.

MS CARLSON: Maybe he can answer this one. Given that the CEO of the Calgary regional health authority has called contracting out an experiment, why is there no sunset clause in Bill 11 to limit this experiment?

MR. KLEIN: I don't recall the chief executive officer of the Calgary regional health authority making that statement, Mr. Speaker.

MS CARLSON: Mr. Speaker, will the Premier make a commitment to repeal Bill 11, also known as the private hospitals act, when it becomes clear that it is eroding medicare?

MR. HANCOCK: Point of order.

MR. KLEIN: Sir, the hon. member alluded to Bill 11. The proper name for Bill 11 is the Health Care Protection Act, Mr. Speaker. Again, I would remind the hon. member that unless she knows of a bill called the private hospitals act – if they have a number for that act, please stand up and introduce the bill.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberals keep talking about a private hospitals bill. We're not talking about a private hospitals bill. If they are contemplating such a bill, if they have a number for such a bill, then stand up and say so.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Stettler.

Liquor Sales

MRS. GORDON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My questions today are to the Minister of Gaming. The privatization of the liquor industry in Alberta is often referred to as the crown jewel of privatization, creating a thousand new independent businesses, 500-plus jobs, longer hours of operation, better customer selection, lower prices. Regulations under the act currently prohibit liquor licensees from accepting inducements favouring the sale of one particular brand or product. Those in noncompliance are fined. Now my independents feel threatened, and they are worried. They say that these rules could change and want to know why. Why are you considering different regulations for different classes of licences? Shouldn't all classes, A, B, C, D, and E, be governed by one set of rules?

MR. SMITH: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to answer the three questions that are put in the first question. Indeed, this jurisdiction is the only administration in Canada that retails beverages and spirits in a private, competitive, free enterprise environment, something I think all of us Conservatives are proud of: to be Conservatives, free enterprise, regulation-oriented, to make sure that we deregulate when we can, that we have malice for none and charity for all.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, we have through regulation created an exceedingly competitive environment. Just as Allan Rock has said: the status quo is not acceptable. The status quo is never acceptable in a market where there are changing dynamic conditions. So what we've done is clearly gone out to those involved in the industry. We've had a good process of consultation, of public presentations in Calgary and Edmonton inviting people from throughout this fine land to talk about what happens when a marketplace changes.

Right now I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, there are no plans in progress to change regulations with respect to placement of a liquor store or the retailing of spirits inside a liquor store. What is being discussed is a competitive environment that allows for the marketplace to function in an efficient fashion and also for this government to be able to detect when regulations are violated and then be able to enforce those regulations as they pertain to the specific violation.

MRS. GORDON: Why, Mr. Minister, would the Alberta Gaming and Liquor Commission not want to retain its mandate and authority for ensuring total compliance with the regulations by strengthening the severity of penalties for infractions and making public the full extent of the said violation and subsequent fine imposed?

MR. SMITH: Well, those are another batch of good questions, Mr. Speaker, that I'm pleased to address.

In fact, one thing that you do in a marketplace is ensure compliance as it pertains to the regulations. I know that members here check www.AGLC.gov.ab.ca daily. There is a complete list of all activities of the Department of Gaming, what they do with respect to alcohol and to gaming. In fact, in many places the market has a wonderful way of taking care of itself in a competitive environment. However, what we want to ensure is that we have a mechanism to detect when a regulation is violated, when enforcement can take place, and to in fact see that the enforcement is of a sufficient level to discourage that activity from continuing, because when people from a private-sector marketplace disobey or break regulations, they are tilting the level playing field of competition.

MRS. GORDON: My independents ask: why is the enforcement of this regulation deemed so extremely difficult when realistically fines collected from contravention could be applied exclusively to costs related to ongoing compliance? They say that is a good business decision.

MR. SMITH: Well, in fact, Mr. Speaker, the financial statements of the AGLC are very clear and they're very open. In fact, what we are assessing are clear ways to determine when these regulations have been violated and then take the enforcement measures. What we can report to you is that even if there may or may not be a rule or a policy change, when there are infractions at the time that these rules are in place and they're found out, there will be enforcement and there will be prosecution.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the member's constituents who are in this business are responding to her with information that is inaccurate and is creating unwarranted fears. In fact, we see it not only in the business of alcohol and the business of alcohol distribution. We see it in the matter of health, in the misinformation campaign that's occurring on the other side. If I can just wrap up by saying that it's important that we have a marketplace that functions, because it is truly competition that allocates scarce resources in the most optimum fashion.

head: Members' Statements

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, in 30 seconds from now I'll call upon the first of three members. Before doing that and sitting down, I'd also like to acknowledge that this Saturday, March 11, will be the election anniversary of 25 of our Members of this Legislative Assembly, who were elected in the general election of March 11, 1997. Twenty-five members.

The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Radio France Isere/Radio-Canada Alberta

MR. DUCHARME: Merci, M. le President. Je suis heureux d'annoncer que le Secretariat francophone de l'Alberta etait l'hote d'une signature d'un protocole d'entente entre Radio France Isere et CHFA Radio-Canada Alberta, Mercredi, le 8 Mars.

Cette entente vise a etabli des liens entre les deux services regionaux de radio publique afin de porter un regard approfondi sur l'Alberta et la region de Grenoble, leurs habitants, ce qui les rapproche et ce qui les distingue. Les partenaires esperent egalement que cette entente servira de catalyseur a d'autres partenariats entre nos deux regions, qu'ils soient economiques, scientifiques, ou culturels.

Le protocole d'entente entre Radio France Isere et Radio-Canada Alberta s'etaye sur quatre axes principaux: information, animation, jeu-concours, et multimedia. Ces axes serviront a couvrir trois champs d'interet: la culture de montagne, la recherche scientifique, et l'actualite, autant politique que culturelle. Ce protocole d'entente entre Radio France Isere et Radio-Canada Alberta entre en vigueur Lundi, le 20 Mars, et s'acheve le 24 Juin, 2002.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to announce that on Wednesday, March 8, the Alberta Francophone Secretariat hosted the signing of a memorandum of understanding between Radio France Isere and Radio-Canada Alberta, the French radio station.

The purpose of this memorandum is to establish a relationship between two public radio regional services in order to create a deeper understanding of Alberta and the Grenoble region: their inhabitants, their similarities, and their distinctive characters. The two partners also hope this memorandum will be a catalyst to other partnerships between the two regions, whether economically, scientifically, or culturally.

The memorandum of understanding between Radio France Isere and Radio-Canada Alberta targets four main areas: information, animation, radio quiz game, and multimedia. These areas will cover three fields of interest: mountain culture, scientific research, and current events, political as well as cultural. This memorandum of understanding between Radio France Isere and Radio-Canada Alberta comes into effect on Monday, March 20, 2000, and ends on June 24, 2002.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Private Health Services

MR. DICKSON: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. Earlier this afternoon I tabled copies of written summaries from a number of meetings held by the Calgary regional health authority in the city of Calgary, and these included a town hall meeting at Glamorgan Community Association on February 19, a town hall meeting at Annie Gale junior high school on February 12, and a meeting with educational partners such as the U of C on February 16.

At Glamorgan most of the questions dealt with the $250 million paid in contracted services, particulars of which are totally, completely a big secret, unavailable to Calgarians. The concerns and suggestions to the CRHA included a question about why health care is moving to for-profit care; a question in terms of since public care can deliver cheaper health care than private care, why are we pursuing the new option; questions about why details of CRHA contracts are not made public; questions about conflicts of interest.

Now, those Calgarians who participated in the exercises had lots of good advice for the CRHA, but most of the answers required must come not from the appointed CRHA board but from the elected Minister of Health and Wellness. We heard many similar concerns last night when some 800 concerned Calgarians showed up at the Red & White Club at McMahon Stadium to find out more about Bill 11 and questionable decisions by this government, including broken promises like the election of regional health authority boards.

The question, though, Mr. Speaker, is whether anyone is listening. The Premier says that he's 99.9 percent sure his Bill 11 will be passed. What is that but disdain for all of the Albertans who are raising questions and issues with the content of Bill 11 and, more significantly, what is not in Bill 11? Why won't the Premier host a town hall meeting in Calgary? Why won't he debate the Leader of the Opposition at public forums? Why won't the Premier come and answer the legitimate, serious questions that people in the city of Calgary have with the dismantling of their public health care system? Those are questions that deserve an answer.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Support for Seniors

MS KRYCZKA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to speak today in support of Alberta seniors. During the past three years as MLA for Calgary-West, as chair of the Seniors Advisory Council for Alberta, and as chair of the aging population study for one and a half years, I've constantly met with seniors in small to large-size groups or organizations and individually, and the total would be in the tens of thousands. Met with means talked to, as in giving information, and listened to means as in acquiring information.

I met all kinds of seniors, from rural/urban, very active and aware, to those with Alzheimer's and from those with very high incomes and assets to those with very low incomes. All these meetings have been accurately documented to government, to the Minister of Community Development, to the Seniors Advisory Council quarterly reports, the annual year-in-review reports, and the forthcoming aging population study report. These reports say what is important to seniors, and I list them.

Housing: appropriate choices; aging in place as long as possible with the help of community supports and caregivers. Home may be of necessity a long-term care facility, but they prefer to not be there.

Health: if they have to be in an acute care hospital, seniors want short stays and caring staff trained in geriatrics.

Transportation: being mobile means being independent.

Income: lower income seniors want to be reassured of government assistance when they need it.

Abuse of seniors: seniors want to be treated, as we all wish, with due dignity and respect by all those they come in contact with.

My point, Mr. Speaker, is that these things are most important to today's seniors, and the government is aware of them and is addressing them. Seniors deserve the right to live in peace and dignity, not to be used as pawns being told misinformation in this philosophical debate on how to deliver health care in Alberta more effectively and efficiently. This playing around with seniors' mental health is unacceptable, and it should end today.

Thank you.

head: Projected Government Business

THE SPEAKER: The hon. House leader of the Official Opposition.

MR. DICKSON: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I'd ask the government to outline now the course of business we might anticipate next week. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On Monday, March 13, in the afternoon under Government Bills and Orders we would anticipate dealing with second reading of Bill 6, the Special Payment Act; Bill 4, the Surveys Amendment Act; Bill 5, the Land Titles Amendment Act; Bill 1, Alberta Heritage Foundation for Science and Engineering Research Act; and Bill 3, the Statute Revision Act. If time permits, Committee of the Whole on Bill 2, First Nations Sacred Ceremonial Objects Repatriation Act.

Monday at 8 p.m. under Government Bills and Orders of course we'll be in Committee of Supply: in subcommittee C, in the Assembly, dealing with the main estimates of Municipal Affairs; and in subcommittee D, in room 512, dealing with Resource Development's main estimates. Time permitting, we may deal with Committee of the Whole on Bill 2, First Nations Sacred Ceremonial Objects Repatriation Act, and as per the Order Paper.

On Tuesday, March 14, at 4:30 p.m. under Government Bills and Orders we anticipate the attendance of Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor to give royal assent to bills 9 and 12; then second reading on Bill 7, the Alberta Science, Research and Technology Authority Amendment Act, and Bill 1, the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Science and Engineering Research Act.

On Tuesday at 8 p.m. under Government Bills and Orders in Committee of Supply we anticipate the reporting of the estimates for Agriculture, Food and Rural Development and Community Development; under Government Bills and Orders for second reading Bill 1, Bill 6, Bill 3, Bill 4, Bill 5, Bill 7, and as per the Order Paper.

On Wednesday, March 15, at 8 p.m. under Government Bills and Orders in Committee of Supply: reporting the estimates of the departments of Innovation and Science, Economic Development, Government Services, Resource Development; and if time permits, second reading of bills 1, 6, 3, 4, 5, 7, and as per the Order Paper.

On Thursday, March 16, in the afternoon under Government Bills and Orders: estimates as may be designated by the Official Opposition on Monday and as per the Order Paper based on progress Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, prior to dealing with the first of our six points of order, might we revert briefly to Introduction of Guests?

[Unanimous consent granted]

head: Introduction of Guests

(reversion)

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the House's indulgence. This is a rare opportunity to introduce in particular three little guests that will not, I know, have an opportunity to attend our Legislature often. I want you to know that I'm very proud of these little guests. I'd like to first introduce Stevie Cox, sitting on my husband, Lloyd McClellan's, knee. Next to her is Tami Cox holding Maverick James, and next to her is Shelby T Cox. I'm very proud of this little family, and we're looking forward to going to the Shrine Circus in Edmonton and seeing zebras.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hope you'll give them a warm welcome.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, one of the unique matters of our Routine that we have in this Assembly is an opportunity for the Official Opposition to designate estimates for consideration on Thursday afternoon. The Official Opposition has that right to choose which estimates it wants to deal with. The chair has indicated on previous occasions, particularly on private members' day, that he did not want to see the Assembly get into a situation whereby many points of order might in fact have the tendency of reducing a private member's opportunity to participate. Today we have six points of order that we will deal with. The chair's hesitation is much the same. However, in this case four of the points of order are being raised by members of the Official Opposition. If we go on with points of order for an hour, an hour and a half, it will not be the chair's dilemma in terms of inability, then, for the Assembly to deal with one of the designated estimates for this week.

Just prior to sitting down, one other item. It also seems that we are coming to a situation where an hon. member will rise on a point of order and then not be here to participate on that point of order. While we have accepted the fact that one of the House leaders might undertake that point of order, the difficulty the chair has is in actually knowing if that argument put forward by one of the House leaders is in fact the point of order that the hon. member would have wanted to address. While the chair will accept the honoured tradition that an hon. member in fact is to be completely truthful in everything one does say and in dealing with the actual issue, it is a concern. It is a concern. It would seem to me that if an hon. member wants to deal with a point of order, really the best, the highest form of parliamentary practice would be for the hon. member to address it. However, I just raise that as a consideration and a concern today. We're still going to proceed with the points of order that we do have.

The hon. Opposition House Leader on the first point of order, I believe now on behalf of the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Point of Order
Provoking Debate

MR. DICKSON: It is indeed, Mr. Speaker, and I want to assure you that it's my understanding that I have the full authority to make representations on behalf of those colleagues. They're going to be stuck with my limited efforts on their behalf. Actually, it sounds like more fun going to watch the zebras at the Shrine Circus also, but I'll go through this as quickly as I can.

The authority I'd cite would be Beauchesne 417, that answers ought not to provoke debate. What I reference is in the second set of questions from the Leader of the Opposition to the Premier. The Premier came back and said words to the effect – I don't have Hansard in front of me – that the leader of the Liberal opposition has said that Albertans couldn't understand or aren't smart enough to understand what's in Bill 11. Well, Mr. Speaker, the short answer to that is that it's not the Leader of the Opposition who put the marginal notes and the little editorial comments on the copy of the bill that was sent out. It's not the Leader of the Opposition who has refused or failed to appear at major, major public events to hear Albertans' concerns, to discuss the bill with them.

Mr. Speaker, I may be one of the few Albertans that enjoys reading back issues of Hansard. Most importantly, I've gone through it with reasonable care, and you know, as hard as I've looked, I can't find the Leader of the Opposition ever saying words to the effect that Albertans weren't smart enough to be able to understand and read Bill 11. For the Premier to make that kind of assertion, more than once – we've also seen this on March 7 of 2000, and it's an attempt to raise the same message – it does nothing other than provoke debate, and I wish you'd caution the Premier against ever doing that again in this Assembly.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

3:00

MR. HANCOCK: Well, Mr. Speaker, where to start? First, the hon. member admits that he reads back issues of Hansard, and therefore anything he says must be suspect. Nobody could possibly enjoy reading back issues of Hansard.

However, Mr. Speaker, I believe there was – and I stand to be corrected – a tabling on the first day that the hon. Premier referred to the remarks made by the hon. Leader of the Opposition relating to her comments from, I think, the transcript of a radio show in which she did in fact say – I'm not quoting her, and I'm not pretending to quote her – something to the effect that legislation was complex and couldn't be understood by average Albertans. I think there is no point of order, simply on the basis that the transcript was tabled and the remark was said.

The hon. member, however, goes on to talk about provoking debate. You've commented on this extensively in the last few days, but again we witnessed in the House today that every single question that was raised by the opposition had a preamble that was far too long and provoked debate and was argumentative. There were questions specifically relating to sections of a bill that will be debated before the House, and the questions themselves provoked debate because they asked questions about the sections of the bill and the interpretation of the sections and the interpretation which they were suggesting the government was putting on the sections and the interpretation which they believed should be on the sections. I heard references on innumerable occasions today to the term "private hospital bill." There is no private hospital bill, and that in itself provokes debate.

Mr. Speaker, I could say worse things about what was said in the House today than that it provoked debate, although I think the rules of the House might call me out of order if I did. But if I did say them, they would be true statements. There is no point of order here.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, good temper and moderation in the usage of the words of the language are always expected. That hasn't been the case in the last number of days. This is not a point of order. I've said before that if someone wants to throw it out, then one has to expect to get it back.

Hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, your second point of order.

Point of Order
Provoking Debate

MR. DICKSON: I'd repeat and incorporate everything I said with respect to the first point of order. It's virtually the same issue. It simply occurred in the third set of questions of the Leader of the Official Opposition. The same comments would apply and, presumably, the same direction from the Speaker.

MR. HANCOCK: Mr. Speaker, I would give the same response except to commend the hon. member for not using the opportunity of standing on the point of order, as he did on the first one, to engage in debate again on the subject.

THE SPEAKER: Ditto.

The hon. Member for Lacombe-Stettler.

Point of Order
Provocative Language

MRS. GORDON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The sections in Beauchesne I'm referring to are 289(3) and 489. I'm very concerned. The Leader of the Official Opposition made reference to the fact that the hon. Premier wasn't out last evening at health forums but in fact decided to send the "truth squad commanders" I think were her words. I really believe that possibly these points should be done in public, because I think there is a terrible public perception that comes from that. The hon. Premier was in this Legislature last night as he was giving the main estimates for Executive Council and the Public Affairs Bureau. I guess the hon. Leader of the Opposition should be quite thankful that the Premier didn't stand up here and ask where the hon. member was last night while the Premier was in this Assembly.

I really think that we have stooped to an all-time low when it is necessary to stand up here – if she had talked to her caucus members, to her people in the opposition, she would have known that he was in here last night trying to answer their questions and do his duty in the Assembly as the Premier of the province. I don't know how in good conscience, regardless of what political party you're with, you can lead Albertans astray to that extent.

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Speaker, the short answer to this point of order. The authorities cited refer to commenting about the absence of a member from this Assembly, which has absolutely nothing to do with the issue that I think the member has raised and is talking about. I think what she's talking about is the concern that's been expressed in this House that when large numbers of Albertans gather in a public forum to get information on the single most important issue for them and their neighbours, they expect to see leadership, they expect to see responsiveness from the men and women who've been elected to represent them.

It is the Premier of this province and his powerful 64-member majority that decides but for a short time on Thursday afternoon what's coming up, when it's coming up, and what sequence it's coming up in. So it's bogus, Mr. Speaker, to suggest that somehow the Premier's hands are tied. He can determine when any particular issue is going to come up in this House, and I assume he does it in close conjunction with his very competent House leader.

The point is this. The authorities cited have absolutely no application, and the Member for Lacombe-Stettler I think completely misapprehends what has been said. There has clearly been criticism that the Premier of this province hasn't been out listening to Albertans when they gather to talk about an important issue, and that criticism will continue to be made again and again until in fact it's addressed by the Premier getting out and not just managing his little phone-in campaign, where he can screen the calls that come in on a Saturday afternoon. He's got to be able to take the heat that the Member for Calgary-Glenmore bravely did last night and the Associate Minister of Health and Wellness did on Tuesday night. When he's prepared to take the heat that he's sending out his emissaries to take, then the Member for Lacombe-Stettler is entitled to stand and say, "We're being unfair to the Premier," but not until.

Thank you.

MR. HANCOCK: Mr. Speaker, it is disappointing that the hon. Opposition House Leader didn't take your admonition not to use up the time of estimates this afternoon in – I'm sorry; did I say obnoxious arguments?

Last night the Premier was in the House defending his estimates. That's a matter of record. The schedule for the record, as the Opposition House Leader well knows, is set well in advance. They've had the schedule of those estimates for a long period of time. They took a slippery, obnoxious, inappropriate attempt to besmirch the reputation of the Premier and to say that he wasn't out defending Bill 11 and talking to the people of Alberta about Bill 11 and hearing from the people of Alberta about Bill 11, when they full well knew he was scheduled to be here. They used that today at a most inappropriate time. It probably was a slip on their part. The Leader of the Opposition probably didn't know that the Premier was up defending his estimates last night. But it's totally inappropriate – totally inappropriate, Mr. Speaker – regardless of the citation in Beauchesne.

It's even more obnoxious that he's trying to get off this point of order on a technicality by saying that the wrong citation was made. It's totally inappropriate for these people . . .

MR. SAPERS: You've said that four times now.

MR. HANCOCK: And I'm going to say it again. It's totally inappropriate and obnoxious and misrepresenting to the people of Alberta what this government caucus is doing and what this Premier of Alberta is doing.

Bill 11 was put on the Order Paper. Bill 11 was introduced. They didn't want the public to hear about Bill 11. They don't like the fact that Bill 11 was mailed out to all Albertans. They don't like the fact that we on this side of the House and on that side of the House over there, where the other members of government caucus sit, are out listening to Albertans, talking with Albertans about the bill but not inflaming Albertans, not bringing empty rhetoric to Albertans, not trying to scare Albertans but listening to good input from Albertans.

Because he doesn't find that we attend the types of forums that they like to set up and manage, he thinks we're not listening to Albertans. Well, he's absolutely wrong. The opposition leader is absolutely wrong. All of their minions are absolutely wrong. Under Standing Orders they should be called to order for the fact that they have made a malicious statement about the Premier today.

THE SPEAKER: Do you want to be involved in this point of order?

MS LEIBOVICI: Yes, I do, Mr. Speaker. Just for a little bit of clarification. I heard the House leader indicate that the schedule was set far in advance for the estimates, and that's true, but the other reality is that the schedule for the CBC town halls was also set far in advance. The reality is also that there was a town hall meeting on Tuesday night in Edmonton at which the Premier, I'm sure, had he decided he would want to attend, could have attended as well. There were no Executive Council estimates on Tuesday night either.

The reality is that the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition has said and has reiterated even today that a town hall could be arranged by the Premier on his home ground of Calgary, at his choosing, whenever he wishes, at whatever time, and she will be there. She has asked for an open debate, where the people of Alberta could participate in that debate as well, and the Premier has consistently refused. So the reality is, as I heard the House leader for the Official Opposition indicate, that in accordance with Beauchesne there is no point of order. We need to get the facts out on the table, and those are the facts.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: Quite frankly, hon. members, if one wants to read Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules & Forms, the sixth edition, and wants to go to point 289, which I believe was raised, there is at least one parliament which has a Standing Order which states: "Every Member is bound to attend the service of the House unless leave of absence has been given him or her by the House". This is another one of those fascinating discussions that we've just heard. Quite frankly, everyone in this Chamber is bound to be here. Bound to be here. When the chair looks out, the chair even right at this moment sees a variety of empty seats.

In section 289 of Beauchesne it also goes on to say:

(3) The duties of Members have become extremely varied and Members must travel frequently. The discharge of those responsibilities will sometimes take a Member away from the House. This absence from the chamber should not be the subject of comment.

Interestingly enough, there's nothing in the Standing Orders that says that presence of the hon. member in the Chamber should be a subject of comment, but the chair will make it. When did it ever evolve to the fact that people should not be discharging their duties in this Assembly? We're hon. members elected to serve in this Assembly. It would seem to me that we sit from 1:30 in the afternoon to 5:30 in the afternoon, and then oftentimes we sit in the evening again from 8 o'clock to heaven knows what time. The prime responsibility is to in fact be in this Assembly.

Now, we'll just reiterate all that again. I gather that the feeling of this Assembly is that from time to time an hon. member must be away, and the Speaker in fact has been quite open with respect to even attendance. Under the Legislative Assembly Act any hon. member who in fact absents himself or herself from this Assembly for more than 10 days is subject to severe penalties. I guess that was a point of clarification.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora on a point of order.

Point of Order Oral Question Period Rules

MR. SAPERS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will start off by referring you to Beauchesne 408(1)(e) and (f). Of course, 408 generally speaks about oral questions, and sub (1) begins:

Such questions should . . .

- (e) not be of a nature requiring a lengthy and detailed answer.
- (f) not raise a matter of policy too large to be dealt with as an answer to a question.

I'm referring to the exchange between the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake and the Provincial Treasurer.

Mr. Speaker, I'll also draw your attention to 408(2), which says that "answers to questions should be as brief as possible, should deal with the matter raised, and should not provoke debate," and then Beauchesne 409(11), "a question which seeks an opinion about government policy is probably out of order," et cetera, et cetera. I won't take the time to read the rest of that lengthy paragraph into the record. I could also go on to quote other authorities that have to do with providing factual information in the Assembly and not doing anything that would be misleading the Assembly.

Now, the exchange of questions I refer to, Mr. Speaker, had to do with the impact of federal tax policy on Albertans. The Treasurer made the representation that Albertans would be receiving an 18 percent tax cut. What he failed to mention is that that only relates to the top 1 percent of Alberta tax filers with an income of over $150,000 per year. In fact, the middle 39 percent of Alberta tax filers, those with an income between $30,000 and $70,000 per year, will only receive an average of 9 percent on their provincial taxes.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the question, as I understood it, related to: what would be the impact? Would taxpayers in this province be better off if we had the existing tax-on-tax regime instead of moving to this so-called flat tax? Of course, there has been an analysis that shows that at income levels of $35,000, $50,000, and $65,000, in fact there is a net cost to taxpayers in every one of those categories of between $322 and $436.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would say that in the first instance the member should have been called to order because his question violated sections 408 and 409 of Beauchesne. In the second instance the Treasurer should have been called to order because his answers were neither complete nor factual.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is probably the most spurious point of order I've heard in this House yet, and I want to be clear on the word "spurious" because the last time I used it, Hansard recorded it as "serious." It was quite appropriate to record it as serious on that occasion, but on this occasion I mean spurious.

The reason I say that it's a spurious point of order is because clearly the hon. member opposite has used the occasion of a point of order, has raised a point of order so that he could try and put on the record the answer he would like to have received rather than the actual, factual answer that the Provincial Treasurer gave.

I would like to point out, first of all, that points of order should not, in my humble opinion, be allowed to go on at length so that members can add their own interpretation of the facts. They should be dealing actually with the issue in the point of order, which is whether the question and answer were appropriate or whether there was inappropriate usage.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora put some inappropriate comments on the record, and I'm sure that when he clearly reads the tax policy, he'll understand what the truth is, or he can go back, as his seatmate suggested, and read back issues of Hansard from time to time and read the hon. Member for Red Deer-North's answers so that he can get it clear.

However, on the points of order which were in fact points of order, the question that was raised was Beauchesne 408, "not be of a nature requiring a lengthy and detailed answer." In fact, I would suggest that the question did not require "a lengthy and detailed answer" and did "not raise a matter of policy too large to be dealt with as an answer to a question." The fact that the Provincial Treasurer, in giving his answer, elected to give a very detailed and complete answer so that the members opposite could really understand what tax policy is was at the election of the Provincial Treasurer and, I think, also dealt with the concept that answers should be of a sufficient length to give the detail that's required. In this case the Provincial Treasurer, in giving the answer, obviously anticipated from the tablings earlier in the House that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, not the person asking the questions, needed to have some factual responses.

THE SPEAKER: Sometimes I really wonder why hon. members deal with some of these points of order. If the chair used the logic of the argument put forward by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, the chair would have ruled out the tabling that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora gave today when he in fact violated the rule by giving an interpretation with respect to a report that he gave and provided a comment with respect to it, which violated tabling policy.

Secondly, the length of time utilized by the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake in the raising of his three questions was just a few seconds less than six minutes, which was a few seconds less than the time that was allocated in the second set of questions between the Leader of the Official Opposition and the leader of the government and the amount of time taken up by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar in his several questions.

The chair has indicated before that the chair attempts to try and find a balance, and one can never be sure, in terms of the length of a question or the length of the answer, what they will be. In terms of the time taken for it, it certainly sat with the tone that was set today. There were 11 sets of questions, and that essentially is the target the chair tries to arrive at.

Thirdly, the argument provided to rule out the question would simply have ruled out virtually every other question in the last 12 days in this session. So once again another point of something.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

3:20

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Speaker, I think we're almost at the end.

THE SPEAKER: Not quite.

Point of Order Factual Accuracy

MR. DICKSON: In the exchange between the Premier and my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar I heard the Premier say that the government is simply following The Rainbow Report, that had been prepared under the direction of the then minister of health, who is the current leader of the Liberal opposition. I cite again Beauchesne 417.

Mr. Speaker, this is so preposterous, it needs to be corrected. It was not the Leader of the Opposition who recommended slashing $700 million from the budget of the department of health. It was not the Leader of the Opposition who recommended chopping the jobs of 10,000 highly skilled registered nurses and health care workers. It was not the Leader of the Opposition and The Rainbow Report that recommended blowing up the General hospital and selling the Holy Cross hospital for a song after spending $32 million on renovations. It was not the recommendation of the Leader of the Opposition to do anything other than look at innovative health reform in terms of primary care delivery but doing it on the basis of stable funding, doing it within the context of the public health care system.

So the absolutely provocative and baseless allegation perpetuated and republished again and again by this Premier shows contempt for the facts as well as it shows contempt for the Assembly.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Mr. Speaker, I think I'm going to have to do some research. There's got to be something in this book which suggests that you can raise points of order on points of order.

The Member for Calgary-Buffalo has again used a point of order to engage in debate. If anything it may be a point of clarification in his mind, although what the Premier said needed no clarification. What he did was take the opportunity of a point of order under our Standing Orders, rather than raising an appropriate point of order, to bring forth some sort of spurious health care debate that was not appropriate in the context of the point of order and was not an accurate reflection of anything that happened in the last seven years and was inappropriate in referring to the comments that were raised by the Premier during question period.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, those sections of Beauchesne dealing with points of order are from 317 on, if that will help the interpretation of the reading of all of this.

The chair will do this last intervention and rejection by the two hon. House leaders as simply a point of clarification having been done and now dealt with.

The hon. Government House Leader.

Point of Order

Oral Question Period Rules

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My point of order is under Standing Order 23(c) and Standing Order 23(j) as well as Beauchesne 409(7) and 410(12). Standing Order 23(c) refers to a member being called to order if he "persists in needless repetition"; 23(j), "uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder"; 409(7), "a question must adhere to the proprieties of the House, in terms of inferences, imputing motives or casting aspersions upon persons within the House or out of it"; and 410(12), "questions should not be hypothetical."

It's my contention that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie referred in one of her questions to "Bill 11, also known as the private hospitals act." It was a reference that was made on a number of occasions today, but on that particular occasion the hon. member specifically referred to a bill in this House, which has a proper name, by a name which is totally improper, inappropriate, misleading, and wrong and used it for the purpose of misleading not only the House but members of the public who might have been watching during question period. The reference was used repetitively throughout the question period today, but it was used in this specific instance quite inappropriately in addressing and specifically talking about the title of a bill which is before the House, and I believe the hon. member should be admonished.

No matter in what way they wish to characterize the government's proposed legislation with respect to the protection of public health care, the strongest piece of health care protection legislation in this country today being proposed or in place, which puts the principles of the Canada Health Act clearly into our law in this province, if it's passed, which clearly outlaws private hospitals, which clearly puts strict regulation on the use of private surgical facilities, which clearly protects public health care – if they want to characterize that in some other way, it may be to them to do so, but they shouldn't, in referring to the title of the bill, use the title of the bill in an inappropriate manner to mislead Albertans.

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Speaker, I'm tempted to read back to the Government House Leader the comments he made a few moments ago when he was trying to instruct all members on how to conduct themselves in raising points of order. If he chooses not to heed his own admonishment, let me make this observation. This government has taken a bill title, and they've elevated it to a pre-election campaign slogan. This has nothing to do with the title of a bill. This is a means by which a government, with their $8 million Public Affairs Bureau budget, is trying to pull the wool over Albertans. As my colleague just said a moment ago, there is not a single person, I daresay, in the 3 million people that live in this province who, upon opening their mailbox and receiving this bill, have any question that when questions are asked by elected members in this House, they all know what bill we're talking about. If it would help the Government House Leader, we'll also refer to it as Bill 11 so that there's absolutely no uncertainty.

There have been references on both sides of the House to private hospitals in discussion around Bill 11, and indeed I'm one who thinks Albertans are smart enough to be able to understand what bill we're talking about. I don't think that they're going to be misled in any fashion by what has been suggested.

Those are my observations, Mr. Speaker, with respect to this last point of order.

THE SPEAKER: Thank you to both hon. gentlemen, who are well practised in the law and who are now in a parliament. There is only a bill, Bill 11. It has a proper title, and it has a proper name. Okay. Thank you very much for that clarification as well.

Now, it may very well be that we have overlooked another point of order. I just want to make sure.

The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: We did, Mr. Speaker, but now withdraw it.

THE SPEAKER: Just for clarification to the hon. Government House Leader. In fact, a point of order cannot be raised on a point of order.

Secondly, several members alluded to the fact that it may very well be that it is unfortunate that we are not on television. Well, the fact of the matter is that we are.

3:30

head: Orders of the Day

head: Committee of Supply

[Mrs. Gordon in the chair]

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I'd like to call the committee to order.

Community Development

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We'll start by having the hon. Minister of Community Development give us an overview.

Hon. minister.

MR. WOLOSHTYN: Thank you very much, Madam Chairman. I'm very, very pleased to be here to follow up on the previous estimates that we had back on February 29.

AN HON. MEMBER: It's exciting; isn't it?

MR. WOLOSHTYN: It's extremely exciting.

I'd like to start by addressing a number of questions regarding the EPCOR Rosedale power plant and the associated site, which has attracted some degree of public and media attention. The member raised some questions about this in regards to the government's actions in protecting the site and what is underneath it and how the province is working with the city on the issue.

I'd like to point out that the Historical Resources Act has already been used several times to protect the heritage resources of the Rosedale power plant site. Last fall EPCOR was asked to provide historical resource impact assessments, known as HRIAs, for both the archaeological aspects of the site and an early building on the property. I'm pleased to say that EPCOR has and continues to provide full co-operation with the department on this particular site.

Next I'd like to address comments on the changes in funding to the Alberta Sport, Recreation, Parks and Wildlife Foundation. First of all, I'd like to make it very, very clear that adjustments in funding for the foundation will have no adverse effect on the annual operating funds provided to provincial sport and recreation associations. In fact, as a result of the reallocation of funds from the quarterly grant program, additional funding has been provided to provincial – and I stress provincial – sport and recreation associations to assist them in carrying out the delivery of programs and services to Albertans.

It's important to note that the funding provided under the quarterly grant program was directed to specific projects. Funding was provided through an application process on a project-by-project basis. Associations did not rely on this program as a source for continuous funding. The ASRPW Foundation reviewed the quarterly grant program to determine the possibility of duplication relative to other grant programs offered by the provincial government such as the community lottery boards program.

Recommendations from this review have resulted in the implementation of the new development initiatives program. This program is designed to meet the needs of applicants not eligible for funding from other funding agencies and programs. Consideration will be given to projects not accepted through other funding agencies yet within the parameters of the program. An applicant may not apply to more than one granting agency and/or program for the same identified project. However, different aspects of the same program may be funded by different agencies, organizations, or foundations provided that total funds do not equal or exceed the total cost of the project. Good examples of projects which were eligible for funding through the quarterly grant program as well as the CLB program are playgrounds and climbing walls and so on.

The elimination of possible duplicated funding has also allowed the ASRPW Foundation to maintain the municipal recreation/tourism areas program at its current level.

I'd like to add that I agree that the Wild Rose Foundation does great work with and for volunteers, and their grant program will continue to serve this important sector. It is important to note that they are also a part of the new criteria.

I'll conclude my remarks by addressing a number of questions that were raised about the department's support for seniors when asked about why there is no funding of seniors' centres included under the budget. While there are no direct operating funds for seniors' centres, there are a number of sources of financial support available, and it varies in each community depending upon local needs, interests, and resources. Project funding may be available to seniors' centres for recreation activities through the Wild Rose Foundation and resources such as family and community support services, community lottery boards, and Health Canada's population health fund may also offer support.

Now I'll address the question about seniors qualifying for a subsidy of full or partial payment of health care premiums and any increase in seniors qualifying for these benefits. Further to the answer I provided in the Committee of Supply, the Alberta seniors' benefit program determines whether seniors are eligible for Alberta health care premium subsidies. There are about 130,000 seniors in Alberta who receive full-premium subsidies and a further 50,000 who receive partial subsidies. The transfer of funds from Community Development to Health and Wellness for these subsidies no longer takes place. It should be noted, though, that it does not alter the actual benefits received by seniors.

In response to concerns raised by the office of the Auditor General, significant change has been made to the Alberta seniors' benefit budget during the third-quarter budget review process, which will become effective on April 1, 2000. This is a change to the budgeting and reporting process of the ministries of Community Development and Health and Wellness only. Also, this change has no financial impact on the government's bottom line.

The net number of additional seniors that qualify for the ASB program, including the Alberta health care insurance premium subsidies, will vary each year. This is influenced by a number of factors: the number of Albertans who turn 65 years of age in a given year, the number of seniors who pass away, and the income of those who have applied to the program. In general, the number has been increasing. In the last fiscal year it increased from 178,289 seniors in March of 1998 to 180,553 seniors in March of 1999.

I now turn to the question raised about increasing funds for lodges and special consideration for assistance to the Greater Edmonton Foundation and its lodges to be renovated or rebuilt. The lodge assistance program grant was not increased in this budget year. Community Development is currently reviewing existing funding formulas to determine if changes to the lodge assistance program are required to provide a more equitable distribution of the funding. This, I must stress, is simply a review. I'm not implying that any changes will in fact be made. [A cell phone rang] Should we answer the phone, or should I continue?

The current lodge assistance program grant formula, which came into effect in 1995, was developed by a joint committee of provincial government officials and members of the Alberta Senior Citizens Housing Association. The committee determined that there were economies of scale for larger management bodies. Therefore, it was decided to pay $3.60 per resident-day for management bodies with 350 or more lodge units – these were all located in Edmonton, Calgary, and Lethbridge – and $4.80 per day for those with less than 350 lodge units. Consequently, this new grant formula resulted in some management bodies experiencing a reduction in their grant funding while others received an increase. The Greater Edmonton Foundation's grant was increased from $789,643 in 1994 to $1,209,192 in 1995, using the $3.60 per resident-day formula.

AN HON. MEMBER: They got more because of inflation.

MR. WOLOSHTYN: The only thing that's inflating is the inappropriate comments from across the floor, I would point out.

In regards to the timing for the tabling of the government's response to the impact of the aging population study, I'd like to indicate that the steering committee will complete its report sometime this spring. Along with report A, it will provide the government with recommendations for action. That report I obviously haven't received yet, so it'll be some time after that before I'll be able to respond, and that's part B of a bigger report. Part A came out earlier this year, and we'll be looking at that in conjunction with all the other reports we have on this whole area.

As I stated at the beginning of my remarks, there were questions raised about the department's performance measures, including those to do with customer satisfaction and whatnot, and we'll get you some of those in writing.

I'd like to thank you for your time, and I would be pleased to listen to your questions and comments and either give you some answers today or hopefully get you answers to questions that are appropriate to be answered in writing.

Thank you very much, Madam Chairman.

3:40

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thanks very much, Madam Chairman. Good afternoon, Mr. Minister. I've got a number of questions to put to you. Let me start with some statistical requests. I'm going to focus most of my questions on the work of the Alberta Human Rights and Citizenship Commission. I know that that's an area in your department that you take a great deal of personal interest and pride in, and I know it's something you're familiar with.

Perhaps you could give me some information relative to the number of cases opened in the last fiscal year, at least up to this point. We're not quite at the end of March, but I'd like to know at this stage the number of cases opened in terms of the type of discrimination. So if you could go through and identify the number of complaints for gender, race, colour, physical disability, age, ancestry, place of origin, marital status, religious beliefs, mental disability, family status, source of income, and sexual orientation. The analysis was interesting before, when it had been broken out from '95-96 through '97-98. I would like updated statistics, Mr. Minister, on that.

Would you tell me how many human rights panels we've had in the 1999-2000 fiscal year? How many of those were referred by the director of the Human Rights Secretariat? How many were referred after an appeal to the chief commissioner? I'm always interested in terms of the body of decisions and orders from the commission in that area.

If you go back and look at my correspondence with you, on March 29, 1999, if this assists you, you wrote me a letter giving me some response to questions I'd asked a year ago, so if you could have somebody in your office pull that letter, I'm going to go through and refer to some of the same items. I'm looking for updates.

One of the responsibilities that the Human Rights Commission has is to provide advice to the minister. I know that you had consulted the commission last year on a number of issues – that was 1998-1999 – on things like the UN declaration on the rights of the child, the compatibility of government caucus decisions on same-sex legislation with human rights legislation, federal/provincial initiatives, gender equity, family violence. I note that the commission director worked closely with government, communicating to Albertans the ramifications of the Vriend decision. Perhaps you can outline for me the areas in which the commission has been providing advice and recommendations to you, Mr. Minister.

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

Let me be more specific in one area. We saw earlier in 1999 Bill 12, the Domestic Relations Act. You've certainly seen now the benefit of the so-called fences committee, chaired, I think, by the Minister of International and Intergovernmental Relations. I think she chaired the fences committee. You know the committee I'm talking about. It was set up after the Vriend decision. You saw the recommendations. You've seen the Liberal alternative, if you'll recall, on Bill 12 in terms of recognizing people who enter into long-term, mutually supportive relationships. I'd like to know what advice you've received from the commission relative to this issue. This is really an extension of what the commission's been advising you on in 1998 and 1999 around the Vriend decision.

We've now progressed, I think, to a different level of sophistication, and in terms of how we make Alberta legislation Charter-proof, I'm assuming that our Human Rights Commission is instrumental in providing advice to the government around those issues. So I'd like to know, Mr. Minister, what concrete proposals have been put forward by the commission to deal with making Alberta legislation Charter-proof, to ensure that we have equal protection for all Albertans, whether it's a question of looking at the Alberta Liberal model for domestic partnerships or what other models are being put forward by the commission.

Mr. Minister, through the chair, you and your predecessor have always told me that the commission is independent. Well, if it's genuinely independent of government, I'd expect that the good advice that they're providing would be shared with all members of the Assembly and not with the political section of the government of the province of Alberta. They haven't sent that to me directly, but I'm sure they'd be happy that you would share that with those MLAs who happen not to be part of the government caucus. So we'd sure look forward to that.

Mr. Minister, I'd be interested in what specific recommendations have been made by the commission in the last year, in the 1999-2000 year, in terms of legislative change. This is broader than what I asked a moment ago, because I'm not now talking about the sort of same-sex partner situation. I'm interested in what other kinds of recommendations for legislative change across the board of provincial government activity within the areas provided to the province, sort of the division of powers.

Mr. Minister, I had an interesting chat with the executive director of the Cultural Diversity Institute. I've been following that closely, I guess, for a couple of reasons, not just because it's headquartered in the city of Calgary, but it seemed to me that last year they got about $250,000 of public money to assist them in their work, so there are substantial dollars going in there. There were proposals to create a board of directors for the Cultural Diversity Institute, and the director of the institute was telling me about some different models that they're looking at. Can you give me an up-to-date status report on the governance of the Cultural Diversity Institute? That information would be important. As well, because of the size of the money that your department is giving the Cultural Diversity Institute, I'd be interested in some of the detailed plans.

You told me last March, Mr. Minister – and I appreciated your candour then – that there would be a research agenda for the institute in place by September 1999. Please provide me with a copy of that. The summer institute was planned for August 1999. I'd like the most current plan on that summer institute being run under the Cultural Diversity Institute.

The resource centre at the University of Calgary run by the Cultural Diversity Institute: can you give me information that I can share with my colleagues, who I think would like to be able to share the information through their . . . [interjections] Oh, no, Mr. Minister, I didn't want you to apprehend that I was close to the end. I've got lots more questions. I just thought my colleagues would like an update on what that Cultural Diversity Institute is doing, so I'm hoping we can get information that can be provided by constituency offices to constituents.

Mr. Minister, something you can help me with. We're going back and forth. On the one hand, I see that you're doing some work – Mr. Minister, I see from your smile that you're going to have responses for me probably before the end of the afternoon, and I'm delighted to have that sort of quick response.

MR. WOLOSHTYN: You haven't asked a direct question yet.

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Minister, you haven't heard any questions in what I've been asking? If you wish, I'd be happy to review them. I was looking for specific recommendations that you've offered to the government of the province of Alberta on legislative reform. I was asking for specific areas in which the Human Rights Commission has provided advice to the government of the province of Alberta on policy matters independent of legislative reform. I had asked you for information in terms of the current status of the summer institute under the auspices of the Cultural Diversity Institute, an up-to-date status report on the resource centre at the Cultural Diversity Institute and the other items I've identified. Then, Mr. Minister, I'm disappointed you didn't hear me ask for how many human rights panels in the 1999-2000 year to date. How many were referred by the director of the Human Rights Secretariat? How many were referred after an appeal to the chief commissioner? Those are the questions that I was asking.

Now, I said a moment ago, Mr. Minister, through the chair, that we'd been moving to a different level of public debate around same-sex benefits, but there's one holdover that I'd like you to address, and it's the fact that our Alberta Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act still does not explicitly include the words sexual orientation. If you take that statute and you shake it and you look upside down and you look between the lines and you look in the footnotes and you look in the margin notes, nowhere do the words sexual orientation appear. I know that you wouldn't agree that Albertans would have to pick up a 100-plus page Supreme Court of Canada decision from Vriend and King's college and have to go through all of that dense legal text to find out what their rights are.

So I'm wondering what your plans are for bringing forward an amendment so that every one of the 3 million people in this province who happen to pick up that statute will know that sexual orientation is covered. And if they're discriminated against in the areas of accommodation, in the areas of employment, in the areas of access to services customarily available to the public or advertising in one of those areas covered by the act, they want to be able to know, Mr. Minister, that that's a prescribed area of discrimination. Will you make that change? Will you make that change in the spring session? [interjection] Mr. Minister, Hansard has to record your voice, so would you please respond to that when you take to your feet after I'm finished.

Now, Mr. Minister, there have been three interesting studies done which have done some analysis and assessment on the work of the commission. I'm referring to the Human Rights Commission, and what I'm talking about, of course, is the communications, research, and assessment project. I had written you on this matter on February 3, 2000 – your office will have my correspondence – and you responded on March 2. I appreciate the response before we got to this stage. You said, and I quote: I do not involve myself in the operations of the commission; however, I know the commission is very interested in improving its business practices; the commission will be finalizing its business planning activities by April 1, 2000; we'll be able to respond to your questions soon after that date. Well, I don't want to wait until after we've voted the estimates for the Department of Community Development to find out what changes are being made by the commission.

Now, the commission has been advised of needs in a number of different areas, and I'm just going to locate my notes in terms of what those changes are. But, Mr. Minister, there were a number of things that represented some problems. I'll just find that report here momentarily. Aah, here it is.

Mr. Minister, here are some of the concerns that were identified in that report. These are the people who did the communications assessment of your commission. They discovered that members of complainant groups identified on the basis of race . . . gender, disability, age, marital status, source of income, family status, and sexual orientation, are not aware of, nor accessing the Commission in a way which is appropriately representative of the discrimination faced by these groups.

In other words, we're doing a lousy job in this province of being able to provide people who've experienced discrimination, particularly on the basis of colour or racial origin, with access to remedies. This is a serious problem.

Mr. Minister, I know you saw the same CBC investigative report that I did that identified problems with shortcomings in the work of the Alberta Human Rights Commission. When you saw this report, the communications needs assessment project, I would have thought you would have cleared that great big desk of yours off, taken that arm of yours and swept those things off the desk, put this foursquare in the middle of the desk and said: "There are vulnerable people in this province that are being denied access to the remedies under our human rights legislation. That's my first priority. There's nothing more important than making sure that people who are being denied access to accommodation or a job or access to a place customarily available to the public are able to get that access." I know you're sending me some signals that you don't want me to take literally, but I want you to tell me that you're assigning the kind of importance to it that I think Albertans would want to see assigned to it.

Mr. Minister, through the chair, the commission was found to have "some qualities and practices that appear to deter access, at the levels of service provision and information delivery." How can we have a Human Rights Commission that's deterring access? [interjection] Well, that was the assessment that was done.

MR. WOLOSHTYN: I don't accept it.

MR. DICKSON: Well, Mr. Minister, you told me in your letter of March 2 that you don't involve yourself in the commission, that you're waiting for the report of the Human Rights Commission sometime after April 1, 2000. Now you tell me you don't agree with the submissions in the communications needs assessment. I'd like you to go through the three reports that make up the communications needs assessment and tell me which recommendations you do not accept and which recommendations you do accept. For those recommendations you accept, tell me in concrete terms what remedial action you'll take in the year 2000-2001. Will you do that before we have to vote on your budget estimates?

There were other recommendations that were brought forward. There's a need to raise the profile of the Commission, with the intent of supporting the message that discrimination is wrong and that human rights are important to all Albertans, by:

- a) improving the Commission's . . . well-received publications . . .
- b) better promoting the Commission, and
- c) disseminating information.

Now, there were findings by that communications needs assessment that many of the interviewees and focus group participants were "not aware of the Commission." They didn't know what the jurisdiction of the commission was, if they were aware of it, and if they were aware of it and they had some idea of jurisdiction, they didn't know what the complaints process was. Once again, Mr. Minister, I would have thought that if I'd seen this report, I'd be hopping to some remedial action.

4:00

You've been advised by the communications needs assessment that a lot of the people who were asked about the commission thought many people interviewed and focus group participants would like the Commission to be more proactive in addressing and dealing with discrimination, particularly systemic discrimination, and human rights issues.

Where was the Human Rights Commission while this Legislature was debating Bill 12? Where was our Human Rights Commission when we were debating changes to the Insurance Act? I didn't hear the commission on the issue of foster parents, adoptions to same-sex couples. [Mr. Dickson's speaking time expired]

Mr. Chairman, so many more questions, but I'll be back. Thank you.

THE ACTING CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I thought I'd start off with a couple of questions about the key performance measures. I was comparing the charts that appeared in last year's budget estimates with the charts that appear in this year's. The first chart on page 98 of the government and lottery fund estimates has a performance indicator that asks about "customer satisfaction with community development assistance provided." In last year's estimates the figures for 1996-97 indicated a satisfaction level of 97.5 percent, yet in this year's budget it says that the information is "not available." [interjection] Pardon me? Page 98: the top chart, the key performance measures, the client satisfaction. Similarly, for 1997-98 last year's book says that the satisfaction level was 95 percent and this year's budget book says that the information is "not available."

I wonder, Mr. Minister, if all of the figures are suspect in those performance measures, because in the next chart, Support to Sport and Recreation Activities and Impact of Support to Arts and Cultural Industries, the first measure, "percentage of the population participating in sport, recreation and physical activity" – and again there's 1996. I'm sorry; I've got the wrong one. It's the third one down, the second diamond, where you're looking at "the economic impact of the arts and cultural industries" in millions of dollars. In last year's it's indicated at $300 million, and in this year's report for the same year it's indicated as $285 million.

My question, Mr. Minister, would be: has there been some difficulty in transcribing the entries from one year to the other? Should we be checking them all to make sure that they have been appropriately entered? I suspect it's just a table that's been updated and the slip has occurred that way. Those are technical matters.

What I really wanted to dwell on this afternoon are the budget lines and the estimates that are concerned with seniors. The Alberta Council on Aging in their news for March and April of 2000, this month, reports on the recommendations that they brought forward through consultation that involved Community Development, members of your department, and there are a number of recommendations there. If my memory serves me correctly, some of these recommendations have been put forward in the past.

I would ask about the notion of what is a senior and how you define a senior. The suggestion from the Seniors' Shelter Cost Study was that a senior-specific market basket of basic needs, which reflects differences in rural and urban settings in terms of shelter costs and services and which would be reviewed regularly, would include things like yard maintenance and security and home insurance and transportation and other support services that seniors need, that that market basket be established and then used as a measure in determining income levels for seniors in terms of their access to the Alberta seniors' benefit and special-needs assistance for seniors.

So what they're asking for is a flexible measure that reflects the actual conditions that seniors are experiencing, and I think they would understand and we'd all understand that determining that market basket would be a useful exercise and, again, would probably result in seniors more likely getting the kinds of assistance they need and reflect the situations in which they live.

As you go through the performance objectives, I wonder if there are really performance objectives that you can hold your department responsible for. How realistic is it to hold the department responsible for the "economic impact of the arts and cultural industries" and the "cultural and economic impact of the new Alberta Film Development Program"? It seems to me that there are so many factors other than the action of your department that actually go into the success of those ventures. Is it really a true performance measure that should appear in budget documents?

Maybe we could consider some other measures that might be more meaningful to seniors. For instance, measures in the budget, the third chart on the bottom of page 98, talk about the satisfaction of seniors with information provided by:

- Seniors Information Line
- Seniors Services Centres
- Programs for Seniors booklets.

The numbers there are very high. For 1998-99 they're all very high. They're 90-plus percent. Some of them approach the 100 percent level, and the 2000-01 targets are even higher.

Yet if you look at the recommendations that appear from the Seniors' Shelter Cost Study, seniors indicate that they're not getting "the right information at the right time." The recommendation they put forward is to explore ways of simplifying programs and informing seniors about the services and benefits available, including ways to address language and cultural barriers and alternatives to written materials.

In order to ensure that seniors get the right information at the right time . . .

As I said, these glowing performances here, up in the 90s, don't seem to match what seniors are saying about the kinds of information they're receiving.

Now, maybe these specific items, when they are questioned about them, are reflected in these measures, but it would seem to me that a more important measure is the one that the seniors are carrying forward in their recommendation, and that's asking broad ranges of seniors: are you receiving the right information at the right time? Because evidently this study indicates there's grave concern that that's not happening.

With respect to that, I wonder if the minister might comment on the provision of materials that help remove cultural and language barriers. For those seniors in Mill Woods this is a particular problem. We have, for instance, cultural groups where the females have not been outside the home, something happens to the male member of the family, and these females are faced with not knowing the language, often not really having any idea of where to turn for assistance, and it's a very large problem for some families. I know that a number of cultural groups have put in place programs of their own to try to alleviate the problem, but again the material has to be in a format and in a language that is available to groups that are living in these situations.

One other recommendation is that there be increased support to “community-based programs such as Family and Community Support Services and non-profit groups that supply Meals on Wheels” and the need by a number of seniors in lower income groups for handyman and housework services and the need for home care services to be expanded to include personal care and home support. Again, the notion is trying to keep seniors in their own apartments or their own homes as long as possible and not forcing them out to centres where it certainly costs more to keep them and where they’re certainly, and most importantly, not as happy as they are living independently. So I would ask: how do you determine that what you are providing is appropriate for those seniors?

One of the most disturbing parts of the report is one that was referenced earlier this afternoon by the Member for Calgary-West. In the Member for Calgary-West’s statement she made reference to fear among seniors in particular. I don’t have a copy of the statement in front of me, Mr. Chairman, but if I recall what she said, there was a great deal of fear among seniors about health care and the concern that the debate over the private hospitals act was raising that fear.

If you look at the recommendations brought forward from the study group, they specifically talk about fear among seniors, and they indicated that it’s “a significant theme.” Emerging from the study was that there’s fear among seniors about the future. They were fearful that although they were coping today, increasing utility rates – that is, the cost of telephones, gas, water, and electricity – increasing taxes, having to pay more and more user fees and increasing health care services “would erode their savings and place them in a vulnerable position.”

So the Member for Calgary-West was right, according to this study. Seniors are living in fear. They’re concerned about what’s happening to them. They feel powerless in many cases to control what’s happening to the revenues they have and the expenses they must pay.

I know it would be very difficult, but if it’s a significant theme among seniors, I wonder if that’s not something the department should address and that somehow or other it should be reflected in either a performance measure or some indication in these materials that seniors are worried. That’s not all a result of the work of the opposition in the Legislature. This reflects the kinds of conditions under which they live.

I didn’t want to conclude my remarks without talking about seniors’ centres and their need for operational funding. I’ve had some experience with this with my mother-in-law and the centre in Wetaskiwin and how valuable that centre is and how difficult it is, not particularly in that centre but in all of the centres, to have operational funding or raise operational funds. So the suggestion that the ministry supply $100 per senior per year or some specific financing plan so that seniors can stay in their home . . .

I know that my mother-in-law looked forward to going down to the centre, talking to the people there. The services out of the centre were those that she drew upon, and she stayed in her own home until she was in her early 90s, 92 before she was moved out. That was in part because there were those support services, and certainly the seniors’ centre was part of those services that she could draw upon. It’s much more expensive, we know as a family, to pay for her now that she’s no longer in her home, to house her in a facility that is paid for by the government. I think that’s a serious concern that has to be addressed.

The study brings forward a lot of good ideas, and there are going to be further recommendations in the future. You get quite a different picture of seniors from the study and the things they recommend than from the kinds of glowing performance measures that we see in the ministry’s budget estimates. I wouldn’t mind the minister being able to comment on that.

Thanks very much, Mr. Chairman.

THE ACTING CHAIRMAN: The hon. minister.

MR. WOLOSHYN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I’ll address some of the comments made by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods first off. I would say that all of us in this House, on both sides, have an obligation to seniors to ensure that they do not live in fear, because quite frankly they need not live in fear. What the Member for Calgary-West I think was referring to in a way was the fear mongering that comes out of this place for the crass purpose of political points that are extremely inappropriate. I would say to the hon. member that his observations I would have to agree more or less with.

Now, one of the first questions was: what is a senior? Well, I guess we’ll have variable things depending upon who defines it. If you have a private seniors’ condominium complex, they will have one age level, and if you have people who give discounts, if you will, they will have maybe another age level. For the purposes of the seniors’ benefit program a senior that is eligible for the program per se is somebody who has turned 65 and the income level is such that they qualify. So that’s one definition that we have to use for this.

The market basket of needs concept I quite frankly do have a lot of empathy for. If you take the cost of living, let’s say, in Fort McMurray and compare it to Edmonton or compare it to another community, it varies. The problem that we have is: how do you take and start administering the number of variables? Currently we’re working on streamlining a number of variables within the existing program to get it forward first.

However, having said that, I think we should be very, very aware that the special-needs program is just what it says. The intent, like you have indicated and that we certainly on this side and I as minister subscribe to, is the aging-in-place concept. That program covers a host of items. It’s been, if you will, virtually anything that could be identified that is essential for that senior’s well-being. I’m very pleased with the program, and I get a continued positive response on it. It’s one that I’m sure you would support.

If you look in the budget, we’ve virtually doubled it from one year to the next. That doesn’t indicate anything other than the fact that our communication with seniors has improved to the point where people are becoming more and more aware. That’s where the demand is. It’s not a sudden decline in their economic status. It is an awareness of the program being there and their accessing it more and more. Quite frankly, that’s there to help the people on the bottom line. We aren’t totally impervious to the fact that there are different ethnic groups and seniors out there, and because of an inability to communicate for whatever reason, we certainly wouldn’t want those kinds of folks to drop through the cracks.

One of the things that we’ve found – and you alluded to this in your own personal situation – is that the best advocates for seniors are usually their family members. If they don’t have any, then usually it goes to the seniors’ groups. I’ll point out a letter I received from – I don’t know if you are familiar with the Seniors Outreach Network Society in Edmonton. Their mandate goes on to say:

The Seniors Outreach Network Society provides in-home services to isolated seniors residing within the City of Edmonton. These services include information, referral and advocacy, together with crisis intervention. In addition, when appropriate and available, volunteers visit isolated seniors on a weekly basis to socialize and provide support.

This is a very good organization. They go one step further. I'll leave the name out. "On behalf of . . . please accept our grateful thanks for the funding received under the Seniors Special Needs Benefit."

Now, this wasn't an MLA. This wasn't a family member. This was this group that guided this senior forward to the department to get support. I obviously wasn't even aware of it until such time as this letter came. It goes on to state how wonderful the support was in terms of improving the particular individual's quality of life. Those are good things, and those are the kinds of organizations that we want to work with.

The Alberta Council on Aging has been a rather vocal advocacy group over the years, and quite frankly I've met with them on quite a few occasions and will continue to do so. They do have some good observations, but you know as well as anybody that we can't just automatically implement every recommendation that comes. There are some that we may want to but are not able to.

The bottom line quite simply is that we have taken the initiative to address the seniors on the lower end of the scale. We are doing that very, very well, not just through the programs. We keep referring to the special needs and the seniors' benefit. We have a lot of other programs. I'll just refer to, for example, the senior citizens' lodge program. That one in its own right is fairly pricey in terms of cost to the government, but then it's there for the people who, if you will, can't afford accommodation at an acceptable level, so we somehow or other try to provide it. I don't think that's being irresponsible. These are low-end seniors in these lodges.

We have another program called the unique homes assistance program, which we are going to be looking at to see if we can expand that somehow to ensure that aging in place remains or, if it can, expands, if you will. We work with a good number of housing authorities that have the social housing. A good number of these people are independent seniors who are subsidized through that category. So when people come and they just finger a particular aspect and say, "Bingo; you're all terrible," I really have difficulty accepting that.

With respect to access to the health care system, I think you know as well as I that there is unimpeded access for everybody to the health care system, period. I will repeat that. There is unimpeded access to the health care system, period. That is a fact of life. Maybe when we get into elective surgeries and whatnot, there may in fact be waiting lists. There are waiting lists; I am personally aware of that. However, to sit and say that any person, let alone a senior, in this province won't get medical care when they need it is an absolute falsehood and unacceptable, period. [interjections]

You can wave whatever book you want, but you bring to me one person who's a citizen of this province, whether or not they have a health care card, who can't get health care service and you and I will be very, very surprised. [interjections] Bring them in here. To my office, anywhere. I would like some of this nonsense to stop. Let's get on the same wavelength and start working together to promote the programs we have.

MS LEIBOVICI: A point of order.

THE ACTING CHAIRMAN: A point of order has been called.

Point of Order
Questioning a Member

MS LEIBOVICI: Will the member answer a question, please?

THE ACTING CHAIRMAN: There's no citation.

MS LEIBOVICI: What is a question under? Beauchesne something or other.

MR. WOLOSHYN: No. When your turn comes, which we have lots of time for, I'm sure you'll have not one but many for me.

Debate Continued

MR. WOLOSHYN: But I really mean that, and as I indicated in previous estimates, we have an obligation in this House as MLAs and as individuals to help

DR. MASSEY: You have an obligation to listen.

MR. WOLOSHYN: I am listening and I am doing, and if you look at the track record in the last few months that I've been minister, the ASB has gone up, the special-needs have gone up, the housing has gone up. [interjections] Hey. And I trust you'll support us.

THE ACTING CHAIRMAN: Hon. minister, could we please go through the chair. Will you please go through the chair.

MR. WOLOSHYN: Oh, I'm sorry, Mr. Chairman. I had my fixation over there for some strange reason.

For the edification of all members, Mr. Chairman, we will in due course circulate an accurate, factual comparison of the benefits that seniors receive in this province compared to the rest of the country. I hope they will read and respect that also, and if there's any way that we can improve it, we will.

Mr. Chairman, I trust I've addressed some of the concerns of the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Getting on to a few of the comments from the Member for Calgary-Buffalo, I rather enjoyed your dissertation and your floating all over the place. It was rather neat, and I expect some more floating around.

[Mrs. Gordon in the chair]

However, I will say this to you, hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo. Alberta has equal protection for all Albertans, period, and it's accessible, period. [interjections] You want me to write it on the wall? Give me a piece of chalk. If you need that to understand it, I'll even do that for you.

MS BLAKEMAN: Do it in the legislation. If you want to write it on the wall, put it on paper.

MR. WOLOSHYN: Heaven help me. What more can we do? On one hand you say: go at arm's length. On the other hand you say: do this. Well, what do you want me to do? We have good legislation. It's appropriate. It's used. It's accessed. It's supported. I don't know what you're beefing about.

Now, the Member for Calgary-Buffalo was going on about advice to the minister and my advice to the government on the legislation and so on and so forth. There's a process wherein these things come out in due course if and when it's needed.

I'll answer one question that was very specific to this – and I'll go on to a couple more – with reference to a $250,000 five-year program grant, I think it was, to the University of Calgary. Quite frankly, we don't get into the governance of that, so you'd have to talk to them about it.

With respect to the summer institute, we'll get back to you when we get details on that, because quite frankly I don't know.

Going on a little bit more with the human rights per se, if you look at some of the documents you have in your possession, you will see that the percentage of Albertans who believe human rights are fairly well or very well protected in Alberta is up around the 80-plus percentage mark, and that's pretty darn good.

MS BLAKEMAN: That's a telephone poll. What about people who went there?

MR. WOLOSHYN: The people that went there are happier than ever, because most of them got their concerns addressed.

4:30

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Hon. minister and Edmonton-Centre, please, through the chair.

MR. WOLOSHYN: Well, tell her to move over there. Madam Chairman, my apologies again.

I would say that we are very conscious of the human rights issue. We're very supportive of fairness for all. We're going to continue on that route, and I think you will find that as time goes on, the view of the commission by Albertans and the acceptability of the level of their performance will continue to rise. We're hoping to get that as close to the 90 to 100 percent category as possible.

As you pointed out in the budget, we do support the Cultural Diversity Institute in Calgary, and we're doing that through meaningful dollars and no interference. We will be working on it to see if there are kinds of things, strategies, we can do with the commission, and in due course, if and when it's appropriate, that will be brought forward. We do want to continue with the education component on the human rights end of things. Quite frankly, we want to collaborate with other jurisdictions to support the initiatives by the various ministers there. So we're working on it, and I think that if you stepped back and weren't looking for questions to the ministry, you would be quite proud of the way the Human Rights Commission in Alberta functions and operates.

With that, I'll take my place and let the members have some more shots – I mean questions.

MR. DICKSON: Madam Chairman, Mr. Minister, thank you for your comments, but there are a couple of things I'd just say. Let me start off by saying . . . [interjections]

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo has the floor.

MR. DICKSON: I'm sorry, Madam Chairman. I have a lot of colleagues who are anxious to make some comment.

As the critic for the Human Rights Commission there are just a couple of points I wanted to make. Firstly, the key performance measure on page 99, "Satisfaction of Albertans with Human Rights Protection," is next to worthless. It is absolutely next to worthless. Most of the 3 million people that live in this province will never have occasion to require redress and a remedy through the human rights machinery.

The more important thing, Mr. Minister, is if you will look at what's been done with your own focus groups. If you look at the focus groups when they have done surveys – and that's been done as part of the communications needs assessment – the people who routinely experience discrimination are telling you that they don't know about the commission, they don't know how to access the commission, they don't know what the jurisdiction is of the commission. So that tells me there's a problem. That tells me there's a problem, and this nonsense on page 99, "Percentage of Albertans who believe human rights are fairly well . . . protected," probably for the most part are part of a comfortable majority that may never have experienced firsthand discrimination. So that doesn't cut it.

Mr. Minister, would you tell us this. Every time Canada is a signatory to an international convention – for example, the U.N. convention on the rights of the child – there is a requirement that states: have to file compliance documentation. I'd like to know what the province of Alberta has done in the last 12-month period in terms of what advice, input, reports you've given the government of Canada for them to be able to file their compliance documentation. Whether it's the U.N. convention against racial discrimination, the U.N. convention on the rights of the child, or the U.N. convention on gender equality, those things, I'd like to know what input has come from the province to deal with those.

Now, Mr. Minister, I had asked you last year about what happened to that study that had been done, a survey of children in grade 8 and grade 11 to assess tolerance in this province. You had said to me last March:

This is an excellent suggestion. I have reviewed the original 1993 survey, which was undertaken by Alberta Education. I am quite interested in possibly pursuing an update, as you suggest. I will explore the idea further with the Minister of Education.

MR. WOLOSHYN: I wasn't in there in March.

MR. DICKSON: I'm sorry. It was the then minister. I'm sorry, Mr. Minister.

MR. WOLOSHYN: Right. Don't even listen to him. I didn't do it.

MR. DICKSON: I've taken the position that this is successor rights, Madam Chairman.

MR. WOLOSHYN: Oh, okay. Fair enough.

MR. DICKSON: When I get a representation from the minister . . .

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Excuse me, hon. member. Through the chair, please.

MR. DICKSON: Yes. Madam Chairman, to the minister through the chair, I assume that when a representation is made by a previous minister, that indication is going to be followed up by the successor minister unless there's some good reason. So, Mr. Minister, when you look at that letter, tell me if you agree with your predecessor that there's some merit in looking at that survey. It's important that we know what we're dealing with, and that would be far, far more useful than doing this kind of a vacuous survey of people generally in the province. If you can tell us about that, I'd be grateful.

The other item, sir, is just if you would go through each of the recommendations in the communications needs assessment and advise me now, as I said, which ones you accept, which ones you reject, and for the ones you accept, what you're going to do about it and when you're going to do it.

Mr. Minister, the other observation I wanted to make had to do with the housing. You're talking about putting $3 million into homelessness. You're the lead ministry in terms of dealing with homelessness. I haven't heard what your concrete plans are. You're going to provide $3 million for community-based homeless initiatives. Well, when I talk to people with the Calgary housing authority, the Calgary homeless authority, there's still some considerable degree of frustration. You provided the digs at McDougall Centre for use of the Calgary Homeless Foundation; thank you. You've provided some nonpecuniary kinds of supports, but I'd like for you to outline the terms of reference. What's the matrix you're going to use when you receive those applications for funding from Calgary groups dealing with an acute homeless and affordable housing problem?

Mr. Minister, I might just ask this. I think we have another $1.2 million going into the human rights, citizenship, and multiculturalism education fund. I think that's the number. Before we have to vote on these estimates, will you provide me with a list of those groups that have received funding in the last 12 months under that fund? Would you also provide me with the list that have formally applied for funding and been declined funding?

I know there are many other colleagues that wish to speak, so I look forward to your responses. Thank you very much.

MR. WOLOSZYN: Just a couple of comments that I want to make in return. I think in fairness all surveys have merit. Very few surveys can be accepted in total. Certainly I don't care who the author is of reports, surveys, whatever you have. If you present them, we do have a look at them, because very frequently we get some very good ideas. Even from time to time from the Member for Calgary-Buffalo we get some good ideas.

You made some references to tolerance and understanding and human rights, and I think you should know my background a little bit better before you take that shot at me, hon. member. Because when the Ghitter commission, the Committee on Tolerance and Understanding, was going around with your former colleague in the House, I was the principal of a school called Kitaskinaw on the Enoch Indian reserve that was written up in that report as an exemplary example of tolerance and understanding. So when you come at me personally on that bent, boy, you're heading down the wrong rail, so I'd switch real quick.

MS BLAKEMAN: Well, you can understand then.

MR. WOLOSZYN: You bet I understand. Been there, done that, and will continue doing it, and it's not a problem for me to address it. There are a lot of ways, in schools, outside of schools, and that is a very fundamental thing. We should have more of that in here, and we'd have more fruitful debates.

With respect to your request for the groups that have received money from that fund, the answer I can tell you is that, yes, I'll give you that list. The ones who were declined, I may not give you that one. I'll have to give some thought to that, but I think you want an honest answer as opposed to an empty promise. So part A you will get; part B I'll have to think about.

With respect to the homeless issue, I know that's one that has a very high priority. I think one of the things you missed on that is that I believe this is the first budget since you've been in this House and since I've been in this House where there is an actual budget line directed at homelessness. That was by no accident. That was done through the hard work of the people that we have in the department now, and I'll let you know there was some rearranging. We came through with a policy on it regarding that. We feel that figure is a good starting point.

Your question as to how it is going to be spent I think is a very good one. We're working on some mechanisms where it will hopefully be easy to access and administer and the money will go straight to where it's needed. Our hope is to work in collaboration with people like the Calgary Homeless Foundation, because they're the ones who have had the hands-on and they would be the ones who would be making the decisions on how and where this money would be going, with an accountability back to us that in fact it was used for the intended purpose. We'll do that in Edmonton, we'll do that in Calgary, and we'll look at the rest of the province. That question I think is a very good one, and whether the $3 million will be adequate or not I have no idea, but certainly if we can get something going there.

The other part that I think we should really identify here is the Hon. Claudette Bradshaw, federal Minister of Labour. I did have a very, very good meeting with her. I think you're going to find as time goes on that there is going to be a very positive and close working relationship between the federal government, the local folks involved with the issue, and the provincial government. We've got our officials on the two governments levels. They have been communicating for quite some time now. I've got assurances from the minister that she is going to work with us in terms of the communication. We decided on this in the meeting I had, and I certainly have no reason to doubt her.

The programs that we are going to work on are going to be complementary. They may or may not be hitting at the same groups, but they're going to be complementary, and we're not going to get intertwined into these trigger programs where you give 50 cents, I give 50 cents, and we try and figure out what to do with it. So I'm quite enthused over what can be coming out of there. As you well know, there were figures announced, and we'll see what happens when they come out. I certainly won't make any negative comments about it because I'm quite hopeful – and I believe in her sincerity – that when some time passes and we're able to address the problem properly, there will be hopefully a good, significant amount of money coming out of the federal coffers to complement what we're doing here.

As you are well aware, the definition of the homeless – most people look at homeless folk as just the so-called mat people, the overnighters. Well, that problem goes far beyond that. What we're trying to do within Community Development is get involved with other ministries who are involved with these folks also. Our goal is not only to provide appropriate shelter on an interim basis but to provide them with the tools to become, if you will, self-sufficient and able to provide for themselves. So it's a broader program than just a roof over their head. That doesn't happen like that. We've just got some good starts on it, and if you are interested, I could forward the policy to you at some point, and if you have some observations on how to improve it, I certainly would be more than willing to look at that. Those are the kinds of things that we're trying to get going there, and as you can appreciate, there's also a lot of other stuff.

With respect to your comments on the performance measures, you know, it's very difficult. You have to be careful that you don't spend more time measuring a program than you do delivering it. With the comments that you're making here today, my staff will be going through Hansard and picking out – and if there are areas where we can look to adjust how we do this performance measure, certainly we're going to. But again I stress to you that I would rather be a little bit off on my measure, if you will, than exhaust so much time doing it that you forget about what you're there for in the first place. It's trying to do the balancing act of having the accountability, and certainly as minister I'm extremely concerned that the lines we have in the budget are accounted for properly.

As you and some of your colleagues indicated, it is extremely difficult. How much of an impact does the budget of the Foundation for the Arts have? The best we can have is a pretty good guess, largely derived from a lot of those folks.

We implemented, as you know, the support program for the motion picture industry, putting it partially back in. That industry tells me that it's levered out fantastic numbers of dollars. I quite frankly don't know how accurate that is, but I would say: okay; fair enough; I'll accept your word on it. I'm certainly not going to expend resources to try and verify it, because you know how long that would take and what we'd have out of it.

So with that, I'll take my place again and let some of your colleagues or my colleagues who have questions to pursue.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

MR. WICKMAN: Thank you, Madam Chairman. I want to take a few minutes and leave some time for the Member for Edmonton-Centre to add some remarks on the Community Development budget. First of all, I want to go to the document and ask some specific questions. If the minister can't answer me today, that's fine. I'm sure he'll send me the response in writing, because they are specific questions. If they've been asked before, I apologize ahead of time. I may have missed certain aspects because this is a carryover from a previous evening.

Now, when I look at page 87, under ministry support services I see an increase from $7,515,000 last year to $8,669,000. That's a vast, vast increase. In community services I see a decrease from $39,376,000 to $32,731,000, which is a decrease of $7 million. When I look at cultural facilities and historical resources, I see a bump there of close to $4 million. Those are the types of questions that I'm asking for specific answers to at an appropriate time.

What I find very, very distressing is when I go to down to program 5. Special purpose housing previously, in the prior year, spent $83,140,000. There's a decline in this fiscal period to $82,557,000 – a decline – in the area of special purpose housing, which is so dramatically needed at this particular time, a view shared by other levels of government.

I flip the page. I look at program 1.0.3, finance and administration, operating expense. An increase from a little over $6 million to over $7 million. An increase of over $1 million, which represents – what? – an 18 percent increase in operating expense for finance and administration.

I flip over to the next page: program 2.1.2, arts and libraries. Again, a very, very valued service throughout the communities in Alberta. I've always maintained myself that if one utilizes the libraries properly, from a family point of view you can almost get your municipal tax dollars back. Yet we see a decrease, a decrease in that very, very valued category of programs within the budget.

Then I flip the page, and I see in program 3.0.1, program support – now, there has to be some rationale to this one – from $449,000 to $2,195,000 in program support. Does that mean direct support for the programs, or is that the administrative costs involved in directing programs? Possibly that one is legitimate in that those dollars may be all going to community programs. If so, then that's a different story.

Again I look at the next page, and I see 4.1.1, program support, operating expenses: from $807,000 to $1,084,000, an increase of over $200,000, which would reflect roughly a 26, 27 percent increase. That to me appears to be an administrative cost, when we talk in terms of operating expense for program support.

I go to the next page, program 5, special purpose housing, where some of these areas are broken down. Special purpose housing operations: a decrease from $4.5 million to $3.8 million. I go down further. The special purpose housing registries grants: frozen, no increase. Home adaptation, the HAP: no increase. Possibly the demand isn't there to justify an increase, but I hope there are sufficient dollars there to keep up with the demand because that's a program that is needed. Rent supplement: down from $13 million to a little over $11 million, a decrease of $2 million. I look at assistance to the Alberta Social Housing Corporation: again an instance of a decrease of a million dollars. So it appears to me that it's fairly consistent.

When I look through the budget, we see increases, vast increases in programs that seem to identify with administrative costs, the ministry administration and so on and so forth, yet those valued programs like arts, libraries, and special housing are being decreased, and that I have a very, very difficult time with. I myself have been involved in some affordable housing, flex-housing, barrier-free and such projects with my son, who's an architect, and I kind of realize from a firsthand point of view just how desperately that type of housing is needed out there.

I want to now make some general comments, Madam Chairman. Last night you were in the chair when we were quizzing the budget of the Premier's office, Executive Council to be exact. One of the areas I brought up was that in less than five years we will initiate the beginning of the celebrations of the year 2005, the centennial of the province of Alberta, recognizing the century since the province was legitimized from a legal point of view. I quizzed the Premier, reminded him that 50 years ago we built two auditoriums as a legacy to the 50 years. Now this is a hundred years. The Premier at that time indicated that you were involved in this and you would be coming forward with recommendations in the next short period of time outlining what areas of legacies would be left behind.

I could maybe suggest the extension of the LRT to Heritage Mall. That would serve my constituency, but I'm not sure that's an appropriate use. It has to be something that benefits the province as a whole, and it has to be something that is a legacy, that people will remember, just like I'm making reference to something that happened 50 years ago. Even though I was a fairly young pup back then, I can recall when I came to Alberta that facility in Edmonton in particular and numbers of people telling me why it was built. It was remembered for years and years why that auditorium and the one in Calgary were built, because of the 50 years, so I would hope the minister would come up with something really, really appropriate.

Under seniors the budget made reference, of course, to the 10 percent increase in the seniors' benefit cash benefit. The average amount per month is $100, so the increase works out to a very, very insignificant amount of dollars in terms of the expenditures that seniors face in terms of increased utilities, transportation costs, gas costs for those that are fortunate enough to drive their own vehicles, food, et cetera, et cetera.

Special-needs benefits, emergency funding. Now, the former minister stood here in the House one day and she told us this story about some person in one of the rural communities needing a new furnace because the furnace had gone out. And within two hours – I found this difficult to comprehend, but I have a lot of respect for the former minister, and I'm sure she would not intentionally mislead the House. This must have been an exceptional case, but a new furnace was installed within two hours. It was all functional, the senior was happy, and it was done in the middle of winter. If that's the case, if that's the way we're responding with this emergency funding, I think that is absolutely great, but that's not what I'm hearing from my constituents in terms of their applications, at least some of them. I'm hearing that a good portion of them are denied and that it doesn't happen in a matter of two hours that you're approved or disapproved.

So I'd like the minister to explain exactly how that emergency funding program is now working, what percentage of applicants are being approved, how long the process is from the time of initiation or receipt of the application to resolving the concern, fixing the problem in other words, and how that one could have taken place in two hours. Again, I don't know if a phone call was made and then somebody there made another phone call and just accepted the person's word on the phone. Again, I just have some problems with that. I know the intent is good, and it sounds marvelous. If that's the case, I applaud the ministry for conducting affairs in that manner.

Multiculturalism. I'm not going to dwell on multiculturalism. I just recognize it as one of the most important functions of the province of Alberta and throughout Canada. It's a symbol of the diversity of the country, a recognition of the contributions made by multiculturalism in terms of immigrants coming to this country and building Canada, building Alberta, and we can never lose sight of that.

Last fall when we debated Bill 38, that would have allowed for the – what's it called in the Constitution? That to me was a negative reflection on multiculturalism as well as on other minorities. Anything like that I find extremely distasteful, and I am really, really glad to see that that bill died on the Order Paper. So I don't want to see the government getting into areas where they're casting a negative light on multiculturalism. It's too important an aspect in the way of life in Alberta and Canada.

I've spoken on libraries, so I'm not going to stress any more requirements for libraries except reinforce what I said earlier. Libraries are greatly valued throughout the province.

The 2001 games is referred to under the minister's portfolio. Events like the 2001 games and the same with the Universiade games, which I participated in as a spectator, being involved and being a councillor at the time, and also the Commonwealth Games – the two were held during my terms of office at city hall. They left behind legacies in terms of the Commonwealth Stadium, in terms of other facilities throughout the city, the improvement to the Kinsmen field house, and so on and so forth. That's the benefit of major events, international events like the 2001 track and field, and the fact that the three levels of government are participating in terms of funding and such is great.

Arts and culture. The former speakers have touched on it. The Member for Edmonton-Centre has spoken many times and filed countless letters from those involved in the arts community requesting additional funding. We always have to bear in mind – I learned this at city hall – that arts is not an expenditure. Arts is an investment when we look at the major arts events, the Fringe and the various festivals that are held during the summer in particular, at what they do to the economy, the benefits they bring in terms of increased capacity in the hotels, visitors to the city, the international reputation that Edmonton has now gotten as the cultural centre of Canada. The base funding for these arts and cultural groups unfortunately has been frozen since the late '80s, and that is very, very unfortunate.

Now, just one more area and then I'm going to turn it over to my colleague from Edmonton-Centre. Just one more area, and that's the reference to lottery funds being used for programs like the Alberta Foundation for the Arts, the Wild Rose Foundation, and the Alberta Sport, Recreation, Parks and Wildlife Foundation. Let me just say that the lottery dollars that are there – and even prior to the dreaded VLTs we always had sufficient lottery dollars to support those types of programs, and that's a good expenditure of those types of lottery dollars from the scratch-and-win, the 6/49, and such. Even with the VLTs we could continue to financially support those programs. They are beneficial to the community because they do comply with the recommendation from the gaming summit to put that money directly into the community in terms of community services and community support groups.

The Wild Rose Foundation, for example, is one that I have repeatedly heard good comments about. Under the chairmanship of Krishan Joshee it fills an opportunity where groups fall between the cracks. They can't get funding here, they can't get funding there, but they can go to the Wild Rose Foundation. So that's great.

So, Mr. Minister, on that note I'm going to conclude. I would ask that for those questions he doesn't respond to today, he would respond to in writing. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. Minister of Community Development.

MR. WOLOSHYN: Thank you. I will follow your suggestion, hon. member, and try and get you written answers to a lot of the specific budget lines. That would probably be a better way of doing it.

You made reference to the centennial coming up in 2005. Your information is correct. This minister and ministry is responsible for putting that activity together. You'll notice, I believe, that we have some $600,000 in the budget to get started on it. We will be coming forward fairly soon with guidelines and criteria and our views of how the event should be going. I think that when you see that, hopefully you will be quite pleased with what you have there.

You identified the concern of time with respect to having special-needs applications processed. Your observations are correct. They were taking too long. I believe by April or May we will be properly caught up. We're working on that, have more staff in place. There are a variety of reasons why that happened, which I won't go into. One of the major ones was a sudden surge of applications. However, they're not all the same, as you observe, too. If there is an emergency, as you indicated, yes, a phone call could get it done. We're talking about your furnace going down; that is an emergency. There is no other way around it.

The other aspect. For example, when people apply for various things, sometimes you want, if you will, estimates on work; for example, dental work and things of that sort. That could take some time. Very frequently there is insufficient information. There is turnaround, and the staff in that particular end do a very, very good job. But I hope that by April, May, in there somewhere, we will have a quicker turnaround time. That's our goal, in any event. So that one I do have to say that you've observed that quite accurately.

The reference to the 2001 games. Yes, as I represent the government on that particular committee and our department does dispense the funds with it, you'll see a $9 million variation on one of the programs because of the way it's being paid out. It's not flying out the window or a big windfall. It's the payment schedule on it. As you know or may not know, there is $40 million that the province contributed to the process. The federal government has contributed $35 million plus $5 million to make a total of $80 million. The rest: a large amount of that is goods in kind from the city and then whatever the games committee feels they can take in revenues, for some, let's say, $115 to $120 million overall budget.

I think you're very right: the spin-off of that to the city and the area and to the province and to the country indeed is going to be quite remarkable. There are I don't know exactly how many countries involved, but it's probably around the 150 mark. It'll be worldwide. It's a class event. Edmonton will be put on the map in a very, very positive light, and something that I think not enough people in this area appreciate is that there's a $40 million grant to do it. That has a real good spin-off, and hopefully when we get past some of the little disagreements, nuances – whether the track should be here, there, or elsewhere – there will be some form of legacy that we can be proud of at the end of the day that's left there. Those, as I understand it, are coming along well.

The library funding. There are variations there why it went up and down, whatnot. One of the areas that we will be addressing this coming year is the method of calculating the basis of the funding on a per capita, and we're going to be taking that through the process.

With respect to your comments on the lottery funding and more money for the foundations, I appreciate that support. We want that, I think, as you do. We know that all the four foundations we have do rather an exemplary job within their guidelines, and I'm very pleased with the outcomes of them. You're absolutely right: the comments coming back from all of those foundations are very, very positive. Would I like more money in them? Yes. Could we use more money in them? Yes. Will we get more money in them? I don't know. On that and the rest we'll sort of pick up and try and give you the specific answers to your questions, hon. member.

Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Calgary-Egmont.

MR. HERARD: Thank you, Madam Chairman. I just wanted to make a few comments. I heard the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford talk about the importance of the arts, and I just want to share with you an experience. In fact, I think the Minister of Community Development and perhaps even the Minister of Economic Development might have an interest in this.

I had the honour of spending six days at our jewel in the Rockies, the Banff school of fine arts, which is truly a United Nations of culture and art. The conference that I attended there was on multimedia, the development of multimedia content for education and for games and for all of the computer multimedia things.

There were people there from all over the world: people from Australia, from Europe, from the United States, and from Canada. One of the things I discovered is that there were people there that manufacture games, you know, that kids play on their computers. They discovered that if they had nothing but programmers building these games, the kids were not all that interested, but if they had artists, musicians, graphic artists, painters, and so on involved in the development of this thing, then the kids really enjoyed the games and played them, and it involved their soul.

So I think the importance that the hon. member has spoken of with respect to the arts is going much beyond what we have expected it to be, because now we're finding that in the area of the knowledge industry, the content industry the role of artists is becoming much, much larger.

I just wanted to share that with you and support what the hon. member was saying about the arts. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Madam Chairman. I hope I don't run out of time. I've certainly got a number of other things I'd like to bring up. The first, actually, is following on the comments raised by the members for Edmonton-Rutherford and Calgary-Egmont about funding for the arts. I'd actually received an e-mail asking me to enquire whether the minister had received any request or advice from the Alberta Foundation for the Arts board requesting more money on behalf of grants for arts organizations.

I guess I would also ask if the minister had seen the numbers of letters that I have tabled here in the House from citizens in both Edmonton and Calgary writing to their local members urging the government to increase the funding to the arts.

As well, I'm aware that the Edmonton Arts Council, a very respected group here, has met with both the capital regional caucus and with the minister himself, I think, asking for an increase in that funding. So there's lots of support for the increase in funding. I'm encouraging the minister to please follow through on this. We have not seen any substantive increase in funding to the arts for a considerably long time, and there's been a lot of moving money around back and forth between different departments. There's been FTEs lost through the arts sector to other areas in Community Development.

As I've pointed out before, there's been programs added into that and money brought in with it, but that was not an increase to the rest of that sector. Essentially, those groups are operating on the funding from the late '80s, and it's been frozen more or less at that amount. When you take into account inflation, they are very far behind.

In conjunction with that and around the conversations around funding for the games, once again I encourage the minister that if the government is putting in money for the games and there is a significant cultural component, there should also be money going in to support that cultural component and not just sort of chipping off a couple of grand off of what's going into the games themselves, but there should be support for the cultural component of those games. As the Member for Calgary-Egmont has pointed out, that's a big draw for people, and being involved with the way arts and culture and festivals are presented, it's a big draw for people coming to those games. It's a big draw on educational components now, and they need the support.

I note that in a document produced by the government itself – and I don't think it needs tabling; I'm sure it's been tabled – Alberta Economic Development: Highlights of the Alberta Economy, there's an entire page devoted to arts and culture, in which the wonderfulness of the sector is being extolled to all. So the government is aware of the value of the arts and cultural sector not only in its economic rejuvenation but the vibrancy it creates in a community, the reduction that we've seen in vandalism and crime in areas that have high cultural components. There's a lot to be said there.

On to a couple of other things. The key performance indicators. I'll refer you to page 98. One of my colleagues, the Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, has already raised some inconsistencies between numbers that were presented for past years in last year's budget estimates and those numbers not appearing or being different when they are brought forward into this year's estimate books. I won't go over all of that again, but I will question the minister about the usefulness of the key performance measures. Once again I encourage the minister, as I have before, to work with the staff from the Auditor General's department to develop key performance measurements that are more useful in actually measuring what we're trying to achieve here.

I look at things like: "Percentage of funding to arts and cultural groups provided by the private sector." That's a key performance measurement for arts and cultural development in Alberta. How much money they raise through the private sector doesn't tell us a darned thing about whether we're being successful in supporting the arts. It says how good they are at raising private funds but nothing about the government's involvement and support for the arts.

In a couple of other areas I think the same sort of questions can be raised. The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo raised questions about the KPI for human rights. I look at the KPI about Alberta's diverse natural, historical, and cultural resources, and we've got "visitation at provincial historic sites" and whether they're satisfied.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I hesitate to interrupt you, but under Standing Order 19(1)(c) I must ask that we now adjourn debate and rise and report so that we can deal with the Speech from the Throne.

MS BLAKEMAN: I understand, Madam Chairman, and I shall submit the rest of my remarks to the minister in writing.

Thank you.

I move to adjourn debate.

Title: Estimates of Human Resources and Employment, Monday, March 13, 2000

Date: 00/03/13

8:13 a.m.

Designated Supply Subcommittee – Human Resources and Employment

Friedel, Gary, Chairman

Ducharme, Denis
Gibbons, Ed

Klapstein, Albert
MacDonald, Hugh

McFarland, Barry

Paul, Pamela

Yankowsky, Julius

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay. We may as well call the meeting to order then. Welcome to the designated supply subcommittee for Human Resources and Employment. I spoke to all the members before the meeting and explained that there is an all-party agreement to allocate the time for this meeting if there is no other agreement. There was a suggestion earlier that the model that was used last Monday was preferable. In this case, the minister is allowed up to 20 minutes to make opening remarks and comments. The Official Opposition would then have a full two hours for questions and answers. I understand the format that they would like is almost like a debate with the minister, so it will tend to be a little bit more informal. Following that, if the independent member, Ms Paul, is here, she would be allowed 15 minutes, and the government members would have the remainder of the time. At any point when there are no further questions from the government members during that remaining time, the meeting would adjourn.

We would require a motion to this effect to make that the process for this meeting, and if I could be so bold as to ask someone to make that motion. Moved by Mr. Klapstein. All in favour?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIRMAN: Any opposed? That's carried unanimously and that is what was required to make this motion stand.

Then we might as well get right into it. Minister Dunford, would you care to address this committee and tell us everything that we need to know about your ministry?

MR. DUNFORD: Okay. Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I'll be glad to open the discussion, and I do certainly approve of the format and look forward to questions. I should note for the record, though, that government members through the standing policy committee and through caucus have already grilled me at length, but certainly if they have further questions, I'd be glad to attempt to answer them.

The situation this morning is that I plan to go over in general terms some of the aspects of Human Resources and Employment. I have people here that I would like to introduce that are going to assist me as required, and certainly any question that's not dealt with here verbally this morning will of course be dealt with in written form at some time, and we make a commitment that we would do it in an expeditious manner.

We have Shelley Ewart-Johnson, who is our deputy minister. She's here in the audience. Jim Dixon is our public commissioner. Mark Asbell is chairman of the Labour Relations Board. Duncan Campbell and Dan Thompson help us with our finances. Shirley Howe and Debra Tiffen help Jim Dixon in the personnel administration office. Shelby MacLeod, I think you know, is my executive assistant. It looks like I've been able to introduce everyone. I want to of course thank them for putting together the 2000 and 2001 budgets, and the effort they extended is appreciated certainly by myself and I would hope by all members of this committee as we go through it.

A little bit about Human Resources and Employment. Our department supports the government goal of enhancing Alberta's new knowledge-based economy and, of course, our competitive edge. We also support another major priority of this government, and that's to build strong and caring communities.

Now, our department and the P AO, personnel administration office – I'll be referring to it continually this morning as PAO – are clearly focused on maximizing the potential of our citizens and the public sector. We also share another goal, and that's nurturing a workplace climate in the private sector and the public service that focuses on innovation, productivity, and excellence. We also want to enhance the health, safety, and wellness of private- and public-sector employees.

To talk about the Human Resources and Employment portion first, we consider ourselves to be the newly created people-and-workplace department, and it is our job to assist Albertans toward greater opportunities. We have 2,400 staff members that help Albertans try to navigate through the various programs that we can offer them as they move through the various transitions in their lives.

We assist Albertans who want to work by providing short-term financial assistance, support, or training, really with the goal for them to achieve greater financial independence. We provide Albertans with career planning information through our career development centres, and at those centres Albertans can expect counseling and services to help them make choices and hopefully land not only the right job for them but something that provides them with the esteem and the financial resources to then look after their families and themselves. By actively working with employers and employees, we believe we can create a fair and level playing field in our workplaces and ensure that our workers are safe and help nurture a positive labour relations climate. As a result, we have one of the highest productivity rates and one of the most impressive workplace health and safety records in Canada.

Finally, we want to make sure that no one is left behind. As we look to the future of Alberta – and by the way it is so bright that we need welder's goggles as we look off into the future. We just cannot afford to leave anyone behind. Everybody's potential has to be realized, because we see day after day the need and the opportunity for Albertans to create a place for themselves and their families in this economy, in this culture, and in this society.

Now, as far as the budget estimates, our budget information begins on page 235 of the 2000-01 Government and Lottery Fund Estimates. Our operating expense and capital investment are projected to be just over a billion dollars. This is a $43 million increase over our forecast for this past year. This increase provides Albertans with the quality programs and services they need to help lead more productive and fulfilling lives.

Our training programs and initiatives are just some of the ways we help Albertans achieve their goals. By providing supports for independence and clients with basic foundation skills programs and other work experience programs, more Albertans are working. Alberta has the lowest proportion of citizens who receive income support in all of Canada. Overall 70 percent of people who complete our programs are not on welfare a year later. Our average monthly caseload is down from 33,000 clients to 31,275. That's to date, as we speak. For the 2000-2001 budget we're anticipating a caseload of 31,400 clients, and this has remained relatively constant from last year.

The supports for independence budget, however, is increasing by $20 million. This is because of a significant increase in costs related to generally increasing costs for dental, drugs, and other related medical services. Last fall's increase of $58 per month to the assured support benefit rate has been annualized now in the 2000-2001 budget, and there's a slight increase in the number of people who face multiple barriers and need more intensive assistance to move them into the workforce. Overall our employment and training initiatives are showing a great return on dollars invested. That's why our training and employment support budget will receive an overall $8 million increase this year.

8:23

Now some highlights. Our department's direct spending under the labour market development agreement with the federal government will spend an additional $5 million over this year's forecast of $93.9 million. This will cover an increased demand for training, and you can find that on page 240. This program reduces the dependence on employment insurance and other government programs by increasing the overall skill level of our workforce.

An additional $1.2 million on top of the $5 million spent this year will help us expand our Youth Connections program across the province. This worthwhile program connects young people to resources such as learning and career information and jobs.

Today there are greater opportunities for Albertans to find employment because of our growing and booming economy, yet there are still some people who are not fully participating in our economy. There are nearly 250,000 Albertans with disabilities, and slightly more than half are working. We know that we can do better. So, chaired by Richard Marz, the Employability Council brings people with disabilities and the groups that represent them and employers together. This initiative will explore ways we can increase their participation in the workforce.

Now, we've invested $55,000 in the council's work. This is a small item in our budget but a great initiative that will help persons with disabilities to reach their potential. While we're encouraging greater participation in our economy, we're also committed to supporting others who may not be able to reach this goal. A good example of this is our assured income for the severely handicapped, or our AISH program. This program places greater emphasis on a person's ability rather than disability. We're encouraging recipients who have the skills and desire to work to train to the extent of their capacity, but we're also reassuring them that they're not jeopardizing their eligibility or chances of returning to the program if they don't succeed. We think this has been a tremendous reform to our AISH program in the sense that we now can provide them with the opportunity to go out and seek a challenge, seek work in the workplace without having to cross that bridge with no safety net beneath them. We think this will show tremendous increases in part-time employment amongst our AISH recipients.

Now, the budget for the program will increase to $295.8 million, which is up $27 million, or 10 percent, over this year's forecast. The additional funding provides for an increasing caseload of about 5 percent, so we're talking 24,000 cases up to about 26,000 cases and, of course, the anticipated increases in medical and dental costs.

Now, our caseloads have been increasing for various reasons. The primary reason is that more baby boomers are starting to reach that age, and we're experiencing new severely disabling conditions such as respiratory and cardiovascular problems. Other factors include an increasing number of mentally ill people, a continuing emphasis on community care as more clients live in the community rather than in institutions and require the benefits, and more people are surviving brain injuries because of the advances made in medical care. The increase to this budget shows our continuing commitment to provide one of the most generous programs of its kind to Albertans.

Alberta's child health benefits program achieves two important goals: keeping our children strong and healthy and supporting low-income working families. Under this program children of low-income families have full coverage for dental, optical, drug prescription, emergency ambulance bills, and diabetic supplies. The program has a budget of $14.7 million, which is a $4.8 million increase over this year. This additional funding will accommodate the costs of families who need this program. We anticipate that next year approximately 83,400 children will be receiving health benefits under this program. Together with Learning we will be offering health benefits to 6,500 children of postsecondary students as well. For working families we also want to ensure they are healthy and safe and are being treated fairly in the workplace.

Now, as far as the workplace and its stability is concerned, the last couple of years have been pretty good to Albertans and to our province. Our approach to labour relations is working well. From 1995 to 1999 our rate of workplace stoppage has been consistently below Canada's overall average. By the way, Canada's average is 8.77 person-days lost per 10,000 person-days, and Alberta's is 3.94, so we're actually less than half. Based on this five-year average, Alberta ranks third lowest, and we're behind P.E.I. and Nova Scotia. In 1999 we ranked second, behind only Prince Edward Island. For the same year, just for comparison purposes, Ontario ranked fourth and British Columbia ranked fifth.

Our labour relations framework attempts to strike a balance between the interests of all parties and support the collective bargaining process. Through mediation and facilitation services we're continuing to encourage workplace practices and solutions that are designed by the stakeholders themselves. We believe that this results in more enduring settlements and that these are better settlements than those types of settlements that are imposed. Our facilitators play a key role working behind the scenes to help parties problem-solve and reduce the number of grievances and disputes and the need for third-party intervention. Ninety-three percent of those cases that are assigned the assistance of a mediator are resolved without a workplace disruption.

The increase to the workplace services budget by $1.2 million over the forecast $13.7 million will help us to continue to provide Albertans with quality workplace programs and services. Some of the increases will provide support for frontline staff and support for the newly formed Workers' Compensation Board Appeals Commission and a council on workplace safety. The Workers' Compensation Board Appeals Commission is examining the entire appeal system to review the services provided to employers and workers, and I look forward to the recommendations of the chair, Sam Friedman, my colleague Denis Herard, and other members that will present that report to me, hopefully later this summer or early fall.

Now, my colleague Julius Yankowsky is chair of the Council on Workplace Safety, that was formed last year. This council is overseeing the regulatory review process for seven of our regulations; for example, the chemical hazards regulation and of course the recently OCed first aid regulation. This will ensure that our regulatory framework is effective in reducing workplace injuries and issues.

Can I ask how much time I've taken?

THE CHAIRMAN: You have four minutes left.

MR. DUNFORD: Four minutes left; okay.

Workplace injuries and fatalities. There have been a number of them in the last month, and these tragic events have brought home the absolute necessity of maintaining workplace health and safety. There are people that are looking for immediate answers and solutions that would prevent this from happening, and we are exploring different options, but we want to make sure that we find solutions that will have a real impact and will be enforceable. Now, having said all of this, I want to assure all of you on the committee and all Albertans that our workplaces really have never been safer. In 1998 Alberta's workplace injury rate was the lowest in the province's history. Our partnership program, regulatory enforcement, and regulatory review contribute to our success. In the partnership program over 3,000 companies have built health and safety programs that have been certified.

By way of comparison, construction companies that are certified have a lost-time claim rate of 3.1 in comparison to lost-time claim rates of 5.3 for construction companies that aren't certified. Our enforcement efforts continue to target companies with poor health and safety performance. In the past two years we have doubled the number of our inspections to 2,769 inspections and our compliance orders to 975.

In the area of homelessness, the shelters for homeless adults program budget will be increased by $500,000 to $10 million to ensure adequate spaces are available.

The Labour Relations Board has a budget of $2 million. The budget provides renewed focus for the board finding and delivering simpler and clearer processes for their clients. Now, we're also in that area placing greater emphasis on disputes resolution training to enhance settlement efforts.

In the area of the personnel administration office, the PAO is the government's central human resource agency. Its budget is $7.8 million, and the PAO ensures that a capable, skilled, and versatile workforce is available to meet the needs of the people of Alberta.

Our public service has been recognized for its innovative management practices in such areas as business planning, performance management, and compensation strategies. The PAO's goals focus on enabling departments to fulfill their business plans through strategic leadership, human resource strategies, and consulting services in the areas of compensation, a safe work environment, and attracting, selecting, and developing employees.

We again are dedicating $750,000 to the cross-government projects under the corporate human resources plan, and our PAO continues to take a leadership role in the implementation of this cross-government priority, now in its third year. Under the strategy we will strengthen the performance management and accountability frameworks for human resources, promote integration for human resources processes and strategies, and continue to implement strategies that will build a strong public service of the future. The PAO is the certifying partner for government under the partnerships and safety program.

That concludes my remarks, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN: And very good remarks they were.

Folks, I was just checking the rules with Diane, and I gather from the information that we looked up, this designated supply subcommittee has slightly different rules for staff than other committees. In this case if the minister wishes, his staff can join him at the table, and he can even ask them to supplement questions with technical information if he wishes. So if you want any of your staff to join you . . .

MR. DUNFORD: No. This will be fine.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay. Then we will just move right on. The official clock here says 8:36 a.m. The members of the opposition now have two hours, and what I'm going to do is allow this part of the meeting to take place in a more informal debate setting. As long as it stays somewhat orderly, I think that'll work well. I won't recognize each member as you wish to speak but will reserve the right, if it tends to get out of hand, to revert to the other process. So with that, whoever of you gentlemen wishes to go first, feel free.

DR. MASSEY: I think Hugh's going to start. Last Monday worked well because it wasn't as much a debate as it was a conversation.

MR. DUNFORD: So we'll have a chat; will we?

DR. MASSEY: We will have a chat.

MR. DUNFORD: A fireside chat.

MR. MacDONALD: Good morning. I have actually quite a number of questions this morning, but we'll start with the detailed budget analysis in ministry support services. On line 1.0.5 why is there a 16.2 percent increase in the budget for strategic services? How many additional staff will be hired with the funds, and what's the purpose of the increase?

Farther down, at line 1.0.7, what is the purpose of the 17.1 percent increase in the operating expense for information technology management? Given that the Y2K problem is resolved, what would justify this increase while there's no increase for capital investment?

Farther down, on the next line, given that the increase in full-time equivalents has been less than a 1 percent net increase, why would the human resources budget require a 29 percent increase?

On the next line, what is the purpose for the 19 percent increase in the operating expense for the finance division?

Would you like to answer those?

MR. DUNFORD: Oh, sure.

MR. MacDONALD: Also, hon. minister, if there are any questions that you would like to respond to by writing, I have no problem waiting for a letter a week or two or three down the road.

MR. DUNFORD: Well, Mr. Chairman, I don't remember if I made it clear or not at the outset, but certainly for any question I don't answer directly here at the table or if I only partly answer it here at the table, certainly a full and complete answer would be provided in writing.

So for the sake of the committee, we're on page 238, program 1, ministry support services. The question has been regarding reference 1.0.5, strategic services, showing the increase there. Two reasons basically: first of all, of course salary cost increases; then also we provided for additional funds for contracts.

On item 1.0.7, information technology management, the increase there is because we're increasing our IBM desktop support. There still are some Y2K compliance issues for the major systems, and of course we're also upgrading workplace program systems. So that represents the cost in that area, Hugh.

Under human resources, 1.0.8, this are additional manpower costs, and then we also we have an occupational health and safety project cost. Does anyone want to comment on that occupational health and safety project? [interjection] Okay. That's fine. We'll further explain the occupational health and safety project in our written answers.

Sorry, Mr. Chairman. I guess I was getting too informal, thinking that Hansard would be able to pick up sideline comments. So we'll deal with that, then, in writing later.

In the finance division, 1.0.9., again this is an increased cost to support additional regional services that we put into place under our new organization of Human Resources and Employment.

MR. MacDONALD: Okay. Thank you.

Now we'll go on to the next page. I have some questions on program 2, page 239, line 2.1.1. Why is there a forecasted increase of 17 percent in the operating expense for program support? Are there any new divisions or areas that have been or are being created to justify such an increase?

Would you prefer to go through the whole page with my questions and then answer?

MR. DUNFORD: Yeah, I think so.

MR. MacDONALD: Okay. In the next line, 2.2.3., why is there a forecasted decrease of 13.9 percent in supplement to earnings?

MR. DUNFORD: I'm sorry. For what?

MR. MacDONALD: In 2.2.3, supplement to earnings, why is there a forecasted decrease?

MR. DUNFORD: Okay.

MR. MacDONALD: How many clients are expected to be taken off the caseload to justify the decrease in funding, and how many staff will be moved or laid off with this decrease in caseload?

Line 2.2.4, temporary support. Why is there a forecasted decrease of 3.2 percent in the area of temporary support? How many clients are expected to be taken off the caseload to justify this decrease in funding? How many staff will be moved or laid off with this decrease in the caseload?

Shelters for homeless adults, line 2.2.7. Which agencies will be receiving funding for shelters for homeless adults? What method was used to determine the increase of $3.5 million to this area?

Line 2.3.1, benefits for people not expected to work, program delivery. What accounts for the anticipated increase of 36 percent or more in the budget for program delivery for benefits for people not expected to work? I'm curious: are there additional staff that are to be hired here?

Line 2.3.2, widows' pensions. What is the reason for the 9.7 percent decrease in funding for the area of widows' pensions? Is there an anticipated decrease in this caseload? If there is, why? What are the forecasts for this caseload?

That's all the questions I have regarding page 239.

MR. DUNFORD: Okay. Taking them in order, 2.1.1, program support, showing an increase. The increased costs would be to support our personal computers and our systems. When we put together the different departments, we of course found, like many other departments did, that in the past maybe there hadn't been the co-ordination with hardware, as we might have hoped. I think you could see the necessity, in fact maybe even the urgency for our computers between the adult social services portion of our department and our career development to be able to talk to each other. This is one of the unsung benefits, I believe, of the new configuration of our department in the sense that we now have full responsibility for people involved in temporary support, and we don't have to cross any more departmental boundaries.

Previously, of course, career development was responsible for the training, and the department of family and social services was responsible for the temporary support. I believe there were barriers then that might have been put into place because the objectives of the two departments would have been different. Social services would want to reduce caseloads; career development would want to bring people in who would be successful in completing training programs. Now that barrier, if it was there, has been removed. We are now fully responsible for that person. So it is important, then, that we have the technology to be able to deal with that.

Also, in that number we're anticipating an increased Imagis operating cost and new systems development, again in our technology area, and of course salary increases.

Supports for independence, 2.2. Actually, hon. member, we are budgeting for a caseload decrease, and the numbers we are using are a decrease from 33,000 to 31,400. We believe that this is a responsible view of the future given the economy that currently exists in Alberta. Of course, you're aware of the recent labour stats that were released last Friday. I think it's fair to say that anyone in Alberta these days who wants to work and can work is there, so we don't anticipate the temporary support being as fully utilized as it might have been in the past.

Also, you might remember from my remarks that we increased the assured support monthly payments by $58. I believe we did that October 1. Now, what you have in this new budget, of course – you know, we only had a part year in '99-2000. We now have a full year at that increased cost, which we have to account for, so that partially offsets, then, the decrease in the caseload.

I guess the other area in there, too, is that we have a welfare payment savings from the national child benefit. I'm sure you know how it works, but just in case, for people here on the committee and also perhaps people that would be reading Hansard, to put it on the record, Alberta has an agreement with the federal government under the child health benefit program that when they increase income to needy families, what we do is lower initially the income support. So the family is getting the same amount of cash into the home, but we are under contract committed to immediately take the money that we theoretically have saved and move it into the purchase of benefit programs for the children of these families.

The federal government and Alberta are fully in favour of that approach, because we are, I think, then directing resources at working families and families that are probably just on the border line. We want to make sure we keep them and do whatever we can to support them in their place of employment rather than having them slide back into our welfare system.

Now, the next one was 2.2.4, and that's temporary support. If I remember your remarks correctly, you talked about a decrease, but that was when you looked at the comparable budget. When you look at the actual forecast now for what we've been experiencing, you'll actually see that that is in fact an increase in our temporary support. We talked about that earlier, again some increase in costs and a little bump up in caseload. We think we'll go from an actual 31,270 to 31,400, if I've got those numbers correct in my head.

Vote 2.2.7, shelters for homeless adults. We are experiencing – and you know this – an increased demand for emergency shelters in Calgary, Edmonton, and Lethbridge, and we're forecasting 600 spaces. Also, you're aware that through collective bargaining between PAO and the Alberta Union of Provincial Employees we've had a salary increase of 4 percent. So we're forecasting and budgeting for a contracted agency wage increase of 4 percent as well – we think that's fair – and, of course, our own staff salary costs.

I don't mean to skirt over your comments about staff, but as you, I think, noted in your comments, in one of these areas we're actually not predicting a decrease in staff. I think we're adding one person. So what you're finding as we move forward with this new configured department is that people are remaining in employment. Most of them of course are remaining in their particular areas of expertise, but there is some movement around. There are no layoffs that are being forecast in this budget.

Vote 2.3.1, program delivery. I don't recall off the top of my head just now why we are forecasting that decrease in numbers. I'll have to get that to you, or perhaps somebody can slide me a quick note.

8:53

Vote 2.3.2, widows' pension. We are anticipating a decrease in caseload from the current 2,800 to 2,530. As you know, there is a means test for the widows' pension. It started in 1982 or 1984, somewhere in that area. We're finding over time that the women coming into the program have now had perhaps better jobs than women of 20 and 25 years ago. It's a stereotype, I know but any of us that have wives know that generally they're better financial planners than the male side of the equation. Well, I'll speak for myself. If I could put aside my male pride and give all my money to my wife, I'd be a rich man. She is a much better planner than I am.

MR. MacDONALD: Well, are we going to have female treasurers?

MR. DUNFORD: Well, I wouldn't be opposed to that, by the way.

In any event, the point I'm trying to make is that the widows now, as they become 55, are in better financial shape than women in the past, so because of that means test that applies to it, we are anticipating a decrease in that caseload.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you. The next series of questions will come on program 3, training and employment support. Now, before I go any further – we talked earlier about the unemployment levels in the province. It is something that I've just noticed – many Albertans I think would agree with me that modesty is a wonderful virtue to have. Mr. Chairman, I would say that this hon. minister is displaying that. I can't say that about his predecessors. Certainly, after these labour statistics keep coming out relating to unemployment, he could call his ministry the human resources and full employment department, because the province is doing pretty good, and you should be congratulated. I hope this continues. There are problems centred around that that I hope can be resolved as well, but human resources and full employment would be at the present time a good title for your department.

Anyway, training and employment support on page 240, line 3.1.1, program delivery support. Given that the first two major budget areas are showing an increase in funding for program delivery, why is there an anticipated decrease of 31 percent for the program delivery area of training and employment support? Given the focus of this government on employment of persons receiving living assistance, why is there this anticipated decrease? Is this related to the subject we've just talked about? I'm curious.

Now, on line . . .

MR. DUNFORD: Just a second. I don't mean to – well, I do mean to interrupt you.

MR. MacDONALD: Okay. Sure. Go ahead.

MR. DUNFORD: You're talking about a decrease. Where?

MR. MacDONALD: At program delivery support in the area of training and employment support.

MR. DUNFORD: So what line are you on? Line 3.1.1?

MR. MacDONALD: Yes.

MR. DUNFORD: Under operating expense; right?

MR. MacDONALD: Yeah.

MR. DUNFORD: Well, my page 240 shows an increase. Where are you getting the decrease?

MR. MacDONALD: Oh, pardon me. Yeah, and that's about 31 percent of the program, too. Okay. I'm sorry.

Line 3.2.1, employment preparation programs. Given the focus of this government on employing those receiving supports for independence funding, why is there a decrease anticipated in employment preparation programs? Will the government be changing the focus on skills development training grants?

Line 3.2.7 now. Could you justify, please . . .

MR. DUNFORD: Just a minute. I don't have a 3.2.7.

MR. MacDONALD: No, nor do I. It should be 3.2.4. What is the justification for a 24 percent decrease in the funding for operating support for employment initiatives?

Under Youth Connections, 3.2.5, how many additional clients will be served to justify the 24 percent increase in funding for Youth Connections?

That's all the questions I have relating to program 3, training and employment support.

MR. DUNFORD: All right. Under 3.2.1, again, I would want to indicate to readers of Hansard that when you look at the '99-2000 budget, which has a number of $26,600,000, and you look at our estimates for the upcoming year at $25,434,000, yes, indeed it does look like a decrease, but our forecast, what we're actually going to spend this year, is $23,695,000. So once again I would want to point out that in the area of employment preparation programs we are actually forecasting an increase in expenditure.

Employment initiatives, 3.2.4, is showing a decrease in operating expenses. Again, as I think you pointed out in your earlier remarks – and I do appreciate the compliment about full employment – we actually are in a position now to reduce the number of employment initiative projects that we have in place. We just simply don't have the clients that would be able to go into these employment initiatives.

The 4.9 percent. I don't know whether those are full employment levels, but certainly, as I'd said earlier, anybody that can work is just about at the point now where they probably are working in Alberta. What it's showing us, then, hon. member, is the fact that those who are still outside of the workforce in many, many cases have multiple barriers. It's simply not good enough just to try to provide them with a few employment skills that would be perhaps marketable out there in the economy. There are all kinds of lifestyle issues that are causing barriers, and of course then there's the whole issue of addiction providing a barrier as well.

With the demand for labour that we have in front of us, we would like nothing better than to be able to remove as many of these barriers as we possibly can, because while you're complimenting us for our full employment levels, I think you might want to withhold some of your compliments when we look at vacancy rates. I'm very very concerned about the level of participation in some industries. I've been told that this winter drilling programs were curtailed in some cases because of the lack of skilled people in the drilling industry. Now, can you imagine? Have you ever heard of it happening before in Alberta where you couldn't find enough people to put on drilling rigs? It's certainly new in my experience. We're ready with employment initiatives whenever we can find the people to put into those particular areas, but we're here today to talk about estimates and what we think is going to happen next year, so we're in fact showing a reduction.

9:03

Youth Connections, 3.2.5. You may be aware from the press releases that Youth Connections is spreading rapidly throughout the province. Probably as we speak, Youth Connections programs are being unveiled in Strathmore, perhaps in Banff. I've attended many of the openings: Medicine Hat, Lethbridge. The Youth Connections program proved so successful in Calgary and Edmonton that we just felt an urgency to spread it throughout the province. In terms of the additional numbers to justify that increased experience, we'll have to provide that to you in writing because I don't have that in front of me.

Of the many things that we've done, most of which are good – perhaps all are good, but again I want to maintain my modest profile – the Youth Connections program is one that I think will be historical in value.

Those are my comments on that page.

DR. MASSEY: If I could, Mr. Minister. You talked about the high employment. Do you keep track of the shape of that in terms of the wage categories? I was reminded, you know, of our push to have a high knowledge-based economy. There was a clip on television the other night on Silicon Valley and homes selling there for – you couldn't buy a two-bedroom home for less than $600,000. The clerks in the offices were riding the bus all night or they were going to shelters because they couldn't afford housing. I don't think we're anywhere close to that, even in places like Fort McMurray, where housing is very, very expensive. I was talking to a group of teachers up there and talking about how difficult it was, given the wage scales there, to enter that kind of housing market. I guess my question is: do you monitor the shape or the profile of that labour force and what happens? Are there efforts made to make sure there's a balance of well-paying jobs versus entry-level kinds of jobs?

MR. DUNFORD: Well, we don't have the labour statistics sophisticated to the point that you're asking about, but there's some general information that we do know. First of all, let me say that the reason we are involving ourselves in the shelter situation is that in some cases what you have is people who are employed but are simply unable to pay the rents that they're finding. This is a particular problem in Calgary, as I've come to understand it. Now, with current gas prices we have exacerbated the situation still further, in my view, because some people, to escape the high rents in Calgary, have not only moved to the outskirts but have gone to the so-called bedroom communities in and around Calgary and then of course are commuting. To do that, you generally have to do it by car. With pump prices now at 64.9 and that sort of thing, there's a real concern.

Of course, the concern that we have, then, is: are we topping up those wages enough so that these people can get by and remain in the workforce? One of the main focuses that we have in Human Resources and Employment is on the working poor. We know that if we can get them into the workforce, then careers start to develop and wages start to increase and they move up in those particular areas.

On the whole area of vacancy rates, whenever I have an opportunity and the context is appropriate when I'm speaking publicly, I've been challenging industry associations, I've been challenging unions, I've been challenging employers throughout this province to start to do better at human resource planning. We in government do have resources that our department has that we put into training initiatives, and certainly the Department of Learning has huge resources that they use to try to meet the particular needs, but if we don't as government get the proper information from industry, then it would seem to me that it is only by accident that we're able to fill the demands.

Obviously I'm using this opportunity now to stand up on that little soapbox and say again to this committee and the influences that you have and to people, again, that are readers of Hansard that this is a serious, serious matter. If we're going to achieve that future that many of us see for Alberta, we just have to have better human resource planning. The government is trying to do it. We talked earlier under the personnel administration office about our human resource strategy, but every industry needs to be as involved as we are in forecasting skill-set needs.

DR. MASSEY: Thanks.

So right now, if I understood what you said, there's not a sort of monitoring or any kind of an attempt to look at that profile.

MR. DUNFORD: I wouldn't say that there are no attempts, hon. member, but there's no sophisticated report that I receive every month that tells me the vacancy rate for drilling people, that there were a thousand positions open, that there's a thousand openings for truck drivers, or that there's just a huge need for software industry people.

DR. MASSEY: I'd shift, then, in terms of the employment standards – and maybe this isn't the place – to the recent incident, the tragedy in Calgary in the sub shop. There was a suggestion that there should be a requirement that they work in pairs in those kinds of situations. Have you done anything? Is that where this would be addressed?

MR. DUNFORD: Well, we don't have anything in our budget particularly dealing with that matter, because the financial pressures of multistaffing would of course have to be borne by the employer. Would you like me to make a few comments on the situation?

DR. MASSEY: I would appreciate your thinking on what the solution might be.

MR. DUNFORD: Okay. Well, currently our staff has provided me with a document that lists a number of options that we have. Now, I'm not going to consider, though, that this is the exclusive list. We will be talking to police services. We will be talking to employer/employee union groups in order to get some of their thoughts, but thus far there seem to be at least two avenues to approach the situation that happened to Tara Anne McDonald.

9:13

The first one, that seems obvious, as you have mentioned – and I'm not listing them in priority – is under the Employment Standards Code. Right now we have legislation and a regulation that restricts the ability of anyone under 18 to work alone. They can't work alone, as a matter of fact. If I have the exact hours right, between 9 p.m. and midnight there has to be another person with them who is over the age of 18, and if they are going to work after midnight, they not only have to have another person over 18 with them, but they also have to have written consent from a parent or a guardian. So we have that situation.

The suggestion has been made that an option would be to simply remove the age restriction. People would not work alone, then, after 9 p.m. or pick another hour of the day or night. It has some attractiveness in the sense that people see it as a quick and easy solution, perhaps. I've learned over the years to be cautious about quick and easy solutions, because one size generally doesn't fit all. So we're going to have to have a look at it, but the point would still be that under the Employment Standards Code there could be a change, then, to deal with that particular matter.

The other option that's open to us would be through workplace health and safety in terms of the designation of a hazardous site, thus forcing an employer to do a hazard assessment and then come up with some sort of risk management plan that would then be acceptable to our officials. That seems on the surface of it to provide a little more flexibility, but again I think it needs broader consultation than just within our own department.

I know it's difficult to deal with the emotional issue of it, and it would seem that if somebody had been with Tara, perhaps she would be alive today. What I wake up in the middle of the night and wonder, though, is if this punk might have had the power to overcome both of them and there would be two dead in that Subway. I worry about things like that.

Getting back to previous member's comments on full employment, I also wake up and worry about eliminating employment. If the margins are so tight on, say, a convenience store in a particular area and they're forced to go to multistaffing and feel they can't afford it and then simply shut down their operation at 9 at night or whatever it is, then I've just put somebody on the unemployment roll. So I do worry about limiting employment as we try to provide a safer work environment.

Now, there might be other options that are available, and certainly we are open to hear them. Our mind is not made up, but our mind is made up in the sense that we're not going to leave this alone. Something will be done.

DR. MASSEY: Thanks.

Could I move to the AISH program for just a minute? You talked about the increase – and I think that was really welcomed – and the flexibility of AISH recipients. I guess my first question is: how do you determine the level? There was $58 added. Is there a basket of costs that is examined on an annual basis for AISH and those living on social assistance? How do you determine what is the right level of support?

MR. DUNFORD: I don't know that there is a formula. Can somebody nod? No, there's no particular formula. So what would be looked at, then, of course is: what is the relationship to other support programs? What is the relationship to, you know, if one were able to work and to create an income, what that would likely be, and then try to relate that to a support level. Then I suppose at the end of the day there's also the consideration of the fact that as the minister I am responsible for – and I take it with a huge amount of concern – and have to be steward of the taxpayers' money. So we have to be seen, then, to be fair to both parties in the sense of something that provides a livable wage and also is something that's acceptable. I don't need a taxpayers' group getting on me about the AISH program, and so far they haven't. I think they see it as a fair level.

We update it periodically, as you know, although there's nothing I can announce in this session this morning, but certainly as we see some of the costs escalating, we constantly monitor it.

DR. MASSEY: I appreciate that balance between making sure that they're well cared for and have the resources that they need yet not offending the taxpayers. There's not a lot of sympathy for people on social assistance, unfortunately. I deal with quite a few of them in my constituency office, and I should say that the department is just excellent in terms of working with clients when we run into difficulties, but it's still a huge problem.

We started an antipoverty roundtable in Mill Woods to try to bring together all the resources. We didn't know we had five food banks of one shape or another, churches that were working, and we've got a garden project going, trying to encourage gardening in public housing. So there are a number of things, but it's really a trap for some of them. Some of them don't have telephones, and even just communicating with people living in poverty is a problem just in a small area like that. I really am interested in how those support levels are determined and that they are regularly reviewed because of things like increased costs for fuel now and other costs.

MR. DUNFORD: Can I just ask a question? On that antipoverty committee that you formed in Mill Woods, have you invited a member of our staff to be part of that?

DR. MASSEY: We've had various members of community agencies, but I'm not sure that we've had anyone specifically from your department.

MR. DUNFORD: Well, we have great people.

DR. MASSEY: Good. It's a good suggestion.

MR. DUNFORD: I guess you want it on a volunteer basis. That's fine, but I'm sure that if you approached us, somebody would. I think it would be a good resource for your committee.

DR. MASSEY: I appreciate that.

On the AISH program, can I give you a bit of a case and then pose my problem? I have an AISH recipient who has a diploma from NAIT in business. He's written a number of business proposals. The last time he wrote a business proposal it was turned down, and he was not given any reasons why the proposal was turned down. It was a contract group that was handling the proposal. I wrote a letter asking if there was an appeal process, and if there wasn't an appeal, if the applicant could at least have a list of reasons why the business plan was turned down. I think he eventually got an oral report from them, but there was nothing that I ever saw in writing. I only get the one side of the story, you understand.

9:23

MR. DUNFORD: Did he submit it to us, though?

DR. MASSEY: No, it was to a contract group in the city.

I guess my question is: is there a troubleshooter or someone in your department that someone can go to? This has gone on over a couple of years. I forget how many hundred employment applications he's filled out. His disability is such that he can't rely on his health. He's up one day and down the next, and it makes it very difficult for him. I wondered: is there a troubleshooter? Someone that's been trying to work the system in the best way but just seems to end up in a dead end and terribly frustrated: is there someone he appeals to in your department?

MR. DUNFORD: I would suggest in this particular instance that the two of you work together to get something in writing that he can feel comfortable in signing basically stating the case, submit it to our office, and then we'll have a look at it. I would also then propose to send a copy to the hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills and his Employability Council. Although they're not there to look into specifics, at least it might give more information to the Employability Council as to some of the barriers our people are faced with.

DR. MASSEY: I don't think he's as much interested in complaining as he is in getting something in terms of a bit of a small business going, a home-based business, but I'll follow that up.

I've asked the question about the support levels.

I guess the last one I had was on the Alberta child health benefit. How do people find out about that? Again, we seem to have people come into the office who don't know what's available.

MR. DUNFORD: I liked your comment earlier about people that are living on the edge not having telephones. They probably sure as hell don't have computers. So while we congratulate ourselves on just tremendous web sites, for certain specific individuals, I mean, we might as well be talking into outer space because we're not going to reach those people. Our caseworkers are particularly cognizant of these particular programs and the difficulty we have in communicating them.

We are forecasting, of course, an increase in our child health benefit costs because we are dedicated to providing better information and better communication so that we find those children. We think we can really help some working families with this particular program. We think it's just an excellent, excellent program, because it gets a lot of the health and dental costs off the parents' backs. So however we have to do it, we will make sure that we try to get that program communicated, because it's just too helpful. How do I say this? You know, this is a program where we want the cost to increase.

DR. MASSEY: Thanks.

MR. MacDONALD: Mr. Chairman, I happen to have some more questions for the hon. minister of human resources and full employment, but before that, I have to remind him of a study that I read. It was presented, I believe, to Alberta Treasury officials. It was researched by an economics professor at the University of Calgary, Robert Mansell, and interestingly enough he and, I believe, some of his students compared Alberta with three American states that have basically the same sort of economy, agriculture, and industry. I think the states were Texas, Oklahoma, and Colorado. In the last decade there has been a significant increase in economic activity not only in Alberta but in those three states as well, and remarkably the disposable income of the workers in the three American states was significantly higher than here in Alberta. Here in Alberta, as I recall reading the report, the disposable income had stagnated. I believe it had gone down marginally for the Alberta workers, and I have some concern about this. I wonder if the hon. minister or any of his department officials have looked at this study and if they have any comment on it.

MR. DUNFORD: Well, first of all, I think you're on to an excellent point. The way that we do our income tax in this country has I think created the very situation that you're talking about. The ability of both the federal government and the provincial government to benefit from the so-called bracket creep I think has contributed a great extent to the leveling off of disposable income and in some cases maybe even the decrease. I personally, but I think we can speak on behalf of the government, am extremely pleased, then, with the recent move by the federal government to involve themselves with indexing a number of the funds, and of course it's now the responsibility of the Alberta government to respond in kind. We have in some cases, but we still have a little ways to go in my view.

The thing, though, that I want to point out to you is the employment tax credit as it relates to families with children. I have heard from the executive director of the Edmonton Social Planning Council that this has been something good that this government has done. Now, many of you will know that we don't often hear from that particular individual about anything positive, but in that case he made the comment to me verbally that it was having a clearly positive impact on the ability of people of lower incomes to look after their families.

I know there's current discussion around the flat tax and what that might do to middle-income families. That'll be sorted out by accountants, not by me. Increasing the personal exemptions for both spouses I think is going to have a huge impact, and of course the Treasurer talked in the Budget Address about actually removing 132,000 Albertans from paying any provincial tax at all. Now, when we lay on top of that the recent announcements by the federal government, I don't know if it'll be 132,000 that won't pay any federal tax either, but I imagine the numbers are going to be actually pretty significant. What we need to find is reform in our tax system in Canada so that the incentive is still to go out there and go to work and work as hard as you want to but as hard as you can and then be properly rewarded for it so that, again, you can increase disposable income and thus increase your quality of life.

We know there's a direct relationship between education and income and health, and while I don't necessarily want to bring a health debate into this particular area, there has been too much attention, in my view, spent on what happens after a person is injured or ill and not enough attention on how we keep people from injuring themselves and how we keep people from getting sick. There needs to be a lot more concentration on the preventative side of it, because not only will it start showing dividends in terms of health budgets, but I believe it will carry on into the economic well-being in the workplace. I think people will then be more productive because they'll be at work. People will be happier because they're productive and because they're at work, and there's just a huge payoff to be made there. We want to see substantial increases in disposable income in Alberta.

MR. MacDONALD: Okay.

Mr. Chairman, I also have some questions for the hon. minister regarding occupational health and safety. Earlier I believe you said something to the effect that workplaces in Alberta have never been safer. I would object to that statement. Two Albertans per week are fatally injured on the job, and that is two too many. How many field inspectors doing workplace inspections to ensure that all OH and S regulations are being followed are employed in your department, and are they informing the sites that they are to inspect that they're coming, or are these inspections done on a random basis? How does the number of inspectors that you're employing now compare to, say, 1996, 1997, 1998?

Also, I have questions regarding the partnerships that you mentioned, particularly those in the construction industry. You were talking last time, I believe, about claim rates of 3.1 versus 5.3 for those who are not certified partners. What are you doing about this 5.3 statistic, and are those contractors reluctant to get involved with your program? How are you making them comply, or is it just a penalty with WCB? They just pay higher rates and that's it?

Also, the issue of light duty comes up in my constituency ofice frequently. Employees are told, after they're injured, to go on light duty. They follow this program for five or six weeks, and then they're laid off. I think these statistics are inaccurate because of the number of cases of light duty that are showing up at the constituency door. If this is the case – and I suspect it is – it's wrong. It's a bad practice, because once those people are out of work, physically they're incapable of finding another job. An employer maybe has a lower WCB rate, but these folks have no means of supporting themselves. It is a trend that I would like to see certainly stopped and hopefully reversed. Light duty in the workplace I don't think is the answer for our problems with workplace safety.

Now, I also have some more questions, if I could go on here for another minute, regarding fatality inquiries whenever someone unfortunately does lose their life in a workplace accident. I have a lot of problems with how OH and S investigates and reports on these fatalities. I have read many of the OH and S investigative reports. I have compared them to the OH and S regulations. Oddly enough some of the regulations are not even mentioned, and the violations of these regulations directly affected the outcome, the fatality. Who determines which violations are pursued in court in an OH and S investigation? What are the criteria for this?

The statute of limitations, I understand, is one year. Charges must be laid within a one-year period or it cannot be done. Now, I'm very concerned about this, because in the past I have had some OH and S reports that have come, oddly enough, the 50th week after the accident occurred, and there have been many violations of the regulations, some of which are outlined in that report, but no charges are laid.

One particular case would come to mind, and that would be in Calgary. The details I don't have before me, but there was one worker killed west of Calgary – I believe it was last summer – while he was installing the metal framework for a tent. He was unfortunately electrocuted. Now, charges were laid in that case, but two summers ago, I believe at the start of Stampede week, there were two workers killed at a site where they were erecting a metal building. No charges were ever laid, but there were violations of OH and S regulations. If you could share with us as to why this has occurred, I would be grateful.

Those are my questions at the moment. Thank you.

MR. DUNFORD: Well, some pretty serious allegations. They of course will be recorded in Hansard, and I'll have to get some information for you in response because I'm not familiar with the specifics.

My understanding of occupational health and safety – I'm kind of working backwards on your list – how it arises in court. I believe it would be a similar situation to where occupational health and safety would have to submit their documentation, their view to Justice, and then they would make the determination.

Fatality inquiries: you know, I take your point. I don't want anyone to think that when I talk about low hazards or a good safety record of 3.1 or 5.3 or whatever numbers that we're using, we are satisfied with that. I agree with you completely that any fatality is one too many. The reality, though, is that in many of the industries in Alberta there are hazards that exist, and it would be unrealistic for me to think that there wouldn't be a fatality during my watch in this particular ministry. So then what do you do about it?

I think that for the first time this morning we probably have revealed to ourselves the differences in ideology and philosophy between you as an hon. member and me as an hon. member. I fervently believe that education is more successful in the long term than enforcement, and our philosophy and our policy to go with that philosophy are based on that principle.

I don't know off the top of my head how many field inspectors we have. We'll certainly get that information to you. I know that I've been around occupational health and safety for many, many years. There are still people within our department who see themselves as enforcers, and that's fair enough. We need that aspect of it as well. But most of our people, I believe, see themselves as educators and as facilitators toward safer workplaces. I'm comfortable with that, and I will be viewed as being successful or not in this portfolio based on that particular philosophy.

When we use the numbers, I believe it's a truism that what gets measured gets done. We have to have a way to measure the relative safety of our workplaces, and the way that that's done is to look at lost-time accidents as some sort of ratio over man-hours worked. I can remember in the late '60s filing with the employer that I had. The employer at that time wanted plant by plant by plant workplace health and safety statistics. The industry has evolved to the point where there now is a meaningful statistic that is used, and I think, then, it's legitimate for Alberta to compare itself against other jurisdictions. There's nothing particularly unique in the sense of a jurisdiction wanting to have safe workplaces. Alberta doesn't want a safer workplace any more than Ontario, B.C., Prince Edward Island, or any of the other jurisdictions, but how do we measure what the performance is, then, of these particular jurisdictions? You have the workplace statistics.

When I talk to this group about the relationship of Alberta to P.E.I. and to Nova Scotia and other jurisdictions, I'm doing it in that context. It does not mean that we're complacent. It does not mean that we don't care. In fact, I would use what has become a theme, I believe, for this government, and that is: just because we're doing good doesn't mean that we can't do better. We will strive to do that. On the national scene and in any street and community in this province there is not a member of this government that needs to hang their head because of the safety record within this province.

The partnerships program, which is a voluntary program, has proved itself. The numbers are there to show that. We are strong advocates of the partnership program. We are constantly recruiting new companies and, more importantly perhaps, new industry associations into that particular program. Three thousand companies today. I don't know what that number is in terms of employees. I wish I did, and we'll provide that to you in an answer. Until we have 100 percent coverage, then we are leaving ourselves open and we're leaving ourselves susceptible to an overly hazardous work site. We are working continually on that. I don't know how many partnership certificates I sign. I don't sign them daily perhaps not even weekly, but I certainly do monthly. More and more of the companies are coming into that particular program. I believe it's been recognized by the union movement in this province as a way to go.

I can tell the hon. member that I have personal experience because I sat at the table of the Occupational Health and Safety Council when the partnerships program was first conceptualized and then as it moved forward and became implemented. On the Occupational Health and Safety Council at that time there were representatives of the public, representatives of employees, and I was there as a representative of the employers. While it wasn't unanimous, we had a majority and we had support from some of the more progressive unions within this province as we brought forward that program. It is successful, it is proving itself successful, and it'll be even more successful in the future. If I haven't been clear, I think it's a great program.

MR. MacDONALD: Okay. I also have some questions, Mr. Chairman, for the hon. minister regarding labour relations in this province and the rate of work stoppages. It seems to me that we have a double standard. Sometimes the department is very anxious to get involved and, to their credit, successfully resolves situations. One that comes to mind certainly is the Calgary public school board. Whenever there was a mechanism within the Labour Relations Code, the disputes inquiry board specifically was used to resolve a dispute.

Now, in the same city we have the Calgary Herald workers. They've been on strike since November 8, and this is well past four months. We have a little bit of history that I think we have to go through now, Mr. Chairman, and that's that in 1935 the sister paper of the Calgary Herald, the Edmonton Journal, received a Pulitzer prize. They're very proud of this award. They have a recognition of it in the lobby. In 1935 the government of this province, as I understand the history, passed a bill to limit freedom of the press.

MR. DUNFORD: It wasn't this government.

MR. MacDONALD: No, certainly not, but in 1935 the government of the day passed a bill, and I believe that the Lieutenant Governor at the time questioned this. However, you look at this situation and you look at the fact that one newspaper at one time stood up in defence of freedom. It was an internationally recognized award that they received.

Now we have, unfortunately, in Calgary a very divisive situation. I think it's evident that our labour laws are inadequate when this dispute cannot be resolved, and we have to change the way we're doing things. You can talk about having stable labour relations, but as I understand from the statistics that you quoted earlier in your opening remarks about time lost due to work stoppages in this province, the Safeway strike of three years ago would have been removed from those statistics, and I don't believe it is right if that has occurred. I know that in past years that was the situation.

Now, maybe under your direction it is different, but whenever you look at the percentage of the workforce in this province that's unionized, it is wrong to compare it to, say, Ontario or British Columbia, because they have higher rates of union participation in the workforce.

MR. DUNFORD: So what are you saying? That unions lead to labour disruption? Is that what you're saying?

MR. MacDONALD: No. What I'm saying is that whenever you have inadequate labour laws and labour laws that are not enforced, you do not have the stability in the workforce that you should have.

Specifically with the Calgary Herald strike, what initiatives has your department taken and what initiatives do they plan to take to resolve this dispute? It's a blight on the entire province, in my view. Thank you.

MR. DUNFORD: Well, I think you probably set the stage, anyway, for my answer in your last comment about it being your view. I respect that, and I respect that view. Committee members will know that you and I both come from different sides of the labour relations table, but both of us have been there. I think both of us understand that the incredible success that Alberta has had when you look at stable labour relations is from the fact that we have a system in place and we have a chairman and we have members and staff at the Labour Relations Board. We have a Ministry of Human Resources and Employment that tries to remain as unbiased as it possibly can in a situation. The law is there to assist both sides of a particular dispute to arrive at some sort of settlement.

People are free in this province to bargain collectively, and once they do, once they turn over that individual responsibility to the responsibility of another party, they then bear whatever fruits come with such a decision. I find it remarkable that a strike at the Calgary Herald garners as much interest as it does. Perhaps it's because it's a media outlet. There are other strikes in this province that of course have gone on longer that we don't hear quite so much about.

I personally have been misquoted about comments that I made at a public meeting. As a matter of fact, the hon. member in question period misquoted me in the sense of trying to relay to the public that this minister was unconcerned about the particular situation that is happening at the Calgary Herald. It certainly isn't the case. When we have a dispute, it is our intention and it's our mandate to do what we can to find the resolution to that particular dispute, and to that end we have had mediation that has been involved. They're at the basic beck and call of either party or both parties. I don't know the actual experience, but I don't believe that you could cite one instance when both parties agreed to mediation where we have not been able to meet that request.

So you have a situation. I mean, the Calgary Herald continues to publish, but it is a dispute. It is impacting on our work-loss statistics. Once again I would refer to a comment that I made earlier and that is that in the area of labour relations when it comes to disruptions in the workplace, one has to have some measure. Again, the industry, which consists of both employers and organized groups such as unions, has developed over time a way in which to measure that. Based on that measurement, again, unless you are personally involved on one side of a particular situation, a reasonable and objective observer in looking at the labour scene in Alberta would say: ah, there is a stable labour relations jurisdiction.

The organized groups around the Calgary Herald situation are certainly welcome to continue to make their views known, but when I get a specific request that asks me to impose a first agreement, we will not do that. That would be in violation of the current act, and the current act is not now up for amendment in this session of the Legislature.

DR. MASSEY: If I could just change the subject from the Herald. I may need your help, Mr. Minister, with this. There was a concern about the wages between government workers and contract and community group workers. I believe the previous minister of family and social services was involved in a project or there was a group that was put together to look at those to make sure that when services were contracted out, those workers weren't working up to 45 percent less, I think was the figure I saw, than government workers. It was causing all kinds of difficulties with community groups and with service providers because there was a huge turnover, a 25 percent turnover, in their staff and competition for staff, and it was particularly acute in programs where they're working with aboriginal communities. I wondered what's happened since there's been the change in the responsibilities of the departments. Has that been picked up with your piece of those workers? What's the state of that project?

MR. DUNFORD: Well, it's a real concern. I agree with what you were saying in the sense that it caused a huge turnover amongst those community agencies, and they're not able to attract and retain adequate and skilled staff. We have to find ways in which to address that, and unless I'm missing something, we haven't addressed that specifically in this budget other than to provide the 4 percent increase. But as you have already indicated, all that does is exacerbate the spread, because the government classification schedule is higher and we're putting 4 percent against that, and the community agencies tend to be lower and we're putting 4 percent against that. So clearly what is happening is that we have a further increase in that spread. It would be our plan over the business plan cycle to try to deal with that situation, but we've not addressed it directly in the estimates that are in front of you. I do appreciate your bringing it forward because now we have it in Hansard as a concern and agreement, then, between you and I that it is and should be a concern. We have to find a way to address it.

DR. MASSEY: Thanks.

Can I jump back to persons unable to make personal care decisions and ask just for some information? How are their assets treated? The AISH individuals have a limit on assets. I'm not sure what the numbers are, but I wondered how the assets of those individuals are treated.

MR. DUNFORD: Well, you're talking about the public guardian here; are you not?

DR. MASSEY: Yes.

MR. DUNFORD: So it's the public guardian's responsibility then to administer support and service to that individual as programs would dictate. If the client has assets and if they are severely disabled and applying for AISH, then of course whatever assets they have would come into play, and if they're applying for some other type of program, then whatever the rules are that would govern that particular program. As I understand it, the public guardian itself doesn't provide them directly with a particular income as they look after them. It's their job to be responsible for that person and in a responsible way to go out and gain whatever is available to them through the various programs.

DR. MASSEY: Is there any obligation on the part of families, any financial obligation, as those people mature and become adults?

MR. DUNFORD: Well, we're into the technical details of that. We'll have to answer that in writing to you. I'm interpreting your question as being if the family has assets, what their responsibilities might be if they are not the guardian. We'll have to answer that in writing for you.

DR. MASSEY: Thanks.

MR. GIBBONS: Mr. Minister, I come from both sides, actually running, managing companies with unions as well as those that I've had on my own and didn't have to have unions because we treated them well. I have a few concerns in my end of town. I've got a pocket which has, supposedly, the seventh highest unemployment in Canada, and that pocket copes with mental patients that are discharged into the community from Alberta Hospital as well as families where the husbands are in the maximum penitentiary, coming mostly right now from Winnipeg, being relocated from Stony Mountain and whatever. I do have a major concern about the amount of work we have in our office on a lot of these cases, mostly mental patients, so you know how my questions go in the House on that.

Our apprenticeship system in the province really needs a revamping and a look at the trades industry, that includes sheet metal, welding, and machinists that have run companies over a number of years. This is a place where we're really running short, looking at the manpower we need up in Fort McMurray. If we had been coping with it for the last six or seven years, maybe we wouldn't be sending as many job finders to Europe. I'm not knocking European workers coming over, because a number of the companies I worked with for years were 90 percent German immigrants who came over in the '50s and really developed the steel industry. We do need to really look at that.

The other one. I have a number of people calling the office who would like to get into some programs around computers that are one-year programs. Is there a funding program to help them out? There was at one time.

Given that we have our little sheets faxed out to us, as well as if you read The Armet or whatever, it always seems to be around the unemployment in Alberta. It's nice to see on paper what we look like, but in actual fact we have a number of people in the larger urban areas like Calgary that are homeless. Thirty-three percent are actually working joes that are making $7 an hour. They can't make enough money to pay the rents that are down there. Is that being looked at, given that the government has resolved that the unemployment rate is an important issue? It doesn't matter where you go. I was in Grande Prairie and Fairview in the last couple of days, and that was a concern up there too. With the shutting down of the alfalfa plant just outside and the receivership of the fibreboard plant, these people are not working anymore. It's an area that really needs something looked at.

I might have two more afterwards, but I'll stop here.

MR. DUNFORD: Well, I think you touched on some excellent areas. I would refer back, of course, to my earlier comments when I talked about some of the vacancy rates that we have and where employers are unable to find the types of skills that they need.

We don't have direct responsibility for the apprenticeship program in Human Resources and Employment, but we certainly are supportive of the Department of Learning in the areas that they are trying to move forward in. I do have some experience in that particular area, and of course we had moved forward in a streamlining situation for apprenticeships in Alberta that, I believe, if it hasn't already, certainly will soon start to show some results. By way of interest for people looking at our budget estimates, we're actually sending over to Alberta Learning $13.1 million for their budget to help them in that particular area.

I believe that our ministry and certainly in my responsibilities as the minister we've been very supportive of people moving into the skill trades. Here is another example of Alberta doing a good job but needing to do better: 9 percent of the population, yet we're indenturing, I believe, 19 percent of all of the apprentices in Canada. So we're certainly doing more than our share, but we're not altruistic about it. The fact is that we need those skills, so we're doing it for ourselves. I mean, we have a vested interest in a high-performance, streamlined apprenticeship program, so we're certainly going to be supportive in that particular area.

You raised a point about computer training. Again, while I don't have the specifics, we can answer that question for you in the written answers. Certainly we can see the change even in the so-called old economy, how they're developing computer technology. So I can't imagine that in any employment initiative these days we would not want to focus on some computer literacy. But we'll answer that question in more detail.

I want to make a comment though. I hadn't been involved in sort of constituency profiles of areas of concern, but a previous member did raise a point about how they had an antipoverty committee in their particular constituency, and my question was whether or not we could be of any assistance to that committee. It would seem from your comments that you have some unique situations in your constituency, as well, and I'd like to offer you the opportunity to perhaps come and talk to the deputy and myself about some specifics. Maybe there's some way in which we can help out.

MR. GIBBONS: One quick one just to get it on the record. With the lack of trades that we have in this province, I mean, it looks great to somebody from down east coming in and looking for a job. It's better than not having a job. The fact is that we need skilled people. The longer we wait – it's just no different than nursing or any other field. The average age is up there, whereas we should be building at the bottom. The average age for some of these programs, in sheet metal and in shop welding and that, should be 30 years old.

MR. DUNFORD: Well, for millwrights I understand that perhaps the average age there is something like 49, something like that. It really is a problem.

Again, you know, the success of the apprenticeship program over the years has been in the involvement, then, at local levels. They've had local apprenticeship committees, they've got provincial apprenticeship committees, and then of course you have the full board.

As you know, as a government, as we've tried to move forward with some reform in other areas, you run into a fair amount of resistance. Frankly, in our attempt to streamline some of the apprenticeship programs, we're running into the same kinds of resistance at particular levels. I don't want to go too deeply into this because I'm getting anecdotal and I'm not the Minister of Learning, who is responsible. I would just ask people to recognize that when you have a problem in front of you and you know that reform has to happen, help us make some moves forward to see if we can address the situation. Don't simply stand in front of us as advocates and proponents of the status quo. Is it Einstein that said that true insanity is to keep doing the same things and expect different results?

MR. MacDONALD: Mr. Chairman, at this time I have some more questions for the hon. minister regarding the Alberta Labour Relations Board. Earlier the hon. minister said that the labour board is as unbiased as it can be. I find this unusual. Has your department considered – I understand there's a modest increase in the budget for the Labour Relations Board – having a completely independent body make all appointments to the Labour Relations Board? There are many people who have complained to me, not just unions or their organizers but also management, about what they feel is unfairness with the labour board. In order to address this problem, I'm very interested to know if at any time there has been a study done to have the appointments made completely independent of your ministry, and by that I mean having an independent body do it.

MR. DUNFORD: Who would appoint the independent body? Would I as minister appoint the independent body? I mean, who? Somebody has to have final authority and, more importantly, responsibility. It would seem that has to rest with the minister.

MR. MacDONALD: We could quickly set up a mechanism so that these appointments could be made. As I said earlier, I think this is important, because there is a view – and it's not just a view by unions but by management as well, by employers – that this is not working in a timely fashion. We have to look at the issue of what they call unfairness.

MR. DUNFORD: What?

MR. MacDONALD: Unfair bargaining. Both parties would refer to it just simply as unfairness.

You have key performance measures here. You're talking about everything being done in a timely fashion regarding the certifications and whatnot, but unfair bargaining is not mentioned in there. There's a great deal of frustration in this. The previous minister of the day talked about this at length, but I don't see it mentioned in here. My question would be: why? Perhaps I'm not making myself clear.

MR. DUNFORD: No, I'm not clear.

MR. MacDONALD: The type of application. If, for instance, I were to go to the board with unfair bargaining, a complaint – okay? – you don't have in your key performance measures an indication as to how long you would like to see that before the board before it's resolved one way or the other. Why is that not in there?

10:13

MR. DUNFORD: I think that's an excellent question. We'll have to review your question, then, and respond in writing. I know that we work very hard in terms of trying to find a process that ensures the rights and obligations of both parties but also would deal with matters in a more expeditious way. The fact that you're pointing out that maybe we haven't put a performance measure to that I think is just an excellent comment.

MR. MacDONALD: Okay.

I also have another question, Mr. Chairman. This question is regarding the statistics that your department puts out on a monthly basis. In those statistics there's one category that I find particularly interesting now, and that is the category of health occupations. Is that full-time health occupations? The number of people who are working in the province in health occupations I believe at the end of January would have been 65,000 Albertans actively working. Are they working full-time? In that definition of health occupations, does that include physicians, registered nurses, LPNs, caregivers? If you could share that definition with us and how many of those individuals are working full-time or part-time, I would be very grateful.

MR. DUNFORD: We'll supply that. I would just think, off the top of my head, that it likely includes both full-time and part-time, because if it is only full-time, if we were to throw part-time in, then you can just imagine what a huge number that would be.

MR. MacDONALD: Okay. Would you have any idea, hon. minister, why there would be such a spike in this?

MR. DUNFORD: Such a which?

MR. MacDONALD: I guess I'm reading too many graphs. Why would there be such a spike in this? Two years ago there were 69,000 people employed in the health occupations, last year it went up to 71,000, and now – these are your statistics – it has gone down to 65,000, and that's a considerable spike. Do you have any idea why this would be occurring?

MR. DUNFORD: No, I don't. We'll answer in writing.

MR. MacDONALD: Okay. Thank you.

MR. GIBBONS: I'm sorry, Mr. Chairman; maybe I'm going to duplicate a question that's already been asked, but what are the parameters for the review of the widows' pension program, what time lines and so on? Has that been asked so far?

MR. DUNFORD: It hasn't been asked, no. Are you aware that there's a human rights submission against the widows' pension? We are waiting to hear what that decision is, and until that time we are not reviewing the widows' pension.

MR. GIBBONS: You don't know the time lines and so on?

MR. DUNFORD: No. Human rights is under Community Development. I think it would be hazardous for me to try to influence one way or the other their particular programs, so I have not made any contact with human rights as to when they're going to hear that particular case.

MR. MacDONALD: Mr. Chairman, I have some questions now for the hon. minister regarding employment standards and practices. Earlier the hon. minister said that education is better than enforcement. Well, I don't think that applies to the Employment Standards Code. We've had some horrible, horrible examples brought forward of how that system of voluntary compliance is not working, in particular in the service industry, the restaurant industry.

Many young Albertans are entering the workforce for the first time, and this is not a positive experience for them. They're not being paid their wages, their benefits, whether it's holiday pay or vacation pay, overtime if they're entitled to it. It is my view and it is a view that is held by many people across the province, particularly parents of these individuals, that in effect, by not enforcing the law, this is a subsidy to these businesses.

It is very difficult, for instance, if we have two restaurants on the same street, and one is abiding by the Employment Standards Code and one is not. If the one that is not knows that it can get around the law, how is the individual restaurateur that is abiding by the law to compete? It is very very difficult, because of course his or her costs are going to be so much greater. That's an issue from a small businessperson's point of view, but from the parent's point of view this is just a poor example for their children as they enter the workforce whenever they're getting ripped off by these unscrupulous employers, and it has to stop.

There is a case that's going through the courts I believe at the moment, but every month I uncover other examples, and this is because people are coming to the constituency of mine and openly complaining. This system of voluntary compliance is not working, and I want to know from the minister what the department is doing to ensure that this is cleaned up.

MR. DUNFORD: We are going to continue with voluntary compliance. We are educators, not enforcers. I think I talked about that in terms of occupational health and safety. Having said that, we're perhaps the most enforcement-related jurisdiction in western Canada in the sense that we take more cases to court than your socialist brethren in B.C. and Saskatchewan.

You mentioned particularly the restaurant industry. I believe you're aware – and if you're not, this is a great opportunity for me to make you aware. We currently have seconded one of the members of our staff with the Restaurant and Foodservices Association. They recognize that they have members in their industry that, just for the same reasons you talked about – and I agree with you one hundred percent. We should not have two restaurants on the same street, one that is abiding by the law and another one that is violating the law, and do nothing about it. I categorically reject your assertion that we do nothing about it.

I would invite you at some point to join me over in Sterling Place and have a look at our phone setup there and the number of calls – you know, we're a hell of a lot busier than you are at your constituency office, believe me. I don't know what the calls per day are, but we receive perhaps 300 or maybe more than that. We are providing information. Our law requires that information be posted at the work site, and young people can read. Also, their parents know when they're not being treated fairly, and they can come forward. We take anonymous calls in this particular area. Normally we don't like anonymous calls creating some response on our part, but in this case it is my understanding that we do. We will check into this area.

We have targeted specific businesses that have had problems in the past. We know who they are – perhaps you do too – and we are monitoring them. We've even gone so far as auditing them, and when they comply and show that they have changed, then we're willing to back off, because they obviously have been educated. When they don't, we take them to court. I don't know what more we would do other than be more of a police state, and again I say that the philosophy of this minister and thus this ministry is one of education as far as possible but enforcement when necessary.

MR. MacDONALD: Okay. Mr. Chairman, if I could get the hon. minister to clarify one statement. Are you telling me that occupational health and safety rules and regulations are posted in work sites across this province?

MR. DUNFORD: I thought your question was dealing with employment standards.

MR. MacDONALD: Yes. Pardon me. Employment standards rules and regulations.

MR. DUNFORD: I believe that it's the responsibility of the employer to post them. There are selected groupings, but that's to be posted in a manner that can be seen and can be read by their employees. If I am misleading you and other members of this committee and readers of Hansard on that point, we will then make it clearer, and I'll make a public statement in the House. But it is my belief as I sit here that the employer is obligated under the Employment Standards Code to post specific regulations in the workplace.

MR. MacDONALD: Okay. And if that's incorrect, you will make a statement?

MR. DUNFORD: I will.

MR. MacDONALD: That's fair enough. Okay. Thank you.

Now, I also have a question regarding the Auditor General's report from last September. There were three recommendations in there regarding the department of family and social services. I'm pleased to see that two of the recommendations, specifically 31 and 33, have been accepted, but recommendation 32 in the report by the Auditor General . . .

MR. DUNFORD: Mr. Chairman, I don't have that document in front of me.

MR. MacDONALD: I can provide you with the document if you would like.

MR. DUNFORD: That's fine. If he provides it, then I'll answer the question. Otherwise, I believed this to be estimates, and I didn't come with it.

MR. MacDONALD: Well, that's okay. That's in the business plan. I'll just read this into the record, Mr. Chairman. Recommendation 32:

It is recommended that the Department of Health and Wellness ensure that services to children with developmental disabilities continue to be provided in accordance with existing legislative authority and that such services should not be provided under the Persons With Developmental Disabilities Community Governance Act unless and until the Act is amended to extend its provisions to children.

Now, it was accepted in principle by the government, but could the minister elaborate – and we can do this by letter if he so chooses – on what discussions are going on between family and social services and other ministries in the government regarding this?

MR. DUNFORD: Well, the hon. member is bringing forward a recommendation that applies to the Department of Health and Wellness, and also to some extent, I suppose, there is a spillover into our area in the sense that many of these people are likely to be on AISH. The responsibility for the so-called PDD boards, the persons with developmental disabilities boards, belongs in that jurisdiction. I suppose I could give a personal comment, if they wish, but I believe that it's more appropriate that that question be directed to the minister responsible.

THE CHAIRMAN: I'm going to suggest that if you do wish to make a comment, feel free, but I don't believe that this is specifically addressed to the estimates that we're supposed to be dealing with at this committee anyway. If you want to comment, if there is any reflection from your department, go ahead since the question has been asked.

MR. DUNFORD: No. I think that would just chew up time that the members might need for questions on our ministry, so I'll ask for the next question.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay. I'm going to remind members that there are seven minutes left in the opposition's time period.

MR. MacDONALD: I had more questions on WCB, but I'd better get my Auditor General's book back, please.

DR. MASSEY: Could I ask about the tracking of social service recipients after they're off the program? Can you give us an update?

MR. DUNFORD: We read into the record earlier in my comments that 70 percent of the people who complete our programs are not on welfare a year later, so we would want people to understand that we consider our social services as temporary support and that that would indicate to us, then, that we have a 70 percent success rate. Now, on how they're monitored, we'll have to respond in writing, because I don't know all of the criteria that they would use in order to develop this number.

DR. MASSEY: It would be interesting to know where they are and what they're doing.

Related to that, a number of social service recipients were put into loans programs and into postsecondary or vocational programs. Has there been any tracking of the success of those recipients?

10:33

MR. DUNFORD: I don't know if that's in the Minister of Learning's business plan, but we can also respond, then, to that question.

DR. MASSEY: It's quite a heavily used program, I think, in terms of accessing student loans.

MR. DUNFORD: I think we both agree that that was a good thing to do.

DR. MASSEY: It was?

MR. DUNFORD: Yes.

DR. MASSEY: I guess any success is success in that.

We're down to the last few minutes, so go ahead, Hugh.

MR. MacDONALD: Mr. Chairman, I have some questions for the hon. minister regarding the Workers' Compensation Board. I cannot find it in here, but am I still to understand that the WCB submits $6 million to occupational health and safety?

MR. DUNFORD: Yes. I think it's six; is it not? I'm getting the nod. It's $6 million.

MR. MacDONALD: That's still occurring? Okay.

Another question. I'm curious as to whether the department is monitoring the payments that the WCB is making to private contractors who are being utilized to rehabilitate injured workers. The Auditor General has made some comments on this. I guess, from what I can understand, there are some billing practices that are not up to code, if I could use that word. What are the minister and the officials in the department doing to correct this?

MR. DUNFORD: Well, I'm aware that that is a matter of some concern with the board of directors of WCB and that they have been investigating that particular issue. They have not made a direct request for me as the minister to be involved. On whether or not we have taken an active role in that, I'll have to respond in writing, because I'm not aware of any direct involvement on our part.

MR. MacDONALD: Okay.

Now, I have another question related to the Workers' Compensation Board. That has to do, of course, with 85 percent of people being very satisfied, I'm told, with the compensation board and how their claim is adjudicated, but there are 15 percent who are not. I understand there are hon. members of the Assembly in the process of setting up a consultation process, and I wish them success, but why in the minister's view are these 15 percent of injured Albertans having such difficulty? If this system is as good as everyone tells me it is, why is this happening?

MR. DUNFORD: Well, I think you've hit on an excellent point, and we have to find out. To that end what I've been able to do – I'm going to use the word "I" here perhaps a little more than I have in other answers. I have taken this matter very, very seriously, and to that end I would like to talk about some of the things that have been done, because the committee members might not be aware of the enormity of the review that is currently under way of workers' compensation. If they are generally aware, they might be interested in some of the details.

First of all, the Workers' Compensation Board has had a consultation process that's been going on for a couple of years. They were looking at some specifics, and it came to my attention as I worked with injured workers, with some of their associations – and of course "worked" might not be the proper use of wordage either. In many cases they were clearly and quite overtly and, in some cases, raucously presenting their issues, so I determined that with this much smoke we better find out whether there's any fire. I've maintained a position, I believe, where I have been unbiased. I have not been an apologist for the WCB, and I've not been an advocate for an injured worker. They have their own advocacy groups, and many of them, as the hon. member probably knows, are quite capable of advocating their situation very articulately.

What I was able to do, then, really boils down to three main initiatives. The first one was to work with the board of directors of the WCB to actually add a service review to the consultation that they already had. The idea there is to make sure that the philosophy and the policy of WCB are actually being carried out in the procedures as cases are dealt with, then, within the Workers' Compensation Board. Now, also to that end, because I believe that MLAs are in an excellent position to have some understanding of the suffering that has taken place amongst individual Albertans, they are in an excellent position to provide input to that service committee.

Then I got to thinking: well, you know, there are 83 of us, and if 83 try to go individually – you know, maybe there is a better way. So to that end I put together a government input committee, that is being chaired by the hon. Member for Red Deer-South, and there are other members from the government side that are on that committee.

It's their job to receive information, to distill it as best they can, and then to make recommendations not only to me but to the Workers' Compensation Board on how the service to injured workers in Alberta might be improved.

Now, I believe that I've acted on your behalf and I believe that I've acted on behalf of all of the Alberta MLAs, because I was able to get agreement from the board of directors of the Workers' Compensation Board that MLAs are stakeholders. So as an individual member and as an opposition member you have two avenues now open to you that might not have been as open to you six months ago, and that is that you can go directly to the board with your thoughts and your observations and your recommendations, or you can also make a presentation to the input committee.

The third and last initiative, which is as important as the other two, is the Appeals Commission, that has been set up to look into how the appeal situation operates, into whether or not natural justice is being served – we believe it is, but it should be checked – and perhaps more importantly whether or not the Appeals Commission is acting as independently as it can, given the current structure, or whether there is a better reporting mechanism to some other minister. That is all up for review as we sit today. The committee is in place. Sam Friedman is a retired justice and has an impeccable reputation throughout this province. We've been able to convince Bob Blakely, who is a respected labour leader in this province, to be part of that committee. We have the president of the Alberta Construction Association. We have a public member from Calgary and we have an MLA liaison, and they will be reporting to me – I believe we have it in the terms of reference – sometime in September.

I believe that through the operation of these three reviews, for something that might not be broken but looks like it is broken, then the perception will be enhanced, or if something is broken, then it will be fixed. I'm very, very optimistic, as we move now into this next century, about the Workers' Compensation Board in Alberta.

THE CHAIRMAN: I'm reluctant to interrupt at this point. The two hours that we had originally approved at the beginning of the meeting have now elapsed. As a matter of fact, we're a few minutes past that. Since the minister was actually speaking when the time flipped over the two-hour time frame, we won't name anyone else.

I would really like to commend the members who did the questioning up to this point and the minister for the way that this was handled. It was a little bit informal. Nevertheless, I think it was a good method of communicating, and it also made it very easy for the chair not to have to be a referee.

The remainder of the time we have now is available to the government members. As the minister said at the beginning of the meeting, government members do have opportunity to question or grill or by whatever form they wish to use on many of these issues either through the standing policy committee process or some of our discussions in our caucus. I expect that the number, if any, and the intensity of the questions for the remainder of the time necessary will be somewhat less than it was for the first half of this meeting.

With that, I will ask if there are any questions from government members. If not, then we require a motion to conclude the discussion and to rise and report.

DR. MASSEY: Could I just thank the minister and the committee for the format and the answers? It went very, very well, and we really do appreciate that kind of help.

THE CHAIRMAN: I appreciate you indicating that on the record.

MR. DUNFORD: Thank you. I appreciate it.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay. Could we have a motion to conclude discussions and to rise and report? Moved by Tom Thurber. All in favour? The motion is carried. We stand adjourned.

[The subcommittee adjourned at 10:45 a.m.]

MR. DAY: Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to introduce Bill 14, the Alberta Treasury Branches Amendment Act, 2000.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, will streamline the operations of the Alberta Treasury Branches, and it'll bring the financial institution more in line with the processes and standards for other banks and financial institutions. Basically, it will transfer responsibility for appointment and recruitment of the CEO to the board of directors. It will change the year-end to October 31 and provides for the treatment of unclaimed balances as recommended by the Auditor General.

MR. MELCHIN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave today to introduce Bill 15, being the Business Corporations Amendment Act, 2000.

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. the Premier.

MR. KLEIN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have four tablings today. First of all, I wish to table five copies of a letter from me to the Prime Minister of Canada indicating to him that the conduct of his Health minister in Calgary last week was a disgrace to him and his government.

Also, Mr. Speaker, I wish to table two copies of two letters dated September 30, 1999, from the Hon. Allan Rock, one to our minister of health and the other to the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Alberta, both urging the Alberta government to hurry up and pass legislation similar to Bill 37.

Also, Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copies of a CBC radio transcript from December 1999 in which the same minister, Allan Rock, says that he has no problem with the sale of enhanced services to patients at the private King's centre clinic in Ontario.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copies of an October 18, 1990, Edmonton Journal story headlined "Federal cuts undermine health system - minister: Betkowski slams 'backing out'."

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've got 11 letters to table today. Five of these are from Hinton, six are from Edmonton, and all of them are opposed to Bill 11.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I have two sets of tablings. The first are letters from Gary Buxton and Eva Zidek of Canmore and Wendy Ehlers and Lorraine Cooper of Calgary. They are letters to the Premier, and they are opposing the Spray Lakes development in Kananaskis Country.

My second tabling is copies of over 60 signatures from people throughout Edmonton who are opposed to the development in Kananaskis Country. This petition has been previously tabled with the minister.

MR. SAPERS: Mr. Speaker, I have two tablings today. The first is five copies of a report compiled by Mr. Brad Severin, who is the senior tax manager for BDO Dunwoody. This report compares taxes paid under the existing tax-on-tax policy versus the Treasurer's proposed 11 percent flat tax. What it shows is that there is an Alberta disadvantage at the $35,000, $50,000, and $65,000 income levels.

Mr. Speaker, the second is a report that is titled Business Losses under Stockwell Day. That's the title of the report. What it does is chronicle that there are $409.9 million worth of business losses that have been racked up under this Treasurer, or equal to the amount of $378,000 per day that has been lost.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

MS LEIBOVICI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am tabling a report by Steven Shrybman, solicitor, with regards to a legal opinion concerning NAFTA investment and services: disciplines and proposals by Alberta to privatize the delivery of certain insured health care services. This report was requested by the Canadian Union of Public Employees.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

MR. WICKMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a number of tablings today. I'd like to table appropriate copies of three different letters from citizens objecting to Bill 11: Gordon Inglis, Dr. Ede, and Ms Karen Schuster.

My second tabling here is five copies of an article on barrier-free building design and handicapped parking that was contained in the last status report on persons with disabilities. The article, in my opinion, written by a very bright, young architect specializing in barrier-free design, solves the dilemma with handicapped parking.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to table this afternoon copies of a letter to the hon. Minister of Learning dated January 27, 2000, from the Association canadienne-française de l'Alberta with respect to the future of the Sainte Marguerite Bourgeoys school and the Francophone program in that school.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

MR. GIBBONS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the appropriate number of copies of brochures to table today on the Trans Canada Trail Relay 2000. This is an exciting millennium event that the Leader of the Official Opposition and I attended in Fairview yesterday, March 12, 2000. The brochure says: "Come out and be a part of the Trans Canada Trail Relay 2000 as it makes its way through your community." This is a 16,100 kilometre trail that connects Canada from the Arctic Ocean to the Pacific and to the Atlantic Ocean with the longest multi-use pathway of its kind in the world.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. With your permission I would like to table five copies of a report that was prepared by an Alberta injured worker in which he requests clarification on questions and concerns from the chairman of the board. This would be involving the Workers' Compensation Act, its policies and its procedures.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, the chair has three tablings today. The first is five copies of a message for Commonwealth Day, March 13, 2000, The Communications Challenge, from Her Majesty the Queen, Head of the Commonwealth.

As well, the appropriate number of copies of a memorandum from the hon. Member for Red Deer-South requesting that Bill 202, the Marriage Amendment Act, 2000, be brought to third reading on Tuesday, March 14, 2000, and the appropriate copies of a memorandum from the hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore requesting that Bill 205, Emblems of Alberta (Alberta Dress Tartan) Amendment Act, 2000, be brought to Committee of the Whole on Tuesday, March 14, 2000.

head: Introduction of Guests

THE SPEAKER: The hon. the Premier.

MR. KLEIN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to introduce to you and through you to members of this Assembly Dr. Anne Marie Decore, wife of the late Laurence Decore, and their son Michael. These two guests and other members of the Decore family including Laurence's brother Leighton and his wife, Bev, and Michael's fiancée, Gill, are with us this afternoon following the announcement of the Laurence Decore awards for student leadership. This is a $50,000 scholarship named in memory of Laurence. I know I speak for all members when I welcome these honoured guests and thank them for being here today. They are seated in the members' gallery, and I would ask them to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Associate Minister of Forestry.

MR. CARDINAL: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you to the members of the Assembly 23 bright students from the Boyle school in my constituency. They are accompanied by teachers Mrs. Corrine Sachko and Mrs. Emily Thomson, by Mr. Carl Parson, the bus driver, and by parents Mr. Dave Madoche, Mrs. Fran Anderson, Mrs. Doris Splane, Mrs. Suzanne Berube, Mrs. Linda Kuraitis, and Mrs. Karen Turner. They are seated in the members' gallery, and I'd like them to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

MR. GIBBONS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to introduce to you and through you to the members of the Legislative Assembly 43 energetic students from John Barnett school in northeast Edmonton. I had the pleasure of attending their DARE program graduation last month. They are accompanied by two teachers, Mr. Tony Kimble, grade 6; Mr. Barry French, grade 5/6 split, and by helpers Mrs. Shirley Zubick and Mrs. Wanda DeWolfe. They're in the public gallery, and with your permission I'd like that they now stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

1:50

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Norwood.

MS OLSEN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I, too, would like to introduce 25 students and a teacher, Mrs. Lorraine Williamson, from St. Gerard school in the constituency of Edmonton-Norwood. The grade 6 class is here to spend a week at school at the Legislature. They are off to a good start, and we hope to see lots of them during the week. Would they please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My guests will be coming in at 2 o'clock and leaving before the end of question period. So if I may let everyone know that the seniors from Spruce Grove are here today on a tour that they are very much enjoying, and they will be in the gallery later. I will relay that the Assembly has given them warm greetings.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two sets of guests to introduce today. The first one is Ms Kathaleen Quinn. She is seated in your gallery, I understand, and her students who are in social work at Grant MacEwan Community College are seated in the public gallery. I'll ask Ms Quinn and her students to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

My second set of guests are Ms Tena Wiebe, who is my constituent, and Melissa Johnson, a graduate student at the University of Alberta, who has been collecting a huge number of signatures opposing Bill 11. I think they are seated in the public gallery. I'll again ask them to stand and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

MR. WICKMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to introduce through you to Members of the Legislative Assembly a longtime friend who is here today as an Edmontonian, not in his role as a newspaper columnist. I would ask Mr. Hicks on Six, Graham Hicks, to stand, but he's on crutches due to a broken bone. Apparently he was trying to stomp on frozen grapes. Anyhow, if you would wave, Mr. Hicks, and receive the warm welcome of the House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-North West.

MR. MELCHIN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure today to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly representatives from three very distinguished groups. They are here today in the public gallery for the introduction of the Business Corporations Amendment Act, 2000. They represent stakeholders from their professions, as well as many other business interests that depend on their services. I am pleased through their diligence, hard work, and professionalism that we found unanimous consent with respect to dealing with the amendments in this Business Corporations Amendment Act. With us today are Peter Lown, director of the Alberta Law Reform Institute; Janice Henderson-Lypkie, counsel from the Alberta Law Reform Institute; Andy Hladyshevsky from the Alberta Law Society, who serves as chair of the business corporations act committee; and Wayne Kauffman, associate executive director of Institute of Chartered Accountants of Alberta. Accompanying them in the gallery is Bob Foord, director of policy and planning with Alberta Government Services. I request that they rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have three introductions today. First, it is my pleasure today to introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly Mr. Jim Salahub and his granddaughters Kimberly, Courtney, and Ashley, who are visiting the Assembly and the Legislature today. They are in the members' gallery, and I would ask them to please stand and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

It is my extreme pleasure to introduce another national championship team from the University of Alberta. With us today seated in the members' gallery are seven members of the University of Alberta Panda women's hockey team. This year they won their third – I repeat, third – Canada West championship and their first national championship in only their third year of existence. We can be proud of these students for their athletic prowess, but we can also be proud of them for their academic achievements. Last year the U of A led the country with 79 academic all-Canadians and has done so for seven of the last eight years. I would ask Shelley Reynolds, Danielle Nystrom, Frances Castle, Lori Shupak, Stacey McCullough, Trish Dubyk, and Erin Kuzyk to stand, and through you, Mr. Speaker, I invite members to join me in recognizing these fine athletes by giving them the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

It is also my pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to introduce on behalf of the Member for Calgary-West some of her constituents who were visiting in Edmonton and St. Albert this weekend and who are here this afternoon at the Legislature. Mr. Chuck Fowler and his son Bryan Fowler from Calgary-West, and Gloria Allen, who lives in St. Albert, and her daughters Kari and Katie Allen are seated in the members' gallery. I would ask these friends of government to stand and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

MR. SAPERS: Mr. Speaker, it gives me tremendous pleasure today to introduce to you a guest visiting from the constituency of Edmonton-Glenora. I would ask that Karen Sevcik please rise and be acknowledged by the Assembly. Amongst her many other responsibilities Karen is the president of the Edmonton-Glenora Liberal Constituency Association.

Laurence Decore Awards for Student Leadership

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, the government of Alberta's Alberta heritage scholarship fund finances and administers a number of awards that are named after great Albertans. Recently Premier Klein expressed his desire to include the late Laurence Decore in their prestigious ranks. Earlier this afternoon, with the support of Dr. Anne Marie Decore, we saw that idea come to fruition.

Mr. Speaker, I'm sure all of the members of this Assembly will agree that Mr. Decore was a passionate and dedicated leader and a true champion of our province. That's why the Laurence Decore awards for student leadership are such a fitting tribute to him.

Throughout his career Laurence Decore served as an alderman, a mayor, an MLA, a well-known proponent of multiculturalism, a party leader, and a Leader of the Opposition. He was well respected and admired by people across this province. He was a good leader and a strong leader. His contribution to Alberta and his spirit will not be forgotten.

The Laurence Decore awards for student leadership will distribute $50,000 worth of scholarships each year, and every year it will be shared by 100 Alberta postsecondary students. I'm very proud that this government is honouring Mr. Decore by recognizing our student leaders. These awards will recognize postsecondary students who have demonstrated their leadership skills through participation in student government or other school- or community-based organizations.

As seems only fitting for a leadership award, Mr. Speaker, the recipients must be nominated by their peers, the people who respect their abilities, like we as his political opponents or political compatriots have respected Laurence Decore's notable skill and drive.

Mr. Speaker, our current student leaders are our future leaders. I am pleased that we are able to offer them this support while honouring Laurence Decore, a man whose energy and political prowess gave Alberta so much.

2:00

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

MRS. MacBETH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to recognize the creation of the Laurence Decore awards for student leadership. I welcome the presence of Mrs. Laurence Decore, Anne Marie, their son Michael, and his fiancée, Gill, and Leighton and Bev Decore, the brother and sister-in-law of the late Laurence Decore.

Laurence was a very respected man in this province. Some of his major accomplishments have been noted by the minister of education, including his work as a successful lawyer, mayor, Leader of the Official Opposition, leader of the Alberta Liberal Party, and valued member of the community. Laurence was proud to say he was a Liberal, and his leadership attracted many supporters. He was a true Liberal, believing in justice and equality for all. He fought for public health care and public education, and it is right to honour his memory.

The creation of this award recognizes these values and Laurence's accomplishments. Laurence Decore loved Alberta. It was his home, and it was one of his passions to see the province strong. Laurence loved Canada, and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms bears his mark in protecting the multicultural strength of our nation. It is fitting that these awards be bestowed on those students who show the same kind of leadership for which Laurence was renowned.

It is my hope that some of the students who are awarded these scholarships will go on to provide this province and our country with the valued legacy and public leadership that Laurence was able to do in his lifetime.

On behalf of the Official Opposition I thank the government for the honouring of this award upon Mr. Decore and his family.

head: Oral Question Period

Private Health Services

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are learning the truth about the Premier and about this government through the reckless experiment with private health care. Albertans just don't trust this Premier any more when it comes to health care. Right here on March 7 through the Hansard record the Premier told us: "We heard from medical professionals". Well, he may have heard, but he certainly didn't listen, because the Alberta Medical Association came out last week and said that Bill 11 won't work. Which medical professionals did the Premier consult with?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, we will continue to consult with the AMA, and we appreciate their comments. As a matter of fact, that's what the whole exercise is about. That's why the bill is out there to about 3 million Albertans, including the medical profession, to get their comments. Hopefully, in the not too distant future, I'll have the opportunity with the Minister of Health and Wellness to sit down with the executive of the AMA to determine exactly what they want in terms of amendment.

I would point out that the AMA didn't reject Bill 11. They want amendments, but they haven't said which ones. As I mentioned earlier, we put the bill out to receive input and look forward to receiving the suggestions of the AMA relative to the amendments they want. I've said all along that we are open to amendments, and I would also like to point out that the AMA position statement supports our view that "contracting is, and will continue to be, an integral component of the publicly-funded health care system." That is a direct quote.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, earlier the College of Physicians and Surgeons said that hip replacements would not be allowed in the Premier's private hospitals. So, again, which medical professionals did the Premier consult?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, the College of Physicians and Surgeons said quite clearly that there is a need to put clear rules in place to govern and control surgical facilities. I would remind the leader of the Liberal opposition that Allan Rock used to say this, too, before he reversed his position. As a matter of fact, in September, as I pointed out in my tabling of 1999, he wrote to the college and to our health minister urging us to pass a law similar to Bill 37. Well, this Bill 11 is a bill that is similar to Bill 37, but it goes a lot further in terms of protecting the public health care system as we know it today.

MRS. MacBETH: Well, Mr. Speaker, doctors don't like it, economists don't like it, and Albertans don't like it, so are only the people that the Premier consulted on his private hospitals bill the troika of Dinning, Davis, and Love in Calgary?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, speaking of people who don't like what other people seem to like as a proposal or proposition to fix the health care system, the AMA does not like what the leader of the Liberal opposition says. This is a quote from a newspaper article: Alberta Liberals said Wednesday they would prevent doctors from working in both the public and private health care systems, but the idea has been described by the Alberta Medical Association as a disaster for Albertans. I think that that quote is attributable to the leader of the Liberal opposition.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, the Premier is clearly experimenting with the health care system and pushing ahead with private health care despite the objections of physicians, economists, small business, religious leaders, students, seniors, and citizens living in rural Alberta, people from all over our province and from all walks of life. He thinks he knows what's best for Alberta no matter what the evidence, but Albertans don't trust this Premier. Why should Albertans believe the Premier's health care scheme when students in our province are taking time from their studies to protest this legislation?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again, protest is a fundamental part of democracy. If we were afraid of this bill, we wouldn't send it out to every household in this province to receive comment, whether it's through protest or whether it's through reasonable discussion and reasonable debate of the issue, whether it's coffee shop talk or protests outside the Legislature or the comments of the AMA, the comments of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, or the comments of anyone for that matter, even the comments of the Liberal party. It's out there for everyone to see and for everyone to comment on.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the bill is true. The bill is absolutely true. There was one error in the bill. That was an honest error. It's being corrected.

Mr. Speaker, if you want to talk about propaganda, this is propaganda, again I presume at taxpayers' expense. This is propaganda where it says that the Klein government wants to introduce two-tiered, American style health care into Alberta. That is fear mongering. That is propaganda. That is simply not true. What is fueling the emotions of Alberta is this kind of malicious information, this kind of Liberal propaganda.

MRS. MacBETH: Well, Mr. Speaker, students and others have actually read the bill, and they think, along with other Albertans, that the Premier should withdraw it. When will the Premier consider withdrawing the bill?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, the bill won't be withdrawn, but if there are reasonable amendments that can be introduced to address concerns that could come about as a result of a consensus, then certainly we will consider that, just as we will consider the concerns of the Alberta Medical Association. They have said that the bill in its present form is not acceptable to them. They would like to see some amendments. We would like to see the amendments that they propose. I understand that the deputy minister of health has been in touch with the executive of the AMA. We have said to them in a very reasonable way: tell us what you want in terms of amendments, and we'll sit down and discuss it.

2:10

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, the question I received last night in Fairview at a town meeting was: why is the Premier experimenting with our public health care system? Can the Premier answer that for the people of Fairview?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, there is no experimenting going on here.

AN HON. MEMBER: Final answer?

MR. KLEIN: Final answer. You know, this is not how to be a millionaire, Mr. Speaker. This is serious business. [interjections]

Mr. Speaker, there are no private hospitals. I just heard some of the chipping and yattering over there talking about private hospitals. The bill says that "no person shall operate a private hospital" in this province.

Getting back to the question, there is no experimenting. I remind the leader of the Liberal opposition that when she was the health minister, there were 37 private surgical clinics opened and operating under her watch, Mr. Speaker. Was that experimenting at that particular time? Since then, about 10 more have opened up. All this legislation does is set down rules and regulations for the conduct and the operation of surgical clinics, something the Leader of the Opposition failed to do when she was the health minister.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, one of Alberta's leading moral leaders, Bishop Henry of Calgary, spoke out against Bill 11. He said amongst other things, and I quote, that private hospitals promise only an array of new problems, end quote. No solutions, just more problems. My questions are to the Premier. What is the Premier's answer to Bishop Henry's objections to Bill 11?

MR. KLEIN: Well, I'm sure that if Bishop Henry wants to phone either myself or the Minister of Health and Wellness, he will find out, and we will reiterate to him that there is no proposal whatsoever in Bill 11 that would allow a person or corporation to operate a private hospital.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, is the Premier saying that Bishop Henry and physicians and economists and students and seniors and Albertans are all wrong?

MR. KLEIN: No, they are not all wrong, Mr. Speaker. That's why we sent out the bill. That's why we sent Bill 11 to 1 million households in this province, to get their comments, to get the comments, the wisdom, the guidance of good-thinking Albertans relative to this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, people throughout this country, including the federal Minister of Health, including all the Premiers, including all the provincial ministers of health talk about change. They talk about change. This government is the only government actually doing something to bring about change and to bring it about within the parameters and the confines of the Canada Health Act and to do it within the parameters of Alberta health care and the publicly funded system as we know it today. We are the only government with the courage to actually bring about change.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, will the Premier deal with the real problems which he's created in health care and stop this reckless experiment before he destroys the public health care system?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, this leader of the Liberal opposition, this hon. member should know more than anyone else what has brought about change. She commissioned, when she was minister of health, The Rainbow Report, which talked about meeting the challenges of an aging population, which talked about the need for the regionalization of the health care system. We did that, and we're doing that right now. And we did it politically. We didn't send our bureaucrats out into the field to do the work for us. We did it ourselves as MLAs.

MRS. MacBETH: Point of order.

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition talks about churches. Well, this brochure, this piece of propaganda was found in a church pew. It was found in a church pew. I don't know how many hundreds of thousands of these pamphlets are out there at taxpayers' expense. We can't FOIP the Liberal opposition, so we can't find out, you know, what prompted it. But I can tell you that what's in this brochure is absolutely false.

It says that seven years of cutbacks, layoffs of health care professionals, and widespread closures of beds, operating rooms, entire hospitals set the stage for private health care. That is an absolute untruth. That is false. That is misleading. That is the malicious kind of misinformation that I'm talking about. That is pure propaganda, because the Liberals know as well as anyone else that we have increased funding to health care by almost 40 percent, and we have included in budgets and our business planning over the next three years money to hire some 2,400 new frontline workers, including physicians.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. interim leader of the third party, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government has lost the trust of Albertans when it comes to its private, for-profit hospitals scheme. A 42-page legal opinion released earlier today on the NAFTA implications of Bill 11 strikes another blow to the credibility of this government. Canada's medical system is being threatened by this government's reckless scheme to privatize health care. My questions are to the Premier. Why does the government keep claiming that Bill 11 is NAFTA-proof when the just-published legal opinion by a well-known trade expert as well as studies released by economists, doctors, and other public interest groups over the last few weeks indicate that the NAFTA exposure will be the most serious threat posed if this Bill 11 is passed by this government?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity of meeting with two representatives of the Canadian Union of Public Employees in Calgary about two and a half, three weeks ago, one of whom was Mr. Mutton, who's the head of the Alberta branch of CUPE. They told me that they had hired a lawyer and some economists to prepare this document, so I would consider this as being a paid political opinion by CUPE and by a CUPE-commissioned lawyer. I indicated at that time – and they have expressed a willingness to co-operate – that we would be delighted to have our lawyers sit down with their lawyers and discuss the finer points of the NAFTA agreement.

We have our own NAFTA experts, including officials who were involved in the original NAFTA discussions, and I can tell you that there is nothing in Bill 11 that exposes us under NAFTA.

I will have the hon. Minister of International and Intergovernmental Relations explain further.

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Shrybman is the executive director of the Vancouver-based West Coast Environmental Law association, and he has done a number of papers on environmental law and international agreements. I have a copy of this document as well. Obviously it was released this morning, so I have had a first look at it. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in this document that suggests that there is any danger to us under NAFTA in Bill 11. In fact, the carve-out, which is discussed in here, was negotiated by the government of Canada, and it does protect the health and social services sector. I tabled in this House about 10 days ago an actual copy of the carve-out.

As the Premier indicated, Mr. Speaker, we have experts here who were involved in the actual negotiations, who were at the table, and who were ensuring that the province of Alberta's interests were protected. We are confident today that our experts are right and that there is no threat under NAFTA in Bill 11. There is no basis for that.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If the government is so sure that Bill 11 will not threaten the future of Canada health care, will this government make its own legal opinion public in full and without any further delay? If the Premier is so sure that Bill 11 won't have negative implications under NAFTA, I challenge him to release that information to the public.

MR. KLEIN: Fine, Mr. Speaker. I have no problem doing that whatsoever. If the hon. member would please extend the courtesy of giving us a reasonable amount of time to look at the opinion of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, we'll be glad to provide an opinion relative to our position on NAFTA as it affects the delivery of health care in this province. We'd be glad to make that public, absolutely.

Speaker's Ruling Legal Opinions

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, Beauchesne 408(1)(c) reads, "Such questions should . . . not require an answer involving a legal opinion." Section 410 reads, "Questions should not seek a legal opinion or inquire as to what legal advice a Minister has received."

Carry on, hon. member.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In that case I'll ask another question of the Premier. How can a government that can't even put out an accurate householder be trusted to accurately assess the NAFTA implications of its private, for-profit hospital scheme?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, there was the mistake of one line on one sidebar. I know that this hon. member was a university professor. I know that he is a very learned individual, but will he stand up and say that he is absolutely exempt from making a mistake, that he has never made a mistake in his life? Will you stand up and say that, that you're absolutely perfect?

Mr. Speaker, one line. It was a printer's mistake. We apologized for that. It was an honest mistake, unlike the deliberate, vicious, misleading, malicious misinformation that's in this brochure. That is deliberate.

The mistake in the bill was an honest mistake. It was one line leading to the wrong section.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Family Violence

MS PAUL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Victims of family violence need to have trust in the legal system. They need to know that their complaints will be investigated in a fair and impartial manner. As a survivor of domestic violence I like many others was shocked to read in the Edmonton Journal on March 11 the two articles concerning the promotion of an RCMP officer who was convicted of assault causing bodily harm to his wife. That officer is now responsible to supervise investigations into family violence issues. My questions are to the hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General. What kind of treatment would a victim of domestic assault receive within an RCMP section led by an officer who choked his own wife until she was rendered unconscious?

MR. HANCOCK: Well, Mr. Speaker, I guess the initial answer to that is that that question calls for speculation on my part as to what type of treatment they would receive, but I would like to say a couple of things in response to the question. First of all, the government of Alberta has taken a very, very strong stance on domestic violence. I use as an example the new domestic violence intake court which is being set up in Calgary as we speak and hopefully will be operational within the next month. We take the whole question of domestic violence very, very seriously.

With respect to the specific instance that is being commented upon, I understand that incident happened in 1991. A conviction was entered. I guess one of the questions that needs to be answered, perhaps needs to be discussed publicly is: can a person, having been convicted of an offence of that nature, ever purge themselves of that offence and go on to lead a productive life?

MS PAUL: My first supplementary is to the same minister. Will you make a commitment to this Assembly and to all Albertans that you will implement and fund mandatory professional counseling and treatment for all convicted offenders of family violence as part of their sentence, as addressed in my Motion 539?

MR. HANCOCK: Well, Mr. Speaker, that's one of the issues that's currently being addressed, for example, in the pilot project on the domestic violence intake court in Calgary, the question of bringing together a partnership between prosecutors, the courts, community groups to identify family violence offenders, to fast-track them through the court process, to have them dealt with in an appropriate manner by the court process, and, yes, to make sure that there's appropriate treatment available so that those offenders can be treated and can be returned to the community and the community can be safer and particularly their domestic partners can be safer because of the treatment.

MS PAUL: My second supplementary to the same minister: will the government under the jurisdiction of the Justice department immediately set up a task force to look at finding solutions to eradicate violence in our homes, in our schools, and in our communities?

MR. HANCOCK: Well, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of different initiatives under way in that area as we speak: the safe and caring schools initiative, the task force on children at risk. There's a task force looking at violence in schools. In fact, I've had some discussions with the Minister of Children's Services with respect to the whole question of domestic violence and what we might do to highlight the issue of domestic violence.

Whether or not we'll proceed to a task force on that is still a subject of discussion, but certainly I think I can say that we would agree on the fact that there needs to be a stronger understanding in the public of the harm that's caused by domestic violence, not just within the family but in teaching our children that violence is an appropriate method to solve problems. Therefore, we do need to key in on that essential question, and we do need to find results. I'm open to any suggestions that might come forward from the member opposite or otherwise as to how we might deal with that important issue.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, followed by the hon. Member for Redwater.

Seniors' Health Care

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As if it wasn't enough to double-cross seniors by shredding the seniors' report and slashing their programs, now we have the Premier and his cabinet blaming current and soon to be seniors as justification for bringing in private, for-profit hospitals. But only 10 percent of Alberta's population is over 65 currently. Manitoba and Saskatchewan are already at 14 percent seniors, but they aren't bringing in private, for-profit hospitals. My questions are all to the Premier. Mr. Premier, where are the studies, where is the concrete proof to back up the government's claims that seniors are somehow a burden on this province?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, the exact opposite is true. Seniors are not a burden on society. As a matter of fact, we owe it to our seniors to provide the best possible health care available, and we provide it to seniors, who are probably more active than ever before, to make sure that the health care system is there for them when they need it.

We want to be able to address in a meaningful fashion the afflictions and some of the anomalies that are associated with the aging population.

Mr. Speaker, one of the most telling studies was done under a former minister of health who happens to now be the leader of the Liberal opposition. I alluded to it earlier. It's called The Rainbow Report. This was a very significant report and was the basis for a lot of the health care restructuring that we did. This hon. member should know more than anyone – and I'm talking about the leader of the Liberal opposition. The Rainbow commission on health care said: let us look at the biggest problem which health care administrators believe they face, and that is the anticipated cost of caring for an aging population. Mr. Speaker, that is true.

Mr. Speaker, here is a document. I don't have five copies. I'd be glad to table it. It's from the Calgary regional health authority, and it's a chart that shows relative health care expenditures by age. The lowest ages are on the left-hand side, my right, of this page. The highest expenditures are when you go from 70 to 75 to 80 to 85 to 90. The chart just shoots right up.

So this is not picking on seniors by any stretch of the imagination. This is making sure that the care is there for them when they need it.

MS BLAKEMAN: Why are this Premier and his ministers attacking the very people who built medicare and who depend upon it the most? Blaming seniors. For shame.

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again, we are doing precisely the opposite. What we want to do under the Health Care Protection Act is to make sure that health care is there for seniors when they need it.

The opposition members obviously don't understand what is going on. I don't know the kind of mail they get relative to waiting lists. It is heartrending to hear of people who are waiting 12, 13, 18 months for joint replacements. If we could move some of the minor surgery, such as we have done in the case of 140 different surgeries, very minor surgeries, out of those huge bricks and mortar hospitals, full-scale hospitals, then we could free up much more space in those public hospitals for the kinds of things that our seniors want and need, the kinds of things that they want and need to maintain a quality of life. That's what it's all about. We want to make sure that our seniors have the quality of life that they deserve.

Speaker's Ruling Decorum

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, it should not have gone unnoticed that decorum was at an absolute high point when the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs was addressing questions. It seemed that no hon. members had interjections. It continues to amaze me why that changes depending on who asks the question and who is answering the question.

So let's try it again, and let's try and remember that the milieu and the decorum in the House when the question was asked by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs and then responded to was really the model.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you. Why, Mr. Speaker, are this Premier and his ministers using seniors as scapegoats to justify Bill 11. Why?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, that question and the suggestions contained in that so-called question – there is only one word to describe it, and that’s nonsense. There is an adjective, and it’s “absolute” nonsense.

Mr. Speaker, I would challenge the hon. member to research some of the facts relative to the number of seniors moving to this province from places like socialist Saskatchewan – the Liberals would know all about that; they’ve moved a long way toward what it’s like to be an ND in Saskatchewan – or socialist British Columbia. They’re moving back here in droves, and the reason they’re moving back here is that they know we offer quality health care for our seniors. We offer the best seniors’ benefits program of any jurisdiction in the country, and we intend to keep on doing that because our seniors deserve nothing less.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Redwater, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

MR. BRODA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta Medical Association held a meeting last week at which delegates held considerable discussion on the government’s Bill 11, the proposed Health Care Protection Act. My question is to the Minister of Health and Wellness. Could the minister advise members of the position taken by the AMA delegates as a result of these discussions?

MR. DICKSON: Point of order.

MR. JONSON: It’s my understanding that at the representative forum of the Alberta Medical Association held on Friday and Saturday, there were essentially two motions that were carried. First of all, the Alberta Medical Association had prepared a position paper with respect to the matter of contracting with private surgical facilities.

Just to summarize very quickly, Mr. Speaker, I think the key part of their position paper is that they indicate that lost in the debate is a discussion regarding contracting in general.

Contracting is, and will continue to be, an integral component of the publicly-funded health care system. More can be done, however, to ensure that these contracts serve the public interest. Albertans deserve assurances that the following rules will be protected or enhanced:

- Physicians are the agents and advocates of patients in the provision of medical services.
- RHAs are the agents of the public in contractual discussions with privately-owned health facilities.
- The Provincial Government is responsible for ensuring a sustainable public health care system that provides reasonable access to all Albertans with no direct, out-of-pocket, costs for insured services.

With respect to the overall direction herein, Mr. Speaker, we in government certainly have no issue with that particular statement. This overall position statement was passed.

The second item that was important in this meeting is that the Alberta Medical Association representative forum passed a motion indicating that they did not support Bill 11 in this current form. That seemed to be, Mr. Speaker, connected to a concern that the Alberta Medical Association has over not enough being done with respect to expanding the number of doctors in the province; that is, the whole area of physician supply. With respect to that particular point, I would just like to indicate that we have worked with the Alberta Medical Association, put several millions of dollars into our rural physician action plan, which was a collaborative effort between government and the AMA.

We have recently announced the expansion of the overall internship component over the next two years at our universities or training institutions, and, Mr. Speaker, most important of all – and the AMA’s been quite complimentary about our joint efforts here – we have been working and are nearing completion on developing an overall report which projects into the future the physician needs for this province for several years to come.

MR. BRODA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister: given that the meeting of the AMA delegates also supported increased funding for the public health system, could the minister tell members if government plans to add any additional funding for health?

MR. JONSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, as the budget recently tabled with the Assembly and conveyed to all Albertans clearly indicates, we have made and we are making a substantial additional commitment to the health and wellness sector in the coming three years. We are adding over a billion dollars in funding. I believe it works out to about 21 percent. I think it compares favourably with any other province in terms of projected increases. We are somewhat disappointed at this point in the corresponding commitment that we’d hoped would be there from the federal Liberal government. Nevertheless, there is a substantial commitment clearly indicated by the government to health care funding.

MR. BRODA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister once more. Delegates at the AMA meeting also expressed the need to recruit more physicians for Alberta. Given that sentiment, could the minister tell the members if the government is taking any action to increase physician numbers in this province?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, I have referenced that point previously in my remarks, but I would also like to indicate that we are right now, and we can point to various statistics indicating that there are physicians coming to this province from other locations in Canada and elsewhere to practise in Alberta because it’s regarded in this nation as a pretty attractive place to practise. Further – and I think this is particularly significant and a favourable indication – we are finding that a higher percentage of graduates from our medical facilities than was the case a few years ago are choosing to stay in this province and practise here and make their careers here.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark, followed by the hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

MS LEBOVICI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It’s too bad there are not more positions for rural doctors.

The one thing about this experiment with private, for-profit health care that the Premier can’t control is how the NAFTA tribunal and the World Trade Organization will interpret Bill 11 if this government continues to proceed with a plan that will endanger Alberta’s health care sovereignty. In a recent legal opinion received by the Canadian Union of Public Employees, one that the minister alluded to but forgot to mention, it was stated that “Alberta’s plans to privatize the delivery of surgical health . . . services threaten the integrity of Canada’s public health care system.” My first question is to the Premier. Given that respected lawyers and economists across this country are warning that Bill 11 will have major NAFTA implications, why does the Premier continue to roll the dice with our health care sovereignty?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, nobody is rolling the dice. This bill is simply to put in rules and regulations relative to the operation of surgical clinics. Those rules and regulations did not exist before.

I find it very curious that for the past number of years, certainly when the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition was minister of health, there were private, contracted-out surgical clinics operating and I didn't hear a peep. I didn't hear a boo from the Canadian Union of Public Employees. I didn't hear anything from the Canadian Union of Public Employees. I'm curious to know why now. Why now? When we want to tighten up the rules and regulations relative to the operation of surgical clinics, why would they be concerned?

As to the intricacies of NAFTA, again I'll have the hon. Minister of International and Intergovernmental Relations explain.

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, in fairness, we received this document at about 11 o'clock. I received it about noon today. I've gone through it. Again there is a lot of conjecture. What if? Well, it doesn't matter about what if because government procurement by provincial governments is excluded from that agreement. So take the what if away. I would prefer that we deal with facts, and I would prefer that we look at this under the context of what is. By the own admission of the author of this document there has been and will continue to be likely – I'll just quote one little line:

Canada's health care system is a mixture of public and private sector service delivery. Most physicians providing insured medical services operate private for-profit businesses subject to certain regulatory controls, e.g. licensing and extra billing.

That is what Bill 11 is about, putting some rules around clinics.

So the study itself admits that Canada's system is that mixture and has been for some time. It's interesting that NAFTA has been in place since 1986 and it's interesting that there were 30-some clinics under the care of the former health minister and there has never been a NAFTA challenge. Isn't that interesting, Mr. Speaker?

MS LEBOVICI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the minister of intergovernmental affairs had earlier talked about the carve-out provisions and has enough time to read selective parts of the report, when the report indicates that Canada's sectoral reservation for health care is qualified and ambiguous because it only applies to health services to the extent that they are social services established for a public purpose, can the minister indicate how she can continue to claim that the carve-out provisions will protect our public health care system?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Well, Mr. Speaker, yes, I can. The carve-out sections, if you read them very carefully, do apply. If you go through this document that was tabled, I'm having a hard time finding a place where the author of this document actually refers to the carve-out. So I suggest that the hon. member pay some close attention to the carve-out.

I repeat again that the procurement of government services, public services in health, are not under NAFTA. We can procure those services with no NAFTA challenge. So, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we deal in fact, not in what if the sky should fall. Let's deal with what the government of Canada negotiated on behalf of the Canadian people for protection of the health and social service sector.

The opposition may not have any faith in the government of Canada's negotiating powers, but I do have a lot of faith in that, and I suggest that they have protected it very well. I also further suggest, Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, that we have had some 40-odd private clinics in this province for almost as many years as the life of NAFTA. To date there has not been one challenge under NAFTA, not one in its entire lifetime. I doubt that there will be a challenge in the future either.

MS LEBOVICI: Given that this is new territory that we are treading into, can the minister of intergovernmental affairs provide any instances when the carve-out provisions have been challenged?

MRS. McCLELLAN: If I understood the question – could I find an instance where it had been challenged? – no, Mr. Speaker, I could not.

The other thing that I would just like to relate to the hon. member is that probably one reason that it hasn't been challenged is because the people who would look at this suggest that it is strong protection and is not worthy of attempting a challenge.

We have in International and Intergovernmental Relations one of the most respected trade experts in this country. He has reviewed this at length many times. In fact, Mr. Speaker, this person doesn't sit in an office and read studies and reports. He actually was at the negotiating table with the government of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, if I have to look for expert opinion on NAFTA, on trade policy, on protection, I'll put my faith in the government of Canada's negotiators and, most explicitly, in the government of Alberta's chief negotiator at those. I suggest that they have served us well and have an agreement that will protect the health and social service sector in this country.

Speaker's Ruling Questions outside Government Responsibility

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, the chair has great concern over the expenditure of valuable House time for the last six or seven minutes with respect to this series of questions. Earlier in the day the chair did rise and point out Beauchesne 408(c), dealing with legal opinion, also 410(13), and also section 409(3), asking for opinions and the like.

More importantly than all of that, there are approximately 6 billion people living in the world, and I'm sure that on any given day there are hundreds of thousands of reports that are being published and written. The report in question, that was the premise of this question, is not the property of the government of Alberta nor any member of Executive Council. One has to take great liberty in dealing with some of these questions, because where are you going to end up in a question period and where are you going to begin?

MR. DOERKSEN: Mr. Speaker, on Friday I had an excellent discussion on Bill 11 with a group of seniors at Canyon View, located, of course, in that beautiful city of Red Deer. They had smart questions not only about Bill 11 but about all aspects of health care. My questions are to the minister of health. In view that the population of seniors will double over the next 20 years, will that affect our ability to provide necessary health services?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, one of the most positive, I feel, characteristics of demographics in Alberta currently is that we do have an increasing seniors population. We have a population which is living longer at a better level of health than ever before. I think that is a very, very positive feature of the province of Alberta. As was alluded to earlier in question period, we do have a trend in western Canada if not across Canada of seniors moving to Alberta to become part of this province's population, part of the economy, part of the culture of the province.

As has been the case in offering whether it's education or health care services over the years, we have to plan for the healthy aging and the aging in place of our seniors. It will require a commitment of resources. It will require working with the seniors population to provide the best possible services, as has been done through the development of the Broda report, the long-term care report. Overall, Mr. Speaker, I regard it as a very positive development, one that, yes, we have to plan for and devote resources to as far as our health care system is concerned and as a government, but we are certainly committed to doing that.

MR. DOERKSEN: Can the minister assure Alberta seniors that they will not have to buy private insurance to pay for necessary health services?

MR. JONSON: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We fully comply with the Canada Health Act as we sit in the Assembly here today as government. Our ability to further regulate and enforce the provisions of the Canada Health Act would be enhanced should the Assembly choose to pass Bill 11.

I also want to point out that right now we have put in place a direction, in keeping with the Canada Health Act, to make sure that people are not going to be charged for medically necessary services, nor will there be any queue-jumping in terms of access to those services. In Alberta we also offer a range of services that are not under the auspices of the Canada Health Act in terms of being insured but do cover a number of the other needs that Albertans, particularly seniors, benefit from coverage of.

MR. DOERKSEN: Will the minister also advise what action he along with the Treasurer will take to eliminate the health care premiums?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, at this particular point in time there are no specific plans to eliminate health care premiums. However, it is something that the minister – I can only speak for myself on this – would be interested in exploring, but there is no immediate plan to eliminate the health care premiums.

head: Reading and Receiving Petitions

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, in 30 seconds from now we'll call upon the first of five members to participate in Recognitions today, but in the interim would all hon. members kindly voice their enthusiasm for the arrival of the visiting group of seniors that was introduced earlier today by the hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Writing Home Project

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On Friday evening past I attended an event at our Musee Heritage de St. Albert celebrating the Writing Home project. This project provided an opportunity for teacher Judy Weber's grade 5 class at Ronald Harvey school to meet and work with seniors from St. Albert's Ironwood Estates and the Westlock care centre to discuss museum artifacts and their uses. The students then wrote stories after meeting with Gail de Vos, who is an author of children's literature, and they painted delightful pictorial renderings after meeting with Lewis Lavoie, an outstanding mural artist.

Mr. Speaker, this project was funded by Museums Alberta and presented by Musee Heritage. I wish to commend Giselle Roy, who co-ordinated the Writing Home project; Tracey Stefanyk, its education co-ordinator; and our Musee Heritage exhibition co-ordinator, Jean Leebody. It was a marvelous project both in its participation and in its display.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Public Debate on Bill 11

MR. WICKMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to recognize two Members of this Legislative Assembly, one on each side of the House. The first one is the Member for St. Albert, and the next one is the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. I want to recognize them because they have agreed to debate Bill 11 tomorrow night at King's college starting at 7, a two-hour debate carried live by CHED radio. I commend them for facing the public and allowing Edmontonians to participate. I hope others will follow their lead, the Minister of Health and Wellness or his associate up against the Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark or the Premier of the province up against the Leader of the Official Opposition. This could lead to recognizing a great deal more members in this House.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan.

Women's CIAU Hockey Championship

MR. LOUGHEED: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to recognize the University of Alberta Pandas hockey team, who were introduced earlier today and who recently captured their first Canadian Interuniversity Athletic Union women's hockey championship. Women's hockey was introduced to the U of A three years ago, and since then the Pandas have won the Canada West Universities Athletic Association championship each year, and this was their third consecutive appearance at the CIAU tournament.

Along with the honour of winning the CIAU championships, the Pandas' head coach, Howie Draper, was named Canada West coach of the year. Draper, a U of A alumnus, has coached the Pandas hockey team since its inception in '97 and has been a key element in establishing such a strong women's hockey program.

Part of the Pandas' success can be attributed to their participation of team members in other amateur athletic competition. Some team members have participated in the Arctic Winter Games and the Canada Games. The opportunity these athletes receive at these events and the skills and leadership experience they are given is invaluable. I commend the University of Alberta Pandas for their hard work and determination and would ask that all members congratulate them.

THE SPEAKER: The Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Health Care Workers

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I would like to recognize all the health care workers in the province who have held our system together in the midst of radical cuts and the recent assault on public health care in the form of Bill 11. Alberta's nurses, doctors, and other health professionals and workers are just like the rest of us in the province who expected a period of calm and rededication to medicare when the government began generating multimillion, billion dollar surpluses. What a shock to realize that instead of entering a time of healing, we are being forced into a new period of stress and uncertainty. The only reason our system is still able to function effectively is because of the commitment and dedication of health care workers across the province. The Official Opposition joins with every Albertan in saying thank you to all these wonderful, dedicated, and much-appreciated people.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: A couple of points of order here today. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition

Point of Order
Provoking Debate

MR. DICKSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've been authorized on behalf of the Leader of the Official Opposition to speak to a point of order she had raised. This had to do with her third set of questions to the Premier. The Premier again referenced The Rainbow Report and said to the effect that his government was doing what The Rainbow Report recommended. The authority I would cite would be Beauchesne 417, the enjoinder that answers "should not provoke debate."

I can save a lot of time, Mr. Speaker, by referring you to page 346 of Hansard, when virtually the identical issue was raised on March 9, 2000. Let me simply say that it wasn't The Rainbow Report, authored under the current Leader of the Opposition, that recommended blowing up the General hospital, selling the Holy Cross hospital for a song, terminating the employment of 10,000 qualified registered nurses and health workers, and doing all of the other things that have resulted in longer waiting lists in the province.

Thank you.

MR. HAVELOCK: I'll be very brief, Mr. Speaker. There's absolutely no point of order. The hon. member across the way simply used a point of order as a means to once again expound on a particular health care perspective. In fact, quite frankly, the Premier's response may generate debate. It seems any response the Premier gives in this Legislature generates debate, but he is responding to questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition and other members of the opposition caucus. This again seemed to have been an exercise in clarifying a particular position. There is no legitimate point of order.

THE SPEAKER: Agreed, and thank you both for making this matter as brief as it really was.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Point of Order
Oral Question Period Rules

MR. DICKSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The second item relates to the question raised by the Member for Redwater when he went to the Minister of Health and Wellness. My authorities here would be Beauchesne 409(8), "A question that has previously been answered ought not to be asked again" and 410(9), "Questions should not repeat questions already asked." Further, in the alternative, the other basis would be under Beauchesne 409(6) and numerous other authorities' past rulings, that the minister has to be asked a question within his competence.

I didn't know that the Minister of Health and Wellness is now a spokesman for the Alberta Medical Association. The first question was – and this is a paraphrase; I don't have the transcript in front of me – what were the recommendations or the decisions made by the Alberta Medical Association at a meeting held over the weekend? It was compounded because we'd already had a discussion in the first three sets of questions about the recommendations coming from the AMA meeting.

The second two supplementary questions I can take no issue with because I think they were perfectly appropriate, but the first question can do nothing other than flagrantly offend. I understand here that ministers are to be accountable, not to be offering commentary. I mean, we could be asking ministers about anything any organization decided anywhere in the province because it might happen to coincide with their ministerial responsibility. That's not the purpose of question period.

Thank you very much.

MR. HAVELOCK: Well, if I get the gist of the argument, one, he's suggesting that you should not raise an issue through question period that has been previously asked and/or answered. Mr. Speaker, every day in this House the opposition members raise the issue of health care. They raise it legitimately, because it is an important issue, but the manner in which they raise it is not legitimate. They continue to harp away on the fact that we're promoting private hospitals when in fact we aren't. In fact, they are legislated against in the legislation very specifically. They continue to distort and they continue to provide misinformation regarding the issue. So for them to rely on repetition is quite frankly simply amazing.

But to get also to the point regarding the AMA position, the opposition raised the AMA position through its questioning. They misrepresented that position, and then they tend to squirm when the health minister gives the straight goods on what the position actually is.

So again there's no point of order here, Mr. Speaker. It's simply another attempt to use a point of order to clarify what in essence was a weak line of questioning from the Official Opposition for probably the 12th or 13th day in a row.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members and the two gentlemen who just participated, I wonder in my mind if either one of you is really serious about this business. Hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, who also serves as the Opposition House Leader, if I take it that you want the chair to enforce 409(8), "A question that has previously been answered ought not to be asked again," methinks you have violated question period repeatedly every day, virtually every question in the last 10 days. So I'm going to take that under advisement.

Now, to the Government House Leader. There's absolutely no doubt in the chair's mind that the hon. Member for Redwater did violate. It was a very, very poorly written question. When the hon. Member for Redwater says, "Could the minister advise members of the position taken by the AMA delegates as a result of these discussions," it's not the purpose of ministers of Executive Council or members of this House to explain what an outside body or an outside group is saying or doing. But, then, that's absolutely no different than the intervention that the chair made when the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark asked the question just a few minutes later.

So I'm telling you that if you want to stand up every day after question period and go through this stuff, you're going to find a much more aggressive chairman who will in fact imply and invoke all of the rules, and this question period is going to become a very, very interesting arrangement.

head: Orders of the Day

head: Government Bills and Orders

head: Second Reading

Bill 6
Special Payment Act

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment.

MR. DUNFORD: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's with a great deal of pleasure and pride that I rise to introduce second reading of Bill 6, the Special Payment Act.

The principles of this bill I think are relatively straightforward. We've had in Alberta for some time the issue of the disenfranchised widows, a group that banded together because they felt they had a particular issue with the Workers' Compensation Board and were seeking relief. They felt that a law that had been changed in the past, 1984 I believe, 1982 perhaps, where they had some entitlements and then had those entitlements removed, was not a just decision and were seeking some sort of recompense for that.

Now, a bit of the background for the members, Mr. Speaker. All through the process of arriving to today, I believe it's fair to say that we've had a fair amount of co-operation between the disenfranchised widows group and the board of directors and administration of the Workers' Compensation Board. It was unique in the sense that they both wanted to find a resolution, but they were looking for a vehicle in which that could happen.

Originally they had made a proposal to the government of Alberta that a board of reference be used. This is a manner in which the government can bring before a court an item for a decision and some direction. The government of Alberta and the minister of the day had agreed to look at that as a possible means for resolution. When the Executive Council had a reorganization and I came to the ministry, I was then approached by representatives of the board of WCB to consider further this board of reference. I expressed initially some hesitation but agreed that we would at least proceed to see whether or not it would be a means to the end that both parties were looking for.

Unfortunately, based on representations from our Department of Justice, it seemed that there were some barriers that would get in the road of that. I think in fairness to the parties one of the barriers that I was most concerned about seemed to be the time line in which to receive a resolution to this situation. I was advised, although somewhat informally, that we might be looking at up to three years before there would be a particular decision.

Well, I don't know the particular ages of all the people involved with this, but that did not seem to me to be an expeditious way in which to handle it. The answer, then, that the government of Alberta indicated to both parties was that, no, we would not seek a board of reference but we would do whatever we could to assist in a manner for the parties to arrive at a negotiated settlement. Upon further discussion between the two parties they realized that under the current Workers' Compensation Act there was no real provision for them, should they arrive at a negotiated settlement, to be able to make a payment under that act. So they asked us for legislative relief to that structural barrier that was then in front of them.

What we have here today, Mr. Speaker, in Bill 6 is a means to allow the Workers' Compensation Board and the disenfranchised widows group, actually for any widow or widower that qualifies under this particular bill – it provides them now the opportunity to arrive at a settlement and for a special payment to be made. So it's on that basis that it is here in front of us today, and I would seek the co-operation and the support of all members of this House in the expeditious approval of Bill 6.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is a pleasure and an honour to rise today to speak to Bill 6, the Special Payment Act, at second reading. This bill will enable a onetime payment from the Workers' Compensation Board for remarried widows and widowers whose spouses died from pre-1982 work-related incidents.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would also like to acknowledge the efforts of the minister responsible for the WCB, the Minister of Human Resources and Employment, in the development and sponsorship of Bill 6. With the successful passage of Bill 6 a five and a half year battle by the Disenfranchised Widows Action Group will come to a close. The struggle by this group for a settlement to this issue has been long and strenuous and at times bitter. It is an issue that has spanned the terms of three different ministers who were responsible for the WCB, but to this minister's credit, his quick and timely intervention has paved the way for Bill 6 to be debated in this Legislature today.

Prior to changes to the WCB act in 1982 widows and widowers were entitled to a lifetime pension, except if they remarried or entered into a common-law arrangement. Many of the widows had young families and were not only hit with the tragedy of losing a spouse but also the secondary tragedy of trying to raise a young family on a small widow's pension. At that time it was not uncommon that many of these widows did not have a career or some type of postsecondary education to rely on in this time of need. Two members of this group told me that in 1966 one of their pensions was $80 a month and the other member's pension in 1975 was $210 per month.

Changes to the Workers' Compensation Act in 1982 removed the provision for lifetime pensions in favour of term pensions and services to encourage long-term self-sufficiency and financial independence through additional job or vocational training. Benefits are now based on 90 percent of the deceased worker's net income at the time of the accident, subject to maximum insurable earnings.

If the spouse is employed, they receive a five-year term benefit which is reduced 20 percent each year after the first year. If the spouse is not employed, they are entitled to vocational rehabilitation to achieve gainful employment defined at a net income level that equals or exceeds 75 percent, which is what the deceased worker would have been entitled to had their accident resulted in permanent injury. These new benefits were provided to surviving spouses regardless of whether they remarried, lived common law, or stayed single.

An all-party committee presented this new legislation to the Assembly in 1982. It was well-meaning legislation but unfortunately treated one group of widows differently from another based on an arbitrary date. The lump sum payment worked out to be considerably less than what a long-term pension could be worth. It became an issue of fairness.

Approximately five and a half years ago the Disenfranchised Widows Action Group was formed and proceeded with the goal of getting their pensions reinstated and a lump sum payment for the years they had been denied pensions. They have been buoyed along the way by results obtained by other groups with similar causes.

In 1987 the government of Canada recognized and corrected a similar discriminatory error by reinstating Canada pension plan surviving spousal benefits. In 1996 disenfranchised widows in British Columbia won a court case against the WCB and had their pensions reinstated retroactive to 1985.

In 1997 Ontario made similar changes to its legislation to reinstate WCB benefits to widows. The hon. Cam Jackson, minister responsible for seniors at that time, spoke these words in Ontario's Legislative Assembly.

Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to join my colleague, the Minister of Labour, in proposing an initiative worth over $135 million to some of the most vulnerable members of Ontario society.

These same words, I think, could be said here in Alberta for our Disenfranchised Widows Action Group.

Mr. Speaker, in a number of provinces varying degrees of reinstatement of pensions have occurred in some areas or just financial settlements in lieu of restoration of pensions. The province of Ontario, from my understanding, has gone even further than this proposed legislation will. I'm sure it is no secret to the members of this Assembly that the Ontario compensation system is in serious financial trouble, but they have put in place a plan that will restore the widows' pensions in addition to a cash settlement.

In December of 1998 Motion 518, WCB disenfranchised widows, was introduced in the Assembly by this member. The purpose of this motion was to address the unequal treatment in pension benefits for widows and widowers of WCB claimants. Unfortunately, this motion was defeated at that time. The principles that this motion was introduced on were those of fairness and the protection of the vulnerable. However, the manner in which these widows have been treated since 1982 meets neither test.

The timely passage of Bill 6, Mr. Speaker, will go a long way in helping to correct the issues of fairness and the protection of the vulnerable widows and widowers who were affected by changes in legislation. I applaud this minister for listening to their plight and recognizing that there is an injustice in this province with respect to the widows' pensions. You have taken steps to correct at least in part the injustices that have gone on for a number of years.

I've had the honour and the privilege of working with these widows since early 1997. It has taken many years to bring their issue to this position. If there is one thing that I can point to with some degree of honour and privilege, it is being able to work with the widows. For all of the attempts that we make in this Legislative Assembly to effect some change that affects people in a positive way, this is one of those issues.

Shortly after I was elected in 1997, our former leader, Grant Mitchell, spoke with me on representing various groups or issues in the Legislature. At that time the light at the end of the tunnel was quite dim for a resolution to this issue, but Grant had great optimism that fairness would eventually prevail for these widows. Through their efforts and the efforts of many others we are now on the verge of bringing about changes to restore some sense of justice and fairness with widows' pensions.

Now, it is interesting to note that the other part of that financial and emotional hardship that the widows had to undergo was that if a second marriage dissolved, there was no basis for the restoration of that particular pension for those widows. In other words, once you remarried, your pension was forever gone as a result of that remarriage.

I've talked to a number of the widows for several years now, Mr. Speaker. They have told me of their extreme emotional stress at the loss of a spouse. I can only reference the cases that came to my attention. The widows would tell me that they would wake up in the morning with their families, all cheerful to start the day. They would see their spouses off to work, out the door of their house. Several hours later they would have a police officer, a coworker, or a friend knocking at the door, indicating that perhaps they should come to the hospital because there had been a serious accident. The widows have indicated to me that their lives were forever unalterably changed as a result of those events that were beyond their control.

To add insult to injury, many of them, unfortunately, after the loss of their first spouse were involved in marriages that subsequently went bad and ended up in divorce or separation. The widows had no recourse to any reinstatement of their pensions after a remarriage.

They wound up financially worse off than when their spouses had died.

The unfortunate part is that WCB has opted, I am told, for an $80,000 lump sum payment. If you did even a rough calculation, that money would have been considerably higher for a number of the widows that have been cut off for a great number of years. This $80,000 figure was arrived at without any negotiations with the Disenfranchised Widows Action Group on a take it or go to court if you're not satisfied with the offer.

Many members of the widows' group are seniors. They have struggled without pensions for so many years. The WCB in Alberta is perhaps the only WCB in Canada that has a huge surplus. They have so much money that they can even afford to buy ads on television when they have a total monopoly for providing compensation to injured workers in this province. So how did they arrive at this figure of $80,000? You know, with the settlements I have looked at, the figure of $80,000 appears to be the lowest. This is perhaps not the right time to ask this question, but I think it is important for the public, the widows, and the members of this Assembly to know how that figure was arrived at. We would like to know how this settlement compares with those across Canada.

I'm not sure if the minister has heard this or not, but not all the widows are satisfied that they will be receiving full justice as a result of Bill 6. Some of them are dissatisfied with the level of compensation that has been offered. Others are upset that the pensions were not reinstated. There are many that feel they have been short-changed on both counts. It is unfortunate that these vulnerable members of our society have been placed in a take it or leave it position or take your chances in court. This action would only result in more delays and costly legal proceedings, that they cannot afford.

Now, as well, when I was looking over Bill 6, Mr. Speaker, I did have some concerns on section 9 regarding regulations. These regulations are simply too wide open. They're too vague, and they allow the minister to effectively write the bill without recourse to this Assembly. I do note that there are others that think this matter is long past its time to be resolved. They have fought the good fight, but they are tired of fighting for what is rightfully theirs. Many of these people are seniors who want to get on with their lives. Time is of the essence to them. They would like to have this matter dealt with. This legislation for them will bring an end, or a closure, to this matter after a number of years.

We would hope for them a speedy passage of this legislation. If we find that there is consensus on this particular piece of legislation, I would like to have royal assent given to this matter as soon as possible. This would allow the WCB to put the money in the hands of those widows and widowers who deserve timely closure of this chapter of their lives. Even as we debate this issue here in the Legislative Assembly, time is of the essence for some very sick members of this group. I look forward to this bill going through second reading and on through committee and third reading as quickly as possible.

In closing I would like to take this opportunity to thank all members of the Disenfranchised Widows Action Group for your resolve, your determination, and the opportunity to work with you. If we do meet on any other issues in the future, I want to be on your side.

Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for the opportunity for me to add my comments to this bill.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to speak to Bill 6 at second reading and to congratulate the minister for his work on this bill and also to congratulate my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Glengarry. He spent a great deal of time and effort ensuring that the needs of this group of people were met in the best possible way.

There is occasion sometimes in this Assembly for us to be able to address grave wrongdoings that have been done in the past, and this bill is certainly representative of an instance like this. I know that the minister has had legal opinions saying that they were not legally bound to do what we see before us with this legislation, but I and many members of this Assembly and of this province and all of those women and their families affected in this circumstance believe that this government was morally bound to do something about this grave wrong that was done to these women back in the early 1980s. Certainly, while the formal battle to receive payment has been going on for about five and a half years, the informal battle that these women have been waging has been happening for them, for the most part, since the day their husbands were killed in work-related accidents.

If we take a look back at that time period in our history of the province, in the '50s and the '60s, when most of these accidents occurred that we're addressing now, women had a very different kind of placement in our society than they have today. They were expected to marry and stay home and take care of their families and support their husband in their husband's work role in society. When something happened to change that relationship, particularly when the husband died, the husband and the wife expected the employer to provide for the wife and the children of the family in some sort of regard.

Let's remember that back in that period of time very few women worked, and those who did work were in very poor-paying jobs. It was hard for women to find employment outside the home, and it was hard for them to be single parents, quite different from how it is today, where there are a lot of opportunities for women in the workforce.

Then when these women were faced with the unexpected death of their loved one and the unexpected challenge of trying to decide how to provide for their families, they were also given the unexpected challenge of having to fight with their employers, particularly with WCB, to get any kind of monetary coverage for their families. For many of these women it was a battle they fought for years, trying to find financial support and any kind of adequate redress from the WCB. Many of those women have told me over the past few years that they were literally told by government officials that they talked to and by members of the WCB at that time that they should just be quiet, go home, take care of their kids, and find a husband, that that would solve their problems.

Well, society has changed a lot since then, I'm happy to say, Mr. Speaker, but during that time period it was very, very difficult for these women to take the next step in their lives. It became the ultimate problem in these women's lives and shadowed their experience for the remainder of their lives up until this point. It is the single biggest outstanding issue that they had to work around and resolve while still doing the very important task of trying to raise their children and provide for their families.

When we look back and when historians look back at this time period, we should be and they will be appalled at how these women were treated over time. It has been a huge struggle for them. It's interesting to see that in 1982 when the legislation was changed, it wasn't addressed as has happened in many other instances, where we see clauses like this grandfathered. If a commitment was made to pay people for their lifetime in terms of a benefit and then legislation changed, generally speaking, for those people addressed during that time period there's a grandfathering clause so that the rules remain the same for them, or at that point in time some form of compensation is made to those people. Not in this case, Mr. Speaker, and I have to wonder if it didn't happen in this case because we're talking about women. We're talking about women who did not have positions of power where they could negotiate adequately on their own behalf. That's a question that I have for the minister, and I'm hoping that he'll be able to answer that.

The minister in his remarks made a statement where he said that it is his belief that there was a fair amount of co-operation between the group and WCB. Well, Mr. Speaker, I don't believe that to be true at all. That is certainly not what I have heard from these women. To be quite blunt, these old women were bullied. They were bullied into accepting a lump sum payment, with no interest accruing, that is far below, in fact way less than one-third, what most of them would have been entitled to.

The wording of the letter that came from WCB was coercive in nature. It told them: this is it; this is the only offer you're ever going to get; you're not going to do any better; opt in or forever opt out and as individuals then take WCB to court. Well, we know the struggle that these women have faced for literally decades. As individuals fighting the system they got absolutely nowhere, Mr. Speaker. They know that this is an all-or-nothing, onetime offer that is substandard. That I also find appalling.

These women feel the pressure not just for themselves but for other members of their group, many of whom, as my colleague from Edmonton-Glengarry has said, have died recently or are very infirm and may not make it through another round of negotiations. They feel tremendous pressure to take the settlement as it stands and not to continue the fight for more fair and equitable treatment. It's too bad that that's the position they are in, Mr. Speaker, but it's certainly a corner that they have been backed into.

Having said that, these women have struggled for a long time, and they're tired, Mr. Speaker. Certainly we saw that when they were here for the introduction of this bill a little while past, for first reading. After the bill was introduced and we met with them outside in the rotunda, you could see how drained they were physically and emotionally, how relieved they were that finally there was some closure, yet at the same time how bitter they were, how upset they were, how unfairly they felt they had been treated in terms of the settlement. A settlement of $80,000 in terms of a lump sum payment is the lowest settlement that has been made across this country so far and from the richest province in the country, so I think that speaks for itself.

These women will be very happy to have closure to this issue, but once again, as has been the case for them over the decades that they have struggled in this fight, they will not have been treated fairly, Mr. Speaker, by this government or by WCB. So because of that I will not be supporting this bill in principle at second reading. I will be supporting the bill when it comes for a final vote because I understand the constraints that the women are under in terms of age and health. I will be happy to see that there has been recognition of their concerns and their situation when the final vote is taken, but certainly in principle it is impossible for me to support this bill.

MR. DICKSON: Just to speak very briefly, Mr. Speaker. I very much support Bill 6 and the purpose of Bill 6. You know, we have a responsibility. I feel I have a responsibility as a legislator when I see a section like section 9 – and I know my colleague for Edmonton-Glengarry touched on it – to be consistent with the concern that at least I've tried to always raise with subordinate lawmaking whenever I see a section that allows a minister to "make regulations respecting any matter that the Minister considers necessary or advisable to carry out the intent of this Act.”

I know that this minister may be a reasonable, practical man, anxious to respond to the need while we have the statute. I understand he may well say with all sincerity: I would never abuse this; it's just the little details, to fill in the things that aren't done in the act. But given the fact that in this province subordinate legislation – in other words, regulations are not vetted, are not screened, are not reviewed by any kind of an all-party committee such as the Standing Committee on Law and Regulations . . .

AN HON. MEMBER: They're not going to be.

MR. DICKSON: Well, to be consistent, the concern has to be raised again, Mr. Speaker.

As much as it pains me even to raise it on a bill – I mean, I listened to the Member for Edmonton-Glengarry, and he talked about the importance of moving the bill through quickly. I want to respond to that. I genuinely do, but I'm also torn because at some point is democracy – it's always the death of a thousand cuts. It's not somebody putting up a banner across the front of the Legislative Assembly saying: closed for the next five years.

MR. SAPERS: No longer an approved legislative facility.

MR. DICKSON: No longer an approved legislative facility, end of quote.

What happens is that it's these little ways. We talked about it and will talk about it in Bill 3. We see it again here. So, Mr. Speaker, it's again to highlight the concern. I'm concerned that somewhere down the road people who study whatever happened when we started losing democracy in Alberta and when they start charting the course, they're going to point to something like section 9 and say: you know, here it was. I don't want anybody to say that the MLAs were asleep at the switch, that they didn't understand the significance of it and didn't understand the consequences and the ramifications. Just because it's tucked in an important bill, a positive bill, a good bill doesn't make that section right.

You know, the most impressive kind of leadership I can think of, Mr. Speaker, the most impressive kind of leadership I could ever imagine would be for the minister of human resources to say: we would never abuse the trust this Legislature has given us, and that's why I'm going to make some commitment that the regulations would be vetted by somebody other than the Member for Peace River and his regulatory or deregulatory task force, whatever it's called.

So, Mr. Speaker, it's a good bill and a good initiative, and it's certainly one that I'm going to vote for, but I just register in the strongest possible terms the disquiet I feel, how uncomfortable I feel with section 9. Just because it's easy and it simplifies things doesn't make it right.

I'm reminded of the Railway Act we saw not so long ago and talking about the armadillo complex that sometimes we see, and I remember my concern there. We raise these things in bill after bill after bill, yet government continues to bring in things like section 9. Why would that be, Mr. Speaker? Is it that they don't think we're serious? They don't think anybody cares? They think that they just never make bad decisions? I don't know what it is. I can only speculate. But I do register that very strong concern.

Thank you very much.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Egmont.

MR. HERARD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's indeed an honour to stand up in support of Bill 6. I certainly want to congratulate the Minister of Human Resources and Employment for bringing this bill forward and for initiating the actions that caused the WCB to reconsider their position with respect to the disenfranchised widows. I want to thank all the other hon. members on both sides of the House who over the years have spent considerable time in discussions with the widows who were affected. I know that there's been a lot of effort made by a lot of people over a lot of years to bring this forward.

Now, the bill may not be seen by all parties as adequate, but I think one has to recognize that there is really no need to defend or prove anything with respect to this bill, and therefore it applies to everyone equally. So I think, in respect of that, that certainly is going to speed the remedy and make the compensation that perhaps should have been paid to some of these people along the way a lot easier.

I also want to thank this minister for doing the right thing with respect to . . . [interjections] I'm not sure if I'm missing something here. With respect to the reviews that he's currently ordered with respect to the service review committee, that I'm honoured to be on, as well as the committee that is currently looking at all of the appeal mechanisms, I believe this minister does the right thing, and in the end there will be some major opportunities to improve the operations of the WCB with respect to those injured workers who are severely injured.

We also know, though, that the WCB indeed does a very good job of a large part of their work, with respect to 85 percent of the injured workers who are not seriously injured. I think these reviews are going to allow visibility to come into the system and certain actions to be recommended by these committees. I certainly commend the minister once more for allowing those things to happen, because it's been a long time coming.

We'll be able to learn, I think, through the questionnaires that are currently now available, as I understand it, in all MLAs' offices across the province, not just government MLAs but every MLA office across the province. I would certainly encourage injured workers who feel that perhaps their case was not given due process to help us to pinpoint exactly what the problems were that they encountered and to give us enough detail so that we can in fact make appropriate conclusions with respect to what they're telling us and make appropriate recommendations to the minister.

So I certainly again want to thank the minister for everything that he's done so far. I know that this bill may not be the last bill of this kind in this particular minister's history. Thank you very much.

THE SPEAKER: The Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Bill 6 has certainly been a long time coming. I can remember back in 1995 probably, maybe even as early as 1994, there was a resident in my constituency, actually a woman that lives in the apartment tower right next to my constituency office, that came to see me. She sat down with me and my constituency manager, Kim Cassidy, and told us her story about the loss of pension and what it meant in her life and the struggles that it meant for her personally. Then she told me about this group of mostly women who were in the same situation. She started talking to me about growing court decisions and court challenges in other jurisdictions, wondering whether or not they would have to do the same thing in Alberta that was being done elsewhere to get some justice and some satisfaction.

I said that I thought their case made perfect sense, that their issue was a good issue, that their arguments were well founded, and that even though obviously there were some policy disagreements between myself and my caucus colleagues in the provincial government, even though that was the case, the logic and the weight of their argument would be impressive and they would be able to make common cause with the government and come to a speedy resolution. As I say, that was back in 1994, 1995.

Well, I will say that the minister that has inherited this file, the current minister responsible for the WCB, I think can distinguish himself from his predecessors at least in this regard. He has sincerely listened to the plight of these disadvantaged Albertans, and he has seen to it that under his watch something appropriate has been done about their concerns. I thank him for that.

Mr. Speaker, I have shared in the anger and the frustration of these men and mostly women over these past five or six years, and for the life of me I can't figure out why it took us so long to get here. I also can't figure out for the life of me why, when the settlement is finally offered, it's at the bottom end of the scale. You know, it's always a difficult judgment, and the government in the past has fallen into the situation where they wanted to make sure that the most amount of money went to the claimants.

We saw the ill-considered Bill 26, where some limitations were going to be put in in terms of legal rights. The government backtracked on that, but I do accept that somewhere in the thinking around that bill there was a sincere belief that the maximum amount of whatever settlement dollars would be offered would go to the claimants. That's the only justification that I can think of when it came to the attempt to use the notwithstanding clause in Bill 26.

In Bill 6, you know, the disadvantaged women do have the right to say no to the $80,000, and they could go to court. Some of them I'm certain will do that. For some it's already too late, Mr. Speaker. This is not a youthful group of men and women, and for some it's simply too late. I understand that the money won't be paid to estates, and I think that's an issue. Others just simply may run out of time. If they did choose to go to court to try to get what in their minds, in their beliefs would be a more fair amount, they simply may run out of time. There are a few members of this group that I know who are gravely ill.

I think it's important to encourage the government to look for areas of injustice that they can correct legislatively. I am glad that this minister has seen to it that his responsibility is being discharged by closing this file. On behalf of the women that I've had the privilege of getting to know over these past half-dozen years, I think a certain amount of closure will be celebrated, but I would really appreciate it if the government would look carefully into the delay over these last number of years, would look carefully at the reasons why any settlement is on the table and ask themselves collectively whether or not this is really a fair amount, the $80,000, whether or not it represents a real measure of justice.

Mr. Speaker, I guess for some of the recipients of this special payment, they'll say: yeah, it's terrific; it's all we could have ever hoped for. For some of them that may be true, but for others – and these are the men and women I'm particularly thinking of – it won't be any measure of justice. It will be seen as an insignificant amount compared to the loss of pension benefits over many, many years and the loss of future benefits, which of course will be forgone.

Madam Speaker, I don't want to delay debate on this bill. We'll get into committee. There may be some discussion around section 9, there may be some discussion around the dollar amount, but, you know, it wouldn't be entirely unique for the government to bring an amendment to its own bill. We have time between now and third reading to take a look at the dollar amount and to rethink it. I would encourage the minister to do just that and have that discussion with his cabinet colleagues.

Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment to close debate.

MR. DUNFORD: Yes. Thank you, Madam Speaker. Just some comments, I suppose in reaction to the members that have spoken previously.

First of all, I want to say that I do appreciate the support that we're finding here today from both sides of the House. I certainly appreciate that, and I am sure the widows and widowers involved will appreciate that as well.

I think it's important to make sure that people understand that with the Special Payment Act we're not taking anything away from any of the widows in the sense that they still have a pathway through the courts if they determine that the negotiated settlement is not to their liking.

The settlement itself is an issue for the WCB and for the widows. My role here today is simply to try to do the best that I can in providing, then, an opportunity or a pathway for the parties to arrive at a conclusion, to arrive at some closure without the use of the courts, if that's what they determine.

I hesitate to get into the numbers, because again that is not the business of the government of Alberta but the business of the Workers' Compensation Board. The briefings that I've had to do with on this particular file have indicated that Manitoba and Saskatchewan in arriving at lump sum payments – I'm told the amounts were $72,000 and $75,000. For the record, perhaps that information might be useful.

I did appreciate and took as a compliment the comments from Calgary-Buffalo, but I would just want to indicate to the hon. member and to all members of the House that however reasonable or however practical he might see me, the act goes above and beyond that, because any minister, any person that is accepted into Executive Council has to take an oath of office, and certainly within that oath it then is our responsibility to govern ourselves in accordance with the good of the people.

I don't know, when it comes to regulations, that section 9 is that sort of a section to be feared, and I would want to assure the member that whoever comes behind me, as surely they will, in this portfolio, that minister will be duty bound and honour bound to do the same that I have.

So with those comments, I'd like to move second reading of Bill 6.

[Motion carried; Bill 6 read a second time]

Bill 4 Surveys Amendment Act, 2000

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Environment.

MR. MAR: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to bring the Surveys Amendment Act, 2000, for second reading. The amendment is a straightforward change. I can help explain that change by giving members of the Assembly some brief background.

Alberta's municipalities, land developers, utility and resource development companies, and government rely heavily on accurate and up-to-date maps called cadastral maps. For the reference of the House a cadastral map shows the boundaries of the subdivisions of land for purposes of describing, recording, ownership, and taxation. To provide cadastral maps as efficiently as possible, my department has made two changes to mapping services in Alberta.

First, we took advantage of new technology and worked with Alberta's two land titles offices. Descriptive plans and plans of surveys are now in a digitized format. This data is integrated into our base maps, which then can be distributed electronically. Alberta is leading the country in electronic cadastral mapping services, with the support and participation of Alberta's land surveyors and their association.

The second thing we did was privatize mapping services to a not-for-profit agency. Spatial Data Warehouse Ltd. is now responsible for updating and distributing digitized mapping data.

Technological advancements are beneficial and inevitable, but they have a cost, and no matter who provides the services, they still need to be paid for. Last spring, consistent with our government's user-pay policy, this House amended the Surveys Act to provide ministerial authority to collect a cadastral mapping fee. Land titles offices in Edmonton and Calgary collect on behalf of my department and forward those fees to Spatial Data Warehouse. However, the wording of the earlier amendment refers only to fees for mapping plans of survey. Section 89 of the Land Titles Act states that descriptive plans are not plans of survey, but Spatial Data Warehouse maps both kinds of plans and is entitled to fees for both services.

The Surveys Amendment Act, before us for second reading today, adds the phrase "or a descriptive plan" to the Surveys Act. This will allow us to ensure that Spatial Data Warehouse receives fees for all the plans that it maps on our behalf, and I ask members of this Assembly for support for this amendment to the Surveys Act.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Madam Speaker. We have some questions about this bill, although in general it's a very small amendment that's being brought in here. We can see that the problem that could have presented itself, had this amendment not been brought in, would have been that the cadastral surveys have to be registered with the Land Titles Act and there's a payment or a fee when a plan of survey is submitted to update this mapping, but no fee is currently required when a descriptive plan is submitted. So this is an oversight, as we understand from the industry, that is being corrected by this process, particularly when you take into consideration that the descriptive plan is not actually surveyed but is a plan drawn on the basis of a verbal description.

What might have happened, then, is that we could have seen people trying to submit descriptive plans to save money when a plan of survey was required, a potential loophole in the legislation and something that was apparently overlooked by everyone involved in preparing the legislation when it came before us in the House last spring. We can see where this bill meets the requirement.

Madam Speaker, there are a few questions in terms of the privatization that the minister has undertaken to put this fee collection process into a not-for-profit agency. When we did a search on Spatial Data Warehouse Ltd., it was very interesting to see the people who are going to be in charge of this not-for-profit agency. First and foremost is the assistant deputy minister for the department in the land and forest service. So who we see listed here on the corporate search is Cliff Henderson, who currently, as I understand it, is still the assistant deputy minister, land and forest service. I'm wondering why it is that he's involved at this level in this not-for-profit agency. In addition to that, the other names listed here are primarily people in a senior position in a local large company here in Edmonton.

I'm sure, Madam Speaker, that there's some easy explanation for this. I'm sure that these positions were in effect tendered to some extent to find out that we have the right kind of representation on this board, and if not, then these positions clearly must be transitional positions. I'm hoping the minister will clear that up for us and tell us exactly what the process was in terms of establishing this not-for-profit agency, what the intent is in terms of those people who are holding key positions in this organization at this time, and exactly what it is that all of these people are doing in these positions.

Also, of course, the big issue here always is remuneration. I understand that this is a not-for-profit agency, but I also understand that fees of $100 are being charged for each plan that is being registered. Now, it's a couple of computer clicks to enter these into the system and perhaps some other work. We want to ensure, Madam Speaker, that any remuneration paid out to people involved in this process is done on a fair and reasonable basis and that any jobs that were the outcomes of this were advertised for in a fair and reasonable process.

Those are my questions at this stage, and I'm sure that the minister will be happy to answer them, not just for me but on behalf of all of those people out there in the province right now who want to ensure that there is openness and transparency in every action that this government undertakes.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder.

MR. WHITE: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The minister and my colleague from Edmonton-Ellerslie have covered a great deal of the area that I wish to cover. I won't repeat those items again, although the nonprofit firm set up to carry on this business raised a number of questions on this side of the House that have never really been explained. My colleague has covered most of the areas that I wish to in that regard, but I've saved this question.

As we understand, the fees and charges of the province of Alberta are held in abeyance currently in order to restructure those and find out whether in fact those can be applied as fees and not as taxes. Is this organization set up to impose these fees, on a willing public presumably, in an attempt to get around that provision that came about by a challenge in the courts in Ontario, I understand? That's a question to be answered some other time, I suspect, unless the minister has the answers here now.

The other area that concerns this member is that it appears that this is a relatively minor and innocuous change in the act and would not in the normal case warrant a full bill, particularly if the Standing Committee on Law and Regulations in this Legislature was utilized in this House for the purpose it was intended, to review law and regulations. Certainly to have an all-party committee review these matters that would arise now and again from the imposition of an act and get it down to an administrative level, you'd find that the act simply does not fill the bill, as it were, and there are some errors of either commission or omission. The committee would be able to deal with that. An all-party committee would receive the tacit consent and knowledge of the opposition parties, and then it would make miscellaneous statutes much more inclusive, such that this side of the House would not have any reason to debate those matters as is tradition in a miscellaneous statutes act.

With the absence of the Standing Committee on Law and Regulations, how does the government expect the Legislature to work in the manner it was designed, which is having the opposition question and call to question both the government's motive and mode of operation? How could it work? It's a question that should be put and should be debated in government caucus a great deal more than it apparently is.

Madam Speaker, with that, this member has no further remarks on this bill, as it was adequately covered by the minister and the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie. Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Madam Speaker, thank you very much. Just a couple of quick comments. We've received an explanation, I think, in terms of what the purpose of the amendment is. My query would be this. I'm not intimately familiar with the Surveys Act, but when I look at section 46, which is the section being amended, what I see is that "the minister may make orders," and really what we're doing is we're amending the (b) part to expand what one of those orders may cover.

Now, perhaps the minister can advise us. There are some orders that in fact are treated effectively as a regulation. They're subject to the Regulations Act of the province of Alberta. As my colleague a moment ago said, although we don't have all-party oversight of regulation, at least there's some procedure for publication of regulations, and they're accessible. We also have a beast called ministerial orders. Most ministerial orders aren't subject to the Regulations Act, and they're just darn tough to find, Madam Speaker. The courthouse in downtown Edmonton has an excellent library, but normally you can't go in there and find those orders. I can go to the courthouse in Calgary. It's got lots of laws and regulations for this province, but I typically can't find ministerial orders there. So my question to the minister is: what kinds of orders are these in section 46? Are these the orders that are subject to the Regulations Act? If they're not, how do Albertans access them?

I'm a believer, I think along with my caucus colleagues, in plain language and that whole movement to make laws accessible to Albertans, and I'm always a bit uncomfortable when we're dealing with orders that may be well known within a department. But, you know, laws are not for the people in the department; they're for the rest of us to manage our affairs.

I'm mindful of the fact that the Alberta Land Surveyors' Association – I mean, there's a finite number of members, and they may customarily deal with these. Maybe they have ready access to ministerial orders. I don't know; I'd need the minister's help with that. This seems like a fairly innocuous bill, but I'm hopeful the minister can tell us what kinds of orders these are and what process is utilized to make sure that regular Albertans like me or you, Madam Speaker, or any of my constituents can go and find out what these things are and what's in them and so on.

The other observation I'd make. Since we're dealing with section 46, this is somewhat collateral to the bill but certainly relevant. This is one of those things that the Supreme Court of Canada in the Eurig decision was focused on. They were looking at probate fees in the Eurig decision, but, you know, I expect the fees here may be a significant cost, and perhaps the minister could just offer us some assurance that the Eurig decision from the Supreme Court of Canada has been reflected in these orders. They may not be, and I'll await confirmation from the minister. These ministerial orders may not even be subject to the Regulations Act of the province of Alberta. It may be that they have not been assessed under the Eurig decision. Perhaps we could just have the minister sort of sign off on that,

Madam Speaker, and tell us that he is as usual way ahead of this member, that he anticipated this concern and it's no problem, that it has been looked after. I'd just like to have that assurance myself.

I daresay my constituency, Calgary-Buffalo, being in the heart of the oil patch, has lots of land surveyors' offices. I'd hate for some of them to think that some of these questions weren't being asked. Otherwise, it seems like a pretty straightforward piece of legislation.

I've learned about a new kind of map I knew nothing about before. It just goes to show you that you can plunk away for 22 years in the practice of law and think you've dealt with lots of land and survey instruments, and then something like this comes along to show you how inadequate your knowledge is, Madam Speaker. So thanks for the education, Mr. Minister, but hopefully you can educate me further on some of the items I've raised this afternoon.

Thanks very much.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. minister to close debate.

MR. MAR: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'll be happy to review all of the comments made by members of the Assembly and respond to them accordingly.

At this point I wish to move second reading of the Surveys Amendment Act, 2000.

[Motion carried; Bill 4 read a second time]

Bill 5

Land Titles Amendment Act, 2000

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

MR. JACQUES: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is my pleasure to move second reading of Bill 5, being the Land Titles Amendment Act, 2000.

Madam Speaker, in general terms the intent of Bill 5 is to place certain land title practices in legislation and to ensure that the Land Titles Act is in sync with certain federal legislation. In 1996 amendments to the Land Titles Act consolidated the north and south Alberta land registration districts into a single Alberta land registration district and provided the statutory authority to establish a land titles office at one or more locations. An amendment to the act is now required in order to provide for the appointment of a single registrar of titles to be responsible for the land titles office. In conjunction with the foregoing, an amendment is also proposed to establish the use of only one seal for the Alberta land titles offices which are located in both Edmonton and Calgary.

An amendment is also required to allow the registrar to accept for registration copies of leases and other registrable instruments which are certified by the chief executive officer under the Parks Canada Agency Act or a person duly authorized by the chief executive officer. This amendment is required to ensure the act accommodates the recent amendments to the Parks Canada Agency Act by the federal government.

On April 18, 1998, the general register was abolished. All writs of enforcement and other registrable instruments as defined must now be registered on a certificate of title. Commencing in 1995, there was a three-year transition period associated with the abolishment of the general register which required that certain legislative provisions be maintained during that three-year period. As this transition period has now expired, some sections of the Land Titles Act require minor changes to reflect current legislative procedures. As well, Madam Speaker, the proposed amendments ensure that all sections dealing with writs, which are now in different locations throughout the act, will be in one location, allowing for both clarity and ease of reference.

Lastly, Madam Speaker, there is a section in the Land Titles Act which enables a person to bring an action against the registrar of the district in which the land exists for the recovery of damages. An amendment is required to reflect that there is only one land registration district and one registrar for the land titles offices in Alberta.

In closing, I would like to note that formal discussions have taken place with the Law Society of Alberta and with Parks Canada of the federal government as well as informal discussions with many institutions and that these amendments reflect those discussions.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thanks very much, Madam Speaker. I'd suggest that there are probably few single statutes in this province that are more important than the Land Titles Act. We have an amazing system of land registration, one of the best in the world. It has been recognized as one of the best in the world for many, many decades, and I know my colleagues in the Alberta Liberal caucus are anxious to ensure that the integrity of the land titles system is assured and protected.

I guess it appears fairly straightforward as I look at Bill 5. I would have felt a little more comfortable if the sponsor of the bill had said that he'd reviewed this not just with the Law Society of Alberta, which is the formal regulatory body for Alberta lawyers, but that he had also discussed it with the real estate section of the Canadian Bar Association, north, and the real estate section of the Canadian Bar Association, south. It's the Canadian Bar Association that in fact does advocacy on behalf of lawyers around legislative change, around issues that lawyers deal with all the time. The real estate sections, particularly in Edmonton and Calgary, Madam Speaker, are very strong. They're well attended. These are people, men and women, who deal every day with the minutia of the Land Titles Act and the land titles system. Now, I know my colleagues, people like Calgary-Glenmore and Calgary-Lougheed, if asked would have made that suggestion to the bill sponsor. By the fact that he didn't mention it, I don't know whether he has talked to them and they had problems with this.

Madam Speaker, as I look at it, this seems fairly straightforward, but I think given the importance of the Land Titles Act and the rules to those people who are charged every day with the implementation, the processing of it, I would have felt and would feel more comfortable if I knew that those real estate sections in Edmonton and Calgary had reviewed this and were comfortable with it. They may well confirm that they have no issues or whatever. It's not to say that they make legislation; they don't. Just because one of those groups might have issues, it wouldn't be necessarily a reason to vote against the bill, but it would seem foolish of me not to solicit advice, take that advice and share it with members here in the Assembly.

I know that I've asked a similar question to some of our Conservative colleagues about the significance, the impact of this, and I haven't to date heard that assurance with respect to the Canadian Bar Association, so I'll do that on my own. I'll be happy, Madam Speaker, to make those inquiries. If the bill sponsor, our friend from Grande Prairie-Wapiti, has got that information, maybe he could just send me a note saying that the real estate sections didn't have any issues with it.

I think it's very dangerous for us to go in and open up a bill as important as this one and do some tinkering with it without making sure all of the major groups that are going to be directly affected (a) know what the contemplated change consists of and (b) are supportive of it. If they're not supportive, then it just seems to me that the sponsor of the bill has an obligation to come in and, with a view to putting all the information in front of us, to say: the Canadian Bar Association, northern real estate section, has got some problems with section 7; these are the problems, and this is why I as bill sponsor and why the government aren't dissuaded after hearing those concerns.

We haven't heard that. Far be it from me to be, you know, trying to shine my flashlight in dark closets and trying to find out what else is there, but I just think, given the importance of the bill, we want to know that information. There may be others who share that concern. Perhaps not, but it's just too darn important to rubber-stamp this bill. You've heard my comments many times before that I don't think my job here ever is to be a rubber stamp. There may be people who wish to use a great big rubber stamp over my skull, but that's not my job here, to rubber-stamp . . . [interjection] Battered by both sides, Madam Speaker, battered by both sides.

I don't want to be a rubber stamp, and that's why I asked that question. I look forward to some clarification, and if I don't get the clarification, Madam Speaker, I want to make you a promise. I want to make you a promise right now that if this bill gets to committee stage – and I'm sure it will – I'm going to again ask these questions. You're going to be sitting there in the chair saying: "Member for Calgary-Buffalo, I remember you asking those questions. Have you not got answers yet?" I want to have answers by the time we deal with this again at committee stage. You probably are wondering what the answers are to those questions that have been asked, so I promise I'll send you a note if you're in the chair when we get to the committee stage on this important bill.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti, do you wish to close debate?

MR. JACQUES: I would ask for the question, Madam Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 5 read a second time]

Bill 1

Alberta Heritage Foundation for Science and Engineering Research Act

[Adjourned debate March 6: Mr. Herard]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MRS. SOETAERT: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Of course, I'm more than pleased to take the opportunity to speak to Bill 1. You know, often things in this Legislature are a bit like a hockey game. The only things that are reported are the fights and the goals, but there's a lot of play in between that never gets reported. Here we go with a bill that has support on both sides of the House, so I want to speak to that for a little while and maybe tie in some other issues that I think will relate to this bill eventually or that should be addressed by further work.

Virtually, the objects of this bill, the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Science and Engineering Research Act, are to support a balanced long-term program of science and engineering research based in Alberta directed to the discovery of new knowledge and the application of that knowledge to improve the quality of Alberta's economy, communities and environment.

We're putting quite a chunk of coin into that, $500 million if I'm correct, to be used by the foundation, and in that we're going to establish an advisory council. In that advisory council, as I understand it, there will be a few different people of different backgrounds. I guess, though, my question is: who will make up the members of the board? Will there be an opportunity to have members of the public? I think the more inclusive we are of different walks of life, different interests, then the better we are served. So that will maybe be an interesting issue that the minister can address at some point: the designated trustees that section 2 will have and if it's only science professionals that will be in the legislation. Surely there might be other science professionals that may be also included in that. I would be interested in hearing about that at a later time as we discuss this bill.

You know, I sometimes think that people don't realize how very significant research in general is. No doubt that in this fast-paced world that we live in, the big focus on engineering . . . Somebody is beeping, but what's new in here? [interjection] No, it's really not me. It's really not me beeping. I'm usually much louder than just a beep.

MR. DICKSON: Somebody has come unplugged.

MRS. SOETAERT: Somebody has come unplugged.

DR. MASSEY: Undone.

MRS. SOETAERT: Undone. It's a machine, we hope.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: I think everything is under control.

MRS. SOETAERT: The Member for St. Albert escorted her machine out. Maybe that's part of the research.

To the bill, Madam Speaker. There's a whole realm of research and technology out there that we have to deal with, but my point about research is that it's more important than we ever think. There are scientists that spend countless hours doing research, and the general public says: well, what does a research scientist do anyway? Little do we realize the far-reaching benefits of some of the work they have done. I am pleased that this is for science and engineering, but I guess within that we should always look at the other disciplines that deserve the same amount of research respect and finance that comes with that.

You know, when we convince people to come to our province and we say, "Listen; we have some great research money, and you would be a great person to do research in our province," we also have to be more encompassing in what we offer here. People move here for all kinds of reasons, and as we entice people to come to Alberta to do research, I think we also have to entice them with quality of life. You know, as people make decisions about lifestyles, one of the things they look at before moving to a place is the quality of education. Is there a school nearby where my child can go to school? Is there adequate health care? As people are enticed to do research in our province, this kind of money and commitment and encouragement is only part of what will bring them here.

I've often said here in the Legislature before that we have to value all disciplines: the humanities, the arts. I'm not saying that this bill doesn't recognize them, but I'm saying that as we start this, let's also encompass the other things. I often think of the movie Mr. Holland's Opus, an excellent, excellent movie. It talks about: if we take away the fine arts, what will our students have to write about? I often encourage members of this Assembly and wherever I go about the real value of a comprehensive education, a comprehensive research plan. I guess that in those other disciplines within the colleges, NAIT and SAIT, the universities, we also must look at the humanities, because I don't want those forgotten as the old pendulum swings towards technology and science and research and all those things that we all rely on more than we know. There's the other side of the pendulum, too, that I don't think we have focused on enough as well.

I know this is based on the medical research foundation, and to my knowledge that works very well. I support this legislation, but I also within it question the things that may be missing. As we do research and as universities and secondary institutions can access this, I express concerns that while we're doing that, we're also not realizing the restrictions that we sometimes put on people to go, to access those secondary institutions because of funding issues, because of the expense of it. I guess if we value research and if we value knowledge, then we should value the availability of those secondary institutions, which I think are becoming more and more inaccessible every year.

When we look at the U of A tuition rising 6 percent, that's a chunk of coin for summer students who make 6 to 7 bucks an hour and for their parents. Obviously many of these young people have to be supported or at least helped along or have loans cosigned by their parents. I think when we're looking at a knowledge-based society and something that's really important like this research, we can't be just narrow. We have to be more comprehensive and look at the whole picture of knowledge in this province, and what we really, really value is the accessibility of secondary education for young people.

You know, it's interesting. In this province many years ago only up to grade 8 was public education. The rest was all private and expensive. Maybe some people can even remember when parents paid for their children to go into the convent or off to the city so they could get an education. Now, of course, we have public education to grade 12, except for some exceptions when we have to fund-raise for books, et cetera. That's veering a bit, but it applies. It applies to a society that values knowledge. I hope that someday I see – and I mean, heaven knows, this government would never approach it. If we truly value knowledge, why aren't we making secondary education far more accessible? In a society that truly values secondary education, would we have such tuition costs? Would that become public education? Imagine an Alberta that valued education so much that secondary education was part of the public program. Maybe not possible in this year's budget but certainly a goal we should all at least look at and say: would it ever be a possibility within our realm to make secondary education public?

Well, we have a government that now is supporting engineering research, and that's a good move. That's a good move. But I think that if we apply knowledge right across the board, it can't just come in a little flagship bill. It can't just come as a one-shot announcement where we pound our chest: "Look at us. Aren't we wonderful? We're the heroes of knowledge." The reality is that, as in so many others, this government has failed.

So I do support Bill 1, but with it I express my concerns that just because we now have a foundation set up for science and research, that doesn't mean, then, that we can just toss away the rest of all the education issues and failings, shortcomings that this government has created. We now have students fund-raising just to get books and photocopying and essentials for the classrooms. We have bake sales. We have sub sales. We have all those kinds of things. In a society that really values education, why are we not acknowledging that we have shortcomings all the way through the system? Instead of addressing all those issues, we do come up with one foundation.

That is good. But you can't say in your little platform speech or out in your communities, "Aren't we wonderful for supporting research in this area?" and then forget that you have underfunded education, taken money away from kindergarten, and raised tuition costs prohibitively.

Speaker's Ruling Relevance

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Hon. member, the chair has listened intently here. I'm a firm believer that one can always bridge, but you're bridging awfully, awfully far away from what is before me in Bill 1. Let's get back to the overall principles within the bill.

MRS. SOETAERT: It is actually university based, and bridging is an engineering topic.

Debate Continued

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The scholars need research assistants who are university students. If tuition is too high, they can't go. It's like a circle. You see, it's a vicious circle. We've got the research, but if you can't get there to access it, you can't go. It's a vicious circle. So there's a lot of bridging going on around here on this Alberta Heritage Foundation for Science and Engineering Research Act.

MR. SMITH: It's a good bill.

MRS. SOETAERT: It's a good bill. Absolutely it's a good bill, but it's just one piece of a huge puzzle with a government that doesn't value education in other areas but touts the $500 million, half a billion dollars. That is wonderful, but the reality is that it's only part. It's one part of a puzzle that these guys won't put together.

Regretfully, there's still fund-raising. Students work full-time all summer and part-time during the year, and they still don't have enough money for tuition. Those very researchers who will be accessing this foundation – we don't want them to be unable to access it because of prohibitive costs just to get to university. Really, it is all part and parcel of it.

I'm supporting it, but I don't want people to ignore the fact that that's just one step. We have to get there in order to access that research. I would bet you that some of the very people who may say, "You know, I can't afford secondary education," are the very ones that may have accessed this and done something very notable for Alberta, maybe for the entire world. We could have been on the map because of that one researcher who maybe couldn't access university because of prohibitive tuition costs.

I think I've touched on some of this. The advisory council will be an interesting one. I know it only mentions the engineers and agronomists, if I understand this correctly, so I'm hoping that maybe there will be other members from the public that will be on this foundation, that it won't be just political appointees. Of course they're going to be appointed, but the reality is that we hope their focus is on research and what things are going to be valuable for Alberta. I'm sure, just quite sure, almost sure that that will happen.

I hope I made a few points and woke up a few people on a Monday afternoon and made new friends, Madam Speaker. The reality is that I'm glad we're supporting research. We should support it in the humanities as well. Maybe that will be the next opportunity. We can't just be narrowly focused on engineering and science. As much as I support those, there are other disciplines that should be acknowledged as well, and research is just as important in those areas. Let's look at the whole picture of knowledge and education and research in this province, because it can't just be one single little flagship. It goes together with the whole package. I will support this little piece of the puzzle in hopes that other pieces will come forward. Mind you, we'll have to provide the pieces. I know they'll never be able to put the puzzle together without us.

Madam Speaker, with those few words of support and encouragement from me on Bill 1, I'm pleased to be able to speak to it, and I thank you for that opportunity.

MR. DOERKSEN: Madam Speaker, I too want to speak for a few minutes at second reading of Bill 1. Bill 1, of course, is the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Science and Engineering Research Act.

I want to make a couple of compliments, first of all to the Minister of Innovation and Science, who has brought this bill and this concept forward to our government. He should be commended for his foresight. Secondly and just as important is the Alberta Science and Research Authority, which is a group of individuals who are not all politically alike in their beliefs, who gather around the table on a regular basis to provide objective policy advice to the government with respect to research, science, and a whole range of how we can be more effective in this area. So I wanted to make sure, Madam Speaker, that they were acknowledged in the development of this particular fund.

The science and engineering research act, or this fund, is set up similar to the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Medical Research. Like that fund, Madam Speaker, the beauty of an endowment fund is the fact that it's a fund that keeps on giving; you know, like that rabbit we see on TV, the Duracell battery rabbit, that just keeps on going. These are funds that keep on giving.

MR. SMITH: Eveready.

MR. DOERKSEN: Is it Eveready? Okay. Well, you know what I'm talking about. I don't watch TV that much, Madam Speaker, so I don't always get these names right, but the concept about giving on a continual basis for a long time in the future as an endowment for the benefit of our children and our grandchildren is what's important.

I think of another fund that does the same thing. It's the heritage foundation for scholarships. I don't think that's the correct name. One of those scholarships is the Alexander Rutherford scholarship, whereby high school students can earn up to $2,500 over the period of their high school studies to help further their education. The reason I'm bringing this up, Madam Speaker, is I'm pointing out to you the benefits of an endowment, which is what we are talking about here. In the case of the science and engineering fund it's a $500 million endowment, which will keep on giving for science and engineering research well into the future. That's exactly the same concept that we had in the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Medical Research as well as the one where we provide scholarships.

The objects of the foundation, of course, are set out in section 3, where it talks about:

- (a) stimulate research in science and engineering,
- (b) promote effective means of using in Alberta the science and engineering resources available in Alberta,
- (c) support science and engineering research laboratories and related facilities in Alberta,
- (d) promote co-operation in research in science and engineering . . .
- (e) encourage young Albertans to pursue careers in research in science and engineering.

Madam Speaker, the fund is going to be governed by trustees, and the makeup of that group of trustees is set out in section 2. Again, what you have here is similar to the Alberta Science and Research Authority. You're going to have good-thinking Albertans who are going to sit on this council to provide the expertise, because frankly those of us in this room cannot possibly provide all the necessary expertise and guidance to invest in something of this nature. We need their advice. We need their opinions.

Lastly, Madam Speaker, I want to point out that had it not been for the fiscal policy of this government, this $500 million fund would never have been possible. By getting our budget under control, our spending under control, by reducing the debt, by putting ourselves in this fiscal position, it made it possible for us to even entertain this fund at this moment, at this time, and it's good for all generations of Albertans into the future. More than that, because of the fiscal policy of this government, I expect we're going to see another $100 million added to this fund every year for the next five years to increase it to a billion dollars.

So with that, Madam Speaker, I do want to stand and vote my support for Bill 1. Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder.

MR. WHITE: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I had intended to compliment the minister – and I will do – for bringing this forward at this time, because it's long, long overdue that some moneys be spent in this manner in this province.

I will have to pick up from where my hon. colleague from Red Deer-South left off and beg to differ in some small manner. This government continually believes that they saved this province single-handedly from this destruction of overspending. In fact, if those that are old enough to remember 1989 will recall, there was an election that year. It was one Laurence Decore, who was honoured today by some expenditure of some funds to further the education of young people in leadership. That man was the one that held the wallet and said: this should not be the way. The current government of the day was overexpending. This government takes this great pleasure in saying how wonderful that they chopped the budget and were able to be fiscally responsible, as though they were the only people in the entire world that would consider doing that. My kids would say: get out of here.

MR. DOERKSEN: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: A point of order from the hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Point of Order Imputing Motives

MR. DOERKSEN: Under citation 23(i), imputing motives. Madam Speaker, in my address, if it was not clear to the member of the opposition, I was not giving credit to the government solely. It was the fiscal policies of this government, which were accepted by the people. In fact, they rose to the occasion. They were the ones who helped us through and were the ones that were responsible for us to be able to achieve for all of Alberta what we have been able to achieve in this province. It's not due to the people in this room. It's due to the people of Alberta. I want to make sure that that's clear.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: On the point of order, hon. member.

MR. WHITE: Madam Speaker, I presume that the Speaker and the Clerk are taking note of my valuable time being used for this non point of order. Quite frankly, this wasn't even a clarification. This would be called an interruption. That's all. In fact, he agreed with what I said. He in fact said that all he did was say that the government provided the opportunity for the government's largesse to put this fund into place, and I was taking umbrage with that. That's all. In fact, I was just using his very words and taking the same position that he was. I presume that the time that has been allotted for this pointless point of order, this disorderly order would be taken off.

4:50

THE ACTING SPEAKER: There is no point of order. What happened is exactly what I said a few minutes ago. This particular stage of the bill is to go over the principle of the bill. If you veer off too much from the actual bill and what is in the bill, then this type of thing results.

So let us move on with the contents of Bill 1, hon. member.

Debate Continued

MR. WHITE: Thank you. Speaking to the principle of the bill, that which brought this bill to this point was that the government in their largesse thought: yes, it's a good time to put some money into this. Personally, I think it is a bad time to take money out of science and technology at any point in this province of Alberta that relies on that and that alone.

Think of the industries that we rely on. The oil and gas industry has in fact financed this government to be able to come to this point. In '93 it wasn't a major expenditure problem. The problem was that the price of oil was down to the extent that we could not continue to spend as we had spent. In fact, to get to this point, this is the area in this part of the world that requires a continual and a continuity of expenditure. You don't just sort of add water and stir in the science and technology area and crank it up and turn out people and have them research in any one area without a sustained effort. Cutting the universities down in the interim – what do they call the number of members that sat in the back row there, Mr. Minister? I can't recall the name.

MR. SMITH: The good guys.

MR. WHITE: They were the ones. It was the good guys in the back row. That's what it was. At the time it seemed their single purpose was to chop and cut and chop and cut and chop and cut. Now, of course, we've moved. [interjection] Yes. Only the Member for Calgary-Mountain View has remained true to the principle. He still is a chop-and-cut guy.

Now we have the current minister, who says: whoa; turn around here. A major turnaround. Personally, I'm really happy he has seen the light. I am more than happy. I'm ecstatic that he has seen the light to pour money into this area of this society that so sorely needs it. In fact, I've heard him speak on the subject, and he speaks quite eloquently and quite knowledgeably about this particular area of endeavour that is truly a place for government to be. Private enterprise simply cannot fund nor should it be expected to be able to fund fundamental research. Not the applied research, not that which we generally see the products of, but the fundamental research.

Being an engineer myself, I have a little difficulty with the title being: science and engineering. My view of engineering is the application of those elements of science that come together in a creative fashion that can be put to some practical use economically. That is one version of a definition of engineering. In fact, engineering in this province has done very, very well. Engineering in fact can do and does do a great deal of research on their own. I speak of the oil industry, which does it exceedingly well. But what they don't do well is that fundamental research, that research that goes right to the heart of matter and its relationship to other matter and the movement of that matter and the discovery of what makes the substance react to various temperatures and other conditions.

The policy I would think would have been better applied to the universities. I have a number of questions that relate to that. Why would a foundation be necessary when we have two universities that in so many areas are pushing the envelope of knowledge in all areas of research and are grossly underfunded and have been grossly underfunded for a number of years in the undergrad area as well as the graduate area? This financing would speak to fundamentally the graduate area, I would think, but with a graduate area that has a substantial expenditure of public funds in the acquisition of that fundamental knowledge, what it does do, speaking to the questions raised by the Member for Red Deer-South, is it inspires those minds. It inspires those minds when you have that kind of research going on close at hand and you're a young university student that has arrived at a place where the world opens up. All of a sudden you find that there are some areas of science that are just blossoming right before your eyes, right there where the knowledge of three or four people in a particular area of science are world renowned.

All through my career and up to the mid-70s and right into the '80s that was occurring in both our major universities to a great extent. Then we had the '92 plunge. We collectively – I was part of that too – packed off a great deal of those that had pushed out the envelope of human knowledge. Yes, you don't see an immediate action and reaction from any of that knowledge, but a great deal of the development and assembling of that knowledge in an order that can be functionally used comes from that.

Now, you'll note that one of the first and best computer science labs in all of Canada and all of northwest United States – I believe California was leading the charge at the time. In Canada this university here, a mile and a half from where we stand, had in the '60s, in '63-64, a fabulous school. It grew, and it turned out some very, very good scientists that have gone all over the world. In fact, today we have right in this city a development of software that is being marketed the world over. I can think of two pieces of software right now that are delivering service to the world in the way of software development. That comes from expenditure – when? – not last week, not last year, but it's a sustained application of a principle that says that a government is responsible for developing that fundamental of science because business simply is unable to do it.

They cannot sustain it. They'd love to. They would love to be able to sustain a push in an area for 20 years, to have it to fruition, but a board of directors simply is not going to put up with that, nor should they be expected to put up with that. Pushing out that envelope in engineering requires studying a finite element. Now, how can you study the finite elements in the telecommunication industry, say, of pushing that envelope of fibre optics, the capacity of fibre optics? No firm can manage that. Bell Canada cannot manage it. It manages a great deal but cannot manage it all. In fact, it takes an AT&T, Bell Canada, Bell international to fund some of that research in one or two centres in the world.

Now, if you have that breadth of knowledge, as we did have in this centre in Edmonton, then this university would have received a great deal of those funds. As it was, in that particular area we did not. This particular university as well as the University of Calgary receives a good deal of funds from the oil business and rightly so, because they're pushing the envelope in the areas of downhole drilling, directional drilling, and directional recovery. All of that has just blossomed, because we have the experimental areas and deep-hole drilling here in the province of Alberta, and we discovered that. There were, in large measure, some exceptionally good science and research people at both universities. In fact there are areas of marketing and agricultural marketing and those related areas in Lethbridge that are just ablossom.

This government seemed to be in the game a little late but strongly in the game with this bill, putting up half a billion dollars, soon, I hear, could be adding more. An endowment fund to turn off, say, 10 percent of $50 million a year, is a very, very good fund. The application of that fund leads to a number of questions, fundamental questions, and a policy statement. In what areas of science and technology, if you will, and applied engineering does this government see the potential expansion? You can't just sort of throw the money out and say: well, we're going to throw it out there and decide that we're going to be all things to all people. It has to be targeted, and it's very, very fine targeting to target those areas that (a) we have some strength in currently, because you can't build on nothing, and (b) that there's going to be a long-term need.

I've heard this province talk about the smart society. I've heard so many eloquent speeches from politicians and academics alike on all of the these areas, but I have yet to see an itemized list that says these are the areas that precisely we should be spending substantial dollars on. Now, it may be early for that discussion with the bill at its current stage, but it is very, very late in the discussion as it relates to all the universities and the furtherance of knowledge-based industry in this province.

I have to wonder: what is AOSTRA's or any of the current government/industry-supported agencies' relationship to this fund? ARC: how does the Research Council relate to it? As I understood it, the Research Council at one time was supposed to be pushing the envelope. But in recent years, as I understand it, they have been more on the application side, the side to take some science that comes out of the university or comes out of the industry to commercialize, as it were, that science. Well, that is a very, very narrow area, and it is an area that is easily supported – no, not easily. It is much easier to support from a business perspective than the fundamental research. I would like to know what areas this application of perhaps in the order of $50 million a year will go to.

I would like to know why we would set up an International Board of Review before knowing what areas one would be targeting specifically, because, quite frankly, the peer review is standard practice in a publication from any noted university. This act would appear to reinvent the wheel, as it were, or develop another similar wheel to do the same thing as all universities do as a matter of course. I have little difficulty understanding why it's needed under this plan, but I'm at a loss to understand why this Legislature wouldn't say that we need and have to direct the universities through the Department of Learning – it's called now – and advanced education to fund universities globally. It seems to me that this ministry wishes to have a micromanagement control on how the moneys are spent in these areas.

Well, politicians come and go. Policies come and go. This member would assume that if you do believe in long-term, sustained funding at a reasonable level in these areas, after you've chosen these areas, this is a long-term plan, and you can't move in and out at the whim of the government of the day. This member would much prefer that the magnitude of these moneys be spent and invested in a university as a whole with perhaps some assistance and some direction through appealing to the board of governors or the senate, as it were, of the university to apply these extra funds to these areas of expanding that envelope. Obviously this argument has not won out, if it was ever made in caucus. Quite frankly, it's disappointing. Looking around at the makeup of this House and the number of graduates that did come from the two universities in the province of Alberta, you would have thought that the arguments would have been made to have this funding be brought along as the budget allowed, following this government's principle.

MR. SMITH: Did you say two universities, Lance?

MR. WHITE: I'm sorry. The two universities that house engineering and science research. There are a number of other universities, of course, in other areas that are growing rapidly and are doing a fantastic job but not in the areas of the applied sciences and the expanding of that envelope that I spoke about earlier.

Madam Speaker, I'd again reaffirm this member's commitment and a compliment to the minister for bringing this forward at this time and wish him well in the application of this. If this member can be of some assistance in the establishment of the advisory council of which he speaks or the International Board of Review, not directly, of course, but certainly with some further assistance in that regard, this member would certainly not be adverse to adding that assistance anywhere it can be put, because this is a very, very important part of the expansion of this wonderful province where we live.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Gaming.

MR. SMITH: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It gives me great pleasure to rise to speak to Bill 1, the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Science and Engineering Research Act. I compliment the Member for Edmonton-Calder for his communication skills. I know as a trained engineer and practising professional that he's certainly one of the most eloquent engineers I've ever had the pleasure to hear from. I know he views his skills humbly and only his work in progress, but he continues to add interesting thoughts to the debate. Even though a point of order would bring him back to cause on this bill, it's a good job.

If I can speak briefly, Madam Speaker, to the bill, the principles and the buildup behind it. In 1993 the economy of Alberta was characterized at about $73 billion in gross domestic product. It had roughly 8.3 percent unemployment. Investment was declining. There was a concern that the overwhelming engine of government spending was going to further curtail growth in the private sector and that there needed to be a time when there was a much better and a more favourable balancing of both investment and, actually, the partnerships that exist between the private sector and government.

From that period, Madam Speaker, the private sector took the bit between their teeth. They were able to react, as the Member for Red Deer-South correctly has pointed out, through a consensus procedure and an ability to move into a growth mode to capitalize on the great strengths that are in this province and actually move the gross domestic product up to this year where it is forecast to be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $100 billion to $103 billion. That's enough additional economic activity, production of goods and services, to equal another Saskatchewan, to equal another Manitoba. In fact, we are three and a half to four times larger than the other two prairie provinces. At that time, of course, we have seen some really interesting examples of job creation, knowledge enhancement, and some liberal descriptions of how to stimulate the knowledge industry.

One that comes to mind that was in vogue earlier, Madam Speaker, was the scientific research and tax credit program. That basically led to a tremendous amount of money wasted in the system, in the private sector throughout Canada. In fact, it did more to turn lawyers and accountants into scientists and engineers as opposed to bright young minds and keen students.

Also, most recently we have seen the billion dollar boondoggle of the Human Resources Development department in Ottawa, that seems to be a direct reflection of some Liberal policy from the Alberta Liberals, where in fact they deal with over 70,000 accounts across Canada. Poor accounting, poor audit, direct job infusion. Basically, money wasted. It did nothing to promote the overall growth in the body of knowledge.

As we went through this, Madam Speaker, there was a tremendous interest in the government of Alberta to continue and to build on already strong spending in the science and research area but also to build the spending on an appropriate infrastructure and to put it into a place where in fact it had concrete and substantial results. If one were to view the first pass of the Tax Review Committee of two years ago and the standing policy committee of this government, we did also look at tax credits. We realized that in today's world, tax credits were not the way to go. In fact, there was a tremendous amount of work being done by an economist out of Stanford by the name of Paul Romer, who has flipped the theory of diminishing marginal returns over and said: now in today's value-creation world, once you spend a hundred million dollars on developing software, the next copy is 10 cents and the next copy after that is 9 cents. In fact, the principle is working absolutely in reverse of traditional industries.

We know how important the sector is just when we look at the activity of the stock markets over the last four months. The Dow-Jones, which is basically an amalgam of stocks in a broad economic array, has actually lost about 10 percent in value, Madam Speaker. If you look at the NASDAQ, the stock market where it is a reflection of Internet technology stocks, the very market where the principles of the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Science and Engineering Research Act applies, you can see that it has held its own. It's down, I think, 140 points today, but it still holds close to around 5,000.

What we've seen is a government's attention to a private-sector need. For example, Madam Speaker, you will see Nortel Networks, that generally employs probably in the neighbourhood of 75 to 80 percent of all electrical engineers graduating in this province, at one time 100 percent of all the electrical engineers at the masters level and 100 percent of all of the ones at the PhD level. So we needed that infrastructure. Being fortunate enough to represent the University of Calgary, we were at an opening of the communication and technology building. There was a tremendous amount of excitement around that university, not only for this bill, of course, but for a terrific move that was supported by the minister of technology and led by the former minister of what was known as advanced education doubling the amount of engineering and computer science grads out of that facility.

So there's a tremendous amount of interest, a tremendous amount of attention, and a tremendous amount of resources being deployed by this government, these active, thinking members of this government, toward that knowledge sector and the development of jobs, jobs that can take place in Rocky Mountain House or Lacombe or Stettler. In fact, in the area I'm responsible for, Madam Speaker, there are a number of technically trained individuals working right out of your constituency today, and we know that that process will continue and that they'll continue to add not only value but jobs and a level of disposable income to that community.

So, Madam Speaker, from that genesis emerged the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Science and Engineering Research Act. A farsighted minister who knew that he would rather have events last for a long time rather than himself and have the legacy speak rather than the re-election took a chance and went to caucus, went through a long process that engendered consensus amongst members of the academic faculty in Alberta, the chancellors of universities, Eric Newell of the University of Alberta and Ted Newell of the University of Calgary, the presidents, Howard Tennant, Terry White, Rod Fraser, of the university community, all great supporters of this bill.

I have a wonderful note from the president of the University of Calgary saying what an important legacy this is to the University of Calgary and more particularly to its students, whom it serves well. It serves in a process of education where we can put money forward to the infrastructure that has been constructed over the last number of years and where science and engineering research should actually take place, and, Madam Speaker, that's right in the universities.

So in fact this government is celebrating its infrastructure. It's celebrating its university infrastructure. It realizes the good work they have done to promote good, solid education and to promote an ability for Albertans to leap into the new economy proficiently, well trained, and with a great deal of expertise.

So it's certainly not hard to support this bill. It's certainly a clear recognition why this government values education, values growth in research and infrastructure, in fact can take a lot of research and knowledge from this and apply it directly to farms in the agriculture sector and to the petrochemical sector, the sectors that are not just in Calgary and Edmonton but are in fact located throughout rural Alberta, throughout Alberta in various places. I think it's a terrific, farsighted move that is not only going to be held as a legacy for the leader of this government but for each and every member in this government as they've participated in its development and emergence over the past two years.

I know that the minister will continue to do good work to ensure the success of this, to be able to shed some of the old-time thinking, some of the cloisters that exist in research and development inside government today. For example, I hear there is great action being planned for the Alberta Research Council. Being able to put it in a more private-sector setting, Madam Speaker, would allow it to capitalize on new innovations quickly and effectively and to be able to move into the forefront of the marketplace.

So, Madam Speaker, I really want to commend the people who put together this bill, who look at the importance of balancing a long-term program of research and science and engineering and directing it to the discovery of new knowledge. I think that's a great testimony to everybody, opposition, government members, all who have been involved in this bill, and knowing that members will want to be as prolific in their praise as I have been, in view of the hour, Madam Speaker, I would suggest that we adjourn debate for the balance of this afternoon.

THE CHAIRMAN: I'll call the subcommittee to order. First of all, I'd like to call upon the subcommittee to grant us leave to introduce guests. Agreeable?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIRMAN: Opposed?

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

MR. GIBBONS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'd like to introduce to you and through you to the Members of the Legislative Assembly Cubs from both Empire Park and Clareview 66. They're here tonight with leaders Mrs. Gail Idenouye and Mr. Chris Idenouye – Chris is the architect in charge of the new addition onto the University hospital; I've known both Chris and Gail for years – and Mr. Reg McIvor from Empire Park. They're in the public gallery, and with your permission I'd like them to stand and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you, hon. member. Before we call upon the Minister of Municipal Affairs, I would just like to explain to the people that are in the gallery that committee is the informal stage, and people can move around. We're even in a less formal part of that, which is a subcommittee. So three-quarters of the members are not here. There's subcommittee A and B and C and D. You've seen C and D, and D has just departed. So we're down to one-quarter of our strength, but we make up for that in quality.

With those words then I think we'll call upon the Minister of Municipal Affairs to begin this evening's deliberations on his estimates. Hon. minister.

MR. PASZKOWSKI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Certainly I'm pleased to present the budget and the three-year business plan for Alberta Municipal Affairs and to answer any questions from both sides of the House as they may come forward. If I'm not able to answer them today, we'll provide written submissions to answer all of those questions. I commit to that.

Before I begin, I'd like to introduce some of the staff from my department that are seated up in the members' gallery. They include my deputy minister, Dan Bader; Brad Pickering, assistant deputy minister in charge of local government services; Dennis Gartner, assistant deputy minister responsible for public safety and information management; Bryan Huygen, acting director of finance and administration; Joyce Ingram, executive director, business planning and corporate support; Brian Quickfall, executive director, municipal services; Ken Fenning, executive director, safety services; Marjorie Morris, director of communications; John Beke, manager, business planning; Mina Montroy, manager of legislative planning; Jim Leitch, executive assistant to the deputy; and Maria Pohl, administrative assistant, business planning, corporate support; and, of course, the world famous Dwight Dibben should be up there somewhere as well.

With that I want to thank staff for showing the interest and really providing guidance throughout the year. I think that under the circumstances the staff has provided excellent direction in working very closely with municipal officials and developing a strategy and working with municipalities that makes this province such a wonderful place to live. Each level of government provides different levels of service, and certainly working with the municipal level is very key. I've mentioned this to municipalities time and time again, that they're really the foundation of this province, and ultimately the strength of the province relies on the foundation.

As we begin the new century, our outlook really couldn't be brighter. The province is strong, it's resilient, and it's ready to take on the 21st century. Albertans have told us that they expect us to keep Alberta strong as well. Albertans want their government to ensure that our province has a strong agricultural sector, economic policies that keep good jobs in Alberta, an education system that ensures that our children can remain competitive, tax policies that respect taxpayers' hard-earned dollars, and a strong and vital health system. These are the components that will keep Alberta strong.

I've long been a believer that a strong province also is built from strong municipalities and communities. With strong and vibrant communities we can ensure that we are positioned to take on the challenges of this new century and to achieve this vision for the future of our province.

Alberta Municipal Affairs is entering a new millennium with a new and more integrated focus. This department is now responsible for local government services, disaster services, safety services, information and privacy, the fire commissioner's office, and the Municipal Government Board. Considering these areas of responsibility, we now have a department that truly reflects the municipal affairs in this province. All of the areas have strong linkages with the municipalities they serve. Equally important, they also have strong linkages with each other.

Our strategy for the next three years is to provide a more focused and co-ordinated approach to the delivery of municipally oriented programs. This new focus is important to the overall direction and goal setting of the ministry, but it's even more important to our clients, who will see a single organization working as a team to address the challenges faced by municipalities.

Mr. Chairman, this budget and business plan were not developed in isolation. To ensure that these documents reflected the views, issues, and challenges being faced by our municipalities, I went on a provincewide tour with our Agriculture, Food and Rural Development minister as well as the Community Development minister and an official from Alberta Infrastructure, visiting 12 regions. We heard presentations from elected officials representing almost half of the municipalities of this province. The tour provided a good understanding of current municipal concerns as we entered into the business planning and budgeting process. The documents before us today reflect the views that we had heard.

For 2000-2001 the operating expenditure estimates for the ministry total $141,900,000. This funding is distributed amongst four key areas: local government services, public safety and information management, the Municipal Government Board, and the ministry support areas.

For 2000-2001 our income statement identifies that our revenue is close to $14.2 million. Of this total, $12 million is funding that we'll receive from lottery revenues to support financial assistance provided under our Municipal 2000 sponsorship program. The remaining $2 million comes partially from the licences and fees associated with the issuance of safety certificates from our safety services area. A portion also comes from the cost-sharing arrangements with the federal government for some of our disaster preparation programs.

The local government services area is by far the largest component of our ministry's budget. From this program area we aim to provide support services, policies, and legislation that enhance the development of a sustainable, accountable, responsive, and effective local government sector. The operating budget for this area for 2000-2001 is $112.6 million, of which $96.7 million is budgeted for various programs.

The nongrant portion of the budget would allow the ministry to carry out a number of key initiatives next year. For instance, we will complete the capital regional governance review, an exciting initiative involving 22 municipalities to build upon the existing framework of regional co-operation. An interim report is expected by the end of this March.

We will continue to offer the highly successful intermunicipal dispute resolution initiative. This innovative program allows municipalities to resolve disputes at their local level. I'm very pleased to advise that 100 percent of the municipalities that have participated in the program to date have resolved their disputes.

We will continue with two MLA committees to ensure that we deliver a fair taxation system for Alberta. The education property tax MLA committee will continue to investigate issues and develop alternative tax structure options. The MLA farm property tax assessment review committee will continue to study the economic impact of changes being considered on how farm and property operations are assessed and taxed. We'll also look to improve the assessment audit, assessment equalization process, and the linear assessment process.

It's also in our business plan to ensure a co-ordinated provincial government approach towards municipalities. The review of the partnership between the province and the municipalities will help us in more clearly defining roles and responsibilities, thereby improving accountability, service quality, and efficiency.

Shifting the focus for a moment to the financial component of the municipal programs budget, I'd like to note that our budget for the Municipal 2000 sponsorship program will be $12 million for the year 2000-2001. This is up $2 million from the previous year. This program has proven to be very valuable for municipalities. Last year 286 out of 307 eligible municipalities received funding for projects aimed at intermunicipal co-operation and innovation.

Our estimates show that we have reduced the budget in two grant programs: the municipal debenture interest rebate program and the grants-in-place-of-taxes program. These reductions will not impact municipalities. The municipal debenture interest rebate program is an historical program that was introduced when interest rates were high to subsidize the interest on certain debenture borrowings from the Alberta Municipal Financing Corporation. As the interest component on debentures held by municipalities decreases over time or the debentures are paid by municipalities, the amount that we need to budget decreases.

With regard to the grants-in-lieu-of-taxes program we've adjusted our estimates downward to reflect the current needs of the program. Reasons for the reduction include a continuing reduction in the amount of property owned by the province and the fact that the switch to market value assessment in Alberta did not have as significant an impact on the program as originally thought. The $32 million that we budgeted for 2000-2001 is much closer to our recent experience, and no municipality will receive less than they were entitled to under this program.

The public safety and information management division, while new to the department, makes a significant contribution to the mission of Municipal Affairs. There are strong linkages with services offered by this area to the municipalities that we serve. Through this area we promote and apply appropriate safety standards throughout the province. We manage provincial disaster planning and recovery programs and provide support to municipalities to ensure that they're prepared to deal with emergencies and, after disasters, to assist in the recovery, and we provide a legislative and policy framework and support to public bodies to enhance access to information and protection of privacy for Albertans.

The expenditure budget for 2000-2001 under this program is approximately $19.4 million. The increase in this budget for this area is primarily due to a new $10 million initiative identified in the estimates as petroleum storage tanks. The petroleum storage tank remediation program is a joint initiative with other government departments and the Petroleum Tank Management Association of Alberta. With a $10 million funding level identified for 2000-2001, we'll focus on completing site assessments to determine the most environmentally sensitive sites, and for high-risk sites we will initiate some of the highest priority remediations.

Another new budget item is a support area for the newly created public safety and information management division. As earlier noted, the division brings three areas together for the first time under one program. We'll continue to improve our assistance to municipalities to help ensure that safety codes are met. To help us meet this objective, we will improve our ability to communicate and cooperate through the better use of information technology, simplify the system so that it's more user friendly and provides greater value to communities, and continue to ensure that our safety codes and standards are appropriate and meet Albertans' expectations of quality.

The pressure vessel inspection backlog reduction program will continue in the 2000-2001 fiscal year. Through this program significant progress was made in improving boiler and pressure vessel safety as the program exceeded its targets to reduce the inspection backlog. The Auditor General has acknowledged the positive progress that we're making in this area in his annual report.

Mr. Chairman, we will continue to work to ensure that public bodies continue to protect the personal information of Albertans and provide appropriate access to information. We'll also conduct a review of the issue of privacy protection in Alberta's private sector.

This issue has been brought to the forefront by the emergence of the electronic commerce industry and one-window approach to service delivery. Privacy concerns have recently been highlighted by the efforts of the European Union to force its trading partners to legislate privacy protection in the private sector. The federal government has responded with the introduction of Bill C-6, with which we have some specific concerns. Alberta's new review will include a thorough consultation process to ensure that Alberta businesses and consumers have every opportunity to express their views on private-sector privacy protection.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, through this division's area we will continue to provide assistance to local fire departments through the fire commissioner's office. This will be done through fire prevention and education initiatives.

In addition to our two major program areas, we'll also rely on the services of our ministry support services area to keep the ministry running smoothly. It's worth while to note that the majority of our support areas, such as human resources, legal services, information technology, and finance and administration, as well as some communication and corporate support functions, have provided services to Alberta Government Services on a shared services basis since last May. The nature of our sharing will change as the Alberta Corporate Service Centre assumes responsibility for the delivery of a number of common services that all ministries in the government of Alberta use, but the underlying concepts of doing things more efficiently will continue. The ministry's support services area is showing an overall budget increase of approximately $367,000 compared to last year. This increase is due to changes that have taken place in the ministry since the government reorganization this past May.

I look forward to working with our partners and my staff to carry out the exciting initiatives outlined in the ministry's plan. In the end, I know that we'll continue to provide good service to Albertans and find new ways to keep moving the standard of good service to a higher level, to a higher benchmark.

Mr. Chairman, I'll welcome any questions from my colleagues, and indeed we'll provide as many answers as we have time for. If we're not able to provide those in oral form, we'll provide them in written form. Thank you.

THE CHAIRMAN: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

MR. GIBBONS: I'd like to welcome and thank the department heads that were introduced, and different than last year, I won't ask 286 questions. From a lot of the information we went over the last week or so – and some of it's still on the agenda; some of it isn't – it's interesting how the ministry has changed over the last year. I do believe that there has been some good in the change, and I hope we see results from that.

I'm going to start with an area that has been in contention for the last while, and that's the education property tax. We're looking at a committee that was set up a year ago, probably a year on the 26th of March, I believe it is, and we are reading and seeing that what's coming out of that is that they're just going to do public consultation this year. I did point out a number of times last year that we've been tinkering, tinkering with the actual education tax when the market value that has been coming in has been a point of contention throughout the province. There has been a point of tinkering in areas where market value and the way the assessment actually is going – because the Bow corridor, anywhere from Brooks right through to Banff, Grande Prairie, and Fort McMurray are really booming.

I do realize and try to emphasize to the city councillors, people in our city, the city of Edmonton, that within two years we'll be moving along with our economy quite well, and there might be things that we have to do then. The fact is that they're pointing out in different letters that have been sent to you, Mr. Minister, the dollars and cents that actually have been saved in different areas. I'm looking at a letter you sent to myself on January 27 of this year. You're illustrating in here information with $162,707,805 for the 5 percent capping. Then I look at a letter that was sent from yourself to the mayor of Edmonton on February 29, and looking at some figures, it's $167,466,317. So there is a difference in one month of how figures have been passed back and forth. What structured alternatives to the current provincial education property tax system is the MLA education tax committee examining rather than just capping increases in the residential and nonresidential equalized assessment? That is one of my first questions, Mr. Minister.

What other jurisdictions in the United States have been examined by the MLA education tax committee as a model for funding public education in Alberta in the future? Will the MLA committee on education property taxes be examining the following alternatives to education property taxes outlined in the 1998 education tax review committee report, one being the trade-off between the provincial funding and education tax on residential property – for example, municipalities might be willing to take responsibility for building new schools – two, based on the education tax per capita or per student amount. The third one is to phase out the education property tax over a 25-year period and tie it into the debt interest savings achieved from paying down the provincial accumulated debt. This is a case of arguing one way or the other. In our past policies in 1997 we were pushing for 80-20, 80 percent out of the general revenue, but it is still a circulated item that actually should be looked at.

My fourth question, Mr. Minister, is circuit breaker tax. The fifth is to use live assessment rather than equalized assessment for requisition purposes. Sixth, trade off a portion of the residential education tax by eliminating provincial grants for other programs. The seventh is a trade-off between the provincial funding for school construction and a portion of the residential education tax.

How does the minister respond to the city of Edmonton, which estimates its residents will pay nearly $8 million more in education property tax in 2000 despite the 5 percent cap on the residential equalized assessment announced by the government last fall?

We also are looking at how we had 10 percent on nonresidential moved down to 5 percent. Is that some of the political push that's coming out of Calgary for reducing property tax altogether? I know that in the last week or so – March 11 was the latest article on the city of Edmonton: "No break for city on education tax." It's a hard one to explain, but we look throughout the province and it's interesting that the chairman of the education tax review committee, who actually hasn't even consulted publicwise at a town hall within her own constituency, has actually brought down every major municipality – that's cities and towns within her constituency – by 22 to 24 and in some cases 33 percent from what it was. It would have been normal if it would have gone through with the market value and the assessment on education tax reform.

The city of Edmonton's complaint is that when compared to the municipality of Rocky View, being minus 28 percent, Edmonton is minus 9 percent. That's actually why the complaint is coming out of Edmonton. I know I have had a few letters from a few councillors in Edmonton, and that's a major factor.

Around the education property tax I've been saying and have hinted in my questions in the House that maybe we should be doing nothing more than freezing it now and trying to work something out. What I mean by that is freeze the current unfairness in the amount of education property tax paid by Albertans across the province. When the province is doing as well as it is, I would almost think we'd be moving along on this one a little bit faster to explain to Albertans where we're going from here. It's really overdue. It's been a year now, and we're just now reading within the business plan and reading in your letter to the mayor that you're going to start doing consultation this year.

The next one that's probably contentious in and around the municipal department is capital region governance. What have been the total costs incurred by Municipal Affairs up to this point in time for the capital region governance review? What are the total anticipated costs of the capital region governance review once it has been completed this fall? Has the minister examined any of the recommendations contained within the reports prepared by special advisers appointed by Ontario municipal affairs – that's around the Haldimand-Norfolk area, Hamilton-Wentworth, Ottawa-Carleton, and Sudbury – as models for more effective regional co-operation here in the capital region? Will the minister make a firm commitment today that the Alberta capital region governance will not be used as an instrument to force amalgamation of communities surrounding the city of Edmonton?

It was interesting what I was trying to pull off the Net, Mr. Minister. Can the minister indicate whether he actually went forward with his mission to examine regional governance in Toronto, New York, Chicago, Minneapolis, and San Diego between January 26 and February 8? If so, is there a report on that? If you didn't go, why not? If you did, was the mission worth it? I do know that when it did come across, the media called me. I was actually just reading everything I could off the Net at that particular date, so instead of being negative, I did say that I was saving Albertans money by pulling it off the Net myself.

We do look at a few areas of the ministry that were removed this past year. I really believe that the ministry in its entirety has been a very large ministry for the last few years. I don't think a lot of people realize how important Municipal Affairs is to our province. You are the lifeline of the municipalities. You should be the sounding block. You should also be the guiding factor for helping people through their expenditures, their budgets, their whatever. I often say that maybe this department could almost be the major planner and help build a plan for throughout this province of how to help a particular municipality.

With the downloading that's actually been created over the last few years, not only from the federal government down to you but from yourselves down to the municipalities, I find it hard to believe that many MLAs, whether they're ministers or backbenchers, have actually come from the rural, local, town, and city municipalities and still let the downloading go on. I often wonder whether or not most people in here actually came from the have times of the '80s. They just look and think what the bank accounts were back then and not realize that the municipalities – there's the odd one that is lucrative, but in general they are trying their best.

We have the secondary roads this past year. A few years ago the province decided they didn't want that particular part of it, so they downloaded it, and now they're taking it back. I hope that the municipalities are going to be able to do some bidding on that type of work so they won't have to sell their equipment off to whoever will take it.

Now, Mr. Minister, concerning the Ministry of Municipal Affairs 2000-2001 gross operating expenses and capital investment of $142,890,000, that's an increase of $2,114,000 from the 1999-2000 comparable forecast of $140,776,000 and $10,764,000 from the 1999-2000 budget, which is an 8.14 increase from 1999-2000. The number of full-time equivalents is expected to increase from 342 to 367. As I go through and mention things tonight, for full-time equivalents I'll be saying FTEs, just for the record.

There's no information provided in the estimates or the business plan of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs regarding plans for capital investment or the change in the numbers of FTEs for 2001-2002 and 2002-2003, and I wonder if I can get an answer on that one. Will the minister provide information on any plans for capital investment by the Ministry of Municipal Affairs for 2001-2002 and 2002-2003? On capital investment I really believe that the study done by the Member for Calgary-North West is a very good study and a direction that I hope the province follows regarding some of these guidelines that are actually put in there.

Will the minister provide information on FTE levels in the ministry for 2001-2002 and 2002-2003? What initiatives will be undertaken by municipal resource services between 2000-2001, 2001-2002, and 2002-2003 to develop a corporate human resource strategy as it pertains to corporate learning, leadership development, recruitment, and community planning?

Will the minister provide an update on the award of excellence program for 1999-2000?

Going to the ministry, will the minister provide a breakdown of the ministry's gross operating expenses of $141,935,000 for 2000-2001 by subject for the following components: salaries for permanent positions, salaries for nonpermanent positions, salaries for contract employees, travel expenses, advertising, telephone and communication, hosting expenses.

Under program 1, ministry support services, how many FTEs are employed in 2000-2001? What is the breakdown of the three programs: the minister's office, the deputy minister's office, and support services? Can the minister explain why the total program gross expenses are expected to rise to $8,211,000 from a gross budget amount of $7,839,000 in 1999-2000? Mr. Minister, what is the breakdown of the $270,000 for the minister's office budget for 2000-2001 by the following components: salaries for permanent positions, salaries for nonpermanent positions, salaries for contract employees, travel expenses, advertising, telephone and communication, and hosting expenses?

Will the minister explain the $5,000 increase in the budget for the deputy minister's office for this upcoming 2000-2001 budget? There again, what is the breakdown of the $302,000 budget for the deputy minister's office in the same year, 2000-2001, for the salaries for permanent positions, for nonpermanent positions, salaries for contract employees, travel, advertising, telephone and communication, and hosting expenses?

Support services. Will the minister provide details of why the gross forecast for capital investment is $876,000, or 800 percent, over the gross comparable budget for 1999-2000? Will the minister provide a breakdown of the $7,514,000 in the operating expenses for support services in 2000-2001 by the following components: finance and administration, communications, corporate services, human resource services, internal audit and program evaluation, legal services?

Program 2, municipal programs. How many FTEs are employed under program 2, municipal programs, 2000-2001? What is the breakdown of the four subprograms: division support, municipal services, assessment services, and financial assistance programs? Where does the minister see a need for the relationship between the municipalities and the ministry to be clarified and redefined? How does the minister plan to clarify and redefine these roles?

Vote 2.1.1, division support. We're looking at a few questions here. We see an increase over the forecast and over the comparable budgets of the last couple of years. Will the minister explain why the operating expenses for division support are expected to rise from the '99-2000 budget amount of $2,975,000 to $3,113,000 in 2000-01? Will the minister provide details as to why the capital investment budget in division support for '99-2000 was $150,000 and the forecast for this fiscal period is 260 percent over the $401,000? What did the department invest in? Why is the capital investment budget for 2000-2001 receiving over a 500 percent increase from the $150,000 in 1999-2000 to $830,000 for the upcoming fiscal year?

Jumping to 2.2.1, municipal services. In this case we're seeing an increase over the budget. Why is the municipal services program receiving an 18 percent, or $1,057,000, increase in the budget this year? What new services are being offered for this money? How will this improve the services to the municipalities? Who will benefit from the increase?

Assessment services. Will the minister explain why the dedicated revenue for assessment services is expected to rise from $1,285,000 to $1,475,000? Also, why are the net expenses expected to rise by $92,000, from $4,344,000 to $4,436,000 in 2000-2001? The percentage of municipal assessment rolls which meet provincial standards for procedures, uniformity, and equity has gone up over the last few years from 66 percent to 93 percent with a target of 95. Will the minister provide . . . [Mr. Gibbons' speaking time expired] Okay. I'm out of time.

THE CHAIRMAN: Hon. minister, would you like to answer some of the questions now, before we have the next question?

MR. PASZKOWSKI: Yeah, I'll try. I'm sorry; I wasn't able to keep up, so I'm not going to answer all your questions. I did try, but you were pretty fast with those questions, my friend. Nevertheless, your questions were good questions, and I appreciate those. Certainly between oral and written form we'll try and respond to any and all that we possibly can.

Your question regarding education property taxes. You know, that's one that is under review. It is a challenge, because virtually every jurisdiction in Canada at the present time uses property tax for their education funding, as does almost every part of North America. Obviously, if there is another way – there is a cost to education, and there's a process that we have to understand and recognize. Alberta has made education their number one priority, and we're quite prepared to meet that commitment, but there is a cost to doing that. To date the property tax assessment has been a part of the overall funding, and I should share that in 1995 property tax was 50 percent of the cost of education. Today it's somewhere in the area of 38 percent of the education budget. So there is a recognition of the importance of working with the property tax people. More and more of the education costing is being shared by the provincial Treasury and general revenue.

You asked some questions as to what the MLA tax review committee are reviewing. It's chaired by the hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane, and the hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore and the hon. Member for Calgary-North West are on the committee. They're looking at every possible avenue. They've looked at every possible area. As a matter of fact, they've already shared the information that if we were to put in a sales tax, it would be somewhere in the area of 4 percent. They've looked at the area of income tax, and it would almost mean doubling, a 38 percent increase in income tax, if indeed that were to absorb what property taxes are paying for now, in order to take it right off the property tax venue. So they are looking at all possible areas. There are trade-offs, and as we go through the process, of course, we'll have to weigh and assess the pros and cons.

The whole key in all of this process, at least from our perspective, is to find the fairest possible way, and I think Albertans have pretty well recognized that that's so critical and important too. Education, in the minds of Albertans, is front and foremost, and they've made it very, very clear that they want the best education system that money can buy. That's what we plan on delivering, and certainly through our minister of education I think we can be very, very proud of the results of our education system in this province. If not the best in Canada, we're right there at the very top, and I'm sure, if anything, we're actually improving our overall position.

The question of Edmonton tax. Yes, they'll be paying about an additional $7.7 million in taxes this year, but we also have to realize that last year they benefited from this very same process by well over $5 million. The years are variable, and you can't just pick one year and say as a result of that that they're being picked on, because indeed this process does have variability. Next year, if indeed the growth projections come about, if Edmonton does as well as the country seems to feel they will as far as growth, they may indeed become beneficiaries again. So it's hardly fair to base the whole assessment on one year. Indeed, as I pointed out, last year Edmonton was a big winner in this overall process to the tune of well over $5 million.

I think it's important to note that property taxes now generate about $2 for the education budget, and the GRF, or the Treasury, generates about $9, so indeed we are generating the majority of the revenue for our education system from general revenue, and that's increasing, as I pointed out: 38 percent from 50 percent just five years ago.

The cost of education is increasing, and obviously there has to be money found to be able to deal with that. Do nothing more than freezing? That's a suggestion, and I'm sure that's something the committee is looking at and considering and will be considering in the overall process of making that final decision.

As far as governance is concerned, there's a focus on the Edmonton governance review, but actually there is a review that's going to take place throughout the province. In our travels we did do the mission, and we did meet with people from Ontario as well as several American cities who did some creative things as far as delivery of regional services are concerned. Where we're going to be going and what we're going to be exploring more clearly will be the whole issue of regional services, the delivery of regionalized services more than the particular role of governance.

What we have to be aware of is that 20 to 25 years ago in every jurisdiction that we met with, they did what we're looking at now. They did regionalization of services 20 to 25 years ago. Ontario, for example, just now moved to dealing with governance. When we met with some of the other groups, they pointed out that really it's regional services that provide the efficiency, and that's really where you want to be going. Governance is very low as far as the economics are concerned, so that's something that we have to take into consideration. Really the key, though, is to be able to provide regional services.

I think the group that really brought that home to us was when we met with the site selectors, which are now the headhunters for industry. In North America the majority of industrial sites are now selected by site selectors who make recommendations. They explore various sites that may be attractive for that particular industry. They make a recommendation. The site selectors told us that really they don't look at a community; what they look at is a region. When you stop and think about it, it just makes sense that when you're setting up an industry, it draws from the entire region; it doesn't just draw from that one community. So why would you want to select on the basis of one particular municipality? And that's important.

So, ultimately, what we're going to have to do as far as attracting industry is see that the province delivers its best possible sell with the benefits that a region can provide. We're behind. We're behind the rest of North America, as a matter of fact. As I said, in Ontario they did this 20, 25 years ago. In the states they did it 20, 25 years ago. It was rather interesting because virtually everywhere we went they all did it at the same time. Somehow we've fallen behind in that particular area, so we're going to have to try and catch up so that indeed we can be on the map as far as site selectors are concerned, so that we can be competitive on the same benchmark or the same basis that the other communities are selling themselves on.

The mission was what I consider an overall success. As a matter of fact, it was a very good experience to basically plan the future, to hear from industry what it is that they are wanting as far as development is concerned, to talk to groups such as the site selectors, for example. We spent a very interesting part of the time meeting with Mayor Daly, who is the guru of North American regionalization, and he was very helpful in the direction that he provided and indicated that he's open for any ongoing discussions that may be required as well, and we will be taking him up on that.

We certainly agree that municipal experience is helpful, but we also agree that municipalities are doing their very best and certainly working very hard to make this a great province that we are in. As far as the growth of municipalities, how municipalities come together, what they really have to concentrate on is providing the most effective, cost-effective service that can possibly come forward, and they understand that. Certainly, as we work together, it is becoming increasingly more evident that that's our future as far as being globally competitive.

As far as FTE mediation, it's difficult to measure some of the FTE categories because of the government reorg. So we've got some different configurations as far as FTEs are concerned, but certainly we'll be providing those where it's possible in the certain areas that are consistent. With government reorg there's been quite a change in this particular department.

As far as capital investment is concerned, those are questions that will have to go to Infrastructure because they're really the ones that are involved in major capital development.

The breakdown of the ministry and the deputy minister, I don't have that information with me tonight to give you an accurate assessment of that breakdown. Certainly we'll have to work on that particular element.

As far as 1.0.2 is concerned, that's the area of salaries and benefits, the deputy minister. The $5,000 increase is due to increased compensation for provincial government employees.

As far as 2.1.1 is concerned, divisional support, the increase in the 2000-2001 budget is to accommodate the additional staff member to work on the web site and the Internet development, to accommodate a salary increase for public-sector employees, and to cover increased amortization costs that'll occur owing to capital projects that are being undertaken by the division. So that is where that particular area is concerned.

As well, the 2000-2001 capital investment budget is increasing to accommodate systems projects. Projects that are under consideration include the database centralized initiative, the municipal excellence and the web strategy, and the rewrite of the grants management system. The division forecasts spending additional capital investment funding in the '99-2000 fiscal year to begin work on the database centralized initiative and to work on web-enabling strategies to link divisional databases and build an Extranet interface to allow for secured data exchanges.

Program 2.2.1. The budget shows an increase owing to the addition of seven FTEs and the move forward on a municipal excellence initiative, which will develop a comprehensive management framework designed to help municipalities increase their capacities to improve performance, to address increased workloads and the demand for advisory services from municipalities and the public – that's 1.5 FTEs. Dealing with the roles and responsibilities framework project and the climate change initiative and the aboriginal initiatives is another 1.5 FTEs. Handling the increased volumes of preparatory work in the administration and processing of grants in place of taxes owing to the addition of grazing lease lands as eligible properties to receive grants in place of taxes is an additional FTE, and hiring an individual to provide administrative support is an additional FTE.

Funding has also been added to cover the increase in salaries of public service staff, to obtain additional consulting services to assist with the municipal excellence project, to undertake a project to research data relating to municipal governance and administrative practices, and to cover increased printing costs that occur for the production of pamphlets, brochures, and other material related to the Municipal Administrators Handbook and the Alberta capital regional governance review, as well as other initiatives.

Program 2.3.1 is assessment services. In that one, the 2000-2001 budget shows an increase owing to the additional four FTEs. They are there to address the concerns raised by the Equalized Assessment Review Panel with respect to the frequency of municipal assessment audits. That's three FTEs there. Increased staff on assessment standards are to qualify and regulate rates for linear properties – they're not currently regulated – as recommended by the linear process audit conducted in '99, and that's one FTE.

In addition to the above, additional funding has been provided to cover pay increases to be received by Alberta government employees, accommodate the attendance for assessment staff at the International Association of Assessing Officers, and to obtain consulting assistance to develop customized client target help plans, and to work with the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board to replace industry's self-reporting system and implement an assessment internship in the summer student program. As you know, there's been a change in the linear assessment process, and the self-reporting process is now going through a more comprehensive auditing system. That, of course, really is making it more effective, and ultimately the municipalities were concerned that indeed there seemed to be some discrepancy between what they felt was the actual lineage or footage of pipelines that were out there and what actually was.

With that, I'll sit down.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

MR. WICKMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I do want to make some comments on Municipal Affairs. Let me say, first of all, that the budget process does get a bit more frustrating each year. We're pretty well halfway through our time on a $143 million budget, and we've had one speaker.

Mr. Chairman, Municipal Affairs, it's . . .

MR. PASZKOWSKI: Percy, do you not want me to answer the questions?

MR. WICKMAN: No, no. It's not that at all, that you shouldn't be answering. I'm just saying that to give us a total of two hours to deal with this type of budget isn't sufficient. Understand that I'm not blaming you; I'm blaming the process. We appreciate the questions being answered, and those that can't be answered here, we appreciate getting the response in writing.

MR. PASZKOWSKI: So would you rather have it in writing? What I'm after is clarification.

MR. WICKMAN: Mr. Chairman, if the minister keeps it up, I won't even have 20 minutes.

THE CHAIRMAN: There are two ways that we can do this, hon. members, and it's up to the subcommittee. In some sections of the subcommittee the member asks to have the minister respond, so you get question and response, question and response, question and response, or you can do it by straight speech or listing of questions, such as we've already had demonstrated. It really is up to the hon. members, so if Edmonton-Rutherford wishes to do it that way, that's fine. If you wish to just get your questions out and then let the minister endeavour to answer them, that's fine. That's up to you.

MR. WICKMAN: I think the preference, Mr. Chairman, would be to have those questions answered that can be answered orally in response, such as he did with the Member for Edmonton-Manning, and those that can't be answered because the information may not be at hand, we would receive in writing a few days later. That's normally the process that has been followed, and that's a good process. I'm just saying that two hours is not sufficient time.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay. Thank you for that clarification. With that, Mr. Minister, we'll let the gentleman continue.
Edmonton-Rutherford.

MR. WICKMAN: Let me continue, if I could. When we talk about government – and we have for some reason wrongfully referred to the provincial government and the federal government as the senior levels of government, implying that the municipality or the municipal governments are a junior form of government, and they're not. They're equal. In fact, in a lot of instances I would argue that the municipally elected representatives perform a more appreciated function to the electorate in that they're dealing with day-to-day issues.

Myself having spent nine years as a councillor, 11 years here as an MLA, I had much more contact with the people that elected me. I dealt with various problems, dealing with snow removal, dealing with garbage pickup, dealing with stop signs, things that may not seem that significant in the big picture, but to that individual they were very, very important. So when people are asked about what level of government they feel the closest to, it's the municipal government. Mr. Chairman, it's very, very rare for me now as a provincial politician to even get phone calls in the evening at home. When I was a councillor, I would get them at 2 o'clock in the morning. People do not hesitate to call their municipal politician, because they identify with them much more.

So we should, first of all, recognize that all levels of government are equal and that there's no such thing as a senior level of government. The provincial government is not a big brother to the municipalities. It shouldn't be viewed that way.

There are many members in this House who have had the experience, including the Premier of the province, of participating in municipal politics, and I've been asked on many occasions which I prefer. Quite frankly, I've always preferred municipal politics over provincial politics for a number of reasons. However, after nine years I felt it was my time to sort of move on. Now, possibly if I would have had the opportunity during my three terms here to be part of a government, I may view provincial politics a bit differently than I do, and had I made the decision to run another term, which of course I've indicated I'm not, then I could look forward to being part of a new Liberal government, which the other members here will in all likelihood be part of. That's an experience I'll miss out on, because I've chosen not to go beyond 12 years.

[Mr. Fischer in the chair]

Now, when we talk in terms of a partnership between the municipalities and the provincial government, this goes back, way, way, way back. We talked about partnerships. We talked about some form of revenue sharing. I can recall attending my first Alberta Urban Municipalities Association convention held in Calgary, and it was long enough ago that Grant Notley, who was the New Democrat member in the House here at the time, was one of the observers at that particular convention. So you can imagine how many years I'm going back. I proposed a motion then, and I was quite surprised that it was endorsed by the vast majority of the delegates at that conference. The motion that I managed to have passed was that we urge the provincial government to allocate a specific percentage of revenues from the resources to the municipalities unconditionally so that the province wouldn't be acting like Big Brother and saying: you've got to spend so much on police, you've got to spend so much on libraries, and you've got to spend so much on roadways and such.

That partnership and that respect for the independence of municipalities and the recognition that they are elected to do a job, just as provincial representatives and federal representatives are, are very, very, important. Now, there are instances where the municipalities have to go beyond the normal funding they receive from the provincial government, whether it be conditional or nonconditional. I'm talking in terms of those types of projects that a municipality can't possibly be expected to afford out of their own budgets or to tax local taxpayers for to that extent; for example, the very, very severe, difficult problems that Calgary is facing now because of the massive growth, the unanticipated growth a number of years ago. That has now suddenly skyrocketed, creating all types of unique problems for Calgary that other municipalities don't share, so that's a special consideration.

When we talk in terms of projects like the light rail transit running to the Heritage Mall, when we talk in terms of the ring road system, the municipalities on their own cannot be expected to fund those types of projects. That's why it's so important to have this partnership so that the municipal government can sit down with the Minister of Municipal Affairs and other members of the cabinet to work out sufficient funding for these particular types of special projects. I know that there is funding going on at the present time. Don't get me wrong; it's not like I'm not aware of that.

I've often heard in this House the criticism by the Treasurer, the criticism by the Premier towards the federal government when we talk in terms of the downloading and how they've reduced the transfer payments to the provinces. We hear quite often the Premier demanding more money for the provincial government or the restoring of some of those dollars from the federal government to the provincial government in areas like health care and such. Now, the very, very same thing of course has happened to the municipalities in terms of downloading by the provincial government. We've seen significant cuts in municipal grants in areas like preventive social services, policing, libraries, and the list goes on and on and on.

The municipal government doesn't have anyone they can download onto other than the taxpayer. Even this year we see the Edmonton council and I believe the Calgary council being forced to raise municipal property taxes, sitting back envying the other two levels of government, not counting the school boards of course, the other two levels of government that have been in a position to advocate tax cuts, to pay down deficits and pay down debt. Citizens at times will ask: why do municipal governments always have to raise taxes when other governments aren't doing it? Well, the reason why, Mr. Chairman, is because they have nobody that they can download to. They've got to go to the taxpayers. They can't even deficit budget, because the Municipal Government Act does not allow a municipality to operate at a deficit. They have to operate on a balanced budget, many times on a surplus.

Now, municipalities have managed because they've been forced to manage. The late former leader of the Liberal caucus, for example, when he was mayor of Edmonton put into place many, many fiscal policies with the city of Edmonton that allowed the city to sort of keep its books in order and to manage its finances, I thought, at that particular time a lot better than the city of Calgary was doing. That's no knock to the Member for Calgary-Buffalo, but that was a fact of life. Calgary was just going ahead and spending, spending, spending on the LRT, counting on the provincial government to bail them out, and it didn't happen.

There was one time when I was on city council that the province was rolling in so much money, they gave the municipalities a billion dollars. What happened? Some of the municipalities just went right back into debt. They said, "Well, we can count on the provincial government to drop another billion dollars sometime down the road," but that never happened. Edmonton was wise enough, under the leadership of that former member, to not get itself caught up in that situation.

I look at some of the other areas that the minister is responsible for in his ministry. He has lost housing. I always thought that housing was a very, very key component of the municipal ministry. Of course, that's been transferred over to Community Development, if I recall correctly. The registries still fall under Municipal Affairs. [interjection] I'm sorry; the registries have also been transferred out. They also have been transferred out.

Now, one of the things that the minister is responsible for, though, is the building code. In the building code, which relates of course to the municipalities, one of the things that is being addressed right now – and I tabled an article in the House earlier on dealing with the solution to the handicapped parking problem. Of course, the handicapped parking specifications are part of the Alberta building code, and that's why I raise this point. I would hope that the Minister of Municipal Affairs, along with the Associate Minister of Health and Wellness and the Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan, can find a solution to the handicapped parking dilemma that has occurred.

It's time to have the building code revamped, to change a system that worked at one time, but since we privatized registrations, for some reason we now have three and a half times as many placards being handed out as before. Sometimes I'm of the opinion that one with an ingrown toenail can go to a doctor, get a form signed, and get themselves a handicapped placard. Maybe it's not that bad, but when I drive around looking for a parking space, at times it seems that way.

Now, one of the areas, too, that I see when I look in the budget is the reference to the lottery dollars. When we talk in terms of references to lottery dollars, it seems to pop up now in every department. There is a greater and greater dependency of departments to bank on that gambling money, which is not really a stable basis of funding. It's not something that one can count on year after year, because we don't know just how Albertans are going to gamble next year or the year after, though the pattern so far has been a continuous increase. Even when I look at the infrastructure, why is such a great deal of infrastructure being funded with lottery dollars?

The other area that we see lottery dollars used for is the community lottery boards. The city of Edmonton, I believe, gets something like $11 million, $12 million a year right now, and then those dollars are disbursed to in some cases nonprofit groups, in other cases, possibly in too many cases, to city departments that would normally be funded by the local tax dollar. I'd like the minister to talk a bit about those community lottery boards.

I'd like to have the minister also address the question as to why such a dependency on lottery dollars for infrastructure, which is such a basic program that Albertans expect out of their tax dollars. Also, when we talk in terms of infrastructure and the federal government, I can't recall – possibly somebody can sort of nod. When the federal Treasurer brought down this last budget, what were the references in there? Was there a commitment made in there to a trigovernment proposal for infrastructure, a $5 billion expenditure? I don't recall if the federal Treasurer actually spelled that out in the budget he just announced some short time ago.

Now, Mr. Chairman, freedom of information falls under the ministry. I'm not going to really get into that, because I know that the Member for *Calgary-*Buffalo is much more knowledgeable in that particular area than I am, so I'll leave that for him. He is quite anxious to speak on it. I don't want to keep my comments going too long, because there are others here, of course, that want to speak as well. They'd like to speak and then go upstairs to participate in the other committee. The budget process does present some problems.

I've talked in terms of generalities, and I would hope that the minister could respond to some degree on the views that I have made. There is one specific question that I do have, and possibly the Member for Edmonton-Manning has already asked it. If so, I don't intentionally mean to repeat a question. When I go through and I look at the various increases, the one that really strikes me, as far as I can see, is under municipal services, reference 2.2.1, where we see an increase in municipal services from $5,830,000 to $6,867,000, which is an increase of roughly 18 percent, or over a million dollars. That seems to be a very, very significant amount of dollars. Of course, if those dollars are going to the municipalities directly, that's one thing, but when we talk in terms of municipal services, I'm not sure if that implies that it's administrative costs that may be related to municipal services.

The very, very last question I would have, Mr. Chairman. The whole planning process in terms of the regional planning commissions that we used to have in place at one time – and we had the Alberta appeal board, where individual municipalities or individual applicants could appeal decisions made by the regional planning commissions to a higher body. I recall former councillor Ken Newman being part of that. My question is: how is the current system of planning under the new process working out? Are municipalities by and large happy with it, or are there problems?

I must say that I'd like to have the minister comment on his views of the Lou Hyndman report and on what he feels is the solution for areas like Edmonton, where you have a number of bedroom communities and the problems that some of the councillors have pointed out in terms of persons from outside of Edmonton utilizing a lot of the services here, on that regional co-operation and such. If the minister could make some comments as to what direction he intends to head that process in. Of course, he was not the minister when that whole thing was initially developed. It was the Member for Sherwood Park, the current Minister of Children's Services.

On that note I'm going to conclude, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Thank you. Now the minister gets a chance to give us some words of wisdom.

MR. PASZKOWSKI: I think the hon. Member for Edmonton-

Rutherford asked for a response, so I will provide that response. I'll try and be brief though. I'm sure the hon. member was a very, very capable municipal councillor.

There is no senior level of government. What we have is three levels of government that provide three different services. Each level of government is responsible for a completely different line of services, and at least from my perspective and from our department's perspective there is no one level of government that's better than the other. They all are critical, they're all important, and they all are the strength of this province and this country. At no time have I ever thought of it as a senior level or a junior level of government, because indeed the municipal level is every bit as important as the provincial level, every bit as important as the federal level. An improper municipal level would create failure at any other level as well.

These all play very critical roles. They all play a very important role in the delivery of services to the constituents in the region that they serve, and my hat goes off to municipal councillors, mayors. I was one for a period of four terms, and certainly I understand the local connection that you have.

To the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford: perhaps if you left your phone number, you'd get some calls at 2 o'clock in the morning even now. So if you want to share your phone number and if you really feel lonesome, we can probably get you some calls at 2 o'clock if you like.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford indicated that there may be a Liberal government sometime in the future and that he'd like to be a part of it. I assure the hon. member that he would be the first great-great-great-great-grandfather that ever sat in this Legislature if he were to be part of it.

The indication was that the municipal government doesn't have ways of generating revenue. Well, they do. They have property tax, so there is that opportunity for the municipal government to raise revenue.

Certainly from the province's perspective, the province tries to assist in things like roads, water, sewer, library, policing, social programming. Just to give an indicator of what the municipal government has indeed done this past year: $425 million in infrastructure funding to address municipal transportation needs, $90 million in health facilities and other health projects, $38 million in capital renewal of postsecondary institutions, $16 million for water/wastewater facilities, $10 million for reservoir projects, $7 million for construction and upgrading of government buildings in at least 19 communities across the province, $3 million for seniors' lodges, $11 million for environment and agriculture capital infrastructure needs, $232 million for disaster relief for farmers, $1.2 million for new grant initiatives for improved disaster and fire training, $2 million to assist rural municipalities to conduct road infrastructure studies. Those are all working together whereby the province is working with municipalities to build on what should be a better province and will be a better province.

Federal downloading. The new program that will be coming onstream. For the total length of the new infrastructure program, which is a six-year program, the federal government has indicated that they'll be providing roughly $200 million over this six-year period to Albertans. Assuming it's on a per capita funding basis, as we have 10 percent of the population, we assume that Alberta will be entitled to 10 percent of the overall funding. Whether that will be the basis, we don't know, because the details have not been worked out and, I understand, probably won't be finalized until the end of the year. But it's interesting. Alberta will be getting approximately $200 million back over six years, but with the revenue from fuel tax alone the federal government captures over $600 million for each year, over $600 million, and returns $200 million over six years. Somewhere something isn't exactly running true to form.

There was a question about cutting back on library funding. The last stats that I had – and they may not be totally accurate. In '89-90 library funding in Alberta was roughly 10 and a half million dollars. This year's budget is roughly $14.2 million. So libraries indeed aren't cut back. They've increased fairly significantly, as a matter of fact, as far as library funding is concerned in this province.

As far as operating off taxes, municipalities aren't the only ones that work off taxes. The provinces, the federal government: their basic revenue is generated through taxes. So all forms of government operate off taxes. That's their major source of revenue. It's not just the municipalities that work off taxes. The provincial government generates the majority of its revenue through taxation. So they're not unique. There's nothing different about municipalities, there's nothing different about the provinces, and there's nothing different about the federal government. That's the basic form of funding governments.

The building codes. It's very important that we accommodate those who have to deal with handicaps, those that are less fortunate. Certainly the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford has generated my sympathy in a situation where there are parking stalls and they're filled continuously. It must be very frustrating, and certainly you have my sympathy there. But it's doctors that allocate those tags. You know that. It's doctors that allocate those tags. Obviously it's a challenge to try and see that there is a significant amount of parking for those who are in need, but I do share your frustration and your concern.

Lottery dollars are used primarily in Municipal Affairs to fund the Municipal 2000 program. I think it's interesting to note that last year, as I pointed out, 286 out of 307 municipalities benefited from this particular program. They're asked to be creative, and this is a program that is extremely successful in dealing with processes that will allow them to interlink with various municipalities in dealing with new creative programming, in designing something innovative and creative. As was pointed out, 286 out of 307 is a pretty good statistic really.

Lottery boards basically distribute local funds. They're local people who are in charge of distributing to their local community. They're designed to basically have their own local people who can identify with the local needs, and I think that's probably as good a way as any. Rather than having someone from Edmonton distributing it to the entire province, it's far better to have that local participation and that local opportunity. Certainly it seems to be a very successful program and one that frankly I support, because it's the local people making local decisions to allocate the money locally. I don't know how one can be critical of that process.

The tripartite infrastructure program. Yes, the federal government has announced it. We don't know what the details are. It appears that it'll probably be December before there's too much in the works as far as details are concerned, but in the first year it's a $100 million program. In this process of this first year all of Canada will be receiving $100 million, all of Canada in that first year. You can probably build 100 miles of road with $100 million if you dedicate it all to roads, but we have to realize that this is dedicated to roads, to infrastructure, to the climate change discussions, to greening Canada, to water, sewer, to homeless, to a whole gamut. So $100 million to all of Canada when over $600 million is captured just from fuel tax alone from Alberta – that doesn't quite ring a true bell. Ultimately, sure, it'll be nice to have that program, but it's not a very significant number, really, when it comes down to it.

Program 2.2.1. The ministry has to increase the budget for the restructuring component from $5 million to $8 million to address regional co-operation or significant infrastructure issues with the restructuring of municipalities. So that's the reason for the increase in 2.2.1.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Thank you.

Hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, before you begin, I would ask that you proceed on the basis that you follow the hon. Member for Dunvegan's father's advice that you learn a lot more by listening than speaking.

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Chairman, thanks so much for your kind and generous introduction. I welcome Mr. Bader here, a former resident of Calgary-Buffalo, as I recall.

Mr. Chairman, I'd make the observation that I'm glad the FOIP unit has finally found a home. My sense is that Ms Sue Kessler and her intrepid band have been wandering around in the desert, and every time they think they've found a home and oasis – first, it was public works, supply and services, but, no, that department doesn't want them any longer. Then it was over to the department of labour, and they're there for a bit. Then we reshuffle the departments, and now they're over in Municipal Affairs. Hopefully that group has found a home that they're going to be able to occupy for a period of time.

I take the minister directly to page 250 of the business plan book. Under goal 3 we find the item Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy, and we've got two performance indicators. The first one is:

Timeliness of compliance to the access provisions . . . as measured by the percentage of FOIP requests completed by government public bodies within Legislative guidelines.

Mr. Minister, what is a legislative guideline? I know what a legislative requirement is. I have no idea what a guideline is.

If you look at section 10, that's not a guideline. It's a mandatory requirement that access requests be responded to within 30 days barring an extension under section 13 or a transfer to another public body under section 14. I find the wording curious. That's hardly a guideline.

It's clear, Mr. Minister, that the FOIP unit in your department is tracking requests through each one of the provincial public bodies. Understand that I'm not talking about the municipal level; I'm talking about provincial public bodies now. These are the people that have been under the act since it came into force on October 1, 1995. So would you tell us how many general information requests have come in to provincial public bodies by public body in the last fiscal year of this province. How many personal information requests have come in for provincial public bodies by individual public body?

How many times has section 28 been cited? Section 28 is one of the problematic parts of the existing FOIP act, because it's where the profit motives of the provincial government conflict with its fiduciary duty to share information with Albertans. I'm interested in knowing how many times section 28 has been cited as an exception to access requests.

I'd like to know how many times section 15 has been asserted by a provincial public body to deny information in whole or in part. How many times has section 23, being the advice from officials exception? Section 21: I'd like to know how many times it's been cited for any provincial body by public body in the last fiscal year. Section 21 is Treasury Board and cabinet confidences. Then let's go to section 26 and then to section 19, the personal information exception. How many times has that been cited, once again, by public body? Tell us, Mr. Minister, please, how many times section 31 has been used to disclose information. My recollection is that it's typically been used by police forces releasing information about people with significant sex offence records, but it would be good to have that information, once again identified by public body.

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

I might say, parenthetically, Mr. Minister, through the chair, that I ask these questions because the annual report that's been prepared by your information unit has been very, very unhelpful. By contrast, the annual report now in its revised form by the IPC, the Information and Privacy Commissioner, gives this member, other members, gives the public some sense of which departments are complying with the spirit of the act and the letter of the law as well as which departments are not. We can never tell with the annual report we get from your public information unit who the information misers are and who the information compliers are. I know that you would want to be able to share that information, and it's obvious from page 250 of the book that in fact you track that information.

I'd like to know how many times section 13 has been invoked to extend the time to comply with a request. That clearly is part of your performance indicator, but, with respect, the performance indicators you've mentioned are so low it reminds me of, you know, the stout kid in the gym class that can't get over the high jump bar so asked the coach to put it lower and lower so he can just sort of fall over the bar.

Well, Mr. Minister, I think we're looking for a little more than that. Your two performance indicators are not very impressive, and there's a lot more information you could and ought to share so we can determine which public bodies are compliant and effective and which aren't. If you'd tell me then: how many times has section 13 been invoked to extend time for an additional 30 days to comply with an access request? Then, since there's the power to go to the IPC and request a further extension, how many times has that section been invoked? How many requests have been transferred under section 14? That's where I make an access request and I get a letter back after two weeks saying: we don't have the request; the request is with another public body. How many times has that been invoked?

You spoke, Mr. Minister, about co-ordination, and you talked about centralizing data. Well, Mr. Minister, help me reconcile that talk of co-ordination with what I see to be an abysmal lack of leadership when it comes to information practices. Let me give you an example. You have a group of highly trained, highly competent FOIP co-ordinators in every public body, including every one of the provincial government departments. They're trained. They're oriented. They're co-ordinated through your department. If we look at your business plan on page 248, goal 3, the third bullet under the access and privacy part says:

Consult and coordinate with other government departments and local public bodies in matters related to the legislation, and participate in agreed federal-provincial initiatives related to proposed federal privacy legislation for the private sector.

Well, a couple of observations, Mr. Minister. You told us about the EU directive. Curious; your colleagues have been denying the importance of the EU directive for at least the last four years. This has been in force for more than a year, and we put at risk a considerable body of trade with western Europe. I remember the now Minister of Government Services when she was a minister of trade and economic development busy pooh-poohing the whole idea: "What? The EU directive? Big deal. No problem." Well, it is a big deal, and it has continued to put at risk Alberta international trade. So now you've acknowledged that as being an issue. You talk about – I think you mentioned Bill C-6 in the House of Commons – did you not? – in your initial comments. It looks like that's going to become law.

One might ask, Mr. Minister, why it is that we sit back and we see Ontario, we see Manitoba, we see Saskatchewan and British Columbia undertaking public hearings, public hearings to allow the citizens in those provinces to find out – this is provinces holding public hearings about a federal statute. Why? Because they understand that on the third anniversary, the three-year time after that bill goes into force, the federal rules apply unless the province has its own rules. So what do we see in Alberta? No public hearings. I understand there may be some consultation going on with Ottawa. But is that something the Alberta Chambers of Commerce know about, have been involved in, consulted with? Is it something the Calgary Chamber of Commerce knows anything about? It's certainly nothing that has ever been discussed in this Assembly.

So, Mr. Minister, that's disappointing, and I think it's a blot, frankly, on what I think is the pretty strong record you've always had in whatever ministerial portfolio you've held. On this one, Mr. Minister, this may not be all your responsibility because you're a successor to others before you, but you're wearing the goat horns now, I suggest, in terms of not involving Albertans in this important exercise.

What I started out saying, though, was the lack of co-ordination. I quoted a moment ago from page 248 of Municipal Affairs' business plan. Then, Mr. Minister, if you go to page 132 and we look at Government Services, what you will find there is a whole section where the minister responsible for Government Services is talking about many of the same items.

Then we've got the chief information officer and the chief information council. Now, this, Mr. Chairman, is made up of some of the most senior bureaucrats in the government of the province of Alberta, part of the chief information council. They're busy doing all kinds of plotting and scheming and organizing around information management. Then we've got the Minister of Government Services telling us the other day that she was at a meeting in Banff last November with the ministers of consumer affairs from across the country meeting with John Manley, talking about Bill C-6. Well, who's got the brief on this? Is it you? Is it the Minister of Government Services?

Then we also heard from the Minister of Innovation and Science, and he's busy worrying about how we're going to make use of information technology. I mean, I'm not as cynical as Alvin Toffler, who had said at one point:

We are increasing the sophistication of deception faster than the technology of verification.

The consequence of that is the end of truth. The dark side of the information technology explosion is that it will breed a population that believes [in] nothing.

As I say, I'm not that cynical, but I look at a province that is touted to be on the front edge of information technology – this is going to be our economic future – and I see confusion, I see disharmony between the chief information council, between the Department of Government Services, between the Department of Municipal Affairs, and I see, frankly, not a high degree of co-ordination. So, Mr. Minister, tell me who's got the brief, who's in charge, who is the minister responsible for liaison on Bill C-6. If it's you, are we going to hold public hearings? That was one of the important things that's been discussed.

Mr. Minister, in terms of FOIP fees we continue to have the most expensive freedom of information and protection of privacy fees anywhere in Canada. Our $25 application fee I think demonstrably reduces the number of access requests. Are there some current plans to reduce the application fee? Will you do what the former federal access commissioner had recommended and change the way we charge for access requests? Instead of rewarding inefficient ministries by simply charging for search time, will we move past that and simply charge for the number of pages, the number of copies provided? What you do then is you reward efficient government departments that are able to run a tight ship, have good information management practices. The current system rewards those that do not, and I know, Mr. Minister, you wouldn't want to be complicit in that.

I'm interested in knowing, Mr. Minister, particulars of what we're going to do around the response to proposed federal privacy legislation for the private sector. If there are not going to be public hearings, tell us how Albertans are going to find out about this, tell us how Albertans are going to be able to make their views known, because I say that this province, unlike at least five other provinces in Canada, has not shared the secret with their constituents. You talk to people about it and they're amazed. They've never heard of Bill C-6. They don't know the impact it's going to have, and I think frankly, Mr. Minister, we've got some responsibility, you've got some responsibility to address it.

I know my colleagues have lots of other questions, and I want to give them a chance.

Mr. Minister, I don't expect you to have responses to all these things now. I don't require a verbal response now unless you have the statistical information. I'd be happy to receive it later in written form.

Thank you.

9:41

MR. PASZKOWSKI: I do have some statistical information on the questions that were asked, and I don't mind sharing those at the present time. I don't have the intimate breakdowns that were asked for, but I do have the total requests for FOIP, for example. The total requests were 5,481. Of that, 3,550 were personal, 1,905 were general, and 26 were correctional.

Interestingly enough, the point was raised about the expensiveness of FOIP in Alberta. I'd just like to share with the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo that the total fees that have been collected to June 1999 are $128,477. I'll repeat: $128,477. Total administrative costs to March of '99 are $10,861,269.

AN HON. MEMBER: How much?

MR. PASZKOWSKI: They're $10,861,269. That means that the fees as a percentage of cost are 1.2 percent of the total cost. How we could be critical of a cost of 1.2 percent and suggest that we're being exorbitant is something I would really dearly like to hear an explanation for. I very much would, because on that basis I would really like to hear how we can justify the fact that we're being exorbitant in our costing.

There's been a fair amount of concern voiced about Bill C-6, and we certainly have concerns about Bill C-6. Interestingly, the question was asked: why aren't we consulting? This, Mr. Chairman, is a federal government bill. Why is the federal government not consulting? I've met, since my appointment to the ministry, with the Alberta Chambers of Commerce, and they were totally unaware that this bill existed. There had been absolutely no communication. I want to put this on record, that the Alberta chamber was totally unaware that Bill C-6 was moving along. I met with AEDA. They were totally unaware that there was such a thing as Bill C-6. I met with the economic development authorities for the major cities in this province. They were totally unaware of this federal piece of legislation.

Why should we as a province be out consulting on a federal bill that today has not even been passed? Why should we be out there when they haven't got the bill passed? What is it that you're going to be consulting with, as far as a province? What would you be telling those people? That the federal government is going to be doing these things, but we're not sure what the final legislation is going to be? Is that what we should be doing?

To start with, Mr. Chairman, why is the federal government intruding in something that is provincial jurisdiction? That's a question I'd like answered as well. What role should the federal government be playing, and why are they intruding in this particular area? To date we haven't been able to get that answer, and we've asked the federal government on numerous occasions. The hon. member has asked what I've been doing. I've been asking the federal government why and what it is that's going to be the final.

The third reading passed. It went to the Senate. Now the Senate's made some adjustments. It appears that there are changes in the making, but we don't know what they are. We've asked whether there are going to be. There's no communication back. If you're going to communicate, there has to be communication two ways. To date it's all been one way, and that is the provincial government asking for advice as to what's going to come forward. The answers to date have been zero, zero, zero. There's been no communication whatsoever, and with that it's very difficult to go out and communicate with people.

Yes, I make a point of communicating with people before we make any decision on any issue. We spent two weeks last summer – we met with 12 regions, we met with over half of the municipalities, and from that we came forward with the programs that came forward. I would challenge the federal government to do the same thing, and I wonder: has there ever been a cost-benefit analysis done on what this is going to be costing the small business in Alberta and in Canada? Has there been any thought given to what it's going to cost small business?

Yes, there is a need for this legislation in e-commerce, and we acknowledge that. However, there is more than e-commerce in this at stake here. Small communities, small businesses are going to have to pay the burden of this particular piece of legislation. Where is it at? We'd love to know, and perhaps the hon. member could provide us with some guidance and some information. We'd be very much appreciative, because this is serious. This is something that's going to affect all small businesses in this province in a far more dramatic way.

Remember what I said: the total administrative costs of FOIP that deal with just government agencies is 10,861,000-plus dollars. Can you imagine what that's going to do to small business in this province? Can you imagine how every small business is going to have to respond and react?

This is something that is very, very serious, and to suggest that we should be out consulting when it's not our legislation, when the federal government hasn't even talked to the Chamber, hasn't talked to any of the players in this province, what do I say? Really, how do you respond to something like that? It's not our legislation. It's something the federal government has chosen to go out and do on its own. We don't feel it's their jurisdiction. [interjection] Privacy's important, absolutely, but there is a proper way of doing it, and before it is instituted, the people of this province should know what it's about. And as soon as we know the legislation – by the way, why are they there in the first place? I'd like that answer. I really have to ask those questions because they are important questions and Alberta businesses are going to be affected.

The plans to reduce the fees. No, we don't have any plans to reduce the fees. We don't feel that 1.2 percent of the total cost is exorbitant. We don't think the taxpayers of this province would feel that is right. We don't think taxpayers should pay more of that particular percentage. There is a balance, and ultimately we think we've got as close to the right balance as can be struck.

So with that I'll entertain additional questions.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

MR. STRANG: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It's a pleasure to stand up tonight and ask a couple of questions. I sort of regret that I have to start off with my first question talking about the freedom of information. The only thing I want to sort of stress and get an understanding from this minister on is the aspect of being able to get names of graduating kids coming up this spring when they graduate. I hope we're not going to have trouble this year with the different interpretations that different school boards would have, since it's been in place for a year or so now. So that's one question, and that's basically your goal 1 on page 246, bullet 6.

The next item is on page 247, goal 3, bullet 3. I would like the minister to give me a bit of an explanation how we're going to improve the equalized linear assessment process because we have a problem in our area, and I'm just wondering if it's going to be rectified in that respect, too.

9:51

If you would turn to page 251 and I guess one line item there under expenses, the public safety and information management, what I really look at is that your comparable 1998-99 actual was only $9,867,000, but then when you had a comparable budget for '99-2000, you're only at $8,831,000. Then in your comparable forecast for 1999-2000 you're at $18,708,000, and looking at estimates for 2000-2001, you jump up to $19,373,000. Then if we progress to the three-year budget program, we're dropping it down again by about $10 million. So I guess what I'm really questioning is why, with our budget that we had for 1999-2000, we jumped $10 million. I'm just wondering what the reason was there. So I'll take my seat and let you answer those questions.

Thank you.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. minister has indicated that he'll take both sets of questions at the same time.

MR. DICKSON: Thanks very much, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Minister, just in response to the exchange you heard a moment ago. Firstly, people in your department have told me and told many that only a portion of the costs of the administration of the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act go to managing access requests, either general information access requests or personal information requests. The bulk of that money goes to developing good information management systems, finding out what kind of information exists in the department and how to be able to retrieve it.

We've had in this province some abysmal information management practices. It's been decentralized. It's been inefficient. We've had some departments that have been, yes, excellent. We've had other departments that wouldn't know where to find a file if it were under the desk. So a good part of that money you keep citing – and I'll ask you now because I know people in your department know this and they haven't obviously shared the information with you. Of the total budget, that you keep citing is specifically attributable to the processing of general information access requests, how much is specifically attributable to personal information requests and how much of it goes to training employees in a department on good information management practices? How much of it goes to designing systems? How much of it goes to advising the ministers and advising managers and advising department staff? Those are different functions, and it serves a huge disservice to Albertans and certainly to people interested in this issue for you, Mr. Minister, to lump all those things together indiscriminately, come up with a number, and toss it out as if that's the cost to manage information access requests.

Mr. Minister, you ask why you should hold public hearings about Bill C-6. You shouldn't be holding hearings about Bill C-6. You should be doing what the select special committee of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta recommended in 1970, the dying days of Social Credit. They had the foresight to say that privacy is important to Albertans and that this government ought to undertake a consultation. Now, this was before anybody invented a fax machine, a modem. I guess we had photocopiers then, but we didn't have a lot of the information management tools we have now. What the other provinces are doing – this isn't tell us what you think about Bill C-6; it's tell us what you think the rules ought to be around respecting, protecting, managing the privacy of individual Albertans when they do business with a private-sector entity. That's the issue.

Mr. Minister, once again, you do a huge disservice to the issue by wrapping yourself in your Alberta flag and saying that we're under siege from Ottawa. That's nonsense. That's utter nonsense. Albertans deserve to know. Not just the chamber of commerce and not just a handful of selected stakeholders but every single Albertan deserves to be involved in a discussion of what sort of privacy protection they're going to have in the future.

You raised, Mr. Minister, the European Union privacy directive. That's quite distinct from Bill C-6, and even if there were no Bill C-6, we should still be consulting with Albertans around the issue of privacy protection. The government majority shot down every effort to try and do that with the Select Special Committee on the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act three-year review. It's now in your court. You have the chance, Mr. Minister, to consult with those Albertans, and this has nothing to do with the division of powers and everything to do with respecting the right of privacy of individual Albertans.

Those are my comments, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

MR. PASZKOWSKI: Well, this can almost turn into a bit of a debate. I'm surprised to hear that the hon. member doesn't think the cost of providing freedom of information isn't a cost, in that when you break it up it actually provides a different source of information, and it doesn't all reflect the cost of providing that freedom of information. I don't understand the logic and the rationale, because it seems to me that in the process it's the total cost that really matters. Training people to deliver the service is a cost of doing business, and under normal conditions that is always considered a cost of doing business. I don't quite understand the creativity of the hon. member in suggesting that perhaps it's really a cost but not a real cost. So obviously we don't agree on that process. The overall cost to government is in excess of $10 million, well in excess of $10 million, and administrative fees have only picked up 128,000-plus dollars of that, so I guess we tend to disagree on that particular element.

It was this government that introduced freedom of information and privacy. I want to remind the hon. member that it was this government that introduced this legislation. It's this government that introduced this legislation that we have here, and we're not denying the importance of freedom of information, and certainly we are working with all the players and we continue to work with the players. But when it comes down to providing for Bill C-6, it still remains very, very strange that we can't even get the federal intentions. We can't get a response. And to me that's a very interesting way – the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford indicated that it's critical that various levels of government cooperate and work together. What a wonderful way to work together. I think that is a true demonstration of what the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford was illustrating. It's sad. It's important that we work together on a process such as this.

The hon. member had mentioned earlier that the process of measurements on freedom of information and privacy weren't – I can't remember the exact wording – really very successful. Our target is 95 percent, and we've moved from 90 percent being able to deliver the information in a timely and compliant manner. We moved from 90 percent in '97-98 to 91 percent in '98-99. Sure, we're not achieving the overall targets, but we're working towards them, and this is based on a 60-day turnaround. Now, a 60-day turnaround on the average – and when you see some of the information that's been asked for, in one particular case there are over 6,000 pieces of paper that were released. Yet our average time is 60 days' turnaround. I think that's pretty good. We're working to be better. Obviously we've set our target at 95 percent. We're at 91 percent. We've set our target higher with the idea of achieving a higher level, and we will continue to do that.

“Satisfaction with the FOIP program as measured by the percentage of FOIP requests completed by government public bodies that are handled without complaint to the office.” In '98-99, 94 percent; our target is 95 percent. In '97-98 it was 92 percent, so we are improving and we are moving and we've set our standards and we've set our objectives higher than what we have and we will continue to work towards that.

So I don't think we're that far out in this process. In delivery of service it's 60 days. Considering the scope of some of these requests, I think under the circumstances we've achieved a pretty good level. In fairness to the employees of this department, in fairness to the employees that work with freedom of information, I really think that they have done the best they possibly could. They've worked extremely hard to be able to provide this information, and to be critical of those people, who've worked so hard to achieve this, I don't think is totally fair.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have a few general questions. In the last Auditor General's report in referring to the Department of Municipal Affairs the Auditor General made comment about performance measurements. The part I underlined was that “management and stakeholders will thus gain a better view of the Ministry's performance and management will become more accountable for results.” He was asking that the department set targets as a basis for determining whether goals had been achieved. I wonder if the minister might comment on what's been going on in the setting of those performance objectives, because it seems to me that we have fewer now than we've had in the past.

I also wonder about the care, Mr. Minister, in terms of the setting of those objectives. I refer you to page 246. Under goal 1 the fifth bullet down talks about ensuring that municipalities and businesses are adequately prepared for emergencies by working with them to develop and test their emergency plans and assisting them, et cetera. I wondered if that is the same goal or strategy that is referred to on page 250 under goal 3, Disaster and Emergency Preparedness. Am I wrong in thinking that those are really the same programs, only that one is listed under goal 1 and the target is under goal 3?

After the number of years that we've been doing business plans, there are still a number of targets that have to be determined, and I wondered about the nature of the targets. For instance, has the department considered a performance objective related to the grants programs and how the receivers of those grants feel about the fairness of the grants? On the delivery of services has there been consideration of going to the recipients of those services and getting some indication from them in terms of how satisfactory the service is? I guess what I was looking for, Mr. Minister – and I'd appreciate maybe some comment – are the measures you're considering that would really be more a reflection on the department and its success so that it meets the kind of comment that the Auditor General was making.

I would like to make a comment about the taxes and the continual battle that we get with one year Calgary saying that they're putting too much money in and that Edmonton is taking too much money out and the next year Edmonton saying that they're putting money in and Calgary is taking money out. It seems to me that sometime, someplace some minister is going to have to remind all of us that we're all in this together, that tax money is pooled for the common interest, that we can't continually attack each other if the system is going to work, and that it's built on trust and sharing and trying to do the best we can for each other. I really think sometimes that we have to remind ourselves and our municipal and school board counterparts that that's the case.

I had a specific question from a constituent who wanted to know about the emergency warning system and if that emergency warning system, the siren system that was installed in urban areas, is still operational. I didn't have the answer to that.

I have a number of other questions, Mr. Minister, but given the hour . . . [interjections]

THE CHAIRMAN: I'm sorry. I wasn't able to hear you say that the subcommittee should rise and report to the committee.

DR. MASSEY: That's exactly what I was saying, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN: Okay. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods has moved that subcommittee C rise and report to the committee. All those in support of this motion, please say aye.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Aye.

THE CHAIRMAN: Those opposed, please say no.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: No.

THE CHAIRMAN: Carried.

[The subcommittee adjourned at 10:07 p.m.]

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Can I call the meeting to order.

We are in subcommittee D, and we are considering the estimates of the Department of Resource Development.

For those of you who haven't had the opportunity to have a meeting in this room – and I suspect that's none, but just in case – we've had a good experience in dealing with estimates in this room whereby rather than having the full 20 minutes allocated to an individual member followed by 20 minutes of answers from a minister, we've had the unanimous consent of those around the table to change the rules so the order would be 20 minutes in opening comments for the minister, and in this case that would include both ministers for a total of 20 minutes. Then the members around the table would have an opportunity to ask questions and the minister would answer and the total period would be 20 minutes. Then we would move on to the next person. It just gives a little bit more back and forth. But it would require the agreement of everyone concerned. So are we agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Opposed? I take that to be unanimous.

Then, minister and associate minister, you will have up to 20 minutes for opening comments, and that will be for both of you.

DR. WEST: All right. We'll get started, then, Mr. Chairman. We're going to be looking at Resource Development tonight. As well, the Associate Minister of Forestry will be addressing his side of the forestry development area when he gets to his talk.

Now I'd like to also introduce some staff members that are with me tonight. We have Deputy Minister Ken Smith; Neil McCrank, chairman of the Energy and Utilities Board; Earle Shirley, the chief operating officer of the EUB; Don Keech, assistant deputy minister of corporate services and acting ADM of mineral operations – maybe he can keep both those positions – Harvey Walker, the executive director of financial services; Douglas Borland, director of financial services; Linda White, the department issues manager; and Joanne Rosnau, the director of communications. So we're well represented there.

Now I'd like to start by saying that we've been through many changes in all departments with the reorganization of government back in May of 1999. This ministry has also done some notable changes in that period of time. The department still holds many of the same responsibilities and still works with the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board to ensure that resource development in this province is safe, sustainable, and fair to industry, which develops the resource, and to Albertans, who own the resource, lest we ever forget.

The department received some new responsibilities in the last year for the forest industry development and the Northern Alberta Development Council, which the Hon. Mike Cardinal will discuss later. Some of the other responsibilities were transferred from Resource Development to other departments, including climate change, which is now with Environment, and John Donner the ADM of mineral resources and 11 staff went over to Environment when that took place.

The 2000-2001 business plan lists three core businesses for the department: revenue management, industry development, and resource stewardship. The Energy and Utilities Board core businesses are adjudication and regulation of applications, surveillance and enforcement, and information and knowledge. Before moving to the meat of the budget and the business plan for Resource Development, I would like to begin by putting today's energy sector in context.

Last week oil prices reached a new post Gulf war high of $34 a barrel. On the consumer side we saw a corresponding increase in gasoline prices, which hit 64.9 cents. If you compare natural gas prices from last month with prices a year ago, you can see a substantial increase there too. Therefore, the socioeconomics of these commodities, the impact of those is quite tremendous. Remember that in January 1999 the average price per barrel of oil was $12.38, and the average price of a litre of gas was 44.9 cents. If you track a penny per dollar per gallon, it's right bang on from $12.38 to $32.38, plus or minus, which it is today, and the price of gasoline went up 20 cents from 44 cents to 64.9 cents. It is a marketplace-driven issue.

Given these high commodity prices, we're forecasting a significant increase in exploration and drilling this year with a corresponding increase in royalties to be collected. It's important to note, however, that we don't expect prices to stay as high as they are now, and with the OPEC meeting at the end of this month we would like to see increased productions there in the world market, which might bring supply and demand more in line with our forecast. Our prediction is that oil prices will average $19 U.S. a barrel in 2000-2001 and that natural gas will average about $2.50 Canadian per thousand cubic feet. These forecasts are lower than prices are now, but they reflect the best economic analysis we have, and those change every quarter.

Our estimates are that resource royalties in 2000-2001 will total $4 billion, up from the $2.4 billion we collected in '98-99 and down from the $4.3 billion we expect to collect this fiscal year. This is predicted to include $2.3 billion in natural gas and gas by-products and royalties, $632 million in crude oil royalties, and $469 million in synthetic crude oil in bitumen royalties from Alberta oil sands. That's $469 million from oil sands, $14 million from coal, and $650 million from bonuses and sale of Crown leases.

I would like to move now to the highlights of the Resource Development business plan. In terms of the bottom line, I'm requesting a total of $87 million. That's $5 million more than was voted in the '99-2000 estimates. Aside from general provisions and manpower cost pressures from Budget 2000 and Budget '99, there are three main items that contribute to this increase.

The human and animal health study, the first item, is a multiprovincial research program to study the effects of solution gas flaring on animal and human health. The study will involve active monitoring of cattle herd health and ambient air quality by the Western College of Veterinary Medicine at sites ranging from southern Manitoba to northeast British Columbia. This also includes other fugitive emissions from all sources. We are still developing a formula for allocating the costs of the research across departments and jurisdictions, which is estimated at a total of $17 million.

The bulk of these costs, around $11 million, will come in the first stage of the research, which is expected to take up to five years. I expect that Alberta will fund a substantial portion of the cost. I am proposing that Resource Development make an initial contribution of $948,000 towards the study, with further contributions coming from Alberta Environment, Alberta Health and Wellness, and several other provinces. I anticipate making a request for additional funding in the next several budget years or reallocating existing budgets to maintain research funding through to the completion of the project.

The second area is coal-bed methane. I'm requesting additional funding in the order of $1 million for the development of coal-bed methane and other initiatives to use this untapped resource in Alberta, estimated to be around 2,400 trillion cubic feet. Coal-bed methane has the potential to become a major new source of natural gas in this province. We have little information and knowledge about the geological characteristics of Alberta's coal-bed methane. By allocating resources to develop a knowledge base about this resource, we can determine the viability of developing coal-bed methane, establish long-range economic policy, develop exploration and developmental strategies, and support coal-bed methane as an alternative to meet our targets for reducing greenhouse gas emissions.

The third area: increase in EUB grants. I'm requesting a $3.3 million increase to address spending pressures at the EUB. Most of these pressures are related to an increase in landowner concern about the oil and gas industry. This has many causes, including high levels of industrial activity, animal health concerns, an increased focus on sour gas drilling and development, and closer proximity of such activity to populated areas.

Some of the activities the board will be implementing to address this issue are the development of alternative dispute-resolution mechanisms for resolving application and operational issues early in the energy development process. The board is also seeking to improve landowner/industry relations by expanding its field staff's facilitative role and focusing its surveillance efforts on higher risk operations, problem operators, and areas of intense development. An expanded field surveillance role will improve the public's confidence in the EUB's inspection strategy and increase public comfort with resource development. It also will be looking at the great development applications that are coming forth; example, the $33 billion that's being invested in the oil sands, $25 billion to $26 billion of which is already in application.

These initiatives call for the EUB to build a greater staff presence in the community, so much of the additional funding I'm seeking here will be used to increase the board's staff complement from 650 in 1999-2000 to 715 in the year 2000-2001, an increase of 65 full-time equivalent positions. The core frontline people, the inspectors, are going up 13 this year, 12 next year, and we hope to look at a component of 18 new geologists, engineers, and technologists in the field.

Another area which I'll touch on quickly is the PPA option and electrical deregulation. Another major initiative this year will be continuing work to restructure the electrical industry, and this will be done through existing allocations. No new money is being requested. The electrical restructuring began several years ago and will largely be completed by January 1, 2001. That's when Albertans will have a choice about who supplies their electricity.

One of the most significant steps will be an auction held in July of power purchase agreements. Power purchase arrangements, or PPAs, are long-term contracts that convey the right to sell the output of the power plants built in Alberta under regulation. The proceeds from the sale of the PPAs will be used to ensure that Albertans receive the gains created by deregulation residual value. The sale of the PPAs also eliminates the need for future regulatory hearings on plant costs and ensures that the deregulation will result in a competitive market.

These are the highlights. I'll now turn it over to the Associate Minister of Forestry.

MR. CARDINAL: Thank you very much, Steve. I'm also pleased to present the 2000-2001 budget estimates for the forest industry development branch and also the Northern Alberta Development Council. Before I get into that, I'd like to introduce Howard Gray, the executive director of the forest industry development branch, and Donna Ballard, my executive assistant.

The forest industry development branch of Alberta Resource Development is responsible for advocating on behalf of the forest industry and for formulating policy relating to forest industry development, forest product exports, and forestry revenues. In the near future we will present a long-term strategy to government to provide a direction on forest industry development policies for the next decade or so. That's something to look forward to.

The responsibility for timber allocation and tenure moved to Resource Development from Environment, and we now lead the negotiations and development of new forest management agreements. The Minister of Environment continues to have - and this is a very important area - responsibility for overall land management and protection of Alberta forests, including fire suppression. Alberta Environment ensures compliance with legislation and collects Crown timber revenues.

The Resource Development forest industry development branch promotes the value-adding, upgrading, of commodities. The branch is working with Economic Development and the industry advisory committee to undertake a major review that will ensure that Alberta's secondary wood products continue to benefit from the Alberta advantage.

Government and industry are working collaboratively together to deal with the expiry of the softwood lumber agreement, which is on March 31, 2001. The Canadian government has initiated a consultative strategy to the development of a process with the provinces in the forest industry. The intergovernmental and aboriginal affairs department is leading this process in Alberta, and it's a very, very important process.

Another important part of my mandate as minister is communicating the socioeconomic impact of the forest industry. One of my first activities was requesting an overview and an update on the economic impact of forestry on Alberta communities. Using the most recent statistics that were available from industry, we developed a document outlining these statistics. No doubt you've seen this document. It is very impressive. The figures were used from 1997-98. The total industry revenues were over $8.4 billion. Direct expenditures were $3.4 billion. Taxes, stumpage, protection charges totaled $564 million a year. The value of exported shipments totaled $2.44 billion. The forest industry provided direct employment for over 25,000 employees and indirect employment of another 27,700. So it's a major, major economic producer. Many people are not aware of the contribution the forest industry makes in our economy, but we are working very hard to ensure that the public out there has in their hands the information outlining this project, and that is why we developed this pamphlet.

The forest industry development budget itself for 2000-2001 is $1,347,000, which reflects a 9 percent increase over last year's budget. This will cover off employee salary increases and increases in the contracting budget to undertake studies related to the branch's mandate.

Northern development is another area I'm responsible for. As you are aware, the area of the northern development boundary has a lot of the resource development taking place. One hundred percent of all the heavy oil production, 90 percent of the forests, 40 percent of conventional oil and gas, and about 20 percent of agriculture is within the northern development area. Yet only 250,000 people live more or less in the area, which is less than 10 percent of the population.

Billions of dollars of economic investments have taken place in northern Alberta, but because of geography and sometimes lack of training and lack of proper education a lot of northerners are prevented from taking advantage of the job opportunities that are there. We are working hard to change that. Family incomes, in fact, and educational attainment are well below the provincial average. For aboriginal communities the old way of living off the land is ending. Many northern aboriginal people want to participate in resource development opportunities but lack the training and expertise and sometimes the financial backing to be able to do that. People are definitely ready to move forward. The old traditional lifestyle is gone. Everybody up north realizes that, and it's time to participate in the economic activity that takes place. We're doing everything as a government to make sure that happens.

The Northern Alberta Development Council carries out the important work of advancing its business plan's objectives for 2000-2001. They are, one, receiving input into priority northern development opportunities and issues; secondly, promoting emerging opportunities and addressing barriers to northern development; and thirdly, increasing northern skills. It is requesting $1,843,000 for 2000-2001, a 2 percent increase over last year, to cover off employee salary increases. It will look for ways to enhance the consultative processes with northern stakeholders, including the hosting of community leadership roundtable meetings. In the past year we implemented the Northern Links program, which will help northern high school students access postsecondary education, including technical institutions.

The northern development council will continue to focus on infrastructure development by reviewing the future of northern airports, continuing discussions on rail transportation, and implementing the integrated road network plans for northwestern Canada, which was part of the western Premiers' economic action plan.

Finally, I invite you to mark your calendars for the Challenge North conference which is happening from March 29 to 31 in Grande Prairie. It will provide an opportunity for northern community industry, education, and government leaders to discuss key northern development challenges and opportunities. I would like to invite all of you to that conference.

That is my presentation. I guess we are ready now for questions.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Thank you, associate minister.

Traditionally it's the opposition critic that would go first. Is that Edmonton-Calder? All right; Edmonton-Calder, the floor is yours for 20 minutes. Just a caution. It works best if we have short questions. They usually lead to short answers. We'll just keep the clock running.

MR. WHITE: Mr. Minister, first of all, it's good to see the estimates in full and complete form, although we'd always like to have them much more in depth than they are. But such as they are, they're here.

There's one particular area I'd like to highlight, and it deals with the regulatory agency the EUB. You'll recall that this member was quite vocal the last two times we gathered with regards to the cutting of the budget and going through phase 1 of the implementation of the recommendations that were brought forward with the framework and the human resources plan of the EUB. I'd like you to comment on then and now. What has changed in the business scene and/or what has changed in the need for the many more field workers required and, in conjunction with that, the turnaround time from completion of hearings to publication of report?

DR. WEST: Well, you're quite right. The restructuring of the EUB didn't start until probably a little over a year ago. Although there was much said about it in the early running, we pulled back from it because it was under such stress because of the high pressures that were put on by the private sector to take many of its staff out to work in the private sector. So we have started now with a program where we will be adding, like I said in the statement, 65 full-time equivalents on the front lines for inspection, for landowner grievances, and for other hearings that go on plus public forums. We'll be putting 13 and 12 next year – that's 25 – and as I said, we'll also be looking at 18 new geologists, technical people in that. To get them, we're going to go – and people will think it's not enough, but we will be looking at 90 percent of the median of industry as paying in salaries. Some of the new moneys that are going in there are 80 percent funded by the industry. We'll put 3.3 in and they'll put 10. It will allow us to add to the structure of the EUB.

On top of that, the EUB has been going through removing the silos that are in there with the new chief operating officer that we have in place and the new chairman. They are looking at getting a more flexible operation. We've also brought on many temporary board members that can take certain files and speed up the application timing and have put in a minimum of 90 days, after the initial hearing, for the results to come out. We also added to the bench strength of the board and continue to look at the cross section of people on that board, whether they be in environmental issues or whether they be with industry background or general background as it relates to municipalities.

MR. WHITE: The hearing to report time, the turnaround time?

DR. WEST: It has been picking up. There are certainly some hearings that take a long time. We've had some sour gas well hearings that have been up to a year. We're going to tighten that up considerably and try to work on that. I mean, a year ago we had 22,000 applications and 22 went to appeal. I think the turnaround time is getting better. It's one that industry constantly hammers us on.

MR. WHITE: Good. Thank you, sir. That's all in that area. Perhaps you want to go back and forth.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: No. Keep going.

MR. WHITE: Keep on going? You want me to go completely for 20 minutes?

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Yes.

MR. WHITE: Okay. The EUB's alternative service delivery plan. Can you expand a little on that plan?

DR. WEST: The disputes resolution mechanism?

MR. WHITE: Yes. In the Corporate Service Centre I gather they're going to do something different in dealing with quick turnaround times for applications. It's a new model of some description, I understand.

DR. WEST: Well, I think I would have to get that answer, all the nuts and bolts of those changes, directly to you. But the idea of it is to put enough manpower in place at the various levels and with the research of the materials that are needed to make those decisions to have it speeded up to the best ability that we can. One of the challenges, of course, is on a timely basis and having the information and the parties meeting at the same time. But I'm going to leave that, and I'll get back to you with that answer from the EUB itself.

MR. WHITE: Okay. Could you elaborate on the streamlining of the applications required in reservoir development and minable oil sands? Traditionally it was an awfully long process, and I gather that what you're trying to do is collapse that process.

DR. WEST: Well, we have worked with Environment and some of the other areas and the municipalities to speed up the process. If it's oil sands you're talking about, we have a much better template now to put against any applications. We've done all the groundwork as it relates to the aboriginal issues, the land use issues, the environmental issues, and the municipal issues as they relate to Fort McMurray. I would say that having more people that we can call in on a temporary basis to look at the new applications, a larger size for the board, will speed up that application process. There's one thing about it that I've always said. Once you've taken a site and mitigated all the application issues, then for the next site that comes in the same area, you should be able to cover off a lot of the technical aspects of it faster. I think that certainly will be there. Of course, the city of Fort McMurray has agreed not to be an intervenor in these because they have agreed with the process. It speeds it up considerably if the municipality involved has mitigated the process.

MR. WHITE: You mentioned in your opening remarks coal-bed methane and the research that had to go on to estimate its recovery value and all that sort of thing. Is there any regulatory process that has been worked upon thus far in recognition of it being a different . . .

DR. WEST: I won't be able to answer that, hon. member. I'll get an answer to that. I am not a geologist, and I haven't been involved in the coal-bed methane evolution.

Just to give you an idea. In the States they've done some work on coal-bed methane development. This million dollars to go in is to research that, and I'm sure that as that comes forward, the EUB would then look at whatever regulations have to be put in place. But if there are any, I'll get those to you. I don't think there are any applications before the EUB at the present time.

MR. WHITE: I wouldn't think so.

DR. WEST: No.

MR. WHITE: You said a million dollars in research funds. Are those research funds going to a special project with AOSTRA?

DR. WEST: It will be work with industry players, consultants, and probably through ARC, Alberta Research Council. All those projects are vetted through there now and the AOSTRA component that we send over.

MR. WHITE: The anticipated level of applications this year over last. I didn't see it, but I suspect it would be in about the same range. The sour wells will be up, I suspect. Has anything developed in the way of a hearing procedure to run more of them at the same time so that they can run concurrently?

DR. WEST: Well, with the increased staff components and the way the committee structures are set up, I'm sure they'll be able to facilitate that, but that's again the internal workings of the EUB on each and every application. These answers will be brought forward to you by the chairman. You have to understand that this is an arm's-length regulatory body, and I do not get involved in the day-to-day workings of the EUB.

MR. WHITE: Agreed.

DR. WEST: And you wouldn't want me to.

MR. WHITE: Well, heck no.

DR. WEST: That's the right answer.

MR. WHITE: It's the right answer. That's true. Not involved. But there's a difference between being involved and being aware, but we won't go there. There's no reason to do that.

It seems to us that the environmental reviews are increasing in number and complexity. Is there any provision for the increase in complexity of the reviews?

8:36

DR. WEST: Well, as I said, we are working on hiring 65 people. At the present time 18 of those are technical people that will be dealing with certain aspects of those applications. As well, 650 people in the restructuring will be directed in I hope the most professional of manners to deal with the complexities of the new applications. That's as good an answer as I can give to you, because many of them are very professional people that have been dealing a long time with this industry and have set the best standards that I know of in the world, actually, here in Alberta.

MR. WHITE: One of the complexities is the proximity to developed residential areas. The output of the $17 million study that you were talking about with flared and solution gas – and part of that would be sour gas. You will be having all these hearings without having the results of this study. How are you going to . . .

DR. WEST: The study is an ongoing challenge that we have. We put it at arm's length to us, with the other provinces involved to ensure its authenticity. That is an ongoing study that will be reporting back at certain periods of time. I think some of it will come back in 18 months, some in two or three years. That does not mean that the EUB doesn't function with the standards they have set in place using present day scientific values.

They have certain policies and structures that enforce distances from urban centres or residences, and they constantly monitor the safety of these areas. They have one gas well that was outside Calgary. There were some 18 special requirements on that well alone that didn't apply to other wells when it was approved. So I have no concerns whatsoever that the EUB won't continue while this study goes on and that if there are any findings from these studies, they'll be implemented by the EUB into their standards.

MR. WHITE: As you are aware, it has been a long-standing criticism of this side of the House with regards to the number of monitoring staff, field staff. I see you are addressing that situation at least in part, but it would still be our contention that there simply is not enough staff to adequately monitor a great deal of the situations the oil and gas business find themselves in. While monitoring themselves does have its upside, that it cuts down the cost of the EUB through the ministry, the downside is that it's darn difficult for any firm to say they are and have been totally compliant. Would it not be reasonable to rely on a local municipality to assist those people by bylaw to do at least part of the monitoring, the initial monitoring, to be able to verify or audit the veracity of the reports coming out of the companies?

DR. WEST: I would think you would have to enlarge the staffing components at all levels. It would be duplicating an overlap that you wouldn't need. The EUB does an excellent job, and with the new funding formulas and the increase in staff they are hiring – plus that will be an ongoing analysis – I think they will address these concerns up front. I would take issue with you insinuating at all that the EUB to a stress point isn't inspecting or keeping a good enough hand on industry and on these developments. I find that a bit of an insult to the EUB and to this province's record. I don't know why you would spend a massive amount of money on duplication where we're already having a stress on professionals that should be in one centre, not spread throughout 398 municipalities.

MR. WHITE: Turning to older pipelines, it's agreed pretty well in the industry that . . . [interjection] Oh, my colleague wants to cover pipelines, so let's move from gas and oil to electricity. Well, no. Before we do that . . . Sorry, sir.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Hon. member, just so you know, you've got four minutes left.

MR. WHITE: Four minutes. I don't have to move very far then, do I?

To move to an area that is prevalent and that you touched on in your chat, could you give the committee some rationale as to why you'd maintain your position on fuel tax? You know, last week I wrote you a letter that suggested that with the estimated crude price in the budget being $19, anything above that is a net bonus to your department and then through to the general revenue. From some albeit relatively simple calculations I did through pulling quarterly reports and annual reports of your department and the previous budgets of '98, '99, and 2000, it's clear that if the fuel tax is reduced a penny at the pump for every dollar that the world price of crude, the WTI, is up, it's still a net benefit. If you drop it, at $19 the Treasury would be entitled to and receive the full 9 cents tax applied, and anything above $28, on a graduated scale of course, would be free.

AN HON. MEMBER: What about when it hits $12?

MR. WHITE: It's still 9 cents. Anything below that it's flat, absolutely flat. They can't go beyond the bottom limit. The Treasury does need some of it. I haven't heard a reply from your note, and quite frankly I expected one earlier than this actually.

DR. WEST: Well, you sent me your philosophy as it relates to what you think should be done. When OPEC and the rest of the world has an undersupply, that may not be agreed across Canada, and we have to deal with the social economics of all provinces, some, such as Newfoundland, that have 85 cents a litre gas. We have asked the federal government to look at one of the taxes. It does move. Ours is a fixed 9 percent, but their GST of 7 percent moves with the price of gasoline. If you were in an 85 cents per litre area, it would be nearly 6 cents, the price of the GST on that gasoline, or part of the 15 cents that they have.

MR. WHITE: I wouldn't ask you to do something to axe the feds. I've already communicated to the feds what I think of their . . .

DR. WEST: What I'm trying to answer to you is that you can't sit in isolation on an issue like this.

AN HON. MEMBER: What did they say to you last?

MR. WHITE: They're as bad as him. They haven't got back to me yet.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: One member at a time.

DR. WEST: I mean, your federal Liberal counterparts are mad enough at us as it is for having high oil prices once in about a quarter and a half, but they didn't come here when it was $12.38 a year ago. Of course, because we have this, they don't transfer the agricultural grants to us; they don't transfer any health wealth to us.

MR. WHITE: I'm talking about the relationship, sir, between the custodians of the resource and the owners of the resource. The owners of the resource are the people of Alberta.

DR. WEST: We can't in isolation, without the country, do that.

MR. WHITE: Sure you can. It's your tax.

DR. WEST: You mean to say that we could just throw in the face of Saskatchewan residents and B.C. residents an island of cutback? In agriculture that's what the federal Liberals did. They drew the line at the Saskatchewan border and they gave us zero, and you know the emotion that we have here.

8:46

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Well, on that positive note we'll move on to the next person. The next member who has indicated a wish to participate is Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to thank both of the ministers this evening and all their staff. It would be my wish that this budget process were a little less formal so that staff could participate in answers, because I think it would be beneficial to everyone involved if that were the process.

DR. WEST: I'd like that, actually, if you'd make the announcements.

MS CARLSON: I'd need a little help here, Steve.

My first set of questions are questions that are very important to me and to my constituents. They have to do with the Gulf gas processing plant at Rimbey and the butane/ethylene pipeline to Edmonton through Mill Woods. I have a series of questions here that I will ask and then ask you to respond. I'm hoping you can give some responses today and perhaps some more detail in writing at a future date within a quick time line, because those answers I will be distributing throughout the constituency as this is quite a serious issue in Mill Woods at this time.

First of all, to do with the processing plant itself, it has requested an upgrade in its sulphur recovery system from 92 to 99 percent. We fully support this application they have made, and we're hoping it will be approved soon. In fact, this evening I just finished meeting with one of the environmentalists that was a key partner in pursuing the upgrade for this plant. We're hoping a public hearing won't be required in that regard, but there are some serious repercussions that are going to fall out of the plant upgrade as it continues its operation. With the upgrade the plant hopes to increase its throughput. We've had some discussion with the plant on this. It's currently underutilized, and in fact we would support an increase in throughput there if they are increasing their recovery of sulphur. That would be an excellent objective.

But if we take a look at this plant back in history, it was originally thought that this plant would cease to operate by this time, and this raises some concerns for us in terms of the pipeline that's carrying the propane and butane condensate from Rimbey to Edmonton. That pipeline is nearly 40 years old, and as we know, the older pipelines are more liable to corrosion and failure.

Now, I understand that this company is checking this pipeline yearly, but if we take a look at the EUB field surveillance reports, the '98-99 report shows 65 percent of pipeline failures caused by corrosion as compared to 51 percent for the period of '80 to '98. So as their age increases, regardless of what they do, there are more failures. In terms of this pipeline that runs through my constituency, which passes a Sikh temple, two junior high/ elementary schools, a Mormon church, a strip mall, and many residences, the people are very concerned that a 40-year-old pipeline is liable to see some sort of failure problems in the future.

So our first question is: what is being done to ensure the safety of old pipelines in general and this one specifically? Another question we would like to ask is: what is the EUB requirement for reviewing pipelines when circumstances change? This pipeline had an explosion in 1979, and at that time as part of the review process it was indicated that the pipeline was expected to close down by the year 2000. Now it's going to continue in operation and will be carrying an increased load if there is an increased volume from the Rimbey plant. Are there any requirements to review the findings of that report? Would the board consider moving the pipeline to the pipeline corridor, where there are adequate setbacks? This pipeline was grandfathered when the new regulations came in, so in some cases it's only 7.5 metres away from buildings. Our understanding is that the setback requirements are more in the 100 to 200 metre range. So that's an issue for us.

Another question is: are there any requirements that setbacks have to be met on old lines if there's an increased throughput? We would request that both the board and the department review the findings of the 1979 explosion report to determine what actions are needed at this time in terms of that very old pipeline.

Also we're requesting that a review of the pipeline be done in accordance with I believe it's section 42, where you can request an inquiry in existing operations. We would like a review of the integrity of the lines, a review of the setbacks in terms of their proximity to residences and other buildings in the area. For us this is a very serious issue. We believe that a review of this pipeline is required as a starting point. There are many pipelines in the province that are facing the same problem. This will be a serious issue that is currently building in the constituency that I don't think will be solved until some sort of review process is put in place.

I'm hoping you could address some of those questions now and get back to me as soon as possible on the rest of them.

DR. WEST: What I heard from you is a concern on behalf of your constituents, and in there was a group of questions and queries as it relates to this pipeline. I can assure you that the EUB has an ongoing provincial interest in older pipelines and will continue to regulate them in the strongest of manners to ensure the safety of the public.

I'll take all the other parts of your concerns as a matter of notice and have the EUB, which is present here tonight, respond to you. I just know that as we go throughout the province, with the level of pipelines we have, 270,000 kilometres in the NOVA system and pipe gathering systems, our track record is excellent, but that does not deny the fact that we must look at the older pipelines to ensure safety. If they are safe pipelines – some of them are grandfathered. The setback rules, you know, are considered.

As I said, I'll take your concerns. I know that as you go throughout your constituency those people who bring these concerns to you are very serious about the impact they have on the social structure of their communities. I understand that.

MS CARLSON: Thank you. I appreciate that, and I look forward to circulating those answers within the community.

Next I would like to talk about the alternative disputes resolution mechanisms, which you briefly touched on with my colleague. You know, we have a real contradiction here in my opinion in terms of what was said by the Premier back in February of '99 in the Legislature and then in the letter from the EUB that says that the alternative disputes resolution mechanisms are working on what the Premier said. It doesn't look to me like there's a direct correlation there. As I see it, the EUB's focus is on the application dispute problems, but they are not addressing the disputes that arise after approval has been granted.

What we hear is that the EUB is saying they don't have any jurisdiction in that area, that there's no process in place for them to put an alternative disputes resolution in place at that stage, and we get a whole raft of answers in terms of whose responsibility it is: your department, Environment, and so on. So my question is: who is going to solve this problem? We think that if the EUB has jurisdiction before, at the application stage, then they should also have jurisdiction after there is approval and there are problems. We're not satisfied that they're only focusing on the application process and, in a very minor role, the issues skirting around the edges of that.

I thank you for the letter that you sent to me on this issue. We know about the terms of reference for the process. It's going to be a good tool where there's an application for development or where problems arise, but we really want them to broaden the issues addressed in there. So if you could address that.

DR. WEST: Well, we don't disagree with you. I think we will be broadening this to look at the postapproval situations that you talk about. There's no doubt that with the growing population in the province of Alberta and the impact this industry has on the urban fringes, as well as those areas where people live, we will have to be looking at many tools, not just this one, in mitigating some of the conflicts.

I know that the EUB will be traveling around. They will be going to Wainwright and other places. They're going to try public hearings and meetings to expand upon the information people should have as it relates to these areas of disputes as well as a better understanding of the role of the EUB, both in the initial phase as well as postapproval time.

They also want to bring forth a better understanding of the responsibility of industry and the public's rights as far as the first phase of any oil and gas development that takes place. So I think that you're on a good area. I'm not criticizing the question. We have to do a better job in the postapproval process as well as getting out there, and we're going to use many of these frontline people to get there with information and a better understanding before a dispute grows in a fashion where it might cause larger confrontations such as we may have seen in the past in the province.

MS CARLSON: Good. Thanks.

Next, I would like to address the field staff concerns that we have had for a long time with EUB. It's nice to see that there are going to be more people in the field, as you've said. I don't believe that my colleague had any intent to insult the EUB, as you indicated. He was addressing a very real concern that we hear time and time again, in fact every time we're out in the country. The majority of the phone calls I get certainly have to do with understaffing in the field. So it's good to see that you're going to be doing that.

[Mr. Coutts in the chair]

One of the issues that we think needs to be addressed in that regard is improving the landowner public relations through the field staff's facilitative role. It's more than, we think, just a public relations job. It is part of industry doing a good job. There hasn't been enough monitoring going in the past few years. Even in the short term with the new numbers of staff you're going to have, we would like to see a significant increase in the number of unannounced spot checks and audits, if for nothing else than to increase the security of people in the community. They feel that this has not been done adequately in the last few years.

We also think it would be a good idea to require that the oil and gas companies notify the municipality so that their operations can be monitored. This was proposed with a county of Strathcona bylaw. Here I'm specifically talking about seismic crews. More than just the county of Strathcona have introduced this bylaw. It's come forward from a number of other counties. We understand that there's been some pressure from yourself to rescind this bylaw, so we're wondering why. Now, I understand that the ownership of roads and road allowances belongs to you, but the maintenance of them and the monitoring of them belongs to the counties.

It would seem to me that in that instance it would be well within the county's mandate to be able to pass a bylaw that would require oil and gas companies to notify the municipalities when they are in the area and when they are drilling. So when you are such a proponent of—I'd say downloading; sharing responsibility maybe is a term you would prefer. I'm wondering why you're not encouraging local supervision in this regard, given the list of duties that you've given for the additional staff. The EUB, no matter what, is not going to have enough staff to adequately monitor this kind of situation.

I'll stop there. I've got some more questions in terms of drilling, but if you could address that part of it.

DR. WEST: Well, I think the issue with the municipalities is that they should work with the province and the EUB if they have access problems. Rather than setting up punitive fees and regulations within the municipalities, they should work with the province. After all, the orderly development of the oil and gas reserves in this province is a benefit not only to the municipalities but to the province and to all people of the province of Alberta.

I know that frustration drives some municipalities to set up these seismic fees or access fees, but we have said: just wait a minute. You don't want to send a message to this industry, that's under a lot of stress from federal legislation, endangered species, the Canadian environmental act, as well as access problems as it relates to traditional lands, natural areas, special places, and on and on and on. So work with us on this to mitigate these areas rather than bringing in punitive fees that in many cases generate a minuscule amount of money for the effort put into them but are there because of a frustration in the municipality.

We just put a billion dollars into infrastructure, and municipalities will share in those moneys in everything from roads to bridges. They should know that those moneys come from a very healthy resource industry and that we shouldn't be penalizing them unfairly. So, yes, there's frustration, but my point is: work with us on solutions rather than on a knee-jerk, ad hoc basis throughout the province, where one municipality versus another puts up barriers. I think we've had agreement with some of them. Using my name in vain with certain local landowners and that sort of thing isn't the solution to good communication, and I've heard that said by some frustrated landowners. I would hope that you the loyal opposition don't just fan that for political reasons. We're all here to work in a collaborative position for the benefit of Albertans.

MS CARLSON: We're very well behaved, I think, in terms of our questions here this evening and the approach we're taking.

DR. WEST: I'm talking about the activities outside this room.

MS CARLSON: We will pursue the issues where they present themselves.

Are you saying, then, Mr. Minister, that you would entertain the notion of counties bringing in a bylaw that requires notification for the oil and gas companies when they come onto those lands as opposed to them putting in a bylaw that would require a fee? If they scrap the fee and just ask for notification, would you support that?

DR. WEST: Well, we have a task force in place at the present time that's ongoing, and I want to look at all those issues. We're not saying that we aren't open to any suggestions. Each municipality is different. We have not just the county of Strathcona but northern municipalities as well as those in the corridor area. So the answer to your question is yes. We're going to continue to communicate. To find the proper answer to notification will be left to those discussions.

MS CARLSON: If you could tell me who is on that task force, if there are any counties that have withdrawn their participation in that task force, and at what points in time you expect reports, be they interim or final reports.

DR. WEST: Well, it's an ongoing task force. I suppose you could say that it will report and continue to report. I don't know of any that have withdrawn, but the counties and the AAMDC are part of that and the AUMA. As well, directly we invited five or six of them—in the beginning I can remember having meetings with them at the Coast Terrace Inn, the Edmonton Inn, and a few other places, discussions with specifically five or six that were charging those fees to start with. We asked the general body to also assess input as it relates to their members.

Who's on the task force? Those people as well as the Minister of Environment, the minister of agriculture, the Minister of Resource Development, and, before that, forestry. Now the Hon. Mike Cardinal will be on that task force as well as the Minister of Municipal Affairs. Again, we will have ongoing discussions as it relates to these issues.

THE ACTING CHAIRMAN: Thank you. The time is up for that series of questions.

The next person on the list is the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Minister, I want to ask you some questions flowing from your business plan and the consolidated statement.

What I'd like to start off with is a general question about the performance measures first for your department, then for the EUB, and then for the Northern Alberta Development Council. The general question is this. When I look at the three areas that you're responsible for under this Ministry of Resource Development, I see three very different forms of performance measure. For example, the performance measures attached to your Resource Development business plan give us figures for either 1998 or 1999 and in one case, I believe, a projection for the year 2001 but no targets or very few targets for the year 2000 set out in the performance measure.

Then if we look at the performance measures for the NADC, we see 1998-1999 actual measures, 1999-2000 targets, and then targets throughout the business planning cycle to the end of 2000-2003. Again, if you take a look at the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board, their performance measures are in a third, very different form. What they do is give us what I believe are all targets for the years 1999-2000 to the end of the business cycle.

[Mr. Renner in the chair]

Now, I understand that the cross-government reference is to have performance measures set out to the end of the planning cycle. I'm wondering if you can explain the difference and why it is that in what I'll call the departmental business plan we don't see them extrapolated out to the end of the business cycle at all. Why are there three different forms of performance measures within your department when we're trying to get some consistency across government, at least according to the documents supplied by Treasury and the Executive Council?

The other question I have is specific to goal 1 under the performance measures: "sharing the profits from resource development." First of all, the target range is between 20 to 30 percent, which is fairly broad. I'm just curious as to why we go from about a fifth to a third in terms of expected range. More particularly, I note that in 1993 it was 25 percent. It troubles me if we don't have an estimate for 1999, but the 1998 estimate is down 4 percent to 21 percent. In fact, it's been going down steadily since '93, and I'm wondering if being at the bottom end of that target range is acceptable. If you set such a broad range, 20 to 30 percent, and you're going down, is that acceptable? If it's really what you're trying to do, then why isn't the target range a little bit more narrow and focused?

Also, I have a question when it comes to the Northern Alberta

Development Council performance measures. First of all, when I look at the performance measures, I see that there are really just three of them. I'm particularly interested in the goal 3 performance measure, which is "to increase northern skill levels." I'm curious as to why there are no performance measures that would look at the percentage of those northern Alberta residents who are in need versus those who qualify for bursary or other support. Also, why isn't there a measure that looks at the percentage of those who apply for support versus those who are approved? Finally, why is there no measure of course completion or graduation rate or at least of years involved in programing that's supported through the council? It seems to me that those would all be measures that would be more helpful in understanding the success of the strategies that are outlined in the business plan.

I'm going to use my 10 minutes and then leave the minister 10 minutes, because I think this process is – anyway, it doesn't matter what I think about this process. So I'll use my time, and then you can respond.

Back to the business plans for energy. I'm wondering if the minister can tell me if he's planning anything that's different in how we handle ethylene in this province and whether or not we're going to be allowing more export to the United States, if there's going to be any relaxation in terms of what we do. If so, what is the rationale? If a change in policy is being contemplated, have you looked at what impact that may have on lost opportunities for employment and value-added processing here in Alberta?

I guess the final question for now – and then I'll allow the two ministers a chance to respond – is a general question about the income statement. I'm just wondering whether it's folks who crunch numbers in the Department of Resource Development or folks who crunch numbers in Treasury who set the expected revenue figures for natural gas and by-products royalty, crude oil royalty, and synthetic crude and bitumen royalty? Who is primarily responsible for producing those numbers?

That's my opening round of questions.

DR. WEST: The answer to your last question is they both do work there, plus they also work on forecasting. They also work using different forecasters, banks, and what have you throughout the world. Internally, of course, they go by the information that's produced on an ongoing basis by the oil sands, whether it's gas or whether it's land sales, and they do it from year to year on certain evaluations. It's both that work together on that.

I don't see any great change in policy from the export point of view. We know that right now we're about 15 percent of the United States' consumption of natural gas. We don't see any effect except the fact that our pipeline capacities are probably not – we can't achieve filling some of the gas pipelines at the present time, but that's not a great disconnect. It's probably helpful to us. Exploration will have to continue, and I think that as we see the companies move into the Mackenzie Delta north, you'll see lots of jobs and that here. I trust that was your question as to whether there was a change in policy coming on exports. No, not that we know of, not unless the federal Liberals decide to step in.

MR. SAPERS: They would only do the right thing.

DR. WEST: Like they did under the national energy policy. I'll just have to mention that once again.

Of course, what might affect export here and jobs here is a change to the oil and gas industry's tax position which just came out in the last budget. If you want to open up the door on the economics of this . . .

MR. SAPERS: Maybe you can just answer my questions.

9:16

DR. WEST: Well, when you kick the door open, you allow me to expand on the answer.

We just noticed that in an appendix to the budget – and the Treasurer is here – they kind of snuck in. A little bit of an agreement that they made in 1975 was on the resource allowances as it related to the oil and gas industry, and I would think you'd be writing your counterparts along with us with the strongest of objections. That will change the capital markets. Two years down the road we'll see quite a struggle for companies that are already struggling in competition with the high-tech markets at the present time. So those are the policies that will affect our export, not the ones that we're doing here.

At any rate, the other one on key performance measurements. If there's an answer to all your queries because they went back and forth – I didn't understand why you would ask questions like that when you know that performance measurements in certain areas for certain departments are two- to three-year moving targets. Therefore, to have them all indicated in one year, 2000, and some of them in 2003 would be redundant as far as the practicability of it.

I also might say, with the Treasurer sitting here, that performance measurements sometimes are questionable in certain areas because they're not as clear a measurement as it might be in the number of births or the number of deaths or the statistics that may be analyzed in certain other departments. Maybe the minister of forestry development could certainly answer in the areas of the Northern Alberta Development Council.

MR. CARDINAL: Okay. Thanks, Steve. Just briefly, because he only touched on the way the performance measures are set up. The main reason for that inconsistency at the time was that the transfer of the Northern Alberta Development Council took place after the budgets were set up for each department, and there was a split that took place in the Northern Alberta Development Council. It was under Executive Council, reporting to the Premier, and was transferred to Resource Development along with the performance measures that were set up. So for this year they have to show up the way they were originally laid out, and it may not be exactly consistent with the way Resource Development has done their performance measures. As we move forward in the next budget year, you will no doubt see a change, and they'll be consistent with the department.

The other area I believe you inquired about is the percentage of applications and percentage approved. I'll give you an example. In 1999 out of 359 applications, 126 were awarded, and this continues to be improved. Our targets are high, and they're being achieved as far as commitment, which is another important issue. You didn't really directly ask about that, but it's part of the process of providing bursaries for our northern students. Seventy-two percent of all the applicants that received bursaries through the Northern Alberta Development Council fulfilled their obligations in return. Our target was 75 percent, so it has gone very well.

For the other couple of questions you've asked, we will do that in writing. I see the staff taking notes, and we will get that to you in writing. They are quite important issues, and it needs more information beyond what I can provide today.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you for that. I appreciate it.

I'd like to go back to a couple of the answers. First of all, one of the specific questions I asked in my first round was the performance measure for goal 1, which is the target range of 20 to 30 percent for "sharing the profits from resource development." I note that it's gone down from 25 percent in '93 to the '98 estimate of 21 percent. I'm wondering why, and I'm wondering why the range is so big. I'm wondering if you're satisfied that it has gone down by 4 percent. Is that the direction that is supported by government policy? The response, as I understood you to say it, is that you don't have a lot of faith in performance measures and don't think they accurately reflect government business. That may be, but as I understand it, it is the policy of this government to produce performance measures as part of the three-year business plans. So unless there's been some special order in council, which of course we wouldn't know about, that has exempted Resource Development from getting on board with the government policy, I guess I would expect that your performance measures would have to get into line.

MR. HAVELOCK: Orders in council are published.

MR. SAPERS: And I won't be distracted by the Minister of Economic Development.

MR. HAVELOCK: By the truth.

MR. SAPERS: Oh, I'll be distracted by the truth. It would be nice to hear that actually.

MR. HAVELOCK: I hope that got into the Hansard.

MR. SAPERS: We can make sure it gets into Hansard. The Minister of Economic Development reminded me that OCs are published. Of course, we wouldn't know about the discussion, because that happens in secret, and that was really my reference. Of course, we can always FOIP it and get blank pages back too, but that's another question.

For example, Mr. Minister, I would note that under goal 5 for forest industry development, the target is to "reduce the gap between the harvest and the annual allowable cut cap." I notice there that you've got historical data going over 10 years, from 1990 to 1999. It shows what the gap and harvest is of course. Now, that seems to me to be exactly the kind of performance measure you could extrapolate over the business cycle, and you haven't. I could pick other examples in your business plan as well.

I was wondering if you could provide me with perhaps a little more complete response to the question about the business plans and specifically the question I have about the performance measure for goal 1.

DR. WEST: Mr. Chairman, I will take his question as a matter of notice so we can get a complete answer for the hon. member rather than having him retort like he did.

MR. SAPERS: It's called debate. I know you're not used to it, but it is called debate. It's not a retort.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Hon. member, you have four minutes left. Do you want an answer?

MR. CARDINAL: In the forestry section I could just give some information on that as far as the gap between the annual allowable cut and the cap. We have a sustained yield policy, which means that the government does not and will not allow harvesting to occur beyond the ability of the forests to grow the timber, and it's very well managed. In fact, Alberta Environment at this time estimates that the annual growth of all inventoried forested public lands in the province is approximately 44,500,000 cubic metres. We at this time are harvesting annually approximately half, 23.3 million cubic metres. We'll have to keep working on that process, but one thing we have to watch is external forces that we have no control over in relation to the inventory out there; that is, forest fires as an example.

We have to always keep in mind that we could have a major forest fire that changes what is out there in relation to the gap between what's available annually and what is being cut. It is critical. We need to maintain our industries operating, and we don't dare overallocate what is available. So it is a touchy area, but you can be assured that we'll try to manage it.

MR. SAPERS: Thanks.

I'll pass the torch, Mr. Chairman.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: All right. Edmonton-Calder, do you have more questions?

MR. WHITE: I do, sir.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Be my guest.

MR. WHITE: Thank you. I would like to direct these questions to the associate minister if you don't mind.

MR. CARDINAL: Sure.

MR. WHITE: Goal 5: "Sustain growth opportunities in the forest sector through maximization of the wood fibre opportunity, secondary processing and export of forest products." The goal, while admirable unto itself, deals only with the forest as a business opportunity in the way of harvest. The difficulty I have is that a great deal of forest is of value to other industries, and this goal doesn't seem to take into account any value for the other industries. The goal may have just been stated in brief and left those things out. I would like to think that the evaluation of forests is not just for harvest and harvest alone, and with your heritage, I'm sure you'd agree.

9:26

MR. CARDINAL: The only areas that we are allowing harvesting to take place for that particular resource are areas where – for example, there are thousands of square miles of muskeg which is generally forested. It's in place. We don't harvest it. It's there. There are special places. There are other areas that are set aside now: parks, Indian reserves. Traditional land areas at this time are not totally developed. So there are a lot of forested areas that we do not develop as part of the overall forest management. But areas where timber can be harvested, is the right size and so on, of course become part of the plan.

We can get the staff to put some of that in writing if you want.

MR. WHITE: No, no. That part of it is okay. Just so long as there's an understanding that aside from all the lands that are set aside for all those other purposes, not forest related – I'm talking about the harvestable forest that is out there. There are a lot of other uses. Recreational is one, and there's lots of trapping and hunting that are of economic value to society. So long as the adherence to this goal is not so strong that it overrides all those others.

MR. CARDINAL: No. The inventoried portion from Environment is estimated at 44.5 million cubic metres of harvestable timber, but we're only harvesting 23.3 million, which is about 50 percent of what can actually be harvested.

MR. WHITE: That 44.5 million cubic metres includes the tree in my front yard. That covers all the trees in the province of Alberta.

MR. CARDINAL: That are harvestable.

MR. WHITE: Right. Sure.

MR. CARDINAL: The green area.

MR. WHITE: But let's not get dissuaded and believe that we're only harvesting half of that which is harvestable. Truly harvestable is not harvesting the city of Edmonton's trees out in the lot here.

MR. CARDINAL: The other thing that's not mentioned too often is that a percentage of the annual allowable cut of both coniferous and deciduous comes from private woodlot operations. I think it could even be 20 percent.

MR. WHITE: I wouldn't think it would ever be that high.

MR. CARDINAL: I didn't think so either, but that seems to be the indication.

MR. WHITE: I can leave that for now.

Can you enlighten me as to the long-term sustainable needs of the forestry industry, the compensation for major losses in the way of fire or infestation – I don't recall anything that has devastated a forest, but it has set it back some – and in particular the nonallocation of forest lands that are taken out of any kind of harvestable production by reason of oil and gas operations and lost to the land base, cut lines and the like? There's no calculation I'm aware of that nets that out of the annual allowable cut. Can you enlighten me in some of those areas, sir?

MR. CARDINAL: Yeah, we tried to. If an FMA holder has a certain amount of land that they manage – for an example, if an oil and gas development takes place – a lot of the FMA holders now are starting to jointly plan between the oil and gas developments and other developments of that nature to make sure that when they do want to build some roads and drill their wells, they try and co-ordinate with the logging activities of the FMA holder. That seems to be working very well. The plans have just been initiated a number of years ago, and it seems like it's something that will no doubt go across the board in the future.

MR. WHITE: Is there anything in the works in the way of a change in revenue strategy, anything that is being worked upon to return a fair share of revenue to the industry as well as to the owner of the resource? I know there is a varying rate in stumpage.

MR. CARDINAL: In the last number of years there have been changes made along with the industry and also the government in relation to stumpage. They are now market driven. We can get you a copy of those rates. In fact, I think it would be good for you to have. It shows that, you know, if the market goes up, then the companies can afford to pay more, but when the market goes down, then they can pay less stumpage. So it's a good package. It's fully supported by the industry at this time.

MR. WHITE: It's stable. You're not working on any other . . . [interjection] No, no. The plan is market driven; I know that. There aren't any changes in the works? There aren't any modifications?

MR. CARDINAL: In fact, there has been a timber quota review committee in place. They've been working in the last three years reviewing all the phases of the forest industry and the quota system. We'll be coming forward both to environmental protection and also our department in the very near future with a report and some major recommendations. No doubt, as time moves on, in the next two years they could become part of the 10-year forest strategy we're going to announce.

There are some proposed changes. They haven't been adopted. They haven't gone through the process yet, but there are some good ones coming forward.

MR. WHITE: Could you perhaps in some return communication explain what is meant by balancing a fair share of revenue with sector competitiveness? I don't really understand that term.

MR. CARDINAL: Well, you always have to look at the economic viability of the industry. One of the problems with the forest industry is that a lot of times we have no control over commodity prices to the point where it could cost more for the person to manufacture the timber or the wood than they could get if they sold it even in the States. So we have to always have that flexibility to deal with these situations as they change. So it's there. It's well protected.

MR. WHITE: What does the department intend to do in the next fiscal period to foster value-added development or facilitate market access? Do you have any plans in that area that you can share with us?

MR. CARDINAL: Part of our strategy, part of our economic diversification plan in Alberta, of course, you know, is concentrating on some of the major areas like the oil and gas industry, agriculture, tourism, forestry, and science and technology. Specifically in forestry itself we are definitely promoting not only diversification in that sector but also diversification in the value adding of that particular area. A good example is the recent allocation of timber through the north-central timber allocation process, which approved a project adjacent to the Al-Pac site, the abcore project.

One part of the project is situated in one of the northern native communities of Wabasca, and the other one will be situated in Janvier-Conklin, which is another native community with very, very high unemployment.

What they will be doing there, actually, is something that's never really been done before: taking the best-quality aspen – that's the white aspen – and making dimensional lumber out of the aspen and chipping the balance of the wood into chips which will be sold to Alberta-Pacific to be turned into pulp. The bark will also be sold to Alberta-Pacific to be used for electrical generation.

After creating 100 jobs in each of these isolated communities with very high unemployment, the dimensional lumber will then be shipped to the Al-Pac site and dried using steam, which is the only way you can really afford to dry aspen, because it is very heavy and wet. What that will produce after it's dried is dimensional lumber, and it'll be remanufactured at the site and then delivered from there to Calgary. In Calgary the product will be finished for door framing, window trimming, and furniture components.

That is the type of value adding we are looking at at this time, and it's working very well. It is a complicated area, and it needs a lot of work to make sure that we can be competitive, economically viable for the companies, yet move toward that area rather than shipping raw product out of the province.

MR. WHITE: The last area we are interested in is the Senate forestry report chaired by a former colleague here, the Hon. Nicholas W. Taylor. Two of the recommendations that have some interest and application in Alberta are extending the tenure of an FMA holder from 25 years. The public may think it is an awfully long time, but when the regeneration of growth is a minimum 65 years to 100 years, it is a relatively short time. The recommendation is to extend those periods for that length of time but to review them every five years in a very, very open and public process that speaks to sustainability of their next five-year cut and the plan they have for sustaining and regrowth and replanting of their areas and the tending of those stands so that it's beyond merely plant and forget. It's plant. Three to five years hence it's brush. In seven to 10 years it's cull. The rest grows to harvest. That's one area of recommendation.

The second recommendation is to encourage the federal government and municipal governments to modify the tax structures on marginal farmland to encourage reforestation into woodlot operations to sustain the industry for longer periods of time. Those are the two comments and remarks.

MR. CARDINAL: Okay. The tenure you mentioned is a critical area. It's part of our long-term management of the forestry. It's critical that it be there. Presently under the quotas we have a five-year quadrant already in place, which is a public process in relation to business operating plans for the forestry sector. The public is definitely involved in FMAs and also the quotas in that particular area. The tenure from 20 to 80 years is also one that's been recommended by the timber quota review committee. Similar reasons are given in that it takes 130 years to grow a spruce or pine and maybe 60 to 70 years for an aspen. There's strong support from the industry to try and look at increasing the tenure.

The last issue you mentioned is modifying the tax structure. There is some activity already in northern Alberta where private woodlot operators are buying some land in areas where there's marginal farmland and planting spruce and pine trees. I think it's a good process, but there is some conflict because the agriculture industry in some of the areas feel that they cannot compete with large industries in relation to maintaining the farmland that comes up for sale, that they can't compete when it comes to purchasing. So it's a very touchy issue.

What we'll have to do, no doubt, is that each municipality may have to in the future identify what land is suitable for farming in relation to agriculture and what can be used for woodlot operation and other uses. There is some potential conflict, but I think it's workable as long as we can manage it.

MR. WHITE: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

If I might turn the questions now to the ministry responsible for management of the supply of electrical energy in the province. Here you're quoted as saying that the residual value of payback to Albertans for their regulated payment in the system – by that I assume that you mean the residual value in the existing power plants that have been supported by the regulated utility rates today. You further said, a rhetorical question I guess: well, say, how much is that? Your answer to your own question there is: hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars. Do you have an approximate value for that coming out of the PPAs in the balancing pool? Do you have a number where you'd say, well, that's a successful bid price or successful balancing pool?

DR. WEST: Unfortunately, due to the process, which is a public auction that will take place in July, it would be irresponsible for the Crown in the public interest to state any specific expectations of that.

We do have a position in the public interest as it relates to the auction, but nobody would go to an auction where they expected buyers to come into town and be presumptuous enough to tell the buyers what the value of this is before the auction took place. So I did say that there would be hundreds of millions, and I think that's because we have done certain prorated estimates of what these auctions should bring. But that's as far as I would go or else I would jeopardize the people of Alberta's position in this public auction.

MR. WHITE: You pose another question. What happens if they don't bid and it doesn't sell? That's the power purchase arrangements. Your answer then is: then we will take a third party and create a financial instrument and bid it into the pool ourselves. Would that not be just another form of government-regulated rate then?

DR. WEST: No, because we already have the evaluation of the PPAs, which by the independent assessment team have evaluated the individual output of each plant and have placed a value on that plant, so we have that fact to work with as well as the expectation of the market value of these plants as related to other sales throughout the known world. There's been a lot of electrical deregulation going on. So putting those two together, we could come up with a value of these plants that would return a good portion back to the people of Alberta.

It's a fallback position, but with the interest that we've had, Charles River Associates, which are going to run the public auction, have been out and had bidder sessions in Calgary and New York and London, England, and Toronto. This hon. member was at one of the bidder information sessions and asked a lot of questions, but you know that there are a considerable number of very good companies interested in that. We have 30 to 40 at the present time, and they will be asked at a certain point in time to meet certain specifications as far as bonding and interest and intent before we go to the auction in July.

I see the chairman has given me the end of this, and that's a good time to quit.

9:46

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Thank you, Mr. Minister. We do have a little bit of time left.

Edmonton-Ellerslie, you had a couple more questions you wanted to ask?

MS CARLSON: I do, sir. I would appreciate the opportunity.

Mr. Minister, earlier in your comments you talked about the EUB staff additions, where you said that 80 percent of them would be paid by industry. Now, I don't want you to flip out on this, but tell us why you think there'll be no conflict of interest in terms of their independence when 80 percent of their salaries are paid by industry.

DR. WEST: All right. In arm's-length legislated regulatory bodies the payment of the moneys has not been a conflict of interest. I'll give you one example. The National Energy Board, which you wouldn't question because they have been instrumental in many tough regulatory decisions, is 100 percent funded by industry, 100 percent. Therefore at the time that we set this up, we funded more of it as the Crown but have gone to an 80 percent level at the present time. We believe that most of that money that the industry puts forward is the day-to-day operations of the EUB in their vested position as far as licensing requirements, and therefore they should pay it, not the individual citizens of the province of Alberta. We are in the process of evaluating what is in the Crown's interest and what is in the public interest as far as the various operations on a day-to-day basis of the EUB.

Let me put it this way. They have put forth a proposal to fund it 50-50 rather than 80-20, but that would be on the side of the operation that's involved in protection of the public interest, such as inspections, the dispute mechanisms, and other areas that we put in to ensure that their standards are met and that certain requirements are met as stated by policy and by legislation.

Now, on a day-to-day application of 22,000 licences, like we had a year ago, many of those are for wells, for routine gas plants, batteries, routine connecting pipelines and that. The industry would still be required to pay that portion. I think that in the new formula we're looking at one portion would be almost 100 percent; the other portion might be met by 50-50. I've asked the EUB to bring forth a proposal that would address that. Once again, understand that the National Energy Board is 100 percent funded by industry.

MS CARLSON: Good. Thank you.

I would like to go back to the sour gas well issue in Calgary for a moment. You made some reference to the task force that was put together there in terms of decisions to review the safety regulations with respect to sour gas. That's excellent. We're very happy to see that happening. Can you tell us when that task force will report and what opportunities there will be for public input?

In addition to that, you talked about the 18 special requirements that were put in place around that gas well that is in close proximity to acreages, and we think that's very good, but once again the concern for those in the community is the monitoring process. Is there anything being put in place whereby the EUB will come up with a report card or something of a similar nature on an annual basis telling the residents that are in close proximity how well the company has done in terms of meeting the special requirements?

DR. WEST: Well, the task force should report in October, for the answer to that.

Now, all I can say on your second question is that I have before me and I had stated that there are conditions set out by the EUB as it relates to certain wells, and some of them are very intense conditions. In those it states that in this case

Cdn 88 shall develop a casing bowl welding procedure by a qualified professional engineer to be included in the detailed drilling plan [and submit that to the EUB].

Cdn 88 shall submit a report respecting the review of steel mill heat certificates for the casing and drill pipe to be used in the construction of the 10-35 well.

Cdn 88 shall satisfy the Board that ARP 1.2.5 New Grade E Specifications and/or ARP 1.2.6 SS-95 Drill Pipe Specifications or better will be used for the drilling of the 10-35 well.

There are 18 of these, and each well that's proposed in these areas carries a condition set out by the EUB, and in this case it's 18, and, yes, there are reporting procedures and, as well, inspection procedures by the EUB that must be met. This one is the most intensified set of conditions that I have ever seen in the province of Alberta. It goes on:

Cdn 88 shall commit to detailed EUB drilling rig inspections prior to spud, and drill out of intermediate casing, including blowout prevention drills.

Drilling and testing in the critical zone shall not take place other than during the summer months, in particular, not before April nor after October.

Cdn 88 shall demonstrate and implement immediate ignition within one minute of the ignition criteria being met.

Cdn 88 shall test all key components of its ERP, including the computerized telephone call out system, communications equipment, communication linkages including outside services, evacuation procedures, and ignition procedures and satisfy the Board that the systems are in order for immediate implementation, prior to drilling into the critical sour zone.

Mr. Chairman, I need not go on, but these are excellent conditions. Would you like to hear a few more of them?

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would suggest that you just table the document.

MS CARLSON: Thank you.

I wasn't questioning how excellent those conditions were, because we think the special requirements are excellent. My question was with regard to the monitoring of those requirements and then the reporting back to the people who live in that area. So I'm hoping that you'll address that.

DR. WEST: Well, I was reading this because these are the conditions, and the EUB will be monitoring this.

MS CARLSON: No, no. I do not see in that document the reporting-back process to constituents, which is the essence of my question.

DR. WEST: Well, I'll have to read on if she didn't get it.

MS CARLSON: If you table the document, we will see if that is specifically in there, but if it is not, then I would specifically hope that you will answer that question.

Now the review of standards for sweet gas wells. I must receive 15 or 20 letters a week in my office in terms of the problems around standards. People do not feel that the setback of only 200 metres is sufficient. They think there should be a much wider area of notification. There are water quality and air pollution issues, soil contamination. I'm hoping that the task force that you talked about with the county of Strathcona is going to address these issues. If not, can you tell me what process will?

These questions are: will the government review standards for drilling sweet gas wells and oil wells and setbacks? Will the government consider a policy be put forward that no drilling be allowed above a certain population density? Will you require that existing operators in an area be required to provide evidence about the standards on their existing wells, specifically things like supply reports on cement casings? People are very worried that their water supplies will be contaminated and that problems will remain long after the gas or oil is extracted. Over the past year I've listened to several scientific reviews where there is some scientific evidence that in fact water supplies can be contaminated as a result of drilling and blasting. So those are issues that I would like addressed.

I'll just carry on with some more questions. I've a couple of other issues, and perhaps you can get back in writing, Mr. Minister. My final questions are with regard to forestry. When I've been out taking a look at the landscape over the past year, I saw some areas that I've been told are test areas where they've applied chemical treatment to retard aspen growth in some of the FMAs, and it literally looks like chemicals have been poured on the ground and disintegrated everything within sight. It doesn't look like a very good practice to me, and I am hoping that you can comment on that.

My other question is with regard to oxidation levels in the water downstream of pulp and paper mills. Now, I know you've got standards and the standards are pretty good, but it seems to me that as the water flows down the stream, it doesn't completely recuperate naturally in terms of oxidization, so some pulp and paper mills closer to the headwaters have an advantage in terms of the amount of work and costs they have to incur in order to ensure that the oxidation output for their pulp and paper plant meets the standards as compared to those downstream. So if you could give me some answers to any of those questions, preferably in writing, at some point, I would appreciate that.

I think my colleague has just a couple of questions. Did you want to run through those quickly?

DR. WEST: Just in the format here I'd like to answer the questions. I think that if I understood four of the questions, the answer is yes, yes, yes, and yes. On the water quality and that: absolutely, we will ensure the utmost security of water quality in the drilling in this province. We do ongoing hydrology tests, and the EUB is very stringent in their policies as it relates to that.

MR. CARDINAL: On the forestry side, both of those questions – and this is what makes it tough, because the split between environmental protection and the forestry development side took place, you know, less than a year ago. It's taking time for the public to generally understand who's responsible for what, and both of those questions would be under the jurisdiction of Gary Mar, the Minister of Environment. Either we could pass those on to Gary, or when you do his estimates, you could ask those same questions. No doubt he can answer them. Both of them are definitely under Environment.

MS CARLSON: If you could pass them on, I would appreciate it, because we won't have much time on those. I'm hoping that I'll get a little more detail in terms of those other questions I asked. Yeses are nice but a little detail would be preferred.

Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I'm sorry. In fairness to the committee, we did have agreement around the table about what the process was going to be, and I have a request from Calgary-Egmont. Calgary-Egmont.

MR. HERARD: Yeah. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I had a couple of questions for the minister, but I've decided to spare him tonight. So I'm just going to move that we rise and report.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: It is actually an appropriate motion, so the motion is on the floor. All in favour?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: It's carried.

[The subcommittee adjourned at 9:59 p.m.]

Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2000

MRS. LAING: Mr. Speaker, I request leave to introduce Bill 16, being the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2000.

This act fine-tunes and clarifies existing condominium law and allows for greater flexibility without eroding the consumer protection it affords.

MR. HANCOCK: Mr. Speaker, I move that Bill 16 be moved onto the Order Paper under Government Bills and Orders.

[Motion carried]

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment.

MR. DUNFORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to table with the Assembly the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association 1998 radiation protection program annual report.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I request leave to table with the Assembly five copies of a letter sent by myself to the Hon. Allan Rock. The letter outlines rather thoroughly our opposition to some of the remarks made in a recent speech in Calgary.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm tabling 11 letters and e-mails that I've received. They are from Calgary, Medicine Hat, Vegreville, Red Deer, Westrose, and Edmonton. All of the writers of these letters are opposed to Bill 11 and other forms of privatization of the public health care system.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. DICKSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm delighted to table this afternoon the requisite number of copies of a report that confirms that private MRI clinics were not in operation prior to May 1993.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I have the appropriate number of copies of a report that is titled Klein Praises Block Funding. In responding to the reduction of federal transfer payments, the Premier said that this allows us to be more flexible; remove the strings; give us the money; we can manage it.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Norwood.

MS OLSEN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I, too, have a report I'd like to table that states that Premier Klein says that he's considering letting investors buy hospitals in the province and run them as money-making private facilities: give us a proposal; we're willing to consider anything.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my privilege to table the requisite number of copies of a report. What's considered a nonessential health service may vary from one region to another, says Premier Ralph Klein.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

1:40

MS LEIBOVICI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me great pleasure this afternoon to table a report with regards to some comments made by the former Treasurer of Alberta and current chair of the Calgary regional health authority, Mr. Dinning, wherein he said that hospitals should be built, owned, and operated by private businesses.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

MR. WICKMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to table five copies of a report called Health Care Up For Sale? in which the Premier indicates that profit-making health care would not exclude foreigners that wanted to pay full price.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I, too, would like to table a report in which the Premier is advising day cares, hospitals, and universities to look at having bingos and raffles to offset provincial budget cuts.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With your permission I would like to table five copies of a report in which the Premier indicated that Alberta hospitals might be allowed to market their services inside and outside the province as a way to raise cash.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings here. One is the growth of private, nonhospital surgical facilities in Alberta under this Premier. It's up by 49 percent.

The other one is five copies of this nonhospital surgical facilities listing, copies of that as well.

THE SPEAKER: The Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With your permission I would like to table the appropriate number of copies where it indicates that the Premier wants to market health care and also where he says that there's an opportunity for some entrepreneurship in the health care business.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The Member for Edmonton-Calder.

MR. WHITE: Thank you, sir. I rise to present the requisite number of copies of a report that outlines the concerns raised by Calgarians and the millions of dollars of taxpayers' money that was spent on hospital construction and equipment just prior to the demolition and/or sale of those hospitals. It contains a quote by the MP from Calgary, Jason Kenney, then the head of the Association of Alberta Taxpayers: it was stupid planning and bad planning not to have frozen projects at the time.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

MR. GIBBONS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I beg leave to table five copies of a report from the Premier in which he says that private hospitals should be allowed to expand in Alberta.

MR. MacDONALD: Mr. Speaker, I also would like this afternoon to table a report. In it the Premier states: Jane Fulton is calling a spade a spade, and I don't think that's reason to cause fear in the minds of the Alberta public.

Thank you.

head: Introduction of Guests

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Government Services.

MRS. NELSON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to members of the Legislative Assembly some very distinguished representatives from the condominium industry. These people represent both owners and developers of condominiums, and they were a part of a working committee established last summer to help develop the legislation that was tabled moments ago as Bill 16, the Condominium Property Amendment Act, 2000. This piece of legislation, that has had its fair share of controversy over the past four years, has been instrumental in bringing forward a group of people to resolve these difficulties, and I believe quite frankly that if they hadn't come together, we wouldn't be able to introduce the amendments that we introduced today.

So I'd like to thank them and introduce them to this Assembly. Seated in the members' gallery are Greg Christenson, the chair of the Alberta Home Builders' Association Condominium Act Task Force; Grant Ainsley, the executive director of the Alberta Home Builders' Association; Marc Bateman, the president of the south Alberta chapter of the Canadian Condominium Institute and a national board member; Deborah Howes, the director of the north Alberta chapter of the Condominium Institute; Dennis Little, president and chief executive officer of the Alberta home warranty program; Victoria Archer, member of the north Alberta chapter of the Canadian Condominium Institute; Sky Wensel, Q.C., counsel for the Alberta home warranty program. Also joining us are Diane Bush, president of the Alberta Home Builders' Association and marketing director of First National Properties. And last but definitely not least I'd like to introduce the person whose task it was to actually put Bill 16 together: Frances Cruden, legislative adviser with consumer and corporate services division in my department. I'd like all these people to please rise and receive the very warm welcome of this Assembly.

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, today it is a distinct honour and privilege to introduce to you and through you to this Assembly 17 visitors who are seated in the members' gallery from Sherwood Park United Church. They are with their leaders today George and Norma Campbell and also Sheila McLachlin. I would ask all of us to give them our warm appreciation for their visit, in some cases their first visit here.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul.

MR. LANGEVIN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure this afternoon to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly eight students from the Dr. Swift middle school in Lac La Biche. The students are accompanied today by teacher Mrs. Linda Johnson and also two teacher aides, Ms Shauna Hannin and Ms Andrea Fries. I would like to ask our visitors to please rise and be recognized by the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly this afternoon 44 students, two teachers, and seven parents from Hardisty junior high. The group is led by Mrs. Lougheed. It is noteworthy to all hon. members of this Assembly that she has a very soft spot in her heart for one of our members, the very distinguished hon. Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan. The other teacher is Mr. Foo. Parents helping out today are Mrs. Diane Franke, Mrs. Judy Ekkelenkamp, Mrs. Joy Johnston, Mrs. Farrant, Mrs. Foerger, Mrs. Gaudin, and Mrs. Milton. These students I believe are in both galleries, and if they would now rise and receive the warm and traditional welcome of the Assembly, I would be grateful.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Associate Minister of Aboriginal Affairs.

MS CALAHASEN: Mr. Speaker, thank you very much. Today I have the distinct pleasure of introducing to you and through you to the Members of the Legislative Assembly a group that I think is very interested in what's happening. However, they won't be coming in until 2 o'clock, and they will be leaving before question period is over. I'd like to have it on the record that they were warmly welcomed by the Legislative Assembly. They're a group of students from Little Buffalo school from Little Buffalo, Alberta, and they are accompanied by three staff: Mr. Darsh Ramrattan, Mr. Wayne Fabing, and teacher assistant Arleyne Noskey. There are 12 junior high and senior high school students. I'd ask that the Assembly please just give them a warm welcome for the record.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

MRS. MacBETH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am very pleased to today to introduce three visitors to our Legislature. They are from Oakville, Ontario. They are Catherine Niles and her two sons, Steven and Philip. They are also visiting our Legislature and are here for some time. Their father and husband happens to be a very important worker with our caucus in the Official Opposition. He certainly helps us a lot, and I would like to invite the Niles family to please rise and receive a very warm welcome from the Alberta Legislature.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly two visitors to Alberta. Laara Ong from Vancouver and Patrick Gallagher from Toronto are here while they are performing in local playwright Marty Chan's show, Mom, Dad, I'm Living With a White Girl. The show is on at the bus barns. They are with us until this Sunday. They are accompanied by the show's director, Ben Henderson, and I would ask all three of them to please rise and accept the warm and traditional welcome of the House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

1:50

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my distinct privilege today to introduce Reverend Dr. Charles Garbovitsky, a resident of Edmonton-Highlands, who is vehemently opposed to Bill 11. Dr. Garbovitsky is seated in the public gallery. I'll ask him to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

head: Oral Question Period

THE SPEAKER: First main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Private Health Services

MRS. MacBETH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In order to assist Albertans who may be watching question period on the television, we wanted to assist them in getting more information on the government's rather weak case for privatizing health care. This government has in fact referenced eight studies on private hospitals in support of its private hospitals legislation. Interestingly, three of these studies are from the '70s, and one even uses data from the 1950s and '60s. This is no doubt because, as The New England Journal of Medicine reported in August, "for decades . . . no peer-reviewed study has found that for-profit hospitals are less expensive." My questions are to the Premier. Why is the Premier using data on private hospitals to support Bill 11 when he keeps telling Albertans that he is not interested in private hospitals?

MR. KLEIN: First of all, Mr. Speaker, it is again misinformation and simply not true that the legislation refers to private hospitals. It does exactly the opposite. It says "no person shall operate a private hospital." And relative to any reference to private hospital legislation, that question is absolutely irrelevant.

You know, Mr. Speaker, the opposition and their Friends of Medicare and CUPE and all the other unions want Albertans to believe that private providers are evil and have no place in the publicly funded system. The leader of the Liberal opposition wants to force private providers to opt out of the publicly funded system. The AMA said it best when it called that policy a disaster for health care in Alberta and, indeed, across the country.

Mr. Speaker, private providers are and always have been an important part of the public health care system. How do these people over there think health care works? You know, it absolutely astounds me that the leader of the Liberal opposition, the former minister of health, has no idea how the health care system works. Perhaps if she asks me the next question, I'll explain it to her.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, the Premier didn't answer the question. These are his own studies that he referenced.

If Bill 11 has nothing to do with private hospitals, then why again is this government's evidence for why they need this legislation based largely on private hospital data?

MR. KLEIN: It isn't. It's based on what is already taking place in the system. Virtually the whole system is based on the government through its health authorities paying private providers to provide medical services and supplies. There are now nearly 4,500 doctors in Alberta, most of them with for-profit professional corporations, that bill health care for services and supplies and charge fees that have overhead costs built into them.

Mr. Speaker, if all the private doctors were to opt out, who would be left? Well, CUPE would be left. Right. We could have Dr. Judy Darcy and Dr. Terry Mutton doing hip replacements. The Friends of Medicare would be left. We could have Dr. Christine Burdette doing heart surgeries. Of course, Dr. Harold Swanson, who's the only legitimate doctor, could join her, provided he was now willing to work for free. You know, he could do that. The federal government would be left. We could have Dr. Allan Rock and his assistant, Diane Marleau, to do brain surgery. That would be something.

Mr. Speaker, the fact is that private providers are and always have been the backbone of the public health care system. The issue isn't private providers. The issue isn't who will pay. The only issue is: where will private providers be allowed to do procedures and under what conditions? That's what Bill 11 is all about.

MRS. MacBETH: Well, Mr. Speaker, as usual the Premier didn't answer the question.

The answer is one of two things: either they have no evidence, so they're using data from the '50s and '60s to support their case, or their actual intention is to bring in a private hospitals bill. Which is it: no evidence or private hospitals?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, there's lots of evidence, and I'll go on. There are no private hospitals. Right now there are 588 chiropractors, 233 opticians, 278 optometrists, 1,414 dentists, 188 denturists, 38 podiatrists, 769 pharmacies, 375 ground ambulances, 14 air ambulances, 52 surgical facilities, 38 of which were commissioned by the leader of the Liberal opposition, many physiotherapy clinics, rehab clinics, child physiologists, walk-in clinics, medicentres: all privately owned and operated and paid to do work for the public health care system. Who would do the work if we banned them from the private sector in health? Who would do the work? The Liberals? Dr. MacBeth would do the work?

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, one of the studies that's been referenced by this government is almost 30 years old and in fact, as I say, uses data from the 1950s. It reaches no conclusion about the effectiveness of private hospitals, let alone their suitability in Alberta in the 21st century. It's really a stretch even for this government to suggest that this study and others like it have any relevance to the debate on Bill 11. What it does show is a government scrambling for anything, no matter how remote or irrelevant, to back up their ill-conceived scheme. My questions again are to the Premier with his script. This study on private hospitals in the 1950s and '60s: what relevance does it have for Alberta in the 21st century?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do indeed have a script, and the script is in anticipation of the questions which are so predictable. Right.

You know, Mr. Speaker, first of all, the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition alluded to a private hospitals bill. There is no private hospitals bill. Until she alludes to the proper bill, the question is irrelevant, and I won't answer it.

Thank you.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, getting back to the question, by using these outdated studies on private hospitals, is the Premier telling Albertans that there are no current studies or evidence that exists to back him up in his support for private hospitals through Bill 11?

2:00

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again, Bill 11 does not allude to private hospitals. As a matter of fact, Bill 11 talks about "No person shall operate a private hospital." The leader of the Liberal opposition refers and alludes to the bill as the private hospitals bill. Again, I would suggest that the question is irrelevant.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, why is this Premier relying on outdated studies and outdated information when there are current studies done here in Canada and right here in Alberta that are far more relevant to this issue? Is it because their own studies have said that Bill 11 is wrong for Alberta?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, Bill 11 is not wrong for Alberta. It sets in place very clear and very precise rules for the operation of surgical clinics, something, by the way, the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition failed to do or ignored or didn't want to do when she was the minister of health.

Mr. Speaker, when the leader of the Liberal opposition was minister of health, she made a claim in a speech, and I'm going to table copies of the speech. This was after she was the health minister and sort of between jobs, not that she has a real one now. "Until 1993 private sector initiatives were limited to specialized, niche markets where a profit could be made without subsidy." The fact is that there were 38 surgical facilities doing day surgeries for the public system and charging patient facility fees when she was the minister of health, and she did nothing about it.

MRS. MacBETH: Mr. Speaker, just to help Albertans understand the lack of studies, interestingly the only current study tabled by this government to justify its private hospitals bill is the World Health Organization's report entitled Making a Difference. However, the government released only a portion of this report and in fact misrepresented the intent of this report. In fact, the report points to the Canadian public system as a model for other countries and does nothing, not a thing, to suggest that introducing private hospitals or clinics or surgical facilities or whatever they want to call them will improve the Canadian system. My questions are to the Premier. Why did the Premier only table one portion of the report, which misleads Albertans to understand what the report really says?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, if there was another portion of the report that alluded to the health system in Canada being fundamentally right and the right system, she's absolutely correct. The leader of the Liberal opposition is absolutely correct. That's why we have put in as our preamble absolute adherence to the fundamental principles of the Canada Health Act. If they're opposed to that section of the bill, then stand up and say so.

Mr. Speaker, again, the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition alluded to private hospitals and the private hospitals bill. There is no such bill on the table. There is a bill that alludes to surgical clinics. There are now 52 surgical facilities in Alberta, none of them charging patients facility fees, unlike the clinics that were operating when the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition was minister of health. They were all charging facility fees. So far the public health system is still standing, despite facilities being able to do surgeries that require up to 12 hours.

The hon. leader of the Liberal opposition is asking us to believe that anything over 12 hours will destroy medicare. That's what she's saying: anything over 12 hours will destroy medicare. Mr. Speaker, will this hon. member stand up and say at what hour the destructive mechanism kicks in? Is it 13 hours or 14 hours or 15 or 23 or 27 hours? Will she stand up and say at what hour the so-called destructive, her suggestion, mechanism kicks in? Stand up and answer the question. She doesn't have the courage.

MRS. MacBETH: Well, Mr. Speaker, the Premier will get plenty of chances to ask questions from the opposition benches after the next election.

Mr. Speaker, my question, going back to the studies, is: why does this Premier continue to misrepresent the World Health Organization 1999 report when in fact that report holds Canada out as a shining example of how to provide universal, single-tier, single-payer health care in an industrialized country? Why does this Premier want to privatize it and wreck it?

MR. KLEIN: We want to maintain it, and we want to protect it. That's why the bill is called the health protection act.

You know, again I go back to the report to which the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition alludes. The 1999 World Health Organization report made the following conclusions about the role of the private sector in health. And, yes, I will accept that they also said that Canada has fundamentally the best system. That's why we have put in the preamble, Mr. Speaker, absolute adherence to the fundamental principles of the Canada Health Act. If they're opposed to it, then stand up and say that they're opposed to at least the preamble of the bill. Are you opposed . . . [interjections]

You know, Mr. Speaker, the Member for Edmonton-Glenora is yap, yap, yap. No substance. You know, a lot of mouth, no substance.

Mr. Speaker, I'll read it. This is from the World Health Organization report.

- Services may be offered by providers of all types. Provided that health practices and health facilities meet certain quality standards and that they are subject to similar levels of managerial flexibility, their ownership status should not matter.

Now, if the report goes on to say that Canada has the best health care system in the world, then fine; I would find that very flattering. That's why we have put in the preamble, as I say, absolute adherence and compliance with the Canada Health Act, both the spirit and the intent of the law. If they're opposed to it, stand up and say so.

MRS. MacBETH: Well, Mr. Speaker, instead of relying on outdated studies from the '50s and '60s and instead of misrepresenting what in fact is in the World Health Organization report, will this Premier commit to overseeing an independent study of our current system done here in Alberta by some of the excellent researchers that we have in our universities before he plunges headlong into his demise in the private hospital system?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I just received the tablings. These are not reports. This is another blatant example of malicious misinformation. They table newspaper articles as a report; as a report. This is entitled a report: "Health care may vary by region - Klein." It's a newspaper article. Another one, they table it as a report. You want to talk about misleading. It's a newspaper article. This one here was tabled as a report. Again, it's another newspaper article. This is the closest to a report that they've come. It's actually the answer to a written question. This one here, another one: they tabled it as a report. How misleading. How deceptive. And there's more and more. How intellectually poor. How intellectually drained they are to take newspaper articles and table them as reports. How intellectually poor they are.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. interim leader of the third party.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Premier has claimed on many occasions that the government's scheme to legalize private, for-profit hospitals does not violate the Canada Health Act. A detailed legal opinion prepared by two senior lawyers who are experts in constitutional and regulatory law – and this report was just released today – concludes that the Premier is wrong. My questions are to the Premier. Why is the Premier pressing ahead with legislation that two prominent constitutional lawyers have concluded violates the comprehensiveness, universality, and accessibility principles of the Canada Health Act?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. leader of the third party that the preamble to the bill – you know, he is a very intelligent man. Read the preamble to the bill. The preamble, which sets the tone and lays out the framework for the bill, says absolutely without question that we will adhere to the principles of the Canada Health Act.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. How can the Premier justify proceeding with legislation that purports to ban private, for-profit hospitals when two constitutional lawyers have concluded that this so-called prohibition is simply an attempt to mislead Albertans?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. leader is asking me to comment on a legal opinion, and you know, there are as many legal opinions as there are fish in the sea. So I won't comment.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Why won't the Premier admit the obvious, that there is no public support or expert backing for legalizing private, for-profit hospitals, and withdraw Bill 11?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again, the hon. member alludes to private, for-profit hospitals. There is nothing in Bill 11 that alludes in any way, shape, or form to the privatization of hospitals. As a matter of fact, section 1 says that "no person shall operate a private hospital." The question is irrelevant.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Support for Agriculture

MR. MARZ: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Just over two weeks ago the Prime Minister announced a farm aid package designed specifically to exclude Alberta producers. Today . . .

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Shame. Shame.

MR. MARZ: That's right.

Today the Premier of Alberta and the minister of agriculture announced a onetime agricultural assistance package for Alberta farmers. This announcement contains no federal money even though agricultural safety net programs are traditionally funded by provinces and the federal government. Last week the members of the opposition across the way were recorded in this House as saying that Alberta farmers were out $25 million as a result of the Prime Minister's announcements. My questions are to the Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development. What did the province contribute today, and what does the minister expect the federal government to contribute to the program in the future?

MR. LUND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today's announcement totaled $145 million. We have taken the numbers – we still don't know how the federal government arrived at the numbers for Saskatchewan and Manitoba – and applied them to a tonnage basis, which seems to be the way they are going. If you extrapolate that over into Alberta and use the 60-40 formula, that would mean that the federal government would owe us about $103 million.

Incidentally, we today sent them an invoice for the $103 million. We're not going to charge any GST. If we get the money, we're going to send it directly out to farmers, and we won't charge any handling fee.

If you look at the amount of money that the province of Alberta put in today, we in fact have just about doubled what would be required under a 60-40 arrangement based on the other calculations. I think that the government of Alberta has stepped up to the plate big time and is going to try to make sure that Alberta farmers are treated equitably in Canada.

MR. MARZ: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: could the minister tell me how farmers will receive the provincial assistance and the federal assistance, if and when it arrives?

MR. LUND: Mr. Speaker, under the announcement today it will be distributed on a per acre basis, the bulk of the money, some $121 million based on $4.29 per acre. A very simple application form – as a matter of fact, it's just a one-pager. If you have a Wheat Board permit book, the one page out of the Wheat Board permit book will suffice to verify the acres. If you don't have a permit book, then in fact it will require the application form to be filled out and notarized.

If we are successful in getting the money from the feds, any amount, we in fact will be distributing it to the farmers immediately based on the application that they've submitted under this particular program.

MR. MARZ: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister again: why has the government chosen to distribute aid by an acreage payment when it has been promoting targeted assistance for so long?

MR. LUND: Mr. Speaker, there is a real cash flow crunch in the agricultural community, and it's very important that this money be distributed before seeding. So we're trying to get the money distributed as quickly as possible and without complicated forms. When you look at the ability to do that through an acreage payment, that's why we went this route.

Now, we have to remember that the farm income disaster program is a very targeted program. It targets the areas that are having a disaster. We've also got the hail and crop insurance program. Once again, it targets a disaster. So I think we've got a combination of the two. We've got targeted programs that will go toward disaster areas, and we now are coming out with a broad program that will get the money out fast. It will assist with the input costs that are continually going up. We have a great cost to get grain from the elevator to the port, so we'll be assisting in those kinds of costs that the farmer is bearing.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, followed by the hon. Member for Medicine Hat.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Misrepresenting to Albertans outdated studies on private hospitals is all this government can find to justify the ramming of Bill 11 through the Legislature. My questions are to the Premier. Is the Premier telling Albertans that Bill 11 is based on a 1972 study that he tabled by Kenneth Clarkson about U.S. private hospitals?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, there was too much noise, and I didn't hear all of the question. The only things I heard were "misleading" and "reports." The only people who are misleading anyone are the Liberals across the way by tabling in such a deceptive way newspaper clippings as reports. That is the only thing that is misleading.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My second question will also be for the Premier. Is the Premier telling Albertans that Bill 11 is based on a 1972 study that he tabled by Kenneth Clarkson about U.S. private hospitals?

MR. KLEIN: In 1972, Mr. Speaker, I was working for CFCN television. I don't recall tabling any such study, but if it's there, then send it over. Nineteen seventy-two. That was a long time ago. The only thing similar in 1972 and today is the price of oil. Right. That's about it.

MRS. MacBETH: Well, then why did you table it as support for your bill?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have no idea.

MR. MacDONALD: Now, Mr. Speaker, that's leadership.

Can the Premier explain to Albertans why an American psychiatric hospital study that goes back to 1970 and was tabled in this Legislative Assembly has relevance in the discussion? Your government brought it forward right now in the discussion about Bill 11. Where does this study talk about surgical facilities and contracting out? Albertans want to know.

MR. KLEIN: I don't recall tabling any such report. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. Minister of Health and Wellness can shed some light on this particular situation. But going back to 1972. I mean, this is digging deeper and deeper and deeper and deeper. That just goes to show how intellectually bankrupt they really are.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, I recall a number of tablings. One was a set of studies that had undergone peer review – that is, review by physicians and scholars – and had been given approval for general publication in medical journals and so forth. Today they're firing quite a few blanks across the way, and you never know what they're saying or what they're alluding to.

Mr. Speaker, in a couple of those research studies – one of the things that is done in one that I remember particularly is that they do reference the beginning of studies, period, in terms of the operation of hospitals, and then they trace the different studies that have been done up until the present, where we've had a public health care system in this country. They emphasize in those research papers very clearly the current situation in North America. But the fact that they start out with a preface or an introduction which references studies in the area of health care is quite common to research papers.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Medicine-Hat, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Education Funding

MR. RENNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the past few weeks I've been discussing the issue of K to 12 education funding with both parents and teachers in my constituency. At the outset of the provincial budget there was a good deal of optimism when the announcement regarding a 9 percent increase in education funding was put on the table. That was somewhat moderated when further investigation indicated that there is, in fact, a 3 percent increase in the base funding grant. My question is to the Minister of Learning. With a 3 percent increase in the base funding grant, where is the other 6 percent going?

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. That's an absolutely excellent question. One of the issues that I have heard as I go out and talk to school boards as well is the total issue of being on core funding. Quite simply, I will outline to the hon. member where the dollars are, the amount of dollars, and what is being spent.

Mr. Speaker, there is a $143 million increase in the basic instructional grant. I must point out that that includes a 3 percent increase on the base budget plus a 2 percent increase on enrollment. The budget is adjusted for enrollment. So if you're in a school jurisdiction, for example, that had a 5 percent increase, you would see a 5 percent plus a 3 percent increase.

There's also a $17 million increase in special needs. This represents a 16 percent increase in that budget. There's also $38 million in the Alberta initiative for school improvement. There's another $31 million in support grants, which are the administration, the transportation, the operation and maintenance grants. The direct dollar amount to the classroom comes out to 8.8 percent, and those are actual dollars that are realized in the classroom.

Mr. Speaker, what we then did is we separated out other aspects of the budget. When we say 8.8 percent, that is the direct amount into the classroom.

On top of that, there are also things like $22 million for the teachers' pension plan. There's $13 million for early childhood services. There's $5 million for private schools. There's $4 million for other types of programs, and, Mr. Speaker, there is $11 million included in that for student health.

That's the long answer. The short answer to the hon. member is that there's actually a 9.5 percent increase of which 8.8 percent goes directly into the classroom.

MR. RENNER: My supplemental question, Mr. Speaker, is to the same minister. Given that wages and other related costs are increasing at or perhaps more than 3 percent, how will the minister ensure that this 8.8 percent that he talks about actually gets to the classroom and addresses the issue of increasing class sizes?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, there are two ways this can occur. First of all, the Alberta initiative for school improvement: we anticipate that a lot of the $66 million that will be put into it over the next two fiscal years or one school calendar year will be used to address class size.

Mr. Speaker, the school boards also have room in their 3 percent, plus their enrollment growth. Again, I must emphasize that that can be in the area of 4 to 5 percent. The school boards have the flexibility to use those moneys to address class size.

MR. RENNER: My final question to the same minister: given that the budget also discusses addressing the needs of special-needs students, can the minister outline exactly how those needs will be addressed?

DR. OBERG: Sure, Mr. Speaker. That's an excellent question. Over the last six or seven months there have been numerous examples of the importance that this government places on special-needs education. In the last budget, as I already mentioned, there is a 16 percent increase. You can put on top of that a $2 million increase that was announced past the budget. What this $2 million does is allow school boards that receive children with special needs to receive money. As well, the school that had transferred the student can keep their money. The reason behind this is that the school that has transferred the student has put in place the program and therefore has contracted that out and must continue to supply that service.

Mr. Speaker, I would just go back to what has happened over the past year. Probably the most significant thing to the hon. member was the lifting of the special-needs cap. Again, we are funding today on the actual number of students that are there. This is a huge step forward. But I must stress with special needs that it's up somewhere in the 16 to 17 percent area.

MR. WICKMAN: Mr. Speaker, the Premier is expecting Albertans to go down the Bill 11 private health care road based on out-of-date studies and the misrepresentation of other studies. All the current, pertinent data clearly shows that Bill 11 simply will not work. To the Premier: is the Premier telling Albertans that Bill 11 is supported by an 1982 study that his government tabled about private U.S. nuclear medicine hospitals? What does this have to do with the 21st century in Alberta?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I'm sure the study to which the hon. member alludes is one of literally dozens of studies that have been tabled in this Legislature on the question. I'm sure the hon. Minister of Health and Wellness is more familiar with the specifics of that study. Perhaps he is; perhaps he's not. I'll have him respond anyway.

MR. JONSON: There seems to be in the hon. member's question a reference to nuclear medicine not being relevant to today's overall health care situation, but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that nuclear medicine is very much part of the forward-thinking and evidence-based health care that's being provided.

The tabling that is probably being referred to – I would just like to draw the attention of hon. members to a 1997 study that was tabled in this Assembly: Should We Worry About Hospitals' High Administrative Costs? by Stuart H. Altman, with his doctorate, and David Shactman. It's in The New England Journal of Medicine, which is a highly reputable publication that I'm sure would not publish anything that was not accurate, Mr. Speaker.

Secondly, we tabled with the Assembly an article from the Journal of Economic Behaviour & Organization, with Jerilyn Coles and William Hesterly being the authors. This was in 1998, not too long ago, Mr. Speaker.

We also tabled from the Journal of Productivity Analysis, authors Gary Ferrier and Vivian Valdmanis: this was from 1996. They determined that in a rural setting public hospitals were inefficient compared to private hospitals. That was the basis for their research.

I could work my way down the line, Mr. Speaker.

MR. WICKMAN: Mr. Speaker, if he is relying on an '82 study, let me try this one. My second question: is the Premier telling Albertans that Bill 11 is based on a 1976 study by Cotton Lindsay on administration in U.S. private hospitals? I thought this wasn't about private hospitals.

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, there have been dozens and dozens of studies tabled in this Legislature on the issue of health care and health care delivery. The hon. Minister of Health and Wellness is much more familiar than I am with these studies. He has them all in hand.

MR. JONSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, let's go to 1976, a good year. Lindsay, the author of this particular journal article, again as I've said, from a credible medical publication, says that public hospitals keep patients longer and skimp on activities such as bedside manner and cleaning floors. That is still as relevant today as it was then, and this is the basis for this research.

MR. WICKMAN: My last question, Mr. Speaker: why does the Premier choose to ignore the conclusion of one of the studies his government tabled called Rural Hospital Performance and Its Correlates, which shows that for-profit medicine will focus on urban areas and create further disadvantages for rural areas?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, again I repeat that there have been dozens and dozens of studies tabled in this Legislature by both sides of the Assembly. This all adds to the public debate on Bill 11, and that's what we encourage. For a change I actually commend the Liberal Party for bringing up these studies, because they all contribute to the debate. I think that once the bill comes up for second reading those studies that have been tabled by the government, by the way, will be quite germane to the debate that will ensue.

Relative to the specific study, I'll have the hon. minister reply.

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated previously, these are very credible pieces of research or studies that have been done in this area. They are well worth reading and well worth considering as part of this debate. They also acknowledge in the reports certain downsides to private provision as well as some of the positives. I think that's the mark of credible writing, credible publications, quite different from newspaper articles and blank-page reports, which seem to be the vehicle for the Liberals entering this debate.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Enhanced Health Services

MRS. FORSYTH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There has been a lot of publicity about charges for enhanced goods and services, both in public hospitals and in private clinics. Some of my constituents have expressed their concern to me about the fact that Albertans may be paying unfair prices for enhanced products. My questions are all to the Minister of Health and Wellness. What action is government going to take to address this matter?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, we have reviewed and been aware for some time that there is a concern about the variability in terms of the provision of enhanced goods and services and also the pricing thereof. These of course are – and I would like to emphasize this; it's very important – devices or services that are not essential. They are not medically required. They are not covered by the Canada Health Act with respect to our system. Of course, our system covers all those insured services for the public of this province.

Mr. Speaker, we have recently issued a directive to the regional health authorities of this province whereby we will work with them towards establishing, first of all, a uniform criteria for what constitutes enhanced goods and services. Secondly, we will establish standard pricing for those additions which a patient, if properly informed and allowed to make the choice properly, may want to utilize. We will approach it that way so that it is fair across the province for everyone and that patients and individuals will have the proper information.

MRS. FORSYTH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My second question is again to the minister of health. Why would regional health authorities be allowed to charge 12 percent on top of the cost of enhanced goods and services?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, I think it has to be recognized that in terms of, first of all, doing the accounting and administering these transactions, should people want to avail themselves of these enhanced goods and services, will cost money. Secondly, they have to factor in such things as shipping and handling costs. They, in some cases, will have to make provision for the storage of these facilities, not just the space, but often refrigeration and various other backup facilities have to be available. So in looking at a reasonable amount to have as an administrative charge, we chose 12 percent. It seemed to be agreed upon as being a reasonable rate.

MRS. FORSYTH: Thank you. What action will the minister take to ensure that these limits apply to surgical facilities?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, we can initiate this through a policy and directive to regional health authorities, and we have done so. Regional health authorities come under current legislation. One of the provisions in the overall governing of regional health authorities is that the minister of health has the power to approve or not approve their business plans and everything in them.

Mr. Speaker, we would want to look at extending this particular approach, this particular provision to any private surgical service or other service that might be contracted to a regional health authority. To do so in an effective manner, we need to have the legislation which is before the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Confidentiality of Medical Records

MR. DICKSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Not only does this government ignore or misinterpret studies; it also ignores experience. It was in 1998 that we found that records of mental health patients had been left untended, discovered in the demolition of the General hospital. In 1999 it was personal health records blowing around a south Calgary neighbourhood. Now we have confidential laboratory reports from the Calgary Laboratory Services which had been sent by fax to wrong numbers. It turns out that this had been happening for at least a month. My question is to the Minister of Health and Wellness. Why has this minister and his government carved out and given special protection so that private hospitals are not going to have to respect and protect the privacy of Alberta patients?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, I recall a very important piece of legislation that was before this Legislature dealing with the protection of health information. The hon. member across the way, although I think he contributed very positively to the development of the legislation, then seemed to turn completely around and oppose pretty well everything in it. We are currently working to implement Bill 40, and this I think is an important overarching matter. We are working towards the proper regulations in consultation with the stakeholders. So that will be an overall improvement that we are planning to make to the system.

I think we have a good record in this province in terms of protecting the confidentiality of health information. We have living in this province around 3 million people, Mr. Speaker. There will be human errors made. The electronic network poses challenges to everybody working in the health care system, but to make the mistake – and I agree it's a serious mistake, but nevertheless it can be made by an individual – to dial up the wrong fax number, is something that will happen in modern life.

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Speaker, given that these assurances sound remarkably like the assurances we got in 1998 and after the incident in 1999, I want to ask this minister: what disciplinary action is going to be taken with respect to the improper abuse of privacy of Calgaryans in terms of their lab reports being sent to unauthorized persons?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, on the three occasions which the member has referred to in the Calgary regional health authority over the last number of years the Calgary regional health authority has followed up and investigated the situation and taken corrective action where it was possible. The case of the General hospital, of course, was a very unique situation. I'm sure they will do the same thing if the statements of the individual across the way are correct. Normally he is very honourable in these matters, but today it's really a little bit hard to believe that they are that way across the way. Anyway, it will be followed up and disciplinary action taken if deemed to be fair in the circumstances.

MR. DICKSON: My final question, Mr. Speaker, would be this: given that this government rejected the Canadian Medical Association privacy code as a model for the health information law, is this minister prepared to review the law, since it's not yet been proclaimed, and make the changes required to adequately protect the privacy of patients in this province?

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, Bill 40 contains some of the most comprehensive and protective legislation in any province in this country.

The other thing. You know, Mr. Speaker, the question is important to the individual case, but the only way that you can absolutely, one hundred percent protect against that kind of situation occurring is to ban people from using fax machines, and I don't think that's something that even the Liberals are backward enough to advocate.

head: Members' Statements

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, in 30 seconds I'll call upon the first of the hon. members to participate. In the interim would you all join me in wishing the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake a happy birthday?

The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Eid Al-Adha

MR. AMERY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On Thursday, the 16th day of March, the day after tomorrow, approximately 2 billion Muslims from around the world will be celebrating a very important event in the Islamic calendar and the Islamic religion. That event is Eid Al-Adha, or the celebration of sacrifice. The Eid Al-Adha festival commemorates God's test of the prophet Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son Ismail for God, a story common to both the Old Testament and the Holy Koran.

Mr. Speaker, during this time every year about 3.5 million Muslims from every corner of the globe visit the holy city of Mecca in Saudi Arabia to perform the pilgrimage, or hajj. Hajj is one of the five pillars of Islam. It also symbolizes on a larger scale the unity of all humanity. Millions of pilgrims all dressed in a similar way and completing the same rituals discard the division of race, wealth, and social status and instead unite in brotherhood and sisterhood in service to one God. It is incumbent upon every Muslim man and woman to perform the hajj at least once in their lifetime, if and when they are able to do so.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Assembly and in particular my colleague the hon. Member for Calgary-McCall I would like to express my sincere best wishes and congratulations to the Canadian Muslim community and in particular to the 75,000 Muslims who make Alberta their home. I would like to say to all of them, to each and every one of them, Eid Mubarak.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder.

Gasoline Tax

MR. WHITE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government talks about tax cuts, but when it comes down to taking the load off Albertans, they prefer to wait for the next election. Albertans own the oil and gas underneath this province, yet when the world price goes up, the people pay more for their own gasoline at the pump and their own natural gas at home. What does this government do about it? Absolutely nothing. Oh, they do something. They take the big fat royalty cheques to the Treasury just to buy votes for the next election.

Last week I suggested a painless method of giving back some taxpayers' money to the taxpayers. I suggested that after each quarter they set a fuel rate for the next quarter. I suggested that the tax rate be reduced by 1 cent for every dollar that the world price went above $19 a barrel. Painless. Absolutely right; it's painless. Because the Treasury, even with that tax break, a temporary tax break, I might add, goes up. Every time I mention the tax break, this government goes on and on and on about the federal government, which they do absolutely nothing about. Or they say that a tax reduction is too complicated. Now, Mr. Speaker, how complicated is it to reduce the tax by 1 cent for every dollar? Not very tough.

I say to the Premier: even though it's not an election year, do the right thing and give taxpayers in this province a break. Reduce that tax. And, Mr. Premier, jump to the pump on this one.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Arctic Winter Games

MR. McFARLAND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As a volunteer member of the Alberta Sport, Recreation, Parks and Wildlife Foundation I'm delighted to rise today to bring recognition to the 232 Team Alberta North athletes who participated in the 16th Arctic Winter Games from March 5 to 11. Since 1970 the Arctic Winter Games have provided a cultural and athletic experience for athletes and cultural delegates north of the 55th parallel. The games, which promote competitive opportunities for young athletes, attract participants from Alaska, Greenland, northern Quebec, Northwest Territories, Nunavut, Russia, and Yukon Territory.

The Arctic Winter Games have a strong cultural and athletic component. From incorporating artistic competitions to traditional Arctic sports of the Inuit, the entire culture of the games provides participants with a uniquely northern experience. The games also foster friendships among the participants while allowing them to develop their personal and athletic skills.

Held in Whitehorse, Yukon, our own Team Alberta North displayed exceptional gold ulu performances in hockey, volleyball, and curling from the men's and women's teams, while the women's indoor soccer team scored silver. Finishing fourth overall, Team Alberta North brought home a total of 86 ulus, including 37 gold, 25 silver, and 24 bronze, a near sweep of team sports and a strong performance in individual sports.

The ulu, Mr. Speaker, is a symbol of athletic achievement at the Arctic Winter Games and is styled after the traditional Inuit knife used as an all-purpose tool in the Arctic for centuries. The Arctic Winter Games, also known as the Friendly Games, continue under the mission of athletic competition, cultural exhibition, and social interchange.

The next Winter Games will be held in Nuuk, Greenland, and Iqaluit, Nunavut, in 2002, and we'll look forward to seeing our athletes and cultural delegates displaying their talents and representing Alberta's pride.

Please join me in recognizing our fine athletes who took part in the 16th Arctic Winter Games.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader on a point of order.

Privilege Tabling Documents

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on what I presume to be a point of order but could possibly be a point of privilege, and I would ask your direction on that matter. I'm rising under Standing Order 2, which provides that the Speaker may make rulings in those areas that are unprovided for, and under Standing Order 15(1), the privilege sections of the Standing Orders.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I think the House witnessed today one of the most intellectually dishonest exercises that I've seen in a long time. Members of the opposition stood in their places and purported to table reports, described them as reports, insinuated to the House and to members of the public who might have been watching through the provisions of television that they had reports when in fact what they had were essentially blank pages with one line on it, report heading, and one line on it, some excerpt from a newspaper article, and in most cases a newspaper article attached to that page. The members one after the other got up in an intellectually dishonest manner, portrayed to this House and to members of the public through this House and through the televised access that members of the public have to this house that they actually had reports which purported to say what they described to the House.

Mr. Speaker, I've looked briefly and quickly through the rules.

MRS. SOETAERT: Shame on you.

MR. HANCOCK: No. Shame on you, Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert. Shame on you.

The rules relating to tablings and the practice of the House have been very broad. Beauchesne 347, at page 107, under tabling of documents indicates that with respect to the practice in the federal House tablings can be done in two different ways and talks about government members, members of Executive Council essentially, tabling government documents. We've had a much broader practice in this House with respect to tablings, and in fact the process of tabling, in my humble submission, has been stretched and abused to an extreme.

However, Mr. Speaker, it has never been stretched and abused in the manner that it was stretched and abused today, where members get up and say, "I'm tabling a dog," and then they table a cat, or perhaps "I'm tabling a cat," and then they table a dog. The items that were tabled by various members of the opposition this afternoon were in no way, shape, or form reports. They could not be considered reports. They were not reports other than newspaper reports. Newspaper reports. But did they say they were newspaper reports? No, they did not.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest it could go almost to a breach of privilege of members of the House in terms of that type of misrepresentation, which brings all members of the House into disrepute and really raises questions, I would suggest in both this House and in the public, as to whether we are really in an honourable place.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for your direction as to how we might proceed properly with this type of a point of order, because as I've said, the rules are not directly on point. The process of tabling documents in this House I believe started, without having done a great deal of research in the last half hour, from the concept that documents of public importance were to be laid before the House and become official records of the House. That was the origin, as I understand it, of the process of tabling. Today we've seen the most ultimate abuse of that privilege of members of this House that we've ever seen.

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Speaker, strip away the hyperbole – and we heard lots of that – and this is what we've got. The Government House Leader says that he thinks this may be a question of privilege because of a number of documents that were tabled today.

Let me just deal with the privilege thing first, because I think it has little merit. Privilege is one of the most important issues that can be raised in this Assembly. We have occasion to do this maybe three or four times in the course of a session. It typically revolves around a member or the Assembly being impeded – I'm paraphrasing the authorities, Mr. Speaker, because I don't think it warrants more – from being able to speak on issues, to speak to questions. That's not at issue here. In fact, one can argue that if we were to be deprived of the chance to be able to table documents that are relevant to Albertans on relevant issues, that may invite a question of privilege.

Now, the member talks about authority. He talks about general authority, but I look right at Standing Order 37, Mr. Speaker. That's the one that I understand deals with tablings in this Assembly. First, 37(1) appears to deal with what we'd call statutory tablings, that are defined by statute and there's a statutory requirement to file them. I look at sub (3), which says:

Documents presented voluntarily to the Assembly for placement in the records of the Assembly and the Legislature Library may be tabled in quintuplicate by a member.

Now, I don't see anything in the Standing Orders that says that you can only table this and you can't table that. You have given direction, sir. You've talked about not tabling documents that have already been tabled, and you've offered many points of commentary in terms of what ought to be said when documents are tabled, usually to a point of encouraging brevity. We talked about this on April 15, 1999, in Hansard, pages 1039 and 1048. You addressed tabling draft amendments on April 29, 1998, page 1813 in Hansard. You've talked about members should police themselves to avoid duplicate tablings of copies of the same document, November 25, '98. Page 2089 said that Hansard excerpts shouldn't be routinely tabled. You've addressed those, but there is nothing that defines a report anywhere in the Standing Orders.

I can't give you a specific example, but I've sat here and watched many times the Provincial Treasurer, other members of the Executive Council, and the Premier table things that I could quibble about, whether it adds anything to the debate, whether it's useful information. But a report, in my respectful submission, until a Standing Order says something different, is whatever a member considers to be a report. There's no statutory definition that binds this Assembly.

DR. TAYLOR: How about the truth? You guys wouldn't know that.

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Speaker, this may be a stimulating debate if we have people speak from the floor as well as from their seats.

My observation is this. Firstly, it's nonsense to speak of this as a question of privilege. In terms of a point of order, the one relevant Standing Order in no way precludes what members did this afternoon. As you always enjoin us, what's good for one side must be good for the other, and that calls into question a host of tablings that I wasn't very happy with and I didn't approve of, for whatever that's worth, when I saw them come in. But I didn't take the time at the time, because I respect the right of each member in this Assembly to table the document that he or she thinks is appropriate.

Mr. Speaker, the final comment I would make is this. I have not viewed every document that was tabled this afternoon, but I have been advised by my colleagues that the documents tabled this afternoon in fact reflect statements made at different times by members of Executive Council or others on issues that are relevant to matters before this Assembly and issues relevant to Albertans.

Those are the comments I wanted to make. Clearly, at most a point of order, and I think not a sustainable one at that, and clearly not a question of privilege. I look forward to the vigorous arguments that hopefully we're going to hear from the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader on this point.

MR. HAVELOCK: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If we were to accept the argument of the Opposition House Leader, then we should only really be concerned with those breaches of privilege which may be related to impeding the ability of a member of this Legislature to discharge his or her duties. We have to respect the rights of individual members, but Beauchesne makes it also very clear that we have to respect the privileges of this House.

I'm going to refer you to section 33 of Beauchesne and quote briefly from it. "The most fundamental privilege of the House as a whole is to establish rules of procedure for itself and to enforce them." That, I think, is the critical line in that particular section. It's clear. The House has its own privilege to maintain, and by maintaining that privilege, it maintains its respect and its dignity.

With respect to what has happened today, I would argue that respect and dignity has been undermined. It's been undermined because members of the opposition used the very rules for their own benefit entirely and in an abusive way and in a misleading way. What has happened, Mr. Speaker, is that I feel this House has an obligation to raise this issue, which has been done, and to suggest to the opposition members that their abuse of the very rules which are in place to protect all members of this House is unacceptable, and we shouldn't be accepting that. So I would argue very strongly that there has been a breach of the privileges of this House, and I would rely on section 33 of Beauchesne.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I won't respond to the assertion that privilege is at issue here, because quite frankly I think the government in their overreaction is grasping at straws.

But what I will respond to are the statements made by the Government House Leader. By incorporation, when he said the opposition and those members opposite, he referred to myself, that I did something that would deliberately mislead this House. He was also uttering the phrase – I'm not sure whether Hansard picked it up – intellectual dishonesty.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk for a minute about intellectual dishonesty in this point of order. What I tabled for this Assembly is a document entitled Report, subtitled "Klein praises block funding." It's a two-sentence report. Attached to it is the source document.

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that I could find that would prohibit me from doing this, and there is nothing that would suggest that I have deliberately or unintentionally misled this House. I would expect at some point in this ruling that that Government House Leader will stand and withdraw those remarks, because if you want to talk about intellectual dishonesty, that sums it up.

I will reference Beauchesne 495, under the title of Documents Cited, where it reads in part:

(2) It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the Table of the House.

Mr. Speaker, 495 goes on to say:

(5) To be cited, a document must be quoted or specifically used to influence debate. The admission that a document exists or the reading of the salutation or address of a letter does not constitute citing.

Mr. Speaker, the government recently issued a press release criticizing calculations having to do with the Canada health and social transfer. It is the government that continually goes down this path. It seems that they like to dish it out, but they can't take it. When they introduce matters into debate that are misleading, they do not like to have their own words fed back to them. I guess they find that to be cruel gruel, indeed.

So I would say that not only is there no point of privilege, there is no point of order. Furthermore, I would ask that you remind the Government House Leader of his obligation to pay attention to the fullness of the rules of this House, including debate, and the role of each and every private member and caution him about his words when he would suggest that a member of this opposition is doing anything to purposely mislead this Assembly when it seems, Mr. Speaker, that that was his intent in raising this erroneous point of order.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, caution was expressed by the chair several weeks ago when he sent a letter to all hon. members dealing with this whole subject matter of tabling returns and reports and on various occasions has also exercised an opportunity to provide some thoughts with respect to this whole matter.

Our Standing Orders – and I want to repeat them again, because I think they are very important. Standing Order 37(1):

Any return, report or other paper required to be laid before the Assembly in accordance with an Act or with any resolution or Standing Order of the Assembly shall be tabled in quintuplicate, one copy of which shall be placed in the records of the Assembly and two in the Legislature Library, one to the Official Opposition, and one to Hansard.

Now, that deals with "in accordance with an Act or with any resolution or Standing Order of the Assembly."

Standing Order 37(2) says:

Responses to written questions and returns ordered by the Assembly shall be tabled in duplicate and the respondent shall also give one copy each to the member who asked the question or moved the motion for a return, the Government House Leader, the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of any other party or group in opposition.

And 37(3):

Documents presented voluntarily to the Assembly for placement in the records of the Assembly and the Legislature Library may be tabled in quintuplicate by a member.

Of course, one can take the broadest interpretation possible with respect to (3), and it seems that some members are in fact taking the broadest interpretation possible with respect to this matter. This allows private members in this parliament to table and participate in tablings, which is really quite unique and quite distinct and quite different than the procedure found in other places and other parliaments.

I would like to refer hon. members to a very interesting book that has just been published in the last weeks called the House of Commons Procedure and Practice, probably the most definitive book that the chair has had an opportunity to run across, recently published by the hon. Monsieur Parent, who is the current Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons, and edited by the Clerk of the Canadian House of Commons, who has been the Clerk in the Canadian House of Commons for a number of years.

I would like to read the section called Tabling of Documents by Private Members, page 373 of the Canadian House of Commons Procedure and Practice.

There has been a long-standing practice in the House that private Members may not table documents, official or otherwise, even with the unanimous consent of the House. Unlike Ministers who must table documents required by statute or in respect to their administrative responsibilities, the Standing Orders contain no provisions for private Members to table documents. Another reason against the tabling of documents by private Members relates to the availability of the document in both official languages as required by the rules. However, since the 1980s, Members have been allowed on occasion to table documents with the unanimous consent of the House; the documents have typically been tabled in only one language.

There are many, many citations where this matter has been dealt with, in the Journals, including reviews by Speaker Lamoureux, who I believe is probably viewed as one of the most distinguished Speakers in all of the Commonwealth.

I repeat what I said at the beginning. In this Chamber we have this very unique provision that allows private members to table, but there always was an intent with respect to what that tabling meant. Of course, time comes and time goes. New members come and other members leave, and somehow hon. members don't recall the reasons why there are certain provisions in our Assembly. I daresay and must reiterate that in terms of the last major review of Standing Orders that we had in this House, which was 1992 and 1993, this person was involved very directly in it. There was always an intent and understanding of what our Standing Orders meant.

I really believe that great liberties have been taken in this Assembly during this parliament with respect to some of these items. This is not a matter that can be dealt with unless our Standing Orders are changed and modified. Undoubtedly, there will be an opportunity in the future to review all of the Standing Orders, and undoubtedly when the review is done by the various people who are involved in the review of the Standing Orders, those individuals will want to consult with other parliaments not only in this country but throughout the Commonwealth in respect to some of these matters. I think we have a special privilege in Alberta with respect to tablings, a very, very special privilege, that hon. members, private members, should consider to be rather unique, and it should be dealt with the highest degree of integrity at all times.

It is not for the chair to respond to the Government House Leader to advise him whether or not it should be a point of privilege or a point of order. The chair will view this as a major point of clarification and give all members an opportunity to discuss this. Hon. members must discipline themselves with respect to these matters and must have the highest degree of integrity with respect to all of this.

THE SPEAKER: Before concluding this matter, I'd just like to advise all members, as well, that we have started testing today, and the tests seem to have been working quite well for the last two hours. The proceedings of this particular Assembly are now available over the Internet broadcast. It will be our intent to have all matters of this Assembly available over the Internet broadcast beginning at 1:30 p.m. on a daily basis and going through to the very conclusion, to the end of a late evening. Bill 202 Marriage Amendment Act, 2000

MR. DOERKSEN: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I'm presenting my final arguments on Bill 202, the Marriage Amendment Act. I begin by posing a very simple question: is the institution of marriage worth defending? It is a very simple question, but it is at the heart of the bill before us.

Some of you suppose that this was an easy bill for me to bring forward because I have been an outspoken advocate for the natural family, yet many of my friends and people I know and have worked with over the years have not had a happy experience with marriage. Others have made choices to remain single. In some of the those marriages it would impossible to suggest that the marriage should be preserved. So why, Mr. Speaker, would I want to possibly offend any of these friends and acquaintances by defending marriage? Why would I risk being categorized as mean-spirited or judgmental or any of the other labels that have been fixed to those who take a principled stance on matters of social consequence?

The pressure to conform, to be silent, to resist issues of consequence is enormous, but when I sit back and think through all of the angles, all of the different rationales, all of the research, the history and the traditions, I cannot be drawn to any other conclusion except to affirm that the institution of marriage is worth defending. Today you will also have to answer that question, or perhaps tomorrow, when you vote at third reading.

Does the fact that many marriages are problematic and many fail mean that we should shelve the institution which has proven to be the best model for the advancement of society? At second reading I made the case based on social science research that marriage has a tremendous amount of value. As governments we spend great amounts of energy dedicated to making divorce better. We create task forces and legislation that deal with issues around maintenance enforcement and access issues. It is my contention that we need to spend some energy on how to make marriage better.

Mr. Speaker, I'm turning now to the notwithstanding clause. At committee we had a point of order that was raised. The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo argued very well that there were two elements to this bill. He referenced the fact that there was a substantive element, which was the definition of marriage, and a procedural one. I argued the opposite, but the chairman ruled in his favour. So using that argument, I would present before them today, those who voted or spoke against the notwithstanding clause – and I understand their reluctance to use the notwithstanding clause, but it is a procedural mechanism that, I argue, is available to governments in order to exercise their legislative authority with respect to matters of urgent importance. Surely where the substantive matter, to use their argument, is in fact the definition of marriage, I would expect at third reading that they would overlook their discomfort with the procedural element and protect the substantive part, which is in fact the definition of marriage. I present them with that challenge.

Again, going back to the very simple question before us, the question that has to be asked when voting at third reading: is the institution of marriage worth defending?

MR. DICKSON: Mr. Speaker, the institution of marriage is absolutely worth protecting. That's why we want to ensure that mediation is freely available to couples having difficulty. That's why we want to make sure that young people in this province are provided with information and access to information to be able to understand the amazing asset that the institution of marriage is.

What our friend from Red Deer-South sort of glosses over as a "procedural mechanism" is, once again, the most powerful kind of tool you could ever imagine. This is the thing that suspends the rights of Canadians. It suspends the Charter, which is in many respects the only bulwark between an individual citizen and the power of the state.

You know, I was never very comfortable with section 33 of the Charter. I have trouble imagining when I'd countenance readily the use of that, but to suggest that we use it in a prophylactic way, which is the part of this Bill 202, smacks of exactly what we went through with Bill 26 – was it two years ago? – when the government decided to suspend the rights of sexual sterilization victims. The comment from the then Minister of Justice – maybe he didn't use the words – was something like: this is a procedural mechanism. When the Premier later tried to defend it, before he did his 180-degree reversal, the Premier said: well, this is just one of those procedural things. Well, this is not just . . .

MR. HAVELOCK: A point of order.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader on a point of order.

Point of Order Factual Accuracy

MR. HAVELOCK: Mr. Speaker, I hate to raise the whole question of privilege again, but the hon. member knows I did not make any such statement.

AN HON. MEMBER: Are you leaving now?

MR. HAVELOCK: I'll be back.

THE SPEAKER: Hold on, hon. member.

MR. HAVELOCK: I'm holding.

3:20

THE SPEAKER: Would you kindly return, please?

Hon. Deputy Government House Leader, would you kindly help the chair? You said you were rising on a point of privilege. Now, again, rising on a point of privilege will be taken very, very seriously in this Chamber and will offer you the opportunity to make your argument with respect to this privilege matter.

MR. HAVELOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I simply wanted to point out the fact that I made no such statement. Perhaps it wasn't a point of privilege, and I withdraw it as a point of privilege.

Debate Continued

MR. DICKSON: I was going to carry on with my debate at third reading, Mr. Speaker, and make this point. I would have hoped that we would have learned from the experience with attempting to beat up on sexual sterilization victims that Albertans don't take the use of section 33 readily. Albertans don't countenance readily the use of section 33 to suspend the rights, and to do it in advance of any kind of a Charter challenge is the most dangerous thing of all.

I think I made it as clear as I could in second reading and committee that I support marriage. I've been married 22 years. It's a wonderful institution. I recommend it to anybody, and I'd be happy to do what I can as an elected person to support the notion of marriage, but to see a piece of legislation in this province get to third reading that has a section 5 in it that contemplates the use of section 33 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms just on the off chance that somewhere down the road some superior court is going to rule that marriage means something other than the definition set out in section 4 is completely inappropriate. It's a dangerous, dangerous course, and I can't overlook that. I can't ignore that. I have to vote against this bill because I feel so strongly against the use of the notwithstanding clause.

I say again that I respect the sincerity of the sponsor of the bill. He and I have obviously just very different views on when and how section 33 should be used. We have very different views of how significant the notwithstanding clause is, although I agree on the importance of marriage.

I make the observation one more time, Mr. Speaker, that we had provided this government with a way of protecting the word spouse, protecting the word marriage. We had come up with a way of Charter-proofing Alberta legislation, and we put that forward in good faith. We kicked it around and road tested it on Bill 12, and we brought it back when we talked about the Insurance Amendment Act. I'm not sure what else we can do. The government chose not to accept that offering, and what's curious is that the government never came up with a better alternative. My colleagues and I, I think, have been looking forward to seeing what the government's answer is to make our legislation Charter-proof without denying equal treatment for every man and woman in this province.

This bill just doesn't worry about equal treatment. It sort of glosses over that. It worries about doing one part, which is protecting the word marriage, protecting the word spouse indirectly. It doesn't define spouse. It attempts to do that, and the bill in effect says – and I hope I'm not being unfair to the Member for Red Deer-South. The people who have spoken in favour of it seem to be throwing up their hands and saying: well, we're just not very concerned about the equality issue; that just isn't sort of a big issue. That's disappointing, Mr. Speaker, because we always have to be concerned about equality.

Mr. Speaker, the thing that I hoped we would be able to do in this Assembly in 1999 was to recognize that if two adult Albertans should choose to enter into a simple contract, certain rights and obligations and so on would accrue to that relationship, a mutually supportive, long-term relationship. We had hoped that this Legislature would find a way to accommodate that and respect the will of those two adult Albertans.

The proposal we put forward is not unique. If you look at Scandinavian countries, they found a way, without having to redefine marriage, to respect the word marriage and respect the importance that people attach to it. In Norway, I think in Sweden, I think in Denmark, and in a number of other nations they've also addressed the other part, the part that's missing from this bill. They managed to address that business of equality and fairness.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that as the debate has gone on, it's been instructive. As strongly as I feel against the use of the notwithstanding clause, it would be very unfair to be dismissive of the genuineness and the sincerity of the people who have spoken on both sides of the debate. Frankly, I've been very impressed that the debate has managed to avoid rancour and name-calling. I think that for the most part it has been a respectful discussion of different points of view.

What I've been struck with is how resonant the theme is about respecting the institution of marriage. I went back through all of the Hansard debate, and I'm not sure I found anybody who took a view that it's not important to protect marriage so that it means a man and a woman. I'm not sure anybody said that. Maybe there are others with keener eyes than this member who observed that or heard that, but I didn't.

As I reflect on the debate that took place, maybe this is what should happen on a Tuesday or Wednesday afternoon, where people unfettered by party discipline should be able to speak in a way that they can be directly accountable to their constituents. None of us can use the excuse of party discipline in terms of how we vote on a bill like this. Each of us has to be able to defend how we vote as well as how we speak and what we say to this particular bill.

At the end of the day let us recognize that Bill 202 is a dangerous, dangerous, dangerous piece of legislation. It's scary that it's so close to becoming something that's passed by this Legislative Assembly. Can we not say at third reading, as we reflect back on the debate, that we require the sponsor of the bill to address the equality issue? It's not enough just to protect the word marriage. Is there not sort of a threshold test that has to be met on every piece of legislation where we talk about being fair to every man and woman in this province? This bill is demonstrably not fair, and I think that's a glaring defect. I think it's a huge gap in the bill. Maybe there are others who see that somehow we've addressed the equality. I can't find it in Bill 202. It doesn't pass the threshold test that I'd suggest has to be met.

Mr. Speaker, the other concern I'd have with the bill is that there may be members who go away thinking, if this becomes law, that we've sort of addressed the issue of marriage, that we don't have to do anything . . .

THE SPEAKER: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but the time allocation for this matter today has now left us.

School Uniforms

503. Mrs. Forsyth moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to introduce a pilot project to examine the feasibility of a school uniform policy in Alberta schools as current research gathered from other jurisdictions shows a correlation between the requirement to wear school uniforms and a decrease in school violence.

[Debate adjourned March 7: Ms Olsen speaking]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Egmont.

MR. HERARD: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to stand and speak this afternoon to Motion 503, which encourages pilot projects on school uniforms. A pilot project for school uniforms in Alberta, as my colleague from Calgary-Fish Creek proposes, is worth exploring.

Mr. Speaker, it's worth noting that my colleague from Calgary-Fish Creek has been overwhelmed by the public support that has arisen since she introduced this motion. She has concerned parents calling from across Alberta and in fact from across Canada seeking more information on uniforms and asking her how they can organize to get uniforms implemented in their children's schools. In fact, my colleague has had trouble just trying to keep up with all the public interest in this idea.

AN HON. MEMBER: Hundreds of calls.

MR. HERARD: Yes, hundreds and hundreds of calls.

Mr. Speaker, this shows the grassroots support that is out there for this idea, and we in this Legislature should perhaps pay close attention to this in making our decision on this motion.

[Mrs. Gordon in the chair]

Hon. colleagues, this is a motion, not a bill. The information and debate brought forward by my colleague in sponsoring Motion 503 and the results that may emerge from running a school uniform pilot project may well change the popular view of school uniform policies. Motion 503 proposes the adoption of school uniforms in a sensible manner by proposing a small-scale pilot project to assess the feasibility of such a policy for Alberta students before looking at adopting school uniforms across the province. Madam Speaker, motions seek to encourage action, not to mandate it.

In Alberta we have a few public schools with uniform policies, schools already mentioned in this debate, like the Nellie McClung school in Edmonton and the Sacred Heart elementary school in Calgary. Madam Speaker, I find it interesting that in one breath the opposition denounces the voluntary pilot project my colleague is proposing yet in the next breath say how good these schools with uniform policies are. I understand that constituents in the constituency of Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert have been calling and asking for information on this concept.

My hon. colleague is proposing an initiative at the community level with consultation from parents, teachers, and students. She's trying to get a few schools to try this out and see if the successful outcomes that the members for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert and Calgary-Buffalo mentioned occurring at the Sacred Heart school can be duplicated elsewhere. That's what a voluntary project is.

In fact, Madam Speaker, a recent poll taken in Edmonton showed that 62 percent of Edmontonians polled support this idea of school uniforms in the city's schools, yet another example of the grassroots support for this motion. If you're looking for other examples of the good that school uniforms is providing, take the United States. There have been a number of positive effects in the American districts with school uniform policies. These include reductions in fights between students, reductions in sexual offences, weapons offences, vandalism, and assaults, and they are not insignificant numbers. On the contrary, school uniforms have been linked to an up to 36 percent decrease in overall school crime in those jurisdictions. They also reduce distractions in the classroom, identify individuals who should not be at that school, such as gang members or drug dealers, and reduce the visibility of economic differences between students.

The Cherry Hill elementary school in Baltimore was the first American school to reinstate school uniforms after the United States Supreme Court found in a 1969 decision that school dress codes violated children's right to free expression. Long Beach, California, was the first school district to put a uniform policy in place in 1994. These schools realized that the positive effects of a school uniform policy, like the substantial decrease in violence that I've just mentioned, is worth doing. In order to prevent challenges that the policy violates free expression, the district provided an opt-out clause for students as long as they obtained consent from their parents. I would like to note, Madam Speaker, that less than 1 percent of the students opted out of this policy. Since the Long Island school system took this first step, they've been followed by school districts in New York City, Seattle, Washington, Richmond, Kansas City, and Phoenix. In all, 12 American states have initiated school uniform policies.

Let's look again at Nellie McClung junior high school, which has an all-girls program. The inclusion of a school uniform policy has resulted in a more level playing field between its students and a more stable classroom environment. This has allowed a greater focus on the real reason students are there, and that is to learn, to grow, to better themselves as individuals, to recognize others as individuals, and to focus on what is within each person and not merely on the external appearances.

The image of neckties, crested wool blazers, and starched white shirts need no longer apply to school uniforms in the year 2000, as my colleague from Calgary-Fish Creek has mentioned. This is an image that existed earlier in the last century. It is simply not relevant for today's proposal. Indeed, Madam Speaker, a school uniform could be as simple as a T-shirt and a pair of khaki pants to achieve the objectives of the policy.

In some cases students recognize that school uniforms are a good thing and are asking for them all by themselves. Last year in Calgary a number of students organized a petition to support a school uniform policy. Why did they do this? Because they're aware of the social status and economic distinctions that exist in schools and the pressures that arise from this. Differences in clothing may not be the only thing kids are ostracized or picked on for, but it's definitely one of them, and I think that students like the ones from Calgary who organized the petition wanted others to know the pressures put on them and the negative outcomes that so frequently result from such behaviour.

Madam Speaker, I'm aware of the arguments that school uniform policies stifle students' freedom of expression. I would respond to these arguments in two ways. First, how one dresses is an important part of self-expression, but there are also other ways to express oneself as a student, by participating in drama, sports, music, debate, community groups, Scouts, 4-H, but more importantly in self-expression from within and the growth in confidence that results. Instituting school uniforms may even encourage other forms of self-expression as students begin to worry less about their clothes and more about developing their talents and expressing themselves as equals in their environment. Second, the uniform policy may only apply during school hours and would be determined by each school. Students can dress however they like after school and on weekends. This is no more a denial of free expression than the uniforms that nurses, bus drivers, and police officers wear when they are at work.

Madam Speaker, where school uniforms have been put in place, they have been very beneficial to the students, the parents, and the community. Motion 503 will allow those who wish to learn whether or not the benefits of reduced class distinctions, lower rates of violence, fewer distractions in the classroom, and a more down-to-work attitude amongst students occur. The potential for the positive consequences of this motion is immense.

Before I close, I want to make a few comments on the quality of our education system. In Alberta, I am very proud to say, we have one of the best education systems in Canada and in the world, and that's a fact. Alberta students annually place at the top of Canada in student achievement, and we produce some of the great young minds of this country. These are just a few of the many initiatives that we've undertaken, and I think for the debate they needed to be mentioned.

So I will close by urging everyone here to look at the reasonable approach my colleague for Calgary-Fish Creek has taken in presenting this motion and to support it for the many benefits it will present to Albertans. Remember; what the hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek is proposing is not mandatory but an encouragement to find ways of helping our young people to overcome the external pressures and listen to the voice from within.

Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

MR. MASSEY: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I, too, would like to make some comments about the proposal in Motion 503, that a pilot project be conducted. In speaking to the motion, I was looking at a summary of the research by Keith King on school uniforms. King looked at the research that had been done and concluded that even though there was a lot of intuitive appeal and conventional wisdom that seemed to reinforce the belief that uniforms would bring more structure and would change behaviour, there was very little or "not much," I think are the words he used, "empirical data to support a cause-and-effect relationship between school uniforms and violence." I think that's important, an important research conclusion that the evidence is not out there, evidence that's strong enough to take the kind of action that's contemplated.

I would suggest, rather than a project with the kind of volunteer approach that that might include, that the government undertake a research project. I don't think it has to be costly. At this time of the year there are all kinds of graduate students in the universities of this province looking for research projects that they can conduct. In fact, probably with a small investment of funds a rather extensive project could be conducted. So rather than the project being described in Motion 503, there should be a research project.

King goes on to indicate the elements of that research project. First, he suggests that there should be some trend analysis, that in a particular school or in a particular school district you look at violence and what has been the long-term trend in violence. Is it at a peak? Is it waning? Just what are the conditions in schools vis-à-vis student violence. That trend analysis, as I indicated, might be at the school level or at the school district level.

He indicates that there should be a controlled experiment, that there should be some experiments with "those required to wear uniforms" and a control group, "those not required to wear uniforms," and that that kind of an experiment would yield additional data that could be put with the trend analysis in terms of making some decision.

Third – and I think this is the most important, Madam Speaker – is that there should be a hard look at the "intervening variables." Just because there isn't empirical evidence right now supporting school uniforms doesn't mean that it's not there or that school uniforms aren't helpful in preventing violence and reducing school conflicts, but they should be looking at the relationships between parents and teachers and their perceptions regarding school uniforms. If parents overwhelmingly believe that it does that job, that's going to affect the outcome of any project.

The study should look at factors such as schools that have mandated school uniforms and those that haven't mandated them and how violence interacted in those situations, and they need to look at the conditions in the community. I think it would be quite a different policy were it enacted in the southern part of our province or in the communities north of this city, in terms of school violence, as opposed to some other places in the province, say the far north or the western school districts. So I think the kinds of community climates, those variables that would impact such a study, are also the kinds of information that King has argued should be brought to bear on any decision in terms of school uniforms.

So as much as I applaud having the project brought forward and the kind of enthusiasm that there is on the other side of the House for the project, I'm going to vote against it and urge the kind of careful approach that Keith King has suggested in terms of trend analysis and experimental research and a close look at the intervening variables.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

[Motion Other than Government Motion 503 carried]

Citizens' Commission on the Future of Education

504. Mrs. MacBeth moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to create an Alberta citizens' commission on the future of education which would set goals and direction for education, acknowledging its fundamental importance to the prosperity and well-being of all Albertans and defining a clear vision for its future.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

MRS. MacBETH: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to rise today to address Motion 504 standing in my name on the Order Paper. I think there is no more important priority nor a more important focus for a provincial government in Canada than the improvement of public education. I think at a time when we perhaps as Canadians seem to be looking at ways to change some of the very fundamental characteristics of our country – certainly private health care is one of those that will change a very characteristic role of Canadians, but so is the issue of education.

I like to think and hearken back to our Constitution and what our Constitution speaks about. I would say that the three words that encapsulate the Canadian Constitution are "Peace, Order, and good Government." I've always thought that those three words give us the groundwork and the ground formation by which our public health care system is designed and our public education system is designed, unlike our neighbours to the south, in the United States, who for their own reasons and with every right to them have created a Constitution and a framework nationally which is very, very different from what we have in Canada. The three words that I think encapsulate the American Constitution are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. There's no discussion about good government, about the issues of peace, about the issues of order, that we accept as a society, as a community of Canadians rather than a more individualistic or perhaps libertarian point of view and point of substance.

We have come up with this resolution having spoken with many, many people across the province about the importance that they attach to public education, people who, for example, started the Save Our Schools petition, people who have watched an apparent priority of government move towards supporting private schools over a greater degree of dollar increase or percentage increase than public schools. People have said to us: we want to see public education valued, and we don't know what the direction of this government is when it comes to the future of public education.

So as a result of those conversations with Albertans, with those parents who are so involved in public education in our province, with the teachers, with agencies who look at the linkages between education and health care status – all of them have said: what is the purpose? Where is education going in this province? Where is the manifestation of the priority that certainly we in the Official Opposition place on public education and the improvement of public education as part of what is the most fundamental purpose of a provincial government?

We came up with the idea of an Alberta citizens' commission on the future of education and hearkened back to the end of the Socred reign in Alberta in the late '60s, when the Social Credit government had put forward what was called the Worth commission with Dr. Wally Worth. I recall well that when the government changed in 1971, the Premier of the day then, Peter Lougheed, talked about when he created a department of advanced education for the first time in the province's history. He talked about looking at what had come out of that report by Dr. Worth in his consultations with Alberta and Albertans and wanted to embody those changes, that new direction into our education framework. As a result, he had a minister of education and a minister of advanced education, and together I think we saw public education grow in prominence, grow in building prosperity for our province, and grow in terms of a provincial priority above all else throughout those years.

Unfortunately, that sense of direction, Madam Speaker, has been in large part lost or at least changed towards much more one of enhanced support for private education in terms of what's coming, what's new. We see the same effect with charter schools. Many would say that charter schools are de facto private schools within the public system but getting full public funding.

As a result, we believe it is time to create an Alberta citizens' commission on the future of education. Not only would the commission look at the goals and the focus for public education in our province and the priority and the pre-eminence that it takes as a focus for a provincial government, but as well it would say: these are the goals, and this is the way we are going to work in order to achieve those goals.

You know, there's been much discussion and inaccurate reflection in this Legislature in recent days on what was The Rainbow Report. The Rainbow Report was from a Premier's commission on the future of health care in this province, and it in fact did design a system of looking ahead, at that time to about 2005, looking ahead to what our health care system would look like or should look like as we reflected on times ahead. It then fell upon me, as the minister of health at the time, to put in place the action plan in order to achieve those goals.

The same process, we think, can be embodied in an Alberta citizens' commission on the future of education, defining what those goals need to be, defining what are the goals of not just our school system and our postsecondary system but the goals leading up to that, the goals for our children in this province from birth to age six, when they enter school, the goals for them when they are in the public education system by law, the goals for postsecondary education for those students who then avail themselves of that opportunity and the goals beyond.

You know, as we live in a much more and increasingly highly technological, information-based province and world, we have to have ways by which people can access information and learn how to access that information. So when we talk about goals for education, let's not be so small-minded as to think that those goals are only for the schooling ages of our young people. They are the goals of education which a provincial government must deliver on. Otherwise, it's not doing its job, Madam Speaker.

So who would make up this Alberta citizens' commission on the future of education? We believe there are many people who need to be a part of this commission. Certainly it would be to listen to Albertans to try and identify what are those goals, but I think one of the models that we might use is to take the initiative of the school superintendents, parents, teachers, and school trustees that came together, taking the provincial government's rather disastrous student achievement program they had come in with a year ago and recrafting that initiative to become a school improvement program. That was done by those groups coming together – the superintendents' association, the Alberta School Boards Association, the Alberta Teachers' Association, and the Home and School Councils' Association – all of them coming together to look at a different way to take those dollars and get better value out of them.

[The Speaker in the chair]

MR. DICKSON: An excellent initiative.

MRS. MacBETH: That really was an excellent initiative, and we think that all of those groups need to be represented on an Alberta citizens' commission on the future of education. As well, I think it's important that we add onto that some of the academic, research-oriented, and excellent people that we have in this province who are leaders in education theory and who could be part of this citizens' commission. Finally and as importantly, probably most importantly, are representatives of government, who would be very much a part of bringing this new vision and a sense of where it was heading together. So that the goals would be identified, the membership of the commission I think is very important.

You know, this government has used the mechanism of summits to address issues. On our side of the House we would say that in some cases those summits have been rather belittling of the size and scope of the issues at hand. Certainly we saw the impact of that with the health summit with Albertans from all over the province: very, very well intentioned; very well involved; some of them brand-new to the whole notion of health care. That was an important part of the discussion, but to simply lock those people in a room for two days and come up with a framework for education is not respectful of the importance that Albertans attach to an issue like health care.

I guess a further blow to those people and a discrediting that needs to be done of the summit as a mechanism in that instance is that when that group came forward and said that they didn't want to see more privatization of our health care system, the government then comes at its earliest opportunity to in fact enhance privatization of the system. Then the so-called consultation mechanism is flawed and fatally flawed and is frankly an insult to those who participated in it when they see that their own recommendations are not even accepted or embodied in the government's plans.

From the point of view of a consultation, our sense is that this commission, the Alberta citizens' commission on the future of education, needs to be a longer term look at education and where it's heading and what kinds of things we can do, whether it's in an apprenticeship program, whether it is in postsecondary learning, whether it's in postgraduate learning, whether it is in early intervention, wherever. On the scale of all Albertans needing access to education, it would be a sense and a blueprint of where we want education to go in this province, because right now that blueprint does not exist. It may well have some flowery words from the wordsmiths of the government, but in terms of an action plan we need only look at some of the decisions that are described in the provincial budget of this past month and see where private schools are increasing at a rate of about 13 and a half percent in their funding, whereas the public system is rising between 8 and 9 percent in its funding.

We've got goals, we've got membership, and we've got methods of consultation. I think as well that once these goals have been defined, we need to look at: how will schools, how will teachers, how will postsecondary institutions, how will Albertans work to ensure that those goals are achieved? One of the key mechanisms in that is to put in place a method to measure achievement in terms of this plan that could be very tangible evidence if we were heading in the wrong direction. It would soon become evident because the monitoring of those goals would clearly show them to not be achieving what they intended to do. So as well as the goals, as well as a method by which the goals are going to be achieved, there must be a mechanism to measure and evaluate those goals.

I guess the fourth ingredient that we think is important is obviously to then look at the goals of education, look at how we're going to achieve them, how we're going to monitor them, and then look at what level of resources are we willing to commit as a province to the improvement of public education in our province. Once that decision is made, which is really a decision largely based on this Legislature, then each step, each program must in some way be enhancing or leading towards those goals. It doesn't mean you can do everything. We don't have limitless dollars, but the dollars that we are spending on public education and on education generally are to be used to improve the quality of education, improve the achievement of those goals in education so that at the end of our term as legislators the legacy will be that we could see and measure the improvement in our education rather than simply being rather empty in our praise by talking about the dollars that were spent or the marks that were achieved.

Achievement in education goes far beyond marks, Mr. Speaker. The model that I would think would be a very much more constructive model to follow, one that I had thought the government might pick up on in its Children's Forum report, is a model that looks at Albertans from the point of birth right through their learning years and beyond and assesses whether we're doing what we can do for them. If the government would only look at the work being done by the Calgary United Way, the work they have done to target young people and target resources so that not everybody gets the same resources but that those with the greatest need are helped the most to bring them up to a level where they may then be ready to enter school – that's what our Canadian Constitution talks about. It talks about peace, order, and good government, and good government is about taking those who are more frail or who are perhaps born into poverty and helping them get that leg up so that by the time they enter school, they are able to participate and learn as the other children who haven't had those difficulties are able to do.

The model the Calgary United Way has built, from zero to three years, is a time of assessment, understanding what deficits may exist in that young person, and then taking the period from three to six to do early intervention. You know, if you talk to anybody in the health care system or anybody with any early education experience, they will tell you that they can sight and spot problems with young people and predict that those young people are going to have problems by the time they reach school age or by the time they reach leaving-school age, say at about 18. You can sight a lot of those problems right at the very beginning, at their birth often. In view of that, let's take that information and let's identify those young people. Whether it's an economic disadvantage, a health disadvantage, a social disadvantage of some kind, let's identify it and then use from ages three to six, as the Calgary United Way suggests, to do early intervention to try and alleviate the greatest amount of impact of that.

Then from ages six to 10 basic learning has to take place. Under the education model we have educators in this province who can certainly talk about that, and there are in fact some things going on that try to identify that but not with the focus that needs to occur.

Then from about nine to 13, the preteen years, are very important years with young people in picking up some of the skills they are going to need, some of the social skills and the prediction of the social skills that they will need before they enter teenagerhood. Then from 13 to 18, the mandatory term of our School Act, ensure that our young people are improving in their education, are learning the things they will need to be productive citizens in our community, are learning not just academic skills but very much the social skills in order to become good citizens.

That sets up a whole continuum, Mr. Speaker, and our proposal doesn't talk about ending there. Our proposal then talks about postsecondary and beyond, as we've said. We think it's a great model. It's one that the government apparently looked past as they were considering the Children's Forum, and it was a great opportunity to do that.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak on this.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fort.

MR. CAO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a pleasure for me to rise today to respond to the private member's motion, Motion 504, brought forward by the Member for Edmonton-McClung. Motion 504 would seek to establish a citizens' commission on the future of education.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to emphasize my conviction on the importance of education in our society and my unwavering support for learners and educators in Alberta. I also would like to take this opportunity to speak on some of the recent initiatives of the Department of Learning, especially our current public participation processes.

This government consults extensively with Albertans to set goals and direction for education. Through collaboration with our learning partners in this province, we have recently established a new vision for lifelong learning for Albertans. This vision is part of Alberta Learning's 2000-2003 business plan, which also identifies strategies toward achieving the vision.

Mr. Speaker, this motion is about involving Albertans – parents, teachers, educators, superintendents – in determining the future of education. This is already being done. Alberta Learning worked with partners to develop the 2000-2003 business plan and will continue to work with partners in the implementation of the plan. This government is committed to building partnerships that will contribute to quality of learning in Alberta.

To address the diverse needs of learners, Alberta Learning already partners with government, industry, professional and community associations, and committees and councils associated with learning. For example, there is a commitment to work with school boards, the Alberta Home and School Councils' Association, and the Alberta Teachers' Association to address the recommendations of the school councils' Next Steps report.

The Department of Learning is committed to working with the Council of Ministers of Education to implement a national agenda to support continued improvement of quality, accessible learning and performance measures. The department will also work with the federal government to improve the delivery and administration of financial assistance by harmonizing Alberta and federal student loan programs.

The Learning department's 2000-2003 business plan focuses on creating a flexible, responsive, and accessible education system for all Albertans. This government believes that a good education and a healthy start in life are the most important tools we can give our children to prepare them for a successful future.

Mr. Speaker, the Learning department's business plan also recognizes Alberta's postsecondary learning system. It must continue to expand the high-quality learning opportunity it provides to Albertans. The postsecondary sector will benefit from research funding from the Alberta heritage foundation for science and engineering research. This government is also committed to expanding student assistance dramatically.

Mr. Speaker, the 2000-2003 business plan is only one evidence of this government's commitment to education and to Alberta's participation in its future. This year's budget also reflects that dedication. Education is one of Alberta's biggest priorities. That's why this government has dramatically increased its investment in our education system. Total education spending in Alberta will reach $4.6 billion in 2000-2001 and will grow to more than $4.9 billion by 2002-2003.

MR. AMERY: How much?

MR. CAO: To $4.9 billion.

The base program funding for Alberta Learning will climb by $766 million, or about 19 percent, over the next three years. One of the fundamental objectives of this year's Learning budget is enhanced flexibility of funding. Alberta Learning has a plan to review school board funding to increase flexibility, recognize local needs, and enhance accountability for the outcomes.

This budget thoroughly addressed concerns raised by Alberta's postsecondary students. Student assistance made up the largest percentage increase, 22 percent or $23 million, in 2000-2001, with almost 50 percent, or more than $50 million, over the next three years. So the total financial assistance available to postsecondary students will be $390 million this year.

By 2002-2003, scholarships, bursaries, and grants will be increased to $56 million.

AN HON. MEMBER: How much?

MR. CAO: To $56 million.

The budget also contains capital funding from Alberta Infrastructure to support schools and postsecondary institutions in this province. For the coming year $160 million has been allocated to address priority projects to accommodate increased enrollments. This money will be used for repair, new facilities, innovation funding, and the preservation and modernization of existing facilities.

This budget reflects this government's willingness to work together with school boards, teachers, parents, students, postsecondary institutions, and industry to determine where investment is needed and how that investment should be made to ensure the best possible result. Spending more money will not improve the quality of our education system. We know that taxpayers' dollars must be directed to where they make a real difference.

This year's budget also clearly reflects this government's commitment to ensuring Albertans are prepared to meet the challenges in the new century head-on. It reflects this government's priority of lifelong learning and having an education system that continues to be responsive, accessible, and affordable for all Albertans. It reflects Albertans' priorities, the priorities that Albertans have disclosed at this government's many public consultations.

Mr. Speaker, we're listening to Albertans. There are a number of interdepartmental and cross-government initiatives to recognize education's fundamental importance to the prosperity and well-being of all Albertans, most of which have involved significant public consultation. These include Get Ready Alberta, People and Prosperity, the Alberta youth employment strategy, and the Alberta children's initiative. There are also many programs and reviews currently being implemented by the Department of Learning that involve education professionals and the public in determining the direction of education.

The Minister's Forum on Learning is a great example. It was held November 19 and 20, 1999, and 200 Albertans provided input on ways to foster lifelong learning in Alberta. The conference participants were high school, college, and university students, educators, continuing education providers, parents, industry and community representatives. The Minister's Forum on Learning featured internationally recognized speakers, who spoke on the future of education, and brainstorming sessions for participants. A report of the findings has just recently been issued. The forum provided an opportunity for community and learning stakeholders to advise the minister on priority issues. This forum demonstrated this government's willingness to consult Albertans on the future of learning in this province.

I would also like to speak about this government's committee on lifelong learning. I was asked, along with two colleagues, by the Minister of Learning to make recommendations on lifelong learning strategies. Our committee is presently consulting with people and organizations across the province on ways to encourage Albertans to keep learning throughout their lives. We are consulting with key stakeholders to review the current situation, identify gaps, and make recommendations on ways to help adults returning to learning improve their employment potential and realize their career goals. Based on what we hear, we will release a discussion paper in the spring and ask for public feedback. A final report will be developed by late summer.

Another important consultation was a school council review. This was a three-member MLA committee that worked with parents, teachers, principals, and other Albertans in a series of public forums held around the province last spring. These forums obtained input on school councils and where improvement could be made. Over 2,000 completed workbooks were returned to the Department of Learning. Overall, the committee found that school councils were working well and that there is a place for school councils in our education system. One important recommendation in the report was that the use of school fund-raising for core education programs be prohibited.

Mr. Speaker, there was also the Private Schools Funding Task Force. This task force conducted a provincewide public consultation process to provide Albertans with the opportunity to express their views on how private schools should be funded. Throughout the review process the task force members met with hundreds of Albertans, listened to their views, and carefully considered their representations.

Another vehicle to gather Albertans' opinions on the learning issue was the 1997 School Facilities Task Force. This task force gathered Albertans' views on the provision of school facilities for Alberta students. Over 400 Albertans and educational partners participated in consultation meetings, and more than 100 written submissions were received. Information gathered from those public meetings was used to complete the task force's recommendations on the new school facility capital plan. All of their recommendations were accepted by the government. A new strategic direction for providing school facilities was adopted based on this consultation with Albertans, school boards, and education stakeholders.

4:20

Mr. Speaker, review committees and task forces are just two of many strategies that the government is pursuing to address increased demands in the classroom. The Department of Learning has also implemented a variety of programs and pilot projects to examine issues of significance to Albertans. To me the most exciting of these endeavours is AISI, the Alberta initiative for school improvement program. AISI is a new approach to supporting the improvement of student learning by encouraging teachers, administrators, trustees, parents, and the community to work together to introduce innovative and creative initiatives. School boards will have the autonomy and flexibility to propose a range of improvement strategies such as early reading or numeracy intervention, smaller class sizes, and stay-in-school programs. To support this initiative, $66 million will be available from Alberta Learning's base funding this year for participating school jurisdictions.

AN HON. MEMBER: How much?

MR. CAO: It's $66 million.

In one of the first AISI initiatives, the Edmonton public school board will pilot a class size reduction program. Along with Alberta Learning the board will look at the impact of teaching techniques and strategies that maximize student learning. Research and findings from this study and pilot project will help school boards across the province pursue class size reduction and other innovative projects eligible under AISI funding.

Mr. Speaker, the Department of Learning has consistently worked with students, parents, educators, and administrators to ensure that the necessary policies are in place to achieve excellence in our learning system. Class size reduction, curriculum changes, increased funding, a commitment to lifelong learning: all of these initiatives were results of consultation with Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, this government has recognized that there are many challenges ahead and that meeting them depends on our ability to work with partners to anticipate, adapt, and develop a lifelong learning system. We have a long history of effective public consultation. I think our government and the Department of Learning have done an exemplary job of bringing stakeholders into the decision-making process, and the results have been positive. The Department of Learning is meeting challenges head-on in trying to make improvements that will ultimately help people learn. Without input and advice from stakeholders, this government wouldn't have been able to develop the progressive initiatives I've just discussed.

The intention of this motion is worthy. I'm glad that it was brought here today because we all know that education is of critical importance to the future of this province, and this government has consistently shown in the past that we are willing to look at initiatives that will bring benefit to the people of this province and improve our existing system.

Mr. Speaker, I do not support Motion 504. A new commission would be duplicative and expensive. We can work from within the existing strengths of our learning system and still incorporate the spirit of the hon. member's motion. For that, thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to have the opportunity to speak today in favour of Motion 504, the Alberta citizens' commission.

As the Member for Edmonton-McClung and Leader of the Official Opposition noted in her remarks, the last time the province had a commission on education was the one that was tabled in 1972. That was entitled Choice of Futures: a Future of Choices. It's interesting, as you look at that document 30 years later, that some of the recommendations in that document are just now being implemented. Thirty years ago that document outlined the advantages of year-round schooling. Lo and behold, right now in this city there are some experiments with year-round schooling being undertaken. There was a rather careful look and some caution in Choice of Futures vis-a-vis the funding of schools, and the kinds of problems we faced with equity in the past number of years were foreshadowed in that document.

One of the things that was in that document and was rather interesting was the conception it had of possible ways of governing the system. There was a defining of the school system that would be a top-down system, a system that would be primarily micromanaged by the provincial government versus a system that would place a premium on local control. I think we know where we've gone these last few years. That top-down system has been the one that's taken over. I had an opportunity to talk to the author of that document and ask how he felt about the implementation of the recommendations, and he indicated that he thought that about 60 percent of the recommendations that were made had been acted upon.

I think it's time to look again at education in the province and to do it in a much different way, in a novel way, and that's what's proposed in the Alberta citizens' commission. Instead of as we had with the Worth commission, with the experts driving the study, determining the information that would be gathered, visiting around the province and interpreting what people were saying, this one turns it upside down and would make citizens paramount. They would have experts on tap that would help them provide the kind of academic and research advice that they needed while they were trying to make their deliberations. It's quite, I think, a different way of looking at a commission that would examine something as important as our public and separate school systems.

I think I would like to spend a couple of minutes looking at some of the things that have happened since Worth made that report in the province. The commission would be an opportunity not just to look ahead – and that's very important, trying to come up with a vision for the future – but it would also be an opportunity to look back, to look at the changes that have been undertaken, and to assess the worthiness of some of those changes. There have been many. If you look at governance alone, the role of school boards has been greatly modified in the last seven years by this government. Those boards that once had taxing authority, those boards that at one time could even hire their own chief superintendent without the government's blessing can no longer do so.

If you look at the Department of Learning, the Department of Learning has become much more controlling of the behaviour of school boards and the behaviour of school principals. A lot of what is done now is in response to tests that are administered provincially, and judgments about the success of our schools are made by the Department of Learning in many instances based on those results.

There's been a move to school-based budgeting. They've been mandated across the province. They've had a great influence, I think, in parents coming to better understand how money is being spent, but they've also been introduced at a time of declining resources, so what looks like an opportunity for parent decision-making on the surface – in reality that freedom is not there.

THE SPEAKER: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, but the time consideration for this item of business has now left us today.

Bill 7

Alberta Science, Research and Technology Authority Amendment Act, 2000

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Innovation and Science.

DR. TAYLOR: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to move second reading today.

I'll make a few brief comments about it. As members know, there was a reorganization of government last spring, and as part of that reorganization a number of agencies were added to the ministry. What this is, essentially, is an amendment to the act to allow the agencies to be added to the ministry and report through the Alberta Science and Research Authority. As you know, the Alberta Science and Research Authority is a provincial agency which is really involved as the senior science policy body in the province. It makes sure that the science policy corresponds to the business plans of the Ministry of Innovation and Science.

We have a number of board members in this agency. Just some of the names I would mention, that some of you may know, would be Bob Church, Ruth Collins-Nakai, Howard Tennant, Elizabeth Cannon, and Len Bolger, all high-level people, high-level Albertans. These are people who are recognized as leading Albertans in their field right across the province. This group works at arm's length from government to assist us with policy advice and helps the government to contribute to the Alberta advantage.

One of the groups that we added in the new bill is the Alberta Oil Sands Technology and Research Authority, AOSTRA. What we're doing through the amendment is expanding the mandate of that group. Certainly oil sands will be included, but we are going to call it the energy research council as we work through this. We think there are probably other areas of energy where we can spend money on research as well rather than just on the oil sands.

The other group that was added was the Alberta Agricultural Research Institute. I'm just mentioning the main bodies. The Alberta Agricultural Research Institute will be part of the ministry. It will retain its name but become part of a larger life-science strategy. We believe it's important to move into the whole life-science area for several reasons. There's some good opportunity with the federal government, and they're looking at their genome project and the expansion of the genome project. Alberta is the second leading light in this whole area of gene research after Toronto. We want to move into the area of proteomics. As you know, there's a protein in each gene that controls the gene, and that's where the research is going. It's like Wayne Gretzky said: I go to where the puck will be, not where the puck is. That's what we want with our life-science strategy.

The forestry research institute we will include in this group as well, and it will be part of this whole ASRA mandate.

I think these changes and others that we are making will address the efficiency and effectiveness of requesting, of reviewing, and of funding science and research within this province. I believe we have some exciting times in this province. We've got some good science. We've got exciting things happening as we go forward, Mr. Speaker, and I encourage the members to support this bill.

4:40

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora.

MR. SAPERS: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the minister and his staff for keeping me up to date on initiatives in the Department of Innovation and Science. Bill 7 is the embodiment of a commitment that the government made to more closely integrate and consolidate research initiatives, science policy development, and the co-ordination of research funding in the province. Towards those ends I can support Bill 7. It seems that this government is able to identify correctly that the innovation system in this province will be strengthened by a co-ordination of effort when it comes to the government.

Now, the Alberta Science and Research Authority, which has now become the Alberta Science, Research and Technology Authority, seems to have an ever growing role. I have heard in general a fair degree of support for the government direction, particularly bringing the Alberta Agricultural Research Institute and the former AOSTRA, soon to be the Alberta Energy Research Institute, together under this central umbrella.

I've also heard some concerns raised, and I think they're worth noting on the record. From the agricultural side I've heard that perhaps there'll be a lack of sensitivity to agricultural issues, particularly as they vary across various regions of this province. I've also heard that people in the oil patch, particularly those that are recovering oil from the oil sands, are saying: well, there was a reason why AOSTRA was set up, and that was because of the particular needs and the particular dependency on research in being able to extract oil under very difficult conditions. Alberta for decades has really been a leader, in fact the world centre for the development of this kind of technology. Those criticisms have been voiced, and I think that the government in this regard should not be defensive about these criticisms but instead should look at them as a challenge to be met. I for one am confident that the voices raised or the concerns raised from the agricultural sector can be well dealt with, and I think the benefits of co-ordination will far outstrip the concerns about the lack of sensitivity.

When it comes to the oil sands, you know, we're talking about huge corporations with fairly deep pockets, with international partners and commitments. They're definitely big boys and girls who know how to look after their own interests. Now, that's not to say that we should abandon them, but I think it is to say that they've certainly benefited from a good partnership with government over the years in this province, and maybe it's time to lend some of that same support to some other partners and generate some new partnerships in the energy sector. Whether we're talking about fostering research when it comes to solar or wind or other kinds of energy, it seems to me that that's our future at some point. There's only a limited amount of oil in the ground or gas to be pumped or oil sands to be refined. Certainly moving towards the development of new technologies and exploiting new energy sources is a goal that's worth pursuing.

This bill is interesting for a couple of reasons, though, not just simply that it is bringing together the research funding of the government under this one umbrella and that the decision-making will be streamlined. I look forward to that, but it's also interesting for a couple of other reasons. The government for a long time has been talking about accountability in terms of board appointments, and what we have here is an interesting model. I'm still wondering how this model will pan out, but it is an interesting model. It's one that if it works well and if it serves the people of this province well, we may want to try to apply it to some other areas of government activity.

As I understand the intent behind Bill 7, the new authority will create these three research institutes, and the members of the three institutes will be selected by the minister. There's nothing particularly unique about that. I mean, this government appoints hundreds and hundreds of Albertans to jobs by ministerial appointment every year. What is interesting is that the board chairs of these three institutes will be elected by members of the Assembly. I think that is fairly unique. I'm anxious to see how that works. We'll have a list of appointees that'll be put forward by ministerial order.

Now, how this list in itself is generated doesn't necessarily have to be a partisan activity. I talked to the minister about this, and I know that they're open to names. I hope they will use the same model that they've talked about using for the foundation to be established under Bill 1, and that is to have a broad search outside of government managed by a recruiting or a head-hunting firm, by a consulting company in any case, so that the appointments won't be tainted by any arguments of partisanship or patronage.

These names will be brought forward, they'll be appointed by the minister, and then from that group a chair will be nominated and then ultimately elected by members of the Assembly. That's an interesting model, and I'm anxious to see how it works and to see whether or not the people who are outside of government, the men and women who are working in Alberta's innovation system, the scientists and the researchers out there in our universities and in our corporations and in private business, will feel satisfied by this process and well served by it.

The government has also talked about the need for consistency, efficiency, and effectiveness when it comes to the co-ordination of science and technology policy. Bill 7, once it's passed, should aid in this regard, but again there's been some criticism raised, and I'd like to put it on record at second reading. Hopefully the minister will have a chance, as this bill proceeds, to reflect on these comments and perhaps address some of these concerns.

What I've heard from the business sector in this province that's involved in science and technology, particularly in the life sciences, biosciences, and communications technology, is that they're beginning to see this superstructure developing, what used to be ASRA. Although most of this criticism is usually leveled at the ARC, it spills over into ASRA as well. The criticism is simply this. The business sector is telling me that instead of simply facilitating research, instead of simply being a funding agent, instead of co-ordinating government policy, they're beginning to see government, through ARC and ASRA, as a competitor, that it looks as though they are more focused on commercial operations than they are on policy and as such have actually become an impediment to some business initiatives.

Now, there is no doubt a fine line that has to be walked here, because particularly ARC does some things that are very entrepreneurial and very commercial by design. We have to make sure that none of their business in fact gets in the way of Alberta business. While this government has said that they want to be more consistent and efficient and effective when it comes to science and technology policy, they've also said that they want to be out of the business of being in business.

Of course, being out of the business of being in business would be a good thing. We've just seen this week, Mr. Speaker, how the government has lost a few more million taxpayer dollars through the sale of the Centennial Food loan. I understand that this represents a loss of over $11 million. When you add that up, it makes any of the concerns raised about what's gone on in Ottawa sort of pale in comparison. I mean, you talk about billion-dollar boondoggles, and we certainly have had our experience right here in Alberta. The bad news is that there's about another $1,800,000,000 worth of outstanding loans at risk in this province that are going to come home to roost one of these days. So if the government is really serious about being out of the business of being in business, let's just make sure that we're not going down some other path of getting into business through some back door or some side door through what's going on in the ASRA or the ARC.

Mr. Speaker, the other issue that's been raised to me has come from academic circles. What some members of university research consortia are telling me is that they're very concerned about what they see as the overt politicization of science and science policy. It's one thing for the government to have an agenda, to articulate its agenda and to pursue it, but it's something else entirely to tie funding and research to these political agendas at the expense of academic freedom and independence. The concern they raise is one that I take to heart. I've spoken in this House before about the dangers of politics and science and the dangers, particularly, of a dominant ideology ignoring the pursuit of knowledge and instead replacing it with the abuse of science.

Science and the discovery of new knowledge is a social good in and of itself, and I think we have to do everything in this Assembly to make sure that we have an innovation system in this province that respects fundamental research and the creation of new knowledge. Then as times goes on, of course things will be put into place where we can take that knowledge, take that discovery, innovate from it, apply it, and even eventually, as the case may be, commercialize it.

Mr. Speaker, when I'm speaking of commercialization, I suppose that's another general query that I have about Bill 7. It does talk about some changes in terms of who owns intellectual property. It makes some changes in terms of the application of the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act in this province. I think it frees up the ability of other partners who are involved in research initiatives to claim ownership over the products of the scientific work. In other words, if a new process, a new product, or simply new knowledge is created that is funded through one of these government institutes, these partners now have a clearer path to claim some ownership or some share of ownership in what otherwise would be really a Crown asset, that being the intellectual property.

I'm hoping to spend some time in the research and science community over the next little while seeing whether or not Bill 7 has satisfied any of the concerns that have been raised. I want to be having my ears open to the concerns raised particularly from the academic community about the loss, the potential loss in any case, of academic freedom. I also want to pay attention to what I'm hearing from Alberta business regarding their sense that they're increasingly having to compete with big government when it comes to science and research.

Mr. Speaker, I'll be listening to those concerns and to see what the response is to Bill 7, but on balance I will say that the government taking control over the research agenda, at least from the standpoint of making sure that there's reduced duplication and increased co-ordination, makes some sense.

I think that if these other issues I've raised can be put to rest or can be satisfied, then Alberta taxpayers will be well served by this legislation, but I don't want to be in a particular rush to pass Bill 7. I don't feel the same urgency, let's say, here as I do in terms of supporting, for example, Bill 1, the government's initiative to create the new science and engineering foundation. I think that Bill 7 will no doubt gain majority support in this Assembly during this session. I see no reason to unduly impede it, but I do want to take some time, as I said, meeting with some members of the community that have a stake in science and research and making sure that their concerns are (a) well understood and (b) addressed.

As this bill proceeds through the Assembly, I look forward to the minister responding to some of these concerns. I have faith that he will, because that has been his track record since he became the minister of this department.

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that other members do the same: set up a meeting or two with the scientists and the businesspeople who are involved in research in their own constituencies and get some feedback on Bill 7 so that we can make sure we get this one right the first time.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a privilege to rise this afternoon and speak to the contents of Bill 7 and to the principles of Bill 7 and how it applies to the initiative that's under way to basically broaden the approach of scientific research in our province. The combination of this change that's going to draw together an administrative group to look over and to deal with the dollars that are being put into the heritage foundation money is a really good approach.

The thing that we have to watch in the creation of these bodies is the fact that they are representative and that they do contain within their membership the broad-based understanding of and appreciation for the different sectors that are going to be dealt with in the co-ordination and the evaluation of research projects that come to them and have to be looked at. They're going to be responsible as well for setting direction and that. If we can look at it from the perspective of how the makeup of that board will deal with the broad perspective of research and development and the advancement of that primary research component in Alberta, that would be really good. We need to have some criteria included in here in the development of the board membership that would allow us to look at that.

The other thing I would like to suggest is that we have to have a clear representation within the presentation and within the understanding and the mandate of the authority to look at the balance that comes between a kind of frontier-expanding primary research and the research, then, that goes into developing and taking new-concept research results and making and developing applications for those research-based activities. This has to be put in there. We have to have that mix that comes in there.

I think the model that we want to look at is the work that's being done through the Alberta Heritage Foundation for Medical Research authority, because they've been able to really pull together some very active co-operative programs between funding at the provincial level, at the federal level, from some of the private sources as well, and really have developed a viable medical research program here. As this group works and takes the earnings that are going to come out of our Alberta heritage fund endowment, this would be a really good model that this authority could look at in terms of developing a viable science and technology research component within our province.

One of the things that we look at in here is the inclusion of the agriculture research component under this. The Agricultural Research Institute has had a very good relationship with the agricultural community, with the commissions and support groups in agriculture. They've been very open and very willing to work with these groups in developing research agendas and direction for research. I could think that if they get involved here and they can take that philosophy and make sure that it works in this new environment as well, it would be worth making sure that opportunity is provided to them, because as we look at their successes, we want to make sure that being put under this new body doesn't in any way hinder or restrict their ability to continue to work at the forefront of both our conceptual agricultural research area and at the applications areas of our research as well.

So with those few comments, Mr. Speaker, I think we're going to have to look at this in the context of how it will improve the co-ordination and management of our research program across the province as well as across the disciplines that are going to be involved in this. If you look at it from the perspective of how it can be brought in and implemented in that context, they'll now have the dollars that come out of the new heritage fund endowment as well as the dollars that I assume were originally and have continuously been put into the other organizations, that are now going to be included in the umbrella under this. So what we'll have is those efforts that have to be looked at: how the dollars get directed and whether or not they are continued to be focused in the areas of the amalgamated authorities that are being brought together.

So, Mr. Speaker, again I say that this is the kind of bill that puts in place a structure. It doesn't talk a lot about the philosophy that's behind it, and that philosophy is going to be determined by the members that get appointed to the board. Then what we have to do is look at it from the perspective of getting a balance there that'll give us the direction for our research in the science and technology area that will continue to promote that growth and the advancement of these areas in Alberta.

Now, we've got a good reputation in our universities. We've got a good reputation in some of our research centres, and we've got good co-operative efforts being provided by a lot of our industries, that are essentially giving us an opportunity to really move Alberta into the forefront of a science and technology research component. It's a matter of getting that critical mass in place. As we put Bill 7 and Bill 1 together, we'll be able to see a real opportunity develop for Alberta to generate that critical mass, that's necessary to be a world player in the area of research in science and technology. So I hope, as we go through this, that almost all members in the Legislature get support from their communities and we can then move this into an active growth component of our economy.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MRS. SOETAERT: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to take this opportunity to speak to Bill 7 from my understanding of it. I've always supported research, and I think that's been a focus of this Legislature in this session with, actually, the bill I spoke on yesterday, Bill 1. Here we have Bill 7, which talks about the combining, actually, the co-ordination of some other research departments – agriculture, energy and forestry, to my knowledge.

You know, at first glance one would consider that it's good to co-ordinate those sections. Are these all going to be located in the same building? How is this going to come about? Is this going to be a major kerfuffle within the department? Do we have people moving buildings, offices, et cetera? I'm interested in the practical aspect of co-ordinating these three.

One of the things that may come from this that I hope will be good – because I don't want agriculture lost in the shuffle. I'm quite sure it won't be, but when we look at research for agriculture, I think it has a bit of a different focus than energy and forestry. With energy having so many big companies involved and big corporations and with forestry involved with so many corporations, et cetera, I have to be concerned about agriculture because those are several individuals.

The average farmer doesn't have the time or the inclination of course – well, maybe the inclination, but certainly not the time – to do good research. They do depend on the government to that well, and different industries maybe from the value-added sector that would promote a certain product. Generally speaking, when you are speaking of research for agriculture and things that will improve the life of the farmer, the quality of the product they can put out, the versatility of that product, that has to come from, I would hope, the research that will be encompassed in Bill 7.

When the minister listed some of the people that will be on that authority, a couple of the names I recognized. That's impressive work. Certainly the work of Dr. Ruth Collins-Nakai I am familiar with. I guess I want to ask, though – I don't want agriculture lost within this, and my hope is that in fact the research for agriculture will be improved because maybe it will be more focused.

I guess one of the things that certainly has come up in my constituency and people have been asking me about – and I'm wondering if the minister knows if this is going to be one of the focuses of this authority – will be the issue of genetically modified organisms. I'm glad the minister of energy is paying attention because he's wondering about those genetically modified organisms.

AN HON. MEMBER: They're called Liberals.

MRS. SOETAERT: We're throwing insults, but that's okay, Mr. Speaker; we have broad shoulders in here.

I was actually trying to support the minister's bill while I questioned some of the things about agriculture.

I also want to ask about the forestry within that. I also wonder about the research of that, the allocations of it, the abilities for different people to clear cut without any research done. In fact, one of the interesting things that has come to my attention is the different sectors and their impact on the environment. I am wondering: that's something that certainly should be researched and worked co-operatively with those areas.
