MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last month I was honoured to attend the official opening of the office of the World Lebanese Cultural Union, Edmonton chapter. The Edmonton-Glengarry constituency is the home of many people of Lebanese descent, and we are delighted to learn that the Edmonton chapter of the World Lebanese Cultural Union chose to locate their office here. Congratulations are to be extended to President Samir Bleibel and Vice-President Samir Sleiman and to all members.

One of the objectives of the World Lebanese Cultural Union is to encourage sports, cultural and educational activities amongst their youth. There are a number of schools in Edmonton-Glengarry where students have the opportunity to study in Arabic as well as English. The community is in the process of having Arabic recognized by Alberta Education. Much work has already been done completing the translation of that curriculum into Arabic. Last fall at Killarney junior high school the Lebanese students and their families hosted a lunch featuring their ethnic food. The lunch was an outstanding success and gave students with different backgrounds an opportunity to learn and share in some very delicious culinary delights.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, let me once again congratulate the Edmonton chapter of the World Lebanese Cultural Union. I am certain that it will be an instrumental key in uniting the Lebanese community in Edmonton.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Calgary Aquamums Synchronized Swimming Team

MS KRYCZKA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Three weeks ago I applauded in this Assembly the commitment of the Calgary Aquamums master synchronized swimmers and wished them well in the world aquatic championships in New Zealand, March 28 to April 4, 2002. Today, well, I'm back and I'm proud to recognize the terrific results of this Calgary contingent, who had the largest synchro group of 14 swimmers.

The team won gold in the 35- to 49-year-old category. The duet of Kelly Kryczka-Irwin and Carol Fitzsimmons won gold in the 40- to 49-year-old category. Carol Fitzsimmons won solo gold in the 40 to 49 age group. Kelly Kryczka-Irwin won solo tech gold in the 40 to 49 age group with Carol Fitzsimmons second and Raphaela Jablonca third. Michelle Paget won solo gold in the 30 to 39 age group and Robyn Kaser was second. Compared to an Olympic competition, I'm told, this championship was lots of fun, proving to these wonderful athletes that there is life after family. Arriving home last weekend, everyone is still pretty keen and looking at the Worlds in Rome in 2004. Well, why not, when the Swiss complimented Carol and Kelly with: "Why don't you guys come over," meaning compete, "in the Swiss open this summer with no age restrictions?"

Congratulations, athletes, on your success in New Zealand. And by the way, the family won't let them go.

Thank you.

Bill Hunter

MR. SNELGROVE: It's not your aptitude, it's your attitude that gives you your altitude in life. Those words were the guidelines for a truly great Canadian honoured here in Edmonton last night. Mr. Bill Hunter, Wild Bill, as he was rightfully known, is truly one of the most remarkable people that this community, both sport and business, has ever known. Mr. Hunter has previously been awarded the Order of Canada and was inducted into the Hockey Hall of Fame. Mr. Hunter's loyalty and commitment to those he knew is legendary. I could not begin to cover all of Mr. Hunter's adventures in this short time. However, I cherish an autographed copy of his memoirs, and I recommend it to all. Mr. Hunter played a huge and colourful part in Canada's hockey history.

Mr. Speaker, there is probably no greater honour than to be honoured by your friends, as Mr. Hunter was last night. I would ask you and all hon. members to join me in recognizing a truly wonderful man, a great Albertan, a proud Edmontonian: Mr. Bill Hunter.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose.

Dr. Dwayne Elaschuk

MR. JOHNSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to recognize the late Dr. Dwayne Elaschuk, a veterinarian and friend of the entire community of Camrose and beyond. Dr. Elaschuk was inducted into the county of Camrose's agricultural wall of honour on March 8 for his contributions to agriculture in the Camrose community. He was an avid supporter of agriculture and was actively involved with the Camrose Regional Exhibition and the Canadian Bull Congress. A scholarship fund to honour Dwayne's memory was established at this year's Canadian Bull Congress. Also, the Dr. Dwayne Elaschuk perpetual 4-H bison trophy has been created for the 4-H winner in the bison class at the annual Wild Rose Classic Bison Show and Sale. This year Dr. Dwayne Elaschuk was selected as the veterinarian of the year by the Western Canadian Association of Bovine Practitioners. Dwayne Elaschuk's commitment to excellence, which showed in all aspects of his work and life, and his legacy will live forever through those who had the privilege of knowing and working with him.

Thank you.

head: Presenting Petitions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to present a petition asking this Assembly "to urge the government of Alberta to not delist services, raise health care premiums, introduce user fees or further privatize health care." This petition is signed by 204 seniors and other residents of this great city.

Thank you.

head: Introduction of Bills

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Whitecourt-Ste. Anne.

Municipal Government Amendment Act, 2002

MR. VANDERBURG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour for me to request leave to introduce Bill 23, the Municipal Government Amendment Act, 2002.

The bill provides a standard of good faith for protection from liability for municipal officials, employees, and volunteers and municipal boxing and wrestling commissions. The bill also introduces changes that will enhance and improve the equalized assessment process and assessment audit system. Mr. Speaker, the bill is based on consultations with stakeholders and recommendations of the equalized assessment panel.

Thank you, sir.

[Motion carried; Bill 23 read a first time]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd move that Bill 23 be moved onto the Order Paper under Government Bills and Orders.

[Motion carried]

Bill Pr. 1

Synod of the Diocese of Edmonton Amendment Act, 2002

MR. MASKELL: Mr. Speaker, I request leave to introduce a bill being Bill Pr. 1, Synod of the Diocese of Edmonton Amendment Act, 2002.

[Motion carried; Bill Pr. 1 read a first time]

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MR. HORNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have one tabling today. It's a letter from Mrs. Joan Trettler, chair of the board of trustees of the St. Albert Protestant school district. The letter expresses some concerns regarding the Education Services Settlement Act.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I've two tablings today. The first is a letter from Marilyn Marks with the Alberta Grandparents' Association addressed to Minister Hancock in which she appeals to him to "help bring the focus of grandparent access forward, by strengthening the Access Law Legislation, so children won't continue to be used as pawns."

My second tabling is a letter directed to the Premier from Christine Cook, who is stating that it's "morally unacceptable to pull [the community lottery board] money out of the communities who create effective programs with it" and urging the government to "honour the promises" and reinstate the community lottery board with an increase.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table appropriate copies of a letter written by Ms Sandra Tessman, manager of Diamond Spring Lodge and Golden Villa Apartments located in Redwater. This facility is managed by the Sturgeon Foundation management, which looks after seniors' supportive housing for moderate- to low-income seniors. The letter is calling on the Premier to reconsider his decision on the community lottery board funding and reinstate the funding programs.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today with your permission I would like to table five copies of 33 letters addressed to the Premier. The individuals signing these letters are joining the War Amps in their request for reinstating their access to the motor vehicle operators list.

head: Orders of the Day

head: Government Bills and Orders

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Consistent with the practice of the last few days with respect to the Committee of Supply I would seek unanimous consent of the Assembly to waive Standing Order 58(4) to allow this afternoon's consideration of the estimates of the Department of Children's Services to go beyond two hours with the vote on these estimates to take place no later than 5:15 this afternoon as per Standing Order 58(5) or sooner if no one wishes to speak.

head: Committee of Supply

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: We shall call the committee to order.

head: Main Estimates 2002-03

Children's Services

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: As per our Standing Order the first hour is allocated to the minister and members of the opposition, and thereafter any other member is able to raise questions.

The hon. minister.

MS EVANS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Actually, I'd like to clarify. My intent is to speak for probably about 15 minutes. I would be pleased to entertain questions as our House procedures apply and will just try and make this a brief summary so that we can have some dialogue, hopefully meaningful to the House.

I would like to discuss the accomplishments of Children's Services in the past fiscal year and our budget for 2002-03 and our business plan for the coming year. The past fiscal year has been challenging for Children's Services. We persevered, made some hard decisions, and brought in a balanced budget.

I want to clarify some misconceptions about our fall cost-containment strategies. We did not cut our budget. In fact, at the end of the year it remained at $648 million throughout 2001-02 with the exception of the 1 percent reduction mandated across government. Now, the 1 percent reduction mandated would have reduced that $648 million, but during the latter part of the fourth quarter, we added moneys from the federal government for aboriginal children's services as well as some allocation to help offset the teachers' strike, et cetera. However, Mr. Chairman, there was an adjustment, in fact, in our service delivery to offset any expected deficit so that we would come in on target, and that projected overspending totaled $32 million in child and family services authorities across Alberta.

So, in fact, we did achieve our fiscal accountability, and many of the programs that were thus reduced were programs that we believe could be delivered in a different fashion. At all times during cost containment we kept the impact on children and families foremost in our minds. So the program changes were made as far as possible from the child at risk and truly at high risk.

In the last fiscal year we named 16 Great Kids from across Alberta who were honoured for their outstanding achievements. We heard from 700 children and youth who shared their dreams about Alberta's future as part of the Future Summit, and the ministry received and implemented all recommendations that were made after the tragic deaths of twin babies.

Headed up by the MLA for Calgary-Buffalo, we started a comprehensive review of Alberta's child welfare legislation that will lead to further improvements in our welfare system. This hasn't been done for over 17 years. The review team has already crossed the province hearing from many stakeholders and the public about what is working well and what solutions, in fact, could be available for issues that currently surround child welfare.

The second Children's Forum drew a thousand Albertans together last fall and heard again from a cross section of people about ways to improve services for children, youth, and families. These ideas are being implemented into our business planning process. Thanks to the work of the MLA for Red Deer-North we are also addressing the needs of youth who require ongoing supports as they go into adulthood. I am most proud, Mr. Chairman, of the work of that particular member, who has gathered together a group of vibrant young people who delight, in fact, in their regular meetings with the hon. member and provide us some policy advice on everything from mentoring to transition from youth to adulthood. I'm pleased to be a partner with her in trying to effect the most positive policies.

Mr. Chairman, children are a priority for this government, and this year's budget will in fact indicate that. As we heard in the budget announced by the Finance minister on March 19, the Children's Services' budget for this fiscal year is $675 million, a 4.2 percent increase from the budget last year of $648 million. With the additional $27 million this year Children's Services will be making further investment in Alberta children and families. Regional child and family services authorities will receive $517 million, an increase of $6 million, or 1 percent, over the last year. But not all authorities will receive funding increases in the next year. Based on last year's experience, we have reallocated funding to address issues in some regions where more services are necessary and some cases require extra resources.

Mr. Chairman, an example I should point out right now is present on the consolidated financial sheet, which might show that, in fact, it appears that we have reduced the funding for women's shelters and shelter support in the province. This is not the case. There are reallocations within this budget. In fact, in that particular area, if you took a look at the functional delivery costs, there will be $14 million delivered for shelter support and support within communities of women who have suffered in violent situations along with their children who need supports. Child welfare will receive a $23 million increase, children with disabilities a $7 million increase, a 36 percent increase in family and community support services for local prevention programs.

Mr. Chairman, I truly wish that the people in this House were listening to me, because I'm going to provide something that would be in part a response to what has been said for the last several days about community lottery boards. We have increased to full funding the amount of dollars that are coming to family and community support services. Many of those 15 million additional dollars will serve to fund programs, especially those in early intervention and prevention that may have been funded previously by lottery dollars. So while there's been a lot of crying about lottery boards, we're doing something about it, and people have completely ignored that amount of money in this year's budget.

The $15 million, I believe, added with the dollars that are complementary amounts from local jurisdictions, will see that local authorities are better able at the municipal level to look at issues that surround the family. We have targeted to have approximately 2,402 full-time equivalents in our budget compared to 2,588 in 2001-02. I must stress that this reduction of 186 full-time equivalents will come largely through attrition, and there will be no reduction in social workers or frontline staff anticipated in this coming year.

We will spend $14 million on family violence, as I have reiterated, and we've added a new line to the budget: governance for child and family services authorities. Two million dollars will be spent on CFSA governance this year. Previously these dollars were in the category of program support, and they have now been isolated for improved disclosure of our costs. Community capacity building has been added under family and community support, and we have recategorized it and taken it out of the support area. Community capacity building adds to our integration pillar and puts money into partnerships with community stakeholders. There is a $2 million reduction in the ministry's support services budget. So with these reallocations there are additional dollars supporting communities and supporting frontline workers.

The lower spending on ministry support services will predominantly come through reductions in technology projects. The change is part of our aim to refocus corporate activities on those that directly support the regional delivery model and eliminate duplication.

Because of the way the estimates are presented, what the numbers may not clearly show is that for the coming year we've moved a number of programs that were previously retained in the department's budget to the child and family services authorities. These include fetal alcohol syndrome, child financial support, mentoring for parents and home visitation, and early childhood development. In that case, we've moved $11 million to the regions, retaining $10 million in the department. Mr. Chairman, we will ensure that the dollars that are moving to the authorities will be wisely spent through our monitoring and our mentoring processes.

While the 2002-2003 budget for Children's Services has increased by 4.2 percent, the ministry must be more efficient than ever with its dollars because of the current challenging economic climate. We've received significant budgetary increases through the years, but we're continually challenged to ensure that the at-risk child receives protection services within the funding we receive.

In the next fiscal year we will continue focusing on protective services, on frontline services, and a key, Mr. Chairman, will be our Alberta response model, an initiative that looks to the future, helping at-risk families but ensuring as much as possible that children reside in permanent, nurturing homes. We will be working on family preservation, family reunification, and where children are most at risk, working hard to make sure that there are permanency plans for those children.

Through the Alberta response model we will utilize community-based resources. We will in fact use these resources through FCSS and also through a number of local providers. With a renewed emphasis on adoptions we hope through this model to increase the number of children who are placed in permanent, nurturing homes. Cases where the risk to children is higher would be investigated under the existing strict investigative process. Implementing a model that will require the participation and efforts of many people, we expect to have strong staff training programs this year for all of the staff in the 18 child and family services authorities. With guidance and dedication these boards, I know, will govern and work hard to make sure that the implementation plan is smooth.

Through our other initiatives in the Child Welfare Act we will engage in significant dialogue with our authorities and with Albertans. A recommendations document regarding the review of the act will be circulated to stakeholders later this year. New child welfare legislation will be drafted in the last six months of this year and, I expect, will be very positively received because of the amount of consultation.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw has done a yeoman's job in following in your footsteps to make sure that the social care facilities in Alberta are reviewed and judged in concert with our partners. I'm very pleased with the activity of the hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw, who has continued to keep us well informed, to keep the ministry informed, and closed the loop on some of the investigations so that in fact we may be able to see improvements in those facilities. She is also working with the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark to determine whether or not in the partnership of reviewing health care facilities our government can make improvements in our efficiencies.

Mr. Chairman, our new youth in transition policy framework, again under the MLA for Red Deer-North, will guide our cross-ministry program, developing policies and programs for youth progressing to adulthood. Mentorship and other ways to ensure that youth will continue to receive the support services they require will be part of the program this year.

Children's Services will develop a message that will ensure that only safe levels of alcohol use come when people are not pregnant. Our message is strongly that prenatal alcohol use is not safe. It is best to use no alcohol at all. That message will be carried not only to pregnant moms but, because of the new research, to those that would be fathers of children and make sure that young men and adults of all ages understand how critical the use of alcohol is and that it should not be used during times of gestation. We will continue to spread that message.

Our business plan has had some fine-tuning since we first established the ministry in 1999. Our vision is that Alberta in the future will be "an Alberta where children and youth are valued, nurtured and loved, and develop to their potential." We believe that Alberta should be child friendly for families, children, and youth, and we believe, Mr. Chairman, that everybody in Alberta deserves to live in a situation where there is no violence, where there is no abuse. This year I personally accept a challenge with other partners to reduce the amount of violence and to work with other ministries to really focus on the detrimental circumstances that Albertans find themselves in when family violence impacts our communities.

There are five goals, eight strategies, and 13 performance measures for this year. Our goals:

- Children and youth will have a healthy start in life and the supports they need to reach their potential . . .
- Families will be safe, healthy, and able to promote children's development.
- Children in need will be protected and supported by permanent, nurturing relationships . . .
- The well-being and self-reliance of Aboriginal children, families, and communities will be promoted, supported and comparable to that of other Albertans.
- Communities will have the capacity to plan and deliver services that promote the well-being of Alberta's children, youth, and families.

As we promote the well-being of Albertans, our core business and key program areas do include the how-tos of this ministry: early intervention programs, early childhood development, child care programming, and resources for children with disabilities. As we work to keep children, youth, and families safe and protected, we will also work very hard and strive with all of our energies on the Alberta response model to transform child welfare, to protect families, to protect children involved in prostitution, and to promote healthy communities.

Mr. Chairman, the future is bright for Children's Services. Our budget has increased by $27 million. We will be working closely with our partners to improve services. We will implement early childhood development and early intervention programs and strengthen child care programs, and we will continue to transform child welfare and improve the outcomes for children. We will promote the abilities of families to provide safe and nurturing environments for children, and we will advance the well-being and safe reliance of aboriginal communities.

I'm looking forward to the coming year, and I'm delighted at the mirth and enthusiasm of the members of the House as they joyously applaud the work that I will do this year and that they will do on our behalf. [some applause]

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It should be noted that the applause came from the government benches. I just want that on the record.

I'm delighted to have the opportunity to ask some questions of the Minister of Children's Services. To start off with, three initial questions. First of all, to thank the minister for the consultation she engaged in in terms of the Alberta response model. I brought back the two videotapes that she shared with me and the documents outlining the basis, as I understand it, for the Alberta response model, which are the projects in San Diego and the Toronto drug court. So I thank her for that information, and I'll return those tapes.

I think there's need for clarification in terms of the department's financial situation. There seem to be two messages that are out there. One is that the cuts, no matter what they are, do not affect frontline service, and if that is the case, then the question that I've had asked of me is: was the department so bloated that it could take a 1 percent cut and then a reduction of 186 people in this year's budget? I think there needs to be some clarification, and I'm not sure that even the language is helping by using words like "cost containment." I'm not sure it's quite clear to people exactly what's happening, so I would appreciate sort of a global statement from the minister in terms of the department's finances. How can the cuts continually take place – I know there's been money put back in – but not affect frontline services to children?

A second really general query is for information about the Alberta response model. I don't pretend to know about the San Diego model or the Toronto model other than what I've read and seen on the video, Mr. Chairman, but it seems to me that one of the characteristics of those models was that it wasn't top down, that it was bottom up, all the agencies being involved in developing the model and bringing it forward as the model that would be used. There are all kinds of questions about the Alberta response model that are raised in the estimates. It's mentioned a number of times, and the minister mentioned it in her remarks, but what exactly is the Alberta response model? How does it differ or does it differ from the San Diego model and Judge Milliken's court? Does it differ from the Toronto model? What are the departments and what are the other agencies that are going to be expected to take part in the Alberta response model? Where in the budget will the responsibility for the model lie? Is it with the department, or is it with the regions? I think we need to have that clarified, because it's not clear where that model is going to be driven from. And what are the implications for the regions, particularly some of the regions that are taking reductions in their budgets this year? Again, I would appreciate and I think Albertans would appreciate knowing exactly what the Alberta response model entails, how the agencies are going to be involved, how it's going to be financed, and where authority for the model will reside. So that's sort of the second general area that I think would be useful to have the minister make comments on.

The third area is early childhood development, and this, I guess, arises out of some specific concerns, and that's in terms of day care and day care workers and what's happening to the preparation of day care workers and to the personnel working in day care centres across the province. There are a number of people who have characterized early child development with respect to day cares in the province as being in crisis. Students are leaving the programs in the colleges. It's hard to attract new students. Workers in the field are being paid minimum wages, and it's very, very hard to convince someone that they should go and take a two-year program to send them out to work in a day care where they end up having to work two jobs just to pay the rent and the food bills. It's an important question and one that I would appreciate the minister's thoughts on.

So in those three general areas, Mr. Chairman, I would appreciate some comment from the minister.

We then have, of course, some specific questions. I guess one is the budget itself and the business plan and where exactly we're eventually going to end up in terms of performance measures and the objectives that we find in the plan. In previous budgets there was a great deal made of the four pillars, and it seems to me that in the past year those pillars, at least a couple of them, have been greatly weakened. I've listened to a number of community groups who feel that early prevention and intervention have really suffered in terms of what's been done to those programs, and I've heard from the aboriginal community that the hope to improve services to aboriginal children and their families has also been badly hurt. In fact, I had one individual call and say: you know, really there has been no work in these two areas, and they have been severely curtailed and hurt by the actions of the department in the last year. So what is the importance of those four pillars? Are they really the four pillars that support the department, or have they been changed? Has the government, as it seems at times, really retreated into intervention, where there has to be police intervention before the department feels any responsibility for being involved? So, again, a question about the business plan. I know it's hard to come up with performance measures, but it's equally hard for people to judge the budget when they constantly change. Is the implementation of the Alberta response model going to mean that next year we're faced with another set of performance measures in the budget?

I'd like to start asking a few specific questions of the minister, and they're those that are concerned with the Children's Advocate. Funding to the Children's Advocate will decrease by 15 percent in the 2002-2003 budget. That budget goes from $2,122,000 to $1,800,000. I guess the question is: why? It's a department that puts out an annual report that I'm sure causes the minister some great unease, and I would hope that the valuable service provided by the Children's Advocate is not going to be undercut because of that. I think that if we are really and truly interested in serving the children of the province, it has to be an independent advocate and one who is free to speak and to reiterate the kinds of things that he or she hears, an advocate that can speak and be the voice of the children in the system who are not being served well.

It seems that there's been the review, and the advocate is in limbo or worse. Again, I would ask: has the minister considered making the advocate an officer who reports to the Legislature, much as the Ethics Commissioner and the Chief Electoral Officer do? Ultimately, that independence from the department seems to be the only way we can really ensure that the office is going to be independent. Is the minister not concerned that a budget reduction such as the one that we have in front of us for the Children's Advocate is going to have a chilling effect on the advocate and cause the advocate to question even more closely the things that he reports on because of the notion that you must not bring forward things that might embarrass the government? I hope that's not the case, Mr. Chairman.

It seems really a curious juxtaposition of budget items. There's this cut of 15 percent to the Children's Advocate, and then there's an increase for accountability and provincial standards of 48 percent. So how do you account for those two amounts and the spending that has been allocated to those two items? These questions arise under program 1, Mr. Chairman, of the ministry support services.

A general question before I leave that: is the increase in the overall budget going to keep pace with the expected increases in child welfare caseloads this year? Is there some evidence we can have? On what basis were budget decisions made so that we can be assured that they will actually keep pace with increases in the child welfare caseload?

Going back again under program 2.1.2, Alberta response model implementation, and some specifics to that. How many full-time equivalents are going to be required to implement the model? In terms of the implementation, is there any assurance that it's going to be more successful than the Health and Learning initiative, where there is still great difficulty having both departments come together and work in the interests of children? There's been a lot of money spent on planning, but the actual impact on children's lives I think has been fairly minimal at this point.

With the ministry's overall reduction of the 186 full-time equivalents, where are the people that are going to implement the Alberta response model? Where are they going to come from? What about the children's authorities? Is there money in that model, or are they going to have to redeploy resources? What exactly is the impact on the children's authorities, and what are the other departments that are expected? Where is Justice in this model? Are there moneys budgeted in other departments, for instance in the Justice department, to help implement the model? What about in Human Resources and Employment? Are there moneys in that department to implement the model? I guess the basic question is: is there a cost sharing that's being undertaken?

I didn't see it in the materials that the minister shared with me, but one of the comments I did read was that the model used in San Diego needed more money for resources, that it was more costly to run the model than it was to stay with the former practices. Now, I think that there were savings claimed in terms of the amount of time that families stay in the system, but as I read the report, it seemed to me that the implication was that there had to be very generous resource allocations put in place by a number of departments and agencies to make sure that those programs worked. If there is information on the implementation of those programs recognizing the differences between Canada and the United States, I'd be interested in seeing that.

I guess there are questions about the Child Welfare Act review and the $350,000. Why is that kind of money being spent when we're having changes introduced in the Legislature before the review, the consultations are over? We've had bills come to the Legislature that one might have thought would have awaited the report and the recommendations of the review. A further question: when can we expect the recommendations of the review to be made public?

I think that for the first round those are some of the questions that I'd be interested in hearing a response to from the minister. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. minister.

MS EVANS: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Let me give a few remarks and try and capture some of the issues that have been raised.

In the very first instance let me talk about the ARM, or the Alberta response model, because I think it's something that I should clarify for the House and see if I can do it thoroughly enough so that it'll address a number of the issues that the hon. member opposite raised both at the beginning of his remarks and later in his remarks. The Alberta response model is in some communities defined, for example in Texas, as a flexible model, which means that there's not simply one way to address all of the intakes of child welfare and that every child is being dealt with flexibly in a different fashion. In Missouri it's called a dual response model. In California it's called a differential model. What it really means is an attempt by the intake worker to identify what the risk is, the risk assessment for each individual child that's coming into the system. So if there is low risk, if in fact they deem that the child, number one and the most paramount thing, is safe in their current environment, then supports are provided to the family – parent supports, parent training, children's supports – through the school, through the kind of community network that we hope to build capacity within communities.

That's why one of our pillars is community based. That's part of our CFSA, our child and family services authority, accountability: community based. So we build the capacity in communities, something we've been doing since May '99, when this ministry came in, and something that the family and community support services will continue to do this year with the dollars that are there for early intervention: the home visitation, the early intervention that will occur even before children might come to risk, the kinds of identification of hazards or barriers to the safety of the child to the capacity of the family to do things in the right way. Many of the dollars spent on early child development will be part of building family capacity to cope so that in the very first instance, when somebody reports that an investigation should be undertaken on behalf of a child, we hope that most would be found to be low risk that we could easily accommodate.

The Alberta response model will look at the moderate risk, where social workers, trained psychologists, and other professionals would have required visits in the home, again working at keeping and nurturing a family to be better suited to accommodate parenting needs, looking after them, and providing supervision and monitoring, working in family case conferencing to add additional support so that the child would not be removed from the home. It would be much like we've done where we remove the perpetrator of violence under a different piece of legislation, to try and remove the hazards under one piece of legislation dealing with family violence. Here we would be trying to add to support children who are at moderate risk where we believe that they were safe in their homes but where home services to support that home, to support parents would be necessary. It would be a very schooled, disciplined approach of working with that family within the home. High risk children where the child's protection is so paramount would be removed from the home at the outset and protection services provided, we hope, with a concurrent plan or a plan that will help work with that child and also work with that family.

Something that has been drawn to my attention several times this year is that often if we remove a child, we simply warehouse a child for the family's convenience without working on that child's family environment to see if we can save that child's family home. For example, in the Toronto model in the drug courts of Toronto they work actively on both the family as well as the person that has been abusing themselves with drugs. Well, we would like to work on protecting the child, give them nurturing but also work on the family home so that they just didn't simply continue perhaps to abuse drugs or to abuse themselves in other ways with alcohol and then come back to court in six months and we continue to keep a child in family protection and in foster care or in group residential homes.

Mr. Chairman, one of the parts of the Alberta response model that's most exciting is that we will review many of the cases we've got. Last year we had over 15,000 cases, about half of which were in homes other than their family home. This year we have about 14,300 cases, I believe, as we speak, and we will look at what the options are for children that are currently in care. So there'll be sort of a dual focus: trying to focus on those that we're taking into care if they need to come into care and focus on the ones that are already in care.

I am not suggesting for a minute that we're going to adopt all of the other models we've seen across America or in other provinces, but one thing that intrigues me is that in America all of the states function with a requirement for family reunification within a shorter period of time. I don't want to fast-track and put children at risk for a fast track, but in the United States a reunification is at a one-year level. They say: insist on one-year reunification. I think it behooves us not to reject that out of hand but look at whether or not the planning for the child in the longer term improves if we try to improve those families and get the children back in those homes if they should be back in those homes. If not, we work on finding a permanent place for that child, kinship care perhaps, but a permanent loving home. Every child deserves one adult that loves them and cares for them and is their advocate at all times, Mr. Chairman.

That's why we have some optimism that the ARM model in various forms across North America is currently showing better results. We protect children well. When I see at the end of the day that less than 15 percent, in some areas less than 10 percent, even graduate from school or graduate from another postsecondary institution and yet they've been in our care for sometimes 10 and 12 years, then like the young child in a safe house who had been prostituting herself for years said to me: you have to work harder; you should have been stronger and more tough on my mom so she didn't get away with bad behaviour for a long period of time.

The Alberta response model will in part save families, Mr. Chairman, and that's a good part of what we'll do. We will provide for the hon. members opposite more information on the ARM model because we believe and are very optimistic that we will see improvements in the child welfare delivery system through training our workers and through what's happening already in this capital region as I speak with region 10 and the Ma'Mōwe child and family service authorities. They are embracing the opportunity to look at different ways to deliver child welfare.

Mr. Chairman, I was asked about the 186 workers. Were we bloated? No, we weren't, but we had some cases where we could become much more efficient. Even prior to the end of this past year at about the 1st of March I understand that there were positions that were unfilled, it's true, that we may still choose to fill now that the freeze is off, but we're going to analyze very closely where the workers need to be on the front lines, and I will try and provide a more detailed evaluation of it. In some parts of the city of Edmonton, for example, there were certainly a larger number of workers than there were, for example, in the way that child and family services were delivered in Calgary. So through management of the various contracts – and as the hon. member opposite knows, agency supports have a huge amount to do with how child welfare is administered. So I'll try and provide quite specifically for the Ma'Mōwe child and family services how we are trying to organize ourselves to do better.

In terms of the day care supports in this budget there are supports. Some of these supports, if you stay tuned, will come through in our policies that will be delivered later. We're looking right now not only at the KPMG report that has been raised in this House for not only day care but family day homes, but we're looking at other programs to do in co-operation with universities and with other nonprofit agencies and with other agency supports for training, nutritional supports, for additional supports for day care. Ultimately, Mr. Chairman, I hope to look at accreditation as a model to respond to some of the concerns that people raised with me relative to day care.

I want to talk a bit about the four pillars. I think that this is essential. We have not weakened the four pillars. If anything this year we have devoted more to First Nations' aboriginal child and family services, and I'm loath to understand quite specifically what might be the problem. We've worked to strengthen them where necessary. We've resumed what had been delegated authority in at least one case. But if you really take a look at the four pillars – community-based, early intervention, improving aboriginal services, and integrated services – they focus a lot on how we do things. We think that a lot of how we do things is coming along pretty well, but what we do in the management of Children's Services – the crisis protection, the family reunification, or the maintenance of family services, the permanency planning – is part of the focus of what we're undertaking in this business plan, and that's why the objectives may appear to be altered slightly.

On the matter of the advocate we see a realignment of advocate staff. We have already asked the question of the hon. Minister of Infrastructure about collaborating on moving out of two facilities here in the city of Edmonton, moving staff out of Hilltop, relocating into the one facility in Peace Hills Trust Tower, and looking throughout Alberta in co-operation with advocate staff at other ways to work on tutoring people for natural advocacy and changing the advocate's role somewhat to provide more frequent reporting, more frequent dialogue with the directors at the local level, to tutoring advocacy for families and community services, and to increasing the work with the children and the families in various communities, targeting where we really have caseload needs. But we do not necessarily anticipate that the caseloads will increase if the Alberta response model works well, even if we have an increased child and family population in Alberta.

Mr. Chairman, I'll just talk a bit about the dollars for the act review. That accommodates staff. In this past year we've had some 30 staff from across Alberta and child care providers from agencies that have sometimes donated their services, but somehow right now as we wrap up and use our staff and Justice staff and other people together, we just wanted to anticipate that we had sufficient dollars to follow through and do that as well as possible. But we have had changes coming prior to the tabling of the new act because we believed that they were vital. I'm going to be talking with the hon. members opposite about another change that has to be made where we see some sense of urgency in the need to do that.

In support for the AR model those dollars are built into the authorities in their training dollars as well as built into the department. We have at least $2 million in the department to accommodate that, and under our assistant deputy minister I know we'll do it.

Mr. Chair, I'm fascinated by the level of understanding that my colleagues in the House have and the three or four other members that have joined us this afternoon.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I thank the minister for those responses. Just a couple of questions that arose out of her comments. There has been a reduction in caseloads from 15,000 to 14,300, and I wonder if the minister could share with us what accounts for that reduction in caseloads given the material that's out about the increase in poverty and the other kinds of social indicators that would lead one to expect that the caseloads might be rising.

I'm still not clear on the Children's Advocate. If I understand what was being said, there's going to be more frequent reporting; there's going to be targeting of youngsters and resources put in to try to solve the problems. If that's the case, then why are there reductions? Why would that not cost more? Or are those reductions just entirely wrapped up in physical facilities and savings on rents and leases? It doesn't seem to quite fit. Again, I would be interested in the minister's response to making the Children's Advocate independent and reporting directly to the Legislature, giving the assurance, then, that the advocate is truly free to represent the interests of young people in the province.

Those are the general ones that came out of the minister's response. Another specific one though – and I must be a little slow, even slower than usual this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, but I can't quite understand how the ARM program is now going to be implemented in children's authorities when you look through and a number of those authorities have had reductions in their budgets. It seems that they are going to be asked to do more to take on an innovative project, yet they are going to be given fewer resources to do that. It's also interesting that some of the authorities that are receiving less money are ones that were in financial difficulty at the end of last year.

So I think there has to be some sort of public reconciliation in terms of how we are going to be able to do more and spend less. I think it has to be addressed, particularly when, as the minister has said, the benefits from implementing the ARM program are not going to be immediate; they're going to take some time before we actually see that happen.

And again the question about the other departments being involved, Justice: are there dollars salted away in the budgets of those departments to help with the ARM project? Does that account for being able to spend less in Children's Services, because the slack is being taken up in one of the other departments? I would appreciate some comment on that.

The minister indicated that caseloads were being reduced, and I guess I've already asked the question. I'd be interested in what accounts for that reduction.

I'd like to ask a question under 3.0.2, the financial assistance to communities and organizations. Why has there been a 100 percent increase in funding from lotteries to line 3.0.2, financial assistance to communities and organizations, as this is where some of the money is coming from, and what additional projects or services are going to be provided by the extra $25 million that have been allocated in lottery revenues?

I have a question under the key program area looking at children involved in prostitution. Why did the department cut its funding last year for the Crossroads program? Is Crossroads going to have the support that they need this year to deal with the initiative? It's a program that I know the government is proud of having instituted and has certainly said is a high priority, but the concern is: does Crossroads have the resources to do the job that's expected of them?

I have a question again about the AR model. Is it intended that there will be mandatory drug treatment for parents in at-risk families who are known to have drug and alcohol problems? Is mandatory drug treatment going to be part of the program? Maybe the minister can expand on what is intended. Will the department enforce drug treatment on parents by permanently removing children from parents who don't comply?

I guess it's the punitive measures that we see in the San Diego and Toronto models. Are those same punishments going to be meted out on parents in Alberta? There was a bit of a dichotomy when you watched the videotapes on the San Diego and Toronto programs. In one program they were interviewing some of the mothers who said that previously they had been sent to jail and that's where they learned their bad behaviour. That's where they learned to do drugs and where to obtain them. Yet the other program uses two- or three-day jail sentences as one of the punishments for parents who don't comply. So it seems to be counterproductive to try to help them and then send them to the very place where they learned the behaviour that's getting them into trouble. I wonder how our ARM program, the Alberta Response Model, is going to address that problem.

The minister talked about the realignment of services, and this is under item 1.1.4. Are the services for children with disabilities going to mean a reduction in support or in some cases a complete termination of support for these children? Handicapped children's services has been drastically reduced in its support for children. Does this new strategy intend that responsibility is going to be downloaded to other agencies? Just exactly what is going to happen? As the minister knows, parents with children with disabilities are greatly alarmed and have held meetings in the province to express their concerns with the reduction. I hope, again, that realignment isn't a fancy word for reduction, that those services those youngsters need are actually going to be there, if not from Children's Services then from somewhere else, and that before any realignment is undertaken the services are in place so that those children do not suffer.

Last year there was a goal, 1.2, that said that the ministry was going to "provide a continuum of services to support and promote the well-being of children, youth and families." This goal is included in performance measure B, "Percentage of families accessing Handicapped Children's Services who report the services are having a positive impact on their family." This was a new measure, so baseline data were still being developed. So I'd like to know what happened to the measure. Why has it been dropped, and did the department actually develop data for the performance measure? If it did, what has happened to that, and why don't we see that here? It would seem to me that it's certainly an important measure in terms of the department's performance.

There's a question under 2.1.1. Performance measure C is: "Percentage of children reported to be at-risk who received supports through community resources and did not require child protection services." The target is: "Caseload growth contained, and reduced by 5%." It seems to me that there's again a contradiction. If the ministry is trying to reduce child welfare caseloads, then why hasn't there been an increase in the support to the early prevention and intervention programs? It goes back to the basic problem, and when the 1 percent cross-ministry reductions of last fall were put in place, there seemed to be a retreat by the department. We all have heard from a number of agencies in this local area who had their programs changed or cut by the ministry at that time. Again I think it's at the root of the feeling that the early intervention and prevention pillar of the ministry is being undermined and that there would be those in the department happy with that and with the notion that intervention and apprehension when children are at high or moderate risk is where the department should put its resources rather than into prevention and intervention. So it's a question that I would be interested in the minister responding to.

Under program 3.2.3, where the intent is to develop a provincial strategy for involving the private sector in addressing the needs of children, youth, and families, I wonder if the minister can clarify the kinds of plans to involve the private sector in providing those services to children, youth, and families. When she comments on those plans, would she clarify what has happened to day care in the province and whether or not that involvement of the private sector has been beneficial? So what involvement now is anticipated, and how has the involvement of the private sector in day care affected the province's programs there?

I really did appreciate the minister sharing with me the San Diego and the Toronto models, but I wonder if there are models from any other jurisdictions that Alberta has looked at in terms of addressing the needs of children, youth, and families and the involvement of the private sector. Again I guess my question would be the motivation. Is this an attempt to save money? If it is, you know, will it improve services, and is there evidence elsewhere that would back that up? If there are examples that we could look at from elsewhere, we'd greatly appreciate that, Mr. Chairman.

So with those questions I'll wait for a response from the minister. Thank you.

MS EVANS: First of all, on the matter of the advocate some of the cost reduction would be implicit in a move or a consolidation here to one office, but there are other implicit reductions implied with the way we're going to do work. We've got a situation now where annual reports have been published, but rather than waiting for an entire year to have those reports, it was my belief that a frequent dialogue between the advocate and the director as well as back to the ministry, quite specifically to the minister, would ensure that on cases which have been identified as delicate or have any problems associated with them, we could grasp the situation immediately and ensure that resources are in place to work on those particular cases. A good part of the time this happens, but the Advocate has advised me that not always has it happened. So we're trying very hard to work through a new process – and it's not complete yet – of putting advocates in more close contact with directors at the local level.

A comment about a reduction of $300,000. Here is no different than some of the things we're doing in the departmental budgets where the departmental staff have had to tighten their belts so that we don't impact the ones out in the field as much, so I've asked for the Acting Children's Advocate to come back with the impact. We're looking quite specifically at the Alberta Youth in Care Network to see if we can fund some of that from the local level, from the child and family services authority. I met with Youth in Care, for example, in Calgary, and I think the responsibility for some of those networks to share in local CFSA funding – that amount is about $90,000. There may be other agency and local support for that funding, which would account for a portion of it. So we are working very hard to see if we can accommodate some realignments of funding for the advocate.

Will we have supports from Justice and other ministers on the AR model in the cross-ministry initiative? Absolutely. I can see a lot of support but more of a resource support. This year, for example, one of the things that will be very interesting to track will be the Zebra initiative that's opening this month here on the top of Pacific Plaza, which will put our police, our social workers, and other child care professionals in a training facility together, and hopefully with a one-process intake, talking about their issues. We can do things with that co-operation that will find some benefits not only to the AR model but to the cost efficiencies of doing our program, again on the front lines, to make sure that there is an interaction. We're going to track that very closely, and I am pleased that our local authority here is very interested in it.

Why have the caseloads reduced right now was part of the question. I can't answer that in all situations. We had a situation where we had over 450 children that were over 18 years of age. So we have worked with other ministries to make sure that all of these children are being managed in some fashion in the appropriate place with the appropriate ministry, and a lot of what has been done has not necessarily implied that government is no longer looking after those children but that other responsibility centres, quite specifically Human Resources and Employment, are picking up responsibilities for children elsewhere.

PCHIP funding is as it was. Will Crossroads continue to be used? When we looked at Crossroads during that period of cost containment, there wasn't one in there that was of the age of a child, but we have absolutely guaranteed that if there are children that are prostitutes in these facilities, there will be a substitute facility found, and I can get more clarification from Calgary to see what is currently happening from Calgary Rocky View's perspective in the contract management of Crossroads. But there were far too many in Crossroads at one point that were really adults, and I know there were some young mothers as well that needed supports, and I'm assured that they will be finding substitute placements for them.

Essentially, although we've explored the mandatory drug treatment programs in Toronto, I would advise this Assembly that probably the models that our model most closely affiliates with are the differential response models in California, the flexible response model in Texas, and the Missouri model. I have just recently got information about those models that I will share with the hon. member.

I should point out that the services to children with disabilities did have increases this year. I mentioned in my speaking notes about a $7 million increase, and I should mention further that on page 83 of the business plan it shows the program going from $55 million last year to $62 million in the budget this year. For people who have been concerned about Bill 9 and the change in the policy direction that we believe has to happen before we have people coming to the Child Welfare Appeal Panel, I commit to the hon. member that it is my intent that we put policy in place before we start managing to channel people off and say that they can't do anything to appeal. That's not the intent of this. We want to make sure that they have an opportunity for appeal. With that expert panel that is just getting its sea legs, there has been some work done by the experts, if you will, already on it. But the work we're doing on the IBI and the autism and some of these special needs for children with disabilities is something that I think you'll see some improvements and some clarification with before we start making changes. So that's going to be a work in progress this year, and I can assure this Assembly that we've no intent to take that family in need, that child with special, unique disabilities and not serve them as much.

We have some very happy situations that I will share; for example, one in Rosecrest, where we're seeking alternate ways to fund drug therapies and other resources for children. That is something where just recently we found a huge cost saving because of some other networks.

You've asked about the private sector. The private sector that I see working with this ministry this year will be supporting us in fetal alcohol syndrome supports. We've got huge interest in working with Children's Cottage and Kids Cottage here in finding respite for children in care when the families need that support, and that's one of the ways we've planned to work with the private sector.

Further than that, we're looking at enhancing something we started in the business plan last year, and that is research capacity. I don't know how we'll fit in with this childhood cancer research that has been announced just in the last couple of days, but it's our intent to work towards some kind of capacity building in checking on things like better ways of doing things.

I recently advised some members of the House that currently, for example, for fetal alcohol syndrome they can take a baby's first bowel movement, the meconium that comes when the baby is first born, and analyze that tarry substance and find out what the mother has ingested for the 20 weeks previous, whether she's smoking or whether she has been drinking. Today they can go further than that. They can take a hair from a woman's head while she's pregnant and determine what she has been having for food for a longer period of her gestation.

Some of these kinds of cutting-edge research things will help us all in the practice of looking after people, mothers prenatally and so on. That's where I see the private sector getting involved and funding some exciting research opportunities.

You've asked on line 3.0.2 about financial assistance to communities and organizations. That increase to the FCSS funding model is for the prevention programs which will help us with the AR model, which will help us maintain low-risk families with community agencies. Today, as we speak, we have a prevention panel mirroring the FCSS groups through members of the public and child and family services authority members: quite specifically, counselors from Calgary and from down in Lethbridge, a former president of FCSS, as well as two members from our CFSA's from Lethbridge and from Diamond Willow. Those chairs are working on how we use these prevention moneys to build capacity in communities on the low-risk side. In total we've moved up from $53 million to $70 million for community capacity building, and I think that that's a step that hopefully is in the right direction.

On the day care I can only say to the hon. member opposite: please stay tuned. I know we've heard from almost a thousand people on day care, but I haven't got that through the process yet of our standing policy committee because the family day home part of the study was later, and we've done some checks and balances. But I'm confident that through our early child development funding there will be some opportunity to follow through.

I know that hasn't perhaps addressed all of them. There were two more issues. You asked about 2.1.1. This caseload reduction we believe will happen and is already showing opportunity as we work with families at the local level. You know, quite frankly, to the hon. member opposite, when you add somebody to our caseload rolls, it isn't necessarily a success story. It identifies a failure on several levels, not necessarily a government failure but a failure by the family and the community and the extended family to help. So I'm hoping that our caseloads can reduce, and that's perhaps modest, but I think we will at least achieve that this year.

Then on 1.1.4 I hope I've clarified that $7 million that you identified from that line for the resources for children with disabilities and my intent not to pursue anything punitive on the policy side until we're absolutely sure that we've got a policy and that families are comfortable that we are not leaving them high and dry with their individual cases. I really don't want to see handicapped children or families go through any more temerity than they do with those issues.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'd like to speak to the main estimates on Children's Services as part of the Committee of Supply debate in the Legislature for the year 2002-2003. I at the very outset want to caution or alert the minister to the fact that I may be repeating some of the questions that have already been addressed. I was away for part of the time that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods was on his feet and asking questions. So in case some questions are simply repeated by me, feel free to draw my attention to it and say to look in the Hansard tomorrow, and I'll be happy to do that.

Mr. Chairman, looking at the Children's Services business plan here and some reference to the goals of the department and then the program delivery models, under program delivery of course the thing that comes to notice immediately is that programs will be delivered based on four basic pillars, as it's called: "prevention and early intervention, integration of services, community-based delivery of services," and the fourth one is "improved services to Aboriginal children." Quickly just to make some general observations starting with the very last of the four pillars, "improved services to Aboriginal children and families" is certainly one of the four pillars of program delivery, yet I notice that in the regional authorities' budgets the Metis settlements item suffers quite a dramatic reduction. The Assembly of First Nations is really way down. The Metis settlements are down by 15.09 percent; that's the reduction there. So I hope the minister will help me understand the relationship between the stated program delivery objectives and modes and these particular reductions that come to quick notice under the Metis settlements, quite a substantial reduction of a little over 15 percent.

In the case of the Assembly of First Nations, this really needs an explanation. Maybe there's different money coming from elsewhere. It's an 86.2 percent reduction according to my numbers here, unless I'm totally out to lunch here. Alternatively, there's a huge increase in the services on First Nations reserves. So some explanations on what this means. According to my calculations here, there's perhaps a fifty-fold increase on that item in the budget, for services on First Nations reserves, as I see it here in my papers.

One other number here that I'll just ask the minister to perhaps make a few comments on has to do with the Ma'Mōwe Capital region. In this region we know that because of particular patterns of population and in-migration, the number of aboriginal families and children continues to increase quite rapidly and already has one of the largest numbers here. The budget is almost frozen at last year's level. There's a very, very minor increase, less than one-third of a percentage. Given the rate of inflation and the probable increase of the target population, this increase seems to in fact mean fewer dollars available, unless the minister can perhaps argue that in the cost-containment strategies that she has, some of these programs can be delivered more cheaply than has been the case in the last year, not in the long run but this year as compared to last year.

The other question that I have related to the three sort of main core business statements. The core businesses are first stated, of course, as "promoting the development and well being of children," and early childhood programs are one of the bullets under 1.1.1, "to better meet the developmental needs of children." When I look at that worthy goal and go down to early childhood spending in, first of all, the overall program expenditures, there is a reduction of close to 9 percent from last year to the current budget year for which we are debating the estimates. Then you look at the early intervention spending by regional authorities, and out of 18 children's services regional authorities, 15 show a decrease in budgetary allocation from last year to this year. The Ma'Mōwe Capital region again is an interesting case. The reduction is close to 14 percent, 13.89 percent to be precise, compared to last year. There are some others that of course have seen much more dramatic decreases. In Diamond Willow – I suppose this is the area north and east of Redwater and that region – the reduction is minus 46 percent, a 46.2 percent reduction from last year.

So, as I said, in terms of the general picture it's clear that 15 of the 18 regional authorities responsible for providing children's services have had their budgets reduced for this coming year, and some of the cases that I mentioned clearly suggest very dramatic reductions. The Metis settlements here, with respect to early intervention spending, will see their budgets reduced by 24.95 percent, which is close to a 25 percent reduction, in early childhood intervention. So my question is: how does this square with the first major goal, which I call the business goal, which is quite worthy? I'm sure the minister will take time to comment on that.

Then under core business 2 on page 77 I notice that starting with 2.1.5, coming down to 2.1.7 and so on, there's a focus on addressing the challenge of family violence. Again, when you look at the program spending commitments made by the department, the prevention of family violence budget is reduced by 14.77 percent from the year 2001-2002 to 2002-2003, the current year of the estimates which we are debating right now. While a fairly high priority is given in the strategy to dealing with family violence as part of the goal of keeping children, youth, and families safe and protected, how is this reduction to be explained in terms of the quite clear statement made on page 77 that this is one of the key strategies that will be used to make children safe, make youth safe, and make families safe and remain protected?

So there's a mismatch here, as I see it, between the priorities given to certain goals and the associated fairly dramatic reduction in the dollar resources to address those very services. I do notice – I must be evenhanded here – that there is quite a bit of an increase in the family and community support services. Perhaps that is where the funds have been transferred to, but I need some explanation as to how those will be accessed and will still be available for addressing the prevention of family violence.

Similarly, the child care program reduction in the budget is quite dramatic: 10.9 percent in terms of my calculation. I just want to share with the minister what I heard firsthand from visiting some child care facilities in Grande Prairie just a few months ago when I was there. I was asked to meet with this group on their insistence; I didn't seek this out. They were bitterly complaining about the lack of resources and the low rates that they have to pay to their workers and the difficulty that they have in attracting and keeping committed and skilled child care workers in the day care area. So that reduction, again, doesn't seem to jibe with the business goal that we have under goal 2.

Under core business 3 – I'm moving quickly to that one – we have the key focus on aboriginal communities, on helping these communities “develop the governance, organizational, accountability, and service delivery capacity to promote the care of their children, youth, and families.” Again, I draw the attention of the minister, I guess, to the Metis settlements, you know, the budget reduction which was quite dramatic, and I want the minister to perhaps comment on, again, that reduction on the one hand and the key focus of core business 3 on generating those capacities and helping those communities to develop those capacities there.

Under core business 3 I want to quickly draw the minister's attention to 3.2.3, the private sector. There's a reference there to “develop a provincial strategy for promoting the involvement of the private sector in addressing the needs of children, youth and families.” I thought that there's already a fair bit of participation by the voluntary nonprofit private sector in this area. What exactly does the minister have to say about 3.2.3 that is new, that would be different, that would be in addition to or on top of what's already being done?

The overall reduction in early childhood intervention programs, Mr. Chairman, as I see it, is close to 18 percent, 17.56 percent. Close to one-fifth of the budget is reduced in this area. We see in the program delivery strategy early childhood intervention and prevention as two of the four pillars, yet we see a rolling back of the budgetary commitment to strengthen those two pillars, if what is said in the first part, where goals are stated and strategies are outlined, is to be taken seriously.

I think that maybe I will stop at this point and hopefully will get another opportunity later on to ask some more questions. Thank you.

MS EVANS: Mr. Chairman, would you care for me to respond?

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Hon. minister, you are recognized.

MS EVANS: Thank you. With some of the issues that have been raised, there may be reference points in the previous notes. The one that I would draw your attention to would be, really, how we do things and what we do. How we do things seems to be identified with the four pillars when you talk prevention, early intervention, integration, and so on. It talks about a method of improving service. But what we do is protect children, emergency protection of children, taking them in in crisis, family preservation, reunification, and permanency planning. So I won't repeat that, but I will go through the notes and give you some of my comments on a couple of areas.

First of all, the Metis settlements had an increase this year over last year's forecast. On page 57 of the estimates it was $3.89 million forecast for last year, and budgeted for this year is $3.927 million. So perhaps if you'd just make note of that. That's on page 57 of the estimates.

In terms of First Nations I want to just talk a little bit about one particular issue. We have noted that the federal government has made available over a million dollars' worth of programs. If we work this year – there are still moneys in the departmental budget – with each one of those agencies out there, with the reserves, and with the Metis settlements for the grants that they are lawfully entitled to that are coming from the federal government, particularly First Nations people, we believe that we can work them through the grant forms and help them achieve those funds that they are entitled to from the federal government. We will not drop them. We are going to work very hard with each of the reserves to make sure that they move from some dependency on provincial funding to some of the dependency they rightfully should have on the federal funding. We know that and they know that, but they just haven't all made the conversion to it. But there's no reduction in the funding.

Where the four regional authorities did have some reduction this past year, some parts of reductions are a function of the funding model not being correct. Some had huge anticipated surpluses proportionate to the service they were providing. Some relate to the mobility of families. In some cases with aboriginal families it relates to the moves from reserves to the city of Edmonton, for example. So I can assure you, hon. member opposite, that there's no reduction in funding. It may be reallocated elsewhere. I do have some sympathy with all hon. members opposite because for over 20 years I have reviewed budgets in government that seem to move things from one post to the other, so it sometimes becomes very difficult for everybody to follow. I can assure you that in the areas of all of those goals, as a general principle there are not reductions. There may be reallocations elsewhere.

Let me explain on the early intervention, for example. If you reference page 83 of the business plan, there's a budget of $51 million, which is compared to the 2001-2002 forecast of $36 million, on early intervention. So that amount of money combined with the $15 million that we have allocated to family and community services – you noted that our community support has actually increased from a total of $53 million through CFSAs and FCSS to $70 million. We are working in partnership with the FCSS and CFSAs to develop community support to accomplish the early intervention. There are actually more dollars there that have come in large part from reallocations within the department and also the new money that we received. As you know, we received some additional dollars, $27 million more this year.

So we've actually significantly increased and substantively made a commitment to prevention and early intervention. Part of the money, when you used to see it, $21 million last year, was some $11 million to the authorities and about $10 million being retained in the department to be allocated to early intervention projects as the approvals come in various communities and as projects improve. Although it's taking a while to illustrate that it's out there, it's in those parts both on page 83 of the business plan and in the workings of FCSS building the community support. To the hon. member opposite, we can provide that detail later if that's not obvious.

Under family violence I want to assure you that when we first canvassed the authorities for supports to shelters, they did not account for all of the funding that comes through under early intervention. So although the line item in the budget talks about $11,161,000, there's actually a total of $14 million that's being spent directly on programs related to family violence for the shelter supports as well as for other child welfare programs.

When I visited shelters, some of the complaints were that they couldn't be sure that they were already accessing some of the agency supports that were in communities. The other thing that we're doing is we have been working with the association for shelters on a database program so that there's not all the fuss there used to be in collecting data about what happened to women coming to shelters. If I can just put it plainly, if a woman comes in with her two children but that leaves an extra bed in the room, then that bed can't really be occupied by somebody else, and we're looking at changing those formulas. That's working well, and another thing that's working really well right now is our work with the RCMP in trying to find better ways of working on family violence. So I assure the hon. member opposite that we are working on family violence.

Day cares I've mentioned previously, but stay tuned. There is work that will be culminating in some initiatives I hoped to bring before this House in the very first few weeks of this year. It's just taking a while to make sure it's all together. I have made some reference points in response to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods previously on some specific things that we're doing right away.

I hope I've addressed goal 3. You've got 3.2.3, the money there for the private-sector donations that hopefully will be coming into research, something that we talked about last year that we were exploring with Innovation and Science, something we continue to explore as we look at projects in Alberta hoping to prompt and provoke other private-sector people to become involved, certainly with fetal alcohol syndrome. We have a working group now that's working private sector/public sector for supports and respite, and I know that's in previously. So goal 3 relates to increasing our research capacity and comments that I've previously made.

So on all areas that you've asked about, I think I can safely say that there are no reductions; there are reallocations through different line items in the budget. If you have further questions after you review the Hansard, I'll make sure that we sit together and review them so that, Edmonton-Strathcona, you have that information.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks very much. I appreciate the minister's activity and engagement in this debate this afternoon. There are just a couple of kind of sections that I want to concentrate on that the minister is aware are a keen interest for me, and they, of course, are around the violence initiatives and specifically shelters for abused women and sometimes their children.

I noticed in the minister's note that she was talking about $14 million allocated to it. If I could just get a description of whether this is an increase? No, it can't be an increase.

MS EVANS: It is.

MS BLAKEMAN: Okay.

I'll just outline the questions for you. I think I also heard her say off-the-cuff in her remarks that there was $5 million specific to the shelters. Can you detail for me what that's for: whether it's staff increases, are there strings attached to it, is it to deliver programs that they didn't have to deliver before, or is it just a straight cost-of-living increase in their expenses?

I guess part of that discussion is this kind of a two steps forward, one step back perception of the funding in this department over the last year or 18 months. The minister and I have had previous conversations about whether the women's shelters would be required to take the funding cut. She was adamant that they wouldn't be, but I had returned to her saying that in some cases it was being reported to me that they were being pressured to volunteer to take this. Again the minister is very quick to get on it and say, "No, that shouldn't be happening," and I appreciate her action on that. But if it did happen and if they did volunteer, then is this $5 million, if that's the amount, bringing them back to where they were before, or is it genuinely an increase, or is it just restoring them to where they were?

I'm also wondering specifically what is the update on the – I worked on this forever; why can't I remember it? – Protection against Family Violence Act. Oh, there, I had it. I noticed that goal 2.1.5 is "increase stakeholder awareness" about the act and the "family violence prevention strategies." Now, I know that after the first year there was to be a sort of review and adjustment, and I've never really heard what happened there, and it's now under the minister's care. So I'm wondering if I can get an update on whether there have been any changes in implementation, lessons learned, where resources are allocated. Of course, I don't expect her to necessarily know that off the top of her head. I'm happy to take that in writing, as with any of the answers to any of the questions I'm giving her today.

There's also under 2.1.6: "Together with Health and Wellness and other partners, develop and implement treatment programs for children who witness family violence, victims of family violence, and perpetrators." So, again, I'm sure this is part of the $14 million, but how is this program going to develop, who is going to deliver it, how many staff are assigned to it, what's the resource pot of money they can pull from, what's the program expected to look like, how long is the time line for it, and what kind of evaluation process is in place for it?

Strategy 2.1.8 is sort of a very open-ended goal: "Work with Justice and other partners in the reform of family law." Now, I'm wondering if this is in anticipation of the review and changes in the family law statutes that we're expecting to be working on this spring and maybe into next fall, and particularly, then, I'm interested in what the department is bringing into the discussion.

I'm also aware that the Alberta Council of Women's Shelters did a survey and a response document around the federal initiative that was recommending changes that went forward to the Minister of Justice some time ago now, a year or more than a year ago. So there's a whole package of questions that I'd like to get answers for around the violence initiatives.

The next sort of cluster of questions I have – and it would almost be helpful to have a little diagram, the two steps forward, one step back, two steps forward diagram, to help understand where the money came in and went out to. I know that the minister spent a lot of time this afternoon explaining that, but if I might make a suggestion, that sort of thing might be a helpful promotional tool for her at this point. I did phone around to some people I know that work in this area over the last couple of days saying: you know that this budget debate is today and were there any last minute things they wanted me to bring up? And one woman just said, "This is such a bad day, Laurie." She said: "I honestly don't understand what's going on here. I don't see where the money is going. They say that there's an increase; I can't find anybody with an increase. Where did the money go?" And I couldn't answer that question for her.

Now, I know the minister has been trying to do that in a sort of piecemeal way here, but even just listening to the comments, I'm trying to add and subtract here. Essentially in 2001-2002 we had a $648 million budget. Then there was a 1 percent cut of $6 million to offset the deficit that could have been coming, which brings us to $642 million. Well, then when the minister starts talking about the budget being increased this year to $675 million and that being a 4.2 percent increase, I go: no, not from $642 million. No, no. I finally figure out that it's a 4.2 percent increase from the original budgeted amount, and this is where people start to get confused, because they're just going: "Look; this is how much money I have this year; I know that. How much money do I have next year?"

What was the original budget just doesn't connect to them anymore, and to be truthful, a couple of years down the road that budget amount will not even appear in any of these documents because we start showing actuals once we have them. So that's a bit confusing for even laypeople like me that are trying to work our way through this and, I'm sure, frustrating for people in the business.

Then I'm looking farther down, and it talks about regional authorities getting $517 million. I'm not sure if these are my notes, but it says: increase of 1 percent. But I'm going: 1 percent of what? You see what I mean about two steps forward, one step back, two steps forward? I think the minister is moving the department forward, but it is so confusing with the comings and goings and transference. Maybe this is her big year to move everything around, but, you know, here's another example of where it gets crazy-making. Not all authorities are getting an increase, but some programs they deliver may get an increase. I think I know what she's talking about there, but other people hearing that go: well, how is that possible?

I know what I was going to ask. Okay. We've got a number of programs that were paid for under the department that are now being paid for under the children's authorities. Like, fetal alcohol syndrome, child financial support, mentoring for parents and home visitation, and part of early childhood development used to be paid for out of the department and are now being paid for by the children's authorities. Is that money contained in that $517 million that is extra money going to the children's authorities? So if Mistahia is getting an extra $517 million, is that $517 million also paying for their assumption of the delivery of the fetal alcohol syndrome program, the child financial support program, the mentoring for parents and home visitation program, and a portion of the early childhood development program? That's where I'm starting to get confused.

On to a new topic. At one point the minister talked about capacity building, which is a phrase that we've been using in the voluntary sector to describe helping agencies working in that area to give themselves a technological and equipment base that allows them to sort of work in the modern world; let me put it that way. So capacity building may include under those definitions things like buying computers and software programs to help a nonprofit group in the community get onto the Internet or be able to do a mail merge program so that they could be in touch with their membership base in a more organized and timely and expedient fashion. I'm just wondering if the capacity building that the minister referred to is the same thing that I just described. Or is this a different kind of capacity building than what we've been talking about across the nation for strengthening and supporting voluntary organizations that are delivering all kinds of services?

I'm going to sit down and let the minister have a stab at that, and then if there's time, I'll maybe have another go. Sorry. Actually before I do that, I just want to bring up homelessness and rent costs. In my constituency of Edmonton-Centre we have a lot of people that live in apartments, a lot of people. Probably 80 percent of my constituents live in some kind of apartment complex, whether that's a high-rise or a fourplex or one of those ones that has three floors and 20 apartments in it. There are not many children, but I'm really seeing everybody that's in these, especially in the rental accommodations, struggling because the cost of rent has gone up so much. One-bedroom apartments have gone from $590 to $900. This is not fancy. It's an okay building with okay security in an okay location. When I start to see seniors and families that are having to move to lower quality to find reasonable rent, I really start to worry.

We don't have a lot of resources for kids in my constituency. I know that there are other constituencies that would have the same issue, but I know mine, so I'll talk about mine. So moving kids to an even less secure area and an area that has less access to recreational opportunities, even a bit of green space, which can be a problem in my constituency, is I think impairing quality of life for those kids and who knows what else: recreational opportunities, health, fitness, all kinds of things. I recognize that the minister is not responsible for housing, is not responsible for homeless initiatives; nonetheless, it affects children.

I'm making a plea for the minister to be aggressive in any cross-government initiatives that are worked on around housing. The provincial governments must take an aggressive role here. To say that the private sector is going to come forward with affordable housing, especially for the hard to house, is not going to happen. It has not happened. All we're doing is putting more people into less safe conditions, and that includes families with children. So I have to make that plea, and I would include seniors as well, because seniors are part of families. They're somebody's grandparents. It's particularly frightening for them.

I notice that the minister is involved in a cross-government initiative, the health sustainability initiative and the seniors policy initiative. The ministry is now supporting this seniors policy initiative for strengthening “collaboration and coordination of initiatives to improve the health and wellness of Albertans, and the sustainability of the health care system.”

Well, I sure think a place to live, a safe place to live, a reasonably priced place to live that isn't taking 60 percent of your take-home paycheque is a priority, and I would urge the minister to be very aggressive in working on that.

Thanks for the opportunity.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I just have one question, and I'm not entirely sure I can give complete information to the minister to address it. I have in my notes here under regional health authority budgets that at the end there's a reference to the almost elimination of a program of community response teams. Was there a special budget item last year which provided that money? It looks like it's on the way to being completely eliminated. My calculations tell me that there's close to a 93 percent reduction in it. It caught my attention because it raised the question of: how do you develop local community-based capacities who are responding effectively to crises that may arise if you take resources away from community-based response teams? So that was my question.

Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. minister.

MS EVANS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps just quickly. The community response teams were a pilot project to support some things that were going on in northeast Calgary, putting teams together. I think that the initiative continues. I couldn't identify quite where under community support, because we moved there from $53 million up to $70 million, but I can assure you that it hasn't been cut, hon. member.

I then go to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre. The increased funding for family violence has moved from last year's budget at $13.627 million – actual spent was $12.8 million – to $14 million. Now, I must give credit to the hon. member opposite who has had a passion for families affected by family violence and who has made it very clear to me that we're on the same page on this issue, because we both want to get something done to resolve the issues. We really see that lots of times shelters have had checkered levels of support wherever they are in the province. So we have been working with the executive director of the Alberta Council of Women's shelters, who is currently not available, as she may know, for some dialogue. We have been working with that association to find out whether or not ultimately the funding should rest with the child and family services authorities or whether it should be dispensed from the department centrally to the authorities. In some places it's working exceptionally well. For example, in Lloydminster it's working exceptionally well, but in other places it doesn't work as well. So before we get into a knee-jerk reaction, we're going to look at how we can handle that. In some places local authorities have been giving wonderful support to the children in the programs, and as you know, we've had double the number of children, regrettably, as the number of women.

The Health Canada study by Nico Trocme has illustrated that violence regrettably is on the increase, a rapid increase, something that affects children and brings children into child welfare, a most regrettable situation. So a lot of the dollars this year in our discussions will be to ensure, to guarantee, that those children get some programing supports and that people won't just meet with a mother on her exit stage left and assume that the mother will have the capacity to follow through with those children. So we're going to target those children in that area.

A lot of it isn't etched in concrete simply because we are still working with one of our staff members at a very senior level to make sure that we work on this family violence initiative in a way that really sorts out all of the best ways it can be done. Thanks in part to the hon. member opposite we are making some differences. I did not in the cost containment agree to any reductions to that particular area because of the impact of family violence on children and families and, in most cases, women that may be suffering abuse. So that's one of the areas. I just want to make sure that I identify my concurrence with the hon. member opposite about that very thing.

In the issue of our involvement with family law, there are many things, as you know, where there's an overlap, when there's joint or shared custody, mediation, child support. With the work that we're doing right now, for example, with the medical examiner – and the Children's Advocate has been represented as well as our department on fatality inquiries – are we examining the way that we should the death of a child? I want to look again quite seriously at our special case review process, again not with the attitude of reducing the importance of looking into it but making sure that we're getting some value for the exercise that we're going through. You know, the fatality inquiry could teach us a lot. The special case reviews can teach us, and I think we should learn from them. So we are doing some of that work with the Department of Justice, and we are working, of course, on the violence initiatives with the Solicitor General. So I'm quite satisfied with that.

I will ask the department to provide in writing, on your question about the 1 percent overall to the authorities, some clarification of my earlier remarks about the funding model and the alterations in the funding model, where the needs are, and also to assure you, hon. member, that there are additional dollars put in there. For example, last year we retained moneys within the department to pay for salary adjustments, and then this year those are accounted for quite differently in the authorities' budgets, but then we've taken other responsibilities. So rather than do the shell game with you, I would rather make sure you get a clear identification of those things as it pertains to each authority, and I think that that would be something all of the hon. members would like some anecdotal explanation of so that it helps identify where they are.

Fetal alcohol syndrome, an increase in our budgeting there. Probably the one thing that across North America we're beginning to be looked at as leaders on is the work we're doing with the communities on FAS building. When I was recently in California and in Texas, they asked us for our materials on that. Our staff have been invited to Denver, Colorado, to speak. In western Canada, from Manitoba eastward, and now northward with the Yukon, we seem to be gaining some prominence because we're working and building that capacity.

Can I just simply conclude by assuring the hon. member opposite that on homelessness the Minister of Seniors responsible for housing is being very aggressive, perhaps behind the scenes to some degree right now, on the initiatives for low-cost housing for families in need and affordable housing. I totally concur. With a buoyant economy once again, in the city of Edmonton particularly, the squeeze on housing is huge, and I hope we can gain some supports. Certainly poverty is one of the issues – and I acknowledge that – that presupposes the stresses that sometimes lead to other family problems on the social index and sometimes, not always, lead children onto our caseloads, and that's tragic.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you. Sorry; I forgot one ongoing issue with me that I always check in with you on. That is the issue about the tag-behind wages. I don't know if the working committee is still in existence, but there certainly was a committee from the nonprofit agencies that were, I think, actively meeting with members of the minister's staff. We keep trying to get those folks caught up, and every time there's an improvement in the wages for the unionized workers, then the gap between those workers and the people in the community agencies that are doing exactly the same work gets worse again. Then there's a great deal of lobbying for two or three years until there's a 2 percent increase back for the community groups, who now close the gap a little bit, and then the union people get another bargaining unit happening, and on they go. The minister doesn't have to answer it now. I know there are other people that want to get up, but in writing if I could get some update on where we are in that tagalong process. Okay?

Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Before I start on some other questions, just to clarify on the handicapped children's services. The question that I had was that a number of parents have suffered reductions of service. I heard from, for instance, a parent who had lost the respite service that she had, that that had been cut. So I wasn't talking about budget cuts. I was talking about what has actually happened to the services to handicapped children, and that's been my concern. We've attended one meeting in Calgary and another here with parents of handicapped children who have had a reduction in their service, and it is a great concern. So that's what I was talking about, not a budget cut.

I'd like to go back for just a minute to the minister's comments about the reduction in caseloads and 450 of over 18 year olds being no longer served by Children's Services. I find it, you know, quite surprising that there were that many, but I also remember, as the minister does, that we attended a rally on the steps of the Legislature attended by many of the 16, 17, 18 year olds and then some 19 year olds that were very concerned about the kind of service they were receiving and the fact that many of them complained that at 18 they were suddenly cut loose whether they were prepared to be independent or not. So I was pleased to hear the minister say that Children's Services has arranged for other agencies to take up the slack to ensure that these young people are not left on their own just because they happen to have reached the magic age of 18.

It does raise for me some of the questions that that particular group raised at that rally and that we've heard from since. I guess I would like some comment from the minister in terms of placements, not just for 18 year olds but for all children. What kind of progress has been made in securing more placements for children? I know it was mentioned last year. It's a constant concern of the department. We had the unfortunate case of the youngster in Grande Prairie who was housed in a motel. My question is: what progress has been made? Has the problem of temporary placements and more permanent placements been addressed so that it is becoming less of a problem to people who have to end up putting children in a placement other than their own home? So I'm concerned about placements, Mr. Chairman.

The lack of permanency planning was also raised by those youth.

Some of them weren't even aware that they had a case plan. That whole notion of permanency planning – and I suspect that the minister will respond that the ARM project should help alleviate some of that, but there are still going to be hundreds of youngsters that have to be dealt with immediately. What kind of progress has been made in making sure that there is a plan to have the children permanently placed and, with respect to young people, that they are aware of that plan?

One of the other questions that was raised, Mr. Chairman, was the refusal to support adolescents who are in custody under the Young Offenders Act and not allowing them to look to the Children's Advocate for assistance. Has there been any thought given to expanding the mandate of the Children's Advocate so that the needs of those particular children could be met?

Adoption of First Nations children. I've spoken about this on several occasions, that the requirement for chief and band council approval results in many children not being placed in adoptive homes. I wonder if there has been consultation, if there have been moves made to make the placement of aboriginal youngsters in adoptive homes easier and to get rid of the kinds of barriers that have prevented that from happening.

The youth that we talked to were concerned about mental health assistance, and the Alberta children and youth initiative addresses that in part, I think, but that concern in terms of help with mental health problems and not being able to get the kind of service that they need in a timely fashion was a concern of those young people. I wonder what kind of action the department has taken to assure those youth that they in fact can get the kind of support they need.

There have been problems in the past with court delays, and I think it contributed to permanency planning. Again I'd like to know if the department has addressed it and what kinds of solutions they have been able to come up with.

The minister mentioned the child death reviews and, you know, what do we gain from those reviews. I think it's a good question. I also think that the question of independence is really important in terms of those reviews. The processes that are internal to the ministry are fine as far as they go, but it seems to me that there is a need for an independent, comprehensive body to review the deaths of children with the goal of trying to reduce the incidence of child fatality. The case of the twins up north I think brought to the fore the kinds of problems that the lack of an independent panel can present.

The Children's Advocate is one mechanism for youth to provide feedback to the department in terms of the services that they're receiving, but I wonder if the minister has considered other ways that they can receive feedback from children in the system so that the system can ultimately be improved.

One of the other problems mentioned was the gaps in the education system for young people. Abused and neglected youngsters just are not served well by conventional school programs, and it was something that I've raised with a local school trustee. I know that the minister was made aware of the problem, and I wondered if there's been any action taken to try to make sure that alternative programs are in place for those youngsters and that the kind of flexibility they need is there so they can continue their education.

The boundary issues between regional authorities still are with us. We hear again of pressures and disputes between authorities in terms of them providing services for students. Again my question would be: what kinds of provisions are being made to make sure that those disputes don't actually interfere with the kind of help that a youngster or a young person might need from the department?

The medicating of children in care has been raised as an issue. It was actually in a day care. Again what kinds of measures have been put in place to assure the public that medications are not used in a way that they were never intended in terms of children and their behaviour and that there isn't an inordinate use of medication as a management tool?

I guess the last one that I would comment on at this time, Mr. Chairman, because I'd like to leave the minister a few minutes to respond, is the problem of staff turnover. We've touched on staff several times this afternoon, and the minister in previous questions in the House has talked about staff. I wonder exactly what is the situation in terms of turnover and what kinds of measures are being put in place to attract and to keep the best social workers, the best workers working with young people that we can.

So I think that with those, Mr. Chairman, I'd conclude. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I've just got a few comments today. I would like to thank the Minister of Children's Services and her staff for being here today and realizing the great work that they do in a very difficult ministry, particularly when they're dealing with some of our most vulnerable people in this society. I know that earlier last fall I had an opportunity to bring a special case to her attention where a couple had three children with special needs, and they were having a lot of difficulty in doing cross-departmental work. I know that in that particular case the minister was able to help them, and if she could elaborate on how, for other families that require that cross-departmental work, those issues can be smoothed out and the road can be much easier for them.

I had the opportunity to listen to Jesse Jackson speak, and he was telling us that the poor people in the United States today are not the new Americans, that they're not our seniors. They are mothers with young families. So this whole poverty issue is not only an issue here in Alberta. It's also quite frequent in the States. As part of that, I think it is because we do have lone-parent families. I see that in Alberta we do have – and this was in the year 2000 – approximately 105,000 lone-parent families, and a staggering 86,000 out of that number were mothers, female parents. Again I can see that a huge part of the job that you do have is tracking fathers for support payments or whatever.

Now, then, as well, I go on and I see that we have a breakdown of lone-parent families in the whole of Canada, but I don't have any for Alberta. I was wondering if the minister can provide me later on – I don't expect it today – with a breakdown of lone-parent families by age and, as well, if the minister has any statistics whatsoever on a breakdown of the socioeconomic standing of the various families that she does deal with.

So with that, Mr. Chairman, I'll take my seat. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Hon. minister, we have about two more minutes if you'd like to make some response.

MS EVANS: Thank you very much. If I may, there are many references that I will not be able to expand upon in two minutes, and I don't want to give short shrift to really critical issues.

I think that at page 57 I should have noted that the child response teams were there, but I didn't provide that information earlier. On court delays that may be happening and on other issues relative to the chief and band and council approval, I will certainly provide more detail. In terms of the processes for child death reviews, again I will provide a briefing note.

The authority boundary issues, again we can talk about that, although those have been ironed out in some cases much more satisfactorily.

I want to make one comment about the issue of medicating children in care. The hon. Member for St. Albert has been dealing with a horrific case where somebody that I would deem to be an absolute rotter has been bringing children into a place that has not been licensed for day care and has been anticipating that nobody would catch her at it. This may have happened in other situations, and to some degree everybody should know that it's buyer beware and that they should check and follow through and find out when people present themselves as child care professionals licensed to do the work they do. They should absolutely make sure that they check with the local children's authority, phone the RITE government number, find out if they're registered, if they're licensed, because unscrupulous people will always make us look bad to the public. We do not condone nor should medication ever be given without parental and doctor's permission.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Minister of Children's Services, but pursuant to an understanding agreed to unanimously by the Assembly earlier this afternoon, I must now put the following question. After considering the business plan and proposed estimates for the Department of Children's Services, are you ready for the vote?

Agreed to:

Operating Expense	$673,068,000
-------------------	---------------

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Shall the vote be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Opposed? Carried.

The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would move that the committee rise and report the Children's Services estimates and beg leave to sit again.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

MR. MARZ: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions, reports as follows, and requests leave to sit again.

Resolved that a sum not exceeding the following be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2003, for the following department.

Children's Services: operating expense, $673,068,000.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Opposed? So ordered.
The hon. Government House Leader.

adjourn until 8 this evening, at which time we'll return in Committee of Supply.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would move that we

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Wednesday, April 10, 2002

8:00 p.m.

Date: 02/04/10

head: Committee of Supply

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

THE CHAIR: I'd like to call the Committee of Supply to order. For the benefit of the members as well as those in the gallery this is the less formal part of the Assembly, and if you happen to look at your sheet and you can't spot the people, that's because other than those who are speaking, they are free to move around the Chamber, and they sometimes do, to the chagrin of the chair. We'll go by the usual rule; that is, we only have one member standing and speaking at a time if we can do that.

Before we commence our evening's deliberations, may we have consent to briefly revert to Introduction of Guests.

head: Introduction of Guests

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Chairman, members of the Legislature, I'm very pleased to have the opportunity tonight to introduce to you and through you to the members of the Assembly a group of very special guests, the members of the Alberta Irrigation Projects Association. Since its beginnings in 1946 AIPA, as we fondly know it, has promoted the best use of water resources in our province. It represents 13 irrigation districts in southern Alberta and has an indirect membership of about 6,000 persons.

Today they work with all levels of government to ensure that we are well informed and well versed and make good decisions on water-related issues. They certainly foster a very healthy environment and not only encourage but implement technologies that maximize the benefit of the water that's available to us in southern Alberta for the benefit of all Albertans.

Mr. Chairman, we have a number of members with us. I would like to introduce each one of them individually, but I think that in the interests of time and the estimates that we're going to debate here, I would introduce their chairman, Mr. Keith Francis. I would ask all of our honoured guests and Mr. Francis to rise and receive the very warm welcome of this Assembly.

Economic Development

THE CHAIR: Thank you. Are there any comments or questions to be raised with respect to these departmental estimates? We'd ask the minister if he would care to begin the evening's discourse.

MR. NORRIS: Being new to this business, Mr. Chairman, I heard the question called, so I'll call for the vote, I guess.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

You've changed your mind, hon. minister?

AN HON. MEMBER: Flip-flop.

MS CARLSON: Just one more, Mr. Chairman: nothing less than we would've expected.

MR. NORRIS: Well, with that rousing introduction, Mr. Chairman,

I'll start my remarks, and I'll offer my thanks and welcome to the irrigators' association. I know that they are probably going to be hanging on every word. I do want to thank them sincerely for what they do for the province. As Economic Development minister I know their work is vitally important, and I join the minister of agriculture in welcoming and thanking them.

Before I begin, I'd like to introduce some individuals who have joined us here tonight. Whether they want to be introduced and agree to let it be known that they associate with me is up them, but they're up in the gallery. I'll introduce them and ask them to stand and be recognized: our deputy minister, Mr. Barry Mehr; next to him, our finance director, Mr. Jim Bauer. Next to him is Mr. Rick Sloan, our ADM. Next to him is Rory Campbell. I'm really not sure what he does, but he always shows up on the trips. Protocol. And, of course, next to him is somebody who's in training, Sasha Angus. Behind him, hiding because of obvious reasons, is Duane Pyear. If you would please extend the warm welcome of the House. I want to thank them sincerely for what they do for the department and for the fact that I still have a job this year. That's outstanding, fellows. I appreciate it.

As you're aware, Mr. Chairman, Alberta Economic Development is the lead marketing arm of the government of Alberta. Our mandate is to promote the continued development of Alberta industries, international trade, and investment and to market Alberta as the tourism destination it should be. Today I will briefly report on the state of Alberta's economy and discuss our department's 2002 business plan and the budget.

Last year, as we know, Mr. Chairman, Alberta's economy was incredibly strong. Our overall GDP for 2002 is expected to remain high, and Alberta will have one of the country's strongest economies once again in the year 2002. We performed extremely well, particularly after September 11. I know that this speech is not going to be what people want to hear tonight, so I'm just going to talk about what we're doing in Economic Development and then answer any questions that people have.

Mr. Chairman, the Department of Economic Development's main focus is to promote what is, as we all know, the best economy in Canada and certainly North America. To that end, we have core businesses which we focus on, and to that end, we have strategies which are linked to our core businesses. It's vitally important for this House to know that Economic Development provides the support and the strategic alliances that businesses in Alberta ask us to provide, and we do that through a number of ways. We do that through our foreign trade offices, we do that through our regional offices, and we do that through our Edmonton and Calgary offices, which are solely mandated to respond to businesses in Alberta and their requirements. Through our programs we attempt to identify the regions of the world that have the most to gain from dealing with Alberta, and we target those areas on a regular basis through trade missions and trade offices.

Further, Mr. Chairman, we have recognized the industries in Alberta which are the true economic drivers of the province, and we continue to support those, and we look for emerging industries and ways to help them develop within the framework of Alberta. It's very, very important for the House to know that the Economic Development department is there to support Alberta businesses. We recognize that they are the ones who are driving the economy, they are the ones who create the jobs and the wealth, and they are the ones that deserve not only this government's support but this government's respect. To that end, we try and give it to them on a daily basis.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. NORRIS: Thank you for not being asleep.

The other issue that I'd like to address, Mr. Chairman, is the issue of tourism in Alberta. I would like to discuss tourism for a few minutes because in my estimation the province of Alberta can do nothing more vitally important to diversify its economy than to recognize the value of tourism and the importance of what it can bring to not only the icons of Alberta tourism but to rural Alberta. To that end, our department works very, very diligently with the other departments that are involved in the tourism industry and the stakeholders to work out plans to continue developing and growing the tourism opportunities in Alberta.

Mr. Chairman, our budget is before you in the House tonight. I'm very proud to say that we responded to the events of September 11. We followed the Finance minister's guidelines, and we have put together what we believe is a strategic budget focusing on our strengths and helping the industry where we need to. But I'd also like to point out that within the framework of this budget there are a number of opportunities for Alberta to continue diversifying, and we continue to look at ways to do that. Some of those are our regional alliances, which are, simply put, economic regions throughout the province that encourage regions to focus on the strengths of particular areas of the province rather than the individual cities or towns. That is a very big, successful program, and we're going to continue that in order to help rural development.

I'd also like to point out that in light of September 11 and the comments of the President of the United States our department and certainly myself feel that Alberta is about to get ready for a rocket ride for the next 20 years. Anybody who heard the comments after September 11 about Fortress North America and President Bush looking for a continental energy policy surely must have been as excited as we were to understand that that indicates that they do not want to have an insecure supply of oil. They will look to North America to do it, and they will come to Alberta, Mr. Chairman; there is no doubt about that. When they do, we had better be ready for it, because it's going to be a great 10 or 15 years.

With that, Mr. Chairman, I will close by saying that it is an honour to be part of this department. It's an honour to have the ability to point out the strengths of Alberta's economy, and I'd like to point out something to the House that I think is very, very important. The position that Alberta is in now in the nation of Canada is due to Premier Klein and the classes of '93 and 1997, who had the courage to put Alberta on a course that is different than any other province in Canada, and it is not a fluke that we have the highest employment, the most development, and the highest immigration of people. It is amazing what you can hear when you travel around the world about Alberta, and I'm going to do my best to continue to promote that to not only the people of Alberta but the people of Canada and the world.

With that, I will close, and thank God we live in Alberta.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It's a pleasure to be able to speak this evening to the Economic Development estimates for this year, 2002-2003. I, too, would like to welcome our guests here this evening to watch the antics of the Legislature. They seem to be in quite high spirits this evening. It's not always like this, but for some reason they're . . .

AN HON. MEMBER: It was until you started speaking.

MS CARLSON: It was until I started speaking. Now everybody can go back to sleep, yes. Well, that's good. It's a little easier to actually talk and get to the points at hand when some of them over there are sawing logs.

I would also like to thank the staff for being here this evening and thank them for a job well done over the course of the year and particularly thank Rory Campbell for what he puts up with with this particular minister. It's a little tough to keep him on task; I know that. You certainly all have my deepest sympathies at moments.

There's no doubt that this minister is – how to say this diplomatically? – one of the best cheerleaders that this ministry has had certainly since I was elected in '93, and certainly since this time last year I would evaluate his performance as being slightly better than unspectacular.

MR. MAR: It's happy hour.

MS CARLSON: Well, it isn't happy hour in here, Minister of Health, I'm sorry to say.

AN HON. MEMBER: The sky is falling. The sky is falling.

MS CARLSON: No, no. I'm not saying at all that the sky is falling. Far from that. In fact, this is a ministry that I like, and you know that I like it because I seldom have questions to ask about this particular ministry. In general, they work within a reasonable framework and don't do that bad a job. But, you know, in terms of the minister himself and the direction and the leadership that he shows, it's very cheerleaderlike in fashion. And good. That's what this job is in part. But it is also more than tub-thumping and chest-pounding, Mr. Chairman.

This is a key ministry for this particular government in defining strategic . . . [interjections] It is. I agree totally: this is a key ministry. If we look at what has happened historically in this ministry since '93, which is when the big round of changes happened in terms of how the government defined its policy and implemented it, Economic Development used to be what I would call a cornerstone ministry, one of the ministries in this government that had, I would say, huge power, big dollars, and lots of say in decision-making and how things happen. When the cuts after '93 happened, we saw it actually become a shell ministry. Most of the resources were sucked out of it. It had a framework, but it didn't have much meat to it.

There were some concerns that they were just treading water, not because of lack of desire on behalf of the staff but really because of lack of resources and lack of focus from the government and emphasis on this as a driver. Given all the costs that were happening in that time period and the focuses that were on other areas, particularly health and education, Economic Development I believe was essentially left to its own devices. Oil and gas were going to continue to do well, forestry was mapped out, tourism was growing, and they could hold their own during that time period. In fact, that was the time period that the Member for Edmonton-Glenora was with the department. I know they worked hard during that time period, but there was a little bit of lack of support, I believe, from the front bench for Economic Development.

We've seen a change happen recently, I would say not directly attributed to this minister. Certainly at the time when he became the minister, there seemed to be a change in focus. It was, I believe, seen as once again a cornerstone kind of ministry and given a little bit more substantive credibility, perhaps you could say, at the table in terms of government decision-making, and the focus was changed to see that there was a need for leadership in this area. If we were going to stay as one of the most viable economies in North America, then some focus had to be placed here. I think that's good. I think that's a positive change in direction, and I'm happy to see this happen.

I still don't see here though, in a general sense, that there is an overall focus on developing a long-term, integrated, strategic direction in this ministry and between this ministry and others that are directly related, which include most of the ministries represented by this government. I'll get to some of the minister's comments in a minute, but even his comments would tend to make me believe that this government has quite a short-term vision, that they're looking for a quick fix in where they go in Economic Development, some quick winners that they can put little gold stars on and say: look what a great job we're doing. What we don't have is the five-, 15-, 20-year plans that show Albertans and the globe how we are going to continue to be economic development leaders across industries and across ministries. That's what I'm looking for from this department. I think it's possible to do this, and I think it's possible for this minister and his department to be able to develop this and to push this government into global leadership. We have some unique opportunities here in the kinds of cash flows we have and in the kinds of development we currently have in some cornerstone industries, but we're in danger of becoming dinosaurs in some of those areas and of not taking the kind of strategic lead that we could if we don't see some plans develop.

I'm hoping that the minister will respond to my comments, and I'm pretty sure that if he does this evening, he's going to say that we do have objectives and strategies and benchmarks and performance measures, and that's true. The business plans were a good step in that direction, and setting out the goals as they have is a good perspective to have. However, what we have still is a bit of a lack of integration in these areas. This government likes to take a business model, and in this department particularly I think that's probably a good idea, but to take a business model from beginning to end is really the goal. You can't just take the headlines of a business model and think that that works.

We have some lack of integration. We have some performance measures that don't actually measure the kinds of outcomes that need to be measured, and some of the inputs don't tie into the performance measures. We've seen over the years that the Auditor General has commented on this. So I would like to hear from the minister what it is that he plans to do in terms of tightening this up. Perhaps you have this in the department and what we see here is just a summary within the business plans, but I need to see some more detail, some more substance. So I want to know what the minister and his department are doing in that regard and some of the outcomes. We get here under performance measures "goal" and "objective": Good. "Performance measure" – yes – and "type of measure." But we don't actually see here the outcomes and the areas that you're working on for improvement and the areas where you have exceeded your own goals in terms of performance, so if you could just deal with that a little bit, I'd be very happy.

I'll just deal now with some of the minister's opening comments. He talked about this department being the leading marketing arm of Alberta. Good, I think, and necessary, but I don't think that that's the only mandate of this department. Marketing is one aspect. You have to have the substance leading up to that in order to be able to deliver in a long-term perspective. I don't always see this happening here, and that's mostly, I think, a lack of integration between departments. I'm thinking particularly of Agriculture and Sustainable Resource Development and Environment as the areas that I think aren't fully integrated with this particular department. Maybe I'm wrong, and we don't get the information. The minister can clarify that.

He stated in his opening comments that his focus is on international trade and development and on Alberta as a tourism destination: all very laudable goals; no doubt about it. International trade and development is particularly important as we are really an export province, and when we have these dollarettes instead of real dollars to deal with, really a key component of our economic wealth is to ensure that we're maximizing our abilities as exporters. Part of the problem with that is that for decades now we've been lead exporters in either raw resources or very close to raw resources, and while I see some changes over the years in some of these areas, particularly forestry and oil and gas, I see that we still primarily are exporters of raw goods rather than finished products. So if the minister could elaborate on what undertakings he has in his department to change that kind of a focus, I'd be very happy to hear. It's been an ongoing problem for this province. It's really easy to put those logs on a truck and ship them to another province, to another state, or to another country. It's not quite as easy to figure out how we can economically and competitively produce finished goods, but I think that's part of the future.

What, particularly, is this department doing in terms of looking at replacements in our economy for oil and gas? Now, I know the former energy minister told us many times – I'm referring to Steve West here – that in spite of what all the naysayers said, every time we run down to the last 25 years of oil reserves, they find more oil in this province, and we're going to have it forever. He said the same thing about gas. I think in the past it's been very true that we've heard the doom and gloom and then the next thing you know, people have found new reserves and we've got more capacity. But I think technologies have improved by this date to where we have a much more accurate inventory of our reserves in the province at this stage, and we can clearly say that they aren't limitless in supply, particularly gas. We're in shallow wells for the most part over the most part of this province now, more expensive to drill and with fewer reserves.

So I look to Economic Development to start to talk to Albertans and lead us in a direction where we see replacements in our economy for those particular commodities as part of our revenue base, albeit we won't be in any serious problems for 15 or 20 years in this particular area. We need to have some focus, and now is the time to be thinking of those kinds of directions. I'm sure that the minister has considered this and is working on it in some capacity, and if he could share that with us, we would be very pleased.

This is a serious question. We have some interest groups who are particularly interested in how the government sees in the long term replacing oil and gas revenues. I would hope that while you may have some comments with regard to that this evening, we'll get something written in response to this, because I'll be taking that information and sending it out to the groups and letting them know that this was in response to questions asked in estimates. So the better it is, the better you look.

The minister in his comments talked about this being the best economy in I think he said North America. Certainly it no doubt is. It's a very strong economy. We've got lots to work with here. During the good times I think we need to ensure that the goal is to not only capitalize on that but to build for the future, and I think I've heard the minister speak often enough to know that he agrees with that.

The minister talked to some extent about foreign trade offices, and we'd like some more information on those. We've seen a change in how foreign trade offices were managed since I came into the Legislature. I think during the early '90s and the early '80s they were glorified retirement positions for preferred friends of government. I'm not sure a whole lot got accomplished in them, and we had a lot of investment in bricks and mortar. We saw that change, which is really good news. I see a bit of a swing back to opening up more trade offices, and I'm not opposed to that. We just want to make sure that we're getting some bang for our buck. So if the minister could tell us which offices in the last year they've opened, which they've closed or are contemplating closing, and how they're measuring success in those offices. I know that they've looked at some new kinds of innovative strategies in the opening of the offices. Could he talk about those in terms of where they're located, how they're costed out, and what kinds of dollars are allocated to them?

Particularly I'm interested in what the outcomes are. How do you measure success? Now, I know there's a component of that that's really tough to measure. Often those offices are an entry point for people trying to do business in the country or those trying to export out, and some of those results are somewhat intangible and sometimes take a long time to measure. I think there is a value to having that service there, but there are some measurements. We'd like to know what you're using and how you develop criteria for whether an office is meeting its mandate and how successful they are. What are the criteria that you develop for deciding that offices are no longer viable?

This is more than just, I think, providing support for trade missions, although those are valuable. Could we know which trade offices have had trade missions through them and how many have had measures of success afterwards, after the trade mission has left? Do developing businesses continue to go through the trade offices, or do they just use them as initial contact sources? It could be both. That doesn't have to be so detailed, Mr. Minister, if you don't mind, just some general overviews. In fact, probably just what you could talk about in that regard would be satisfactory.

Mr. Minister, you talked about emerging industries and that you're helping them to develop. Could we have some detail on exactly what that means? Helping emerging industries can mean many things to many people. Does it mean that there is capital support, operating support, services support, training support, initial research support? Some of those details would be helpful in terms of knowing how much this ministry may be deciding to get back into the business of supporting business. It has been our position for a long time, for as long as I've been looking at policy directions, not to support businesses in a large way that may create an unlevel playing field for them in the industry. So we would hope that that's not what the minister meant, that there's a different kind of support being offered here. What we have found traditionally and what particularly have been the outcomes with this government's relationship with business is that by supporting them in any kind of an overt financial or even marketing sense, the businesses become uncompetitive and end up in the long term failing or continuing to require government subsidization, and what that does is hamper the Alberta economy and create undue hardships for other businesses who are in the same market and are trying to succeed. So if you can talk about that a little bit.

Mr. Minister, you talked about diversifying the economy. Very good. And you talked about the value of tourism. Also very good. However, we do know that with tourism it can be a huge draw to a region, and we certainly get a large share of the tourism draw in Alberta. That's all very good, and I certainly support that as an industry initiative. However, in the long run . . . Oh, I'm out of time. Thank you. I'll come back and finish this thought and some others.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Minister of Economic Development.

MR. NORRIS: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I would like to commend the hon. member for her questions and for the general tenure of her conversation. It appears that while they are opposition members, we agree on the direction that Alberta has to take, and I believe that her comments about our department being much maligned and underfunded are inaccurate. I believe that we have enough resources to do what we need to do, and we'll continue to fight for more where we see the need for them.

Her comments about the province being in virtually the same place as it was 10 years ago with respect to oil and gas could be nothing further from the truth, Mr. Chairman. The diversification program is working, and I will provide her with the documentation and the facts and figures to support that.

She had talked about a five-, 10-, and 15-year plan and the absence of it, and I would like to respectfully disagree with that. We do have a plan. It's called Get Ready Alberta. I'll send her the information regarding that, but it's basically talking about the need for postsecondary education, continuing the skill level of Alberta employees, and making sure that Alberta technology is where it needs to be. To that end, my hon. colleague the Minister of Innovation and Science is overseeing the Supernet, which, according to Time magazine, is one of the most brilliant government innovations of the 20th century, and that's another way the Alberta government continues to lead.

With our main value-added strategy that you referred to, I would like to point out that we believe she's exactly right, and to that end we are working currently with four other ministries, most of the ones she referred to. Once again I thank her for being ahead of the curve, and our theory is to continue to build on what we need to do to sell the products at the highest end of the value chain. As the hon. member is probably well aware, commodity prices over the last 20 years have remained relatively flat, while value added has gone through the roof. So that is where our focus is. I can certainly share that information with her.

She referred to our oil and gas reserves being in short supply. Well, I would like to suggest that the hon. Member for Fort McMurray would disagree vehemently with that. The latest estimates based on the total world requirements of oil put the oil sands able to supply us with 200 years' worth of supply. So I don't think that's a problem, but it's clearly something that we want to continue to get away from as we have in the last 10 years.

She referred to our trade offices very glowingly, and I want to thank her for that. I believe nothing is more important when you have a good product than getting out there and letting people know. We have a hiring policy that is extremely strict. These are not patronage appointments in any way, shape, or form. The people have to have a minimum five years' business experience, have to be fluent in the language of the country they're in, and they have to go through a hiring policy that is extremely open and transparent. I'll share that information with the member as well. As a way to keep the cost down, we try to collocate with the federal government wherever possible, such as in the Munich office, which we just opened, and we are attempting to do that in Mexico City and London, England, as well. Why we target those markets is because we respect that they are the biggest sources of foreign investment and trade in the world, and that's where we need to be.

I guess in closing I would like to thank the member for her comments and reassure her that we are not in the business of being in business, nor do we ever intend on being there again. That's clearly an economic pitfall waiting to happen. What we do try and do is to continue having a broad-based low tax. We have the lowest corporate taxes and the lowest personal taxes. I know it makes certain hon. members of other parties squirm, but we believe firmly that if you leave money in the pockets of those who know how to generate it, guess what? They're going to generate more of it. These are long-term sustainable jobs. These aren't government-made projects, and we encourage the Alberta businessman to continue to set up here, risk his hard-earned capital, because it's the best place in the world to be.

Thank you.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm pleased to have an opportunity to address the estimates of the Economic Development department this evening. I'll start off with a few rather simple questions, I guess, and that is asking for some explanation in terms of the changes in categories in the government and lottery fund estimates.

If you look at last year's budget under Department Summary, the four categories were ministry support services, market development and investment attraction, tourism marketing and development, and economic policy and planning. This year the categories have different names and also a difference in some of the numbers that have been carried over. I wondered if the minister could explain the kinds of changes that have occurred to result in the categories being what we see before us.

I look at last year's budget in the minister's office, and under program 1, performance management, was an item of $912,000, and it doesn't appear under Ministry Support Services in this year's budget. We still have communications and the deputy minister's office and the minister's office, but we don't have finance and administration, nor do we have performance management.

I raise the questions partly because one of our tasks is to try to track the changes in department spending. We have the same difficulty when categories are changed that have been highlighted by the Auditor General in terms of being able to make valid comparisons when the way that information is reported keeps changing. So I would appreciate some comment on the reason for the changes, and I'm sure that there are a number of explanations for the changes that have had to be made.

I have some specific questions, Mr. Chairman, and would ask the minister if he could provide an update on the implementation of the Get Ready Alberta strategy on page 133 of the estimates and would ask the minister if the department has considered what has happened to the work environment with respect to learning and teachers in terms of drawing and attracting teachers to the province. It seems to me that there's been such a change in the climate that attracting teachers is going to be difficult, and I wonder if that has been a concern of the department. In terms of our high school students, when they start contemplating the future and their options for the future, what kinds of concerns does the department have about retaining those students in the province, and what is being done to help those students at the present time? Is the Economic Development department concerned with promoting Alberta to prospective teachers as a place to live and work? What kinds of things can be done to ameliorate the effects of the current labour disruption?

Getting ready for the future apparently starts with the youngsters, according to the Get Ready Alberta year 1 report. The best preparation for Laura, Max, Jennie, and all Albertans comes with a healthy start and a good education. We see our youngsters on the steps of the Legislature these days. How is that helping them get the start, and how does it show the kind of leadership that is talked about in terms of a cross-ministry economic development strategy at the present time? So a number of concerns, and it may not be a concern of the department, but it's something that has been raised with us as a concern for people interested in the field.

There are some specific questions I'd ask while I'm on page 133. What exactly does the $3 million for strategic economic leadership get us? How is that money spent, and what is the advantage of that for Albertans? What exactly does the $8 million for industry and regional development buy us? How are those funds going to be instrumental in helping the economic development of the province?

The department talks about responsiveness and effectiveness being enhanced, and again it would be helpful if we had some specific examples that we could draw upon.

Those are the initial questions I have, Mr. Chairman, but I would be interested particularly in the change of categories in the budget documents.

THE CHAIR: The hon. minister? No.

Okay. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm pleased to rise tonight to speak to this department, and I even wore a special tie to recognize the sartorial habits of the minister. It's no match for his ties, but it's as good as I can get.

I'm wondering if we might be able to engage briefly in some discussion on, oh, philosophical or strategic issues around economic development. The budget is significant, certainly. In the overall scheme of the total provincial expenditures it's relatively small, and it is, I believe, a bit difficult to follow trends over the last few years and compare this year with previous years because of significant changes in the budget. There is one I would like to ask about a little later. Perhaps what's most valuable this evening is to address issues that underlie the challenges and opportunities for economic development faced by this department and by the province as a whole. I recognize that the minister may not be able to respond here verbally, but if he is, I'd appreciate that and we can engage constructively in a discussion.

The first sector around which I'm sure we all have some concerns is forestry, the risk that the province's forestry industry will be and in fact is being hit hard by the dispute with the United States. There's a risk, in fact, that I think within weeks we may be seeing significant layoffs in the forestry industry, and I'm wondering if there are strategies in place and if the minister might be able to share those with us. I recognize that some of those strategies may be confidential for negotiating purposes, but at least to the extent that they fit into this budget and fit into the plans underlying this budget, I'd be curious if the minister has any comments on that particular issue.

Do you want me to go through four or five areas, and then I'll open it? We can pop up and down and keep the bloods flowing. Thanks.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Minister of Economic Development.

MR. NORRIS: I don't think he's here tonight, Mr. Chairman. Recognizing I'm insignificant, but it's Economic Development.

THE CHAIR: That's what I said.

MR. NORRIS: Community Development.

THE CHAIR: Well, I beg your pardon.

MR. NORRIS: Well, they're already telling me that it's a small department.

THE CHAIR: But a mighty voice it has.

MR. NORRIS: Mr. Chairman, there's a recurring theme here about how small our budget is, and like I tell my wife recurrently: good things come in small packages. So I don't know what their concern is. We feel very adequately funded, in response to the member's comments, and are proud of the resources we're given.

With regard to forestry the member has raised an excellent concern. Forestry is indeed our fourth largest industry. It employs over 54,000 people. It has approximately $7 billion in gross revenues, which is extremely significant given the member's comments earlier about diversification. Our strategy at this point is to deal with the Minister of International and Intergovernmental Relations on every aspect that we hear from industry – and we do hear a lot – relay it to his department, which is the lead department, and let him continue the good work he's doing with the Minister for International Trade, Pierre Pettigrew. All of the tariffs that are being suggested have not come into effect, and we continue to work hard to make sure that they are changed prior to their coming into effect.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you, Mr. Minister. The next sector I'd like to address is one that's come up many times in this Assembly and it will continue to for years, I'm sure, and it has to do with electricity, two different angles relating to the electricity sector. One has to do with the concern over prices: prices to industry, prices to consumers. This is, I'm sure the minister would agree, a fundamental building block for Alberta's industry for value added or indeed for any industry.

Electricity has historically been one of Canada's real competitive advantages and one of Alberta's real competitive advantages: the ability to generate and deliver low-cost, reliable power. The last two or three years in Alberta have seen a lot of turbulence around the electricity industry and around prices in particular. The wholesale spot market at least continues to be very volatile for electricity in Alberta, and I worry about that as a threat in a sense to Alberta's ability to attract and hold onto certain kinds of energy, major energies that are heavy consumers of electricity such as some high-tech industries. I know you're not the lead minister on this, but it seems to me to be an economic development concern. So I'm not sure if you have comments on that or if that fits into your strategic plans here at all.

The other question that comes out of electricity is the issue of exports. Now, we're all in favour of exports, most kinds of exports anyway, from this province, whether it's oil or gas or grain or forestry or manufactured goods. I think there are, however, different kinds of concerns around electricity exports, and I'm a skeptic myself of the value of developing electricity into an export commodity. Again, if the department is involved or not in plans around that and if they fit into this strategic plan and are supported in the budget, I'd be interested in the minister's comments on that.

MS CARLSON: And convince us that we're wrong.

DR. TAFT: Yeah, he can try to convince us that we're wrong if he thinks we are.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Minister of Economic Development.

MR. NORRIS: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me that last year at this time when I was honoured with this portfolio, the discussion of electricity was relentless, and at that time I believe the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie was predicting that businesses would be leaving in droves. Well, a year later we know that that's not true, and we have factual evidence, which I can present to her, that says that Alberta continued to have the highest net migration of businesses into the province of anywhere in the jurisdiction of Canada. They understand, as I said then and I will continue to say now, that the Alberta advantage is made up of many things, not the least of which is electricity.

I'd like to point out some of the aspects of the deregulation program that have been remarkably successful. Because of deregulation we now have a viable wind power industry that's forming in southern Alberta. We now have numerous players who would not have looked at Alberta prior to that bringing in more supply. I don't know whether the hon. member opposite believes in supply and demand, as I do, but it drives market prices down. That is a fact of life, and it's happening in Alberta.

I would also like to remind the hon. member that with regard to this specific situation our Premier has stood in this House numerous times and has said: electricity as an export is not on the table until all of Albertans' needs are met. I would also like to remind the member that part of the problem that was created this time last year was that the province of British Columbia, who exports electricity for profit, seized that opportunity to make Albertans pay very dearly because they were in a position to do so.

So I disagree. I believe that electricity, when Albertans' needs are met, is an outstanding opportunity and will continue, as the member has suggested, to diversify our economy. What could be wrong with that?

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. One of my fundamental concerns with exporting electricity from Alberta is the environmental impact, because as the minister knows, we generate that power mostly through burning coal, and like it or not, there are serious environmental issues there. Nonetheless, we'll move on to the next sector.

I did take note and support the minister's comments on tourism. Through the '70s and '80s tourism was a top priority for this government, and I think it is again now. That is important. I think we all support that.

My questions have to do again with strategy around developing tourism. There were undertaken in the '80s a series of dramatic projects to boost the tourism infrastructure, the tourism magnetism of this province. I'm thinking of events such as the Winter Olympics in Calgary. I'm also thinking of permanent facilities such as the Tyrrell Museum of Palaeontology, the Remington carriage museum, the other equivalent facilities like that, Head-Smashed-In Buffalo Jump and a number of others. Certainly some of those, the Tyrrell museum probably leading the way, have been responsible for attracting hundreds of thousands of visitors a year to this province. Are there plans or strategies in place to continue with that sort of infrastructure development in the province, and if there are, can the minister share any of those with us?

MR. NORRIS: Well, I would at the outset like to thank the hon. member for recognizing what I believe our department has recognized, that tourism is one of the cleanest and certainly most reliable and renewable resources Alberta has. As I say when I tour around the province, it's my personal belief that God was smiling when he made Alberta, because there's not one part of this province that doesn't offer a tourism opportunity and isn't beautiful.

Tourism is the fifth largest industry in Alberta, as the hon. member probably knows. It employs over 110,000 people, and it generates over 4 and a half billion dollars in receipts. I don't disagree with the hon. member that it may be time to look at new destinations. I know that the hon. Member for Drumheller-Chinook knows full well what a difference the attractions you were referring to, the Tyrrell in Drumheller and Head-Smashed-In, have made to the region. [interjections] On highway 9.

What we are attempting to do now through a strategy that is in place in our department with a cross-ministry initiative is identify where we can find some opportunities to develop, and we will be continuing to do that over the next two years. I can share that strategy with the hon. member at the appropriate time.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The next sector, the largest and dominant sector in the Alberta economy in my view, the sector that separates Alberta, say, from Manitoba, is the energy sector, the petroleum industry. Despite our efforts at diversifying the economy of the province, the economy here is still driven by the energy sector, and I think that the boom or the surge in the economy that we're experiencing in the province is a direct result of the energy sector.

We need to divide that into different components. Obviously there's oil and gas, but there's also the oil sands here. My concern is that conventional oil and gas reserves are declining steadily. I don't think there's any way of denying that, despite the looks from the Treasurer opposite. I think the trend lines on conventional oil are clear, and they've been steadily downward for certainly over a decade, and gas reserves are also nearing a peak and are expected to begin diminishing in the near future as well. I think we all share the concern that while the oil sands are practically limitless it seems, the conventional petroleum reserves are not. Indeed, we've been in a position in Alberta where revenues to the province from gambling have passed those from conventional oil some time ago.

We talked earlier about the Tyrrell museum and the importance of that place for the Drumheller area and the whole river valley through that area. If you tour that river valley, as you drive down the highway, say, from Drumheller to Dinosaur park, you will go by a remarkably large number of abandoned coal mines, coal mines that were flourishing in 1950. I think that there were over 100 coal mines in the Red Deer River Valley in the Drumheller vicinity in 1950, and by 1965 there were less than 10. The problem wasn't that the coal ran out; the problem was that the demand shifted from coal to diesel for the railroads.

One of my concerns is that we at some point, because of technological developments, could face the same situation with demand for liquid petroleum. At the same time that President Bush of the United States announced the desire for a continental energy policy, I think he made provisions for something like an $800 million investment in alternate fuels. I see that as a potential threat to the economy of this province, and I'm really looking here for, again, a philosophical or strategic reflection from the minister, recognizing that undoubtedly the lead minister on this is the Minister of Energy. Nonetheless, this is an Economic Development concern of profound magnitude for our province. Has his department got strategies in place? Are they working with other ministries to look at issues around the decline of our energy reserves or the potential that they may be made simply irrelevant through new technologies that don't need that sort of resource?

MR. NORRIS: Well, again, Mr. Chairman I'd like to thank the hon. member for the opportunity to have a broad-based philosophical discussion if that's what he wants to engage in. Conventional supplies may well indeed be dwindling. I'm sure the members for Calgary-Varsity and Calgary-Foothills would know more than I about that, and we can certainly talk further about that. I can tell you that the Member for Fort McMurray will, I'm sure, back me on what we referred to earlier. I guess what I would point out and one of the reasons I'm very proud – and I don't want to risk offending the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie by being a tub-thumper or a chest-beater. Is that what it was? I believe that Albertans are extremely resilient and have proven to be over the course of the hundred years that we have been in operation. Our department to that end continues to talk to other ministries on a regular basis and has seconded a member to our department now for a specific value-added strategy.

The premise of the value-added strategy is broad based on all of the top 10 industries in Alberta. It doesn't focus solely on oil and gas or agriculture or forestry or tourism or petrochemicals or environmental services or any of the others but on all of them. The idea, as I said earlier in my opening remarks, is to find the resources and the strategic direction to say what we can do in environmental services, for example, which started out 10 years ago as a virtual nonindustry and is now a $3 billion a year industry and world respected. How do we encourage those industries to continue recognizing Alberta as the place to do business from? Our value-added strategy, which I will share with the member, addresses all of those concerns on a very broad base. So if conventional oil and gases do dry up, because we know they will at some point in time, I'm not as worried that we are not replacing them with other industries.

One of the ones that I'd like to touch on that I feel very passionate about is the aerospace industry. Unfortunately, due to federal intervention certain parts of the country have continued to get an extremely unfair advantage in the aerospace industry, and I don't think I need to go into those areas, because you probably know them well. But the Alberta government and our department now are focusing on the aerospace industry that is centred in and around the Calgary airport, which is a huge economic driver, but also around the Edmonton airports and saying: how can we develop the platform that will make the Boeings and the Spars and the Airbuses of the world want to use our strategic hub and our low dollar, et cetera, to service the American market? To that end, SAIT has made an announcement that they have set up a school that will address that exact thing. It's a $12 million initiative being set up at the airport in Calgary, which is remarkable by any stretch. It's a North American first, and it is being put there solely to address the aerospace industry's needs and to develop that to take it from a 10th place, $1 billion a year industry to maybe a fourth or a fifth and to start value-adding and continuing the diversification.

So I think I will share those comments verbally and get you the written information that you are asking about.

DR. TAFT: Thank you. I appreciate that. One last question. I'll go from one extreme to the other, so will go from the strategic discussion we've been having to a particular line item. I might not have heard my other colleagues mention it, but I want to make sure the question is raised. I'm on page 134 of the estimates. Ministry revenue takes an enormous rise, if I'm reading this correctly. The estimates are – oh, okay. Sorry; I can sort this out myself. It looks like you're getting a very substantial contribution from the lottery fund, $14.1 million. I would be interested to know what that's being used for, and is that one time only or is that going to be ongoing?

MR. NORRIS: That represents the tourism initiative. The $14.1 million is community lottery funds for tourism. I'll get a further answer for that.

THE ACTING CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you.

MR. NORRIS: Stand up.

MR. MASON: I can't even get started without getting heckled by the minister.

MR. NORRIS: I love you, man.

MR. MASON: It's tough love, though; isn't it?

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to speak about the estimates of the Economic Development department and to speak to issues raised by the minister. I appreciate his forthrightness and his being prepared this evening to operate on a fairly interactive basis. That's much appreciated and I think certainly makes it a more meaningful kind of process than it sometimes is.

I wanted to talk about five major areas and to ask the minister to respond as he sees fit to each of them at the end. The first one is the whole question of value-added as a concept for economic development. That means, at least to me, that to the extent possible, we do the processing, the manufacturing, the secondary and the tertiary processing here in Alberta. In my view, that will do a better job of creating long-term and well-paying employment for Albertans than simply exporting raw product.

There are a couple of areas that I'm particularly interested in. The first one is forestry. I wonder if the minister could comment on initiatives to increase the value-added component of forestry in this province and to ensure that to the extent possible we are exporting products with the highest level of finishing possible and what the government and his department are doing to enhance those opportunities for our province.

The area that gives me, I think, the greatest concern, Mr. Chairman, with respect to value-added is in the whole area of exports of natural gas. We know that that's a very limited commodity, but there was a policy change a number of years ago with this government that allows the export of natural gas in its raw form from the province. Previously government policy under Premiers Lougheed and Getty required that many of the components of natural gas that are useful in building petrochemical and pharmaceutical industries and so on had to be stripped out and retained here in Alberta. I noted that the Minister of Energy a few months ago was making comments about the potential for a natural gas pipeline from the Northwest Territories and Alaska coming through Alberta and his desire to see those very same chemicals taken out of the gas so that they could support a petrochemical industry in Alberta. But we're not doing as we say in this respect, and I wonder if the minister could comment on that.

I note also – and I'm sorry I don't have the name of the gentleman – that a number of months ago there were some public comments made by a senior executive with Celanese to the effect that they will not necessarily be able to sustain their industries in Alberta if they can't maintain a long-term supply of the appropriate raw materials, which in their case come from natural gas. So it seems to me, Mr.

Chairman, that in respect to this policy – and I appreciate that it's not directly under this minister's control, but I'd be interested in his comments – it certainly seems to me that what we're doing is exporting jobs by not insisting that the components of natural gas that are useful for petrochemicals and pharmaceuticals be retained here in Alberta in order to support those industries taking place here. I'd indicate also my view that something like a pharmaceutical industry is something that can be sustained in Alberta over a long period of time because transportation costs are relatively low given the nature of the product and the high value that it has.

I want to talk secondly about sustainability, and I want to come again to natural gas and to forestry. Some figures that I've seen recently indicate that in terms of proven reserves for natural gas we now stand at less than 10 years. The construction of a number of pipelines, particularly the Alliance pipeline, has allowed the export of raw natural gas from this province at an ever accelerating rate, and this quite frankly is a concern. It's not that we shouldn't be exporting gas and shouldn't be making money for the Alberta economy by doing that, but we need to take a look at how it occurs over a period of time and how quickly we allow that to occur and what we have in place for when the natural gas runs out. It certainly seems to me that while there may be more gas discoveries – and I'm sure there will be – it becomes more difficult and more expensive to find, and eventually you do tap out all of the practical reserves that may yet be discovered.

This is important also because natural gas revenues form such a very significant portion of government revenues. We talk about oil, but what we really need to understand is that the natural gas royalties form the lion's share of the royalty revenue for the province of Alberta, so there's also a government revenue issue associated with this. I'd be very interested in the minister's comments about whether or not we are depleting our natural gas reserves at a very, very high rate, what we're going to do when that happens, and how we will be able to sustain a petrochemical and a pharmaceutical industry in the province once the natural gas is gone.

The third area I wanted to talk a little bit about has been touched on already by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview. That has to do with electricity, and this is a serious concern. I appreciate the minister's comments that we're able to sustain wind power, for example, but the primary reason for that, in my view, is that we have now sustained higher prices for electricity in Alberta. I certainly support wind power, but I concur with the comments of the Member for Edmonton-Riverview that long-term higher electricity prices are a disadvantage to the Alberta economy and that we would be better off maintaining a regime that can supply steady amounts and appropriate amounts of electricity at a relatively low price. I think that would really enhance the viability of Alberta's industry and enhance its competitive position. So even though the minister has already commented on that, I think it would certainly be nice if he'd elaborate a little bit on whether or not he believes that in the scheme of things – and I agree with him that there are a number of factors that you need to take into account – electricity is essentially the lifeblood of a modern economy and that to maintain it in a relatively low-cost environment is very important.

The fourth thing I would like to raise, Mr. Chairman, is the whole question of the education and research institutions in our province and their relationship to economic development. Certainly we've moved well past the time when we were merely hewers of wood and drawers of water, but if we're going to continue in that direction, there needs to be a closer relationship between our research and our education facilities and our economic development activities, and the commercialization of research I think is an important part of that. So I'd be interested in the minister's reflections on where we're going and where we should be going in that respect.

The fifth point that I'd like to raise, Mr. Chairman, has to do with participation of Albertans in economic development. There are a couple of areas that I would like to raise, because one of the things that is occurring in this province is that there is a growing polarization between rich and poor. As a whole the province is becoming richer; there's no question of that. The economy is strong, and if oil prices bounce back, as it certainly seems they're going to given the situation in the world today, then that will continue. But there is still a serious problem with poverty in the province, and there is a significant sharpening of the contrast between rich and poor in our province. It's not limited to Alberta, but clearly the government's policies have not overcome that tendency, and I would like some comments with respect to that.

One of the ways that I think that can be achieved is through the encouragement of small businesses and businesses in the home. It's well known that a large majority of jobs are created by small business. So I would like to know specifically in the various sectors what the minister is proposing or his department is doing in order to facilitate small business participation in the economy, because in a very real sense, Mr. Chairman, that means the participation of Albertans in their own economy in a very significant way. It's something that I think should have a higher priority. At least in the documents that I've been going through from the ministry, it's primarily a sectoral approach – agriculture, tourism, and so on – but not as much as I would like to see about how we specifically target opportunities for small business people and people working in their homes within each of these sectors. I'd like to know if the department has specific sector-by-sector plans to promote small business.

I would also like for the minister to address the question of aboriginal participation in the Alberta economy. There is some mention of it in terms of cross-ministry initiatives in this report, but I certainly think that there's a lot that has been done but more that could be done. I'd like to get the minister to respond to how successful the province has been in encouraging participation of aboriginal Albertans in the economy, and if he can give us some ideas in terms of numbers, it would be very useful.

So just in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I think that there are a number of areas which require more detail, and they are: the role of value-added and efforts to increase that, the sustainability of key sectors of the economy, the infrastructure in order to support an economy and provide a price structure that allows Alberta industry to continue to remain competitive, the integration of our education and research institutions with Economic Development, and the issue of the equitable participation of all Albertans in the economy that we have.

With that brief summary, Mr. Chairman, I'll take my seat, and hopefully the minister can enlighten me.

THE CHAIR: The hon. minister.

MR. NORRIS: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I will be delighted to respond to the hon. member's comments. Whether we ever agree or not remains to be seen, but actually one of the delights and beauties of being in politics in Canada as opposed to some jurisdictions in the world is that you and I can agree to disagree until the cows come home, and we probably will. But it's the democracy that we love and support that allows us to do it. I for one am very proud to be able to say at the end of the day: we may never agree, hon. member, but that's the way it is, and that's just fine. So I'll answer the questions that you pose to me and appreciate the opportunity to do that.

I believe that the first thing you touched on is forestry. I would like to again at the outset say, as would the Member for Athabasca-Wabasca, who is far more knowledgeable in this than I, that forestry is vital to the province of Alberta and to its success. But we do not want to be shipping out wood when we can be shipping out furniture; you're exactly right. To that end, I will refer again to our value-added strategy, which talks about working in conjunction with industry rather than imposing certain ideals that we have. We do have and have had several workshops. I'll be attending one in May in Jasper to discuss with the forest industry what they feel we can do as a government to facilitate that and then try and continue formulating that in our value-added strategy, recognizing that there's absolutely no such thing as a quick fix. If the market that we on this side of the government believe in dictates that we are not going to get involved in subsidies – some of the hon. members encouraged us not to earlier, so I appreciate that – we are going to let the market decide. I know, given that, that Alberta businesses will rise to the challenge and get to the value-added stage that I think you and I both want. It is part of our value-added strategy, and I will be able to share that with you further in a written summation if you wish.

You've talked twice about natural gas. Once you spoke about it, then you went to something else and came back. So I'll address natural gas and your concerns in a very broad-based response. The current reserves for natural gas will certainly last longer than you and I will be in this building and, based on certain track records, maybe longer than both of us. Having said that, we are looking at ways to continue to bring natural gas in to feed the petrochemical industry that you referred to. You continued to refer to a pharmaceutical industry. Maybe you know something I don't, but I believe that you probably meant petrochemical.

The interesting thing about natural gas is that it is a commodity that is traded where it comes out. It's not like oil, which is a commodity that has a world value. So what the government of the day did to encourage the establishment of the petrochemical industry was the right thing to do at the time. What we can never do, nor will the Alberta government do – and I'm sure the former Minister of Energy will support me on that – is legislate where people can and can't sell their product. I think you're referring to the Alliance pipeline, which took natural gas resources out of Alberta into the mid-west United States. That was a market decision made by the producers, supported by the NRCB. The Alberta government had intervention status in that, and that went ahead.

Now, what I was referring to, hon. member, is that the massive gas finds that are in northern Alaska have to come down to the lower 48 somewhere. Because the infrastructure is there, just in and around Edmonton, what our job to do with the producers – and that's what I was doing in Dallas when you referred to that comment – is to make sure they understand that in Alberta we have the infrastructure they need. These are not plants you can set up on a whim and with $100 million. These are several billion dollar plants. We have them all here. Our job is to tell them that and to make sure they understand that and that we have no sales tax, the lowest personal taxes, and the lowest corporate taxes so that the market itself is driven into Alberta. That is how we are going to ensure that those industries continue to flourish for many years past our tenure here.

You had referred to a specific company, and I know the company. It's located in the hon. Minister of Children's Services' riding. I would be very remiss and it would be inappropriate of me to comment on a specific company and their business decisions. I don't know what went into how they made that decision. I don't know what their infrastructure is like. I don't comment on their business decisions. I know that similar industries are not having that concern because the price of natural gas, as you know, has come down dramatically since the time last year when that was a concern. But we will monitor. You're absolutely right: it's a feedstock, and we need to do what we can.

Electricity prices are not causing an unfair advantage in Alberta. There is no evidence of that. In fact, the evidence is all to the contrary. As I said, businesses have moved in on a net migration basis far higher than anywhere else in Canada, and there's a reason for that. Are we concerned about where electricity prices might go? Of course we are, the same as any other industry and the feedstocks that are required. But as I said earlier in answer to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview's question, the deregulation in our estimation has allowed a freer market to continue to produce more electricity. More supply means cheaper price.

You have raised the concern of environmental standards, and I'd like to take a moment to talk about what I believe are some of the best environmental practices and standards in North America, which are right here in Alberta. We believe that the Alberta-based businesses are using best technology and are trying to get to a cleaner burning situation. As the hon. member must know, we have some of the highest emission standards in all of Canada, so I don't share your fear that using the natural resources that we have, which are natural gas and coal, to produce electricity will cause as much environmental damage. In fact, I disagree that they will. The evidence doesn't support that.

One of your comments that you and I can agree on tonight wholeheartedly is that educational institutions are not only an integral part of a community, but they are vital – absolutely vital – to economic development. We have to look at outside-the-box thinking and talk about them as a part of the community, which is a massive economic driver as well as a good source of education, a good source of diversification, and a good source of producing skilled labour. To that end, you're probably well aware that the University of Alberta was just awarded the nanotechnology centre for all of Canada, which is a marvelous thing. I alluded to SAIT having a breakthrough at the Calgary regional airports. There are a number of success stories. My department has got educational institutions on the radar and will continue to promote them in any way, shape, or form that we can. You are absolutely correct on that.

With regard to how we treat the rich and the poor in this province, although it does not fall under my ministry – it would certainly fall under the Minister of Children's Services or human resources far more – again, I could not disagree with you more. The tax treatment that we have is broad based and by far the fairest for not only low-income earners but the highest. I would remind the hon. member that the tax cutoff for low-income wage earners is the highest in Canada. It does not get any better than in Alberta. You can make the most money before paying taxes in the lower brackets than anywhere else in Canada. We have support systems that everybody in Alberta knows and respects, and we do take care of our poor. I believe, like all members on this side, that society isn't measured by how it treats its wealthy; it's how it takes care of those who can't help themselves.

There is probably one fundamental place that you and I will disagree, and that is that everybody has the opportunity to survive and succeed. It is not the government's place to promote that, and that's where we will always disagree. If you want to do something in Alberta, you have the ability to do it, and if you believe that somebody attempting to raise themselves up should be taxed or brought back to a lower level to help people who aren't doing that, then we'll always disagree. If you are talking about people who will never have the opportunity to earn money, yes, we are on the same wavelength, and I again believe that our province treats them as well if not better than anywhere in Canada. I would disagree with your contention that the rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer, because the very fact of the matter is: without people who are generating income, you have no social services. Period.

The government can't print money unless it goes into a deficit or debt, and we're not going to do that. You've heard that over and over again. So the only way that social service programs are supported in this jurisdiction is by people who want to go out and risk capital and generate wealth, and that wealth is then taxed and put into social services. And guess what? Per capita we spend about as much as we need to to provide the services, and we're all very proud of that. So you and I will never agree on that point, and we can talk about it endlessly if you'd like.

I can tell you right now as a former small business owner that this was the best place in Canada to do business and I was happy to pay my fair share, and I emphasize the word "fair". It has nothing to do with taking the incentive out of my getting up and going to work to make sure that people who don't want to are leveled out. On that one we will probably never, ever agree, but again the beauty of this House is that now we agree on something.

More than you would ever know, hon. member, small business is indeed the backbone of the Alberta economy, so much so that 95 percent of all businesses in Alberta qualify as small businesses. As I said, I'm a former business owner myself, which qualified as a small one, and I understand that those are the people that get up every morning and create real jobs and they create tax dollars and they create employment opportunities. To be supportive of that, we have a number of initiatives, not the least of which are our regional offices which are centered around the province. There are 10 of them, and we encourage businesses who have any concern, large or small, to access those offices. There are a number of support mechanisms that they have the ability to use, and those are free of charge. Those are free of charge because they are supported by the business community that pays the taxes to provide those services. So you can go into Grande Prairie or Fort McMurray or Carstairs or Cremona, and you'll have access to this kind of information.

The second thing I'd like to point out is our economic alliances, which we're very proud of. We have some very good ones. They are now being recognized as a model around the province. What they do is encourage regions to band together and promote the strengths of the region. Most specifically, the recent one that we signed off was Wetaskiwin-Millet. It may sound very odd being that Wetaskiwin is with Camrose as a provincial riding, but Camrose and Wetaskiwin are very different. Wetaskiwin and Millet are very similar. They formed an economic alliance, and now our department can go and help service those small businesses in that area.

We have a web site that is free of charge to anybody in Alberta. They can access it whenever they want, and it's full of information for small businesses.

The final thing that I'd like to point out to the hon. member is that our department does actively support the Business Link, which is an initiative supported by the federal government, the city of Edmonton, and ourselves, and we believe that it's an outstanding resource place for businesses to come and get access to information, education, and resource tools to help them grow their businesses. We will never pick winners and losers, but we will certainly put in as many pieces of the puzzle that they need to continue succeeding.

Again, as I said at the outset, I thank you for recognizing in this Chamber that we can certainly agree to disagree. If I haven't answered any of your questions here, please contact us, and we'll get the written answers to you.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I just want to briefly correct one misapprehension that the minister seems to be under, and that is that we in our little corner of the House are advocating that when someone starts to get on their feet economically, we want to tax them back down. That's certainly not anything that I said. It's fine if the minister wishes to disagree with me on things that I've actually said, but he shouldn't be disagreeing with me on things that I have not said.

The last point that I want to make, Mr. Chairman, is with respect to the polarization between rich and poor and the levels of poverty and so on that are existing in the province. These are not matters of opinion. It's not a matter of my opinion or a matter of the minister's opinion and that we can disagree as hon. members. There is statistical evidence that clearly indicates that this is in fact what's happening.

Thank you.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

MR. JACOBS: Thanks, Mr. Chairman. I'd just like to make a brief comment and ask a question of the minister. First of all, I'd like to commend the minister for his enthusiasm for his portfolio. He has a great subject. Alberta is a great place and truly is a place that we should be grateful to live in, and I commend the hon. minister for his enthusiasm for Alberta and for the way he promotes economic activity here. I also appreciate very much the stand he takes on free enterprise and keeping government out of business and creating a climate for people to want to do business and invest their money and keep this province going. I totally agree with him on that and commend him for that.

Many things have been covered tonight, and I don't want to take more time on other areas, but I notice that one of the goals is to "increase participation of Alberta communities in regional economic development." That caught my interest because I represent a riding that is a rural riding, and I sense the frustration in rural Alberta with trying to create economic development and create jobs and keep people in the communities. Many rural communities are really struggling to maintain their population base and are looking at ways to stimulate economic activity. I know they're looking to us as governments to try to help them solve the problem. I was interested recently to learn of a project in southern Alberta. It's called Mounties to Mountains, and it's a group of communities that are getting together to try to encourage regional economic development.

So I guess my question to the minister is: could you expand a little bit on this goal about increasing economic development on a regional basis? What are some of the things you have in mind, and what are some of the things we can do to sort of stimulate more activity in some of the rural communities that are really struggling to remain viable?

Thank you.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Minister of Economic Development.

MR. NORRIS: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman. At the outset I would like to thank the hon. member for his comments, but I must remind the House that the class of '93 under our Premier set up a place that . . .

AN HON. MEMBER: How long is your tie, buddy?

MR. NORRIS: I'll take that question under advisement and get an answer later.

I would like to remind all members that because of the courage and guts of the classes of '93 and '97 we are in a position where I can join this team and have the honour of promoting Alberta as the economically viable and wonderful place it is. I don't think any of us in this House or on the opposition benches should forget the courage that it took to turn around the good ship Alberta and put it in the position that it is in now. Reports continue to come out, as recent as yesterday, Mr. Chairman, that Alberta has not only weathered the storm but is an economic elephant in the face of all economic challenges that were faced. I do thank the hon. member for his comments, and I will continue to be positive because it's a very easy thing to be positive about. The Alberta advantage is real.

With regard to his question about rural Alberta in my mind nothing could be more important for our department to accomplish than a successful and tangible rural development program. As we all know, there is very little oil on Jasper Avenue, and I suspect that except at Stampede time you probably won't see a lot of cows wandering around Stephen Avenue Mall in Calgary. Those resources that we cherish and love so much are all in rural Alberta, Mr. Chairman, and unless we recognize and get a handle on that, the fact that rural Alberta is somewhat disadvantaged, then we will have a big problem on our hands 10 or 20 years down the road.

To that end, in answer to the hon. member's question, the regional alliance theory is one that is taking hold in that it allows us to maximize our resources. As I said, certain regions have certain similarities that they can group together and promote. In the hon. member's area the Palliser Economic Partnership is in place and by all accounts is thriving and working very well, similar to the Central Alberta Economic Partnership, which is the hon. Minister of Innovation and Science's riding, and PREDA, which is the Peace region district, which of course takes in all of northern Alberta. These alliances have proven to be successful in that they allow rural Alberta access to information they might not otherwise have, and I will certainly get more information to the hon. member about how they work and how they might benefit his rural communities.

Two other things I would like to mention. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie alluded to it earlier, that our department does cross with many other ministries, and one that I'm very proud of the work we're doing with is the hon. minister of agriculture's department. To that end, we are now working on what we are trying to call a blueprint strategy for rural Alberta, whereby any small business or any business existing in rural Alberta can call our department and have access to a very simple plan in order to either start or promote an existing business. I'm told by my deputies and the deputy of Agriculture and Rural Development that they are proceeding at a great pace on this, because we both recognize the vital importance of it, and I will be delighted to give the member some more information about that.

The other thing I was going to mention, the final point – I alluded to it earlier, Mr. Chairman – is that I sincerely believe that tourism is sadly overlooked as a vital part of rural development. We all recognize that people come to Alberta for the beauty of the mountains and the excitement of West Edmonton Mall, but our challenge is not to let them go into British Columbia, as they are doing at a great pace, but to keep them in Alberta.

One of the ways we're doing that as a department is through the promotion of rural Alberta destinations and circle tours so that when you come to Edmonton, we can prepare a three-day trip that may take you to Cold Lake or Grande Cache or Bonnyville, or if you go to Calgary, you'll certainly go to Drumheller. You may end up in Chinook. You may end up in the Crownsnest Pass. But this is all rural development, because they have to have services once they get there, and that's part of the overall tourism strategy that I and my department will be bringing forward hopefully in the next month or two to address the need for recognizing tourism as a rural development tool. I will share that, as well, with the hon. member.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. We certainly appreciate the participation of the minister in answering the questions this evening in some detail and as we ask them. I have a couple of questions that I would like him to answer in that fashion, and then after that I have a whole series of questions that don't actually need to be answered tonight but that we would hope would be answered in writing at some point in the future by his staff. In addition to that, it looks like we might not get to all of the questions. If we don't, could we send them to your department and have them answered in a timely fashion?

MR. NORRIS: In the spirit of co-operation that is floating through the House tonight, Mr. Chairman, I would be delighted to answer any questions that are appropriate and that I have the ability to answer. In the event that I don't, I would invite the hon. member to come down to my office, check out my collection of ties, and we can talk further.

MS CARLSON: Mr. Chairman, I don't know if I want to co-operate quite that far, but I thank him for the offer.

MR. NORRIS: It's all about the love.

MS CARLSON: Well, maybe on your side, but let me tell you, there are some fences.

Mr. Chairman, one of the questions I have that we would like the minister to answer tonight is on tourism, and he spoke about it just a little bit a moment ago talking about circle tours and other regional alliances. We still often hear in this province that the majority of the tourism support and the focus in the province is on the Banff-Calgary region and that southern corner. I know that those are top-of-mind areas for global visitors, but of course we have other great, outstanding areas in this province. Could he tell us what the vision is for the department in terms of the entire province and how they see changing the balance, if that's part of the focus?

MR. NORRIS: Yes.

THE CHAIR: Pardon me, hon. Minister of Economic Development. I appear to have two ministers who are anxious to either answer the question or to ask a question. The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has tried a number of times to get in.

The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

MR. NORRIS: I know where you live, Guy.

MR. BOUTILIER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm so glad the minister does know where I live, but I would just like to echo the comment the other day in question period that I am the Minister of Municipal Affairs, not of Community Development or anything of the sort.

I would like to pose a question to the hon. minister. In his budget it's been my observation in the last year, during his time as minister, that the energy and enthusiasm that he's brought to the ministry are important in this way. The people that work within his department, traditionally government, have taken the attitude that economic development is just simply government's responsibility and that we have to protect it and take care of it. I heard the minister on numerous occasions say that economic development is everyone's business, and that, I believe, is so important in the spirit of how we work together in partnership. So I just want to say that the dollars that are used in partnership with those many stakeholders are important if it is intended within his upcoming budget this year to continue to build on that partnership, to stretch a dollar where other sector people, such as private, such as public/private, are participating in economic development initiatives.

THE CHAIR: Hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, I don't know that that answers your question. It may be just something on the side. Do you wish to ask a further question, or should I go to the minister?

The Minister of Economic Development.

MR. NORRIS: Well, in response to the Minister of Municipal Affairs I would like to thank him for his comments and remind him of our glorious days at Saint Francis Xavier University, where we both shared an awful lot of enthusiasm but fueled under different circumstances, Mr. Chairman. He, also, has not lost his energy and his vibrating personality, and that's wonderful to see.

Where I think I can answer the minister's question is that most if not all of our tourism initiatives are matching dollars, and that is a very valuable point he's brought up. It is not the government's job to promote or handpick industries, nor is it the government's job to be in the business of business. As I alluded to earlier, we do provide tools to business and industry and hope that they utilize them. I again thank him for his comment and his undivided attention.

With regard to tourism the hon. member has touched on something, as I said earlier, that is very near and dear to my heart. To that end, I asked the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, who has a wealth of information and experience in tourism, to chair a committee that was struck in the summer of 2001. They were challenged with going out to the stakeholders in Alberta and finding out what works in our tourism and what doesn't, and to the government's credit the STMC, or Strategic Tourism Marketing Council, which was set up by the current Minister of Finance, then Minister of Economic Development, is working extremely well.

In order to equalize what's going on in the province, we have set up what are called tourism destination regions, of which there are six: northern Alberta, central, mountains, Edmonton, Calgary, and southern. Each of those regions receives $300,000 as part of our budgetary expenses, and with that money they are encouraged to promote tourism in their regions and develop tourism initiatives so as to equal out the perception that the mountains, Calgary, and Edmonton are getting the lion's share of the money. That's one way we are leveling out that playing field.

The other way, as I said, is in our new tourism initiative that we are bringing forward. Part of that component is rural tourism and agritourism, which is something that I think is going to be the wave of the future, and our department will continue to equalize the money that is coming in, as you suggested, from the mountains. But at the outset, in conclusion to your question, I would suggest that any marketer, given what we have in Alberta, would never, ever ignore the mountains, nor would they ignore Calgary and all it offers, nor would they ignore Edmonton, and we would be at our own peril if we did. What we have to do is emphasize what's outside of those centres, and that's what we'll try and do.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think that was an excellent answer offered by the minister, and we're happy to see that he's progressing that way. I now know which meeting it was that I accidentally walked into some months ago that the minister was chairing.

I have a question that I would like him to answer on the Kyoto protocol and that whole issue of CO₂ emissions. Is this ministry providing any support on the government position on opposing the Kyoto protocol, and does the minister see the economic benefit of promoting trading credits and permits, and is his ministry doing anything . . .

MR. HLADY: It's a trick question.

MS CARLSON: No, it isn't actually a trick question at all. I would believe that his answer to the first one is no and the second one is yes.

Thank you.

MR. NORRIS: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member probably quite rightly knows, this matter does fall under Energy, but I am delighted to talk about it. I don't think there has been a more foul and unfair proposal brought forward on the province of Alberta since the national energy policy, and it's time that we discussed this in an open and frank fashion.

At the heart of this Kyoto protocol there is an unknown quantity called tax credits. Our biggest trading partner in the world is 400 miles to the south of us. It's called the United States of America. They have no intention whatsoever of signing on to this protocol, leaving us at a massive competitive disadvantage, because they see the inherit folly in this whole protocol, which is that it's inherently unfair, Mr. Chairman. If you have any hard and fast evidence other than theories that have been put forward, the government of Alberta is as diligent as any other government in the world in protecting their environment. I have kids. I know most of the hon. members do. We have no desire to ruin our environment, but there is an economic challenge associated with the Kyoto protocol that will devastate Alberta quite simply.

Our challenge right now is to find out what the federal government is doing very benevolently on our behalf without telling us, and to that end I am going to be meeting with some of my counterparts in Ottawa in two weeks to try and get answers, because this protocol does have the inherent possibility of devastating Alberta. Let's not be foolish about it. What it does is it establishes tax credits, but we have no explanation of how to trade them. It talks about sinkholes, but we don't know what they are, and they're racing ahead to sign this protocol without even consulting with the lead ministries, which are certainly Environment and Energy, and secondarily my ministry.

So my role right now is to push as hard as I can for Alberta industry, which drives this glorious province, and say that this protocol is wrong the way it is, absolutely wrong. Until it's fair, I will continue to encourage all government members not to look forward at this protocol but at a made-in-Alberta or a made-in-Canada solution that works with our biggest trading partners, the United States and Mexico.

I would like to remind the hon. member that of all the greenhouse gases in the world, Canada is responsible for 2 percent. Of that 2 percent, Alberta puts in its fair share with Ontario and British Columbia and other industrialized provinces. What this protocol overlooks is that China, the world's biggest polluter, India, the world's second biggest polluter, and South America, the world's third, have no intention of signing on to this.

So all you're doing by encouraging that is penalizing Alberta businesses and redistributing wealth. If that's a solution to emissions, it's an illogical one. This has nothing to do with curbing those countries' emissions. It has everything to do with forcing Canadian businesses to revert to emission levels that were prior to 1990 and are not sustainable. So if you want my direction on what we're doing, we're going to fight it every step of the way.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. A follow-up question to that is: what does the minister see as the solution to containing emissions? I'm not saying even reducing but containing them globally? And a second question: what will be your participation in the G-8 summit this June?

MR. NORRIS: Well, I thank the hon. member for that question. What I see is what I continue to see as I travel around Alberta: to encourage Alberta businesses to lead the nation in best practices. In regard to the emissions, when we are talking about coal, as I talked about earlier, we do have the highest emission standards in Canada. We will continue to encourage the study and the research of clean-burning coal or, as our Premier likes to call it, coal by wire. There are a number of ways to get to that point, and I would favour a model that the Americans have proposed: rewarding businesses who fuel the economy rather than penalizing them. To that end, I will be looking at their model and trying to bring forward some ideas on that.

With regard to your comment about the G-8 summit our involvement will be to ensure that the tourism opportunities in Alberta are not limited to Albertans, because they are taking place in our national parks, that are controlled by the federal government. That's of vital importance. I noted recently that numerous opportunities are going to be closed down because of the G-8 summit, so we are going to be working with our federal counterparts to see how we can alleviate that. As a method of marketing Alberta we have made an arrangement with the federal government to have displays on hand at the G-8 to talk about Alberta and its obvious advantages and opportunities, and that will be our involvement in the G-8 to date.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would like to return to a discussion that the minister and I had in our earlier comments about their long-term strategic planning. When I talked about having a five-, 10-, 15-year plan for economic development in Alberta, he referred me to the Get Ready Alberta paper that was produced. What I have before me is the Year One Report to Albertans. So, Mr. Minister, if there's more information available on this program, I would be interested in seeing that.

In terms of this being a long-term strategic direction, I think it's a good opener. I think what you've come forward with here is a good idea, and the goals are excellent starting points, but they are, in fact, just starting points. They talk about "unleashing innovation" and the goal being “Alberta is a world leader in innovation, research, development and commercialization of new ideas.” It’s an opener. It doesn’t tell us where you expect us to be. You list what we’ve accomplished in one year, but you don’t tell us where you expect us to be as a province on these particular issues in five years, 10 years, 15 years, or 20 years. I’m hoping that that is the intent here, that you’re going to go there and you can share that information with us.

The same, Mr. Chairman, when we talk about all the rest of the very excellent goals here: leading in learning, competing in a global marketplace, and making Alberta the best place to live, work and visit. Exactly what are the benchmarks that you’re measuring success by? If you could share those with us, I would be very appreciative of that.

Particularly under the “leading in learning,” in the list of the major first-year accomplishments, you talked about “increasing the number of participants in training and employment programs who felt they learned new skills to 88%, up from 83% in 1999.” A great goal but could we have some more specifics? Where are these people coming from? How many of them are retraining? So how many people are cycling through the training programs more often? Is this specifically aimed at addressing the shortage of skilled labour that we have in this province right now, particularly with regard to the trades? I see that you have listed in your core businesses as one of the current challenges, “workforce and skill shortages”. I think we need more information than just what is given here.

If you could answer those few questions briefly, we will submit the rest of the questions we have, which are more specific, itemized questions on the budget, and conclude our remarks for this evening.

THE CHAIR: The hon. minister.

MR. NORRIS: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. As we conclude this session, I would like to thank all the hon. members opposite for their hard-hitting and insightful questions. I certainly appreciate the chance to talk about this ministry, as I do agree with the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie. I see it as being one of the most vital to the continued success of this province and the diversification of our industries. I want to thank her specifically for her enthusiasm in the questions.

With regard to Get Ready Alberta I can certainly provide you with more information about our value-added strategies, but one of the main areas that I see that we have to focus on – and it’s something that the dean of business and current president of the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce focuses on on a regular basis, a man who I have a good deal of respect for, and that’s once we have come up with new technologies, how do we capitalize on them and bring them to market? To that end, we are working with the Minister of Revenue, the hon. Member for Calgary-North West, with his department, with Innovation and Science, with ASRA, and other stakeholders, including Calgary Inc. and Economic Development Edmonton, to come up with a long-term sustainable plan for venture capital in Alberta. That doesn’t mean the government is going to fund that program. That won’t be happening, but we want to work on ways to facilitate that and let other people know what’s going on here. I see that as being vital not only in the two- to five-year term but in the long term in order to establish industries that might not otherwise come to Alberta.

One of the things that is a five-, 10-, 15-year program is the Supernet. I alluded to that earlier. I see it as being an absolutely dynamic economic development tool. This brings world-class information to any neighbourhood in Alberta.

AN HON. MEMBER: Right on.

MR. NORRIS: You guys are awake. Outstanding.

It’s something that every province in Canada is not only envious of, but I noticed that the former Minister of Industry, the now retired member for Newfoundland, tried very hard to get the federal government to see the wisdom of what Alberta is doing and failed miserably. I was saddened by that, because I think a national Supernet would have been an outstanding initiative, but I guess his leadership aspirations weren’t strong enough to carry the day. However, it is a wonderful idea, and it’s something the federal government should look at, because the Alberta government believes in it sincerely.

The benchmarks that we look at are, I guess, the same as any small business would look at. At the end of the day you take all your resources and you look at how you spent them and you see what kind of return you got. Our return quite simply is an increased population base due to people wanting to come in, the most new jobs established, and I’ll get the exact figures for you if you wish. The number of bankruptcies is on a severe decline, which we’re very proud about, and the fact that more people from other parts of Canada and the world are migrating to Alberta tells us that our strategy is not only working, but it’s flourishing. So I think we’re on the right track.

I appreciate the hon. members’ comments about how we might make it better. I’m sure the hon. Minister of Children’s Services would have more to comment on about poverty and how we deal with it. I think we do an outstanding job, and I want to commend her on her work. As far as the information that you require and the written questions, I would be delighted to answer any that you have at the appropriate time you bring them forward.

With that, I’ll conclude my comments, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIR: Are you ready for the question? After considering the business plan and proposed estimates for the Department of Economic Development, are you ready for the vote?

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIR: Operating expense and capital investment to be voted . . .

MR. MASON: Do you not want to find out if there’s anyone opposed?

THE CHAIR: The time, hon. member, is one minute from being up. It’s more of just a pro forma question, “Are you ready for the vote?” so that everyone has their attention focused on the estimates.

So if you want to know whether anybody’s opposed: anyone opposed?

MR. MASON: Opposed.

THE CHAIR: So noted.

MR. MASON: Thank you.

Operating Expense and Capital Investment $51,377,000

THE CHAIR: Shall the vote be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIR: Opposed? Carried.

MR. HANCOCK: Mr. Chairman, I would move that the committee now rise and report the estimates of Economic Development and beg leave to sit again.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Leduc.

MR. KLAPSTEIN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions, reports as follows, and requests leave to sit again.

Resolved that a sum not exceeding the following be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2003, for the following department.

Economic Development: operating expense and capital investment, $51,377,000.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in this report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Opposed? So ordered.

Second Reading

Bill 18
Social Care Facilities Review Committee
Amendment Act, 2002

[Adjourned debate March 19: Dr. Massey]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have been in consultation with the minister over the repeal of section 13 of the act, which is the complaint officers section of the act. It's section 13 and it's also section 8. I believe that the minister has an explanation that would account for those two sections being repealed.

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, I'd be very pleased to do it. The sections . . .

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: If I'm not mistaken, the hon. member did move second reading on this bill.

MS EVANS: Yes.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Before I can recognize you, then, I must say, "The hon. minister to close debate," at which time anybody that wishes to speak to it might stand.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've looked through Bill 18 with some interest and reflected on my experience many years ago on the forerunner to this committee, another committee which still exists, the Health Facilities Review Committee. When the Health Facilities Review Committee was first struck – and I'm thinking 1973 here – it had a massive mandate.

Speaker's Ruling
Decorum

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: There seems to be some confusion. This is not committee. This is Assembly, and we don't get to wander around and speak any number of given times. I know it's late and we've had a lot of fun, but we'd like to hear at second reading the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Debate Continued

DR. TAFT: All right. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying before I was interrupted, I was reflecting on the history of this particular committee, the Social Care Facilities Review Committee, and the fact that it arose more than 20 years ago, I would say, as a sort of offspring of the Health Facilities Review Committee. The Health Facilities Review Committee had an immense mandate, which was frankly unmanageable. This committee was struck, and I think the original chairman, Dr. David Carter, went on eventually to become the Speaker. He was, I believe, the first chairperson of this committee and pursued its mandate at the time with great vigour. I think it would be interesting for the minister to talk to him about the amendments here in Bill 18.

These committees were set up to act, in effect, as Ombudsmen for, on the one hand, the health care system and, on the other hand, the social care system and were given the job of visiting social care facilities, in this case throughout the province, a vast range of facilities. Certainly at one time they were unannounced visits, and if there were concerns, either they came through the visit or they came through complaints. The committee was fully empowered to investigate those in lieu of the Ombudsman, because certainly the Ombudsman is precluded from investigating the health care system, and that may be a restriction that applies in social care facilities also.

These committees took their mandates extremely seriously and worked very hard at their job, and I'm sure that the current members do as well, but I am concerned when I look at Bill 18 that the capacity of this committee to fully investigate complaints and, indeed, to initiate investigations on their own may be restricted. I am frankly concerned that the independence of these committees, which was cherished when they were first set up, is being compromised and eroded steadily. For example, provisions in Bill 18 that seem to bring the committee under the tighter jurisdiction of the minister concern me, and I'm thinking here of section 3: the following is added after section 5, is how this reads.

Directions to Committee

5.1(1) The Minister may provide directions to the Committee, through the chair, relating to the Committee's duties under section 7.

(2) The chair of the Committee shall ensure that the Committee complies with any directions provided by the Minister under subsection (1).

Now, I recognize that there's room for interpretation with that, but I am concerned that it could have the effect of limiting the committee's independence or initiative from the directions from the minister, and that was not the initial intent. The initial intent was to allow for significant independence from the government for these committees. These committees report – or at least they originally did, and I hope they still do – to the Legislature through the minister, and that was to recognize in part that they are viable, important third-party eyes and ears and minds on our social care system and our health facility system. So that section concerns me, and any reassurance the minister may be able to give us either in response now or during committee would be much appreciated.

I am also concerned under section 7 of this bill that section 13 of the original act is repealed. That section 13 that's being repealed – and I think it's worth reading this into the record – reads:

- 13(1) The committee may designate
- (a) a member of the committee, or
 - (b) with the approval of the Minister, an employee of the Government who is under the administration of the Minister,
- as a complaint officer.
- (2) The complaint officer shall on behalf of the Committee
- (a) make preliminary inquiries, or
 - (b) if directed to do so by the chair of the Committee, make investigations
- into complaints received under section 8 and report the results of the inquiry or investigation to the Committee.
- (3) Members of the Committee at the request of the chair of the Committee may assist the complaint officer in the carrying out of the complaint officer's duties.

A profoundly important role for this committee, and I don't know why that section is being struck, but frankly it worries me.

I reflect again on my own experience in the sister committee to this, in which at times completely unannounced – and the Minister of Health and Wellness may be interested in this also. If we had concerns about a facility, we would team up with staff of the department, experts in diet or nursing care or administration, and at times land in large numbers on a facility unannounced and do an absolutely sweeping and comprehensive investigation. If that power is lost as a result of Bill 18, then I will forcefully oppose this bill.

Any response the minister can make tonight or at a later date to those concerns I look forward to keenly. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Children's Services to close debate.

MS EVANS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hope I will be able to satisfactorily address the concerns raised by the members opposite. I was not planning to speak long, but I'm going to just redefine why we're doing this. We're making these amendments because we will shift the emphasis for the committee from inspections and investigations to service reviews, and we will do that because the Protection for Persons in Care Act is the piece of legislation that conducts investigations. They are, under our definition, required to conduct investigations, and if these amendments are passed, regulations will be developed to designate facilities under other departments to come under the jurisdiction of the Protection for Persons in Care Act.

The original reason why we started refining the definition was because the Social Care Facilities Review Committee was reviewing facilities that were not under this minister's direct line of authority. So the separation here will in fact compel that health care facilities will be reviewed by the health care facilities committee and social care facilities under the social care facilities committee and be a review as opposed to investigation. That has been something that will then see the consolidation of investigations under the Protection for Persons in Care Act, which is required to do that.

In the manner of complaints, complaints that might initiate a review are taking place regularly. Complaints about day cares and complaints about the quality of service delivery in women's shelters have come forward. We've had a number of complaints, and then the Social Care Facilities Review Committee is required to follow up on those complaints, but they do not do the type of intensive investigation which is done under the Protection for Persons in Care Act, which I know from my time in a previous ministry generates huge files with very qualified investigators. These, if you will remember, are people appointed from the public who will represent all parts of the province, who are good people, who are acknowledged to be able to do reviews but are not given the special investigative training that is given in our legislation under the Protection for Persons in Care Act, which has very definitely got a more onerous set of criteria for investigation.

If I may just go one step further, I think that the concern under section 3 about the minister – while the minister may provide directions to the committee, it was noted that there was a gap in that the committee may never report back all of the reports to the Legislature. There was nothing that actually compelled the committee to bring forward reports, and the beauty of having reports come back, at least to the minister, is that then we can follow through and ask the person or persons that may be doing things inappropriately in facilities to take corrective action immediately. Under the capable chairmanship of the Member for Calgary-Shaw I am religiously receiving reports which I am funneling right back through the deputy minister to the chief executive officer and getting corrections made. I have myself initiated two requests for review of day cares which I considered less than capable of serving the people.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that these clarifications will at least assure the hon. members opposite that the current legislation does not today reflect what is actually happening in the review, which are simply reviews, and that vulnerable people will be protected under the Protection for Persons in Care Act and that the regulations will be developed prior to the proclamation of the facility portion of this legislation. Narrowing the definition of "facility" fits with the review committee's new mandate, and in fact since the committee's inception, since 1978, it has primarily conducted reviews as opposed to investigations.

A review involves meeting with the service recipients and reviewing the information and making observations about their satisfaction with the services involved. So in my view it does not deal with some of the other issues like the capacity of the facility to provide the services. In some cases we have reviewed facilities which may have very satisfied customers – i.e., parents for their children – but the facility itself may be wanting under our licensing regulation.

Through the new amendments we hope that this committee will be able to be clear about its mission, will in fact still receive complaints and act upon those complaints, will report regularly to the minister and that those more detailed investigations under the time of the proclamation of the Protection for Persons in Care Act dealing with the regulations to the facility definition will then see this enacted under the narrower definition of "facility".

With that, I would move second reading.

[Motion carried; Bill 18 read a second time]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would move that we adjourn until 1:30 p.m. tomorrow.

[Motion carried; at 10:19 p.m. the Assembly adjourned to Thursday at 1:30 p.m.]

Title: Thursday, April 11, 2002

1:30 p.m.

Date: 02/04/11

[The Speaker in the chair]

head: Prayers

THE SPEAKER: Good afternoon and welcome.

Let us pray. Our divine Father, as we conclude for this week our work in this Assembly, we renew our thanks and ask that we may continue our work under Your guidance. Amen.

Please be seated.

head: Introduction of Visitors

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Airdrie-Rocky View.

MS HALEY: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. It's a great pleasure for me to be able to introduce to you and through you to the Assembly a young man who ranches with his family just outside the Coronation area. They have cattle and horses, and right now, I guess, there are some water problems out there, so there are not many cattle roaming around. Hopefully the snow will help.

He's also an educator, Mr. Speaker. He has an honours degree in philosophy along with his education degree. In the last while he's been teaching out in a small school called Byemoor in the Byemoor area. He's been teaching grades 3 to 9 math, grades 5 and 6 social studies, grades 4 to 9 phys ed, as well as computers. In his first year of teaching he was one of six Alberta teachers nominated for the first year of teaching award under the Edwin Parr award, which is an award in excellence. It shows how well rounded he is as a person, as a teacher, and as he will be as an MLA.

I'm absolutely delighted to introduce to you, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Doug Griffiths, the new MLA for Wainwright, who will be sworn in and will be able to join us down here on April 29. Just to finish that, he's accompanied by my administrative assistant, Loretta Fontana, who will be showing him around this afternoon.

Thank you.

head: Introduction of Guests

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

MR. BOUTILIER: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, it's my pleasure today to introduce through you to members of the Assembly a young man from Fort McMurray who is studying at Mount Royal College in Calgary. He has visited every constituency in this entire province of Alberta, and it's my pleasure to introduce him as the new president of PC Youth of Alberta. I would like to ask Blake Robert from Fort McMurray to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Little Bow.

MR. McFARLAND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's indeed a pleasure today to introduce, as I have for about the past nine years, a school group who left at 7 o'clock this morning to be here with us. The students and the parents that are with us today are from Hazel Cameron elementary in Vulcan. They have been up here, as I indicated, for years in the past, went to the trouble of fund-raising to get to be here, and mysteriously two days after the passage of a certain bill in this House had their school trip canceled. So today, regardless of money, regardless of the funds that they fund-raised, five of the parents and eight of the students took it upon themselves to come up as part of their social studies class to see the Legislature and take in the Alberta science centre. I would ask that the five adults that I will now introduce – Mrs. Deb Hyslip, Mrs. Debra Wyatt, Mrs. Janice McCallum-Campbell, Mrs. Louise Markert, Mrs. Jane Machacek – and the eight wonderful students from grade 6 at Hazel Cameron elementary, who are in the public gallery, receive the warm welcome of this Assembly and our thanks for coming up here.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a real privilege today to stand and introduce through you to the members of the Legislature a young man that's become involved in politics. He's attending his first question period. He's a student at Grant MacEwan College, but he's very active in the Redwater constituency and has just been elected as a director of the Alberta Young Liberals. His name is David Cournoyer, and I'd ask David to stand and receive the warm welcome of the House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

MR. AMERY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's indeed a pleasure to rise today and introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly a guest from Lebanon who happens to be a former teacher of mine. Mr. Sayah is here with his wife, Mrs. Sayah, to attend the graduation ceremony of their son Dr. Sayah, who just graduated from the University of Alberta with a PhD in chemistry. Along with Mr. Sayah, Mrs. Sayah, and Dr. Sayah is a relative of mine who is a well-known Edmontonian, Mr. Kelly Tarrabain. They're all in the public gallery, and I would ask them to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

head: Oral Question Period

THE SPEAKER: First Official Opposition main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Swan Hills Waste Treatment Facility

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Premier confirmed that Alberta taxpayers now own the Swan Hills waste treatment plant, a plant that was previously owned 100 percent by a private company. The terms of the Financial Administration Act are very clear. Before getting back into the business of being in business, the government must bring the deal before the Assembly. My questions are to the Premier. Why has the government failed to comply with the letter and spirit of the Financial Administration Act?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm sure that we have abided by the spirit and the intent of the Financial Administration Act. I guess this whole matter could be dealt with as a subjective matter. I consider the plant and many others consider the plant to be a utility, although we try to find a way to operate it in concert with the private sector as efficiently and as effectively as we possibly can. The simple fact is that there is garbage to burn, very, very dangerous garbage, to get rid of, to destroy, to completely kill, and that's what this plant does.

Mr. Speaker, there is a cost to garbage. This hon. member in the city of Lethbridge pays municipal taxes – taxes – to have his garbage collected and taken to a landfill site. [interjection] Absolutely. Everyone in this room does the same thing. The problem with toxic waste – and it was identified – was that there was no process other than to gather this waste, put it in containers, and ship it someplace else. So in 1984 it was decided that Alberta would look after its own waste. It would set up a process, a plant to deal with toxic, dangerous, dirty waste. I look at that plant, the Swan Hills plant, as a utility to save and protect the environment.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's still owned by the government.

Will the Premier commit to bringing the Swan Hills deal before this House for full public debate, as required by the Financial Administration Act? We have to have that public debate to comply with the law.

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe that I addressed that question yesterday when I indicated to the hon. member that if he wishes to submit a motion for a return outlining the kind of information he wishes to receive relative to the finances of the Swan Hills waste treatment plant, then I would invite him to put forward such a motion.

DR. NICOL: Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was asking for the financial information. Today I'm asking for the government to comply with the law. Will you bring that purchase back to this House so that we can debate it according to the Financial Administration Act? Follow our own law.

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, we took it back. Relative to the intricacies of the sale or the acquisition or the reacquisition, I will have the hon. Finance minister and the hon. Minister of Infrastructure respond.

MRS. NELSON: Mr. Speaker, when we entered into the arrangement to deal with hazardous wastes in the province of Alberta, we were on the frontiers in this area, and we were going out into a new venture that would deal with something that had never been dealt with in North America before. So to put forward a facility of this nature was breaking ground in every respect. When we made the deal for someone else to operate and take over the facility, there was a clause in the agreement that always anticipated that there had to be a relation back, if there were difficulties, to the Crown, because it was the Crown's initiative originally to move into this arena. So there is no conflict with the Financial Administration Act, because this was always part of the original agreement, and that's where it came back to the Crown.

Now, once again, let's be very clear: this is the only facility of its kind in North America. When someone talks about the financial burden of this facility, let me tell you very clearly that in a province like this, that deals with the type of development we have in the province of Alberta and the intense capital development that has taken place in this province, if we did not have the ability to dispose of hazardous waste right in our own backyard, we would experience far greater financial difficulties than anyone could well imagine, because there isn't another facility in North America. So this actually saves us money.

THE SPEAKER: The second Official Opposition main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

MS CARLSON: Point of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: Point of privilege. Okay.

Tools Deduction Legislation

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last year Members of this Legislative Assembly passed a bill that would provide tax savings for tradespeople. Now likely thousands of tradespeople are finding that as they do their taxes, there is no such tax credit on this year's tax form. The government has decided not to proclaim the bill which would make it the law. My question is to the Premier. How many hardworking Albertans are being declined a tax cut that they were expecting this year because that bill hasn't been proclaimed?

MR. KLEIN: I'll have the hon. Minister of Finance respond.

MRS. NELSON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm sorry; I didn't hear the full gist of the question, but I understand that it had to do with the trades tax bill that was put forward last spring. The hon. member is quite correct that it has not been proclaimed. We're still assessing that bill, and when we're ready, we'll move forward.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the Minister of Finance: is the reason it hasn't been proclaimed this year because you needed the revenue to balance the budget rather than give the tax cut that you promised?

MRS. NELSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, when you put forward legislation, you have to do an assessment on the impact of it, and we clearly have been in that process, so we're not in a position to move forward at this point.

DR. NICOL: The House committed to providing this tax cut. Why is it, when they made that commitment almost a year ago, that the people who benefit from it haven't been given the opportunity to exercise that option? They need to be able to count on using bills that are passed in this House. To the Minister of Finance.

MRS. NELSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe that our whip has corrected me and informed me that the bill was actually passed in November, so it hasn't been proclaimed as yet. I think Albertans expect us to take the time to evaluate these situations before we move forward on them, and that's the process we're in.

THE SPEAKER: Third Official Opposition main question. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Teachers' Withdrawal of Voluntary Services

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As a result of Bill 12 many schools in the province are in turmoil. Students are disappointed, teachers are disheartened, and parents are frustrated. My questions are to the Minister of Learning. To restore extracurricular activities in schools, will the minister (a) call the president of the ATA to work out a solution, (b) widen the arbitration to include all the issues in the dispute, or (c) do nothing?

DR. OBERG: I'll take (a).

DR. MASSEY: To avoid frustrated parents withdrawing volunteer services in schools in support of teachers, will the minister (a) provide boards with money to negotiate fair settlements, (b) provide school boards with resources to reduce class sizes, or (c) do nothing?

DR. OBERG: I've already taken (a).

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you. My third question to the minister: to heal the rift between the teachers and the department, will the minister (a) amend Bill 12, (b) speak to the teachers' general meeting next month, or (c) do nothing?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

DR. OBERG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd love to take (b), but they told me I couldn't come to the meeting.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader of the third party.

Bill 12, Education Services Settlement Act

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Frederick B. Henry, the Roman Catholic bishop of Calgary, has released a pastoral letter criticizing Bill 12. The pastoral letter, copies of which I will be tabling at the earliest opportunity, condemns Bill 12 in the strongest possible terms. My questions are to the Premier. Why did the government enact the legislation that Bishop Frederick Henry describes as "so punitive and insensitive that it will take a herculean effort to revive teacher morale and repair the damage it leaves in its wake"?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I guess Bishop Henry is entitled to his opinion. The way he outlines it is:

The President of the . . . (ATA) meets with the Premier and seemingly achieves through a direct meeting with the Premier what the ATA had not been able to get at the negotiating table, i.e. arbitration of all outstanding issues.

That is not true. Bishop Henry was not at the meeting. I know exactly what happened. Notes were taken. I'll be glad to provide Bishop Henry with those notes. There was agreement on a process for arbitration.

Then he says:

Within days the Alberta School Boards Association . . . meets with the Premier and persuasively argues for the exclusion of any consideration of classroom conditions and the limitation of wage increases according to a board's ability to pay.

There was no persuasive argument for the exclusion of anything. There was a straightforward, down-to-earth discussion with the ASBA. It stands to reason, if I'm going to meet with the ATA, that I would meet with the other side.

Then it goes on to make the assertion, uninformed, that "the Premier either spins or reneges on the agreement with the ATA." That is absolutely false, and for a man of the cloth to make that kind of statement is wrong. It is fundamentally wrong.

Now, relative to the issue: how many Catholics are in this caucus?

AN HON. MEMBER: Quite a few.

MR. KLEIN: Okay. Do you agree with the assertions of Bishop Henry?

SOME HON. MEMBERS: No.

MR. KLEIN: No. Well, then, that answers your question.

THE SPEAKER: The Minister of Learning.

DR. OBERG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will add to what the Premier has already stated. We will be addressing a letter back to Bishop Henry, explaining what is wrong with his letter. It will also be CCed to the Alberta Catholic School Trustees' Association and Archbishop Collins in Edmonton. I will be demanding that he send this letter to the parishioners that he distributed his letter to.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My second question to the Premier: why did the government enact this divisive and one-sided legislation, that the Roman Catholic bishop of Calgary describes as pitting the Alberta Teachers' Association and the Alberta School Boards Association against one another, all the while ensuring that the government's underfunding of education continues unabated?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again, the bishop is entitled to his opinion. I don't agree with his opinion in any way, shape, or form. That's exactly what it is, because he said, "Many of you have been asking for my reaction," which I take as a synonym for opinion, "on Bill 12. Now that we have concluded our Holy Week observance, I am prepared to offer a few reflections for your consideration." Reflections, opinions – opinions that, by the way, are not shared by any of the Catholics in this caucus and certainly are not shared by me.

THE SPEAKER: The Minister of Economic Development to supplement this answer?

MR. NORRIS: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have to rise as a devout Catholic all my life . . .

THE SPEAKER: No, please.
The hon. leader.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final supplementary to the Premier: why did the government enact this legislation that the bishop of Calgary says unfairly excludes from arbitration issues like pupil/teacher ratios, which certainly impact the workplace?

MR. KLEIN: Again, Bishop Henry doesn't obviously understand the complexities of this particular issue. One size does not fit all, Mr. Speaker, and there needs to be a long-term, detailed examination of this whole issue of pupil/teacher ratios, of sparsity and distance, of special-needs kids. A plethora of issues need to be examined in a straightforward and honest, open manner, and we need to take some time. By the way, I invite Bishop Henry: Bishop Henry, please, in the spirit of God and the Catholic church, will you participate with us to come to grips with what we do to make education sustainable rather than sending out these kinds of missives based on misinformation?

THE SPEAKER: To the Minister of Economic Development: if there was a point of privilege and the Minister of Economic Development would like to rise at the conclusion of question period, I would recognize him for such.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenarry.

Anthony Henday Drive and Deerfoot Trail

MR. McCLELLAND: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Over recent weeks there has been much public speculation as to the construction schedule of both the Deerfoot Trail and Anthony Henday Drive. I'm wondering if the Minister of Transportation would set us straight on exactly what is happening concerning the construction timetable of the Anthony Henday and of the Deerfoot Trail?

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. STELMACH: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. In response to the question, the schedule for the Anthony Henday, which is part of the north/south trade corridor, is to have the Anthony Henday open to traffic by 2006. It will not be fully completed by 2006 because there will be a few interchanges to go in, but it will be open to traffic by 2006. The reason we'd like to expedite that is to work in co-operation with the city of Edmonton. The city has a number of major projects, as well, that will tie into the Anthony Henday. One of them is on Whitemud Drive. So once Anthony Henday is open to traffic, then they can start with their project on the Quesnell Bridge, I believe, and another project on Whitemud.

With respect to the Deerfoot extension, the bridge over the Bow and the Dunbow interchange are nearing completion. They'll be completed this construction season, and we will cap all of the grade. So then there's just a small area of the Deerfoot extension that isn't completed yet, but we've heard that the negotiations are now complete between the city of Calgary and CARMA. So that project will proceed. I'm not quite sure if they will be able to do it and start it in 2002, but certainly by 2003 we'd like to see that completed, the Deerfoot extension. The interchanges on the Deerfoot: we will expedite and try and do them as quickly as possible and ensure that all of them are done within a reasonable time frame.

MR. McCLELLAND: With regard to the Anthony Henday and the Whitemud freeway, why would we build the Anthony Henday without interchanges if building the Anthony Henday with interchanges would negate the necessity of widening the freeway?

MR. STELMACH: What we want to do is ensure that the Anthony Henday is open to traffic. The interchanges will be built, again, in co-operation with the city, because they have to move a fair amount of traffic, and they won't have a road to do it once they start their project on the Whitemud.

MR. McCLELLAND: Now to the same minister the really difficult question: who's going to pay for what?

MR. STELMACH: The Deerfoot and the Anthony Henday are fully the responsibility of the government of Alberta. We've also assumed full responsibility for the maintenance on the Deerfoot, and we will do the same on the Anthony Henday as part of the north/south trade corridor. The full cost of the construction will be borne by the province of Alberta.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry, followed by the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Calmar.

Children with Special Needs

MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. During question period on March 6 the Leader of the Official Opposition told the ministers of both Learning and Children's Services about a mother whose autistic child needs intensive behavioural intervention. Like many other parents this mother has been told by the Child Welfare Appeal Panel that her case is not in its jurisdiction, which means that her child has been denied the appropriate support. The Leader of the Official Opposition also wrote a letter to the ministers of Children's Services and Learning to ask whose jurisdiction it is to address this case. To the Minister of Children's Services: why in over a month has the minister not responded to either a question or a written letter so that this mother of this child gets the help she needs?

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, we have actually been putting together the terms of reference with the expert panel and only this past week appointed a chairman. That has not been announced yet, but I can certainly announce today that Dr. Margaret Clarke has agreed to chair the expert panel. The information has been provided to the families, to the best of my knowledge, that we will be reviewing not only the programs for autism but all of the strategies for intensive behavioral interventions. There will actually be a thorough review.

And if I may take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House I advised that in terms of children who are receiving supports, resources for children with disabilities, the budget figure has increased from $55 million to $62 million. We are in fact providing more funds. Should there be some failure for this communication to reach the hon. member opposite, I apologize and will look into that. But clearly we have been advancing the case of children with special needs. It has taken some time because we were looking for some very well-placed people, knowledgeable in the industry but able to provide a thorough degree of input in our assessments, so that we can do this job properly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the Minister of Learning: why in over a month has the minister not responded either to a question or a written letter so that the mother of this child gets the help she needs?

DR. OBERG: Thanks. I believe that the Minister of Children's Services has just answered that question.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member for Drayton Valley-Calmar, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Diploma Exams

REV. ABBOTT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have received some calls from several members of my constituency, including students who are concerned about the upcoming diploma exams. Some who are writing the tests next week are concerned that the written sections of the biology and social studies exams have been removed, saying that this will not be as fair an assessment compared to last exams because they are better at the written portion of exams. Now, I've also heard from other students who say that these multiple-choice only tests will be easier and, therefore, are not fair to past writers. My questions are to the Minister of Learning. Why have these adjustments been made, and how will they affect students' marks?

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much for that excellent question. First of all and very briefly, the reason these adjustments have been made is because we had a very difficult time arranging for markers due to the Alberta Teachers' Association boycott of the Department of Learning. Mr. Speaker, what we have chosen to do is take out the written portion of the biology 30 and social 30 examinations – this accounted for roughly 30 percent of the exam – and we have replaced that with multiple-choice for the April examinations. The people in my department are one hundred percent excellent exam writers. They have been doing this for a long time, and they have assured me that these exams, for those people who are wondering, will be just as tough, will not be easy. I feel that it is something that, unfortunately, we have to do. Diploma exams are necessary. If the ATA had not withdrawn their services, we wouldn't be doing this.

REV. ABBOTT: Well, as the Alberta Teachers' Association has encouraged teachers to withdraw their services from marking provincial exams, then who will mark the April diploma exams?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, in every discipline other than English 30 they will be mechanically marked, meaning that on the multiple-choice exams the marking will be done through a computer. For English 30 exams we do have roughly 50 to 60 exam markers who have qualified with our certification, and these are the people, whether they're from our department, whether they're from outside – we have some retired teachers; we have some PhDs from the universities – who have consented to mark. I even understand that there are some people in this very Legislature who are teachers who have consented to mark. I think that that's extremely important, and we are going to get through this. I continue to hope that we can go back to the situation we had which made us the number one jurisdiction in the world, the number one public education jurisdiction in the world, and I continue to hope that we go back to that.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

REV. ABBOTT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My second supplemental – and it's very important – to the same minister: considering the changes to the biology and social studies exams, will Alberta postsecondary institutions be accepting the grades from these exams?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, we have made contact with 18 of the provincial institutions, colleges and universities, and each one of these 18 institutions will be accepting the exams. We have not made contact with the four private university colleges yet. However, we anticipate that that will be occurring within a day or two. The quick answer to your question is, yes, they will be accepting them.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview, followed by the hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ambulance Services

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's been almost one year since the committee reviewing ambulance service was created. According to internal government documents, its report is already completed and its recommendations have been forwarded to the relevant ministers. My questions are to the Minister of Health and Wellness. How much longer must Albertans wait for this report?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, the report prepared by the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo is an extensive one, and it does require some amount of effort for the three ministries that are affected by the recommendations in the report to deal with it. Those three departments are the Department of Human Resources and Employment, the Department of Municipal Affairs, and of course the Department of Health and Wellness.

We are in the process of examining it. There are some difficult issues to deal with because there is a patchwork of ambulance services across this province. Part of the difficulty is that some municipalities provide an excellent ambulance service and others don't provide any at all. One of the challenges, Mr. Speaker, will be how to ensure that whatever changes we make preserve the best of what we have and improve those areas where we are lacking.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can't imagine why the report has to be kept secret in the process.

Is the government prepared to act on the report's recommendation that ambulance services be funded provincially?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, indirectly now they are, through grants to municipalities. Municipalities make the decisions as to what services they provide. To the best of my recollection – and perhaps I can be supplemented by the Minister of Municipal Affairs – the total bill that is covered by municipalities for ambulance services is in the range of $40 million.

MR. BOUTILIER: Mr. Speaker, I would also like to indicate that in speaking to the Member for Calgary-Buffalo and also the Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake, one thing was for certain: they have spent so much time traveling this province consulting with our municipal stakeholders on this very important issue.

DR. TAFT: Well, I'm delighted they've done that. Why don't they release the report?

What is the government's position on the report's recommendation that ambulance services be subject to compulsory arbitration?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, having not gone through the entire process of formulating our response to recommendations in the report, I can only say that the report has been well prepared. A great deal of work has been put into it, a great deal of effort by the members for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake and *Calgary-*Buffalo but also by many stakeholders throughout the province. Much work has gone into this, but we have not yet formulated our response to the recommendations, so I cannot reply to that particular request of the hon. member.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for St. Albert, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Provincial Water Strategy

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. People in my constituency are raising concerns about some of the recent media reports from Saskatchewan as well as from our own Minister of Environment that one possible way to better manage the safety and sustainability of our water supply is to increase the price people pay for water licences and water usage. My question is to the Minister of Environment. Is the province considering any policy which would substantially increase the price of water in Alberta?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

DR. TAYLOR: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, the simple answer to that is no, but I would just comment a little further and say that right now when people pay their water bills, whether they're for irrigation or in the city, they typically pay a conveyance fee. It's a conveyance fee to get the water to their house or to their irrigation farm. It is not a price on water. Typically, there is no price on water at the present time. So that answer still remains no.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, we have this water strategy that has been quite successful in attracting comment and discussion at a number of public meetings around the province. In fact, we originally scheduled 12 meetings. We've now had to schedule up to 15 meetings due to the demand for these. One of the issues that has been raised by people at these meetings – it's not government policy – is that one could encourage conservation by putting some kind of price on water, but that's being raised by the public who are attending these meetings. This is not a government policy.

MRS. O'NEILL: While I understand that we're currently involved in the process of developing a provincial water strategy, is there currently any situation in the province where water is bought and sold like any other commodity?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

DR. TAYLOR: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Last year in the irrigation districts there was a trading of water, if I can call it that. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the irrigation districts, such as St. Mary, are granted one licence, and then they manage that licence inside the district.

To grow potatoes you need roughly 20 inches of water. Well, last year, for instance, St. Mary could only provide you 10 inches and me 10 inches, so what they would do is I would come to you, Mr. Speaker, and say, "Can I buy your 10 inches of water from you so that I can grow potatoes and you can grow a dryland crop?" You would kindly agree to that because of your kind nature, and then water traded in our area for up to $150 an acre.

MRS. O'NEILL: Well, if water is treated essentially as a commodity in irrigation districts and through water co-operatives, what is to prevent this practice from leading to water exports or the buying and selling of water to the U.S. or other countries?

DR. TAYLOR: Simply put, Mr. Speaker, we have a law in Alberta that prevents the selling of water outside Alberta. It would be impossible for us to do. There's a law against that.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

Calling Lake Fishing Zones

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Official Opposition is on the record in several debates over many years demanding that the government take responsibility for fish stocks. Not surprisingly, at the 11th hour they are now making some attempt at action. The recently announced plan is for Calling Lake to be divided into fishing zones, with fishing being permitted only in the south end of the lake. This is quite typical of this government's policy: lofty goals but short on details. My questions are to the Minister of Sustainable Resource Development. Who is going to paint the line on the water so anglers know when they are in the north half of the lake and when they are in the south half? How can this ever possibly be enforced?

MR. CARDINAL: Of course, Mr. Speaker, only the Liberals would see something that negative in the very positive, innovative process that we are looking at. We know that there is a lot of pressure on the fish stocks in Alberta. We have only a thousand lakes that are fish-bearing lakes. We have 800 commercial fishermen that fish over 34,000 100-yard nets, and that is very hard to manage.

MR. CARDINAL: Thirty-four thousand 100-yard nets. It's a $5 million industry.

Then, on the other hand, we have the sports fishing industry, which licenses over 300,000 fishermen. That's a $350 million industry. Our economy is growing. Our population is growing. The demand is getting greater for our fish stocks, and we need to be very innovative in how we manage our lakes.

The specific project in Calling Lake is new and innovative. We're looking at how we can protect and enhance natural spawning grounds instead of depending on the fish hatcheries that are there. Although the fish hatcheries are doing a good job also, we feel that natural spawning grounds are probably the ideal way to enhance the fish stocks in those lakes, and that's exactly what Calling Lake is about.

At the suggestion of some commercial fishermen that are elders in the area to look at an innovative way of closing a portion of the lake by marking at the shorelines where the closure will take place and where it's going to be open – Mr. Speaker, it's an innovative way where natural spawning and stocking will take place. It's a good area also for nesting grounds for birds. Ducks Unlimited, in fact, yesterday said that they were fully supportive of that particular plan.

MS CARLSON: Mr. Speaker, this minister's own biologists don't agree with this plan. Why is he going ahead with it when his own technical staff tell him that it can't work?

MR. CARDINAL: Well, Mr. Speaker, we have over 2,000 staff in my department, and they do a heck of a job in managing our resources. Because there's some much pressure on our natural resources in the area of fisheries now, we have to be more innovative. It's something that hasn't been tried, but I know that the process has been tried in other jurisdictions, probably not in the inland lakes. Therefore, this plan will work.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell us how many staff will be working to enforce and monitor this plan?

MR. CARDINAL: Mr. Speaker, of course, we are restructuring in our department, and we have over 100 conservation officers that can monitor this process. It's not a problem.

One thing to keep in mind. With these new processes in place, Albertans themselves will monitor the process. In fact, more than 99 percent of Albertans, I believe, are very, very honest. They wouldn't purposely break the law. They will no doubt follow what we've laid out.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands, followed by the Member for Red Deer-North.

Low-income Programs Review

MR. MASON: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. The minister of human resources has been sitting on the report and recommendations of the low-income programs review since last October. He's been promising to make them public almost as long. Implementing the approved recommendations from this review is a key strategy identified in the ministry's business plan. My question is to the Minister of Human Resources and Employment. Why does the minister continue to suppress the report and recommendations of the low-income programs review, especially in light of his repeated promises to make them public?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. DUNFORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The MLA committee that was placed in charge of this exercise chaired by the MLA for Edmonton-Castle Downs did an excellent, excellent job, a very extensive review into all of the situations as they deal with low-income supports to Albertans, and has put together two reports. The first report is entitled What We Heard. Of course, upon its release that will provide, then, the opportunity for feedback to all of those various groups that did provide input. I understand that it was something like 6,500 Albertans who provided input, so it'll be very important for Albertans to see that the kinds of things that they had to say were in fact reported.

The second report is entitled What We Recommend. That is now the recommendation of that five-person MLA group. Again it'll be my responsibility to make sure, then, that we provide a government response to the recommendations of those reports.

The member is probably aware that there's an internal process that any minister of this government must go through. We are presently involved in the various stages of that internal process, and the member and other Albertans will see the reports imminently.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MASON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. How does the minister, then, expect this House to debate his budget estimates, which include the business plan, which includes reference to these reports, if we have not yet seen the report? How are we supposed to do that this afternoon, Mr. Minister?

MR. DUNFORD: Oh, I'm sure they'll find a way. We'll make sure that we provide as much information as we possibly can in terms of the questions that individual members might want to raise, and certainly as a minister I'll feel obligated to try to provide you with as much information as I can. Of course, at this point I'm not in a position to table those two reports.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MASON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a breathtaking disregard for the rights of this Assembly. What possible explanation can there be for this government's failure to publicly release the recommendations of the low-income programs review other than that the government has obviously decided to do squat for low-income people in Alberta and they want to keep that a secret as long as possible?

MR. DUNFORD: I think that on the floor of this House it's quite appropriate for members to speculate in whatever manner they wish. Again, I think we would revert to the situation of 6,500 Albertans who in fact took the time to make comments about the low-income support system that we have here in Alberta, which by the way, Mr. Speaker, is very extensive. In fact, we have some areas of support for low-income Albertans that are the . . . [interjections]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister has the floor.

MR. DUNFORD: Well, I'm sure the hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona in his time at university dealing with classes, when he tried to provide information, tried to provide some education, probably got interrupted a time or two as well, and of course the situation is happening here again today.

But a very extensive report, excellent recommendations, a process to be going through, and that's exactly what I'm doing. Now, I was designated, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon. Had they really shown the concern that they wanted to make sure that the report was there, I have answered in question period previously that the release of those reports was imminent. There is a long period of time allowed for the debate of the estimates. You could have just as easily put me off for two weeks, but I'm here today and I'm prepared to stand in front of anybody in this House and defend the estimates, because what we're doing for low-income Albertans is right and it is proper.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Red Deer-North, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Violent Offenders

MRS. JABLONSKI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Sending violent offenders to jail for a period of time while their victims suffer a lifetime of physical and mental damage does not balance the scales of justice. The taxpayer is also a victim when they're required to pay for the offender's unproductive time while in jail and for the medical costs of the victim. My question is for the Minister of Justice. Should violent offenders be made to pay financially through some mechanism for their victims who suffer so badly that they become dependent on health care for a period of time or even for a lifetime?

MR. HANCOCK: Well, Mr. Speaker, under the Criminal Code there are provisions for offenders to pay restitution to victims of their crimes. Most often that's used in the area of property offences, but it can also be used in cases of bodily harm if that bodily harm and the damages caused can be ascertained easily. In addition, of course there are civil remedies that people have available to them, but that's not usually that productive because, I would hazard a guess, in most cases where serious and violent crimes occur, the people that are incarcerated have few resources and certainly don't have any income available to them while they're in jail.

Now, it's important to point out, however, that we do have in Alberta a great program operated by the Solicitor General, and she may wish to comment on our victims of crime fund which victims of crime can apply to for compensation. The money that goes into that fund of course comes from the surcharge on fines and penalties that are assessed. I know that's being reviewed, and the Solicitor General may want to supplement. Of course, she has also indicated that she is reviewing corrections services, and there may be some provision there for having offenders in our jails at least work and earn an income. But I think the biggest problem with the concept, while it might be an appropriate concept, is that prisoners would have to have resources in order to compensate victims, and too often that's not the case.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Red Deer-North.

MRS. JABLONSKI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question refers more to the restitution to the taxpayer rather than to the victim, so my supplemental is: does retribution for a crime served through jail time paid for by the taxpayer while offenders are not required to pay any maintenance for their victims result in a fair and equitable justice system?

MR. HANCOCK: Well, there are many aspects, Mr. Speaker, to the concept of justice, and while we may be straying into the area of opinion here, in terms of policy it is our policy to make our communities safer by locking up violent people and by locking up the people who commit serious and violent crimes. Now, while most often the case that those would be in federal penitentiaries because on the provincial side we only have prisoners who serve two years less a day, it still remains the same. The question is whether it's useful because the prisoners don't necessarily have the resources. If they do have the resources, in Alberta – and the hon. member will remember that last year we did pass an act in this House, the Victims Restitution and Compensation Payment Act. Under that act we do have the ability to take the proceeds of crime or to take property, with due process of the court, from a criminal and have it applied to a victim or have it go into the provincial coffers for other use, which in some small way does compensate the taxpayer for some of the activity that has happened.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MRS. JABLONSKI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, followed by the hon. Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan.

On-the-Job Training Programs

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This past January the Minister of Human Resources and Employment was made aware that over 34,000 taxpayer dollars were funneled between 1997 and the year 2000 into Wrenchmen Automotive, a business with alleged links to the Hell's Angels. The money was provided through training-on-the-job programs operated under the Canada/Alberta agreement on labour market development. The Liberal leader wisely asked the minister to conduct an investigation into this matter. All my questions are to the Minister of Human Resources and Employment this afternoon. Why do the public accounts show that in 1999 only $10,700 was provided when training-on-the-job contracts released through FOIP show that $20,460 was the amount allocated for that year?

MR. DUNFORD: I would ask the hon. member, with the information that he has for his question, to either send it over to us directly and we'll look into it, or if he wants to write a memo about it, that would be fine. We'll be glad to look into it. I, of course, don't have the information in front of me to be able to respond to the question.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister: how many other problems have been identified with money provided under the Canada/Alberta agreement on labour market development for programs that are similar to this one?

MR. DUNFORD: Well, he's asking, Mr. Speaker, about other problems. One of the things that has been ongoing within our department for quite a period of time in terms of the labour market development agreements has been working with the Auditor General in terms of the audit itself and to try to provide some management tools under the ongoing contracts. We of course have been making some strides in that area. I think that in any reasonable review of the Auditor General's reports over the last number of years that I've been responsible for this ministry, we see the acknowledgment of improvements in that particular area.

Again, in terms of his actual question, though, about the number, I sense that there's another shoe to drop here with the next supplemental question so would just simply ask him again: to provide whatever information that he is requesting, simply send us a request for that.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister: given that the Alberta Liberal leader, as I said before, wisely asked the minister to have the Auditor General conduct an investigation into this matter, when will the results of that investigation be made public?

MR. DUNFORD: Well, the hon. leader of the Liberal Party is in fact a wise person, and it's not unusual in any sense that he should ask a wise question. I suspect that there's been some benefit now due to the hon. member for having phrased the question in that particular manner.

Once again, it looks like he has some good information there, and I think we need to get the situation resolved, because we've been working very, very hard on these agreements, and we need to make sure that we're all the way home on that.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, prior to the recognition of the first of several hon. members to participate in Members' Statements, might we have unanimous consent to revert briefly to Introduction of Guests?

head: Introduction of Guests
(reversion)

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment.

MR. DUNFORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the gallery today we have a class of schoolchildren from my constituency, the Dr. Gerald Probe school. It's my understanding that there are 47 students accompanied by six parents and an undisclosed number of teachers. I would like for you and for all the Members of this Legislative Assembly to show a warm welcome to those people that we have here today from Lethbridge, Alberta.

head: Members' Statements

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Edson Atoms Edson Credit Union Canadians Edson Legion Sabres

MR. STRANG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased to say that Canada's national sport is alive and well in West Yellowhead. During the week of March 16 the Edson Atoms earned a hard-fought-for silver medal in the Sturgeon-Pembina atom B2 league playoffs in Sangudo. This medal is a tribute to their never-quit attitude and good sportsmanship.

On the same weekend the Edson Credit Union Canadians won gold in their tournament at the Sturgeon-Pembina atom B league playoffs. They were undefeated in tournament action in Linaria.

Last but not least, the Edson Legion Sabres scored the winning goal on home ice on March 24 and won the provincial midget A tournament. As a number of players will be moving on after this season, the hometown win was an added bonus for them.

The game of hockey provides our young people with the opportunity to learn and practise leadership, teamwork, and discipline. All these young people have been outstanding ambassadors for the West Yellowhead region. I am pleased that they were representing us.

I would ask all members to join me in recognizing these Alberta athletes, their volunteer coaches and managers, as well as parents, families, and friends who support them all. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

Provincial Fiscal Policies

MR. MASON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The Tory government pretends that it knows what it's doing when it comes to fiscal management. However, Tory fiscal management is just that: a game of pretend. Their philosophy is based on helping those who don't need assistance while abandoning those who do.

One needs simply to look at the recent budget fiascos to understand their style of management. Days after unilaterally breaking an agreement with Edmonton and Calgary regarding transportation spending and only after the real threat of litigation, the government magically found $155 million to make the problem go away. Days later, after poisoning relations with Alberta's teachers, the Learning minister claimed that there was not enough money in the kitty to allow ambitious grade 10 students to take as many courses as they would like. After a justified public outcry the money suddenly reappeared. In a true insult to Albertans this government conveniently doled out $4 billion in utility rebates mere months before the last election.

I don't want to give the impression, Mr. Speaker, that these were isolated slipups on the part of the government. In fact, the problem is much more entrenched. In an eight-year period the government managed to misestimate revenue by over $21 billion. This is a deliberate policy allowing the government to plead poverty in the early part of the term and to appear as financial geniuses for finding hidden surpluses year after year. By giving away $1.5 billion in tax breaks to the richest Albertans and $1 billion in tax cuts for already profitable corporations and, worst of all, by consistently underestimating revenue, this government has put important core services at risk.

When the New Democrat opposition asks about education funding, transportation funding, and support for important programs like the community lottery board, we are consistently given the same response: wait and see if oil and gas prices stay high, and then maybe we'll throw a bone to Alberta's families. Should grade 10 students check the business section of the morning paper to see whether commodity prices are high enough to pay for their education? Should Albertans plan family outings . . . [Mr. Mason's speaking time expired]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

National Wildlife Week

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Climate is Changing; Help Wildlife Weather the Storm. That is the theme of this year's national wildlife conservation week. As legislators it is very important that we take the time to consider how the policies, regulations, and laws that we discuss in this Assembly affect wildlife. We are all aware of the balancing act required in Alberta. We have a wealth of oil, gas, and forests that can and do provide immense material wealth. We also have ecosystems that can be quickly destroyed by irresponsible development, emission levels set according to profit margins, and inefficient use of water.

Alberta is also facing the challenges of the Kyoto agreement. To address climate change and help wildlife weather the storm, the government must be committed to policies that are grounded in scientific studies. We need research that takes into account baseline levels and cumulative impacts. Short-term results are important, but we must realize that industrial and commercial developments will continue to impact the environment long after we have left this Assembly.

The effects of climate change and increasing temperatures have been documented in Alberta wildlife. The increasing temperature and decreasing levels of water in our lakes and rivers are affecting fish stocks. When fish stocks decline, the ecosystem of the body of water changes, and the effects spread to birds and other animals that feed off the fish. Shorter, drier winters are also causing havoc in our forests. While some people see forest fire as only a loss of merchantable timber, there are also animals that die as a direct result of the fire or indirectly as a result of lost habitat. Alberta's fossil fuel economy has a significant impact on climate change.

It's time for investment in new technologies and new ideas. Climate change is real, and we have to accept some responsibility. The laws of this Assembly must not focus only on dollars and economic growth. Our decisions affect water levels, air quality, and wildlife habitat. National wildlife conservation week gives us an opportunity to broaden our perspective and consider more fully the impacts of our decisions.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Calmar.

Drayton Valley Thunder Junior Hockey Team

REV. ABBOTT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to recognize the solid efforts of the Drayton Valley Thunder junior hockey team, who last night defeated the Grande Prairie Storm to win the Alberta junior A hockey championships four games to zero. Led by the solid goaltending of rookie goaltender Clint Chalmers and high-scoring veterans like Jade Galbraith, the Thunder walked into Grande Prairie and beat the home team by a score of 8 to 3. Before playing Grande Prairie, Drayton Valley beat teams from Fort Saskatchewan, Sherwood Park, and Olds to earn the right to play for the championship.

As the MLA for Drayton Valley-Calmar I want to extend my best wishes and congratulations to coach Ian Kallay and all of the members of the Thunder, who have represented Drayton Valley admirably over the course of this year. The team has only been in existence for four years, and although it is comprised of players from all over the province and one from as far away as Anchorage, Alaska, our whole community of 6,000 people has taken these guys in as their own, and they have responded by bringing a championship home to Drayton Valley.

I also want to note that this past summer the Drayton Valley council agreed to join the International Association of Character Cities. Drayton Valley is the first community in Canada to join this association. Right here we have a fine example of a group of young men who have shown character and determination by winning the Alberta junior A championship, and their season isn't over, Mr. Speaker. Beginning April 19 in Drayton Valley, the Thunder will play the British Columbia junior champions in the best of seven series for the Doyle Cup. Then when they win the Doyle Cup, the team will travel to Halifax in May to compete in the national junior A championships.

I again want to congratulate everyone involved in the Thunder organization and ask all members of this Assembly to cheer them on as they do Alberta proud.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

head: Presenting Petitions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to present a petition signed by 500 Albertans requesting the Assembly to urge the government "to support the establishment of Chinchaga Wilderness as a legislated protected area."

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I would like to present a petition signed by 115 residents of Edmonton, many from the Edmonton-Highlands constituency, petitioning the Legislative Assembly "to urge the government to not delist services, raise health care premiums, introduce user fees or further privatize health care."

head: Notices of Motions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 34(2)(a) to give notice that on Monday I will move that written questions appearing on the Order Paper do stand and retain their places.

I'm also giving notice that on Monday I will move that motions for returns appearing on that day's Order Paper do also stand and retain their places.

Thank you.

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As promised earlier this afternoon, I'm tabling appropriate copies of the pastoral letter by Bishop Henry of Calgary. It's a reaction to Bill 12.

I have two other tablings, Mr. Speaker. Both of these are letters written on April 10 and addressed to the Premier. They come from Fort Macleod, one by Harry Urwin and the second one by Georgina Lawrence-Donald, both expressing grave concern about the rumours that the Fort Macleod hospital either might be closed or the services might be severely curtailed. They're appealing to the Premier to take action on it and make sure this doesn't happen.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm tabling five copies of a letter from the Edmonton Community Lottery Board addressed to the Minister of Gaming. The board is urging the minister to expeditiously process the funding applications which have fallen through the cracks, and they are identified as the Citadel Theatre, the Kenilworth facility upgrade for the ice arena, and the Edmonton Police Service for a police gym.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have three tablings this afternoon for the benefit of all hon. members of this Assembly. The first one is a notice to all Workers' Compensation Board employees on how to proceed to join a union, the Canadian Union of Public Employees. This is a meeting that's going to take place at the Inn on 7th, quite handy to the WCB headquarters.

The second tabling I have this afternoon is another proclamation, a letter regarding Bill 207, which was the Alberta Personal Income Tax (Tools Credit) Amendment Act, 2001. It is urging cabinet to have this act proclaimed immediately, and it's signed by Bill Fraser, Kevin Johnson, and several other individuals.

My third tabling this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, is copies of a petition that has been organized again by Mr. Darby Mahon of Edmonton-Gold Bar. It is a petition supporting public and separate schoolteachers in their long, extended contract negotiations with their provincial government.

Thank you very much.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have, with your permission, two tablings this afternoon. The first is a letter from Joanne Cuthbertson in Calgary-Currie to the Premier indicating her concern with the cynicism that's growing among Alberta parents with children in public schools based on the lack of government action to resolve the issues that face public schools.

The second is five copies of a subsequent letter from Joanne Cuthbertson to the Premier indicating her dissatisfaction with the circumstances that continue for our children and their families and teachers in Alberta schools.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the Leader of the Official Opposition I would like to table the appropriate number of copies of a petition supporting services to persons with developmental disabilities in Alberta signed by 60 people who live in Calgary and other parts of southern Alberta.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have a number of tablings today. I'll go through as quickly as I can. The first is a letter from John Reid of Calgary directed towards the Premier regarding the dissolution of the community lottery boards. He notes: "Not only is the Alberta Foundation for the Arts underfunded . . . now the government deletes this other positive program that at least allows non-profits to buy hard cost items."

The next tabling is from Shauna Kennedy, also of Calgary, directed to the Member for Calgary-Buffalo. She asks him "to take immediate action to help reverse the decision to do away with the [community lottery boards]. They are vital to the survival of the many organizations, including EMMEDIA," all contributing to the Alberta advantage.

The next is a letter that's directed to the Alberta Council on Aging from Edwin and Chris Callaghan. They note that the recent elimination of the extended health benefits for seniors wasn't much, but it helped reduce their bills, and this is going to leave them without any resources.

I have the correct number of brochures from the Candora Society of Edmonton, who spoke at the rally today for the community lottery boards. Candora stands for Can Do in Rundle and Abbottsfield. These are communities in Edmonton.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to table five copies of a media release from the Edmonton Community Lottery Board announcing the dissolution of their board effective May 31 and regretting the withdrawal of the program.

Thank you very much.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have one tabling today, and it's done with permission. It's a letter from a constituent who is a tax adviser, and it comes with attachments expressing serious concern about public confusion over Bill 207, the Alberta Personal Income Tax (Tools Credit) Amendment Act, 2001.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to table today a letter addressed to me from Mrs. Joan Trettler, who is the chair of the board of trustees of St. Albert Protestant schools, in which she asked me to table this letter with respect to the concern around Bill 12.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Economic Development.

MR. NORRIS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On this glorious Alberta day I rise to table the appropriate number of copies of excerpts of a speech yesterday from the president of IBM Canada, who has chosen Edmonton and Alberta to set up their e-business. I'd like to read a small excerpt of why they made that decision: what stands out is the many ways in which . . .

THE SPEAKER: Hon. minister, if you're tabling it, there's really no need to read anything. All members will have a copy.

Thank you.

MR. NORRIS: I will table it because they chose Alberta because of the positive business environment.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Little Bow.

MR. McFARLAND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to table the appropriate number of copies of a letter received from one of my constituents, Angie Stober. She outlines her unequivocal support for the government's position on dealing with the pending arbitration process. Interesting reading.

head: Projected Government Business

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Official Opposition House Leader.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We would ask that the government share next week's projected government business with us at this time.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As all members will know, we will continue throughout next week in Committee of Supply, but to be more specific: Monday at 9 p.m. under Government Bills and Orders Government Motion 23 with respect to the confirmation of the appointment of the Auditor General; then under second reading bills 22, 16, and 20; Committee of the Whole, Bill 11; and as per the Order Paper.

On Tuesday, April 16, in the afternoon under Government Bills and Orders in Committee of Supply the main estimates of Sustainable Resource Development will be considered, and then at 8 p.m. under Government Bills and Orders in Committee of Supply the main estimates of Infrastructure. Time permitting, Bill 23, Bill 16, Bill 20, and others as per the Order Paper may be considered.

On Wednesday, April 17, under Government Bills and Orders in the afternoon, day 11 of 24 of Committee of Supply, with the Department of Energy being considered. At 8 p.m. under Government Bills and Orders, again in Committee of Supply, the main estimates of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development. Time permitting, second readings of bills 21, 23, 24, 25, and as per the Order Paper.

On Thursday, April 18, in the afternoon under Government Bills and Orders, day 13 of Committee of Supply main estimates, with the Department of Environment presenting their estimates and thereafter as per the Order Paper.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, the chair was advised earlier this afternoon, as all hon. members will appreciate, that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie wishes to rise on a purported question of privilege. Hon. members might follow under Standing Order 15.

Privilege

Contempt of the Assembly

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am rising on a point of privilege this afternoon against the Minister of Finance and the Premier under Standing Order 15. More specifically, we believe that a contempt of the Assembly has occurred by the Minister of Finance because she was responsible for the Financial Administration Act and by the Premier because as President of Executive Council he is ultimately responsible for noncompliance with legislation. He has also exhibited full knowledge of this noncompliance over the past two days of questions to him on the Swan Hills waste treatment plant. The contempt that we will be discussing is a breach of the Financial Administration Act, specifically section 42, with regard to the operation of the Swan Hills waste treatment plant.

The Financial Administration Act in section 42(2) states that the government may not purchase shares or enter into a joint venture or partnership unless that transaction is specifically authorized by an act or a subsisting regulation that was in force before the commencement of that section. We have seen no regulations come through, nor has the Premier or the Finance minister referred to those in any questions asked of them. Shares include "any equity . . . or interest in the capital, property, profits or earnings of a corporation."

The Special Waste Management Corporation Act was repealed in 1997, and under the Interpretation Act a bylaw is not considered to be a regulation. In dealing with this point of privilege, there may be some discussion about a bylaw giving them an exemption from bringing this deal before the House, but according to the Interpretation Act a bylaw is not the same as a regulation, so this particular loophole does not apply in this particular case. The government is also prohibited under section 42 of the Financial Administration Act from bringing an appropriation bill or estimate that would involve the Crown entering into a joint venture or share transaction unless the transaction is authorized by the act. We'll see that in the last two years of budget estimates it has occurred where there have been line items speaking to dollars in the act.

We've heard arguments over time by the Premier saying that there is nothing he can do about the amount of money required to pay down the debt each year because it is written in law. Well, the Financial Administration Act is also law. In section 42 it states that before getting back into the business of being in business, the deal must be brought to the Assembly for full debate.

We have included in our package both to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Government House Leader a great deal of information laying out the history of this plant and instances that we believe justify that this breach has occurred going back as far as the year 2000 in October. There's a press release in here talking about reaction to Bovar's announcement for the plant that would be given back to the government for $1. It's our opinion that when that transaction occurred, we saw the first breach happen.

We asked for independent audits. We talked about at least $442 million in Swan Hill losses. We gave the government other options for dealing with the hazardous waste treatment plant; specifically, seven of them. In Hansard of last year, in May of 2002, we again raised questions about this and the finances of the Swan Hills plant, and we asked for information to a written question, which was then denied to us by the Minister of Sustainable Resource Development.

There have been recent articles in the newspaper about this particular facility being back in the business. Specifically, as part of a budget of tough choices, the government has chosen to include $26 million for operating expenses and $2 million for capital investment in this plant. Clearly a breach under the act. Articles in newspapers have attributed the following information from the spokesperson for Alberta Infrastructure, David Bray: that the government would not release quarterly figures for the plant and that the government does not have an obligation to release information because the plant was privately owned for a number of years. These are indications that the government is now back in the business, which has been also confirmed by the Premier in his responses to questions yesterday. Any losses or profits resulting from this are borne by the taxpayers, and they have a right to full disclosure in terms of what's happening and a right to decide what has happened.

We see the annual report for 2000 stating that despite significant cost reductions and the campaigning of the Swan Hills Treatment Centre, there was not sufficient hazardous waste flowing to the centre to maintain it as a viable operation. They go on to talk about how waste is handled and that the facility operated on an as-needed basis, further evidence of the need for a full debate of the issue so that the people of the province can decide if the government should participate in this business in accordance with the act under discussion.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, our key points are that the financial viability of this plant has long been in question; Albertans are split on the issue. The government has resisted attempts of the Official Opposition to obtain information about this operation, having said several times, on one hand, that they would provide it and then denying it. Taxpayers are already into this deal for over $500 million including cleanup costs. It is our role as Official Opposition to examine government operations and policies and offer alternatives. Without full disclosure we cannot perform our elected function. The responsibility of the Premier is to uphold his own laws, which means, in this particular case, bringing the choice for this decision, to be in business or not to be in business to operate this plant, before the Legislature so that we can have full and open debate and so that the people of the province actually know what is occurring and can participate on a fully informed basis, where they can let their views be known to all of us.

The Minister of Finance as the minister responsible for the Financial Administration Act has a responsibility to bring this forward. We believe that the terms of the Financial Administration Act are clear in this regard.

The Special Waste Management Corporation Act was repealed in 1997, so we believe that a breach has occurred twice: once when the government took back ownership from Bovar and again when they went into an agreement with Sensor Environmental to operate this and to continue to fund this plant in this province. They've tried to consider some corporation bylaws as regulations in this case. We believe that under the Interpretation Act the bylaw is not considered a regulation. Under section 42(3) the government is also prohibited from bringing in an appropriation bill or estimate that would involve the Crown entering into a joint venture or shared transaction unless the transaction is authorized by an act. For two years now there have been line items in the Infrastructure budget for the operation of the plant, and I refer you specifically to this year's budget, program 2.1.12. These line items were not present when Bovar had 100 percent control over the plant. The reappearance of this budget item indicates that the government is back in the business of being in business.

Lastly, I would refer to a statement made by the Premier in 1996 regarding the spirit of the act, where he stated:

We're tying our hands . . . because [this] government is now out of the business . . . of loans, guarantees, and investments to business, period . . . From now on if any of these kinds of deals are to be made, they must be made right here in the Legislature and before the eyes of the public.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. Government House Leader, as the details of this point of privilege have just begun to unfold in the last couple of minutes and as the individuals who are cited in this point of privilege are not here, perhaps the hon. Government House Leader would want to wait until Monday before making a formal response. But if he wishes to proceed now, that's fine too.

MR. HANCOCK: I was prepared to make a few comments but was going to ask precisely for that. This is a very detailed question of privilege. While I'd be delighted to deal with some of the issues that have been raised off the cuff, it would be more appropriate, because of the nature of the question raised, to be able to deal with it fully and completely in a discussion on Monday.

THE SPEAKER: Agreed.

head: Orders of the Day

head: Government Bills and Orders

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, after continuing communication on this issue with the Official Opposition and the third party, I would first seek the unanimous consent of the Assembly to waive Standing Order 58(4) to allow this afternoon's consideration of the estimates of the Department of Human Resources and Employment to go beyond two hours, with the vote on these estimates to take place no later than 5:15 this afternoon as per Standing Order 58(5) or sooner if no one wishes to speak.

head: Committee of Supply

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: We shall call the committee to order.

Human Resources and Employment

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: As per the Standing Order the first hour is allocated between the minister responsible and opposition members, following which any other member will be able to rise and speak to the estimates.

The hon. minister.

MR. DUNFORD: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I, of course, am here this afternoon to present the 2002-03 estimates for Human Resources and Employment. Now, this ministry has four components. We have, of course, the department itself, Human Resources and Employment, but we're also responsible for the Alberta Labour Relations Board, the personnel administration office, and the Workers' Compensation Board. Now, ladies and gentlemen, I'm asking for $1.061 billion to support the work of the first three entities. The WCB is entirely financed by employer premiums and is not a part of these budget estimates.

First, the Department of Alberta Human Resources and Employment. Within this department we have three components: people, skills, and workplaces. Our first range of programs is people investments, and you can see that in program 2 of the estimates document. Expenditures will be about $742 million, about 4.4 percent more than last year, and that is about two-thirds of the department's overall spending. Supports for independence come into this area. The SFI program provides financial benefits and helps people get skills and experience for work. It provides earning exemptions to ensure that people are better off working. Twenty-eight thousand families need supports for independence to cover their basic living costs, but let me tell you about some of these people.

In central Alberta this year a financial benefits worker received a call from a client that she had served actually a number of years earlier. The caller was actually hiding in a rural area. Her husband was in jail, and she had no food. She had been abused. The worker dealt with police, victims' services, a landlord, community agencies, and others, and within a month her client had a new, safe place to live. Now, this woman still has a long way to go, but she has a chance now for a new life.

It happened in north Edmonton as well. A client receiving supports for independence believed she could not work because she had poor physical health. She attended a HOPE workshop provided by career and employment counselors, and it helped her see her possibilities instead of her limitations. She is now enrolled in call-centre training and is looking forward to starting employment. We helped this client get a new lease on life, and I'm sure that the chairman that today is overseeing these activities would appreciate stories like this, based on his background of an extensive career in social services.

People in need can also include people with disabilities. The assured income for the severely handicapped, well known as AISH, is among the most generous programs of its type in the country. The caseload has been rising by 7 percent a year, about 2,000 people, as a result of a growing and aging population. In the year ahead we will provide about $361 million in financial and medical benefits to about 30,000 Albertans, and this is an increase of $26 million. Even with fiscal restraint across government our programs protect Albertans who need it most, and we will always give people a hand up, but we are prepared to consider whether we can spend resources better. We have asked Albertans whether social programs are doing all that they could be doing. This spring the government will respond to recommendations of the MLA committee that reviewed low-income programs, and I'm sure that the hon. members here in the House today representing the third party will be glad to get up and question me at some length on those particular areas.

We have also told eligible families about the Alberta child health benefit, a program for low-income working families. It provides premium-free medical benefits for children. Prescription drugs, basic glasses, dental work, and diabetic supplies are covered. Each child receives about $260 a year in medical benefits. This, by the way, is less than one month's welfare benefits, so their parents do not need to quit their jobs to go on assistance to meet medical needs.

Another important program is family maintenance. It helps single parents and parents in blended families get child support orders or agreements. Receiving child support payments can mean the difference between a family being independent or needing to turn to the provincial government for support. Last year the program helped 23,000 clients. Programs like family maintenance and the child health benefit are triple wins: wins for children, wins for parents, and wins for taxpayers.

The second area that is key, in our view, is the skills investment area. These are programs that help move people into workplaces. There are nearly 1.7 million Albertans working. Unemployment rates are at about 5 percent. Average weekly earnings continue to rise, and employers are finding it a challenge to attract all of the skilled workers they need. This year my department will devote over a quarter of a billion dollars to ensuring that there are trained people for jobs and jobs for people.

Those investments include the skills development program. Let me tell you about a 21 year old in Red Deer. She had dropped out of school in grade 10. She was unemployed. She wanted to do better and started with academic upgrading. It was quite a struggle for her, as you can imagine. In fact, staff even helped with tutoring so that she would get through her grade 12. She then registered at Red Deer College. She'll be graduating from the legal assistant program this year and is assured of getting a good job. The skills development program gave her a second chance.

There are others who want a first chance. Many Albertans with disabilities will tell you that their biggest barrier to employment is not their disability itself but the attitudes of other people about their disability. Let me tell you about a college graduate in management studies and rehabilitation practice. She is a full-time employee with the city of Edmonton, and she's blind. The disability-related employment supports program – the acronym for that is DRES – provided $7,000 worth of computer hardware, some software that reads aloud, and a scanner. That sum, equal to eight months of AISH benefits, has actually helped her move into the workforce, and of course she's not on AISH. This year we will invest $7.3 million in DRES and the supports for associations that help people: people with disabilities who want to work and employers who see ability first and disability second.

Now, yesterday I was presented with the minister's Employability Council report – this was chaired by the hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills – and we'll be responding to its recommended strategies. We will help people get the skills and experience they need to be successful.

The summer temporary employment program will provide summer jobs to about 3,800 Albertans. Under the $113 million labour market development agreement with the federal government Alberta delivers career services to employment insurance clients. That agreement helped a man in Donalda who had been laid off from the oil industry. The self-employment program meant that he could get employment insurance benefits while he started a new business. He built a plasma welding and creative metal fabrication company. He is now patenting a new invention, has two full-time employees, and subcontracts to several shops in the area.

In a network of offices across the province we help people who visit our labour market information centres, career development centres, and Canada/Alberta service centres. These offices help people be successful at work with a seminar on how to find a job or information on why one career path suits one person better than another career path might.

We're running an ad campaign right now called Click, Call, Come in, to show the many ways you can get information about careers learning and employment. People can click on our ALIS web site. I have a sweater that has that web site down a sleeve. Unfortunately I'm not able to wear it today, but for the information of all members, that web site is www.alis.gov.ab.ca, or any member of the House that's thinking of a career change can call the career information hot line at 1-800-661-3753 or come into our offices across the province. So there you have it: click, call, come in.

We have another way for people to get service. Now, listen to this. We actually go out and talk to them. Careers in motion is a career-related motor home, like a bookmobile, only built for looking for work and training. Originally the vehicle was an air quality testing unit used by the Environment department, and we've all seen that unit up and down the highways in Alberta. Well, now it's going to have a little different look to it. It was purchased by our department. Clients in the Slave Lake Alberta Job Corps repaired and refurbished the unit. The exterior was painted and covered with decals last month. So if you're on Alberta highways this summer and you see a big multicoloured vehicle with the stickers "geologists rock" and "I heart resumes," meaning of course "I love resumes," our staff inside are going to help people be successful at work. We're really excited about the ability of this government to get out from under the dome and to get out to where Albertans are and carry these services to them.

Now, we also provide skills to Albertans, and we are also part of Alberta workplaces. Employment standards ensure that employers and employees have balanced rights and responsibilities. We received an e-mail three weeks ago from an entire family. Their son had not been paid wages he was owed. Employment standards investigated, and the teenager now has the money that he had earned. He also has an important life lesson: family and government can work together and solve problems.

In employment standards and other workplace enforcement areas of the department our approach is to first educate and then enforce a regulation. So we want to first educate, then regulate. Our officers are in restaurants, retail outlets, autobody shops, factories, and hotels across the province. They provide training on how to calculate overtime and holiday benefits or how to arrange shifts in compressed work weeks or how late a 16 year old can work at a gas station. Employers and unions who receive training and information from our staff have said that our officers helped clarify their obligations and ensure a better workplace. We will devote $4.4 million to employment standards initiatives this year so that we can continue to help people and workplaces be fair.

We also want Alberta workplaces to be safe. This year's business plan sets my personal challenge to Albertans: reduce the workplace injury rate by 40 percent over the next three years and keep 15,000 lives from shattering. I have talked with families who lost a parent to occupational disease, and I've talked with families who lost someone because of what somebody called an accident. We're going to remove the word "accident" from the English language as far as we in Human Resources and Employment are concerned. There are no accidents. All workplace injuries and fatalities can be prevented.

I am challenging Alberta workers and employers to change. I've asked for advice from 15 Alberta businesspeople and employee representatives about how to make their work sites safer. They will send me a proposal shortly. I am asking members today for their ideas. On May 8 at the workplace safety 2.0 forum in Edmonton I will ask more than 100 Albertans what they are prepared to do to make workplaces safer. The target is clear: reduce injury rates and save lives.

The final component of our workplace investments is labour relations. Mediators are on call, ready to help with formal labour negotiations, and our facilitators are involved in helping make workplace relations more balanced and productive. Let me tell you the difference a facilitator can make. A transit worker was injured and could not return to his old job. He identified a position he would like, but the employer did not agree. The case ended up as a human rights complaint against the union and a grievance against the employer. A facilitator was called in. He identified some common ground and showed that the worker, union, and employer all had different understandings of the employer's duty to accommodate. With the facilitator clarifying each group's obligations and some additional information about the identified position, the grievance was resolved. The case did not progress to an outright battle, and the worker is back on the job. It was a win/win scenario for both the worker and the employer.

The second component is the Alberta Labour Relations Board. It uses dispute resolution practices as part of its daily routine. These efforts result in fewer disputes going to formal hearing, which lowers costs and makes for a better result. Last year 53 percent of applications were resolved without formal adjudication.

The third and final component of the ministry is the personnel administration office, or PAO. It is the government's central human resource agency. PAO's budget of $8 million supports the work it does to build a strong public service.

As an employer we face the challenge of changing demographics. About a third of our employees are over age 50, and many are near retirement. We must ensure that we have employees ready to replace those who retire, employees who have high skill levels, solid knowledge bases, and a commitment to ongoing development. As we come out of the recent hiring freeze, we are focusing our efforts on recruiting and retaining skilled workers, knowledge transfer, and succession planning. We want to bring new people to the public service like students and recent graduates. Our internship program provides opportunities to these individuals looking to begin their careers.

The Alberta public service offers incredible potential for growth and development along with challenging and interesting work. We continue to have a positive relationship with the Alberta Union of Provincial Employees, and we are in the first year of a new three-year agreement that expires in 2004. Our employees value their work. Our most recent survey shows that 84 percent of staff are satisfied with their jobs in the public service.

We place great importance on providing the supports our employees need to acquire and develop the knowledge and skills to do their jobs successfully. We involve our employees in our business planning process and help them to understand how their work contributes to the achievement of the business plan goals. We keep our employees informed about changes that will impact their jobs and work, and we provide expected outcomes on the employees' work and recognition for their contributions.

In a recent briefing the Conference Board of Canada stated that the impact of leadership cannot be understated when building a strong public service. They go on to cite the Alberta example of the deputy-led corporate human resource development strategy as the leading practice in this regard. We have a proud reputation here in Alberta of setting our own course and leading the way. The members of our public service have risen to the challenges placed before them, and today we are respected as one of the best public service organizations in the country, an honour that has been hard earned.

The Ministry of Human Resources and Employment has been an active part of thousands of Albertans' lives over the year and will continue on in the year ahead. We make a difference to individual people every day in communities across the province.

I look forward to hearing any comments and questions from hon. members about these estimates. For any budget-related questions that I don't answer today, I will provide the Legislature with written answers.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. It's a pleasure to participate in the estimates debate this afternoon regarding the budget for this fiscal year for Human Resources and Employment, or as an AISH client at a rally I attended at a church a couple of weeks ago stated, "It's the Department of Human Resources and Nonenjoyment," because AISH levels are far too low, and there has not been, certainly, an adequate adjustment made to compensate for inflation in the last number of years.

The hon. minister has pointed out that it's a program that is unique, but it certainly is not the only program of its kind in the country. We need to improve it.

At this time, as I understand it, Mr. Chairman, the debate this afternoon on the estimates is going to – if you could clarify for me, I would be very grateful. The debate is going to be a number of questions, and then the hon. minister is going to provide answers, and if not, there will be written answers at a later date. Okay. Thank you very much.

It is a very important issue, and the poor and the powerless are also an important part of the fabric of this society, of this province. We have to address the benefit programs for SFI and AISH. There were questions earlier and there have been persistent questions by all hon. members regardless of their political affiliation about just exactly what's going to happen with the low-income review. We need answers now. Last fiscal year there was actually money that went from the hon. minister's department back into the general revenue fund, and I think that is just a shame. It is acting in a manner that I do not consider responsible, because there are many people who need an increase in their SFI rates or in their AISH rates. They need it now. They don't need to wait any longer for this low-income review. I don't know what else it's going to tell us. The minister spoke about the market basket initiative, I believe, and I'm going to be very anxious to see what the afternoon's debate brings us in answers.

Now, low-income Albertans have opportunities to improve their financial situation and attachment to the workforce; there's no doubt about that. On page 271 of the estimates under 2002-03 Key Initiatives, it states, "Implement approved recommendations from the MLA Committee to Review Low-Income Programs." Spending in this area is only going up $15.4 million, or 2.1 percent, and this is comparing total program spending on page 263 of the estimates for program 2, and it's called People Investments. When we use the words "people investments," let's not forget the poor and the powerless.

This amount is going up, as I said, $15.4 million. What impact will this increase have on the program? How much of this increase is simply going to be lost to inflation? Inflation was discussed in question period yesterday afternoon, and it was recognized at over 2 percent. How long has it been since many of these individual programs offered, such as AISH or SFI benefits, have seen an increase in the amount provided to clients? We've all received a wage increase in here. I can look at the productivity rate of Albertans in here, in Measuring Up, in the 2000-2001 annual report.

Our workforce is skilled and productive, and it's good enough for us to tie our wage increases to this. Why do these citizens of this province have to wait and wait and wait for a review? I don't think it is, as Alexander Mackenzie would say, responsible government. I'm not talking about the Prime Minister; I'm talking about the blacksmith.

Now, will the minister, Mr. Chairman, be implementing any increases to any benefits provided to other Albertans in this fiscal year under his Department of Human Resources and Employment? Also, what has happened to the idea that came up last summer – we touched on this briefly a moment ago – about seeing increases in some areas for benefits to accommodate exceptional costs of living in those areas? Certainly I believe the AUPE – it is recognized by many, including the hon. minister, that they have a very solid relationship built up, a mutual respect and trust, which is an excellent reputation whenever you're dealing with collective agreements, and I would like to think that that relationship will continue to be built on mutual respect and trust. I would urge that respect be shown for the Alberta Teachers' Association, the same way the government respects the AUPE. Now, that certainly needs to be done. At this time in the afternoon I'm not going to get into that because I want to first off deal with this issue of – I believe the needs of the poor and powerless are not being met.

Does this budget acknowledge any changes coming from the recommendations from the low-income review, or will there be supplementary estimates for those changes? Certainly if we as hon. members of this Assembly are going to enjoy compensation levels that are rated to some sort of productivity gain, perhaps it's time to take SFI rates and AISH rates – perhaps it's going to be in the recommendation. Perhaps those rates should be indexed to the increase in the cost of living, because the cost of living in some of our major centres, Mr. Chairman, has certainly gone up with electricity deregulation.

You know, candle power has taken on a whole new meaning in this province since people have had to pay the deferral rates and pay these new costs, these added costs to their electricity bills. Something I would urge the hon. minister to do is to take these programs, these income-support programs, and index them to the cost of living.

Natural gas is another issue. It's another costly bill at the end of the month for people who are living on very, very modest income; $855 a month does not go very far.

Now, my next question to the minister would be: why were the changes not implemented for this budget year? We've had the low-income review. If it has not, why not? We often hear, Mr. Chairman, that with Alberta's economy in such good shape demand is down for many of these programs. But what are the numbers as far as applications for assistance compared to the actual number of cases that exist? It would be interesting to see if the decline is in the number of applications or the number of approved cases. Or is it a combination of both?

I have one more question at this time before I cede the floor, I believe, to the hon. minister. There has been a significant decline in the number of SFI files. I believe that before the draconian cuts started, there were 90,000 files in the province, and now we're down to between 24,000 and 27,000 files, roughly one-third of what there were before. How many of those files or individuals that were named in those files have turned up in this Canada/Alberta labour market agreement under some sort of continual or perpetual training scheme: I'm going to ABC college for six months to learn how to write a resume, and then I'm going to the next place to learn how to conduct myself in an interview, and I'm on this sort of treadmill? How many of those files have wound up – because these are very expensive programs, like $100 million a year roughly. This is unique in an agreement between provinces and the federal government, this Canada/Alberta labour market agreement. If the minister's department has done any study on this, I would be interested to know where those folks have wound up.

Now, at this point, Mr. Chairman, I believe I will cede the floor to the hon. minister. Thank you.

MR. DUNFORD: Well, I appreciate the opportunity to respond at this time. If our list gets too long, you know, I'm going to end up doing all of the speaking, and really I think it's important that we hear what hon. members are concerned about.

Not in necessarily any particular order, but I do find the last question of significance. We will make sure that we record in Hansard that that specific question has been asked because I'd like to have the answer myself and don't have it here today, but we'll see what we can find.

If there is anything that motivated me to see a restructuring of family and social services and career development, it was this very item that the hon. member is on, because even though this government, as any government, ultimately will be evaluated by what they do for the poor and the powerless – and I do like that phrase. Just to digress a minute, the rich and the powerful can always look after themselves no matter what government does. As a matter of fact, governments spend a lot of their time like they're in a big checkers game because we make a move and then people respond, and then of course we have to make another move.

But as it relates to the poor and the powerless, what we're onto here is a significant motivation for why we have now in this province a Department of Human Resources and Employment. Now, I don't think anybody would deliberately play any sort of a game with an Albertan that needed support, but let me tell you about the two different interests that were in existence in this province when we had family and social services and we had advanced education and career development operating somewhat as silos.

There is no question that it is an honourable intention for a government and for a society to have low numbers of welfare clients, because we want people not to have to rely on that type of support. Everybody wants to be independent themselves. They want to look after their family themselves. We don't even dispute that. We accept as a reality that they, the poor and the powerless, and we, the middle class and the representatives of the people, and the rich and the powerful all want the same thing: they want independence for themselves and for their families. So an honourable motivation for family and social services was to reduce that 92,000 as low as they could possibly get it. As a matter of fact, I think the numbers – well, I'll tell you what. The number that is being forecast now for the end of '01-02, which we've just passed, is actually 26,830, so let's use that number.

This was an honourable, honourable activity for family and social services. They want that number down, but if they can't get them into the workplace, where are they going to put them? Well, they can put them in training programs, because then, under the way we do our statistics, they would not be on welfare. They would be in training programs. So there I am as the minister of career development and here we have people, then, that are being recommended to us, and what do we do with that? We have a motivation, if we're going to spend taxpayers' money on training programs, that we won't just be training for training's sake, that we'll be training so that people can actually get employment. Like, what a concept. So what we would be doing in career development is saying: "Well, look. We will provide contracts for private providers." And this is where most of it happens, through private providers. "We will provide contracts, but we will want outcomes." Unlike the federal government, which is involved in inputs, in Alberta we are always outcome based, and we want 70 percent of the people that go into our employment training programs to have meaningful employment six months after they are finished that training program.

It's getting back to what the hon. member was asking about, but now do you see what might be a conflict there? If I'm a private provider and I know that my contract is based on getting 70 percent of my clients into the workplace, I might be just a tiny bit selective on who I'm going to take into this particular area. There was how the silos were working. And, ladies and gentlemen, if you don't need any other reason in the world as to why we have a Human Resources and Employment ministry, it is for that very reason.

We now have those people. There cannot be any sort of ping-pong even contemplated, because if they are our clients, if they come to us in a mode of needing low-income assistance, if they come to us in a more traditional welfare situation, we now have not only the resources, but we have the talent within our department. We now have the skills, we have the knowledge to start moving them through into training and into the workplace, and we don't have to cross department lines. It is all up to us. So we will take full responsibility for the numbers of Albertans that come into our programs and for the numbers of Albertans who move on with their lives, and we hope that we will make a meaningful difference in the lives of thousands of Albertans, because now there are no governmental structural impediments to having that happen.

I hope that long after I'm gone from this ministry, every member in this House will see the significance of what was done in May of 1999 by bringing the adult social services, by bringing the career development, and by bringing the labour portions of government services under one umbrella. I think it was an excellent move, and I can't tell you how honoured I've been to be its first minister.

AN HON. MEMBER: And a good one at that.

MR. DUNFORD: Thank you for that.

I would hope that successors would be just as passionate as I am about this particular mandate.

In terms of the low-income review, yes, those reports are waiting. One of the things that we're dealing with as we're now moving through the system – I have a philosophical opposition to labeling people and then sending entitlements. I wonder why we would do that. Why wouldn't a government see people as a collection of individuals? Why wouldn't we do that? Why wouldn't we be interested in taking each individual as a person or as a family and look at what are the particular needs that they should have. Why should we be forced into saying that you are an AISH person or you are a this person and then you get these entitlements? So we were looking at that.

By the way, because there have been rumours out in the community at large, AISH is a program that this government is very, very proud of. There are no changes contemplated to AISH as we're standing here speaking. So all of those who will be reading Hansard, for those members today that send Hansard out to their constituents, I hope that they're hearing what I'm saying. I don't know where and how it ever happened that people would have to be so terrified that they would be phoning our office in a hysterical state trying to reach members of government, phoning MLAs' offices, talking to me directly as the minister responsible and talking about how the AISH payment was going to be reduced to $600 a month. I have no idea of where that got started. And I want to say here as strongly as I can that if there's any member in this House that either started that rumour or even portrayed that rumour, they ought to be ashamed of themselves. Now, I don't know that it happened, but I expect every member here today to walk away from this debate saying that they heard the minister say that there is not going to be a decrease in the AISH payment. Okay? Do you hear me? [interjection] Well, hon. member, if I'm making you feel uncomfortable, that's simply too bad. I don't know that the $600 came from this room.

AN HON. MEMBER: It came from your department probably.

MR. DUNFORD: No, I don't think so, because the department would know and understand.

So I expect every one of you hon. members who have a list of constituents that phoned you and pleaded with you to do something about the $600 to phone them back and say that you were able to do something for them, that the minister is not going to reduce it.

I'm taking up too much time here, but I want to just indicate that with the low-income review, look at the numbers, understand that we're still in a downward trend in terms of caseloads, understand that we are increasing the budget, and then understand that we are going to be looking at a system where we can provide the assistance that we need for Albertans who need our assistance. I believe that the hon. member talked about shelter rates in his comments – we'll check Hansard to make sure – but we are as aware as anyone else about the differences that are happening throughout this province. Fort McMurray is one situation; Calgary is another situation. We're starting to see some pressure in my own community of Lethbridge. So we know that shelter rates have to be looked at. We're anxious for a market-basket measurement because now we will finally have a logical and a reasonable gauge by which to start to compare what it actually costs for a person to have to live in a particular community. Thank goodness we will be finished, hopefully, with that low-income cutoff nonsense that's gone on for too long, where people have been able to bash whatever government is in power, not just ours, and simply use a LICO system as the definition of poverty. Can you imagine how ridiculous a low-income cutoff is in Oakville, Ontario? I mean, half the people, then, are in poverty in one of the richest communities in Canada. So out with LICO and in with market-basket measurement.

The rest of the questions, of course, we'll deal with as best we can.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thanks very much, Mr. Chairman and the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, for letting me proceed here. I'd like to express my appreciation for the minister's comments and indicate that I think that a certain amount of progress has been made since the days of the mid-1990s and the cuts that took place then and the changes in policies that occurred then. We're no longer in the position of giving people on social assistance one-way bus tickets to British Columbia, and we're beginning to deal with some of the issues that exist within this department.

I want to say generally, Mr. Chairman, that I believe that it's the objective of government and the objective of this department – or it ought to be – to allow people to live in relative comfort and dignity when they become dependent for whatever reason on government assistance. I also agree that it is an objective and ought to be an objective to help people to become independent of assistance where that is possible and where it is not possible, to avoid any sort of discrimination against those people or single them out in any way but recognize that assistance is necessary for them to have a productive life and simply get on with it and not in any way denigrate them for being in that position.

I want to talk a little bit generally about some of my experiences working in municipal government and for the last year and a half as an MLA for an area that has a fairly high level of poverty, that has significant numbers of low-income people and people who are on assistance. One of the things that I concluded a number of years ago working with these communities is that a community approach is a very good one to take and, in fact, that programs ought to be enabling people to become independent and productive. There have been a few that I've seen in which people are encouraged to set up their own small business or their own business in the home, and they have been given skills and resources that allow them to work cooperatively with partners in the community.

One of the other things that I think has been very significant, Mr. Chairman, in a number of places, including such places in the United States, is dealing with the question of housing and providing people with equity in housing. I know that our rules currently do not allow that, but one of the ways that people become independent is if they're given a stake in the community in which they live, and one of the best ways to do that is through allowing them to provide some equity in their housing situation. I don't think that that's part of the current government thinking at all. I think, in fact, that the philosophy has traditionally been that if you're dependent on government assistance, we shouldn't be helping you to buy a car or a house or any of those other things, that that's not the responsibility of the people of Alberta. But I think it has to be framed, in a way, as what's the best long-term interest of the individual and the people of Alberta, and that is to help people get on their feet.

I would just make those comments generally, Mr. Chairman. I'm not maybe a traditional New Democrat in some senses in that I believe that government welfare programs which create long-term dependency are not desirable, but allowing people to create some equity in their lives is probably one of the most effective ways to help those people become independent of government assistance. On the other hand, I want to say that when people must, of necessity, be dependent on government assistance, then that assistance must not be at a level which produces indignity on the part of people. I think that some of the rates that we are paying in social assistance are continuing to have that effect. They continue to be, in our view, far too low to allow people to live at or above the poverty line. So that is a continuing problem as far as we are concerned.

Now, I know that the minister has talked about the market-basket measure, and I think that that's an interesting approach and something that I think we need to look at fairly seriously, but I want to raise the question of the caseloads and the reductions of the caseloads and ask the minister what the reason is for the reduction. Is it entirely due to the improvement or the continuing strength of the economy, or are there reasons why people who might be dependent on social assistance in Alberta would choose to leave the province as a result of deficiencies there?

I want to talk a little about labour, and I want to go back to the pastoral statement if I can just find it here because I thought that the bishop had some interesting points. I don't think that this is subject to dispute by the Premier or members opposite, because I think the bishop certainly understands the church's teachings, at least. It says:

In its social teachings, the Church firmly maintains that labour unions have an essential role to play in preventing the violation of the dignity of human work and serving as a mouthpiece for the struggle for social justice. Without unions, working people frequently have no voice in society.

He goes on to say:

Through labour unions, workers are also able to press for changes in public policy and participate in a broader social movement for the building of a just society. In effect, the Church maintains that labour unions are an indispensable element of social life. No one may deny the right to organize without attacking human dignity itself. The right to organize also includes the right to assembly.

I wonder if the minister can share with us whether or not that is consistent with the department's philosophy relative to labour.

The labour movement in our province continues to maintain that Alberta has amongst the least favourable labour relations climates from their perspective and the least favourable labour legislation anywhere in the country. I wonder if the minister could share with us any plans he may have to assist unions to increase their ability to improve the lot of their members, and that includes the ability to organize unorganized workers in this province.

One of the key indicators in any society, in taking a cue from what the minister said, is how society deals with its poorest people. I agree with that, but I also say that in a practical way, the most effective way historically to improve the lot of the poor in society is indicated by the level of unionization that exists in that society, and Alberta has amongst the lowest levels of unionization in Canada. So, clearly, if we really want to make sure that everybody participates in the economic advantages of Alberta, one of the indicators we should be looking at is the extent to which the workforce is unionized, and we should be looking at ways to amend labour legislation and practices in order to facilitate the organization of unorganized workers.

I want to ask specifically the minister if there are plans to amend the Labour Relations Code and whether or not the minister will be bringing forward legislation to bring Alberta's labour legislation into line with the Supreme Court decision regarding second-party picketing.

Mr. Chairman, that's maybe it for me at this point. I have a couple of questions about the Workers' Compensation Board before I take my seat. I see that $6 million has been budgeted for the appeals for Workers' Compensation Board that wasn't budgeted for last year, and I'd like to know if that's for the review of lengthy cases and why the WCB isn't paying for these appeals itself. I wonder if it maybe ought to be doing that.

So with that, Mr. Chairman, I just want to come back to the issue I raised in question period today, and that has to do with the low-income review. I guess my problem is that if recommendations in the low-income review have an impact financially on the department's budget, then we ought to see that. I'd like to know if, in fact, this budget reflects changes or anticipates changes as a result of the low-income review and provides funding for changes and, if it does, then why we are dealing with that without the review being released. If not, then of course I'd like to know why not. But, basically, I'd like the minister to stand up and release the two reports. I'd be very interested to see them.

I continue to get calls on a regular basis to my office, Mr. Chairman, to the minister, about these reviews, and lots of people have put a lot of stock in them and a lot of hope for themselves and their families in these reviews, and I don't want to disappoint them. They are certainly getting increasingly impatient about waiting for them, so I would encourage the minister to release them as quickly as possible and to share with the House before we vote on the estimates any elements of those reports which have a bearing on the budget.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

MR. DUNFORD: Edmonton-Highlands in his opening remarks touched on the substantive but also the fundamental debate about how a government needs to provide for its citizens. I'll put it this way. His view is one of the positions that's taken in the debate when he used the terms "comfort" and "dignity." No one wants to argue that any person shouldn't have comfort and shouldn't be dealt with in a dignified way. What it denotes, however, is that the government, then, is obligated to provide to all of its citizens a quality of life type of support.

The other part, then, of that debate is the fact that many people view support for its citizens to be of basic needs, to make sure that the basic needs of the individual or of the family are provided for. That's a continual debate. The debate will go on long after the Member for Edmonton-Highlands and I have both drifted off to whatever our next careers are going to be, but it is essential and fundamental, of course, to the argument. I think there's obviously not only personal philosophy that is involved in that, but there are, you know, the political philosophies that are in there as well.

Certainly he talked about housing, and that is again one of the challenges that not only our department has but certainly the Department of Seniors. I guess he has already had his estimates; hasn't he? I haven't read Hansard yet to see all of the answers that he provided in estimates, but I'll need to do that. Again I think there was an acknowledgment about the market-basket measurement and perhaps some interest in how that will work.

The hon. member also made a very profound statement, and that is that long-term dependency is not desirable. In that, we share. Now, whether he's not a traditional socialist and I'm not a traditional capitalist or not a traditional conservative or whatever, we agree. We agree on that specific point. So always the challenge as you look at the level of benefits is: is the benefit enough to provide for the basic need and yet not providing, then, the sort of long-term dependency? It's a challenge; there's no question. It's a challenge, and we're out there every day trying to do that, and of course we face the scrutiny and then also at times the criticism of people that don't see that we have that sort of situation in balance.

As far as Bishop Henry's statement, you won't have any trouble with me in recognizing the fundamental and significant role that trade unions play in a democracy. You'll find me defending, you know, the right of people to bargain collectively. I won't waiver from that sort of thing, but if you expect me to hand it to them on a plate and to make it easy for them, no. No, we're not going to do that. There's work that any labour union organizer has to go through, just as the person that tried to put that business together, tried to find a product or a service and put his house probably on the line, put probably time with his family on the line so that he could go out and not only provide a living for his family or her family but also, of course, for other families that were through the employees. So that work and that effort and that collaboration with all of those people deserves some sort of recognition as well. So union organizers out there, do your work. We're not going to stand in the way of it, but we're obviously not going to give you, you know, a gold-plated methodology, I guess, in order to be signing the people up.

In terms of the actual question, though, about amending the Labour Relations Code, the current business plan is that sometime this summer I'll put together an MLA committee, and they will go out and they'll talk to the stakeholders about whether or not there are precise sections of the labour code that need to be, one, reviewed, and then, secondly, would need to be amended. As you might expect, I've been getting lobbying from various groups on both sides of the employer/employee spectrum and some allegations or assertions of problems that are out there, but we've also been receiving significant requests from stakeholders: "Don't touch it. It works fine. Look at the results of the labour relations in Alberta. Look at the low amount of productivity that's lost due to strikes.

Look at the high number of negotiations that are resolved right at the local level. Look at the high number of mediation successes, and of course look at the high number of successful arbitrated awards.”

The $6 million that now shows up in the estimates from WCB is there because a year ago the Appeals Commission was kind of attached to WCB, and they sent their budget to WCB and received the resources, then, that they needed to run their operation. The hon. member is aware that during this fiscal year we will be taking the Appeals Commission and moving it over under the umbrella of the Human Resources and Employment ministry, but we will also be levying WCB for that particular fund. We don't have that legislation in place at the present time, but that bill is going to be introduced imminently.

Low-income review. The answer is, yes, there are changes that are contemplated within the low-income structure as to how we go about using building blocks to provide benefits for people. But to the best of our ability in looking at it, we can provide for any of those prospective changes, which have not been approved at this point, but we'll be able to accommodate them within the budget estimate numbers that you are seeing in front of you today.

There was a question about a decrease in caseloads. You know, because of freedom of information and protection of privacy and just common decency and courtesy as well, we don't have good tracking mechanisms for people that leave our caseload. We're not going to be putting any electronic bracelets on anybody. So they move off our rolls, and in many cases we know that they've gone into the workforce directly. If we've moved them along from social assistance to the training providers in career development, we can perhaps track them a little longer and a little better, but if somebody stops filing for assistance under SFI because they have won the lottery or have found a job or whatever, we don't have a good way of tracking that as yet.

With that, Mr. Chairman, I think I've covered most areas.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks very much, Mr. Chairman. There are five issues that I just want to raise with the minister. I'm aware that we don't have a lot of time to debate this afternoon, so I'm more than happy to receive his responses in writing, but I will warn him now that toward the end of my remarks I'm going to talk about the document produced by his department called Culture Steps Forward. So if he wants to have his staff supply him with information on this, I'll be talking about it toward the end of my remarks. By the way, I do appreciate having staff from the ministry here with us today, a big help to the minister, I know. They do very good work, and I appreciate what they are trying to do for all Albertans.

The minister asked if perhaps I would have been responsible for rumours about the AISH rates being cut. I usually regard this minister as quite a reasonable man, but I have to say that that was uncalled for and an unreasonable statement to make. I don't know of any MLA that would willingly frighten their constituents in that way . . .

MR. BONNER: The most vulnerable.

MS BLAKEMAN: No doubt. Vulnerable constituents.

. . . and then spend hours on the phone and in person trying to reassure them that the government wasn't out for them personally. I'm not going to cause myself that kind of work, Mr. Minister, and I'm sure you understand that.

What I really do see that is driving these concerns and this eruption of activity from people covered by the AISH program is fear. They are already struggling on a number of fronts, or they consider themselves to be struggling on a number of fronts, and rumours get going: “There's this MLA review that was out there. Why aren't they responding back? Why aren't we hearing? It can only be bad news, blah-blah.” Off they go from there, and there's no stopping them. I agree with my colleague from Edmonton-Highlands. The faster the government will produce that report and release its response to it, the better for all of us. I will join in encouraging that that happens. I'll leave it at that. It's of great concern to people that are on AISH, and they need to know what's happening for their own lives, for stability and for planning purposes. The government is a big one on talking about planning but doesn't seem to understand that those affected by their programs also need to plan. So the sooner we could get information about that and what's being contemplated, the better.

The next subject I want to talk about is housing. I know that this is not an issue that falls under this minister, but his department is offering programs that certainly have a housing benefit component to them. I will make a plea to this minister to press his colleagues who may be in a position to assist with housing for hard-to-house individuals, any kind of affordable housing. Most of my constituents live in apartments, and we are really experiencing a difficult time right now. That rental housing market was depressed for a long time. Now they're doing very well. Rents are rising steeply and regularly. I have constituents who are phoning me, telling me that their rents are going up every three months and sometimes jumping substantially. The example I've used before is jumping from $590 to $900 for a senior couple in an apartment. This hurts, and it's very difficult for people on fixed incomes or low incomes to plan how they are going to find an additional whatever that was, 310 bucks, out of nowhere every month. So anything this minister can do in talking to his cabinet colleagues to encourage the government to come up with innovative ways to work with other partnerships – I don't care what kind of partnerships – to get new housing would be appreciated.

These are dire circumstances for many people, and it does not work for the provincial government to say: “Well, we can't participate in that,” or “We don't believe in it,” or “We don't like it,” or whatever, because the private sector will not build affordable housing. We've given them the time to do it. They've had 10 years to do it. They don't do it because they can't make money. They're a private sector. They're there to make money. I don't blame them for that, but what are we going to do in that gap where we're looking for housing that's affordable for the people buying or renting it? We have the responsibility there because it won't fall to anyone else, and no one else will pick up the slack. So a little plea there.

Third thing. When the minister and I met in Public Accounts earlier this spring – is that possible?

MR. DUNFORD: It seems like a year ago.

MS BLAKEMAN: It does.

I asked the minister some questions about programs that his department might be providing specific to women, and I think he thought I was joking. I wasn't. Every year I ask the minister responsible for women's issues what programs he is offering for women, and every year I get referred to other government departments, one of which is the Department of Human Resources and Employment. So on the record, about this budget we have in front of us, I'm asking the minister again: what programs are either specific to women or are structured in such a way as to be understanding the specific barriers in front of women and helping them to leap over those barriers?

MR. BONNER: In lone-parent families women outnumber men.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you. I'm reminded by my colleague again about the situation – I'm sure the minister's aware of this – of the lone-parent families headed by women. They're placed amongst the poor. They hold the highest percentage as a group. I'm urging the minister to take me seriously. I know it's easy to come back and say, "Well, the government doesn't believe in being gender specific, and all programs are gender neutral," but let's get real. We know that different programs affect men and women differently, and I'm prodding the government a bit here.

Now, I'd like to turn to the document Culture Steps Forward. I would like to say that I think some pats on the back are due to the department for taking the initiative on this project. It's no surprise to the minister that I come from the arts sector. Everything in here I've probably personally experienced, and culture is an important sector for this province. We struggle sometimes in getting recognized outside of the boundaries of what is Community Development. If nothing else comes out of this report – and I hope much will – I can tell you that it's been a tremendous confirmation for people in the cultural sector that they are worthwhile Albertans to be recognized by another department and to be taken seriously.

Now, there are a number of questions, of course, that are going to come out of this, and I'll launch into that. I'd like to get the minister on record, and I don't know if he can give this to me verbally. In writing, as I said, is fine, and then I'll just ship the answers out to the people that I'm corresponding with.

So, first of all, the obvious question: has there been an official departmental response? I don't think so. I'm not aware of one, but if there has been one, then where is it? Could it be released publicly and when? I'd be interested in knowing what the department has learned from this. This is more or less a straight reporting back of what happened in the process, but I'm wondering what was learned by the department, and hopefully further by the government, that it can use and work into future plans.

Now, a big part of being an artist in Alberta is being self-employed and the intermittence of that employment. People aren't aware that in Alberta our artistic companies – our ballet companies, our operas, our symphonies, our theaters – don't have enough money to be able to employ a company of people that are paid year-round. Therefore, every cultural worker gets a gig for a very short period of time. For example, if as an actor you would be successful in auditioning for and getting a part in a play, you would then have probably three weeks of rehearsal, two to three weeks of performance, and then your job is over and you start over. You're back out on the streets or you go back to the restaurant where you work as a waiter, and you look for the next job. Of course, we plan ahead and we try and line up a whole season's worth of work and all of that sort of thing, but the truth is that it's a very intermittent work schedule for us. I've talked a lot in this House about how the artists subsidize the arts in Alberta, because of course they do go back to work in a restaurant because they've got to pay their rent, and that in itself is keeping that person available to us to continue to give us the benefit of their art rather than them just leaving for Toronto where they could work full-time. So the artists do subsidize the art.

One of the things that's been identified in this report is the difficulty of securing access to group health, disability, and life insurance. Even a small family-run business can probably score some sort of plan, maybe even through the Chamber of Commerce or through some other grouping together. Even a company with just a few people working for it can get access to some sort of plan to get disability insurance or life insurance at a reasonable rate because you're going at it as a group. But for an individual artist, which most of our cultural workers are, they have no access to that, so they're paying 100 percent of health care premiums and things like that: full rack rate, to use a phrase used in the hotel industry. The disability insurances are beyond us. They're simply beyond us. It's too much money. You know, it's coming in at $50, $60, $75 a month. We just don't have that kind of money. So there is no disability insurance, and if you're a designer, as my friend is who fell off a ladder and hurt his back, he had to get his friends to come in and finish his work for him because there is no disability insurance for him. We live in terror of getting hurt because there's nothing to help us there. As we get older, it becomes even more serious for us because the likelihood that we would get injured is more severe and it would have longer lasting effects.

So I'm looking to see whether anything has been looked into as a result of this identification of that access to some kinds of insurance schemes. Has the department done any research? Is it likely to do any research? Does it care? Having identified and heard this information, what are you going to do with it? Can you report back to us on that?

Your department offers – you did talk about it with a great deal of passion and body English – skill development programs. One of the other issues that's arising for us is that we actually are a highly-skilled cultural sector. Many of us have bachelor degrees and master degrees in what we do, but when we look at skill development and lifelong learning, your programs don't help us because of a couple of reasons. There's actually a pretty clear quote here. You've got a quote on page 39, footnote 28.

There are other programs offered by Alberta Human Resources and Employment for which self-employed culture workers may be eligible that will be treated in the section "Careers in Culture." However, the majority of ARE funding is dedicated to programs supported by E.I. funding.

I hope the minister is aware that cultural workers don't qualify for employment insurance. So that right there cuts cultural workers out of any program you offer where you have to have E.I. qualifications. We don't get it because we're self-employed workers. We can't even buy into it if we wanted to buy into it. They won't allow us to. We are actually an identifiable sector under employment and revenue.

So what has been done or what would your department consider in looking towards accommodating people in this sector who did want to work with midlevel skill development? We are not entry-level workers, but if we wanted to upgrade – for example, when we look at some of our administrators, we're falling behind because our companies generally would have paid for professional development, but in this day and age that's the first category that goes out of the budget. As you know, our cultural money, the AFA money, has been frozen since 1988, since before the creation of the current foundation. So our operating funds that are coming through there have been frozen for a long time. We can't pay our own people for skill development or professional development. So even in comparison to other nonprofit sectors and volunteer-based sectors, we can't keep up. There's another area that your department could be helpful in. If like me, for example, someone moved out of strictly arts management into nonprofit-sector management, that would be more difficult for someone to do today because their arts management skills are going to be not as up to date as someone outside of that sector. Am I making sense? Okay. Good. So that was that program.

I must be really close to the end of my time here, and I just want to make sure that I ask the question and put on the record that I'm interested in what the philosophy of this department is. There were obviously philosophical choices that were made to group together what's grouped together under this department. This minister has been in it long enough and obviously has a very clear guiding light for where he wants the ministry to go. So aside from all of the well-written bureaucratese descriptions that you get, those lovely things on web sites that say that this is what our department does, I'm interested in the longer, farther reaching discussion about why you made the choices to put these groupings together. What are you contemplating by doing that? It seems to say that we only value people that work, and if you don't work, then we'll help to make you work. And if we can't help to make you work, then we really don't like you. Now, that is being terribly exploitive and full of hyperbole, and the minister understands that, but you see where I'm going. It's the choice in grouping together the programs you grouped together when we had the change in ministries. You've had it running long enough that you must know why you did it and whether it's working. I'm interested in why, so if I can hear that.

I must be close to my time. Okay. I'm going to go back then. If I've got a couple of minutes left, I'm going back to the Culture Steps Forward document. We know that it costs much less money to create a permanent long-lasting job in the cultural sector than it does in industry or commerce, significantly less. I think the last time I looked at the numbers, it was $40,000 to create a job in the cultural sector and $200,000 in manufacturing or industry or something. So I'm looking again for what strategy the minister is looking to employ that might work in conjunction with his colleague the Minister of Community Development to look at job creation. This government has made the choice to put a lot of money into developing innovation and science, technology, agriculture, and rural development in the short time I've been in this Assembly. It's been a concentrated effort, and a lot of money and resources have been directed there. Would you consider directing even a fraction of the same amount of attention, money, time, and resources to the cultural sector, knowing that you get such an incredible payoff? And that's just in job creation and employment.

Our money stays here. Cultural money stays in the community. We're not paying people who leave here. We're not paying people who can even afford to take a holiday outside of here. So our money really stays in Alberta and contributes to the local economy, going round and round. I'm pushing the minister on this, but, boy, there's an opportunity here, and I would like to see the government and the minister take it.

Thank you very much for this time, and I'd appreciate the minister responding to me in writing.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment.

MR. DUNFORD: Yeah. I'll just take a couple of minutes. We will respond to most of that in writing.

A reference was made to our officials in the gallery, and I have not introduced them at this point. So I'll now do that, if they could just sort of wave when I say their names. We have Dan Thompson, with our department as director of budgets and forecasts; Ellen Hambrook, who is director of business planning, performance measures, and corporate projects. Lorne Saul-Demers is acting director of human resource policy and consulting with the personnel administration office. Mary Anne Wilkinson is acting executive director of corporate human resource development with the PAO.

Just quickly on the philosophy of the department. If I direct you to page 270 of the document and you look at our vision, we have six words there. It's the '02-03 government and lottery fund estimates. You know, Churchill one time apologized because he only had a couple of days to develop a speech, so he went on to give a 20-minute speech. He said: if you'd given me two or three weeks, I could've gotten it down to two or three minutes. It takes a lot of work to get something concise, and we hope we have with our vision: "Alberta works because we invest in people." Our mission: "To provide a continuum of services and information that enables individuals to succeed in the changing workforce, fosters safe and healthy workplaces and assists people in need." So that's part of the philosophy.

I want to advise the member that I'm probably going to try to utilize some of her talent, skills, and knowledge because she did raise the issue about EI funding as part of a gateway or a selection process for many of our labour development agreement programs. This is something that the federal government has put in place. Provincial ministers from right across this country, despite whatever sort of political affiliation, I believe are unanimous. I can't think of a jurisdiction that is offside on this. We are lobbying the federal government to remove that restriction. There are all kinds of people that are here within our communities, within our province that aren't eligible for employment insurance. The hon. member has indicated an excellent area that we could probably develop as a further argument as we lobby the hon. Minister of Human Resources Development Canada. While I can't say that I've ever been an artist and I'm certainly not an actor – I mean, what you see is what you get – I do know of the huge economic development that is involved in the arts and culture in this particular jurisdiction. The employment being generated by the arts is huge. So I do agree, and yes, we will respond to these questions.

The last point: I want to apologize if my comments about AISH rumours were directed at anyone inappropriately. Please forgive me for that.

DR. PANNU: Mr. Chairman, I've been listening to the minister carefully. I commend him for his sort of congenial forthrightness and refreshing candour. I hope these remarks on my part earn some brownie points later on with him, but we'll see.

I want to just raise a few questions in a few minutes. The minister, in responding to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands, tried on the one hand to acknowledge that human dignity is important, that not only should we deal with people in need in a dignified manner but also do whatever we can to make sure that they can maintain their human dignity while they live under circumstances which we recognize need our assistance and help.

In that context, the minister referred to basic needs as a criterion, and I agree with him. The notion of basic needs itself – I hope the minister will agree with me – varies, of course, from society to society. We need to ask: what are the basic needs in our kind of society? What is the level at which we should consider those basic needs met? Although in a generic sense having a roof over one's head, having something to eat, and being able to meet other basic needs such as clothing and health – those are normal, generic things, but the levels at which these needs are recognized as important varies. We live in Alberta, and there, of course, the notion of comfort comes in, which is variable. You took some mild exception to the notion of comfort. I don't think you meant to say that people who come to the government of Alberta for help under conditions that we recognize are legitimate should be left in a state which is not comfortable.

The market-basket method, Minister, that you mentioned is certainly one that needs to be, I think, looked at, because it does provide some flexibility. You referred to Fort McMurray and Calgary and perhaps even Lethbridge, and there may be other places. Grande Prairie, I think, is another one of those spots where there are pressures and problems. So long as the market-basket method is used to move away from a one-size-fits-all approach, I would welcome it.

I do have a few questions which I want to pose to the minister related to the move to the MBM model. The budget documents draw attention to some changes in the average monthly caseloads for the supports for independence program, and I think there are reductions anticipated here. My question to the minister is this: are these anticipated reductions in supports for independence in any way related to the use of the MBM, that shifting to the market-basket model might lead to redefining the cases and thereby lead to some reductions? Or should I assume that there is no connection between the commitment being made here to move to the use of the MBM and the reductions? I would like the minister to explain what the grounds are which have led him to anticipate these average monthly caseload reductions in supports for independence.

The second question related to this is: is the market-basket method or model going to be used as well in the case of AISH rates of payment and determination? You did, Minister, try to disabuse anyone who was listening inside the House and outside of the alleged rumour that the rates might be cut to $600 a month, and you said no to that. But my question to you is: is it likely that if the market-basket model is applied to AISH recipients as well, that might mean a reduction of payments to these recipients depending upon which communities across the province they live in? So that's a specific question related to the possible impact of the MBM application to AISH recipients.

The second question related to AISH. Surely you were, I think, quite forthright in suggesting that the $600 a month rumour is baseless. I welcome that from you. I hadn't heard about it, by the way. I wasn't aware of this rumour going around, but I do have a question. I think there is an anticipated increase in the number of AISH cases in your budget over the next three, four years from 26,700 to 33,200, and the increase between the year that has just passed into the new year, this year, 2002-2003, is estimated to be an increase of 2,025 cases. This is in the business plan on page 220, I think. In light of this anticipated increase in the business plan, what's likely going to be the impact of this increase on the AISH payments to recipients? Can you give us any indication that the AISH payments will increase at least to keep pace with the increase in the rental situation and the inflationary pressures that people, whether they live on AISH or live on larger incomes, have to deal with? That's my second question related to AISH.

The one question, I guess, which my colleague from Edmonton-Highlands asked the minister – but you perhaps weren't able to answer it – is a question on labour legislation changes in light of the Supreme Court's decision having to do with secondary picketing. Are the labour laws of the province of Alberta going to be brought in line with the decision of the Supreme Court, and if so, are you planning to proceed with it during this current year? That was just a thing overlooked in your notes. That's the question that I have for you. I hope you will address it this time around.

Of course, you know, your philosophical position that any Albertan who is able to work or who may be presently on assistance should be encouraged in every possible way to move away from that dependence to becoming independent income earners – there's no dispute over this, I think. I think it's a laudable goal. It's an important goal. It's one way in which we can help people regain their dignity, maintain it, and enhance it by becoming independent income earners. I fully agree with that goal, but people who work and yet remain poor and need assistance remain in a situation in part because of some of the policies that your department and this government have with respect to our minimum wage.

With the minimum wage the level at which it is, an Albertan who worked, say, at the level of the minimum wage, if he worked 50 hours a week, not 42 and not 46 and not 38 but 50 hours a week, and worked for 50 weeks out of 52 weeks a year, worked full-time – and we know that people who work on minimum wages don't have that privilege of working full-time all the time – he would make a maximum of $15,000.

Now, there are lots of Albertans, usually young, some without very productive skills, but they get help and learn some skills. Then they find themselves in a situation that regardless of how hard they work, they remain in need of assistance. Dependence doesn't go away because they're ready to work, able to work, committed to work, and do work. Is there any, first off, acknowledgment that there may be a relationship between the persistence of dependence and the legislated level of minimum wage, either as a regulatory consequence of legislation – in other words, the relationship between government policy and minimum wages and living in poverty in spite of working hard? What's your answer to it? Is there any consideration to looking at that relationship and then addressing it in a way that is positive and provides incentives to people who move away from dependence on assistance, go into the workforce, go into the labour market, to stay there and feel encouraged by their income to continue to work hard and become responsible for meeting their own needs and maintaining their dignity and maintaining their families?

So those are some of the questions, Mr. Chairman, that I have for the minister. Perhaps he'll be kind enough to address them.

MR. DUNFORD: In light of the number of speakers that still want to get on to this afternoon's discussion, maybe I'll just cherry-pick a little bit here. Of course, we'll respond to the other ones in writing.

The market-basket measurement will not redefine the criteria for being eligible for assistance; okay? I believe that was your question: whether we would be using that to redefine how you actually entered. Where the market-basket measurement will come in won't be a redefining of whether you qualify, but if you do qualify, it'll talk about what level of assistance you should require. Of course, market-basket measurement will not be involved in any reduction, then, to AISH payments.

In terms of the secondary picketing, that would be one of the areas that the MLA committee would be mandated to go out and hear reports on. I have had a briefing about the recent court ruling, but I don't have it with me in my documents. At least I can't put my hands on it. So I'll have to respond.

Just to spend a minute or two on the minimum wage, and I believe that this is one of the most misunderstood programs that we have in our area. Certainly anybody can read what the minimum wage is, but what we have in Alberta is something like less than 2 percent of the workers actually on minimum wage, and when we investigate that area, we find out that most of them are students. I think, to our benefit, that at the last refinement of the minimum wage here in Alberta we removed that discrimination between an adult and a student or however we made that determination. Now there is only one minimum wage level. Most of the people that are working for minimum wage in Alberta today, as we are speaking, are young, single, and students. If, in fact, we have constituents in your area – and I certainly have constituents in my area – that are working at minimum wage, here's where we can start to kick in, then, some of the other benefit levels that we have. If somebody is a family member that's trying to provide for their family, well, then, we have supports that can bump up that particular level of earnings that they have, and if they happen to have children, we have an excellent, excellent program of providing medical and dental and school benefits and others, you know, to that particular family.

In my view, it doesn't present the whole picture when one just looks at the minimum wage. I think we'd look at minimum wage as one more low-income support level for Albertans. I can't prove this, because I don't have the empirical evidence in front of me, but if you take a look at youth unemployment rates and level of minimum wage, it seems like there might be some correlation. Now, I know I'm treading on difficult ground here because I can't prove it, but if one were to forget simply other economic and sociological values and variables that might be in play here, if one just looked at youth unemployment and minimum wage across Canada, you find something very, very interesting, and that is that where the highest minimum wages are, you have the highest youth unemployment levels. So is there a message there? We're not sure. Somebody some day should really take a look at that.

What I'm proud about in Alberta is that we have less than 2 percent on the minimum wage. And let's not forget this is starting; it's a minimum by definition. We get people into the workforce. Employers take a chance on them. We find that many of them within a very, very short time receive increases, move up and start to receive benefits and then move on to the career. There's always an argument around minimum wage – I understand that – but you won't find me as a representative of this government and a person concerned about the development of employment opportunities not really considering very, very carefully any proposed change to minimum wage.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I'd like to add just a few comments and questions this afternoon for the Department of Human Resources and Employment and say how pleased I am to have the opportunity to ask a few questions of the minister and his department. When we look at the overall budget for the department of over a billion dollars, it certainly is a lot of public money. It's a lot of public money to spend on some very important groups, programs that affect some of the most vulnerable members of our community.

I have a number of areas here that I would like to touch on, and these are primarily concerns that constituents have forwarded to me. I know that they've also forwarded them to the minister, and he's been very good at supplying them with answers, and they do let me know when you answer. So Gary and Robert say thank you even if they don't agree with your answers.

Of course, one of the areas that they're most concerned with are the benefits in AISH and how these have not increased over the years. Certainly it is a program that they are totally dependent on and a program where they feel very, very susceptible if there are changes, if there is a reduction in those changes. It certainly has had a huge impact on them in the last year, probably two years, with the housing situation as it is in Edmonton, where we have had rents going up every three, six months, and it's biting more and more into what they have. So at some point some of these people are having to make the decision as to whether they maintain their medications to the level they would like or, you know, eat properly and eat well-balanced meals. Of course, if they do have the complication of, for example, diabetes, where they do have to eat a very restricted diet, then it certainly adds more and more stress in their lives.

As well, what happens here is that in some of these cases these people are also receiving Canada pension plan benefits, and they are supplemented by AISH. Now, then, what is built into the Canada pension plan is an inflation factor where these recipients get more money. They're very concerned that when they get more benefits with their CPP, in fact the amount from AISH is clawed back so that, in effect, they don't see any increase at all. So could the minister inform us as to whether there are any proposed changes which would stop this clawback in their AISH benefits when they do get their increases in Canada pension plan?

Another area that I see here is that supports for independence is decreasing 5.7 percent, or $17.2 million, from last year, and the department has stated that this reduction is because fewer households are expected to need the support. Could the minister please just outline how they did their projections and how we expect fewer people to require supports for independence?

Just a few more questions in regards to those people who are on supports for independence. Could the minister also indicate how he will be accommodating the increasing costs of medical benefits for some of these people and what changes those individuals who are on supports for independence are likely to see in the coming year? Will the supports for independence be increased to a significant amount that will reflect at least a portion of the costs that these people will be incurring in the coming year?

Previously we have seen a drop in what was actually used in the resources allocated for SFI compared to what was budgeted, and what I would like to ask the minister: was that because there ended up being less of a need, or is it possible that some people who could have qualified did not apply? Is it possible that because of the situation that these people find themselves in, they are not aware that they could have the benefit of this program? Has the department ever looked at how well it is making its programs, such as supports for independence, known to those who may potentially need it?

I do have some other areas here that I would like to talk about, and certainly one, Mr. Minister, is this goal 4, "Alberta has a fair, safe and healthy work environment." We certainly know that when we have a huge influx of workers, it does provide quite a number of challenges not only for our communities but for safety in our workplace programs. Certainly, because of the great influx of construction workers into the province, we have people who are working in jobs that they're perhaps not as well trained for. We also see where contractors are asking people to take on roles that perhaps in a situation where there wasn't such a demand for workers, they might not be asked to be doing these things.

So when we are looking at this whole area of safety, this idea of compliance by companies, compliance for workers to follow safety codes doesn't seem to be filling the bill, because the number of injured workers continues to climb during this era of rapid economic expansion. The number of injured workers certainly grows at a greater rate. Is it a possibility with occupational health and safety that we will be seeing more inspectors out in the field that will be looking at this particular situation?

As well, could the minister please provide us, if he has these figures, with the safety records, for example, of unionized members versus members that are in CLAC as far as accident rates go or union workers versus non-union workers or even CLAC versus non-union workers to see which group is the best trained and which does have the safest working conditions?

Now, as well, one question a number of injured workers throughout the province have been asking me is on the whole idea of the changes that are going to be taking place in the act and where the appeals process is going to be moved: totally away from WCB, and for lack of a better term, where it's operating now at an arm's-length distance, it's going to be moved under the ministry. At one time, if my understanding is correct, appeals used to come to the minister's department. I stand to be corrected if this information is wrong, but their concern was that if in fact there are those cases which occurred before the present system was introduced, does the department have a fiduciary responsibility to these people? Does the government have that responsibility, or does that still fall back to the WCB.

I know that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has a few more questions, so at this time I will take my seat and wait for some answers. If you'd like to answer some now or see what the minister would like to do.

Thank you very much.

THE ACTING CHAIR: The minister.

MR. DUNFORD: Okay. Thank you. I'll try to be quick, because I know there are still more speakers.

The member began by indicating that this was a lot of public money, and I do agree. If I want to be defined in a number of ways, I hope that one would be a compassionate person, but the other one obviously would be that I could be defined as a steward of taxpayers' money, because I take that very seriously.

A previous member had noted how we had lapsed money. That is not inconsistent with my experience and my record as a minister of a portfolio within this government. I think I've been able to do that every year except perhaps in one occurrence. Not that we're trying to do that on the backs of anyone, but it's more important that we have sustainable funding. When we find opportunities, then, to lapse dollars, it is really usually because of some onetime occurrences rather than any decreases of benefits. We simply haven't decreased those benefits.

I want to focus this time, though, first of all on some of the workplace areas rather than on the earlier ones. We can answer those in writing. Under legislation before 1988 the actual appeal of a WCB decision went through an appeal mechanism that was actually the board of directors of WCB and not the department. The reform or the revisions in 1988 set up this Appeals Commission, but it was still bolted onto the WCB system. The reforms now of 2002 are going to unbolt that Appeals Commission and move it into this area.

In terms of workplace health and safety, 26 percent of the injury incidents at the workplace are workers in the first six months of their employment, and a full 40 percent are within the first year. So the hon. member is onto an excellent area here about new and inexperienced workers. I would want the hon. members, however, to know that we are currently involved with a workers' compensation partnership where we are focused on a huge educational campaign for this particular group. Now, I haven't heard the ads on the radio, but I know that there are ads for the radio. It's just that I don't happen to listen to the same radio stations that young workers listen to, so I'm not necessarily hearing them. There are posters, and it's called: Pick out the New Guy. Of course we show, then, a pictorial arrangement that clearly indicates the target audience that we're looking for.

In terms of compliance, we will not be adding more inspectors, but through changes within our administrative and our procedural areas we've actually reduced the office time that our inspectors have to spend. So they are in the field on a higher percentage of time basis, and we have substantially increased the number of inspections over the last little while.

I'll have to read Hansard to understand the references to union versus CLAC and union/non-union and CLAC/non-union. You know, with the Christian Labour Association – not to presume what the results might be – I would expect that any organization that has CLAC as their employee representatives probably would have a good safety record just from: would it not be Christian to, of course, have a safe workplace health and safety area? I don't know what those numbers are, but we'll certainly be looking into that.

On that, maybe we'll allow, then, any other speakers to use the remaining time.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I have still a few questions for the hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment. Before the time runs out in a few minutes, I would like to comment for the record that the minister certainly has worked very hard at improving some of the deficiencies that were in the department which the hon. minister inherited.

Now, certainly there needs to be more work done with employment standards: some of the chronic violators, repeat offenders. It is no way to save a dollar by not paying young Albertans, in particular, the money that they have earned, and it is not fair to other small businesses that do. It's not a level playing field when one company is violating the Employment Standards Code. How can a company that is not and is paying overtime wages and vacation pay and whatnot to all its employees – it's very difficult to compete whenever someone else is cutting corners like that. I would encourage the minister to continue to ensure that employment standards are enforced.

Again, with the minimum wage, I think it should be reviewed annually, just the same as with my pay and that of all other hon. members of this Assembly. Our compensation levels are reviewed annually. Why can't we do the same thing for the minimum wage?

In the time that I have, I have to mention the youth employment rate and this initiative that was discussed with a great deal of fanfare by various government departments to prepare for growth, building Alberta's labour supply. I will have to remind at this time all hon. members of the Assembly that youth unemployment – I believe this is the bracket between the ages of 16 to 24 – is 10 percent, whether it be in the female or male category. I think that the female category is slightly lower than the male category, and this is too high when you look at the unemployment level of the rest of the workforce. It is double, as a matter of fact, and we need to get those people in that age group active in the workforce, active in training programs. I don't necessarily agree with this notion of fast-tracking people into this province at this time for skills that are in short supply. I think we should be first trying really hard to train those people. I can understand certainly if every rock is overturned in pursuit of these valuable employees, but I don't think that's been done. Certainly in the First Nations population across this province there are large pockets of high unemployment, and I would urge that in the next year the government explore that, Mr. Chairman.

Now, I have to get my items that I want to discuss here in priority in the time I have. I receive complaints constantly from across this province in my job as an opposition critic about the claw-back of the Alberta child health benefit. I see on page 220 of the Human Resources and Employment business plan, where there is information on the caseloads, that the caseloads for the Alberta child health benefit will go up by 10,000 from roughly 70,000. Oh, it's more than that. It's up to 84,000 for the fiscal year 2004-2005, and that's a significant increase. I'm not satisfied that that is prudent. That is federal money, and it's been redistributed, Mr. Chairman, and I don't know how this is working. With this increase in the number of files or the number of caseloads, how is this going to be financed? Who is going to lose, and who is going to gain? If I could have that question answered, I would certainly be very grateful.

Now, for the labour relations review that's going to go on and is going to be struck, I would urge the hon. minister to take members of the Official Opposition and put them on that committee. Let's have an all-party committee on this labour relations review. Certainly it won't be as long in reporting as this low-income review. I think that this should be an all-party committee, particularly after what's happened with the teachers and the major falling out, the major deterioration in the relationship between – I don't believe it's this minister's fault, Mr. Chairman; I certainly do not – the Alberta Teachers' Association and this government. I think it's shameful and that it was not necessary. If we're going to have a look at the labour code, perhaps if this was an all-party committee, it would be a way of somehow starting to rebuild that faith in the system. We can all look at the proclamations about how fair and impartial the Labour Relations Board is. It's the mission statement; it's the goal. It's a good goal, but it's going to be difficult if there's going to be no balance on this committee. I'm sure the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry is going to be very anxious to serve on that committee.

Now, for the safety review that is also going to be initiated for this year, I would encourage the minister to work very hard at that. The hon. minister has a very important goal, which is hopefully achievable. In the past there has been an initiative to start the call centre up the street here so that individuals can phone in if they have any concerns or questions about occupational health and safety law and regulations. It's a good product, but I think it's poorly marketed. It's a matter of marketing that call centre so that each and every worker in Alberta knows about it. Now, how that is going to be achieved I don't know, but I would encourage the marketing of that call centre. The hon. minister was talking about a web site or stickers. We could work with the sector of the economy that rents industrial tools and have a sticker not on every tool that would be rented but certainly on some of the tools that are rented on construction sites. So if a person picks that tool up in the morning, they're going to see that, whether it's a web site or a 1-800 number, and if they have any questions, they can call about occupational health and safety regulations and laws. There has to be a better way, because if we can reduce workplace accidents – fatalities are another matter – perhaps we can do something about the WCB. You know, a 27.4 percent increase in premiums in one year, then a double-digit increase previous to that, and who knows what it's going to be next year: that's too much. That is too much. I think we can work and we can improve the system.

The hon. member spoke about something that's dear to my heart, random independent inspections. I'm not going to be too critical, but certainly this minister on his watch I believe has increased enforcement of his rules and regulations through the courts, and I would encourage him to continue to do that regardless of the cost. It is necessary and has to be done, and it sends such a strong message. When the new CEO of the WCB signs a contract, it should be a public document so that we know what the compensation rate and the severance package will be, Mr. Chairman. That's very, very important.

THE CHAIR: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, but pursuant to the understanding agreed to unanimously by the Assembly earlier this afternoon, I must put the following questions. After considering the business plan and proposed estimates for the Department of Human Resources and Employment, are you ready for the vote?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Agreed to:

Operating Expense and Capital Investment	$1,061,451,000
--	-----------------

THE CHAIR: Shall the vote be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIR: Opposed? Carried.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I would move that this hardworking committee now rise and report the votes and request leave to sit again another time.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

MR. LOUGHEED: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions, reports as follows, and requests leave to sit again.

Resolved that a sum not exceeding the following be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2003, for the following department.

Human Resources and Employment: operating expense and capital investment,	$1,061,451,000.
---	------------------

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in this report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Opposed? So ordered.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's been a very good day and a very good week, and in light of the hour I would move that we now call it 5:30 and that we adjourn until 1:30 p.m. on the following Monday.

s

[Motion carried; at 5:18 p.m. the Assembly adjourned to Monday at 1:30 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Monday, April 15, 2002 1:30 p.m.
 Date: 02/04/15
 [The Speaker in the chair]

head: Prayers

THE SPEAKER: Good afternoon and welcome back.

Hon. members, would you please remain standing after the prayer for the singing of our national anthem.

Let us pray. Dear God, author of all wisdom, knowledge, and understanding, we ask Thy guidance in order that truth and justice may prevail in all our judgments. Amen.

Now, would you please join in the singing of our national anthem in the language of your choice as we are led by Mr. Paul Lorieau.

HON. MEMBERS:

O Canada, our home and native land!
 True patriot love in all thy sons command.
 With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
 The True North strong and free!
 From far and wide, O Canada,
 We stand on guard for thee.
 God keep our land glorious and free!
 O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
 O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

THE SPEAKER: Please be seated.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At the end of the question period this afternoon I will rise on a point of order regarding the comments made by the Minister of Finance on Thursday during my question.

head: Introduction of Guests

MR. KNIGHT: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in the House this afternoon and introduce some special guests from the riding of Grande Prairie-Smoky. I would like to introduce to you and through you to the members of this Legislature a group of 13 students from Crooked Creek Christian school along with teacher Mr. Trevor Penner and parents and helpers Kathy Penner, Terry Virtue, and Fred Wiebe. I would please ask the members to give the traditional warm welcome to this group situated in the gallery.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder.

MR. RATHGEBER: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is indeed a pleasure for me to introduce two sets of guests to the Assembly here this afternoon. First of all, in the members' gallery there is the van der Ahe family from the Edmonton-Calder constituency. I first met this family last February during the election campaign, and subsequently they have attended all the town hall meetings that I have held in the Edmonton-Calder constituency. I'd ask Martin, Marianne, Jessica, Michelle, and Jason to rise and please receive the warm reception of this Assembly.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, in the public gallery I have two visitors this afternoon: Karen Simmons Sicoli and her son Matthew Sicoli. Karen has been recognized for the work that she has done in raising autism awareness in the province of Alberta. In fact, she has a book that she's published called Little Rainman. She is the mother of an autistic child, and she's the recent recipient of the Edmonton Smart City award. I would ask Karen and her son Matthew to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

MR. MASKELL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to introduce today on behalf of the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford some visitors from out of province. They're the guests of Louis St. Laurent school on the south side. The school is the Alexander Galt regional high school from Lennoxville, Quebec. There are 32 students and two teachers, Mr. Chris Obermeier and Ms Jodi Coleman. Would our guests please rise and accept the warm welcome of the Assembly.

head: Oral Question Period

THE SPEAKER: First Official Opposition main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Swan Hills Waste Treatment Facility

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On Thursday the Finance minister made some very interesting comments in this Assembly. My first question is to the Minister of Finance. Based on her answers from Thursday, will the minister tell the Assembly what financial difficulties the province would experience with the Swan Hills waste treatment plant operating about half a year to treat the imported waste at the expense of Alberta taxpayers?

MRS. NELSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, clearly the Swan Hills waste disposal centre has been such a phenomenal asset for this province. If we had not dealt with the disposal of waste in Alberta for the last number of years, the buildup on the environmental impact would be fierce. We dealt with this head-on by putting that facility in place. It's the only one of its kind in North America.

When I talk about a huge cost, I talk about the cost to the environment, that Albertans would not tolerate the buildup within this province. That's why that facility is so critically important to this province. The Minister of Infrastructure alluded to it in his answer, that this province is basically PCB free, and it would not be that way if we had not built that facility and had it available and at our disposal.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the plant accepts waste from other jurisdictions and is operating at taxpayers' expense, why are Albertans subsidizing the treatment of someone else's toxic waste?

MRS. NELSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, insofar as the regular operation of the facility, I'll ask the Minister of Infrastructure to respond.

MR. LUND: Mr. Speaker, that question and comment are somewhat misleading. I think that if you knew how the plant operates and how important it is that the diet of the plant be regulated, you can easily understand how in fact bringing in some waste could very well more than offset the cost of treating. That's quite simple. By looking at the heat units within a certain type of material that's coming into the plant and then looking at some of the material that's coming from Alberta as waste into that plant, you can easily see how, often, bringing that in and making sure that the chemical reaction, the maximum value of that reaction, is obtained and the heat units that a certain material will generate on its incineration, how that affects the other products that are being put in there that don't have those heat units.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the Minister of Finance. Bovar's annual report for 2000, which is a public document, shows that 64 percent of their revenue from treating toxic waste came from dealing with waste from outside of Alberta. Does the Finance minister support Alberta tax dollars being used to clean up someone else's waste?

MRS. NELSON: Mr. Speaker, again I'll ask the hon. Minister of Infrastructure to comment on the regular operations of the plant. Let's keep in mind, again, that that plant is there, first and foremost, for the disposal of hazardous waste in the province of Alberta. With the type of industry that we have and the industrial development that is taking place in this province, along with the medical hazardous waste that goes through, we are very fortunate to have that plant. Again, I'll ask the Minister of Infrastructure to supplement my answer on the daily operations of the facility.

MR. LUND: Mr. Speaker, I think it's really important to recognize as well that the current operator is doing an extremely good job. I think that when the hon. member sees the report coming out of last year's operation, he's going to see something that's somewhat different. I'm very impressed with their ability to watch the diet of that plant, to make sure that they're maximizing, as I indicated in my first answer, how the diet is changed and what comes into it.

Now, as well, Mr. Speaker, when you look at the fact that waste knows no boundaries, when the hon. member criticizes Alberta for helping keep the environment clean in other areas, I find that very offensive, because in fact we are doing something to help the environment as it pertains to Canada.

THE SPEAKER: Second Official Opposition main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. They could at least charge them enough to cover the cost.

Mr. Speaker, on Thursday the Minister of Finance said that intense capital development was one of the reasons we need the Swan Hills waste treatment plant. What specific development was the minister referring to in that answer?

MRS. NELSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, quite frankly, when you look around this province and you realize that we've had the largest capital investment per capita of any place in Canada and, I believe, North America over the last number of years, it doesn't take an awful lot to figure out that there are going to be some hazardous chemicals that have to be disposed of. While the hon. member opposite would have us believe that this is not a successful plant and one that we need, where would we take that hazardous waste? We would have to transport it. I don't believe, as far as I'm aware – and the Minister of Infrastructure again can supplement – that there's another facility that can dispose of this waste in North America. So that would mean transporting hazardous waste somewhere other than North America, and I quite frankly think that that would be extremely costly and not beneficial for Albertans. I'll ask the Minister of Infrastructure to give us some background as to where else this waste could go.

MR. LUND: This plant, Mr. Speaker, has the ability to not only incinerate but also to neutralize, to handle the various materials that come in in such a manner that they become benign to the environment. I find it a little bit disturbing when the hon. member seems to indicate: well, okay; we can charge a whole lot of money for this waste coming in from B.C. or Saskatchewan or our neighbours. That's fine to make that comment, but the fact is that there is a limit. Once you bump up against that limit, that waste may very well not be treated properly and in fact then harm the environment. As I said earlier, this material knows no boundary, so we could very well suffer in Alberta for waste that's disposed of improperly in other jurisdictions.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, it's the imported waste that they're not charging enough for.

Given that oil field waste is exempt from being treated at the plant – this waste is actually buried in the ground – what other intense capital development was the minister referring to on Thursday?

MRS. NELSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, I remember that when I was in a previous portfolio, there was talk about somebody wanting me at one point to fabricate oil field waste as hazardous when in fact it wasn't. Some of the chemicals have to go through the disposal, but a lot of the waste from oil field development goes back down the hole that it came out of.

I think the Minister of Environment would probably want to get in on the different types of categorizations, but there are things that are also disposed of up there that are on the medical side that are hazardous, some of the chemicals that have to go in, and I can relate to one. I'm aware of blue asbestos being transported to Swan Hills last summer to be disposed of, which is very, very dangerous if humans come in contact with it, and there was only one place for that to go to, and that was Swan Hills. I don't know whether the Minister of Environment wants to list off the various toxic wastes that go through that facility or whether the Minister of Infrastructure wants to.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister provide any documentation to this Assembly to show that Alberta industry generates toxic waste at a level to justify the taxpayers subsidizing a facility the size of the Swan Hills plant? Surely as the Minister of Finance she's looking at some backup for a $28 million line item.

MRS. NELSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, once again I'll ask the Minister of Infrastructure, who's in control of the daily operations of this facility, to take the question.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. LUND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I have said many times before, I find it rather offensive that the opposition would pretend that they want to protect the environment when in fact they want to criticize constantly that it is going to cost a little. The fact is that for every $250 that we spend in my budget, only $1 goes to the Swan Hills plant. If that is too much to spend to protect the environment, then I'm sorry; I don't agree. I don't believe it is too much to spend, and when I talk about what that plant does – just take a simple thing like the drugs, the drug roundup that we have and the other household waste that we have that we round up. That is disposed of totally with taxpayer dollars. There's no way that you can pick that up some other way. If you didn't dispose of it this way, where would it go? For example, the drugs end up in the wastewater treatment areas, so they don't get properly treated and they end up in the water. We're talking about different ways to protect our water resource, another great example of how the Swan Hills plant does that.

THE SPEAKER: Third Official Opposition main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Purported Remarks in the Assembly

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last Thursday disturbing comments were made in the Legislature that may be influencing government policy decisions. As a result of a question between the Premier and the leader of the third party on April 11 a side conversation occurred in the Legislature. In reviewing the Legislature Library tapes, we believe we heard the Finance minister state, "Is that the pedophile priest?" to which the government whip states, "Yeah, that's him," to which the Deputy Premier responds, "Most of the Calgary board are pedophiles." My questions are to the Deputy Premier. Will the Deputy Premier confirm that she said that most of the Calgary board are pedophiles?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Absolutely not, Mr. Speaker. I think this is a very serious accusation, and I certainly will want to review this. I did not make that statement, and I think the Leader of the Official Opposition should listen a little more carefully or identify voices more carefully. I think this is not the end of this question. I will look at this as a possible question of privilege.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. How do statements like that reflect policy decisions made by the government?

MRS. McCLELLAN: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I have categorically and most emphatically denied that I made that statement, so why a second question would refer to how statements such as this could affect policy is beyond me. As I indicated, I am going to look at this very seriously as a question of privilege.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Will the Deputy Premier direct the Speaker to release tapes so that we can all confirm exactly what was said?

THE SPEAKER: What?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, I believe I heard him say that I should direct . . .

Speaker's Ruling Speaker's Role

THE SPEAKER: Thank you very much. The hon. member's been here long enough to know that the Speaker is a servant of the House. The Speaker is elected here by secret ballot of all members of the House. The Speaker takes no direction from any member of the government.

The hon. leader of the third party.

Calgary Pastoral Letter on Bill 12

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last Thursday the Minister of Learning said in this House that he'll be sending a letter to Bishop Frederick Henry of Calgary explaining what's wrong with his pastoral letter on Bill 12. The minister further said, "I will be demanding that he send this letter to the parishioners that he distributed his letter to." My questions are to the Minister of Learning. With the weekend to think about it, will the minister agree that the bishop of Calgary has every right to express his views on Bill 12 in a pastoral letter without being subjected to threats and bullying from the Minister of Learning?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Learning.

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Bishop Henry has absolutely the right to say whatever he wants to his parishioners. I will also say, though, that being a citizen of Alberta, I have the right to correct what is said and attempt to give the facts to Bishop Henry, and it is up to Bishop Henry if he wants to parlay these facts to his parishioners. If he chooses not to give the facts to his parishioners, that is his decision.

1:50

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My second question to the Minister of Learning: why does the Minister of Learning persist in sending out the chilling message to anyone who disagrees with this government that you will be belittled, you will be insulted, and above all you will face the full wrath of this arrogant government?

DR. OBERG: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have quite a difficult time with this line of questioning when the hon. member has not even seen the letter that has been sent out. If I may quote from this, I was going to table the letter that was sent to Bishop Henry this morning, but I will say:

Bishop Henry, I know that when you speak on matters of public concern, you do so in the best interest of the community you serve and the province as a whole. I hope that you can appreciate that government does the same, and has made every honest endeavour to bring a reasonable and satisfactory end to the dispute with teachers. The importance of reaching such a conclusion is one point on which I trust we both can agree.

This will be tabled at the proper time in this session.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My last question to the Minister of Learning: will he withdraw his so-called demand that he made of the bishop on Thursday?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, I also have a very large problem with this line of questioning. When you have someone who is putting out a document that does not have what I feel are the proper facts – this hon. member is asking the bishop not to put out my letter, which does have the facts on Bill 12, which has our side . . .

DR. PANNU: I'm asking you to withdraw the demand. That's all I'm asking.

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, then very briefly, the answer is no. I believe that the parishioners of the Catholic church in Calgary are entitled to know the facts.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Chronic Wasting Disease in Elk

MR. LOUGHEED: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is for the Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development, and it's on behalf of elk ranchers in Alberta, who are asking the question: what should they do with their animals now that a case of chronic wasting disease has been discovered and has eliminated the possibility of export to Saskatchewan or U.S. hunt ranches?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, certainly the discovery of an elk with chronic wasting disease in this province is of great concern to us. However, I do think that elk ranchers should be heartened by the fact that our surveillance for this disease successfully identified the animal, and a costly recall of meat was avoided. I think that our elk ranchers have to remain patient. They have to have continued confidence in the surveillance and that that will continue. I believe that our ability to trace farmed deer and elk through their entire lifetime is a great asset in isolating and eradicating a diseased animal for the protection and benefit of the entire elk industry.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. LOUGHEED: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister: under current constraints of no exports and no market for velvet and no market for elk meat the industry could die over a period of a few years. Should the government shut the industry down?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, I think that the prediction of the demise of the industry is premature. The market opportunities for the farm on which the elk that was affected with chronic wasting disease – certainly the market opportunities for that farm are limited, but other elk farmers are able to continue to market their animals. To protect the public, the meat is always held until the animal has been tested and is declared clear. So when that occurs, then that meat is sold. I think the basis of one farm being affected in the province certainly doesn't indicate that the entire industry is. We've got to continue to support the CFIA, the Canadian Food Inspection Agency, in control measures and eradication of this disease and, I believe, research to better understand this disease and how it occurs. This means surveillance, this means monitoring, this means testing, it means research and, certainly, facilitating the tracing of animals, and we'll continue to do that.

MR. LOUGHEED: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A final supplemental to the same minister: if the industry in fact does die over a period of a few years, animals will be lost, they'll be released, and farms will go bankrupt. Does the government have any plans for assisting in a windup of this industry?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I don't like to speculate on the possible demise of an industry because we don't expect this industry to die. Therefore, we don't have plans to wind up the industry. We're going to continue to work with the industry to diversify, to develop their markets, to re-establish their velvet antler and breeding stock markets. I think we do that best through increased surveillance and mandatory testing.

Mr. Speaker, I should say that for those farms that are affected and those farms that are having difficulties through this difficult time, we do have a farm income disaster program, which the elk farmers and ranchers are certainly able to avail themselves of, and any agricultural farm program that is in place could be applicable to this industry. We encourage members of this industry that are experiencing difficulties to consult with our department.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

Provincial Fiscal Policies

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last Thursday the Premier announced that the government will contemplate yet another radical change to the budget process by trading in oil and gas futures, or hedging. The Department of Revenue in the state of Alaska, after studying this issue extensively, stated that they are not an advocate of hedging and don't sense much enthusiasm for it from state officials or from knowledgeable private individuals. My first question is to the Minister of Finance. If the province of Alberta needed to put up hundreds of millions in tax dollars to cover margin requirements in a futures-based program, how would that be financed?

Thank you.

MRS. NELSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, the concept of hedging is not something that is new. A number of private-sector entities use hedging components in their financial mix, as do a number of governments. We've been looking at some of the scenarios that are obvious and present. Naturally, all people familiar with hedging would know that you wouldn't take all of your resource base and put it into a hedging program. That wouldn't make sense whatsoever. You'd put too much at risk. What you are trying to do in a hedge is protect against a downward slide in revenue base so that you have some certainty and some ability to manage the risk on the downward trend.

In governments, though, it is difficult. If you only manage the downward trend, you may miss the upward trend as well. So there are components and groups that do provide insurance on the upside as well as the downward slide. We are looking at this. We're looking at volatility. We've asked the Financial Management Commission to review potentials for us. We've been in contact with some large players to see what kinds of components are available. Once again, no one would put all of their revenue into a hedge if they had any idea of what they were doing.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My next question is to the Minister of Revenue. What consultations has the Minister of Revenue had with the Minister of Justice to determine if there are any legal issues at stake for the government in the establishment of this hedging program?

Thank you.

MR. MELCHIN: At this stage the Financial Review Commission, as mentioned by the hon. Minister of Finance, is reviewing those topics with regards to hedging, and that's the extent of the work at this time.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the Minister of Finance: why not swallow the government's pride and adopt as government policy the Alberta Liberal fiscal stability fund as outlined by the Leader of the Official Opposition?

MRS. NELSON: That's a really easy one, Mr. Speaker. So far the stability funds that the Liberals have put forward in each case have been drastic failures, and we're looking for positives on this side. I might turn them in a direction where they can spend some time researching. There are other hedges that they might look at that are quite successful and have had some positives as opposed to some of the ones that they've put forward.

I would remind hon. members opposite that stabilization funds are usually put in place when revenues are high. While they've been whining and bellyaching and complaining for the last three years about having additional dollars for this, that, and whatever may come down the street, this has been the highest revenue base that this province has ever experienced. So those additional dollars would have been, in their formula, not available for their projects and their whining but going over into stabilization funds. We preferred to pay off debt to free up the interest-expense dollars forever, which we reduced by over $1 billion, which was gone from the equation forever. Their idea was to live off in some fun program.

Now, just a place they might want to look for some new information is SaskEnergy. It's the Saskatchewan Crown corporation that runs their program. They have some hedging opportunities that may help them out with some of their research, so go in that direction for a little while.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

High School Enrollment Credits

MR. MASKELL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've received questions from my constituents and from former principal and teacher colleagues regarding changes to high school enrollment credits, especially those that will affect grade 10 students. This month grade 9 students are planning their high school program. There's a lot of confusion about the changes, and it is creating anxiety. My questions are for the Minister of Learning. Would you please clarify what changes are being made?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Quite simply, in grade 10 we are going away from the CEU funding to a standard per student type of funding. Grade 10 students will receive $4,997 if they take anywhere from 31 credits and above. For 30 credits and below they will receive $2,498.50. I believe that this is a very important step forward as it decreases the amount of administration. It does a lot of other things to simplify the administration for these students.

MR. MASKELL: Again to the same minister: how will this change affect students enrolled in integrated occupation programs and in the IB program?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, in essence, there will be no effect on these students. They will receive the same funding, the $4,997 per student funding, and I will reiterate that this is roughly $630 more than what that same student would receive in grade 9. The other point I will add is that children with severe disabilities will receive 10 percent more funding than they did prior to this.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member?

Funding for Nursing Programs

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The number of nurses per 10,000 population has fallen in Alberta from 80 to less than 75. The situation has been labeled very dangerous for future years. My first question is to the Minister of Learning. Why has the government failed to fund the new U of A nursing program for degree holders?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In direct response to the question, each new program is put through what is called the access fund, and we look at each one. This year the access fund was suspended. I hope that it will be back in budget 2003. It may or may not be.

The interesting point that the hon. member really needs to take home, though, is that presently we have 31 percent more nursing grads this year than we did in '93-94, so we are moving ahead with nursing. We recognize that there are shortages. Just last year, for example, we put in the accelerated nursing program to get more nurses into the hospitals. So, Mr. Speaker, this is a very important question, and it is a very important response that we are taking.

DR. MASSEY: My second question is to the Minister of Health and Wellness. Will nursing costs not increase as more overtime is needed to cover nursing shortages in the province?

MR. MAR: Well, it's true that in the current iteration of our health care system we do not have enough nurses, and we have worked at improving the numbers. I point out, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps one of the most important things we'll do is deal with the recommendations set out in the report by the Premier's Advisory Council on Health. In that report – and we are working on the 44 recommendations that were given in that report – it did talk about putting better incentives in for attracting and retaining and making the best use of health providers. That's not only nurses; it's about other health care providers as well. In keeping with the spirit of that recommendation, we are developing a comprehensive health workforce strategy. We are using and developing a forecasting model that will help us better identify the need for health care professionals. We are working with regulated professions like registered nurses, licensed practical nurses, and psychiatric nurses to ensure that they are working to the full scope of their practice. So the issue about the costs associated with overtime for nurses is a legitimate issue, but we are working towards solving it.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member?

Savings as a Result of Teachers' Strikes

MR. VANDERBURG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When Budget 2002 was announced by the Finance minister, the Minister of Learning announced that the savings as a result of the teachers' strike would be returned to the school boards. The budget documents highlight that these funds would be provided to the school jurisdictions before the end of March, yet in talking to my constituents in Whitecourt-Ste. Anne, the school boards have indicated that they have not yet received these funds. My question is to the Minister of Learning. Can you advise me, sir, what's happened to these funds?

DR. OBERG: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. The cheques were cut and sent out on March 28 of this year. They were not given a special status, so I would suggest to the school boards that the hon. member has that they take a look. They were included in the per student grant, but those cheques have been cut and have been sent out.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. VANDERBURG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question again to the same minister: are there any restrictions on these funds that went back to the school boards?

DR. OBERG: No, Mr. Speaker. That particular fund went into the funding envelope of the per student funds, so apart from the rules on the per student funding grant there is no special rule that is attached to those funds.

MR. VANDERBURG: Again to the same minister: why weren't these funds just included in the basic grant to the school boards?

DR. OBERG: Well, Mr. Speaker, these were savings that accumulated this year from the strike, and rather than taking them and working with them, what we decided to do was transfer them forward so that the school boards could use them in the upcoming year. They are being used to the full advantage of the school system, which is what we always intended. These savings were from the strike, so we felt that they had to be put back into the educational institutions, and that's what we did.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

Funding for Community Sports Programs

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. After the Future Summit the participants agreed that one of its top priorities was to make Albertans more accountable and responsible for their own health. Community sports programs were identified as an important tool for reaching this goal. My question is to the Minister of Gaming. How does the reduction of funding for sports programs and the elimination of the community lottery boards support the Future Summit and the government's goal of making Albertans more responsible for their own health?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. STEVENS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think it's important for the hon. member opposite to understand that at this point in time the charitable model that we have in Alberta provides about $300 million annually for the not-for-profit groups in Alberta.

AN HON. MEMBER: How much?

MR. STEVENS: Three hundred million dollars. That is a substantial amount of money, and there is one particular foundation that is funded specifically with a view to assisting a sport. That is a foundation under Community Development. But $300 million is a great deal of money, and the sporting organizations in the province have access to a great portion of that.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, given that before cutting the lottery boards, the government cut the quarterly grant program that was specific for sports programs and told those same sports groups that they should then apply to the community lottery board for funding, where does the minister now propose these groups go for funding?

MR. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I think it's important for the hon. member opposite to appreciate that we had a difficult decision this year to make with respect to the budget, and that gave rise to the discontinuance of the community lottery board program. However, looking forward to the next fiscal year, I'm happy to say that about $20 million additional funding will go into our various foundations, including additional money into Community Development and, as such, additional money into the foundation which supports sports programs.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: could the minister explain why his particular department is undermining the minister of health by cutting funding for community sports programs?

MR. STEVENS: I think it's fair to say, Mr. Speaker, that $300 million for not-for-profit groups in this province is beyond what any other province in this country does for its volunteers. Many of the volunteer groups that access those funds are in fact involved with community sports. They are building facilities; they are providing operating funds. I think that if the hon. member took some time to see what was happening in that area, she would in fact be very proud indeed of what is happening in this province.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands, followed by the hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Bill 12, Education Services Settlement Act

MR. MASON: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. In late March during the heat of the public debate over Bill 12, the government asked deputy ministers to send an e-mail message to public service employees containing the government's spin on this legislation. I will table copies of this correspondence at the appropriate time. This makes the government's criticism of Bishop Henry's pastoral letter all the more offensive and hypocritical. It's really a question of the Pat calling the kettle black. My question is to the Deputy Premier and Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development. Why did the minister have her deputy send to all employees in the ministry of agriculture an e-mail containing the government's spin on Bill 12 when this communication has nothing whatsoever to do with the business of this ministry?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, in that question I think I'm being asked to explain why another minister did something.

MR. MASON: No. Why you did it.

MRS. McCLELLAN: No. That's not the way I heard it, but I'm going to ask the Minister of Learning if he would like to enlighten us on this.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

DR. OBERG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Quite simply, we have some 22,000 public service employees in our employ, and as Bill 12 was reasonably controversial, we decided that it was extremely important for our own employees to hear from us as to what Bill 12 was all about, to give them an explanation of the bill, and that's what occurred. A committee of deputy ministers led by my deputy minister suggested that these letters be sent out to our employees, explaining what Bill 12 is. Our employees are equally the citizens of Alberta as anyone else and are entitled to the facts.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Then to the Learning minister: how can the Learning minister stand in this House and attack the bishop for distributing his view on the bill, demand that his particular spin be included by the church, yet do exactly the same thing with every government employee regardless of the department that they work for?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, a fact is a fact is a fact, and regardless of who distributes the facts, they're still the facts.

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Learning if he will demand that deputy ministers distribute a copy of Bishop Henry's critique of Bill 12 to all government employees.

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, if Bishop Henry would like his letter distributed, then that's up to him to go ahead and distribute it. He delivered it to his parishioners; we delivered it to our employees. If he wants to deliver it to non-Catholics, then I guess that's up to him as well.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Richardson's Ground Squirrel Control

MR. MARZ: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My questions today are to the Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development. With the arrival of spring farmers are faced with their annual challenge of controlling a pest that causes a lot of damage to crops, pastureland, and livestock as well. That pest is the Richardson's ground squirrel, or gopher, as it's also commonly referred to. I hear some chuckles around, but I've lost a couple of animals myself that stepped into these holes and broke their legs and subsequently had to be put down. One of them was my child's pony, so it wasn't a very funny thing. Last year's pilot program which distributed premixed strychnine to grain farmers through their municipalities had mixed success. Although the product was an effective control when applied in a timely manner, weather conditions such as we see outside today do not always allow for the timely application, especially when premixed product is only available at limited times, and if it's stored for four or five days, it gets moldy, which renders it useless.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Question.

MR. MARZ: My question, which the opposition is so anxious to hear, is: what is the minister doing to assure farmers of an adequate supply of 2 percent strychnine for gopher control this spring?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, Alberta Agriculture, Food and Rural Development has been granted registration again by the Pest Management Regulatory Agency out of Health Canada for the agricultural use of strychnine. This period is from February to the end of June 2002. This does allow our agricultural field men to mix 2 percent liquid strychnine with fresh oats supplied by the producer.

Mr. Speaker, the one thing I can assure the hon. members is that the Ag field men have a sufficient supply of strychnine poison on hand at least to start the season, and it is our expectation that by the middle of May we will have more supply. This is a concern because we had a very, very huge problem with Richardson's ground squirrels last year. Of course, we're going to ask municipalities to share their supply if there's an area that has a higher level of need, and hopefully that'll get us through the beginning of the season.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MARZ: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: when will farmers be able to purchase 2 percent strychnine that they'll be able to mix themselves so they can apply it in a more timely and effective manner?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Well, Mr. Speaker, we would like to see farmers be able to mix the bait themselves, but currently under the Pest Management Regulatory Agency the conditions of approval do not permit that. At this time through that regulation, which is through Health Canada, only the Ag field men are allowed to do the mix. I think that we in the agricultural community should be thankful and I guess appreciative of the fact that we've received this temporary registration for the use of this product again to deal with a very difficult situation.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MARZ: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister: could the minister perhaps tell me what other approved controls for Richardson's ground squirrels are readily available to farmers that are equally as effective as the 2 percent strychnine?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Well, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of things that are available to control this. One is poison. Secondly, I guess, is trapping. Fumigation is another, and of course shooting is another. Each one of these things can provide a favourable result, but every one of them, obviously, has its limits. Poisoning with treated grain is the most effective and most common method that's available to producers at this time, and strychnine poison is certainly the most effective in that area. There are other control agencies, one called Rozol concentrate, zinc phosphide, but as I indicated, all of these have limits. The best time to control Richardson's ground squirrels is just before vegetation turns green in the spring, when they're undernourished, so the best and the most effective way is to feed them a poisoned grain.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview, followed by the hon. Member for Dunvegan.

Education Fund-raising

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Parents of schoolchildren in one of Edmonton's richest neighbourhoods have written to me to say that they continue to subsidize the education system by thousands of dollars annually through their fund-raising efforts. Bill 12 does nothing to address this symptom of the government's chronic underfunding of education. To the Minister of Learning: if even affluent parents must fund-raise in order to buy their children essential school supplies, will the minister finally end his denial of the obvious and take the necessary steps to provide the needed resources in all schools?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would give me the name of the school, I will certainly look into it. I've been in contact with the superintendents of both Edmonton public and Edmonton Catholic, who have assured me that this is not occurring. For the edification of the hon. member opposite, there in all likelihood will be some regulations coming forward that will change all of that very soon.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll provide the names of the parents.

If parents withdraw their voluntary services as well as teachers, which some parents are considering, how will the minister keep the education system afloat?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, each student in the province of Alberta receives roughly $7,500 in total per student. Do the math. If there are 20 students, that's $150,000 or so for a classroom that is designated for that, so there is a considerable amount of money.

There is fund-raising that goes on that does pay for extra things such as rock-climbing walls, all of this. We've had this discussion numerous times. Each and every time that something has been brought forward to me, I put it forward to my department to investigate. We recently had, for example, 22 investigations in Edmonton. There were a couple of them, I will say, that were fund-raising for things like textbooks. We have put an end to that.

Mr. Speaker, the offer is open to the hon. member. I'd be more than happy to send my audit team to this school to make sure that that isn't happening in this school.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final question to the same minister: will the minister commit to meeting with the parents of this school in my constituency who have expressed these concerns?

DR. OBERG: I'm sure I'd have no problem at all, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Dunvegan, followed by the hon. Member for Redwater.

Vehicle Accidents Involving Wildlife

MR. GOUDREAU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As individuals living in rural constituencies like Dunvegan, we often find ourselves competing for space with the wildlife that also live in the area. Lately this has been a lot more challenging with the increase in elk and deer. We have experienced problems both on our roads and around our farms and homes with these animals. My first question is to the Minister of Sustainable Resource Development. Is there anything that is being done to reduce the hundreds of motor vehicle accidents involving wildlife?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. CARDINAL: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. That is a very important question, especially for the member in the northwestern part of the province. There have been, of course, large increases in elk and deer populations because of the recent mild winters we've had here in Alberta. In fact, there have been over 6,000 accidents.

DR. TAYLOR: How many, Mike?

MR. CARDINAL: Over 6,000 accidents, a 40 percent increase over the last seven years.

Our department of course works very closely to establish deer populations across the province, and we are currently, in fact, developing a deer management strategy which will look at things such as promoting the number of informed hunters out there and also possibly increasing the number of tags that would be available to hunters in that area.

MR. GOUDREAU: My second question is also to the same minister. Not only are these animals causing problems on our roads, but they're also moving into our yards and causing a lot of damage to feed. This is very dangerous as well as economically destructive. Can the same minister tell us if there are ways to reduce this damage?

MR. CARDINAL: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That is why in fact we are developing an overall deer and elk strategy in Alberta. We are experiencing a lot of problems because one thing that has happened, I believe, is that there are not only the warm winters, but also the deer and elk have become pretty tame in Alberta, and they are starting to wander into even towns and different communities throughout the province. A lot of animals are also spending time on highways, and that creates additional problems. So we will continue monitoring the situation and ensuring that we deal with these issues.

The other thing we need to do for sure is to ensure that our highways are marked properly, because an individual that travels on a certain part of rural roads generally knows where the animals are, but any strangers that travel in those areas would not know unless there is signage on the road. So we will be doing that.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Redwater, followed by the hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul.

Publicly Funded Health Services

MR. BRODA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is to the Minister of Health and Wellness. I received a letter from one of my constituents expressing concern over the possible delisting of insured services. The individual is worried that they will not be able to continue treatments with chiropractic services if they're removed from the list of services that are publicly funded. Those on fixed incomes cannot afford to pay the full cost of these appointments. Have any decisions been made about which allied services will continue to be funded through the Alberta health care insurance plan?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, the short answer is no, although the government is working on the recommendations set out in the Premier's Advisory Council on Health to include the recommendation to establish a permanent expert review panel to make decisions on what services and treatments are publicly funded. The department is currently working on reviewing the applications for positions on that committee, and I hope to be able to make announcements with respect to it by the end of this month. The panel will be making recommendations on all services that are currently funded by the public health care system, including developing criteria to determine which new procedures and treatments should be publicly funded. At that time chiropractic treatments and other allied health services would be reviewed.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. BRODA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My first supplement to the same minister: what qualifications are required to sit on this expert panel?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, the panel will have a total of 10 members, and eight of those members will be selected for their expertise either in the medical, clinical, or health policy areas. There will be, in accordance with the recommendations suggested by the Alberta Medical Association, two members that will be selected from the public. There were public advertisements in daily newspapers throughout the province. Approximately 150 people applied, and two public members will be selected from that 150.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. BRODA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My second supplemental to the same minister: having heard this, does the minister see any potential for conflict of interest if medical practitioners are in a position to determine which services will remain on the roster of publicly funded services and which would be paid directly by the patient?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, of course there is a potential for conflict, but we have tried our very best to address it in a number of different ways. As an example, the medical and clinical members of the panel will come from varied fields, so the interests of one particular member may be balanced against the concerns of others. But as a group the panel will be required to review all services and agree on the medical necessity of each before making a funding recommendation. Of course, members who feel that they are in a conflict of interest may excuse themselves from reviewing any particular issue. Also, because we are bringing in members from the general public, they will represent the interests of patients and consumers of health care services.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, before a final appointment to the expert panel each potential member will meet with the province's Ethics Commissioner to discuss their personal financial interests, and the commissioner will determine if there is any reason that the member should be disqualified from the panel.

Leaders of Tomorrow Awards

MR. JOHNSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Recently I had the pleasure of attending the Leaders of Tomorrow awards presentation in Camrose. These awards are given to young volunteers in four age categories between six and 21 years of age who have demonstrated outstanding dedication and excellence in their community service and work. These awards were sponsored by the Bethany Group, Boston Pizza, and the Volunteer Centre of Camrose & District. Nineteen outstanding young people from Camrose and surrounding area were nominated to receive Leaders of Tomorrow awards, and the recipients of the awards in their age categories were Brandon Morris, Billy Staggs, Asher LaGrange, and Michelle Jensen. This was a particularly memorable occasion for the nominees and audience alike as the guest speaker and awards presenter was our Lieutenant Governor, the Hon. Lois Hole. Thank you to the sponsors for making these awards possible, and congratulations to all the nominees and award recipients for the contributions they have made to our communities and for the important work they do as volunteers.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Speaker.

Rescue Commendation Award to Highwood Constituents

MR. TANNAS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I wish to recognize the brave actions of young Highwood constituents Nicholas Koch, Daniel Fuller, and Danny Doyle. On May 23, 2001, David was playing in a shallow area of the Sheep River near Riverside Community Park in Okotoks when he picked up a large rock, threw it in the water, but forgot to let go and fell face first into deeper water, only to be swept downstream by the strong current. Brandi, David's mother, immediately jumped into the water, and she herself was swept away. Both were now in danger of drowning. Fortunately, Nicholas, Daniel, and Danny, all from Okotoks, had seen this situation take place and immediately sprang into action. Nicholas was the first to enter the water and then headed towards David. He was able to grab hold of David and started swimming back to shore when he heard the mother's cry for help. Nicholas called out that Brandi was in trouble and needed their help. Daniel and Danny swam out to Brandi and assisted her back to shore. Although badly shaken by their near fatal experience, no injuries were a result.

For their quick actions these three lads were presented with the rescue commendation award and the lifesaving medal for merit at a special ceremony on March 18 by Her Honour the Lieutenant Governor, Lois Hole, with His Highness Prince Michael in attendance.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

Spruce Grove Junior B Regals

MR. HORNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today it's with great pleasure that I rise in the House to bring recognition and congratulations to the Spruce Grove junior B Regals hockey team. On the weekend of April 5 the Spruce Grove junior B Regals won the provincial title with a precedent 5 and 0 record. As well, the team was the host of the provincials in Spruce Grove and did an excellent job. As a parent who is a part-time assistant coach and who loves the sport of hockey, I would like to congratulate their coach, Cam Aplin, who led the 18 to 20 year olds to this victory. The team prides itself on being homegrown, as the majority of members have come up through the Spruce Grove minor hockey league. They say that the chemistry on the bench of these young men was outstanding and certainly one of the contributing factors to such a successful season.

This past weekend the junior B Regals traveled to Assiniboia, Saskatchewan, where they represented Alberta in the westerns. It was a tough and emotional weekend as the team went into the final game, again undefeated, to play the host team. As the final game entered the third period, the score was a 1-1 tie, but late in the third the host team scored, and the Regals could not get one back.

I want to extend my constituency's and the province's pride as they represented Alberta well as great Alberta ambassadors in the sport of hockey.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

Calgary Pastoral Letter on Bill 12

MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to recognize the courage and determination of Albertans who stand up for what they believe is in the public interest. Our cherished freedoms of thought, belief, opinion, and expression are all too often castigated by members of this government when people legitimately criticize government policy. Albertans from various walks of life seek to make our province better and recognize that a government has no monopoly on defining how this is done.

In particular, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to recognize the courage and leadership of Bishop Henry of Calgary. Bishop Henry knows the value of a good education system and is prepared to stand up and fight for it. Bishop Henry also knows the price one has to pay for taking a contrary stand to the government.

Mr. Speaker, let us recognize that opposing voices strengthen our democracy and commend them for their courage in speaking out for fairness. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Redwater.

Radway STARS Ambulance Fund-raiser

MR. BRODA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to recognize the community of Radway and surrounding area for their excellent STARS air ambulance fund-raiser held Saturday, April 13, at the Radway Agricentre. Approximately $40,000 was raised, which includes a private donation of $15,000 from the Maurice Tomlinson family in memory of Matthew Melnyk and Michael Senych, both of whom had recently passed away as a result of injuries sustained in motor vehicle accidents and STARS ambulance had to be used.

Thank you, Radway and area, to all volunteers and supporters. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Air Spray Ltd.

MRS. JABLONSKI: Mr. Speaker, the spirit of Alberta is alive and well at the Red Deer Regional Airport. Despite the overwhelming challenge of a fire in October 2000 that completely destroyed their hangar, wiped out seven aircraft, and took the life of an employee who suffered severe burns, the management and staff of Air Spray Ltd. are determined to keep flying.

On April 5, 2002, Donald T. Hamilton, founder and owner of Air Spray Ltd., celebrated along with his staff, his friends, the aviation community, and local officials the grand opening of their new 51,000 square foot hangar at the Red Deer Regional Airport. The new $2.7 million hangar represents a major investment and commitment to aviation in Alberta and will provide a significant economic boost to Red Deer and surrounding area. It was in 1970 that Don Hamilton saw the opportunity for fire bombing to fight forest fires in Alberta. Starting with a single Douglas B-26 and a leased Cessna 310, Air Spray is now recognized as one of the leading fire bombing companies in the world, with over 40 aircraft and 50 professional pilots and engineers.

Congratulations to Don Hamilton, Richard Covlin, and Perry Dancause. We wish you blue skies and safe flight.

Emergency Medical Services

DR. TAFT: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the women and men across this province who provide emergency medical services. One of the comforts of living in a major city is that emergency medical services, including well-trained personnel, good equipment, and fine emergency wards, are almost always available within minutes. Through helicopter services such as STARS these services are accessible far beyond the big cities, though as a society we can do still more for rural Albertans.

People are drawn to this kind of work out of a passionate desire to serve others at their most needy moments. Though this kind of work is undoubtedly interesting, challenging, and rewarding, it is also difficult. We ask these people to be available to respond instantly to crises 24 hours a day, 365 days a year, and at times we ask them to attend to genuinely horrific and occasionally dangerous situations with calm and clearheaded professionalism, instantly assessing and acting on life-and-death situations.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure every member of the Legislature will join me in saluting Emergency Medical Services Awareness Week to say thank you to the paramedics, nurses, technicians, doctors, dispatchers, drivers, pilots, and others who always stand ready to serve.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table a petition signed by 682 Albertans requesting the Legislative Assembly to urge the government to "support the establishment of the Chinchaga Wilderness as a legislated protected area." I presented a similar petition with 500 signatures last week.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am presenting a petition signed by 75 residents of Edmonton petitioning the Legislative Assembly to urge the government "to not delist services, raise health care premiums, introduce user fees or further privatize" the health care system.

head: Notices of Motions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll rise on a question of privilege this afternoon.

head: Introduction of Bills

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Child Welfare Amendment Act, 2002 (No. 2)

MS EVANS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce a bill being Child Welfare Amendment Act, 2002 (No. 2).

[Motion carried; Bill 24 read a first time]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Revenue.

Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment Act, 2002

MR. MELCHIN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce Bill 25, the Alberta Corporate Tax Amendment Act, 2002.

The amendments in this bill enact the second phase in the reduction of the corporate income tax rates in Alberta as announced in Budget 2002. It will also parallel a number of changes that have been made recently in the federal Income Tax Act.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 25 read a first time]

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Finance.

MRS. NELSON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have four tablings today. My first tabling is the appropriate number of copies of a letter of apology, dated April 12, which I sent to Bishop Frederick Henry.

I am also tabling the appropriate number of copies of section 42 of the Financial Administration Act.

In addition, I am tabling the appropriate number of copies of the Special Waste Management Corporation Act.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I am tabling the appropriate number of copies of the Special Waste Management Corporation Act Repeal Act.

These last three tablings each relate to the purported point of privilege raised by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie on Thursday of last week, which I will be responding to later today.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, two sets of tablings today. The first is a letter to Randy Ferbey care of the Ottewell Curling Club and to his teammates – Dave Nedohin, Scott Pfeifer, Marcel Rocque, and Dan Holowaychuk – on winning the 2002 men's world curling championships this weekend in Bismarck, North Dakota. Congratulations, gentlemen.

The second tabling is to a group of outstanding Alberta artists who captured several Juno awards this weekend, including Chad Kroeger and the Nickelback group with fellow musicians and singers Mike Kroeger, Ryan Peake, and Ryan Vikedal. These are some outstanding examples of talent from the Hanna-Brooks area in our province. They won the best single, best group, and best rock album Junos.

MRS. McCLELLAN: And their grandfather was a member of the Assembly.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Their grandfather was a former Member of this Legislative Assembly, Henry Kroeger, of course.

Also to Jann Arden, who won the best songwriter Juno; Oscar Lopez, who won the Juno for best instrumental album; and finally to Canada's country sweetheart, Carolyn Dawn Johnson, who was awarded the Juno for best country artist. Congratulations to all of these Juno award winners.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Learning.

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table a letter to the Most Reverend Frederick B. Henry, Bishop of Calgary. This letter has been alluded to already in the Assembly. What it is is purveying the facts about Bill 12 to him.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two sets of tablings today. The first is on behalf of the Leader of the Official Opposition, who is tabling the required number of copies of a letter to Mr. Randy Ferbey of the Ottewell Curling Club congratulating him and his team on winning the Ford world curling championship.

The second set of tablings is the appropriate number of copies from Nora Maidman of Dalemead, Ted Mann of Calgary, Kathryn Pennington of Calgary, Janet Pennington of Calgary, Ava Morasch of Calgary, and Ian Fabris of Calgary, all requesting the government to designate the Bighorn wildland recreation area as a wildland park using the 1986 boundaries.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings this afternoon. The first is a petition organized by Darby Mahon of Edmonton-Gold Bar, and it's a petition supporting public and separate school trustees in their negotiations with the provincial government.

My second tabling is a copy of the new policy for listening to audiotapes of remarks that are taped in this Legislative Assembly.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a couple of tablings here today. The first is the information package that was handed out at the launch of the Zebra Child Protection Centre, and that was opened in the constituency of Edmonton-Centre on Friday, April 12. This is a child-centred facility, fully integrating systems of services for children [focusing on] total wellness of children, their families, and the community, with an emphasis on protection, investigation, and preventative measures.

The second is the appropriate number of copies of the newsletter called the Federation News from the Edmonton Federation of Community Leagues with a budget overview and how the cuts of the community lottery boards and other lottery fund cuts are affecting community leagues.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, an e-mail from Lisa J. Sierra asking that the government overturn the vote against funding the Calgary community lottery board and commenting that it's been a valuable program to her personally and professionally. Thank you very much.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have one tabling today, the appropriate number of copies of a document signed by 60 residents of Calgary. It says:

We the undersigned citizens of Alberta petition the Legislative Assembly to urge the government to alleviate funding constraints and budget deficits, which are undermining services to persons with developmental disabilities.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Two tablings for today. My first tabling is the appropriate number of copies of my letter that I wrote to the Premier this morning regarding the malicious, disrespectful, and insulting remarks the Minister of Finance directed against Bishop Frederick Henry.

My second tabling, Mr. Speaker, is the appropriate copies of a letter from Phillip and Eileen Walker of Edmonton asking the Premier to "demand" the Finance minister's resignation for slurring Bishop Henry.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm tabling five copies of a letter from Dr. David Fleiger headed "Bishop Henry – 10; Tories – 0," pointing out that thousands of Catholic and non-Catholic Christians in Alberta are offended by the Finance minister's offensive remarks respecting Bishop Henry. [Music was heard in the Chamber] That was some divine accompaniment.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, we have several matters to review this afternoon, and we'll go in this order. First of all, we'll deal with the purported point of privilege that was raised originally last Thursday afternoon by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, and the chair will invite her to provide additional comments if she so chooses. Then we will recognize a spokesperson from the government to participate in this point, and other members as well, of course, under the rules that we have. Then we will proceed with the hearing of a point of order as identified by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, and then we will proceed to a question of privilege that will be raised by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, and then we will proceed to a point of privilege that will be raised by the hon. Deputy Premier. We will go in that order.

So, first of all, hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, is there something further that you wanted to add to what you added to on Thursday last?

Privilege Contempt of the Assembly

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will just perhaps clarify a couple of remarks. What we asked for under the point of privilege was in fact a contempt against the Premier and the Finance minister in terms of the dealings with the Swan Hills waste treatment plant. We believe that they have broken the Financial Administration Act through entering back into business with that plant, and the intent of that act is broken by the receipt or the expenses of any moneys on behalf of the government.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Finance on this purported point of privilege.

MRS. NELSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the Premier and myself I am rising in response to the purported point of privilege raised in this House on Thursday last by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie. Earlier today I tabled section 42 of the Financial Administration Act, because the hon. member has referred to that section in raising her purported point of privilege, although I believe she is mistaken in her reference to the specific section of the act.

In her statement in the House last Thursday the hon. member said:

In section 42 it states that before getting back into the business of being in business, the deal must be brought to the Assembly for full debate.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, nowhere in section 42 of the Financial Administration Act does it say anything of the sort. While the Financial Administration Act does set out clear guidelines on what sort of partnerships or share purchases this government may or may not engage in, the current operation of the Swan Hills Treatment Centre does not fall into any of these categories.

For the benefit of all hon. members I would like to outline a brief history of transactions involving the Swan Hills plant. In July of 1996 the Special Waste Management Corporation sold the plant to Bovar. Under an agreement signed at that time, Bovar had the right to revert the plant to the corporation, that being the Special Waste Management Corporation. This agreement with Bovar was outside the terms of section 42 of the Financial Administration Act. The Special Waste Management Corporation's enabling legislation, which I tabled earlier today, provided the authority for the sales agreement with Bovar and has been in place since 1984. Section 42 of the Financial Administration Act came into force in May of 1996, so section 42 did not apply to the corporation's activities. Further, even if section 42 had applied to the corporation, an asset sales agreement of this nature would not have contravened section 42.

In May of 1997 this Assembly passed the Special Waste Management Corporation Act Repeal Act, a copy of which I have also tabled today. This act was also the subject of debate by members of both sides of the House. Under the terms of the repeal act the government became liable for all obligations of the Special Waste Management Corporation, including the obligation to take back the plant in the event that Bovar's ownership of the facility ceased.

On December 31, 2000, Bovar's ownership in the Swan Hills Treatment Centre ended, and the plant reverted to government ownership. At that point a service-provider agreement was signed with Sensor Environmental Services to operate the plant under government ownership. Sensor is an independent service provider operating the facility under a contract on behalf of the government. The province of Alberta remains the sole owner of the facility. The Financial Administration Act prevents this government from entering into a share purchase or a joint venture partnership. The contract with Sensor is neither of these. Under the terms of the contract the government of Alberta remains the sole owner of the facility. Swan Hills Treatment Centre is owned through the Ministry of Infrastructure just as is done with many other wholly-owned facilities.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie also raised a number of concerns in her purported point of privilege about information she has or has not received from other departments regarding the Swan Hills facility. If the hon. member feels that her questions about the facility itself have not been satisfied, I would encourage her to approach the ministers directly involved, but I see no relevance to the Financial Administration Act in any of those matters. The simple fact is that the hon. member is not correct when she alleges that the government is in noncompliance with the Financial Administration Act. The government is not in partnership or joint venture with the private entity.

The hon. member opposite has also raised concerns about the inclusion of operating and capital investment revenue for the Swan Hills Treatment Centre as a line item in the budget of Alberta Infrastructure. This is a normal procedure for a wholly-owned government facility and represents all the costs and revenues associated with the government's ownership of this facility. It is abundantly clear that Sensor is in no way co-owner of Swan Hills Treatment Centre. The plant remains a wholly-owned facility of the government of Alberta.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is clear to me and I hope it is clear to any member in the opposition that no breach of the Financial Administration Act has taken place. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: Are there additional members who wish to provide guidance/advice with respect to this matter?

Well, the matter will be reviewed now on the basis of the information ascertained today and the information ascertained the other day, and hopefully tomorrow we'll be in a position to provide a statement with respect to it.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

Point of Order Abusive or Insulting Language

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order pursuant to Standing Order 23(j). Standing Order 23 states that a member will be called to order by the Speaker if, in the Speaker's opinion, that member . . .

(j) uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to [cause] disorder.

In asking you to sustain this point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to briefly review the events of last Thursday afternoon. I wish to explain why I did not rise on a point of order then and instead notified you by way of a copy of a letter that I wrote to the Premier this morning and later on in my meeting with you in your chambers my intention to rise at the earliest opportunity this afternoon.

Last Thursday after I had finished asking my first question to the Premier, I have a recollection of hearing the words “pedophile priest” shouted across the floor by a government member. I did not rise on a point of order at that time because I quite frankly couldn’t believe that something this offensive would be said in this Assembly. I also wasn’t one hundred percent sure who had made the remark. I wanted an opportunity to review the Hansard records first. After question period was over, I immediately instructed my staff to review both the Hansard Blues and the audio recordings of question period. Suffice it to say, the pedophile priest remark did not find its way into Hansard; however, the words “pedophile priest” are clearly heard on the audio recordings of question period. Moreover, these words were clearly said by the Minister of Finance.

There is some disagreement about what the minister actually said. Two members of the Liberal opposition, members of this House, insist they heard the minister say: is that the pedophile priest? The minister later insisted she said: isn’t that the guy that hired that pedophile priest? Either way, Mr. Speaker, the minister made a remark that was malicious, disrespectful, and insulting. The remark was clearly personal in nature and directed against the head of the Roman Catholic church in southern Alberta.

You have commented on numerous occasions, Mr. Speaker, that members need to be extra careful when referring to citizens who are not members of this House. These citizens are not able to defend themselves against personal attacks made by members of the Assembly. Moreover, the use of abusive and insulting language in this Assembly by any member clearly reflects negatively on all members of this House and on this House itself.

In sustaining this point of order, I ask that you ask the Minister of Finance to retract the offensive remark she made last Thursday. I further ask that you request the Minister of Finance to make a full and complete apology both to Bishop Henry and to this House.

A full, complete, and unequivocal apology, Mr. Speaker, should be quite different than the halfhearted and insincere apology made by the Minister of Finance in a letter sent to Bishop Henry and released to the news media last Friday afternoon. That letter, which contains the words “I regret that my comments could have offended you,” is the kind of apology that implies you are at fault for taking offence.

Mr. Speaker, unlike the minister’s so-called apology a sincere apology acknowledges wrongdoing. A sincere apology takes responsibility for saying something that was hurtful, offensive, and malicious. A sincere apology says that I’m sorry for what I said, I will learn from this, and this won’t happen again.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I urge you to sustain this point of order by calling on the Minister of Finance to make a sincere apology for the insulting and abusive remarks of last Thursday.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Finance.

MRS. NELSON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Earlier today I tabled a letter that I sent to Bishop Henry on Friday after the events on Thursday. I regret – and I have said this publicly too, when I was interviewed earlier – the comments that I made in this House. It was inappropriate, and it did not keep with the decorum of the House. In 13 years I don’t believe I have done that before. So I regret making the comments. I have said that. I have apologized, and it’s a sincere apology.

I know that when I got home Friday and ran into my son – and this will give you how serious this can be. I did not set a good example for young people. My own son asked me: Mother, what have you done? I said: “I have done exactly what I have told you all along not to do. If you haven’t something nice to say, say nothing at all, and use your head before your mouth,” and I did not do that. I sincerely apologize to this House for not keeping the decorum, and I certainly have apologized to Bishop Henry.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, the chair has heard now from the hon. leader of the third party and the hon. Minister of Finance and appreciates the comments from everyone. One of the really difficult matters with respect to this is that the chair did not hear any of this last Thursday. If members will recall, the chair was introducing a speaker at the time. Of course, members have to appreciate again all of the citations from the orders that we have and all of the House of Commons Procedure and Practice and Beauchesne and the like.

Last Thursday afternoon, when this matter occurred, the chair was listening very attentively, as he always does, to the speaker. He heard the hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona raise his question, heard the words. At that point in time there were a number of responses from various quarters of the House. The chair at that point then said, “The hon. the Premier,” and we moved on. No member in the House rose at the time with respect to a point of order. No member of the House conveyed such a matter inviting the chair for an intervention from the chair. It was a very difficult thing, then, to realize that the chair was in his office the whole afternoon and that other than a couple of individuals who are not members of this House coming in and wanting to do a certain thing, I heard from no one with respect to this matter. But then by Friday it certainly got a life of its own.

So today we have dealt with this. The hon. leader of the third party has asked the hon. Minister of Finance to apologize and withdraw her comments, and the chair has heard the hon. Minister of Finance use these following words on several and more than one occasion: “regret,” “comments . . . inappropriate,” “not keep with the decorum,” “sincere apology,” “not . . . a good example,” “use your head before” you open “your mouth,” and “sincerely apologize.” One can conclude that the matter has met the test that the hon. leader of the third party would want and certainly would meet the test that the chair would have in terms of a reasonable apology. So that matter is over with.

Now the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Privilege
Access to Audio Proceedings
Accuracy of Hansard

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a question of privilege this afternoon. My point of privilege is with regard to two related items: first, the right of all members to access the audio recordings of this Assembly’s deliberations and, two, the accuracy of written transcripts from Alberta Hansard.

Mr. Speaker, this House, like many others in the Commonwealth, maintains a transcript service so that its members, the media, and the public can review the deliberations that occur within its walls. Standing Order 107(4) provides that the Speaker shall be responsible for the audio recordings of the Assembly’s deliberations, while Alberta Hansard is provided for in Standing Order 107(1). The point of privilege that I am raising is in respect to the debates held in this Chamber last Thursday, April 11, 2002. I along with several other members heard the Minister of Finance unfortunately say, "that pedophile priest."

Now, Mr. Speaker, with respect to my first point, which deals with the right of all members to access the audio recordings of this Assembly's deliberations, I in conjunction with the Official Opposition staff made a request to the Hansard office to listen to the audio recordings in order to confirm what I had heard the hon. minister unfortunately say. This request was made very soon after the minister uttered her remarks. I discovered that a new policy from the Clerk had been issued which directs that members can access tapes of only their own comments and that access to tapes relating to comments from other members required a request to the Speaker's office. The Official Opposition staff subsequently made a request to the Speaker's office, which informed them that the members could only access audio recordings of their own comments and not the comments of other members. It is clear that the Clerk's policy and the Speaker's office policy are contrary to one another.

I believe that these newfound policies are contrary to the parliamentary privilege afforded to all hon. members of this House. [interjection] The hon. Minister of Environment may disagree, but our main duty as elected members is to debate in this Chamber issues that matter to Albertans. No member can carry out this primary task with any degree of effectiveness unless we have the knowledge of comments made by other members in this House. After all, Standing Order 107(4) provides that "the Speaker shall be responsible . . . for the custody of those recordings." If members are denied access to the audio recordings, then Standing Order 107(4) would be illogical since there would be no need to maintain custody of those recordings if no one is allowed to access them. Due to the fact that the opposition staff and myself were prevented from accessing the audio recordings of what was said by the minister in question, I have been impeded in my ability to carry out my duties as a member. Therefore, I believe that this rises to a level of a contempt of parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I would also add that the Clerk's policy is contrary to the same Standing Order 107(4), which provides that the Speaker, not the Clerk, is responsible for the audio recordings of the Assembly. It is not enough for the Clerk to notify the Speaker of policies. Rather, according to the said Standing Order the Speaker must officially approve all policies with respect to audio recordings. In addition, I understand that this Assembly has always made audio recordings available to its members, the media, and the general public. It is up to the entire House, not just an officer of the Assembly, to change the Assembly's customs and traditions. In fact, officers of the Assembly are charged with protecting and maintaining the Assembly's customs and traditions.

I have tabled a copy of the Clerk's new policy earlier this afternoon as provided to me graciously by the Hansard office on the evening of April 11. This is there for your reference, Mr. Speaker, and for the reference of all members of this Assembly.

Now, my second point, Mr. Speaker, deals with the accuracy or lack thereof of written transcripts from Alberta Hansard for the Assembly's deliberations last Thursday. It is the custom of Alberta Hansard to record every audible word spoken in this House. This custom applies at all times, even if a member is speaking out of turn, as the Minister of Finance was last Thursday. With due respect to the hon. minister, her words "that pedophile priest" were not recorded in the officially published Hansard from that day.

Again, our main duty as elected members is to debate issues that matter to Albertans, and no member can carry out this primary task with any degree of effectiveness unless we have an accurate transcript of what has been said in this House. Now, perhaps we cannot expect every utterance to be transcribed, but in instances such as this one we should be able without any obstruction to review the audio recordings in a timely fashion. We should not simply be referred to secondary sources like Internet broadcasts and archives. That is a secondary source inferior to the source recordings up in the Hansard office. Furthermore, there's a delay in the archiving of these recordings; they are not timely.

Mr. Speaker, I draw your attention to Maingot, second edition, at page 233. It states that the House "is not only entitled to but demands the utmost respect when material is placed before it for its scrutiny, investigation, or study." Further, at page 248 Maingot states that the House "remains prepared to entertain . . . questions of privilege where false, partial, or perverted reports of debates or proceedings are published." Since the edition of Hansard covering the deliberations of Thursday, April 11, 2002, did not accurately reflect what was said in this House, the parliamentary privilege of all members has been breached.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, at this the earliest opportunity afforded to me, I have briefly set out the facts as well as the relevant quotes from parliamentary authorities that show that there is a prima facie case with respect to the right of all members to access the audio recordings of this Assembly's deliberations and to the accuracy of written transcripts from Alberta Hansard. I am sure that this question of privilege will attract much debate within and outside this House.

At page 227 of Maingot it states that the Speaker asks simply: "Has the Member an arguable point? If the Speaker feels any doubt on the question, he should . . . leave it to the House." By finding that there is a prima facie case, I urge you, Mr. Speaker, and all members of this House to carefully consider this matter. Should you find that I have a question of privilege, I am prepared to move the necessary motion. In the case that you find that there's not a question of privilege, I would still ask that your office, the Clerk's office, and the Hansard office make available all audio recordings and accurate written transcripts of this Assembly's deliberations to its hon. members, to the media, and the general public in the future.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands on this purported point.

MR. MASON: Yes. Mr. Speaker, I would rise in support of the point of privilege raised by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. I wish to just transmit to you and the Assembly some of the circumstances with respect to our caucus' activities last Thursday afternoon.

On Thursday afternoon, after coming out of the House, the leader of the New Democrat opposition asked staff to request a copy of the audiotape of the session and was told that that would be provided. We were then told that a copy would not be made available – and this, we understand, is contrary to previous practice – and that we must come and listen to the tape directly. The leader of the New Democrat opposition then asked staff to attend and listen to the audio recording. The staff were then told that they could not attend, that the leader or an MLA must come personally to listen to the audio recording. So the staff . . .

THE SPEAKER: Hold on. Hold on here. Sit down. Your leader was in my office this morning seeking access to tapes. It was given to him. When he said to the Speaker, "But I can't hear very well; can I have somebody come with me?" the Speaker said, "Sure." What are you talking about?

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, I'm going to come to that. This all obviously transpired before the leader's visit to your office.

Finally, upon intervention to the Speaker's office, the leader was permitted to bring staff in to listen to the tapes and, I understand, received tapes from you this morning. I think that the whole procedure is irregular, and I would ask that the policy and the circumstances surrounding changes to the policy be clarified for the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: Are there additional comments from hon. members on this purported point of privilege?

Well, let me thank the two members who did participate in the purported question of privilege. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar provided written notice to the Speaker's office more than two hours prior to the start of this afternoon's sitting, and proper notice was therefore given pursuant to Standing Order 15(2). The notice is quite succinct in citing the issues to be raised, which are "(1) the right of all Members to access the audio recordings of this Assembly's deliberations, and (2) the accuracy of written transcripts from Alberta Hansard." As the members pointed out, these purported questions of privilege relate to certain comments that were allegedly made on Thursday, April 12, 2002, which do not appear in Alberta Hansard.

With respect to the first point, Standing Order 107(1) clearly states that Alberta Hansard "shall be compiled, edited, printed, distributed and administered under the direction and authority of the Speaker." Furthermore, Standing Order 107(4) states:

The Speaker shall be responsible for recording the deliberations and proceedings of the sittings of the Assembly, committees of the whole Assembly and such other committees as request recordings to be made, and for the custody of those recordings.

It is the Assembly that has written these rules. It is the Assembly that has delegated to the Speaker the responsibility to produce Hansard. It has made the Speaker responsible for the custody of the recordings from which Hansard is produced.

The purported question of privilege relates to a matter of administration of the Assembly and, quite frankly, is not a prima facie question of privilege. Having said that, the chair will review the policy on access to recordings used in the production of Hansard.

This Assembly has had Hansard since 1972. When Hansard was invented for this Assembly in 1972, a major report was written, which is available to any citizen in the province of Alberta. The chair would have believed that hon. members who are members of this Assembly would have availed themselves of the opportunity to understand the history of this Assembly and to find out what the historical precedents were with the formulation of any particular document we have. Secondly, the Hansard people that we have work hand in hand with the Hansard people from around the world, those who use the British form of parliamentary debating, and the history is there.

The proceedings of this Assembly are recorded to enable the editor of Hansard and those employed by the director to produce Hansard. That's the purpose of the recordings. As all members are aware, the unedited transcripts of Hansard are known as the Blues and are available to members so that they can suggest minor edits, and the Blues starting at question period and the Routine we had this afternoon are probably available now for the review of all hon. members. Walk out of this room and you will find a document that's available to you, your first opportunity right here in the precincts associated with this.

As Marleau and Montpetit in their book House of Commons Procedure and Practice indicate on page 969: "A Member may correct the record of his or her statement, but may not correct that of another Member." That is the historical precedent with respect to the promotion and the conduct of Hansard. In keeping with this underlying rationale, the policy with respect to access to the recordings held by Hansard are – and this is not a new policy, contrary to the position put forward by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, which appears to be rather fictitious. This policy has been in place in this Assembly for nearly three decades, not invented in somebody's imagination in the last few days.

Number one in the policy, "Members may listen to the audiotape of their own remarks any time after the Blues are posted." Members' own remarks. Number two, "At no time can members listen to somebody else's remarks without the authorization of the Speaker." The chair would point out that this permission would only be granted in the most exceptional of circumstances, and not once since I have been the Speaker, since 1997, has that been provided to anyone. Thirdly, "The same policy applies to members' authorized staff." Fourth, "Blues may not be released to anyone, with the exception of the table officers, until they are posted." They are here. They are reviewed. They are posted. They are available to you to accept at any time.

The electronic version of what transpires in this Assembly is available on the Internet. It is several years ago that we moved to this. It is live. It is real. It is available to anyone. All the feeds go onto the Internet live. It's there at the Assembly's web site, and we even keep them in storage for several weeks at a time for the availability of anyone. After two weeks the electronic record is transferred to CD-ROM and is available in the Legislature Library. There is instant – instant – access to all of the recordings of this Assembly now. What I said one minute ago is available to anyone anywhere. The video portion, live television, of the daily proceedings is also recorded by the Legislature Library, and it, too, is available from the Library.

The chair also wants to note that when members are involved in some investigation of a policy, they should first address that request to the Speaker. The chair will not tolerate – and I repeat – the chair will not tolerate any attempt by a member to seek second opinions from an officer of the Assembly or an employee of the Legislative Assembly Office. These individuals serve the Assembly, and any attempt to cast aspersions on their conduct in the Assembly will be dealt with swiftly by the chair. There will be no harassment, no intimidation, and no second-guessing of what any table officer said to any member. Table officers advise me that what the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has stated is totally erroneous and incorrect. This is a great difficulty for the chair, and this is a great difficulty, I believe, for the hon. Member from Edmonton-Gold Bar as well.

In keeping with the subject of Hansard, it is a well-established principle that Hansard does not report interventions unless they elicit a response from the person who is recognized by the chair. Such interjections are out of order. As Speaker Schumacher commented on a similar point on April 17, 1996, at pages 1184-85 of Hansard, these are the guidelines used at every other Assembly in this country and, to our knowledge, most of the Assemblies following the British form of parliamentary democracy.

Of course, as repeated earlier today, the chair cannot comment on interjections when the chair doesn't hear them. Beauchesne's 486(4) addresses this point. There are 82 members in this Assembly. When members speak out of order and out of turn and when they turn their heads away from the chair, the voices go in different directions. There is no conceivable way that the chair from this vantage point can hear, particularly when the chair is speaking and recognizing a particular member.

The chair would also point out that Erskine May, 22nd edition, states at page 230 that the Official Report [their version of Hansard] remains the authoritative record of what is said in the Commons, and the Speaker has stated that the tapes cannot be used for the purposes of casting doubt on the validity of the Official Report.

That is a time-honoured tradition in Erskine May going back years and years and years.

Finally, the chair has cautioned members many times about the sensitivity of the recording devices used in this Assembly, and the most recent document I provided to all members before we reconvened here in this spring session pointed out again the sensitivity of the machines and the microphones in this particular Assembly.

There is no question of a prima facie case of privilege, and the chair is quite concerned about some of the statements made by one member that are incorrect.

And the last one, the hon. Member from Edmonton-Gold Bar in correspondence to me dated April 15, 2002, notes, "This question of privilege arises from dealings I had with the Speaker's Office." The hon. Member from Edmonton-Gold Bar had no dealings with the Speaker's office any time in the last several days on this matter. That is nonsense. There is no point.

Now the hon. Deputy Premier.

Privilege Accusations against a Member

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to section 15 of our Standing Orders I wish to inform you that I intend to pursue raising a question of privilege arising from comments, maybe more appropriately described as accusations leveled at me, in question period today by the Leader of the Official Opposition. I would request that I have the opportunity to review Hansard and review this further and ask you to deal with this at a time you deem appropriate.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. member, the chair will not deal with this in the absence of the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition, the member who made the comment. The chair is going to repeat into the record what the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition said: "Will the Deputy Premier direct the Speaker to release the tapes so that we can all confirm exactly what was said?"

I would like the hon. member to review Marleau and Montpetit, page 266, in terms of Impartiality of the Chair. I'm inviting the hon. Opposition House Leader to review this section, and if the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition chooses to not withdraw this question, then I would invite the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition to rise tomorrow on a point of nonconfidence in the Speaker.

School Trustee Statutes Amendment Act, 2002

[Adjourned debate April 8: Ms Carlson]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm glad I'm able to take advantage of the opportunity to speak in second reading to Bill 205, the School Trustee Statutes Amendment Act, 2002. I have reviewed the opening comments of the sponsoring member and have indeed read as much as I can of the comments that are already on the record for this bill. I'm troubled by it. I'm also curious as to what need was seen that drove the member to propose such a bill.

When I see legislation in this House, I always ask: is there a problem; and if there's a problem, does it need legislation to fix it; and if it needs legislation to fix it, is this the legislation that would fix it? I go back to the beginning here and say: is there a problem? And I would have to say: not that I've heard. I'm not seeing people marching in the street saying: we have a terrible problem with our trustees. I'm not seeing letters to the editor going: oh my goodness, we really need to revise this; it's a huge problem. I'm not hearing this as a topic for the phone-in talk shows with people expressing great concern about conflicts of interest with their school board trustees. I'm looking in the magazines that we're all reading in Alberta, and even Alberta Report doesn't have anything that says that we need to get rid of our school trustees. [interjection] It's not in there. Sorry.

So where is the situation or the uprising or the groundswell that is saying that there's a crisis in Alberta that needs to be addressed? I don't see it. Nothing is identifying that this is, in fact, a crisis that needs to be dealt with. I was going to say that I'm considering how I'll vote on this bill, but I guess I've just decided for myself. I don't think there's a crisis, and if there's no crisis, then why would we have legislation?

Now, I'm careful to listen when my honourable colleagues get up to debate, and I've heard many, many, many times how this government doesn't like legislation, how we should have less legislation, we should have less laws in this province, we shouldn't be burdening people with all these restrictions and restraints and requirements. Here we have a situation where nobody's asking for this, but we're going to have legislation. Well, why?

AN HON. MEMBER: It's good legislation.

MS BLAKEMAN: It can be dandy legislation, but, you know, giving people candy every . . .

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: I'm sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I wanted to just remind all hon. members that this afternoon is private members' public bills, and the one we are talking about is not a government bill. It is a private member's public bill and is not, therefore, government legislation.

MS BLAKEMAN: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. You know, the thing is that there are 74 against seven, so you'll have to forgive me if sometimes it looks like everything is coming from that side. But I do understand the difference, and I do understand that this is not a government bill. It is, in fact, Bill 205, which would indicate right there that it's a private member's bill. So if I've said "government" anywhere in here, I apologize.

But I will go back and repeat the argument: nowhere do I see a great groundswell, a great coming together, a great calling for there to be a change in the way our school boards elect their trustees and who's eligible to be elected. Therefore, I question the member, the private Member for St. Albert, on why she felt she needed to bring this legislation forward. I read her comments. It doesn't say in there that she attended a meeting when everyone signed a piece of paper saying: please, please, make this legislation happen; this is a terrible problem. Of course, she has an opportunity to speak again on this bill, and I hope she will, because I'd be very interested as to why she felt that this situation was in such a crisis that it needed legislation to deal with it.

Now I know why I was saying "government." Yeah. Government and private members often bring forward bills in this Assembly that want to place restrictions on people, and this is such a bill. Yet, at the same time, for both government and private members there is a great proclamation about less government, less legislation, less rules. But that's not what I see here, so the ascribed proclamation, the activity that backs that up, is in fact exactly the opposite.

This is a private member's bill, but I believe it's following government policy that the people most affected by a decision shouldn't have anything to do with it. I'll give you an example, and there has been a sort of progression over time with this. The primary example was the membership on the Premier's roundtables on health that were put together in the mid-90s, 10 years ago in fact, to examine the current health care system and make recommendations on what was to be done with the crisis in health care. In fact, we know now and I've spoken to a number of people who were told that anyone directly connected to the health care professions was specifically precluded from being a member of these roundtables. So nurses and doctors and health professionals and psychiatrists and chiropractors, anybody working in the health care field, were specifically barred from participating in a rethink of how health care was going to be provided and what health care would look like and be in this province. Well, I think the government would admit now that it's still having problems with the health care system, so that may not have been the wisest way to go about having a consultation for a better health care system.

Since then we've had a number of other processes for involving Albertans in feedback sessions and recommendations on how the government should be developing policy. In fact, the government I think learned from that lesson, and with the summits and the forums and a number of other terms that have been used here, I have seen great effort to balance – and I'm putting that in quotations and underlining it – the input that was going to be received from the professionals, from the frontline workers that were involved in any given area, to balance their input with anybody else's. A great deal of time and resources and dedication was put into rounding up anybody else that could provide some sort of balance but really, in fact, opposition to those members who were working in the field that was then under study.

For example, we've had the justice summit and the children's summit and the education summit. We've had a gaming summit. We've had quite a few of them, and I just find it interesting that there seems to be such a desire to control what has to be said and the wisdom and experience that can be brought from people that work in a given field, that that somehow is not allowed to be just presented and the rest of us with fair intelligence can take that all into consideration. There seems to be a need here to control that, to box it, to contain it for fear that it will – what? – somehow spring out like a jack-in-the-box and bop you in the nose. I've never quite understood what the concern is so that these people and these ideas need to be so carefully controlled. Why is employee participation on a given issue such a bad idea? Why is it such a bad thing?

I think there are three other issues that I want to raise around Bill 205. One is participation in democracy. I think we all acknowledge or at least I certainly acknowledge that it's a problem that we have around a 50 percent voter turnout in our elections. I think in municipal elections that's higher, but certainly provincially and for school board elections and Capital health elections . . . That's not my 20 minutes?

AN HON. MEMBER: You had 10 minutes.

MS BLAKEMAN: Oh, shoot. I'm not having a good day.
Thank you.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fort in the 10 minutes you have.

MR. CAO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to speak on Bill 205, the School Trustee Statutes Amendment Act, 2002, which has been proposed by the Member for St. Albert. Mr. Speaker, our education system is our most precious resource. It is in the classroom that our students of today pick up the skills they need to be our leaders of tomorrow. It is an environment for our valuable teaching professionals to make an important difference to our society. A prosperous Alberta in the future means having the best possible educational facilities and programs given available funds today.

Making sure that we have those facilities and programs is not easy. Alberta Learning has an incredible task to ensure that our teachers are top-notch, our schools are in good condition, and our students are adequately equipped to learn. We also have to ensure that our school boards are in a position to make the best possible decisions for our learning system. It is the intent of Bill 205 to address this latter concern to give the Department of Learning another necessary tool to provide the best education system for our students.

Bill 205 would ensure that any teacher or school board employee who necessarily would have a pecuniary or financial interest as a school board trustee would be deemed ineligible for running for that position. However, rather than being expansive in scope, Bill 205 narrows the scope of those who share financial interests to teachers and school board employees and only states that spouses of teachers or school board employees must excuse themselves in votes relating to matters dealing with their spouses' contracts and must list possible conflicts of interests upon putting their name up for election. For example, if a person were a teacher or a principal, his or her spouse would not be able to vote for his or her pay raise.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is an important step towards protecting our students' best interests because it allows this province to leave the governance of school boards in their respective localities but also sets up strict guidelines stating which sorts of people will not be appropriate to be able to govern our school boards.

Mr. Speaker, in many school districts board members too often must excuse themselves from voting on certain matters due to a real or possible conflict of interest. This leaves the remaining board members in the uncomfortable position of having to speak for their colleagues. This is unfair. The remaining members of the school boards didn't put themselves up for election to a school board for the purpose of speaking for everybody. They, like members of this Assembly, put themselves up to add a voice to the discussions, to help reach conclusions in concert with the other board members, and to speak for their constituents.

So, Mr. Speaker, this is in fact a very reasonable measure. By precluding those with conflicts of interests from seeking nomination, we make sure that all of our board members can vote on school matters and prevent one or two members being left with the job of having to make big decisions on their very own. We also ensure that there are never any situations in which a conflict of interest puts our education system at risk either because an individual votes with an apparent conflict of interest or because decisions are made without inclusion of the requisite amount of board members in the vote. We should have all board members providing input to all decisions, and in order for this to happen we need legislation like this proposed Bill 205.

Mr. Speaker, it ought to go without saying that clear regulations on conflicts of interest are of the utmost importance to the functioning of any body operating for the public good and entrusted with public funds, especially when we are concerning ourselves with education, which, along with being the focal point of our future, is also home to an immense budget. We must be vigilant with conflict of interest regulations. We have to ensure that the stewards of education are operating with the best interests of the students and teachers and the parents and taxpayers.

With Bill 205 we make our trustees decision-makers, not bystanders. By doing so, we will make sure that our school board trustees are more accountable and more responsible when carrying out their duties. We will ensure that all school boards and all board members are in as close a position as possible to being critical thinkers with open minds toward all ideas for educational reforms at the local level. Of course, nobody can do anything about the political stance or inclination of any board members, but at least we can ensure that it is through their conviction about what is right, not a desire to gain, that those persons put themselves up for school board election. Our schools will be better for it.

Mr. Speaker, earlier I alluded to the situations in which many school board trustees are not allowed to vote because of a conflict of interest, leaving the others to pick up the slack. Well, along with leaving other board members in a bind, they also end up costing our taxpayers a lot of dollars. For example, a situation arose in which all board members had to excuse themselves from deciding on a matter due to a conflict of interest. When the Department of Learning is forced to go into a situation and make decisions because the boards lose their quorum, it costs them administrative dollars. Employees have to look over the situation, investigate it, and make sure that it is all right.

Further to that, we also see a situation that thrusts the Department of Learning into a situation that it doesn't want to be in. Local decisions are best made by local groups, not a central government. This is an overriding principle of our government. We put money in the hands of individuals through a low tax regime. We put responsibility in the hands of individuals with prudent yet noninvasive laws. We consult our population with summits like the Future Summit, the justice summit, and we have put powers in the hands of our local groups by creating regional health authorities, school boards, and the like.

Now, considering all of this, why would we want to keep school board trustees laws that obviously create situations in which this local decision-making must necessarily be taken over by the provincial government because board members find themselves mired in conflict of interest situations? As a government we clearly believe that people in southeast Calgary, for example, know more about the things that need to be done in southeast Calgary than the bureaucrats in Edmonton do. We want the local people to make decisions. Well, they can't make decisions if they are ineligible to vote due to a conflict of interest. We need people on these boards who are eligible to vote with total integrity and confidence. We are a government that supports and trusts Albertans. This is one reason why we've narrowed the scope of who is eligible.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Mr. Speaker, I know that there will be some arguments against this bill. Some will say that it's restricting hardworking and caring individuals from working for the greater good of their schools. This is a fair concern, I must say. However, I'm sure that there are enough concerned parents and citizens out there that school trustee positions will not go unfilled.

Therefore, I agree with the Member for St. Albert, the proponent of Bill 205. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have several people who are standing. Since the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry stood the last time and I had to go to the alternate, we'll go with the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry, followed by the hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to make just a few comments on Bill 205, the School Trustee Statutes Amendment Act, 2002. I'd like to start out by saying that I will be arguing strongly against this bill. Any time we have legislation that restricts representation, any time we have legislation in this House that impedes the democratic process, any time we have legislation proposed in this House that limits who Albertans can vote for, then I think that we are not serving Albertans very well.

I think as well that when we do propose legislation of this nature, then we certainly are opening ourselves up to a legal challenge. Of course, when we look at our record when we have been challenged in the courts, it is not very good. We just heard the hon. member mention that this is a very costly process. Well, a court challenge is much more costly, and we don't have to go any further there.

As well, we have heard so many members in this House over the last few years certainly mention what a great job our educators are doing, what a great job our schools are doing, how well our students do when they are compared against students in other provinces and internationally. We see that also we've had school boards operating in this province for approximately 120 years. We certainly, as the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre has mentioned, have not seen this as a problem. The magnitude of this problem certainly isn't great, and it seems to be overstated greatly by a number of members.

Now, then, in this House, Mr. Speaker, all of us pay taxes here in this province, or I think most of us do – I should qualify that – yet we get to vote on a budget. We have the Members' Services Committee, where we can vote on raises for ourselves and for other departments within government, yet there are no restrictions placed on us as to whether we have members of our immediate family working there. So this is not consistent whatsoever. This bill is not consistent with what we do as members.

When we look at the scope of this bill, I don't see any great conflict of interest that requires us to pass a bill in this House that limits who can sit on our school boards, especially when we look at the role of the school trustee. The role of the school trustee is certainly the setting of the priorities of that district. The role of school trustees is to put programs and resources that will make those programs and resources a reality, and these priorities are really what school trustees do when they are allocating various parts of the budget. The case of where, because of a potential conflict of interest, we have to have some members withdraw from that decision-making certainly is of a lot less importance, particularly with the passing of Bill 12, which virtually took away the majority of the bargaining powers of our local boards and put it into the hands of government and, further, put it into the hands of arbitrators. So the role of trustees, if we continue in the same fashion as we are now, is certainly going to be of much less importance when it comes to negotiation, because it certainly seems that the direction of this government is to interfere in the collective bargaining process by putting line items in the budget and passing bills such as Bill 12 to take away the local autonomy, the local control that our school boards have.

I also see that what we do here with this bill, Mr. Speaker, is we disenfranchise a certain group of people who have a great interest in serving their school boards, in serving their communities, and in serving the children of this province. In many cases these people have some very special abilities that go along with their great interest and certainly have made over the years some great contributions to our system. I would think: who would be of better quality than someone who is familiar with the school system and how it works? I can think of any number of trustees that I've had the opportunity to teach with that have done an excellent job. Many of them were associated with a professional organization for teachers in some fashion or another.

So, Mr. Speaker, in closing, I would certainly hope that all members of this Assembly would see that this bill will take away the rights of a certain group of citizens. Certainly if this bill is enacted, we are setting ourselves up for another court challenge, one that I would think we cannot win. I would urge all members in the Assembly to defeat this bill when it does come to the vote.

Thank you very much.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MR. HORNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and speak to Bill 205, the School Trustee Statutes Amendment Act, 2002. Bill 205 is a small amendment to the School Act. Currently through the act the Alberta government delegates much of its authority for the governance of education to locally elected school boards.

Our school boards serve a very important purpose. Boards make decisions like developing a budget for the fiscal year, planning and setting priorities, making policy to guide administration employees, adjudicating in policy disputes, and communicating with community and staff on behalf of the jurisdiction. These responsibilities are vital to our education system, and the people elected to the boards do a fine job in dealing with these responsibilities. They handle them with rationality and wisdom.

Almost any person is eligible to run for a school board position. A candidate may let his or her name stand for election as long as they meet the requirements for the election process, which include that the individual is able to vote in the election, that they have been a resident of the local jurisdiction for six consecutive months, or that they are not disqualified by the School Act. Once elected to the school board, a trustee begins to make the tough decisions that are required of him or her. When handling their responsibilities in making these decisions, individuals should be able to perform their duties as a school trustee to the best of their ability and with a minimum possibility of conflict of interest in pecuniary matters.

Decisions involving money are among the most important and contentious issues that a school board trustee must face. Currently in Alberta there are situations that arise that call into question some of the regulations and rules currently set out in the School Act. One major problem is that on occasion the majority of school trustees must abstain from important decisions on money matters because they would be in a conflict of interest if they were to participate in the discussions. This results in decisions being made by one or two of the elected officials, most often not even coming close to making quorum: 50 plus one. The act sets down that a trustee would be in conflict of interest if the trustee's spouse, children, parents, or parents of the trustee's spouse share a pecuniary interest with the trustee. These rules make it very difficult for some boards to operate.

The hon. leader of the third party wanted to know why this bill was present. This is a perfect example that shows this case. In Medicine Hat during the collective agreement negotiations 4 out of 5 of the school board trustees declared that they could be in a possible conflict of interest and therefore could not take part in deliberations. This left the decision-making to one individual, Mr. Speaker, and this is unacceptable. We do not elect trustees to sit on boards to have them get up and abstain from some of the most important discussions. The trustees are elected for a purpose and need to be able to fulfill that purpose. Bill 205 will hopefully work to eliminate this problem.

Bill 205 would ensure that individuals who would face a pecuniary conflict of interest in the course of their duties as a school trustee are prevented from seeking nomination. Mr. Speaker, Bill 205 catches the problem at the starting point by not allowing some people to run because of a possible conflict of interest. We will be able to have people seek the position if and only if they are able to make the decisions and do the jobs they were elected to do. This means that people who have a permanent contract with their respective school board would be disqualified from running.

Bill 205 would also narrow the scope of individuals who are deemed to share a pecuniary interest with a trustee to just the trustee's spouse. As mentioned before, the current legislation includes not only the trustee's spouse but also his or her children, parents, and the parents of their spouse. This is far too broad, Mr. Speaker. In fact, it is excessive. It should not be a conflict of interest if a trustee's spouse's parents happen to work in that school jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 205 would also establish parameters around specific kinds of circumstances that would automatically be deemed to be a conflict for reasons of pecuniary interest. These parameters would not restrict the fact that trustees must disclose any pecuniary interest which might constitute a direct or indirect conflict of interest. The amendments that are being proposed would provide clarity by describing certain situations which would be presumed to be a conflict for reasons of pecuniary interest. One of these certain situations could be one where a trustee's spouse is employed or under an ongoing permanent contract with any school district in the province. This would be the case of a conflict of interest, and the trustee would excuse themselves from discussion on the issue. Currently if a trustee's mother-in-law has an ongoing permanent contract with a school board, the trustee is deemed to be in conflict of interest. This is too broad and doesn't give trustees any credit for being able to separate their arm's-length, personal lives from their professional duties.

These broad scenarios create difficulties for school boards all across Alberta, and I feel that it's time the government did something about it. When negotiations between the union and the boards are taking place, how can we as voters be assured that we are getting the best and most informed decision out of our school board if the decision is being made by only or two individuals? This is not to say that these individuals cannot make a proper decision, but when a board is elected, it is done on the basis that those elected to represent their constituents will be able to do so when the time comes. They will not have to abdicate responsibility. If the majority of those elected have to abstain from the decision-making process, then I would argue that it's no longer a viable process.

As I see it, this bill, if passed by the Assembly, will make school board trustees more responsible and more accountable by providing that a majority of members will be able to take part. To clarify this, let me again bring in the Medicine Hat example. On that school board the one person who was left to make the decision did so on behalf of all board members. The abstainers must respect that decision. But if the public decides that the decision was not in the best interest of the community or the school or what have you, then the members that abstained from the proceedings can claim that they had nothing to do with the decision, therefore washing their hands of responsibility. This is not why these people are put on these boards. They're there to make the tough decisions. That's why we must pass Bill 205: to ensure that the decisions are made by the majority of trustees elected.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken with the school boards in my constituency, obviously contrary to what the opposition may have done. There are trustees in my area that will be affected by this legislation. It's important for me to tell this Assembly that I have the utmost respect for all of the trustees in my riding. Their contribution has been extremely valuable for the community, and they will be able to continue now to serve their term in some cases by being able to take a more active role in the important decisions that have to be made.

I have also received a letter from the Greater St. Albert Catholic school division supporting the bill in its entirety. I've also received a letter from the Parkland school division which does outline two concerns that the division has with the bill. They state that they do support the changes to the School Act, however with reservations. The first concern is with the proposed changes to section 22(1) of the Local Authorities Election Act, proposed addition (1.1)(a). Parkland school division feels that it should read: the same school district or division and not a school district or division. They feel that a person could be employed by another school division and still serve as a trustee in their own district, as they are not making decisions which affect their own workplace. If it were a matter of pecuniary interest, as with anyone in that position they would declare this prior to discussion of the issue which they are in conflict with.

Mr. Speaker, I've also heard from several constituents who are educational professionals that are also concerned in this regard. The other concern that Parkland has was with the proposed amendment to section 81(1). They feel that the changes take away the choice of the local boards to pass a bylaw in regard to filing a statement. They strongly believe in local autonomy and feel that the proposed changes may infringe on that autonomy.

I feel that we should look at these concerns and comments, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps include these issues in the review that's forthcoming of education in the province. However, that being said, the boards in my area have expressed to me that this amendment would bring clarity to the issue at hand, and that is the most important aspect. I believe we need to make the rules clearer and stick to them so that all boards in the province are operating under the same guidelines.

The majority of this bill is still supported by the school divisions in my constituency, and with that, Mr. Speaker, I urge all members to vote favourably on Bill 205 in second reading.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak against Bill 205. Quite frankly, this bill causes me a great deal of concern. I want to indicate that while I can certainly accept that if a majority of a school board in any jurisdiction would have to disqualify themselves on any issue before the board, that is indeed a problem, it seems to me that the bill goes far too far in the entire scheme of things. For example, the bill would eliminate the right of any individual to stand for election as a trustee if they were an employee of any school district, not just the one for which they are running, or any charter school or any private school. The effect here is to eliminate educators from participating in the governance of education in any way.

Now, I can certainly understand and can appreciate the concern that's been raised with people having to disqualify themselves on a particular vote, and if that's a significant number of members of the board, then that is a concern. That, Mr. Speaker, I think could be dealt with, but it appears to me that the effect, whether intended or not, of this particular legislation is to exclude a class of people from participating in one level of the democratic process. There is no way that someone who runs, for example, in Stony Plain but lives in Edmonton would have a conflict of interest, because they are not affected, but this bill would exclude it on the basis of the argument that has been put forward.

So why would this be, Mr. Speaker? One of the things that has happened is because of the participation of many different individuals in school board politics. That's what it is. It's a level of politics. It's a level of citizens participating in the democratic process and not, as was implied, simply a delegated authority by the province to sort of a quasi-administrative body but in fact one of the fundamental and originating levels of democratic and community participation in the entire country. Why? I believe that the school boards have been continuously supportive of public education, and they have stood up for public education and have not been subservient to the government's policy and the government's bidding.

One of the ways to deal with that, I would suppose, is to eliminate educators, who are often the most familiar and the most motivated members – not always; certainly not always – who tend to be people who have a real passion for education, and to take them as a class of citizens and then abridge their democratic rights in order that we can have school boards that are compliant with government policy. I think that this particular act is to us completely unacceptable. It represents an attack on democratic rights of citizens that I think every Albertan ought to oppose.

I want to talk a little bit about how governments of this province, Progressive Conservative governments, in the past have dealt with this issue. It's been quite a different story, and I'll tell maybe a personal story, Mr. Speaker. When I first became interested in municipal politics, I was a city employee, and at that time the Municipal Government Act precluded municipal employees from running for city council. I raised this issue and brought a Charter challenge before the Court of Queen's Bench, and that challenge was unsuccessful, but unfortunately there was not enough time to conduct an appeal. As a result, I had to choose between resigning from my job with the city, which was a job I quite liked, or running for city council. I chose to resign my position with the city, and I was subsequently elected to Edmonton city council.

At the time the Member for Edmonton-Highlands was my representative – that was Pam Barrett – and she stood up and asked questions of the Minister of Municipal Affairs, and that was Mr. Ray Speaker. In response to the question, the minister indicated that he did see that there was a problem, that my and other municipal employees' democratic rights were infringed by that provision, and he brought forward an amendment to the Municipal Government Act that is still in place today. What its requirement is, Mr. Speaker, is that a municipal employee who is elected to the municipal council which employs him must resign their job after being elected, not before. So there are different ways to deal with it, and governments in the past I think have erred more on the democratic side and on the side of increasing rather than restricting people's democratic rights in Alberta society.

This bill goes in the opposite direction. This bill infringes on people's democratic rights, reduces them, takes them away, all under the guise of preventing some very unfortunate problems that have been referred to but for which there are more appropriate remedies. You can strengthen the conflict of interest guidelines. You can make sure that people who have a conflict of interest are required to eliminate or get rid of that conflict of interest after they're elected if that becomes a problem. That is one solution that can be offered.

There has been no satisfactory explanation given for excluding people who are employed in education generally from seeking office or being eligible to run for a school board outside a jurisdiction in which they are employed, and that is very discriminatory and really says that if you have an involvement in a particular occupation, you can't stand for a particular kind of political elected office. This is completely unacceptable, Mr. Speaker. It is completely unacceptable that any government would so abridge the democratic rights of its citizens based on their employment. It's pure and utter discrimination, and it ought not to be acceptable in this House.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

If the member is interested in actually preventing these specific types of conflict of interest that have been referred to, then she ought to amend this bill or arrange for someone to amend this bill so that we are not attempting to kill a fly with a sledgehammer, because that's exactly what's happening. It's going to give rise to the concern that school boards are too pro-education and that it's a political change that the government is seeking rather than simply correcting a problem that arises from time to time with conflict of interest.

So I find the bill, Mr. Speaker, as it's presently set out to be completely unacceptable, not worthy of consideration of the House, and it ought to be defeated, as it well deserves. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan.

MR. LOUGHEED: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today and join in this debate. As we all know, this bill, sponsored by the hon. Member for St. Albert, is brought forward to ensure that school trustees would not be in a pecuniary conflict of interest, and if so, then they wouldn't be eligible to run. As well, another good point about the bill is to narrow the people that are seen to have this pecuniary conflict of interest down to only their spouse. This bill makes a lot of sense, and I believe there's a need to establish some more realistic guidelines for the people responsible for making those decisions that affect the lives of our children and their education.

Part of what interested me about this bill, Mr. Speaker, was that during the past summer I was out backpacking in the middle of nowhere and had been out for several days when I got engaged in a conversation with a teacher from a jurisdiction in Alberta. He commented that they had a really good memorandum of agreement signed and that it went to the two parties, the teachers and the board, to vote on the memorandum, and the teachers accepted it wholeheartedly. It would have been about a year ago when this came forward, maybe 11 months or so ago when this happened, before the school year was over anyway. The vote then went to the board, but unfortunately there was I think only one board member, as I recall the story as he related it, that was able to vote on this. Although all of the board member's colleagues had voted for the memorandum of agreement, they were unable to vote, so only this one board member voted, and that board member opposed the memorandum of agreement. This teacher was quite disgruntled about that. As we follow the history of that memorandum of agreement and the collective agreement, they finally did settle. It was several months, a lot of conflict, and a lot of trouble and difficulty that they went through in order to finish off that collective agreement.

I think there are many good principles involved in this bill that this member has brought forward. School trustees have a direct responsibility to ensure that the decisions they make are in the best interest of the district. The board allocates all sorts of funds to the schools, and all together the trustees must make the most responsible decisions for the district. School trustees are elected to make important decisions on infrastructure investment as well as salaries of school staff and teachers. These are important decisions for our communities, decisions which should not be taken lightly but should be discussed and debated by all of the wisdom and experience brought to the board by every trustee.

Currently the School Act defines those who share pecuniary conflicts of interest with a trustee as their spouse, their parents, children, and their spouse's parents, and this means that the trustee, should their mother-in-law work for the school jurisdiction, would be unable to discuss, and they would have to abstain. They would have to abstain from voting on any budgetary or bargaining position, and that would just be due to the relationship of a relative.

The problem arises, Mr. Speaker, that with all the stipulations which define a trustee's pecuniary conflict of interest, too many people are having to declare themselves ineligible to be at the discussion table. Unfortunately, under these guidelines Alberta school boards are faced with too many decisions being voted on by less than a full board, and often trustees are opting out of decision-making because they're somehow tied by this conflict of interest.

I am pleased to have an opportunity to have this debate on Bill 205 because I believe that those guidelines are too broad in scope. Having the guidelines include not only the spouse but also all the other people that are mentioned leaves too many people with a chance of being in conflict of interest. I feel that the School Act should be amended to address this problem by narrowing those people determined to share the pecuniary interest in return for a fully functioning school board.

School boards are carefully created under specifications by the minister, and the number of trustees is determined by many factors, such as geography, population, regionalization or amalgamation agreements, and they had a ward structure set up in that regard. This number was selected to ensure that the decisions made would be sufficiently debated and would be representative of the constituents throughout the area. When important decisions are being made by less than a full board, then those people are not being properly represented.

Negotiations were something that I used to be involved in. I remember, Mr. Speaker, that they were a very intense time, and I certainly admired the breadth of experience brought to the table by both the ATA representatives and the school board trustees. Because of my experience in those negotiations I'm confident in saying that I believe that all of the trustees must be capable of bringing their experience and input to the table during that debate. Budget decisions should not be made while relying on less than a full board of trustees. The decisions made by the trustees are important for the development of schools and the education of our students, and when that development depends greatly on school funding, I believe that we must not only have people who represent the concerns of the public, but they're also capable of committing themselves fully to that debate.

Bill 205 would also narrow the guidelines for candidacy for those wishing to run in the school board elections, and I believe we must consider and debate this, because I personally feel that board members, if they must abstain from budgetary decisions, are not able to fully perform a major proportion of the job of an elected trustee. We must narrow the scope of those who must opt out during voting decisions because of conflicts of interest, and it makes logical sense and lots of sense, Mr. Speaker, that if you can't participate in many of the necessary decisions as a board member, you should not run for that position. However, these situations continue to occur currently, and it's a fact that most people interested in serving as a trustee have a background in education or a family who does. If we narrow the regulation to include only the spouse as sharing pecuniary interest, then Bill 205 will allow trustees to function as fully participating representatives, and they all want to do that, I believe.

We depend on elected boards in our communities to make and determine the outcomes of important decisions. We need those boards to be learned and experienced decision-makers to focus on examining problems in their sector and use the experience of every board member to develop a solution which will benefit the entire community. In the case of school board trustees, they are determining the outcomes of important decisions that will directly affect the education of our children. Our school boards must be able to function with the full complement of those wise individuals. When trustees are elected, we do not suppose as electors that they will be forced to abstain from important budget decisions.

Allocation of funding is certainly one of the most important jobs of the trustees, and, Mr. Speaker, we must consider the guidelines that determine who can run for trustee and help eliminate some of the numerous cases where trustees are forced to sit on the sidelines. By instituting legislation that is far more flexible for trustees, it will give board members greater ability to vote on decisions they need to. Allocating all of the funds and ensuring that funding is distributed fairly and most appropriately is a difficult and huge task, and important budget decisions need the input from as many people as possible. Every time a trustee abstains from these important decisions, we're losing out on the healthy debate from that individual. They would have shared a huge burden of determining the budget and allowed it to be more thoroughly examined.

Mr. Speaker, it's my belief that we need to change the guidelines to make our school boards more effective. I believe the two amendments before us, as proposed by Bill 205, have given us the opportunity to consider ways that trustees can do their work much better, the work that they were elected to do. I look forward to the remaining debate on Bill 205. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: There being no further speakers, I would call on the hon. Member for St. Albert, then, to close debate.

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to wrap up and respond to a couple of the questions that were raised, but what I'd like to do first of all is remind everyone that the name of Bill 205 is the School Trustee Statutes Amendment Act, 2002. Essentially it amends the Local Authorities Election Act on one point, and it also amends the School Act on two points. There are only three parts to this bill. I would like to, in response to the questions raised, comment on a couple of those that were raised by the speakers.

I am not denying, Mr. Speaker, the fact that employees and, I daresay, teachers would make excellent contributors to the deliberations of a school board, but the fact is that they can't be part of those deliberations if they have a conflict of interest. So I am not denying the wisdom any employee of any school board, private school, or charter school would be able to bring to the table, but what I am saying is that the fact is that once they come there, they are then denied the opportunity to vote by virtue of the conflict of interest.

I would also say – and I say this very specifically – that there is nothing sinister nor arrogant about Bill 205. There are no untoward assumptions underlying this bill other than the fact that the intention of Bill 205 is to bring clarity to the process under which a school board acts in the best interests of the public. You do not need, also, to have a crisis in order to propose good legislation. In fact, I would argue that when the waters are often very churning and stirred, that time is not the time to be looking at a responsive reaction piece of legislation. You get more objective consideration of good law when you look objectively at a situation in order to construct it so that it is the best operating circumstances for all.

In the response to the question raised by the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie that she would like to know what my response was to the ATA's news release, quite frankly I would suggest that maybe she work from the bill rather than from the ATA's news release because the ATA's news release had it wrong. I have responded to them accordingly, and I do hope that they understand what is fact rather than what they would like to make fiction.

I'd also like to suggest that when we're looking at a consideration of the clarification of who can be a full participant at the board table, I think that everybody here would agree that once a person is an educator, they're always an educator. You, Mr. Speaker, are a former teacher. I think that if you feel yourself that you are an educator by virtue of your profession, you are always one, but I would also say that a few of us would say that once you are an employee of a certain jurisdiction or a private school or a charter school, you are not always an employee. So the wisdom of an employee – and in this case, the reference was made, if that employee is a teacher – can be applied, however not while they are an employee of a school jurisdiction.

I would urge everybody to vote in favour of Bill 205, specifically because it makes reference to the clarity of circumstances under which we can get the best good governance of school jurisdictions with full participation by all trustees at the board table.

I would also point out in my concluding remarks, as we come to the end of the second reading of Bill 205, because we are talking about the Local Authorities Election Act, that in the beginning of the School Trustee Statutes Amendment Act, 2002, we are talking about the eligibility to seek election for three different levels: municipal, in some instances health, and also for school trustees. It is very, very complicated when you define those out as per the first part of Bill 205. So in an interest in seeking an abundance of clarity, I will take under advisement the confusion expressed by some people and look further to the discussion after we pass this reading.

[The voice vote indicated that motion for second reading carried]

4:40 Bill 206
Fisheries (Alberta) Amendment Act, 2002

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul.

MR. DANYLUK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move second reading of Bill 206, the Fisheries (Alberta) Amendment Act, 2002.

I'm pleased to rise today and begin debate on Bill 206, an amendment to the Fisheries (Alberta) Act that would ensure the preservation of one of our most valuable natural resources. Fish are extraordinarily important to Albertans, and I am pleased with the progress of the steps the Sustainable Resource Development minister is taking in making sure that fish remain important to our province.

After all, our history as a province is rich in fishing tradition, both as an industry and a recreational activity. Today the commercial fishery exports fish across the country and around the world with direct sales of almost $70 million per year from the Northwest Territories and the prairie provinces. Alberta's commercial fisheries have an $8 million direct, indirect, and induced value to our economy. Alberta anglers invest over $300 million directly into sport fishing every year. This does not include their contributions to the multibillion dollar tourism industry.

Ensuring that our fish stocks and fish habitats are both preserved and enhanced is the main focus of Bill 206. By proactively managing our fish stocks, we will make sure that this vital resource is maintained for generations to come. This bill will amend the Fisheries Act to allow the minister to enhance our fish stocks by constructively removing beaver dams, issuing depredation orders, and restricting fishing in certain areas. It will also amend the Agricultural Pests Act to allow the minister to declare certain species of nonendangered, nongame birds as pests to agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, for years now my constituency of Lac La Biche-St. Paul and many other Alberta constituencies have been having problems with a particular species of bird, the double-crested cormorant. Populations of the double-crested cormorant have increased to the point where they are damaging the fishery and the ecosystem and are interfering with the traditional way of life of many of my constituents. Their numbers are also threatening the preservation of today's endangered birds and presenting a financial burden when it comes to restocking our lakes.

The double-crested cormorant has the ability to fly 50 or more miles each day and can completely empty lakes, rivers, and private dugouts of all fish. A full-grown cormorant from beak to tail can reach one metre in length and can consume up to a kilogram of fish every day. The cormorant can dive 40 feet and swim faster than a trout. Given that they mostly eat small fish, the so-called bait and forage species, our lakes are having a very difficult time recovering any significant fish populations. Mr. Speaker, in the process of eating numerous fish each day, cormorants can wound with their razor-sharp beaks upwards of a dozen of the fish they just about catch.

The cormorant has few natural predators. When a colony of cormorants reaches a certain size and is secure from predation and competition from other birds, their colony booms. Concurrent with the fish population's collapse over the past 30 years, cormorant populations have increased tenfold. Soon all plant life, even grass, is overcome, suffocated and killed. As a result, cormorant populations are skyrocketing, causing much harm to fish populations in the province.

Their impact has moved biologists in Lac La Biche to implement a study on cormorant populations. The results are staggering, Mr. Speaker. In 1967 there were only four colonies, totaling less than 200 nests in all of Alberta. Last summer in the Lac La Biche area alone biologists counted almost 8,000 of these nesting pairs in four lakes. That's up from 2,250 pairs in 1994. Since roughly two-thirds of the cormorants are non-nesting birds, biologists estimate that there are over 46,000 cormorants spending their summers in the Lac La Biche area. If 46,000 cormorants are consuming one kilogram of fish per day for approximately 200 days, we are talking of over 900,000 kilograms of fish being taken out of four lakes each summer by cormorants alone, as compared to 406,000 kilograms taken out by commercial fishing in the same time frame in 25 lakes in zone D. Alberta fish populations are dangerously low. Pike catches are only 15 percent of what they were in 1970. Of 27 walleye populations on which there are data, 21 lakes have collapsed in recent years. There is also concern on the quality of water, which may pose a risk to local municipalities and summer resorts.

Previous to 1997 double-crested cormorants were listed as an endangered animal in Alberta because of their small populations at the time. They were removed from the endangered list in 1987. Cormorant populations are now estimated as surpassing 2 million in North America and climbing rapidly. The double-crested cormorant in recent years has been recognized as a problem, and in 1994 it was classified as a potential pest under the migratory bird convention signed by Canada and the United States and Mexico. Bill 206 would be just extending to fish a type of protection similar to what agriculture has already implemented against its pests.

The management of cormorant populations has been recognized in other jurisdictions. The United States Fish and Wildlife Service has recently begun to develop a cormorant management plan to prevent them from taking hold over the aquaculture and fishing industries in those areas. The difficulty for the Americans is that they cannot take the relatively easier and more humane measures to just manage eggs, as we can in Alberta. Most of the breeding territory for cormorant populations is here, in Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba.

Mr. Speaker, from the very beginning this province has taken upon itself the duty to manage wildlife responsibly so as to preserve the natural balance and maximize the benefits to all current and future generations of Alberta. Bill 206 enables Albertans to ensure the protection of natural fish populations and aquaculture to ensure that this precious resource is maintained. Bill 206 entrusts the expertise of the Alberta fish and wildlife service to take the proper and most cost-efficient measures to manage threats to our fisheries, our ecosystems, and our water supplies.

I strongly encourage all members of this Assembly to join me to support Bill 206. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to have an opportunity to respond to Bill 206, Fisheries (Alberta) Amendment Act, 2002. In preparing for this bill, we consulted quite extensively with the Alberta Fish and Game Association and Trout Unlimited Canada. In summary, their concerns with this bill were significant and particularly talked about the lines between wild and private fish stocks being blurred by this legislation and that it doesn't specify who could make the order – preferably it would be a qualified biologist, but there's no indication that that would be the case – and that there are no guidelines for what information will be used to determine if an order should be written. Once again that gets left to regulation in this legislation. My initial inclination was certainly to oppose this bill, and it hasn't changed in terms of who we have consulted with.

There's no doubt that I would agree with the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul that the preservation of natural resources should be a primary concern of this government and in fact all members within the Legislature, but what we need to address that, truly, is an integrated and comprehensive plan that takes into account all pressures and all needs. The real issue here is proper management of our fish stocks and water quality management, something that we have talked about extensively over the years on this side of the House.

It was interesting, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Environment was quite happy to heckle his own member, stating earlier that this doesn't mean that we have to kill the cormorants, and I'm hoping that he will stand up and respond on the record to the member's bill.

MS BLAKEMAN: No. The statement.

MS CARLSON: Statement? No. We need the Minister of Environment to respond to his member's bill and clarify his remarks on whether or not this is a kill-the-cormorant bill.

We understand that there have been problems with the birds for fish stocks in the Lac La Biche and St. Paul region, but we need to take, I think, a more integrated approach to what's happening here. This bill itself is not well thought out and is just one little piece of the whole puzzle and problem that's occurring there. Certainly habitat and species management goes beyond giving permission to destroy birds on Crown land, and I think that is an issue of last resort. We need to then take a look at all the implications up and down the food chain, and we also have to ask ourselves the question: why are the cormorants coming here? What has changed in the ecosystem to have that happen? These birds are of concern across Canada and the United States. There is evidence, however, that they are not as much of a threat to wild commercial fishing stocks as overfishing is.

So we need to do what I've said often in here, some scientific research, and decide what the real issues are here and how those can be solved. With this bill as it's laid out, there is no requirement for record-keeping on the number of birds or eggs destroyed or the method of destruction and disposal. The member referred to humane ways, and I'm sure that that was his intent, but those kinds of directions and rules actually need to be laid out and not left to regulation. The act does not specify what type of research must go into making an order; that's a big hole in the legislation. Irrigation projects, oil and gas development, and forestry all threaten fish habitat, Mr. Speaker, on various levels, and this government has some work to do on all of these areas before looking at killing animals that may harm the fish habitat. We hope that the Minister of Environment will respond to that.

Before giving serious consideration to this bill, we think the government should clearly document how avian predators are impacting fish stocks. We can't just order the destruction of animals based on hunches. We need some real data here. The government needs to put sufficient resources into determining the status of fish stocks across the province. They have recently been lobbied by various organizations to do exactly that. People have even recommended that fishing licences be increased if the money is directly directed to this kind of research, because everyone in the province who is concerned about fish stocks and water quality knows that we have some issues here and that the answer to the issues is going to be based on science-based research to determine why the stocks are at those levels and how we reduce the destruction and return stocks to former levels. We've seen some action. Sustainable Resource Development's plan to buy back fishing licences shows that there has been government mismanagement in this area, and we've talked about it in this Legislature for as many years as I've been in here. Let's address those issues before we start shooting these birds.

If we take a look at the sectional analysis of the bill, my first concern is 2, section 33.1(1), that when the minister determines that a species is destroying or harming or may destroy or harm fish or fish habitat, measures may be ordered to reduce the numbers of that species on Crown land. The concern is how the determination is made and will be put into regulations; it isn't legislated. It doesn't specify wild versus domestic habitat. It does not specify if habitat is limited to the lake or if breeding areas such as associated rivers are included. There are no grounds for determining destruction versus harm. So all keen issues that need to be identified and discussed and at least debated before a bill like this could be passed.

Then in 33.1(2), the species to be reduced do not include those defined as endangered under the Wildlife Act. That is one good part that was put into this bill.

Section 33.1(3): the minister may delegate to any employee the power to make an order under subsection (1). Our concern is that there is no mention of what information the employee must consider or the qualifications of the employee. This makes the order look like an administrative matter rather than something that has serious ecosystem implications. We already know that field staff within both Environment and Sustainable Resource Development are, I believe, stretched to capacity at this time. We've got all kinds of monitoring and enforcement issues out there, and this just absolutely adds to the burden of work that they have.

Section 33.1(4). An order can be issued to protect domestic or private fish stocks. Our concern is that fisheries legislation is meant to apply to wild fish stocks. Private fish stocks should only be dealt with under agricultural legislation. Perhaps the minister of agriculture has something to say about that, and we'd be happy to take any advice from them.

Section 33.1(5): an order may be enforced by fishery officers, fishery guardians or certain employees of the minister's department. Our concern: no restrictions on how or when the orders are enforced. Restrictions should be part of the order, but the act does not say what an order is supposed to contain.

In section 3 we have concerns under section 44 that guidelines for determining when an order may be issued will be made by ministerial regulations. Our concern is, as always, that regulations are made behind closed doors.

Section 4 has an amendment to the Agricultural Pests Act. An order made under that act will apply to this act as well. Our concern is that an order for domestic stocks should not automatically apply to wild stocks.

I think that sums up what we have to say on this bill at this time. I hope that it doesn't make it past second reading, Mr. Speaker, but if it does, we'll go into more detail at committee.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fort, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

MR. CAO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise today to speak in favour of Bill 206, the Fisheries (Alberta) Amendment Act. It is also in my interest as an avid angler and a gusto fish diet consumer. As has been previously stated, Bill 206 would enable fish farmers to protect their investment from pest species. It would also create a mechanism and guiding principle by which the Department of Sustainable Resource Development must ensure the viability and protection of fish stocks and the biological diversity of aquatic ecosystems in Alberta.

Bill 206 would enable us to improve the spawning routes of fish and improve the status of fish farms around Alberta. Aquaculture, in common with all food production practices, is facing challenges for sustainable development. Most aqua farmers, like their terrestrial counterparts, are continuously pursuing ways to improve their production practices to make them more efficient and cost-effective. One of the major challenges that aquaculturists face is the increase of pests and predators threatening their farms, especially the fish farms.

Open-water areas and large concentrations of fish that are found in aquaculture facilities are a virtual smorgasbord for wildlife that eats fish. Most mammals are either large enough or small enough that they do not pose an economic threat to the facility. Taking a military analogy, the ground attack can be defended, but the aerial attack is hard to defend. Yes, birds are difficult to exclude and can have significant economic impact if no control is used. Bird population problems are complicated. There are different regulations and laws on the books adding to the confusion, making it a very difficult situation for owners of fish farms to know how to deal with a pest such as the cormorant that threatens their investment.

Bill 206 goes a long way in offering a solution to the pest problem that is occurring in aquaculture facilities around Alberta. I feel that it is this legislation that is really needed so that the owner of such facilities can better control and protect their investment.

Mr. Speaker, depleting fish stocks is a huge problem in Alberta. A large part of the problem of depleting stocks is the cormorant. They are increasing in population, and they are having a serious negative impact not only on aquaculture but on other colonial nesting birds. Waste from these birds is decimating, again, not only aquaculture but much of the vegetation in the area. The dramatic increase in the cormorant population is due to many factors. One reason is that the birds deplete fish stock in lakes around Alberta, and then we in turn restock the lake. This leads to more cormorants coming in to feed on the seemingly endless abundance of fish, and the cycle continues. The population grows rapidly. Another reason for the increased population is that there are no natural predators, especially in north Alberta. The predators of the cormorant are rats and large snakes. Now, I don't know about the rest of you, but the fact that neither of those predators prospers in Alberta is all right with me. The last thing we need is to introduce rats in Alberta to control the birds.

Mr. Speaker, the way to solve this problem is to pass measurable and sensible legislation like Bill 206. To try to give members an idea of how these pests are depleting our fish stock, let me paint a figurative picture of what the sky looks like when cormorants all take off at once. Think of the eclipse, the total blackout of the sun when the cormorants take off from the lakes. The only thing you can see are birds, thousands and thousands of birds making the sky as black as night. These birds are out of control in the lakes district in Alberta. I commend the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul in attempting to do something about the problem of depleting fish stocks, as I'm an avid angler myself.

Now, granted, Bill 206 deals with other problems depleting fish stock, such as problems created by beaver dams. However, the main concern, I believe, is the cormorant problem in Alberta, their part in depleting our valuable fishery resources throughout Alberta. They are also destroying many of the ecological systems around Alberta. As well, they are wreaking havoc on any of our attempts to have a thriving aquaculture industry in Alberta. This damage to the environment cannot be ignored.

Mr. Speaker, some in this Assembly may ask: what's the big deal? Why all this concern over this industry? Well, I will tell you. Aquaculture is currently playing and will continue to play a big part in boosting global fish production and in meeting rising demands for fishery products. At the recent session of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations Committee on Fisheries they stressed the increasingly important and complementary role that aquaculture and inland fisheries play in fish production for human nutrition in alleviating the economy of many rural areas around the world. This is an industry that has the potential to grow very large, and I would hate to see Alberta lose out in this new industry because of species that are out of control.

The cormorant has caused many problems not only in Alberta but around North America. There is even an industry cropping up from people who are trying to figure out ways to control the population of cormorants without using lethal means. From the research I have been told that they have not been a hundred percent successful. Studies show that the new techniques work on many birds and pests but not completely on cormorants. It is time that we give recourse to aquaculturists to get rid of this pest that threatens their livelihood.

Now, I am not talking about outright elimination of cormorants. Of course not. This bill is only advocating that we give owners of fish farms throughout Alberta the ability to control the population of pests so that the industry will have the chance to survive, and I honestly don't believe that the industry has much of a chance of surviving the way the population of pests is steadily increasing; that is, unless we take action.

Mr. Speaker, there are many strengths in Bill 206. I have alluded to some, one being that the active management of fisheries will promote the long-term sustainability of the industry and will increase economic stability and growth of the industry throughout northern Alberta. Another important strength is that Bill 206 will ensure that fish farmers have an effective recourse in the protection of their property and their livelihood from pests such as the cormorant. It has been argued earlier in the debate – and I'm sure the debate will go further – that owners do not have a viable way to deal with the pest threat and that Bill 206 gives them quick solutions. A strength in Bill 206 that I have only touched on is that it will allow spawning routes for older fish species to be facilitated. This would increase the population of fish naturally and thereby reduce the necessity of expensive restocking measures.

The final strength I want to mention is that by controlling these pests, the proactive management of waterfowl population can be protected, and for that reason I recommend passing this bill. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak on this bill, which is one of the shortest private members' bills, I guess, in this session that we've seen. I like its brevity, I'm intrigued by its simplicity, and I'm certainly not averse to the reasons that the hon. member has given to proceed with the bill; that is, the commercial significance of fishing is something that we should certainly pay attention to. If the stocks are depleting, then clearly we have to ask the questions why and what's the impact of the depletion of stocks on the livelihood of lots of Albertans and to the economy.

All of those I think are legitimate considerations that should lead one to give serious thought to this bill, Bill 206. It's its simplicity, however, that I think might be somewhat misleading. We need to ask some important questions about what the objectives of the bill appear to be and how they can be best served and whether or not the provisions of this act are indeed adequate enough to serve those purposes.

The bill obviously amends a couple of existing pieces of legislation. It certainly amends the Fisheries (Alberta) Act, and it also has a bearing on the Agricultural Pests Act. It intends to establish provisions for reducing the number of any birds or animals that could potentially threaten fish or fish habitat. Endangered species are clearly mentioned here and that this bill doesn't apply to any of the birds or animals that are listed under endangered species. So far so good, Mr. Speaker.

The question, however, is that the depletion or decline in fish stocks is not addressed in detail, and the questions are not asked about: what are the primary causes of that decline or depletion of fish stocks? Unless we identify the important causes, the primary causes of the depletion, our solutions might be off the mark. That's my concern. It is true that some of these birds, the cormorants, may like fish, and they're obviously converging on Alberta for some reason and not only North America but coming more and more north. I think they're finding the climate warm enough to come here and enjoy themselves, and I think that climate warming might be something the Minister of Environment should pay some attention to if he wants to deter the increasing migration and growth of these birds that seem to like our fish and want it free.

That's the other part. You know, in this province anything that's free is not good, and the birds want it free. If they were willing to pay for it, I think it would be one thing, but these guys come here and they want to have the freedom to enjoy this meal without having to pay for it. That's not good enough, I think, and now we want them to pay for it by their lives or something. We want to get rid of them. My concern is that these natural ecosystems are systems. You know, these species are interrelated. They depend on each other, and just to start manipulating one particular element without understanding the complex and intricate interconnections and interdependencies between these elements may not only not help us reach the objectives but may damage the ecosystem in a way that we may find later on difficult to repair and correct. So that's one of the concerns that I have.

I think we need some science, and the Minister of Environment always talks about, you know: science is on our side. I think here we need to make sure that science is on our side before we accept the proposals that are made in this bill to have legislation that will help us to control just these birds. I think that although the words "birds" and "animals" are used, the concern is with this particular species of birds. Cormorants are the target, I guess, of this bill.

Also, the question has been raised before that the ongoing, prudent management of fish stocks is important. We seem to be dealing with responding to a crisis that resulted perhaps from not so prudent management of the fish stocks. Is overfishing a problem? Do we have some mechanisms that help us monitor when fishing activity borders on overfishing, and to what extent can we take some remedial actions to make sure that overfishing in itself does not become a cause of the problem?

Overfishing of a particular species. I understand – I'm not a specialist, you know, in this area – that there is a certain relationship between different species of fish. Forage fish numbers have, I understand, increased, and these birds are attracted here in larger numbers because they find their particular preferred food of fish growing in numbers. We need to ask: where are the predatory fish stocks going, and what can be done to strike a better balance between different species of fish? I think it's the forage fish that these birds like. Is that true, hon. member? Their numbers have been increasing, and we need to ask why that number is increasing. It's not that fish altogether are disappearing. It's these particular species of fish, I guess, that have commercial value that are going down. So we need to ask some of these questions before we vote this bill in.

I think I'll just stop there. I've raised a few questions. The Minister of Environment is delighted to receive my suggestions. I'm sure he'll respond as well. But the member, I think, might find some of the questions I raised helpful. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Cross.

MRS. FRITZ: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to speak in support of second reading of Bill 206. I, too, would like to commend the hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul for bringing forward this important bill. I understand that the passion my colleague has for this bill comes about as a concern from his constituents. It's a concern, as he said earlier, that his constituents have with the double-crested cormorant. I really believe that this is a well-thought-out bill, and I know that my hon. colleague's constituents will appreciate his efforts on their behalf.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta has an amazing aquatic ecosystem. Our lakes and streams have an incredible diversity of life, and each year thousands of anglers and tourists head to the rivers and streams of our province and come to appreciate the beauty of our land and our great fishing. We all know that our fish are not the result of Mother Nature alone. In fact, for decades now environmental groups and local farmers have participated in the maintenance and sustainability of fish stocks in our lakes, rivers, and streams. Today aquaculturists raise many varieties of fish including rainbow trout, goldfish, arctic char, American eel, many varieties of salmon, and freshwater prawns. Albertans actively engage in aquaculture for a number of reasons. One is economics, where local entrepreneurs sell their fish stocks for a variety of reasons including fingerling production, you-fish operations, contract growing, table food market production, and biological grass-control carp, where operators raise sterile carp for weed control in water and for research purposes. In fact, in the year 2000 our aquaculture industry was estimated to be $10.8 million.

DR. TAYLOR: How much?

MRS. FRITZ: It's $10.8 million, hon. member.

Another reason, and a very important one, also happens to be a sincere concern over depleted stocks. Low stocks are a result of many factors, Mr. Speaker, including inadequate spawning routes for fish populations and shallow, isolated ponds where fish are susceptible to the effects of winter. It is also the result of overfishing in areas of high demand. Needless to say, this action has caused a few problems, which is why the hon. member has brought forward this bill.

Restocking efforts have contributed to the increase in predatory pest species. They are increasing dramatically, as we heard earlier. The stocks provide an abundant and convenient source of food. As restocking efforts increase, so too does the growth in predators. This results in a very frustrating situation for aquaculturists and those concerned with the sustainability of our aquaculture system. It is especially troubling for an industry that generally incurs high cost levels in order to meet the demand in their particular markets.

Mr. Speaker, as the hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul said earlier, a perfect example of this sort of pest situation is the double-crested cormorant. The cormorant is determined and irritating. They have increased in number by the thousands over the past 25 years. You would think that a predator of the cormorant would help offset the problem. It is well known, as my colleague from Calgary-Fort said earlier, that the natural predators of the cormorant include large snakes and rats. Well, there are not many large snakes in the northern Alberta lake region where the cormorant makes its home, and Alberta is rat free. So the increase in the cormorant flocks continues to be out of control.

Birds, fish, and mammals are known predators of cultured fish. Bird predation is the major source of fish loss at aquaculture facilities. The diversity of Alberta's aquaculture practices as well as the variety of predators mean that producers need to employ a variety of damage prevention and control techniques. The only assurance of eliminating bird predation at these facilities is total exclusion of birds from fish-holding venues. However, total exclusion is often impractical for many facilities due to size of operation, expense, or interference with management activities, which is why farmers turn to a number of management methods including the construction of barriers or frightening techniques such as noise, visual scare devices, lights, or even scarecrows.

While it is currently possible for a fish farmer to obtain a depredation order for a specific pest species from the Department of Sustainable Resource Development, it is a very, very time-consuming process in a situation where time is of the essence. Under Bill 206 a depredation order would no longer be required when a fish farm is threatened by an identified pest species. Of course, it would still be the responsibility of the minister to identify which species are considered pests, and it should be noted, Mr. Speaker, that it is an identical mechanism to one contained in the Agricultural Pests Act. This act allows agriculture farmers to destroy any animal which threatens their crops or livestock provided that that animal has been declared a pest by the Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development. As a nongame bird it is possible for the double-crested cormorant and other nonthreatened, nongame birds to be declared a pest and enable farmers to properly protect their livelihoods. The same principle should exist for a traditional farmer that grows crops or raises traditional farm animals and for an aquaculturist. In both cases it makes sense to enable farmers and Albertans to use their discretion.

Some individuals may be concerned that by empowering farmers, we would be putting species at risk. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is why Bill 206 has the minister declare certain animals as pests. He or she would have the ability to monitor species to ensure that no long-term harm comes to them. In essence, Bill 206 would amend the Fisheries (Alberta) Act in such a way as to clarify the responsibility of the Minister of Sustainable Resource Development to protect the fisheries resource through the minister's power to issue depredation orders, remove beaver dams, and restrict fishing in certain areas. While the minister has all these powers currently, Bill 206 would provide a guiding principle for the proactive, sustainable management of fishery resources.

Mr. Speaker, you can see that this is a widespread problem which governments are trying to resolve. I believe that the approach taken by Bill 206 is reasonable, it's responsible, and it's well thought out. The goal of the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul is to enable fish farmers to protect their investment from pest species of nongame birds. They would be identified, as I said, by the Department of Sustainable Resource Development, and I understand from the sponsor of the bill that this identification would be fully compliant with the Wildlife Act, the federal migratory birds convention, as well as certain provisions of the Water Act and the fisheries act.

Mr. Speaker, David Gillies, who is executive assistant to the Deputy Government House Leader, recently loaned me a wonderful book titled River in a Dry Land by Canadian author Trevor Herriot. Mr. Herriot quotes in the book that if there is magic on this planet, it is contained in the water. I firmly believe that the hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul is protecting one of our important resources through this bill, so I would urge all members of the Assembly to support the hon. member on this bill. Thank you.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to adjourn debate. Thank you.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Another excellent day with much excellent progress having been made, I would therefore move that we now call it 5:30 and that we adjourn until 8 this evening.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:25 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Monday, April 15, 2002

8:00 p.m.

Date: 02/04/15

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Please be seated.

head: Motions Other than Government Motions

Student Loans

504. Mr. Snelgrove moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to study the student loan system in place in Alberta.

[Debate adjourned April 8: Ms Blakeman speaking]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. I'd just like to pick up where I was on this Motion 504. As I was saying last week before we adjourned, I have a lot of students that live in my constituency partly because there are so many postsecondary education institutions in the constituency or very close to it. For example, we have Grant MacEwan college, NorQuest College, Alberta College. NAIT is right next door, practically, and a lot of students live in my riding and attend that, and of course the University of Alberta is just one short LRT ride across the river.

I certainly hear a lot from students of their struggles in trying to achieve a postsecondary education without committing themselves to a long-term relationship with a lending institution, which is what tends to happen, so although I take issue with a number of the statements that the mover of this motion made – and I'll come back to that – overall I do support the motion itself. I think we do need to review the student loan programs that we have in place. We seem to have changed the way we operate the program a number of times, but I don't think we really took a step back and went: okay; what is going to work best here?

Given that we know that a number of students are graduating from postsecondary educations with debt loads that are in the $20,000 range, and that would be, like, for a three-year degree and certainly significantly more than that if the student was choosing to pursue a specialty degree like a medical degree, I think it's particularly important that we do whatever we can to assist students with a student loan program.

One thing that I would like to bring up around this was something curious that happened last fall. Now, there was a period of time in place – I think it was six months – that was a payment holiday on student loans, and interest was not supposed to be accruing, I think. The students had six months to start paying their loans. I had one student phone me and go that he had just received notification that in fact they had canceled that part of the program some six weeks earlier but hadn't notified him until just then. His point was that he'd been saving his money for his payments and, in fact, had it in an interest-bearing account of some kind or some sort of term deposit or something like that, waiting for that six-month period to come into play, and then he was going to make a payment on his student loan. He said: "They took away my choice. Had I known they were going to charge me interest for those six weeks, I would not have put that amount of money into a term deposit. I would have just paid it, and that would have saved me a lot of money on the interest. Why did they tell me this six weeks after the fact?" We were never really given a satisfactory answer to that, but that's exactly an example of why this student loan isn't serving students very well. Let's face it. It is the students who end up paying back the money here, so it's not as though this is a program where the taxpayers are carrying the full burden here.

A couple of other things that have been brought to my attention by constituents around the current student loan program. The issue about family assets. I think the sponsoring member spoke about farm families and them showing huge assets on the books but, in fact, not a lot of cash flow, which is a fairly common situation with many of our farming families. Yet because of the regulations in place currently, there was an expectation that that family could surely come up with the cash to put their child through whatever stage of university, and that's just not happening. I don't think people have that kind of disposable income anymore. I look around, up and down my street. Some of these families that are two people working are looking towards their retirement. They're also looking towards saving something towards their kids' university. Maybe they own a house, and they've each got a vehicle to get to work. Well, those assets are going to count for them. But can they actually come up with cash on the barrelhead to be able to put towards these kids, you know, every month that they're in university or to front the tuition money? No, they're not going to be able to. So what we end up with is a situation where students are taking much longer to complete their degree because they're having to work part-time all the way through and can't take a full course load, which just extends the agony for everyone, because now you've got that initial loan for five years instead of for four years or for three years. I mean, it's stressful to work and go to university.

I find it really interesting that very few of us in this Assembly would have been in the position that we are freely expecting young people today to be in. Certainly, there was no expectation that I would be graduating from university with that kind of a debt load, but we're readily expecting that of the current generation of students. So there's a big double standard there.

I also think that the budgeting requirements through the student loan program are unrealistic in this day and age. What they're expecting is a reasonable amount of rent to pay or transportation costs or food costs certainly in the cities is just not connected to reality. So students are expected to put their budget in, and then the managers of the loan program come back and say: no, no, no; you won't be paying $700 for rent; you'll be paying $300 for rent. Well, you're hard-pressed to find a place for $300 to rent even when you're young and you're willing to, you know, have a roomie. Even residence is going to cost you more than that. So I think that there are some unrealistic expectations.

If we want to be a smart province, if we want to be in the vanguard, at the forefront, in a number of technology-based and intellectually based areas, we need people to go to university not only so that they'll end up with an engineering degree. We need thinkers. We need citizens. We need people that have had an education that challenges them to be creative and to pour all of their talent into what they're doing. To have a loans program that seems to be discouraging people from getting into postsecondary education I think is defeating where we need to be going as a province. We know that we need more people that are trained for skilled work or with university degrees, so let's not make it so difficult. If it means reviewing a student loan program, then I'm fully in support of it because I want to see our young people have the best possible future that we can give them.

Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. CENAIKO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to have the opportunity to join the debate on Motion 504, sponsored by the hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster. I believe that a review of the student loan system in this Assembly can only bring about positive results for Albertans pursuing postsecondary education as funding pressures continue and fewer sources of financial assistance are available for students.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to briefly talk about the financial options available for Albertans seeking postsecondary education. Then I'd like to share with this Assembly two options that this government should consider promoting to help improve accessibility for Albertans pursuing higher learning. First of all, I'd like to point out that this government provides wonderful achievement scholarships that recognize academic and athletic excellence through the Jason Lang and Jimmie Condon awards. The Jason Lang scholarship recognizes academic achievement of undergraduate postsecondary learners entering their second through fourth year of studies with $1,000 awards. The Jimmie Condon athletic scholarship recognizes excellence in athletics and encourages learners to continue their studies. Awards are valued at $1,800 per student. In 2000-2001 2,792 adult learners were awarded $2.8 million in Jason Lang scholarships, and 1,802 learners were awarded $1.5 million in Jimmie Condon scholarships. This government also awards Alberta heritage scholarships, which recognize individuals who have obtained exceptionally high standards in arts, science, and the humanities as well as at the high school, technical school, undergraduate, and graduate levels.

This government has introduced legislation this session that recognizes the contribution of students to their community. We also have legislation in place that prepares the Department of Learning for future liabilities related to student loans. Bill 1, introduced by the hon. Premier, outlines a program to recognize achievement among high school students in the areas of citizenship and leadership. It provides for awards of $5,000 to be presented to five students in these areas per year. The bill establishes another two scholarships per year for people studying the visual arts and performing arts. I agree with the hon. Premier that these areas of pursuit – citizenship, leadership, and the arts – are very much characteristics associated with the reign of Her Majesty, who has exemplified achievement in these areas during her 50 years as our monarch.

Alberta Learning provides a line item in their budget called provision of loans, which is an accounting adjustment made in recognition of future liabilities associated with new student loans. Although these liabilities could occur several years from now, current accounting practices dictate that this potential future liability be recognized in the year that the student loan is issued. Approximately 48,500 adult learners each received $7,200 of provincial loan assistance in 2001-2002. Mr. Speaker, in 2001-2002 the Alberta student loans program approved about $100 million in loans to approximately 50,000 students.

AN HON. MEMBER: How many?

MR. CENAIKO: Fifty thousand students.

The provision for the future cost of student loans issued, a statutory expense that is accrued up-front in the budget, is approximately 60 cents for every dollar of loans issued. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Department of Learning is working hard to find ways to provide financial assistance and encourage students to excel in their postsecondary studies.

However, there are challenges. Last year this government lost one of the biggest partners in the student loans system. The major banks have been withdrawing from the student loans business based on loan portfolio performance and negative customer retention, the biggest example being in March 2001 when CIBC notified the province that it did not intend to provide student loans after its current contract expired on July 31, 2001. The bank offered to enter into an agreement to extend its involvement in the student loans program for one more year. However, the terms of the proposed agreement were not favourable to this government, and the Department of Learning with the support from the Department of Finance proposed that the province directly finance student loans as of August 1, 2001. As a result, Learning moved to the direct financing of student loans. A private corporation, Edulinx Canada Corporation, will administer these loans on a fee-for-service basis. There's no impact on the provision for student loans issued in 2001-2002 as a result of moving to direct lending.

Mr. Speaker, my question is: if financial institutions cannot find a way to effectively manage student loans, how can the provincial government? I understand that the Department of Learning and this government do have a commitment to lifelong learning and therefore need to ensure that postsecondary education is accessible to all Albertans. I think the members of this Assembly would agree that the Department of Learning has found many ways to recognize academic achievement and offer financial assistance to Albertans seeking higher learning. Furthermore, I truly believe the Minister of Learning is always open to suggestions for improving accessibility to postsecondary education. Overall, I believe the Alberta government offers a great deal of funding for people seeking postsecondary education. As far as the financing of student loans, I believe the Department of Learning is moving in the right direction, but I worry about the financial risk to this government.

Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for these remarks.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Whitecourt-Ste. Anne.

MR. VANDERBURG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to enter the debate on Motion 504, which has been proposed by the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster. Motion 504 calls for a review of the student loan system in Alberta. I know that in my constituency office in Whitecourt-Ste. Anne I hear about student loans, both good and bad. I'm pleased that this issue has been raised for debate here in the Assembly so that we can discuss it in its entirety.

Mr. Speaker, student loans are designed to help those Albertans without means to pay for their education. However, sometimes I wonder whether the student loan system is letting down both our students and our citizens. It often does not help Albertans who do need help, and it's often not paid back in the best way for borrowers and lenders alike.

At this time, I'd like to share some thoughts from a constituent that took the time to write me and give me her feelings on Motion 504, so I'll go on. She states:

One huge consideration during the review has to be the cost differences between urban and rural students. Many urban students can remain in the family home while furthering their education. Of course, rural students do not have this opportunity and their loans cost them considerably more. Meager room and board accommodations range from $300-$500 per month; meager rental accommodations range from $500-$700 per month. If a student is lucky enough to find decent accommodations near the learning facility, the student often has to pay for them during the summer months in order to have a place for the following year.

And we experienced this with our own sons, so I can say that that's true.

The bottom line is that rural students face at least a minimum of $6,000 per year just for room and board.

Student loans are also cut back big time if the student owns any kind of vehicle. Yes, vehicles can be expensive but rural students often need to make trips home and bus fare is also very expensive. Hitchhiking is dangerous . . .

I am also aware that whatever amount the student applies for is usually very carefully calculated – and then reduced by 10%-15% upon approval as the student is expected to work to help with his/her expenses. This is understandable to a point but really not too practical as it definitely interferes with class and study time. Also factor in the difference between urban and rural loans and it is evident that a reduction of this sort is very expensive for rural students. Often these students face a lot of stress just relocating to an urban community and this added money worry only makes them more nervous.

Therefore, I . . . strongly suggest that rural students be given a special consideration such as a reasonable 'Housing and Transportation Allowance' for problems that are unique to them. This 'Allowance' should be forgiven in order to reduce the differences between urban and rural student finances.

One more thing I would like to mention is the fact that potential post-secondary students are very aware of the fact that the qualifying criteria for student loans are [very] much different if the student . . . has been out of school and living away from home for a period of only one year. I can name many, many people who do this on purpose so that they can easily qualify for the much less stringent criteria of student loans for adult students. This does not make much sense to me as the student's vigor (and study habits) wane during this year. In many cases, once potential students have been in the work force for a year, they may decide not to continue their education as they like having money in their pockets. It also seems to me that this is a very poor approach for a province that is crying loudly for skilled people in the workplace.

I wanted to share those comments from a constituent because the constituent did take the time and made an effort to send me her feelings on Motion 504.

So I guess I'll close and urge my colleagues and all members of this Assembly to support Motion 504. Thank you, sir.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, there's a lot of interest in this motion given the number of people who want to participate in the debate, and I think that's great. It reflects the value that we all have for education.

One of the basic issues that has always struck me about how far we ask students to go into debt is the question of balance between debt and subsidy. What I mean by that is that through our student loan program as it is now, we seem to be asking students to take on very substantial debt. They come out after a four-year degree with, in some cases, tens of thousands of dollars of debt, and I find myself questioning the wisdom of that. We then have them pay back the student loan program, which is now operated once again, as I understand it, by the provincial government, and to the extent that that takes several years of payment, we are preventing those students from perhaps advancing themselves with a second degree or purchasing a house or investing in a business or moving on in other ways. So we loan them the money and then they pay us back, and I'm not convinced that we shouldn't be looking at a different approach, which is to keep tuition costs at least at a very affordable level and help students avoid the debt in the first place.

MS BLAKEMAN: Agreed.

DR. TAFT: I can see that at least some members agree with me.

REV. ABBOTT: At least one member of your caucus.

DR. TAFT: I take what I can get.

I've heard this concern and had this perspective brought to me from quite a number of my constituents. The University of Alberta is in my constituency. It's the largest university in the province and one of the largest in the country. A great number of the students there end up taking on student debt, and they, of course, spend a lot of their energy and time and concern sorting out how to handle that debt: how much to take on, how to get out of it, how to minimize it. So I do raise the issue, and I would be pleased if some serious attention was made to the question of: how far into debt do we want students to get, and what is the price that we as a society are paying for having them get that far into debt?

A few days ago in the Assembly I tabled a survey conducted by the University of Alberta Students' Union. It addressed a whole range of issues, one of which was: what are the top concerns for students? The cost of education was, indeed, the number one concern for students. That's no surprise, but I do think it indicates the need to have a look at this particular issue. Are the costs we're placing on students appropriate? Are they perhaps too high? My concern, frankly, is that they are too high.

We're also hearing a number of concerns brought up by other members which I think are excellent concerns. One has to do with the way in which the student loan program requires a tie between students and their parents and makes certain assumptions about parents' ability to contribute to the cost of education. Sometimes, of course, that's a reasonable assumption, but in many cases it's not reasonable. The parents themselves may not be able to contribute, or even if they are able to, they may not be willing to because of strains in the family. We all know that families today are not typically the nuclear family that once was so dominant with mom and dad looking after the kids until the kids were university graduates. Instead, we may have blended families or second marriages or all kinds of complications that limit the parents' interest in supporting a child or a stepchild or an adopted child through university or college or postsecondary education. So I'm not convinced that the regulations, as I understand them, around student loans are up to date and reflect the modern reality of families.

Other issues that I've heard raised here today which I think are legitimate have to do with things, for example, like recognizing the difference between students from urban areas and students from rural areas. Students who live, say, in Edmonton-Riverview or Edmonton-Centre are typically a walk or a bike ride or an LRT ride from the university, but students who may be in a suburban area or coming in from out of town will face much greater costs, and there's no easy way of avoiding that. So I think we would want to look at that sort of issue in reviewing the student loan system and ensuring that allowances for transportation costs were fair and reflected the circumstances of the individual students.

I've also made a note here, and this goes back to an earlier point I was making. My understanding is that over half of students – I think perhaps the information I have is 53 percent of students – have their loans turned down or denied or at least reduced because of the position of their parents. As I indicated earlier, that can be completely unfair. It may simply be that the parents aren't willing to contribute, and we shouldn't hold that against the students. That moves me to what I think is perhaps the fundamental discussion around this issue, which is the value of education itself.

If we have a student, a young adult typically but perhaps a student of any age, who is wanting to improve their self, who is wanting to advance their self, advance their career, or understand the world more thoroughly than they do now by returning to education, I think we should celebrate that and encourage that because it's a good thing in and of itself. I think that we are a better society for having a well-educated population, and as a society, therefore, we should encourage students of all ages to seek higher education at every opportunity.

The value of education, of course, can be looked at, and it typically is looked at in a most easily measured way, which is: how much does it add to a person's income? We probably have all seen studies showing that grade 12 graduates earn such and such and college graduates earn more and university graduates earn even more and so on it goes, and that's an important measure. I wouldn't deny that. It's appealing, it's easy to present to people, and it's a reasonable basis for encouraging people to improve themselves and seek further education, but in some ways I think it's the least important reason for seeking an education. Seeking an education simply to get a job seems to sell the whole concept of education a little bit short.

There are some other reasons we want to look at. As the health critic I stand here before the Assembly having read any number of studies suggesting that one of the closest correlations with good health is high education. The higher educated the person, typically the better their health. So there's an issue we may want to consider.

What about satisfaction with life? If we want to go through life fully experiencing it, understanding what's going on, appreciating whatever we're looking at – whether it's in nature or in architecture, in art, in language, in music, in politics – having a sound education to work from I think will be an asset for getting the most satisfaction from life.

Finally, I think it's worth reflecting on the value of education as part of a democratic society so that our population is well enough educated to feel competent and confident in participating in a democratic society and contributing to a democratic society.

So there are many, many reasons for supporting education, and I think to the extent that student finance and student loans are a pillar for supporting education, it is well worth having a look at them, fleshing out the philosophy, fleshing out the details, and ensuring that they are serving students and society to the best.

Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Red Deer-North.

MRS. JABLONSKI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to join the debate over Motion 504. I believe it addresses an issue that is critical to Alberta's young adults. This motion has great potential to effect positive change towards addressing issues of fairness in the student loan program, and I believe that we must revisit our policies surrounding student loans.

Having said this, I think the steps that Alberta Learning has made recently are extraordinary and a very positive step in bringing access to postsecondary education to all Albertans. The new remissions benefits program will waive millions of dollars in student debt for each year of the program from the immediate time that the loan repayment to it begins. This is a staggering amount and very welcome relief to individuals who are really at the very beginning of their working lives. Imagine the relief of not being saddled by a crushing debt and seeing possibly a third of take-home pay being taken back by the bank for years upon years.

This program will accomplish so many great things for young Albertans, allowing them to make a strong start in the job market as well as in the investment markets to help individual Albertans accumulate savings and investments sooner. This kind of income security for Alberta individuals will mean overall economic strength, a more confident consumer, and a more confident investor in the Alberta advantage.

Looking at all these enormous advantages of the steps we have already taken, we really should be wondering if there aren't opportunities to go even further. We have to take a look at some of the evidence to suggest that there may be opportunities to provide greater equity in the system and provide more Albertans with an opportunity to acquire knowledge without having to sacrifice their standard of living in subsequent years. Perhaps Alberta could become known as the place where the starving student was first threatened with extinction.

When we look at the challenges that face our youth in the decades to come, we have a great opportunity to prepare them in the best ways possible to meet the challenges head-on. This is so important to young Albertans and can only help our economy and our society to grow. A population burdened by thousands of dollars of personal debt not only stifles the economy but causes a great deal of stress on the families, the individual, and eventually social programs. Financial stress is cited as a primary cause of marital breakup and can contribute to depression and even suicide.

It is important that we not underestimate the opportunity we have to better the lives of those Albertans who have strived to better themselves. We have a significant opportunity to provide educational opportunities to some individuals who might not have thought they had the chance to get educated. The student loan program has traditionally been targeted to youth. Still, Mr. Speaker, there are many individuals who later in life want to upgrade their skills and need a few financial supports to do so. We should be doing all we can to raise awareness of the Alberta student loans for those individuals that pursue lifelong learning.

The benefits of having an educated population are similar to the benefits of having financially secure individuals in the province. The workforce is more flexible in what they can do, and this reduces the level of so-called structural or natural unemployment. People are better equipped to adapt to the challenges that face them throughout their life. Having a strong base of knowledge also helps individuals be innovators, entrepreneurs, or be in a highly specialized field. An educated workforce adds greatly to the productive capacity of the province and can greatly enhance our ability to produce unique and innovative products. As well, a trained workforce will attract start-up and venture capital into the Alberta market, which will help Alberta's economy grow stronger. These are just a few of the ramifications of having more accessible student loans. This is core to the issues that Motion 504 would address, and this is why I support the motion.

Mr. Speaker, I have always believed that education is extremely important to making the lives of Albertans richer, more fulfilling, and happier. There should be as few barriers to entry into university or technical training as possible, and if there are barriers for individuals, we should work hard to eliminate them. With the current system, quite oddly, one of the barriers for young adults in many cases is the wealth of their own family. Unfortunately, not all young adults have the support they need from their family to go to school. Some parents just don't believe in supporting their adult children and cut their children loose after they turn 18 without so much as a handshake. In other cases youth are very adamant about making it on their own and don't want the support of their parents. Still others are estranged from their parents at an early age simply because they just don't see eye to eye. It's a sad commentary on human nature, but young adults and the middle-aged are frequently at odds with each other. The generational gap that persists can often leave Alberta's youth without the financial support they need to go to college. Instead, they choose to enter the workforce and squander the potential that they may have developed by higher education.

This is what student loans are there for, one might think, but unfortunately this is not the case. The parents are expected to foot the bill of the young adult's education, if they are able to, before the young man or woman can receive assistance from student loans. In cases where the young adult wants to take the responsibility or is estranged from their parents for whatever reason, then the individual has fewer options. I think that a person's financial tools should have nothing to do with their parents, particularly when the person is recognized by the law to be an adult. Young men and women look toward higher education to find independence and a sense of their own identity. It is stifling for them to have to rely on mom's and dad's goodwill and generosity if they want an education. The student loans program ironically provides financial freedom only to those individuals whose parents are not wealthy. This completely ignores the disposition of students and their willingness to take on the responsibility for their education themselves as adults.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Member for Red Deer-North, but under Standing Order 8(4), which provides for up to five minutes for the sponsor of a motion other than a government motion to close debate, I would invite the hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster to close debate on Motion 504.

MR. SNELGROVE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When I brought the motion forward, I think I stated clearly then that I didn't have all the answers to this motion. It's a very complex question, and I think we've seen from the opposition and from the members on this side that the situation the students are in ultimately may end up the same but with very, very different circumstances surrounding how they're getting there and what they're doing. I think the hon. member across made a very valid point when talking about the problem of trying to access funds from parents that may not still be in a relationship and that legal battles could take months if not years to determine who's financially responsible for the child, and I wonder what is he supposed to do in the time while that legal fight is going on. It doesn't make any sense to put him in that position.

The other aspect that I think we have to keep in mind is that while many students go into the education system from a low-income family, when you graduate as an engineer or a doctor or whatever profession you choose, I think you do that because you're going to move yourself out of the low end. So when you graduate, your repayment scale shouldn't still be based on how you started. If you're an engineer, whether you started poor or started rich, you're still going to make the same $60,000 or $70,000, so your repayment shouldn't be based on being poor at the start. I mean, that's just one of the aspects of saying that you have to know what you're doing when you get into this program because we're expecting our money back.

Mr. Speaker, I just think – and I think pretty well all hon. members in this House would agree – that an educated society is a successful society. It makes us able to look after our less fortunate and allows people to enjoy things in life they may not otherwise, whether it be the arts or whether it be the humanities or whatever. I don't think there's any question that we want to be able to educate our youth to be better than we were so that the future is brighter and better. That's all I think we have to do, to look at what the best way to do this is, and I want to say again that I don't know. I just know it's a huge problem that we seem to have separated students into different gates and different funnels, and I don't think we're addressing the issue right now. I think we're probably spending more on paperwork and application processes than we are on what we're actually doing with the students.

So I would just ask the hon. members to support this motion, and then let's see where it goes from there.

AN HON. MEMBER: You've moved us, man. You moved us.

MR. SNELGROVE: I moved you. Okay.

With that, Mr. Speaker, thank you.

[Motion Other than Government Motion 504 carried]

Provincial Achievement Testing

505. Mrs. Gordon moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to review and re-evaluate the delivery of provincial achievement testing.

MRS. GORDON: Mr. Speaker, colleagues one and all, is our provincial achievement testing providing an adequate measure of a student's overall ability? Is provincial achievement testing meeting the learning system's overall goal of effectiveness in educating students? Could we utilize a more comprehensive mechanism for evaluating a student's overall performance? Many educators as well as parents in my constituency have asked me to bring forward their views vis-a-vis Motion 505. They are asking us to review and re-evaluate the way we are presently delivering provincewide achievement testing.

Many of these parents are particularly concerned with the testing of eight and nine year olds, children in grade 3. These parents talk about the stress placed on the child, the fear, the anxiety. They refer to the fact that children at this age and stage often mature at very different levels, at very different rates. Some children in grade 3 cannot possibly comprehend a timed test or understand the full ramifications involved in multiple choice questions and answers. What about their communication or their collaboration skills? How are they incorporated into or fully measured through achievement testing? I am told that communication, collaboration, presentation, and research skills are not part of the mix. Should they be? Let's initiate an overall review and find out.

Provincial achievement tests have been used since 1982 and are aligned with the provincial curriculum, thus are based on curriculum standards for grades 3, 6, and 9. They are designed to provide a common measure for all Alberta students. As well, they provide Learning officials, as in department, with feedback related to the curriculum. They also measure the effectiveness of teachers working within the learning system. Do these tests distort and/or limit classroom instruction? How often have you heard a parent remark, particularly the parent of a grade 3er, that teachers spend all year teaching to and for that test. Lacombe upper elementary principal Wayne Hampton, a most respected educator and award winner, tells me that these exams don't test the skills children will need for job success: responsibility, adaptability, and teamwork. Further, he states that these tests measure what's easy to measure, not what's important.

Let me share with you a random sampling from my constituents, and I'd like to thank the many parents who wrote. The way the tests are laid out now, they do not test what children know, only what they don't know. Eliminate these tests for grade 3 and work at improving the procedures for grades 6, 9, and 12. Please remember that the work world requires employees who can learn, unlearn, and relearn, and that should be our goal in any type of testing. Achievement testing is far too costly. My grade 3er fearfully asked me what the government man would do to her if she failed the exam. Another huge concern is the inappropriateness of mandating these tests to students enrolled in the integrated occupational program. If you haven't studied calculus, how can you be tested on it?

As a sidebar I would like to add the following. This morning I had a lengthy, interesting conversation with a very nice, knowledgeable gentlemen who has long been involved in education. He told me something very interesting. Research proves that boys do much better than girls in multiple choice testing. Girls, however, do better at writing, at writing compositions, stories, and essays.

Standardized testing? We must recognize that elementary and secondary schools teach a wide range of materials and/or subject matter, including some very, very important life skills. For some children this is the only place that those life skills are taught. Is there a mechanism to more adequately assess the teaching and retention of these skills which are not directly discernible from the present format used in provincial achievement tests? I don't know the answer to this question. Do you?

What I'm asking for is your support so a full review and re-evaluation can take place. If what we're mandating is fine, then it need not change. But is there a need for a change or a need for an update? Are student portfolios the way to proceed? Should there be a blend of the two? Please support Motion 505 so that we can hold a broadly based review of current testing procedures. It is my understanding that a review has not taken place since 1982 and certainly would be needed if that is the case. I would hope that this review could involve dialogue with many: with parents, teachers, academics, the general public, and those who are most affected, the students themselves.

Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Before I recognize the next speaker, may we briefly revert to Introduction of Guests?

[Unanimous consent granted]

head: Introduction of Guests

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Calmar.

REV. ABBOTT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a very great pleasure for me to rise tonight and introduce a very distinguished guest in our members' gallery. She is the former MLA for Drayton Valley-Calmar and has been my coach and mentor over the last year or so, and I very much appreciate her. She is from the small town of Winfield, which has actually produced three MLAs for our constituency, myself being the third. I would ask if the hon. Shirley Cripps would rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this House.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to have the opportunity to support Motion 505, as put forward by the Member for Lacombe-Stettler. I think her comments indicating that this review is long overdue are most appropriate. I was part of the testing committee at one time that put in the exams in the first place, and I'm quite amazed at how the original intent of those exams has changed and how the administration of those exams has changed.

Originally the tests were put in to sample the programs. They were to look at the third grade social studies program, the sixth grade social studies program, and the ninth grade social studies program, for example, and indicate how appropriate they were for those children that were studying the content in those courses and to make some judgments about the program of studies itself. There was no need, when that was the intent, to give the tests to every youngster in those grades, and initially the tests sampled youngsters across the province. So at any one time there would only be a small number of third graders writing one of the exams, and that has changed so dramatically.

The tests now are given universally. Every youngster in grades 3, 6, and 9 writes those exams, and the purposes of the exams have again changed to almost be unrecognizable from the original intent. They're used now to evaluate not only students. They're used to evaluate teachers, they're used to evaluate schools, and they're used to evaluate school districts. This very, very minor instrument now has this huge impact on the schools and on education in the province. I think it's not overstating it to say that the use of the exams is being abused in some quarters. As the previous speaker indicated, the exams now are wagging the dog, and you hear reports of a sixth grade youngster coming home in January and saying: now we're starting our review of exam questions for the achievement tests in June. That was never intended, Mr. Speaker, when the exams were first instituted. So I think it's really worth while taking a look back in any review at the history and what the intent was and what's happened to that intent and whether we're happy with the changes that have occurred and the uses that are now being made of the exams.

I think a second question that needs to be answered in any kind of review is: are we making the best use of the evaluation dollars that are available to us? The current testing program is very, very expensive in terms of the preparation of the tests, the administration of the tests, the kind of time that's involved. It's a very, very expensive operation, and are we really getting our money's worth? If you have limited dollars for evaluation, is this the way you would spend them?

If I go back to when the tests were first discussed, Mr. Speaker, I think the original intent was that these would be used to make some judgments about the program of studies and the appropriateness of the program of studies but that in terms of actually helping classroom teachers, we would move to a series of diagnostic tests, which makes much more sense, that teachers would be given a diagnostic test to use with youngsters at the beginning of the term. That test, along with other evidence that the teachers gathered about individual youngsters, could be used, then, to plan and determine a course of studies or a program for individual youngsters. It would seem to me that if that's the use being made of a test, the payoff for individual children is really quite high.

As it is, the exams are given at the end of the year, so the benefit for any individual youngster writing it, other than having a mark assigned to them, is nil. I mean, there's no benefit at all to that youngster. Now, there may be some benefit to the teacher, if he or she learns that in teaching a concept like interaction, all of the youngsters in that particular class do poorly or that they do very well, in adjusting his or her instruction for the next year, but in terms of individual youngsters and helping individual youngsters, the current tests do very little.

I think questions have been raised particularly about the appropriateness of the exams for eight year olds and nine year olds. Again, the nature of the exams: they are predominately multiple-choice questions. There were the last time I looked some open-ended questions. But all of the limitations that we have known for years and years and years of onetime testing can be applied to the achievement program. It's done on one day, one hour, and samples the behaviour of a youngster. I think that most parents now, when they're talking to teachers about the progress of their child, look for much more comprehensive reporting, and the use of portfolios has become extensive. Parents want to see a wide range of evidence in terms of the progress of their child, and teachers, when they eventually have to sign a grade for a youngster, aren't comfortable using one instrument. In most cases, they rely on a wide range of instruments, portfolios, that take into account youngsters' daily work, that take into account other situations that they're put into in terms of problem solving. So there's a wide range of the youngsters' abilities and accomplishments that are taken into account in any kind of an evaluation.

Again, I think that there has developed around the tests a mystique that's completely inappropriate. I think we have to remember that these are exam questions made up by committees who field-test them, who gather them back in and for each exam put together a pool of items for which they have predetermined what the success rate for the grades 3, 6, and 9 children will be before they write the exam. For instance, I think that when the third grade exams are put together, the expectation is that 85 percent of the youngsters will be able to answer 85 percent of the questions on that exam successfully. So these are man made; these are people made. People construct the tests, and there's no magic. The power of the test is limited to the test-makers.

One of the other things that we've asked, I think, in the past to look at, now that the exams are being used in the way they are, is: is it appropriate for the government to actually be doing this, or should it be done by an independent committee or an independent agency?

So with those comments, Mr. Speaker, I'm delighted to support the motion and hope that my colleagues in the Legislature will join the Member for Lacombe-Stettler on this motion. Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

MR. LORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a pleasure, indeed, to rise tonight and speak to Motion 505, which urges the government to conduct a review of provincial achievement tests given to schoolchildren in Alberta. First, I would like to thank the Member for Lacombe-Stettler for her efforts to bring this issue forward. A debate concerning ways and means of measuring the learning progress of Alberta's youth as they move through the school system is something that I am pleased to contribute to.

I would like to talk briefly about how achievement tests are used in the Alberta education system today. In grades 3, 6, and 9 Alberta students write standard exams that cover essential learning topics. In grade 12 our high school seniors are issued standard diploma exams that they must take in order to graduate. To use grade 6 as an example, Mr. Speaker, children take tests that measure their knowledge in language arts, mathematics, social studies, and science. These exam scores are then used to evaluate students, teachers, schools, and the success of the provincial education system as a whole.

With the information that is gathered from the exams, we are then able to compare the achievements of our students class to class and district to district as well as across Canada and indeed around the world. I think that it is incredibly valuable that we have a way to measure the effectiveness of our learning system as a whole and of our schools and teachers individually. Being able to gather information about our student body in a quick and cost-effective manner is essential. The results of these tests can then be used to hold the learning system accountable to the students, the parents of the students in the schools, and the taxpayers of this province.

Recently, Mr. Speaker, Alberta students have been submitting scores that rank among the very best in the entire world, and I would like to congratulate them for the excellent work that they have done on these tests. Results of standardized exams are also used as a guide to shed light on where students excel individually by subject and where schools display excellence as well as a need for improvement over the core subjects. The test results can then be used as a guide to tell the minister and associated groups and individuals that help to draft the curriculum where it needs enhancement as well as where it is meeting the desired standards. However, are these tests comprehensive enough to gather essential information on the complete learning needs of Alberta's children? That's the question. Is there information about students that is not gathered and skills that are not assessed by these standard exams?

Mr. Speaker, I believe that there is important information about student learning and success available from different types of exams and the use of student portfolios. The main purpose of standardized testing is to sort through large numbers of students as efficiently as possible. This limited goal unfortunately gives rise to conformity and teaching to the test. These tests are felt to neglect or ignore several essential skills such as writing, speaking, acting, drawing, and constructing or repairing. All of these skills are taught in our schools and are valuable in life, yet they are not measured in provincial achievement tests.

Far-reaching educational policies are often based on results of standardized testing programs. Concerned individuals from the education system and beyond have questioned this situation. Questions arise because there are educational experts who are unsure that standardized tests look closely enough at the students' abilities and knowledge to make informed decisions about curriculum changes. The testing programs and their scores have been blamed for disrupting normal classroom learning and assessment because often the tests are viewed as being one-dimensional, biased, and not useful for the classroom teachers.

The phrase "test-driven curriculum" captures the essence of the major controversy surrounding standardized testing. When test scores are used on a comparative basis not only to compare the educational fate of individual students but to also assess the relative quality of teachers, schools, and school districts, it is no wonder that teaching to the test is becoming a common practice in our schools. This would not necessarily be a problem if standardized tests provided a comprehensive, in-depth assessment of the knowledge and skills that indicate a mastery of a given subject matter, but to achieve that, we will need to seek out complementary tools to use with standardized testing. On their own, standard tests may be too rigid to serve the learning needs of Alberta students.

With that said, Mr. Speaker, I believe that a review of standardized testing in Alberta is a great idea. It is reasonable to assume that the demand for test results that can be compared across student populations will remain strong.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Member for Calgary-Currie, but the time limit for consideration of this item of business has concluded.

Appointment of Auditor General

23. Mr. Zwodzesky moved on behalf of Mr. Hancock:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly concur in the April

8, 2002, part one report of the Select Special Auditor General and Information and Privacy Commissioner Search Committee and recommend to the Lieutenant Governor in Council that Frederick James Dunn be appointed Auditor General for an eight-year term commencing June 1, 2002.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader to close debate.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm delighted that all members concur in this because this decision was arrived at pursuant to a recommendation of an all-party committee. So in that regard, on behalf of the Minister of Justice and Attorney General to all members of the House I would like to simply say thank you for the support.

Second Reading

Tobacco Tax Amendment Act, 2002

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Revenue.

MR. MELCHIN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to move second reading of Bill 22, Tobacco Tax Amendment Act, 2002.

The amendments in this bill will legislate the increase in the tobacco tax rates that were announced in Budget 2002. This action is in response to recommendations from the report A Framework for Reform and is part of a comprehensive tobacco reduction strategy. The bill proposes increases to cigarette taxes of $2.25 per pack retroactive to March 20, 2002. A larger increase applies to loose tobacco in order to equalize the rate with cigarettes and prevent switching to avoid the tax. Cigar taxes, which are calculated in proportion to their estimated value, will also go up substantially.

These increases are expected to generate added revenues of $281 million in this fiscal year in spite of the substantial decline in smoking rates expected. All tax revenues, including the increase in tobacco taxes, go into the government's general revenue fund. The government uses the fund to support the programs and services it provides and to meet its priorities in all areas of spending. Health care funding is increasing by about $500 million this year. Some of that increase will be addressed by increased tobacco tax revenue.

Before the increase Alberta had one of the lowest tobacco tax rates in the country and had not raised them in over 10 years. Tobacco is one of the leading avoidable causes of illness and premature death in Alberta and in Canada. Raising tobacco taxes is part of a strategy to reduce the use of tobacco, especially by young people. A study by the World Bank states that on average increasing the price of tobacco by 10 percent reduced the demand by 4 percent within the adult population and as much as 15 percent among the youth population. Alberta's tobacco tax increase results in a rise in the price of cigarettes of almost 50 percent.

In addition, several amendments are proposed to help prevent tobacco smuggling from getting a foothold in Alberta. With these raises in rates, you can see that certainly smuggling becomes a larger concern. Part of the amendments includes limits on possession of tobacco, provisions that would enable us to pass regulation extending the tobacco marking program to include cigars, and increases in the penalties for offences under the act. The Alberta Gaming and Liquor Commission works closely with Alberta Revenue, the RCMP, Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, Health Canada, and other external provincial regulators regarding smuggling issues in Alberta. Any increase in attempts to smuggle tobacco as a result of this tobacco tax increase will be addressed by improved enforcement efforts by the AGLC, Alberta Revenue, and our partners.

An amendment is also proposed to parallel a provision in the Alberta Corporate Tax Act whereby we can waive penalties and interest in cases where noncompliance is outside the control of the tax remitter. An example would be when a business burns down. Obviously, the owner would have difficulty in maybe meeting deadlines or remitting taxes on time, and this would allow the flexibility even in the tobacco tax for those kinds of reasons to grant extensions or avoid the penalties.

Alberta's new tax rate is $32 per carton of 200 cigarettes. B.C. has increased its tax rate to $30 per carton. Saskatchewan is now at $32 per carton. Prince Edward Island is at $22.90, and Nova Scotia is at $21.04 per carton. Other provinces' budgets have yet to be tabled, Manitoba's possibly as early as next week, many of the provinces taking the same direction of increasing their tobacco tax.

In conclusion, the increase in tobacco tax supports our goal of promoting wellness and encouraging healthy behaviours as part of our efforts to build a sustainable public health care system. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm delighted to respond to the minister and address Bill 22, the Tobacco Tax Amendment Act, 2002. I appreciated his comments, and I for one will be supporting this legislation, although that doesn't mean that I don't have some issues I would like to discuss in relation to the bill.

I share one of the prime motives of the government, which is to reduce tobacco consumption generally throughout Alberta, and I think that common sense and the research would suggest that by increasing the costs of tobacco, we will reduce demand. The minister has actually cited research supporting that position, which I've seen reference to in other locations as well. I think that's a commendable objective. As a health issue tobacco use is a huge concern and a leading cause of death through a variety of causes: cancers and heart disease, to name but two. So there's much to be said for Bill 22.

I also understand from the minister and from other sources as well that there is something of a co-ordinated approach among western Canadian provinces on increasing prices in harmony. The minister mentioned Manitoba raising prices. I assume that that will be up to a level similar to Alberta's, and I think that's commendable. If we have a consistent pricing strategy ideally across all of Canada but at least across western Canada, then we can minimize problems with interprovincial smuggling or interprovincial transportation of tobacco products.

There is, of course, the problem of international smuggling of tobacco, especially coming in from the United States, and we perhaps fuel that concern by tax increases on the product. It simply makes for a larger margin of opportunity for smugglers to use for their profit, so we will need to be vigilant on international smuggling of tobacco products. There are some provisions, I guess, in the bill in terms of marking tobacco products and that sort of thing, but I would certainly commend the government and the other authorities or the other ministers involved to maintain a very vigilant attitude towards tobacco smuggling.

One of the concerns that I imagine some other members of the Legislature may raise is that tobacco use is not evenly distributed across the socioeconomic strata of our society. I'm told that my colleague from Edmonton-Centre wants to address this issue as well, and I think there's at least one member from the government side who has heard from his constituents on this issue. Tobacco use is heavier among lower-income Albertans and Albertans with less education, so in some sense this is a tax that will be felt more heavily among lower income Albertans than among higher income Albertans, and it will be felt more heavily among lower educated Albertans than higher educated Albertans and probably among less healthy Albertans than among more healthy Albertans.

So you could argue – and I think there would be some credence to the argument – that increasing the tobacco tax is burdening unfairly the poor, the lower educated, and the unhealthy. It's not an argument that I'm fully prepared to accept, but there is something to it. I do think that the long-term benefits of reducing tobacco consumption outweigh those kinds of problems, and certainly if we discourage youth from starting to smoke in the first place, then over the long haul that problem will automatically begin to diminish, but it's one worth considering.

There's also the issue of the cultural meaning of tobacco. In European or mainstream Alberta society or whatever the proper term is, tobacco has a meaning of pleasure and addiction and so on for people who use it, but in our aboriginal culture tobacco has actually quite an important spiritual meaning. Those of us who have been at aboriginal ceremonies where tobacco has been treated with remarkable respect and almost reverence have seen how important as a symbol tobacco is to aboriginal Albertans, a symbol of their culture. So we also tax an important cultural symbol by implementing Bill 22, and that . . . [interjection] Sorry?

MRS. GORDON: They're exempt.

DR. TAFT: Off reserve too? The issue is being raised, for the record, that aboriginals are exempt. Is that true off reserve as well? No? Okay.

In any case, it is an issue that I wanted to bring to the attention of the Assembly, that the cultural meaning of tobacco is different for different cultural groups. We don't want to lose sight of that as we put taxes on it. Whether those taxes apply on reserve or off reserve is a different issue but a related one.

Further, as I've gone through Bill 22, I couldn't help wondering – I don't have the answer to this, but it may be worth raising in committee – about the free trade implications. Under section 2(b) we actually differentiate between cigars manufactured in Canada and those manufactured outside of Canada. I'm not sure, but it made me wonder if we are in some way contravening free trade agreements on that particular issue. So it would be worth raising in committee, and perhaps by that point the minister will have a response and an explanation for that. We would hate to incur some kind of a grievance under NAFTA that would cost the provincial government a substantial amount of money to compensate lost business for American or other tobacco companies. It's unusual these days to see legislation that has such a clear distinction between products manufactured in Canada and those manufactured abroad, and I hope the minister will look into that.

Finally, one other, frankly, disappointment I'd like to express is the fact that the revenue that will accumulate as a result of Bill 22 will not go into a wellness fund. I know that the minister of health at times has raised this as an idea worth exploring, and I have concurred with him on that. In fact, a very large number of health promotion groups have championed the cause of having the revenues generated by the tobacco tax go into a wellness fund, and the total revenues are expected to be, I think, in the range of $300 million or something like that. I could be corrected. It's a significant amount of money but in the overall scheme of things not a huge amount of money, but I would say that it is enough money to have in the long term an almost revolutionary effect on the health of Albertans if it were specifically targeted to wellness initiatives. I think that's the kind of creative use of tax funds that in the long run will make this a much healthier province and might very well save us far more than it costs.

So that's, I would say, my greatest disappointment with this bill, the fact that it doesn't establish any kind of wellness fund. As far as I can read, all the revenue from this tobacco tax will simply flow into general revenue. It might be spent on potholes. It might be spent on debt reduction. It might be spent on health care. Who knows? I would say once again that I believe that for that sort of revenue, for that amount of money we could have in the long term a nearly revolutionary effect on the health of Albertans.

Finally, I'll close by just noting that there are some other members of the opposition caucus who want to address the bill and who are not able to be here at this moment, so I hope they will have that opportunity under second reading to speak to the bill, and I'm sure the Government House Leader will consider that.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

MR. SNELGROVE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a few points, and they may not exactly deal with the intent of the bill, but they certainly are questions that I think could be addressed in a likewise bill. I think the most important issue we are addressing when we've increased the tobacco tax is that we justify it under tobacco reduction. Ideally we don't want people to smoke, so if we tax it high enough, maybe they'll quit and save us money. So to the minister I would say this: why haven't we addressed the tobacco use in our native population just as critically as we do with the rest?

We have set up our alcohol system under a system where the fee is a markup. It's not a tax, and everyone, then, pays the same amount regardless of anything. I would just simply put it like this: if health care is our biggest concern and through tobacco reduction we're going to achieve that, why don't we feel that healthy young native children are every bit as important as any other child, and why don't we feel that healthy First Nations people are just as important as any other people? I think we do ourselves a big disservice when we start to treat people in our society differently, and if we can address this issue, instead of a tax – apparently due to legal or whatever things some people may be exempt from paying tax, but to my understanding, Mr. Speaker, no one is exempt from paying the markup on alcohol.

So if health and tobacco reduction are the two critical points of our government and of this bill, I'd just ask you to consider revamping how we address a markup on tobacco to a markup instead of a tax, because quite honestly in my area now the sale of tobacco in the small communities around the First Nations reserves is probably the biggest single street business there is. It only took two weeks, Mr. Speaker, to start this. There is simply no way you can enforce it or stop it when it's there. So I would ask you and I would ask all the Members of this Legislative Assembly to consider whether we have the willpower and the common sense to back off on the tax and call it a markup, and let's treat everyone equally and fairly and do what's right for everybody.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Just a minute. We have five minutes for questions and comments. Are you rising on a question or comment?

MS BLAKEMAN: No. Sorry.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Any questions or comments?

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre is recognized.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. I'll try this again. We've got 15 minutes. Oh, man. I'm pleased to be able to speak in second reading to Bill 22, the Tobacco Tax Amendment Act, 2002. There have been a couple of speakers precede me from both sides of the Assembly, both of them raising good points.

I had just a couple of notes on this bill. Obviously, this is the formal response to what was in the formal mechanism to what was outlined in the 2002 budget. I'm interested that the percentage increase on different kinds of tobacco products is different, and I've listened, but I've never heard anyone explain in particular why there's such a difference. For example, it went up 128 percent on individual cigarettes, 183 percent on cigars, and 300 percent on loose tobacco, and I haven't heard a description yet of why there's a discrepancy in that. I can see the minister making notes, so I expect he'll be able to answer that question.

According to what I've heard, the object of this is to discourage Albertans from smoking, particularly to discourage young Albertans from starting smoking. I can certainly speak to what a worthwhile endeavour that is. I smoked for more than 30 years, and I started when I was 12, so it's no surprise to anyone that has looked into this that getting young people to smoke is a great market for tobacco companies. It's easy to get younger people smoking, and I can speak from experience that it's really hard after 30 years to quit. I guess I'll always be a reformed smoker. I quit during the fall session, so it has been five or six months now, but, man, when you get hooked that young, it's a part of your entire lifestyle. Everything I've done in my adult life is around smoking. Every activity involved smoking.

So to listen to the somewhat glib instructions on how to quit smoking – they say: well, do some different activity. What different activity? Every single thing I've done in my adult life is about smoking. Go for a walk. Yeah, and smoke. Go visit friends. Yeah, and have a cigarette, of course. Go to work. Yeah, and smoke. Uh-huh. It's really hard to stop this. I'm certainly supportive of anything that we could do that would stop young people from starting, because, boy, it becomes a lifelong battle to quit, and frankly I didn't want to quit. I still don't want to quit. I still miss it every day, but I quit.

So, anyway, moving on, part of what I was looking for and what I believe I heard in discussion around having this tobacco tax brought in was a wellness fund. It was in the Mazankowski report. Create a wellness fund, and that was hooked in the Mazankowski report to this tax, but I don't see the tax being hooked to a wellness fund. When I look at Bill 22, the Tobacco Tax Amendment Act, 2002, it's not hooked to a wellness fund, so I'm wondering what went astray. What went awry here? What we have now is simply a mechanism for increasing the revenue to the government, but we don't have any of the other corollary aspects that we were expecting to come along with it.

I'm not seeing a wellness fund. I'm not seeing anything in here that comes with smoking cessation encouragements. I think that is a huge mistake. It's hard to quit smoking. There are different methods on the market right now to assist people with that, but they're expensive, frankly. If you're in a position where you're going to be both smoking and trying to pay for these smoking cessation things, it's a considerable chunk of money, and that's enough to deter someone from even trying. So I'm wondering what happened to cause the disconnect between the increase in taxes and the smoking cessation and also the promotion of a healthier lifestyle. Those things didn't come along with this, and I want to know why.

The other thing I've referred to here is a wellness fund. As part of that, I'm wondering why the government didn't consider incentive programs for people to have a healthy lifestyle or to continue having a healthy lifestyle. We've certainly seen the government use the stick, but where's the carrot? I have constituents that say, "Hey, you know, how come I can't get a tax credit for my health club membership or my fees for a trainer or a nutritionist?" I say: "I don't know. I'll ask the question," so I'm asking it. You know, if we're trying to encourage that, why are we only willing to use a stick, but we're never willing to use a carrot? There are people that are interested in that, and they're feeling a little hard done by. They've done all the right things – you know, they've got the healthy lifestyle; they're eating properly; they have an exercise program; they regularly go to the gym or whatever – and they don't get anything for it. I mean, yes, they're healthier, but they look around and in other areas there are incentives or tremendous punishments, and they feel they're doing something right, so why aren't they gaining anything from the government for it?

I, too, am wondering about this increased smuggling. I can remember – when was this now? – five or six years ago when taxes on tobacco products went up federally maybe, and in fact the smuggling increased so much in Ontario and B.C., I think it was . . .

DR. TAFT: Quebec.

MS BLAKEMAN: Sorry. I'm corrected. Quebec.

Those provinces, in fact, reduced their provincial taxes on tobacco products to bring the price down so that smuggling was not so attractive. In fact, I'm hearing already from members who are in the know saying that this is already a problem on the street for us. The government must have anticipated this. Why was nothing set in place to actively deal with it?

I want to support this, but I was really looking for the full meal deal here. I was looking for the tax which was going to bring in some revenue, but that revenue was going to be used for a wellness fund, and it was going to be used for smoking cessation programs to help people. I'm not seeing those two parts out of three. All I'm seeing is the government making more money. So if that's all this is about, the government making more money, then I have a beef with this bill, because it is going to disproportionately affect people in a lower income range. It's not fair; it's not right; we all know we know better; it shouldn't be happening: all of those phrases. Nonetheless, we know statistically that people with lower incomes smoke more and consume more tobacco products, and you can argue that this is not a good use of their money. Well, fine, but that's where they're spending it. To simply use this as a vehicle to get more revenue for the government without the additional programs going along with it is a tax grab by the government. It's a regressive tax, and it's picking frankly on people with lower incomes. It wouldn't surprise me that this government would make the choice to do that, but I really thought that they were supposed to be going into it with a larger program in mind.

If the purpose of this is simply to make additional money for the government, then I disagree. It's a regressive tax. It's taking money away from people who can least afford it in many instances, and the government is giving no assistance for people to be able to not have to pay that tax. I mean, let's face it. If you're addicted to smoking, you're addicted. This isn't just a matter of going, "Gosh, the tax has increased, and I'll just not do this. I'll just not have this next cigarette." They're addicted. There's a physical compulsion that has to be addressed here, and for any of you that have never been addicted to cigarettes, well, good on you, but, boy, I can speak from experience. It's darn hard to deal with.

So I guess that's how I'm approaching this bill: if it's part of a larger program, then where's the rest of the program? And give me some information, please, about when you expect it to be launched and how much money is being dedicated toward it or how much is expected to be raised from this particular tax that will be dedicated towards those two parts of the program. What are the various components of it? Where's it going to be launched? What kind of advertising campaign is going to be involved so that people are aware that it's going on? If you're not interested in attaching those two components to it and this is simply to raise additional revenue, then I'm not supportive of what you're trying to do here. I think if the government needs to raise money, which it obviously feels it does, there are other places that are more fair to Albertans for this government to be looking for that additional revenue.

So thank you for the opportunity to be able to speak to this.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Questions or comments?

Okay. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to Bill 22, the Tobacco Tax Amendment Act, 2002. I have throughout my adult life and my political career been someone who strongly supported action by government and by society generally to reduce the use of tobacco and to reduce smoking, and that goes back for me a very long way. I've worked alongside groups such as ASH to bring in bylaw amendments at the municipal level, and I certainly appreciate efforts that can be made by a government to reduce the use of tobacco.

However, Mr. Speaker, I have a concern similar to the Member for Edmonton-Centre. The use of tobacco is disproportionate in society among low-income groups. For example, a background report for the Mazankowski report indicates that 39 percent of people who did not complete high school smoke compared to 14 percent of people who have a university education. People in the lowest income households were nearly twice as likely to be current smokers, at 30 percent, as were those in the highest, which is about 16 percent. This is consistent with most research on the issue of smoking. Working people, poor people, and aboriginal people are far more likely to be smokers than people with higher income backgrounds.

So I think we need to put the legislation in context, Mr. Speaker. There are many steps that can be taken by this government to reduce smoking if in fact that is their single objective. However, one has to become somewhat suspicious if the government seems to be pursuing the issue of tobacco use in Alberta society from a strictly revenue point of view. There are many ways to tackle the issue, but one thing is clear: if the government's main instrument of policy is taxation, then it will harm or hurt or affect financially those members of society who are most addicted to tobacco and who have the least financial means. That is, I guess, the biggest problem that I have with Bill 22.

At the same time as the government is continuing, albeit at a reduced rate of speed, with tax cuts for large corporations in this province, the only people that are getting tax breaks, they are in fact increasing taxes in a variety of ways on the rest of us. This is a tax which will particularly hit low-income Albertans. There is a real problem in that philosophically for me at least, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps it's not for members of the government side, but certainly I think that there is something wrong with the picture of increasing taxes – in this case a tax that affects low-income Albertans in a significant way – at the same time as continuing along their well-trodden path of cutting taxes for those people who are most able to afford to pay taxes. I think that there's a serious inequity involved in that.

You might draw a parallel, Mr. Speaker, to the whole question of gambling revenues in the province. The growth of those revenues as a percentage of government revenues is very dramatic, and now it exceeds well over a billion dollars of revenue in a year. Yet if you look at it, if you analyze it, you'll find that most of that money comes from a relatively small proportion of people who gamble. Large numbers of Albertans gamble occasionally or infrequently, but a significant but small percentage are people who gamble regularly, and they provide the lion's share of revenue to the government. So the question really is: where does the government want to get its revenue from, and is that a moral choice, is that an ethical choice, is that an equitable approach to producing government revenue? People who are dependent on tobacco or gambling are certainly bearing an enormous financial burden.

Well, what are some of the things that the government can do? I'd like to refer members to a report of the Alberta Interdepartmental Committee on Tobacco Reduction of AADAC, and this is dated June 2001. It sets out quite a number of very interesting things that can be done by government to deal with this. What it talks about primarily is that there needs to be a very comprehensive and multifaceted approach to dealing with tobacco use. It indicates that best practices internationally include community programs.

- Develop partnerships with local organizations
- Maintain continuing education programs for young people, parents, enforcement officials, community and business leaders, health care providers, school personnel, and others
- Restrict access to tobacco products
- Tobacco free policies

And any number of things.

What it says most importantly, I think, is that a tobacco reduction strategy must be comprehensive: "A comprehensive approach including focused programming, taxation and legislation is required to lower the tobacco usage rate in Alberta." It must be complementary; that is to say, "Federal, provincial and municipal laws and initiatives need to complement each other." It must be collaborative: "Provincial, municipal and community agencies need to work together to address tobacco reduction to ensure mutual knowledge and support." It must be sustainable: "In order to be effective, programs must be sustained over a long period of time." It should have performance targets.

There are many, many valuable points in this particular document, Mr. Speaker, and I would recommend that members review it. It's available on the government's web site.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think that tobacco reduction is an important element. Surely the costs of tobacco use to society in terms of health care and other costs are well documented, and it's a very sound investment by government. But what I would like to see is exactly the type of comprehensive program that's outlined in this brief, which was published back in June of 2001. I would like to see the government acting in a broad and comprehensive way, and certainly protecting people from exposure to secondhand smoke and increasing the locations in our community that are entirely smoke free is a good thing.

One of the things that I wonder, Mr. Speaker, is why we play this game with tobacco companies. I know that this is outside the jurisdiction directly of this provincial government, but it always amazes me how the federal government spends millions and millions of dollars on antitobacco advertising, and they don't really do anything to criminalize the production, distribution, and promotion of tobacco products by the big tobacco companies. It seems to me that if you're really serious about getting rid of tobacco, that's a direction you ought to go. You need to be focusing on the executives and the shareholders of the tobacco companies and making some of the activities that they are involved in in the promotion of smoking, particularly among young people, criminal activities. That would be an approach that I would certainly support. But you allow these companies to operate almost freely and then spend all kinds of money trying to counteract what they're doing. It just doesn't seem to make sense.

To come back to the bill, Mr. Speaker, I am after careful consideration not going to support this bill. I know that the Premier was standing in question period and saying: if anybody has any objections to the bill, why don't they stand up and say so? But he wouldn't sit down long enough to allow that. I do think on balance that this bill is more of a tax grab in an area where the government feels there is popular support for a tax grab than a serious attempt to deal with smoking in our society. I know that the Premier has said that there would not be any taxes and that taxes were going nowhere but down in Alberta, but this is in fact a tax increase. I believe that it's dressed up as an antismoking measure, but in fact what this is is an area where the government feels there is public support for a tax increase, and that's why it has been selected. This is a revenue item, presented quite properly by the Revenue minister, as opposed to an antismoking measure.

As I said when I opened my comments, Mr. Speaker, I believe that given the demographic nature of smoking in our society, a tax approach to smoking is probably one of the least fair approaches to reduction of smoking and will I think increase the tax burden on those people who are least able to afford it. As a result, I cannot support the bill and will oppose it at second reading.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Any questions or comments?

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods is now recognized.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to make a few comments about Bill 22, the Tobacco Tax Amendment Act, 2002, and I am going to support the bill. I think any kind of action that we can take to reduce smoking is worthy of support, and I think the reasons have been well stated by others: the health reasons; the costs to society, health costs being but one of the costs that we bear; the kind of lifestyles that are encouraged by smoking; and in particular the dangers of secondhand smoking to, in many cases, family members who are in no position to control their environment. So I think anything that we can do to discourage Albertans from smoking, starting or continuing to smoke, deserves our endorsement.

When I first saw the item, in fact I started to look through the budget for other program areas that would be used to complement this, because when I first heard of it, I thought it was part of an antismoking initiative that was going to be undertaken by the government either through the Department of Learning or through the Department of Health and Wellness or through one of the agencies, through AADAC. Unless I've missed it – and I'm sure the minister would have mentioned it in his remarks – I'm really disappointed to find that it is a stand-alone item, that it's an isolated action. I think the government has missed the opportunity to use this tax to launch an all-out assault on smoking in an all-out effort to reduce or eliminate completely smoking in the province. I think it's an opportunity lost. It was a move that received a great deal of publicity and would have been, I think, an ideal time to launch a provincewide program.

I think we have to live with the difficulties: robberies, increased crime, smuggling. If you stop by a 7-Eleven to pick up milk, you see the signs and the locked cases with the cigarettes in them, and I'm sure that that's going to be an even greater concern now that the cigarettes are more valuable. Those are the kinds of things that I think are the price we pay in an effort to try to reduce smoking.

I also think it's unfortunate that the kinds of factors that are involved in smoking have not been taken into account, and some of those have been mentioned already: gender, young females. The last information I'd heard was that young females are the highest percentage of new smokers. Trying to understand why that is true, I think, would be as important, Mr. Speaker. If you're a low-income earner, then you're more likely to smoke, and there is some correlation between the amount of education you have and whether or not you smoke. I think there's been a great deal of research done, but understanding the problem is key to resolving it. Again, I'm surprised and disappointed that some of these funds will not be specifically earmarked to agencies that could undertake that and further that research and help the understanding that we now have of the problem.

I do have a question for the minister and would ask him why it is that this building is not a nonsmoking building. It seems to me that if any facility should be nonsmoking, it should be this one, the capital building, the symbol of government in this province, and I'm amazed that you walk into offices and into hallways in the building and can be overcome by secondhand smoke and that smoking is still allowed. Even in the cafeteria there's a designated smoking area. I wonder just how much money the provincial government has spent in trying to accommodate and modify facilities to accommodate smokers and whether that isn't working at cross-purposes when you take and put in a huge tax program like this to try to get smokers to quit, yet you still allow them or encourage them to continue by making sure that the government buildings have facilities where that activity can continue. So I'd be interested to know from the minister just exactly where discussions on making the Legislative Assembly smoke free are.

I think that with those comments I'll conclude, as I said, supporting the bill, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Any questions or comments?

The hon. Minister of Revenue to close debate.

MR. MELCHIN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the comments tonight, and in committee I'll endeavour to bring back responses to the questions that you've had. Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 22 read a second time]

Bill 16

Racing Corporation Amendment Act, 2002

[Debate adjourned March 18: Mr. Stevens]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to be able to raise some issues and debate a bit around the principle of what's being proposed here in Bill 16, the Racing Corporation Amendment Act, 2002. I think this is a timely bill, actually, because there are a number of issues that are coming up around questions that are being raised around the horse racing industry in Alberta. Certainly the Alberta Racing Corporation, which is the predecessor of what's being proposed in this bill, was in fact given a great deal of attention by the Auditor General in the 1999-2000 report and again in the 2000-2001 report, raising some concerns about management and accountability and also the split of the moneys collected and where those moneys were going.

There have also been concerns raised around the reduction in the number of racing days. I'm sorry that I don't have my notes with me as to the exact dates, but I think it was last spring when a number of people were writing in expressing concern around the future of the horse racing industry. In particular, I'm remembering the letters from people that made their living in this sector – I actually did table those letters – pointing out the number of racing days that were being offered to them through negotiations with both Northlands in Edmonton and Stampede Park in Calgary. The number of racing days that were being offered in negotiations with the sector were decreasing. Additionally, my research has turned up that there's been less betting, smaller purses, less participation, which in itself becomes a vicious circle for this industry because that leads to less betting, smaller purses, and less participation. It seems to be spiraling in a downward direction, so I think there needs to be a larger debate about the future of horse racing in Alberta, period. I welcome the opportunity through this bill for that discussion to be taking place.

One of the issues that was raised with me was the concern that under this bill the members who had been serving or were currently serving on the Alberta Racing Corporation and could be moved over and appointed to this new incorporation of Horse Racing Alberta could, in fact, have a very long tenure in sitting on these boards, because the time that they had sat on the boards for the Alberta Racing Corporation was not going to be considered under Horse Racing Alberta. In fact, I think that in all, they could sit for almost 12 years: six years with Alberta Racing Corporation and then an additional six years under Horse Racing Alberta. Some people were questioning that.

Additionally, there was some question about how the new board was being configured, and one of the additions to it was that there would be representatives from the track represented on the board. There's supposed to be less emphasis on the owners and the breeders. In fact, I think when you really look at it, given the public members who are appointed to the board, it's still quite possible to come up with a weighting to the side of the breeders and the owners.

I'm aware that there are very warm feelings from the government toward horse racing in Alberta. I mean, the Premier has often made it clear that he used to own horses, and I'm aware that just recently the Premier was involved in a charity fun race with one of the members opposite. Certainly the previous Premier is well known as a horseman and involved in horse racing in Alberta. So I understand that there's a great deal of warmth and goodwill towards ensuring that horse racing continues to thrive in Alberta. I just wonder if that's possible, and I wonder how much assistance this sector is going to need now and in the future from the government in order to remain a thriving sector. On the one hand, I'm sympathetic and supportive of that because this is a labour-intensive industry, so a number of people are making their living from it. Again, those are people that are not making a lot of money, and their money is staying here in Alberta and circulating about and contributing to our economy here. For those people that are trainers and groomers and walkers and people working at the tracks, it's important for them.

They don't want to see their sector die any more than anyone working in another area could envision their jobs disappearing, but in fact that's happened.

What we're seeing is that people want the big races. So they may go to Edmonton Northlands or Stampede Park in Calgary, but what they want to see is the simulcast from the big races in the States or in Europe. Right now only 20 percent of the betting at Northlands is on local races. Eighty percent of the betting action that takes place is on the simulcast races. So what's that telling us? I think we could be in a position where Alberta cities – in other words, Edmonton and Calgary – could become like a small market in the same sense that we're struggling right now with our professional hockey teams, that were a small market. There are only so many people we can pull from and so much activity that we can generate here. When I look at the emphasis and the percentage of participation that really is on the simulcasts, I think that trend is going to continue, and eventually we may just be sort of betting shops where the races are all taking place somewhere else and we're just watching them take place and betting on them.

DR. TAFT: There's only one global racetrack.

MS BLAKEMAN: No. I think there'll be more than that.

The people I've talked to are saying that it's quite likely that within 10 years everything will be simulcasts of the big races, and perhaps at best Edmonton and Calgary, I suppose, could look at having something like a B circuit, like triple A baseball, like the Trappers are. You know, is that a bad thing? Maybe not. There are still employment possibilities there for people. Perhaps that's more within the economic range that these markets can support. Part of my concern here is that this bill is looking to enable a sector that in fact needs to change and is moving in a direction of change by itself, and this bill is stopping that and propping it up in a different way. I'm not an expert in horse racing. I'm more than happy to listen to other people bringing forward comment on this, Mr. Speaker, because I am interested in the debate and I think we need to have it.

Further on this idea that live horse racing is dying and why we are making an effort to prop it up or to prolong it, I found that the total pari-mutuel has declined by 48 percent since 1991. As I said before, the number of live race days has dropped from 381 – and that was in 1991, so 10 years ago – to 221 in 2001. That's 42 percent fewer race days. So those two things are more or less following each other: 48 percent less in pari-mutuel and 42 percent less in racing days. That's almost half in 10 years. Thus I'm thinking that in another 10 years we could expect pretty much to see the end of it.

I question here whether the government is picking winners and losers. That may be amusing, considering that we're debating gaming, betting here, but I mean it seriously. Is the government perhaps because of its long ties to the horse racing industry choosing to take steps here to support an industry that in fact is slowly changing itself into something else? Is the government picking winners and losers on this?

How is this being accomplished? Well, ironically it's being done through electronic gaming. Most of these racetracks have what are called racing entertainment centres, RECs, in them now. Those racing entertainment centres have VLTs, slot machines, and in some cases electronic racing terminals, which are sort of like little games of horse races. It's like a simulcast. You actually see a race that goes on, and little horses run around and you bet on them. How the money that's collected from this electronic racing is being split is part of it is going towards the purses for the horse racing. That's part of what's being contemplated here in this act, and it's very specifically what the Auditor General was talking about in his two previous reports: how that money was getting divided up.

In fact, it is a very special deal for racing. Compared to any other gaming arrangement that we have for any other sector in Alberta, this is a very special deal because the government gets 33 and a third percent of what's coming off of these electronic games. The remaining 66 and two-thirds is split between the racetracks and the horse owners. By horse owners I mean the purses. They're the ones that are going to win this money, so they're the beneficiaries of it. Essentially it's between the racetracks and the purses, if you want to put it that way.

In the other endeavors that we can look at that are in the gaming sector, the operator is getting 15 percent, the charity is getting 15 percent, and the government is getting 70 percent, which it then puts into the lottery fund. Some of those funds, only 6 percent now, are going back out to charities and nonprofits. About a third of it goes to debt repayment, and the remaining third goes for a variety of priorities the government has identified, like health and education and other core government services.

There's a very special deal that's being offered here to racetracks to prolong perhaps or encourage continued activity in a sector that seems to be in fact declining. I find this an irony because when we look at the betting progression, we have an odd sort of connection here. We have a decline in racing that is partly attributable to an increase in people putting their gaming money into slot machines and VLTs and electronic racing terminals. So what are we going to do to try and save horse racing? We're going to take the money from the slots and the VLTs and electronic racing terminals and put that towards the purses. They become parasitic. They become reliant on one another, and I don't think it's going to be the live horse racing that's going to win out of this. You know, in order to keep the whole thing going, there's an increased reliance and encouragement for people to gamble using the electronic terminal, not the live horse racing.

In order to keep up the purse amounts and keep up this level of activity, we're going to need the revenues from the slots to increase tenfold over the next four years to keep up. The minister and the legislation anticipate there being additional gaming machines put into the racing entertainment centres at these track facilities. How many new slot machines are being anticipated, and what's the cost to the taxpayers? Is there a corresponding amount of money that's being set aside to treat gaming addiction out of this, or is that simply left to come out of the lottery fund because it's not in any kind of percentage to the increase in the amount of gaming overall? The other thing around all of this is: where does Internet gaming come in? It's not contemplated in here, but when we're talking about the electronic machines supporting the live horse racing, somehow Internet gaming has got to be dealt with here, because it's coming. How does that fit into this whole scheme that's being anticipated here?

There's an argument about providing entertainment for the public. What's interesting here is that in most cases the entertainment is paid for by the provider. For example, skiing is considered an entertainment. Well, the resort that develops it pays for the development of it, and they're going to get their money back through their charges to people that use it. Hollywood movies: you know, it costs a lot of money to develop those, and they're going to get their money back through their ticket prices. Golfing and golf courses: again, a lot of money to develop, but they get their money back through their green fees and various promotional items. Even things like monster truck rallies: I mean, it costs the promoters money to put this together, but they're going to get paid back from the proceeds of it. When we anticipate there being additional gaming machines put in here, it's the taxpayers that are going to pay for those additional gaming machines. So we have the taxpayers of Alberta supporting a particular entertainment, but that money isn't necessarily going to come back to them. I'm interested in the argument about gaming being entertainment, because I don't see these being equivalent or parallel.

Another question. It doesn't appear that the Alberta Racing Corporation was very successful in advancing racing. In fact, that was part of its mandate when it was established, but it wasn't particularly successful, and we've had a decline in the number of racing days. We've had a decline in the purses. We've had a decline in the amount of betting. So what is anticipated in the changes that are going to establish Horse Racing Alberta that will be different? I'm not seeing any substantial difference in the operation of the agency. Essentially it's the same people. We know that they can all be reappointed for up to six years, I think. We've had a couple of small changes like the race tracks being represented, and Horse Racing Alberta will have two seats for the tracks, but at the same time we're increasing the number of seats for the breeders and the owners. So we've just kept the same ratio happening again. The public members that are appointed to this board have in the past certainly tended to be members of the owners, so you still have an imbalance there. If that's what was trying to be corrected here, I don't think it's going to be achieved given what's put forward in the act, because in the end the tracks are still at a disadvantage.

I just have about a minute left, and I haven't started to discuss the concerns that were put forward by the Auditor General specific to Alberta Racing Corporation and whether, in fact, those concerns have been addressed in the dissolution of the Alberta Racing Corporation and in creating Horse Racing Alberta. I may be able to do some of that in Committee of the Whole, where I can go clause by clause once I've examined the concerns that the Auditor General brought forward in 1999-2000. He did answer in 2000-2001, and he did say:

With respect to the Ministry of Gaming's oversight role and accountability for the performance of the [Alberta Racing Corporation] under the Racing Corporation Act, we recognize that coordination of respective roles and responsibilities will take time. We will also follow-up this issue in 2001-2002.

We have had a number of steps taken partly in response, I think, to the Auditor General's concerns, but obviously the Auditor General is still anticipating an oversight role that needs to be continued. He obviously was not satisfied completely in the steps that were taken by Alberta Racing Corporation or by the ministry.

Thanks very much.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Whitecourt-St. Anne.

MR. VANDERBURG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just want to make a few brief comments regarding Bill 16 in support of the Racing Corporation Amendment Act, 2002, and to let people know that this just isn't gaming – and the member across had made some good points – but it's also farming for a lot of families in Alberta.

I've read different reports on it, and I've witnessed, you know, how many people are affected by horse racing in this province. I can tell you of one specific case where I know of a second generation family here in Alberta. Right now their farm south of Calgary has close to 150 horses, and these horses end up all over North America. There's a breeding industry, and there's a training industry, and there's a big industry behind horse racing. It's not just gambling.

There are many, many people throughout this province that invest their hard-earned earnings into this business and return good profits back to Albertans. You know, there's a feed industry; there's a vet industry; there are people that haul horses back and forth from tracks, whether it be B tracks in Lethbridge or Grande Prairie or the Stamped track in Calgary or Northlands.

Speaking about Northlands, Northlands track is one of the highest rated tracks in North America. They have outstanding staff that maintain that track in a world-class state. So, again, we've got people that are maintaining tracks and maintaining barns, and we have grooms, and we have all kinds of people that make their living off horse racing. Really I think that we should recognize that it's not just gambling. It's farming, and it's an industry. I'd encourage everyone here to think hard about that and support Bill 16.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Any questions or comments?

MR. MASON: To the hon. Member for Whitecourt-St. Anne: recognizing that what you said is true, that horse racing is an industry, is it consistent with the Conservative government's philosophy to provide subsidies by the taxpayers for any industries, and if it's not generally in keeping, why this one?

MR. VANDERBURG: Well, I can only say that in the case of the people that I know in this industry, they pay big taxes and they contribute lots to the economy of this province.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you for the opportunity to say a few words about Bill 16, the Racing Corporation Amendment Act, 2002. At second reading, Mr. Speaker, we are asked to address our remarks to the principles that stand behind the bill, and there are a couple of principles that I think are important principles to consider when we're looking at Bill 16.

I think one of the principles that becomes clear if you look at the bill and the background material is that there is a need for an integrated governance structure for the industry, and that need is based on a number of factors. One, there's a need to stabilize the industry. There have been some great reductions in revenues in the last number of years and instability, so there is a need to bring some stability about, and some changes in the governance could help that happen. There is need to enhance the horse racing and the breeding industries in the province, and we heard from the previous speaker in terms of the kind of ripple effect on the other industries that are related to the horse racing and breeding industries and that this does have a large economic impact on Albertans. We also heard from the Auditor General of the need for increased accountability to the government by the industry, so the principle that there is a need for an integrated governance structure I think is supported and defensible.

The model that the government has brought forward – and I don't pretend to be an expert on it, but I think it's modeled closely after the Ontario Horse Racing Industry Association, and I think it was chosen as the pattern because of the success or the resurgence of the industry in that province. So, again, the governance model is borrowed from elsewhere where it has proven to be of some success.

I think another principle that the bill rests on is the principle that horse racing will be part of the overall gaming program in the province. This bill makes it clear that it's part of the government's overall gaming program, and I think it clarifies and makes clear the role that horse racing will play in that strategy, although I suspect there are parts of it that still have to be worked out and negotiated. Again, the principle is that horse racing will be part of the overall gaming strategy.

I think the principle that the governance structure has to be inclusive of those who have horse racing and breeding interests is also an important principle. This act includes harness and thoroughbred horsemen, breeders, and the two large city racetracks, and it makes it possible for all the finances and marketing to be channeled through Horse Racing Alberta. It also gives the one organization the responsibility for governing racing rules, so it brings together a lot of the interests in horse racing and provides a governance structure for them that will again, I think, lead to some stability and to some certainty. I think it will also make possible the resolution of some of the disputes or conflicts that seemed to be characteristic of the industry in the past.

I think that with those comments about the principles, Mr. Speaker, I'll wait until we go into committee to make comments about some of the specific items in the bill. Thank you very much.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Any questions or comments for the hon. member?

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to speak to Bill 16, the Racing Corporation Amendment Act, 2002. I read the bill with some interest, and what it does, of course, is it provides a unified voice for the horse racing industry, expands the board of the governing body from seven to 12 members, and attempts to provide an integrated voice for the industry. Now, that's all well and good. It's very hard to argue with that. It looks like it's just a progressive change and essentially an organizational type of bill, but I think we need to look a little bit deeper into what is behind this bill. Dr. David Reid, who sat on last year's horse racing review committee, has indicated that the government has told the industry that it will only receive support – and by that I take it to mean financial support – if there is a unified voice for the industry.

In the past internal bickering between elements of the industry meant that the government could not provide financial support to one section of the industry without creating a furor and demands by other sections for equal treatment. Dr. Reid was quoted in Horse Racing Gets Wholesale Makeover: Report calls for new governing body, hike in slot revenues, which was an article in the Edmonton Journal on December 15, 2001, as saying:

The government insisted that they would only help if we came as a united voice . . .

They couldn't have supported us before, even if they had wanted to, because the industry was too fragmented. Any help would have just caused more bickering."

So what it seems to me from those comments and others that I've heard, Mr. Speaker, is that the government is insisting that there be some unification in the horse racing industry as a precondition for continued support, including financial support, for the industry. What I see this bill as being is government legislation of that unified voice in order to open the door to continued financial support of this industry, and it's curious that the industry, this particular industry out of all of the other industries, has been singled out as one worthy of government subsidy.

Now, this government has prided itself in the past on a policy of noninterference in the marketplace and getting government out of business and ending subsidies for business. The government of the current Premier has made quite a reputation for itself nationally for doing this and as being a principled enforcer . . . [interjection] And well might you applaud if the government was indeed consistent, hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora, but the government is not consistent. It has this one little blind spot, which is the horse racing industry.

The Auditor General pointed out last year – we dealt with this before the election, I guess, so it may be a little more than a year ago – in his report that $17 million had gone to various elements of the horse racing industry illegally, in contravention of existing legislation. So what did the government do? Did it ask for the money back? If one was a welfare recipient and had received an overpayment as a result of some government error, the government would surely insist that the welfare recipient repay the money in full. They'll take it out of their cheque; they'll do any number of things. But in this particular case the government did not ask for the money back. In fact, they found a new way to legally give what illegally had been given before. Why is that? Why is the horse racing industry deserving of a different standard of treatment than a welfare recipient? Not only that, not only having legalized this illegal overpayment, the government is now doubling the stakes in this year's budget, Mr. Speaker. There's a $33 million subsidy for this industry, this one industry.

Now, I have to ask. This industry is in trouble financially, and the reason is that a source of the industry is being displaced by new technology. This is very common. This is pretty typical of capitalism wherever you might go. New technologies, new businesses, more efficient ways of doing things come into being, and they displace old ways of doing things, old technologies and outdated concepts, and so it is with horse racing. It's being displaced by electronic gambling, and that is one of the reasons why there's been a steady decline in this industry.

All well and good if the government wants to subsidize a declining industry in order to maintain jobs. I can't say that other governments haven't tried it, but I thought this government had turned its back on those practices. Does the government attempt to prop up the vacuum tube industry, Mr. Speaker? Does it try and prop up Ramblers? Does it try and prop up the vinyl record industry, the eight-track stereo industry? Does it give subsidies to drive-ins to help them compete with VCRs and DVDs? What is it doing to protect the declining shag carpet industry? And to take a homegrown example, what is the government doing to protect the wooden grain elevator industry, a very, very threatened homegrown Alberta industry that might just be worth giving a little help to? Well, they're not doing anything for those industries because that's the natural way of things, the evolution, the going out of business of outdated technologies that the government accepts as a fact of life, the jungle of the marketplace if you will. No. In this particular industry the government insists on continuing subsidies in contravention of its own philosophy and its own track record, much trumpeted around the country.

I would like to know why that is occurring. The horse racing industry in this province has won the quinella, and I don't mean to nag, but I really think it's time that this government bet on a different horse and was consistent in its policies about support for industry. I have yet to hear an explanation that I find acceptable for the selection of a particular industry, in this case the horse racing industry, for public subsidies. At the same time as there are ongoing cuts to children's services, for all kinds of valuable services that the people of this province need, the government insists on giving subsidies to business, and I think that it ought to stop.

So, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I just want to indicate that I think that the Racing Corporation Amendment Act seems to be benign on the surface, but when you put it in context to the government policy relative to this industry, it is not and is not something that in that context I can support.

Now, I want to make one final point, Mr. Speaker, and that is that the act requires Horse Racing Alberta, as it's becoming known, to provide annual business plans. I would suggest that these annual business plans ought to include a provision to get this industry off subsidy by the Alberta taxpayers. Why not amend this act to put a requirement that the business plans of Horse Racing Alberta move very quickly towards complete financial independence from the Alberta taxpayer? That would be something that perhaps I could support, but as it now stands, I don't see any intention on the part of the government and even less so on the part of the horse racing industry to wean itself from taxpayer subsidies.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Any questions or comments for the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands?

The hon. Minister of Gaming to close debate.

MR. STEVENS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the hon. members who spoke to this bill in second reading, and I'll provide some comments in response at the beginning of committee.

Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 16 read a second time]

Bill 20

Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2002

[Adjourned debate April 8: Mr. Mason]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to have an opportunity to begin addressing some of the concerns and some of the principles that we find in Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2002. It's a huge act with a host of changes, so I thought I would start off initially with some comments about one section.

There are actually eight acts amended, and the first that I thought I would spend some time on is the Civil Enforcement Act. The Civil Enforcement Act takes up about the first one-third of the bill, and it affects virtually all Alberta businesses because almost every business in the province, I'd say without exception, will at some time or another attempt to recover the funds that are owed to them. All of the rest of us as citizens and consumers have an interest in ensuring that the way funds are recovered is fair and provides the debtors an opportunity to discharge their debt before their property is seized and sold. So I think that all Albertans in one way or another, Mr. Speaker, are affected by these amendments to the Civil Enforcement Act included in Bill 20.

It deals with how you recover money or how you recover objects to which you are entitled. It usually happens in one of two ways: one, you get the money from a judgment from the court and you register the judgment and then attempt to collect on that judgment; or two, certain kinds of contracts such as property leases and conditional sales contracts allow the creditor to seize under what is known as the power of distress, and it's a little different because you don't have to go to court and sue to recover that money. Those are usually the two ways that creditors recover what is owed them.

The bill has as one of its purposes to sort out competing claims. Often when someone is in debt, particularly a business, they're in debt to a number of businesses, and sorting out whose claim comes first and how all the claims are going to be handled is a part of this bill. The determining of that priority is handled in this section of the bill.

There's a minor amendment but I think one that creditors are going to find useful, and that's the ability now to find out who else is owed money. So if you are a creditor, you can find out who else will be working to try to also get redress and to have a claim on the business for funds. That's a minor change, Mr. Speaker.

A fifth change is the conditions under which creditors can obtain payment from a bad debtor. Usually what happens is that the creditors initiate a seizure, or a garnishment, of someone's wages. When that happens, when a debtor has his or her wages garnished, there's often some agreement where the creditor comes along and says: look, I'll pay you part of this if you cease action against me. This requires the release of the seizure, of the garnishment. This is now allowed under the bill. The notice period to other creditors to allow them to initiate action such as seizure or garnishment was 15 days, and that's now in the bill being extended to 30 days. I think that this is an amendment that will accommodate other creditors and will not unduly prejudice the rights of a debtor.

A sixth change that this particular amendment deals with is enabling certain civil enforcement agencies to contract with the sheriff's office. I guess this is one where I'll be interested in what other members of the Assembly have to say. It will now allow the sheriff's office, acting on behalf of the Crown, to carry out certain things usually done traditionally by the public office. I think it's an area that my colleagues in the opposition have expressed concern with in the past. That is the concern that the oversight of those activities will be weakened, and it may lead us to the kind of situation, that we all dispare, that exists in the U.S. of having the repo man, the repossession individual, who uses all kinds of dubious tactics to gain a creditor's assets. The fear is that they'll be cutting corners to accommodate commercial creditors, particularly if you have large commercial interests paying them. So it's a change that we'll come back to, Mr. Speaker, and have further comment about in the future.

Another change – and I think it's an important one – is that it affirms the sanctity of a citizen's dwelling. It deals with the entry of a bailiff into a residence or a business to seize property and how that has to be done. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees all of us the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure, and this section of the act reaffirms that tradition of the citizen's dwelling. It deals with actually two situations: one, where the premises being entered belong to the debtor and, two, where the premises being entered belong to a third party. In the first case, the bailiff can enter for only two purposes. The first is to seize and remove the debtor's property or to evict the debtor in a landlord/tenant situation. If the premises are residential premises or if the premises belong to a third party, the bailiff can enter for either of those two purposes only if an adult is present who the bailiff believes is a resident and if that adult consents to the access. So, again, careful restrictions in terms of how property can be entered and seized.

There are also provisions for how to enter a residence of either the debtor or the premises of a third party in terms of what the bailiff may use as reasonable force to gain access; that is, to force open a locking device to enter a nonresidential premise of a debtor. Absent consent, a court order is required to force open a door to the nonresidential premises of a third party or resident. There are provisions there, and very carefully laid out provisions, in terms of how that entry can be gained.

I think the amendment is a positive change. The major difference is the requirement that an adult be present before an entry can be forced into a residential premise. That's, I think, a positive move, Mr. Speaker.

I think a final change will be about the Civil Enforcement Act. There are penalties now for passing yourself off as a sheriff, agency, or bailiff on your business papers or your business cards or identifying badges or any kind of documentation that is used to try to convince somebody that you have a legitimate right to engage in the activity in seizing or entering property. Though it's a minor change, I think it's an important change.

The bill has a number of underlying principles that are designed to protect the debtors and a number of principles that are designed to support creditors in securing their rights under the law. But as I said, it's a comprehensive bill, Mr. Speaker, and one that really begs being moved to the Committee of the Whole, where we can deal effectively with these specific items. I think with those comments, I'll conclude.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Any questions or comments for the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods?

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just need to take a few minutes to address some of the aspects of this very substantial bill, indeed one of the more extensive bills we will be seeing in this session. I have in my constituency a superabundance of lawyers – it's a burden I must carry, but I do my best – so I know they will be expecting me and indeed have provided various comments to me on their views concerning what is, in effect, an omnibus bill, I would say.

I would just, as is I think customary for second reading, go through a few of the highlights and principles. As we all know, Bill 20 is amending a number of acts. The Civil Enforcement Act makes changes, as the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods noted, that a bailiff may enter a residence without a court order only with the permission of an adult who lives at the residence. It's a step to protect our rights as Canadians.

The aspect of this bill that has received the most media attention so far, I think, has to do with the amendment to the Fatal Accidents Act, which increases the amount of damages paid to the spouse or cohabitant of a deceased adult or to a parent of a deceased child from $43,000 to $75,000 and increases the amount of damages paid to a child for a deceased parent from $27,000 to $45,000. It amends the act so that there are quite different approaches than are currently in place for collecting damages from the death of a parent or child, and I won't go into those details here. They have been discussed already in the media and, frankly, are a source of some controversy. Some groups, such as Mothers Against Drinking Drivers and some lawyers who are supporting them, have views that they've made a point about delivering and that contradict the proposal from the government here. I'm still weighing out which side to come down on here, but that's why we have these debates, and I'll be listening to some of the comments as time goes on.

The bill will also amend the Interpretation Act, which will adjust how people are appointed to boards or committees and how hearings and investigations are held and so on, and it addresses a number of other acts in greater or lesser ways.

I was particularly, though, wanting to address the issue of the Fatal Accidents Act and the amendments proposed there, which will, as I say, increase payouts to $75,000. One of the first things that concerns me when I see a dollar figure specified in legislation is that once that becomes law, it's very difficult, impossible to change, in fact, without new legislation. Sometimes that's good, but it is a constraint, and with the effects of inflation and so on, it's an issue to be concerned with, and maybe we need to review that.

MS BLAKEMAN: Every five years.

DR. TAFT: Perhaps a five-year review provision would be a good idea.

MS BLAKEMAN: Maybe you should look at an amendment.

DR. TAFT: I'm getting various comments of assistance from some of my colleagues here. I think that maybe we'll all end up agreeing on this, that some kind of a five-year review process for the dollar figures would be a good idea.

I think, Mr. Speaker, there's a great deal – a great deal – to be said on this piece of legislation, but I sense that the energy in the room is diminishing despite the passion of my comments, so I think I may take my seat here and cede the floor to somebody else. Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Any questions or comments?
The hon. minister to close debate?

[Motion carried; Bill 20 read a second time]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to all members for their co-operation this evening. It has been a very productive evening. With that, I would move that the Assembly now stand adjourned until 1:30 tomorrow afternoon.

[Motion carried; at 10:49 p.m. the Assembly adjourned to Tuesday at 1:30 p.m.]

Title: Tuesday, April 16, 2002

1:30 p.m.

Date: 02/04/16

[The Speaker in the chair]

head: Prayers

THE SPEAKER: Good afternoon.

Let us pray. Our Father, we confidently ask for Your strength and encouragement in our service of You through our service of others. We ask for Your gift of wisdom to guide us in making good laws and good decisions for the present and the future of our Alberta. Amen.

Please be seated.

head: Introduction of Guests

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Solicitor General.

MRS. FORSYTH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the Minister of Justice and Attorney General I would like to introduce to you and through you to the Assembly 10 staff members from Alberta Justice, legal services. They are Mrs. Sue Lefebvre, Ms Greta Lankoff, Ms Joyce McKenzie, Mr. Doug Wolch, Mrs. Michelle Iverson-Marshall, Mrs. Myriam Murray, Miss Christie Wade, Mr. Bob Lisevich, Ms Darlene Moser, and Mrs. Karen Janz. The minister has asked me to thank these hardworking staff members for their diligent service, and I'd ask them to rise and receive the warm welcome of the House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MR. HORNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is indeed my pleasure today to introduce to you and through you to all members of the House a large group of students from Brookwood elementary. We have in both galleries today 95 very well-behaved and bright students from Spruce Grove. They are accompanied today by their teachers and a large group of parent helpers including Parkland school trustee Lori Benner. I would ask that they rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Leduc.

MR. KLAPSTEIN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm delighted to introduce to you and through you to members of the Legislature my uncle, Walter Halbach, who is visiting us from Jackson, Mississippi. He is seated in the members' gallery, and he has come to observe how we govern ourselves in the fine province of Alberta. So I'd ask him to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased today to introduce to you and through you to the House a very active group from my constituency of Edmonton-Highlands. The five members belong to a group called the Edmonton-Highlands health care action group. They formed because they are concerned with the future of health care in Alberta. They are developing a submission to the Romanow commission and are very active in making sure that their community is well advised on the government's direction in health care. They are to be congratulated for their hard work and dedication. I'm happy to introduce Sandra Barnes, Cindy Drummond, Vivian Cheperdak, Remi Genest, and Ross Deacon. I would ask them to rise and receive the warm welcome of the House.

head: Oral Question Period

THE SPEAKER: First Official Opposition main question. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

School Fund-raising

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Legislate, regulate, castigate: that appears to be the way the Ministry of Learning deals with problems. Parents are the latest group to be attacked for simply filling the gaps in underfunded schools. My questions today are to the Minister of Learning. Given that the government committed in Bill 12 to examine the learning system, which, one assumes, would include resources, why has the minister undermined the work of this committee before they even get started?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, probably two years or two and a half years ago I rose in this Legislature on numerous occasions to talk about fund-raising and this government's belief that parents should not be fund-raising for textbooks. Since that time a lot of things have changed in Alberta Learning. There have been roughly 25 percent – yes, 25 percent – more dollars go into the budget, especially for the budget on the K to 12 system. We presently spend about $3.7 billion for the K to 12 system.

What the hon. member is alluding to are comments that I made about putting in a regulation or a policy or something in the funding manual that will limit parents' fund-raising for textbooks. I would bet you that probably in the last two and a half to three years the hon. opposition has raised the issue about parents fund-raising for textbooks at least five or six times. We are doing something about it. This is not acceptable. With $3.7 billion going into the education system in Alberta for 550,000 students, I feel that every taxpayer has the right to demand that their kids have textbooks.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you. Again to the same minister, Mr. Speaker: how will the minister stop parents fund-raising for items that free up money for the basics?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, what we will be doing is bringing forward a list, that probably will be more inclusionary as opposed to exclusionary, which will be saying that we feel that parents can fund-raise for things such as trips to Europe, trips to New York, rock-climbing walls, things like this that are outside of the curriculum but are the nice-to-haves in the school system. We will be bringing that list forward probably in the next two to three months. We are looking at how it can be done. But I will assure you that textbooks will not be on that list to fund-raise for.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you. Again to the same minister: how can the minister claim that schools are adequately funded when there are no standards for class size, school librarians, school counselors, or even the number of textbooks that children must have?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, I have a little bit of a problem with that, and I'll use Edmonton as an example. I received a letter from the superintendent of the Edmonton Catholic school system that categorically states that their school system does not fund-raise for textbooks. On the other hand, I hear from the Edmonton public school system that, yes, they do. The funding formula is the same for each of these school jurisdictions, so what inherently is the difference? This government believes that parents should not be fund-raising for textbooks, that the $3.7 billion that goes into the K to 12 funding system is more than adequate to pay for textbooks, and that is something that we absolutely will not tolerate any longer.

THE SPEAKER: Second Official Opposition main question. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Children in Care

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today the Korvette Crier inquiry was released, more than two years after the Minister of Children's Services promised a review. Yet again we are seeing this government's abysmal record when it comes to children in care, and yet again we are seeing a lack of standards and a lack of guidelines for children in care. My questions are to the Premier. Why did it take more than two years for this inquiry to be completed?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, for the details of that particular question I'll have the hon. Minister of Children's Services respond.

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, we conducted a special case review. We looked through all of the issues surrounding this. There were a number of different processes of looking at it. I should remind this Assembly that it was not only thoroughly looked at, that the person in question was taken through the courts, was jailed for two years, and is presently released on three years' probation. Clearly there has been significant follow-through on behalf of both the defendant and on behalf of Children's Services. We have continued right from the time of the case, from the first knowledge that we had of it on the death of the child, and received that tragedy with the most grave attitude and followed through with a number of things. Very recently, our initiation of the foster care review plan and how we train foster care parents is part of subsequent action we have taken in the department as a result of this tragic situation.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you. My next question is to the Minister of Children's Services. Given that the report calls for provincial standards for screening prospective foster parents, why were there no standards in place?

MS EVANS: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would dispute the fact that there were no standards in place. The record of this particular case will show that in fact the standards for accreditation of agencies to identify and source foster workers were in place, but with the agency that was selected, the worker apparently was not aware of the fact that that particular foster family and that particular agency were not accredited for assuming this type of case and this particular case. There are standards in place. The fatality review has gone further. It has suggested that we communicate those standards, that we work on the enforcement of those standards. I'm very satisfied that over the last three years we've made significant strides.

Mr. Speaker, I don't want this Assembly to believe that we haven't been working with due diligence, particularly with First Nations communities. We have 17 delegated authorities. For the most part they're doing an exceptional job. They continue to improve every day, and we continue to work with them and with the foster families that they have within their employment as well. We are working on training programs. We are looking very assertively at other programs that the Child Welfare League of Canada has in place, PRIDE, and other training programs as well to assist foster families. In First Nations communities – one final point – it's very hard to find foster families to do the job, and we're making a plea regularly through the Metis nation association and through other native groups in Alberta to continue to try and increase the roster of foster families that will help us look after these children.

DR. MASSEY: Mr. Speaker, to the same minister: how will the minister respond to the recommendation that the entire system be reviewed?

MS EVANS: Well, Mr. Speaker, we have been doing continuous review in Children's Services of our systems. This is one part of the system, and this is one particular area that we are working and focusing on. Throughout the last three years, I would suggest, we have done a great deal to initiate and follow through with that review and make significant change.

THE SPEAKER: Third Official Opposition main question. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenarry.

Children's Advocate

MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Every year the Children's Advocate's report provides details of how Alberta's child welfare system is rife with abuse, yet the government continues to ignore the recommendations. Now a class action suit may be filed on behalf of more than 400 children who were allegedly abused in one year alone. To the Minister of Children's Services: how many of the 13 recommendations from last year's Children's Advocate's report have been implemented?

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, as soon as that report was delivered to me, not only did we look at those recommendations, but we examined every single case anecdotally identified in that report: every single case from the vantage point of what was said, when it was said, what information was delivered to the advocate's office. We have done our utmost to follow through on every single one of those particular cases and taken a look at it.

I think I should comment on one area right away to reduce this number that's being purported as the number of children that were harmed through any particular action. In that particular year, dealing with the substantiated cases, 18 children received some type of abuse while they were in the direct care of the province, not necessarily at the hands of their caregiver but by somebody's particular action. It may have even been a parent. Thirty-four children were found to have had some particular type of abuse through action taken beyond the scope of Children's Services but while Children's Services were involved in working with the family to provide supports for children who were at risk.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: does it take the threat of a lawsuit to convince the minister that she must make changes in her department?

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, I previously answered that question by saying that on the very day that I received that report we were following up on every single aspect of it. We followed up on everything from the situations that the advocate reported on to the types of actions that should be taken. It's quite clear that although not all recommendations in that report have been enacted, we are still reviewing how we work with the Children's Advocate in direct relationship to the child welfare directors in every authority. So the net result will be that children in the province will be better looked after, and in future the frequency of the dialogue between the advocate and the authority will ensure that we don't wait for some horror story to be printed, that we are acting immediately when we hear that children may be at risk or damaged.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the Premier: will the Premier act now to have the Children's Advocate report directly to the Assembly as an officer of the Legislature?

MR. KLEIN: I don't know why we would do that. The Children's Advocate is not hired by the Assembly, Mr. Speaker. Why would he report to the Assembly? He's hired by the government on behalf of the Department of Children's Services.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader of the third party, followed by the hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last November 26 the Minister of Learning emphatically denied in this House that parents and children were fund-raising for school essentials. Yesterday the minister announced that he was considering passing regulations to prohibit fund-raising for such essentials. You don't pass laws and regulations to deal with a problem that doesn't exist. My question to the Minister of Learning: why is the minister proposing to put regulations in place to prohibit an activity which he has previously claimed is not taking place?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Again I will reiterate that back in September of the year 2000 the Alberta School Boards Association put out a document that in essence suggested and recommended to all their school boards that fund-raising for things such as textbooks be prohibited. I believe that the exact wording that they used was core curriculum materials. Since the time that the hon. member has cited in his question, I have received confirmation that there have been some individual schools that have been fund-raising for textbooks. We have done audits on these schools and found that it is not appropriate.

Mr. Speaker, I will add that a school in my own constituency wrote to me asking for money for textbooks. In contacting the superintendent and the board chairman of my own school board, they categorically refused to accept that this school had to do it. There were funds available for it, as there are funds available in every school jurisdiction. So quite simply, this is something that obviously has not been followed. The school boards have not followed the ASBA's recommendations, and quite literally it's time to do something about this.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is interesting that the minister now recognizes that he misinformed the House in November. While the chair of the Edmonton public school board says that the funding we receive is inadequate to meet all needs within our district, the minister chooses to punish parents who raise money to make up for the funding shortfalls. Why?

DR. OBERG: Well, Mr. Speaker, I found it quite interesting that the chairman of Edmonton public would come out when their own superintendent said that it was not necessary and was not needed in Edmonton public. So perhaps that's something that the chairman of the board of Edmonton public schools should talk to his superintendent about and come forward with a recommendation. If he comes forward and says that they definitely must fund-raise for textbooks in Edmonton public, then we would be looking very seriously at what is going on in Edmonton public.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final supplementary to the same minister: instead of addressing the underfunding of classrooms, why is the government choosing to use the force of law to make it illegal for parents to fund-raise for basic education requirements?

DR. OBERG: Quite simply, Mr. Speaker, it's the school boards' responsibility to provide things such as textbooks to their students.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Employment Opportunities for Aboriginal Youth

MR. DANYLUK: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Recent demographics of the aboriginal community show that their youth population has increased significantly. It is a well-known fact that the unemployment rate is very high in this community, especially among young people. My first question is to the Minister of Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development. Is your department working to ensure that aboriginal youth have employment opportunities?

MS CALAHASEN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are aware of the fact that there will be and continue to be labour shortages in Alberta. The most obvious source, in my view, to address labour needs is to be able to deal with the fastest growing population. In fact, the aboriginal working-age population is growing at a rate four to five times higher than the nonaboriginal population. To ensure that aboriginal youth have employment opportunities, in this province we're blessed to have what I call a tool, the aboriginal policy framework, which provides us with the ability to act in two ways.

One is to be able to deal with it internally, and that's to be able to facilitate or collaborate via cross-ministry initiatives with a number of ministries involved. Just as an example, Mr. Speaker – I think this is really important – Alberta Sustainable Resource Development has been assisting aboriginal communities to obtain fire-fighting contracts worth approximately $9 million. Another example: Alberta Transportation developed a number of contracts for transportation and civil projects for aboriginal lands which contained aboriginal content clauses for labour equipment and material resources.

The other component is the external component. When we're talking about external, we're talking about working with First Nations, we're talking about dealing with Metis, and we're talking about dealing with the federal government and industry. We have in excess of 40 aboriginal industry and government partnerships currently in place in Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, we're starting, but we've still got a lot of work to do, and I look forward to working with my counterparts in these respects.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. DANYLUK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to direct my first supplementary question to the Minister of Human Resources and Employment. Mr. Minister, what is your department doing to assist aboriginal youth in the enhancement and development of skills?

MR. DUNFORD: Mr. Speaker, first of all, the province values the full involvement of the aboriginal people within our economy, especially youth. We recently released a publication looking at the forward thinking and future planning of being able to meet the skill requirements that need to be available here in Alberta. From that report we did focus on aboriginal youth, so we are trying to raise the skill level of many of our young citizens here in Alberta.

We particularly want to increase partnerships. I might just anecdotally, then, make note of a recent project, the Precision Drilling initiative in Frog Lake, where 50 First Nations people were trained for jobs in the oil and gas sector. My colleague and I were out at the graduation ceremony, and there really seemed to be a lot of excitement around that particular partnership. So we're encouraging more situations like that, and of course, again, we're dealing with First Nations people in developing these skills.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. DANYLUK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final supplemental is to the Minister of Learning. Given that you recently signed an immigration agreement to provide an additional source of labour, what impact will this agreement have on the employment opportunities of our aboriginal youth?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. First of all, the provincial nominee program stipulates that any employer applying for foreign workers to come in under that program must show that there is a shortage, so quite simply I don't feel that this will have any effect on the aboriginal youths. Obviously, as the previous two speakers said, it's a very important element of what we are attempting to do in Human Resources and Employment, Aboriginal Affairs, and Learning. However, to assure the hon. member, this will have in essence no effect on aboriginal youth employment.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Regional Health Authority Budgets

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Northern Lights, Keewetinok, Peace, Mistahia, Lakeland, WestView, East Central, Headwaters, Chinook, and No. 5 health regions are all either projecting budget shortfalls this fiscal year or looking at reducing services to meet their budgets. To the Minister of Health and Wellness: how many millions of extra dollars will it cost RHAs to cover the 30 percent rise in health care premiums for their employees, that is simply paid back to the minister's own department?

MR. MAR: I'll undertake to look into that particular question that the hon. member asked, but I should remind him and members of the Assembly that health care is clearly the number one priority of this particular government, Mr. Speaker. The 7 percent increase in health care spending reflects that. About half of that went to regional health authorities. Yes, regional health authorities from rural Alberta have said: we need more. In some cases some of the regional health authorities got close to 7 percent, including a rural regional health authority, and they say: well, we actually need 15 percent. Well, that's not sustainable, and it speaks to the issue of the requirement of regional health authorities throughout this province to deal with their budgets, to plan, and to co-ordinate.

This is the key reason why, as set out in the Mazankowski report, there was a recommendation to look at collaboration and innovation. It's the reason why the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glenora chairs a committee with our colleagues from Red Deer-North and from Highwood to look into ways that regional health authorities can collaborate with each other. Is there a compelling reason, Mr. Speaker, why every health authority should provide every service, or can there be examples of collaboration where they might share services or they might contract with each other or they might share an administration system or they might be contracting out for things like laundry?

Mr. Speaker, there are many, many opportunities for regional health authorities to do the things that they need to do to serve their constituencies within the budgets that have been allocated to them.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. How many tens of millions of extra dollars will it cost RHAs to cover the rise in health care premiums and the cost of higher electricity prices?

MR. MAR: I can't speak to the issue of utility prices, Mr. Speaker, but I can say, again referring to the MLA Committee on Collaboration and Innovation, that we have to establish clear responsibilities that are government responsibilities and those which are RHA responsibilities, that we have to get RHAs to co-ordinate with each other so that they are not duplicating services, that we must develop areas of specialization. There are good examples of where that has worked in this province, and there must be much more of that in order for our system to be sustainable into the future.

An example raised by an hon. member here in this Assembly is the Health Link line run by the Capital region, that is co-ordinating its service, an exceptionally good service, I should say, Mr. Speaker, with the regional health authorities in the Peace region and in Mistahia. That is the key to how regional health authorities must deal with the issues that they have within their budgets.

DR. TAFT: Given that the funding formula for regional health authorities is based on historical utilization rates and costs, will additional funding be provided to RHAs to deal specifically with higher health care premiums and electricity costs?

MR. MAR: No, Mr. Speaker.

Minimum Wage Rate

MR. LORD: Mr. Speaker, a common question or theme often heard when discussing poverty is to ask: why doesn't the government just raise the minimum wage rates to the point where poverty is just eliminated amongst the working poor? My questions are to the Minister of Human Resources and Employment. Sir, the question is: since people are our greatest resource and British Columbia now has one of the highest minimum wage rates in the world, considerably higher than Alberta's, will this not lead to a tremendous drain of financially struggling people, such as most of our young people in this province, leaving the province to go after the higher minimum wages available in British Columbia?

MR. DUNFORD: Mr. Speaker, I think the actual situation might be quite the opposite. When we look at the numbers, we see that with the migration flows of people, especially skilled labour, back and forth across the country, I think you would find that there are likely more British Columbians that have come to Alberta recently than are going the other way. So the concept, then, of what role a minimum wage might play in that I think is somewhat difficult. I think what we should do is take a look at some of the issues surrounding this particular matter.

For an example, if we were to look at youth unemployment, which, of course, is a concern to all the members of this Assembly, and compare British Columbia and Alberta, you will actually find that the youth unemployment rate is higher in British Columbia than it is in Alberta. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, Alberta, which realistically has one of the lower minimum wage rates in the country, is actually enjoying the lowest youth unemployment rate in the country. So I think we need to examine issues perhaps a little more closely than just falling into the trap that to up the minimum wage is somehow changing the complexity and the character of a workforce.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. LORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, if raising the minimum wage rate could just erase poverty, then why wouldn't this government just raise the minimum wage rate to a decent level of, say, $15 or $20 an hour and thus eliminate poverty?

THE SPEAKER: Well, methinks there's a lot of opinion going on in here.

MR. DUNFORD: Well, it's not that the hon. member hasn't heard those comments before, as I have as well, but I think we need to again just examine that situation, Mr. Speaker. Actually, one of the interesting facts that is revealed is that a full 98.5 percent of people employed in Alberta are paid at a rate higher than the minimum wage. Therefore, of course, doing the math, you have 1.5 percent that are currently at minimum wage. Then as we look at that area, we find that a tremendous amount of those people are actually young people and are students. So one of the things that is happening in Alberta is that there's a tremendous influx of youth into the workforce, and, yes, while they might start at a relatively low minimum wage, they're able, then, to move forward in those particular careers. So what we have is a minimum rate that doesn't kill jobs. We have a minimum rate that allows businesses to be competitive.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. LORD: Yes. Mr. Minister, since businesses did get a little bit of a tax break this year, would this mean that they might be able to have a few more funds available to pay a little better wage rate to their employees as a result of that?

MR. DUNFORD: Well, I think this is something that most employers would look at. In many cases the minimum wage earners are working in accommodation, food services, and retail. Many of those particular areas are sort of the mom-and-pop shops that we all think about, and of course in those particular companies and enterprises the actual labour costs would be a high percentage of their input costs.

Let's remember that we're talking here about a minimum wage, Mr. Speaker. We're not talking about a maximum cap that people are allowed to pay their employees. So they can come in. They can start. They can start to become productive and, of course, like all of us be upwardly mobile, then, in a very hot economy.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Swan Hills Waste Treatment Facility

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Finance minister continued to make confusing statements in the Assembly, and I would like to give her another opportunity to clarify her comments. To the Finance minister: from a financial perspective, will you please tell this Assembly how you can describe the Swan Hills waste treatment plant as "a phenomenal asset" when Alberta taxpayers are subsidizing the treatment of out-of-province waste?

MRS. NELSON: Mr. Speaker, we have had the benefit of that disposal facility for a number of years now. We have been able to clearly see that Alberta is the one jurisdiction that is basically PCB free. We would not be in that environmental plus side of the equation if we had not had that facility here in our own backyard.

To add to the benefits of that facility and because I am losing my voice, I'm going to ask the Minister of Infrastructure to supplement the answer.

MR. LUND: Mr. Speaker, it's unfortunate that the opposition continues to make those accusations. They are certainly not accurate. The fact is that when you look at how important, as I said yesterday, the diet of the plant is and how that affects the operations – but another point that I neglected to mention yesterday was the fact that we can operate on the economies of scale. There is a very large cost regardless of how much waste you treat, so when in fact you bring in waste, the ability to reduce those costs per unit goes down. So to be making blanket statements that the out-of-province waste is costing us a lot of money I think is very misleading and unbecoming to the hon. member.

MS CARLSON: Mr. Speaker, white elephants do require economies of scale.

To the Finance minister: given that it is not beneficial for Albertans to dump their waste in someone else's yard, why does the minister support someone else's toxic mess being dumped in our yard and treated at taxpayers' expense?

MRS. NELSON: Well, again, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Infrastructure was quite clear. We have had the benefit of this waste disposal facility for a number of years. We have to dispose of our waste in one form or another. We are a highly economically active community in this province. With the economic development that has occurred, naturally we have produced more waste that has to go through a facility in some form or another. So choices had to be made: put the facility here to dispose of our own waste, whether it be an industrial waste or a medical waste, et cetera, or move it somewhere else to dispose of it, because it has to be disposed of somewhere.

The benefit of bringing waste in from other jurisdictions, as the hon. Minister of Infrastructure has already said in the first answer, was that we do gain back some dollars and we also help our neighbours on either side to dispose of their waste. When you have a facility with capability and capacity available, why would you not open it up to the neighbours on either side? They pay for the disposal of their waste. It cuts the cost down. It's good for them. It's good for Canada. I don't understand, for the life of me, why the environmental critic over there is opposed to disposing of hazardous waste in her own backyard instead of having to ship it gosh only knows where to dispose of at whatever cost it would be on having to get extra special packaging and cargo things and separate containers to move it. I just fail to understand that.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the Premier would like to supplement my answer.

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, all I have to say is: will this hon. member travel to Swan Hills, stand in the town centre and say, "I want this plant closed"? I don't think so.

MS CARLSON: Mr. Speaker, given that the Finance minister knows that I support environmentally friendly, state-of-the-art technology, not white elephants, and given that their policy is to make polluters pay, will the Finance minister tell us: how does a $28 million subsidy for the destruction of someone else's toxic mess become a higher priority than community lottery boards in this province?

MRS. NELSON: You know, Mr. Speaker, I'll be like the Premier. I would challenge this hon. member to go up to the community and call this a white elephant disposal facility in that community. More importantly, if this hon. member is so concerned with the environment, she would not reject the disposal of waste coming from the province of British Columbia. As I alluded to yesterday, I know perfectly well that blue asbestos was transported from Vancouver Island to this facility last year to dispose of blue asbestos, that they couldn't get rid of any other way, that was harming the people who were in the community of Nanaimo.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Domestic Violence

MR. CENAIKO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. During this government's review of the present Child Welfare Act and through consultations in communities throughout Alberta, some issues have arisen about reporting domestic violence to Alberta's policing agencies. It appears that there are women who have gone to women's shelters for care and protection who are not reporting to police the physical abuse and violence they have experienced. My first question is to the Solicitor General. Do Alberta's policing agencies have a zero tolerance approach to dealing with domestic violence complaints?

2:10

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MRS. FORSYTH: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Guidelines were issued to all police services in Alberta to ensure a uniform policy for handling family violence complaints. In Alberta if there is evidence to support a charge of domestic violence, it is mandatory for the police to lay a charge. I will be meeting with the Alberta Association of Chiefs of Police in a few weeks, and I plan to talk to them about domestic violence.

The Alberta government is committed to providing safe communities for all Albertans, and that includes freedom from violence within our homes. I want to say very clearly that domestic violence is a crime, not just a problem or an issue. Victims of domestic violence do not have to stop the violence on their own. The criminal justice system can and will take an active role. It's a tragedy that domestic abuse is one of our most underreported crimes. For one reason or another, Mr. Speaker, only a small portion of abused women and men report the abuse to police. That is the issue that we need to focus on now, and I will continue to work on this important initiative with my colleagues the Children's Services minister and the Justice minister.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. CENAIKO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My next question is again to the Solicitor General. Do we have programs in place to support victims of domestic violence?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MRS. FORSYTH: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The chiefs of police, the commanding officer of the RCMP, and the police commissions worked hand in hand with my department to develop and put in place a number of initiatives. There are training programs to ensure that police officers respond to the victims of domestic violence in a humane and caring way. Police services in Alberta's large urban centres have specialized domestic violence units. Some municipalities have established specialized services for family violence. As one example, the Edmonton Police Service has a child-at-risk response team to help the children who are also victims when there is domestic abuse in the home. In addition, the Protection against Family Violence Act was passed in Alberta in 1999, and under that act a victim of family violence can get an emergency protection order forcing the abuser out of the home.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta has 108 victims' services units. These units provide information, assistance, and support to victims, including victims who are dealing with domestic violence. My ministry has provided financial assistance to these hardworking community organizations that focus on helping victims of domestic violence.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. CENAIKO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final question is to the Minister of Children's Services. What supports does her ministry provide to women's shelters?

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, we provide $14 million at least to women's shelters through operational funding of 27 shelters in the province, and we provide supports for looking after the children, for intervention when children have been victims by the watching of a violent act within the home. Child abuse, incidentally, is by law required to be reported by shelters to the police, and we don't insist that women report that abuse when they come to shelters. We try to empower them through education, increase their awareness, help them look after their family in their own immediate circumstances, and work, in fact, through the shelters and through the societies throughout Alberta to increase awareness of the damage that family violence does so that people will stop violence in the home and stop violence everywhere.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

Correctional Work Camps

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. A 1995 efficiency review conducted by the correctional services division of the Department of Justice recommended that all except two of seven correctional camps be closed in order to save money. This recommendation was made because the camps were operating under capacity and experienced correctional officers were being forced to leave their families in order to work at these sites. My questions are to the Solicitor General. Why have the recommendations of the efficiency review not been implemented?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MRS. FORSYTH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member brings up some good points, and one of the things that we're looking at and hoping to announce very shortly is a review of exactly the issues that she's discussing.

MS BLAKEMAN: Well, why wasn't the review from 1995 implemented now that you have to do a second one? That's seven years.

MRS. FORSYTH: Mr. Speaker, when we're talking about the work camps that the hon. member is alluding to, we have to keep in mind that these work camps are valuable services to organizations and the community around them. They're a benefit to the government in many, many ways because they provide free labour in regard to, for example, forestry cleanup and things like that. It's something that we are looking at. I am aware of the review she's referring to, and we are going to be looking at that exact thing and in fact a whole correctional review, not only the work camps.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you. Can I get a commitment from the Solicitor General, then, that this review will go over the same ground, I guess, and look specifically at the capacity of the correctional camps and the officers having to leave their families for up to six days at a time in order to work on-site at the camps?

MRS. FORSYTH: Well, Mr. Speaker, our correction officers who are in this province are very well trained. They also know, when they take the job on as correctional officers, that there are times when they have to leave their families, and that's part and parcel of the job. I will tell the hon. member that in the correction review that I'm looking at announcing very shortly, we will look at the whole correction system, not only the work camps.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Bill 12, Education Services Settlement Act

MR. MASON: Thank you very much Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Minister of Learning tabled a copy of a letter to Bishop Frederick Henry which, the minister claimed, contained the true facts about Bill 12. I'll just quote one line from this letter.

When the teachers' strike had kept students out of class for almost three weeks in many parts of the province, and no agreement was in sight, the government took legislative steps to get classes going again.

How can the minister claim in his letter to the bishop that Bill 12 was a legislative step to get classes going again when in fact students were already back in class well before Bill 12 was ever introduced in this Assembly?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, the students went back to class when the PET was declared, an emergency situation was declared. Bill 12 was brought in when the PET was challenged in the court by the ATA, so one definitely led to the other.

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, the minister is sliding the definition of legislative, to be sure. So I will ask again: why did the minister include erroneous information in his letter to Bishop Henry that falsely stated that Bill 12 was needed to get classes going again when in fact students were already back in class before Bill 12 was even introduced?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member just called me a liar. That's something that I do not like, and the hon. member is absolutely wrong.

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, how is it that when the Minister of Learning pens a letter on Bill 12, he's stating the facts, whereas when Bishop Henry pens a letter, he's putting out misinformation. When did the Ministry of Learning become the ministry of truth?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-East, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Alberta Supernet

MR. AMERY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Lately we have been hearing some very disturbing information, that the Alberta Supernet is using technology that's already out of date. This information has made many of my constituents very nervous. My question is to the hon. Minister of Innovation and Science. Can the minister assure Albertans that their tax dollars are being put to good use to build a network that is up to date? [interjections]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister has the floor.

MR. DOERKSEN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. While so many questions that we deal with on a day-to-day basis are concerned with the tyranny of the immediate, this question has to do with the future, and Supernet is about the future. It's an optical state-of-the-art network, and because it's an optical network, it's also scalable, which means that it can accommodate an increased demand for bandwidth well into the future.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to note that the operations of Supernet are based on a business model, which means that the revenues from the operation of Supernet will be used to refresh the network; in other words, to maintain and upgrade the electronics over the length of that 10-year contract.

Mr. Speaker, I can think of no better expenditure of lottery funds into 4,700 locations in 422 communities across Alberta.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. AMERY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister: could the minister inform the House if there are any facilities in Alberta rejecting Supernet in favour of cable or DSL services?

MR. DOERKSEN: Mr. Speaker, there are many schools and libraries which currently operate on different levels of services. Some would have what we know as a dial-up service, which is about 56K. If you wish to download a picture at that level of service, you can go out, have a cup of coffee and a snack, come back, and your picture might be there. At a DSL level you can't do that because the speed is higher, the bandwidth is greater. What Supernet will do is increase that speed and capacity by probably another 10 to 20 times on top of that and now allow you to take high-resolution X rays or MRIs and transfer them to a remote location, so you have that high-resolution image and you can analyze that at a remote location. You cannot do that under the current system.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. AMERY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister: could the minister advise Albertans as to what Supernet will do to benefit the existing networks in Alberta like the Alberta public library electronic network?

MR. DOERKSEN: Mr. Speaker, libraries are a very important component to the Supernet because libraries are where every Albertan can have access to the Internet, to this kind of service. It's a community portal, much like our schools are. We are currently testing segment 7. There are libraries, I believe, in Eckville, Rocky Mountain House, and Sylvan Lake to test this service out. This will enhance the current APLEN, which is the Alberta public libraries electronic network. It will give them more capacity and enable them to do more things.

Also, Mr. Speaker, they're currently paying from about $50 to about $3,000 a month based on anything from the dial-up service to the high-speed networks. In our model we expect those costs to be ranging from approximately $242 per month to $800 per month. We are working with the Minister of Community Development on these plans and look forward to exciting things at our public libraries.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, followed by the hon. Member for Dunvegan.

Electricity and Natural Gas Billing

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Alberta consumers are confused and frustrated with their monthly electricity bills. My first question this afternoon is to the Minister of Government Services. In regard to utility bills, where in one part of the province there are eight line items to comprise the bill and in another part of the province there are 13 items to comprise the bill, what measures is Government Services taking to protect Alberta consumers in regard to deferral accounts with electricity?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. COUTTS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's true that Government Services does look at consumer protection on the electricity side for the marketing of electricity in the province of Alberta for consumers. For actual consumer protection in terms of what the companies do with their bills, that is under the Department of Energy, and the question might well be referred to the Department of Energy.

However, let me say this. Government Services puts together a package of consumer tip sheets that consumers can call upon to make sure that the people who are out selling electricity are valid, that they have proper contracts in place, and that they identify themselves at the doors to make sure that people have the exact companies they would like to sign a contract with.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you. Again, Mr. Speaker, to the same minister: is Alberta Government Services contemplating having a uniform system of billing for natural gas and electricity so Alberta consumers can accurately compare and understand different charges by different retailers?

MR. COUTTS: Well, Mr. Speaker, again, on the actual company side those particular details should be brought before the EUB and, of course, the Department of Energy. In terms of what Government Services is looking at, we make sure, no matter whether it's a utility company that's serving gas or a utility company that's serving electricity, that the people that are going out and asking consumers to buy their product must be licensed. They must post a $1 million security bond. They also must be under a code of conduct for their particular marketing, they must show identification to their consumers, and they must show a contract that shows all of the intricacies of the product that they're selling. So that's the protection that we provide for consumers in this province when it comes to electricity marketers and gas marketers.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister: what rules and regulations are available governing exit fees for electricity consumers switching from a regulated rate option to a competitive offer from another retailer? What regulations do you have for the exit fees?

Thank you.

MR. COUTTS: Government Services, Mr. Speaker, has developed electricity marketing regulations under the Fair Trading Act, and the Fair Trading Act shows those guidelines. When people have concerns about exit fees as well as hooking up with another company, they can call our call centre in Government Services and get some information there as to how they should proceed with setting themselves up with a new marketer.

Teaching Profession

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Much has been said recently about teachers, about the teaching profession, and about the teaching environment. Much also has been said by the opposition in this Assembly about what they think we as government members think about teachers, about the teaching profession, and about the current teaching environment. If there is anything that frustrates me, it is having someone else tell me what they think I think. So I rise today to put on record what I as the Member for St. Albert think about teachers, about the teaching profession, and about the current teaching environment.

I know that teachers are truly remarkable citizens. From the beginning of their day to the end they work to enhance the knowledge for which the students have come to school. They care for the health and safety of their students in the gymnasium and on the school grounds. They nourish such values as caring, honesty, and generosity, and they encourage the power of thinking and the possibility of problem solving. I believe the teaching profession is a truly honourable one. As such, those who choose this vocation prepare themselves broadly and extensively to respond to the ever expanding, ever evolving curricula. This profession demands and dictates to its members a high standard of responsible behaviour. It is my experience that the professionalism of our Alberta teachers is uppermost in their minds. Their professional behaviour in responsibly fulfilling all their contractual obligations and more is truly admirable and worthy of our respect.

I have always respected the dignified integrity of teachers, and I believe that today's teaching environment is a truly challenging one. Societal expectations run the gamut from a little to a lot. Teachers are often expected to be all things to all students in the minds of almost all people. When students need counseling advice, nursing care, and parenting acceptance, the school environment expands considerably. The teaching and learning environment is complex and intense, and I believe it is also productive and exciting. I applaud the numerous quality initiatives taking place in our classrooms, our music and art rooms, our gymnasiums, and all other venues in which significant learning and teaching takes place.

THE SPEAKER: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

Mikko Nissinen
Alberta Ballet

MR. MASKELL: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to take this time to recognize Alberta Ballet's outgoing artistic director, Mikko Nissinen. Since 1998 Mikko Nissinen has been at the helm of Canada's fourth largest dance company. During his tenure the company has increased in stature to become one of Canada's leading dance companies. As well, Alberta has gained a great reputation through its performances internationally.

Currently the company is concluding its regular performance season to great acclaim of audiences and critics alike. Deirdre Kelly from the Globe and Mail wrote:

The second coming of Alberta Ballet is mostly thanks to Mikko Nissinen, the acclaimed Finnish dancer . . . Alberta Ballet no longer moves, it crackles with energy. The pace is fast and punchy. The dancers attack the choreography . . . with a ferocity that is exhilarating to watch.

Mr. Nissinen has had some exceptional works created for Alberta Ballet and has acquired existing quality repertoires. Some of the great names in the dance world's work, such as George Ballanchine, have graced the stages of Alberta. Mr. Nissinen, realizing the importance of developing local talent, created a platform for young Canadian Alberta choreographers. Through various opportunities in choreographic workshops Alberta Ballet dancer Sabrina Matthews has emerged as a true talent. The Alberta Ballet School has also benefited from Mikko Nissinen due in great part to the appointment of Murray and Nancy Kilgour, teachers of distinction world-wide. Mikko Nissinen has created a dance company for all Albertans to be proud of.

Recently the Globe and Mail wrote on the growth of Alberta. One of the people interviewed in the article said that the reasons he moved his family to Alberta was not just for the economic benefits but also the fact that Alberta had great leisure activities and a world-class ballet company. Alberta Ballet is an important part of the cultural fabric of Alberta, that makes this province a very special place to reside.

Please join me in thanking and congratulating Mikko Nissinen on his success in making Alberta Ballet the successful dance company it is today. Mikko, we wish you great success in your new role as artistic director of the Boston Ballet.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Safe and Caring Schools Program

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On April 20 we will remember the students who died at Columbine high school in the United States. In Alberta we will also remember Jason Lang, the 17-year-old Taber high school student killed in the same month. These deaths gave a new sense of urgency to the work of the Alberta Teachers' Association's Safe and Caring Schools project. The goal of that project is "to encourage school practices that model and reinforce socially responsible and respectful behaviors, so that learning and teaching can take place in a safe and caring environment."

The importance of the project aimed at violence prevention and begun in 1996 can be seen in the project partners: our universities; the Muttart Foundation; the Lions Clubs of Alberta; the human rights, citizenship and multiculturalism education fund; the national strategy on community safety and crime prevention; and the Alberta Teachers' Association. Provincial support and funding of the project has been crucial. Research into the nature of violence, the development of preventive programs and materials, and ongoing training of school and community personnel are all products of the project.

Given that the prevention of school violence is literally a matter of life and death, it is hard to understand how the Alberta government could fail to include the resources for the Safe and Caring Schools project in this year's budget. Millions of dollars have been appropriately put into the Jason Lang scholarships so that Jason and what happened to him will never be forgotten. Surely the dollars needed to make sure his story is never repeated are equally valuable. I urge the government to act quickly to restore the funding and ensure that the Safe and Caring Schools project continues uninterrupted.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Red Deer-North.

Alberta Juno Award Winners

MRS. JABLONSKI: Mr. Speaker, Alberta has some of the most talented and creative people in the country who are a shining example of our province's vibrant arts and culture scene. Solid evidence of this fact unfolded this past weekend when a number of Alberta artists won several of Canada's top music awards, the Juno, held in St. John's, Newfoundland. Late Sunday night, April 14, my daughter cheered with joy and clapped with glee as the musical group known as Nickelback from the great Alberta town of Three Hills won the best single, best rock album, and best group awards. We are very happy and honoured to congratulate Chad and Mike Kroeger, Ryan Peake, and Ryan Vekedal, who are members of the Nickelback group. Also presented with awards were Albertans Jann Arden for best song writer, Carolyn Dawn Johnson for best country artist, and Oscar Lopez for best instrumental album.

Mr. Speaker, they are all exceptional performers who have continually demonstrated remarkable skill and talent as musicians while bringing pride and honour to Alberta. They inspire others through their music and serve as exceptional role models for up-and-coming Albertan and Canadian musicians. The arts remain a vital part of what makes Alberta one of the most vibrant and exciting places to live in the world. All members of this Assembly recognize the exciting talent that is born and raised in this great province, inspired by our majestic mountains, emerald lakes, blue skies, loving families, and friendly people. Congratulations to each artist. We wish you continued success.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I am presenting a petition signed by 115 residents of Edmonton petitioning the Legislative Assembly "to urge the government to not delist services, raise health care premiums, introduce user fees or further privatize health care."

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment.

MR. DUNFORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to table with the Assembly today the 2001 annual report of the Alberta Association of Architects.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two sets of tablings today. The first is letters from Dennis Knelsen of Sherwood Park, Don Iwaschuk of Edson, Marcus Lyon of Okotoks, and Dwayne Papke of Sundre. These Albertans want the government to maintain some access for off-highway vehicles in the Bighorn.

I'm also tabling five copies of a letter from Tamaini Snaith of Calgary, Shirley Bray of Calgary, and Nigel Douglas of Calgary, who want the government to designate the Bighorn wildland recreation area as a wildland park, using the 1986 boundaries.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have five tablings today, all on the community lottery boards. The first is from Deborah Evans, the Canadian Cancer Society, Alberta/Northwest Territories division, noting that the community lottery boards have supported cancer education and cancer patients and their families with a list of projects.

The second letter is addressed to the Member for Calgary-Currie and is signed by Doug Easterbrook, president, StoryBook Theatre. They thank the member for his kind words and enthusiasm for the project and "continue to hope that there will be a reversal of the decision to disband the Lottery Boards across Alberta."

The next tabling, Mr. Speaker, is the appropriate number of copies of a letter from Karen Pirie from the Women's Centre continuing to express disappointment in the government's refusal to reinstate the lottery boards. They don't find comfort in the government seeing them fall through the cracks.

The next tabling is from Shauna Kennedy of Emmedia asking whether it wouldn't be easier to reinstate the boards now so that if future funds become available, the structure to distribute the funds will still be in place.

The final letter, Mr. Speaker, is from Danielle French from the constituency of Highwood. She would like to be more informed on the reasoning behind the decision to cancel the community lottery boards.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have one tabling today, the appropriate number of copies of an e-mail sent yesterday afternoon from an Albertan from St. Paul who asked me to table this e-mail on his behalf requesting "Finance Minister Pat Nelson to make an apology in the Legislature to all Catholic Albertans for her derogatory comments," which he found exceedingly offensive and hurtful. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings this afternoon. The first one is a petition supporting public and separate school teachers in their ongoing negotiations with the provincial government. This again is organized by Darby Mahon of Edmonton-Gold Bar.

My second tabling this afternoon is a copy of an e-mail from Phillip and Eileen Walker from the constituency of Edmonton-Gold Bar, and in this e-mail they are demanding that the Premier receive the resignation of the Minister of Finance.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

2:40

DR. PANNU: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to rise and table a letter from the president of the Canadian Federation of University Women, Lethbridge club. Diana Williams, the president, writes this letter on behalf of members who place a very high value on quality public education, and she's writing this letter to protest the very undemocratic nature of Bill 12, which unfortunately has now become law.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I have a tabling today, and I'm tabling the appropriate number of copies of a document entitled Message for Deputy Ministers To Share with Their Staff. This document provides government propaganda from the Ministry of Learning to government employees respecting the teachers' labour dispute.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Calmor.

REV. ABBOTT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table the requisite number of copies of a petition initiated by the Schizophrenia Society of Alberta and signed by 444 Albertans who are petitioning the government to implement changes to the Mental Health Act of Alberta. They would like to "change the criteria for involuntary commitment or Court Ordered Treatment," to be based on "illness or helplessness, not solely on the presence or absence of danger."

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw.

MRS. ADY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today with two tablings, one from the chair of the South Calgary High School Steering Committee and the other from Mark Mcmillan, the chair of the South Calgary High School Youth Committee, both expressing their concern for the deferment of the South Calgary high school project and asking for my help and support to remind government that it's still much needed.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, I table in the House today five copies of a letter dated April 15, 2002, which I received from the Leader of the Official Opposition, requesting that the second supplemental of the third question asked on April 15, 2002, be withdrawn, as "it was an unacceptable mistake."

Privilege Contempt of the Assembly

THE SPEAKER: Now, we have two matters to deal with, and the first arises out of a purported question of privilege that was raised just several days ago. I am prepared to rule on this purported question of privilege raised by the Official Opposition House Leader and Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie. In a nutshell, the hon. member alleges that the government is in contempt of the Assembly for not complying with the terms of section 42 of the Financial Administration Act concerning certain arrangements about the Swan Hills waste treatment plant.

Notice was given by the member last Thursday, April 11, 2002, after the first set of questions by the Leader of the Official Opposition on this subject. As members should know, questions of privilege must be raised at the earliest opportunity. The member followed the procedure in Standing Order 15(5), which provides that a question of privilege may be raised "after the words are uttered or the events occur [giving] rise to the question."

Frankly, the chair cannot see what there was in the responses by the Premier or the Minister of Finance on that day giving rise to a question of privilege as opposed to the previous day, but in light of my ruling it is not of much consequence.

In support of her application that day the hon. Opposition House Leader tabled some material concerning the financial activity surrounding the government's involvement with the plant. She also tabled a page from the book by Marleau and Montpetit, House of Commons Procedure and Practice, concerning contempt.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance provided some information on the plant and disputed the member's interpretation of section 42 of the act, indicating that the section had not been breached. At a minimum, for there to be a prima facie question of privilege, there would have to be some link to the proceedings of the Assembly to demonstrate how a member's rights were interfered with. While there was much attention devoted to the financial arrangements of the plant, there was not much authority cited as to how the complaint would constitute a contempt. The chair will not read the entire section 42 of the Financial Administration Act, but subsection (2) requires that there to be specific authorization by legislation or regulation before entering into a joint venture, a partnership, or giving a loan or purchasing shares. Subsection (3) restricts a member of Executive Council from introducing in the Assembly an appropriation bill or estimates that would involve the Crown's entering into any of the relationships the chair just mentioned without specific authorization.

Clearly, the chair is being asked to give a legal ruling on this matter. It is not a matter of procedure but, rather, a matter of deciding whether the Crown has met its legal obligations. The authorities are quite clear that it is not the chair's role to interpret legislation that does not involve the procedures of the Assembly. Beauchesne's paragraph 31(9) states, "The failure of the Government to comply with the law is not a matter for the Speaker, but should be decided by the courts." The chair would also refer members to Joseph Maingot's book Parliamentary Privilege in Canada, the second edition, at page 180. As Speaker Fraser said in the House of Commons on February 5, 1992, at page 6426 of Debates, "Speakers do not interpret or enforce matters of statutory law." Of course, there is an exception when the statute refers to the procedures in the Assembly, but that is not the case here. Likewise, it is not the chair's role to rule on the legality of the contents of the estimates in terms of whether they comply with statutory preconditions. That, too, is a question of law.

Accordingly, there is no prima facie question of privilege.

Privilege Accusations against a Member

THE SPEAKER: Now, yesterday, hon. members, in the Assembly notice was given by the hon. Deputy Premier about the desire to proceed with a purported question of privilege, and it arose out of an exchange that occurred in question period with the Leader of the Official Opposition. The Leader of the Official Opposition visited with me later yesterday afternoon and did indicate to me that he would be away from the Assembly today on official business. Section 15(4) of our Standing Orders states:

If the member whose conduct is called into question is not present, the matter shall be deferred to the next day that the member is present unless the Speaker rules that, in the circumstances, the matter may be dealt with in the member's absence.

In much the same way, I guess, that a point of privilege was dealt with that was raised last Thursday and then followed up last Monday, in this case not knowing what the point of privilege is going to be but only surmising that the point of privilege will probably have to do with words that were exchanged in the Assembly yesterday and recognizing that the longer these matters continue outstanding in here, the more difficult they are on the members themselves, should the Deputy Premier rise shortly and ask for permission to proceed with her submission with respect to this point of privilege, it would be my intent to provide authority to do that, recognizing that this matter will not be dealt with today and it will give the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition 24 hours to review the comments and determine what he would like to say. He would be given an opportunity to respond tomorrow afternoon in the Legislative Assembly, and only after hearing all the arguments would a ruling be provided with respect to this matter.

So I am going to sit, and I will invite the hon. Deputy Premier to advise whether or not the hon. Deputy Premier chooses to initiate a statement today or wait until tomorrow.

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, I gave notice of my intention to rise on a point of privilege, and today I do wish to address that point of privilege. My question of privilege arises from an allegation in the second main question asked yesterday by the Leader of the Official Opposition. The leader alleges that on April 11 in this Assembly I was heard to say or I said, "Most of the Calgary board are pedophiles." Mr. Speaker, for the record, I made no such remark on mike or off mike. The word "pedophiles" was never uttered by me. When the opposition leader posed his question to me, I immediately responded "Absolutely not," and I'll paraphrase and go on: I did not make that statement.

My denial was not good enough for the leader, who, as usual, seemed compelled to stick to his prepared script even when the script was rendered obsolete by my answer. Following my firm and unequivocal denial, the leader went on to ask whether "statements like that reflect policy decisions made by the government." Again I categorically denied making such a statement, but again the leader seemed incapable of acting in any other way than reading the words that had been put in front of him.

In his second supplemental he had the temerity to ask me to direct you, Mr. Speaker, to release certain audiotapes. You were very quick to set the record straight on the relationship between the Deputy Premier and the Speaker. You were very quick to point out the obvious inappropriateness of the question, and I understand that that matter has been dealt with. However, the Leader of the Opposition has not been so quick to correct himself in regard to what he alleges he heard or they heard or I said. He has not, in my view, dealt with that issue at all. He has, in my view, been shamefully irresponsible if not dishonourable in not setting the record straight and apologizing.

Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of this Assembly for almost 15 years. In my first address in this House – I believe we call it our maiden speech – I made the following pledge, which I quote from Hansard dated April 11, 1988:

Mr. Speaker, I promise to fulfill my term in this Legislature with dignity and to conduct myself in a way which conveys the utmost respect for my honourable colleagues. I pledge to uphold the traditions of this great institution and hope that what we accomplish here in this Assembly may stand as a shining example to our youth. I also hope that through my actions I can honour the memories of both my father and Henry Kroeger.

Over the course of the years since I made that pledge, Mr. Speaker, I have endeavoured to maintain my personal dignity as well as the dignity of this House. In one false, I believe malicious line of questioning the Leader of the Opposition, in my view, has called that dignity into question not only in this Assembly but across Alberta, where his question from yesterday has been widely reported.

I notice in some media reports today that the leader has tried to qualify this remark with the statement that he didn't actually say that I made the comment, only that the Liberals believe I made that comment. Well, frankly, Mr. Speaker, what the Liberals believe is irrelevant. Albertans can only judge these proceedings by what is said, not by what might or might not be believed. What is relevant to this Assembly is what members say, and what the opposition leader said yesterday was hurtful, it was disrespectful, it was unproven, and above all it was wrong.

I endeavoured very carefully to remember what I said in an off-mike comment during the discussion on April 11 regarding Bishop Henry's letter. I have listened to the audio of the proceedings, which are available on the Internet for all members, and I have reviewed the video of the proceedings. I think it is quite clear. For the record here is what I said, and I quote: most of the Catholic boards have settled. End of quote. This remark was directed to the Minister of Learning and was offered as a possible counterpoint to the arguments of Bishop Henry. To reiterate, Mr. Speaker, the word "pedophile" was never uttered by me.

During my years in political life I've worked hard to establish a positive relationship with Alberta Catholics and, indeed, Albertans of all faiths. When I had the pleasure of serving as minister of health, I was honoured with a lifetime membership in the Catholic Health Association of Alberta and their affiliates. That honour was for my work in maintaining the unique principles of the Catholic philosophy of health care during a time of great change in the health system, and the word "integrity," personal integrity of this member, is on that document. Though I left the health portfolio almost six years ago, that tribute continues to mean a great deal to me and my family.

Speaking of my family, I should put on the record that many members of my family are of the Catholic faith as well as a great number of my very, very close friends. I have a respect for the history, the principles, and the great community spirit of the Catholic church and would never, ever say anything publicly or privately to demean the church, its clergy, or its members.

I believe that the leader's allegation yesterday could potentially blemish that good relation I have with the Catholic church, Mr. Speaker, and even if the leader shows enough respect for this Assembly to apologize, his malicious remark will linger in the public memory. People will wonder: what did the minister actually say? A seed of doubt has been planted, and it has absolutely no merit.

Mr. Speaker, in recent years, in my view, the Liberal opposition has frequently resorted to personal slurs and attacks against members of this government both inside the House and outside. I don't think it's any coincidence that during this period of personal attacks they have diminished from being a party of stature across this province under the leadership of the late Laurence Decore to a party with only a small handful of seats and virtual irrelevance in most of the province. While I certainly do not profess to be an expert in Liberal political strategy, I do suggest, if I may be so bold, that if they want to regain even a shred of the respect they enjoyed several years ago, they begin today by apologizing for the unfair and untrue allegation leveled at me yesterday, first, and then they might think about focusing on the issues that matter to Albertans rather than trying to score cheap political points by leveling personal attacks on other members of this Assembly.

Mr. Speaker, section 15(1) of the Standing Orders of this Assembly states: "A breach of the rights of the Assembly or of the parliamentary rights of any member constitutes a question of privilege." There is an accusation on the floor of this Assembly from the Leader of the Opposition which clearly, I believe, breaches my rights as a member of this Assembly. How can I possibly continue to execute to the best of my abilities my responsibilities as an MLA, as a minister, as the Deputy Premier with this outrageous falsehood hanging like a black cloud over my character?

Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules & Forms, 6th edition, section 69 says that a question of privilege exists if an attack on a member "impinges upon the ability of Members of Parliament to do their job properly." Beauchesne's section 64 states that the attacks on individual members in the past eventually resulted in the accuser being "summoned to the Bar to apologize." Mr. Speaker, I hope that's not needed in this case.

It is my sincere hope that the Leader of the Opposition does the honourable thing and unconditionally apologizes, withdraws the accusation, and admits that what he said and did was wrong. Mr. Speaker, failing that, I believe a prima facie case of privilege exists and would encourage you to hear my argument, judge the case, and allow me the right of the next procedural step to clear my name.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

3:00

THE SPEAKER: Now, hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands, you wanted to participate on this purported point of privilege?

MR. MASON: Yes, please, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: Be very specific, please.

MR. MASON: We will be as specific as possible, Mr. Speaker.

Following the question period yesterday and the statement of the hon. Deputy Premier, we went and reviewed the videotape, and we could not ascertain what in fact the minister had actually said, but there was one thing that we find rather troubling, and you may wish to take this into account in your ruling. One of the things that the Deputy Premier did that was quite different from the statement made the other day by the hon. Minister of Finance was to make a private comment to another member sitting down, and it was picked up on the tape because the mike was open.

We believe that there needs to be a distinction drawn between a statement which is made obviously for all members of the Assembly to hear and a side comment made privately to a colleague that is inadvertently picked up on the microphone. We would hate to think that people would be searching the videotapes and the audiotapes for any side conversations in order to make use of it in the Assembly.

So that point is just offered for your consideration, Mr. Speaker.

head: Orders of the Day

head: Government Bills and Orders

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. STEVENS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. After continuing communication on this issue with the Official Opposition and the third party I seek the unanimous consent of the Assembly to waive Standing Order 58(4) to allow this afternoon's consideration of the estimates of the Department of Sustainable Resource Development to go beyond two hours with the vote on these estimates to take place no later than 5:15 this afternoon as per Standing Order 58(5) or sooner if no one wishes to speak.

head: Committee of Supply

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: We shall call the committee to order.

head: Main Estimates 2002-03

Sustainable Resource Development

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: As per the Standing Order the first hour is allocated between the minister and members of the opposition, following which any other member is able to participate.

The hon. minister.

MR. CARDINAL: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I am pleased to be here today to talk about Sustainable Resource Development's 2002-2003 budget. I couldn't think of a better day to be here. With all the snow out there, I assume that there are no forest fires going, so it'll give us a lot of time to think carefully and debate the budget.

Before I start, I'd like to introduce some of the staff I have sitting here in the members' gallery. Our deputy minister, Dr. Bob Fessenden, is here; Crystal Damer, executive assistant to the deputy minister; Stewart Churlish, assistant deputy minister of strategic corporate services; Ray Duffy, director of budgets, forecasts, and financial statements; Daphne Cheel, director of policy and planning; Donna Babchishin, of course, director of communications; and Donna Ballard, my executive assistant. They'll be monitoring the discussions very closely, Mr. Chairman, and ensuring that any answers that I cannot give to some of the questions that may be put across the floor to me we will of course do in writing as soon as possible after the discussions.

I'd like to also thank other departments that were involved in the overall planning of our government budgets, because not only do you develop a stand-alone budget yourself and budget estimates, but we co-ordinate that with other ministries. So I'd like to thank other ministries and their staff for their support, and of course I'd also like to thank the opposition members of the House for their support in a lot of areas and co-operation in the development of programs to serve Albertans.

At Sustainable Resource Development our job is to ensure that Albertans benefit from the development of their public lands and renewable resources both now and of course into the future. For instance, there are a number of economic, recreation, cultural, and social activities on our public lands. Our department maintains a balance between activity and conservation. An example of this balance is certainly seen throughout the recent public consultation we've been doing in the Bighorn area of our province.

We have a variety of programs and services in our ministry, but there are five core businesses: forest protection, forest land and resource management, fish and wildlife management, rangeland management, and land use disposition management. Each of these core businesses comes with their own challenges, of course.

Speaking of challenges, we dealt with extremely dry conditions and numerous forest fires in the past year. Certainly this reality is costly, and it is reflected in our budget. In terms of our gross comparable forecasts last year we spent close to an additional $100 million in supplementary estimates to deal with the extremely busy fire season we had. For example, the fire at Chisholm alone resulted in over $30 million in staffing and equipment costs to get this fire under control.

Dealing with natural occurrences such as fire, it is often difficult to know how our budget will be impacted over the fiscal year. The reality is that the forecast projections from this much of the expenditures are based on weather conditions and the type of fire season that occurs throughout the year. However, what I can tell you is that as a ministry we are doing everything we can to promote fire prevention and also be prepared as a department.

For instance, in order to prepare for the fire season, we have started the season on March 1, basically about one month earlier than the normal time. Another proactive initiative that we are doing this year is in the area of wildfire education. An example of this education is through the FireSmart program for communities and individuals, providing information and tools for communities to develop effective fire solutions. Our expectations for the FireSmart education program are to reduce the fire behaviour potential, to increase our ability to suppress wildfires, and to increase industry's awareness and support.

To accomplish this we will need to implement effective strategies such as establishing barriers to stop the spread of fires, managing sources of fire fuel such as grass and trees close to communities, managing partnerships in needed prevention programs, enhancing the resources that communities have to fight fires, and enhancing education in communities between all partners, including industry. This is such an important initiative. Prevention measures can save or significantly reduce the impact of fire on families, homes, and communities. We all share in this responsibility for protecting our homes and communities.

Forest protection meets the government business plan goals of keeping Alberta a safe place to live as well as encouraging the well-being and self-reliance of aboriginal people in Alberta. I can assure you that we will not compromise public safety and will do this by supporting programs such as FireSmart and our work with the municipalities.

Another challenge for our ministry is the expanded role of the Natural Resources Conservation Board, also known as the NRCB. On January 1 the independent agency assumed the responsibility for the regulation of confined feeding operations in the province of Alberta. Albertans can be assured that the new review process will be impartial and open, allowing for public input into projects. They will base their judgments on the need for consistent, science-based decisions and on Albertans' desire for sustainable development of our natural resources and our livestock industry, which is so important in Alberta.

With this expanded role and responsibility we will be providing more resources to this area. Specifically, we will be providing an additional million dollars in funding for the NRCB. However, despite this increase our overall budget is $7 million less than last fiscal year's budget. Four million dollars of this change is associated with the end of a short-term program related to fire reclamation work from the 1998 fires. We are reducing another $4 million by finding efficiencies toward the reorganization which we are going through at this time. This reorganization will place a greater focus on regional services and issues as well as make our regions more economical and effective. Streamlining processes and administrative savings will be achieved through the hard work of our dedicated staff. So just to clarify, between the reduction in this area and the increase of $1 million funding to the NRCB, we will still be facing a $7 million cut from last year's budget.

Another area that I wish to speak about as a challenge within our ministry is the area of fisheries and reinvestment. Our fisheries resources are under increasing pressure from our growing population and new resource developments. Alberta has the third highest freshwater angling pressure in Canada as well as pressures from aboriginal and domestic fishermen and commercial fisheries. With current fiscal resources these programs are challenging. Our ability to effectively manage fish stocks is a real challenge.

We are currently working out a number of options that will recover healthy fish populations and produce sustainable fisheries in Alberta. These options include rebuilding the population and number of fish types, improving the fisheries inventory to provide current information about the status of the resource, reducing the number of commercial fishermen in Alberta, and providing information and educating the public about fisheries management. These are just a few of the options that we are looking at over the next while. We need to be proactive and get moving on this by taking the necessary steps to help recover this vital resource in Alberta and, by doing so, ensure that Albertans will have the opportunity to enjoy the province's natural, historical, and cultural resources.

Our ministry deals with a number of wildlife situations, both positive and negative. As an individual living in a rural community, I am very aware of the challenges that exist out there. Lately there has been an increase in the number of elk and deer in certain areas of the province. As you can imagine, this causes a variety of problems both on roads and around our farms. In fact, in the last year we have had close to 6,000 wildlife/motor vehicle accidents across the province, a very high number. That's a 40 percent increase in the last seven years. Our department works to establish targets for deer population. We also monitor deer population through a number of ways, including aerial surveys, hunter harvest, and hunter and public input.

Our current deer management strategy is being updated to deal with public concerns. Our new strategy will target problem areas and changing trends. A large part of this strategy is the public education we do through our fish and wildlife officers and through media releases such as the one we will be doing today, and we did one earlier also. Other tools in our strategy include promoting an increase in the number of informed hunters and increasing the number of tags to hunt certain deer in certain areas of Alberta.

The last area that I want to talk about today is that of our forest industry. Forestry is essential to Alberta's sustainable resource development and a very important part of our provincial economy. Part of the overall economic action plan in Alberta includes the forestry sector as the third industry in relation to revenue generation and job creation. In fact, the revenue generation from the forestry sector is around $8 billion. Over 50,000 people are employed directly and indirectly in the forest industry, and over 45 communities throughout Alberta depend on forestry as their major source of revenue and job creation.

Of course, what is in the news these days is the softwood lumber trade dispute. There is no doubt that the softwood lumber dispute with the U.S. is having an impact on forestry throughout Canada. It also is very important to those communities who rely on this industry and to thousands of Albertans who work directly and indirectly in this sector. I can assure you that this government will do whatever we can to ensure that we come to a reasonable settlement. Both the Ministry of Sustainable Resource Development and my hon. colleague Minister Jonson from International and Intergovernmental Relations have been very involved in this issue. In return for the significant adjustments to our forestry policies and practices, we expect long-term, secure access to the U.S. markets. Like many of you, I am greatly disappointed with the U.S. response to Canada's offer and the 29 percent ruling on March 22. We are not looking for a deal at any cost, though, to our industry. Alberta mills' exports of softwood lumber to the U.S. account for 7 percent of Canada's total softwood exports, or about $500 million to $600 million.

What we need is a solid commitment from the U.S. that current trade cases will end and that new trade cases will not be initiated. International and Intergovernmental Relations is the lead on these issues. Alberta is not looking for its own agreement with the U.S. The U.S. government cannot sign a trade agreement with a province. However, we will have our mark on an agreement. In discussions with the U.S. an Alberta annex would be negotiated by Alberta officials, not federal officials. Alberta does not – does not – subsidize its lumber industry, and Albertans receive a fair market value for their forest resource. I can assure you that Alberta will continue to work closely with our industry partners, the federal government, and other provincial governments to work towards a durable Canadian solution. If we cannot come to a negotiated settlement with the U.S., we will continue to pursue the legal challenges through the World Trade Organization and NAFTA. I am confident that we would win again, like we have the past three times.

Regardless of the outcome of the softwood dispute, our ministry is working with other government departments and industry on the important future direction of our forestry here in Alberta. These include such areas as forest productivity, primary manufacturing, secondary manufacturing, third-level manufacturing, community partnerships and participation, and forest industry supply. In order to remain competitive in the international marketplace, we know that Alberta's forest industry is going to have to diversify. It is important that the industry develop and market and promote the value-added sector. By doing this, we can create different economic opportunities for Albertans while continuing to ensure sustainability of our forests. Industry is such an important player in that process. Whether it is about stumps, softwood lumber, or timber allocations, we will continue to work with industry to ensure that we have a competitive and sustainable industry. We want an industry that provides stable employment for communities and economic benefit to all Albertans.

Our department realizes that there are many challenges to be faced, but thanks to our careful planning and the dedication of our staff and other departments' staff, we are prepared to meet these challenges. Ladies and gentlemen, my department trusts that you will offer us your understanding and your support on this budget. Again, I want to thank you for your continued support and co-operation as we move forward with this challenging department, and I'd like to thank the opposition for their input in this.

Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It's my pleasure to be able to participate in the Sustainable Resource Development estimates this afternoon. First of all, I'd like to thank all the staff who are here and all the staff in the department, many of whom I know quite well and have worked with for a number of years on a variety of issues. I think this is just an excellent example of a government department, directed by a minister, who are working in as full a co-operation with the opposition as could possibly be anticipated, and certainly as the critic for this department I appreciate that level of co-operation. What we see in this department are staff who are very dedicated to their work and are very dedicated to the province as a whole. That certainly shows through in how they carry out their work, and it is a pleasure to work with a department where the minister agrees to have full co-operation and as much disclosure as we could ask for. So while I don't want anyone to get the impression that I always agree with everything the department does or the filters that they use in decision-making, it's been unbelievably pleasant to work with the department and certainly all of their staff members, and I can say that, having worked for many years with the staff under the direction of former ministers.

Now, I have to say that perhaps it's not always as much fun in question period as it has been with former ministers. I was reminded of that today when I was in a meeting with Bob Clark and Glen Clegg, who both talked about how interesting question period could be when the Member for Rocky Mountain House was the Minister of Environment and we used to get into some interesting verbal debates. In fact, Glen Clegg said that that Member for Rocky Mountain House never would agree to go deer hunting with me, and that's true. He never would. Now, I'm a little afraid that this minister would, and I'm not sure I would go.

AN HON. MEMBER: Not when you call him "deer" all the time.

MS CARLSON: Well, that was exactly Glen's interpretation. [interjections] There you go. Well, that's interesting.

We've had some more acrimonious and adversarial and sometimes interesting times in question period in previous years, but we certainly haven't got in previous years the level of co-operation and information that we get now.

I would also like to openly acknowledge that we get briefings on issues from the minister and his staff when issues that they think we might be interested in arise, and those are also very beneficial. The offer has been made for us to bring up issues that we wish to be briefed on, and we haven't taken advantage of that offer so far mostly because of my busy schedule, but I can certainly anticipate doing that in the future. Perhaps when we're out of session, we'll do so.

The minister has stated that we will be getting a briefing soon on fisheries, and I particularly look forward to that because, as the minister and the department know, that has been an area that I've had particular pet peeves with for many years. The minister referred to that issue in his comments, and I appreciate that. We believe that this is an area that has been underrepresented and undervalued by the province for many years, subsequently resulting in the kinds of problems we have in fisheries right now, where we are now starting to look at very serious damage being done to the industry from both a commercial and a recreational perspective, not to mention the environmental impact it has on water quality and the food chain when we have problems with fish stocks in the province. In my personal opinion, we can't spend too much time or energy looking at resolving that problem, and I hope that the long-term strategy in dealing with this particular issue will be based on the collection of science-based research and an integrated strategy that takes into account the cumulative impact of fish stocks in all areas of the province, not just on the economic and recreational sides. I'm sure that that's where this department is going now. I think that they look like they're on the right track, and we look forward to that.

It's my anticipation this afternoon that we'll have a very friendly exchange. I'll make a few opening comments and include a few opening questions in response to the minister's comments. I hope that he will respond, perhaps generally – that's just fine – and then if they have more detail, that detail could come in writing at some later time. Then after those opening comments, I'm hoping to go to more of a question-and-answer format, because this format has worked well in this House with other departments so far this year, but particularly this format has served me very well in past years when we had this department meet in other rooms and when we had some of the senior staff available for questions and answers. The specific budget items in terms of who gets paid what and how many FTEs there are can always be easily submitted in writing and answered later on. For us, what I like to get out of a department review is a general direction of where the ministry is going and how the minister interprets some of the issues that are outstanding in the community. That's worked well for us in the past in this department, and I'm sure that it will work as well this afternoon.

In general, my only dollar question off the top is that as usual I'm a little concerned when this department sees continued reductions over the years. This is an area that I like to fight for more money in. We've seen quite significant cuts. I understand the restrictions that the minister is under in terms of coming up with his share of the cuts in this most recent budget, but I don't see this department getting their share of the budget surpluses when those also arise periodically throughout the year. If we take a look at budget forecasts right now, this government so far is headed for about a billion dollar surplus, and I'd put a lobby in for this department to get their share.

There are lots of places where onetime funding could be used. Of course, my preference would be for sustained funding, particularly in the enforcement area and the fish and wildlife area. It's really great to have rules and regulations, but if they haven't got the people out in the field educating and enforcing, then there are some problems, and we've seen some of those problems erupt over time. So that's just my only general observation about cash to begin with.

The minister in his introductory comments talked about a balance between economic development and environment, and I'm glad to see that that's how he sees the department. It isn't specifically how it is outlined when we take a look at the business plan for the year 2002 to '05. There they talk about the mandate including, yes, "the right dynamic balance amongst economic, environmental and social values and benefits," but later on it talks about "integrating scientific, technical, social and political considerations into the decision-making framework for resource management." So I don't see the flow-through of the focus on environment all the way through.

I would also be concerned about and want to know what kind of weighting the ministry gives in their decision-making process, because it seems to me often that the economic and the political considerations get a very heavy weighting compared to the other areas. Maybe I'm wrong in how they do that, but those are certainly the optics, and we would like to be provided perhaps later on some weighting of that. I'll just go on to a couple more, and then you can generally answer that, if you like.

Firefighting: a good job in this province. We had some concerns a couple of years ago that the cuts in staff and the loss of expertise may have contributed to some longer time and therefore extra dollars and lost inventory in some of the fires that occurred about two years ago, but generally speaking, I think this is an area that government does a pretty good job in. We certainly never have any problems when they come back in supplementary estimates for money if it's a heavy fire year. Happy to see you focus on education. I think in this area it's very needed. I'm not a huge fan of fire suppression in some areas, but I think that generally speaking the government has done a good job on this.

The minister talked about an extra $50 million for the NRCB, and I didn't get exactly what that money was going to be spent on, so if he could just expand a little bit on that.

Then if he could also expand on two questions on the fishing information he provided. Are you specifically going to be addressing the request from the walleye association to increase fishing licences and have that money directly dedicated to helping sustain fish stocks? That's something that I think is quite interesting that has been brought up, and definitely we would support something like that.

Then he talked about elk and deer, and that brought to mind that I've been hearing quite a few concerns about tick-infected moose and them moving into farmyards and acreages and causing some kinds of problems. Does he see that as a problem in his department, and what are they doing about it?

So just take those few questions, if the minister could respond, and then I'll continue.

MR. CARDINAL: You covered a lot of areas, and I really, really appreciate that giving me an opportunity to continue with some of my remarks. Of course, there are a number of priorities and issues that do overlap in our ministry in terms of importance. You mentioned a bit about priorities and the importance of issues. I mentioned many of these issues in my remarks earlier today, but again I'll just touch on other areas. In terms of priorities perhaps I can speak a bit about them in just a few general categories.

The first one I want to speak to is the priority of protection of Albertans, because the issue of the fire and fire suppression was mentioned. As the member knows, we are responsible for protecting Albertans from forest fires, and we do, I believe, a very good job of this each fire season.

Another area that is involved in the protection of Albertans of course would be dealing with drought on public lands. As you know, it may look very wet out there today with a lot of snow, but we shouldn't be fooled. It is very, very dry out there yet, and we need to be alert.

Another priority you mentioned is achieving a balance again, and, Mr. Chairman, our department will look at achieving a balance in the economic, environment, and social aspects of our resources. This means that we know that we need to find a balance for all competing demands that exist in our province. For instance, the Bighorn area of the province: many people and industry want to use this area for their own distinct purposes. Our challenge of course is to find a balanced and sustainable approach to all these demands for now and for the future, for the long term. One of the key elements of doing this is to involve the public. We need to know what their needs are, and I've mentioned in this House a number of times the committee that's in place and the work that they are doing. I'm expecting a report from them in the near future.

Another resource that of course we need to find a balance in is our fish and wildlife resources, and the hon. member mentioned the importance of that to Alberta and to Alberta's future. We will definitely do that. As I mentioned earlier, Alberta is facing many challenges in keeping our fish population viable. One of the ways our ministry is looking at ensuring this is through improving the Alberta fisheries initiative that I spoke about earlier, and I'll expand on that in a very short while.

The last area I want to talk about in answering your questions on this is about the sustainability of our forests. We all know that we are currently facing a huge issue with the ongoing softwood lumber trade dispute, which I spoke about in my opening comments. While working in partnership with International and Intergovernmental Relations, we are fighting for Alberta's forest sector. However, this issue is not just about the softwood lumber dispute. There are so many communities and so many Albertans dependent on the forest industry itself, on the primary, the secondary, and the tertiary industries. So we need to have strategies that will ensure the existence of this sector for a very long time, and you can be assured that we will continue to do that.

When you look at our forest resources, for an example, in relation to the management of our resources, we only harvest approximately 50 percent of what the growth will be out there. There's approximately 44 million cubic metres of annual growth, and we are only taking out 23.1 million cubic metres of annual growth. So we are definitely trying to keep a balance. It's not easy to do, but it's something that we will be doing and will continue to do because it is very important. Conifers, for someone that may be interested – that's spruce and pine – are 13.2 million cubic metres, and deciduous, which is normally aspen or poplar, are about 9.9 million cubic metres. So we do have a good inventory of our forests. We have good forest management agreements in place with the industries. We're partnering with the Alberta Forest Products Association in relation to the future plans of where we go with our forestry.

The primary industry itself I mentioned earlier is again an $8.4 billion industry. Over 24,000 are directly employed in the primary industry itself. What we need to look at when we're talking about forestry and how important it is to Albertans is that the corporate tax alone is $188 million. That's only from the primary industry, not the secondary or tertiary. Provincial income tax is $197 million; property tax is $114 million; stumpage, $71.4 million; direct expenditures, $4 billion; and indirect expenditures, $6.7 billion. So it's a major, major industry, and no doubt we will continue to be prosperous as long as we can manage the forest fires and the other demands that are out there to use our forest resources.

The other very important area to the member, I believe, and of course to Albertans and to our government is the area of fisheries. In fact, I've been working very closely with the member and our colleagues in government to look at how we may revitalize the sport and commercial fishing industry in Alberta. Today we will be releasing – and the member will have the information today – what we are doing there. Part of that input was already done through our normal approval processes and also in consultation with the member opposite.

One of the challenges we face in the fisheries of course is that the province has the third highest angling pressure in Canada. Alberta's population increased 35 percent since 1980. There are about 300,000 anglers, and there are currently over 800 commercial fisheries active in the province of Alberta. Alberta only has about 1,000 fish-bearing lakes compared to 94,000 in Saskatchewan and 110,000 in Manitoba and 250,000 lakes in Ontario. So definitely we have less lakes and more people. Of Alberta's fishing lakes, 800 support natural fish populations and 300 must be supported by stocking programs.

Fishing licences, for an example, in 2001 were the highest they've ever been since 1997, so the pressure doesn't stop. In 2001, 9,000 more licences were purchased by resident anglers than in the previous year, and there are only about 18 species of fish in Alberta that are preferred for food. So what we need is more detailed knowledge of fishing pressures and the fish resources to ensure that sport, commercial, and domestic uses are sustainable for the future. Humans share the fisheries resources with many others, including animals, aquatic birds, and cormorants, of course.

Some of the challenges, some of the things we need to do to revitalize the industry are to look at increasing inventory and population monitoring activities to gain greater knowledge of fish populations in specific locations, upgrading fish disease control programs, stepping up efforts to encourage Albertans to protect natural fish habitats, increasing public education and information, improving the province's hatchery system, in operation for more than nine years now, and drastically reducing the number of commercial fishing licence holders through increased fees and a compensation program.

That is one that we are really targeting to make that industry more viable and, at the same time, more manageable. We are looking at reducing the 800 licences possibly down to about 200 and reducing the yardage they have from 34,000 100-yard nets down to about 18,000. What we had to do is provide a compensation package of $200 per 100-yard net and also $2,000 per zone for those people that want to step out of that industry. The commercial fishing industry is about a $5 million industry. On the other hand, the sportfishing industry is about $300 million, so there is quite a difference there.

What is happening in some of those areas, because there are so many commercial fisherman, so few resources, and so few lakes, is that when the lake opens, the targeted population is never really harvested, because what comes out first is the population that's not targeted, which is normally the walleye and other sport species. So what we will do with this new plan is we will ensure that we reduce the number of commercial fishermen so they are manageable and so they become more economically viable, but it is going to be a challenge. I'll definitely need support from our government, from the public out there, and from the opposition, of course, to ensure that we move very carefully, ensuring that as we move forward with the compensation package, we do not really have a negative impact on the economies of some of the smaller fishermen.

What I intend to do once the package is released, possibly later today or tomorrow, is also ensure that we have a hardship committee put in place, which will include someone from the Alberta Commercial Fishermen's Association and our department and possibly some other department member. That will look at those commercial fisheries that may have to sell their smaller licence holdings, but, at the same time, it could be part of their total family income. I'm willing to look at each individual case to ensure that we do not create a hardship for that particular industry. What we want to do with that industry is enhance it so it's economically viable while we have a system in place that will be better managed.

In the other area what we're doing is enhancing fish spawning through lake closures and other methods and introducing pilot projects. We have a pilot project that will be announced either today or tomorrow, and it's in my home community. Calling Lake is where I'm from. What that community has agreed to do is to look at a very innovative project there. That lake at one time had an abundance of fish: whitefish, tullibee, walleye, and pike. Through, of course, various pressures and I guess sometimes not taking the appropriate actions at the appropriate time to look at the natural spawning grounds, that lake had come to a near collapse situation as far as the walleye fisheries, and it was closed, whereas it was catch and release.

What we are doing with that lake now is that we are changing the policies. As of May 15 you'll be able to keep one walleye, any size, and two jackfish, any size, and the fishermen will decide what fish is suitable for their family, but while we're doing that, we're also closing one-third of the north part of that lake, which is a natural spawning grounds, a natural nesting grounds, and that will become a sanctuary where we will not allow any fishing whatsoever. While we're doing that, we also will be opening up the beaver dams that have plugged up the natural spawning grounds, and there are two major natural spawning grounds, one river and one creek, that have been blocked for years now by beaver dams and other activities.

So it's an innovative approach, and I think it's something that Albertans could possibly look at supporting across Alberta. I'm not sure if it's ever been done in Alberta or any other jurisdiction in Canada, but I think it's a unique concept of not depending solely on fish hatcheries and moving fish stocks around but enhancing the natural spawning grounds where they should be. I think it's a process that could work. It's something that's supported by the community, and the public I think will support it. I'll also definitely need the support of the opposition in this process.

The other area that you mentioned. I'll try and answer some of these. An example is the increased funding in NRCB. Of course, as of January 1 of this year I have assumed responsibility of NRCB. With new staff and new responsibilities we will be requiring, no doubt, additional dollars. The NRCB, as you are aware, is the Natural Resources Conservation Board. What it does, for those members that may not know, is review applications for approval of major natural resource development projects such as forestry, recreation and tourism, the mining industry, and water management. This board decides on a number of issues, and I can expand on that a bit later if you want, but that is where the million dollars is going, to the expanded role of NRCB and the new staffing and the new structure and the new responsibility. It is a good process. It's something that the public I think would support and no doubt the opposition also.

As far as the department reorganization, one the questions you have is the cuts in staff, especially in the area of conservation officers. We are reorganizing the department, and the opposition member, of course, has been somewhat involved in the process. What we are doing is we are making four regions out there, and actually an executive regional director will be situated in Lac La Biche for the northeast region. Other ones will be situated in Peace River for the northwest region and Rocky Mountain House for the central region and Calgary for the south region. Those are the four executive directors, and these executive directors actually report directly to the deputy minister, so their role is an authority. As far as review of projects or approval of projects, it will be done out in the field. Right now the way the process works – normally if you go apply for, as an example, a timber permit or a gravel permit, you apply at the local level. It goes up to the assistant deputy minister, across to, if it's environment, Environment, fish and wildlife, and then back down, then back up, and then back down. What will happen with this new process is that if an individual goes and applies for a permit, for example, to develop a gravel pit, they should be able to get the approval right at the regional office. It's the one-window approach that the industry has been asking for, so it makes the department more efficient.

I'll sit for now, and maybe you have a few other questions.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciated the exchange here and the discussion and the information. I'll admit to having missed some of the questions that were raised by my colleague from Edmonton-Ellerslie, and if there is some repetition in our questions, I apologize for that. There are times when we all have constituents who want issues raised, and sometimes that leads to duplication. You've also, I recognize, provided some answers that addressed a few of the questions that I had around fish stock management, lake management, restoration of, for example, Calling Lake, which will be interesting to watch, and I hope it succeeds. That's a beautiful lake. I've camped on the shores of Calling Lake and watched the pelicans and the herons fish, although I haven't been up there now in probably five years. It's a beautiful lake, and I hope we're able to restore it to robust health. So certainly that's an innovation we'll be watching closely and wish you the best of luck with.

You may well already have addressed questions about some of the shifts in the overall budget. As I'm looking at it, there seems to be a decrease in the operating expenses and capital investment of around 3 percent, I think. Capital, on the other hand, is going up. Some of us will be interested to know what's driving that and hear your explanations for that. The huge overrun in last year's budget, I believe, was – am I right in assuming that's primarily because of forest expenditures? Yeah.

Also, we've noticed that the number of full-time equivalent employees is dropping for the department. Of course, by taking on responsibility, as you noted, for the NRCB, you're gaining staff, I guess, through that process. But there are changes in staff there, and if you haven't already explained them, it would be useful to understand for us and for the public.

I'm just going to work through some of my notes and then go to the business plans. The question of regional offices for various government departments comes up. I know they've recently been an issue and a concern in the Department of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development. They are recognized as an important way for many different ministries, including this one, Sustainable Resource Development, to reach out across the province and to implement its programs across the province. There is a budget item, if I'm reading this correctly, of about $1.8 million to set up new regional offices. One of the questions around regional offices is: what facility do they use? Do they move into existing facilities? Are they looking at new leases in private buildings? There was a day even when the offices might have been installed in buildings that were purpose built by the government. I doubt if that's happening now, but it may be. And $1.8 million dollars is a fair bit of money; it would be useful to know if that's going to existing buildings or new buildings or new leases and how that's being handled. I'm not sure what the relationship is in this sort of exercise between the Department of Sustainable Resource Development and the Department of Infrastructure. I don't know if Infrastructure's involved in this process or not.

Also, if there are new offices, there will be new expenses going along with the space. Will there be, for example, departmental identity logos, new logos or new vehicles and so on? Details on that sort of expense within reason are useful. It's, frankly, a way to just keep everybody on their toes.

Shifting to the question of legal services; it may be in here somewhere. Last year there was $67,000 for legal services, and we haven't been able to find it in the current proposed budget. So I suppose a simple question would be: where did the legal services go? Maybe we don't need any this year, which would be a fine thing, but I think it's probably reasonable that any department of this size and this nature requires legal services legitimately, yet we can't see them in the budget. So the explanation for that would be useful.

One of the strengths of this government, I think, is communications, and I notice that the communications budget is increasing by a fair percent, going up from $719,000 to $804,000, so that's more than a 10 percent increase. That may be for community education purposes. It may be for press releases. It may be for photo ops. It may be for all kinds of things. The questions would be: why a 10 percent or 11 percent increase in that budget, and what's it being used for? Preferably for things like community education, but it may have other purposes as well.

There's also a substantial increase in the budget for policy and planning, going up, if the figures are correct, almost 160 percent, so a very substantial increase. We like to think that maybe it's because some of our very good ideas that we've offered to the department are going to be acted on, so you're committing policy and planning dollars to some of our ideas. But in case that isn't the situation, what are those dollars going to be spent on? What policy and planning work is coming along that requires more than a doubling of expenditures in that area? Along with that, are we going to be seeing an increase in staff? The overall staff in the department isn't increasing, so who's going to be using that money? Is it going to be consultants? If so, how would those consultants be hired and retained? What's the process for selecting consultants? How are we sure that we get the best people for the job, whether they're staff or consultants or whoever?

We move on to program 2, forest protection. Again, it may be that my colleague from Edmonton-Ellerslie has raised some of these questions, but I would like to ensure that they are covered. It looks like the budget for fire reclamation has been eliminated, I think. That's how it appears anyway. What's going on there? That's a fair chunk of money actually. I think it's close to $4 million, if I'm reading this correctly, and that's a lot of money. Last year we had a very serious fire season, so the question would be: are we not doing any fire reclamation work? If we are, is it being handled elsewhere? What's going on there?

There are also some signs of programs perhaps being cut under line 2.0.4, forest fire information and community programs. Certainly, again referring to last year, there was a lot of controversy over communities getting notified about fires, communities being involved with fire prevention, and then evacuation and so on. So that's probably being handled somewhere else; I'm not sure where, though. I have a feeling there will be a reasonable explanation there. It may involve reducing or eliminating one program and starting a new program, but the details of that would be helpful for us.

If we move to program 3, forest land and resource management, it's a sizable piece of the department, ranging in the last couple of years between $28 million and $33 million. So it's a significant amount of money, but we are seeing a bit of a drop in the forest policy area, from $336,000 to $283,000. Does that mean we're going to be seeing less policy come out of the department? How does that fit with the very substantial increase under another program in policy and planning, or does it relate at all? Why are we seeing that drop there? We're seeing also a cut in capital investment for this area from $161,000 last year to $35,000 this year. So it makes you wonder what kind of investment the department is doing for $35,000. It's a modest amount of capital investment. I'm curious to know what it's for.

The eastern slopes is one of the areas of this province truly prized by Albertans and by people who visit here. We do in fact get many people who visit here and use outfitters to go into the eastern slopes and explore or hunt or fish. Last summer the department was planning three pilot projects related to the tenure system for outfitters on the eastern slopes. What's the status of these pilot projects? Every pilot is supposed to run a course and then be evaluated and either expanded or eliminated. If we started those pilots last summer, will they be in full swing this year? Are they already being phased out or expanded? What's the status of them?

There's also constant concern about the major strategies for the management of forests. Going through the business plan, one of the major strategies of the department is to “provide a clear, balanced approach to forest management,” which sounds great. Of course we always want balance, and we want things to be clear. So could the minister please provide copies of that sort of strategy and indeed of any forest inventories that the province has done in the last few years so that the public can be clear on how effectively the forest management process is proceeding. What’s the status of our inventories? Are they in fact sustainable? We would certainly hope they are, given the title of this department, but there is concern that the demands on the forests of Alberta are beyond the abilities of the forests to meet, so our forests may not be sustainable. Good, clear information on an inventory of forests would be invaluable to all Albertans.

We’re concerned that there may not be any more forests to allocate to new mills, and the mills that are there now may not be operating at capacity because the inventory isn’t adequate. So that raises the question: if the government has allowed the mills to overbuild and the industry to overbuild, where are we going to go in the future? What’s going to happen? What’s going to happen to our industry? How will mills that have to chronically function at less than capacity continue to be economically feasible? If we’re close to the annual allowable limit for cut to meet the needs of the mills, what’s going to happen in the future? Are we constantly pushing the limits? What’s the calculation based on? Is it based on real, solid research on what the forest can provide, or is it based on some hope of what the mill will demand? Is there a risk that perhaps mills themselves have created an impression or have been given an impression that inventories are greater than what they really are? Those are all concerns.

Given the importance of the forests in Alberta and the importance of this industry, I’m not sure that it’s adequate in the business plans to just encourage sustainable forest management. Why aren’t we requiring it in the business plans? Why don’t we say that sustainable forest management will be required? The strategy actually uses the word “encourage” rather than “require.” Certainly it’s nice to encourage things, but when it comes to the forests of Alberta and the thousands of jobs and the environmental concerns, maybe we should be requiring proper forest management.

There’s also in strategy 2.4 some pretty creative language used to create impressions but maybe not explain in detail what’s going on. So when we talk, for example, about the department “unleashing innovation,” what exactly are we talking about there? What’s the innovation? How are we unleashing it? What does it really mean? We could unleash innovation of all sorts. What kind of innovation are we looking for? I mean, are we unleashing it because it’s currently tied up in the forest somewhere, or are we unleashing it for some other reason? So more detail, more specifics in the business plan would be much appreciated.

That carries me through some of the programs, and I see my time is just about out here, so I will take my seat. You can respond, and I’m sure there’ll be other questions. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. minister.

MR. CARDINAL: Thank you very much. Those are good questions and I’ll answer some, but I’ll allow the staff to answer in writing some of the more detailed stuff.

The issue of budget decreases. I mentioned, I believe, some of that in my opening comments, that $4 million of the $8 million decrease in the budget was because we finished a project from the 1998 fire, and that took $4 million. That is why we don’t need that money any longer. The other $4 million, of course, we will be finding through the reorganization of our department.

As far as full-time equivalents or full-time staff being dropped, the drops are only minor. What we’re doing is basically looking at reallocating some of the existing resources we have. For an example, we’re putting four new regional offices out there with more responsibility, more approval authority at the local level, and more visibility, with the ability for the public to be able to phone one office if they have a concern on fisheries, if they have a concern on public lands, if they have a concern on forestry or other areas of our departmental responsibility. Those regional offices – one in Lac La Biche, one in Peace River, one in Rocky Mountain House, and one in Calgary – will be able to address those issues. Those new positions were actually filled using existing full-time equivalent positions and reallocating existing staff within the department.

So what we’ve done is become way more efficient in serving the public and the MLAs out there, who get a lot of phone calls at times, because, as all of you know, if a department is not efficient and the public does not know who to contact when they have an issue, they end up calling the MLA’s office. What this will do is that the public will know the person in charge of all the areas they’re in charge of, and that person will be highly visible. It’s a person that’s local. They’ve been there, in most cases, a long time and know the people, know the region, and it should be very effective. We will not require new office space for our northern offices, our existing offices. Of course, there are vehicles there already, the office is there, the telephones are all connected, and they’re all set up.

The other area we’re working with closely in relation to office space, of course, is Infrastructure. Because of some changes that are taking place in Agriculture, Food and Rural Development, there are some vacant office spaces where we are collocated, for an example in Athabasca, where we will expand our office by moving staff in the existing offices. So there will be no added cost or a very minimum cost in relation to office space.

The $67,000 in legal services. I’ll get my department to answer that in writing, because I’m not really sure.

The increase in the communications budget. Of course, we’re trying to be more proactive and ensure that the public knows the types of things we are doing in the department, and this is an example. This booklet shows almost everything you need to know about the forest industry in Alberta, including the inventory, the annual allowable cut, and the annual allowable growth. This project even breaks down areas, like Edmonton for an example, as to what impact forestry has. I think it’s important for people in Alberta to know. For an example, in Edmonton in the primary industry in forestry there are 10,536 people employed. It’s a $1.1 billion industry. They’re into value-adding mainly, and all those are here in Edmonton. That’s just one example of many examples in Grande Prairie, the Peace River region, the Slave Lake region, and then it goes on to show the forest management agreements. It shows where all the sawmill and pulp mill projects are there. It’s important, I think, to have proper communications for the public to ensure that they are very clear on what the forestry department does. This is another example of, I think, good communication. There’s a little pamphlet that goes with this also that will show the innovative projects of sustaining the fisheries industry, both the sportfishing industry and also the commercial fishing industry in Alberta.

In relation to the communications budget, I think that this year, being a new department and new structuring, no doubt the communications budget that we require will increase. I offered to use smoke signals in my department, but no one could read them, so I couldn't use those to save money. If there's an increase in this budget: again, if I missed something on communications, I'll get my department to answer that in writing, not smoke signals.

The other one is the FireSmart program, that we just announced. It's a major communications package involving most of the municipalities, involving firemen out there and communities and municipalities to start looking at how we can fireproof our communities by developing fire preventative programs around the communities, looking at the area structure plan, for an example. There are a number of ways to do that. In Wabasca, which is a community in my constituency, and also in Fort McMurray, in fact, we are moving some public land to the municipality for more commercial and residential development. What we've asked in that plan, as part of our agreement to move the public land, is to put in their area structure plan a fireguard around a community. So we are doing a lot of innovative things as far as communications.

Policy and planning. I'll ask my department, again, to answer that in writing to you because it's pretty detailed.

In relation to forest land and resource management, again, I'll get my department to expand on that and also on the eastern slopes policy, because it is quite detailed. As far as forest management and the balanced approach, we have a policy in place in Alberta that we will never harvest more than there is annual allowable growth. That is the challenge, because we have fires, we have, you know, the beetles, and we have other interests in development of resources in the same area where we are harvesting forest resources. It's challenging, but it's not impossible to do. We know the capacity of what our mills require both short and long term. We know, generally, what volume we have both short and long term, and we generally know at this time how many resources we have to allocate.

For an example, the GAP project in the Grande Prairie region not moving forward allowed us to look at reallocation of those resources to, possibly, existing companies. We've always said that before calling for new companies to come in to harvest the resources we have, we'd better on the long-term basis stabilize the existing companies we have out there. So it is very important. Our industry, partnering with us, is doing a heck of a job in forest management and balanced growth and balanced approaches in harvesting that resource.

The other area you mentioned that is very, very important, of course, is forest protection. Although it's something we don't have to worry about today because there's so much snow out there, you can be assured that as soon as it warms up, it is still dry out there. As you are aware, last year we spent $170 million, which was considerably more than what our operating budget is. When you look at the last five years, we've spent $58 million a year for the last five years. So it is an area where we are definitely being proactive.

We have roughly over 2,000 personnel that are trained in fire fighting, and we have 22 air tankers on contract and 14 air tanker bases. We have 132 lookout sites and 41 ranger stations. We have 152 weather stations, 39 remotes, 13 lightning direction finders, and of course we have our operation budget of about $69 million for 2002-2003. The secret to fighting fires is basically being prepared, and it is something where we could never do too good a job. Being prepared means having a good policy in place, being ready, and early detection of fires. As soon as there's a fire out there, we need to be out there with early response. For an example, if a fire starts at, say, 8 o'clock, 9 o'clock in the evening, with the new policy we have in place now, our bombers will be out there. If the weather is reasonable, we'll be out there at 4 o'clock in the morning. The previous policy was that they would be out there from 10:30 in the morning till 5 o'clock, so it allowed the fire another six hours to burn before we were out there. So that's one policy we've changed. That's just an example of some of the changes we are looking at.

As far as that particular budget for fires, the breakdown is: policy and readiness, $44 million; prevention and detection, $9.5 million; and early response, $36 million. So definitely we are ready. What I will do is ask my staff to pass on to you this information that shows you exactly a breakdown of the policy readiness; for an example, the exact dollars of firefighter training, information systems, permanent manpower, seasonal manpower, fire line and aircraft communications. All of it is broken down with the dollars in there. If you go under prevention and detection, it shows you that we are spending $9.5 million and what we do with that budget. The FireSmart program is under that, with $3.8 million; fire investigation, legal, $110,000; then early response again, the rapid attack crew, heli-tack crew, heli-tack support crew; aircraft operations; and wildfire fighting crew contracts. We also have contracts. In addition to that, we have, of course, I believe around 38 contracts, some with First Nations that are ready. If we call them, they're out there working.

In addition to this, we are also looking at a way of providing possible fire insurance for this year. It's going to cost us approximately $12.5 million. It'll cover insurance between $175 million and $300 million, and again we will provide you detailed information on this as to exactly how it's going to work. It's a one-year pilot project, and I think that if the situation is like last year, the last five years, no doubt it's something that can kick in. There are criteria as to when something like that would kick in.

The other area we are working on and jointly done with the Ministry of Municipal Affairs is a program between that department and the municipalities, especially the ones – there are about 16 or 18 municipalities – that are bordering the protected area, the green area of Alberta. What we have there is that a lot of the fires start in the municipalities, and the existing programs we have in place sometimes do not encourage the municipalities to call us early to go in and help put out the fires. Because of the billing system we had in the past, the municipalities would wait, try to put out the fire, and eventually they'd call us. Sometimes it's too late. The fire is out of control and gone into the protected area and some Crown lands within the white area.

So we are looking at a joint agreement where we will set criteria. It's just starting to go into the process now. I think some of the municipalities support it. We will be doing an MR jointly with the Minister of Municipal Affairs, and again we will advise you of this process. It is something that is good. What will happen is that if a fire starts in the municipality, the municipality will go in there and try to put it out. If they have a problem, they call us immediately, and we will be out there to assist in putting it out and bring in maybe our mop-up crews, even the standby crews, which we have sitting already in place and in a lot of cases not doing a whole lot. So they will go in there and assist the municipalities in putting out these fires and mopping up the fires. I think it's a system that will work. We are doing everything possible to be proactive in fire suppression.

I believe you had maybe another question. That was in relation to innovation, 2.4. Again, I'll ask my department to expand on that particular one. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I rise to participate in the debate this afternoon on the estimates for the Department of Sustainable Resource Development. There are a number of issues that I certainly would like to bring to the attention of the hon. minister and his staff. Certainly in the previous remarks by the hon. minister we cannot forget the importance of the lumber industry, the forestry industry, to this province and the efforts that have been made to diversify our province using our forests to achieve this goal. However, there are always questions as to just how many sustainable cubic metres of softwood lumber there are. Some quarters say that it's not sustainable; other individuals say that it certainly is. At this time I would certainly encourage the minister to table in the Assembly to qualify this argument: do we have enough timber supply not only to sustain the current mills and their production rates but also future development, particularly up in the Peace district?

Now, the hon. minister, I believe, said that there were 10,500 jobs directly and indirectly created around metro Edmonton, which is certainly significant to the local economy, and I certainly appreciate that information. The lumber industry in the entire country is valued at over, I believe, $30 billion, or the American market is a $30 billion market and we need access to that. Hopefully the minister, in co-operation with the minister of intergovernmental affairs and all officials across the country, is going to be able to resolve this dispute regarding duties to America.

However, I'm concerned about the export of raw logs to Montana. At the same time, Mr. Chairman, the minister is correctly pointing out the significance to the local economy. What sort of difference is the trucking of raw logs to Montana making to our value-added production here in this province, and how much lumber is exported or trucked across the border to Montana? I've said this before in this Assembly, I believe. I was astonished and delighted at the same time on a visit to St. Louis. I was in a suburb of St. Louis, Missouri. I walked past a construction site, and there was a lift of two-by-fours that had been manufactured. They were still in their sort of cellophane shrink-wrap, and they came from the constituency of Whitecourt-St. Anne. This product had originated in Whitecourt, and I was surprised to see this. I went over and had a bit of inspection of this lift of two-by-fours.

I don't know if that practice will continue, unfortunately, with this ongoing quarrel with our neighbours to the south. To resolve the softwood dispute is quite an issue. Whenever you think of the Americans, they have a coalition dominated by lumber producers in the southern states, where there are privately owned lots. All the trees that are produced are on private property. Yet we have so many Crown leases and Crown allocations in this province. That's the basis of the dispute as I understand it.

Now, many of these private lot owners or landowners in the southern states certainly object to Canada's almost $10 billion presence in the U.S. market, charging that of course not only Canada but Alberta subsidizes its publicly owned forests and dumps – they're accusing us of dumping – lumber in the United States market. Canada, backed by a World Trade Organization decision in previous softwood lumber disputes, certainly refutes this charge. This country has won World Trade Organization softwood decisions in the past, and basically when we win these arguments, we win the right to retaliate against American exports to Canada, but we're really risking the reverse. We're risking a tariff wall against ourselves. This, unfortunately, increases our costs.

There's no deal here. There's certainly no deal. There are compromises being made. There's talk of an export tax. It's been suggested that it could be as high as 32 percent at the border. I don't know how much of an effect, but I think it's going to have a significant effect on our industry. I understand that there have been efforts made, and I would recognize those efforts. There have been efforts made by this government to protect the smaller operators from the fallout of all this, of what's going to happen.

In order to I guess the word is pacify the Americans on this issue, what sort of policy changes is the department going to have to make in this current fiscal year? Are we looking at changing Alberta's forest act and timber management regulations, the FMAs, to eliminate ministerial discretion? Certainly there is talk that this is what's needed to be done. I don't know how that's going to affect us. How will it affect timber quotas, timber licences or permits? If the minister could shed some light on this, I would be grateful.

Now, there's also the whole issue of regulatory controls. For example, would there be request for proposal options? Would what are called the RFPs have to be eliminated now to satisfy our American cousins? With the complaints from this coalition, who have an extensive lobby in Ottawa from what I can read on this issue, are we going to be forced so that all new tenures, all new blocks that are put up for sale are sold competitively, based solely, regardless of who it is, on the highest price paid? Certainly I can remember the Bow-Crow forest region in southwestern Alberta. The Competition Bureau had to get in there and say: "No. This is wrong. This is not competition." There was actually a case of bid rigging, and one outfit was found guilty. I think it was a $10,000 fine or something of that nature. Is this the sort of past practice that our American cousins are talking about?

Now, there is also the issue of stumpage. What adjustments are going to be made to our regulations to update our current system in this fiscal year, Mr. Chairman? I think it's important. Are there going to be annual cost updates by the department? Is there going to be interest on the inventory? Is there going to be an elimination of the small mill rate for the larger operators? This is perhaps what the hon. minister had to do in order to protect what are called the mom-and-pop sawmills, the smaller ones. Is another step in this to enact new legislation to install this validation process? How will this work? The regulated log transaction data requirements by the industry, a regulated requirement for cost updates by third parties: how will this be handled? Will there be unrestricted eligibility in the sale of land based on the highest bid only? Will this be accepted for any and all future sales? These are the commercial timber permits. This is getting back to the unfortunate episode that occurred in the Bow-Crow forest region.

Now, I hope that all these changes are going to certainly occur in this fiscal year, because as the hon. minister has stated, there are 10,500 citizens reliant on this industry alone. Hopefully they will be able to rely on this industry in the future. We need to get a good handle on these commercial timber permit sales. I would appreciate from the minister precisely how many cubic metres of wood fibre will be available from commercial timber permit sales. Also, how is the department going to record data on private land timber sales? These are these log exports, and I have concern about the log cash-only transactions off private properties. Again, is that the source of all these logs a guy sees being transported on highway 2 south? One only has to go to the cafe in Innisfail and have a coffee and sit for half an hour, and I'm quite sure you will see at least one if not more trucks whiz by on the way to the U.S. border. I'm told that they're not coming from the area. You know, one would naturally think that the Sundre-Caroline area is where they would be coming from, but I'm told that they're coming from as far north as Whitecourt, and this member has some concern about that.

The stumpage. Will we need a minimum stumpage increase? If the minister could tell me what that would be in dollars per cubic metre, I would be very grateful. At the same time, if there's some sort of delicate negotiations going on between him and the hon. Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, then perhaps I could at this time wait with respect to a collaborative effort with the other Canadian provinces in resolving this issue with the Americans.

Now, is 5 million or 6 million board feet the maximum allowable production that the minister is contemplating will be available for the smaller operators? I would like to know what that target would be. With that, I have a few questions at this time, Mr. Chairman. I would like to conclude my remarks, my questions, on this most important issue of the softwood lumber trade dispute with our American cousins.

In light of the time I have, I would like to discuss this whole issue of forest fire protection. The hon. minister is quite correct in his observation that with this blanket of snow we don't have to worry, but soon we will. We need to ensure that the machines and the operators on them are well trained. There were some contentious issues around Swan Hills a couple of years ago regarding forest fire fighting practices and the utilization of machines. I certainly hope this will be ironed out.

I notice in the business plan that one of the major strategies identified is to "keep the number of human-caused fires . . . from increasing," and that is certainly noteworthy. With lightning strikes there's not much that can be done, unfortunately. What role will education play in keeping the number of human-caused fires from increasing? Will any fines be increasing? We all know that this government is increasing sin taxes in an effort to curb or alter the behaviour of Albertans. Will the same principle be applied here?

My next question dealing with this policy of forest protection is: what is the department purchasing for $3 million under capital investment for wildlife operations? Is it more D9s? Is it trucks to haul them from fire to fire? Is it camp equipment for the workers? What exactly is it? Is it more water bombers? I don't know.

Now, in program 5, Mr. Chairman, strategy 4.4 states that the department is going to "encourage good stewardship practices by monitoring utilization of public rangelands," and program 5, for all hon. members, is public lands management. How many staff members are responsible for these monitoring programs? What is the nature of these monitoring programs? Is it more self-reporting, that the government is so fond of? If the minister could answer these questions in due time, I would be very grateful. What form of encouragement will be used? Will strongly worded letters be used? Are there any fines associated with this encouragement?

Further on, strategy 5.3 states that the department wants to "ensure dispositions for the use of public lands are issued in a timely, effective manner with the appropriate and relevant conditions." There is no mention of the role of the public consultation or even notification being an important part of these dispositions.

Now, that concludes program 5, but in program 6, reporting agencies, Mr. Chairman, there is a difference between the 2001-2002 and 2002-2003 budgets of roughly $1.2 million. Who went over the budget here? Was it the Surface Rights Board or the Land Compensation Board? I understand that the budget was $1.7 million, and the forecast is half a million higher now at $2.2 million. The Surface Rights Amendment Act was supposed to take more appeals out of the courts and put them before the Surface Rights Board. Is that the reason for the budget overrun?

Mr. Chairman, I have just a few more comments in program 4, and I'll conclude my remarks for the moment. [Mr. MacDonald's speaking time expired] Oh, darn.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. minister.

MR. CARDINAL: Just very briefly, I mentioned earlier as far as the sustainability of our forests that we probably have one of the best forest management areas in North America, and we have something to be proud of. We have a policy in place that will never harvest more than the forests will grow. That is why out of 44 million cubic metres of forest we're harvesting about 23 million cubic metres, so we are doing quite well.

I'll try and answer just a few of these questions. Because of time I'll get the staff to answer a lot more in detail.

As far as log exports, it is not a policy we favour, but sometimes when there's a fire and burnt logs, we have a limited amount of time to process those logs. Therefore, it is necessary to always be open to export if it is necessary to do that.

You mentioned small sawmill operators. There are over 200, in fact 230, I believe, operators that process under 5 million board feet of timber each year. These are loggers and small sawmillers. These companies hopefully, because they do domestic markets, can be exempt from the free trade negotiations. The larger companies, of course, that are well diversified have a better chance of surviving some of the market trends that are out there in relation to exports to the U.S., but there are targeted groups of sawmills that produce certain amounts of dimension lumber that depend on a lot of exports for their survival. So it is a real challenge.

Areas that we're faced with in relation to the softwood lumber negotiations and disputes in Alberta. Of course, there is a concern on tenure. Our existing forest management agreements: I think the U.S. would like to see us advertise those each year and bid them out, but we will not do that in Alberta. We want to stick with the forest management agreements. Long-term tenure: if we want to have industries continue investing and expanding in Alberta in relation to forestry development, we need that long-term tenure in place.

Stumpage is another one that they would like to see change. I've always argued that stumpage maybe can change once the companies recover their capital costs plus a percentage of profit. Beyond that, you may have some room to make adjustments with the stumpage, but other than that our market-driven stumpage presently works very, very well.

The other one that's manageable is the flow of wood that goes into the U.S. as far as how much is produced each year and when we should market. Again, that's possible to manage.

You mentioned RFPs and CTPs and the bidding process. I believe that if the negotiations went the way the U.S. wanted, you would have to tender out all of your wood, and it would eliminate the CTPs, the RFPs, and all that stuff that's in place that's working quite well right now in Alberta. We still maintain that our forestry is not subsidized and will continue to defend that. The U.S. would like to see any new timber that is available marketed on open bids, and again that would really, really have a negative impact on our smaller operators across the province, who depend on the ability to access the commercial timber permits that become available.

In relation to the disposition of public lands in program 5 and program 6 on surface rights, again I'll ask my department to expand on those issues in writing. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Okay. Are you ready for the question?

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have a few more questions for the minister. In the interest of time I may group them and ask you to respond to them with however much time it takes.

The first is with regard to the Bighorn wildland recreation area. Both the minister and I and many members in the Assembly have had a very aggressive lobby in recent months, and certainly I know that the minister and myself have for many years faced quite an aggressive lobby on this particular area. It's an area under pressure in this province right now, and there are two parts to the lobby.

One is those who want the Bighorn wildland recreation area designated as a wildland park using the 1986 boundaries, and in their lobby they talk about roads and motorized recreation areas remaining prohibited within that area. That's in response to the increased use we've seen of off-highway vehicles in the area. They want a wildland park designated. They state that it's one of the only places left where the backcountry can actually be experienced with the absence of the roar of ATVs and also some concerns about seeing oil and gas development in the area. So I would like to have the minister respond in terms of what they're doing there. I'll table the letter that I'm specifically referring to here. This one is from Margaret Main of Calgary, and she's specifically wanting the Bighorn to be set aside for those "who like to take the slow road and enjoy the scenery." She states that she wants her grandchildren to be able to enjoy the Bighorn the way she does.

I'll table this in a moment along with the letters that I have from some Albertans who want the government to maintain some access for off-highway vehicles in the Bighorn area. These letters are from Tom Felt of Ferintosh, Inga Witzler and Horst Witzler of Fallis, and J. Green of Calgary. They're concerned about "closure to motorized recreation in Wildland Provincial Park or West Country area." Snowmobilers, ATV users want the same rights as hikers and naturalists. They say that they pay the same taxes and should be able to enjoy the area. They believe that "there are enough protected areas" and that "with proper management these areas can be used by everyone." They say that "with proper management this area can be a great snowmobiling destination and bring economic benefits to the communities in these areas." So I'll table those as well, Mr. Chairman.

There's no doubt that the key in these letters is proper management, and we have seen increasingly over time that while many ATV users and snowmobilers are very responsible users of trails, there are those who aren't. I say this knowing that the Member for Edmonton-Centre is a very committed snowmobile user and is also very committed to the proper use of trails. Because off-road vehicles by their nature can go off the road essentially anywhere, we've seen increased deterioration in areas that were formally relatively pristine. We see degradation of streambeds particularly and hills and watershed areas, and for the most part the minister and I agree that there needs to be designated use for off-road vehicles but that we have to be very clear that it doesn't hurt watersheds particularly.

In addition to that, I side for the most part on the side of the environmentalists who want more land restricted. There is nothing worse than being in the backcountry and enjoying the very beautiful views that Alberta has to offer, both from a scenery perspective and from plant life and animal life, and then hearing the very distinct roar of ATVs tearing up and down slopes. So I think that how that progresses has to be done very strategically, and I'm hoping that we do see the designation of many areas in this province as wildlife areas and wildland parks so that we can ensure that all users in this province have access to the kind of recreation that they want, but I would be interested to hear the minister's comments on that. That's one issue that I would like him to speak to.

Another one is cervid harvesting or, as most people have come to know them, pet shoots. We've had some preliminary discussions on this, and I know that this is an area where elk farmers are looking for a change in regulations so that they can open up their farms to hunt on the land that is enclosed area. Lots of concern about that. There have been all kinds of public meetings across the province. I know that the minister's department is involved in taking a look at a study, as is agriculture, and I would be interested in knowing where that study is going and how it's progressing and when the study will be available, if it will be public and how that will impact on any changes that will be made to the elk farmers and the potential for hunting on their land, particularly of interest given the confirmation of chronic wasting disease on a farm last month. The entire herd of 70 elk where the disease was confirmed, including 20 elk removed from that farm over the past three years, were ordered to be destroyed.

One of the main concerns that has been raised with cervid harvesting is the potential for the chronic wasting disease to be communicated to wild animals. It is a problem in Saskatchewan. It's been confirmed in Saskatchewan on more than 200 farmed elk and also on two wild mule deer since the year 2000. Alberta has about 40,000 farmed elk and 13,000 white-tailed and mule deer, so it's a huge risk for us to be taking. I know that most of the problems with the chronic wasting disease are the responsibility of the agriculture minister, but there certainly is some crossover here, and I would be interested in hearing the minister's comments both on the cervid harvesting and if they're working with the agriculture minister on containing this disease and its potential crossover to wild animals in the province.

I have a couple of other concerns that I wanted to address if possible. I know that it isn't solely the minister's responsibility, but I am sure that he is having some input within the ministry on the government's position on the Kyoto accord. More particularly I am interested in anything that the minister's department or the minister may be doing in terms of pursuing a policy of working towards tradeable permits and credits for the province. It's my position that the Environment minister is in a role where he can take real leadership for this province at the federal table and ensure that our industries are protected while still moving forward on CO₂ emissions. I think that that is by pursuing the ability of this government of this province to have tradeable permits and credits and also the issue of taking a look at the consumer of the product being the person who actually takes the responsibility for the CO₂ emissions rather than the producer of the product. So I'm sure your department has had some feedback and input on that, and I would like to know what that is.

Also, I would like to know what involvement you have in the G-8 summit. We know that the summit is going to be held in a beautiful part of Alberta but also a vulnerable part of Alberta. I think particularly there's the increased potential for fire hazards during the summit. So if he could comment on any participation he has in the summit and any recommendations that they've made in terms of security around the issue and any recommendations their department has made in terms of Alberta's position with regard to that summit.

So I'll let the minister respond to those questions at this point.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Hon. member, in your comments you mentioned that you would be tabling some material. We need that for our records.

MS CARLSON: Ready to do that now, yes. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. minister.

MR. CARDINAL: Thank you very much. Very briefly. Three of the issues you mentioned – the cervid hunt, Kyoto, and the G-8 summit – are also involving other departments. I will ensure that the staff jointly with the other departments respond to that.

Very briefly on the Bighorn issue, because that is also a very important issue. It is a very large resource-rich region and a very popular spot for many recreational activities in southwestern Alberta. About 4,000 square kilometres have several different land use zones, including 80 percent designated for prime protection or as a critical wildlife zone under the eastern slopes policy. The Bighorn Advisory Group, which involved 15 public members and also six department officials, will provide advice on balancing the needs of different land users or proposed land users in that area.

Some of the off-highway vehicle activity in the Bighorn area does not comply presently with the eastern slopes policy, but it is not illegal activity by legislation. This access plan will address these issues, so I am looking forward to the report, which should be submitted in the near future. We are looking at a balanced approach. I believe there is enough room there for all users, and we can do it in a balanced way.

Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. One other question for the minister: are there any resources in the budget to look at the situation in terms of sturgeon in the North Saskatchewan River? We've talked about fish stocks in a number of lakes in other parts of the province. There is an ongoing interest in the health of the North Saskatchewan River and the fish stocks there, particularly the sturgeon population, and as the representative of certainly the only constituency in the city of Edmonton that sits on both sides of the river, I have a particular interest in this. So if there are some resources in the budget to examine that issue, I'd be interested to know.

Thanks.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. minister.

MR. CARDINAL: We'll do it in writing.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I, too, have a couple of questions here that I couldn't get on the record and get the needed answers previous. Now, this also has to deal with program 4, fish and wildlife management, and my first question is in reference to 4.0.2. How is the department going to deal with the 40 percent cut to the program operating expenses in business management? Also, will the increase to the fisheries and wildlife management program, 4.0.3, mean more enforcement officers?

Under strategy 3.5 the department wants to "maintain up-to-date management plans for all game species." What is the status of this? How many are updated and how many are not? How many staff actually work on this specific project, and are any of these positions going to be cut?

Mr. Chairman, further along here what is the government doing to maintain and restore fish habitat? Now, is killing cormorants the best idea the department has? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry was describing to me the amount of fish – and I was astonished – that these birds can consume in a day. How about maintaining appropriate water levels in the south rather than letting irrigation have all the water? How is the department dealing with that issue, and how much habitat maintenance does the government actually do, and how much is done through groups like the Alberta Conservation Association and also TUC?

With those questions, Mr. Chairman, I would like to express my gratitude to the minister today for his co-operation and his responses. Thank you.

MR. CARDINAL: Thank you. We'll do it in writing.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Okay. After considering the business plan and proposed estimates for the Department of Sustainable Resource Development, are you ready for the question?

HON. MEMBERS: Question.

Agreed to:

Operating Expense	$181,441,000
Capital Investment	$3,035,000

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Shall the vote be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Opposed? Carried.

The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would move that the committee rise and report the estimates of Sustainable Resource Development and beg leave to sit again.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

MR. MASKELL: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions, reports as follows, and requests leave to sit again.

Resolved that a sum not exceeding the following be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2003, for the following department.

Sustainable Resource Development: operating expense and capital investment, $184,476,000.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to table copies of documents tabled during Committee of Supply this day for the official records of the Assembly.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Opposed? So ordered.

The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would move that we adjourn until 8 p.m., at which time we return in Committee of Supply.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:15 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Tuesday, April 16, 2002

8:00 p.m.

Date: 02/04/16

head: Committee of Supply

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

THE CHAIR: I'd like to call the Committee of Supply to order.

head: Main Estimates 2002-03

Infrastructure

THE CHAIR: Are there any comments or questions to be offered with respect to this set of estimates? Then we'll call on the hon. Minister of Infrastructure to begin tonight's deliberations.

MR. LUND: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman. Before I begin, I would like to introduce some of the staff members that are here with us: first, my deputy minister, Eric McGhan; Jeff Paruk, my executive assistant; Winnie Yiu-Yeung, executive director of finance; Tom Hong, executive director, business management and FOIP; and our communications director, David Bray.

Infrastructure's three-year business plan and 2002-2003 estimates indicate how we plan to contribute to Alberta's economy and prosperity by ensuring efficient planning, design, construction, rehabilitation, operation, maintenance, and land management of government-owned infrastructure and by developing innovative partnerships to ensure that support of infrastructure meets the overall needs of Albertans, including health care, learning, community service facilities, and of course the seniors' lodges. Managing central services to all departments includes accommodation requirements, property acquisition and disposal, air transportation, and of course the government fleet operations.

Before going over our budget targets, I would like to outline some of our new and ongoing business plan initiatives. First, we took over the responsibility of operation and maintenance funding for schools on April 1. At the moment we are working with stakeholder groups and Alberta Learning to review the existing formula to ensure that funding is fairly distributed among school boards. Secondly, evaluations and numerous feedback are ongoing from the 2001 Minister's Symposium on Schools. We will be following up with many individuals and groups on new and innovative ways to better build and redevelop our schools. Three, following the September 11 terrorist attacks, we set up a special team to work within Alberta Infrastructure with all the ministries to develop safety plans for government owned and leased buildings. Four, building condition audits of postsecondary institutions will be completed soon. Much work is needed to catch up with the deferred maintenance of all of these facilities.

As well, we will continue to oversee the Swan Hills Treatment Centre. We are proceeding with a proposal call to obtain a long-term contract operator. The centre has been operating very successfully since it was turned back to the province on December 31, 2000. The Swan Hills Treatment Centre is the only facility of its kind in Canada and one of the few in the world and has played a principle role in ridding the province of hazardous materials, toxins, and of course PCBs. Without the plant dangerous material would have to be buried or stored at potential risk to the environment. We will continue to ensure that hazardous waste in the province is managed responsibly.

Now getting to the budget part of it and looking at the $847 million targeted for the year 2002-2003. In the '01-02 budget our department was approved for $3.1 billion. This means more than a $2.2 billion reduction in capital expenditures in this department this year. In October '01 as part of government's fiscal and economic update we were asked to reduce our budget in response to the global economic slowdown. For '01-02 Infrastructure's budget was reduced by nearly $824 million. As a result, 34 capital projects were deferred, representing total construction costs of about $445 million; that is in '01 dollars. The rest of the reductions were related to the energy rebate program and other operating costs.

In '03-04 our target is about $988 million, and in '04-05 the target drops again, below $904 million. These budget reductions will certainly have an impact on the state of Alberta's infrastructure.

Now I'd like to discuss how we prioritized and allocated our dollars. We prioritized spending based on what's needed to cover the day-to-day operations of government. As well, we prioritized our capital commitments for schools, postsecondary institutions, health facilities, and seniors' lodges. Some projects are in construction, and others are just being completed. Then we looked at allocating dollars needed to undertake priority maintenance projects to protect the integrity of existing infrastructure and the taxpayers' investment. In light of the current economic outlook faced by the province of Alberta, we had to make tough decisions to ensure that Infrastructure's basic needs are met within the current budget targets. The positive news is that more than 1,100 capital projects have already begun in '01-02. However, changes in the province's revenue projections mean that there is very limited funding available at this time for new capital projects in '02-03. Projects previously deferred in '01-02 will continue to be deferred until replacement funding becomes available.

Now let's look at the allocation of the $847 million for '02-03. Our budget of $847 million was allocated in a variety of key areas. About $324 million, or just over one-third of the budget, will go to school boards for operation and maintenance of school facilities. A further $228.5 million will be used to pay for the day-to-day operations of government facilities, including the utilities, janitorial service, and of course the leasing costs. We will continue to provide a number of cross-ministry services such as the government aircraft and vehicle fleet as well as property acquisition and disposal. Another $180 million will be used to continue funding those capital projects that were already approved, many, as I mentioned earlier, under construction. To give you an idea of the capital projects that are planned or are already under way for '02-03, we are looking at $59.2 million for health facilities, $58.5 million for school projects, $16.4 million for postsecondary facilities, $12.2 million for seniors' lodges, $18.9 million for capital in accommodation projects, and $7.3 million to continue with those centennial infrastructure projects that were not deferred. There is some further funding allocated from the access fund administered by Alberta Learning.

I believe that the budget estimates for the year will allow us to meet our business plan goals and help maintain the government's commitment to fiscal responsibility.

So with those few brief comments I would be only too anxious to hear comments from the hon. members and answer the questions that I can. If we can't answer to the detail that the hon. members require, then certainly we will give them in written form. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I welcome the opportunity to rise this evening to speak to the estimates for Infrastructure. I want to thank the minister for his opening comments and the very good outline of exactly where the moneys are allocated for this year's estimates. I'd also like to thank his staff for coming out this evening and answering any of these questions that we might come up with here. As well, the minister did indicate that he would be providing us with some answers now and that perhaps he might need more time and others will be coming later in a written form. That's certainly fine by us.

Now, then, in preparing for the estimates this evening, I went back to last year, and I noticed that last year the gross operating estimates had a 300 percent increase. The gross operating actual was 150 percent. The gross capital investments were an increase of 97 percent. The gross capital investment actual for 2000-2001 was $26,376,000, and the total budget requested for 2001-2002 was an increase of 296 percent.

When we start comparing that with what is happening this year, we see that the 2002-2003 operating expense and capital investment for the department of $847.109 million reflects a $2.293 billion decrease, a decrease of 73 percent from the 2001-2002 budget. We also see when we look at the forecast that we have a reduction of 26 percent, and operating is decreasing from a budget of $3.088 billion in 2001-2002 to $834.099 million in 2002-2003, a 72 percent decrease. As we also see, Mr. Chair, the capital is decreasing from a budget of $52.03 million in 2001-2002 to $13.01 million in 2002-2003, which is a 75 percent decrease.

Now, this certainly indicates that the revenues weren't there to support Infrastructure this year as they have in past years. It also indicates that we're still going along with this idea of a roller-coaster budget. It seems that we're either in a feast or a famine mode, and we do not have any stable funding. Particularly when we look at the economic forecast for Alberta, this plays a significant role, because if we lose the workers this year because we don't have the money to put into our Infrastructure budget, if in fact we have to make these cuts that I see here in the neighbourhood of 73 percent or 26 percent or 72 percent or 75 percent, all of these decreases just have a huge impact not only on our infrastructure but on the industry that supports that infrastructure. I think primarily of construction, of maintenance, and if we lose those workers at this particular time, if those companies lose those workers and they get out and they find jobs elsewhere – and I'm not trying to intimate that they are government workers – then certainly in periods of good times when again you want to provide steady work for companies, they are going to have to go through this whole idea of attracting workers back to their companies if in fact they had to lay some off or workers moved elsewhere, because they certainly have a choice at this time in Alberta.

So we think we do require some type of a fund that will smooth out the peaks and valleys. We certainly do need some type of a savings account for when we do hit these periods where revenues do not flow in to the same extent that they have in the past, and so it is that the Official Opposition has called for on many occasions an infrastructure enhancement fund. This would be that when we have periods of great revenue coming in, we would certainly put some of that money aside. We'd put it aside in advance so that when we do have the money in place, then we could certainly accelerate, would certainly be able to enhance the infrastructure projects, and at that time as well we just wouldn't have to wait for these projects until such a time as the onetime funding would allow it. When the need is there, then, Mr. Chairman, we could fulfill this.

Now, as well, I was glad to see that the minister did refer to new and ongoing expenses and that particularly when we were looking at the special infrastructure projects and funding arrangements, which were announced last year, I believe, there were condition audits that were completed on 1,463 schools in the province. In the annual report from last year it goes on to say that "the audits will provide a strategic tool for the prioritization of school capital projects."

Now, then, the Department of Infrastructure plays an integral role in what happens in our schools, not only in school maintenance but construction of new schools in this province, but probably the best people to make a decision as to where the schools are needed, where new school construction should take place, are the local boards themselves. I certainly was glad to hear that you were in constant contact with the stakeholders in this regard. What is the determining factor as to where new schools are built? Who has the final say? If the school boards indicate that their priority is one particular spot and the government decides or the Department of Infrastructure decides that perhaps this should be somewhere else, then who gets the final say? That was one of my questions in regard to that.

As well, Mr. Chairman, the minister used the term "deferred" a number of times, and when I see that 34 capital costs were deferred for a total of $445 million, that's quite disturbing, quite disturbing for our communities, for our seniors, for our health care, for our schools. To focus in a little bit on the schools, if I could at this time, if the minister could outline what school facilities have been deferred and also the impact of cutting the budget for school facilities operating expenses from $555 million to $23 million. Again, under program 2.1.2, school facilities, we see lottery dollars being reduced from $150 million to $35 million. Could the minister outline where this $150 million in lottery funds is going?

In the minister's business plan there's a goal that only 9 percent of K to 12 schools will be rated in poor condition. Will the minister please table or provide us with a list of schools that are currently in poor condition, that you have done in your review, and as well what was used to classify these schools to come up with this 9 percent figure? Is it only the condition audits that are serving as the foundation for prioritizing school projects?

Another question I have for the minister: how can the ministry not have a measure for the functional adequacy of school facilities supported by Alberta Infrastructure? Will we see this measure by the end of 2005 or sometime earlier? If that would be introduced, we would like to know.

As well, when we look at seniors' lodges, the program for upgrading seniors' lodges has been extended. Certainly this is a bit disturbing when we look at a number of factors that are occurring in the province right now. One of those is that we constantly have in all projections an increased seniors population. We certainly have seniors living longer, and at stages in their later years they are requiring more types of facilities like lodges. As well, we see some seniors that want to move to lodges simply because they're in a position where they can't afford the rents that they're paying or perhaps they do need the advantages that lodges provide us. Now, then, we feel very strongly that the lodge program is one of those programs that should always remain under public ownership. We've certainly seen the disaster of trying to privatize seniors' lodges, as has occurred in the United States. Certainly they are having just an incredible time trying to monitor what is happening in these privatized seniors' lodges. As well, they find that there certainly is a tremendous lack of accountability with the providers of these seniors' lodges.

In last year's budget 121 lodges were to be completed by 2002-2003. In this year's budget we see that extended to 2004-2005. If the minister could please let us know what conditions seniors are living in because we have not provided enough lodge-living for them at this particular time and if he can see down the road where our construction of new seniors' lodges will match the increase in the seniors population each year. Again, we do have a problem there that once the bubble goes through, we don't want to be left with a glut of vacant seniors' lodges, but we certainly have to be able to plan so that all seniors can live in the dignified and respectable manner that they deserve after contributing so much to this province for so many years.

Also, will the minister provide us with some information on what is included in the capital and accommodation projects? The operating expenses for this program, 2.1.7, have actually increased. This definitely appears to be a government priority. If you could please give us some information on that.

Now, then, as well on the capital and accommodation projects, how will these projects be affected by the reduction in capital investment from last year's spending spree of $21 million, when the original budget was only $13.9 million, to this year's budget of $4 million?

The budgets for property operations, 2.1.9, and leases, 2.1.10, are both increasing. Property operations are increasing from $96 million to $115 million, and leases are going up by $2 million. The Auditor General has been fairly critical of the government and its desire to lease rather than build facilities. Will the minister please provide an update on what steps have been taken to establish and enforce the requirements for preparing business case analyses?

My final set of comments before the minister does reply. If he could please tell us what progress has been made on capital plans containing the required information. With the cuts to this year's budget it is clear that the government does not have a long-term plan. Do some of the departments have some idea as to where they would like to go with their capital investments?

So if he could provide some answers to those questions now and written answers later, it would be much appreciated. Thank you very much.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

MR. LUND: Thanks, Mr. Chairman, and thanks to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry. I apologize. There were a couple of places there where you lost me, but we'll pick it up from Hansard, and we'll give you an answer.

The hon. member started out by describing the reduction and the impact that that was going to have on workers and those types of things. I must remind the Assembly that in fact there is a very large amount of money currently in school boards, in regional health authorities, and in postsecondary institutions that will be spent this year and next year for capital projects. As a matter of fact, there will be somewhere around 1,200 projects on the go by this department during this fiscal year.

AN HON. MEMBER: How many?

MR. LUND: About 1,200. So it's not all doom and gloom, even though the budget does look very difficult and it is difficult to keep within the money that we have.

I think that when you talk about a fund, one of the main purposes of the blue-ribbon panel on fiscal management, that the Minister of Finance is setting up, one of the issues that they're going to deal with is: how do we account for, how do we handle these capital projects, and how do we make sure that we don't have these huge ups and downs? It makes it very difficult for the contractors, and it makes it difficult for us to plan with any certainty when, in fact, there can be these fluctuations in the budget. We were fortunate enough in this department to be able to allocate funds out of last year, to advance funds for projects that would be constructed this year and next year. So you will see a lot happening out there. It's not going to be all doom and gloom.

Talking about the facility audits, certainly in my opinion this has been a very, very important exercise that the department started two or three years ago. They've now pretty much completed the postsecondary. The schools, of course, have all been done, as the hon. member mentioned, and our own facilities have been audited now, so we have a very good handle on the condition of our facilities, those that we're responsible for. It's going to be a great tool for us as we move forward and allocate dollars where they are needed to keep that infrastructure whole and sound, and it's going to also allow us in the future, within the business plan, to in fact have a goal and to record exactly where our deficit is relative to the infrastructure that we're responsible for.

You asked about the decision-making and where money goes as far as schools are concerned. We work very, very closely with the school boards, and we will continue to do that. As a matter of fact, when you look at what was approved last year, we basically took the recommendations from the school boards and allocated the funds accordingly. Of course, we have to draw between the new and the modernization. Last year in the '01-02 budget there was a $50 million program of modernization along with the other capital projects. So those of course were different categories. In some cases in a school jurisdiction we may – for example, if they had 10 projects on, part of them would have been in the modernization part in the capital projects. Of course, we'd come down as far as we could on the top capital ones and then on the modernization, so it would maybe look like we weren't following exactly what the school boards had put in, but frankly we were very, very close to what they asked for.

Now, when you're dealing with priorities, it's not just the audit that dictates where there will be schools built. Utilization plays a very big role in that decision-making, and if, for example, we see that there's a school with a very high score on the audit, well, it would have a high priority as far as eligibility for a modernization and/or a capital project. You could possibly see a school that is in fair condition. Maybe there are two of them, and there's very low utilization because of all of the area that's available in that sector or in that particular community. So you may see that we would do something. Even though the condition of those schools was not that bad, the utilization was very poor.

So it's a combination. Certainly we have to, wherever there's a health and safety issue, address that issue. That's number one. If there's a health and safety issue, then that has to be addressed, so that's how we work through those allocations. As far as having the final say, as I said earlier, we work with the school boards. I guess if we ever got in a case of push comes to shove, we would have to make a decision, but I'm hoping that we don't get to those kinds of conditions.

You asked about the schools that have been deferred, and certainly you asked for the list. That's no problem. We can easily give you that list. I can assure you that as we were making those decisions, what schools were going to be deferred was a very, very difficult decision. I don't like saying no anymore than anybody else does, but the fact is that we simply do not have enough money to allow all of them to continue. When you take $445 million out of the budget after things have been approved, then it's very, very important that you look at the cash flow and make sure that you don't have a situation where you spend many millions of dollars only to have them sit for a couple of years. You're much better off to complete some projects and then pick up as soon as you can on the ones that have been deferred.

You asked where the $115 million disappeared from lotteries. When the lotteries budget is up, you'll have to ask. I don't allocate where those dollars go. We didn't get them. That's all I can tell you. We didn't get them.

The schools that are in poor condition. Yes, we can give you the audits of the schools. That's no problem. I think I got a little ahead of myself when I was talking about the utilization and the audit and how that ties in, and that was your second one.

You made some comments about not having a measure, and I'm sorry that I didn't catch just exactly what your complete questions were in that area, so we'll get that to you in writing once we see Hansard.

The seniors' lodges. Well, the 121 of them in the province have been upgraded. Now, I think you have to take a real look at what the function of lodges are, what the assisted living facilities that are coming onstream do. Of course, as you know, the Minister of Seniors is working with the federal government looking at low-cost housing. We have to look at that whole big picture. What exactly is out there? What can fit the need best? How best can we do this?

Certainly there will always be a role for the lodges. By default the lodges have had to take on loads that should be in assisted living, and you are seeing now many assisted living projects where we partner with the private sector to have those facilities built. I think you'll see the dynamics of this all changing. We don't have any plan to privatize the lodges. That's not in the cards. Certainly the management has changed to what it was a few years ago, but it seems to be working very well where you have lodges and you have some facilities that are low cost but they're publicly owned and those kinds of things that are out there.

You asked about the capital investments, and I'm not sure just exactly what you were looking for there, but certainly as we move forward, we are looking at the needs of all of the facilities. As we look at the age of our universities, for example, I think that is probably the best example of where we have a lot of old structures, and there's going to be a need for a lot of capital upgrading in those postsecondaries. Really Alberta is such an exciting place to be when you look at the universities and what they're doing, particularly the university in Calgary and the one in Edmonton here with all of this new research that's coming onstream. It's just fascinating. Now, that comes with a cost, of course, where you need the facilities. We need the facilities for that research, but they're also busting at the seams with students. So we've got a huge challenge coming up in that whole area.

With those, Mr. Chairman, I'll let somebody else take over.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'll follow up the comments of the minister and my colleague from Edmonton-Glengarry with a series of reactions and questions of my own on the budget of Infrastructure. I was listening to the minister in his opening comments, and I think he shares the concern, he's certainly aware of the concern that we have and many Albertans have about the wild swings in funding up and down for this department. I'll get to the numbers in a little while, but they're truly dramatic. I mean, budget plans up into the billions of dollars and then reduced by 80 percent or something in some cases in one year and then cranking up again. It very much looks like and I would say is a kind of yo-yo effect for funding.

There are, as the minister undoubtedly knows too well, many drawbacks to that. There are inefficiencies, for example, when plans begin to be made and then they're put on hold and then they're cranked up again and they're put on hold, when contractors build up their capital equipment base, have their workforce going full steam and are anticipating in one or two or three years a continuing supply of work, whether that's road-building work or construction work or whatever, and then suddenly they're caught having to lay off staff or idle equipment that they've purchased. I'm sure the minister has heard a great deal from the road builders, for example, and other construction industry members. That's a profoundly serious problem I have with the way that this department is being managed and the direction it's being given and the funding it's being given by the government. So that's fundamental to all the other questions that I have here.

I also noted that in the minister's opening comments he referred to current economic conditions and said something like: in light of the current economic outlook we had to cut our funding. My sense of the current economic outlook is that it's quite rosy. Certainly there were questions in the fall. I fully concede that after the attack at the World Trade Center there were questions over what was going to happen to the economy, but things have rebounded well. There was never really a significant slowdown or hardly a measurable slowdown in Alberta's economy.

I am concerned that what we're looking at in this budget is a huge overreaction. There was time between September 11 and today for us to take a deep breath, pause, collect our thoughts, and then proceed. What I'm seeing instead in this budget is an overreaction and no response to the fact that the economy is rolling along full blast in Alberta. So I'm not convinced that the current economic outlook justifies the steps we are seeing taken in this budget. Maybe the minister has in his hands or his briefcase an economic outlook that is gloomy, and if he does, I'd like to hear about it. Otherwise, I'll express my real concern that we're seeing here an overreaction to the concerns of last fall.

Of course, one way to avoid that kind of overreaction would be to have a proper stability fund in place, which we in the opposition have been advocating for many years. The logic of it is very, very simple. In an economy where there are huge swings, booms and busts, during the boom years you take some of the extra money, you put it in the bank, and during the bust years you draw it out. Through that sort of process you're able to stabilize your funding over the long term, and you can actually, for example, counter the effects of slowdowns when they occur. You can carry on with your construction work, for example, in this ministry, and you're not laying off construction workers in the middle of a slowdown. You're holding onto them. A stability fund for Infrastructure is a policy that we've been advocating for years. I commend it again to the minister here, and I hope he commends it to his cabinet colleagues. In doing so, I hope he gives us full credit for the idea, but we'll share it with him even if he doesn't.

I also want to reflect on the question of the very nature of debt and deficit. There are many ways to measure debt and deficit. One very simple way is just what money you have in the bank and what money you have in your wallet. Or in the case of the provincial government, what money do they have in their various accounts and do they expect to get? I think that's the simplest and, in some ways, most shallow way to measure debt and deficit, and I think we have fallen into that trap in Alberta. We measure our debt and deficit strictly by how much money is in the bank and how much money we owe, period. We do not account for the fact that we can also have an Infrastructure debt or an Infrastructure deficit.

I need to tell you an example from my constituency that I think I even referred to maybe last week in a debate on estimates. In a school in my constituency that I toured shortly after I was elected and have revisited two or three times, while walking around this school, I approached one of the emergency doors, an emergency exit – this is in an elementary school – and looked at the door frame. One of the teachers pointed it out to me, and the door frame was in such poor condition that I could literally pick the wood apart, splinter the wood with my fingers. It was rotten; there was no other way around it. This was an emergency exit to an elementary school, and the doorframe was so far gone it was rotten. That's just a tiny, tiny illustration of a larger infrastructure deficit. We all encounter that when we drive down the roads and we hit the potholes. We can see that on our campuses, in our universities, as the minister mentioned, in many other public facilities.

Now, I do notice – I'm going to lose track of my documents here – that in one of the department's documents there is a rating, for example, of the condition of different facilities: good, fair, and poor. The number of facilities listed in poor condition is under 10 percent, which is, I guess, fine. Actually, now I've found it. It's in the business plan, and it covers two or three pages, pages 242 and 243 especially. You know, I would be curious to see some examples of fair and of poor. I'm not sure that this school would be in poor condition or would be in fair condition. I certainly hope that it wouldn't be in good condition, but to my eyes at that moment it was in poor condition. So I would say to the minister and encourage him to take to his colleagues that there's more than one way to look at that. We need to look at the bigger picture. There's no point in having our debt paid off in 2005 if we are seeing our public buildings and our hospitals and our schools and our roads deteriorating. I won't go on about that, although I do feel strongly about it.

When I see the drops in funding for infrastructure as dramatic as they are, for example, in the budget – and the minister quite openly alludes to this, and it's here in black and white. Looking at health care facilities, the comparable budget for last year was $750 million for operating expenses in program 2, line 2.1.1, and this year, if I'm reading this correctly, the comparable figure is $9.2 million. Then if we include the portion funded by lotteries, it goes up to $59 million, but the budgeted amount for last year would have been $870 million. So we're going from a budgeted amount last year of $870 million to a budgeted amount this year of $59 million. That's a dramatic, dramatic, dramatic shift. In fact, last year because of midyear adjustments there was a real reduction in plans, and what we're actually likely to see, what's forecast to be spent is about $440 million instead of the $870 million, so nearly a drop in half.

Now, I watched with great interest the series of announcements that were made, you know, in the period of 12 to 24 months ago about hospital expansions and road expansions and public buildings getting the kind of funding they deserve, school development, and so on, and I applauded that. I am a fan of good public facilities. I support those. When I see such a dramatic cut, I worry that needed facilities are not being built and that facilities that have been constructed and are declining are not being properly maintained. That raises a very serious question to me. If those facilities are not there, needed facilities, needed hospitals, needed schools – my colleague from Calgary-Shaw, for example, lives in a sprawling constituency, and I think we're all aware that it's the most populous constituency in the province. Are we providing adequate schools there? I'm fortunate to represent a constituency that is filled with neighbourhoods built in the '50s and '60s. Do you know what? There are good schools. Every neighbourhood has at least one school, and many of them have two. I think it's quite unfair to newer neighbourhoods in this province that were built at a time of wonderful prosperity that they may not have any schools.

AN HON. MEMBER: Or even a hospital.

DR. TAFT: And certainly not a hospital. Sorry. I'll stop there.

So you see my point, and I'm sure you understand it. I'm sure you can feel the logic of that point. So it's very, very serious. I think Albertans are going without proper public services because the facilities are not there, and the corrective measures that were in last year's budget have been eliminated in this year's budget.

Do I have 15 minutes or 20 minutes?

MR. BONNER: Twenty, I believe.

DR. TAFT: Okay.

Now, there is a logical progression to my comments, which may surprise some of you here, but I'm working on it.

AN HON. MEMBER: Building up to it.

DR. TAFT: Building up to it.

So we have needed facilities. They're not getting the funds. The departments are put under the squeeze. So what do the departments do? They look for other ways to solve their problems, and they look to one particular way, public/private partnerships. Public/private partnerships can take lots of forms. We can have them for capital; we can have them in some form or another for operating programs.

MR. BONNER: IGA high.

DR. TAFT: We can have IGA high, as one of my colleagues has pointed out here.

There are many, many lessons to be learned from private/public partnerships, and if you're not already familiar with it, I will direct you to one set of lessons which were written by none other than our Auditor General in his annual report of 2000-2001, his comments, very good comments, I would say, on the Department of Infrastructure, several pages of comments leading to a number of recommendations. I will not read all these pages.

MR. LUND: I've read them.

DR. TAFT: You've read them. Okay. The minister tells me that he's read them, and I applaud him for that.

I do think that in the spirit of debate and learning from our experience and from our Auditor General, it's worth reflecting on some of these comments. One of the themes of his comments is that we can get drawn into deals through public/private partnerships that in the long run cost taxpayers of Alberta more than if we had built to own. Certainly this isn't limited to strictly public/private partnerships of the kind we're looking at here. There are many questions raised on leasing a vehicle for an individual. Is an individual better off leasing a vehicle or buying a vehicle? Many of the same principles apply to that discussion, and increasingly the benefits of leasing a vehicle are being brought into question. In the same way, there's excellent, excellent work done in many countries around the world on public/private partnerships. Do they really pay off or not? There's a tremendous amount of evidence that often they do not.

One of the ways for us to decide whether they're even worth a serious look is to ensure that the public sector has strong baseline data for expenditures if a given initiative were undertaken on a build-and-own basis. The Auditor General reflects on this at some length and recommends carefully that we look at that. I'm looking here through the Auditor General's comments. I'll read, for example, from the Auditor General's report, page 156:

The Ministry [of Infrastructure] advised us that it entered into [particular] arrangements to do essential work or make necessary purchases but it had limited budgeted amounts available for capital funding. For example, the Ministry entered into a lease agreement for a warehouse. The landlord built the facility on land owned by the Ministry that was leased to the landlord for the period of the lease of the warehouse. At the end of the lease the Ministry must purchase the facility for the purchase price as defined in the agreement.

Very much like leasing a vehicle and then being forced to buy the vehicle at the end of the lease. Those were my comments, not the Auditor General's.

Going back to the Auditor General, he continues: "The Ministry's analysis for this project indicated that the build/own option was more financially favourable. But because of budget constraints it chose the lease option." I am concerned that the budget constraints that we're seeing in the proposed budget this year put constraints on the public sector that will drive us into unfavourable arrangements that will cost us all more in the long run, and I would strongly encourage the minister to develop baseline information so that we know very, very soundly, as the Auditor General recommends, exactly what the full life cycle costs of a project will be if we build and own as opposed to leasing. That is a bare minimum requirement before we should get into any public/private partnerships.

My time is running out, Mr. Chairman, and I just got warmed up, but thank you very much.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

MR. LUND: Thanks, Mr. Chairman. Thanks to the Member for Edmonton-Riverview. He made a number of comments about the ups and downs of the budget, and I must once again remind the member that, yeah, I agree. I think it would be better if there were some way that we could stabilize it, but it isn't quite as bad as it appears because of the money that we were able to advance last year. As a matter of fact, I met with the Alberta Construction Association. We mustn't confuse this department with Transportation. The impact on Transportation is more severe. You mentioned things like buying a lot of equipment. Well, the type of contractors that are associated with this department don't have the same need for that very expensive heavy equipment, but it's true that they have the need for engineers, architects, and professional people, and of course, as you indicated, they ramp up because of all the work and then have to lay off. Fortunately in Alberta, like the housing industry, the commercial buildings that are going up, our budget reductions are not having quite the same impact as in Transportation.

Certainly, as I indicated to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry, one of the prime things that the blue-ribbon panel is going to have to look at is this whole issue about: is there a different way? For example, I still find it strange that we can't amortize capital. When you're buying your house, do you wait till you have all the money, or do you spread it over time? When you look at businesses, very rarely do they pay for the structure up front. It's amortized over time. So those are the kinds of things that have to be looked at. I'm not totally convinced of just having a fund. I think there are maybe some other things that we need to look at. It may very well be that a fund is one of the tools that we can use to spread this out.

You mentioned my comment that we had to make big cuts because of the slowdown in the economy. Let me point out to the hon. member that nobody, absolutely nobody thought that the price of gas would go from around $11, $12 a gigajoule down to under $2 a gigajoule in the space of about six months. Nobody thought that that was going to happen. Then on top of that, not only did the price go to the basement, but exports dropped 35 percent. So you had a huge loss. People tend to target oil. Oil is not the real big one. Gas is the big one. When you look at the fact that every 10 cents spread over a year is worth about $160 million and you go from $11 to $12 down to under $2, you've got a problem. Like, that's a huge drop. So that is really where we had to find a way of reducing our expenditures.

You have to also remember that when this budget was being put together, it was two and a half months ago. Yes, the economy is picking up, and that's great to see. Hopefully we'll be able to see our way in next year's budget to maybe increase from what we've currently got in the business plan, but there are a lot of things that can happen between now and then.

You're absolutely right about the Infrastructure deficit. I have been talking about this for over a year. It's something that we have to look at. Now, after the auditing of all of the buildings, we will be able to include that in our financial accounting. That's going to be a very, very important tool for us to be able to identify. What we are going to do is take the replacement cost of a structure and take 1.5 percent, because that's what the industry tells us is about what you should be spending on an annual basis to preserve whatever structure you have. Now, some are going to be a little more; some are going to be a little less. But that'll be sort of a benchmark that will provide a very good guide for us as to what we need to spend in order to preserve.

You mentioned the school with the rotten door casing. Well, we have a program called the BQRP, the building quality restoration program. It's a $50 million program that we give to school boards. It's based on the area they have, the pupils they have, and it's on a formula basis. We don't direct where it is to be used, only that it's intended to fix the very things that you mentioned. Now, if you want to get the audited score on your school, we can certainly provide you with that to show what the overall condition of the structure is.

When we started on the century schools program at $1.1 billion and we had the audited scores, the higher the score, the poorer the condition of the building. We were trying to get down to a 900 score under that program. Poor starts at about 800, so we've still got some poor schools out there that aren't going to receive funding immediately. Out of that $1.1 billion we managed to do close to 500 projects, so we did cover off a fairly handsome number. If you look in our measures, you'll see that in fact schools in good condition went up and schools in poor condition went down, and we hope to accelerate that trend in the future.

The lack of funding for health facilities. Once again I have to remind you that in fact you will see a lot of construction this year. There is a lot of money out there that we were able to advance to the regional health authorities for capital projects that will be into the ground this spring and seeing completion a little later. It's true that we won't be able to cover all the projects. A number of health projects are on the deferral list, so they won't be able to get immediate funding.

A comment about the high school in south Calgary. Yes, we regret that we had to put that one on the deferral list, but we also know that deferral doesn't mean cancel. It will happen, just how soon we can't say, but hopefully it has a very high priority. You also must remember that high school students are more mobile. Certainly more than one of you is in the education system, and you recognize that distance is not really what high school students are that worried about. What they're worried about is the program that they have when they get to the school, and you'll see all around the cities how they move from one school to another. I think that will be accelerated as you look at school-based budgeting. I know that here in the city of Edmonton, where my brother happened to be a principal for a number of years, with school-based budgeting what developed was that schools picked out a certain niche, if you will. Some were academic, some excelled in sports, and students came from around the city to that particular school because of the program that it offered, not because of the distance. There is a great need. I'm not trying to mislead that. There is a great need, and we certainly will be looking at that one in Calgary-Shaw.

Your comments about the P3. Yes. We applaud the comments that the Auditor General made; they're bang on. We have to develop the criteria that we can measure a proposal by, and we have to look at the whole life cycle of the building. We had the school symposium back in December and got a lot of good input. New Brunswick went through – well, they actually had a crash with P3 projects. They weren't prepared. They went into a whole host of them. So we were able to learn quite a bit from their experience and hopefully will be able to come up with a program that is good for the Alberta taxpayer.

I firmly believe that there are some real examples that could work. For example, in a new subdivision if a developer were to build the school, build a community hall that will serve as the gym at the school – this would be a K to 3 school – and design it so that in 25 years, when the demographics of the area change and you no longer need a K to 3 school, you could convert it into something else like a seniors' lodge. There are a number of other ideas that have been kicked around and came out of the symposium. For example, where you have a K to 3 or K to 4 school and on the same facility you do have a seniors' lodge, it's amazing how you get the interaction between young people and seniors: they complement one another. So I think there's great potential for some of these innovative ways of doing things that we have to look at and we are looking at as we move forward to figure out a different way to do business.

THE CHAIR: The hon. leader of the third party.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. We've now been examining the estimates for about 70 minutes, more or less. Several important questions have been raised and addressed and answered back and forth, so I will try not to repeat many of those pertinent questions, and I could certainly see the minister's attempt to address them. I would like to make some general observations first, Minister, and you made those at the beginning of your address. You certainly acknowledged the very deep nature of cuts in the Infrastructure programs.

I'm looking at some of the key areas here where the Infrastructure costs to the government were quite heavy. The cuts need to be, I think, recorded in terms of percentage. I notice that the health care facilities cuts will amount to about 93.2 percent. The scale of cuts or the magnitude of cuts for postsecondary facilities is the same again, around 93 percent: very, very deep. Out of every $100 that was budgeted last year, $93 have been removed. Only $7 remains to be used for maintenance and for capital projects development. In terms of school facilities again the cut is over 91 percent, 91.7, so close to 92 percent.

Using these three areas to ask some questions, Mr. Chairman, I would like to go from there to the business plans book. I'm looking here at goals 2 and 3, pages 242 and 243. A measure that is used to assess the physical condition of the facility in the case of health facilities is the condition facility index. There is a bit of information on how this index is in fact developed. It says that the "facility is in good condition if the facility condition index rating is less than 5 percent." I suppose this means that if the infrastructural assessed costs are less than 5 percent of the total value of the asset, then it's in good condition. [interjection] It's page 242. I'm just trying to get an idea about the FCI index, I think it's called, in the business plan volume.

The table on page 242 under Goal #2 Measures lists the percentage of the facilities that are rated in good condition, the percentage in fair condition, and the percentage in poor condition. The index that is used is in a sense a ratio, I think, of the cost to correct existing deficiencies to the current facility replacement value. Right; that's what it is, yeah. The projections in the table are that the percentage of health facilities rated in good condition is expected to go up year after year after year from 55 to 57 percent, then 60 percent, and 64 percent year after year for the health care facilities.

Now, when I look at that in light of the cuts that I just mentioned, I see a discrepancy between the projections in terms of the numbers that you indicate here that will show that a facility is in good condition. There's a percentage that's going to go up, while the resources needed to upgrade or maintain are being cut back dramatically, as I said, by 93 percent in this current fiscal year. I'd like you to, Minister, perhaps comment on that discrepancy. How do you expect the percentage of health facilities rated in good condition to go up by 2 percent when in fact the cuts that you are proposing will be very deep, to the magnitude of 93 percent?

We move on to the next page, page 243 in the business plan, under Physical Condition of Post-Secondary Facilities. The table there in fact is indicating a decline in the percentage of facilities in good condition from the year 2001 to the year 2005, 47 percent in the year that's gone by. You're suggesting that the percentage will remain the same in this year, and then for the following two years it will slide down to 45 percent. Correspondingly, the percentage of facilities rated in poor condition is of course indicated as moving up, and that makes sense.

One suggestion there. I was looking at the goal 2. I think there is helpful information there at least with respect to the numbers that I used to get the FCI, the index. I wonder if the index used for determining the physical condition of postsecondary facilities is exactly the same. If that is the case, then perhaps it is good to repeat that information in that second one, too, under the Physical Condition of Post-Secondary Facilities, because that facilitates understanding and also shows that the department uses some sort of consistent measure for measuring the physical condition of Infrastructure facilities, be they hospitals or be they university buildings or college buildings. That is just a suggestion that maybe next year one can have that information consistently supplied at the beginning in a footnote saying that this is the index that will be used across these areas.

Going to the numbers in terms of the facilities in good, fair, and poor condition, again I would like you to comment on this in light of the fact that for the postsecondary facilities the cuts will be close to 94 percent, I guess, that you're proposing overall in your budget this year. I don't see how this mix can be maintained given the depth of cuts. Those are two questions related to the two pages I referred to.

Like my colleague from Edmonton-Riverview I had a look at the Auditor General's report for last year, the year 2000-2001. According to the Auditor General's report for last year the total Infrastructure assets that the department either directly owns or helps in maintaining is close to $42 billion. Is that correct? Does that make sense? Now, if that is the case, if the replacement value of Infrastructure assets exceeds $42 billion according to the Auditor

General, I wonder if you'd like to at least speculate, if you don't have exact numbers, with respect to the deferred maintenance costs given the deep cuts in the three areas of health care, postsecondary education, and school facilities that I referred to. These are the three areas which do sustain the highest level of cuts. Given that, what are the implications in terms of the deferment of maintenance costs given that hospitals, universities, schools, and such other facilities form perhaps the major chunk of the over $42 billion in assets?

I think this budget is good from the point of view of the Treasury Board's targets. You're trying to meet, of course, the targeted cuts as determined by the Treasury Board. But from the point of view of taxpayers, ordinary Albertans and even people like me, the MLAs, it's important also to weigh the savings that we make by cutting the budget, by making deep cuts in the budget which are temporary savings, with what the liabilities are that we as Albertans earn down the road from year to year as a result of the temporary savings that are attempted, seriously attempted and honestly attempted, in this year's budget.

I was looking at the Auditor General's report again, and he goes out of his way to talk about these savings as temporary savings. As a matter of fact, on page 157 the Auditor General uses a hypothetical example to draw attention to the fact that these savings are not only temporary, but later on these savings will come back to haunt us. In fact, these temporary savings could result in far more increased costs for us to bring the buildings or the facilities back to a level at which they're in good condition or fair condition and are safe for use both physically and in terms of health.

With these few questions I'll sit down, and hopefully you will comment on some of the questions I've raised.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

MR. LUND: Thanks, Mr. Chairman, and thanks to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona for his comments. You commented on how could it be, in light of the budget, that the percentage of health care facilities in good condition goes up and poor goes down when in fact the budget doesn't have the money to make that happen. Once again I must go back and remind the hon. member about the fact that there is a lot of money in the health authorities currently that will be spent next year and the year after and will address a lot of the poor conditions that we find in these facilities. Will we be able to meet the target? I'm not sure. It's an ambitious goal and one that we want to achieve, but of course it'll depend on the availability of funds probably in '03-04, '04-05 whether in fact we can meet these targets. But I can assure you that in '02-03 there is a substantial amount of money that will be spent. Of course, some of that will be for new, but there is some of it, quite a lot of it, that is going to be for upgrading and improving.

With postsecondary of course the opposite is shown in the business plan, and it's truly reflected by the budget. One of the difficulties we've got in the postsecondary, though, is that we are not starting from as good a position. The postsecondary institutions, particularly when you look at the University of Alberta, have a very large portion of their buildings that are getting very old. In the health field we are starting from a little better position and will be able to move up. In the postsecondary the large structures tend to be older and tend to take more money, so the budget simply does not have the resources to build the new that we're being asked to do because of all of the great things that are happening in research and medical research and you name it. There's so much going on and they're needing more classroom space, so there has to be quite a bit of addition as well as improvement of the existing buildings.

The FCI that you were referring to. I refer you to page 243, and I think it kind of gives the explanation of what this really is. "The index is a ratio that compares the total cost of deficiencies to the replacement value of the facility." So it's a pretty accurate measure of what we have, and as we've done these audits and got a good handle on what we've got out there, this will become very meaningful.

The $42 billion that the Auditor General refers to. You've got to remember that's when it was transportation and infrastructure. The total in this department is somewhere around $23 billion. We'll get you the number. We don't have it completely yet because we're not completed with the postsecondaries, but it's right in that neighbourhood, about $23 billion. So the $42 billion included the highways.

Now, you comment about when you don't do the preservation, the graph would start going up. That's true. It's not as severe in the types of structures that are in Infrastructure as in Transportation. Transportation really takes off on you. Not to say that we don't need to really look after our infrastructure as well, but it doesn't deteriorate as rapidly. The cost to repair it doesn't accelerate by the same ratio that it does in Transportation. But we're aware of it, and like I said earlier, we are going to be using a number of about 1.5 percent of the replacement value as a guide for preservation as we move forward in the future.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw is the next on the list.

MRS. ADY: Thank you. I've really enjoyed tonight's debate as we've listened to the minister describe his department and the different members that have stood to debate Infrastructure.

For those of you that don't know, I used to be a general contractor for about 10 years, so in the spring whenever I smell sawdust, I always feel like building something. My nose comes up and I'm ready to build. It's always hard when you look at infrastructure projects and you don't have the money to build them yet you have the scent in your nose, so I do feel a little that way this year.

I was looking at the minister's budget for 2001-2002, and we saw the $3.1 billion rapidly reduced by $2.2 billion in one year. That's quite a descent, and we know that falling energy prices and the global economic slowdown were part of the reason that that happened, so we have to adjust to realities. That's just the simple truth of the matter. As I looked further through the budget for 2002-2003, we have about $847 million to operate schools. Well, you've got to have lights on, you've got to have heat, and you have to be able to take care of those buildings. I don't think it's a spoiled thing to expect the lights to be on in a building, so those things have to go forward. We have somewhere over $200 million going into day-to-day government operations, also necessary, and then about $180 million for capital projects. Is that about right?

AN HON. MEMBER: It's $185 million.

MRS. ADY: There's $185 million for capital projects, so we see that those have descended quite a bit. One of the questions that I wanted to ask our Infrastructure minister is: that's still quite a bit of money that we're putting into capital projects, but can you tell me what we put in the year before? Did it go up from the year before? I mean, we had quite a jump in capital projects that we actually were allowing for this year, and some got deferred, but what happened in the year previous to that? How much money was spent on capital projects in that year?

Now, I know none of you have ever heard of this before, but I have over 82,000 constituents in my constituency. That's new information, but . . .

AN HON. MEMBER: How many?

MRS. ADY: I have over 82,000 constituents in my constituency, and I've often thought, you know, as you look at the high-growth areas of this province, mine being one, that there are others in the province: Fort McMurray, Edmonton, Calgary. I mean, lots of people – even Whitecourt-St. Anne is raising his hand. We have to wonder at that, but we do have growth in this province, and it would be very interesting if we could stop everyone at the border and say: you can't come across the border unless you bring a school, a hospital, and a doctor with you. That's not realistic, that's not going to happen, but it would be a simple solution.

As we look at these areas that grow rapidly – and that's just, I think, a reaffirmation of how wonderful the province is doing and how much people want to live in this province. In fact, when I was door-knocking in the last campaign, every other door was a new Albertan in my constituency, so it speaks well for what the province is doing and how much people want to live here.

But we still have this problem of infrastructure. We know there are some 1,200 projects that have begun, and I think that represents hope in this province. Those are a lot of projects. And as I look at that, I also have to look, though, at the $445 million on deferral and wonder what those projects are. We do know that construction cycles go up and down and that it causes problems. I've heard a stabilization fund mentioned, and I know the problems it causes beyond just construction. What happens when we all of a sudden have money and can build infrastructure projects is often that school boards or hospitals suddenly get so much money so quickly that they can hardly get it built fast enough. The price of whatever you're building jumps considerably because the demand is so high for people to build, so it actually ends up costing our province more money. So I'd ask the minister if he could comment on that and whether there's a way that we could smooth those kinds of things out so that we were actually getting the best bang for our buck when it comes to when we do build.

When I look at Infrastructure and I look at the fact that you can't afford to build everything when you want and how you want, I look at the city of Calgary, because that's the one that I know best. When we look at the new communities in the outer doughnut area of Calgary, we know it's taking about 15 years before an elementary school comes into those communities. I'm even reminded of a group that I worked with in northern Calgary. When they finally got their first elementary, they were 15 years old. They talked about how everybody always talks about how the school is the heart of the community and how they'd been sending their heart down the road for many years, and they were so happy to have it coming home. It might kind of sound a little schmucky, but I do think it represents how communities feel about schools. So if in fact it's taking about 15 years, I'm very encouraged to hear the minister talk about innovative ways to manage this differently in the future.

I know that he had a symposium, and there were lots of good ideas that were brought up at that symposium, and I also have had opportunity to work in this area a fair bit. We've seen property disposal opportunities in Calgary that have never been looked at before, a way of reusing properties. He mentioned turning schools into senior care bed facilities. I mean, those are all, I think, very good options on how to manage school property in the future.

The P3. I think of the hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert. He comes from a lot of places. He, like me, has had opportunities where developers have approached and said: "Let us build the schools. We can do it cheaper than you," because they were in construction. "We think we can do it cheaper than you could do it," and "You know, we'd take it on for 25 years, lease it back," whatever. They're really open to however we want to look at this problem. So I'm very encouraged when I hear that we are looking at those options. I think they're good options, and we should be looking at them.

We also know that communities change and that often after 25 years they don't have the demand they used to have. I've heard so many communities in Calgary say: "But we're growing again. We've got kids moving back into our neighbourhoods. You don't need to close our schools." The reality is that I have not seen an example in the city of Calgary that doesn't dip after a certain amount of time and then never really recover that population again. So can we get innovative and start to just build K to 3s that can downsize to communities? All of those things are good approaches to the use of Infrastructure dollars in the future.

The last item I'd like to touch on is the priority list. I do think it's a good idea for individual school boards to come up with priority lists. They live closer to the situation. They know the communities that they live in, and one of the things that I think became a problem this year as we saw the rapid reduction was that there were priority lists there. In fact, I'll just go ahead and say it. The south Calgary high school was number 1 on the priority list. The demand was great and is great for that school, but because it took longer to plan a high school, it wasn't in the ground yet, so when it came time for deferral, you had to start where money still was and projects hadn't begun. So in some ways it kind of changed the deferral list a little bit, and I know that was upsetting to my constituency.

We also talk a little bit about distance in the city. There's no question that in the city of Calgary there is still room in high schools, but those high schools are located far from where I live. I know that my rural colleagues are going to say that's not far, but as I once explained to the hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul, there is road distance and then there is traffic distance, and you have to measure both in time. I have constituents from the deep south right now that have to get a bus, a train, and a bus to get to their high schools, so it's taking them sometimes up to an hour and a half to travel, as the crow flies, not very far, but through traffic distance that becomes great. So I don't know that you can always view it by saying, "Well, within the city there is space," but it's located a long ways from you trafficwise.

AN HON. MEMBER: Is that one way?

MRS. ADY: That is one way.

So I was happy to hear the minister talk about that, although he did mention that students traveled, but in the city of Calgary we're still very much bound to a boundary, so people don't have necessarily that option. Sometimes they can approach programs, but the majority of our students stay within the boundary that they're given at this point in time.

I also was very impressed with the facility audit that was done by Infrastructure. I think it really gave us a good look at where the buildings were and what condition they were in. Often I might say to you: well, Calgary's buildings are in worse condition than Edmonton's. The facility audit gave us a nice level look across the province at those facilities that needed immediate attention. I know that roads deteriorate really rapidly, but in my house if the tile cracks in my bathroom and I ignore that, then I know I'm going to have a major construction problem. So I think it's good that we are able to kind of get a handle on this infrastructure deficit when it comes to those buildings that do need repair. I've been really happy to see the facility audit, and I want to commend the department for that.

I do think that there is such a thing as an infrastructure deficit, and I hope that as the economy continues to improve – and I hope that it continues to improve – we'll be able to reprioritize this very important area of the province and that we'll be able to see those moneys go back into those hospitals, schools, senior care facilities, and those things that we need as we continue to grow and thrive as a province.

Thank you very much.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. It's a pleasure to participate again this year in budget estimates with the hon. minister, this time of Infrastructure. I was listening to the remarks from the hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw in reflecting across the House to the hon. minister, and certainly he looked like a minister without a fiscal stability fund. It's a Liberal idea, but I would encourage all members across the way to take this policy and run with it, because we're going to have a better province as a result of this.

I'm not going to spend too much time discussing the stability fund. It was discussed earlier, and the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview also suggested that it become government policy. One only has to look at Alaska, which is in a similar situation to what this province itself faces. The hon. minister was very accurate when he reminded all members of this Assembly just how important natural gas and natural gas royalties are for the fiscal well-being not only of the government but of its citizens and the fact that conventional oil here is declining. The production of conventional oil is declining significantly, but in Alaska it's the reverse. There is still a large amount of conventional or crude oil produced in Prudhoe Bay, and naturally it's shipped south to California and the Pacific northwest states. However, the Alaskans take money and set it aside in a stability fund, and it helps them out. It helps them out whenever the price of oil goes very high or goes very low. I think that we could avoid a lot of the stop/start measures that we've seen here in this province.

Now, the government's fiscal plan on page 23, Spending on Infrastructure. Certainly from last year to now there is a significant reduction but also for next year and the year after as well. In 2004-2005 there's going to be roughly one-third of what was spent last year, Mr. Chairman, a little better than one-third but a significant reduction. I for one am going through this. We've got the transportation network, health care facilities and equipment, schools, postsecondary institutions, water and water management, infrastructure Canada/Alberta, the Supernet, and others.

Now, what's going to happen leading up to the next election? Are we going to be in the same position as we are on page 22, where we're talking about interprovincial comparison of capital expenditures, and we see this dramatic jump leading up to the election, and then we see this dramatic decline. I don't know how this would work, where we have leading up to 2004-2005 this significant reduction whenever you compare it to the four years before. I certainly hope we're not going to suddenly as the election approaches again get in that cycle, gear it up to the point where there may be one paving machine colliding with another. That, in my view, is certainly not sound government policy.

I'm not going to go through the list in the amount of time that I have, but certainly there are some noteworthy projects that I'm sure the minister would love to see come forward. I think that the best chance of them coming forward, these projects as noted, is if we had the stability fund, Mr. Chairman.

With that, I have to talk a little bit about some of the seniors' lodges at this time. Now, on page 244 of the Infrastructure business plan the hon. minister spoke earlier about the number of seniors' lodges upgraded, and I believe he said that there were 105.

MR. LUND: I said 122.

MR. MacDONALD: One hundred and twenty-two. Pardon me.

For 2004-2005 the target is also 121. This year there are 115. We look over on the next page, and we see expenses for core businesses, and this is Infrastructure support, as I understand it, for health care, learning, and community service facilities and seniors' lodges. This is expenses of core businesses. However, Mr. Chairman, if we look on the following page, on page 247, in the ministry statement of operations we see seniors' lodges. For instance, last year it indicates here that there was $17 million spent and $12 million this year. Is that for the upgrade of the lodges that is mentioned on page 244?

Now, we're going to step forward a couple of more years, and we see $6.6 million, and then we see for the year 2004-2005 the sum of $5 million. The minister may be trying to accomplish a lot on that $5 million, perhaps too much. I would have to ask: how many lodges? If I am correct, is the hon. minister going to be able to fulfill his target on the previous page with that amount of money?

We all hear this argument, Mr. Chairman, that we have an aging population, that we have a population crisis in this province, that we have an aging population which is driving up the health care costs, and we know this simply not to be true. It's not true. No. We have one of the youngest populations, if not the youngest population, in the entire Confederation. Roughly 10 percent of the population of this province is over 65. It's certainly going to go up. In 12 years I believe it is going to be between 14 and 16 percent of the total population. So it would be my view that the upgrade of the lodges and lodge programs should be going in this direction and not, as they say, going south. Now, perhaps the hon. minister can clarify that for me.

Also here in the line item on energy rebates there was a lot of money spent on energy rebates. Of course, for this year we're drawing a blank. The minister referred to the high cost of natural gas last year. May I ask, please: how much, if any, of this money from last year remains unspent? Is there any of this amount of $208 million here that is unspent?

Now, further on on the same page – and I'm going to get to this in detail – the Swan Hills waste treatment plant. We're going to be spending $2 million annually, it looks like, for the next couple of years on capital investment. What precisely is that capital investment, Mr. Chairman?

I also have some more questions on Swan Hills. Certainly in the 2000-2001 annual report the government in this case assumed responsibility for the management and potential transition to the private sector of the Swan Hills waste treatment centre, as it's called.

Program 2. This waste treatment plant must be a favourite of the department, Mr. Chairman, because this year Albertans are getting to waste, in my view, another $26 million on this plant. It is my view and it has been certainly expressed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie that this plant be shut down and that we look at alternatives. There have to be some cheaper alternatives to this.

Now, last May the ministry put out a request, as I understand it, for qualification of submissions on this plant. It was said that a decision would be made by the end of the year. The decision that was made was to hang on to it for another year. If this is such a great facility, why is the private sector not showing more of an interest in this, and why are they not coming after it lock, stock, and burning barrel? It has been described as perhaps the most expensive burning barrel on the North American continent. The private sector is coming after our hospitals; they can't wait to make more money there. But for some reason nobody wants this plant. Could it be because the technology is old and outdated? Could it be because companies can treat waste where it is to be generated with portable technology? Certainly a contributing factor is this government's decision to let the oil and gas companies keep burying or injecting in deep wells their waste rather than having to treat it.

I think this has gone on long enough, Mr. Chairman. It is time for the government to shut down this plant in an orderly fashion and move on. There are other ways to treat waste, and there are better ways to treat waste. The government refuses to open the books on this deal because they know that Albertans would be completely frustrated with the continuous waste of taxpayers' dollars.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while we've had extensive conversations about this plant in recent days, particularly during question period, I would like still at this time to get some facts on the record. Bover documents show that for 1999 and 2000, 64 percent of the revenue from treating toxic waste came from treating waste imported from other jurisdictions. This plant is losing money, so Alberta taxpayers – you and I, everyone – are subsidizing this facility. The hon. minister made comments in the Assembly that this waste needs to be treated or it could affect our environment. Toxic waste knows no boundaries, and the hon. minister is correct, but there is no reason for Alberta taxpayers to subsidize waste treatment while the government raises our health care taxes, cuts community programs, increases court user fees, takes money from municipal property taxes, delays transportation projects, and cancels infrastructure projects, which was discussed here earlier, including the remarks, I would remind all hon. members, from the Member for Calgary-Shaw.

The government's refusal to table the documents on this plant leads us to conclude that there's something toxic here. I don't know what it is; I have no idea. But in the end it doesn't matter what is said or done. We need to come clean to all taxpayers regarding this issue.

At this time, Mr. Chairman, I have no other questions but this one, and it is from page 289 of the government and lottery fund estimates, on the centennial projects. We're looking here at spending $5 million. What projects are we going to be spending this money on at this time?

With those questions, Mr. Chairman, I will conclude my remarks and wait with great anticipation for the answers from the hon. minister. Thank you.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

MR. MASKELL: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm going to speak tonight about a matter that concerns me very much. About nine or 10 months ago I was known as plus 63 by many members in this Assembly. Today I'm known as minus 62. What I'm speaking of is the deferment of Victoria School of Performing and Visual Arts.

I was given the challenging assignment in 1985, from a teacher you're going to get a bit of a history lesson this evening, of revitalizing Edmonton's oldest high school. It's been on that site for more than 90 years. As Edmonton grew and expanded and the suburbs sprawled, the school continued to empty. It was a school that was started in 1948. The old, original brick building was torn down, and the 1948 structure held about 1,500 students. You know, in the '60s, as populations continued to increase and so on, here in Alberta and across the United States and Canada school boards got that Texas mentality that big is better. These schools continued to spread and spread, so Victoria became a school that was three city blocks long, almost half a million square feet, one of the largest school buildings in the country.

The school started to empty in the '70s, and by the '80s it was in danger of being closed, but the bigger problem also was the problems that the building was dealing with in terms of the structure itself. When I arrived at the school, as I said, I was given the assignment of revitalizing the school. In a period of time over 15 years we worked. I had a wonderful staff. I had risk-taking parents and students who came to the school. So from a school that was going to be closed in 1985, 16 years later we had a school that was full to the brim, not any space left in the building. We created great programs. We had great parents and students at the school, all of the things that we needed. To all the members that are here tonight, you need to know that there probably was at least one student from every constituency in this province. The school has become really a provincial school of the arts.

What I'm talking about is that I'm not dealing with a neighbourhood school. This is a school that encompasses students from across the greater Edmonton area, all the bedroom communities beyond, across Alberta, and even from other provinces. The school got a reputation. In fact, Arthur Hiller calls the school the Julliard of the north, and it's considered one of the top five performing arts schools in North America now.

Over a period of 16 years, as the program evolved and was created and got stronger and has been so widely recognized, we realized also that the building was in extreme difficulty. Three or four years ago the province audited schools across this province. In fact, when they arrived at Vic, they covered half a million square feet with me, and I can tell you that this poor old body sure knew that it was quite a task covering that half a million square feet. But when the audit came back, in fact the people who did the audit were in shock because on a scale of 1 to 5, nearly all of the audit was at the 1 level. The school was in desperate shape: you flushed toilets and hot water would come out of them; windows where the wood and everything was so rotted around the frames that a big gust of wind would have blown the windows out and so on; air conditioning. So it was in desperate circumstances. We had everything we needed except the building that the program deserved.

Thankfully, as a result of the audit, we began to work with Infrastructure and with Learning in looking at the potential for a new building. Everyone was quite excited about the prospect of what we were going to create. It was being viewed not as an Edmonton public school, although it was part of the Edmonton public school system, but in fact it was a school that was going to be built to serve those students from anywhere in this province who needed a very strong performing and visual arts program. They were not going to duplicate that kind of a facility in any other part of the province. We began to do our work with staff and parents and students and so on and with the arts community and others. Last June the Minister of Learning and the Minister of Infrastructure came to the site and made the announcement that $63 million was going to be there to create this new school.

Unfortunately, the deferment happened. We understand why the deferment happened, but the school is in such desperate shape, I'm hoping that as Infrastructure is reviewing its priorities and so on, they will be looking very seriously at having this project removed from the deferment list as soon as possible. The school is in desperate shape. It's not a matter of just being able to continue the way it's operating now. I'm just urging that the deferment be reviewed as soon as possible.

Thank you.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure in the few minutes remaining.

MR. LUND: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. First of all, I want to thank the Member for Calgary-Shaw for her comments. One of the questions she asked was: how much capital was spent last year when you're looking at the $185 million that we got this year? Well, it was about $1.7 billion. We can get that exact number for you, but it was in that range, and it's down to $185 million this year. So, yes, there has been a great decrease.

Your comments about the increased costs when the economy is very strong are very accurate, but it's kind of interesting to see that the economy is still strong. Even though our budget is down, the economy is still strong. I don't think that we're having the same impact on the economy that we have had at other times, but certainly it is a concern we have that in fact we may impact the economy to the extent that our costs go up and you get less for every dollar spent. We are looking at how we can reduce our costs, and the Member for Calgary-Currie chaired an MLA committee that looked at some of the alternatives and what we might do. His work will be very much appreciated.

Let me once again say that it was a very difficult decision for us to defer that school. There is another high school in Calgary that was deferred, on the north side of the city, a separate school, a high school. Those decisions were not taken lightly, but the fact is that we had to look at: at what point was the progress on those schools? They're both expensive. It was over $40 million combined. We had to then look and see: well, if we spread the $40 million over a number of projects, what value do we get out of that? So that's where we went. Quite frankly, pretty much the same thing applies to the comments from Edmonton-Meadowlark when he was talking about the school for the performing arts in the city of Edmonton. Yes, we recognize that the condition of that school is one of the poorest in the province. All these projects that I'm referring to now on schools are high priority, and certainly they will get our attention as soon as we can deal with it.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, of course, went on about the stability fund in Alaska. I want to remind the hon. member that there's a huge difference between Alaska and Alberta. Alaska has a fraction of the population therefore a fraction of the costs that we have to provide the services to our people. We have to put up with a Liberal government in Ottawa, and we're contributing to the rest of the country, who have a deficit. Certainly the federal government in the United States transfers a lot of money to the state of Alaska, so it's totally unfair to compare the two.

THE CHAIR: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Minister of Infrastructure, but pursuant to Standing Order 58(4) I must now put the following question. After considering the business plan and proposed estimates for the Department of Infrastructure, are you ready for the vote?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed

THE CHAIR: Opposed? Okay.

Agreed to:

Operating Expense and Capital Investment	$847,109,000
--	---------------

THE CHAIR: Shall the vote be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIR: Opposed? Carried.

The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would move that the committee rise and report the estimates of Infrastructure and beg leave to sit again.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

MR. JOHNSON: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions, reports as follows, and requests leave to sit again.

Resolved that a sum not exceeding the following be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2003, for the following department.

Infrastructure: $847,109,000 for operating expense and capital investment.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in this report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Opposed? So ordered.

Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

THE CHAIR: I'd call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 11

Energy Information Statutes Amendment Act, 2002

THE CHAIR: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this?

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It is a pleasure to rise at committee this evening and discuss Bill 11, the Energy Information Statutes Amendment Act. This is certainly being described as housekeeping legislation, but I don't necessarily agree with that. Certainly in a democracy everyone is entitled to their own opinion. When we look at this, on the surface it looks like we're going to just amend six pieces of legislation to give confidentiality sections precedence over the FOIP Act. One has to be concerned. This area that's going to be protected is going to include, of course, royalty information, and there are various periods of confidentiality discussed in this legislation, ranging from one year to 15 years to unidentified periods.

Now, certainly hon. members are going to be correct when they state that this piece of legislation was discussed in the final report of the Select Special Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act Review Committee in March of 1999, but nowhere do I see in recommendation 24 any mention of the deregulation that came about in the electricity generation and distribution system in this province. Certainly we can talk about the Electric Utilities Act, but we're not talking about what has exactly happened since 1999, and this is only one of my concerns. There was information received by this hon. member today that there's going to be a rebate. Fortunately, it's a rebate; it's not a deferral account payment that consumers are going to have to be making. It comes close to $8 million, as I understand. ATCO Electric and TransAlta are going to have to make some adjustments and rebate some customers some money. That's just one example, Mr. Chairman.

All this is unfolding very rapidly with electricity deregulation, and to somehow remove this from the FOIP commissioner I don't think is sound public policy. I think we should leave the decision on what information should be provided and what information should not be provided in section 70(1) to the discretion of the Privacy Commissioner.

Now, that's only one industry. Certainly with royalties I believe the same applies. Let the commissioner decide. There was no mention described in the Natural Gas Marketing Act amendments here in section 17. There was no mention, as I said, in this report that was presented to this Legislative Assembly three years ago about what should or should not be done in regard to royalties: how they're being paid, how they're being collected, what royalties might be forgiven, and so on. The argument has been made in this Assembly in debate at second reading that royalty information is top secret, that it's confidential and it is information that should remain in the confidence or in the security of the businesses. However, one only has to look at the web sites, that are available on any computer – and there are certainly a lot of them with their green lights blinking in this Assembly this evening – to see, Mr. Chairman, that there is . . . I'm detecting an echo here. [interjection] No, an echo.

AN HON. MEMBER: An echo?

MR. MacDONALD: Yes.

Mr. Chairman, one only has to look at the annual reports, that are presented on the Internet for investors to look at, to see that this royalty information is not secret. Now, if we were to look at the annual report for 2000 for Talisman Energy concerning Talisman's oil operations in the Sudan, which are very profitable to both Talisman and the government – and this is just one example. According to their annual report for the year 2000 under its agreement with the government 39 percent of Talisman's revenues from its Sudanese operations went to pay royalties to the government of Sudan. That was an increase from 23 percent royalties paid in 1999. Now, we even go further along here and you can see a comparison of royalties that were paid in this country in 1999, 2000, and 2001. We can see what royalties were paid in the North Sea in 1999, 2000, and 2001; Southeast Asia for the same years. In Sudan for 1999 there was $30 million in royalties, in 2000 there was $252 million, and for 2001, $248 million. I don't know if this is in American or Canadian dollars, but it doesn't really matter, Mr. Chairman. This information is available.

So for hon. members of this Assembly to say that this is all top secret information and it's not the business of Albertans, that it's not the business of the members of this Assembly, I cannot agree with that, and this is yet one example.

Now, there are several kinds of information here at issue, Mr. Chairman, as discussed in a letter that I was grateful to receive on March 4 from the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner signed by the Acting Information and Privacy Commissioner, Mr. Frank Work. It clarified some of this. The commissioner makes some very valid points. He's discussing geophysical and geological information and removing the possibility of access for other information, for example, again getting back to royalty information. Now, there are provisions already in the FOIP legislation for the commissioner to act, Mr. Chairman. [interjection] There it goes again.

Mr. Chairman, I remind all hon. members of this House, and this is directly from the commissioner: "Royalties are what Albertans receive in exchange for the mining of non-renewable resources." Now, the commissioner states that "Albertans have a right to know what royalties are being paid, how the royalties are being collected, what royalties might be forgiven and so on."

At this time I think we need to realize that there has been no significant study of royalties in this province in 10 years, and a lot has changed. Certainly a lot has changed. It was suggested in an Edmonton Journal editorial a couple of weeks ago that perhaps now is the time to have a look at all this royalty structure to see what's working, what's not working, what needs to be improved, to see if the whole system is working and Albertans are getting the maximum benefit. Now, by Albertans not only do I mean the citizens in royalties but also the oil companies. We have to encourage the maximum amount of production from wells, oil wells in particular, that we can absolutely get, because as we discussed earlier, conventional crude oil production in this province is declining. We need to ensure, as I said, that we get maximum return for that, and if we can devise a royalty structure that provides for that and we can improve on the current one, then I think we should.

I have to at this time remind all hon. members in this Assembly of the concerns that were raised by the Auditor General in regard to the mechanism that we use to collect royalties in this province. As far as I know, the EUB is currently conducting a pilot project, if I could call it that. It's called VIPIR, and it is a study to devise a better way of gathering information on how royalties are calculated and how they are collected. Now, Mr. Chairman, the royalty structure here is quite complex. I described some of the structure earlier, but for the benefit of all members I think perhaps it would be advantageous to have another look at our royalty structure. We have, as I said, no major changes in 10 years. The technical details and the financial impact of these changes are reflected in the budget that we debated earlier this evening.

The value of the Crown's share of natural gas or oil. If we pass this legislation, citizens will not have the right, in my view, to check to ensure that we are getting maximum benefit. Royalties are more than an economic rent, because the citizens of this province own the natural resources. All citizens. We can go through and we can talk about old oil and third-tier oil, new gas, old gas, new oil that's heavy. We can talk about synthetic crude production. With all this we also have to talk about the natural gas royalty reductions and who is getting them, the petroleum royalties. We also have to look at the Alberta royalty tax credit and who gets that. You know, we've just dealt with a department that took a significant hit in the last budget, and there's 140, 180 million dollars in the Alberta royalty tax credit. Perhaps it's outlived its usefulness, because certainly outfits – I just have one here, and it certainly has a robust cash flow from its operations here, and that's Talisman.

So perhaps the time is past for the Alberta royalty tax credit. It is looking like that tax credit depends on the amount of royalties. If they're lower, the tax credit is lower. If they're higher, well, then the royalty tax credit goes up. Now, Albertans have every right to know who's getting that, and with this legislation we are overlooking that.

In conclusion, I would again like to remind members of this House and I would encourage them: this document has been tabled. It's a letter that I referred to earlier. It's from, of course, the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner. I would ask that each and every member of the Assembly, before you vote on this bill and consider this bill, read this letter, because I think that instead of allowing royalty information or information from the EUB to be locked away in a filing cabinet somewhere, it should be at the discretion of the office of the Information and Privacy Commissioner. If it is of a confidential nature, then let that person, he or she, the commissioner, decide. Let's put this under FOIP, and let's forget about these recommendations, because I do not think that they're valid anymore with the changes that I discussed earlier. I would encourage all members of this Assembly to think carefully about the implications of this bill before it is passed in this Assembly. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I rise to speak on Bill 11, the Energy Information Statutes Amendment Act, 2002.

Mr. Chairman, the act, although fairly brief – it runs only the length of five pages – I think is quite sweeping with respect to the impact that it will have on the access to vital information that Albertans should have a right to. The bill amends several existing statutes: the Coal Conservation Act, the Electric Utilities Act, and the Mines and Minerals Act. It amends also the Natural Gas Marketing Act and the Oil and Gas Conservation Act. So it amends five different existing statutes, each one of which is about the energy sector of our economy.

The energy sector in our economy, Mr. Chairman, is exceedingly important to the public interest in the sense that public revenues generated from the activities of economic enterprises involved in this general area produce these revenues, which are really quite significant and large in the overall scheme of provincial revenues. Given the fact, then, that any changes to existing legislation will have an impact on that very vital area of public interest – that is, the annual revenue flows to the public treasury from activities in this economic sector – I think we need to take a very close look at the potential impact of increasing the powers of the Energy and Utilities Board to keep information confidential and to have the powers to deny access to the information that is associated with other activities related to coal conservation or electric utilities or the mines and minerals area, natural gas marketing, or oil and gas conservation. Clearly, the challenge that I guess we are addressing here is striking a balance between public interests and the private interests of companies that operate in this particular sector of the economy.

My read of Bill 11 suggests that if this bill were passed, the balance would tilt quite significantly in favour of private corporate interests at the expense of public interests. Whether it's the question of the information related to the royalty rates, or it has to do with royalty tax credits or royalty tax reduction regimes that the government follows in the province, whether it has to do with the production and sale of electricity or coal or whatever, natural gas, in each case the effect of the proposed amendments will be to make it more difficult for Albertans as individuals and for public interest organizations such as environmental organizations and others to get the information that they need to intervene at EUB hearings.

Why would this Assembly make it easy for companies to enjoy provisions of confidentiality even if that means overriding the Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act? FOIP legislation is exceedingly important. It assures Albertans the right to information that should duly be theirs, that they should have access to, and it provides protection of privacy where it's deemed necessary by the FOIP commissioner. To tie the hands of the FOIP commissioner and to add to the powers of the EUB in exchange would seem to me to be heading in entirely the wrong direction. The public interest of Albertans in the province is at stake if the powers of paramountcy of the EUB related to FOIP legislation are strengthened by virtue of the passing of this act.

I think Albertans have a right and indeed an invaluable interest in having access to the information that will impact the revenues of the province, the matter which the citizens of this province have a legitimate interest and legitimate right to have information about. Public debate on these issues, on matters of royalty tax credits, royalty rates, royalty tax reductions, is overdue in this province. We have already far too much secrecy surrounding the issue of royalty rates, whether they have to do with natural gas or with oil sands related oil or the more traditional oil resources. If this bill were to pass, I think we would create statutory conditions which would make it impossible for such a debate to develop, to be vigorous, and to be meaningful. The secrecy/confidentiality provisions that are provided in this act, Bill 11, will simply make not available the information that is necessary for a vigorous and open and transparent debate, and therefore meaningful debate, public debate simply cannot happen.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would certainly not be able to support this bill and will certainly invite my colleagues in the Legislature to give serious thought to doing the same given that this bill, in my view, runs counter to the protection of the public interest, which is related directly to the revenue flows that are generated by the economic sector, which will see its powers to keep vital information of public interest confidential when in fact it shouldn't be.

So thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I will yield the floor to other members.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'll keep my comments brief. They've been touched on by the two members who spoke before me, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar and the hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

I must say that I share their concerns. This seems to me to be an unnecessary piece of legislation coming from a government that says it doesn't like unnecessary legislation. The effect of the bill, as we've reviewed, will be to remove from public access by law quite a host of information, and various sections of the bill address and amend a number of acts, and in each case the effect is to make it more difficult for the public to get information.

So I would propose a way that I prefer to deal with the issue: to bring the said acts under FOIP, bring the information under FOIP. I should note that under the freedom of information and privacy legislation there are ample safeguards for protecting the interests of the industries involved such as the oil and natural gas industries and other industries. It's worth noting that the freedom of information act says under section 16(1):

The head of a public body must refuse . . .

And I repeat "must" refuse.

. . . to disclose to an applicant information

- (a) that would reveal
 - (i) trade secrets of a third party, or
 - (ii) commercial, financial, labour relations, scientific or technical information of a third party,
- (b) that is supplied . . . in confidence, and
- (c) the disclosure of which could reasonably be expected to harm the business interests – I'm summarizing this section here now – of the parties.

Beyond that, there are any other number of safeguards under the freedom of information act to more than adequately achieve what Bill 11 will be achieving. I am very uneasy with the idea of removing from public purview information of the sort that we are about to remove from public purview by Bill 11. The Information

Commissioner has made it clear that a crucial aspect of FOIP is that “accessibility and transparency bring about accountability and accountability makes for better government.” That’s a quote from a letter written by the Acting Information and Privacy Commissioner just a month ago on Bill 11. He’s expressing real reservations about this bill. I share those reservations, and I think it’s safe to say our entire caucus does. There are better ways to handle this issue, and I wish we were seeing the issues handled differently.

My points are clear. Our lead critic on this, the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, has touched on some of them. Given the late hour, I will draw my comments to an end at that point.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIR: Are you ready for the question? We have, then, the question being called. Are you ready for the question?

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIR: Opposed?

AN HON. MEMBER: Opposed.

THE CHAIR: Then stand up. All that is is a pro forma. If you are opposed to it going on, then stand up and speak. That’s all it asks for. It’s a warning that we’re going to close this part. So there isn’t any opposed, but because it was objected to before, I threw it in.

[The clauses of Bill 11 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

THE CHAIR: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIR: Opposed? Carried.

The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would move that the committee rise and report Bill 11.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

MR. JOHNSON: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration and reports Bill 11.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in this report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Opposed? Carried.

Second Reading

Bill 23
Municipal Government Amendment Act, 2002

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Whitecourt-Ste. Anne.

MR. VANDERBURG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’m pleased to move second reading of Bill 23. [interjections]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: I wonder if we could remember that there are people who are recognized, and right now we only have the one member, the hon. Member for Whitecourt-Ste. Anne.

MR. VANDERBURG: Okay. Mr. Speaker, I’ll continue. The Municipal Government Act is a very important piece of legislation in Alberta. It authorizes the operations of municipal authorities and therefore affects the vast majority of Albertans. I’ve had the opportunity for close to 15 years serving as past mayor of Whitecourt to use the Municipal Government Act. This government acknowledges the key role of the Municipal Government Act and is firmly committed to ensuring the act’s continued viability and relevance.

As part of the government’s responsiveness to the needs of Alberta’s municipalities and their residents, further amendments have been made after consultation with the stakeholders to address those needs in each of the years from 1995 to 1999. To further improve upon the act, the government has concluded that additional amendments are appropriate. The purpose of Bill 23, the Municipal Government Amendment Act, 2002, is to improve the act by improving the equalized assessment process, in which requisitions for cost-sharing programs are calculated, and providing liability protection for municipal officials and for municipal boxing and wrestling commissions.

Mr. Speaker, let me begin with the proposed amendments that apply to the assessment and taxation. These proposed amendments implement some of the equalized assessment panel recommendations and address some of the Auditor General’s concerns about the equalization process. These proposed changes would eliminate the one-year lag between the preparation of current assessments and equalized assessments, establish a framework to more clearly define standards for quality assurance in the assessment practice, increase the transparency of the equalized assessment system, and require both municipalities and the province to disclose assessment information for the purpose of requisitions.

The primary recommendation of the Equalized Assessment Panel is to move the use of the current year assessments of municipalities for calculating the equalized assessment. Requisitions will be more fairly determined and understood by ratepayers when they are levied on equalized assessments based on the most current assessment information.

The proposed amendments will also improve the transparency of the equalized assessment process and the quality of information required. These changes would also support the use of the assessment shared service environment, also known as ASSET, that is being developed by Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, the second set of proposed amendments would provide a standard of good faith for protection from liability for municipal officials and for municipal boxing and wrestling commissions. These proposed amendments would protect municipal officials, employees, and volunteers from unreasonable exposure to liability in the conduct of local government business. As currently worded, section 535(3)(b) of the act does not provide municipal officials protection if the cause of action is found to be gross negligence. Gross negligence is a vague legal term that has been applied subjectively by the courts, including instances when gross negligence may not have been reckless or deliberate. To address this issue, it is proposed that section 535(3)(b) be deleted and that section 535(2) be amended to limit liability based on the provision of good faith.

By applying a good-faith provision, an employee or other municipal officials are not exposed to unreasonable risk of liability. This limitation will give greater protection to a municipal official when an action done or omitted to be done was not reckless or deliberate. The application of good faith as a standard for legislation protection from liability is far more prevalent in Canada than is gross negligence. The Alberta Urban Municipalities Association and the Association of Municipal Districts and Counties have expressed support for amending section 535 to provide municipal officials an equitable level of protection from liability.

The proposed liability changes would also include that a new provision be added to section 535 to protect boxing and wrestling commissions from liability on the basis of good faith. These commissions are currently not protected from liability under the act.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, with the major areas of change that Bill 23 proposes, the bill is one example of the government's determination to respond to the changing needs of Alberta municipalities. It is important to emphasize that the proposals have been developed through a lengthy process of consultation with Alberta local governments and many other stakeholders. These proposed amendments improve the assessment practice throughout the province and enhance liability protection for municipal officials and municipal boxing and wrestling commissions. The overall result is that the municipal authorities will be better able to continue providing the high quality of service that Albertans have come to expect from their local governments.

Mr. Speaker, this bill addresses the needs of Albertans and will help maintain the Municipal Government Act as model legislation in Canada. It is presented to the members for their support.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I move to adjourn debate on this item. Thank you.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move that we adjourn until 1:30 p.m. tomorrow.

[Motion carried; at 10:46 p.m. the Assembly adjourned to Wednesday at 1:30 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Wednesday, April 17, 2002

1:30 p.m.

Date: 02/04/17

[The Speaker in the chair]

head: Prayers

THE SPEAKER: Good afternoon and welcome.

Let us pray. As Canadians and as Albertans we give thanks for the precious gifts of freedom and peace which we enjoy. As Members of this Legislative Assembly we rededicate ourselves to the valued traditions of parliamentary democracy as a means of serving our province and our country. Amen.

Please be seated.

head: Introduction of Visitors

MR. JONSON: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I am pleased to introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly Mr. Kiyoshi Shidara. He is accompanied today by his wife, Mrs. Shidara, and the vice-consul general of Japan, Mr. Ito. The consul general has been posted to Alberta for three years and is now returning to Japan. During his tenure we have appreciated his efforts at building Japan's relationship with Alberta. He was instrumental in helping organize a number of Alberta missions to Japan and numerous events and projects here in Alberta. I very much appreciate his assistance in planning my recent mission to Japan. We will certainly miss his expertise and his strong support for the Alberta/Japan friendship that has grown. I would like to ask that our honoured guests please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly. Best wishes to them.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Learning.

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a great privilege today for me to introduce to you and through you to the members of this Assembly two people that I believe have gone above and beyond the call of duty today. Today Herb and Orval Belcourt together with Georges Brosseau from Canative Housing donated $5 million for a Metis scholarship fund. This will go a long way in making postsecondary education more accessible for Metis students, and I truly believe that what they've done today is a huge step forward for all of Alberta.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Environment.

DR. TAYLOR: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a number of guests here today that I'd like to introduce. They're from Alberta Environment, and they're here to see how the House works and have a visit of the Legislature Building and just see what happens here. I am pleased to introduce Louise Cox, Della Gerbrandt, Bonnie Magill, Jackie Jaycock, Azina Kanji, Shelly Little, Carol Heinrich, Maureen Davson-Trim, Sandra Moore, Pat Visman, Norm Gratton, Sandra Duxbury, Sarah Waddington, Tanya Hope, Terry Sly, David Toop, Megan Jack, Karen Saffran, and Robert Rippon. I'd ask all those people to please stand and accept the warm welcome of the House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you a former teacher, a former MLA from St. Albert, a former rodeo cowboy, a current councillor for the city of St. Albert, and an all around good guy. I'd ask Len Bracko to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Legislature.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Calmar.

REV. ABBOTT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a pleasure for me to rise today and introduce three people in the members' gallery. They are not constituents of mine. They're actually from the Lacombe-Stettler constituency. However, they are family members. I'm going to introduce my sister Chris Leinweber and her kids Michael and Sydney. If they would rise and receive the warm welcome of the House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

MR. HLADY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a great honour to be able to introduce to you and through you to the members of the Assembly two people that help make the oil and gas industry work here in the province: Nadine Barber, a senior communications adviser with Anadarko Canada, and Doug Noble with Sparks & Associates. I'd ask them to please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to introduce to you and through you to the House a young man that I had the pleasure of meeting with recently in my constituency office on Whyte Avenue. He's highly energetic, interested in politics, and a motivated young man who is here to observe the proceedings of the House today. His name is Andres Lineker, and he is sitting in the public gallery. I would ask Andres to please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Community Development.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of the House one of my constituents, Debbie Lishingman, who is here today with 20 other visitors from the Edmonton Immigrant Services Association. We just met outside and spoke with representatives who are here from many different countries and now settled in our province. I don't see them in the members' gallery, but if they're in the public gallery, I would ask them to rise now and please receive the very warm welcome from all members of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It gives me a great deal of pleasure today to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Mr. Paul Cetinski. Mr. Cetinski has written me on a number of occasions and is very involved and concerned with what happens here in the Legislature, and with your permission I would ask him now to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you to all hon. members of this Assembly Mr. Francis MacInnis. Mr. MacInnis is a resident of Edmonton-Gold Bar and a keen observer of the proceedings in this Assembly. I believe Mr. MacInnis is in the members' gallery, and if he would now rise and receive the warm and traditional welcome of this House, I would appreciate it.

Thank you.

head: Oral Question Period

THE SPEAKER: First Official Opposition main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Budget Surplus

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The $500 million surplus from last year's budget presents the government with an opportunity to invest money in priority programs in this year's budget and still meet its debt repayment targets. Last year's unexpected surplus must go toward debt repayment, and the money in the current budget that is earmarked for debt repayment can be released to go toward priority programs. At the end of the year the debt will be lower and important programs will be better supported. My questions are to the Premier. Given that community lottery boards were cut because of budget constraints, will the Premier now use some of this possibly freed-up money to reinstate the boards?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition alludes to last year's budget. Whether the $500 million figure is correct or not remains to be seen, and that will be determined after the results of the final quarter are in. I think it's too early to speculate on what that surplus might be notwithstanding the headlines today in the Calgary Herald.

Having said that, the community lottery board issue relates to this year's budget, the current budget, Mr. Speaker, and it was an ongoing program until its cancellation, and there are no plans at this time relative to this year's budget or years subsequent to reintroduce that program.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Will the Premier invest $115 million from this possible $500 million surplus in education to address teachers' concerns over crowded classrooms?

MR. KLEIN: As I said earlier, it's premature to speculate on what that surplus will be, Mr. Speaker. If there is any money to be allocated over and above the amount that we're required to allocate to debt repayment, I can assure the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition that it will go to the priorities of Albertans.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. How does the government justify the $45 million education property tax grab from municipalities when it now has a $500 million surplus?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again I say that it's too early to speculate on what the surplus might be, and on the basis of that speculation it is very, very premature to speculate on where additional revenues, if any, might be spent.

THE SPEAKER: Second Official Opposition main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Out of that $500 million that has been freed up, could you put in $200 million and use it to replace the increase in health care premiums?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, he's mixing apples and oranges. He's alluding to something that was reported in the media which may or may not be true. I haven't had a chance to talk to the hon. Minister of Finance about this particular issue. He's alluding to something that might or might not happen with respect to last year's budget. The issue of health care premiums is an issue that is relative only to this year's budget and subsequent years.

DR. NICOL: Mr. Speaker, if they take that unexpected revenue from last year, put it to the debt, and use the money that was assigned to the debt, does that not give the government money that they can use this year on programs and have the debt at exactly the same place it would be at the end of this year irregardless of where the dollars came from?

MR. KLEIN: Irregardless, but what the hon. member fails to take into consideration relative to a budget process is that if you take onetime funding out of last year's budget and put it into program funding for this current year and subsequent years, then you are back into the situation of financing ongoing programs, Mr. Speaker, that tend to grow and grow and grow.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question, then, is to the Premier. What about putting it into the infrastructure of the schools that you've canceled, putting it into the roads that you've canceled? Those are onetime funding.

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, significant dollars already have gone into infrastructure of both schools and hospitals, but to enlighten the hon. leader of the Liberal opposition, I'll have the hon. Minister of Finance respond.

MRS. NELSON: There was a story that ran in the newspaper today that has got everybody stirred up with regard to speculation as to what the final fourth-quarter numbers will look like for last year's fiscal year. I might remind hon. members that we are at day 17 of this new fiscal year. We will not have final numbers, Mr. Speaker, for the fourth quarter of last year for probably another 60 days. That being said, what we were able to do – that leads into the third question from the Leader of the Opposition – was that in the last 10 days of the last fiscal year, which ended March 31, we were able to identify that we would have some additional revenues, which allowed us to put money back into transportation programs and some infrastructure programs, as we had promised in October when we had to defer those projects. What our numbers will be in 60 days will depend on what comes through on our resource revenue calculation from the estimate to the actual. We don't have that number, so please don't go on with that line of questioning. We don't have it.

THE SPEAKER: Third Official Opposition main question. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Children in Care

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Lack of supervision, lack of independent checking, staff shortages, high staff turnover, and heavy caseloads: not just contributing factors in the death of Korvette Crier but themes that have been repeated in investigations of the deaths of children from Jordan Quinney to the Kinahan twins. My questions are to the Minister of Children's Services. After each death the minister gives the same explanations. When will the ministry hire the staff, provide the standards, and create conditions to ensure that children in care in this province are safe?

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, the death of Korvette Crier is a tragedy that has been discussed by our department since August 1999, when this ministry was about four months old and when we were at the outset of looking not only at our delegations but our establishment of regional authorities. We didn't start when the judge's report came out on the fatality inquiry. We started the day after the tragedy to try and explore what we could do to make sure that the standards were in place, that we were doing the right things for children throughout Alberta. Currently we have 18 delegated authorities of First Nations who are providing services both on and off reserves, in some cases, to children and families in need. We have huge needs still with foster parents, but we continue to work very hard not only with those authorities but in the monitoring.

I should just once again, as I have many times in this House, reidentify that although we had a staff reduction in this year's budget of 186 full-time equivalent positions, those were in the area of administrative support. Professional technical advice had nothing to do with frontline workers that would be involved with these children, and there is absolutely no doubt in my mind that in the case most recently cited in the hon. member's question, there was a clear delineation, that staff supports were in place, that there were supervisory supports in place, that resources were in place. They may not have been in place at the time of this death over three years ago, but clearly we have been moving in the right direction to improve the system on a daily basis, and children are safe, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you. My questions are to the same minister. Can the minister assure the House that the factors leading to the death of the next child in care will not be exactly the same as those in the Quinney, Kinahan, and Crier cases?

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, as it's often been stated in this House, when you have a death of a child in care, it's always a tragedy. We do not look forward to and anticipate death. We anticipate wellness. We do not however ignore the fact that children that come into care – and everybody should remember this: we have over 14,000 children in care presently, not all of which are in care by direct guardianship of the ministry. Somebody somewhere has abused that child, or it wouldn't be in care in the first place. We do not admit the well children that are the daughters and sons of people in this Assembly, for the most part, but we do admit children that we acknowledge are fragile, sometimes have been battered, experiencing family violence, may be victims of fetal alcohol syndrome or fetal alcohol effect, and we do our best to prevent that. We do not look forward to death at any time.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister. A former minister reported that until 1997, 50 children in care had died. How many have died since then?

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, we'll be pleased to table any information that the hon. member wishes. That is always annually reported. We will review that and provide that. I believe that in the past year the number was 13 – and many of those deaths were tragedies that were quite unrelated to care – that were administered while in the direct supervision of a guardian or a family member.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-McCall.

MR. MASON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Year after year for the past eight years this government has underestimated its budget surpluses by a total exceeding $19 billion. It's breathtaking. History appears to be repeating itself again this year. Since bringing down her budget on March 19, a month ago, the Minister of Finance has already revised her numbers once. Now there are reports that she may soon be doing it again. My question is to the Minister of Finance. Why doesn't the minister just be straight with Albertans and tell them what last year's budget surplus will actually be?

MRS. NELSON: Well, first of all, Mr. Speaker, I have to clarify something. I believe I heard the hon. member say that we have revised our budget. We have not done that. The budget is before the House right now and being debated, and there has been no revision to that budget. What we have done, as I said to the earlier question from the members of the Liberal Party – we were able to take advantage of some additional revenues that had come through in the fourth quarter to honour a commitment to put dollars back into some Transportation and Infrastructure programs before the March 31 year-end date came around. We did follow through on that.

We do not have final numbers and will not have final numbers. I told this to the hon. member opposite this morning in Public Accounts, Mr. Speaker. We'll do it again. We do not have final numbers, and we will not have final numbers, hon. member, until likely the first week of June, at which point we will have the resource revenue numbers coming in and we can give you a better update as to what last year's numbers ended up being.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MASON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Instead of this policy of hiding the true size of the budget surplus until it's too late, why isn't the government . . .

REV. ABBOTT: Question. Question.

THE SPEAKER: To the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Calmar: thank you. Your elicitation is totally unnecessary, unwarranted, uninvited.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Instead of this policy of hiding the true size of the budget surplus until it's too late, why isn't the government at least being straight with Albertans and telling them that it is more important to have a large budget surplus than have community lottery boards and more important than having properly funded schools and hospitals?

MRS. NELSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, again – and I went through this this morning for two hours with the Public Accounts Committee – when we rely upon our revenues to come in and we do record the actual, which is what comes out in our final report for the year, we have to wait until those resource numbers come in. They are actually the resource revenue numbers that go to March 31. They will not be reported through to the government in the form of Crown royalties for 60 days after the last day of production, which is March 31. We don't have those numbers, and we have to present actual numbers, so we can't give you a definitive on what that number is. What we were able to do before the end of March – we had a feeling and a preliminary number on our corporate tax number, and we were able to make some adjustments to the Infrastructure and Transportation requirements that we had pulled back on the deferral last fall.

We don't have those numbers, hon. member, and we won't have them – we never do – until 60 days after the year-end. So we can't give you that number.

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, given the fact that the minister's department is as leaky as a rowboat with termites, can she explain to the House whether or not she or any of her officials authorized the release of information about the size of last year's budget surplus to the media?

MRS. NELSON: Well, actually, Mr. Speaker, we would not have given that number out from our department, and any pre-information that has come in the press, quite frankly – and I've talked to reporters about this. I would caution them: be careful what you print because so far you haven't been accurate on any one of the statements that you've made as far as what's in the budget numbers. They've been wrong in each case, and again I daresay that this number is wrong. I don't know where that number came from, but it certainly didn't come from my department. Whoever is handing it out, I hope that they haven't signed their name to it, because I don't believe it's correct.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-McCall, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

School Fund-raising

MR. SHARIFF: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last Monday in this House the Minister of Learning indicated that he would be drafting regulations that would prevent schools from asking parents to fund-raise for essential services. It is alleged that some school boards are forced to fund-raise as they do not receive adequate funding for items such as textbooks. I called a number of schools in my riding, and all of them have confirmed that they do not fund-raise for textbooks. However, they fund-raise for items such as library books, seat belts for buses, sewing machines, pots and pans, et cetera. These schools are concerned that such items may be affected by the minister's regulations. My question is to the Minister of Learning. How much funding do we provide to support essential services including textbooks?

DR. OBERG: Well, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to the total amount of funding that goes to the schools, it's roughly $3.7 billion on the basic side of my department. To put that into concrete terms, it works out to about $7,500 per student. So in a classroom of 20 students, for example, that's roughly $150,000 that is going in there.

Mr. Speaker, we have received – and I've heard it in this House as well – a lot of issues about fund-raising for textbooks. When we go and take a look at them, there are indeed very few areas that actually fund-raise for textbooks. Obviously, you know, there was just a guffaw from across the way.

I will say what the Alberta School Boards Association has said about fund-raising: "Fundraised dollars should not be used for instructional purposes or basic education items, those being items required to complete a core course." Mr. Speaker, that was put out around two years ago, in September of 2000. Since that time I've still received issues and I've still received complaints. There needs to be clarity on this situation for the parents. I am in no way saying that they cannot fund-raise.

MR. SHARIFF: Again to the Minister of Learning: under the new regulations that he'll be drafting, what can schools fund-raise for?

DR. OBERG: Well, Mr. Speaker, what we will be doing is looking at essentially an inclusionary as opposed to exclusionary list of what can be fund-raised for. We continue to hear, as I stated earlier, about fund-raising for textbooks. Clearly, that is something that is not acceptable with the Alberta School Boards Association, but fund-raising for things like a rock-climbing wall, things that are outside of the core curriculum – absolutely, people can fund-raise for those. If they want their band trip to Okotoks or their band trip to New York, absolutely they can fund-raise for these types of things.

Mr. Speaker, I in no way want to cut off fund-raising. However, there does have to be – and I will use the same word that I have used previously – clarity as to what is being fund-raised for. That's what the attempt will be in any regulation used: to provide that clarity to parents.

MR. SHARIFF: My final supplement is also to the same minister. Can the minister identify which school boards in Alberta fund-raise for textbooks and why?

DR. OBERG: Well, Mr. Speaker, this issue has been brought up numerous times in this House. I have said, as the Premier has said: bring the issues forward, and we will look into them. We had 22 different schools. I will not mention the school boards nor the individual schools, but we did have 22 brought forward. We looked into each and every one. There were two that were very questionable. We went back and took a look at them more, and the superintendents assure us that they have not been used to fund-raise for textbooks.

I will say, Mr. Speaker, that in my own particular constituency I received a letter from the student advisory council of one particular school saying that they were having to fund-raise for a whole set of textbooks. I subsequently called the superintendent, as he used to be the principal at that school, and I said: what's going on here? He said: absolutely, 100 percent, not; they should not, they do not have to, they will not be fund-raising for textbooks in that school.

So, Mr. Speaker, again this speaks to the clarity that is needed when it comes to fund-raising so parents know what is actually being fund-raised for.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, followed by the hon. Member for Lacombe-Stettler.

Community Lottery Boards

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Premier has indicated that the community lottery boards were eliminated because they were not a priority for the government. Well, Albertans disagree; the lottery boards are a priority for them. My questions today are to the Minister of Gaming. If community lottery boards were really cut because of budget constraints, why didn't the government just reduce the funding but leave the volunteer board structure in place?

MR. STEVENS: As has been indicated, Mr. Speaker, in this House on a number of occasions, the decision with respect to the discontinuance of community lottery boards was, firstly, a fiscal decision, and secondly, it was a very difficult decision for this government to make. It was part of the overall government package, and it was made on the basis that there were other priorities which were higher; namely, health, education, children's services. Out of the Alberta lottery fund, which is where gaming revenue goes in this province, all of those areas are receiving additional funding in this particular fiscal year.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that 98 percent of the funding for community lottery boards went directly to providing programs, where does the minister envision getting a better deal for program delivery costs?

MR. STEVENS: There's absolutely no doubt that the community lottery boards did a lot of good work over the four years that they were in existence, and I very much appreciate the volunteer work that each of the volunteers in the 88 boards did, but the fact of the matter is that there's going to be approximately $300 million available for the not-for-profit volunteer sector this year. That's a great deal of money, and there are a number of very valid vehicles through which that money will get into our communities.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the Minister of Gaming: what are the anticipated administration costs for incorporating the community lottery board programs into the community facility enhancement program, as the minister has mused on before?

MR. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, what I have indicated is that as a result of the discontinuance of the boards and as a result of a response from the public, we are prepared to look at and we in fact are looking at those smaller applicants who may fall between the cracks; in other words, those applicants who may not have access to funds under current programs. We're in the process of looking at that, and when I have something to report to my colleagues, I will be bringing something forward for their consideration.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Stettler, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Rural Electrification Associations

MRS. GORDON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. My questions today are to the Minister of Energy. Last night five MLAs met with several board members from Central Alberta REA Limited, providers of power for our rural constituents. This group told us, Mr. Minister, that your department is setting up a committee to review once again REAs in Alberta. Why would there need to be another review when it was less than three years ago that REAs participated in a similar exercise?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. SMITH: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. In fact, I spoke to the REAs at their annual meeting and enjoyed an afternoon with some 475 members of an association that brought major change to this great province over the last 50 years. In fact, through the process of a new competitive market structure there are some issues that come that impact REAs. These rural electrification associations have the issue of load settlement and the accurate reading of their bills, the issue of what happens when an REA purchases another REA in a different service area. What happens when it competes with a transmission provider to buy service for an independent town?

We already have the MLA for Grande Prairie-Smoky working with a committee on issues of electricity in small communities, and I've asked him and Brent Rathgeber, the member from Edmonton . . . [interjections] I couldn't remember his constituency. As soon as I said the name, Mr. Speaker, Edmonton-Calder came to mind.

They're not a committee. They're not a task force. They're simply two good, strong, effective MLAs that are helping a minister communicate with an important stakeholder to resolve issues that may be outstanding in the area of a new competitive market of electricity marketing.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MRS. GORDON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. REAs are rural electrification associations. I thought I should state that.

As many individual REAs over time have amalgamated to achieve economies of scale, is this practice still allowed and will it continue to be allowed in the future?

MR. SMITH: Mr. Speaker, I know about the rural electrification associations. That's exactly the nomenclature that I applied to them.

With respect to these individual questions that the member is bringing up, those are exactly the types of issues that are going to be brought back in a businesslike format and be reported through a system that we have called standing policy committee, called cabinet and caucus. It's worked for well over nine years, and I expect it to continue to work efficiently in this government.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MRS. GORDON: Excuse me one moment, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Minister, it was a couple of people over here that weren't sure what REAs were, so I was just identifying for them. It wasn't anything back and forth.

Are these REAs able to compete to seek customer bases outside the farm gate? For instance, could they provide service to municipalities and/or their ratepayers?

MR. SMITH: Those are exactly the questions that we'll be talking about in standing policy committee. I know that the member as a chair of a standing policy committee has perfect attendance in that committee, and we'll ensure that she has an invitation to our standing policy committee as well.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Apprenticeship Standards

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On July 3, 2001, the Minister of Learning stated, quote: the demand for skilled tradespeople in Alberta is high right now, and so are our standards. End of quote. My first question is to the Minister of Learning. Given that a personnel list dated June 1, 2001, of contractors working at the Weyerhaeuser mill in Grande Prairie indicates unregistered personnel employed in the compulsory trade of pipe fitting, is it now government policy to ignore nationally and internationally recognized Alberta standards as an answer to our shortage of skilled tradespeople?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, the answer to that is no, but I really feel that the Minister of Human Resources and Employment, in looking after the occupational health and safety components, would probably have a better answer than I would, and I would ask him to respond to this.

MR. DUNFORD: As closely as I was paying attention, I'd have to get the question repeated.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the Minister of Learning. The Human Resources and Employment minister in a letter to me dated July 25, 2001, states:

Welding and steamfitting/pipefitting are 2 of the 22 compulsory certification trades designated under the Apprenticeship and Industry Training . . . Act administered by Alberta Learning. People working in these trades must be a registered apprentice or a certified journeyman with the Registered Apprenticeship Program.

Given that, what measures is the Department of Learning taking to ensure that compulsory trade certification is being enforced throughout this province?

Thank you.

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, we have local apprenticeship committees throughout all communities in this province. We also have provincial apprenticeship committees as well as the apprenticeship board. The apprenticeship side of my department is truly one of the gems in my department. We are presently increasing – increasing – at the rate of a net 132 apprentices per week. We recently passed 40,000 apprentices in our apprenticeship program, and it's something that all Albertans can be extremely proud of.

With regard to the specific issue that the hon. member has raised about one particular person working at one particular job, I'd be more than happy to take a look at it, but, Mr. Speaker, I will not have this hon. member speaking negatively about our apprenticeship industry because it is the best in Canada if not in North America.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you. Again, Mr. Speaker, to the same minister: does the Department of Learning consider the use of a noncertified worker in a compulsory certification trade a violation of the general safety regulation?

Thank you.

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, again as a general rule I would agree with the hon. member, but for each individual circumstance we will take a look at it, and if there is indeed a fault to be found, we will rectify it. I will reiterate that our apprenticeship program is the number one program in North America.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister to supplement.

MR. DUNFORD: Again, because the hon. member is bringing up a specific situation, I would take it upon myself to work also with the Minister of Learning so that we can clear this matter up. The hon. member has a well-rehearsed manner that he brings into question period, as if these were some exposes and that kind of a thing. I think that in fairness to getting answers for a question, you might provide the information so that we could be looking into it. Certainly I join the Minister of Learning in recognizing the apprenticeship system which many, many unions, that the hon. member is involved with, recognize as the best in this world, as the previous member had indicated. To try to cast some disparaging comments on it is really casting disparaging comments on those people that support him very, very well.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

School Construction Deferrals

MRS. ADY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My questions today are for the Minister of Infrastructure. In 1999-2000 the South Calgary High School Committee in my constituency was informed by government that the provincial government could not make priority lists for capital budget for the construction of new schools, that school boards alone were responsible for assessing the needs within their jurisdiction and for prioritizing their requests for new schools, that in order for the south Calgary high school to be built, their board would need to rank it number one on their priority list. This was achieved in 2001, and the school was granted by government. Can the minister tell my constituents why, when deferrals became necessary because of funding difficulties, his department chose to defer the number one priority and not the projects further down on the list?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. LUND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Let me first of all assure the hon. member that this is just a deferral. It's not a cancellation. Also, I want to emphasize that to say no is very difficult for me. The fact was that we had a situation, because of the economic conditions that arose after September 11, where we simply had to reduce our expenditures on the capital side, so that meant making some very tough decisions in order to find enough money to meet the net target. Through that process there turned out to be two high schools in the city of Calgary that were deferred: one in the public system, that the hon. member is referring to, and one in the Catholic system, that is in the north part of Calgary.

What we had to look at is two projects that would amount to over $40 million, so we had to weigh: if you take that $40 million, take it away from a number of other smaller projects, what is the impact of that move? We know that high school students are more mobile than, say, elementary and/or intermediate. That all played into part of the decision. I can assure the hon. member that with the work that she has done and the priority that the school board has put on this project, it is a high priority for us when the funding becomes available.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MRS. ADY: Thank you. Given that the high school was granted $15 million of the $22 million needed for the project, is government now removing those dollars and reassigning them to other projects?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. LUND: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is absolutely correct about the numbers that were allocated to that particular project. We have asked both the public and the separate boards in Calgary to take the dollars that were allocated, except for a portion that would see the design and up to the contract of papers – they would be able to continue doing that – and use the rest of the money on other projects within their jurisdiction. So that's what currently is happening, and it is my understanding that the board is well along the way in the planning and the design in both cases, so once the money does become available, they'll be ready to go to tender.

MRS. ADY: My final supplemental to the hon. minister: if revenues are higher than projected in the first quarter and further moneys are restored to Infrastructure, can the minister assure the residents of Calgary-Shaw that the restoration of this high school will be one of its top priorities?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. LUND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I like to think of myself as being very optimistic, so I would share the enthusiasm of the hon. member. However, we have to also remember that there was a total of 40 projects put on the deferral list, so we'll have to have some very serious discussion if and when more money becomes available. But, yes, all of the deferred projects, particularly these two in Calgary, are very high priority.

Regional Health Authority Budgets

DR. TAFT: Mr. Speaker, the Northern Lights, Keeweenaw, Peace, Mistahia, Lakeland, WestView, East Central, Headwaters, Chinook, and No. 5 health regions are all either projecting budget shortfalls this fiscal year or are looking at reducing services to meet their budgets. My questions are to the Minister of Health and Wellness. How does the minister explain why so many rural RHAs are anticipating deficits?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, I'm referring to issue 21 of the 25th Legislature, Second Session, Alberta Hansard for Tuesday afternoon, April 16, where the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview asked the question that he's asking today, and I'll refer him to page 714 for the answer.

If I may reiterate that answer, Mr. Speaker, health is the top priority of this government. A 7 percent increase has gone into the Department of Health and Wellness. About half of that money, roughly $250 million, has gone into the operations of regional health authorities. The health budget has gone up since 1995 approximately 88 percent.

We have some regional health authorities that say: our allocations of 6 or 7 percent increase are insufficient; we need 10 or 15 percent. Mr. Speaker, I don't think anybody would accept that that is a sustainable growth pattern for regional health authorities, and at some point regional health authorities have to assess the services that they provide and ask: are there ways that we can do this better? Are there co-ordinations that we can have with other regional health authorities? Can we share services? Can we contract with one another? Can we be innovative? Can we have provincewide services that we all contribute to and share and accrue the benefits of the shared services? These are exactly the types of ideas that will be posed to the Committee on Collaboration and Innovation, that will be chaired by our colleague the Member for Edmonton-Glenora. I look forward to regional health authorities doing exactly that.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If the minister paid attention, he'd know that yesterday's questions were on electricity prices and health premiums.

Will RHAs be allowed to run deficits for the 2002-03 fiscal year?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, the letter that I sent out to regional health authorities asking for their business plans to be completed by the end of this month clearly indicates that they are not to be planning for long-term deficits.

DR. TAFT: Given that legislation and regulations leave open the possibility that RHAs could issue debentures or borrow for capital projects, will the minister rule out this option for RHAs?

MR. MAR: Well that's an interesting idea, Mr. Speaker. I expect it will be something that will be considered by the committee being headed up by Mr. David Tuer. We are looking at different ways of funding capital, of funding operations. We're looking at ways of allowing regional health authorities to have different sources of revenues. That is a constructive suggestion. I expect that it will be considered in due course.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, followed by the hon. Member for Little Bow.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Minister of Learning admitted that he was dead wrong last fall when he claimed that no fund-raising for classroom essentials was taking place. However, instead of fixing the problem of underfunding, the minister is going to pass a regulation banning fund-raising for essentials. I wouldn't be surprised if the minister's next move is going to be to make it illegal for parents to possess chocolate almonds. My questions are to the minister. After punishing teachers with Bill 12 and sending scolding letters to religious leaders and now going after the parents, whom is the minister planning to take to the woodshed next?

DR. TAYLOR: I thought you liked chocolate almonds, Lyle.

DR. OBERG: Yeah, Mr. Speaker, I do like chocolate almonds. I enjoy them quite a bit, actually.

As I answered the previous hon. member who asked me this question, there needs to be clarity around fund-raising. The ASB policy I've already read into the Assembly today. I still continue to receive from the opposition and from a lot of different people reports about fund-raising for textbooks. Mr. Speaker, I'll say it again: textbooks and those core essentials of the curriculum are not something that should be fund-raised for. There is money there. Again I'll use the same numbers that I already used to answer the previous question, and I realize that the hon. member can look at it in Hansard. There's $7,500 spent per student, which works out to around $150,000 per classroom. We expect, the citizens of Alberta expect, the government of Alberta expects that when we spend $3.7 billion, the kids will have textbooks.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now that the chair of Calgary's board of education has added her voice to those saying that there is not enough money for education, why is the minister reacting in a knee-jerk fashion by punishing parents who raise moneys to pay for classroom essentials?

DR. OBERG: Again, Mr. Speaker, I do believe that the hon. member has stretched the facts considerably. As a matter of fact, I met with the Calgary public school chairman just this morning, and what they said is that they completely agree that parents should not be fund-raising for textbooks. That's what she said.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final supplementary to the minister: why is the minister so determined to put in place a regulation on parent fund-raising designed only to save the government political embarrassment while doing nothing about chronic underfunding?

DR. OBERG: Unlike the opposition, Mr. Speaker, we actually listen to what our parents have to say, and what our parents have to say is that they feel that they should not be fund-raising for textbooks. Quite frankly, I agree. In the year 2000 the Alberta School Boards Association put out a policy guideline saying that they should not be fund-raising for core curriculum materials. That's something that this side agrees with. We continue to get complaints about this, so there has to be some clarity put around what is fund-raised for. Any regulation or any policy manual that we do will contain that clarity, that is so badly needed on this situation.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Little Bow, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

Electricity Billing

MR. McFARLAND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This past month I've been made aware of hundreds, perhaps as many as 1,400, EPCOR billings that have been sent out in an erroneous fashion that ranged from $700 to $3,999 per household. To compound the problem, this last week my office is starting to get phone calls from people who've just got their first billing for the year 2002, followed by a disconnect notice three days later. My questions are to the Minister of Energy. What can you do on behalf of many, many very unhappy customers, Mr. Minister, that would require EPCOR to mail out accurate billings to begin with?

AN HON. MEMBER: Good question.

MR. SMITH: Well, it is a good question, as my colleague has just pointed out, Mr. Speaker, and those customers in the constituency of Little Bow are important constituents. I was quite privileged to be able to attend a meeting with some of those constituents and listen carefully to some of the issues that they brought forward with respect to electricity restructuring. The utilities might be deemed to be even a little slower than governments these days and in fact a little bit more resilient to change than what they should be, and they are going to have to become more customer oriented. That's exactly the focus of electricity restructuring, that the customer will be right, shall be right, and have the information to be right.

If you take the customers in the member's area, they were the customers of three different power companies in a period of less than 12 months. Firstly, TransAlta, who then sold the customer base to, secondly, Utilicorp, and then Utilicorp kept the distribution part and sold the retail supply to EPCOR.

So, Mr. Speaker, the issue is that these private-sector companies who have welcomed and wanted the challenge of competing in a market industry have got to act like market players, treat their customers like the precious commodity that they are, bill at appropriate times, and use the mechanisms at their disposal to deliver good, prompt, efficient customer service.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. McFARLAND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My supplementary to the same minister: do you have the power and the ability, Mr. Minister, to force EPCOR, in this case, to reimburse late-payment charges, to keep the power on, and possibly to reimburse reconnect charges?

MR. SMITH: Well, officials in the Department of Energy and staff in my office have been working with individual customers as they phone us and talk to us of their issues. I can report to you that in the overall scheme of things, Mr. Speaker, there are less complaints than there were in the first three months of restructuring. I can tell you that in discussions with EPCOR, they say that they will do everything they can to keep the power on. If a consumer gets a huge bill that they can't pay in one shot but in fact it's an accurate bill, EPCOR is prepared to work with their customers to make arrangements for the bill to be paid over time. So we're seeing signs, in fact glimmers, of real customer service.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. McFARLAND: Thank you. I do appreciate your co-operation with our ratepayers. However, mad customers in our riding want to know, Mr. Minister: can you point them in a direction as to what market alternatives and consumer choices there are if they continue to be totally unhappy with their present biller?

MR. SMITH: Well, yes, Mr. Speaker. I again want to congratulate the member for carefully-thought-out questions that do provide good information to his constituents, and in fact it's these types of questions that keep these private entities on their toes. For example, EPCOR says that it is also waiving interest charges and other penalties in cases where the delay in billing leads to a bill not being sent out in a timely manner.

Now, the member's constituents who are in the Utilicorp service area have a service that is regulated by the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board. So, one, they can take the issue directly to the utility. That would be either EPCOR as the power provider or Utilicorp as the transmission provider. Secondly, if they don't get appropriate satisfaction from these two entities, it is absolutely their right to take the complaint to the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board, which has a mandate to ensure that the delivery of Alberta's resources that takes place is fair, responsible, and in the public interest.

Charter of Rights and Freedoms

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today we mark the 20th anniversary of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The passage of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in 1982 is indisputably an important milestone in the evolution of law in Canada. Generally speaking, the fundamental freedoms protected by the Charter – freedom of religion; thought, belief, and opinion; peaceful assembly; and association – are among the tenets that have made Canada a recognized world leader in democracy and human rights. We are fortunate to have laws in Alberta such as the Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act that speak to the equal dignity and rights of all citizens and our belief in the ability of society to transform itself into a culture that respects and promotes human rights. The John Humphrey Centre for Peace and Human Rights is located in Edmonton and will be hosting a conference on April 25 and 26 in recognition of the 20th anniversary.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Norwood.

Thelma Melnichuk
Ed Feihle

MR. MASYK: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to acknowledge the volunteer spirit that is alive and well here in Edmonton. This time it has manifested itself through two energetic and hardworking individuals whom I'd like to recognize today: Mrs. Thelma Melnichuk and Mr. Ed Feihle. Thelma and Ed are long-serving members of Edmonton North District Area Council Two. I met them recently at a dinner honouring volunteers of the north district area. Ed has volunteered over 15 years of his time on the executive council for North District Area Council Two, running both bingo and casino. Thelma also has volunteered her time and community spirit as a bingo chairperson for the Edmonton North District Area Council Two.

Both Ed and Thelma set great examples for volunteers in and around Edmonton, and I'm proud to recognize such outstanding individuals for their excellent hard work. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Des Pardes Times

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As today is the 20th anniversary of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, it is particularly timely for the Legislature to recognize the establishment of a new Punjabi language newspaper to serve the needs of Alberta's Indo-Canadian community. The newspaper will be called Des Pardes Times, which means news from the old country and the new country. The Des Pardes Times will be published biweekly and will provide news and information from Alberta, Canada, and India. It will be based in Edmonton and will be produced in Edmonton. Many people are choosing Alberta and, in particular, Edmonton for their new home. The Indo-Canadian community has seized this opportunity and has become a prominent participant in the business, social, and political institutions of this province. One of the main goals of Des Pardes Times will be to further encourage and foster the community's involvement in Edmonton and Alberta's businesses and social life.

We wish Gurbhalinder Sandhu, the editor-in-chief, and his partners every success in their new endeavour.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Belcourt/Brosseau Metis Awards

MR. DUCHARME: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to congratulate Herb and Orval Belcourt, Georges Brosseau, and the Edmonton Community Foundation for their dedication and commitment to ensuring that postsecondary education is accessible and affordable for Metis youth by supporting the creation of the Belcourt/Brosseau Metis awards. The government supports your initiative. Through your efforts you are providing Metis students with the opportunity to continue their educational journey. By strengthening access for Metis learners, you are helping to make our province stronger for these individuals and all Albertans. It is very important that we help our young people develop the knowledge, skills, and positive attitudes that will enable them to be self-confident and successful.

Again, congratulations on your efforts, and continued success in the future.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Charter of Rights and Freedoms Anniversary of Women's Enfranchisement

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to recognize two anniversaries of special significance to women. Today, April 17, is the 20th anniversary of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and Friday, April 19, is the anniversary of women getting the vote in Alberta.

Section 15 of the Charter set out prohibited grounds of discrimination and included gender as one of those grounds. In addition, to ensure that there was no mistaking the intent, Section 28 was also included and spelled out that the rights and freedoms in the Charter are guaranteed equally to male and female persons. Strong words, strong policy, strong protection: these sections were a watershed for women's equality. I can't talk about the Charter without saluting the work of LEAF, the Legal Education and Action Fund.

I also recognize and celebrate the enfranchisement of women in Alberta on April 19, 1916. The following June they were able to exercise that franchise and vote in their first election. I applaud grassroots activity by some women to create handmade dolls and leave them in public places for all to see and be reminded of women's achievements and continued struggle.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Cheyenne Price

MR. MARZ: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I stand to recognize an outstanding young constituent from Swalwell, Alberta. Cheyenne Price is one of 16 Alberta students named as a 2002 Great Kids award winner out of over 400 applications that were submitted. Great Kids were chosen throughout Alberta from hundreds of their peers for outstanding contributions to their community.

Cheyenne, who is a dedicated student and athlete, was struck with an unknown illness in 1998, and although many treatments have been tried, none have worked. Since her illness Cheyenne is unable to eat food and receives all her nourishment through intravenous. In spite of all the challenges that this illness and various invasive treatments have presented, this 19-year-old young lady has faced them with courage, bravery, and unwavering faith. Although she can no longer play basketball, she still helps to coach on days she is able to feel strong enough to leave the hospital.

Cheyenne, you have been such an inspiration and encouragement to everyone in our community as well as all those that you've come in contact with. I know that this Assembly joins me in congratulating you on receiving your 2002 Great Kids award and assuring you that you are in our hopes and prayers in finding a cure for your illness.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Dan McLean

MR. KNIGHT: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to recognize an elder of the Sturgeon Lake Cree Nation. On April 9, 2002, Mr. Dan McLean passed away at the age of 89. Dan was born on the Sturgeon Lake reserve, nine miles west of Valleyview, on July 9, 1912. Throughout his life he lived, worked, and trapped in Alberta and northern B.C. Dan worked for many years on behalf of his community in the areas of treaty rights, education, and court services. His significant contribution is recognized in First Nation councils across northern Alberta.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

head: Presenting Petitions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm presenting a petition signed by 104 residents of Edmonton petitioning the Legislative Assembly "to urge the government to not delist services, raise health care premiums, introduce user fees or further privatize health care."

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to make two tablings today. The first tabling is a letter from David Gainer, who currently lives in Seattle but grew up in Alberta and spent lots of time here. This letter is addressed to the Premier regarding Bill 12 and the teachers' labour dispute. Mr. Gainer writes that he had always hoped to return to Alberta to raise his family, but the government's actions in the last few months have made him rethink all this.

The second tabling, Mr. Speaker, is also a letter. In this case it is from a parent from Calgary by the name of Theo van Vugt, addressed to the Minister of Learning advising him that he is stopping all volunteer work, including fund raising activities at the school for his children.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I have one tabling today. I'm tabling the appropriate number of copies of a letter from Jeff Goth, a teacher. Mr. Goth details hundreds of his volunteer activities and financial contributions to his school. These include paying for science resources and prizes and snacks, subsidizing trips and buying clothes, paying for bulletin board borders and posters and pencils and art supplies, and buying hundreds of books.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have one tabling this afternoon, and this is a petition organized again by Darby Mahon of the constituency of Edmonton-Gold Bar. Mr. Mahon is organizing this petition from citizens who are supporting public and separate school teachers in the current dispute with the provincial government.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With permission I have two tablings. The first is a letter that I've been asked by Diane Tilma of Ponoka to table indicating that she feels that the Child Welfare System has let her and her deceased husband and her five step-children down.

The second is the required number of copies of 55 letters from parents at Hillhurst community school in Calgary voicing their formal objections to Bill 12, the Education Services Settlement Act.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

2:40

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have four tablings today. The first tabling is from Tunde Dawodu from the African Festival and Presentation Society of Calgary noting that the funding from the community lottery board allowed the society to improve its administrative capability and that they couldn't have received this money from other foundations because it's outside of their mandate.

The second tabling I have is directed to the Member for Calgary-Buffalo from Ellen Busby, the general manager of PanCanadian Wordfest, noting that the festival is to promote and support literacy and that the lottery board program offset onetime expenses associated with specific projects, and asking for it to be reinstated.

The next letter is directed toward the Premier. It's from Shauna Kennedy, the production co-ordinator at Em Media, who gives a long list of the Calgary lottery board funded organizations that she's been personally touched by.

The final letter is from Danielle French, who is living in the Highwood constituency, noting that as an arts administrator she has felt the effects of the lottery board cuts immediately.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MR. HORNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have one tabling today. It's a letter from a constituent, Mr. Rick Curtis of St. Albert. Mr. Curtis has concerns regarding the funding for community lottery boards.

Privilege Accusations against a Member

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, yesterday at this time we heard the presentation of a purported point of privilege by the hon. Deputy Premier, and indication was given by the chair that today at this time the chair would invite the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition for comments with respect to this matter.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to begin by putting on record a sequence of events. After the Finance minister allegedly made comments about Bishop Henry of Calgary on April 11, it was brought to my attention that the Deputy Premier could also be heard making questionable comments during the exchange in the Legislature. We felt it was important to look into that matter, so we carefully reviewed the tape of question period, and indeed the Deputy Premier could be seen and heard making comments.

My question to the Deputy Premier on April 15 regarding those comments is already on the record. We felt it was important to seek clarification of what we believed was actually said. In doing this, I was exercising my rights and my privilege as a member of this Assembly. According to Beauchesne 24, the privileges of Parliament are rights which are "absolutely necessary for the due execution of its powers". They are enjoyed by individual Members, because the House cannot perform its functions without unimpeded use of the services of its Members.

As the Leader of the Official Opposition it is my duty to raise issues and ask questions that I believe are important. It is widely accepted that the purpose of question period is to seek information and to call the government to account. This is in Beauchesne 410(5). When I asked my question to the Deputy Premier, I was seeking information to clarify what I believed I heard the Deputy Premier say. My question was not malicious. I did not accuse the Deputy Premier of anything; I simply asked her to confirm what I believed I heard her say. At no time did I make an accusation. I was asking the hon. member a question. I was seeking clarification for what I believed I heard.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that as elected members of the Assembly we must feel free to ask questions and express our views. This is our parliamentary privilege. I am concerned that this issue could set an unhealthy precedent. Members must be free to ask questions. It is unavoidable that some questions will offend or cause discomfort, but the fear of offending another hon. member should not impede us in the House.

In a 1984 ruling by the Speaker of the House of Commons the Speaker noted:

The privilege of a member . . . when speaking in the House or in a Committee is absolute and that it would be very difficult to find that any statement made under the cloak of Parliamentary privilege constituted a violation of that privilege.

Additionally, in 1987 Speaker Fraser of the House of Commons noted that Parliament enjoyed the protection of absolute privilege because of the overriding need to ensure that the truth can be told, that any question can be asked, and that debate can be free and uninhibited.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is my duty as an elected member and the Leader of the Official Opposition to ensure that my right to questions remains free and uninhibited. The tradition of this House that will allow for free and uninhibited questioning must be recognized, preserved, and strengthened for members present and for members in the future.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that there is no prima facie case for a breach of privilege. It's unfortunate that I caused the member distress, and I'm sorry that that happened. In reading the statement by the Deputy Premier yesterday, I was disappointed by the comments, indeed attacks that were made regarding my conduct and the conduct of my caucus members inside and outside this House. I feel that these comments were unnecessary, unfounded, and only served to obscure the hon. member's argument for breach of privilege.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, my question was intended to seek clarification. It gave the hon. member an opportunity to clear the air and confirm what indeed had been said. The hon. member yesterday clarified her remarks, and I accept her explanation. I'm sincerely glad that she did not say what I believed I heard her say. Because there was uncertainty about the member's remarks, I had to ask the question. My intention was honourable. It gave the minister an opportunity to create certainty amidst the uncertainty surrounding comments made on April 11. The hon. member asked that I withdraw my accusation. I cannot because I did not make an accusation. I asked a question, which is my right. I will not apologize for exercising my parliamentary privilege.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will apologize. I am truly sorry for any distress or discomfort experienced by the hon. member, her family, or any of her friends. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader on this point.

MR. HANCOCK: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I'm rising only because it is with a great deal of disappointment and regret and shock, in fact, that the member opposite did not see fit to apologize and withdraw his comments and remarks. First of all, a question in this House to a member of Executive Council under our rules is for the purposes of ascertaining government policy, not for the purposes of asking what a person said or did not say in a private conversation or a public conversation when that member was not recognized in the House. So the very premise upon which he makes his remarks is unfounded and improper and should have been withdrawn, in fact should have been ruled out of order at the time.

The concept that the hon. member is using his privilege as a member in raising a question like that in the House is absolutely inappropriate right from the very start. The purpose of question period is to allow members of this House to seek explanations of government position and policy and accountability from members of Executive Council on positions of government policy. So from that perspective there is no question of the member's privileges being violated, in fact quite the opposite. In framing a question rather than making a statement, one is doing what is often done by people asking questions for which there is no appropriate answer and, by doing so, putting the very issue on the table. That, Mr. Speaker, is what breached the hon. Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development's privileges. By putting a question that's unanswerable on the table, it puts the implication out there which cannot be appropriately responded to. It was inappropriate to do it by way of question, and it was inappropriate to make that question.

Now, members have to have the opportunity in this House to raise issues when statements are made. Members are recognized to speak, and when you recognize a member of this House to speak, that is the only person who is on the record in this House and the only person who is entitled to speak. But there are occasions from time to time when inappropriate things are said or done, and people have to have the opportunity to deal with that. There is an appropriate way to deal with that: going through the Speaker to research the question and to find out before putting something on the record and abusing a person's reputation. Before doing that. So the process was inappropriate in terms of using question period as a way to ask that type of a question, and it was inappropriate to make an allegation of that nature on the record without having done the appropriate research ahead of time.

Mr. Speaker, on both counts I would support the hon. minister's question of privilege and ask that you rule that there is a prima facie case. It has not been answered in any way, shape, or form by the hon. member. In fact, he has made it worse.

THE SPEAKER: Additional comments on this point? We've heard one from the government side. Is there anyone else?

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to get drawn into this.

THE SPEAKER: You were recognized yesterday. You made a comment. Is it something further?

MR. MASON: It is.

THE SPEAKER: We're not having a debate here.

MR. MASON: No. I appreciate that.

I believe that the hon. Government House Leader is correct about one thing, and that is that question period is an opportunity to hold the government accountable for its administration and its policy. I would suggest that there is a point of order that would be valid. I do not believe that a point of privilege should be sustained on this item.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. STEVENS: Yes. I wish to speak to this matter, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Deputy Premier in her comments the other day indicated that the thing that one has that is most valuable is one's reputation, and you spend a lifetime establishing what that reputation is. I don't think that there is anybody in this House who would disagree with that. What the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition did by raising the first question, which was denied, and putting forward the second question, which flew in the face of the answer that he received, was call into question the Deputy Premier's reputation. That is the type of thing that is published outside of this House. That is the kind of thing that swirls around in the media, and there is no basis. All that the hon. Leader of the Opposition has said today is: I had a belief. Well, anybody can stand forward and say, "I had a belief, and I ask the question by saying: I thought I heard you say." But the fact of the matter is that there is no foundation – no foundation – that has been offered by the hon. member opposite for his belief. Nothing. Yet he has put forward the hon. Deputy Premier's reputation, called it into question.

The purpose of this process, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion is to establish whether there is a prima facie case. If there is, that will give the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition an opportunity to lay the foundation for his belief. If he can, then that is one thing. He didn't choose to do that today. If there is no foundation, however, no possibility of a reasonable belief, then there is the issue of mala fides, and that is what we're talking about here. If you have no basis for standing up here and asking a question, then you ought to be called to account, and that is what this is about.

THE SPEAKER: The chair is prepared to rule on the purported question of privilege that was raised by the Deputy Premier yesterday afternoon. The chair confirms that proper notice was given by the Deputy Premier Monday afternoon shortly after the incident in question transpired, and therefore the requirements in Standing Order 15(5) have been met. The Leader of the Official Opposition has had an opportunity over the last 24 hours to review the Deputy Premier's comments from yesterday where she clarifies the nature of her statements that were the focus of the leader's questions on Monday afternoon.

The chair would like to say at the outset how it is regrettable that this matter has not already been resolved. The events giving rise to this purported question of privilege stem from the Leader of the Official Opposition's third set of questions during Oral Question Period on Monday. During his preamble the leader stated, "We believe" certain statements were made by the Minister of Finance and the Deputy Premier during question period on April 11, 2002. The Deputy Premier unequivocally denied making the statements alleged by the Leader of the Official Opposition, as reported in the April 15 Hansard at page 667. This reply to the first question should have ended the matter. However, the Leader of the Official Opposition ignored the Deputy Premier's response when he asked the question, "How do statements like that reflect policy decisions made by the government?"

Typically, in this Assembly one accepts the word of an hon. member. To quote from Beauchesne, sixth edition, at paragraph 494, "It has been formally ruled by Speakers that statements by Members respecting themselves and particularly within their own knowledge must be accepted." I emphasize the word "must."

The chair is reluctant to report the exact words that the leader attributed to the Deputy Premier. Had the Deputy Premier or any member stated these words on the record, the chair would have intervened as they most definitely impugn the reputations of individuals outside the House and would be out of order. The Leader of the Official Opposition used the device of asking the Deputy Premier: did she use the phrase? It is a well-established parliamentary principle that members cannot do something indirectly that cannot be done directly. This is well stated in Erskine May, 22nd edition, at page 387: "A Member is not allowed to use unparliamentary words by the device of putting them in somebody else's mouth."

There was no doubt in the chair's mind that the Leader of the Official Opposition's first supplementary question was a breach of the rules of this Assembly. This is a clear violation of Standing Order 23(h).

Now, whether this amounts to a prima facie question of privilege is another matter. The question is whether the words constituted an improper obstruction to the member in performing her parliamentary work. The chair listened very attentively yesterday to the Deputy Premier's comments that the leader's allegations have affected the dignity of the House and have called her reputation into question. These appeared to be heartfelt comments, and the chair takes this matter very seriously. However, the chair faces some difficulty in concluding that this constitutes a prima facie question of privilege. First, the alleged comments that were the subject of the Leader of the Official Opposition's question were not recorded in the official records of the Assembly, nor did the chair hear the remarks. As noted in paragraph 486 of Beauchesne and at page 526 of House of Commons Procedure and Practice, private conversations not heard by the chair do not invite the intervention of the chair. This may address the point made by the Member for Edmonton-Highlands yesterday.

Secondly, the weight of parliamentary authority indicates that allegations against a member are very rarely held to be a breach of privilege. In previous rulings that have involved allegations against members, one on November 17, 1998, and the second one on May 28, 2001, the chair has cited the following passage from Joseph Maingot's work Parliamentary Privilege in Canada, second edition, at page 254:

Language spoken during a parliamentary proceeding that impugns the integrity of Members would be unparliamentary and a breach of order contrary to the Standing Orders, but not a breach of privilege.

The chair would also take note of the ruling from the House of Commons by former Speaker Fraser from May 5, 1987, where he held that an allegation of a purported conflict of interest against the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport, the Hon. Otto Jelinek, did not amount to a prima facie question of privilege as the member's ability to perform his functions had not been impaired.

Finally, given that the Deputy Premier has had the opportunity to clarify her comments in the official records of this Assembly, it is very clear what in fact transpired last Thursday. As this is now part of the official records of this Assembly, it is difficult to see that this situation now falls into the group of rare examples where an allegation has impeded a member's parliamentary duty.

Although the chair has not found a prima facie case of privilege, the chair is very concerned about the statements in this Assembly that have given rise to the points of order and privilege over the last few days. As all hon. members know, points of privilege should arise very rarely in our Assembly. However, recent events in this House would suggest otherwise, as this is the third privilege ruling in three days. What transpires in this Assembly receives wide attention, and unsubstantiated accusations or allegations not only impugn the integrity of the particular member but tend to diminish the respect and dignity that is given to the institution of parliament.

The chair realizes that this is a serious place where serious words are used. The stakes are high, but at the end of the day members have to work together to do the work that the people of Alberta have elected them to do. Unsubstantiated allegations and accusations only serve to poison the environment we must all work in and bring no credit to the member raising the unsubstantiated allegations and accusations.

The bottom line is that this is very clearly a violation of Standing Order 23(h), and failure by the Leader of the Official Opposition to withdraw his comments or apologize will result in the chair calling the member to order. The chair would now call on the Leader of the Official Opposition, who may wish to resolve this matter now or wait until this time Thursday, to respond.

DR. NICOL: Mr. Speaker, I can't emphasize in this House the sorrow that I feel in the anguish I've caused the Deputy Premier. I acted on what I believed was a proper process. The end result is not in any way or form what I thought it would be or what I intended it to be. I was seeking clarification. I withdraw that part, all of that comment. I apologize to the Deputy Premier, her family, and her friends, as I said.

I think the deputy House leader on the other side made reference to a whirlwind. Well, when we put words out into the wind, we never know how they're going to be heard, we never know how they're going to be perceived, and we never know the connotation in which they are interpreted. I can tell this House with all of my integrity that it was not intended in any way to reduce the esteem and the honour in which I hold the Deputy Premier. Under I think it was section 23 you said, I do withdraw that part of my question. It was a follow-up to the first part that was done in the context again of the preamble, not necessarily the response to the question, but if that is the point of contention, I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker, and I really apologize to this House and will be much more diligent in the future.

THE SPEAKER: I want to bring this matter to a close. Hon. Deputy Premier, from the records of our Assembly and particularly from the records of Thursday, September 23, 1993, a similar type of event occurred, and I read from the official records of the day.

If a member intends to apologize for and withdraw any remark, whether as a result of a point of order or a question of privilege, the apology should be sincere and the withdrawal unequivocal.

The statement of the day further says, "The Oxford Dictionary defines apology as a: 'regretful acknowledgment of [an offence] or failure; [an] assurance that no offence was intended,'" and apology further by the offending member will invariably close the matter. Close the matter. Does the hon. Deputy Premier feel that this matter has now been closed?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, in my comments yesterday I said:

It is my sincere hope that the Leader of the Opposition does the honourable thing and unconditionally apologizes, withdraws the accusation, and admits that what he said and did was wrong.

I believe I heard some regret of the comments. I believe I heard an apology, and I believe I heard a withdrawal of some words.

This, as I indicated yesterday, has probably been one of the most hurtful things that has occurred in my almost 15 years in the Legislature, probably most hurtful because it came from a person that I felt was an honourable colleague and indeed a friend. I will accept the comments that have been made, whether they fully meet – my personal thoughts on this, Mr. Speaker, may take me some time to determine, but in the best interests of the operation of this House and in the hope that the dignity of this institution is considered more carefully by all of us, I would consider the matter closed.

head: Government Bills and Orders

MR. HANCOCK: Mr. Speaker, as has become the norm, I seek unanimous consent of the Assembly to waive Standing Order 58(4) to allow this afternoon's consideration of the estimates of the Department of Energy to go beyond two hours with the vote on these estimates to take place no later than 5:15 this afternoon as per Standing Order 58(5) or sooner if no one further wishes to speak.

[Unanimous consent granted]

head: Committee of Supply

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: We will call the committee to order.

head: Main Estimates 2002-03

Energy

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: As per our Standing Orders the first hour is allocated between the minister and members of the opposition, following which any other member is able to raise questions. I now invite the Minister of Energy for his comments.

MR. SMITH: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Let me talk about, with pleasure, the estimates for the fiscal year 2002-2003. I think that since Premier John Brownlee passed the Natural Resources Transfer Act of October of 1930, it's been very clear that oil and gas have been of primary importance to not only this Legislature, not only the elected members but also to all Albertans. In fact, when some 66,000 people gain their daily bread from oil and gas and it affects as much as 35 percent of our gross domestic product, you can see that the attitude of exploring for oil, exploring for gas has indeed permeated all Albertans. In fact, an old geologist once said that oil is not found in the ground, but it's found in the minds of men.

Having talked about the importance of oil and gas in this province and how its revenues this year are focused at just under $4 billion and the fact that we depend on it greatly for our economic well-being, we are going to listen very hard to the comments from members opposite, we are going to listen very hard to the comments from our own members, and we're going to work very hard at providing good, straightforward answers as quickly as we can provide them so that there is good information in the hands of all our elected members here. I think this is an industry so critical to Alberta's future – and it's a very complex business, Mr. Chairman – that we have to continue to know more and more about it every day, and I think that part of this exercise might help us put that knowledge out towards members who haven't worked in the industry.

Now, as I look at the Assembly, I know that the Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky has had a lifetime of experience in the oil and gas industry and understands its economic value to his constituency. I know that the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar has worked hard in the industry and has a good understanding of the industry. When I see the Minister of Sustainable Resource Development, I know that he has had experience with the oil and gas industry and knows what it means to northern communities and communities that sit upon absolute lakes of bitumen. In fact, if you take a look at the heavy oil deposits around this province, Mr. Chairman, you'll find that they'll take up 20 percent of the size of France. There are some 140 square kilometres of oil sands.

If you take a look at the Member for Airdrie-Rocky View, that member was brought up in the oil and gas industry and in fact probably had her first glimpses of all Alberta through the windshield of a pickup truck while rigs were on the move. If I look at those others here, Mr. Chairman, I can see that there is a really broad array of oil patch expertise. I even think of the Member for Calgary-Bow and know that her experience in computer software brought her into close contact with the oil and gas industry.

This is an industry that leads Alberta, that Albertans breathe every day. They take risks. They win from it; they lose from it. There used to be an old story about an Alberta oilman who went to the dentist, Mr. Chairman. The dentist looked at him and said, "You have absolutely perfect teeth," to which the oilman replied: "Well, drill anyway. I feel lucky."

Part of the oil and gas industry, Mr. Chairman, is not only the fact that it generates substantial and fair royalties to its owners, Albertans, but it generates investments, and investment creates the jobs. It's the jobs that have created the fabulous growth of this province and allowed us to move forward. I think that when we see the linkages of this industry and the linkages with northern gas, Alaska gas, you can see we have a province that has a strong and secure future.

We also have a secret weapon, Mr. Chairman, that I know everybody is counting on. We've got to be the only jurisdiction I know of on the globe that has conventional oil deposits that are declining yet has oil production that is rising. That's because of the oil sands, the manufacturing and mining of bitumen or the oil sands. Some 311 billion barrels of recoverable reserves sitting on a lake of some 1.3 trillion barrels of oil will keep Alberta in the pink or in the black for a long, long time. We are fortunate, and it's because of a good partnership between government and industry with responsible regulation from one of two top regulatory boards housed in Alberta: the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board.

So, Mr. Chairman, I know that members opposite, those remaining, are absolutely eager and keen to get involved with this. I just want to take this moment to reflect on the able assistance that a minister receives in his pursuit of his duty with the presence of Mr. Mike Ekelund, acting assistant deputy minister for gas; Mr. Bob Taylor, assistant deputy minister for oil and heavy oil; Ms Charlotte Moran, director of communications for the department; Mr. Don Keech, assistant deputy minister of minerals; Mr. Joe Miller, erstwhile appointee to the department; Mr. Ken Smith, deputy minister; and in fact just to make sure that we're giving right information, accurate information, and information that the industry can use, I also notice that Ms Nola Bietz, no stranger to this building, is here in her position as government relations vice-president for the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers. Welcome to all.

Of course, because of the arm's-length relationship that we have with the Energy and Utilities Board, I didn't want to include the head of the board with the rest of the department, Mr. Chairman, but Mr. Neil McCrank, the head of the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board, is also with us today, and we appreciate all their time spent on this topic in the House today.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I look forward to comments.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. It's a pleasure to participate this afternoon in the estimates regarding the Department of Energy, and certainly the hon. minister is going to be a very, very busy minister. There is significant interest in not only the oil and gas industry in this province but certainly in our experiment with electricity deregulation.

Now, there are probably many important regulatory bodies in this province, but the minister at the conclusion of his opening remarks touched on the role that the EUB has, not only with the department but also in the role it plays in Alberta's energy development, whether that's synthetic crude – and the minister certainly noted the dramatic increase in the production of synthetic crude. Mr. Chairman, it has been 30 years since we went on a steady decline of conventional crude oil production in this province, and the efforts made to increase synthetic crude production certainly do not go unnoticed on this side of the Assembly.

The EUB's priority areas are organizing electricity generation, public safety, and sour gas reports and recommendations – certainly with a lot of rural landowners and a lot of residents of rural Alberta sour gas is an outstanding issue – and, as I said before, oil sands development and the timely fashion in which oil sands development is proceeding.

All hon. members of this Assembly cannot underestimate or ignore the strategic role that the EUB plays. I think there are between 38 and 40 different statutes that they fall under or seek guidance from. To the Minister of Energy: in the future how will the annual budget of the EUB be determined? Will there still be this balance between industry and government, or will it eventually become a hundred percent funded by industry, or will there be more of a balance where it's 50 percent funded by government and 50 percent funded by industry?

Now, I have corresponded with the respective minister regarding my concern about this EUB advisory committee, and I received a rather gracious letter back seeking names for this advisory committee. My concern – and I still have this concern – is the ratio, Mr. Chairman, between industry representatives and public members, and this, I believe, flies in the face of the mission statement or the values that are discussed by the board. I would like to see more than one public member. You know, this doesn't have to happen overnight, but I certainly think that there should be more than one public member on the EUB advisory board. I think it would go a long way to settling a lot of these outstanding issues that have cropped up here lately regarding drilling rights and access for oil and gas production on property.

There's certainly no doubt that the activity levels of this organization – I believe it is remarkable that they have been able to carry on. Certainly in the past, in the last five years, I think they may have lost a lot of good people. There was a performance measure somewhere – I don't know if it's still here – about regrettable staff turnover. I hope that we have learned our lesson. If we're contemplating government layoffs, we only have to look at the EUB to know that perhaps it was not the right thing to do. These people were skilled, and they were recruited, I think, quickly by private industry. We, as a result, were left with long turnaround times on regulatory approvals, as I understand it.

Now, I talked earlier about the decline in conventional oil production, but there has been a dramatic increase in that same time period. When we started on the downhill slope with conventional oil production, there were about 70 companies, as I understand, active in the province, and today there are more than 1,200. That's a 1,700 percent increase. Certainly there has been a reflection in wells drilled in that same time period. There's been a 740 percent increase.

Again, this gets back to my previous point. I certainly hope the Minister of Energy is not contemplating what was done in the past. In 1970-72, at the same time conventional oil was declining, the EUB had a staff across the province of roughly, I understand, 300. Now, 30 years later, there are 700 on staff, a little better than 700. That's roughly a 235 percent increase. You can see the activity that has gone on, and you see the staff, so I think these folks, as some people would like to call them, are certainly earning their compensation packages.

Utility hearings. There has been such a large increase in utility hearings. I want the minister to tell this Assembly that these hearings which are due to regulatory requirements associated with electricity deregulation – and there was an $8 million adjustment to the deferral accounts, this time in favour of the customers, that was announced yesterday by two utilities. The decision, I believe, is close to 290 pages, so these things take time. I want to be assured that we're going to have enough staff to conduct the affairs of this body in a timely fashion, not only for future electricity projects but also for the restructuring of the natural gas industry. Now, I'm certainly not a fan of selling our resources too quickly. I don't think we should be in such a hurry to be selling off our natural gas resources and particularly the liquids, but we'll get at that a little later on this afternoon.

There are performance measures to deal with in the EUB, and a colleague is certainly keen to discuss the performance measures, but we have to look at – and hopefully we're going to get the time to discuss this in detail this afternoon – the priorities for future electricity generation in this province. Current electric supply capability in megawatts is roughly fluctuating around 10,000. Now, it depends on what year you look at, what fiscal plan you look at. It's noteworthy, because there appear to be to this member some discrepancies there. If we had a 2 to 3 percent growth in demand annually and we do not want to rely on the imports of electricity particularly after the cap comes off the Pacific northwest, we could be in trouble again.

There's certainly a nervous line of questioning from government members to the minister during question period regarding rural electrification areas, whether it's about billing or whether it's about the cost of the power.

Now, certainly there are new power projects on-line. In the Peace district there are two, I believe. There are a couple in Calgary with location-based credits. I was told repeatedly that we're out of the business of being in business, and this notion of having location-based credits – yes, we have transmission difficulties, and this is one of the problems that the minister is going to have to deal with. We have a lot of talk of reaching capacity with the main north/south line. There's talk of having a line built from Fort McMurray south, and there is talk of the export line.

We had a committee struck, this electricity supply task force. That was formed, I believe, as a result of a brownout, and I consider us lucky – it's good luck – that we have not had another significant shortage of electricity since that unfortunate Sunday afternoon in Calgary. There was a committee struck, and there was a report completed in February of last year. I believe there were 14 recommendations made. To the hon. minister: how many of these recommendations have been implemented, and when are the other recommendations from that task force going to be implemented? I don't believe they've all been implemented.

Now, sour gas is discussed as perhaps the EUB's biggest future challenge, and it's the number one fear, as I understand it, for rural Albertans, for the lives of their families, for the health impact on their families, on livestock. Certainly it's reflected in property values, because if you have a high pressure sour gas well within a kilometre of your home, perhaps it's going to be harder to sell.

There has been public consultation across Alberta. There were many, many recommendations made. When are these recommendations to be implemented and how many?

I said this last year in, I believe, the same department, and I guess, Mr. Chairman, if you repeat it often enough, perhaps it will become reality. I would like to see the Peace River district made a priority for future oil sands development. If it cannot be made a priority, if I could have the answer as to why not, I would be very, very grateful. I know that Shell did some work up there. I thought the results of that work were positive, but perhaps I've been misinformed. Now, certainly for in situ development – perhaps not the conventional drag the overburden off and let's make a mine – perhaps it's time that we spread this development a little further to the west. I've said this earlier. I know we seem to be having budget shortfalls, but I see a highway going straight west of Fort McMurray right across to the Peace region someday, a two-lane highway, paved. Hopefully I will live to see that day.

Now, we certainly have a lot of international experience in the energy industry in this province, and I would like to know what priority the department is putting on increasing trade and expertise with the Chinese government. My research indicates to me that one of the largest increases in consumption of petroleum or petroleum products for the next 10 years is going to come from the Chinese, and I see that as a market opportunity. I would like to know what we're doing to export and make a dollar on, as well, some of our Alberta technology. Certainly a lot of other areas on the globe are cutting back through conservation their use of petroleum and petroleum products, but it doesn't seem to be the case in China. I wonder what the hon. minister has to say regarding that.

Also, the use of fuel cells. I would also like to live long enough, Mr. Chairman, to see the widespread use of fuel cells not only in automobiles but in large installations that would, say, supply electricity for a fairly large complex, much larger than this Legislative Assembly and the surrounding buildings. What studies is the Department of Energy doing to encourage the development of fuel cells and fuel cell technology in this province? It's the future. I am concerned about the decline in conventional crude oil. As that declines, it gets more expensive to find, but fuel cells are maybe one of the alternatives we could look at.

I would also at this time like to know what the department is considering as far as royalties – I'm going to get to royalties a little later – on coal-bed methane perhaps as that develops. Now, I'm told that 7 percent of the natural gas in America that's produced comes from coal-bed methane. There are a lot of deep coal seams, particularly in central Alberta, you know, lying east, to the west, to the foothills from almost highway 2. What studies are being done regarding the exploitation of this resource, and what sort of royalty structure would be set up for that?

Now, I'm not satisfied with any of the answers I've received in this next related issue, and that's electricity exports and imports to this province. We were sort of an isolated grid before this experiment, this costly experiment on electricity deregulation that has gone on. We were sort of isolated. Certainly there were requirements every now and then for imports, but we have gone from some of the cheapest electricity in North America to some of the most expensive. Not only is it expensive; it is not reliable. It is noteworthy that as many officials gathered to celebrate the naming of Edmonton as one of the best places in the world to do business at the Shaw Conference Centre, there was a reception going on. It was about a month ago. It was a noteworthy achievement, but it was clouded by the fact that at that time the Power Pool price between 6 and 7 o'clock on that day was, as I recall, 23 cents a kilowatt-hour. If that price was to be sustained, it would literally kill our economic advantage. I can look at some of the prices that have occurred, Mr. Chairman. We'll talk about this later on. I'll cede the floor.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Before I recognize the hon. minister, may we briefly revert to Introduction of Guests?

[Unanimous consent granted]

head: Introduction of Guests

(reversion)

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

MS KRYCZKA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I wish to introduce to you and through you to members of this Assembly two guests who were here earlier and had to leave: Peter Kinnear, who is the director of government and regulatory affairs of the TrueNorth Energy foothills oil sands project, and D'Arcy Levesque, vice-president of public and government affairs, also of the TrueNorth Energy foothills oil sands project. I just want to share that Peter was at one time the executive assistant to hon. LeRoy Fjordbotten. He is also a constituent of mine and, I know, a great supporter of mine in Calgary-West both on my PC Association board and also in the community. These two guests in their absentia can't rise, but I would just like us to welcome them in the appropriate manner as if they were here.

Thank you.

Energy (continued)

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Minister of Energy.

MR. SMITH: Thank you. I guess hiding behind those two guests, Mr. Chairman, was Mr. Doug Borland from the department, who I did not see in my first pass of the members' gallery.

I really, really want to respond to the questions from the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, the Official Opposition critic. I want to respond to all the questions, and I might even respond to the one or two that are directed at the estimates.

Mr. Chairman, there's lots of interesting content, and I'll try to take them from top to bottom rather than trying to sort them. It sounds like the member is equally as proud of the accomplishments of the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board as I am. I believe that prior to his arrival as a private member my second bill that I took through as a government member was the amalgamation of the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board, the old Energy Resources Conservation Board, and the public utilities commission. So that's legislation that has my name on it, and I am extremely proud of the work that those people have done under difficult circumstances.

In fact, the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar points out that they continued to meet their performance measure even under difficult times of a high turnover due to some difficult wage gaps between that of the regulator and that of the private sector. As the member goes through the business plan, which I know he's keen to do, he will see that in fact the actions of the last year have reduced the turnover of staff of regrettable man-years from some 400 to well below that of 125 years. So in fact progress has been made, and he's been very good to point that out, Mr. Chairman. Of course, while he was reading that, he didn't mention it specifically, but I know it was in the back of his mind that the Energy and Utilities Board continued to meet their standards 99.9 percent of the time. So in fact even in periods of high turnover they were able to perform diligently.

Of course, the member I think is complimenting the diligent work of this government, of over 100 people who actively spend every waking moment on the royalty regime. He talks about the expansion of oil companies and gas companies in Alberta from some I think his numbers were 70 to over 1,200, a 1,710 percent increase. We welcome that growth, and we welcome that compliment from the Official Opposition critic.

Yes, he is absolutely right, Mr. Chairman, that conventional reserves peaked, I believe, in 1973 at some 1.35 million barrels per day of production and subsequently declined now to about 600,000 barrels per day. One of the things that you can do with a royalty regime is you can help enhance the oil recovery, which allows you to take more and more oil from those reservoirs that were once thought depleted. In fact, that's also spelled out in our business plan. We think that there still remains a good recoverability of further amounts of oil from those resources through enhanced oil recovery, whether it be nitrogen, which is also being used now in Weyburn, Saskatchewan, or carbon dioxide, which is used as an injectable. They're looking at ways of getting more out of those oil reserves.

I noticed through the member's comments, Mr. Chairman, that there was a theme of how he'd like more control over the private sector. I'll address that in the end, although it is contrary to the free market access and entrepreneurial basis that the government today is espousing. Reading back in past Liberal history, I would think that past Liberal control of the oil and gas industry would best resonate through the document of October 28, 1980, known as the National Energy Program. In fact, that particular program cost this province – these individuals, these companies, Liberals and Conservatives alike – some $60 billion. Although the member continues to espouse a Liberal dogma of continued control in the marketplace, we'll continue to fight that with every breath that we take to provide free enterprise a chance to succeed in this land.

Mr. Chairman, let me go on and respond. The member has indicated that he would like to appoint oil companies into the Peace River oil sands area. He's quite right in that Shell has spent a great amount of dollars there. In fact, as you go north and a little bit east of Peace River, you'll also find a significant conventional oil discovery in the Peace River arch. You see that the private sector has spent a great amount of dollars, has used technology as it has evolved over the last few years, and it's they who will make the decisions about where to drill, where to develop, and where to invest their money. In fact, what they have done is decided to put over $51 billion worth of investment into oil and gas development, and that happens to be focused, at this point, on the Fort McMurray through Bonnyville area.

Now, I know that CAPP is here. They're probably taking notes about where the member would like to see them go, and perhaps he can go and make an individual presentation to the members of the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers and explain why he believes that the Peace River area is an important area and what policies of a Liberal – shudder the thought – administration might direct private-sector activity to that area.

I do want to also speak briefly, Mr. Chairman, on the royalty comments. I know that he has more to discuss. We do believe that we have a fair royalty program. It's one that has been worked on diligently. It is one that has performed with admirable results. Its performance measures are outlined in the business plan. Again, it's one that we always welcome any comments on from anybody that may wish to add to the discussion.

Also, the member commented about the advisory committee at the EUB. We would welcome very much a Liberal submission to the EUB on what that particular party would deem appropriate funding for the organization. We do know that the EUB wrings value out of every dollar that they are granted from the budget of the Department of Energy and from every dollar that they use from the private sector. They are busy, as the member points out, on the electricity side. They have delivered the goods consistently inside the performance standards that they have published. They've done it with decisions in the Wabamun-Sundance area and with decisions in the Calgary area.

I do have to comment, just to clarify for the record, Mr. Chairman, on reliability. During the period of the new electricity market restructuring, there is no record of one cubic foot of gas not being delivered, of one kilowatt-hour of electricity not being delivered, of one dark moment in a bright Alberta, either future or past, that can be attributed to the deregulated model. Again, if the member has specific or directed evidence, we would be more than pleased to discuss that with him. I will say, though, as the member talks about control over where companies should be, control over how our expertise in marketing should be marketed, control over fuel sale royalties, that there's a marketplace out there. There's a marketplace that works. The deregulation or competitive market model of electricity has in fact created conservation through increased pricing signals. We do know that when the price goes up, people do use less. That's been proven over the past 12 months. We've seen almost a 6 percent conservation effect. Compare that to the experience in California, where those signals were blurred and in fact conservation did not occur.

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

With respect to international service, international training, our expertise, we have supported the China-Alberta Petroleum Centre. They are a jurisdiction that's going to have a very, very difficult challenge. Their Daqing field, some 40 years old, now produces half of their petroleum requirements. They are doing a little work offshore. They're working with the private sector as well, but we have provided them with some avenues, as we have in other jurisdictions, for individual companies working in those state jurisdictions.

I do not believe that it is the job of this government to tell the private sector where they can make money. I think the private sector does a better job, a more effective job, and a more profitable job for Albertans to find their markets, develop their markets, and deploy their expertise. I believe it is our job to support their efforts, to provide them with entry points to markets where we can, but clearly the decisions lie in the hands of the private sector. I know that the Minister of Economic Development works very hard with the Alberta Economic Development Authority, and those discussions take place at that market, although I know that the Liberal way would be to provide a little bit more control on that.

So I think that covers the first pass of questions, Mr. Chairman, and I look forward to more from the members of the opposition. Thank you.

3:50

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. It's a pleasure to get this opportunity to rise again. That was an interesting discourse by the Minister of Energy. So that my comments are not being misrepresented, there certainly is a role for regulatory bodies, and the EUB is a regulatory body. I will say no more on this matter other than to encourage all hon. members of this Assembly and members of the general public in the galleries to purchase Andrew Nikiforuk's book Saboteurs and read it and then discuss with your neighbours and with your friends why there's a role for a regulatory body that everyone can have confidence in in this province.

Now, I'm getting sick and tired of comments made about the NEP and that it was a one-way street. Well, Mr. Chairman, one only has to review Hansard from this Assembly when this Progressive Conservative government was in its infancy and how they were so valiantly fighting for increased control and use of natural gas and natural gas resources for the petrochemical industry in this province that they advocated a national energy program. I would encourage the hon. minister to perhaps, if he has any spare time, go back to Hansard during the first Progressive Conservative term, this same government in their first term, and how they fought . . .

MS BLAKEMAN: The Premier signed it; didn't he?

MR. MacDONALD: Not only the Premier. The Premier of the day would discuss in this Assembly the need to have a national energy policy, and he signed the agreement. He signed the agreement without any threat of force, as far as I know that period of history.

Before we blame Liberals for too much else – and I'm going to have to review what exactly the curriculum at the Notre Dame school in Saskatchewan is. Perhaps the students are playing a little bit too much hockey and not studying enough history, because in 1925 a Liberal government in Ottawa – a Liberal government in Ottawa – started the negotiations so that this province could have a considerable inheritance, which turns out to be our oil and gas royalties. Now, it did take time, but it was a Liberal government under Mackenzie King, and this was one of the first transfers in the British Commonwealth. We have to recognize that. Not only . . . [interjections]

Chair's Ruling Decorum

THE CHAIR: Hon. member, can you yield for a moment.

There are several quarters who seem to be anxious to enter into the debate, and that's wonderful. The hon. minister is going to get his chance in a few minutes, and if other members of the opposition or on the government side wish to, we'll take them in their turn. But the government members aren't on until some time from now according to the agreements that have been made by members of this Assembly. So right now we only have one member speaking and asking questions, and that's the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you.

THE CHAIR: Do you have a point of order?

MR. NORRIS: I just have a point of clarification, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIR: No. There's no such thing.

MR. NORRIS: I'd like to make a point of order then. If that's the ruling that's coming today, I'd be happy to abide by it, but I would remind hon. members that throughout this process that's the way it's been going.

THE CHAIR: Thank you. If you heard me correctly, hon. minister, I did mention that both sides, both government and opposition, will have to take their turns.

MR. NORRIS: I'll listen better next time.

THE CHAIR: Okay.

I did hear noise coming from those who would support the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I really appreciate that. Thank you.

Debate Continued

MR. MacDONALD: Now, this event of the federal Liberal government of the day assisting over a period of time the transfer of wealth is a very important event in the history of this province, as is the Royalite No. 4 well in Turner Valley, which in my view changed the entire history of oil exploration in the western Canadian sedimentary basin. Those two events cannot be overlooked. They are very, very important. So in the future I would like to encourage the minister, when discussion on the national energy program comes up, to also talk about the historic role that the Progressive Conservative Party in this province had in its development and its implementation and also the role that the federal Liberals had in the succession of oil and gas rights for the government so that the Minister of Finance here can have a budget and enjoy revenue that other areas of the country, other ministers of finance can only dream about.

Now, with that, Mr. Chairman, it's time to talk about one of the problems that we're dealing with this afternoon in the business plan, and that is: what exactly is the Department of Energy going to do with the issue of electricity exports? What is the policy of this government for exporting electricity? Members may ask: well, why would this matter? Let's look at February of this year. There was roughly $850,000 worth of electricity exported, and the price was about 2.8 cents a kilowatt. In the last 12 months that price averaged 6.3 cents a kilowatt. If we're looking at building electricity generation and people are looking at the potential of exports to pay their costs, are they going to be able to do that at these prices? We're not exporting much electricity, and in this same time period we have imported. Now, I'm sure the minister is going to say: see; we're importing all this electricity, so we better build some more generation. But we're importing this electricity, about $4.5 million worth, and we're paying roughly 3 cents a kilowatt, so how is all this going to be ironed out?

If we look at last year, of course, when there were dollar signs in everyone's eyes, there was a significantly greater price for electricity whenever you were importing it. Some people paid as high as 47 cents. Some people paid as little as 15 cents. Some people paid 7 cents. That's quite a change. Naturally our exports of electricity took a sudden change when the Americans put a cap last June on their electricity prices in the Pacific northwest.

Now, can the minister please tell this hon. member and the House: what role – and certainly in the documents that are presented in the budget there is a role, and there's a regulatory role in this as well – is the Department of Energy playing in discussions with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission in America in regard to setting up the Regional Transmission Organization West? Is this going to be a partnership? What role is B.C. Hydro or Powerex going to play in this? Are there plans for the construction of a transmission line through southern Alberta directly south to Las Vegas? Who's going to pay for this line? These questions are not only for this hon. member but certainly for investors and consumers, whether they're industrial, residential, or commercial. They have every right to know, and they need to know now.

We're talking about the EUB. How are we going to pay for the location-based credits? Is that money coming out of the Power Pool? Where did all the rest of the money go from the power purchase arrangements? When will the next auction sale occur? I was led to believe that it was to occur last November, because some of those original contracts were for one year. If this auction was delayed or whatever sort of process was going to happen, when will all this come about?

Now, another question I have regarding electricity at this time is: how are we going to get rid of the bottlenecks in the transmission system? What plans does the minister have to get rid of all these bottlenecks? Certainly there are areas of the province where the electricity transmission system is running at capacity and others where it is not.

With all these new rules that we've had for electricity, we need to clarify for consumers, and yesterday I asked the question about billing practices. In Wabamun, west of the city, there is an individual who gave me his power bill, and there were 13 different line items that I could detect that comprised the total price, and the price is sky high in comparison to what it used to be under the regulated system. This gentleman gave me this bill, and I was astonished to look at it because it was so different from my bill at our house, which has eight line items to comprise the price, and yesterday I asked if perhaps we should have standardized billing across the province so consumers know precisely what they're paying for. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would note that both of these bills were from different areas. One was from the city and one was from Wabamun. However, they're from the same electricity provider. I've heard so many times the hon. minister talk about competition. Well, there doesn't seem to be much competition developing with the providers.

Transmission bottlenecks. There's also the issue, Mr. Chairman, of transmission access. Could the hon. minister please tell me: does the federal Energy Regulatory Commission have direct control over access to Alberta's transmission system? Before we proceed any further with exports, what exactly do they have control of? With the payments in lieu of taxes that the municipally owned electricity generators and in some cases marketers or providers, whatever category you want to put them in – where does that money go?

Before I conclude this portion of my comments, where did the remaining money from the sale of the PPAs, the power purchaser arrangements, go? What account is that in? That's a very important question I think, and I may have overlooked it. With that, at this time I think I will conclude my comments on electricity and certainly move on to natural gas.

Now, the minister has explained to the standing policy committee, Mr. Chairman, very smoothly that we have no problem with ethane in this province, and by ethane I mean to be used as a feedstock for the petrochemical industry. We've got lots. There's no end to our ethane. This gets back to my sort of admiration for a previous Conservative government when they fought like badgers to establish a petrochemical industry in this province, and the current government to my amazement developed policies that led to the export of the natural gas liquids in the Alliance line.

I know that the minister and I have a different view of this, but in the Auditor General's report – and it's been brought up for a number of years now – there is some concern about how we collect our royalties. I'm not talking about the amount of royalty for new gas or old gas or what type of well it is, how deep, or whether it's a horizontal well. I'm talking about the actual mechanical mechanisms that are there to make sure, as the Premier is fond of saying, that we get our pound of flesh. How up to date is that system, and has there been any success in reducing the amount of amendments that are made whenever the royalties are collected? Now, how is all this working? Can this hon. member have confidence that we are getting every last nickel of royalty revenue that we deserve from that resource?

There certainly has been this VIPIR project initiated by the EUB, and again it's, as I understand, in partnership with industry or stakeholders. If the minister could report any progress on this to the House.

Also, the Alberta royalty tax credit. The minister was talking about how industry likes to be left alone and make their own money. Well, you know, depending upon the price of the resource, there's a significant amount of money, Mr. Chairman. In some cases it's $180 million annually. Some years it's as little as $140 million. This is the Alberta royalty tax credit. When the cash flows are robust, to say the least, for the resource industry, why are we continuing that program? It may have been a good idea when it was started, because it certainly kick-started the industry, so to speak. Who exactly is the beneficiary of this Alberta royalty tax credit? Is it just the junior companies, or is it everyone, all the players, so to speak?

With those questions, Mr. Chairman, I will take my seat, and I will anxiously await the answers from the hon. minister. Thank you.

MR. SMITH: Well, Mr. Chairman, let's not have him wait very long. I know the spirit of the House during the last week has been a little bit contentious. They talk up about some of the discussions about the good Catholic faith, and then I'm a little surprised to hear a little bit of a shot to my old alma mater, which is Notre Dame College, and a wonderful monsignor by the name of Athol Murray. Like the individual across, a member brought up on the ways of the east, he did not know that in fact the west was the promised land until he arrived here in 1927, as this member knows when he arrived here from the island about – I guess it would be 15, 20 years ago now. [interjection] Twenty seven years ago. We've done a good job, too, with him. I think he's made progress.

I would like to talk to the House for some time about the exploits of Monsignor Athol Murray, who is probably the reason why I'm in politics today. In fact, he was an individual, Mr. Chairman, who would go out and rail at invitations to speak, and he would rail at the government of the day in Saskatchewan. Now, that Premier of the day happened to be Tommy Douglas, and Athol Murray was one of those monsignors that was firmly committed to free enterprise. He believed that government's role was to be an umpire and that a Canadian's great strength was their will to succeed as a small businessman in the marketplace of today. So the good monsignor would go out and talk about the benefits of capitalism and the disadvantages of socialism, and in fact he referred to it as Marxism.

At the end of those speeches – and oftentimes those speeches were fueled by some of Johnny Walker's finest product, Mr. Chairman, which, I know, you have more than a passing knowledge of yourself. Nonetheless, he would come back some 30 miles outside of Regina to a college that had about 300 students in my time living in granaries, living in buildings that were already condemned, and he would await what would happen the next day. The next day there would be a phone call from the bishop in Regina responsible for all of Saskatchewan, and the phone call – although I was never present, Mr. Chairman – would go something like this. "Athol," and Athol would respond, "Yes, your grace." "I hear you've been out speaking again." "Yes, I have." "Well, I am enclosing the telephone number of the Premier's office in Regina, and he is waiting expectantly for an apology from you." So on more than one occasion Monsignor Athol Murray not only challenged the political system of the day but also had to apologize for it too.

He was skilled in some four to five languages. He wrote and read Latin and spoke Latin fluently. Raised by the Oblates, educated by the Jesuits. When the member says that they had a tendency to play more hockey than study history, he's seen the performances of a Rod Brindamour, a Curtis Joseph, a number of individuals who have had a great amount of talent and showed up in the professional leagues. In fact, that college sends more individuals on full athletic scholastic scholarships to Ivy League schools in the United States than any other school in Canada, Mr. Chairman. It's often said that that college has populated the oil patch in western Canada. One could only look to the former president of Consumers' Gas, Mr. Bill Mooney, an architect in the development of Syncrude, a great Albertan; an individual who brought TransCanada PipeLines to Alberta and put that head office in Calgary, Mr. Gerry Maier. This college teaches a lot of history, and it teaches a lot more than just history.

So although the member invites a point of order on 23(h), (i), and (j) about imputing motives, I'm not going to do that, Mr. Chairman. As you know, I'm wide open myself to open and candid debate in this House and will continue. I'm glad throughout the discussion that the member did mention estimates and business plan and costs at least once, because it allows us to return to that.

Mr. Chairman, he also made a reference that I can't leave untouched. He talked about former Premier Lougheed willingly signing the national energy program. I would direct the member to his history, and he would note that when Premier Lougheed was elected, it was shortly thereafter that he was responsible for raising the royalty charges to the oil companies in Alberta and in fact brought a fairer return back to Albertans. I think a hallmark of Progressive Conservative government in Alberta is one that looks after Albertans first and then its resources second.

Mr. Chairman, we also know that Mr. Lougheed fought very hard to avoid the encroachment by the powerful federal Liberal government, and we are continuing that fight whether it be a direct attack in something like a carbon tax or something so oblique as a smoke screen of Kyoto, that is simply nothing more than a wealth transfer from this province to not only other parts of Canada but to in fact other parts of the world. People in my industry, in the oil and gas industry, have said: why should we pay a royalty to Russia for the purposes of producing oil and gas here? But, again, those Kyoto-type initiatives, those carbon taxes, those control mechanisms are all left to be best explained by a member of the Liberal Party, who is here with us today in the presence of the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar. I'm sure he can explain the whys and wherefores of that.

Mr. Chairman, he did talk about electricity being imported in Alberta. That was the last year of regulation, 2000, and in fact some $300 million of electricity was exported in the year 2001. I think he asked the Premier if electricity was a good or if it was a service, and I think he received the absolutely correct reply, that it was in fact a good service. I think that that continues.

He also asked the Premier last week about electricity exports, and I thought the Premier gave him a clear and honest answer when he said that there are electricity exports occurring in Alberta. They will continue to occur. In the case where a generator develops electricity and wants to export it as far away as Las Vegas, which has an ample abundance of power – I don't know why they'd want to export it to Las Vegas at this juncture, although it is a neighbouring state to California. In fact, there are merchant power lines, Mr. Chairman, that are available for contract today. There are some under consideration that I know of. The Premier said that generators, if they're exporting power, would be responsible for its payment.

In terms of the Alberta grid, more than asking a government how this should work, we prefer a clear and transparent process to a very complex question. That's why the transmission administrator has published a paper and the Energy and Utilities Board has commenced deliberations on how best to alleviate anticipated congestion in an Alberta grid and how best those costs should be shared. I have met on two occasions with Pat Wood, the chairman of FERC, or the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. Mr. Chairman, he has no jurisdiction over what happens in lines in Alberta, but he has a great interest in seeing Alberta's ceasing to be an island of electricity and starting to be an area where electricity can move freely back and forth from many jurisdictions.

Who pays? I think that that question will be answered by the EUB. That question is also very open and transparent in a competitively structured electricity model. I think it's a much better model than a regulated model where a bunch of government appointed toadies have determined what an appropriate rate of return for power is. In fact, what an unregulated electricity model does is bring out, Mr. Chairman, transparency. It brings out appropriate costs, and it puts the focus of risk on an investor and not on a consumer.

Lastly, I do want to finish with the good questions the Liberal Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar talked about: ethane and the royalty position. He does know that there have been royalty discussions and a paper put forward and a royalty change of schedule to take place in 2002 with respect to the constituency of natural gas as it leaves the province of Alberta. We believe we're getting most of the royalty money, hon. member. If we believed we were getting it all, we could save money by not employing those auditors, but we're not ready to do that yet.

I believe that the VIPIR program, which is the volumetric and infrastructure petroleum information registry, will be an effective way of creating a petroleum data warehouse. It's got a budget line item of some $25 million. It's scheduled for implementation this October and reports as of lunchtime today that tests are beginning, and we look forward to a successful although concerned October launch for the data processing model.

I believe you asked a question about the proceeds from the auctions from electricity. They, as you know, were all returned in the $40 bill. That was consumers' money. They got it all back. It's gone.

Now, the balancing pool released, I believe on April 11, a press release stating that they have structured derivatives for the balance of power that they control, and they will be delivering that into the marketplace shortly in an auction form. They are seeking client and customer feedback at this stage, and the purpose is to have all the power in the hands of the marketplace and none of the power in the hands of the balancing pool. So that's proceeding.

There was one other one: the offset credits. I think that's a good question for which we will give you a detailed written reply. I think that's an important question as well.

So with those brief and minor comments, Mr. Chairman, I will take my seat.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

MR. KNIGHT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It's a pleasure to join the debate this afternoon. I would have a few comments and a couple of questions for the minister with respect to this issue.

Firstly, Mr. Chairman, the Alberta government's expanded mandate of AOSTRA I think is a very important point that should be brought out this afternoon through the Alberta Oil Sands Technology and Research Authority. I actually was fortunate enough to be involved with the pilot project that AOSTRA ran, which the minister alluded to, in partnership with Shell at Three Creeks, just east of Peace River. I believe that certainly the results of that technical exercise have generated for the province of Alberta simply billions of dollars in return.

AOSTRA of course is going to continue under AERI's role, and the role has expanded and includes other types of energy-related research in areas including oil and gas, heavy oil and the oil sands, coal, electricity, and renewable and alternative energy. So it's really good to see that the department is supporting this ongoing work.

Also, I'd like to point out that investment in the energy sector is continuing to be led by activity in the oil sands, certainly alluded to again, and we look forward to these capital investments that private enterprise is making and continues to make in the province of Alberta. The projection is something in the neighbourhood of $40 billion over the next few years. This will on an ongoing basis lead us into a situation where our conventional production will begin to be secondary to synthetic crude production and exports for the province of Alberta.

Mr. Chairman, again on the research side of things the Petroleum Recovery Institute, a business unit of the Alberta Research Council: ongoing work in the energy industry "to assess, source, develop and commercialize technologies that deliver a competitive advantage." These programs are designed "to bridge the gap between basic research and commercialization" of products and technologies that these groups develop. This program is run by the Alberta Research Council, and its objectives are "to increase the recovery factor for conventional oil fields, and to reduce the operating and environmental costs associated with production in these fields."

I'd like to point out that I'm sure that as we move ahead in the recovery areas of conventional oil in the province of Alberta, there will be some very exciting possibilities with respect to sequestering carbon dioxide. Some of the secondary and tertiary recovery systems that we have had experience with and continue to work on in the province are certainly world class, and we believe that this technology again will allow us to not only improve our production and reduce our emission of CO₂ but at the same time, Mr. Chairman, will provide in the future a very important export product for the province of Alberta. The knowledge-based community that will spin off from these technologies is certainly important for the province of Alberta.

Another area that we're working with and again very important, I believe, is the enhanced water flood programs. We've done of course in the province of Alberta a number of secondary recovery systems involving the use of water, and again there is certainly some contention with respect to the amount of water that is injected into these programs. One of the points that I would appreciate the minister perhaps commenting on is, you know, the ability of these projects to recycle water, and perhaps a little clarification with respect to potable water being used in these facilities and that type of thing.

Gas floods and miscible flooding are another area where again the technology that we have here is certainly on a par with almost any production field certainly in North America and, I would suggest, probably globally. What we do, of course, in miscible flooding is inject methane and ethane mixtures on a cycling basis with water and wash the zones in that manner and increase our recovery rate. There is some newer technology that unfortunately I haven't been involved with foam floods and some chemical surfactant flooding. Again these programs are all very well supported in the minister's department, and I believe that they will enhance Alberta's recovery and certainly recovery in conventional fields. Again I would like to point out that I believe that the knowledge is an export product.

Mr. Chairman, there was a touch made with respect to the Alberta hub. Certainly the Alberta hub is, I believe, reasonably well understood by us and certainly understood by our neighbours in Alaska, but I'm concerned that the Alberta hub is not broadly understood and perhaps not broadly understood by some of our major customers. The minister and I have had some discussions with respect to that issue, and I would appreciate if we could perhaps indicate how we're going to move ahead and do a better job of selling ourselves, because I think that it is very key that we be sure that our clients and our customers know who we are and what our capabilities are.

Again, when we look at the energy bill that's being brought forward and being discussed in the U.S. now and their certain concern with energy security in North America, I think it's incumbent on us as Albertans and as producers, major players in that market, to understand where our competition is, what their capabilities are, and how we can I guess match our capabilities with theirs. Perhaps when we have a better understanding or have a better research capability with respect to some of the gas, particularly in South America, maybe we would have a better opportunity to apply ourselves to our market and to our clients to be sure that we're getting all of the possible sources of market for our products.

Interestingly, I think, recently some of the indications and some publications and certainly some briefs and reports given from South America with respect to their gas reserves are important to us. I was of course, as the minister indicated, involved in the gas business in northwestern Alberta for all of my working career.

MR. GRAYDON: Three weeks.

MR. KNIGHT: I worked, yes. I did. I don't want to really let anybody here know that, but I did.

In the 30 years that I spent in that business, Mr. Chairman, I really didn't understand the capabilities of our friends in South America. Bolivia started exporting natural gas to Argentina in the 1970s, and I wasn't aware of that. You know, when we start looking at that, it's going on 30 years that Bolivia has been a producer.

In 1999, Mr. Chairman, there was an 1,800 kilometre pipeline built from Santa Cruz province to São Paulo, Brazil, Brazil's industrial capital. The demand for gas in Brazil in 1996 was really unclear, and Bolivia's reserves were insufficient even to fill its new 20-year contract with Brazil. Now Brazil's demand for gas has grown, and it wants to double volumes going through the pipeline by 2004, and Bolivia's reserves have expanded tenfold since 1996. Tenfold. As a result, Bolivia is seeking customers further afield, and of course where would they look but certainly northward into the Mexican market and further northward into the California market?

Spain, Britain, and Pan American Energy, a BP subsidiary, are pushing a plan to pipe gas from the Margarita field in Bolivia to the Pacific coast. My understanding is – and this is the question that I have for the minister – that some of the reports that we have been acquiring would indicate that Bolivia's idea is that they can reach the Baja California and certainly Mexico City areas with Bolivian gas at around the $3 to $3.50 range. I think, Mr. Chairman, that if we look forward and if in fact the LNG receiving stations that are on the books for the U.S. and Mexico move ahead – and when you look at the possibility of LNG, once it's in a tanker and floating, it's not much different than delivering crude oil – it would perhaps open up a huge new competitor for us.

There's a certain amount of solution gas still remaining globally – that is basically gas that's produced for nothing – so they don't have this kind of 50 cent lifting cost or equivalent cost that we would perhaps face in Alberta with respect to supplying these same markets. So I'm wondering if the minister has any comments with respect to the possibility of this whole idea of LNG, maybe putting a ceiling or a cap on the price of Alberta gas, and if in fact that happens, have we any idea where that cap might settle? What might be the price of natural gas as we move ahead with respect to competition of that sort?

I'll move away from the gas business, Mr. Chairman, if I may for a few moments. I just want to ask the minister one more question, and it is with respect to the deregulation of electricity. Certainly I think that on most fronts and if you looked at it on a volume basis of the electricity consumption in the province, deregulation has been very successful. I would suggest extremely successful. We do have an area that is of concern, and I think that might be the area where we still have 20 percent of Alberta's power that's under a regulated price agreement. That is all stuff that's not industrial. So about 80 percent of the electricity is now being traded freely in the province of Alberta. My question for the minister would be: what do we see between now and 2004-05 with respect to the retail competition and the retail end of that 20 percent that's kind of a hangover from the deregulation process?

I think those comments will probably be enough. I'll conclude and thank you very much for your kind attention.

THE CHAIR: The hon. leader of the third party.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am pleased to have this opportunity to ask a few questions of the minister with respect to his budget for the Department of Energy. I just want to note the presence of the chairman of the EUB and members of the CAPP here. I want to say welcome to them for being here.

My questions are fairly specific. I won't preface them with lengthy talk. My first question generally has to do with the forecasts in the budget with respect to revenues from nonrenewable resources and the revenue picture for the department as a whole. Looking at the numbers in the budget, the department is forecasting almost a 50 percent decline in the budgeted revenues from last year. It's exactly half. Those projections or forecasts were obviously based on certain assumptions which had to do first with the shock that the American economy and, derivatively, Canadian economy received from the September 11 or post September 11 developments, economic slowdown. Then there was the question of certain assumption made about oil prices and gas prices. On all those three issues the picture seems to have changed and changed for the better quite a bit. In fact, the forecasts of concerns about the shock to the economy in hindsight now appear to have been somewhat overestimated. Are the budget estimates here, the numbers, still reliable given that the very assumptions on which these numbers are based have changed and have changed quite substantially? That's the first question. The assumptions that I draw attention to are stated, I guess, in this fiscal plan booklet on page 10, which is accompanied, obviously, by a bar graph, if the minister wants to look at that, although I don't think he does need to. He has all this information at his fingertips.

My second question then has to do with an observation that the minister made earlier in responding to a question, I guess from the member sitting next to me. It was a reference made to the huge investment that has been made in the oil and gas energy sector by the private sector. I think you mentioned $51 billion. I hope I was paying attention, but I didn't get the number of years over which this may have happened, so if you'd clarify that.

Another question related to that. Clearly this investment is good news for Alberta, for the economy. In spite of the fact that you see me as someone who would probably not say that, I acknowledge that. We have seen that some of the revenues the industry may have put into this capital investment may have come from the forgone public revenues in the form of royalty tax reduction and royalty tax credit policies that have been in place for some considerable time. The question that really occurred to me was: would the minister have an estimate of what percentage, in terms of the number of billions of dollars, of this $51 billion might have been drawn from these forgone public revenues as a result of those policies? That's quite a specific question. I hope the minister will care to respond to that.

My third question has to do with a goal in the business plan document. It's goal 1 under performance measures, "Sharing the Profits from Resource Development." There's a range given there of 20 percent to 25 percent. I think that's what you want to capture, the net profits; right? I looked at the table on page 119 following those statements, and there's a pattern there in that table. For the years '96, '97 – the year I got elected to this Assembly first time around – and '98 there was a stable number of 23 percent of the net profits that were captured and came into the public treasury. According to this table, starting in 1999, 2000, and 2001 that percentage has in fact slid down to 21 percent, so there has been a two percentage point decline in the share enjoyed by Albertans of the net profits of the industry.

Now, it seems to me that in light of that, the minister might want to explain to me whether or not the target of an upper limit of 25 percent is still valid as a performance measure, because it appears to me that a pattern has been established. It may in part have been the result of specific policies in terms of changes in certain oil royalty rates or tax credits or what have you. It has come down to 21 percent. Is it still accurate or, alternatively, is it still okay to take seriously the performance measure of 25 percent as the upper limit when in fact it seems to me that the upper limit has been brought down to 21 percent? This being noted, that the share has come down by two percentage points, would the minister have a rough estimate of the loss in revenues to the public treasury because of the systematic lowering or decline in the percentage of the net profit that comes into the public treasury? That's the third question.

My next question has to do with core business 3, which is on page 121 of the business plan: "Awareness and Understanding – Increase Albertans' awareness of energy and mineral resource development and related policies." This goal is an important one, in my view. I applaud the minister's and the department's commitment to increasing this understanding, but what I find missing here – and I hope, Mr. Chairman, the minister will take this question seriously and respond to it, but whatever he does, I want to start with him answering this question. Why as part of this goal is no mention made of the fact that Albertans need to have the benefit of some transparent public debate so that they can understand the royalty rate issue? It's a complex one, I know, and you could simply say, "Well, look; it's far too complex to ask Albertans in general to engage in this debate," but it's a vital issue.

There have been recent statements made in the media. Assertions have been made that royalty taxes in Alberta are too low. I heard you say that we are getting a good return. The point is to allow a public debate to happen, and the department needs to take a lead in it so that it can provide supporting evidence for the view that it holds. I'm not at the moment challenging the view, but I think there are studies, there are statements, and there's information that does raise serious questions about it, and I think there's a need for that. Why is it not the case that a commitment is made here to engage Albertans in that kind of enhanced understanding based on public debate which speaks substantively to the issues of both the complexity of the royalty regimes and why it is okay for us to receive what we do when in fact we do know or some people do claim that the royalty regime we have now is much lower than was the case in this province during the Lougheed years and is in fact even lower yet than the royalty tax rates or regimes that we had during the Getty years? So given that that's a serious question, I hope the minister will answer it in that vein.

Two other minor points. The minister was very animated when he was talking about capitalism and the virtue of markets, and I did hear him say that the more unregulated the markets are and capitalism is, the better it is. But it did concern me a bit that he didn't qualify his statements in light of the Enron fiasco, and he's aware of this because he's a very big player on the energy side both as a minister and also as someone who's worked in the industry. Does it send some sort of a message to us that regulation is indeed important? While markets are necessary, unregulated markets and unregulated capitalism can lead to the kind of fiasco that Enron symbolizes.

The last point, Mr. Chairman, has to do with an experience that I had recently. I was visiting a seniors' residence outside of town, and I went into the suite of a senior, a lady who is I guess in her early 80s. She mentioned and complained about two things to me. One was of course the news at that time of the increase in health care premiums or taxes. For the second one she showed me her electricity bill, and she said: "Before January of this year it used to be $32 a month, and now my bill has grown to $68 a month. My consumption hasn't changed; my living space hasn't changed; my cooking habits haven't changed. I only attribute it to the changes in the manner in which electricity now is produced and marketed, this deregulation of electricity."

That's my last question, Mr. Chairman, and I look forward to the minister's response. Thank you.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate the opportunity to ask a few questions about the Energy estimates and business plan this afternoon. I'm going to confine my remarks I think, given the time, to the business plan, specifically the questions raised about the business plan by the Auditor General and specifically the performance measures.

In the conclusion to his report the Auditor General makes the comment that the measures are not valued as a tool by the senior management. I guess my question to the minister would be: what has been done in response to that criticism by the Auditor General?

The Auditor General goes on to indicate: "It is not clear who is, or who should be, accountable for the process. At the Board, the Audit and Finance Committee would naturally be the group to take responsibility." My question is: is that the case today? Does the department really consider the performance measures something that is not a valuable tool in the operation of the department and in managing the department? If they do, I can sympathize with them. I have some questions about the wholesale adoption of performance measures that has been undertaken by the government as their major management tool. Nevertheless, they have adopted it, and if it's going to be used, then I suspect that it should be used in the way it was intended. That's one of the questions I have.

The second. The Auditor General indicates that the business of the department has been stable over a number of years. There have been a number of measures in the plans, and they have changed from year to year. The Auditor General includes a table in his report indicating that in 1996 to '97 there were 11 performance measures in the annual report. Over the years that changed from 11 to 10 to 17 to 15 and then to 19, and he says that those numbers he gives have the same basis; that is, they take into account the businesses that have been moved out of the ministry, the change over the years.

The comment that the Auditor General makes is that if things are stable, why are the performance measures not stable? He points out the difficulty that a constantly changing set of performance measures presents in terms of people trying to assess the department and trying to track performances on a multiyear basis. He presents some rather interesting figures in terms of the measures themselves. He indicated that the life span of the departmental measures summarized is 1.7 years, so they're not even in place for two years before they are changed again, and that of the 40 measures that had been used since 1996-97, only three of the measures have lasted more than three years. I looked at the business plan again for this year – I just counted quickly - and I think there are 22 measures that are put forward by the department, not the 25 that the Auditor General anticipated would be there. So the whole question of the number of measures, how long they're used, how difficult it is for anyone that's trying to make comparisons from budget to budget, business plan to business plan, and it really defeats the purpose of having performance measures as a management tool to be used by the government and by people who are trying to understand the operation of the department.

One of the other comments that the Auditor General makes is that the measures often highlight something that's currently in the news or of temporary interest; that is, they seize on current happenings and they end up appearing as performance measures in the business plan. That, Mr. Chairman, may be one reason why they don't last, because they are directed at current happenings and don't reflect the long-term work of the department. The Auditor General makes the plea that the department should settle on the key measures that they are going to use and stick with them. My question to the minister is: why are there problems here? There's been criticism in the past of the use of performance measures by the department, and the problem, at least at the writing of the last report of the Auditor General, hadn't been addressed.

I would like to comment on at least one of the sets of measures, and that's the measures at the top of page 123, the indicators that talk about the deregulation plan and the policy framework being in place, where the department gets a hundred percent, and talk about consumer education, where "to benefit from open market competition and customer choice, consumers need information and education." I wonder if I could have some more information on that specific measure. It's one that we have constituents contacting our office about. The whole business of trying to understand for instance energy deregulation was really, really very difficult for constituents. I'm not quite sure what the 50 percent means, what exactly is being measured. I have difficulty and I guess I would like to know a little bit more about the measure in the same set that says "percentage of customers . . . that have actually switched energy suppliers." It seems to me that 50 percent is very, very high, Mr. Chairman, and I would appreciate further information on that particular measure and any background that the minister may have.

I'll confine my comments to the performance measures. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Minister of Energy.

MR. SMITH: Well, Mr. Chairman, it's with real anticipation that I rise to respond to some of the good and some of the interesting and some of the sublime comments from members. If I can, I'll just turn directly to the comments from the leader of the third party from Edmonton-Strathcona. I would direct him to page 84 of the budget, which tracks the forecasts of oil prices and tracks the forecasts of natural gas prices. In fact, if you looked on budget day and you look at the government of Alberta forecast, we hit the money within 3 percent on an accurate forecast of the price of oil. In fact, we have a record of meeting targets, and we have a record of balancing budgets. I can tell the member that if there is any concern over our budgets, it's the fact that on the budgeted price of oil and natural gas we may err on the side of caution. Those budget lines may be considered prudent, they may be considered cautious, but overall they are going to be considered as conservative.

THE CHAIR: Hon. minister, it was getting difficult to hear you, and that's quite an accomplishment on behalf of the rest of them, but now that they've decided to listen to your words, I'll be able to hear them as well.

MR. SMITH: Well, I'm sure you're referring to the skills of your audiologist, Mr. Chairman, and not the tenor of my voice.

I would add, to the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, with respect to these comments about forecasting, that we certainly are conservative, although we're conservative with a progressive bent. You might even say that we're Progressive Conservative.

Mr. Chairman, the question of forgone royalties on the oil sands is an interesting one. Let's tip the question upside down and look at what royalties would we in fact not ever receive had we not created a royalty regime that would attract investment. One of the great bonuses of oil sands investment is – I would classify it as captured investment as opposed to traditional exploration and production investment, which is far more migratory. In fact, boardrooms throughout the world still look at Canada when they allocate capital, and they look at it from the perspective that the federal government has not ultimately solved the issue of Quebec separation, they have a high tax load, they have high regulatory infringement, and they also have no focused debt management plan. So that alone, without the spectre of Kyoto, can immediately affect exploration and production investment in conventional oil markets. In fact, with a 1 percent gross revenue royalty on oil sands and then moving to a 25 percent investment on net revenue after payout, we've found that that's fair, and it's also been one that's attracted excellent investment in the oil sands.

In fact, I was speaking in Houston yesterday at a Ziff Energy gas conference, and I also mentioned the tremendous reserves that sit here with our heavy oil and our bitumen deposits. I met a renowned Houston forecaster. He's been in the business for some 30 years, and he says, "You guys don't do enough about selling Alberta and the benefits of Alberta's heavy oil, the benefits of Alberta's conventional oil deposit, the benefits of Alberta's natural gas": the fact that we light up one out of every seven and a half households in the United States, the fact that we'd supply 250 million megawatts of electricity if you converted all our natural gas into electricity, the fact that we supply 25 percent of all the natural gas used in North America. He says: "You guys have got to get out there and sell yourselves. You've got to get the Minister of Economic Development, the Premier, the Deputy Premier, the opposition members. You've got to get these people out and talk about what this province can do for continental energy use."

I know that we have got a reasonable royalty operating regime, Mr. Chairman, because if you look in the performance measures, the audit adjustment does continue to move us up to target on page 120. We continue to stay strong in our royalty attraction as a percentage of overall operating income.

I do want to comment briefly on the Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky's wise and sage experience and comments. I would think that the spectre of liquified natural gas transportation is more of a threat today to the state of Alaska and the population that is looking to build a pipeline out of there as opposed to Alberta. I think that when we first started pipeline discussions on northern gas, LNG, liquefied natural gas, was in the money at around $3.50 to $4 U.S. Now that number has shrunk to $3 to $3.50 and in fact was part of a discussion yesterday in Houston. In fact, there are some projects going ahead in Mexico about building liquefied natural gas facilities and terminals in Mexico and then tying into the gas pipeline infrastructure in the United States. The other thing we have to remember is that Mexico, although a large oil exporter, is a net importer of natural gas and actually will continue to be a net importer as their economic demand outstrips their supply.

So there are concerns, which we monitor carefully. We have people again working just as diligently on forecasting. They also work diligently on a continental supply and demand balance. We do think that the three-year forecast is one tempered by cautious recovery, yet there's still a need to increase our supply and still six to seven years out on northern gas linkages. The Alberta gas hub, though, will be one of those key commercial elements to provide northern gas both to an increased demand in Alberta, to its oil sands, and also to the United States in the lower 48.

From time to time the discussion about appropriate royalty collection comes up, as the Member for Edmonton-Strathcona discussed. There are always the usual misunderstandings about royalty. For example, why don't we charge what Alaska charges? Well, in fact, if we did charge what Alaska charged, Mr. Chairman, we would be dropping our royalty structure. Alaska's royalties are 12 and a half percent for the gas, and generally the gas is now drilled and reinjected back into reservoirs. In fact, our royalty regime for natural gas begins at 15 percent. If you talk to the federal bureau of the interior, as I did yesterday, their royalty for offshore is much lower than Alberta's.

All in all, I would say that the Department of Energy is doing a good job on its business plan, a good job on its estimates, and thanks to the wise and cautious vigilance of members from standing policy committee, cabinet, and caucus, as well as the odd interjection from the opposition and debate in the House, we continue to be on our toes, Mr. Chairman.

THE CHAIR: The question is called. Pursuant to the agreement reached earlier this afternoon, I must now put the following questions. First, after considering the business plan and proposed estimates for the Department of Energy, are you ready for the vote?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Agreed to:

Operating Expense and Capital Investment	$101,993,000
--	---------------

THE CHAIR: Shall the vote be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE CHAIR: Opposed? Carried.

The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'd move that the Committee of Supply rise and report the Department of Energy estimates and beg leave to sit again.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

MRS. JABLONSKI: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions, reports as follows, and requests leave to sit again.

Resolved that a sum not exceeding the following be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ended March 31, 2003, for the following departments.

Energy: operating expense and capital investment, $101,993,000.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in this report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Opposed? Carried.

The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd move that we adjourn until 8 p.m., at which time we'll reconvene in Committee of Supply.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:18 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Wednesday, April 17, 2002

8:00 p.m.

Date: 02/04/17

head: Committee of Supply

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: We'll call the committee to order.

head: Main Estimates 2002-03

Agriculture, Food and Rural Development

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: For the members seated in the gallery this is the informal part at committee stage, so you will notice that there are members who are probably not wearing their jackets and probably moving around.

I shall ask the Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development to lead with her presentation. The first hour will be allocated between the hon. minister and members of the opposition, following which any other member is able to participate.

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Chairman, thank you. It's a pleasure for me tonight to introduce the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development. It's been an interesting year for our department, and there's no question that the agricultural industry in this province has gone through considerable challenge and considerable change. I think the budget that we're going to examine tonight will represent some very positive changes to the industry, but it also represents some of the challenges that we face.

I'm delighted to have a number of members of – well, some are leaving – my department in the gallery: I think most of you have met my deputy minister, Brian Manning, who I know just stepped out the door; Brian Rhiness, who many of you have met because of the major restructuring that we've done in the industry development branch; Les Lyster; Ken Moholitny; John Knapp; and I have somebody else up there I can't see because of the light behind me. I thank them for being here tonight to assist us in our deliberations.

The challenges that I mentioned in the industry, of course, over the last year began with the worst precipitation records that we'd had in a hundred and thirty years, which signified a major drought for almost the entire province, which is very unusual. Our province often experiences drought on a regional level but not to this extent.

The second thing that our industry faced almost immediately was a very major outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in the United Kingdom. I want to say at this time how proud I am of the people in the Department of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development as well as the Canadian Food Inspection Agency and the ministry of agriculture for Canada for the very responsible way in which they managed the whole process which I believe led us to be foot-and-mouth free in this province. When you have an outbreak with countries that you interact with to the extent that we do in the beef industry, this was a major, major coup, I believe.

We also experienced falling grain prices again, and that certainly was a tough year, but you know, Mr. Chairman, again our industry came through. It showed its grit, and it came out strong with record numbers in farm cash receipts. Of course, we're very proud of our food and beverage manufacturing shipments and exports, and I like to remind people who are not as familiar with this industry that this is the single largest manufacturing sector in this province. We expect to continue to grow, and the changes that we've made in our industry development branch we believe will lead to that growth. We see 2002 as a year of opportunity. We see this budget focusing on support for those opportunities.

We're going to place a renewed emphasis on rural development.

We've had a sector in our department on rural development, but we're certainly recognizing that we need to move forward in this area. I believe that our rural development initiatives office, which is headed up by Glen Werner, who has a lot of experience in this area, will play a very key role in the evolution of a rural development strategy for our province. I'm pleased that the hon. minister Andy Mitchell of the government of Canada also supports rural development and has suggested to us that he wants to work with us on a strategy that his department could play a part in.

One of the other major undertakings of this year was the merger of the Alberta Opportunity Company with Ag Financial Services. This merger is going very well. Of course, the legislation is in this House at this time, and we think that by bringing those two groups together, we will offer meaningful and unique financial services that will better serve our communities.

We've almost completed the work on the agriculture drought risk management plan, which I've mentioned to you in this House before. This is a co-operative effort with the Department of Environment, PFRA, Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration, from the federal side, and these three groups have worked very diligently over the last year to put a drought mitigation risk management plan in place. As I indicated earlier, our province will always have some regional drought, and we think that by having a drought risk management plan in place, we will better manage those occasions when they occur. We think we'll get better and more timely assessments of drought impacts on our farm economy and that we will be able to have more timely and more effective measures in place. So I look forward to, in the next weeks, sharing that plan with you all.

We were disappointed that we were unable to continue the 30 percent discount on crop insurance. However, we were able to enhance our crop insurance program, not to the extent that we would have liked, but timing of managing a negotiation between the three partners in that program didn't permit us to do all that we would like to have done. Of course, the budget pressures that we face in our own province certainly wouldn't have allowed us to do it on our own.

Food safety continues to be a very high priority for Albertans, and certainly our industry has been setting the pace in this regard. We're going to continue to work closely with our commodity groups. We have a little initiative called HACCP, which is hazardous analysis critical control points training, and that was designed so that nobody, including the minister, could say it. So we call it 'hassept.' This will help us to implement and support on-farm safety programs and training programs, and it will ensure that we have a place in the export community of high-quality, safe food, and that of course is for our domestic and export markets.

I've said consistently that farmers live off the land. They live in that environment. Sustainability is paramount to their future, and they are the most proactive people in this area. Our Agricultural Operation Practices Amendment Act, 2001, passed in this Legislature. The NRCB has been managing this since January 1, and it is a work-in-process for sure, but indications to this point are that it is working well. I give credit to our NRCB group for their efforts at getting out and speaking with community groups, with municipalities, with producer groups to ensure that everybody understands how it operates. What this will do is ensure that our industry grows in a responsible manner and that Alberta's water, soil, and air is protected. We will have our final reports in this year from our ag summit consultation. This will wrap up in the 2003 year, and we should have the 12 industry-led action teams' reports in place.

The other thing that I think is of interest and importance to you in this Legislature is the new agricultural policy framework. The provinces and territories and government of Canada are working on a five-year strategy encompassing food safety, environmental renewal, science, and risk management. We're going to make sure that Alberta's interests are reflected and protected as this new framework is developed, and we should conclude that process, if things go well, in June. We have a meeting at the end of June.

I've tried to cover just some of the highlights of the department. The budget is I think quite straightforward. There are some decreases which are noted, but we must remember that we had an acreage payment program last year which is not in place this year, and I indicated that there are some crop insurance changes. So far we've had good response on that: the high-protein coverage for durum and red spring wheat, different coverage amounts for Polish and Argentine canola, and the introduction of a provincial lack-of-moisture insurance pilot program for native improved pasture. We know there are some challenges with that, and we're going to work with our producers. Also, we have the introduction of a cereal silage insurance pilot program. The Dairy Control Board, of course, is assuming the responsibility for milk delivery and co-ordination, so it definitely is a budget line that's quite significantly different, but the net result to us is zero.

Those were the main changes. I must say that this budget is based on some assumptions. We're assuming that commodity prices won't decline further, we're assuming that interest rates remain fairly stable, and we're hoping and assuming that we won't experience a disastrous year of claims under the farm income disaster crop insurance program. Having those assumptions means that this plan does have some risks, and it would only be correct for me to outline those for you. There could be issues in widespread crop production losses if we have bad weather conditions, including drought. A major disease in the livestock sector would cause certainly a risk to this plan and further decline in global commodity prices. Always the changes in the economy, increased interest rates, a change upward in the Canadian dollar would all have an effect on us. It doesn't appear right now that the Canadian dollar is going anywhere too rapidly, so that's probably not as big a risk.

There are some changes in revenue, Mr. Chairman. Our revenue is somewhat lower than last year. I've explained some of the reasons for that. Our federal transfers are reduced this year, but remember that last year we did receive federal funding for our farm income assistance program. We have discontinued the 30 percent premium discount, as I noted.

I think that wraps up my comments on the budget. I would look forward to questions from members. In the interest of time I will probably not answer all questions tonight and, as usual, will assure our members that they will get a full, detailed response from me before the House ends and at the earliest opportunity.

Thank you for your interest in agriculture, and I look forward to your comments. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I just want to rise tonight to address the issue of the Agriculture, Food and Rural Development estimates. I want to begin by thanking the minister for the work she's done with me over the past year in terms of making sure that she keeps me informed of their initiatives and making her staff available, and I'd like to thank the staff that are in the gallery for the work that they've done and the openness that they've shared in keeping me up to date on a lot of the issues that they're undertaking. It's been great working with them, and I look forward to the next year as well.

I also want to kind of reiterate and recognize the minister's comments about, I guess, the debt that we owe to the staff of Alberta Agriculture and the Canadian counterparts in protecting Alberta in that foot-and-mouth epidemic in the U.K. in how it potentially could have spread here. They kept it under control, and they kept the world confidence in our meat supply at a high level so that we didn't have any trouble with it.

I guess I'd like to make another response to the minister's initial comments. I want to just relay to her that I had a chance last week to attend a meeting where Dr. Bietz from the NRCB was talking about how they were going to apply the new intensive livestock, or confined feeding, operation guidelines. He did an excellent job of both discussing the program and responding to the concerns expressed by individuals in the audience. I hope that the minister will convey that to him, that she can have confidence in what he's doing.

The other issues that come up in the context of both the budget and the business plan – I think we have to look at kind of the overall mood that's out there right now in rural Alberta. I think the last two or three weeks have helped an awful lot in terms of regaining some optimism, especially in the production sector. The moisture that we're seeing now is basically going to give in most of the province a fairly optimistic outlook, at least through seeding, but we need some more yet. The southern part of the province is getting some more snow this week, and it should be able to really upgrade the snowpack estimates so that there might be less concern about irrigation water availability. These things all work together.

I guess this leads into kind of the ongoing concern that the farmers continue to talk about. What type of programs will be available? How will they get support? The minister mentioned the fact that the crop insurance premium reduction is disappearing this year. The acreage payment programs are disappearing this year. I guess if any of them have been consistent in the questions that get asked of me by farmers or by people in the rural community, it's: what about the acreage payment program? [interjection] Not the pasture payment program but the cropland payment program.

They saw it not so much as a drought program as a counterbalance to the international subsidy programs, that are depressing all prices around the world. So what in effect they are asking is: will there be opportunities for that same kind of support for our agriculture industry this year? Because it doesn't look like there's going to be any relief from the interference in the marketplace by the European and American governments. You know, if we follow the movement of the new ag bill through the U.S. Congress, it looks like they're actually going to increase their involvement and their interference in the marketplace, and this would further hurt Canadian producers. I guess they're kind of concerned that we had a program in place last year to help them in that international disequilibrium that's created by these programs, and they'd like to see something this year that would allow for kind of a replacement or a continuation of that kind of recognition, because they felt that the trade negotiations that are going on right now don't seem to be very promising. They're very concerned. You know, this was expressed to me, Mr. Chairman, as late as last night, a meeting that I was at, where one of the farmers was very concerned about this and wanted to know why the dollars weren't at least being tentatively considered to provide a program similar to that one that they had in the past.

I guess the other issues, while we're on kind of the farm insurance programs, are the issues that come up when we look at the farm income disaster program. A lot of farmers still feel that, you know, this is a good program that works when you have a one-year deviation from a base price. Again, this is why they feel that the acreage payment kind of brought them in line with what was a fair price. We still need to start looking at whether or not the farm income disaster program can be redesigned in a way to more closely reflect the appropriate cost of production coverage as an insurance rather than a guarantee or a program which sustains past depressed incomes. I know that Alberta Agriculture has been looking at some of these options, and I guess the questions are: how far have they gone? Will they be available soon for the producers to look at? They see the price side of it as totally different from the issues that are being addressed now in the new drought risk management plan that's coming into effect or that is being developed. So they'd like to see some reflection in that area as well so that they can deal with the idea of some kind of international parity for them.

I guess the other question that comes up within the context of what we're looking at here in terms of the farm insurance programs is the possibility now – and the minister spoke about it in question period this week – of what may happen with the chronic wasting disease. Will there be dollars available? Will those all be federal dollars that come into the issue of if we have to deal with herd reductions to compensate for those kinds of potential control activities?

Mr. Chairman, with those comments kind of falling out of the end of the minister's comments on the farm safety nets, I'll start again at the beginning.

When you look at the numbers that are in the budget and compare those to the business plan, you know, it's interesting that additional revenues from outside the general revenue fund account for well over half of the expenditure part of the budget. We're only, in effect, voting for a small percentage of the budget. The rest of it is coming from the revenues that come in through Ag Financial Services, the transfers from the federal government. This seems to be fairly consistent with where we've been going in the past, so it's an indication that there's stability in that part of the ministry.

The minister spoke a minute ago about the revenue side. Under line item 1.0.8, the agriculture information division, there's a $225,000 revenue listed there. Is this from the sale of access to information? Is it the sale of databases? What kind of information would be available for sale out of the ministry's central office under agriculture information, or would this just be revenues that come from the sale of government publications? I would have thought that those would have shown up in some of the other line items where we see significant revenues coming into the ministry.

If we look at the next part of the budget, which is in the planning and competitiveness area, I guess the question that a couple of farmers have asked in the last year – and I keep talking about a different role for them. What they want to know is: what is the relative function of the Alberta Grain Commission compared to the Canadian Grain Commission? They keep dealing with that. So this is a question about whether or not this should be funded by the industry as opposed to by government. What kind of arm's-length activity goes on within that that makes sure that it has a benefit to be funded out of taxpayers' dollars instead of user fees or a checkoff to support that, much like is happening now and we see more of it occurring in the dairy industry?

I guess one of the other things that I marked here on this part of it was: under this particular area, why the relatively large amortization of capital compared to some of the other sections of the budget? I would have thought that assets, you know, technological equipment, would have been much higher, like in the information services with the computers that might be necessary or in some of the others where they might have to deal with research facilities and that. This particular planning and competitiveness component seems to have a high capital asset amortization relative to the total dollars in the ministry.

Another question has come up a couple of times when I've been out in the marginal grain sector, not the politically active part of the grain sector. Some of the grain farmers are asking: what is the status of the Grain Sector Task Force? What are the recommendations coming out of it? What role does it play in policy development? They'd like to have that, so if the minister would provide me with the current status and activity of that, it would be great to help me when people ask questions about it so that I can more fully explain to them what is actually going on.

In that same program I see that there's basically the same budget for the 4-H program, yet I've had a number of letters in the last little while asking why and what is happening to the 4-H specialists. I see the minister is smiling. I take it she's had some letters to that effect too. Yet the budget is there. What we need is the information to make sure that rural families understand that their 4-H programs aren't in jeopardy, even though it appears to them that their 4-H staff member is not going to be as easily accessible as they expected in the past.

Again, as we go down that page, looking at the educational and community services, there's a $780,000 dedicated revenue component there. Is this workshop materials that are being franchised out, in effect? What source of revenue comes under educational and community services? Or are these fees for staff to go out and present seminars, to present information meetings? That would be quite interesting to find an answer for as well.

When I go down that page under the planning and competitiveness component, the farm income assistance program is listed there. This ties back into what I was saying a little while ago about, you know, this is here more because it's a payment relative to the competitive position of Alberta farmers rather than it's not an insurance program or not a disaster relief program. It's a payment to sustain competitiveness. So, I guess, other than our budget shortfall this year, what is there within the agriculture world environment that leads the minister to believe that the competitive position of Alberta producers is now at a level that they don't need that support when they had it last year? That ties back into some of the comments I made just a few minutes ago in terms of what we were dealing with.

Again I want to just reiterate that I see this being an issue much more because the U.S. is going through their mid-term elections this year and it looks like the ag bill is going to put significantly more dollars into supporting the ag community in the U.S. We need to make sure that we do have some sense of commitment to keeping our producers competitive. I don't imply by saying this in any way that this should be just an Alberta commitment. This has got to be a federal government commitment as well. This is in effect a federal government initiative in most of these other jurisdictions like the U.S. and the European Community. In the European Community it's even a multigovernment issue. So, you know, we as a province shouldn't be taking on the entire financial obligation of it, but what we should be doing is looking strongly at working with the federal government both to work through those international trade agreements and in the interim provide a signal to our farmers that we value them, that we do want them in the rural community.

This is the area where there are a number of specific – what do you call them? – dedicated revenues. I guess the interesting part of it is that as you go down through the livestock industry sectors, the revenues seem to be very uniform in each of the sectors, even though those sectors relative to our total economy vary significantly. So, you know, what kind of revenue system is there that these end up being so uniform?

When we look down again into the next section on crops, we see the pulse and oil seed groups having a very large revenue relative to the others when you compare that especially to the cereal crops. Is this kind of a signal of the maturity of that part of the industry? The cereal crops have their own commissions at work. They do a lot of their own research support, research promotion, market development where the younger or the newer industries or the subindustries basically in the crop area, the pulse and oil seeds as an example, are getting government support to help them develop their markets, to help them develop farming techniques. That, I guess, would indicate that they're relying more on information from the government than they are from their own outside jurisdictions. That's why there's more revenue coming to the government, as a source of information. I ask that question more to try to explain it.

I remember during the ag summit process that we talked a lot about the ag entrepreneurship focus and initiatives. This now has been incorporated into Alberta Agriculture, and I was just asking for an update on how the ag entrepreneurship programs, the feasibility action team in the services area are functioning. Are they getting acceptance from the industry? Are the people in the communities getting a sense that these are really contributing well to the objectives that they asked for in the business plans that they designed in the context of the ag summit process?

I'll sit down now and let somebody else have a chance.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate the opportunity to raise some questions with respect to the estimates of the Agriculture, Food and Rural Development department this evening. I thought my questions would focus on the business plan and some questions with respect to the performance measures that are there and that are being developed.

I'd like to start on page 62. There are some performance measures there with respect to the "percent of Alberta production from Alberta chicken farms, hog farms and beef feedlots produced under nationally recognized on-farm food safety programs." This is a measure where there's no expectation for 2001-02, but we see the 2004-05 targets, and I guess I would ask how those targets were arrived at as being the appropriate ones and why there's a difference. For chicken farms the target is 90 percent, and for hog farms the target is 90 percent, but the target for feedlots is only 74 percent. Given that number, I suspect there's a logical basis for having arrived at those targets, and I'd appreciate some further explanation on what that is based on and how that's arrived at.

If you look under Improved Environmental Stewardship and in particular goal 1 – I'm again looking under the performance measure – the ministry wants 68 percent of respondents to have adopted "improved practices as a result of ministry-supported stewardship training." My question is: how many farm operations will this actually be, and again can we have some rationale, some explanation for why those particular targets have been chosen? For instance, where did the 68 percent come from? How did the department determine improvement? Is there a scale that's used? What if an operation fails in another area? How is that handled by the performance measurement?

Under this goal, too, the ministry wants to consult with industry and with other ministries to "provide guidelines, standards, regulations and legislation for environmental performance requirements to sustain the quality of Alberta's soil, water and air." I think that's a goal that we all concur with and applaud, but I wondered if there was any thought given, Madam Minister, to inclusion of some of the advocacy groups in this process. There are advocacy groups who have particular interests in the environment and would I think be able to make a valuable contribution to the considerations under this goal and help in setting environmental standards and, as I said, would strengthen the whole project.

I'll back up for a minute to page 59. When we're considering long-term profitability, it seems that it should be important for us to consider all the environmental impacts that are factored into that final cost, and I guess the specific question: what will the ministry be doing to enhance market access? Will there be the promotion of particular products or industries? If there is, how are they chosen? Will there be supports? Will the supports be financial, or will they be in terms of organizational support? Will there, for example, be tax breaks or the promotion of products at trade shows or on trade missions? Just what is the ministry doing to enhance market access?

I look at page 60 and I guess some questions about products that are being developed in Alberta. What are some of those new products that are under development? Does this involve value-added processing or the development of new crops? If we could have some specific examples, Madam Minister, I think it would be helpful in understanding what's actually being done. Has there been government consideration to the promotion of crops that require less water rather than considering north-to-south diversion schemes? I'm sure that there has been some consideration about confining crops to areas where certain crops can survive or having a particular animal-based industry because of lack of water. So the question is: is there a geographic consideration given to where crops and livestock operations are considered for development?

I think that on page 61 – I'm sorry, I've lost my place. The ministry wants a safety surveillance system that validates the safety of our agriculture and food, and I think that's an objective that all Albertans, urban and rural, would overwhelmingly support. The concern is widespread. How accessible is information at this time? What are the data collection strategies that are in place, and has there been consideration to using something like the Internet as a tool for disseminating information about the food system? How can the department go about making sure that the information that is available is widely available? The department has a reputation for the very wide breadth of information that it now offers, and I'd be interested in knowing how they intend to approach this really very important issue.

Page 63 of the business plans talks about the water quality index being developed based on data since 1997, and the report says that it'll be released annually. I guess my question is: does that mean it's not currently being released and is still being developed? Just what is the status? If it is under development, when will it be released? What's the anticipated time framework for its development and release? I'm sure it's there, but what data is being developed to track rural population trends? The latest data from the federal government indicates of course that that population is falling. What mechanisms does the department use to track changes in rural population?

The plan also says that the department is developing data on resources invested in community-based projects. What is the relationship between this and the projects that were supported by the community lottery boards? Is there any relationship, or did they work in isolation from each other, or was their focus entirely different? Is there an impact on rural communities with the cuts to the community lottery boards?

The ministry is also developing data on community amenities. It's interesting. Is there any inventory kept of amenities across the province, particularly in rural communities? That's the question. Is there an amenities inventory that can be consulted that is used to ascertain the level of amenities that are available to rural Albertans?

I think those are some preliminary questions about the business plan, Mr. Chairman, and with that, I'll conclude. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I rise just to follow up on a few more points in the budget for Alberta Agriculture, Food and Rural Development. I just happened to be sitting now marking the pages, at about page 48, on the Ag Financial Services Corporation. I guess my question to the minister – there are two of them that come up there. How is the crop reinsurance proposal working out? This I think was quite a good initiative there, but in terms of the budget the expenses associated with that now are rising to the point where you're basically looking at about two and a half years of coverage, yet you don't show any kind of expected revenue from it this year. What are the long-term benefits of that program in the context of creating stability for your insurance programs within Ag Financial Services?

Within that same set of information there you have a provision for losses on loans and guarantees. What change in loans in default or loans at risk do the farmers carry with Ag Financial Services? I think it probably is a little higher now than it was three or four years ago, and in the context of evaluation that kind of information as a performance indicator might also be useful for people to understand the large jumps. If we look back to 2000-2001, it's only $145,000, whereas by this year we're looking at the possibility of as much as $5,248,000. So there's a significant change there, and one way to look at that in the context of budgeting practices would be to have as a performance indicator loans at risk or loans under different categories of closeness to default.

I wanted to raise another issue back on the main part of the program in the budget. As I went through all of the departments and the programs that you have – you can help me a little – I don't remember in our discussions the relationship between Alberta Agriculture and the NRCB. Will all of the dollars for the operation of that CFO function of the NRCB now be over in the other ministries? Or will there be a transfer from Agriculture to support or to in essence cover a part of the NRCB's operating costs associated with its role in monitoring, approving, and in effect policing the CFO guidelines that are associated with that?

Another issue comes up, moving into the next section, where we're talking about the ministry business plan. We run into a lot of information about what the expected outcomes are and how we're going to be looking at them. I guess the question that I come up with initially is on the commitment that you made or that you indicated at the start to this stronger initiative; your rural initiative I think was the title you put to it. What kind of a target do you have there? If I look in the other book, the business plans, under your information, I think that's where I saw the fact that you wanted to look at the level of rural population. Yes, on page 63 in the business plans book, "rural population trends." What are you looking at there in the context of the relationship between the rural population and agriculture? Will this be broken down into kind of the nonagriculture sector, the residential rural family, or will it just be lumped together as the total rural? So in effect the increase in residential operations – and this is now becoming an issue for a lot of the ag producers.

Especially in the areas where some of the oil and gas development is occurring, workers in those areas are moving out into the rural communities, taking up homesteads in subdivisions and in effect becoming part of the rural economy. How will that build into developing the sustainable growth trends that are important for rural Alberta? You know, that in a sense reflects on a lot of the other discussions, Madam Minister, that we're having with respect to education, to health care. How do we serve rural residents in those public service areas?

I'm really pleased to see that you're focusing more on this rural initiative and trying to deal with it in the context of population and community viability, because that is one of the issues that I hear raised at just about every meeting I go to in the context of what the government is doing to help or to sustain the population base so that our schools, our community halls, our curling rinks, our hospitals, and all the way down the list remain viable. You know, a lot of the rural communities have been really having some difficult times with the consolidation of the grain handling system. Their elevators close. People don't come to the community anymore to deliver their grain or to deal with their crop input purchases. In effect it takes away a large part of that community's attraction or viability, and they're seeing that same kind of thing happening as adjustments are made in the location of schools or hospitals or that.

I guess what I would ask in that whole context is: does the government have or envision conducting some kind of a rural viability study? I remember that a few years ago I saw one that came out of Saskatchewan, where they were talking about what are viable communities and what are kind of the geographic advantages that certain communities have over other communities. They had done this study and looked at a large part of western Canada, not just Saskatchewan. They came into Alberta as well, and they were talking about some of the characteristics in terms of economic activity, in terms of social activity, and what the characteristics are that are necessary to truly sustain a rural community. Under this rural initiative will you be looking at that kind of a study for Alberta, or is one ongoing that I don't know about?

Another issue comes up under this rural initiative, or goal 2, "strengthened rural communities." You talked in your opening comments, Madam Minister, about the amalgamation of the Alberta Opportunity Company and Ag Financial Services. I looked at the mandate that the new agency is going to have, and I read the information that your department sent over I think it was about 10 days or two weeks ago on a new beginner farmer loan and how it's expanding its coverage or issues that can be financed using it.

That comes to kind of a question that was raised by a producer up in the Grande Prairie area when I was there just after Christmas, it must have been. She was telling me that she'd gone to Ag Financial Services to get an expansion loan and get some support for an activity that she was trying to promote, and they told her that she was too small to be part of their new strategy. This really set her back. I told her that I didn't know why that comment was given to her.

It created, you know, some real questions in her mind about what the mandate of Ag Financial Services was under the beginner farm and expanding farm programs, because this was a small specialty crop producer that wanted to expand their ability to value-add their produce. They were told that they were too small to be of interest to Ag Financial Services, so I guess that comes up as a question about what is the option for community initiative, for uniqueness within a community, especially in areas like we're starting to see now, the community-labeled goods, where people can go out and say, "Oh, yeah. I know exactly which farm that came from." You know, they develop kind of a history with these producers and processors.

As we look further through the business plans, you've got a section on environmental stewardship, and you're talking about the water quality indexes. Are the 23 watersheds that you initiated in 1997 now on a regular basis providing information that shows, like, seasonal variability? Are they providing information that shows differences between the watersheds so that we can start to monitor activity in the area on an annual basis, climate change, drought versus lots of runoff, and start to develop some databases that could be useful in assisting in mitigation or prevention planning? To me when I read through this, I thought: gee, you know, this really gives us an opportunity to start to deal with some kind of planning if there are issues that come up. If there are not, then our industry is really doing a good job, but if there are areas that show some concerns, we can start to develop mitigation plans.

In that context who are you working with to look at any mitigation plan or any support programs if they're being considered? That is something that I know the University of Lethbridge has been working through their water centre. It's got a name almost as long as the one you had there for your hazard analysis critical control, but they have a water centre that they're trying to initiate through the university. That is one of the things they wanted to focus on as part of their original mandate. I know it's expanded a little bit. Are they part of that?

I guess the other thing – on page 65, Madam Minister, there's a graph there where you look at the deviation in Alberta farm cash receipts from the long-term average. I looked at that, and I thought: gee, that's pretty stable. Then I read the paragraph above, where I recognized that that actual includes after-government payments of all kinds. In the context of looking at and truly appreciating the variability and the instability that's in Alberta cash receipts, it would be I think very interesting for the public to have a line below that which shows the actual cash receipts without the government support programs. Then, Madam Minister, what we would have is a really strong signal that we could send to the community that says: look, here's the variability without programs, and look at how we've contributed to stability through the programs that are put in place.

So I think that that kind of information would be quite useful for the community, especially the non-ag community, when they look at, you know, what these dollars do to promote stability of the economy across Alberta. That's especially critical for a lot of our smaller rural communities where they do really rely on the agriculture producers and the ag industry for their economic activities. It would help, I think, as an information tool to provide that kind of background.

Minister, this kind of leads us into a breakdown here. When I was teaching my farm management courses, I always used to talk about, you know: we have to measure farm income in the context of its stability. That's what we've just been talking about in that graph there. We also had to talk about it in the context of its adequacy and its equity. In looking at the business plan here, we deal a lot with the stability issue, but we don't really deal as much with the adequacy and the equity issues. I'll explain those a little for the non-ag listeners. Those basically reflect on whether or not the income levels are adequate to give a competitive return on fixed resources, most specifically capital, and whether or not there's a degree of competitive equity between the sectors and between the ag sector and other sectors to in effect compete for that capital resource. So from those two different perspectives I think it would help us if we could do that to look at how much support might be needed to offset the international distortions that are there from the competition. Or what we can do is just say: in other words, this is the economic disadvantage that our farmers would have to build their business strategies around.

I looked on page 66, and I was quite impressed with your policy initiatives there on health sustainability. Do you have a program in place, or will these health initiatives be used to support and to kind of keep dynamic the guidelines that'll be used by the NRCB in making decisions about siting and CFO permit approvals? This to me seems like a really good place to get basically the scientific information that can then be put into the guidelines for approval that the NRCB would be using in dealing with what is an appropriate technology, what is an appropriate location, and what are appropriate support activities as they go into siting the CFOs under their new mandate.

Further down in that section you talk about the economic development strategy, and under your measure you talk about new investments. I was wondering: are you looking at the size of investment, the categories of investment? Here there's a lot of feedback or correlation between the viable size of farms, the viable size of businesses that go into communities, and the participation in that community, so it ties back to your rural initiative.

I've been following some studies that were done in the lake states, the midwestern part of the U.S., and some more that were done in the Colorado/Nebraska area, Kansas, where they talk about the contribution that different sized production units make to a community. There's kind of a bell-shaped curve in it in the sense that very small producers contribute a lot of human resource to the community but not a lot of economic support to the community. When you get up to a mid-size, that's when they become viable contributors in a dollar and cents way to the community. When they get to be much larger, it drops off again.

So I'll follow that up if I get a chance to get back up again. Thank you.

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Chairman, I'm just going to answer a very few questions because of time. I do want to take the opportunity to address some very current ones. The issue around chronic wasting disease and how that's handled: it is my understanding that the federal government is responsible for the eradication and disposal of the herd. They have taken that responsibility in Saskatchewan, and we assume, through CFIA and our input from them, that the same procedures will occur here although the same procedures of disposal may not be there, but the costs will be borne. In Saskatchewan it is my understanding that they buried the animals. We're looking at possibility incineration here rather than burial.

One of the things that we're very fortunate for in Alberta is that we do have a very good monitoring and surveillance system. I think they call it the GLID program or GLIB, GLED, GLAD – something. Anyway, it has an acronym, but what it really is is an opportunity to trace every animal throughout its lifetime and its history, which gives us a much better opportunity to curtail these diseases, and I did want to mention that.

The other one that I really wanted to make sure that we got on the record is the 4-H program. We realize that because of some of the restructuring we did in our department this year, we caused some consternation in the rural areas on the 4-H program. Actually, we have not reduced any support to the 4-H program. In fact, we have enhanced it, and I'm not sure if we've hired the additional specialist yet, but I know that my department is in the process of recruiting, which will give us in fact more help.

I do want to mention for the record that this year we retired a longtime employee of our 4-H branch, Mahlon Weir. Mahlon dedicated over 35 years – I forget the exact number – to the 4-H branch, was synonymous with every 4-H event that you went to, and of course worked in different parts of the province so was dearly respected and appreciated by 4-H. So we bid him farewell with a great deal of gratitude for his service to 4-H and youth in our province. He will be missed, certainly, but I'm sure we'll still see him around on occasion. I am pleased to say that Marguerite Stark has assumed that role, another person who is very, very, well known and respected in the 4-H community.

What really happened was that the decision was made that we would change the way we deliver services to our 4-H clubs. So we asked the 4-H Foundation and the 4-H Council to consult and to determine in which manner or fashion these services could be delivered best to our 4-H clubs. Because of some of the changes in our district offices and because we didn't want any disruption to our clubs, we wrote to all of the club leaders early and said: please order your supplies early; we don't want you to be disappointed. Well, that led to all of us, I think, that have rural communities getting a lot of calls saying that, you know, we've sort of dumped 4-H. Nothing could be further from the truth.

This government has the highest support for 4-H of any province in Canada. It has the best 4-H program of any province in Canada. In fact, at the last 4-H leaders' workshop and banquet that I attended just recently, the Canadian 4-H president acknowledged that. There is no other province in Canada that receives the amount of government support both in funding and in manpower. That support will continue. We will continue to work with the 4-H Council and Foundation, and I'm sure that over the next weeks they will come forward with a plan for delivery of services that will be very appropriate for them.

I wanted to also just mention that on the issue of food safety and the livestock sector the pork people have been very, very proactive in this area, and you see high percentage numbers there. I was trying to recall with help from my staff the name of their program that they've really received national acknowledgment for. I believe it's called the quality assurance program. Again, Alberta producers lead the way in being proactive in food safety and product safety areas. We certainly applaud that group for that. I mentioned the HACCP program as well. So I think we can be very, very proud in this province of the leadership that our livestock industry shows in assuring that they have a quality product.

Which leads into market access. The best way to get into a market is to have a good product; we all know that. We do product development. We've developed new potato products. Of course, our new potato plants help move product. We've developed new meat products, new ways of serving meats. We've developed new crops.

The issue of the use of water was mentioned. We should all be reminded that in 4 percent of the agricultural land we produce 22 percent of the agricultural product. I think that that speaks to the efficiency of the use of water. It is well known that the southern half of this province – and remember that the half-way mark isn't Calgary; it's much further north – enjoys the largest population with the smallest amount of water. For those of you who are not aware of the value of irrigation, I invite you to take a little trip down into southern Alberta, where over 40 communities depend on an irrigation system to which this government has been a huge contributor in the headworks program. Over 40 communities depend on that water for their domestic water: the city of Lethbridge, the city of Medicine Hat, Taber, just go on and on.

I also want to remind those people who are in the north, who are used to water bodies all around, of one more thing: there isn't one natural lake in southern Alberta. They are all part of an irrigation system, whether it's McGregor Lake or Keho Lake or the Kinbrook project or Newell, where there's a huge wetlands project. I applaud the people in southern Alberta who have done so much to improve the environment for our game birds, for our wildlife. We have not had moose in southern Alberta – I'm not sure that if you hit one with a car, you'd think this was an asset – but it's amazing that you would consider that there was a season on moose in the Castor area in the last year or two. Deer are not native to my constituency historically, but because of the improvements that have been made – and I don't have irrigation, I might remind you. There are 10,000 acres off the Deadfish project around Sheerness plant, but deer are not common. Yet we have large herds because of the improvements that the agricultural community has made to water supplies and to grass. It was a desert; it is a land reclaimed. There's a very good book on that. I would invite people to read that.

So the main thing for all of us is to understand the diversity of this province and understand the strengths and develop the opportunities that arise around it. A lot of new crops are grown that are drought resistant, and this is definitely due to research that has occurred. I will mention chickpeas as the most recent one: a great market, great feed potential. It's drought resistant, and somebody told me that grasshoppers don't like to eat them. Now, I am very tempted to plant a couple of rows along my garden to see whether this is indeed true or not. As well, I also understand from Alberta Agriculture that chickens are your best way to get rid of grasshoppers. They like them. I've tried that out on my husband, and he wasn't too excited about it.

AN HON. MEMBER: He doesn't like grasshoppers?

MRS. McCLELLAN: He doesn't like chickens.

There are a lot of things happening in the research area. We probably have some of the best, best research facilities between our own research associations, applied research associations across this province, who do wonderful work with the producers: our Lacombe, Lethbridge, and Fairview areas, the Ag Canada research. One of the things I'm most proud of is the co-operation that is occurring between Ag Canada and Alberta Agriculture and also our agreements with the university, Olds College, and other institutions on joint research projects.

Our reinsurance program is another one I wanted to just comment on, just to give members a sense of what it means or has meant to this province for Ag Financial Services to take the bold initiative to go into reinsurance. This year we paid $20 million in premiums, and $54 million was paid by the reinsurance fund to Ag Financial Services.

Loans, another area that I think is important. Loans in default are 1.1 percent of our portfolio. I think that most financial institutions would like to have those kinds of numbers. This is the lowest that it's been in a long time, in fact in 20 years. This speaks more to, I think, the good management practices of our producers and also to the staff that we have in Ag Financial Services, who spend a lot of time counseling and working with our producers who do have loans. We can't understand why the hon. member would have met a person who was rejected because they were too small. No loan is too small. I encourage the hon. member to contact this person and have them call either my office or Ag Financial Services directly or my deputy. Our average loan probably is $100,000, but we take promissory notes on loans up to $20,000, so if there was a rejection, I would assume that there must be another cause.

NRCB is under sustainable development. The minister of sustainable development is responsible for the budget. However, when NRCB assumed the responsibility for confined feeding operations, certainly we transferred considerable dollars from Agriculture as well as staff to them.

I'm excited about rural development initiatives. We are making a concerted effort to work with our rural communities. It is true that a lot of people are moving from the urban areas to the rural communities to experience rural life. In most cases that's positive, sometimes not. One of the concerns is that many of these people are commuters and that often their dollars are spent in the urban areas rather than the rural, yet the rural areas are responsible for the infrastructure. We think that by having good community support systems, good schools, hospitals, recreation opportunities, more often these people will become integrated into the rural community and be a part of it.

The loss of elevators, of course, is a difficult thing for a rural town, mostly because of the loss of the tax base. It is really a fallacy to think that a farmer drives to town with a load of grain and then goes shopping. That doesn't happen, but certainly our elevators have been a source of product such as fertilizer, sprays, and so on, and that's the real loss. That will probably be taken up. What is difficult is for the producers who have these long hauls. Unfortunately, we were promised that all of this would cause better efficiency, and if you have better efficiency, you would think that your costs go down. We have not experienced that, and I think that had the federal government implemented the full Kroeger/Estey report instead of picking parts of it, we would have a more efficient, better transportation system, which would lead to some lowering of costs to producers. We continue to press the federal government to totally implement the recommendations of that report. I think the work that was done on that was valuable. We certainly worked hard through our Department of Transportation and through Agriculture to have input into that, and we were very disappointed that that happened.

I certainly will provide more information on the rural development initiative and the viable communities area.

Water quality index. I think this is an incredibly important area. Certainly all of us have been reminded of the importance of water quality with Walkerton. We know what can happen today if all things aren't followed. When I followed the Walkerton issue, though, and the hearings, I found it interesting where it appeared the blame was really being attached. I think it was wrong, and I think the findings in the end proved that. In fact, there were a number of contributors, but somebody not doing their job was the main contributor, not the other things like the provincial government, the farmer, those things. What it really does for all of us is raise our awareness of how important this is.

Fortunately in Alberta we took this initiative over a dozen years ago, and in southern Alberta we embarked on a groundwater study for intensive farming – not just intensive livestock but intensive farming – recognizing that when you have heavy fertilizer use in irrigation, you can have an impact through the use of pesticides and herbicides and all of those things on groundwater. That study concluded about two years ago, and I think it gave us some very, very valuable information as to the status of our groundwater. It also, I guess, led to the 23 monitoring sites that we have at watersheds, and this will help us develop baseline data, which is what you really need. If you don't have baseline data, you don't know where you're going. This will provide an annual report, which will be made public. It will give us the opportunity to be proactive rather than reactive. It's a lot easier to prevent a problem than it is to clean one up. I think the people of this province do appreciate the fact that we have the highest standards for water quality of anywhere in Canada, and the rural communities and agricultural communities are certainly a part of ensuring that we have that.

Some of the things that are happening with AESA, the environmental sustainability initiative, a wonderful group who have done some great work and are doing work on environmental farm plans and certainly will contribute to the health sustainability initiative. Alberta Environment has standards, of course, and guidelines in that area, and I think it's clear that we need standards and guidelines that are there that are stable, that have predictability, as we heard, in confined feeding operations.

A good suggestion on farm cash receipts, to have another line in there, and we'll certainly work on that.

The last thing is on community-based projects. Certainly we have ag initiatives grants, that are provided to communities for initiatives that they believe improve the desirability of their community as a place to work and live. Ag societies are provided annual funding, and they contribute in a huge way to the quality of life in rural communities, because the decisions are made as to how they use that funding by those communities for initiatives that are important to the communities. Those are two areas that I just thought I would mention, and as we indicate in our business plan, data is being developed so that we can better tell you what resources are there.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

MR. KNIGHT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It gives me great, great pleasure to join the debate this evening. For the most part, I certainly do agree with the presentations given by the hon. minister and the answers that she has provided for the questions, but I would like to ask the minister about an area that appeared to be completely lacking in her presentation, and that is the area of sheep. Now, we must realize here that sheep are extremely important to the province of Alberta, and my question to the minister would be if there is any way that she might be able to enlighten me on which breed of sheep might do better in the province. We have Bleu du Maine, Bluefaced Leicesters, Cheviot, Dorset Horned, Hampshire Down, Shetland, and Suffolk sheep. I'm wondering if the minister might be able to help me out and let me know what type of sheep might best be utilized in respect to helping us out keeping Alberta weed free. We have in the province of Alberta some 75,000 kilometres of pipelines, and I would think that it might be an extremely important thing to look into if we could perhaps employ some sheep to take care of the growth of noxious weeds on the pipelines, and another area might be power lines.

It is also interesting to note, Mr. Chairman, that New Zealand ships wool carpets worldwide, and I'm wondering if it's a possibility that perhaps Alberta could get involved in this type of project. If we could get sheep on the pipelines, perhaps we could get a carpet industry going in Alberta.

The other thing of course is that this evening we attended a wonderful reception, had some very good information provided about sheep, in particular with respect to lamb, so that also brings up another question. I was wondering how much lamb is produced in the province of Alberta, and in fact that also appeared to be missing from the minister's report.

With that, I'll close and just ask if I might get some answers to those questions. Thank you very much.

MRS. McCLELLAN: Chairman, because of the hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky's fascination with the sheep industry I thought I would just quickly try to answer a couple of the questions. We do have a number of varieties of sheep in this province, and of course the sheep variety depends on whether you're trying to derive the best quality in wool or in meat. One of the things that's of interest is that one of the challenges our lamb industry faced in this province in its development was the very seasonal lamb. I was asking some of the folks from the Sheep and Wool Commission tonight how they were managing in getting a year-round supply. I was really pleased to be informed by them that they were within two months of year-round supply, and they're able to cover that two-month period with late-growing lambs and others. So we are almost at year-round, which is a huge achievement for that industry.

The sheep industry in our province is relatively small, but it is very valuable and has a great opportunity to grow. Sheep have been used very successfully in environmentally sensitive areas, on river banks and in other areas, for getting rid of noxious weeds. Certainly I would imagine that the pipeline companies or those responsible might be quite interested if they can figure out a way to fence these little sheep so they know where they're supposed to be. On the other hand, sheep are very easy to herd.

We have a great program at Olds College. It's a fibre centre, where they're doing some great work on different fibres, certainly not confined to sheep but alpaca and other things, and they've produced some very, very fine products. Not always is our climate conducive to the type of sheep that produce the wool that's the best for carpets and clothing, but I'm sure that with good research we'll get into that area. I am impressed with the fibre project at Olds College. I think it's an opportunity that has great potential.

So with those few comments on that very valuable industry I'll take some more questions.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

DR. NICOL: Thank you. Just a few kind of wrap-up comments. I want to just comment back to the minister about when she was suggesting that we encourage everybody to go down and see the value of irrigation in southern Alberta. A couple of years ago in conjunction with Stan Klassen with the Alberta Irrigation Projects Association, we managed to take my caucus down and go for a tour, and they were really quite impressed by the contributions of the irrigation industry.

I wanted to just follow up a little bit on one of the other things as the minister closed her comments a little while ago. She was talking about the ag societies and the contribution that they make to rural communities in a broad spectrum of ways. I was just looking through the budgets within the last little while, a couple of days, and I noticed that the funding for a lot of the ag societies has been moved to the lottery fund from what appeared to be the general revenue based Agriculture budget. I guess I would ask what the rationale was for that shift. Was it just access to dollars, or was there a philosophical reason for moving it into that source of revenue? The budget documents show that there is a real movement into that area.

As we look through the rest of the budget now, the Dairy Control Board, as you said, Madam Minister, is being moved out under the new act to an industry-driven proposal, yet there still are dollars allocated for the ongoing operation of that. I don't quite remember, when we passed the bill, what functions stay with government support as opposed to going to industry support that we still need to have the dollars in the budget for the support of the dairy industry, the dairy council. That was kind of a question that came up.

The other issues I think have pretty well all been addressed, as we look through the rest of the budget.

I guess with that, Mr. Chairman, I'll conclude my comments. Again, I just want to thank the minister and the members of her staff for coming in and giving us the support tonight and getting the answers to questions that I wanted to raise. I look forward to continuing to work with the minister to improve the sector over the next year.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: After considering the business plan and proposed estimates for the Department of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development, are you ready for the vote?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Agreed to:

Operating Expense and Capital Investment 305,290,000

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Shall the vote be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Opposed? Carried.

The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would move that the committee rise and report the estimates of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development and beg leave to sit again.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul.

MR. DANYLUK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions, reports as follows, and requests leave to sit again.

Resolved that a sum not exceeding the following be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2003, for the following department.

Department of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development: operating expense and capital investment, $305,290,000.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Opposed? So ordered.

Bill 21

Alberta Personal Income Tax Amendment Act, 2002

[Adjourned debate April 8: Mr. Mason]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to rise to make just a couple of comments about the benefits that will come to Alberta from a consistency across Canada in the way we treat earners of income in Alberta who aren't resident here. This act will help the taxation programs that are in effect here use a formula that's competitive and comparable to the rest of Canada. Looking through it, I see that as the major part of the first section of the act.

I think we all need to look at it from the perspective that if those dollars are earned here in the province, then they should in effect contribute to the revenue sources and be part of income tax so that we treat our outside-the-province income earners the same as everyone else. I know I had a lot of experience with this when I was working overseas on a number of country assignments. You'd always end up having to work with what income tax you paid to the country that you were in, what income tax you paid to the country that was helping to finance the project, what income tax you paid to Canada, what income tax you paid at the provincial level, and you ended up playing around at changing your residency to minimize your income tax payable and to maximize your dollars in your pocket. When we standardize taxation practice, it eliminates that kind of residence shuffling to try and influence the tax we pay.

Mr. Speaker, the second part of the bill deals with the NHL program and how we're going to be taxing them. This is a really interesting new approach to getting revenue for what is basically a small industry, just two participants. Still, it's an interesting way to support that industry in staying viable in our province. I take it that the time frame that's put in here in terms of the end date is consistent with the end of the NHL players' contracts so that we can look at whether or not there will be a small market equalization program put in place by the league, and then we won't have to have this. I assume that that's kind of why the deadline appears to coincide with the number you hear brought up in the NHL about the next time there will be negotiations about, you know, market share, market revenue transfers.

So I think that this, in effect, gives our teams in Alberta a chance to remain viable until that kind of commitment is made by the NHL to sustain their broad appeal across the whole geographic area of North America, because they need to have the smaller centre teams to keep the interest of their viewers across all of their potential market. So I hope that they do at the appropriate time begin to recognize that the small-market teams do need league support. We may not need this, but I think we should be prepared to look at it as an ongoing support if it means keeping our hockey teams here kind of for spirit in our province.

On that basis, Mr. Speaker, I think we should look at this as a bill that contributes in two positive ways in changing our tax statute, and we should support it. Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much Mr. Speaker. I also would like to make a few comments on Bill 21, the Alberta Personal Income Tax Amendment Act, 2002, and certainly the portion in this particular bill that deals with the taxing of the NHL players and our attempts to provide support for our Alberta teams that are currently in the NHL. They not only face the burden of being small-centre teams, but they also have to pay wages in American dollars. This puts them at a great disadvantage when it comes to trying to ice teams that are competitive and teams that will make the playoffs, where again they can earn more income with more games. I certainly see absolutely nothing wrong with players paying tax on the money they earn when they play here in this province, whether it be in Edmonton or in Calgary.

Now, then, this is also required because until the next round of negotiations with the players' association, the options open to help support the small-market teams are quite limited. These teams do need help. We certainly cannot continue to increase ticket prices at the rate that these salaries are going up. I think what we also have to do is look at the tremendous impact on the community that both the Flames and the Oilers have. I know from my long association with hockey here in Edmonton that I would be a very sad person if the Oilers left town, yet I don't get to go to that many games. These players do a tremendous job as members of our community. They're certainly role models for our younger players. I don't think there was anybody more proud than the people of Alberta with the contributions that our players made to the Olympic team and certainly none that were sadder when both the Flames and the Oilers did not make the playoffs this year.

As well, I think we have to look further than this, Mr. Speaker. We have to look at the number of jobs that are provided to people in our communities who work at the Saddledome, who work at the Skyreach Centre. We are not talking here only of the people who have the full-time jobs. There are a number of people who rely on the part-time jobs there, whether they be students or some of our people who are retired and who are trying to augment their pensions a little or whatever. But they do do a tremendous job of that.

You know, I can certainly recall watching the Olympics from Salt Lake City. How proud we were when players from the Oilers or the Flames stood out for any particular reason during those games, and what great ambassadors they were not only for their cities but for the province. I also look at the role that these players play in our communities, and certainly one of the great advantages we have in Alberta with our small-market teams is that the players live and get involved in their communities. I don't know how many hundreds of thousands of dollars are raised by the players for various charities around the city. I do know that they go out of their way to get involved.

I think we also have to look at the benefits of these teams, Mr. Speaker, when we look at all the businesses that are associated in supporting teams of this nature. We look at the hotel industry, the food and beverage industry here in this city. I just noticed an article in the paper here a couple of days ago on the huge impact on the Coliseum Inn when the Oilers failed to make the playoffs and how many vacancies they are going to have there. When we look at that, we look at that particular hotel laying off staff because they don't require as many people, whether it's chambermaids, whether it's people to serve the food in the restaurants or whatever. Again, I think it is one of these situations that if this is one way that we can assist in keeping our small-market teams in Alberta, then it's something that we should certainly do.

I had the opportunity a number of years ago, when Craig MacTavish was still a player here in Edmonton, to accompany him into a dressing room with five- and six-year-olds, and it's about the closest I ever came to seeing magic in my life. These little fellows were looking at him. He passed out autographed cards of himself. They would look at the card and they'd look at this guy. He was never examined so closely in his life to see if he was the real bill of goods. When you see little fellows sitting there barely able to take a breath, it gives you a whole different picture of the impact that these players have.

But these teams also go further, Mr. Speaker, in contributing to our communities. I certainly look in Edmonton, where we have the 50-50s, where minor sports teams – not only in Edmonton but in surrounding areas, and these would primarily be hockey teams at this time, but there could be a change where we have ringette teams involved as well – are given the opportunity to sell 50-50s at the Oilers games, where they get to keep roughly 50 percent of the profits. On a good night this means that teams can make somewhere between $4,000 and $5,000, so it's a huge benefit to our minor hockey programs.

As well, we look at the Flames in Calgary and what they have done. They have their program of excellence, where they certainly have put into place the necessary organization for the development of young hockey players. Certainly when we look at the opportunities that our youth have to go on to play at many different levels, I think that this is another area where these people do get involved. Another way that they also get involved, partly because of the Olympics that were held in Calgary but also because the Flames were there, is that the CHA runs part of their program out of this province. It is certainly another reason that I would like to see the CHA stay in western Canada, and I'm not so sure that they would keep that Calgary branch open if the Flames were not there.

So I certainly am one of those that supports Bill 21, the Alberta Personal Income Tax Amendment Act, and I would urge all members of the Assembly to support this if for no other reason than that the tax generated by this particular bill will certainly go a long way to help carry our teams until such time as the players' association and the NHL owners get to renegotiate these contracts. I would certainly hope to see the league at that time take some responsibility for our small market teams, whether it be some sort of a cost-sharing or revenue-sharing agreement where when our teams go to the States to play, they share the gate there with American dollars, and when American teams come to Canada, we look at sharing the gate here in Canadian dollars, and certainly make some effort to equalize the revenues that teams have. I know that when we look at other leagues, for example baseball, they're certainly considering this at this time so that they can maintain the number of teams in the league.

I would certainly, for one, hope that we will be successful in convincing all members that Bill 21 is a very good bill, and it should be passed. Thank you very much.

DR. MASSEY: Just a few comments about Bill 21, Mr. Speaker. With reference to the NHL tax, I caught a bit of an interview with a city official, I believe it was from Philadelphia – I'm not certain, but I believe it was Philadelphia – where an NHL tax has been in place for a number of years. It was interesting to listen to that manager talk about the use of the tax. There it's part of a larger program of nonresident taxes, so if you're not a resident of the city and you're in the city doing business on a continual basis, you are subjected to a nonresident tax. The NHL of course pays that tax as do other groups who are using city services and doing business in the city. I thought it was interesting because the interviewer asked that manager what the benefit was to the NHL, and the manager went on to say: well, the teams benefited by the provision of facilities that the city provided and that those facilities were often constructed in co-operation with municipal personnel and the teams involved. What it seemed to me as they talked was that this is an issue of great importance to municipalities.

I think of our own city of Edmonton and the difficulties they're having right now with revenues and trying to secure the revenue that they need to provide programs and services that most citizens in the city want and support. My question would be: were the municipalities consulted about this tax? Many of them – I would assume that Calgary does. Edmonton already has some special arrangements with the Oilers in terms of use of the Coliseum. Was this tax part of the discussions with the city, or is it a stand-alone item that will be directly handled by the teams and the provincial government? It would seem to me that as a stand-alone tax, it opens the door to some problems that might be avoided if the municipalities had been involved.

So it's a question I would appreciate having some information on, Mr. Speaker. I think the support for the Oilers is pretty well universal in this city. As someone who held season tickets until I was elected to the Legislature and couldn't use them enough times in the season to make it worth while owning those tickets, I'm interested in what happens to the team, but I'm also very interested in what happens to our city and to the taxes that Albertans pay.

With those comments, I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Finance to close debate?

[Motion carried; Bill 21 read a second time]

Bill 24

Child Welfare Amendment Act, 2002 (No. 2)

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Sustainable Resource Development on behalf of the Minister of Children's Services.

MR. CARDINAL: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to move second reading of Bill 24, which is the Child Welfare Amendment Act, 2002 (No. 2).

Bill 9 of course, a separate Child Welfare Amendment Act, is already before the House but does not address the issues of temporary guardianship orders related to a recent Court of Appeal ruling. Bill 9 has passed second reading, so it is too late to include these needed amendments in the bill. Bill 24 is being proposed to validate temporary guardianship orders that have been technically invalidated by a court ruling. Temporary guardianship orders, or TGOs as we all call them, refer to the status of children and youth who need protection and are temporarily taken into government care. The Child Welfare Act requires that a child's care plan must be filed with the court within 30 days of the TGO being granted. The plan must outline services to be provided to the child and their family while the child is in care. The court and the child guardians have access to the filed plan.

Although the child welfare handbook reminds social workers to file these care plans within the proper time, some social workers have not routinely complied with the requirement. On March 4 the Court of Appeal ruled that the failure of a child welfare director to file a plan of care with the court within 30 days of granting a temporary guardianship order renders the TGO invalid. As many as 600 TGOs have been invalidated by this ruling because a plan of care was not filed within 30 days.

I must stress, Mr. Speaker, that in almost all our child welfare cases across the province social workers have prepared a plan of care. They just haven't filed them. Social workers ensure that the case plan is shared with the child's guardian whether it is filed with the court or not. The reasons for nonfiling are varied, ranging from social workers viewing it as a formality to response from the courts.

Until now the courts have not strictly enforced the formality of filing these care plans. For years the courts have been reviewing unfiled plans of care. Some court clerks have not wanted these plans, saying in one case that they had no room for the extra paper. Some judges have deemed the plan of care submitted in court hearings as sufficient since it is no different than the one that would be filed after the hearing.

The amendments have a very limited application and will apply only to TGOs invalidated by the court's ruling. New amendments in Bill 24 will allow care plans to be filed after the 30-day time limit so long as they are filed within 30 days of the amendment coming into force. The amendments will also allow temporary guardianship orders to remain valid even if a plan of care was not filed within the 30 days of the TGOs being granted. In future, plans of care for TGO children will be filed in compliance with the Child Welfare Act.

I have asked all the CEOs of the child family services authorities to file plans of care with the courts within the required time period. The family law branch of Justice has applied to the Court of Appeal for a stay of the ruling in order to allow time for the amendments to be passed and to come into force. The amendments will come into force as soon as the bill is given royal assent.

I ask for support for this act in order to validate temporary guardianship orders for children presently in the care of child welfare. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, at this time, with a previous agreement, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move that we adjourn until 1:30 p.m. tomorrow.

[Motion carried; at 10:05 p.m. the Assembly adjourned to Thursday at 1:30 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Thursday, April 18, 2002

1:30 p.m.

Date: 02/04/18

[The Speaker in the chair]

head: Prayers

THE SPEAKER: Welcome.

Almighty God, we give thanks for the lives of Your faithful servants who defend the freedoms and values that are a true expression of Your divine intent. We humbly ask Your blessing and grace upon the soldiers of the 3rd Battalion, Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry who were killed and wounded in the service of their sovereign and country in Afghanistan. We pray for the families, the friends, and fellow soldiers of those who have died as they mourn their loss and ask that You give to the wounded the will and spirit to sustain their recovery. In a moment of silence we remember them.

May they rest eternal, O Lord. Amen.
Please be seated.

Hon. members, there has been some consultation among the three caucuses represented in the Assembly, and because of the very tragic circumstances of yesterday it's my understanding that the leader of the government, a representative of the Official Opposition, and the leader of the third party would like to make some comments with respect to this tragic event. In order to do that, we have to alter the Routine, and we would need unanimous consent from the members to proceed in that manner. So I'm going to ask the question. Might we have unanimous consent to proceed?

[Unanimous consent granted]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. the Premier.

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, first of all, thank you so very, very much for your thoughtful prayer.

It is with a heavy heart that I rise today to express the government of Alberta's deep sorrow at the deaths of four Canadian soldiers who were struck down yesterday in Afghanistan. This terrible event touches every Albertan and Canadian with a great deal of sadness. While the loss of life is always regrettable, it is all the more tragic when it occurs in the service of others and in the defence of one's country. Those lost and the many others who were wounded are all in our hearts today, as are their families. To those at Edmonton garrison and in the 3rd Battalion, Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry Battle Group, to the friends and neighbours of those lost and wounded, and to their families I extend on behalf of all Albertans deepest condolences.

The members of Canada's armed forces have always distinguished themselves with honour, courage, and bravery. They have always been willing to face great danger to defend this country, its people, and its cherished values of freedom, democracy, and peace. Heartbreaking events like this truly bring home the horrors of war and remind us all of the risks our armed personnel face whenever they go into battle. They remind us of the heavy price we pay for safety and security. Most importantly, events like this remind us of the value of human life.

In the rotunda of this Legislature there are plaques that commemorate the proud and timeless names of Albertans who fell in the great wars of the last century. Those names remind all of us who visit the Legislature that when the solemn call to arms comes, Albertans have always responded with courage and firmness. Today we mourn four more soldiers who showed the same courage as the forebears and who answered a call to arms that is just as noble, just as necessary as the battles that claimed those who came before them. These four brave soldiers are the first Canadian military casualties of the war against terrorism. We pray that they will be the last, but we know that we cannot be certain that they will be. Whatever happens, all Albertans know in their hearts that the debt we owe to those fallen and wounded soldiers and their families is immeasurable. We can begin to pay that debt by honouring them and their spirits from this day forward.

Today we pay tribute to Sergeant Marc Leger, Corporal Ainsworth Dyer, Private Richard Green, and Private Nathan Smith. May they rest in peace.

We also pay tribute to the eight wounded soldiers: Sergeant Lorne Ford, Corporal Rene Paquet, Master Corporal Curtis Hollister, Corporal Brett Perry, Private Norman Link, Corporal Shane Brennan, Master Corporal Stanley Clark, and Corporal Brian Decaire. May they recover and be home soon.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is with profound sadness that I rise on behalf of the Official Opposition to offer my condolences to the families and friends of our Canadian soldiers who have been killed or wounded. Members of the Canadian forces and their families recognize the risks involved in the defence of our country and our freedoms. Nevertheless, such a loss is always a shock, and family, friends, and the nation feel the loss of these soldiers. The loss of these young Canadians in the service of their country should serve as a reminder to us all that the members of the Canadian forces safeguard the freedoms we cherish. We are indeed fortunate to have men and women prepared to set aside their own fears and concerns on behalf of the country. Their bravery and commitment and willingness to face danger should be a model for us all.

Mr. Speaker, the brave service of members of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry dates back almost a century, to 1914. To the members of this regiment we also extend our condolences for their loss. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity. Last night four Canadian soldiers, members of Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry on duty in Afghanistan, were killed. Eight others were injured. I echo the Prime Minister of Canada when I say that mere words of sympathy are small solace. As Canadians, as Albertans we are united in our grief as our tears fall together with those of the families of these soldiers. For their families there is on this Earth no fair exchange for the grief, confusion, and disbelief they are experiencing this morning and in the long, difficult time ahead. This tragedy will sadden and burden our hearts for many days to come.

I join my colleagues today in this Legislature in offering our condolences to the families of our departed friends. We owe much to those who serve. We owe them honour, and we owe them remembrance. The sting of these deaths will remain in our hearts and minds and memories. In the dreams they nurtured, they will still shape our future. While this unexpected tragedy will sadden and burden Canadian hearts for many days and months to come, may peace soon replace the heartache.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

head: Introduction of Guests

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

MR. BOUTILIER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure today to introduce young Canadians and young Albertans who visit annually the Legislative Assembly of Alberta. Joining us here today are grades 5 and 6 students, parents, and staff from l'école Dickinsfield in the city of Fort McMurray in the public school system. I'd like all of them to rise now and receive the very warm traditional welcome of this Assembly.

1:40

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General.

MR. HANCOCK: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you today and through you to members of this Assembly employees from the Alberta Justice Court of Appeal service. These individuals are here on the public service orientation tour, which, I understand, is being promoted and carried out by the Legislative Assembly Office and your good offices. I'd ask Mr. Randy Steele, Mrs. Beth Millard, Ms Monica Cassidy, Mrs. Ruby Theroux, Ms Charlene Colpitts, Ms Alice Barnsley, Mrs. Danielle Umrysh, Mrs. Toni Wilson, Ms Diane Boisvert, Ms Rosemary Evans, and Ms Corinne Renaud-Gagnier to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this House and our sincere thank you for the good work that they do on our behalf and on behalf of all Albertans.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

MR. MASKELL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure today to introduce to you and through you to the members of this Legislature Mrs. Xiao Na Xiao, a former champion triathlete and star of the Chinese national track and field team and now a resident of Alberta. She's the founder of Li Man International Trading Ltd., an Alberta-based company focusing on import and export between Canada and China. One of the major projects of her company is to introduce Alberta advanced environmental protection technology to China. She's leaving for China tomorrow representing some of Alberta's engineering consultant companies such as Lockerbie, Stantec, Jacques Whitford, and the ISL to Chinese environmental protection projects. She's accompanied today by Diana Wong and Benson Chiu, who are her assistants. Would my guests please rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

MS EVANS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan I'm pleased to introduce a couple who last year received the century farm family award and this fall will celebrate their 60th wedding anniversary. Their son-in-law is the Member of Parliament for Lakeland. Their daughter, Joan, is with Chamber security, so they're well versed in Legislature matters. I'd ask that Norman and Lydia Gabert do rise, please, in the public gallery so that we can all provide our traditional warm welcome to them in this Assembly.

head: Oral Question Period

THE SPEAKER: First Official Opposition main question. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Ultrasound Technicians

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Ultrasound technicians are vital to a modern health care system, performing ultrasounds for diagnosis and treatment in areas such as cardiology, obstetrics, gynecology, and internal medicine. Today one of Calgary's major hospitals, the Rockyview, is on the brink of crisis because so many of its ultrasound technicians have been hired away to for-profit diagnostic centres. As a result, Calgaryans may face serious problems in getting health care even as health care spending climbs. To the Minister of Health and Wellness: how does the minister expect the Rockyview to continue as a full-service hospital with such a profound shortage of ultrasound technicians?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with many different issues in health care, and we have placed a great deal of emphasis on the people inputs that go into our health care system. Throughout this province we do have dedicated professionals, and of course it's not just physicians or nurses. It's also ultrasound technicians and technologists, people who work in laboratories, and so on. Ultimately, we have done a great deal to recruit people from other jurisdictions. That, of course, is a short-term solution. In the medium and longer term we have spent significant numbers of dollars in training more people, and I'm not talking about just these technicians but throughout health care professions. To the best of my recollection, sir, about three years ago we trained about 3,700 people in our health care professions per year. Last year it was over 5,000. So we are making significant investments in three different areas: in capital, in people, and in equipment.

Mr. Speaker, of course an important role should be recognized for the private facilities that are providing diagnostic services. Those services can by contract still be provided to the public system of course. So we will have to strike the right balance between getting services that are done in public facilities but in private facilities as well, sir.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that ultrasound technicians at the Rockyview and other Alberta hospitals are being poached by for-profit diagnostic businesses with large signing bonuses, pay hikes, promises of no shift work, and easier patients, what is the minister prepared to do to prevent public-sector ultrasound technicians from being lured away by for-profit businesses?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, regional health authorities are working on health workforce issues, and of course the issues with respect to a specific regional health authority will be dealt with by that particular regional health authority. Ultimately the solution may be that a regional health authority could decide to contract with a private facility to provide the same services, and if there is a way of providing that service or that procedure through a dedicated facility that provides diagnostic services, that might ultimately lead to efficiency in the system.

DR. TAFT: At a higher cost, I would say.

Will the minister finally admit that this government's experiments with for-profit health care are creating far more problems than they solve?

MR. MAR: No, Mr. Speaker. In fact, our plan is to move forward on improving health care. I think it would be fair to say that Albertans feel very strongly about the quality of their health care system. There are some legitimate issues with respect to access, and it is our goal to maintain quality and improve access in our public health care system. That is the endgame, sir.

THE SPEAKER: Second Official Opposition main question. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

For-profit Health Care

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government for years has denied the evidence that increasing the role of for-profit medicine will weaken the public health care system, this despite research that shows that the larger the role of for-profit health care, the higher the cost to the taxpayer. Today we see yet another example of why Alberta's health care system should remain public and why Albertans are paying more and more for less and less health care. To the Premier: will the Premier admit that the signing bonuses and higher wages offered to ultrasound technicians in for-profit clinics are going to inevitably drive up wage costs in the public system?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I take great exception to the hon. member's statements that this is for profit. If there is a medically required procedure, whether it's an X ray, a CAT scan, an ultrasound, an MRI, or any other procedure that is prescribed, it is provided to the patient under the publicly funded health care system. So this kind of rhetoric, the kind that we heard during Bill 11, is unnecessary, to say the least. It is misleading, to say the least. It is this kind of misinformation and misrepresentation of the facts that does the Liberal Party such disservice, and that's why they only have seven members.

DR. TAFT: Again to the Premier: why are regional health authorities subsidizing for-profit clinics by going out of province and even out of country to recruit ultrasound technicians only to have them hired away by for-profit businesses?

MR. KLEIN: Recruiting has been going on for years and years and years. It will go on long after we're gone. All I know is that we have in this province under the publicly funded system among the highest if not the highest paid physicians in all categories in the country, Mr. Speaker. I can tell you that the clinics that provide various diagnostic services under the publicly funded system do a commendable job, an absolutely wonderful job. I know that when I had pneumonia, I was in and I was out and it was very expedient. You know, I didn't have to go to emergency at a hospital and tie up the equipment there. I went to the clinic, got it done in, I would say, 15 minutes. I was in and I was out. It was done with a great deal of dispatch, a great deal of efficiency, and, I might add, with a great deal of professionalism.

1:50

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Will the Premier finally admit that one reason for the climbing costs of Alberta's health care system is its growing experiment with for-profit health care?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again it is absolutely wrong – wrong – for the hon. member to stand up and talk about “for-profit.” Bill 11, the Health Care Protection Act, clearly states as its preamble and as a matter of law, which is paramount, paramount in this province, paramount in this country, that we will abide by all the principles of the Canada Health Act. Only he, this hon. member, seems to be unable to get it through his head.

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, if I may supplement, sir. Under the Health Care Protection Act there are some 34 contracts that have been approved for private providers to provide services to the public system. In aggregate the contracts total approximately $10 million out of what will now be a $6.8 billion budget, somewhat less than one-fifth of 1 percent of the overall budget. The balance is spent on public health care.

THE SPEAKER: Third Official Opposition main question. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

Health Resource Centre

MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Health Resource Centre, a business backed by major multinational investors, submitted a proposal to the Minister of Health and Wellness for approval to perform major overnight surgeries in Calgary. To the Minister of Health and Wellness: given the notable shortages of surgeons, anesthetists, nurses, and various medical technicians in Alberta's public health care facilities, will the minister prohibit HRC from recruiting staff from public facilities?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should first make himself familiar with the provisions of the Health Care Protection Act. In it it clearly states that major surgeries are to be done in public hospitals. It is not incumbent upon the government to decide what is major and what is minor. It is incumbent upon the College of Physicians and Surgeons to decide. We don't have as a government the ability to determine those major procedures which should be done in a public hospital. Accordingly, the college has approved and accredited this particular facility to perform certain types of surgical procedures. They have submitted a proposal as of yesterday's date to the Department of Health and Wellness to provide uninsured surgical services.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. members and Albertans should know that under the Canada Health Act there are certain exceptions to the Canada Health Act. Uninsured services would be paid for, for example, by the Workers' Compensation Board, the armed forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, other provinces, the federal government, and out-of-country residents. So there are sufficient protections in the approval process to ensure that there will not be harm to the public health care system. That has to be the primary responsibility of the Department of Health and Wellness and the Minister of Health and Wellness, to be satisfied that the approval of such a facility to provide uninsured services will not impair the public system.

MR. BONNER: To the same minister: if the minister refuses to prohibit HRC from recruiting staff from public facilities, isn't he then confirming that HRC's application will lengthen waiting lists by worsening staff shortages in the public system?

MR. MAR: I believe that I was perfectly clear, in answering the hon. member's first question, that the paramount concern from the perspective of the Minister of Health and Wellness has to be to be assured that the approval of such a facility by the Department of Health and Wellness will not impair the public health care system. Mr. Speaker, the criteria that will be applied will include the notion that there can be no negative impact to the public health system, that the facility will in fact serve the public interest either in terms of improving access or maintaining quality, and that it will not – it will not – breach the spirit and the provisions set out in the Canada Health Act. Further, I'll need to be satisfied that no conflict of interest exists.

MR. BONNER: To the same minister, Mr. Speaker: given that HRC will be using staff recruited from Alberta's public system to serve out-of-province patients, how can the minister claim that HRC is a benefit to Alberta's health care system?

MR. MAR: Well, indeed, there are many people from out of province that receive services here in this province, and they are both in the public and in the private system, Mr. Speaker. As an example, I'm advised by the people who run the Cross Cancer Institute here in the city of Edmonton that some 50 people a week come for cancer treatment from the province of Saskatchewan. I don't think that there's anything wrong with that. Indeed, I would like the hon. member to stand up and say, "Because you're from Saskatchewan, we won't provide you with this very important service."

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Earlier this week, as the Minister of Health and Wellness has indicated, he received an application from a company that wants to do total joint replacements and other major back surgeries in its private Calgary hospital. The minister has set up a secretive approval process on such applications, where the decisions get made behind closed government doors while other health care providers and the public get frozen out. My questions are to the Minister of Health and Wellness. Given the precedent-setting nature of this application, will the minister do the right thing and make public the details of this application before he makes any moves to approve it?

MR. MAR: I believe that a great deal has been disclosed about this application already. It has also gone through a process with the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Mr. Speaker. The College of Physicians and Surgeons has been transparent in their process in determining that this facility can be accredited for the provision of certain types of services, which include knee and hip replacements. It is always the intention of the government to be perfectly transparent about this. That is my expectation for the future as well.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the minister is committed to transparency, will he explain or state whether he plans to do any public consultation before approving this precedent-setting application for a private, inpatient, nonhospital hospital, or will the entire approval process take place behind closed doors?

MR. MAR: Well, I first of all want to respond to the hon. member's characterization of this facility as a hospital. He should refer, Mr. Speaker, to the Health Care Protection Act, which specifically says that hospitals are within the public domain and not within the private domain. So can there be private surgical facilities that provide services that are uninsured? Is the hon. member here to say that uninsured services should not be provided at all? I don't think that makes any sense. Keep in mind that this application is not about providing publicly insured services; it is about uninsured services. I don't think that the hon. member wants to stand here in this House and say that he'll stand between somebody who has a particular need and somebody who can provide service that will alleviate a person's pain. Will he stand here in this House and say that he'll stand in between that? I think that this is not within the views of Albertans who say: we have needs, and we want those needs satisfied.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans have another concern. Will the minister assure this House that he will not approve an application from HRG, now Network Health, or any other corporation wanting to open a private, for-profit, nonhospital hospital that has any level of foreign ownership, since this could expose Alberta's health care system to NAFTA challenges?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, I have to stand here and say that I've made clear how this will be approved or not approved. This facility will not be approved if it harms the public system, but the converse is that if it can improve our system, improve access, and does not take away from the public system, then it will be approved. I will take the time to very carefully evaluate this particular application. He appears to have made a ruling on it without even having considered what the terms of the application are. I think that's what people can expect from this hon. member.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Budget Surplus

MS DeLONG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There have been a lot of discussions in the media lately regarding the province's projected surplus for 2001-2002. One report indicated that the economic cushion could be as high as $500 million. My questions are to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister confirm what our surplus for the last fiscal year will actually be?

MRS. NELSON: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, I cannot confirm what the operating cash flow surplus will be for last year at this point as we're only 18 days into this fiscal year, and as such the accounting for the last fiscal year has not been completed not only by departments but by agencies of the Crown. In addition to that, we need to have all of the revenue that would come through March 31 come in and be accounted for, and that would come probably within 30 to 45 days or even up to 60 days, so we won't have that number for a while. Naturally, we have to verify the numbers before we can give the final fiscal picture for last year, and that will take some time.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MS DeLONG: Thank you. The Department of Infrastructure budget for the year in question was $2.8 billion, and they actually spent $2.2 billion, a difference of unspent money of about $600 million. Is this surplus money actually budget surplus?

MRS. NELSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'll have to take members back to last year when we brought the budget forward for the fiscal year 2001-2002. We booked what we call an economic cushion of just over $800 million to accommodate the fluctuations, et cetera, throughout the year as we saw there were changes in the economy, and that cushion did erode downward. We are ending the year, so we had forecast that we would have over $800 million. We know with the updates that we put through from the first quarter, the second quarter, and the third quarter that there were massive changes predominantly on our cash flow from our natural resource area and our investment income that brought our revenue picture down. As such, we don't expect that we will be able to fulfill an $800 million cushion. It will be substantially less, so there are not really additional dollars, although we are going to be in a positive position. That's what we do in this province. We do not run deficits. We run positive positions on our cash flow statements.

The question on where we pulled back on our spending, as you know, was in the Infrastructure and Transportation areas mainly last fall when we found out that our revenue picture was down by over $1.5 billion. So we deferred and delayed a number of projects in the two departments of Transportation and Infrastructure, Mr. Speaker, and we were able to put some dollars back into the existing budget framework to release those dollars that we had held up in the fall.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MS DeLONG: That's fine. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, followed by the hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Debt Repayment Legislation

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government has set aside every other priority of Albertans for the sake of its signature law of debt repayment. As we've seen, municipalities are not happy with this, charities and community groups are not happy with this, parents and schoolchildren are not happy with this, and now not even some of the government's own ministers are happy with this, as they are beginning to voice the concerns of their constituents. My first question is to the Minister of Seniors. How did the government's law to put 75 percent of any budget surpluses towards the debt contribute to a successful seniors' housing program being drastically reduced?

MR. WOLOSZYN: Well, Mr. Speaker, to begin with, the very successful seniors' housing program has not been reduced. We've gone through the onetime funding that was allocated. We've retained I believe it is a million dollars for contingencies this year, and as we assess the ongoing needs and the ongoing successes, we'll ensure that this seniors' housing meets the need as prescribed in things like the Broda report and the impact on aging. To try to relate the two is fishing for the stars in daylight.

MS CARLSON: Mr. Speaker, in response to that, I'll table the statement from program 3.4.1 in the Seniors' budget that states that it is.

My next question is to the Minister of Sustainable Resource Development. Will the minister lobby the cabinet to acknowledge that debt repayment law fails to provide sufficient flexibility for his department and the government in general?

MR. CARDINAL: No.

MS CARLSON: My last question is to the Premier. Will the Premier listen to ministers and constituents, or will he continue to ignore them and pursue his own plan for a retirement party?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's evident by the size of this government's majority that we did listen to Albertans. Going back as far as 1993, Albertans told us that never again do they want this government or any government to spend more than it earns, number one. They wanted us to balance the budget. Going back to that period of time, the debt had accumulated to astronomical figures, and Albertans said to the government: "We want you to reduce the debt. We don't want massive amounts of money going to pay off debt. We want that money to go to services. We want that money to buy things that benefit Albertans. We don't want it to go to the banks and other financial institutions, where it only serves to enhance the corporate profile of the financial institution. We want it to stay here in Alberta." That's why we brought in a law that dedicates 75 percent of all surplus to pay-down of debt so we keep reducing the amount of interest, the hundreds of millions of dollars that would otherwise go to financial institutions that we're now able to put into services. It's as simple as that, so simple even the Liberals should be able to figure it out.

THE SPEAKER: To the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, the appropriate time for tablings will come a little later in the Routine.

The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Drought Assistance

MR. JACOBS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last year Alberta farmers suffered through a devastating drought, and the continuing dry conditions in many parts of southern Alberta are not offering any hope of improvement this year. This week Cypress county authorities declared a drought disaster for their area, and according to news reports several other farm groups are also calling on both the federal and provincial governments for aid to alleviate the drought conditions they are facing. My question is to the Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development. Can the minister tell us what this government is doing to help Alberta farmers deal with these drought conditions?

2:10

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, Cypress county's declaration of drought disaster certainly alerts all of us to the fact that there is still a problem. Certainly we welcome the snowfall we've had in some of the northern parts of the province, including this area, because members would recall that at this time last year this whole area, in fact the majority of the province, was suffering the worst precipitation levels in 130 years. Today in this area we're seeing dugouts filling and hopefully good spring moisture. Because of the concerns we did extend the farm water program. We listened very carefully to producers and groups and municipal councils in our various areas and extended that program. We extended provincewide a pasture program and of course the 4-H production program. Repetitive droughts in the past years have clearly identified to us that we must continue to be vigilant and responsive, and we will do that.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. JACOBS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: will there be any other programs to help farmers should a 2002 drought occur?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, I have spoken in the House a number of times about an Alberta drought risk management plan that was being put together through co-operation with Alberta Environment, PFRA, and Alberta Agriculture, Food and Rural Development. This plan will certainly improve our ability to monitor drought conditions and to respond in a timely manner. We intend to proceed with that plan this year. We along with the federal government – and we appreciate their support in this – have added several additional weather monitoring stations which will help us identify areas.

Mr. Speaker, one of the important reasons, I believe, that Cypress county has identified this early a drought disaster in their area is a tax deferral program that the federal government does implement. However, the process for that is that the county or the municipality must first identify their area as a disaster, then in about July the provincial government will approach the federal government to either extend the tax deferral – which is this instance, because this would be the third year in that area – which is in place so that we don't lose those herds permanently. When people have to deplete their herds because of lack of moisture or lack of pasture, we want them to be able to restock. So it is important that municipalities do react in a timely fashion so we can address that.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. JACOBS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final question to the same minister. I've heard some farmers saying that the only thing that will help them this year is immediate financial aid. Is the minister considering a drought assistance program like the one that was offered last year?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, it would be very unusual to consider a drought in April because we've seen over the last weekend and into this week how quickly circumstances can change. However, we do know that in some regions of the province, it will take more than one year to recover from those conditions; hence, the pasture insurance program, the forage insurance program, the crop insurance program, that we were able to make some enhancements to this year, and the water program, which is probably one of the best programs we have. We'll continue to monitor the situation, as this government has consistently, and we'll continue to support our farmers in their times of stress in the best way we have available to us.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Education System Review

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Bill 12 mandates an examination of the learning system in Alberta. Class size, the adequacy of student grants, resources for special-needs children, and technology greening are but some of the issues that led to the strikes in our schools and need to be addressed. My question is to the Minister of Learning. Who will be doing the examination?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, there will be a panel of independent individuals that will be doing it. The final choice on these individuals has not been made yet.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: will the minister assure parents that the parents will have an opportunity to have their voices heard in front of that panel?

DR. OBERG: Yes.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Film Development Program

MR. LORD: Mr. Speaker, the constituency of Calgary-Currie has the great pleasure of serving as one of the major centres of activity for the film industry in Alberta, with the head offices and in many cases the only offices of many small film companies being located on the old Currie barracks lands and buildings, and we are happy to have them. I often hear from constituents about some of the notable success stories in the movie business and also the many opportunities lost. The industry itself has not only generated a great deal, even a disproportionate amount, of economic development within Alberta but has in fact helped advertise Alberta and Canada all around the world, much to the delight and benefit of all of us. Now, the Alberta film development program has provided advice and has helped generate stability in this very difficult industry over the past three years, and I have some questions for the Minister of Community Development in this regard. Mr. Minister, given that the first three-year phase of the Alberta film development program recently concluded, can the minister explain how and whether or not that program benefited our province?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes, indeed, the member is quite correct. The Alberta film development program in its first three years of operation since being established in 1999 in fact has provided some tremendous benefits on many fronts for Albertans and particularly for the cultural industry of filmmaking.

I should say that the most eminent feature of the program's success is the fact that we were able to resurrect the infrastructure, the crews as they were, for this highly mobile and somewhat fragile industry. I should say secondly that we were able to increase the participation by about 37 percent with respect to film-related personnel. In the process we've also been able to attract more films and more high-profile films to our province. We've received numerous national and international recognitions as a result, which is good for our province and, indeed, for the whole country.

We've also had tremendous economic benefits that have come to our province as a result of this highly successful program. In fact, Mr. Speaker, for the year ended '00-01, we saw something in the neighbourhood of $68 million of economic return for an investment in artistic film development of only $5 million.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. LORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister: what plans or changes does the minister have for the Alberta film development program, looking into the future?

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Mr. Speaker, I think one of the most important things for the future is to see how we can best help sustain this film development program and maintain it. That is why in the current budget you will see a commitment from me and from this government to see that important film development program continue into the out-years beyond the current year's budget.

Secondly, in relation to working with the very important industry association, AMPIA, the Alberta Motion Picture Industries Association, in tandem with them we're going to talk a little bit more about how we can further the artistic development and smooth some things out that would help make the business of filmmaking in this province even more attractive to others, which will help with the artistic development that the program pledges to do. I think that in the future you can see increased participation on behalf of filmmakers and also on behalf of some of our government personnel working there in attending some of the higher profile national and international events such as the Cannes Film Festival, which is coming up very soon, so that more and more people know about the beauties and wonders of our province in terms of how nice a place it is to do business and make films.

So we'll do everything we can to attract more filmmaking opportunities, I can assure you.

MR. LORD: Again to the same minister: given that the industry is fragile and fraught with challenges, what specific actions could the minister consider to ensure that Alberta's filming environment remains strong and competitive?

2:20

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Well, Mr. Speaker, I should tell you that I've had numerous meetings with our colleague from Airdrie-Rocky View with respect to this issue, because it is an issue that she has championed and is well known for in our caucus, along with our Deputy Premier and numerous others. In response to some suggestions made by those hon. members and others as well as having met with numerous representatives from the filmmaking community, AMPIA representatives, their president and executive and so on, I will be meeting soon with representatives from the Alberta Foundation for the Arts and talking to them about some plans that I have that will help this industry a great deal. I'll just give you a couple of them really quickly. First of all, I am prepared to look at increasing the cap from $500,000 upwards from there. I'm also prepared to eliminate the eligibility requirement of 10 percent of total expenses and make it something more in the line of 20 percent of Alberta expenditures as being the eligible amount. I'm prepared to increase the funding to dramatic series, which provide a lot of benefit to this province. There will be other good-news items. I know that . . .

THE SPEAKER: Sounds like a fine ministerial statement coming up.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

Community Lottery Boards

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On October 4, 2001, the city of Edmonton received notice from the Edmonton Community Lottery Board that a grant of $300,000 had been awarded in support of the redevelopment of the Kenilworth arena in the constituency of Edmonton-Gold Bar. Now, on December 10, 2001, the city of Edmonton subsequently received a second letter delaying that money until April of this year, but Alberta Gaming stated that they "will issue your cheque in April 2002." My first question is to the Premier this afternoon. Why did you break away from the $300,000 agreement with the city of Edmonton to improve the Kenilworth arena not only for minor hockey players but for figure skaters and adult recreational use?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, as I understand the question, this was a decision of the community lottery board, to grant $300,000 to this particular arena project. We had absolutely no say over the operation of the community lottery board other than to provide them with the money. I know that under the rules of CFEP it would have had to have come from a number of different constituencies, probably, for that kind of money, but the rules might have been different for the CLB. I'll have the hon. Minister of Gaming respond in further detail relative to the specifics of this project.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. STEVENS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The community lottery boards deal with many applications and certainly did in the year 2001-2002. I personally am not familiar with each and every application that comes forward; it's an administrative matter. If cheques were in fact written, there would be a record of that. What I can do for the hon. member relative to this particular application is look into it, and I'm happy to do that and provide further information to this hon. member with respect to that.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. For the record, I appreciate the Minister of Gaming's diligence. However, my next question is for the Premier. How many tax dollars is the government planning to spend to defend these cutbacks in court, because Alberta Gaming not only made commitments in Kenilworth through the community lottery boards but elsewhere in the province, and these commitments are not being honoured. These existing agreements have not been honoured to provide funding to community groups.

Thank you.

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'll have the hon. Minister of Gaming respond because I'm not sure how agreements through Alberta Gaming with community lottery boards pertain or relate in any way, shape, or form to the funding of individual projects. I'll have the hon. minister respond.

MR. STEVENS: It's quite correct that on an annual basis the Ministry of Gaming enters into individual agreements with individual lottery boards. For the year 2001-2002 there were 88 boards, and there would have been 88 agreements relative to that. The funding would flow out of the Alberta lottery fund into Gaming and from Gaming into the various lottery boards, and there was a process that each board set up for the allocation of funds. Beyond that, Mr. Speaker, I'm not aware of any detail relative to the questions being posed by this hon. member.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the Premier: given that this government has broken faith with Albertans over the community lottery boards, how can the city of Edmonton properly plan and manage this project and its imminent construction when this government without warning takes away the funding?

Thank you.

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, you know, without warning we introduced the community lottery board program, and for years and years and years municipalities existed without community lottery boards. For years; isn't that right? For years they existed without community lottery boards, and we brought them in without warning. They were taken out so we could reallocate resources to the things that are deemed to be the priorities of Albertans, like health and education and infrastructure. Those things seem to be of no importance to the Liberals, because they are obsessed with community lottery boards to the detriment of those things that Albertans have told us are priorities for them like health, like education, like infrastructure, like safe communities, like meaningful research in science and technology, like protection of the environment. Those are the things that Albertans have told us are important to them.

Mr. Speaker, again I stress that these things are obviously of no importance whatsoever to the Liberals, because they are obsessed and all they can talk about are community lottery boards.

THE SPEAKER: Well, hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands, you've been rather vociferous this afternoon. Now it's your turn.

Chronic Wasting Disease

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One month ago the first known case of chronic wasting disease, a relative of mad cow disease, was discovered in a slaughtered elk from an Alberta game ranch. At this point we don't even know the identity of the game ranch that has the disease, nor do we know whether and how widespread this problem may be in the province of Alberta. My question is to the Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development. Exactly whose privacy is being protected by the refusal to make public the identity of the game ranch on which chronic wasting disease was found? The elks'?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, I fail to understand from the hon. member's question of what value it would be for him to know the identity of that farm. The farm was immediately quarantined. Fortunately this industry has been vigilant in developing a monitoring and surveillance system that allows them to track the movement of every animal on or off a farm in this province. Not many industries can say that they can do that with assurance.

When there is a disease identified, the Canadian Food Inspection Agency, an arm of the federal government, is responsible for carrying out the quarantine and for the disposal of the herd if that's required. We are assisting in the tracing. As I say, fortunately we can do that and have done it. The farms that might have received an animal or had a contact through animals from the affected farm are now quarantined until that testing has been done.

So, Mr. Speaker, what the value is for the Member for Edmonton-Highlands to know the name of the farm, I fail to see.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MASON: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Given that testing for chronic wasting disease can only be accurately performed on elk or any animals who are no longer alive, why has the government failed to order the slaughter of the remaining elk on this game ranch in order to determine how widespread the incidence of the disease is?

2:30

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, this line of questioning clearly defines the need for some clarification and understanding for this hon. member of this whole industry and shows the lack of it. First of all, I did say in my first answer that this is entirely under the federal government, under the Canadian Food Inspection Agency. Secondly, I did indicate that we have the best monitoring and surveillance and tracking system, that we can identify every animal. He should know that these animals are only slaughtered at certain abattoirs and they are tested at that time and the meat is held until that animal is declared clear of disease. This has been done prior to our having chronic wasting disease in this province. It's a federal matter, and if he wishes these answers, perhaps he would like to go under the federal FOIP legislation to get them.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MASON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Given that there is now a chronic wasting disease case in Alberta, can the minister tell the House, whether her government or the federal government is responsible, why testing for this disease among elk continues to be voluntary?

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, we've had a voluntary monitoring system in this province for a number of years in this industry, and I must say that the compliance with the voluntary system has been extraordinarily high. We've had a number of discussions with the industry. They are very responsible people. We had a meeting, in fact, as late as yesterday morning, the Minister of Sustainable Resource Development and myself, to discuss this and other matters. I would expect that it will be mandatory at some point soon. However – however – before an animal is consumed or sold for meat purposes, it is tested, and that is the very important thing.

Mr. Speaker, chronic wasting disease has been in other provinces, our neighbours to the east, and in fact in other states, and we think that the fact that we've had this co-operation from the industry, this desire to have a good industry, we have managed to keep this disease out of Alberta until now.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Calmar.

Mental Health Legislation

REV. ABBOTT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Some of my constituents have recently raised concerns about mental health patients in their community who appear to need more help in maintaining their treatments. On Tuesday of this week I tabled a document with almost 500 signatures on it, asking to change the criteria for involuntary commitment or court-ordered treatment. My question is for the Minister of Health and Wellness. Is the government considering setting up community treatment orders to require patients to take medication and receive proper treatment?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, I am aware that this is a very important issue for families of persons with mental illness who may not comply with their prescribed treatment. Any time that we review mental health legislation that involves the detention and treatment of people with severe mental illness, it is always very, very complex and controversial. Mental health legislation does try to strike a balance between the needs of the individual who is being detained for treatment and the rights of society to be protected from any harmful activities of such individuals.

Mr. Speaker, I've received much information on this particular issue, and I can say that the opinions of both the medical field and the legal field vary greatly upon how to achieve this particular balance.

REV. ABBOTT: My next question is also to the same minister. Given that today's laws only intervene where there is a threat to oneself or others, what is the current system doing to support mental health patients who need help in maintaining treatment?

MR. MAR: Currently, Mr. Speaker, the Alberta Mental Health Board provides services through community mental health clinics throughout the province and psychiatric hospitals, and of course there are also hospital programs that are operated by regional health authorities. Consistent with our response to the recommendations of the Premier's Advisory Council on Health report we are supporting the recommendation to integrate the operations of the Mental Health Board into regional health authorities in order to have a more coordinated and comprehensive system of mental health care.

Team Alberta Arctic Winter Games

MR. GOUDREAU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today it is with great pleasure that I rise in this House to congratulate on my behalf and on behalf of our Member for Peace River the junior ladies' curling team from Grimshaw and Peace River. This team won gold at the recent Arctic Winter Games held in Nuuk, Greenland. This team comprised of Grimshaw's Amanda and Charlene Swicheniuk and third Kate Blakely helped skip Erin Brennan of Peace River bring this medal home. They represented their province and our northern communities very well. This Team Alberta swept their competition into submission in the double round-robin with six wins and no losses. In the semifinals they were victorious over the Yukon team, moving them on to the final game against the Northwest Territories, where they again defeated their opponent to win the gold ulu. The gold ulu is the medal awarded at the Arctic Winter Games. The ulu is the traditional Inuit knife commonly used for centuries as an all-purpose tool in the Arctic.

These girls have a history of winning, having won western Canada's junior championship in Calgary last year. No doubt we will hear more of their accomplishments and victories in the future. These young girls join other Peace region teams and individuals who came back with many medals. Many other ulus, or medals, were won in individuals and pairs sports events. Their efforts and victories speak well of what our young people can accomplish as well as the support received from their coaches and their parents. The communities of Peace River are very proud of their young athletes who qualified, participated, and won at the Arctic Winter Games in Greenland.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Law Day

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Law Day will be celebrated this Saturday, April 20, in both Edmonton and Calgary. Now, with all that's been in the news lately about the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and access to legal aid and increasing court costs, here's an opportunity to learn more about the courts and the law. This event, sponsored by the Canadian Bar Association and organized by the Alberta legal community of judges, lawyers, students, clerks, and others associated with the law, invites anyone to drop into this free open house with booths, displays, tours, lectures, and mock trials. Have a look behind the scenes at how our courts work and what role each person plays.

In Edmonton Buccaneer Bill is charged with piracy and kidnaping in the children's trial. Calgary's children's trial will feature Harry Potter in the case of the missing ring. Trial times are repeated throughout the day. A family law custody trial in Calgary features the Calgary Stampeders mascot, Ralph the dog, and one of the football players from the team. Mock trials will also be held for the areas of criminal and civil law. There will also be many lectures on legal topics like wills and estates, small claims court, and taxation, reviewing lawyers' bills. Or in Calgary you may ask the lawyer at the ask-a-lawyer booth for free legal information. Both cities will feature a citizenship court, high school mock trials, and tours of the law building. In Edmonton all events run from 9:30 to 4 at the Law Courts Building on Winston Churchill Square, across from city hall.

In Calgary things kick off at 9 a.m. with an opening ceremony featuring a dragon dance and runs until 3 o'clock.

I have attended Law Day in the past. It is great fun and really interesting, and it's all free. My thanks to the Canadian Bar Association, the Alberta Law Foundation, the Law Society of Alberta, and their media sponsors for taking the extra time to provide all of us with a fun way to better understand how our courts work and what the people in them do.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Egmont.

Gerald B. Art

MR. HERARD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's with the greatest pride and honour that I rise to recognize and celebrate the life of a longtime friend, mentor, and constituent of mine, Mr. Gerald B. Art. Gerry journeyed to his great reward on March 3, 2002, at the young age of 68 years. Gerry was many things to many people. As a volunteer, an employer, a partner, a friend, a husband, a father, and grandfather, in whatever capacity we knew him best, we recognized him as a wonderfully funny, generous, fair, warm, caring, and compassionate man. These characteristics were woven from the strands of a life of dedicated service to others before self. Along with his child bride, Eleanor, as he so fondly liked to call her, he served and contributed to the well-being of communities and constituencies wherever they lived in this great province. Together they made a positive difference in the lives of many without ever looking for any recognition in return.

Gerry's first involvement with the Alberta Progressive Conservative Party was as campaign manager for the late hon. Neil Crawford in 1971. He and Eleanor have remained involved with the party ever since. Gerry generously gave of himself to the Calgary-Egmont Conservative constituency association in every conceivable way and served as president from 1987 to 1989 for my predecessor, former Speaker David Carter. He was my nomination chairman in 1993 and continued to be actively involved in the association. Meanwhile, Eleanor served as secretary of the association for many years as well as being my president in 1995-96 and my very capable constituency assistant for many years. In 1997 Gerry and Eleanor helped launch yet another political career. The then new candidate for Calgary-Fort needed some organizational campaign management experience, and Gerry and Eleanor answered the call to help secure his victory.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, we will all miss this gentle man, Gerry Art, who did everything with dignity and class, and we're all better human beings for having had the privilege of living within the sphere of his influence. He enriched our lives.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Earth Day

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Who says you can't change the world? That question is the theme of Earth Day 2002. Earth Day founder, Gaylord Nelson, a U.S. Senator from Wisconsin, proposed a national environmental protest in 1970 to shake up the political establishment and put a wide range of issues on the public agenda. On April 22 of that year his vision was taken to the streets, and the green movement got political. Here in Alberta we have the fortune of having grassroots groups advocating for the protection of our air, water, and soil; preservation of critical wildlife habitat; and appropriate development. These groups educate, advocate, question, propose alternatives, and demand action. They run on shoestring budgets with hundreds of volunteer hours contributing to their success.

Alberta is not an easy province for greenies and tree huggers. Even those looking for moderate change backed up with facts and figures have met with resistance. In honour of Earth Day I would like to recognize some of the groups that make this Assembly a little more interesting: Albertans for a Wild Chinchaga, Pembina Institute for Appropriate Development, Federation of University Women, Clean Air Strategic Alliance, Toxics Watch Society, Edmonton Friends of the North, Sierra Club, Alberta Environmental Network, Canadian Parks and Wilderness Association, Alberta Wilderness Association, Grassland Naturalist Society, and Trout Unlimited. This list is a long way from being all of the groups that are working to protect our environment, but these groups have written a lot of letters and made many phone calls. [interjection] They have let the members in this Assembly know what they want, and they are not afraid to repeat, repeat, repeat, in spite of what the Minister of Environment has just stated. So who says that you can't change the world? These groups haven't quit trying.

head: Presenting Petitions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm presenting a petition signed by 106 residents of Edmonton petitioning the Legislative Assembly "to urge the government to not delist services, raise health care premiums, introduce user fees or further privatize health care."

head: Notices of Motions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise pursuant to Standing Order 34(2)(a) to give notice that on Monday I will move that written questions appearing on the Order Paper do stand and retain their places with the exception of written questions 3 and 4.

I'm also giving notice that on Monday I will move that motions for returns appearing on that day's Order Paper do stand and retain their places with the exception of Motion for a Return 1.

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: I know he visits quite often, Mr. Speaker, but he can't have that constituency.

I have a number of tablings today. The first is in response to the question I previously asked of the Minister of Seniors. I will table his former response made on March 20 of this year in budget estimates where he talked about cutbacks in his department for seniors' housing that are due to the restraints and that he's "hopeful that as the fiscal situation improves, [he'll] be able to reinstate those programs."

My second tabling is on behalf of the Leader of the Official Opposition. It's a petition supporting services to persons with developmental disabilities in Alberta. It's the appropriate number of copies with 54 signatures from people throughout Alberta.

My third tabling is a similar letter requesting that the Bighorn wildland recreation area be designated as a wildland park, using the 1986 boundaries. These folks are all from Calgary. The letters are from Shawna Nyberg, Brenda Everitt, Renee Huba, Kathryn Manny, Joanne Wyvill, Madalena Pinto, Connie Serelle, Fenella Hood, Marco Musiani, and D.G. Lavallee.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I would like to table for the information of all hon. members of the Assembly three letters that I have. The first letter is dated July 13. It's a letter that I have written to the hon. Minister of Learning expressing my concern regarding the enforcement of trade qualifications for both apprentices and journeymen in this province.

The second tabling that I have is a letter that I received on July 25, 2001, from the hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment. This letter certainly has to do with the concerns expressed about the lack of enforcement of compulsory certification trade qualifications.

The third letter, Mr. Speaker, is a letter that I received and that I was pleased to receive from the hon. Minister of Learning. It's dated July 27, 2001, and it is in response to concerns that were raised in the July 13 letter regarding enforcement of specific requirements of the Apprenticeship and Industry Training Act.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. I have three letters today, once again all on the community lottery boards. The first letter is from Jennie Esdale, who started out as a young performer here in Edmonton and is now living in Calgary. She points out that the theatre company she operates with does an April Fools Day parade every year with their community. She asks that the community lottery board be reinstated. It's essential to their community.

The next tabling is directed to the Minister of Gaming from Joan Farkas also of Calgary. She's pointing out that revenue from gaming was intended to benefit the local communities, that charitable groups who are entitled to lottery funds have been treated with disrespect.

The third letter is again directed to the Minister of Gaming from Laurie Leier also of Calgary, pointing out that there is a misconception that there are other sources of funding available to make up for the cut community lottery board program and asking the government to reinstate the community lottery board program.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have one tabling today. It's the appropriate number of copies of a letter dated April 6, 2002, from a Mary Paranchych, who is stating that it is extremely important to the cultural life, the community groups, and educational groups in this province that community lottery boards be continued. In fact, she goes on to say that it is imperative that they be reinstated.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the appropriate copies of a report titled the Fort McMurray DisAdvantage. This report was prepared by six teachers from that city and highlights the problems of the high cost of living in Fort McMurray. Accompanying this report is an attachment of 22 signatures of other teachers, and they also share the concerns of this report.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

2:50

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm tabling a letter from Lori Nicholls addressed to the Minister of Children's Services. As Ms Nicholls' previous letters to the minister have remained unacknowledged, she is once again writing to plead for immediate help from the ministry.

head: Projected Government Business

THE SPEAKER: The Official Opposition House Leader.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At this time I would ask that the government share with us the projected House business for next week.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Next week starting Monday, April 22, in the afternoon we will of course deal with private members' business, Written Questions, and Motions for Returns, followed by Public Bills and Orders other than Government Bills and Orders. At 8 p.m. under Motions Other than Government Motions we'll deal with exactly that, and at 9 p.m. we will move to Government Bills and Orders for second reading of bills 23, 25, and 24, then to Committee of the Whole for bills 6, 7, 9, and 14, and otherwise as per the Order Paper.

On Tuesday afternoon under Government Bills and Orders and specifically under Committee of Supply we'll deal with the main estimates for the Department of Justice and as per the Order Paper. Tuesday evening at 8 we will have Committee of Supply, the main estimates for Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development, then second reading for any bills that still remain under second reading, then hopefully Committee of the Whole for bills 10, 13, 14, and 15, and otherwise as per the Order Paper.

On Wednesday afternoon under Government Bills and Orders the Committee of Supply will deal with the main estimates for the Department of Revenue and as per the Order Paper. On Wednesday evening under Government Bills and Orders the Committee of Supply will deal with the main estimates for International and Intergovernmental Relations; private bills, Bill Pr.1, which I believe is from Edmonton-Meadowlark; second reading as well for any bills that remain in that particular stage of debate; and then Committee of the Whole should be able to deal with bills 16, 18, 20, and 22, and otherwise as per the Order Paper.

On Thursday afternoon of next week under Committee of Supply for main estimates the Department of Learning will be discussed and debated; otherwise, as indicated on the Order Paper.

THE SPEAKER: Now the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie on a point of order.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

MS CARLSON: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I stand under Standing Order 13(1), Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules & Forms, sixth edition, pages 45, 46, 47, and the House of Commons Procedure and Practice by Marleau and Montpetit, pages 525 to 527 with regard to the Premier. Earlier this afternoon in question period in an exchange between the Premier and the Member for Edmonton-Riverview the Premier I believe twice used the term "misleading" in referring to the question asked by the Member for Edmonton-Riverview and certainly used the terms "misleading" and "misrepresenting" in the same sentence in a very aggressive manner with an intent to ensure that people believed that this member was trying to mislead Albertans. That certainly offends the rulings in those orders and books that I have stated and is laid out, Mr. Speaker, in the information you provided to us on November 29, 2001: Expressions Ruled Unparliamentary by Speakers/Chairmen of the Alberta Legislative Assembly, 1905 – 2001. As we review this, you talk about what happens if a member is found to use offensive or disorderly language, and we would at this time request that the Premier withdraw the unparliamentary words and phrases that he used in that particular exchange.

If we refer to your document of November 29, we will see that you have listed 13 different variations of the term "mislead" and have accompanied that with 27 references when this particular word or phrase has been ruled unparliamentary in this Legislature. We would like you to add this particular instance to the list and will be quite satisfied in our request if the Premier will withdraw that particular reference.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader on this point of order.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes. I want to just correct the wrongful impression that may have been left with members of the House with respect to some of the statements made by the previous speaker from Edmonton-Ellerslie. While it is true that words like misinforming, misleading, mislead, and misrepresentations, and so on, are in some contexts deemed to be unparliamentary, so too is it true that within other contexts they are in fact deemed parliamentary. To cite the examples, I would cite for you and for all members of the House section 491 of this particular version of Beauchesne that I have, which is the 6th edition, wherein it states:

The Speaker has consistently ruled that language used in the House should be temperate and worthy of the place in which it is spoken. No language is, by virtue of any list, acceptable or unacceptable. A word which is parliamentary in one context may cause disorder in another context, and therefore be unparliamentary.

On the preceding page, which cites Beauchesne 490, it would show you that "since 1958, it has been ruled parliamentary to use the following expressions." Included therein are the words misinforming, misleading, misled, and misrepresentations. So those particular words have been ruled parliamentary because of the context within which they were cited.

Now, we don't have the final edition of Hansard here, but from what I recall hearing the Premier say, he did say that it's this kind of misinformation and misrepresentation of the fact that does the Liberal Party such disservice, and so on. When you review what it is that the Member for Edmonton-Riverview said, you can understand that within the context of what that member said, the Premier's comments were in fact correct and they were bang on. In fact, I think what the Premier was attempting to do was to help set the record straight with respect to the comments made by the Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

There are a number of occasions that have arisen over the past several years, Mr. Speaker, during which time I've been in this House, where we've heard about the cut and thrust of the debate and how certain words can be used and misused perhaps, and so on, but in this particular case I think the Premier was well justified in what he said, given the context of what he said and given also the context of what has happened earlier this week. I can appreciate where the opposition might be coming from, because it has been a bit of a difficult week, I'm sure.

On the point of misleading and misrepresenting let's review sometimes what gets said here too. Earlier in question period we heard one of the members from the opposition talk about some particular program in the Ministry of Seniors that had been apparently cut or removed or whatever. Shortly after that, we heard the Minister of Seniors get up and correct that statement too, but we didn't jump back and accuse them of anything on that particular case. It was a mistake on their part and the minister set them straight and life goes on.

Similarly, when the Member for Edmonton-Riverview continues to talk about private, for-profit health care and those types of things, I think those are damaging and misleading statements that could be made within the context of how he's using them. In other contexts perhaps they're acceptable, but that's not what we're all about with our Health Care Protection Act. I think that as evidence of what we are all about, there was a clear indication of that a year ago March 12, in which the issue was settled. Clearly, the majority of the public in this province understood very well what is publicly funded health care, which is what we have and what we're pledged to continue, and what is not. They also understood the difference between private hospitals, which are not allowed in this province, and special clinics that would allow insured services to be done in private settings but funded by public dollars. That's an important distinction. So there's no attempt to mislead or misinform here whatsoever.

I thank you for considering those points, Mr. Speaker, in your deliberation.

THE SPEAKER: Well, I was kind of hoping that when we arrived at Thursday of this week we wouldn't have to do this again. But okay; so be it. I appreciate the hon. member's desire to bring this matter forward and to bring this matter forward in the manner in which the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has brought it forward, and I also recognize the response provided by the hon. Deputy Government House Leader with respect to this matter.

So what do the Blues actually say, which is important first of all I think as we begin with respect to this. In response to a question from the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview the hon. the Premier said the following.

Mr. Speaker, I take great exception to the hon. member's statements that this is for profit. If there is a medically required procedure, whether it's an X ray, a CAT scan, an ultrasound, an MRI, or any other procedure that is prescribed, it is provided to the patient under the publicly funded health care system. So this kind of rhetoric, the kind that we heard during Bill 11, Mr. Speaker, is unnecessary, to say the least. It is misleading, to say the least. It is this kind of misinformation and misrepresentation of the fact that does the Liberal Party such disservice, and that's why they only have seven members.

It was at that point in time, I do believe, that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie intervened. Now, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie has quoted a variety of text, all very important text. I should point out one, probably the most important one that we have to deal with, dated November 29 of the year 2001, issued from my office: Expressions Ruled Unparliamentary by Speakers/Chairmen of the Legislative Assembly. The member is absolutely correct that in reading from that document of November 29 the following expressions were ruled unparliamentary, expressions such as

Mislead, continue to Mislead (the House)

Mislead (the House), deliberately/deliberately meant to Mislead the people, deliberate attempt to Misleading
Misleading statement
Misleading the Assembly/House/Albertans
Misleading information
Misleading, intentionally Misleading, totally Misleads, she deliberately
Misled
Misled, deliberately

This very same person, though, who issued this statement also issued another statement on the same day, November 29: Expressions Ruled Not Unparliamentary.

Misinformed
Mislead/Misleading Albertans
Misleading statements
Misleading (the House)
Misleading the public
Misled
Misrepresentation

Now, what is really the thrill of this job. As all members have known and all members have been told, it is the context and the manner in which the words are used. Several tests are included with respect to this. If the word "deliberately" is included in it, then it could be viewed as an attack on an hon. member, basically saying that that hon. member misinformed, which is not good – not good – and if you used the words "deliberately misinformed," that's no good at all. That will cause intervention and penalty.

A lot of it has to do with, as the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie referred to, the House of Commons Procedure and Practice.

The Speaker takes into account the tone, manner and intention of the Member speaking; the person to whom the words were directed; the degree of provocation; and, most importantly, whether or not the remarks created disorder in the Chamber.

All of which has to be considered. And further, "Thus, language deemed unparliamentary one day may not necessarily be deemed unparliamentary the following day," which is really wonderful guidance for someone in the chair to follow and deal with.

Now, what also is very important in this is whether or not it is actually directed towards an individual. In dealing with the statement in here, reading this again:

It is misleading, to say the least. It is this kind of misinformation and misrepresentation of the fact that does the Liberal Party such disservice, and that's why they only have seven members.

Presumably someone might argue that that statement was directed not to a particular individual of the House but to a particular group, which, then, sort of goes right by that individual and hits another wall.

So while the language is not the best language – and I heard the hon. Deputy Government House Leader admit that that was not the best utilization of language in the context; I recall hearing that – technically this is not a valid point of order as it would appear that the bottom line is that the comments seem to be directed to a group, not an individual, and, secondly, that no one is certainly deliberately misleading the Assembly.

Hon. members, given all that's really transpired in this Assembly in the past week, though, I'd like to just ask members to remember the following. It is the role of Her Majesty's Loyal and Official Opposition to ask questions of the government and to do what it can as it seems advisable to bring the government to account. That is a duty of the opposition. Also it is a duty of private members.

At the same time, the questions are to conform to certain practices that are identified. Questions have to be dealing with government policy, not seeking opinion, not being frivolous. The rules are all identified. All members, not only members of the opposition parties, should read these rules. I think all government members should read these rules. Quite frankly, a fair number of all of these questions from both sides might be ruled out. The accepted practices are important.

At the same time that that advice is being provided to the members who direct questions, to those who reply to questions, the intent is to be brief, to as much as possible deal with the matter raised, and certainly not to have controversial or contentious comments in the responses that might lead to disorder. This is given to all.

It would have been really helpful in the case of this point of order if all the precedents in the past would have been a little clearer on it. The language is not the best language that we might want to use, ruled unparliamentary one day and parliamentary the next day in the context of what is said.

I really encourage all members to reflect on all the rules and the practices and the procedures and the traditions of our Assembly. Take some of these books out of the library if you don't have them. Read them on Saturday and Sunday. Come back energized with a new respect for the parliamentary tradition.

head: Orders of the Day

head: Government Bills and Orders

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, after continuing communication on this issue with the Official Opposition and with the third party, I seek the unanimous consent of the Assembly to waive Standing Order 58(4) to allow this afternoon's consideration of the estimates of the Department of Environment to go beyond two hours with the vote on these estimates to take place no later than 5:15 this afternoon as per Standing Order 58(5) or sooner if no one wishes to speak.

[Unanimous consent granted]

head: Committee of Supply

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

THE CHAIR: I'd like to call the Committee of Supply to order.

head: Main Estimates 2002-03

Environment

THE CHAIR: Are there any comments or questions to be offered with respect to these estimates? I'll call first of all on the hon. Minister of Environment to talk about his estimates for the year 2002-2003. The hon. minister.

DR. TAYLOR: Thank you so much, Mr. Chairman.

AN HON. MEMBER: Question.

DR. TAYLOR: Now, there's a good idea.

Mr. Chairman, I will keep my comments relatively brief today because I know that the opposition members have some questions they want to ask. I will certainly assure the opposition that they will get answers back. Their questions are all recorded in Hansard, and we will, as we always have, respond to your questions.

3:10

I would like to introduce a number of people that have joined us from the department. I'm surprised to see so many of them up there.

We have Stew Churlish; he's our chief financial officer. I must say that that's an appropriate name for a chief financial officer. We have Roger Palmer, my deputy minister. Alexandra Hildebrandt: I'm not sure what she does, but she's very valuable. We have Val Mellesmoen, my communications director, and Ken Faulkner, my executive assistant. Alexandra is a policy person.

On behalf of the Department of Environment I am pleased to present this budget and our estimates, which we hope you will approve. I want to point out that Alberta Environment really is the chief protector of Alberta's environment. We have a bunch of excellent people that do an excellent job of enforcing some of the toughest and most stringent regulations in North America and, if you check, around the world.

I would like to start with a few comments about the department. As you know, Mr. Chairman, we are a department that was created really just a little over a year ago. This is the first real budget of that new department. Of course, when it was created, the budget process for the old department had actually been ongoing, so this is the first real budget. Because of the new mandate we did take a look at our core business, and we did take a look at our key issues, our key priorities, and we came up with a number of new key strategies and a number of core businesses that we are tying our budget to. Rather than tying our budget to business units, what we've done on the suggestion of the Auditor General is to tie our budget to our core businesses.

Mr. Chairman, one core business that we've identified is environmental leadership, and for instance what you'd find in that core business is the long-term water strategy that we are developing. What you'd find in that core business is the emission standards that we've asked the Clean Air Strategic Alliance to develop around emissions from coal-generated electricity plants.

Another core business that we've identified is environmental assurance. An example there would be to maintain the high quality of Alberta's drinking water. For instance, Alberta is one of two provinces that has adopted, either through regulation or legislation, the Canadian drinking water quality standards. In fact, we have in many cases made our standards even tougher than the Canadian drinking water quality standards.

The third core business that we've identified is something we're calling environmental stewardship partnerships. What we're trying to do is develop partnerships with industry, with environmental groups to help us as we monitor and develop policy around environmental issues.

A fourth core business we've identified is environmental stewardship education, and what you're going to see as we move forward is an emphasis on educating the public and educating industry. We want to provide an education system so that people will quite clearly recognize what they should do to protect the environment. It's our philosophy, Mr. Chairman, that what we should be doing is educating the public, educating industry to prevent environmental disasters, not trying to clean a mess up after it's been made. Certainly we do have to clean up the messes, but we're much further ahead if we can prevent those messes from happening. So through our educational stewardship program we're going to put a lot of emphasis and we are putting a lot of emphasis on educating not only the public but industry.

Let me give you one example of education partnership. We're working with the Dairy Council as we speak, and you might have heard some of the excellent commercials on the radio or seen the excellent commercials on television on recycling the milk jugs. As we go forward, the milk jug recycling was only at about 40 to 42 percent. We've set some very strict guidelines, and we expect the milk jug recycling to be at 55 percent this year, 65 percent, and 75 percent over the next three years. So that's kind of an example of an educational partnership between Alberta Environment and a nongovernmental organization.

The fifth core business area that we've identified is hazard and risk management. Essentially we have to maintain a strong capacity to manage toxic spills, to manage drought, to manage floods, and this hazard and risk management is that type of area. We need to, as we go forward, be able to respond to air polluting events, be able to tell people, if they have a fire of some sort, if there is damage there, if there are emissions that are damaging to people from that fire or from that polluting, whatever that polluting event would be.

So those are the five core business areas that we've identified. What we've done is we've assigned a budget number, as the Auditor General has requested, to each of those core business areas, and we will go forward in our budget and develop those core business areas.

Now, one other, final area I'd like to address in the budget area is that there is a drop in the total budget, Mr. Chair, of approximately $17 million. This drop is due to the elimination of onetime funding, projects that no longer need funding. I'll give you two examples. One example would be the animal study that's being run out of the University of Saskatchewan on the effects of flaring. What we did was we paid that forward, so we didn't need it in our budget for this budget year. Another example would be Climate Change. We've paid Climate Change forward, so we didn't need it in this budget year that we're looking at. Those would be the major programs that make up that $17 million. There are a number of smaller programs, but those would be the major two programs. Now, I'll be very clear: those two programs are continuing. It's just that we were able to pay them forward last year, so we didn't have to include it in our budget of April 2002 to March 31, 2003.

With those comments I'll conclude and allow the opposition to present some questions.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm happy to have an opportunity to respond to this year's Environment estimates. First of all, I would like to acknowledge that the Environment minister has been very straightforward throughout the course of his term as minister in terms of sharing information and briefing us on some of the key issues. Sometimes the briefing comes after the announcement, but that's okay. We'll work on that. I don't always agree, in fact I actually seldom agree, with the filters that he uses for decision-making, but it is always an interesting discussion and opens up lots of opportunity for debate for us in and outside of the House. So I thank him for that level of co-operation and look forward to that continuing.

I also would like to thank all of the staff that are here today. You all do a wonderful job. They have, I think, a tough time keeping this guy out of trouble, but they're also doing a good job on that side, and we'll stay tuned.

DR. TAYLOR: That's their primary job.

MS CARLSON: Yes. I understand that very well. I'm sure they understand that very well too. We'll see how things unfold in the future, but I know that they're up to the challenge, Mr. Chairman, and we'll have to keep on our toes to find those potholes that he steps into.

DR. TAYLOR: As long as the potholes aren't filled with something.

MS CARLSON: Yes. Well, you're the guy from rural Alberta.

For the debate this afternoon I'll make some opening comments and list some issues that I would like the minister to talk about, and if he doesn't mind responding to them in a general or more detailed fashion, whatever he prefers, and if there are specific details that he wishes to share with us at some later time, that would also be very acceptable. I find that budget debates are most effective for long-term use when we're able to get some answers on the floor of the Assembly, so thank you for that, Mr. Chairman, and Mr. Minister.

3:20

The minister in his opening comments talked about his department being the chief protector of the environment of Alberta, and that's how I also see his role, so it's a little disappointing for me when I go through the core businesses of the department and see that they have such an economic development focus. I'll talk about that a little bit more in detail, but I do agree with him on what he sees as the chief role for this department. I don't necessarily see that they use that particular filter in making a great deal of the decision-making, and perhaps he can tell me how they develop the decision-making process that they use when they apply it to decision-making as the chief protector of the environment. I see a heavier focus on what we see under their core business goal 1, the key strategy of sustainable development, integrated resource management, where it states that they "develop a comprehensive series of sustainable development strategies to integrate the uses of land and resources." It would seem to me that it would be more appropriate, in keeping with what he stated as their chief role, if the statement at least said: develop a comprehensive series of sustainable and integrated protection and development strategies, or something along that line. So I would ask him to comment on that.

I think that, otherwise, the core businesses outlined here are good as sort of second-tier core businesses. What I would like to see a focus on for this minister and this department is a model of sustainable development that takes in more than the economic model that it looks like they're using as a descriptor. I think that there's a big need in this province at this time, and this government could show a real leadership role if they took a look at developing a science-based model of sustainable development. I think this is the particular minister to do this because of his background.

We're facing increasing competing interests for our land base and our water and our air in this province, the competing interests being people, municipal development, agriculture, industry, and wildlife needs. How do we make the decisions? I guess that is really the question. Right now what we see or what the perception is is that the decisions are made based on either who has the money or who has the influence or who has the biggest degree of pressure on the government. In talking about this particular model to industry and environmental groups, both sides are very receptive to looking at some other sort of a formalized structure being put in to decide who gets what in the province. If the government were to initiate a science-based study to decide what the land load is for all the competing interests in the different regions of the province . . . [interjection] Well, the minister is saying that they're doing something like that. I'd be very interested to hear about that. Perhaps I'll listen to what he has to say on that before I proceed with the other comments I have on this.

DR. TAYLOR: I'd just like to comment on that, the issue around integrated resource management. I think that's what the member is indicating. She's talking about the ability of the department to look at a particular land mass or a particular area of the province and try and develop an integrated resource plan, and that's exactly what we're doing. We have a very good model on the northeastern slopes, and I think we sent copies to the member. If we didn't send you a copy of that, the northeast slopes management plan, we will send you one. What that northeast slopes management plan does is look at limiting the footprint of industry or industrial development on a particular area. For instance, in the northeast boreal, of course, you have a lot of forestry roads through particular forest areas. Well, what we would say as part of the plan is that if the oil industry or seismic wants to develop into a new area where there's forest and forestry wants to develop in that area, the industry should get together to limit the footprint and just have as small a footprint as possible on any one particular area.

Now, the northeast slopes plan is the first one that we've done, granted, but as we go forward, that is an initial model of what we want to do. We want to develop what we're calling integrated resource management plans for various areas around the province, and we will do several of those this year. I'm not sure how much the staff can do, because it's a public process and we get the public involved. We hold public meetings and ask the public. What this does is bring a balance between industry and the environment. It protects the environment.

The goal of the integrated resource management plan is to have as little disturbance to the environment as possible, and that's what this department is about. It's about protecting the environment and balancing economic development with that. It's quite clear from the World Economic Forum, from the World Bank that countries that have the healthiest economies also have the highest environmental sustainability index. Countries that have the lowest GDPs – and these are 2000 studies – have the lowest environmental sustainability index. So a country like Haiti, Eritrea, or Ethiopia has a very low environmental sustainability index. What we're trying to do with these integrated resource management plans is do exactly what you said. Have we gone far enough, you know, fast enough? Maybe not. Have we started? Yes, and we will continue along that line.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Mr. Minister, for your comments on that. We do have the information on the northeast slopes and the management plan. It doesn't really address what I'm talking about here because what we're looking for is something that goes a little further. You talk there about limiting the industry footprint in a particular area. I think there's a question that needs to be asked prior to making that decision, and that is: should that particular footprint be there anyway, or does it even need to be limited? What is it that we need to actually decide here as the criteria for deciding what the land-load base is; that is, how much can the land sustain? I think we have some areas in this province that are overdeveloped and some that are underdeveloped. So how do we decide that, and then how do we decide who gets there and whether or not the next step is an integrated plan where industry looks to limit their footprint?

[Mr. Klapstein in the chair]

The University of Alberta has an excellent environmental planning area that's quite interested in looking at designing a model that could actually decide, could define within some reasonable parameters what the land-load base is. For instance, in your part of the province, where we're seeing increasing pressure on water and increasing pressure to have intensive livestock operations, what is the science-based land load there? What can that land base sustain, given the resources it has available to it right now, in terms of industry, people, municipalities, and wildlife? Let's look at that from a science-based position and then decide whether or not we can take any more. If we have too much, what do we do to mitigate long-term damages? The same in all the other regions of the province.

Now, I've had some fairly detailed discussions with people in oil and gas and forestry on this as well as with environmentalists. We would expect that environmentalists would be happy with this kind of a proposal, but would industry live with it? Would they be happy? We have already some commitments of financial support for this kind of research should it go forward, because what everybody is looking for, on both sides of the issue here, is a roadmap to be able to follow that takes out the political lobbying, the chance situations, the court challenges that we've seen happen here in the past. So I would respectfully ask the minister to take a look at something like that, because I think that could show real leadership.

We have a unique opportunity in Alberta because of the resources available here in terms of environmental and industry and dollars available to the government to really be a best practices province. Now, I know that in many ways we are, but I don't want us to compare ourselves to Third World countries. I want this province to be able to say that we are leaders in the globe. We have an opportunity to do that, and we have an opportunity to preserve areas that are quite unique but may not be so unique five to 10 years from now if we don't take a look at these kinds of practices.

A short sustainable development definition that I particularly like and I think lends itself to developing this science-based kind of research is development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs. That takes into account more than just the balancing of resource management and industrial development with environmental needs I think. I think it's something that we need to take a look at.

If we take a look at what people are starting to talk about globally, they're starting to talk about things like a quality of life gap where standard measures that we use, and are particularly used in this province, that measure the economy and changes in the GDP and inflation and employment fail to tell us about long-term sustainability of our economic development and how it translates or fails to translate into quality of life. Certainly the environmental gap falls into that kind of a measure.

Everybody knows that human activity leads to disruption of global climate, but we find also that the actions of governments and industry are quite short of what's needed in the long term to prevent severe damage to economies and environments. The minister alluded to this when he talked about good environmental practices leading to wealth in areas. We really need to take a look at the beneficial kinds of changes that we can see in the balance between economies and environments and the resource consumption that people have, because we're not where we need to be, and I think we need to just have a little bit of a change in focus in how we determine what that is. We don't actually, I think, incorporate risk assessment and management as policy in making decisions when we talk about sustainability, and that could be easily incorporated into this kind of science-based review.

So if the minister could just briefly comment on that, I would appreciate it.

DR. TAYLOR: I'll be very brief. Once again I would suggest to you that that's exactly what the integrated resource management plan does. It does take the science into account. I mean, we're not perfect. We can always improve, and we certainly will take your comments seriously as we go forward.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you, Mr. Minister.

Next I would like to touch on your comments on the Kyoto agreement and where this goes in terms of leadership in the province. I'm hoping that the minister isn't sticking to his guns of fighting it out with the feds at all costs.

DR. TAYLOR: Absolutely I am.

MS CARLSON: Well, I think that that is an eventual stage you can get to. I don't disagree with that, that potentially long-term that may be where this all ends up. But I think there's again a real leadership position that this government needs to take, because let's face it; we have the most at risk here as a province in any decisions that are made long term.

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

Now, I'm hoping that there's the public side of this issue where you're ready to meet at high noon and shoot it out, but I'm also hoping that there is a private component to what this government is doing and what this minister is doing in terms of moving this province to the forefront of decision-making on what happens in the long term around CO₂ emissions. I don't necessarily agree that the Kyoto accord should be ratified by Canada. I don't think that it takes us where we need to go, but there are some issues there that need to be clearly identified. We need to do something. I think everybody agrees with that. I think industry agrees with that. Certainly that would be the information that I have, and that's a topic that I know quite well because I did my master's thesis on it. I think that we're seeing industry lead on this issue, and I think the government is still falling behind in terms of where they need to be pursuing issues. If you just pick a fight with the feds, why would they go to the table and start to work with you on some of the issues that are important to Alberta, which has such a fossil fuel dominant position?

Where are you in terms of pushing forward with issues like tradeable permits, carbon credits, and sinks? I think that's a position that Alberta can carve out for itself and pursue aggressively at the federal level, because those are the areas that we're going to be hurt with. What are you doing in terms of taking a look at the emissions following the buyer rather than all the risk being assumed by the producer? If these guys want our oil and gas, there's a cost associated with that. There's an environmental cost, and what are you doing to push that along in terms of it being accepted as an option?

I received just recently, yesterday or the day before, some great information on the Breton Plots Soil Conservation Society and some good work that they're doing. They talk about how the practices that they've had in terms of learning how to manage unproductive soils have led to the development of economically viable agriculture over a large portion of Alberta. Particularly with regard to Kyoto they've shown that certain practices have increased sequestration of carbon in the soil and therefore reduced carbon dioxide. Other research has shown how certain practices reduce the amounts of nitrous oxide and other greenhouse gas, and they are relevant in terms of carbon credits. So in addition to that federal component, what else is this government doing particularly to push along the research and development side of some of these issues?

DR. TAYLOR: Well, thank you very much. I'm very pleased that our persuasive arguments have convinced the hon. member that the federal government shouldn't sign the Kyoto agreement, and I hope she's communicating that to her federal counterparts.

Now, what have we done and where are we going? I would say that on the whole we work very closely with the federal government on a number of these issues. Just last weekend I spent considerable time with both the federal minister and his deputy minister. As a direct result of the effort that we put into working with the federal government, they included earlier on last year the concept of forestry and agricultural sinks in their negotiating position. That was a direct result of Alberta working with the feds on that, and they did get the United Nations, the climate change agreement, to agree to include both forestry sinks and agricultural sinks. I won't go into the details on explaining what they are, but you obviously know.

Now, the other thing that we have worked with the federal government very clearly on after Bonn, which was last July or August, was to get them to include what we're calling clean energy exports in the agreement. It has become quite difficult with the U.S. not a signatory to the agreement because most of our energy – and I'm just going by recollection here. I think about 80 percent of our exported natural gas goes to the U.S., and about 60 or 65 percent of our oil exports go to the U.S. That's recollection. I could be a few percentage points out. When we move particularly our natural gas to the U.S. and replace coal or some oil-burning furnaces or whatever we're replacing it with, we should get clean credits for that, and both the federal government and us agree on that.

That's a direct result of us working with the federal government in Bonn, and I can tell you that at Bonn I had very good co-operation with the federal government. I couldn't attend the negotiations because unfortunately Alberta is not a federal state. Only the federal states could attend the negotiations, but we did meet every morning. We met with the federal negotiators every morning that the negotiations were going on for anywhere from an hour and a half to two and a half hours. They met with us and they told us what had happened the previous day, where they saw it going, what was Alberta's position. Quebec was there as well. I can't remember if it was just Alberta and Quebec. There may have been one other province. I can't recollect. What is Quebec's position on this? What is Alberta's position? Where do you think we should be going? I found the federal negotiators to be very frank, very open, and very honest, and we worked very closely with them. So I see that ongoing working relationship to continue.

On February 21, I believe it was, we presented a paper in Ottawa at an invited conference that outlined Alberta's strategy, its kind of overarching strategy as it deals with climate change. We've always said that climate change is important, and with or without Kyoto Alberta will go forward with a strategy and an action plan.

You were asking specific questions about emissions, trading, sinks, and so on, and I can tell you that that will be part of our action plan that we will be presenting to the joint ministers' conference in May, May 21, 22, in that time frame, in Charlottetown. There will be very clear actionable items. It will have a great emphasis, I'm sure, not to give anything away, but energy conservation certainly will be a large part of what we go forward with in any action plan.

Industry is co-operating with us. We've got a group called Climate Change Central. The board is made up of industry. It's made up of environmental NGOs. Who else? Agriculture is there. Transportation is there. Some academics are there. It's a very good and effective board. They're actually working very closely with my climate change people in the department headed by John Donner, who's an ADM, working very closely with the Climate Change Central group to actually work on and develop this action plan. It's actually developing as we speak. As I say, we will be releasing that publicly at the May 21, May 22 environment ministers' conference.

We want this to be a leader. We want people to look at this and say: you know, Alberta's got a very clear action plan. Other provinces should be able to look at it and be able to generalize their issues around CO₂, and we hope the federal government will take a look at it and say: yes; here's an action plan that will actually reduce the CO₂ as we go forward. Of course, we have to do this in the North American context. As I said earlier, the largest amount of our trade – in energy issues, in all areas, manufacturing, whatever – is going to the U.S. So we have to be cognizant of what the U.S., our largest trade partner, is doing, and we have to develop our action plan within the North American context.

The Europeans quite clearly do what they do within the European context. They have something called a European bubble. They move things around. So, for instance, Portugal can increase its CO₂ by about 30 percent and still be at a Kyoto target. What they do is they take that Portuguese 30 percent and move it around and artificially reduce.

I want our action plan to be really centred on actually reducing CO₂, because that's the purpose. With or without Kyoto makes no difference. Preferably without, because the technology will not get us there in time. I believe that this needs to be a technologically driven process, not a politically driven process. So you will see in our action plan a big emphasis on developing technology: sequestration technology, sink technology, agricultural sink technology, forestry sink technology, and so on. That's the way we're moving.

I mean, there's always going to be, you know, discussion around any action plan just as there was around the strategy that we released, but I think overall that people will be impressed and pleased. Once again we were seen as leaders when we put the strategy out there, and I believe that we will be seen as leaders as a province when we put our action plan out there too. So you can look forward to that mid-May.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have two more points that I would like to address before I yield the floor to other opposition members. The first is a follow-up to what the minister has said, and thank you for the information. It's certainly more progressive than what we have been reading in the newspapers in terms of your position and where you're going. As a follow-up to that, without giving away anything that you can't disclose about the action plan in terms of CO₂ emission reductions, I'm hoping that you can tell us that included in at least the public education component of the strategy is the public participation in CO₂ emissions and their required participation in reducing that. We know that the focus has so far been on industry, but in fact they aren't the greatest emitters if we take a look at it on a collective basis.

DR. TAYLOR: If I may make one small correction, actually in Alberta industry is the biggest emitter. The oil sands and electrical generation emit about 52 to 55 percent of the CO₂, but in other provinces it's different. In most other jurisdictions in Canada it's largely a consumer issue. And, yes, we will very clearly deal with the consumer issues and public education on energy conservation as we work through this action plan.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, and eventually we'll get Edmonton-Strathcona in here.

MS CARLSON: Yes. One more point. Mr. Minister, I would like to get some opinions from you on genetically modified organisms. We know that primarily the focus for this issue is an agricultural issue, but there is certainly an environmental component to it that fits in with a number of the goals and core businesses that you've outlined. Two points here. One is on insect resistant strains and GMOs and the potential for them being toxic to their predators, like critters that eat grasshoppers, caterpillars, things like that. What are you looking at in your department in terms of that kind of long-term environmental risk, and what impact does a crop developed using biotechnology have on the environment?

If we take a look at the July 2, 2001, Agri-News put out by Alberta Agriculture, Food and Rural Development, on page 3 they talk about how "biotechnology may bring animal care benefits and challenges" and that "bio-engineered livestock may bring many human health and environmental benefits." So I am wondering if you can comment on the potential environmental benefits you see on the side of GMOs and the environmental problems that we may see. We hear a lot these days about how GMOs will modify the landscape and impact particularly on forests. So if you can give us some general comments, and if you're doing anything specifically, I would appreciate that being provided.

DR. TAYLOR: As you correctly identified, this is largely an agricultural issue, and I'll actually have to get back to you on that and see exactly what we are doing within the department on GMOs. I could comment, I suppose, that you have a genetically modified organism sitting to your immediate left, but I wouldn't. We will get back to you on that issue.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I rise with pleasure to ask a few questions of the Minister of Environment concerning the budget and related matters and policies. I was listening to the minister's comments on the position that the minister and I guess the government have taken on the Kyoto accord, or protocol, and its signing. The minister seems to have a sort of ambivalent position on the climate change issue, and Kyoto is only one instrument, I guess, to address the problem. He would like to go with Kyoto but not necessarily. He says preferably not, and perhaps uses his own action plan instead. I have a question on the reason that the minister has used and the government has used. Why would Kyoto in its present form make us economically uncompetitive vis-a-vis U.S.? True; 80 percent of what Alberta produces goes there. I guess 75 percent of what Canada produces goes there too, but there are two ways of dealing with it. One is to accept the U.S. position as is and then develop our own responses, because the U.S. position is out there and we don't want to say anything about it.

To what extent has the minister expended any efforts to convince the federal government and to work with it and other provinces as well – because the other provinces are players too, I guess, in this whole process – to collectively put pressure on the American government to change its position? That to me is one of the many responses. If they don't change at all, then of course I'd like to see what your own action plan is if you don't accept Kyoto. What pressures have you mounted either as a provincial representative, all by yourself, or jointly in co-operation with federal and provincial governments?

DR. TAYLOR: Thank you for a legitimate question. I will say that we have the support of a number of provinces quite clearly: the strong support of British Columbia; the strong support of Saskatchewan, a good ND . . .

DR. PANNU: Did my question not get through?

DR. TAYLOR: I'm going to get there.

. . . strong support of Ontario and New Brunswick, so we have strong support from those people on our position. They actually see us as leaders, and most of the country sees us as leaders. No, I don't think Kyoto is the appropriate instrument, period. Okay? Because we will not get there by 2010. The first measurement period is 2008 to 2012. Canada gets measured, if Kyoto is ratified, in 2010. We don't even measure it ourselves. Do we get these UN cops coming in to measure Canada? So you've got some sovereignty issues around there as well.

So Kyoto is not the instrument. That does not mean that climate change is unimportant. What it does mean is that Kyoto is not the way to address it. We need to address climate change through the development of technology for the reduction of CO₂ and other pollutants. As a matter of fact, the fellow that first wrote about climate change in 1988, a NASA scientist whose name was Hanson, is actually backing off, as he's kind of Mr. Climate Change. What he's saying now is that certainly CO₂ is important, but it's the other issues – the NO_x's, the nitrous oxides, the sulphur oxides, and the particulate matter – that make people sick, and we need to be spending more time on those than we do on CO₂, because as you get rid of those, you also get rid of CO₂. Quite frankly, Kyoto says nothing about SO_x's, the sulphur oxides, and particulate matter and so on.

Now, I'm kind of getting around to your question eventually. So what I'm saying is that, no, we have no intention of trying to put pressure on the U.S. to accept Kyoto. It is an inappropriate instrument to deal with the issue of climate change. Climate change needs to be dealt with through the development of technology. That is not what Kyoto is about. Kyoto is largely about a wealth transfer from the industrialized world to the developing world, and that may be an appropriate thing to do. In fact, in my own personal opinion I think that probably as an industrialized world we need to do a lot more for development in the Third World, but if that's the issue, then let's do it appropriately. Okay? Let's do it in a direct fashion, not through some international treaty that has little to do with actually dealing with the issues of the developing countries. So, no, I don't intend – the federal government may be trying to put some pressure on the U.S. to change their position, but you can see how much success they've had, and I agree with the U.S. that Kyoto is an inappropriate instrument to deal with the issue.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm glad you made yourself clear. The federal government is trying to seek some modifications, I guess, in the Kyoto before they will sign. They will not have your support regardless. Is that what you're saying?

DR. TAYLOR: Well, one of the issues that we've got on the federal agenda and that the federal government has put on the international agenda – because of course we can't put it on the international agenda ourselves – is clean energy exports. The Prime Minister has commented on it; a number of senior ministers have commented on it. That's clean energy exports, getting credit for those clean energy exports, being crucial to Canada's position on ratification. If they do get the clean energy exports as part of the UN treaty, which I don't believe they will – and last weekend in Banff when I was there, the Europeans quite clearly said that they will not allow that to happen. The Germans have said independently that they will not allow clean energy exports to be part of the treaty. So I don't believe they'll get it done.

Let's assume that there's some miracle that happens and the federal government gets clean energy exports as part of the treaty. At that stage, then what we will do is we will reanalyze our data. We will put that into the different computer models that we're using to estimate costs, and we will see if that changes the amount of damage it will do to the Alberta economy, first, and to the Canadian economy secondly. So if they get it, does it automatically mean that we'll agree with ratification? No. Does it automatically mean that we'll agree with not ratifying? No. What we have to do is to take the information we get and put it into our different modeling scenarios we're using and see what effect that will have on the economy.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Let me move from there to the Alberta strategy and action plan. We now know that the government of Alberta is drafting an action plan. We also know that it will be officially released on May 21, May 22. Would you be able to release a draft of this for public debate in Alberta so that Albertans, your and my constituents, can have some foreknowledge of what you will be proposing on the 21st, 22nd? What's wrong with making your plans public to Albertans, to whom you and I owe an obligation to be open with?

I have a couple of other questions. I may as well make those. I want to thank my colleague here from Edmonton-Gold Bar, who has kindly permitted me to ask you a few questions because I do have to leave the House for a while after that.

I see that environmental stewardship is one of the main businesses of your department as goal 3 in the business plan. It says that stewardship is best achieved through "generating awareness and understanding that encourages environmentally responsible behaviour." I presume both on behalf of the government and on behalf of all of us as individuals, stewardship by all Albertans. Would this goal not be seriously addressed if in fact you made a commitment here today that you are going to take your draft first to your own citizens of Alberta rather than taking it somewhere else first? Why would you not do it in light of that?

My second question is about your reference to CO₂, that the control of CO₂ emissions is important. Whatever strategy of the province you lead this government to develop will have to address of course the matter of CO₂ emissions through power generation. I was taking part in the debate yesterday afternoon on the Energy department's estimates, and there was a forecast there, a projection that over the next four or five years in Alberta the alternative energy generation will remain at 9 to 10 percent. It's 8 to 9 percent now. It's remained fairly at that level, and the primary reliance in this province will remain on coal to produce energy. Of course, the province is encouraging greater amounts of generation of power primarily obviously through the burning of coal. Coal burning leads to the release of all kinds of pollutants including CO₂. What plans do you have as the Minister of Environment, the advocate of environmental enhancement and protection, I guess, to act on that front to limit, to reduce CO₂ emissions even if you don't like Kyoto and you won't go along with it?

DR. TAYLOR: Let me deal with the first issue, which was releasing the document beforehand. One, we have a timing issue that's simple and practical. We're working very hard to get it ready, and it'll probably be ready about the week before we go. So that we do have some feedback from Albertans, we have 74 members in this House that represent the largest percentage of Albertans, and we will have those members certainly review it before we take it anywhere. Simply there's a timing issue, and we will do that.

AN HON. MEMBER: I didn't know you considered that important.

DR. TAYLOR: Absolutely they are important, and we hope to have them support us next time around, which I'm sure we will.

So it's a timing issue largely, and we will release it. When we release it, it will be the first step of an action plan that we will be asking for feedback on. It's not something that's written in stone. It'll be the first step. As I said a little earlier, I'm sure there's going to be lots of feedback on it because it will certainly be somewhat controversial.

Now, a very important point that you've raised is in regards to the emissions issue and burning of coal. I will point out that Alberta has the toughest standards for provinces where we burn coal. B.C. has, for instance, tougher standards on coal burning for power production than we do. But guess what? They don't have any coal-generated power plants because they're all hydro. So in jurisdictions that actually burn coal to produce power right across North America, we're equivalent. Does that mean they're tough enough? No, it does not.

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

As you know, last July we toughened up the standards some. We made them more stringent. I have asked the Clean Air Strategic Alliance, which is not a government body – it's once again made up of NGOs and industry – to come up with new standards for our emissions. They are presently working on that, and it's going to be a very interesting discussion to see what they come up with.

Also, I've asked them to take a look at: should the new standards that they come up with be applicable to existing plants? In other words, should existing plants be grandfathered? My personal preference – and I don't want to prejudice the discussion that CASA has – is that existing plants should not be grandfathered. But that represents my personal viewpoint. I think that when we put in the new standards, when a licence renewal comes up, those standards should apply to the licence renewal. Hopefully nobody from the Clean Air Strategic Alliance reads Hansard and accuses me of trying to prejudice their discussion. That's a personal opinion. What we're going to do is we're going to get the results back from the Clean Air Strategic Alliance.

On coal I would mention that I did spend some time – I don't know; it would be a month ago now – with a group called the Clean Coal Alliance or something like that. It's a group that's made up of Alberta, Wyoming, Los Alamos lab, a whole bunch of groups around North America. We're all putting money in to see if we can burn coal cleanly. The scientists are telling me, at least the ones I met with that are involved with this, that in 15 years or less we will burn coal essentially without emissions. We'll have figured out how to get rid of the NOx's, the SOx's, and the PMs, and we will separate the CO₂ from those and sequester the CO₂. We might use it for enhanced oil recovery.

In fact, we're working in Saskatchewan with PanCanadian, the federal government, and the Saskatchewan government. [interjections] I know it sounds shocking to you, but we are very pragmatic people and like to help out the poorer neighbors, you know. We're working with those groups on carbon recovery, pumping CO₂ into the ground to help oil recovery. That project is happening right now, as we speak, in Weyburn, and we will continue to do that. The hope is that as we go forward, as I say, within 15 years or less, we should be able to be burning coal with virtually no emissions and separating CO₂ out and sequestering it.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. One more question. On the issue of clean coal-burning technologies I understand that TransAlta already has a plant in Washington state which uses state-of-the-art technology and that there are technologies currently available that will help reduce those. I understand that those are not as alternatives on the table for consideration as requirements for our plants for expansion. I do want to commend you for the position that you just stated with respect to you're being against grandfathering the older technologies, and I think you do have my plaudits for taking that position.

There are other technologies available which are better already, and you said yourself that climate change should be technology driven. On that one, I think you will recall that during the '70s energy crisis, when the government of the U.S. decided to reduce both consumption and in California of course emissions, they said: we're going to generate the technology that will help us get there. When they wanted to get into space, they didn't wait for that technology to happen; they set their targets and then said: we will produce the technology to get there. So I guess your logic on that one is somewhat weak, the cause and effect. You don't wait for the technology to happen before you do this. So I'd like you to address that.

My question is on water now, the last one I will ask of you. Again in the business plan you have: "develop a partnership with industry to collect [information] and analyze the state of Alberta's ground water." I'd like you to comment on the nature of these partnerships that you may already have in place or that you are hoping to develop. Why is industry being brought into the study phase? You know, at this stage is it really an enormously expensive project? Is that why? [interjection] Let me complete, please. I'm sorry. A couple of questions on it.

I'm a little bit worried, you know, about bringing the industry into it at this stage. I'd like you to assure me that it won't be a prelude to the commodification of water later on, that you won't get into the business in a big way of turning it into a commodity and businesses making huge profits from it. So that's why I raised that question.

The issue of toxins that are released into the water, you know, groundwater, surface water, both through intensive agriculture and intensive livestock operations, whose growth is being encouraged, I guess, as a matter of policy by this government, is causing concern to lots of communities, lots of people, particularly in certain parts of the province. We know that the E. coli 0157 counts in different parts of the province are different, and in some parts of the province they go above the guidelines that are set by the province for public health reasons. The Chinook region is one such region. I won't go into the numbers here. You are familiar with those, so you'll, I'm sure, be able to respond to this.

The release of toxins into water is a matter of growing concern, and the impact, particularly of nitrogen-based toxins in water, is a source of serious health consequences. I'll give you an example. In Indiana some women who lived in close proximity to these water sources that were contaminated, that carried higher levels of toxins, nitrate-based and nitrite-based, had miscarriages a total of six times – there were three women – within two years. All three lived near an ILO and were drinking well water with nitrate levels greater than 10 ppm. You would know what ppm means; I don't. When they switched to drinking bottled water, they were able to have healthy, full-term pregnancies. Just one example of the kind of negative health consequences that can result from progressive release of toxins into water. So any comments, any plans?

DR. TAYLOR: Let me just talk first about partnerships. I thought that from your perspective you'd want everybody to be involved with water, all the different partners to be involved as we go forward. That's the goal of our partnership. We want to involve industry; we want to involve the public. You can see us doing that right now in the water strategy. I mean, we had originally scheduled only 12 meetings around the province, and we had such demand in fact in Calgary that we had to have a second meeting because we had to turn people away. I can tell you that there have been a number of very interesting meetings, because people feel very strongly about some of these issues and there are a number of very strong different viewpoints. So it's our goal in partnerships to bring in industry and the public and environmental NGOs.

Now, in particular to groundwater the biggest utilizer of groundwater in this province is the oil industry. One of the things that is coming up quite clearly in the public meetings that we're having is: should the oil industry be using these numbers of gallons of fresh water that they are using? That's clearly a discussion point. Some people in the meetings are suggesting that they should be using the saline, or salty, water, that you can get out of the ground as well. Depending on the depth you go now – I'm not a water well driller – you can apparently either attract saline water or fresh water. So perhaps you drill a little deeper and get saline water to use in your oil wells.

I'm not saying that any decisions have been made. I'm just saying that the value of what we're doing with the water strategy is that we are having these discussions openly and publicly for the first time I believe in Alberta. I don't know what's going to come out the other end, but we will have to see what comes out the other end as we work through this strategy. So I feel strongly – and I'm sure that the department does too – that we have to have everybody involved in these partnership efforts, particularly when it comes to water.

Now, in regard to ILOs, as you're aware, the ILO has to go through the NRCB, but the water issue we still deal with. Most ILOs that I'm aware of need to have water. Whether it's chickens or pigs or feedlots, they have to have water. So after it gets through the NRCB process, it has to apply for a water licence, and one of the things we're very careful of in water licence applications is how it affects the surrounding groundwater, how it affects other neighbours' wells.

I can tell you of one recently that was in my constituency. The gentleman wanted to put in an ILO, not a large one like some people are projecting but a small one. It's an individual farmer. He's in the cattle business, and he wanted to expand his operation into the pig business so he'd be a little more diversified. It's a one-man farm, a one-man operation, so it's not these huge things that you think of when you think of some of these hog operations. We asked him to hire an independent hydrologist and give us a report, which he did. He had to drill some test wells and monitor those test wells first for volume and then to see if there's any contamination. So he had to drill test wells in a number of different positions and a number of different distances that will be monitored by hydrologists.

We recognize that one of our prime jobs is to protect the drinking water supply of Albertans. That's why we as well, working with the health units, allow people to bring in – you probably live in Edmonton, but say that you lived in Sherwood Park or someplace where you might have a well. Do they have wells in Sherwood Park? I don't know. In the rural areas, in Strathcona county, where they might have some wells, you can take a sample of that well, and then certainly we will test it, and if there are pollutants in that well, then we will try and help you fix that. So we're very conscious of drinking water and it being very important to Albertans.

As I said earlier, you know, we have some of the toughest drinking water standards in the country. There are only two jurisdictions that have adopted through legislation or regulation the Canadian drinking water quality standards. Alberta is one of those jurisdictions, and on top of that we've even strengthened some of those Canadian drinking water standards; that is, we've made them more stringent. Our standards are even more stringent than the Canadian drinking water quality standards. So we're very conscious of the water issue, and we'll continue to be conscious of it, and that's why we ask, depending on the situation, for monitoring of wells around ILOs. There have to be hydrology reports and so on. So we will do our utmost to protect and make sure that what you're talking about doesn't happen.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thanks, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate the responsiveness from the minister. I've been trying to attend to his comments so that I don't duplicate some of the questions, and if I am duplicating them either because my mind wandered or because I was out, just tell me and I'll check them out in Hansard.

I might as well start with a very specific question. It jumps right out from the estimates. I'm on page 165 of the estimates. I wouldn't be surprised if this has already been addressed in discussions while I was outside of the Assembly. Under expenses, environmental leadership, environmental assurance, and environmental stewardship, there are notable declines in budgeted expenses for each of those areas, most especially environmental leadership, which is going to drop, it looks like, from about $21.4 million to just under $10 million, so over a 50 percent drop. Could you tell us what's happening there that there's such a dramatic drop, and how does what's happening there feed into the mandate of your department for things like stewardship and leadership and so on?

DR. TAYLOR: That question actually hasn't been asked, no, so I'm pleased that you did ask it. I would point out that there was a drop, which I did address a little earlier, of $17 million in our budget overall, but that was for onetime projects. Okay? As I said earlier, we have this flaring study going on that you're familiar with, and we had some of it budgeted for 2002-2003, and what we were able to do is pay it forward, so we haven't included it in our budget 2002-03. We pay forward our contribution at the end of this year. Same with Climate Change Central. You'll see that there's no budget in there for Climate Change Central. That doesn't mean Climate Change Central is going to disappear. In 2002-2003 it's not in there. What we did was we paid it forward at the end of the 2001-2002 year. Just in terms of the $17 million, the drop, those were the two biggest areas of the $17 million that we dropped, and there were some other onetime expenses that we no longer needed.

Now, in terms of your question, that brings us back to our core budget. We've identified in our core budget a number of issues, and we're going to move resources around in our core budget. For instance, we want to spend a lot of time and effort on environmental education and environmental stewardship, so what we're doing is moving dollars around inside our budget. I don't know if you were here when I identified our five core businesses, which are environmental leadership, assurance, stewardship partnership, stewardship education, and hazard and risk management. Those are our core businesses, and what we're doing along that, then, is we've identified some key policy areas. Okay?

If you have a matrix – I should actually get you one of these. Have you got one? Okay. This is the matrix I'm working off, and it's kind of a place mat. I'd encourage you, if you don't have one, to get back to us, and we'll get you a few, and you can sit at your dinner table and put them under your clear glass plates, because they are laminated. Our core businesses are along there, and our policy areas are down this side, so you've got very good access. Water, air, climate change, resource planning, and regulatory systems are located down as key policy areas.

What we're doing is allocating what we consider our budget to our important core business and on the other access policy areas. Let me give you an example of that. For instance, for water we're allocating $35 million across those core businesses. Across those five core businesses we're allocating $35 million. That's by far the biggest, $35 million. The other big one across those core businesses is resource planning.

How do we manage our resources? I talked a little bit earlier on integrated resource management, and that would be as part of those core businesses. So what we're trying to do is locate our dollars where we feel that we're going to have the biggest pop, the biggest bang for the buck. One of the areas that we're really keen on is water, for instance. We're spending a lot of time and effort around water, water strategy, and so on. I mean, would I like to have more money? Certainly. Every minister in this front row would like to have more money, you know, because we all get committed to our programs and platforms and like to have more money. So what we're doing is reallocating within the budget to areas that we see are important.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, again. I would like to focus on one particular area of the province for a set of questions if I may, and I'm sure there are some provisions in the budget that would address these, and certainly there would be a strategy. That area is west of Edmonton, the Wabamun Lake area, where there's so much power generation. I'm not quite sure why in my constituency, in Edmonton-Riverview, but I do get contacted from time to time. There are in fact a number of cottage owners that live in my constituency who have cottages there, and it's of course people from Edmonton driving to Jasper or wherever out to the west who see that so much. I've also paid some attention to the electricity issue, and I'm concerned about how that's playing out. There seemed to be a convergence of issues in that part of the province as a result of the power plants, and they represent a whole host of issues for the environment: air, water, land. I just want to confirm an understanding I had from an earlier exchange.

The Wabamun power plant is one of the oldest coal-fired plants in the province. The original Wabamun plant still churns away. If I understood correctly, your personal view would be that when that comes up for relicensing – and I'm not going to abuse you with this question or anything, but I'm just curious – they would be expected in that power plant to meet today's standards for emissions, and of course you're not . . . [interjection] Okay. I'll stop there and let you fill me in on that.

DR. TAYLOR: Essentially yes.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. minister.

DR. TAYLOR: Thank you. I'm so excited I don't even wait for it.

What we've done is we've asked the Clean Air Strategic Alliance to look at new emission standards for it. Are you familiar with the Clean Air Strategic Alliance?

DR. TAFT: Well, a little bit.

DR. TAYLOR: Okay. It's basically made of – I could mention names, but you would know. Environmental groups are on there and industry and a couple of government representatives. So what I've asked them to do is to take a look at tightening up, developing more stringent standards for us, for Alberta. Okay? Now, once the Clean Air Strategic Alliance gives us those standards and I take it through the political process and it becomes government policy, then my position would be that any licence that comes up after we have those standards should not be grandfathered. It should have to meet those new standards that are being developed by the Clean Air Strategic Alliance.

I do have a couple of these. Somebody has kindly sent me down a couple of my place mats, so I'll ask the page to take one over to each member, please.

DR. TAFT: What's the time frame for that? Realistically, if things go your way – and that's an if, I understand – when might the old power plants face an expectation to upgrade their emissions?

DR. TAYLOR: I'm expecting to have something back from CASA within about 18 months. I see people nodding up there. And then how long does it take to get them through the process? Six months? I don't know. But within two years I believe we'll have some more stringent standards. So within two years is kind of the time frame that I'm expecting.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Another issue out at the lake, which I think should concern us all, is not just the level of the lake – I am sure you're aware of that issue – but a concern of contamination of the water of the lake around the discharge outlet from the old power plant or indeed from the newer power plant, Sundance. There is some concern that I've had that there may be for example in the mud that's accumulated there over the years a concentration of heavy metals or other toxic contaminants. Does the department have a serious active monitoring of the water and of the mud at the bottom of the lake around that outlet or outlets like that?

DR. TAYLOR: Not to cloud the issue, but it's my understanding that – well, the lake level is one issue. We have a signed agreement with TransAlta and EPCOR, I believe, that will bring the lake level back up to the appropriate level, whatever that level is – I can't remember the numbers – over the next year to two years.

In regards to the water that comes through and back into the lake – if I'm wrong, we'll get back to you; I'm going by recollection and memory here – it's my understanding that it's treated before it gets back into the lake, that there is a water treatment plant there that treats the water before it gets back into the lake. So there shouldn't be any of the contaminants you're talking about, but I will check on that, and we'll get back to you. I'm pretty sure there's a treatment plant there, and I will get back to you and have some kind of response for you on: does the treatment plant take out the heavy metals, are there heavy metals, and how do we monitor that? I will respond to you on that.

DR. TAFT: I'm particularly referring to the oldest power plant, the old Wabamun power plant.

DR. TAYLOR: We'll check on that and get back to you.

DR. TAFT: Another issue that's brought to my attention by constituents is concern over the eastern slopes area around Waterton and the potential for that gorgeous land leading up to Waterton park to be developed. I'm sure you've heard of this issue. I'm not sure if it's in your jurisdiction entirely or not. [interjection] It's not, so I've missed my chance for that question. All right.

Changing gears to questions of habitat protection for wildlife. [interjection] Okay, not your jurisdiction either.

How about changing gears once again to air emissions from pulp plants? I'm not sure what the strategies are in your business plan specific to some pulp mills, and I'm thinking of experiences I've had driving back and forth to Jasper, going through Hinton. If the hon. member representing that town were here, he'd be thumping his desk, I'm sure. Sometimes you pass through the town and there's no smell from the plant, yet other times, including, I think, just a couple months ago, passing through that town, there remains at times quite a strong sulphurous odour from the pulp plant there. What's the strategy with pulp mill emissions, and how are we going to see that enacted through your business plan?

DR. TAYLOR: Well, what we're concerned about with emissions are things that are damaging to either human or environmental health, and I'm not sure that smell is always an indicator of that. It may be. What we do is have stationary monitors around a number of different pulp plants in this province. As well, we have a bus – my staff hates me calling it that – that goes out, and if there's a complaint from a citizen, we can send our sniffer bus out and, once again, monitor. With our stationary monitoring techniques I can tell you how many days a particular plant has been outside their limits. Okay? See, when a plant is given a licence, it's given a certain emission quality or certain emission standards that it has to meet. With our monitors we can tell you if those plants meet those standards every day, how many days of the year they were outside those standards, were inside the standards. I don't have that information right here, but I'll make a commitment to provide that kind of technical information to you from some of our monitoring stations around some of these plants.

We did have an issue with one of the plants. I can't remember if it was the Weyerhaeuser plant. I shouldn't mention company names, I guess, because I can't remember which one it was. When we actually investigated it, they were concerned about the particulate matter, and they were blaming the plant for the particulate matter. But when we actually investigated, most of the particulate – there are a lot of gravel roads around there in that particular community – was coming from the gravel roads. We will provide you with that information that we have.

DR. TAFT: Just a brief follow-up. As a general direction with those emissions from pulp mills, are there standards set now for quite a number of years, or are we going to be seeing those standards reviewed and improved or not? Do you know?

DR. TAYLOR: We're always reviewing our standards. The pulp mills and the lumber mills here in Alberta are using the latest technology. That's one area that is actually being very good environmental stewards and using the latest technology. As we go forward, we certainly are reviewing our standards all of the time in terms of where we are, where we should be, looking at other jurisdictions, where are other jurisdictions, are we tough enough, you know, are we too tough. I've never seen us say that we've been too tough, but certainly we review our standards constantly, and we will continue to review our standards. Around pulp mills, around electricity, around everything that we do, we review standards.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I just have one or two other questions. I have a sense that the next question I have – I asked it to your colleague the minister for sustainable development, and I'm not sure you'll have any further comment on it. It has to do with the North Saskatchewan River, the health of that river. I've heard talk of a North Saskatchewan River strategy, I think, or something like that. The river flows through my constituency, and I've lived within a mile of that river almost my whole life. First of all, am I asking the right minister? Okay. I'd be interested to know where that's going and what the strategy is. In particular, I'm curious. This may be straying out of your responsibility, but the riverbed and the riverbanks and so on, the health of those or their ability to sustain or rejuvenate the sturgeon population that used to exist in the river and is dying out – I would be interested in any comments on that.

DR. TAYLOR: I'll give you a model. We actually have a very good model in this province. It's the Bow River Basin Council. That Bow River Basin Council started a number of years ago, and they've developed a model around the Bow River. I've seen the first draft of a South Saskatchewan River basin plan, which includes the Bow and would include the Oldman, the Red Deer River, the Battle River, the Belly River – I can't remember all the rivers – a number of different rivers. We're trying to use that Bow River Basin Council as a very good example. We partnered. We provided a good deal of funding for them. Once again, it's a partnership. It's put out to the community on the basin council: municipalities, environmental groups, industry. What they've done is developed a basin management plan for the Bow River in particular, and that includes the riparian environment that you're talking about, the riverbanks and so on. What we're doing is encouraging other basin management groups to take a look at that and develop basin management plans for their rivers.

The South Saskatchewan is further ahead than the North Saskatchewan, but there is an active working group that is developing, that we have funded to some extent. I'm not sure of the exact dollars, but we've put some money in to develop a North Saskatchewan River basin study. The people are working on it. It's not as far along as some of the others, but this is all part of what we see as the value of a water strategy. In the overall water strategy ultimately what we should have is a basin management plan for all the rivers in Alberta. Does that mean it's going to happen tomorrow? No. It's like our integrated resource management plans. We've sent you copies of the northeast slopes management plan, and that's what we'd like to see over all the areas of the province. That's the same kind of model that we'd like to see for the river plans, for the basins. So, yeah, there is a plan being developed. Is it as far along as I'd like to see it? No. Is it as far along as you'd like to see? But people are working, and we will get there.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My last question, again hopping around. I'm impressed with the minister's range of knowledge. Well done.

The last question has to do with the city of Edmonton's Waste Management Centre in the east end of the city around the old Clover Bar landfill and the quite remarkable development that's occurred around there with the composting centre and the recycling and so on and the city's ambition for this to become a waste management centre of excellence and indeed become – it seems a bit paradoxical – an international attraction for people wanting to study waste management. So it becomes in its own way a kind of a tourist attraction. Does your department have a direct role in supporting that sort of development, and is it something that your department can encourage to develop, say, in Calgary or other areas?

DR. TAYLOR: Certainly Edmonton is seen as a model. Early on we did have some immediate involvement in that project, but the project is being run very effectively now. We certainly do encourage people to look at it. We actually have a business group in our budget that's called action on waste. It's funded, I think, up close to a million dollars. Once again, what its role is is to take a look at projects like this and work with other partnerships out there and encourage essentially the recycling of various products, which we don't do enough.

A good example is the milk jug recycling. I don't think you were in when I commented on it. I'll be brief. One of my colleagues was complaining the other morning. They heard me at 5:30 in the morning, when their alarm clock went off, encouraging people to recycle milk jugs. Right now we're only doing about 42 percent. We've got a very active program with the Dairy Council. I've said to the Dairy Council: I want 55 percent at the end of this year, 65 and 75 percent recycling. They're trying to do that on a volunteer basis. So the action on waste is a very active program working with communities around the province.

Now, the big centres tend to be fairly active in this. Where it becomes more difficult is in rural Alberta. I don't know if you're familiar with this, but in many of these there might be one dump – dump is the wrong word. I actually mean a dump where you drive up and you drive to a container, you drop it in, and it dumps down into a container below. In rural Alberta it's more difficult because: who's going to pick up the recyclables and so on? So I really feel that we need to work hard in developing appropriate programs for rural Alberta in terms of the recycling areas that we're dealing with.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm happy to re-enter the debate on Environment. I have a bit of a follow-up question to what I talked about previously on sustainability. I'm referring to an excerpt from Commonwealth Currents, the 2001 edition. It's a magazine that we all get. On page 23 there was an article about what environment ministers recommend. It talks about the Commonwealth Consultative Group on Environment recommending to the high-level group that is reviewing the future role of the Commonwealth that it "identify environment and sustainable development as an important element of that role." This is in reference to the seventh meeting in Nairobi, Kenya, in February of 2001.

The group, that was comprised of Commonwealth environmental ministers and senior officials, also suggested that Commonwealth leaders at their October 2001 summit in Brisbane, Australia, should "explicitly acknowledge" the importance of the association's role in relation to the environment and sustainable development by placing the issue high on their agenda for discussion.

They go on to talk about how that played out.

Ministers [ultimately] called for the World Summit to promote sustainable development in a truly integrated way, through a clear commitment to poverty alleviation, and by ensuring that development and environment objectives were tackled together.

I would like the minister to comment on the substance of that. Are you able to attend these summits? I know that they're primarily a federal jurisdiction, but is there any opportunity for you to participate, and if so, do you?

DR. TAYLOR: I don't disagree with what you're saying, you know. I want to be very clear: we are very interested in this province in environmental sustainability and developing environmentally sustainable industries. For instance, we have the biggest wind generation industry in the country in this province. You can see the results in Calgary, where we fund Climate Change. Climate Change was involved with the city of Calgary in the Ride the Wind! project. That's where the whole C-Train in Calgary has been run on wind power. We worked with the city of Calgary in terms of providing green energy. In Calgary at the present time, if you want to pay an up-charge on your electricity bill, you can go with green energy. So we are very, very supportive of these projects. We will continue to find and develop other ways that we can support environmentally sustainable industry. I just want to be very clear on that.

With regards to going to the summits, I've been able to attend the summits that I felt were important for us to attend. I was at Bonn last summer, and then we've had a number of various meetings around the province. I'm not a great traveler – I prefer to stay home – so I kind of pick and choose and try to determine the ones that are worth while. If the minister of intergovernmental relations agrees to it, I'm hoping we'll be able to attend the South African summit, which is at the end of August, and it's a Rio plus 10 kind of summit, which is an environment summit that's going to be talking about Kyoto and issues around Kyoto. Yes, I have had no problem attending the summits that I feel are important for us to attend.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you. Mr. Minister, I'm quite happy to hear you say that, and I would add my push to the Minister of International and Intergovernmental Relations to allow the Environment minister to go, because I think there's lots to be learned and some benefits from that. I'm sure you can find the dollars in your budget. It's not that big a deal.

I would like to focus now on some of the actual line items in the budget if I may, first of all addressing the new budget for new processes, that you talked about in your opening comments. We see a change in how the ministry is delivered and program reorganization, and for us it's very tough to follow where the specific decreases have been in specific areas. You talked about a couple of the large ones, but if we could have more detailed information on that in terms of how they relate to previous years' budgets, that would be very helpful for us.

Particularly, I would like to ask about the environmental protection emergencies. We know that that area has been reduced, so if you could tell us what types of services are funded under that program and why the decrease. Have there been fewer emergencies? Do you anticipate fewer emergencies? Does this department charge back any of the costs if it can be determined that specific businesses were responsible for emergencies?

DR. TAYLOR: The question is in Hansard, and I'll have the department respond on that kind of specific detail.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I've been listening with interest to some of the questions I've heard directed to the Minister of Environment this afternoon. However, one of the things that concerns us all is the intricate relationships that occur between one government department and another. Yesterday in Energy estimates we heard the hon. minister discuss at length and with a degree of certainty that there was certainly too much regulation and that it was affecting how business operates in this province, particularly the oil and gas business. For the Minister of Environment: how does the department deal with the event of a fire at a jointly approved EUB/Alberta Environment facility? Who determines which organization should be the primary contact? In the event that Alberta Environment is the primary contact, is there a certain step that would take place to notify the EUB? In the reverse, if the EUB is the primary contact, how does the Alberta Environment department become aware of this?

There are a number of industry notification requirements that are joint, and whether it's a facility or whether it's a pipeline, Mr. Chairman, I think we need to have this clarified in light of some incidents that have happened recently. One of those incidents that comes to mind is certainly the ethane fire at the storage facility in Fort Saskatchewan, that was operated by BP Canada. Now, there are some spills or releases or accumulative releases that the EUB would be the primary contact for. That would be like unrefined product spills. It could be produced water or refined product spills. That would be Alberta Energy; that would be the hon. minister's department. Then you have, of course, contravention of Alberta Environment approvals, and naturally that would be the hon. minister's department. But then we see unplanned or planned releases in accordance with EUB approvals; naturally they would go to the EUB. For flaring, whether it's solution gas or produced gas, it varies as to whether it's Alberta Environment or the EUB. It doesn't seem to be clear here. It could be black smoke. It could be odours or fugitive emissions. If the minister could clarify that and express confidence or nonconfidence in this system, I would be grateful.

I also at this time, Mr. Chairman, have a question regarding coal technologies. Certainly the minister – and I appreciated that – earlier discussed the fact that there is a joint study. I think it's an excellent use of taxpayers' dollars, in this member's view, to study how coal can be burned much more efficiently than it currently is, and I understand that this is going on in New Mexico. If the hon. minister could update this side of the House on precisely how much money we're spending and when there will be any interim results on this study from Los Alamos, I would appreciate that.

Also on the whole issue of coal, we know that there's certainly going to be more coal-fired electricity generation west of the city. Both TransAlta and EPCOR have facilities that, when they're built, are jointly going to produce over 1,200 megawatts of electricity for the provincial electricity grid. I'm not sure from the research I've done that even our new standards are on par with what the Americans have. Now, it doesn't matter which part of America you're in, because it is my understanding that the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has a say in this matter. They have been encouraging older plants through the use of tax credits up to a cap – it's a significant cap; I could stand corrected on this, but it's in the millions of dollars – to refurbish or refit these plants with either natural gas or with coal so that they have a reduction in their emissions.

If the minister could clarify, please, what studies he's referring to when the conclusion is made that our new standards are better than those that are currently in application for American coal-fired generators. I think we have to be very cautious here that this province does not become the fly ash capital of North America, because we certainly have a lot of coal. The hon. minister said that in 15 years we may be beyond that and that what CO₂ there is will be used in enhanced oil recovery. In my view, that research that's going on around Estevan, Saskatchewan, is prudent. In the meantime, if people are going to build these coal-fired plants which cost millions and millions of dollars, they're going to want to know what the rules are before they put their money down for the construction costs and the purchase of turbines or whatever. And the public deserves to know, because once these plants are built, they're going to be operating for 30, perhaps 35 years. All the constituents of Drayton Valley-Calmar, all the constituents in Ponoka and Lacombe that are sort of downwind of these facilities, we should not expect them to have particulates or fly ash or soot or an emission of any sort floating down on them continuously for the next two generations. I don't think that is prudent planning.

Now water transfer. The hon. minister is certainly industrious and hardworking. He's always at the job, I believe, and he's as industrious as the Canadian beaver that's on the nickel. And there's a similarity there, Mr. Chairman, because he seems to want to build dams, whether they're needed or not. This gets to the whole issue that I have regarding water. I would like to know if water is considered by this department and this minister to be a commodity that can be bought and sold. I think this is very, very important, because long after we've all left this Assembly, the members that are coming after us are going to be discussing this issue. I would like to know what exactly is going on. Is water considered a commodity, or is it for the public good, for everyone? There are issues. There's a lot of water in the north half of the province and there's a lot less in the south half of the province. How exactly are we going to deal with this issue?

There are members here that have problems with this issue of global warming. As I said after the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Chairman, there was certainly reluctance to spend public money, significant public money. We saw it in the teachers' dispute. It is this member's view that that money is being set aside because of the possibility of large payments for drought-stricken farmers this summer. Now, the money certainly has to come from somewhere.

When you think of the dramatic climate changes that are occurring, we have to be concerned about this. One only has to drive on the Banff-Jasper highway and see the recession of the glaciers. You can walk up to one signpost that states 1930 or 1935, and you've almost got to walk a kilometre before you can get up to the current time. That's how much the glacier has receded. Certainly in the Arctic there are dramatic, quick changes that are occurring with the ice packs and the weather in the Arctic.

It is time for us to consider our activities, our industrial activities and the activities related to our larger concentrations of people in cities. We have to consider this, and that's where the whole issue of water, global warming, and greenhouse gases comes into public debate.

Now, also the issue of gas flaring. I'm sure the Environment ministry is in discussions with the Minister of Finance, perhaps deciding if there can be some form of tax relief to encourage not only electricity produced by wind power, which I think southern Alberta could certainly be a world leader at, but also with capturing gases that are flared. It's unfortunate. You can take the statistics here this afternoon with me. Certainly less than 1 percent of gas production in this province, from the statistics I'm looking at, is flared. It could be roughly 1 percent. It might be 2 percent, Mr. Chairman.

If we could use that gas to power turbines to produce electricity for the local area – and this would certainly also apply to solution gas. I think it would be noteworthy at least to study. The hon. minister said that we're studying coal technologies, but this is something that is worth studying as well in consultation to spark the industry the same as the oil and gas industry was – I'll use the word again – sparked in the early '90s with the Alberta royalty tax credit. We saw a turnaround and a lot of interest by the oil and gas industry operating in Alberta as a result of that tax incentive, and that was a tax incentive that really came into play in 1994.

So what sort of plans has this government got and this minister got to encourage further development of wind power and also the capture of gas that would be flared and could be used to power turbines to generate electricity? What's being done with those policy issues?

With that, Mr. Chairman, I will cede the floor to another colleague at this time. Thank you.

5:00

DR. TAYLOR: Just a couple of comments. In regard to jurisdiction between the EUB and the Department of Environment I suggest that the member read the legislation and understand the legislation. It'll probably inform him of what he wants to know. In regard to some of his other comments around coal I suggest that he review Edmonton-Riverview's rather intelligent comments and questions and review the rather intelligent answers that he got. I think that'll answer most of his questions.

MS CARLSON: Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the minister and his department for their participation in the debate this afternoon and, previous to the last comments, his quite interesting and well-thought-out comments. Looks like he's getting a little testy and maybe a little tired, so perhaps it's time to call an end to this particular day.

We do have number of other questions. Most of them are fairly detailed in terms of subject matter, and we will send them over in writing to the department.

I would also like to take this opportunity to thank the Member for Calgary-Montrose for finally entering into debate in this legislative session by repeatedly calling for the question, and I would also ask for the question at this time.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: After considering the business plan and proposed estimates for the Department of Environment, are you ready for the vote?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Agreed to:

Operating Expense and Capital Investment	$103,450,000
--	---------------

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Shall the vote be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Opposed? Carried.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman. There being no further speakers, I would move that we rise and report our progress to the House.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

MR. MASKELL: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions, reports as follows, and requests leave to sit again.

Resolved that a sum not exceeding the following be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2003, for the following department.

Environment: operating expense and capital investment, $103,450,000.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Opposed? So ordered.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's been a very good week, a very good afternoon, and because of the extremely good progress made over the week, I would move that we now call it 5:30 and that we adjourn until 1:30 p.m. next Monday.

[Motion carried; at 5:05 p.m. the Assembly adjourned to Monday at 1:30 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Monday, April 22, 2002

1:30 p.m.

Date: 02/04/22

[The Speaker in the chair]

head: Prayers

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, welcome.

Let us pray. Though we as legislators of this great province and its people are taken from the common people and selected by You to be architects of our history, give us wisdom and understanding to do Your will in all that we do. Amen.

Hon. members, would you please remain standing so that we may participate in the singing of our national anthem, and we'll ask Mr. Paul Lorieau to lead us.

HON. MEMBERS:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all thy sons command.
With glowing hearts we see thee rise,
The True North strong and free!
From far and wide, O Canada,
We stand on guard for thee.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

THE SPEAKER: Please be seated.

head: Introduction of Guests

MRS. McCLELLAN: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Premier I'm pleased to introduce a number of guests from the Alberta Public Affairs Bureau. As all members know, the Public Affairs Bureau is the communications arm of the Alberta public service. The guests here today are seconded to many different government ministries and of course are vital to the successful communications that the government and the public service have with Albertans. They are here as part of an orientation tour. They are seated in the members' gallery, and as I call their names, I would ask them to rise, and at the conclusion of naming them all, we would give them the traditional warm welcome of the House: Jackie Bibby, Ron Bos, Rachel Bouska, Johanna Dietrich, Anne Douglas, Jamie Edwardson, Jeremy Fritsche, Dan Huang, Terry Jorden, Kari Larson, Carey LeVos, Lori Lindquist, Kim MacDonald, and Chris Mikaluk.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert.

MR. HORNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two introductions today. The first is that I am pleased to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly constituents of mine, Nancy Cornelius and her son Dan, who have included in his home schooling studies a tour of the Legislature and to be with us here today to observe the proceedings of the House. They are seated in the members' gallery, and I would ask that they please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

My second group, Mr. Speaker, is a group of 26 students and six adults from Parkland Village School, which is just north of Spruce Grove. This a lively and bright group who asked some great questions when I was able to visit with them last fall. A note I would like to mention is that Parkland is a year-round school, and the general consensus is that it is a great success. Their teacher is Mrs. Laurie Maycher and teacher's aide Mrs. Louise Rose. The parent helpers are Mr. Bruce Neville, Miss Cindy Bukmeier, Mrs. Cari LeGrow, Mrs. Suzie Veysey. They are seated in the members' gallery, and I would ask that they please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased to rise today and introduce to you and through you a group of social work students from Grant MacEwan Community College who I believe are due to graduate from their two-year program fairly soon. This group of students undertook an initiative at their college recently and collected over 400 signatures on a petition dealing with the subject of safe and affordable housing in Alberta. I met with members of the group last week, and they presented me with the petitions, and they're here today to see their participation in the political process come to fruition as I present their petitions to the Assembly. These soon-to-be social workers are Mary MacKinnon, Catherine Hosein, Barbara Jadischke, Rachele Andre, Connie Fleming, Christina Deboulet, Lucrecia Mendoza, Alma Swann, and Tami Biagi. I would ask them to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Seniors.

MR. WOLOSHYN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Over the course of time many Albertans have contributed to the excellence of our education system. Today I'm honoured to introduce to you and to other members of the Legislature one such gentleman. He is the recently retired superintendent of schools for Parkland school division. I'd ask Dr. David Young to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Environment.

DR. TAYLOR: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased today to rise and introduce Robin Kurpjuweit. Robin is a former constituent of mine. He worked very hard on my campaign, and he's a young man that's very interested in politics. Robin is now with a program out of Langley, B.C. He's the program co-ordinator for a program called How To Drug Proof Your Kids. It works with other drug prevention programs like DARE and with the RCMP and so on on drug proofing kids. He had the opportunity to meet with the hon. Minister of Children's Services this morning and found it to be a very profitable meeting. One thing that's exciting about this program is they don't ask for government money. Robin, please stand and take the warm welcome of the House.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Health and Wellness.

MR. MAR: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Sir, in recognition of Hope Week, April 21 through 27, 2002, and the important role that hope plays in maintaining the wellness of Albertans, I wish to introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly Jean Wilkinson, president of the Hope Foundation of Alberta, and Joan Mason, chair of the Hope in Action Gala Committee, who are seated in the members' gallery. On the 26th of April here in the city of Edmonton the Hope in Action gala will take place. I would ask Mrs. Wilkinson and Ms Mason to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

MR. LUND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me a great deal of pleasure today to introduce some first-time visitors to the Legislature from Rocky Mountain House and Calgary, Jack and Dolores Killick and their charming daughter Carmen. They're seated in the members' gallery. I'd ask them to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment.

MR. DUNFORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to introduce to you and through you to the Assembly Ms Shirley Howe and Mr. Ken Smith. Ms Howe is the acting Public Service Commissioner for the government of Alberta, and Mr. Smith is the Deputy Minister of Energy. Both Ms Howe and Mr. Smith are co-chairs of a group of senior Alberta public service executives who are profiled in the cover story of the latest issue of the national magazine Canadian Government Executive, and I will be filing appropriate copies of that article later on this session. The magazine article is about the very successful corporate human resources development strategy that is here in the Alberta public service, an initiative led by Ms Howe, Mr. Smith, and their team. I would ask Shirley Howe and Ken Smith now to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Whitecourt-St. Anne.

MR. VANDERBURG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to introduce to you and through you to members of this Assembly a very special visitor in the members' gallery. George Jendyk, mayor of the village of Onoway, is here today, and he's met many of my colleagues and some ministers today. George is in his third term on council. He's been elected since 1995, and in 2001 George was elected as mayor. He has served on many committees for council, including the ambulance authority and seniors' housing. George is also a teacher at the Onoway elementary school. He's a member of the Royal Canadian Legion and has served as a longtime member of the Masonic lodge. I ask George to rise and receive a warm welcome of this Assembly.

head: Oral Question Period

THE SPEAKER: First Official Opposition main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

PDD Boards

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The government's budget for Community Development allocates funding for various persons with developmental disabilities boards in the province. Now, less than a month later, with the ink barely dry, we learn that the government has changed these allocations and made adjustments to the level of funding for the various boards. My questions are to the Premier. Why were changes made to the level of funding after the budget was introduced?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the budget contains an 8 percent increase for PDDs, but I'll have the hon. Minister of Community Development respond.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's true that from time to time we do have to take a look at how we're delivering these important programs for persons with developmental disabilities, and that's why in response to a lot of community feedback and a lot of contact with our own MLAs and community agency workers we were very pleased this year to accomplish another 8 percent increase in addition to the 8 percent that we increased last year. But giving more money to the system alone is not necessarily going to find the kind of improvements we need for this very vulnerable group of individual Albertans. We also have to take a look at how we deliver those programs on a per case basis, and that is part of the review that has been going on ever since the Building Better Bridges report was written by myself and others a few years ago. We will continue in that same vein to ensure that this population gets the services they require.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. They didn't get the question. Why is it that there were changes in the allocations made between what shows in the budget and what numbers were given to the boards that they were to use to build their business plans? There's a difference between the budget level and what the boards got. Why the difference, Mr. Premier?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, again I'll have the hon. Minister of Community Development explain, if he can, the answer.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Sure. The fact is that back when the 9 percent projected increase last year had to be pared back, as with all government agencies, by 1 percent, we did the same thing, so some of the anticipated increases at that time could not flow out the way they had anticipated to be able to flow out. So we're flowing them out this year, and by the end of April all of the regional boards will have had an instruction from the PDD Provincial Board with respect to clarifying the amounts and how those amounts are to be applied. Some of them, as you know, are labeled for PDD uptake. Those that are coming to us as children turning adult are fairly easy to predict, but there are a number of others that come in which we're not aware of on as timely a basis, so it's a little bit complicated. The other funding increases will flow out for community agency workers, and none of that is easy to forecast too far in advance, but by the end of April it will all be done.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. They still didn't get it. Why is it the numbers in the budget are different than the numbers that you sent to the PDD boards saying "these will be the dollars that you will get this year to operate"? Which is the right number: the number you're stating in the budget or the number that you put in your material that you sent out to the boards?

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Mr. Speaker, let me try this again. By the end of April these numbers will be finalized. What we're working on from one year to the next always are projections, and that's what a lot of those figures have been based on, hon. Leader of the Opposition. Now, if you have something very specific that you want to share with me that I'm not aware of, I'd like to see it, because the numbers that are going to be confirmed will be done in about a week's time, and I'd be happy to give them to you as exact as they are. Please bear in mind that a lot of these programs and services change from month to month with certain recipients because they do show improvements, and we're constantly upgrading the services that we provide and the types of programs that are designed for them. So being really, really that specific sometimes is difficult, and that is the truth.

THE SPEAKER: Second Official Opposition main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I guess from that, our budgets don't really mean anything, so I'll try some service delivery.

Mr. Speaker, many disabled persons rely upon Persons with Developmental Disabilities for support and service even though those services do not fall under the mandate of PDD. We now learn that persons with developmental disabilities boards are examining various cost-cutting measures, including moving nonmandated services out of PDD. My questions are to the Premier. Given that shifting programs from one ministry to the other does not improve service delivery or lower costs to the government, why is Community Development allowing PDD boards to examine this option?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I don't know that to be true or untrue. I would assume that PDD boards examine various ways to achieve efficiencies and ways to provide more effective forms of services. Relative to the details I'll have the hon. minister respond.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thanks. Mr. Speaker, the important thing here is that no one who qualifies for services under the PDD programs will be denied that service. We're very proud of that record, and we're going to ensure that it continues. When I wrote the report a couple of years ago, there were certain services at that time that were being looked upon as perhaps being withdrawn. We did not withdraw them in the end. The government responded very positively, and in fact we're adding more and more to that program to make it a much more improved system for all these individuals across the province. There are about 8,000 people receiving this service, and we're providing service that is unparalleled anywhere else in Canada when it comes to the degree to which we get involved with them through our regional boards and when it comes to the comprehensiveness of the programs that we are providing.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Back to the minister: can the minister guarantee that PDD clients who now receive these services will not fall through the cracks because of programs and services being juggled to other departments? How can he guarantee that they'll still get those services?

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm personally not aware of any programs that are being juggled or hived off anywhere else. If there are some programs out there that can be delivered through a different model or a better system, I'd be happy for the hon. member to share those with us. I can guarantee you that anyone who qualifies for services as a person with a developmental disability will continue to get that service, and that's what's important here. That's why we increased this year's budget by $30 million: to look after those individuals.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader.

DR. NICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the Premier: will the Premier guarantee that programs that are moved out of PDD will continue to receive funding at a level that they had under PDD when they end up in a new department?

MR. KLEIN: Well, again, Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister responded by saying that he knows of no programs that are being moved out. Again I'll have the hon. minister respond.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Well, Mr. Speaker, let me be really clear. If the hon. member has some kind of a document that says something along this line, I'd like to see what that is. It's true that there are from time to time a lot of individuals and organizations out there that require some examinations of some of the programs. Those do get looked at on a regular basis so that we can stay as current as possible and provide the best possible service within the dollars and the framework available. Again, anyone who is eligible for PDD services receives that service, and we're very proud of that.

THE SPEAKER: Third Official Opposition main question. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

WCB Early Resolution Initiative

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On Friday the WCB held an information session on a pilot project called early resolution initiative, that changes the way the WCB handles internal case reviews. This is on the eve of the introduction of Bill 26, which is also anticipated to deal with changes to the internal WCB review process, though how substantial is yet to be seen. My first question is to the Minister of Human Resources and Employment. How can the WCB get around existing law since their pilot project does not utilize the Claims Services Review Committee or the Assessment Review Committee, both of which are provided for in the WCB act?

Thank you.

MR. DUNFORD: Mr. Speaker, I will be introducing a bill later this afternoon that deals with the amendments to the Workers' Compensation Act. As a matter of fact, the issue that the hon. member is raising has to be dealt with and will be dealt with in the provisions of that act.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister. Given that the early resolution initiative was discussed at a public meeting on Friday, April 19, can the minister tell the House: is it mandatory for all current cases to be involved in this pilot project, or is it voluntary?

Thank you.

MR. DUNFORD: It's a pilot project, Mr. Speaker, and I'm not sure of the exact term of reference that WCB has put on that particular pilot. In any event, we are introducing a bill today. We have a second reading, a committee reading, and a third reading to go through before it would be legally binding as law. Again, it's mostly enabling legislation. It's there to help the people that this hon. member has tried to care for and tried to represent their views in the past, with some success I might add. This is one more response by both the Workers' Compensation Board and this particular government to respond to the needs of injured workers.

MR. MacDONALD: Again, Mr. Speaker, to the same minister: then why was the early resolution initiative discussed before the hon. minister had the opportunity to table the bill in the Assembly?

Thank you.

MR. DUNFORD: Mr. Speaker, I don't see any sort of conspiracy here. Now, perhaps I'm missing something. It seems quite common these days for people to get out ahead of legislation, before it is actually tabled, and this appears to be another case of that. Certainly, from what I can understand from what the member is saying, it sounds like the intentions of the parties are good, and I don't know what the beef is. If there's something that he wishes to formalize by way of a formal complaint, then I would suggest that he put it in writing.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader of the third party, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-Fort.

Teachers' Labour Dispute

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The memorandum of understanding reached last Friday between the government and the province's teachers wasn't so much a negotiated settlement as it was a surrender, with the Minister of Learning popping out of his foxhole just long enough to wave the white flag. This comes after several months of job action, closed schools, and canceled extracurricular activities, all of which were completely avoidable. My questions are to the Premier. Why did the government reject the olive branch offered by the teachers two months ago when teachers voluntarily agreed to submit to a fair and impartial binding arbitration process and instead enact a punitive piece of legislation?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I don't know where the hon. leader of the third party has been, but the union took us to court on the OC that was passed, and much to their surprise they won. [interjections] And much to our surprise as well. Absolutely. Much to everyone's surprise. So I guess it's a matter of, you know, the teachers getting what they asked for, not that they really wanted it, I'm sure. That resulted, then, in legislative action that had to be taken to ensure that teachers would go back to work and that the students would be looked after.

I might remind the hon. leader of the third party that the only thing that is back in the agreement, albeit in an amended form, is the pension issue, and that is for a one-year period. I would remind the hon. leader of the third party that that was always on the table, and it was taken off when the teachers went on strike. In my meeting with Mr. Booi there were three things that we agreed to.

DR. PANNU: Four.

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, they were not at the meeting. What were they doing? Did they have their ears up against my door? Were they listening? Do they have some unknown vent, you know, or some snooping device? They were not at the meeting. I can tell you that the hon. leader of the third party was not at the meeting. He wasn't anywhere close. If he was close, you know, will he please advise this Legislature where he's getting his information and if he has a secret peephole or a listening device?

Mr. Speaker, three things were agreed to. One, Mr. Booi agreed that there should be a legislated arbitration process; two, that it should deal with the issue of salaries and that other issues relative to the sustainability of education would be referred to a blue-ribbon panel or some kind of a commission; and three – and it's in the notes – that we would revisit at some time the pension issue.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Will the Premier be a little more contrite and apologize to Alberta students and parents for putting them through several months of unnecessary misery given that the elements of the settlement with teachers had been there all along?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I will apologize to absolutely no one. This agreement was reached. I understand that the hon. minister participated in a news conference on Friday with Mr. Booi there. Both the minister and Mr. Booi seemed to be totally satisfied with the deal that had been hammered out by third parties, in this case lawyers for the Alberta School Boards Association, the Alberta Teachers' Association, and the government of Alberta. It served to end an impasse relative to teachers withdrawing voluntary services and refusing to mark exams. It involved something that we agreed to revisit in the first place, and that was the issue of teachers' pensions.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final supplementary to the Premier: since one of the features of last Friday's agreement is a loosening of the arbitration rules, will the government make up financial shortfalls resulting from any arbitration awards, or will the government compound the problem by forcing school boards to cut in other areas?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. leader of the third party that significant increases have been granted to education this year, and indeed over the past five years there's been a substantial increase in education spending of about 41 percent. One of the terms of the arbitration process, Bill 12, the act now, is that school boards cannot incur deficits, and to that point I will have the hon. minister respond.

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Under the agreement that was signed on Friday, it was established that the interpretation of deficit would be that they could not run a deficit at the end of the day. The arbitrator must be satisfied that the deal can be reached without running a deficit.

Mr. Speaker, I will add a couple of other things if I may. This line of questioning has been about the agreement that was signed on Friday. This agreement was signed because of the willingness of this government, the ATA, and the ASBA to put aside their differences for the sake of Alberta students. It's very unfortunate that the other side will not do that.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fort, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Education Funding

MR. CAO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Recently I have been in contact with two teachers in Calgary. Teacher number 1 told me that she has 27 students in one of her classes, 12 of whom require constant one-on-one attention for various reasons. Teacher number 2 told me that her class has 24 students: six on individual program plans, 11 as ESL, three with attention deficit disorder, and four considered average. Given that our government's K to 12 education budget has been increased continuously since 1995 – I notice that the rate was over 41 percent – still there is clamour about lack of funding. I do not want to talk about the big number of many millions. I just want to ask the Minister of Learning about the amount of funding at the classroom level that the teacher is supposed to have for her class. Could the minister tell us: what are the current budgeted rates of instruction funding per student per category of need?

2:00

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The average student in the province of Alberta receives roughly $7,500. Included in that are add-ons for things such as English as a Second Language. There are add-ons for the Alberta initiative for school improvement. There are add-ons for sparsity and distance. There are add-ons for growth and density. There are add-ons for severe special needs. All these issues are what determine how much funding goes to the school board for the classroom. In general, probably the best number that I can give the hon. member on a systemwide basis is about $7,500 per student.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. CAO: Thank you. Without being exact, could the minister give us just a quick estimate on the instruction funding only for each of the classes mentioned above based on the rate and the number of students?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, just doing simple mathematics, for 27 students it would be a little over $200,000; for 24 students it would be around $180,000. Again I will reiterate that there are a lot of extras that are added on; for example, an extra 12 and a half thousand dollars for a severe special-needs student. All of these are added on in conjunction with that. With respect to an average class, it would be a little over $200,000.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. CAO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: again without being exact, could the minister give an average in total of the education funding for each of the above classes?

DR. OBERG: Well, Mr. Speaker, we recently did a study that showed that the average size of a class from grade 1 to grade 6 would be 23.6. Say we rounded that up to 24, that would put the actual number of dollars going to that particular class, assigned to the classroom, at about $180,000, so a very large amount of money going to the classroom. That does include administrative usage of the dollars as well as transportation and things like that. In general, it would be around $180,000.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford.

Foster Parent Program

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The time for reviews is over. The Children's Services ministry must now take real action in order to prevent any more tragic deaths of children in care. My questions are to the Minister of Children's Services. Given the recommendations of the Korvette Crier fatality inquiry, will the minister now require that all foster agencies be accredited?

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, accreditation as we know it today is not a perfect model. It is a move towards a perfect model, I guarantee, but there are several things that we have to do about accreditation. Should all foster agencies be accredited? Absolutely. The only ones that heretofore had not required accreditation were those where delegation of authority had been provided on reserves. They were accredited, but the situation in this particular case, going back three years ago, Mr. Speaker, was that there was – and this is far from the accreditation issue. It was an issue of communication. It was an issue where the worker did not realize that the agency that was delivering services was not accredited for the purposes of providing foster care. So it's not a simple issue of accreditation or saying that they should all be accredited. It's a situation whereby in this particular case there was not a recognition that the agency wasn't accredited.

Let's be clear in this Assembly. Somebody paid dearly. The child in question paid dearly, and so did somebody go to jail. We have had accountability in the system, because somebody was charged, and there was a recognition that even if there had been accreditation, the action that was taken was an inappropriate action. Our society through our courts recognized that.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister: will the minister commit to giving all foster parents standardized training?

MS EVANS: Well, Mr. Speaker, we do. We give at least 67 hours of basic training. We give incrementally more training to foster parents as the need arises, particularly if they are dealing with children with particularly tough situations. If they have developmental disabilities, they get more training. They get a variety of supports, and as written by the current parent support executive director for foster families in Alberta, they get extensive training. In this situation, again a very unfortunate circumstance, the situation evolved because the parent that was providing the foster care did not have appropriate training and support for the work that was done.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister: will the minister commit to implementing a standard policy on how many foster children may be placed in one home?

MS EVANS: Mr. Speaker, we're working very hard to make sure that the right number are placed in the right home at the discretion of the local authorities. You can't just treat people like widgets and have a standard number. You have to look very carefully at what the circumstances are with the child and the parent involved, what the age of the child is, and whether or not they have any developmental disability. You have to look clearly at the child and the capacity of the family to provide the services involved. It is not a simple standard. It's a very important thing for us to look at a very clear and defined process for evaluating what the child needs and for evaluating whether these children are all members of one family or not and whether it's wise to split up siblings. We look at this from a variety of points of view, but we look at it, again, bottom line, from what's in the best interests of the child or the children involved.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Oil and Gas Royalties

MR. McCLELLAND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta depends on revenues from oil and gas royalties to finance important government programs. My question is to the Minister of Energy. Does Alberta's royalty increase to reflect the increasing value of the resource as the reserves diminish?

MR. SMITH: Well, Mr. Speaker, as is known, it's sometimes yes and sometimes no. The royalty regime, first of all, is an economic rent. It is clearly defined to reflect the province's ownership of the resource. It is not a tax. It is not a levy. It is not a policy instrument. It is ownership to reflect economic rent. In fact, this economic rent changes, whether you're in Alberta, Alaska, Norway, Louisiana, with the type of structures you have, the relationship that you have with the people who build the industry. For example, with oil sands today we get 1 percent of the revenues from the product that's generated in that area. That is a program put in place that has, along with some other major tax considerations, enticed some $51 billion Canadian in investment. Then all the economic benefits accrue from that.

Mr. Speaker, once those investments are paid out, we get some 25 percent of the net oil sands production. We are the only jurisdiction in the world where, as conventional production declines, our oil sands are actually increasing so that we are able to replace depleting reserves. That luxury will allow us to deliver appropriate economic rent to Albertans today, tomorrow, and for the productive life of the oil sands.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. McCLELLAND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Minister of Energy has any notion of the timetable when we might expect to get economic rent from synthetic oil royalties on par with conventional oil royalties.

AN HON. MEMBER: Good question.

MR. SMITH: There's a good question, as one member has pointed out, Mr. Speaker. This year will be the second year that nonconventional, or oil sand oil, production will in fact surpass that of conventional oil. Conventional oil peaked at 1.3 million barrels a day back in 1973. Today we will produce some 1.4 million barrels of oil, which will be about 600,000 barrels conventional and 700,000 to 800,000 barrels of nonconventional oil, or oil sand oil. This gives us the ability to ramp up these investments, have these investments pay out, and as our royalty diminishes from the results of its decreased production, we will be able to increase the royalty take from the oil sands.

Some of the early indications, Mr. Speaker, would indicate that royalty revenue from the tar sands would ramp up sometime in the year 2005-2006. One of the difficulties in timing that is that the oil sand takes up so much of Alberta's skilled apprenticeship and labour production. In fact, in a province that has only 10 percent of Canada's workforce, we are working today well over 20 percent of the apprenticeship workforce across Canada. So this creates increased costs. We are a partner in sharing those increased costs, and our royalties will not increase until such time as those costs are paid out.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. McCLELLAND: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final question is this: do we as Albertans get a fair return, as compared with other jurisdictions such as Alaska or Norway or Louisiana? I guess the basic question: are we getting our money's worth, or are we getting ripped off?

MR. SMITH: Well, Mr. Speaker, the member has a solid, solid question. In fact, we have an entire section of people both in oil and gas, some hundred plus individuals, whose job is not only the collection of these royalties, these economic rents for Albertans, but actually to scan the competitive marketplace of the world to ensure not only that we remain competitive so as to continue to attract global investment but that we also remain fair to Albertans and deliver the maximum amount of economic rent available.

So, in fact, Mr. Speaker, if we were to compare ourselves with Alaska, Alaska's gas, that is shut in, that is waiting for a pipeline, has a royalty charge of some 12 and a half percent. Our royalty on gas can go up as high as 35 percent. We average about 20 to 23 percent. If you take a look at Norway, they are in fact moving towards some royalty holidays to find new pools of gas. In Louisiana much of that land is owned freehold or by individuals, and therefore the state can only gain revenues by a severance tax. In many analyses and analyses from respected individuals in the oil and gas industry Alberta is rated as one of the very toughest regimes for economic royalties in the world.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, followed by the hon. Member for Highwood.

Justice System

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government believes in justice for all people except maybe poor people. In the last budget the filing fee for the small claims court jumped 300 percent. However, at the Court of Queen's Bench, where more affluent people go to file much larger claims, the filing fee remains unchanged. My questions are all to the Minister of Justice. Does the minister believe that it is justifiable to charge a person a $100 fee in small claims court to try and get back a $300 damage deposit?

MR. HANCOCK: Well, Mr. Speaker, one of the things which we're trying to accomplish in the justice system is for people to take responsibility for their own issues and try and resolve them in the best way possible. In the Provincial Court, Civil Division we've had for the last two to three years a civil mediation project where we pay essentially an honorarium to people who volunteer their time, other than for this honorarium, to help mediate disputes. We pay two mediators per dispute $50 each; $100. That program is being very, very successful in helping people resolve their problems early and without going through the process of court. About 70 percent of the cases that go into that mediation program get resolved. Now, that is a very advantageous thing for the people who participate. We'd like to expand that program. We'd like to have it available right across the provincial court system, but it comes at a cost. We believe that the $100 cost, where we're paying $50 to each of two mediators to help assist people to solve problems in an early and effective fashion, is a very effective way of doing business. It doesn't take up expensive court time, it helps get to an effective resolution early, and it helps people deal with their problems. The other point which should be made is that when people go to small claims court, whether the filing fee is $25 or $100, if they're successful, they get that money back.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you. My second question is also to the Minister of Justice. Given that the cost of getting justice is skyrocketing, why hasn't the minister increased the qualifying income level for receiving legal aid?

MR. HANCOCK: Well, Mr. Speaker, the qualifying income level for receiving legal aid has gone up I believe 5 percent, so it has in fact been increased. We've recently concluded an agreement with the Law Society and the Legal Aid Society with respect to a new governance structure, which the member should probably know, and we've also increased the funding for legal aid by 25 percent over the last two years I believe it is. It could be three years. So there have been significant improvements both to the funding of legal aid, the governance of legal aid, and to the qualifying incomes.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you. My final question is also to the Minister of Justice. Why won't the minister commit to tying future fee increases to the cost of living? A 300 percent increase is quite a bit for an individual to handle.

MR. HANCOCK: I'm not sure what future fee increases the hon. member is referring to. If she's talking about future increases to Provincial Court civil claims, that hopefully is a onetime increase to deal with, as I indicated, the costs of providing mediation and other costs relating to the front end of that service. I should also mention that the hon. member indicated that there was no increase at the Court of Queen's Bench level. However, she would be wrong in that we increased the filing of a certificate of readiness at Queen's Bench rather significantly. The import of that, Mr. Speaker, is that people are again encouraged to resolve their problem through mediation prior to setting it down for trial, prior to utilizing the court's time in terms of setting aside trial time. So it was appropriate to put the fee increase at that stage rather than at the introductory stage in the Court of Queen's Bench, but there has been a significant increase at the Court of Queen's Bench.

With respect to increases in those areas, Mr. Speaker, there haven't been a great deal of increases in the court level. We do provide a high level of service and access to the public. We are doing a lot to encourage people to deal with their problems at the precourt level, which is more effective for them and certainly more cost-effective. I'm open to any ideas or suggestions that the hon. member or anyone else might have as to how we can do that more effectively and more cost-effectively for Albertans.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Highwood, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Highways 2, 7, and 547 Interchange

MR. TANNAS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My questions today are to the Minister of Transportation. Last Friday a tragic accident occurred at the intersection of highways 2, 7, and 547 near Aldersyde. The driver and her four-year-old grandson were killed. Highwood constituents are demanding timely action on the long-promised interchange at this location. To the minister: when does the Department of Transportation plan to build a safe interchange at this intersection?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. STELMACH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The department is responsible for about 30,000 kilometres of highway network system plus about 3,800 bridges, which would include interchanges. We support about another 135,000 kilometres of rural roads and about 8,800 bridges through municipal grants. With respect to the interchanges we of course look at the daily traffic volume and also at safety. With this particular interchange I'd like to inform the member that we are in the process of preliminary engineering and design, which is proceeding through the normal routes within the department.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. TANNAS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: what is the current status of planning, land acquisition, and the cost of building this most needed intersection?

MR. STELMACH: Mr. Speaker, the total cost of the interchange at this particular site is around $20 million. We have one parcel of land in place, and we are working diligently on the other two parcels. We do have an agreement in principle, but the final agreement has not been signed as yet.

2:20

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. TANNAS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the Minister of Transportation: where does this interchange fit in with the overall plans and priorities of the north/south trade corridor, which is also called the Canamex highway?

MR. STELMACH: Mr. Speaker, there are about 19 or 20 interchanges along the north/south trade corridor. That does not include at least another half a dozen on highway 16, on highway 1, one at Fort McMurray, and one at Medicine Hat that are in the planning stage. This particular interchange does rank near the top. As soon as we put all the land acquisition in place and complete others on the list that are in progress as we speak – and that's part of the north/south trade corridor along the Deerfoot Trail – of course we'll be moving with some progress on the Anthony Henday Drive, as well, and then highway 2 and highway 43 in Grande Prairie.

For-profit Diagnostic Facilities

DR. TAFT: Mr. Speaker, important research tabled earlier in this Assembly shows clearly that the greater the dominance of for-profit health care facilities, the higher the costs of public health care, including hospitals, home care, and other public programs. In Alberta for-profit health care corporations are pushing up public-sector wage expectations by offering signing bonuses, higher salaries, and easier working conditions to pull workers out of the public system. One result of this is a pronounced risk that for-profit diagnostic corporations will soon have enticed so many technicians away from some public hospitals that those hospitals will be unable to function properly. To the Minister of Health and Wellness: does the minister see any risk – any risk – that government policies are driving health care costs unnecessarily higher rather than lower?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, the real issue in this debate appears not to be whether or not there are private or public providers of the service but whether it is a single or a multiple payer of the system. I think what you'll find – and I would entreat the hon. member to review the literature – is that in places where there are multiple payers, that does appear to be driving up the costs of health care. The United States and the U.K. would be good examples. But what we are working on in a made-in-Alberta solution in this province is not multiple payers. We're talking about still a single payer, but there can be a role for private providers of care within the publicly funded health care system. That is a dramatically different situation than has been portrayed by the hon. member here today.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd be delighted to review the evidence if the minister provides it.

What policies will the government enact to prevent for-profit diagnostic companies from creating predatory monopolies that will hold RHAs to ransom for overpriced contracts?

MR. MAR: With respect to all of the contracts that have been approved under the Health Care Protection Act, the overriding principle all along has been that we are interested in preserving the very best of our public health care system and improving access wherever possible. Mr. Speaker, in the approval of those contracts under the Health Care Protection Act, the overriding principle is: how can we improve the public system?

So, Mr. Speaker, for those members of the Alberta public or the hon. member himself if he so chooses to avail himself of the opportunity, if people wish to review such contracts as they have been approved, those contracts are available on web sites. People can see for themselves that these contracts are in fact improving access and not impairing the public health care system.

Now, with respect to the issue of diagnostics, Mr. Speaker, this may well be an opportunity for regional health authorities to contract with private providers. If private providers can provide the service faster, better, and at the same or improved cost, then that should be what happens.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that some RHAs may soon have no choice but to contract with for-profit diagnostic corporations on those corporations' terms, how can the minister continue to tell this Assembly, as he just did, that diagnostic services will only be contracted out when it is faster, better, or more efficient to do so? Aren't we just putting RHAs between a rock and a hard place?

MR. MAR: Well, you know, the hon. member asked me specifically about ultrasound technicians the other day, on Thursday afternoon, April 18, issue 23, at page 788. I do have more detailed information with respect to ultrasound technicians, but as I indicated on Thursday last in this House, Mr. Speaker, the issue of trained technicians, technologists, and health care providers of all sorts is an issue not just in Alberta but across this country.

We have been very, very aggressive in our recruiting, particularly with respect to sonographers, which is what he was referring to the other day. There is a North American shortage of trained and qualified sonographers. The regional health authorities and the government are recruiting these professionals from other jurisdictions. Arrangements have been made with educational institutions in the provinces of British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, and Nova Scotia to meet with new graduates. Those interviews will take place in the month of May of this year. We've entered into a contractual arrangement with Worldwide Health Staff Associates, an international recruiting agency, to recruit sonographers from the United Kingdom. There will be attendance at the Canadian Society of Diagnostic Medical Sonographers national conference that will take place in June, 2002, for the purposes of recruitment. So we are making every effort to ensure that people are available not only for the facilities referred to by the hon. member but within the public system as well.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands, followed by the hon. Member for Red Deer-North.

WCB Claims Review

MR. MASON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. A committee of Tory MLAs recommended an independent adjudication of long-standing WCB claims by injured workers, a recommendation that was seemingly endorsed by the Minister of Human Resources and Employment, yet it seems that employers have pressured the minister into backing down on justice for injured workers. Given that employers claim that they cannot afford the adjudication process, can the minister tell the House how he expects injured workers, many of whom have been unemployed for more than a decade, to continue to bear the costs of poverty and despair as a result of the injustice that they have faced?

MR. DUNFORD: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the hon. member is speculating. There's no question that there is some difficulty with getting all stakeholders on the same page as it relates to how one would look at a long-term contentious claim, but I think it's a little early to be calling for the demise of that exercise.

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, I'm certainly not calling for the demise of the recommendations, but I'd like to know why the minister is prepared to cave in to employers when there are WCB claimants who have been waiting in some cases more than a decade for justice on their claims?

MR. DUNFORD: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to be ignoring a very fundamental fact here, and that is that the workers' compensation system as set out by the Meredith principle does talk about a system that would be funded by employers and would be there for the treatment of injured workers. As part of that principle then coming into practicality, there have to be systems that are put together to ensure that an injured worker sees and finds justice and that if the injured worker is unhappy with that particular situation, there would be an appeal system for some satisfaction, as a matter of fact even on to the Ombudsman. So we've been looking at ways to streamline that function and will continue to work toward a better system in WCB.

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Then will the minister commit to a process that if workers are unable to get an impartial adjudication of their claims, he will bring in amendments to WCB legislation allowing these workers to seek justice in the courts?

MR. DUNFORD: Well, the member can't have it both ways, and he knows that. One of the so-called tenets, at least as I understood it, of the labour force in this province was adherence to the Meredith principle, and I'm wondering if the hon. member had thought to check with those that have supported his campaigns in the past, because I think he's just offered a very inflammatory offer during this particular question. If I appear to be stumbling a little bit, Mr. Speaker, it's because I am so shocked to hear the hon. member, you know, the socialist among socialists, even pretend that this is not a good system and to take away a system of no-fault insurance, which people like Lewis and Douglas – I mean, they must be rolling in their graves hearing a socialist like you talk about this. This is a situation. It's very serious. The Meredith principle, to which all of us are so attuned, is that there will be no lawsuit between the employee and the employer. Shame on you for suggesting it.

head: Recognitions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Bill Warren

MR. HLADY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to invite all members of this Assembly to join me in recognizing an Albertan who has made outstanding contributions to the Olympic movement and to Olympic ideals. Bill Warren, a key figure in Calgary's bid to host the 1988 Olympic Winter Games and a past president of the COA, received the Canadian Olympic Order on Friday, April 19, at the Canadian Olympic Hall of Fame induction dinner. The Canadian Olympic Order is accorded to those individuals who have made the Olympic movement their life's work and have served it with distinction. It has only been awarded to 17 other Canadians since it was first presented in 1994. Beyond fame and fortune, Mr. Warren has dedicated a major part of his career to sports, and his success continues to inspire and encourage anyone who aspires to a dream. He complements the history of sport and has brought pride, distinction, and honour to Alberta. I encourage all members of this Assembly to join me in congratulating Bill Warren on receiving the Canadian Olympic Order.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Canadian Armed Forces Reserves

MR. LUKASZUK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. During Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of last week I had the distinction and honour to spend time with 1,500 men and women who are indeed the epitome of professionalism, dedication, commitment, and, above all, patriotism. These are the members of the 408 squadron and the Princess Patricia regiment now stationed in Suffield, Alberta, for training. Despite the recent adversities that we have heard of, having four of our soldiers lost, these men and women continue to be dedicated to protect our land and to keep us indeed strong and free. Do we recognize them for this effort and this commitment adequately? Sadly the answer is no. As I observed during the last three days in Suffield, we lack legislation comparable to that in the U.S. that would preserve the jobs of reservists who are deployed and have them waiting for them when they return to Canada, and many of them live in substandard conditions. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that all of these committed men and women deserve a collective salute from all of us and all Canadians.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member might want to read Standing Order 10.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

National Volunteer Week

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Once again I'd like to recognize National Volunteer Week, which started last Sunday, April 21, and runs to April 27. As someone who worked in the charitable nonprofit sector before being elected, I have firsthand experience with how much volunteers bring to our agencies, organizations, and groups. The theme for this year, Experience Matters, is also one I can speak to from experience. This theme highlights the skills side of volunteering. Some people volunteer to gain skills in something they haven't done before, but other volunteers like accountants or lawyers bring their skills to the sector to help out, and it is a huge help. This year's theme also speaks to varying levels of experience. In the theatres I managed, we often got young people coming in to volunteer to see if this was an area they might like for a career, so they brought enthusiasm, energy, and a can-do attitude. Sometimes we were lucky enough to get seniors and retired folk in, who brought us a lifetime of wisdom and experience. So hug a volunteer today, and if you're a volunteer, then give yourself a pat on the back. Volunteers are the real advantage in Alberta today.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Red Deer-North.

National Volunteer Week

MRS. JABLONSKI: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I, too, am pleased to rise in this Assembly to recognize April 21 to 27, 2002, as Volunteer Week in Alberta. Volunteers are one of Alberta's most valued resources. Through the nationally proclaimed Volunteer Week we pay tribute recognizing the valuable and significant contribution volunteers make to our lives. Although our volunteers are priceless, contributions from the volunteer sector are estimated to be over $1 billion to Alberta's economy annually and over $14 billion to the national economy. This generous spirit of Albertans is an integral part of who we are and what we are celebrating this week. Through a unique partnership between the Wild Rose Foundation and Volunteer Alberta the Volunteer Week initiative has made Alberta a leader in recognizing National Volunteer Week in Canada.

This year a record number of 136 Alberta communities, including Red Deer, representing more than 2 million Albertans are participating in the weeklong series of events. This is a good example of lottery dollars at work helping to reinforce the efforts of those who through their many and diverse selfless acts enhance the quality of life for all of us. I encourage this Assembly to join me and the minister responsible for the Wild Rose Foundation in thanking all of Alberta's many wonderful volunteers.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Peter Lougheed

MR. LORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a privilege for me to rise today to invite all members of this Assembly to join me in recognizing the accomplishments of another outstanding Albertan for his outstanding contribution to the Olympic movement and to Olympic ideals. Former Alberta Premier Peter Lougheed, whose accomplishments otherwise are well known, has also been involved with the Olympic movement for more than three decades. For his work in this area he received the Canadian Olympic Order this past Friday at the Canadian Olympic Hall of Fame induction dinner. The Canadian Olympic Order has only been given to 17 individuals who have exemplified Olympic ideals in their commitment and service to the Olympic movement and who have achieved major distinction in doing so since its inception in 1994.

Mr. Lougheed has dedicated a major part of his career over the years to promoting and organizing sporting activities, and his success at doing so continues to inspire many others who are also following their dreams and hoping to achieve similar successes. In achieving this entry into the Canadian Olympic Order, Mr. Lougheed becomes part of a very prestigious group, and I would encourage all members of this Assembly to join me in congratulating Peter Lougheed on receiving the Canadian Olympic Order.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

Gary Bobrovitz

MR. CENAIKO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to recognize one of my constituents, whom I've known for over 20 years, for reaching a goal of his on March 17, 2002. Gary Bobrovitz, a well-known and respected journalist and investigative reporter for Global News in Calgary, defended his title at the Canadian national powerlifting championships in Red Deer. Last year Gary was successful in winning the gold medal in the men's open division 60-kilogram classification, lifting over 700 pounds, or nearly five times his own body weight. This year he lifted 880 pounds, over six and a half times his own weight. Gary has qualified to move on to the world powerlifting championships in Helsinki, Finland, in November of this year. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Gary on his amazing repeat performance and wish him the best of luck in Helsinki.

Thank you.

John Ewasiw

MR. MASON: Today I stand and recognize Mr. John Ewasiw, this year's recipient of the United Way Jim Shewchuk award. This award recognizes outstanding individual contributions to the labour movement and to the community. Mr. Ewasiw's roots are pure Albertan. Born in Thorhild in 1936 and raised on the family farm, he moved to Edmonton in 1957 and worked for Swift Canadian until 1997, when he retired. He became a member of the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, local 280, in 1957 and served for a number of years as the local's president. During his working days John supported his community in many ways, including the United Way, the Alberta Federation of Labour, the Edmonton and District Labour Council, and the Boys and Girls Club. He has been involved in raising funds for leukemia research since 1992 and continues to this day. I'm happy to recognize this exceptional trade unionist and Albertan, Mr. John Ewasiw.

head: Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

MS GRAHAM: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Standing Committee on Private Bills has had a certain bill under consideration and wishes to report as follows. The committee recommends that the following private bill proceed: Bill Pr. 1, Synod of the Diocese of Edmonton Amendment Act, 2002. I request the concurrence of the Assembly in this recommendation.

THE SPEAKER: Would all hon. members in favour of the report please say aye?

HON. MEMBERS: Aye.

THE SPEAKER: Opposed, please say no. The report is carried.

head: Presenting Petitions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to present a petition signed by 137 Albertans, mostly residents of Calgary, petitioning the Legislative Assembly to urge the government "to not delist services, raise health care premiums, introduce user fees or further privatize health care."

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to present a petition signed by 148 residents of Edmonton petitioning the Legislative Assembly of Alberta to urge the provincial government "to take decisive action in making safe, affordable housing a top priority of concern when making policy decisions and working with other levels of government on this issue."

head: Introduction of Bills

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment.

Bill 26

Workers' Compensation Amendment Act, 2002

MR. DUNFORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce a bill being the Workers' Compensation Amendment Act, 2002.

This bill will bring a more open and accountable workers' compensation system to Alberta and will streamline the appeals system that is so important to injured workers.

[Motion carried; Bill 26 read a first time]

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Finance.

MRS. NELSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to table today five copies of the 30th annual report of the Alberta Automobile Insurance Board, for the year ended December 31, 2001.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Seniors.

MR. WOLOSHYN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to table the appropriate number of copies of the responses to the questions raised by Edmonton-Mill Woods and Edmonton-Centre in the presentation of my estimates on March 20.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment.

MR. DUNFORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to file with the Assembly five copies of the current issue of a magazine entitled Canadian Government Executive. The magazine contains a cover article profiling Ms Shirley Howe, the Acting Public Service Commissioner for the government of Alberta, and the management team behind the successful creation and implementation of a new human resources strategy for the Alberta public service. All of us in government are very proud of Ms Howe and the management team that led to the development of this strategy.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Community Development.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am very pleased to table with the Assembly today a copy of the news release that I've issued on behalf of the government of Alberta officially recognizing National Volunteer Week from April 21 to 27 and showing that a record number of 136 communities in our province are participating this year.

I also have two letters of congratulations on behalf of the government to hon. Peter Lougheed and to Mr. Bill Warren on their being inducted into the Canadian Olympic Association Olympic Order at the Canadian Olympic Hall of Fame dinner last Friday.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose.

MR. JOHNSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta Alcohol and Drug Abuse Commission as an agency of the government of Alberta reporting to the Minister of Health and Wellness contributes in a major way to the health of individuals, families, and communities in this province. Today it is my pleasure to table the 2002-2005 business plan of the commission, which lays out the plans of the commission for providing alcohol and other drug and gambling problems prevention, treatment, and information services to the people of Alberta over the next three years. This business plan reflects the lead role that the commission is undertaking in coordinating the implementation of the Alberta tobacco reduction strategy.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the president, Mr. Duncan Brook, of the Edmonton Gold Bar Liberal Constituency Association and on behalf of all constituency members I would like to table the report to the commission on the future of health care in Canada. This is addressed to Mr. Roy Romanow, Commission on the Future of Health Care in Canada.

I also have a second tabling this afternoon. It is the WCB's proposed resolution, these cosmetic changes to the WCB, the early resolution initiative, the pilot project that was initiated on April 2 of this year. This information is available and tabled for all hon. members.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to table five copies of an e-mail from Lynn Chambers to her MLA, the Member for Airdrie-Rocky View. She is raising her concerns about the community lottery board funding and noting that it was critical in helping Alliance Francaise achieve its goal of meeting the needs of Calgarians with an interest in French language and culture and asks her member to take immediate action to help reverse the decision.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table five copies of a letter from Moe Hamdon, mayor of the town of Drayton Valley, addressed to the Minister of Gaming. The letter is dated April 16. The mayor expresses his concerns and unhappiness regarding the government's decision to eliminate the community lottery board program because it undermines the survival of many voluntary organizations and contravenes the government's original undertaking to return a significant portion of gaming revenues to local communities.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm tabling five copies of a calendar of events which lists the various events celebrating the May week labour festival taking place in Edmonton from Friday, April 26, to Sunday, May 5.

head: Orders of the Day

head: Written Questions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, proper notice having been given on Thursday, April 18, it is my pleasure to move that written questions appearing on today's Order Paper do stand and retain their places with the exception of written questions 3 and 4.

[Motion carried]

Access Television

Q3. Ms Blakeman moved on behalf of Mr. MacDonald that the following question be accepted.

How many government departments have provided or sponsored in part or in full programs, shows, advertisements, or other initiatives for use on Access Television, how many were there for each department, and what was the cost of each for each of the fiscal years 1992-1993 to 2000-2001 and April 1, 2001, to March 13, 2002?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Finance.

MRS. NELSON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It would be very difficult for the government to produce the information that has been requested in this written question without extensive manual work on a ministry-by-ministry basis. In fact, answering the question would require a review of the details of every single payment made by a ministry to Access over the last 10 years. This information is available through the general revenue fund for 2000-2001 and 2001-2002 by department and expenditure code for payments to Access but not in the detail requested. For earlier years the only available information is contained in the general revenue fund details of expenditure by payee, which we used to refer to as the blue book. It's tabled each year in the House.

Rejection of this written question is based on Beauchesne 446(2)(g), which states that "papers of a voluminous character or which would require an inordinate cost or length of time to prepare" should be exempt from production. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I'd refer the hon. members opposite to what was called the blue book for that data. Unfortunately, we will have to reject this request for Written Question 3.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre to close the debate.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm disappointed to hear that a refusal is the response from the hon. Treasurer. I understand the citation that she referred to, looking for a voluminous amount of material, but I am a little concerned when I see a request coming from the opposition for information that is then declined because it would just be too much work to try and find it. I think that certainly from this side what we've experienced in the past is that we ask nicely by letter; we don't get it. We try and ask through a written question or a motion for a return; we don't get it. Then we FOIP it, and everybody's all surprised and hurt because we FOIPed it and why we didn't just ask nicely in the first place. So trying to get information out of this government, which is not open and transparent, is very difficult. This is another example of their having the information and not being willing to compile it for us.

I think this is a reasonable question. The government divested itself of interest or ownership in Access Television a few years ago, but it does appear that it's still providing support for programming, and I think that it's quite a reasonable question to find out how much support is coming from the government. Obviously, it's coming from different departments. Certainly there's sponsorship from various departments that I've seen at the beginning or the end of programs on Access. I felt that it was a reasonable question to be asking, how much government support was still going through. So once again it's very disappointing how little information this government is willing to provide to people that ask reasonable questions of it.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Written Question 3 lost]

Police Services Agreement

Q4. Ms Blakeman moved that the following question be accepted.

How many provincial policing positions has the government funded for each of the fiscal years 1999-2000, 2000-2001, and April 1, 2001, to March 13, 2002, through the provincial police services agreement, and how many of these positions were filled?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Solicitor General.

MRS. FORSYTH: Yes. Thank you. The government is prepared to accept Written Question 4 with some amendments, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Forsyth moved that Written Question 4 be amended to move that the following question be accepted:

How many provincial policing officers has the government funded for each of the fiscal years 1999-2000 and 2000-2001 and projected for 2001-2002 through the provincial police services agreement, and what was the authorized number of officers for each of those years?

The original question is unanswerable for the following reasons. It is based on the assumption that government funds a set number of positions through the provincial police services agreement, while in reality the government establishes a target authorizing the establishment of full-time equivalent, or FTE, officers but pays only for the actual average establishment. Because staffing is fluid with the continual movement of persons into and out of positions, actual FTEs calculated as an average over a period of time, for example a fiscal period, is used to monitor policing strength. This is a more accurate method of determining funding requirements than positions. The term "officers" is used to indicate full-time equivalents. The actual FTE utilization for the period April 1, 2001, to March 31, 2002, is not yet available. Instead, a projection will be used.

Mr. Speaker, the government will accept the question with the amendments as circulated to all members.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I'll take this as a genuine effort from the Solicitor General to provide information. I find it frustrating, though. The specificity of the language was therefore a reason I was seeking information on how many positions the government thought they were funding and whether in fact the positions were filled. What I'm hearing from some people is that a given detachment may have 12 positions that are supposed to have officers in them, but in fact one of them is out on WCB and two are off on stress leave and two of them were native policing. So the actual number of officers that are available in that detachment is far fewer than is on the books, so to speak, and there was a suspicion that there was a growing gap between what was on the books and what was actually rubber on the road. That was some of the information I was seeking.

As I have said before, it's very difficult to get information out of this government. [interjection] I look forward to the time when I can have the Minister of Environment as my minister, and then I'm sure he'll be able to provide all the information I'm seeking. However, he's not the minister that I'm dealing with at this time.

So I will accept not gratefully but begrudgingly the amount of information that is being made available to me and hope that I can encourage the Solicitor General to continue to be forthcoming, even to expand her forthcomingness in the future.

Thanks, Mr. Speaker.

[Written Question 4 as amended carried] head: Motions for Returns

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Proper notice having been given on Thursday, April 18, it is my pleasure to move that motions for returns appearing on today's Order Paper do stand and retain their places with the exception of Motion for a Return 1.

[Motion carried]

Police Services Agreement

M1. Ms Blakeman moved that an order of the Assembly do issue for a return showing copies of documents prepared by or for the Department of Justice and Attorney General and the Department of Solicitor General between April 1, 1999, and March 1, 2002, providing the number of provincial police positions funded by the government under the provincial police services agreement and the number of positions filled under that agreement.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Solicitor General.

MRS. FORSYTH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The government is prepared to accept MR 1, again with amendments, sir.

Mrs. Forsyth moved that Motion for a Return 1 be amended to read that an order of the Assembly do issue for a return showing copies of documents prepared by the Department of Justice and Attorney General and the Department of Solicitor General for the fiscal years 1999-2000, 2000-2001, and 2001-2002 providing the number of provincial police officers funded or projected by the government under the provincial police services agreement and the number of officers authorized under that agreement for each of the fiscal years.

The original motion for a return should be amended for the following reasons. Summary documents prepared by the government of Alberta for payment reconciliation should be used rather than complex documents provided by a third party, who may have objections to details being released publicly. Because the established authorized and actual FTEs are reviewed and reconciled on an annual basis, separate information for the fiscal years 1999-2000, 2000-2001, and 2001-2002 would be more meaningful and in keeping with the corresponding written question than trying to combine the years. Because staffing is fluid with the continual movement of persons into and out of positions, full-time equivalents as represented by the word “officers” provides a more accurate and meaningful measure than “positions.”

The fiscal reconciliation for the period April 1, 2001, to March 31, 2002, is not yet available. Instead, a projection will be proposed. Under the provincial police services agreement the government funds the actual number of officers. It would be more meaningful to compare the actual with the authorized number of officers, FTEs.

Mr. Speaker, I'll move that MR 1 be accepted with the amendments.

MS BLAKEMAN: My response to this proposed amendment to MR 1 brought forward by the Solicitor General is very similar to my statements in response to Written Question 4, so I can refer any reader back in Hansard to read that. Essentially I was looking for information that's going to detail for us whether we actually had officers filling the positions we thought we had and exactly what they were doing, because there is a suspicion that we don't have as many officers out there doing the work – in other words, policing or law enforcement – that we think we do. Particularly, in one case I had someone approach me with a concern that an officer had been seconded around September 11. [interjection] Yes, 9-11. So I was looking for information about whether or not that in fact was happening. So I appreciate the Solicitor General coming forward in an attempt to provide me with information, and I'm willing to accept the amendment to Motion for a Return 1.

THE SPEAKER: Hon. Solicitor General, the chair heard the hon. Solicitor General speak to the amendment. It would be helpful if the hon. Solicitor General moved the amendment as well.

MRS. FORSYTH: Mr. Speaker, I'm sorry; I thought I had. I move the amendment.

[Motion for a Return 1 as amended carried] head: Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 206
Fisheries (Alberta) Amendment Act, 2002

[Adjourned debate April 15: Mrs. Fritz]

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Whitecourt-St. Anne.

MR. VANDERBURG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's truly an honour and a privilege to join in on the debate on Bill 206, sponsored by the hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The words “careful” and “control” came to mind when I thought about Bill 206. We've heard debate about the need to control the population of predatory birds in order to effectively preserve fish populations in Alberta lakes. The sponsor has described the behaviour of the double-crested cormorant and how birds have decimated lakes in northern Alberta. You know, the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul knows more about the negative effects of this bird than anyone else in this House, and I would agree with other members in this Assembly about the need to control this bird that's obviously causing great harm to our aquaculture and environment.

Things are getting out of hand, and it's time for government to find a solution, Mr. Speaker. The challenge for this government is to act in a serious and sensible way while fulfilling our roles as protectors of both the Alberta environment and Alberta business. The remedy proposed in Bill 206 is to allow the minister responsible for the Fisheries (Alberta) Act to use existing legislation, the Agricultural Pests Act, to control this bird species that is destroying and harming fish habitat. The bill is not suggesting drastic measures, nor is it suggesting anything new. The Agricultural Pests Act currently provides the legal authority to deal with native and introduced pests affecting agriculture production.

Mr. Speaker, the beauty and usefulness of Alberta's lakes will be here as long as the people of Alberta and this government are willing to show careful regard for the environment. Bill 206 does just that. I would encourage all members of this Assembly to support this important legislation.

Thank you.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is a pleasure to rise this afternoon and make some comments on Bill 206, the Fisheries (Alberta) Amendment Act, 2002, sponsored by the hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul.

Certainly the growth in the population of cormorants over the last decade has been incredible in this province, but before we rush forward and pass a bill such as Bill 206, I think that what we need are some type of quantitative studies which are going to certainly point out exactly why this phenomenon has occurred, particularly when we see that for so many years in this province that population was stable, yet in recent years it has grown, and grown rapidly. I think what we're seeing here today as well, Mr. Speaker, is that a number of people in this province have looked at this issue, and as the hon. Member for Whitecourt-St. Anne has just indicated, they see these birds as a problem. I think we have to go much further than to just look at the reason why these birds are now considered to be a problem.

I had the opportunity a few summers ago to go to Namur Lake, which is a trophy lake. You have to fly in from Fort McMurray. Those people have been managing that lake for a number of years, and they certainly saw the impact of the cormorant on particularly the arctic grayling, which were at one particular end of the lake and certainly in the creeks and whatever, and how those populations had been wiped out. We also have to look at not only those populations that had been drastically reduced, but we have to look at the fish populations, for example, of northern pike and walleye. These populations were stable in the province for many, many years, but with the growth in the number of fishermen and the limited number of lakes that we do have in this province, the populations of northern pike and walleye have certainly decreased.

Of course, that compounds the problem in that smaller fish in the lake and minnows and whatever increase in great numbers when they are further down the food line and their predators have decreased significantly in numbers. There was a tremendous amount of food available to birds like cormorants. There were at one time healthy populations of northern pike and walleye. So these small forage fish certainly grew in incredible numbers. The food supply was increased, and the bird populations obviously followed suit.

Now, then, I don't believe that passing a bill like 206 is going to take care of this problem over time. What we have to do, Mr. Speaker, is certainly restore the fish populations, particularly of northern pike and walleye. Just as this problem has arisen over time, to correct this problem and to correct it properly is also going to take a significant amount of work and dedication. It is very, very difficult to monitor field inventories on these popular game fish and fish populations and to also notice the trends when over the last decade we have had significant decreases in the funding of the two departments that are most responsible for our fish populations in this province, and those are Sustainable Resource Development and Environment.

What this is is simply crisis management. When we get to the stage that we introduce a private member's bill to deal with this significant problem, yet when we go through the departments of Environment and Sustainable Resource Development, we certainly don't see any mention of this problem, we don't see any additional funds that have been allocated to take care of this, then I know that I cannot support Bill 206. As this problem has developed over the last decade, then I think that we have to look forward and institute the proper strategies so that nature itself can take care of this problem. If it hadn't been for the overfishing by people in this province, we wouldn't be experiencing this problem right now and nature would be able to handle the situation very well.

As I was mentioning, Mr. Speaker, one of the keys that we have to have always in place in this province is that we monitor accurately the status of our aquatic resources. As well, we have to reinvest into those aquatic resources, we have to rely on a long-term monitoring program of our fish populations, and we also have to look at the fish habitats, including not only water quantity but water quality. I think that if we are looking not for a quick fix to a problem and certainly something that there are no guarantees for, a solution that is not nature itself that is in control but man, then I think what we have to do is that we have to restore the aquatic resources in our budget, the number of dollars that we're going to spend, and certainly look at how these resources have been eroded over the years in year after year of decreases to this particular budget.

We have to put in strategies here that are going to reverse this whole increase in the cormorant population. We have to put in strategies that are going to restore the healthy numbers of walleye and northern pike in our northern lakes, and by doing this, we can certainly reduce the number of small forage fish that the cormorant feeds on. But the quickest way and long-term solution for this is to certainly eliminate or drastically reduce that source of food that these birds rely on.

So, Mr. Speaker, I will not be voting in favour of Bill 206. I think it's a band-aid solution, and I think the problem is much greater than what this bill will fix. I think that as an Assembly our duty is to look at solutions which are long term. We have to look at solutions where our fish populations are sustainable, and if it takes another decade for nature to correct this problem itself with some help of ours, whether it's introducing these types of game fish, the northern pike and walleye into these lakes, then certainly it is incumbent upon us to look at those solutions and certainly not the crisis solution of killing off these birds.

Thank you very much.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

MR. SNELGROVE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a privilege to rise today to speak in favour of Bill 206. I think this is really one of the examples where the Legislative Assembly can work properly. When a member from an area or region comes into this Assembly with a very clear and specific problem and has worked with the departments to develop a solution to a problem and can present that in a very timely and affordable manner to the people of Alberta, then I think surprisingly enough, occasionally, like I say, even a blind squirrel finds an acorn.

What the member has asked the minister to do is:

When the minister determines that a species of animal or bird is destroying or harming, or is likely to destroy or harm, fish or fish habitat, the Minister may order, in accordance with any guidelines adopted by regulation, such measures throughout Alberta or in part of Alberta that the Minister deems necessary to protect the fish or fish habitat which may include reducing the numbers of that species of animal or bird on land owned by the Crown.

That's a very simple, straightforward request that says: here's a serious problem; let's fix it.

Now, we target fish as one of the species at risk here, but that's part of the big plan. We can't just say that it's fish for the sake of someone going to fish. They're part of an ecosystem – I know even our hon. members across would agree – that is a very important part of the big picture. So we could sit, Mr. Speaker, and we could do some more studies, and we could monitor, and we could count numbers, and we could let the lakes in Alberta die. Then we would all say, "Man, we should have done something," but we were busy counting and taking numbers and doing studies.

We see a very good example of this. They say: "Well, that wouldn't happen. How could normal people do that?" Let's look at what's happened in the north with the snow geese. The numbers of snow geese have increased so far past what the land is able to handle that they have destroyed the Arctic tundra for miles and miles and miles, and given the growing season in the north it won't be in any of our lifetimes that this ever comes back.

Now, the federal government, as they can do, will study, and they will count birds, and they will say: boy, we've got a problem there, but as long as we have money to count and to study and no one lives right there, then it's not a big problem. Even the Alberta fish and wildlife people recognize that, and they've upped the limit of snow geese you can shoot, but I guess they should make it mandatory maybe that you have to shoot 50 of them before you shoot a Canada goose. I don't know what the answer is, but the answer certainly isn't doing nothing.

There's another very good example right now going on in Chesapeake Bay, Mr. Speaker, where a type of swan is doing an incredible amount of damage to the reeds and grass along the edge of the Chesapeake Bay. Given the nature of water movement there, it's a very dangerous precedent to set, to start to erode the banks. It's not just the animals that live near the banks, but it affects all of them. Now, it would be simple if the swan was an ugly thing that people didn't care for much. You could probably go destroy it and people wouldn't mind, but a swan is a beautiful creature, and we're all supposed to love it. Still, the fish and wildlife people there have put forward a plan, that's already been approved, to spray the eggs with an oil-based solvent that won't let the eggs hatch, so it's pretty painless. It makes the birds think they're doing a heck of a job, but there are just not going to be as many birds in the future.

AN HON. MEMBER: It's slippery to sit on them, though.

MR. SNELGROVE: Yes. If they oiled them first, they'd probably be easier to have.

Mr. Speaker, here's a case where certainly we have the environmentalists on one side saying: "Boy, we can't do this. We can't mess with nature." We're the biggest part in nature now. Unfortunately, we destroy nature every day, and we're not going to go back, but the least we can do when we recognize a very clear and present danger to a species or a chain is step in and help where we can.

So I would say to the Assembly that we can study and we can watch and we can listen to the people who aren't up there to see the disaster that's coming from these cormorants, but as far as I'm concerned, we should get on with the matter at hand and the sooner the better. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I rise with an open mind on this issue, as remarkable as that may seem. I can see both sides or maybe many sides to the issue, and I at the moment am not clear where I'm going to come down on it, but I do find myself trying to put this issue in a bigger debate.

I'm sure all members of the Assembly are aware of the collapse of fish stocks actually worldwide. We're all aware in Canada of the collapse of the fish stocks in the Newfoundland Grand Banks. When I was a schoolboy, I was taught that the Grand Banks of Newfoundland were virtually an inexhaustible supply of fish, yet they're gone. In fact, when you look at that in a global term, there are fish stocks around the world that are collapsing off the coasts of every continent. The major fish stocks are collapsing, and we are seeing the same kind of thing with freshwater fish stocks in Alberta and I'm sure in other jurisdictions. There have been repeated references in this Assembly by the hon. Member for Athabasca-Wabasca to the collapse in various fisheries. I know from my own experience and experience of my family that going out to fish for something as simple as jackfish is now difficult to do. I mean, you used to be able to catch jackfish. Even I could catch a jackfish, and that's really saying something. Now it's hard for anybody to catch jackfish in many lakes in this province.

What we're looking at here is a global problem with our fish stocks. As much as cormorants may be a problem in some lakes in Alberta, I can't imagine that they're the cause of the demise of fish stocks around the world. I don't think in the big picture that killing cormorants is going to be any kind of long-term solution to the problem we're seeing.

I think we need to look at other or further solutions, and those solutions may have to do with our whole approach to the habitat: our handling of the lands through which the rivers flow and in which the lakes are formed, the way we handle the lands around the edges of the lakes and the riverbanks, the amount of encroachment we allow on this land from industry or residential development or agriculture, the kinds of chemicals that are produced in our society that get into the water supply. All kinds of issues affect the welfare of our fish stocks, and again I repeat that I can't believe for a minute that cormorants are the main cause of the problems in the lakes that we're discussing.

On the other hand, I listened carefully to the comments from the hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster and his plea for action, and I think of comments I hear for plea for action on a whole host of issues, whether it's climate change or other environmental issues. I think there's much to be said for acting, so that draws me to support the bill, but I know I'm not alone in having my concerns.

The whole issue of how we as a society and how this government manage fish stocks comes into this. Are our fish and wildlife resources adequate? By that, I mean the department: the inspectors, the biologists, the policy managers. Are there enough of them to sufficiently manage the fish and wildlife of this province so that they don't become extinct or they don't disappear? I am concerned that there's a direct correlation between the decline in fish stocks in this province and cuts to the staffing and budgets of the departments that are supposed to manage those stocks. So it may be that it's not the cormorants' fault; it's the Treasurer's fault, for example. But she's not going to respond to that, so I'll just pass it on.

It may be that there are other causes that we should be looking at and that the cormorants are in fact simply a symptom of a larger problem. The surging cormorant population may in fact result from the collapse of fish populations such as the northern pike population or the Walleye population. With those sport fish being fished out, it may be that the forage fish population has surged and they've provided a much more attractive feeding source for the cormorants, so the cormorants are coming in after the fact. That's one possibility. We may be treating a symptom rather than a cause. So it would be useful for me if the member sponsoring this bill were to present the larger context in terms of what's really happening. Is this really the cormorants' fault, or is this something much bigger?

There are also questions around how this Bill 206 might be implemented and how it might be managed. Would we keep track, for example, of the cormorant population over the years that the bill was enacted? Would we have some kind of objective or goal for the number of cormorants that were acceptable? Would we have an annual cormorant count on the lakes? I got a smile from one of the members, but actually, you know, we'd probably need something like that to know if we were having a successful campaign and to know when to stop killing cormorants. I suppose there's even the question of the public image of people going out to kill cormorants or to destroy the eggs of cormorants. Indeed, are we going to be destroying the food source for certain types of small wildlife if we destroy the eggs? Are we for example going to be starving foxes or muskrat or other creatures who might feed on those eggs? I have no idea. Maybe the hon. member does.

MR. BONNER: We need to increase our forage fish.

DR. TAFT: Yes. Might we see in fact a great surge in the forage fish in the lakes once the cormorants are gone, and what are going to be the implications of that? Maybe they'll be great. Maybe we'll see a surge, a return of the jackfish population and the walleye population, but on the other hand we might see the ecological balance of the lake thrown totally out of whack. Maybe the cormorants are there filling an important role for nature, a kind of stopgap measure for nature.

So those are some of the questions I have at this point, Mr. Speaker. I'm undecided about where I will vote on this particular piece of legislation. I think the hon. member's intentions are admirable. I doubt if he bears a grudge against cormorants. He's simply interested in improving the health of our lakes, but I'm not sure that this is the mechanism through which we want to do that. So I'll listen with interest to the other members' comments.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

MR. MASKELL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a privilege for me also to rise today to speak to Bill 206, the Fisheries (Alberta) Amendment Act, 2002, sponsored by the hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul. For a very long time my only experience having to do with cormorants – and I've had this great affection for China for many years – was in my reading and hearing about these wonderful fishing birds they had in China. They put a ring around their neck, and they tossed them out of the boat with a rope tied to their leg, and they went down and caught fish for the family and brought them up and so on. I never thought I would be rising in the Alberta Legislature to speak on an issue about cormorants. What I'm going to be speaking about today really is my personal experience, which perhaps many of you haven't had insofar as cormorants are concerned.

A number of years ago I bought a farm out in the Sangudo area.

MR. VANDERBURG: Is that Whitecourt-St. Anne?

MR. MASKELL: Out in Whitecourt-St. Anne on the bluffs overlooking the Pembina valley. It was a wonderful place to bring my family. I brought my grandchildren and nieces and nephews there to have a great adventure. Well, their great adventure was to get a video and go in and watch it while they're at the farm. Needless to say, it got me a little agitated, so I thought: you know, wouldn't it be great to put a trout pond in? It could generate some revenue with aquaculture, fish farming, and at the same time give my grandchildren something to do in catching fish. So I went through the whole process of getting the licensing and permissions that were required, had the pond created and filled it and so on. Then when it was time, I ordered the fish to be delivered and got 500 fingerling trout put into the pond. We had great fun throwing the fish food out on the pond and watching all these little fingerlings coming up to seek the food, but a couple of weeks after I had stocked this pond, my brother phoned and said: "Bro, you've got a big problem out there. Birds are flying in, and your fish are disappearing quickly." They were like a swarm of grasshoppers, which we're familiar with, the way they came in. Well, I can tell you that within a week I had no trout left in my pond.

Well, I'm not a very good loser on things like that, so I thought, "Doggone it all; I'm going to have those trout in that pond for my grandchildren." So I ordered another 500 trout and had them delivered. I had phoned all the right people, who were going to tell me how I could thwart the cormorants and not have this problem. So on the pier I built a scarecrow, and he looked mighty frightening, this human kind of scarecrow, standing on the pier. Well, that didn't work very well. All I did was provide another perch for the cormorants to land on. Then the fish and wildlife people, all the great experts that we had there, with all due respect, said: "No. You put a raft on the pond, and then you put the scarecrow on the raft." So now the raft floated around and so on, and now we provided another perch for the cormorants to land on: the raft and the scarecrow. So that didn't work well.

So, again, not to lose out on this, I decided to take the next step. These authorities said: "No. Now we've got to take the next step with propane guns." So all these guns were firing all the time. Well, that helped for a few hours or so, but again it didn't seem to affect the birds at all, and the neighbours were getting a little cranky about the propane guns that were firing continuously. Needless to say, I had a lot of visitors to the pond from the area and lots of advice and also people telling me that they had never seen these cormorants before I created this pond.

MR. DANYLUK: Oh, so you started it.

MR. MASKELL: Hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul, it's not my fault, honestly.

So finally they said: "Okay. Those three things don't work. Now, this will definitely work. You string wire back and forth across the pond. You put spinning reflectors on it and flags and so on." So, I mean, my family went to great trouble to create this. Well, it made it a little difficult for them to come sliding in and land on the pond, so all they did was land on the grass and walk in and then catch my fish. So I surrendered for that year and then tried the following year and had much the same experience.

What I quickly discovered was that this certainly is not unique to the area. The Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul was talking about in the northeast it being a problem and in central Alberta also and in our area stretching from Barrhead to Lake Isle. People were putting fish ponds – even in the farmyard. Mine was a quarter of a mile away from the house, but right in the farmyard these birds will land and clean out the pond. You could sit there day and night, and they'd find a way to get your fish.

So in terms of aquaculture and creating fish ponds to raise these fish, that didn't work at all. But the lakes around the area also suffered significantly. The lakes that had natural fish stocks for many years were being quickly cleaned out. In some of the smaller lakes the bird population was so large that the vegetation, the trees and so on around the lakes, was being killed from the bird droppings and so on. Stocked lakes in the area of course didn't survive the problems that we had.

So it's a matter that these birds were not known in the region at all for many, many years, and now they've just about cleaned out the area. I've done some research on this, and we've heard over and over and over that Alberta fish populations are at low levels. Pike catches – jackfish, as the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview speaks about – are only 15 percent of what they were in 1970. Of the 27 walleye populations for which there is data, 21 have collapsed in recent years. Concurrent to fish population collapse over the past 30 years, cormorant populations have increased tenfold. Commercial and sportfishing, not including tourism spin-off industries, contribute over $1 billion to the Alberta economy. So active management of fishery resources to promote long-term sustainability of the industry would increase the economic stability and growth in northern Alberta.

Bill 206 would enable the Ministry of Sustainable Resource Development, responsible for Alberta fish and wildlife, to ensure that fish farmers have an effective recourse and protection of their property from pests. Under Bill 206 the spawning routes of all fish species would be facilitated. This would increase the population of fish naturally and thereby reduce the necessity for expensive restocking measures. The proactive management of waterfowl populations would prevent waterfowl fecal pollution of potable water sources and habitats for protected bird species such as the great blue heron, the American white pelican, or the whooping and sandhill cranes.

Bill 206, Mr. Speaker, allows for a very broad approach to fish population recovery strategies and is not limited to depredation of cormorants or other pests. I plead with members: please, please support Bill 206.

Thank you very much.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Dunvegan.

MR. GOUDREAU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and add my voice to the debate on Bill 206, the Fisheries (Alberta) Amendment Act, 2002. I would like to thank the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul for his efforts in bringing this legislation forward. The Alberta fisheries industry is something that does not receive enough attention or discussion, and I'm grateful for the opportunity to discuss it here. I would like to talk about the benefits of the proposed legislation and then move on to why I think passing Bill 206 is important.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation aims to enable fish farmers to protect their investment from pest species of nongame birds. It will also set up a framework that would allow the Alberta fish population to grow on its own. The legislation will permit proactive and protective actions by fish farmers.

First, Bill 206 will allow the Minister of Sustainable Resource Development to control factors that hinder the growth of the fish population. Predatory bird populations could be reduced, and improved spawning routes could be ensured through the constructive removal of natural barriers such as beaver dams. Second, Bill 206 will allow the minister of agriculture to declare certain species of nongame birds as pests to aquaculture, or fish farming. With this legislation in place fish farmers will have the ability to protect their investment through lethal methods without obtaining a depredation order from the department. If it is passed, Bill 206 will enable fish farmers to act swiftly to protect their livelihood without having to wade patiently through the existing channels while their investments get eaten up one by one. These amendments to these two acts will work together to establish guiding principles by which the Department of Sustainable Resource Development can ensure the viability and protection of Alberta's fish stocks and biodiversity of Alberta's lakes and aquatic ecosystems.

Bill 206 is an important step towards a goal of long-term, viable fishing resources in Alberta. When compared to Ontario, B.C., and Manitoba, it can be truly said that Alberta is a province with few lakes. Because we have a small number of lakes, Alberta has a comparatively small commercial and tourist fishing industry. However, commercial and sportfishing, excluding tourism and spin-off benefits, contribute over $1 billion to the Alberta economy. A billion dollars is no small sum, and when tourist dollars are included and the total economic impact is assessed, I think that we could all agree that this is an industry that could use a measure of legislative help.

Mr. Speaker, the Alberta fishing industry and our recreational fishing have suffered from a population explosion of unchecked predators and other natural, limiting factors. Our fish populations are presently at dangerously low levels, and as our Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark indicated, pike catches have declined 85 percent from the level fishermen enjoyed 30 years ago. Also, data reports that three-quarters of the walleye populations in Alberta have met with severe decline over the same period. We have all heard that a bad day fishing beats a good day at the office, but with statistics on fish stocks like these, it's hard to imagine too many good days' fishing. And I had chalked it up to really bad bait all this time.

In response to this problem, Alberta has attempted to bolster the fish population in our lakes several times over the last 25 years. The restocking of Alberta lakes that has occurred has met with little success; hence the repeated attempts that have been made. Depleted stocks have persisted despite restocking efforts due to several factors including overfishing, inadequate spawning routes, winterkill in shallow ponds, and overwhelming shorebird presence. Bill 206 will give the Department of Sustainable Resource Development a mandate to attempt to effectively prevent and manage the responsible factors that have created the fish stock problems in this province. If the department is able to re-establish and secure routes for fish spawning and prevent overfishing, then a large portion of the problem can be solved.

However, these steps will not rectify the problems that certain lakes and fishing areas are facing. Northern Alberta fishermen and fish farmers are all familiar with a winged predator that mercilessly guts fish stocks in lakes, streams, and dugouts. The double-crested cormorant is a bird that is native to lakes in northern Alberta. The bird is awkward in the air but is a skilled fisherman. Cormorants have natural predators, namely rats and large snakes. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, northern Alberta is not hospitable to large snakes, and as we all know, Alberta is a rat-free province. This has left the cormorant with no natural predators.

Before the 1970s the population of cormorants was controlled inadvertently by the use of DDT. When the decision-makers of the day came to the realization that this pesticide was harmful to the ecosystem, there was a ban put on its use. While banning this pesticide was without question a necessary and positive step for the provincial environment, it did allow the cormorants to flourish. At about the same time, the government of the day undertook steps to restock the fish supplies in this province and provided the cormorants with a bounty of food. Ironically, and by no coincidence, Mr. Speaker, each restocking has led to a dramatic increase in the population of cormorants. The provincial population of cormorants is now 10 times higher than it was 25 years ago, and I believe that a direct link can be made to the restocking efforts that have been made over the past three decades.

I think it is time that we put an initiative in place to allow Alberta's fish population to grow, and it would seem to me that a great way to help achieve this is through the sensible removal of an unyielding and unchecked predator. The current methods of warding off winged predators could be enhanced by the measures proposed in Bill 206. Taking legislative action to protect our limited fisheries from natural predators is a valuable first step in the strengthening of Alberta's recreational fishing and Alberta's fish farms.

Mr. Speaker, an easy comparison can be drawn between the way that fish farmers feel about cormorants and the way that our farmers feel about gophers: they are small in stature, travel in generally large groups, and hinder the human ability to achieve maximum effectiveness in our farming endeavors. It is no coincidence that Bill 206 will allow cormorants to be listed as the same type of pest as the gopher in the eyes of the provincial laws. Farmers have the right to eliminate gopher populations on their property with lethal means in order to protect their investment. Under Bill 206 fish farmers in the province will have the ability to also eliminate cormorants through any means to protect their investment. On fish farms the investment is ripe pickings for fish-preying birds like cormorants. The fruits of the farmer's labour are nestled in shallow pools, waiting to be plucked off by hunting birds. It is not right to prevent the proprietors of these farms from protecting their investment in the same way that other agricultural farmers in this province have been able to protect their lands from certain pests.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, taking active management of fisheries resources will undoubtedly promote the long-term sustainability of the fishing industry in Alberta and would increase its economic stability and growth in the north. The proposed legislation allows for a broad approach to fish population recovery strategies and is not limited to depredation only. With this legislation in place, the spawning routes of all fish species will be facilitated and preserved. In conjunction with the facilitation of spawning routes, the means that Bill 206 makes available for fish farmers to use to protect their stock will help increase the fish population naturally and thereby eliminate the need for expensive restocking strategies.

I would strongly urge my fellow members of this Assembly to lend their support to Bill 206 and to the fish farmers of Alberta. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Calmar.

REV. ABBOTT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to join the intense debate regarding Bill 206, the Fisheries (Alberta) Amendment Act, 2002, which has been introduced by my distinguished colleague from Lac La Biche-St. Paul. At this time I wish to express my gratitude to my colleague for bringing this important issue before the House.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 206 is intended to correct a problem that has adversely affected the aquatic ecosystem in Alberta for many years. With lakes, rivers, and creeks found in every corner of the province, many Albertans are directly affected by negative changes to fish populations and our aquaculture. In the last 30 years a major collapse in fish population has occurred, while at the same time the population of a particular bird species, the cormorant, has flourished throughout the province. Now, I know that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview thinks that this may just be a coincidence, but the double-crested cormorant is a bird species that consumes up to a pound of fish on a daily basis. This bird is a very skilled predator of small fish and has the ability to severely deplete fish stocks in lakes and other bodies of water with overwhelming efficiency.

Bill 206 aims to empower fish farmers to protect their investment and in turn their livelihoods from this and other identified pest species. Further, Bill 206 will allow the Department of Sustainable Resource Development to develop a mechanism designed specifically to ensure sustainability, biological diversity, and viability of fish farming. This will help protect the aquaculture in Alberta for years to come and will help people like the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark as well.

Since the Department of Sustainable Resource Development is responsible for Alberta fish and wildlife, it is their responsibility to maintain a healthy environment in which aquafarmers can protect their property from pests that unnecessarily damage their investment and the environment. Since certain bird species and more specifically the cormorant have expanded their habitats dramatically during the last three decades, they have placed severe pressure on Alberta's fish population. While fish farmers and environmental groups are working feverishly to maintain our aquaculture in good shape, the cormorant and other pest bird species are working even harder on depleting our fish population to dangerous levels.

Our province serves as an especially suitable habitat for the cormorant. As you heard, there are no natural predators that are present in Alberta to control their populations. Snakes and rats are the two major predators that help keep the cormorant in check in other jurisdictions. As we all know, there are no rats in Alberta, and snakes are also in very short supply, especially in northern Alberta, and I am very glad to say that it is so, Mr. Speaker. Further, many Alberta lakes are relatively shallow, and since the cormorant can dive up to 40 feet, many fish have nowhere to hide. Thanks to Bill 206 we will finally provide the tools necessary for our fish farmers and the Department of Sustainable Resource Development to control the cormorant and other bird species that have grown out of control.

In addition, an important point to make is that commercial and sportfishing, not including tourism and spin-off industries, contribute over $1 billion to the Alberta economy. Many Albertans enjoy their time spent fishing and angling on the many pristine lakes and rivers around our great province. With many lakes suffering from substantially reduced fish stocks, the fish farmers, aquaculturists, and fishing enthusiasts are finding it increasingly harder to find adequate sources of fish in Alberta's lake and river system. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is especially difficult for those of us who are not great fishermen to begin with. By providing reasonable and effective legislation, we can ensure that certain pest species are controlled at levels that allow for environmental harmony.

As many Albertans work to restock the fish population in our lakes and rivers, certain bird species expand in numbers accordingly and effectively counteract those restocking efforts. Bird predation is among the leading causes of fish loss at commercial aquaculture facilities. Mr. Speaker, the Agricultural Pests Act, which is administered by the Department of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development, allows farmers and ranchers to proactively manage species that threaten their stock as long as it has been determined a pest by the minister. The Fisheries (Alberta) Amendment Act, 2002, would work in much the same way to protect our fish population from nonthreatened, nongame birds. Certain pest species have gone unchecked for too long, and legislation is badly needed to correct the problems they are causing. There are major environmental and economic implications to this issue, and unfortunately the double-crested cormorant is at the centre of most of it.

I'd like to thank the hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul for having the strength, Mr. Speaker, to deal with this issue. Even though the pesky bird problem is a very important one, Bill 206 also deals with other challenges that currently hamper a healthy development of our fish populations and fish farming operations. By providing adequate spawning routes, we will facilitate the natural ability of fish stocks to develop. This can be maintained by proactively removing beaver dams that pose a problem for certain fish species' migration. Bill 206 would also help farmers deal with problematic beaver dams when appropriate. The facilitation of spawning waters will help increase the fish population naturally, which will also reduce the need for restocking measures that often carry substantial additional costs.

The legislation proposed under Bill 206 is not designed to eliminate the cormorant species or any other predatory bird species in Alberta. It is designed to serve as a tool that fish farmers throughout Alberta have at their disposal to deal with pests that threaten their property and livelihood.

Finally, Bill 206 will address the issue of the management of sport and commercial fishing licences to promote sustainable harvesting of the fishery resource. This part of the Fisheries (Alberta) Amendment Act, 2002, is necessary to ensure that we can maintain a healthy fish population in areas most affected by overfishing, which has to be named as one of the culprits to the degradation of Alberta's fish population. Bill 206 would require the minister, through Alberta fish and wildlife, to evaluate Alberta's aquatic ecosystems and provide effective solutions to problems that are affecting the fishing industry throughout the province.

Further, Bill 206 provides a broad framework that will serve as the foundation for effective stock recovery strategies. Only a broad and flexible approach will ensure that we do what's best for Alberta's fish populations, the fishing industry, tourists, and aquatic ecosystems as a whole. We have a serious problem on our hands, Mr. Speaker, and it requires serious action on our part. Bill 206 provides adequate legislation to allow those involved to be better equipped to deal with the issue as necessary.

Mr. Speaker, as I voice my strong support for Bill 206, I wish to encourage all my colleagues as well as those on the opposite side of the House to support it as well. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Norwood.

MR. MASYK: Thank you very much. We hear a lot of reports of people who are not so good at fishing and who do not have the ability to catch fish. Mr. Speaker, I'm a great fisherman, and I have trouble catching fish. So when a fisherman goes out for recreation and the cormorants are lapping up all the fish, the recreation fisherman isn't going to be too pleased. As a matter of fact, he'll be somewhat horsefaced to spend an afternoon and not catch anything.

Mr. Speaker, I first of all want to thank you for allowing me to enter into the debate of 206. I'm pleased to support this bill and hope it'll convince other members of this Assembly to do so as well. If passed, Bill 206 will give farmers the right to protect their fish stocks from predatory animals that overpopulate the ecosystem, devour fish stocks, and destroy the ecosystem by their presence.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to this bill from the perspective of Albertans who own and operate businesses that are dependent upon clean, natural, and balanced ecosystems. Bill 206 will allow government to keep Alberta's environment balanced, and it will be a positive for business owners, the government, and environmentalists alike. To work together like that, in parallel, is a new philosophy. However, it will work. This bill affects directly and indirectly Albertans and Alberta businesses that are heavily dependent on Alberta lakes and their environment. I can sympathize with those that it would affect: businesses in Alberta's environmental and recreational sectors that rely on several factors to succeed. Some of these factors they can't control. Rain or weather conditions are beyond their control and, for example, forest fires. But many of the factors which affect the profits of nature-based and recreational businesses can be controlled, and the activity and overpopulation of pests are two of these factors. This is especially true for those who own businesses that depend upon keeping fisheries and aquatic ecosystems in good condition. An infestation of pests damaging to the environment not only means less business but, more importantly, less Albertans to enjoy the great outdoors.

Mr. Speaker, I don't understand why anybody would want to not have a sustainable fish stock in Alberta. Cormorants are really not from northern Alberta, and if they were, then I would suspect that they would have many rats and large snakes to control them. So saying that, I would think that it would be our responsibility to replace such predators by controlling them and allowing people who have a direct investment to control them. We have to remember that a large infestation of pests like the cormorants is not at all natural, but their very occurrence is slowly becoming more and more serious and more troublesome for those who love the outdoors.

Mr. Speaker, government, business, environmentalists, and sportfishing enthusiasts have worked together on many occasions to ensure that the stress put on Alberta's fishery is manageable and is best for all parties involved. Like the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster put forward, it allows the minister to govern and to have tools available to him to engage in such activities. But when you have these pests interrupting the process in an unnatural fashion, like cormorants do, this causes a problem. Why spend time and money to restock and properly manage our fishery if cormorants are going to eat up all our fish? Our efforts would be to win, and it would be all in vain if we don't.

This is why this bill is necessary. As lakes in the province have been restocked over time, we've basically handed over a massive source of food to the predator. This leads to more predatory birds migrating here. These birds procreate and multiply at amazing rates. They attack our lakes and deplete our fish stocks, Mr. Speaker. It is therefore clear that Bill 206 is necessary to help our environment and help business related to the environment. This bill gives the Department of Sustainable Resource Development the power to identify the species of the pest, nongame birds, in accordance with the Wildlife Act, the Migratory Birds Convention Act, the Water Act, and the Fisheries Act.

The bill also gives Sustainable Resource Development the power to take steps to ensure the viability of fish stocks and their protection from pests and to protect the biodiversity of Alberta's environment. Some of these steps include removal of beaver dams and issuing department orders. I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that I support the fact that Bill 206 makes the Minister of Sustainable Resource Development the one person responsible for issuing the orders. This ensures that the department order that is delivered is not in haste and has gone through every possible channel.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, when the depredation order is delivered, the fish farmer can take steps within the confines of the order to rid himself of the pest problem. I'd like to take up this particular aspect of the bill. We don't need to run up the budget for Sustainable Resource Development by having officials running down cormorants and protecting fish stocks when farmers and local people know exactly how to get the job done and do so willingly.

Mr. Speaker, when farmers and individuals take charge, they know how to do things efficiently, because I'm a farmer and I know how to get the job done. Therefore, an Alberta farmer will rise to the occasion. We just need to give fish farmers the ability to take care of the problem, and I guarantee you that they'll be glad to do it.

In closing, I'd like to reiterate the support for this bill. Our businesses that depend upon a clean environment and sustainable wetlands would certainly be in favour of it. This especially applies to fish farmers. We've already heard the sponsor of the bill talk about his own experience: skies filled with birds, beaches filled with bird feces. At some point we have to say that enough is enough. Let the farmers take care of their problem. Bill 206 gives us the ability. I gladly support it and ask that other members of the Assembly do so as well. Thank you so very much, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose.

MR. JOHNSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today in support of Bill 206, the Fisheries (Alberta) Amendment Act, 2002. The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul has brought forth this bill to bring an issue to the attention of this Assembly that many people in Alberta and in particular his constituency have been dealing with for a long time. As many of my colleagues have already stated, the wild and stocked fish populations of Alberta are being severely threatened by a voracious predator. The cormorant is a large bird and not the cleanest bird to have as a neighbour.

Environmental conservationists in the Great Lakes region have been monitoring the effects of cormorant populations on the fish population for over 15 years. Their research has proven that cormorants hunt in large groups and prefer to catch fish more in shallow waters than offshore. I am hoping that by this statement, Mr. Speaker, I can help illustrate how Alberta, with our shallow lakes, is an ideal hunting ground or habitat for these birds, putting our fish population in jeopardy. The crested cormorant has become a hazard and a pest to the balance of our aquatic ecosystem.

We have been restocking our lakes for decades, which unfortunately has a spin-off effect of simply feeding these predatory pests. I know many of my colleagues have seen the effects that these birds have on a well-stocked lake or water body. They nest and hunt in large packs. In fact, environmental conservationists destroyed over 5,500 nests on one island alone in the Great Lakes region as these birds were destroying the fish population and vegetation around the island with their droppings and sheer numbers. Double-crested cormorants are a pest in Alberta because we have no natural predators for these birds, those being rats and large snakes, as has already been mentioned. Mr. Speaker, what we are dealing with is a predator who has the ability and the free rein to multiply its population, and we keep providing it with the most opportune habitat by restocking its feed lakes.

Mr. Speaker, we have the ability as a province to act in our best interests and decide that the double-crested cormorant, because of its destructive feeding and nesting habits as well as its lack of natural predators, has proven that it is a pest in Alberta and a hazard to our natural aquatic ecosystem. Its population must be controlled. In conclusion, I will be supporting Bill 206 because I believe that it will give us the opportune legislation and the appropriate legislation to protect our ecosystem and control the damage it causes. I encourage all of my colleagues to do the same.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul to close debate, there being no other speakers offering themselves.

MR. DANYLUK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to rise today and conclude the second reading debate on Bill 206, the Fisheries (Alberta) Amendment Act, 2002.

I would like to begin by thanking the members of the Assembly for their thoughtful comments regarding this proposed legislation. I would also like to say that this is a challenge for all Albertans and in fact all of North America. What happened is that we have seen some of the illustrations in the comments that were made by different individuals from throughout different parts of the province with their concerns, but also what happened is that we did get letters from different groups and different associations expressing their concerns, and maybe I'd like to address some of them.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I'd just like to talk about the bird society. Especially in my local area, when I talk about the bird society, what happens is that they want to protect the endangered species and the endangered birds, and the cormorants are really posing a problem in that direction. We all agree that Bill 206 is about protecting and enhancing Alberta's fish stocks and fishing industry. It has been commented by a member from across the way that this proposed legislation is just one piece in an overall puzzle of habitat and species management and not a comprehensive plan that takes into account all the pressures and needs faced by Alberta fisheries. I agree with this point. However, the members of this Assembly are familiar with the nature of the private member's bill, and we are aware that these bills cannot ask for resources. They are intended to address and raise awareness of problems and issues we face in our constituencies and not a cure-all for industry.

Mr. Speaker, before I close debate, I'd like to address some of the concerns that were raised during the course of debate. It was mentioned by a member that qualified biologists should be the ones who take the control orders under the proposed legislation. It is the minister who makes the call, but of course he would do it with the advice of many qualified biologists.

It was also mentioned that there is no requirement for record-keeping on the number of birds or eggs destroyed or the method of destruction. My experience with scientists has showed me that they love to keep records, and this is not going to be a problem.

The same member stated that private fish stocks, unlike wild stocks, should be dealt with by the agricultural legislation. Again, I wholeheartedly agree that it should be under the minister of agriculture when it comes to aquaculture.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to refer a little bit to a couple of comments that were made by the members on the other side. When we say that we must manage and that there must be a balance, I very much agree that there has to be a balance. This is not an exercise in annihilation. This very much is an exercise in balance, and it will be done in that manner. I would also say, when we talk about the balance of the ecosystem, that we have already fooled with the balance of the ecosystem. As stated by some of the members, when we talk about the annihilation of the rats in Alberta, that has changed some of the balance there. We have allowed fishing. We have allowed fishing by commercial fishermen and by anglers. We have controlled that. We have there, as well, done some to change the balance of the ecosystem. There has been hunting and trapping of fur-bearing animals, and when I talk about the beavers, that has again changed some of the ecosystem. We are in a situation where we can isolate. The one bird that we're talking about today is the double-crested cormorant, that basically has no predators, and in order to maintain some balance, we need to have some monitored control.

Mr. Speaker, I call the question on the second reading of Bill 206. Thank you very much.

[Motion carried; Bill 206 read a second time]

Bill 207

Alberta Wheat and Barley Test Market Act

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

MR. HLADY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move second reading of Bill 207, the Alberta Wheat and Barley Test Market Act.

Mr. Speaker, what I would like to do is start off by thanking my colleagues, because I think we have a very special mix of urban and rural in government caucus that allows us to truly appreciate many different issues. When something good happens for the cities, rural wins, and when something good happens for rural, cities win. We understand that connection inside our caucus, and it certainly makes a huge difference for us in making positive, good decisions for what's best for Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, many people have asked me: why Bill 207 from a Calgary MLA? It's really that with my background in the stock markets, as a financial adviser before, it was about understanding the fundamentals of the marketplace. That's really what we see and what this is truly all about. I saw the Canadian Wheat Board as possibly the most socialistic piece of legislation that sits in our federal government today. It is an unbelievable thing and has hurt our agricultural industry in an amazing way for the last 50-plus years. That's truly why I got involved with this as well as speaking with many of my colleagues from rural Alberta: to understand and see what this is all about. Even the Auditor General of Canada is not allowed to see the sales contracts in wanting to test and see if a monopoly system is better than an open market system. The Auditor General can get more information out of CSIS than it can get out of the Canadian Wheat Board. So it's really, really important to understand the goal of being in open competition to create a marketplace. This doesn't mean you have to get rid of the Canadian Wheat Board, but what you need to do is create a marketplace where there is competition to see and allow us to move forward.

I think it's important to understand a little bit of the history of the Wheat Board. Post World War I, Mr. Speaker, it was formed the first time. It was disbanded in 1920, two years after World War I, because the government of the day could not justify such a monopoly in peacetime. Then the farmers established their own marketing organizations through wheat pools in each province, and farmers responded on their own to make things work. In 1935 the board was reintroduced, but it was still a voluntary marketing agency. In 1943 the board was granted the monopoly powers because of World War II. It's a little after World War II today, in 2002. Alberta at this time, in 1943, had 35 percent of the value-added agricultural economy created from wheat and barley. Today, over 50 years later, it's down to about 5 percent of the value-added agricultural commodity due to wheat and barley. All of that has moved from western Canada to eastern Canada. It was really an economic move that the Canadian Wheat Board created over an extended period of time.

I'd like to work on the current situation today as we have a designated area, and not all of Canada is part of that. Western Canada is. It includes Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and northeastern B.C. The producers are not allowed to make marketing decisions affecting their own product, and I think that's very hard for people to understand unless you work inside the agricultural community. Deliveries can only be made, when the Canadian Wheat Board calls for wheat, through delivery of contracts unless delivery is made to the off-board market as a feed wheat. In terms of exports, producers can buy wheat back from the Canadian Wheat Board. You've got to buy your own grain back from the Wheat Board. You can't even make a decision on what you want. I don't understand that. It's just unbelievable in a Canadian marketplace.

Bill 207 would certainly allow for and accomplish some direct marketing, Mr. Speaker, and that's really what it's all about. For domestic consumption sales, farmers are forced today to let a third party make the decision on what grades to market, to whom to market, when to market, and what price to market. The farmer is then provided with a net price realized on the sales over the year for a particular grade of grain. With marketing and administration costs as well as operating costs deducted from the gross sales value, thus the farmer loses control of what can be sold, when it can be sold, and the price at which it can be sold. Unbelievable.

DR. TAYLOR: It is unbelievable.

MR. HLADY: It really is.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one of the positives, actually, of having the Canadian Wheat Board has been the shift away from products controlled by the Canadian Wheat Board, so that might be the one positive that we've seen in the whole marketplace. We've seen many other specialized products come up because of the fact that the Canadian Wheat Board is today controlling the grains that they do in the way that they do. Just to read, some of the other ones that we're seeing people come up with that have grown in quite impressive ways are things such as canola; we're seeing a good increase in mixed grains; dry peas; mustard; sunflowers; lentils. So the one minor positive, I guess I could say, of having control by the Wheat Board is that it has allowed for diversification. But the success is obviously not in the monopolistic areas, which are the areas that are controlled by the Canadian Wheat Board, being the different wheats and barleys.

Mr. Speaker, Ontario has the Ontario wheat board, which is separate from the Canadian Wheat Board and has allowed some interesting things to develop over time. That has allowed the farmers there a little bit of flexibility. It's not the ideal situation. Historically, I've introduced in the past an Alberta wheat and barley board which would have been very similar to that. It did not receive support at that time; hence the move toward this 10-year test market plan for which, I feel very comfortable, there is a lot of support here in the House.

We've seen some very interesting things with the Ontario wheat board. Let's see. In '96 and '97 the report found that the grand total of marketing costs in Ontario ranged from $17.40 to $31.30. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, the costs through the Canadian Wheat Board were $56.89. That's anywhere from two to three times the costs of the Ontario wheat board, which has a lot smaller market to work with, so the economies of scale don't even make sense.

It should be noted that part of this significantly lower marketing cost structure of Ontario compared to the Canadian Wheat Board is due to Ontario's location and size of crop relative to demand in eastern Canada. But the size of the total growth: as an example, western Canada produces 95 percent of Canada's wheat. That is only about 31 percent of the flour milling capacity today, Mr. Speaker. Eastern Canada does the vast majority of the value-added part of the wheat processing.

I think that understanding also some of the things that happen in the world today is very important. Right now Canada's share of the world flour production has decreased by 9 percent, Mr. Speaker, over the last 10 years. At the same time, our neighbours to the south, the U.S., their milled wheat has increased by approximately 30 percent. So there's been the demand, and it's a North American demand, but Canada is not meeting the world's demand. It's all coming through the United States. The Canadian Wheat Board is not helping us to achieve that kind of access to the markets in the world, which is one of the major reasons that the Canadian Wheat Board is supposedly in place to do. The United States processes more than twice as much malt barley as Canada, yet they only have about half the barley production relative to Canada. It makes no sense again. We are shipping it through the Canadian Wheat Board rather than creating the value-added.

Mr. Speaker, I know that there was a major malt barley plant just formed in Montana, just south of the Alberta border. I believe there was an investment of around $67 million U.S. Now, that could very easily have been built up here, but there was no current situation that would allow us a chance to have that value-added market move here with the current structure today.

Mr. Speaker, there have been some interesting changes relatively recently in Australia as well. Australia went through a barley board experience very recently, getting rid of the monopoly powers. Systematically we've been blocked by the Canadian Wheat Board, but in Australia, interestingly enough and with a Labour government yet, the Labour government has allowed the states to make their own decisions. Constitutionally our provinces have power over agricultural things inside the provinces. This is not being allowed because of the structure of the Canadian Wheat Board. The Australians have this thing called the National Competition Council, which allowed the Australians to go through this process and allowed the individual states to create individual marketing. It's great to see.

Mr. Speaker, I know that there are many other speakers that would like to talk to this. The main point I'd like to make is that this does not get rid of the Canadian Wheat Board. This allows us to create competition. The Canadian Wheat Board has had a 50-year head start. They should have had enough time to be competitive. I would also like to say that there was a wonderful news release by the Western Barley Growers that said that they believe that this will allow Alberta farmers to fully take advantage of the Alberta advantage.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and participate in this discussion. I have had a look at Bill 207 and have given it some thought, and I will be taking it out to various people I know in the agricultural community. It raises a lot of huge issues, actually, for Alberta wheat and barley growers and, indeed, for all Canadians because of the size and the importance of the Canadian Wheat Board nationally and internationally as a massive grade grain trader.

I appreciated the introductory comments from the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View, and I listened with some care to a number of the things he raised. For the moment I'm keeping an open mind on this particular bill. We'll see how the debate goes and where it heads and what issues come to the surface and what various stakeholders say.

I know that the intent of the bill is to create an open and competitive market and through the forces of the market bring down costs of production, to bring creative dynamics into the economics of wheat and barley production and trade and processing and consumption, but I am concerned that what sounds good in theory may not work out very well in practice.

One of the issues that farmers in Canada struggle with – and I'm sure the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View is well aware of this, as are many of the members of the Assembly – is their ability to have an honest and free and open market internationally when virtually every other competing country in the world has all kinds of mechanisms to subsidize their production or to otherwise protect their producers.

I am conscious, for example, that enormous amounts of corn are being trucked into southern Alberta, staggering amounts, thousands and thousands of tonnes a month, to feed the feed stocks that go through Feedlot Alley. What are they called now? They're not feedlots. They're confined feeding operations, something like that. In any case, enormous amounts of corn are being brought up by truck from the United States. If you dig a little bit into the economics of that corn, there's some really alarming information that comes to the surface. In fact, the corn is being sold at less than the cost of production, and that's made possible because of staggeringly large subsidies to American corn growers. Those subsidies are so vast that even after the loss on the exchange rate between the U.S. dollar and the Canadian dollar and the cost of trucking these thousands of tonnes of corn, these grain imports are able to beat out locally grown Alberta barley. That's a very serious concern, especially as we get more and more into feedlot operations in this province. It's no fault of the Alberta farmer or the Canadian farmer, who, if there were genuinely a free market, would well be able to stand his or her ground against any competition. So while I laud the notion of a free market in grains, I am concerned that it may not play out.

I go back to introductory economics in university. In fact, one of the classic case studies presented and taught to students of an ideal free market was actually the market for grain. If you have a perfect situation in grain – and you come pretty close to it there – theoretically you can have a genuine free market. You have a large, large number of producers. You have a commodity that's very consistent, so it's easy to substitute barley or wheat from farmer A with that from farmer B or farmer C. So it's easy for consumers to shop around and substitute one farmer's product for another's. In theory – and I stress here “in theory” – you have a huge number of consumers. After all, we all eat grain. We all eat wheat; we all eat barley or drink it or whatever. It's literally a textbook example of a free market. Again I raise a concern that what works in the textbook and on paper doesn't necessarily translate into practice.

In reality, we do have thousands and thousands of farmers producing wheat and grain in Alberta, and we do have a commodity that's easily traded, but the fact is that there are only a small, small number of major buyers of that product. There are I think only about four corporations that trade in any substantial volume at all in wheat and barley, and I am concerned that as a result of that, we lose the possibility of a free market. I stand to be corrected on that, but I don't believe so. That's not just a factor of there being a Wheat Board in Canada, because a similar sort of situation exists in the U.S., where the grain trading is completely dominated by a tiny, tiny number of massive grain-trading corporations.

So the idea of this bill to create a free market in grains is great. I actually think that free markets, when they are genuinely free, are commendable. My concern is that in this case we won't see a free market. We can actually see this same sort of thing in practice in health care or in electricity deregulation, where attempts at creating free markets simply don't work. What happens? Prices go up, and there are all kinds of problems with accessibility. So I'm concerned that we risk undermining one of the last pillars of the family farm through this bill.

I do appreciate, however, the fact that in this bill, as the sponsoring member has made quite clear, we're not replacing the Canadian Wheat Board. We are setting up a parallel market or a parallel system to the Canadian Wheat Board. That's an interesting twist. We have to think through that and speak to some people about whether that will actually work or not or whether at some point that might simply undermine the strength of the Wheat Board.

I have quite a number of farmers in my extended family, and we have had some discussions about the role of the Wheat Board. I know, as I'm sure the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View and many other members know, that the farm community is divided on this issue. Some of them think that the Wheat Board for all its problems is better than no Wheat Board. Others would rather just get rid of the whole thing and see how they can manage on an open market, going toe-to-toe with the grain traders or with whatever the market generates.

I am concerned that one of the effects of this bill is to create yet another source of instability for the family farm in Alberta. I think that this kind of legislation is more likely in the long run to support corporate farming and corporate grain traders and squeeze the family farm harder and harder. [interjections] I appreciate some of the supportive comments from my colleagues.

But there is a real concern that the family farm in the long run may be threatened, may be further undermined by that, and ironically we may end up in a situation in the future where we as a Legislature will be debating farm subsidies that will be required as a result of this bill.

So with those comments, I will take my seat. Thank you.

4:30

MR. McFARLAND: Mr. Speaker, I'm very pleased today to join in the debate on Bill 207, the Alberta Wheat and Barley Test Market Act, sponsored by my colleague from Calgary-Mountain View. I do want to congratulate him as an urban cousin for bringing this bill forward, because it truly does demonstrate that there is a lot of understanding as this industry has grown. I believe that this bill is very important and that it addresses a very important issue that this Assembly is now going to debate. Once again, I'm pleased that Calgary-Mountain View has brought this to the forefront.

[Mr. Klapstein in the chair]

For a long, long time wheat and barley farmers around Alberta have waited to see changes made in how their products are marketed. I believe that this act would in effect bring the efforts of farmers and government together to address a 70-year-old problem. Bill 207 brings the wheat and barley producers in this province the opportunity to have personal choice. It's my belief that farmers should have that right to choose what they can bring to the market and to choose how they can have an opportunity to set a different price for a commodity that they and they alone are solely responsible for growing. Currently, these choices aren't available under this system, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board system, where options are rather limited and I believe restrictive.

As the Member for Calgary-Mountain View indicated, the Canadian Wheat Board was established almost 70 years ago. At the time, long before probably all of us were even alive – well, most of us anyway, Mr. Speaker – it was designed to ensure and monitor a supply of wheat and barley throughout Canada for foodstuffs. But today, Mr. Speaker, especially in Alberta, food shortages and tough times basically are no longer a reality.

What is a reality is that farmers are, as the Member for Edmonton-Riverview indicated, facing hard choices. But contrary to what the member might have spoken about in terms of stability on a farm, I believe that the majority of the constituents that I represent and in fact the majority of Alberta wheat and barley producers do support some change in order that they may become viable and may remain stable in today's economy.

If this bill were passed, obviously the results of this would be closely monitored and certain stipulations maintained for a period of 10 years. I believe that's one of the good attributes of this bill, as it allows a pilot of sorts to see if in fact this can work hand in hand with the Wheat Board, where you'd have the option of producers choosing to market and take some responsibility and marketing decisions on their own, and those who would rather maintain the status quo could stay under the guise of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board has accomplished a good deal for farmers. Bill 207 does not remove the Wheat Board, and I don't believe that's the intent. But many farmers in the past decade that I'm aware of have again argued and put forward that they do need the opportunity to have a dual choice or a marketing choice, and I believe that this bill would provide that. This bill allows the farmers the choice to compete in a free market, to sell their grain through the Canadian Wheat Board if they so choose, or to take that responsibility in finding markets of their own either internally or within the western Canadian growing provinces.

I think that many of our growers feel powerless and frustrated when they deal with the Canadian Wheat Board and the quota system, and I have to remind those who aren't acutely familiar with the farming situation that not all grains are under the Canadian Wheat Board. In fact, Edmonton-Riverview mentioned the Feedlot Alley, which happens to be in the heart of our constituency. For clarification to that member and those of you who may not be aware, the malt barley – unless it is of such a poor quality that you put it in the ground and never are guaranteed the opportunity or the assurance that it would make a malt grade – is fed to the cows in Feedlot Alley. These are feed barleys, and those feed barleys are not under the control of the Canadian Wheat Board. They used to be, but thank goodness for some of us, some of the grains that had been under the Wheat Board before are no longer under the Wheat Board. So I do think, Edmonton-Riverview, just for clarification, please bear in mind that the malt barley that you're drinking in the form of beer is a different type of barley that's produced here in Alberta. Most producers of malt barley will go after that market as opposed to one that goes into a cow's stomach in Feedlot Alley to produce some of Alberta's best beef.

The other comment I would like to make in terms of progress that the Wheat Board has made, Mr. Speaker, is one of pricing. Now, I've been a critic of the Canadian Wheat Board ever since I started farming some 30 years ago. One of the reasons was that the Canadian Wheat Board made payments at various times throughout the year or at the end of a crop year, usually some 18 months after the beginning of a current crop year at the beginning of my farming career. As a beginning farmer, many of whom may be here today, probably could recollect, it was very frustrating to know that your own money was being held up by the Canadian Wheat Board to wait for an accounting practice that pooled all the various grades and then finally disbursed your own money back some 18 months after the fact without any benefit in terms of interest. In the meantime, you probably swallowed quite a few of the costs of demurrage. Sadly enough, when these payments were made, the headlines would read, "Record Payment to Alberta Farmers," and everyone thought: aha; the Canadian Wheat Board or the federal government or somebody magically came up with some new money for the whiny farmer. Well, in fact, I would like all the listeners and the readers of Hansard to remember that this was the producers' own money that had been banked in the pooling accounts of the Canadian Wheat Board for up to and including 18 months.

Now, the point I'm trying to drive home here is that the Wheat Board has made some pretty good changes in the last couple of years, Mr. Speaker. One is being more in tune with the current market conditions. They are putting out interim adjustments on a more frequent basis. That's a positive, but again that's the farmer's own money for the product that they are selling internationally on behalf of western Canadian farmers. The other thing that they have done and I have to give them credit for is going to electronic deposits and assisting farmers in that regard. Nonetheless, at the end of the day, Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Board has been quite reluctant to open up its arms to allow farmers to contract with flour mills, to contract with other value-added producers within the province, which in turn would encourage more value-added production here in Alberta.

So if there's a bottom line to this whole conversation from my point of view, Mr. Speaker, it's approval of this bill, setting up an opportunity for farmers dealing with the hard spring wheats, the durums, and the malt barleys to make a choice whether they want to market their grain through the Canadian Wheat Board internationally or to deal with a company who wants to add value to that product and produce flour, produce pastas, produce maybe locally manufactured beer. It could be done on a contract basis and would eliminate probably the sorest point to a good many farmers, and that's the one of the costs of freight, handling, elevation, storage, and so on.

As an example, Mr. Speaker, I will quote my own durum production, which represents a lot of similar farms in southern Alberta. Last year when No. 1 durum was taken from the combine and hauled to an elevator, 29.4 percent of the gross value of that product was automatically eliminated at the top of the cheque for freight to Vancouver, for handling, for elevation. The sad part was that in the case of durum some of it was put on a truck and simply sent down to Ellison mills, for instance, in Lethbridge.

Mr. Speaker, I know that many of us can go on, especially those of us on the farm, but I would encourage everyone to support this worthy bill.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Highwood.

MR. TANNAS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and speak in favour of Bill 207, the Alberta Wheat and Barley Test Market Act, sponsored by the Member for Calgary-Mountain View. I want to congratulate him on his bill, and I have received many letters of support for him.

Mr. Speaker, during my tenure as MLA I've received a number of letters and telephone calls on the issues from farmers in the constituency of Highwood. The letters and calls from farmers follow a similar theme, and that is that many farmers are not happy with the Canadian Wheat Board as a single-desk seller. These constituents have asked me as their representative to lobby the government to find some solution to the problems and constraints posed by the Canadian Wheat Board. I believe that Bill 207 is a potential solution to the problems that farmers face with the Canadian Wheat Board.

The problem with the Canadian Wheat Board is not a single one; there are many of them. The main problem, as I understand it, is that the Alberta farmers make decisions on everything: what barley and wheat varieties, what other grains, oilseeds, what they want to plant, the types and rates of fertilizer applications, when to plant, when and how to harvest a producing crop. Our farmers make all of these decisions, yet when it comes time to make the most important decision of all, marketing their wheat or barley, they are in effect told that they're not qualified to do so, and they're forced by the dominion government to let a third party sell their wheat for them. This third party is, as we know, the Canadian Wheat Board.

Now, the board has long outgrown its usefulness in western Canada and in Alberta in particular. This is not a matter of getting rid of the Canadian Wheat Board. It is a matter of allowing a choice for our farmers to sell their product to the Canadian Wheat Board or a private dealer or a private and direct sale. The Canadian Wheat Board has grown into a very large and lethargic bureaucratic nightmare. Farmers are having problems justifying to themselves why they must continue to use the single-desk selling entity. Farmers are concerned because over the last 25 years they have made sacrifices to improve the efficiency of their farms in order to continue farming. At the same time, they've seen the Canadian Wheat Board grow ever larger and make the same mistakes over and over again at the cost of the farmers, without the farmers' say.

Farmers are fed up with the hoops they have to jump through to sell their wheat and barley in a monopoly situation which is forced on all prairie farmers in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and in northeastern B.C. They ask: why are the farmers in Ontario not forced to sell their wheat and barley through the Canadian Wheat Board? Why are the farmers in Quebec not forced to sell their wheat and barley through the Canadian Wheat Board? Why are the farmers in New Brunswick not forced to sell their wheat and barley through the Canadian Wheat Board? Why are the farmers in Nova Scotia not forced to sell their wheat and barley through the Canadian Wheat Board? And why are the farmers of Prince Edward Island not forced? Well, as our hon. Member for Little Bow and the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View have explained, it's because they are forced by an outdated law that arose out of the Second World War to deal with the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that farmers are intelligent and experienced businesspeople. They know what it takes to keep their farm, which is their business, afloat. They just want the freedom to be able to choose to whom they can sell their wheat or barley. They want to be able to run their own business without the interference from hindrances of the Canadian Wheat Board. I believe that the Canadian Wheat Board does not always help the agricultural industry. In fact, many people believe that it's hurting the industry and costing farmers a whole lot of money. The Canadian Wheat Board doesn't seem to be able to deal with small market opportunities and in fact stands in the way of farmers seeking niche markets for their wheat or their barley. Bill 207 is exactly what farmers need. Bill 207 hears the concerns of farmers, takes them to heart, and offers them as a solution to the monopoly that is the Canadian Wheat Board. It offers an alternative to the Wheat Board, something that is desperately needed.

Bill 207 sets up a 10-year test market to allow farmers to sell their grain and barley to whomever they choose. It gives farmers the choice to sell their grain to either a private processor, the Canadian Wheat Board, or both. The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View has cited a number of lost value-added opportunities that are caused by the restrictions of the Canadian Wheat Board. Mr. Speaker, I too feel that the Canadian Wheat Board is a serious hindrance to our value-added industry. Let me give you an example. Let us imagine that a pasta company comes to a farmer here in Alberta and says: okay; we see that your soil and the rainfall and the hours of sunshine and the temperatures here are perfect for the wheat that we want to make our pasta from; I want to buy your wheat so I can make pasta. The farmer given this opportunity would have to refuse it, because of course they live in the western part of Canada and the Wheat Board says: no, you can't do that. So the pasta people go to the Wheat Board and ask for that particular farmer's wheat. Again, because all of the wheat is pooled, they can't avail themselves of that opportunity. So the pasta company then withdraws the offer and locates elsewhere. They can find a farmer in Nova Scotia or some of the other provinces I just listed and establish their business there.

This type of scenario can and does happen. The policy of the Wheat Board is in my view a very discriminatory policy to farmers in the west and not to central Canada and eastern Canada. It's the western farmers whose freedoms are trampled, and they're not allowed to do what's best for their business. The value-added industry has a lot of potential for Alberta farmers. I believe that the scenario that I portrayed could be avoided if Bill 207 were passed.

Mr. Speaker, a few months ago I received a letter from a constituent, a farmer who felt that she needed to express what was wrong with the Canadian Wheat Board. A fault that she sees is that the board is not accountable. They do not conduct their operations in a businesslike nor a professional way nor in a way that is in the best interests of Alberta's farmers because they get paid any way that they do business. Farmers no longer want to deal with the problems that are associated with the Canadian Wheat Board. As my constituent stated in her letter: farmers are as mad as H, and they're not going to take this kind of treatment anymore. They are looking for solutions so they can advance to greater heights in the agricultural industry. If the farmers of Nova Scotia have an option, why can't the farmers of Alberta?

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I urge all MLAs to vote in favour of Bill 207. It's in the best interest of farmers throughout Alberta and the west. Give them a fair option. Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and speak to Bill 207, Alberta Wheat and Barley Test Market Act, which seems to be a simplified version of a bill that was debated in this House in '99. It was at that time numbered Bill 209, and it was defeated after a very interesting debate in this House. With due respect to the chair, the chair in fact as a Member for Leduc spoke rather passionately and clearly against Bill 209, which was called the Alberta Wheat and Barley Board Act at the time.

What's different in Bill 207 now from Bill 209 that was defeated by this House just a few years ago? That's the question that I'm asking. I think what I find here is that there is some detail in Bill 207 which at that time worried the speaker; that's the hon. Member for Leduc. At the time it had to do with the powers of the board, the bureaucracy that will have to be set up to have an alternative marketing agency Alberta style. You spoke very strongly at the time against that bill. You drew attention to the fact that it will not only increase costs by duplication of the bureaucracy, but it will also restrict the choices and will contravene two federal acts, the Wheat Board Act and the Canada Grains Act, Mr. Speaker. Those two acts, I would like to suggest, still remain in place, and federal acts have paramountcy over provincial acts.

To quote you, if I may, from '99, Mr. Speaker, you said that this act "creates another agency with exclusive rights to the buying and selling of wheat and barley." Of course, the issue of exclusiveness is now sort of buried under the notion of test market in this act. You go on to say, then, that it will require Alberta farmers to register to produce as well as to market their wheat and barley. It could determine the price to be paid to producers and require the price payable to be paid to or through the board. It duplicates the Canadian Wheat Board on a provincial basis. It could restrict marketing within the province. It could significantly reduce freedom of choice in marketing and enhance the single-desk marketing of wheat and barley.

Alberta farmers and industry would still be held accountable under the Canadian Wheat Board Act and the Canada Grains Act. Apparently, under constitutional law any provincial laws which are operationally inconsistent with federal laws are inoperative to the extent of the inconsistency.

You argued then, Mr. Speaker:

Therefore, any provision in the bill which required a producer or any other person to do something which was contrary to the Canadian Wheat Board Act or the Canada Grains Act would be inoperative to the extent that it created the inconsistency.

So, Mr. Speaker, you in a very clear way raised some of the objections that I think apply to this bill. What this bill doesn't do is that it doesn't provide us any information about a board or an agency or an organizational mechanism that will have to be set up in order to create the so-called test market and the provisions for it. So something that was rather explicitly mentioned in Bill 209 is pushed under the table if not underground in this act. If this act does pass, regulations will have to be set up. Arrangements will have to be spelled out through regulations as to the bureaucratic machinery that'll be needed in order to implement this act. I think members of this House and certainly this member will not be able to support this act unless I know what were the costs of it, what is the bureaucratic structure that will have to be set up to implement this act. So the questions that you raised and raised very well three years ago remain questions pertinent to the debate today.

There was something said by the hon. Member for Highwood with respect to how western Canadians feel discriminated against and are not allowed to do what Ontario farmers and Quebec farmers have been able to do. I've heard in this Assembly lots of arguments about the uniqueness of Alberta, about the uniqueness of the prairie region and how those unique elements and features of Alberta and of the prairie region require unique actions. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian Wheat Board was one such unique response to the unique production and marketing conditions in the experience of family farmers in this region of the country. The one-size-fits-all approach doesn't work, and that's why the Canadian Wheat Board has stood the test of time. It continued to enjoy majority support in the referendum that was done just a few years ago, and you mentioned that, I think, in your speech three years ago, Mr. Speaker.

I ask what has changed between '99 and now. The only thing that seems to have changed is that Bill 209 has been stripped to bare bones and the board has been eliminated in terms of any reference to it in this and has been replaced by this notion of a test market. Nothing else has changed, and no argument has been made that things have changed. It's just that this act, if passed by this House, will allow this government of Alberta to enter into some sort of negotiations with the federal government. For the federal government to engage in negotiations on a bill that will in fact contravene existing federal legislation will mean that the federal government will be violating its own act. So I can't see how the passage of this bill in this Legislature will encourage the federal government to sit down around the table and say: yeah, we are willing to deal with you and not make any changes in the existing federal legislation first.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

If the intention is to engage the government in sort of a discussion so that necessary changes can be made in the Canadian Wheat Board Act and the Canada Grains Act, then I think those negotiations should precede voting on this bill, not follow it. I just want to remind members, Mr. Speaker, that this bill, if passed, will certainly lead to undermining and weakening the Canadian Wheat Board, and the Canadian Wheat Board is seen by family farmers – not corporate farming, but certainly by family farmers – as a very important institution that has proved its utility to them. They've been able to rely on it, they've been able to defend themselves against private, corporate, predatory multinationals around.

DR. TAYLOR: Why don't you talk to the farmers about it?

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Hon. minister, if you wish to be on the list, we'd be happy to put you on the list, but right now it is Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the minister for co-operating on this matter.

So, Mr. Speaker, this bill by weakening . . .

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Sorry, hon. member; your time has now passed. Even the interruption does not take away from your time. The clock stops when there's either a point of order or the Speaker has an intervention, so you didn't lose any time.

The hon. Member for Airdrie-Rocky View.

MS HALEY: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm really pleased today to be able to have the opportunity to rise and speak on Bill 207, the Alberta Wheat and Barley Test Market Act. I would like to begin this afternoon by thanking the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View for bringing forward this bill and for his continued efforts to see change brought to the Alberta wheat and barley industry. Well done.

The Canadian Wheat Board, Mr. Speaker, has been a topic of heated debate for western Canadian wheat and barley producers for many decades now. It is an issue that I have had some personal experience dealing with, along with many other members of this Assembly. It is a topic that we should all be concerned with, and I'm very happy to add my thoughts to this debate.

I see Bill 207's intent as a fundamental right of every wheat and barley producer in this province, the right to determine the future course of their product. It is a right that underpins our most basic understanding of capitalism and commerce, and it is time for it to be given back to some of the most capitalistic as opposed to socialistic free enterprise people that I know, and that is the farmers of this province. In this case it is a right that involves allowing farmers the ability and the opportunity to sell their wheat and barley not only – not only – to the Canadian Wheat Board but to whatever marketing agent they choose, as opposed to the comments made by the leader of the third party indicating that somehow it would be a single-desk Alberta market. That is not the goal. This is about dual marketing, the ability to have a choice. If you want to deal with the Wheat Board, good for you. If you don't, then you should have a choice.

Today farmers do not have that choice, and if they wish to grow wheat or barley for human consumption, they must sell it to the Wheat Board. No questions asked. Even if they want to process the grain themselves, they are legally obligated to first sell the product to the Wheat Board and buy it back. Talk about efficiency. If farmers try to sell their product to any other destination than the board, they face serious and damaging consequences. All hon. members here today probably recall the story of Andy McMechan, who was one of several farmers who attempted to sell their grain in the border states of the United States in 1998. He spent 155 days in jail after refusing to pay the fine because he tried to sell his own grain.

The insistence by some to prevent choice for wheat and barley farmers is bizarre. There's no other private industry in Canada that matches their level of regulation and control, but there are other important reasons we should change the Wheat Board besides the principle demanded for choice. Let us for example look at the current changes that are occurring within the grain marketing industry. One of the most interesting trends in agriculture over the past decade has been the growth in the production and sale of specialty crops, and my hon. colleague alluded to it earlier. The Wheat Board has refused to address the underlying concerns of producers on wheat and barley, and in the same manner that capitalism responds to inefficiency so, too, have farmers moved away from an ineffectual and an overregulating board.

Over the past decade permit holders of the board have steadily declined. Growth in board wheats and barley has been stagnant, where speciality crops such as potatoes, peas, oats, and canola have undergone dynamic growth. In fact, Mr. Speaker, Alberta Agriculture predicts farm gate sales for such diversified crops to reach over $670 million . . .

AN HON. MEMBER: How much?

MS HALEY: Over $674 million by 2004. It's an incredible achievement and one that we should all be very proud of, but the growth need not be limited to nonboard crops alone. Producers need to be able to seize technological innovation and lucrative and fast-moving opportunities that exist for organic grains and specialty wheats. More than ever, direct dealing is necessitated between the grower and the end user. The Canadian Wheat Board simply does not facilitate this growing demand for specialization.

The Alberta producer is not afraid of challenge or risk and, in the words of Prime Minister Winston Churchill, "Give us the tools, and we will finish the job." That attitude, Mr. Speaker, will allow this province to capture the enormous impact that grain selling and purchasing can have on the growth of the value-added processing industry. Quite simply, investors are reluctant to put money into processing knowing that they cannot enter into normal business relations with local farmers.

One has to wonder, Mr. Speaker, why it is that western Canada produces 95 percent of Canada's wheat but has only 31 percent of the flour-milling capacity. You have to wonder why it is that in terms of manufacturing value added in the bread and other bakery products industry, Canada has experienced an increase of only 3 percent between 1990 and 1998, whereas the United States experienced a growth rate of 6.7 percent annually. You have to wonder why the U.S. processed more than twice as much malt barley as Canada, yet they have only about half the barley production relative to Canada. On the other hand, it is interesting to note that domestic processing of oats has increased twelvefold since it was removed from the Canadian Wheat Board in 1989, and during this same period domestic crush of canola has increased 125 percent.

Mr. Speaker, I want to add just an anecdotal story on oats. I was involved in a grain company that started in Alberta somewhere back in the early '80s, you know. We went out and we found all the right-wing, free enterprise, willing to take a risk farmers in this province – and the minister was one of them – and we proceeded to sell their wheat and barley. Well, we wanted to sell oats, and you couldn't sell oats. The Wheat Board wouldn't allow you to do that because it was under their control. The reason they gave for this was – they had not gone out and developed a market, and oats had become just a problem for them. It just wasn't something they were prepared to deal with. We had a market in Venezuela. They weren't mechanized in Venezuela, and they needed our oats for their horses. Our oats are recognized around the world as being some of the highest quality oats anywhere in the world. We needed to be able to sell it in 50-pound bags, and the Canadian Wheat Board would not allow us to tap into that market and sell Alberta oats over there, because there was no flexibility and no desire to deal with a small, innovative company such as Palliser Grain. If it wasn't from the Alberta Wheat Pool or UGG, it wasn't going to happen in this province when it came to dealing with the Wheat Board. You know, it's funny how in a capitalist free market system it can produce results.

Mr. Speaker, some farmers will continue to use the Wheat Board as a low-risk alternative for some of their production, but we must work towards allowing alternative marketers. The Canadian Wheat Board should relinquish its singular grip over the wheat and barley trade. If it actually applied the same principles to Ontario and Quebec and the rest of eastern Canada, it would have been gone 30 or 40 years ago, but because it's just western Canada and we're just sort of the hind end of the cow, it doesn't matter out here. What we want simply doesn't count. You ask for a dual marketing system and the answer is going to be no forever. You've got to take a dramatic stand. I think it would be fascinating for this Assembly to know how much it really cost us over the years on all of the wheat and barley sales that the Canadian Wheat Board made and never had to report openly and honestly to any government anywhere in this country.

On QR77 one day Peter Warren was on talking about his information showing that Russia, from years gone by, owed us over $6.5 billion that has never been paid for wheat that had been sent to them. Now, I don't have the stats on that – somebody faxed him a copy of it – but it's fascinating. I believe that that was probably almost an annual event, because they never had to open their books, they never had to be accountable to anybody out here, and they got to set the prices and decide when anything was going and which direction it was going. It blows my mind. Even with the elections that they've got in place now, Mr. Speaker, I still don't think it's worthy. I don't think it should be the only alternative that Alberta farmers have.

I want to thank you very much for the time that you've given me, Mr. Speaker.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to join in the debate this afternoon on Bill 207, the Alberta Wheat and Barley Test Market Act. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate so far, and it certainly is a contentious issue.

Now, we had a bit of a history lesson earlier this afternoon from the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View. Before we set up this concept of dual marketing or allowing more choice – and certainly on a lot of issues in this Assembly we hear the argument of: what is the matter with choice? – one has to wonder exactly what is wrong with choice. If you look at the past, Mr. Speaker – and we sort of had a walk down memory lane earlier – one has to look at perhaps, before we talk about eroding the powers of the Wheat Board, some of the successes that have come as a result of what the hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona would refer to as collective action.

Going back, one has to recognize the importance in the prairie provinces, not only in Alberta but Manitoba and Saskatchewan, of production of all grains and certainly here in this province the production of grains and how it affects the production of cattle. We certainly have a very, very large value-added industry in this province with cattle production. In fact, in the year 2000 the production of cattle and meat products was in excess of $3 billion. We were second to the province of Saskatchewan in the production of wheat, at over $700 million, and you can go on, regardless of whether it's barley, canola, as was mentioned, soybeans, or even sugar beets.

When you look at how these farm products are marketed, we have to look at some of the successes that have occurred in the past. It was a Prime Minister of Canada who was from Calgary – he certainly sat in the House of Commons as a member from Calgary – R.B. Bennett, who organized and encouraged the responsibility of the orderly sale of wheat to one John McFarland. Now, this decision was of course compelled by the economic events in the fall of 1929. In August of 1929, Mr. Speaker, the Winnipeg price for top-grade wheat was still averaging $1.73 a bushel. In the fall of course we saw the collapse of the New York stock markets and price declines, massive enough to spread shock waves throughout every market in the world, including those of grain.

In February of 1930 the Winnipeg price for wheat had fallen to $1.15 a bushel. Six months before, 48 million bushels were pledged to banks at a value of approximately $1.70 per bushel, and each bushel was now worth 60 cents less on the market. The banks began to worry about their loans and so did the prairie provincial governments under their guarantees. As the year advanced and the gloom deepened and the nervousness of the bankers and the provincial governments increased, Mr. Bennett came up with a solution, and that solution was summed up in the name John McFarland.

Now, I have no idea if this gentleman is a long-distant relative of the hon. Member for Little Bow, but it remains to be seen that this Mr. McFarland was an astute trader of grain. Within the limits of his powers Mr. McFarland became a very successful manager of Canadian wheat sales, and Mr. McFarland's decision on when to sell and when to withhold supplies from the market helped to raise the price of wheat to 83 cents a bushel by the summer of 1933. Now, again it fell to 60 cents a bushel by the end of the year, but the following two years the price was relatively stable at 80 cents to 85 cents a bushel.

At one time Mr. McFarland held 213 million bushels in storage and was in debt to the banks for over $90 million, but by the end of 1935 the situation was easing and McFarland was finally able to dispose of the whole Canadian surplus, repay the banks all principal and interest, and hold $9 million in cash, to his credit. As he himself said, Mr. Speaker: the final success was more the result of crop failures than of general world economic recovery. There were of course three bad years of drought in North America, two in Australia, and, finally, one in Argentina in 1935.

However, people worked together and they pooled their resources and as a result managed their way out of a very difficult time. That is a lesson, Mr. Speaker, that I think is worth while noting for all hon. members of this Assembly, because there certainly is a place for organizations such as the Wheat Board.

Now, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview spoke earlier about who exactly would benefit from this Bill 207, and we have to ask ourselves the question: will rural Alberta be better off? I guess it depends on who you would speak to. But as this debate continues on Bill 207, again the word "choice" slips into the debate. It's supposedly an ideal compromise, Mr. Speaker, but I doubt that this bill would make a good law. Now, maybe I'm wrong. Maybe this idea of choice is going to be better for family farms in Alberta.

We can continue in this province to increase subsidies to the province's biggest corporate farms – and I'm sad to say that this seems to be the consensus of this Assembly – or we can make a significant investment in creating real opportunity in rural Alberta. I don't think we can do both. At some time we have to have the debate in this Assembly – and perhaps this is the opportunity, with Bill 207 – as to precisely what sort of guarantees we're going to have for the family farm. Are we just going to allow the concentration of food production in the hands of a few, or in the strategic interests of all Albertans and all Canadians are we going to have the production of food in the hands of many?

Now, one only has to drive in certain areas of rural Alberta to have a look at opportunity. Opportunity is in short supply, in my view, in some areas of rural Alberta. There are stretches of rural Alberta that are in significant decline. At this time, Mr. Speaker, I'm not going to get into the description of this government's policies on rural Alberta, the highway 2 mentality, where if it's 50 kilometres east or west of the highway, then we're going to have development and we're going to have services and to heck with the rest. I'm not going to get into that because I only have a few minutes left. But across a wide swath of rural Alberta, communities are shrinking and dying, churches and schools are closing, and businesses are leaving town and going to the next largest market town and setting up shop there and trying to make a living. It is my view that community decline is driven by agricultural decline.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

MS DeLONG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I have the distinct pleasure to join my colleagues and rise to speak to the spirit and intent of Bill 207, the Alberta wheat and barley direct marketing act. Our province along with Saskatchewan and Manitoba produces the bulk of the annual Canadian wheat and barley harvest. Ranking second behind Saskatchewan in 2000, Alberta produced over a quarter of the total wheat crop, at an estimated value of $912.4 million. That figure is approximately 30 percent of the value of the sum total of the Canadian wheat crop. For barley during the same period our province's yield was 44 percent of the national, and cash receipts exceeded over $200 million, representing 35.6 percent of the national production. In other words, there's a lot of grain grown in these parts. A considerable portion of the wheat and barley crop is exported, therefore contributing to our nation's gross national product as well as confirming the applicability of the term "the world's breadbasket" to Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba.

The wheat and barley crops also create jobs here at home, from the farmers who plant and harvest the crop to the mill workers who process the grain to the railroad employees who transport hoppers full of grain and on and on. People all over the world depend on the wheat and barley that's grown in Canada. Some depend on it as a way to earn a living, whereas others depend on it for flour with which to bake bread and other foodstuffs. So far so good, Mr.

Speaker. But how do these crops get from the farmers' fields to the consumers? Like so many other commodities, they're traded on the world markets, and this is where the picture loses its rosiness. The overarching principles that guide trade in North America are free trade and fair trade, enshrined first in the Canada/United States free trade agreement in 1989 and again in 1994 in the North American free trade agreement, or NAFTA, between Canada, the U.S., and Mexico. But for the western Canadian wheat and barley farmer, trade is neither free nor fair. When it comes to wheat and barley, the CWB's mandate incorporates only Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba plus a small portion of British Columbia which, for all intents and purposes, can be considered an extension of Alberta's grainfields. This region is, in CWB vernacular, a designated area. Sadly, the tenets of NAFTA do not affect CWB.

Mr. Speaker, at the core of Bill 207 is a very clear purpose: to allow Alberta farmers to sell their wheat and barley crops as they choose. The Canadian Wheat Board, which first saw the light of day following the end of World War I, in 1918, is a dinosaur, a relic of the past. It has outlived its usefulness for Canadian farmers of wheat and barley and now mainly exists for its own sake. There's no denying the fact that there was a time when the CWB served a purpose, served it well, helping to defend our country. As part of the war effort there was ample justification to bestow upon the CWB the monopoly to trade the nation's grain harvest, but the war has been over for 57 years, yet the CWB's monopoly remains intact.

Mr. Speaker, what is the reason for this extended franchise? Why are our farmers not free to do business with whomever, whenever and however they see fit? Why should trading with someone other than the CWB result in criminal charges? There is little reason why this giant should be allowed to control the lives and livelihoods of western Canadian farmers any longer. On its own web site the CWB proudly proclaims itself the largest single exporter of wheat and barley in the world. It's only through the hard work of western Canadian farmers that the CWB is able to make claims like that.

However, Mr. Speaker, things now go from bad to worse. You see, other wheat-producing provinces are not subject to the CWB's mandate – that's right – whereas farmers in Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba, along with that little portion of our western neighbour, must adhere to the CWB regulations every step of the way. Our counterparts elsewhere are not burdened by the same restrictions. While it's true that the CWB is the only agency in Canada that can issue export permits for wheat, wheat farmers in several other provinces are, generally speaking, free to sell to whomever they want, whenever they want. Why this discrepancy? The Alberta wheat and barley farmers and their counterparts in Saskatchewan and Manitoba have no option but to deal with the CWB. In Ontario farmers have choice. In New Brunswick there are alternatives. In Quebec, in Nova Scotia, and on Prince Edward Island they have options. Why not Alberta? Options are what it comes down to. Alberta farmers have no options. It's the CWB or let the wheat and barley go unharvested and rot, lose millions of dollars, and quit farming.

There is another alternative, of course: break the law and sell the wheat directly to whomever you want, whenever you want. Of course, the RCMP will seize your truck and your farm, and you'll go to jail or at the very least be fined so heavily that you will no longer be able to stay in the business of farming. It's as if you can hear the CWB towering over the individual farmer booming: "Which do you choose? Will it be CWB or jail?" That's what's at the heart of the opposition to the monopoly of the CWB: the freedom to do business and the freedom to be able to engage in fair business dealings. That involves risk-taking; any business does. It's true that the CWB offers protection during difficult times by paying producers a higher price than they might otherwise get. However, Mr. Speaker, it's equally true that by imposing a variety of surcharges directly and indirectly and by restricting opportunities for Alberta farmers to engage in the free and fair trade of their wheat and barley crops, the CWB unfairly impedes the farmers' marketing opportunities. Moreover, doing so prevents the farmers from realizing the full commercial potential of their crops and especially during good times.

Mr. Speaker, passing Bill 207 would mark an important step in the direction of freeing the farmers of Alberta from the shackles of the Canadian Wheat Board. At last Alberta farmers would have the opportunity to engage in free and fair trade of the fruits of their labours. These are genuine concerns of mine and why I support Bill 207. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

MR. JACOBS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased today to rise and enter the debate on Bill 207. Inasmuch as the time is getting close, I would move that we adjourn debate, and I'll reserve my comments for another day.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In view of the hour I would move that we now call it 5:30 and that we reconvene at 8 this evening.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:26 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Monday, April 22, 2002

8:00 p.m.

Date: 02/04/22

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Please be seated.

Provincial Achievement Testing

505. Mrs. Gordon moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to review and re-evaluate the delivery of provincial achievement testing.

[Debate adjourned April 15: Mr. Lord speaking]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

MR. LORD: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week we ran out of time to discuss Motion 505, so this week I am pleased to again rise to speak in favour of this motion, which urges the government to conduct a review of provincial achievement tests.

Last week I spoke about the excellence of our education system in Alberta and how well our students were doing on competitive exams. I also spoke about some of the shortcomings of those exams and questioned whether or not they captured all of the important skills our children need to learn or maybe have learned and whether or not we were just teaching to the tests. Also, there are other skills that our children may possess and not be recognized for, and the critical question is whether or not such tests that we're doing now might obtain those results or whether or not we should attempt a more comprehensive assessment of student abilities than the current standardized tests are capable of proving. Of course, in looking at that, an equally critical question would have to be whether or not such tests are too costly to be widely administered.

Suggested alternatives that I have discovered are based on the concept of a performance-based assessment. Depending on the subject matter being tested, the performance may consist of demonstrating any of the active skills that I have mentioned before which are untested by standardized achievement tests. For example, when the evaluation of writing, drawing, or other artistic impression skills is concerned, a portfolio assessment involving the ongoing evaluation of a cumulative collection of creative works may be an approach worth examining. With this approach, the student can track their improvement over the course of the school year because the work they submitted in September is available for them to look at in May and June, when they have nearly completed the year.

For subjects that require the organization of facts and theories into an integrated and persuasive whole, an oral defence-style assessment may be an approach that we can take a look at. This approach would allow for a free expression of thoughts and ideas, both of which are limited by standardized exams. Through this format, students can display what they know as opposed to the current format, which focuses on what students don't know.

A third approach is based on a problem-solving model – this method could be adapted to most knowledge-based disciplines – where students would be presented with a problem scenario that can be resolved through the use of specific principles that the student would have learned through his or her study of the subject material.

The methods that I have described may be impractical on their own without standardized testing in the sense that they are difficult to obtain a general picture of the whole education system from, and they may not be cost-effective either. However, if they can be used in conjunction with standardized testing, then I think that we as parents and taxpayers can gain a better understanding of how our children or children in the school system learn and a comprehensive look at what each child can do as a student. Mr. Speaker, I would not suggest that standardized tests be abandoned for a new method as standardized test scores that are obtained through a valid and reliable instrument can offer a wealth of information about students, teachers, schools, school districts, and the curriculum. However, I think that there is room for a complementary evaluation that can more closely examine the growth of each student.

Mr. Speaker, I am unsure that we are currently taking an in-depth assessment of the abilities of each student in Alberta. Along with others I feel that our current standardized tests could be more comprehensive in their approach. Further, I think that a review of provincial achievement tests would examine the concerns that Albertans have. It could suggest alternatives to the present system and answer questions about standard exams. This is why I support Motion 505 and a review of standardized testing in Alberta.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'd just like to add a few comments to what other members have made in regards to Motion 505, "Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to review and re-evaluate the delivery of provincial achievement testing." I fully support this motion.

I had the opportunity to work on the grade 9 provincial achievement math test, an experience that was valuable to me but unfortunately wasn't as valuable to my students, and there are a number of reasons for that. Certainly they had to prepare to write an achievement test, and in writing that test, there were flaws in the testing, the way the tests were written, to begin with. At that time we were only rewriting one-third of the questions per year, so one-third of the questions had been used the previous year and another third the year before that. So the potential for misuse of the test was certainly there by teachers and by students if they happened to get their hands on them. We saw how easy that was to do, for example, in a grade 12 departmental test where some students were able to get copies of the test before they wrote.

As well, you are putting schools and you're putting school districts into the position where they are being judged on how well their students do on those exams, but really when we get back to hopefully what those exams are meant for, which is the benefit of students, they rarely, rarely get to see those results. If they do get to see them, those results in the majority of cases are not used, particularly at grades 3, 6, and 9, for any sort of evaluation on their year's work. Now, at grade 9 we certainly had the option of using a percentage of that mark if we wished towards the final grade for that student, yet by the time those students in grade 9 had their exams evaluated and the marks sent back to the school, they'd already moved on to grade 10, so the majority of them never had the opportunity to find out what sections of the test they did well on, what sections they did poorly on, or even what their mark was. The same situation would apply, Mr. Speaker, when we look at the grade 6 student. The grade 6 student writes those near the end of June, and certainly the teachers have the ability to mark those. The same comments I made about grade 9 would apply to grade 6s.

Now, I think that probably the most inappropriate place for these exams is at grade 3. There are so many more uses we could be making of testing of grade 3 students than for achievement. I think:

why wouldn't we use a test that could measure what areas perhaps they're having trouble with, some sort of a diagnostic test where we could pinpoint difficulties that students are having? Why couldn't we use those tests to have a team of experts help those students who are having great difficulty? I think one, for example, would be in the area of reading. Certainly that is one of the areas where we can test to see how well students are doing and how well they learn that particular skill in their first three grades. How much the whole school system would benefit if we could have every child reading well by the time they finished elementary school. This would certainly ensure that that problem of not reading is not passed on to other teachers that have to deal with a student who can't read. We do know that there is an optimum time for learning for various disciplines, and certainly with reading, the earlier we can get students to be proficient in the elementary grades, the better off we are.

Another area that gives me great concern with these tests is the fact that they are being used today for exactly the reason they said that they wouldn't be used for when they were first proposed, and that is to judge schools and to judge school districts. It is certainly an unfair use of those tests. When we look at those results, without too many exceptions the results that come in those tests almost parallel the socioeconomic conditions that we find in the areas in which those schools are situated. Now, certainly in some cases – and I can use the case of Londonderry junior high school in north-east Edmonton. Londonderry junior high school has a Mandarin program. It attracts many students who wish to study Mandarin, and these are top-notch students, so certainly there's a case where the norm would vary slightly in that achievement scores in that particular situation would be much higher.

Now, as well, Mr. Speaker, one of the other major concerns I've always had with achievement tests. Since they are not doing what they originally set out to do, I can't see what is the purpose of having every student in grade 3, grade 6, grade 9, and grade 12 write those exams. We can get the same information, particularly in grades 3 and 6 and 9 if we wish it, without having to do an exam that encompasses all the students in this province in those grades. We could certainly take a sample from across this province and do that, and we've seen this happen. We had a situation last year where our Alberta students were compared not only with students across Canada but students internationally, and they did very well. We certainly didn't have to test every student in the province. We could take a sample instead of a census to do that.

Now, then, if we really do want to use these tests for some sort of meaningful standard and not a self-report by government, what we want to get away from is a body that sets a curriculum, a body that does the testing, and a body that does the reporting on that testing. If, for example, we want to know how well students are doing as a whole – again the original reason that we introduced these exams in the province – then certainly what we should have is an independent body that would come in and test our students, and they would report back. That certainly would be a much fairer way for this whole process to work.

In the little bit of time I have left, Mr. Speaker, I would just like to summarize that certainly I think we have to get to a system here where our achievement tests would do a number of things. First of all, we will eliminate the misuse of tests, whether it be by teachers, by schools, by school districts. I would like to see these tests eliminated for grade 3s. Testing at the grade 3 level can provide us with much better information, information we can use diagnostically. As well, I would certainly like to see that if we as a province through our department of ed are setting the curriculum and we feel a need for testing at various levels . . . [Mr. Bonner's speaking time expired] Certainly nobody is going to complain about those in grade 9.

Thank you very much for this opportunity, Mr. Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

MRS. O'NEILL: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise tonight to speak in support of Motion 505, and I'd like to read it into the record because I believe that the intent of this motion is in order to review something, not to guess ahead of time or to determine ahead of time what would be the results of such a review. Motion 505 reads: "Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to review and re-evaluate the delivery of provincial achievement testing."

Before I speak to the strength of a review, I'd like to take a moment to commend particularly those students in my constituency who are engaged in and have been engaged in taking the achievement tests in grades 3, 6, and 9 and of course those who take diploma exams too. They have performed exceptionally well in all three school jurisdictions in St. Albert. I would also like to say that I think the teachers who have prepared them have done a remarkable job in preparing the students for the tests.

I do believe that Motion 505 would be a means to ensuring that our standardized tests are worth while and are achieving what they should achieve. There is nothing wrong – indeed, I should say that there's something very right – about the fact that we would like to have an objective measure of where students are at provincially. I know that the parents have asked for it. I know that the students in the senior years have always asked: how do I stack up against the knowledge and the abilities as per performance on achievement tests with other students across the province? So there is a very legitimate desire to maintain these with the objective assessment of the achievement tests. However, like every tool that we use within education, sometimes it is in use for a long time and we don't evaluate what are some of the consequences, both positive and negative, of administering these achievement tests.

I can say that for those who have perhaps eased into the attitude, either the teachers or the students, the feeling that all of the education and the learning taking place in the classrooms is geared toward taking the test, sometimes if the curriculum is good, if the teaching methods are good, if the students are truly engaged and curious about learning, it's not all that wrong to find out how well they have achieved in their knowledge and understanding of the curriculum. But on the other hand, if they are merely used by those who are administering them as a tool, for instance, to be able to either boast or to use the results just in a way of selling the program or the curriculum, then I don't think that's the primary reason why they are administered. I think we should evaluate why achievement tests were put there in the first place, what we hope to learn from them, and subsequently what we hope we will be able to achieve if we are to tweak them, to change them, to adjust them, perhaps even to look at the appropriateness of the grade levels at which we administer them.

While Motion 505 indicates that a review and a re-evaluation would be a good idea, I would further suggest that it would give us the opportunity to hear from those who are preparing the students for the tests to find out how much time they spend preparing the students, how much time they spend making sure that the students truly do integrate testing and evaluation with the curriculum and with their school and classroom experience, and to also find out if we are allocating the resources appropriately. I do know that a recent COMPAS poll of Canadian attitudes regarding standardized tests indicated 79 percent support from the public for provincewide testing of students. I sense that those who were polled and voted in favour and comprised the 79 percent were those who realized that there is a certain objectivity and evaluation learned from how the curriculum is truly being delivered and how the students are understanding it.

We also know, though, that there are a number of school boards and schools, for instance, who will use their results as a form of one-upmanship. While that might be laudable and present a very positive sense of the school and evaluation of the school, I think we have to remember the reason for which these exams are being administered, and that's for the child, for the measurement of making sure that the student is learning a certain body of information, et cetera.

I would be the first one to admit that achievement tests do not test all the skills, all the learning abilities, nor can they speak to all the learning styles of the various individuals and students right across this province, but I would say that they are one measure of how students achieve. What we have to do is balance and weigh the positives against those factors that perhaps are not positive forces in the administration of these programs. I know that Motion 505 is suggesting that we have a comprehensive review, that we re-evaluate the strengths and acknowledge the weaknesses of achievement tests. We hear from those who either have been students taking the tests and those who are teachers preparing students and administering the tests as well.

One of the things that we really have to make sure of is that achievement tests that were introduced in 1982 of course have evolved over the years to make sure that they are as objective and accurate a tool as possible, but the other thing that we have to remember is that there is a proportionate amount of effort spent in making sure that the content and the ideas that are presented and the information queried on the tests is again current, appropriate, and suitable to the grade level. I've heard from a teacher in my constituency who feels very strongly that there is a disproportionate amount of time spent on preparing the students for these achievement tests, and I think that that kind of critique needs to go into the mix that Motion 505 suggests.

I would point out something too that I think we from a provincial perspective should take into consideration. The information that I received was that achievement testing is very costly. We know that. Lots of things are costly, but we have to make sure that we get our value for our investment, and what I do understand is that $8 million per year is spent on achievement testing in Alberta. Now, that's quite a significant amount, but when the comparison is made to what we spend per year on curriculum development, it's only half that amount, $4 million. So I say maybe again it is time for us to evaluate the administering of and the fact that we do have achievement tests here in Alberta, because when you compare, we invest in the curriculum development only half of what we invest in evaluating or in finding out whether that curriculum has been absorbed, internalized, and understood by our students. Those are the questions of balance and investment that I think this motion will allow us as a government to undertake.

So I would strongly urge that everyone here in the Assembly realize the strengths of achievement tests, realize that they aren't perfect, realize also that Motion 505 will give us that opportunity to improve them, restructure them, reposition them, replace them, or eliminate them, however the study and the evaluation and the review would determine. But the time has come, Mr. Speaker, and with that, I would urge everyone to vote in favour of Motion 505.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

MR. MASKELL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a pleasure to rise today and speak to Motion 505, which urges the government to conduct a review of provincial achievement tests given to school-children in Alberta.

First, I would like to thank the Member for Lacombe-Stettler for her efforts to bring this issue forward, an issue that has certainly been of concern to me for some time. A debate concerning ways and means of measuring the learning progress of Alberta's youth as they move through the school system is something I'm pleased to contribute to.

I would like to talk briefly about achievement tests as they're used in the Alberta education system today. In grades 3, 6, and 9 Alberta students write standard exams that cover essential learning topics. In grade 12 our high school seniors are issued standard diploma exams that they must take to graduate. To use grade 6 as an example, Mr. Speaker, children take tests that measure their knowledge in language arts, mathematics, social studies, and science. These exam scores are then used to evaluate students, teachers, schools, and the success of the provincial education system as a whole. With the information that is gathered from the exams, we are then able to compare the achievements of our students class to class and district to district as well as across Canada and around the world. Some believe that it is incredibly valuable that we have a way to measure the effectiveness of our learning system as a whole and of our schools and teachers individually.

As I've been preparing for this speaking time, I certainly have been in contact with principals and with teachers and so on. One of the things that certainly troubles school principals and teachers about the current system is when we talk about comparing them individually. For instance, I was principal of a school that was an international baccalaureate school from K to 12, and in fact from K to 9 it was totally international baccalaureate. When we talk about the 15-85 results measure, for instance, for our diploma exams, where 15 percent of the students set the standard of excellence and the other 85 set the acceptable standard, well, at my school you could have flipped it around the other way because these IB students were so strong.

But I was also speaking to a school principal this morning in my constituency where their school could be called an inner-city school, where many of these youngsters are certainly behind their grade level. Yet when we issue results of these achievement tests, the problem is that people will compare schools. So if you compare Vic, for instance, the school that I spent many years at, with another school that has this kind of problem with the students that are delayed somewhat, I mean, people will then make decisions about what school they're going to send their child to, which is totally unfair to that school and unfair to the teachers, who consider then they must have failed the students somehow because they didn't get up to that measure that the students in a school that has these kind of high-achieving IB-type students in them.

I guess it's believed that being able to gather information about a student body in a quick and cost-effective manner is essential, but as I've said, the results of these tests can be used to hold the learning system accountable to the students and to the parents of the students in the schools and to the taxpayers. I mean, it's been a great thing, Mr. Speaker. Recently Alberta students have been submitting scores that rank among the best in the world, and I'd like to congratulate them for the excellent work they've done on these tests.

Results of standardized tests are also used as a guide to shed light on where students excel individually by subject and where schools display excellence as well as the need for improvement over the core subjects. They can be used as a guide to tell the minister and associated groups and individuals that help to draft the curriculum where it needs enhancement as well as where it is meeting the desired tests. However, Mr. Speaker, are these tests comprehensive enough to gather essential information on the complete learning needs of Alberta's children? Is there information about students that is not gathered and skills that are not assessed by these standard exams? I believe that there is important information about students' learning and success available from different types of exams and through the use – and it's a kind of assessment that I've not always been in favour of – of student portfolios.

The main purpose of standardized testing is to sort through a large number of students in as efficient a way as possible. This limited goal gives rise to conformity and teaching to the test. These tests are felt to neglect or ignore several essential skills such as writing, speaking, acting, drawing, and constructing or repairing. All of these skills are taught in our schools and are valuable in life, yet they are not measured in provincial achievement tests.

Far-reaching educational policies are often based on results of standardized testing programs. Concerned individuals from the education system and beyond have questioned this situation. Questions arise because there are educational experts who are unsure that standardized tests look closely enough at the students' abilities and knowledge to make informed decisions about curriculum changes. The testing programs and their scores have been blamed for disrupting normal classroom learning and assessment, because often the tests are viewed as being one-dimensional, biased, and not useful for classroom teachers.

The phrase "tester of curriculum" captures the essence of the major controversy surrounding standardized testing. When test scores are used in a comparative basis not only to compare the educational fate of individual students but to also assess the relative quality of teachers, schools, and school districts, it's no wonder that teaching to the test is becoming a common practice in our schools. This would not necessarily be a problem if standardized tests provided a comprehensive, in-depth assessment of the knowledge and skills that indicate a mastery of a given subject matter, but to achieve that, we will need to seek out complementary tools to use in standardized testing. On their own, standardized tests may be too rigid to serve the learning needs of Alberta students.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I believe that a review of standardized testing in Alberta is overdue. It is reasonable to assume that the demand for test results that can be compared across student populations will remain strong. The critical question is whether such results can be obtained from tests that attempt a more comprehensive assessment of student abilities than the present standardized tests are capable of proving. An additional but equally critical question is whether such tests are too costly to be widely administered.

Such alternatives that I have discovered are based on the concept of a performance-based assessment. Depending on the subject matter being tested, the performance may consist of demonstrating any of the active skills that I had mentioned before, which are untested by standardized achievement tests. For example, when the evaluation of writing, drawing, or other artistic impression skills is concerned, a portfolio assessment involving the ongoing evaluation of a cumulative collection of creative works may be an approach worth examining. With this approach, the student can track their improvement over the course of the school year, because the work they submitted in September is available for them to look at in May and June, when they have nearly completed the year.

For subjects that require the organization of facts and theories into an integrated and persuasive whole, an oral defence-styled assessment may be an approach that we could look at. This approach would allow for a free expression of thoughts and ideas, both of which are limited by standardized exams. Through this format, students can display what they know as opposed to the current format, which focuses on what students don't know.

A third approach is based on a problem-solving model. This model could be adapted to most knowledge-based disciplines. Students would be presented with a problem scenario that can be resolved through the use of specific principles that the student would have learned through his or her study of the subject material.

The methods that I have described may be impractical on their own without standardized testing in the sense that they are difficult to attain a general picture of the whole education system and they may not be cost-effective. However, if they can be used in conjunction with standardized testing, then I think we as parents and taxpayers can gain a better understanding of how our children or children in the school system learn and a comprehensive look at what each child can do as a student.

Mr. Speaker, I would not necessarily suggest that standardized tests be abandoned for a new method. Standardized test scores that are obtained through a valid and reliable instrument can offer a wealth of information about students, teachers, schools, school districts, and the curriculum. However, I think there is room for a complementary evaluation that can more closely examine the growth of each student. I am unsure that we are currently taking an in-depth assessment of the abilities of each student in Alberta. [Mr. Maskell's speaking time expired] Oh. Okay. I was just getting wound up here.

Anyway, thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Calmar.

REV. ABBOTT: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise today and speak to Motion 505. As has been previously stated, Motion 505 asks the government "to review and re-evaluate the delivery of provincial standardized achievement tests." I think it is important that we highlight exactly what the intent of Motion 505 is. Motion 505 is not urging the government to be rid of provincial achievement tests. It is not asking for them to be changed. It is only asking for them to be reviewed and re-evaluated. The provincial achievement tests are a valuable tool for assessing how our education system is doing.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that these tests are a large part of the reasons that we have the best public education system in the world. As we know, Alberta students are at the top of the class in Canada and internationally when it comes to mathematics. Earlier this month results of the school achievement indicator program, or SAIP, showed that Alberta had the highest marks overall in the problem-solving category by the province's 13 and 16 year olds. This of course is nothing new. Back in December the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, or OECD, study found Alberta students ranked number 1 in the world over 32 industrialized countries in reading, third in science and math, and well above the Canadian average. Now, that being said, I feel that the tests could possibly be reviewed by the Department of Learning, because I do not think that they are the only way that our system should be evaluated.

Mr. Speaker, the debate on standardized testing revolves around their effectiveness, reliability, and value. One of the assumptions underlying the tests is that learning can be broken down into parts and rebuilt. The tests assess student understanding of knowledge that has been deconstructed. However, I do not believe that teachers or students can always nicely fit into the scientific model of standardized measurement used to frame how concepts and strategies are taught and learned. In school students and teachers are influenced by the assessment process, and these processes influence how teachers teach the information and how students will learn in order to achieve success. If the goal of our Learning department is to assess learning, we should also look at using additional assessment formats that will lead to student success. I feel that standardized testing permits only one single expression of understanding.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that these tests should not be relied upon as the sole examiner of students' success. I am concerned for several reasons. First, they are not developed from classroom instruction. Tests are developed outside of the classroom, not allowing the full knowledge obtained in the classroom to be realized. Now, this could be a strength or a weakness, so this needs to be looked at. Secondly, they inhibit variations in presentation of learning, and they limit content and constructs that are measured. The tests encourage students to think and respond alike, and creative and critical thinking is not always given the same value as conformity.

Mr. Speaker, standardized testing assesses skill in a manner that does not allow for the assessment of a whole activity. Teachers cannot fully know if lack of success on the standardized tests is an indication of lack of ability or lack of testing knowledge or just lack of interest. While I support the tests in general, I think that these tests paint a limited picture of our learning system. They are biased against some students, because they do not take into account such things as income levels. They do not allow for language, cultural, emotional, or physical barriers, which have an impact on test results, and with a learning system as great as ours I feel that these tests may not fully or accurately represent our entire system.

Mr. Speaker, I have a great quote I would like to share with the House from Oliver Sacks, a neurologist who studied cognitive performance. He summarized the greatest failings of standardized tests when he said: "A test situation is other people's questions. One is in a rather passive situation. In an active situation, you find your own voice and your own vision." Assessment needs to be a part of a process in which students have an opportunity to find their own voice and vision. Our tests do not always allow for this to occur.

The standardized tests are a measure of our learning system, but I think that they should be used in conjunction with other forms of assessment. I think that if a review of the tests were completed, it would be found that the tests are a very good indicator of our learning system but only if also used with other indicators.

Mr. Speaker, in January 1996 Alberta Education made the following comment, quote: although provincial assessments are designed to assess the achievement of provincial standards as reflected in the program of studies, many important learning outcomes cannot be measured by time limited . . .

THE ACTING SPEAKER: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Calmr, but under Standing Order 8(4), which provides for up to five minutes for the sponsor of a motion other than a government motion to close debate, I would invite the hon. Member for Lacombe-Stettler to close debate on Motion 505.

MRS. GORDON: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I just want to thank each and every speaker. I think that every one of you brought your own perspective and the perspective of the people that you represent to the debate.

This motion has been stated several times tonight and is quite simply that I am asking the Assembly to "urge the government to review and re-evaluate the delivery of provincial achievement testing." This has over the last couple of years become an issue in my particular constituency, and I would like to thank the teachers and the parents and the students that I have heard from on this issue. I think that we can be very proud of how well we fared in the standardized achievement testing compared to other countries and other provinces, and I appreciate the teachers that have worked very hard to ensure that our children achieve so very, very well.

It was mentioned earlier by one speaker here about student portfolios. I don't know whether student portfolios are the way to go or a combination of standardized testing and some student portfolio. I do know that in the letters that came to me, many parents were very concerned about the stress placed on a grade 3 child to write an achievement test. Although it's some time ago, I do remember back to the early years, and children learned at different levels and at different speeds, and there might be some children that are quite capable of writing a written test when others wouldn't fare so well. So all I'm asking for is a complete review. Let's look at what we wanted when we started, where we are today, and where we want to be in the future.

I thank each and every one of you again for entering into this debate, and I ask you to support this so that we can undertake a complete review. Thank you.

[Motion Other than Government Motion 505 carried]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Impact of Aging Workforce

506. Ms Kryczka moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to seriously address the impact of a growing and aging population on the Alberta labour market, taking into consideration the present culture that largely accepts disengagement or early retirement of older workers.

MS KRYCZKA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members, it is an honour to begin debate on Motion 506. I would like to start with the basic reasons for bringing forward this motion at this time. Then I will talk about ageism and why this government should commit to reducing ageism to keep older people at work.

Mr. Speaker, Alberta continues to enjoy a great deal of economic prosperity, attracting the attention and more of thousands of Canadians from other provinces each year. These people see the benefits of conservative fiscal management and have moved their families from their home province to enjoy what we refer to as the Alberta advantage. The migration of people to Alberta has contributed to Alberta's population being one of the youngest in Canada.

So the question that people may have is: well, why look at the issue of an aging workforce right now? The answer, Mr. Speaker, is that even though Alberta has enjoyed a great deal of population growth with the number of people moving to this province, if you consider this factor plus births, it will not even come close to compensating for the larger number of people who will become eligible for retirement by 2010 and beyond to 2030. For example, in only eight years 46 percent of all provincial employees will be eligible for retirement. This is a huge percent to have to replace from a proportionately smaller, younger population, and the picture is similar for other key work areas, including health care professionals, police services, and postsecondary institution instructors. We cannot ignore the relevance of the large and growing field of research that tells us that allowing Alberta's workforce to continue to retire early will have devastating effects on the province's labour market.

In June 2000 the Alberta government released Alberta for All Ages: Directions for the Future, a governmentwide study. It highlighted several key areas to advise the Alberta government in preparing for an aging population. One of the report's key areas, and therefore with recommendations included, was to encourage public- and private-sector employers to introduce more flexible employment policies for mature workers, as forecasts point to a labour and skill shortage in a number of areas in Alberta's economy. In addition, working is one of the best ways for people to remain active and engaged in their community.

Older workers could continue to make an important contribution to the workplace, particularly if flexible work opportunities were made for them. Flexible opportunities recommended could include optional phased-in or delayed retirement, changes in work status, reassignment within a company, including changes in responsibilities, fewer working hours, or less demanding positions. Older workers are to be most valued for their brainpower and experience, not necessarily their physical power.

In October 2001 the Labour Force Planning Committee released Prepared for Growth: Building Alberta's Labour Supply. The report specifically identifies older workers as a source of employees who can become part of the solution to the skill shortage problem through emphasizing the advantages and positive potential impact of their extended labour force participation. In November 2001 the report Aging Populations in the Workforce: Challenges for Employers stated that due to declining birthrates in Canada, the United States, and Britain, these countries will see much slower growth in the pool of potential workers, with growth ultimately ceasing by 2030. The shift in the composition of the working-age population leads to a workforce that will likely be older, better educated, and largely female over the next two decades. As a result, the report urges both private- and public-sector employers to adapt or develop new training strategies to tap underused resources such as older workers.

In September 2001 the TD bank released an economics report that stated that Canada's economic growth could be hampered within a decade if the private sector is not prepared for the upcoming massive wave of retiring baby boomers. In its report the TD bank urged companies to come up with more and unique ways of attracting older workers and retaining them in the labour market longer through flexible work arrangements, respectable wages, and more training. Highly skilled older workers are seen as key resources for addressing current and future labour and skill shortages.

Also, the Conference Board of Canada released What to Do Before the Well Runs Dry: Managing Scarce Skills in 2001. The study reported that 83 percent of the people they surveyed stated that they were experiencing shortages of skilled labour and that 60 percent expected their skill shortages to be more pronounced in the future. Strategies for attracting and retaining talented workers, including older workers, were discussed in the study. In particular, survey respondents suggested that provincial governments increase and align basic funding to meet the skill requirements of the industry. Finally, the board concluded that Canada's future success depended on focused collective action by all stakeholder groups to ensure that the well of skilled talent does not run dry. I believe that this government should lead this type of collective action to encourage older workers to remain in the job market and to fight the growing threat of ageism.

Mr. Speaker, ageism reflects a prejudice existing in society against older adults in the form of primarily negative stereotypes and myths relating to older people. Ageism can even reflect a deep-seated uneasiness on the part of the young and middle-aged and even a personal revulsion and distaste themselves to growing old and, further, a fear of powerlessness, uselessness, and even death. Ageism can affect individuals on two levels. First, people may be ageist with respect to others; that is, they may stereotype other people on the basis of age. Second, individuals may be ageist with respect to themselves.

Economically we view children as having future economic potential. In a way, they are seen as an economic investment. However, older adults are often perceived as a financial liability. This is not to say that older adults are unproductive, but older people upon retirement too easily are viewed as economically unproductive in North American society and are therefore devalued.

I believe that this government could reduce ageist attitudes through continual exposure to and work with older adults. By taking a leadership role, the Alberta government could use the existing government infrastructure to develop education programs and communication initiatives focusing on the benefits of keeping older people in the workplace.

The challenge for this government is to combat ageism in the workplace and beyond while also promoting the benefits of working rather than those of early retirement. A second challenge is to convince employers to adopt flexible work options. The third challenge is to change the attitudes of the workers themselves toward continued work on a flexible basis and the benefits of making that choice.

I believe it is in all of our best interests to encourage employers to reduce workplace stress in order to keep older workers working longer and thereby reduce employees' preference for early retirement. Employers should also be encouraged to promote transitional jobs with possibly a lower salary but with fewer responsibilities and on a part-time or contract basis, giving older workers more time away from work while still earning some income.

Mr. Speaker, this government basically needs to plan ahead with appropriate leadership actions. We planned ahead to eliminate our debt, and we're planning ahead to reform our health care system. Let's plan ahead for the aging population as this, too, is a very important emerging issue. The earlier we seriously work on this trend, the better prepared we'll be eight years from now when many, many more people reach the traditional age to retire. Let's help them to look at different employment options made available to them as a result of the leadership role taken by this government. Just as with the provincial debt and rising health care costs, we cannot bury our heads in the sand procrastinating about the impending age increase in Alberta's workforce.

Hon. members, as a final thought I'd like to briefly mention some of the well-known people beyond typical working age who still contribute very substantially in Alberta's workforce. Peter Lougheed, former Premier of this great province, works in Calgary as a senior partner with the law firm of Bennett Jones. Peter Valentine, Alberta's former Auditor General, is now with the University of Calgary. Dr. Bob Westbury, former CEO of TransAlta Utilities, is now with Grant MacEwan College. These men are in their retirement years but still contribute in a very meaningful way to Alberta's economy.

I look forward to the debate on this motion, Mr. Speaker. Dealing with the aging workforce is an issue this government must seriously address immediately in order to lessen the impact when thousands of older workers, Albertans, may choose retirement rather than other working options for the time being.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, this is feeling very familiar. Once again the sponsoring member for this motion has done a lot of work and is, I'm sure, working closely with the Seniors Advisory Council in bringing forward this motion. I'm hoping that her motion will receive a more favourable reception than the other ones she's done. It seems she works very hard to bring these issues forward on behalf of seniors and then doesn't get support from the Legislative Assembly, so I'm urging everyone to give this close consideration.

We do have an interesting situation right now where there's a push towards the ideal of freedom 55, where people were encouraged to have invested their money and made enough money and chosen a career that would make them enough money that they would be in a position to retire at 55. Pitted against that is the struggle that we're having with not having enough people in the skilled workforce pool. I think this is certainly a reasonable request of the government, that it look at the impact of the aging population on the Alberta labour market and take into consideration a culture that largely accepts that disengagement or early retirement of older workers.

I agree very much with the member that it's important to plan ahead. I think it's particularly important to give notice to seniors that this is what's being considered so that they don't feel that a deal was broken, because I know many seniors in Alberta today feel that a deal was broken for them. They had made certain arrangements for their retirement, made certain choices around their retirement, even when they might be retiring, expecting certain programs to be in place that they could take advantage of. For those that retired in the early '90s, when the current Premier came in with his focus, very quickly these programs disappeared for a lot of people, and they felt that very keenly. Certainly they felt that the deal was broken. They had taken their retirement and planned their retirement expecting certain rules and programs to be in place, and those rules and programs were withdrawn. I still hear from seniors – and I'm sure most of you in here do – about how much this has cost them. So I think it's really important that with any changes in direction that are anticipated involving seniors or retirement-age or older people, we need to be putting those policies in place now to be very clear about what the expectations are in the future.

I think it's important that there is choice and that there is balance. I don't think we want to be in a position where we're forcing people to work past 65 if they are not physically able to do that or even mentally prepared to do that. I think it should be a choice. I'd like to see, if there is to be encouragement for people to stay working beyond 65, that it's encouragement that's done with a carrot rather than with a stick. Just this afternoon I saw the government in answer to a question making a choice where instead of using a carrot as encouragement, it was a stick to discourage them, and I think we want to be moving people in a direction where they're going to accept it readily.

I notice that the Department of Human Resources and Employment is looking currently at implementing the Prepared for Growth: Building Alberta's Labour Supply plan. It's interesting, because this report makes reference to an aging population, but there's no actual exploration of it. There's no sort of inclusion or planning that's involved with it. Aging workers are not a part of the strategies for action that are included in the report, which was very odd because my understanding is that this report is quite new.

I agree with the sponsoring member that it's important that whatever we look at now when we talk about labour market and participation in the labour force, we do really consider the impact that older workers are going to have. I was talking about choice earlier, and I think this is important because I suspect that probably more in the future than we've experienced so far, we will have workers who will need to work past 65. They will not have sufficient income nor will there be social programs which will be in place for them. In particular here I'm thinking about people who were self-employed, contract workers, part-time workers, women, in particular women who took time away from the workforce to have children. They will need to work because they will not have sufficient income to be able to retire, and I suspect that the programs that are in place or were in place will no longer be there to support them. That won't be a choice for them. They'll have to continue working in order to be able to make the rent.

I won't be surprised if there is a move to have a government committee look at this, and again I would encourage the Assembly that if there is a committee to look at it, it should be an all-party committee, where there can be representation and input and feedback from all parties represented in the Assembly.

I notice that there was an article today in one of the papers around urging the federal government to consider dropping the mandatory retirement. That's been a part of our laws for some time, and people have even challenged it and lost. I think now we will through necessity have to look at getting rid of those laws that require mandatory retirement, but again my encouragement is that we look for a balance and for choice.

Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but the time limit for consideration of this item of business has concluded.

Bill 23
Municipal Government Amendment Act, 2002

[Adjourned debate April 16: Mr. VanderBurg]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Whitecourt-St. Anne.

MR. VANDERBURG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have concluded my comments on Bill 23. I don't know if there are comments from others in the Assembly. If so, I'll sit down at this time and make note.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Indeed it is a pleasure to rise tonight and speak to Bill 23, the Municipal Government Amendment Act, 2002. I would also like to take this opportunity to thank the hon. Member for Whitecourt-St. Anne, who certainly took time out of his busy schedule to brief myself and my research assistant about Bill 23. The first thing that became evident to both of us was the amount of consultation he had done with the various stakeholders, whether it be the AUMA or the AAMD and C. Another thing that came through very well in our review of this particular bill was that we saw where his vast experience in municipal government had come to the fore. As a result, I think that government members and opposition members should have no difficulty in supporting Bill 23, because it does reflect the wishes of the various stakeholders.

Now, then, these changes, Mr. Speaker, will make changes to the Municipal Government Act. Of course, this is the act that authorizes the operation of all our municipal authorities. When we look at Bill 23, it does two things. The first thing is it'll allow the government to move the municipal assessment information being filed on-line rather than submitting it manually. This act changes some of the dates for filing the information, and the department will now be working with the most recent assessment information rather than having a year's time delay. As well, the second part of the bill will also make changes to the standard for holding municipal employees and members of the boxing commission liable for their actions. Rather than gross negligence, the standard will be acting "in good faith." This is the same standard for provincial and federal employees.

Now, just some comments. When we start looking at the first part of the bill, this deals with assessment and taxation. There are a number of proposed amendments, and what one of these proposed amendments will do is allow the implementation of some of the Equalized Assessment Panel recommendations. As I mentioned in my opening comments, what the proposed amendment will do is eliminate the one-year lag between the preparation of current assessments and the equalized assessments, so the information that now will be provided will certainly be much more current and allow decisions to be made based on current information. This will also clearly define standards for quality assurance in the assessment practice. Again this will allow for reliability, and people in various areas will certainly look forward to that. The proposed changes as well, Mr. Speaker, will increase the transparency of the equalized assessment system.

Now, then, as well, because we have so much information, there is also protection here, and this protection would be in a form that requires both municipalities and the province to disclose asset information for the purpose of requisitions.

As well, what this particular bill will do, Mr. Speaker, is address the Auditor General's concerns about the equalization process. Now, the primary recommendation of the Equalized Assessment Panel is to move to the use of current-year assessments from municipalities for calculating the equalized assessment, and by doing this, the requisitions will be more fairly determined. As well, it will be more easily understood by the ratepayers when they are levied or when equalized assessment is done, and it will be based on current information.

Mr. Speaker, as well, the second set of proposed amendments will provide a standard of good faith for protection from liability for municipal officials and for municipal boxing and wrestling commissions. Again this is quite an interesting note that was explained to me at the time: not all cities or municipalities have boxing commissions. I was quite surprised to learn just how wide the area of the Edmonton Boxing and Wrestling Commission extends and how people without commissions will be coming to them to sponsor various events.

Now, then, these proposed amendments would protect municipal officials, employees, and volunteers from unreasonable exposure to liability when conducting local government business. We certainly know that liability is an issue that not only the average citizen on the street is facing but our various levels of government, and we continually hear this term of due diligence. So I think that this is an important change, an important proposed amendment, and it will strengthen the act. Under present legislation these people are not covered for gross negligence, so this proposed change will limit liability based on the provision of good faith. The application of good faith is in a situation where our municipal officials and employees are not exposed to unreasonable risk of liability, so certainly where the action is not reckless or deliberate, then they will not be exposed to liability.

Now, then, the members of the AUMA and the AAMD and C have expressed support for amending section 535 to provide them an equitable level of protection from liability. There is also, Mr. Speaker, a new provision which is to be added to section 535 to protect the boxing and wrestling commissions from liability based on the good-faith clause and to offer them protection where they are currently not protected.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, the changes in Bill 23, the Municipal Government Amendment Act, 2002, do reflect the wishes of the stakeholders. It is a clear example where Albertans were listened to. These changes will improve the assessment practice. They will also improve the liability protection for municipal officials and municipal boxing and wrestling commissions. As well, it will strengthen our Municipal Government Act and make it more current.

So I would urge all members of the Assembly to support this bill. Thank you.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Whitecourt-Ste. Anne to close debate.

MR. VANDERBURG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do appreciate the comments made by the Member for Edmonton-Glengarry. His comments were very accurate, and I did appreciate and value the cooperation.

I move to close debate on Bill 23 for second reading.

head: Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: We shall call the committee to order.

Bill 7

Agriculture Financial Services Amendment Act, 2002

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill?

MR. KLAPSTEIN: I'd like to provide some additional comments and respond to questions raised during second reading of Bill 7, the Agriculture Financial Services Amendment Act, 2002. I'll remind members that the prime objective of this legislation is to give the Agriculture Financial Services Corporation expanded responsibility to include the business assets, obligations, and opportunities of the Alberta Opportunity Company. The Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development announced late last year that this government intended to merge the two operations, and since that time both AFSC and AOC have been working together to ensure a smooth transition on behalf of the small business and agri-industry clients that they serve.

During second reading the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar asked specifically about debt servicing costs. It should be made clear that debt servicing costs are just part of the costs included in the company's operating expenses. Income is generated from interest payments received from AOC's customers. Due to the strength of the Alberta economy and therefore a low level of loan write-offs, AOC's actual net cost to government for the past five-year period was $5.3 million in total, or just over a million dollars per year. Operating surpluses are retained by AOC to cover future loan losses and to fund future lending commitments. This in turn results in lower borrowing requirements from the general revenue fund.

The hon. member also suggested that businesses should or could use the services of a chartered bank or the Alberta Treasury Branch rather than the Alberta Opportunity Company. In both urban and rural areas AOC co-operates with lenders in the private sector to offer financial solutions to mutual clients. As well, a large percentage of loans approved by AOC are referrals from private-sector lenders who see some potential for the entrepreneurs but are unable to assist them due to their lending policies or other considerations. I'll remind members of this committee that since its inception AOC policy has clearly stated that financial assistance will not be provided when it's available in the private sector on reasonable terms and conditions. So to suggest that AOC is no longer needed in this province is incorrect. In fact, it may be needed more now than ever.

Alberta's rural economies are continually shifting and adapting in response to changes in the overall provincial economy, and one unfortunate constant through all of those shifts is the shortage of available financing for small businesses in these communities. We have witnessed the continued withdrawal of the major banks and other financial institutions from rural Alberta. We've seen their waning commitment to small business in general. So AOC's role as a facilitator of small business financing is more appropriate than ever. There are, of interest to this committee, more than 10,000 small businesses that have started or expanded through the assistance of AOC over the past 28 years. These 10,000 small businesses would be hard-pressed to agree that AOC has outgrown its mandate. I might also add that AOC has been very careful to avoid providing funding assistance that would result in either excessive competition to existing operators or an unfair advantage to its client. It is a fact that many a solid proposal has been turned down on this basis.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar also referenced that AOC deals with finances of more than a hundred million dollars. Let me be clear that AOC presently has a million-dollar loan cap, and under the proposed amendment the cap would be raised to $2 million. So this in no way approaches the $100 million mark referred to by the member.

As well, Mr. Chair, I wish to respond to points raised by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands. He suggested that the merger might in some way shift the focus of AFSC from providing the services it does to the farming community. The services of both AFSC and AOC will continue under the merged company of AFSC. Both of these strong organizations have dedicated staff and proud histories. By reducing administration and combining the business strengths of both, we are looking to enhance delivery of a one-window, made-in-Alberta financial solution.

So those are my comments for now, Mr. Chair. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks very much, Mr. Chairman. I wanted to make just a few comments. I know that our leader and the ag critic for the Official Opposition spoke on this issue and was in fact speaking to the bill in his response to the Speech from the Throne, because I remember quite well the points that he was raising around the possibilities both that were being taken away and also that might be opened up through the passage of this bill. I think the sponsoring member has made it quite clear what the government's aims for this are. Certainly we'd always be looking to support something that was an efficiency, that created a balance, that enhanced accessibility and choice in any sector that we're talking about.

Our concerns around what's happening here – and, actually, I was expecting an amendment to come forward from the government on this very topic I'm about to go into. Not only is it important that this new office not be used to grant loans when there's regular financing available, but the act should clearly direct the local approval officers not to approve a loan when the approval will introduce an imbalance, a disequilibrium in the local market. This I think is critical. We certainly have seen examples of this in the past where, you know, you can have a couple of businesses competing, a tight marketplace, and profits are pretty close to the line; nonetheless, they're all surviving. Then we get someone who comes in, direct competition, and they've got AOC financing. Well, that's the end of everybody. That really is creating an unlevel playing field.

If there's one thing I keep hearing from this government, it is how they like that level playing field. Well, then, I think you've got to be careful to make sure that you have not put things in place that can create an unlevel playing field. I was expecting, as I said, an amendment coming from the government. I believe that was an agreement or something that had been worked out between our ag critic and the sponsor of the bill and perhaps the Minister of Agriculture, Food and Rural Development as well; I'm not sure.

That's really our most consistent concern on what's being proposed in this bill: if we have a competitive situation existing already with a number of businesses providing a service or a product, the government should not create a subsidized business that goes in competition with the local self-financed businesses. That creates an unfairness. That is the government picking winners and losers or their agents picking winners and losers. One of the checkpoints on that is that if commercial lenders don't see an applicant's business plan as viable given local market conditions, then the Alberta Opportunity Company or the financial officers that are now involved in these new offices should not be approving this and disturbing the local equilibrium, or the local balance, or the local tension, between existing businesses any further.

That, as I said, was the concern that we in the Official Opposition most dreaded seeing as a result of this bill passing. Certainly we know that some sectors in the rural community have felt abandoned by this move. It was quite a topic of discussion during the by-election in Whitecourt.

AN HON. MEMBER: Wainwright.

MS BLAKEMAN: Wainwright. Sorry. Wainwright. Sorry about that.

MR. BONNER: George is still here.

MS BLAKEMAN: Sorry; I didn't get rid of somebody here.

You know, people were concerned that their local office would be closing and would be amalgamating, but I was reasonably convinced when I was told that in fact most of the increase had been coming by telephone and that there were going to be adequate telephone call centres to deal with any calls that were coming in from potential users of these offices. I think access is always an issue, particularly when we have such a vast land mass in Alberta, in trying to serve the various interests there. Anything that can be done to make that easier – and part of that is using available technology, frankly. Where we have the possibility for video teleconferencing or e-mail, use of web sites to get information out there, 1-800 numbers, we should be doing everything we can to facilitate that. In the voluntary sector we call it capacity building, so that all the participants have the capacity to participate in that arena.

I think that's what we want to see here, that people can still take advantage of the expertise that's being offered through these offices, but they may not be doing it face-to-face. They may be taking advantage of some other methods, some other routes of access perhaps that are even more cost efficient. But certainly we don't want anybody to feel that they got left out in the cold or that their interests aren't being taken into consideration here.

We are in Committee of the Whole. Perhaps I have spoken too soon and there will be someone bringing forward this amendment that I'm waiting for. I know that our critic for Agriculture, Food and Rural Development was certainly looking forward to that and has charged me with bringing forward those issues on his behalf.

So having put that on the record, Mr. Chairman, I'm very happy to take my seat and let others continue the debate.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Leduc.

MR. KLAPSTEIN: Mr. Chairman, I think I should respond to the comment that was made about an undertaking or understanding that we would be bringing forward an amendment. I'm not aware of that kind of an arrangement, but what I do have is a copy of a notice of amendment that came from the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East, and I did pass word over to opposition members this afternoon saying that we would be rejecting that amendment if it did come to the floor. So I guess I'll leave it to the hon. member to decide whether she wishes to put the amendment on the floor, and then I could speak to it. I have a copy if you want it.

[The clauses of Bill 7 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Opposed? Carried.

Bill 14 Gaming and Liquor Amendment Act, 2002

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill? The hon. Minister of Gaming.

MR. STEVENS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I do have some comments I'd like to make at the beginning of committee on Bill 14, and these comments essentially deal with points that were raised by members during debate in second reading.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, I'd like to emphasize that this government strongly supports a unique charitable gaming model. We have and we will continue to support it. Members opposite and all Albertans can be assured that Bill 14 will only strengthen our adherence to the charitable gaming model. Secondly, integrity is paramount in the Ministry of Gaming. The amendments that Bill 14 proposes to the current legislation all serve to enhance the integrity of gaming and liquor activities in Alberta. Albertans deserve nothing less, and we are committed to maintaining the trust that they have placed in us.

Mr. Chairman, I'm going to now speak briefly on some of the specific concerns that were raised by members who spoke during second reading. One of the queries had to do with what sort of consultation went into the gaming licensing policy review. I can say that the word that best describes it is extensive. We have had a large number of stakeholders, and they were most definitely consulted. As for specific groups, they would include the public, charities, the Federation of Alberta Bingo Associations, casino operators, police, AADAC, AUMA, AAMD and C, the Alberta Gaming Industry Association, the Alberta Hotel & Lodging Association, the Alberta Restaurant and Foodservices Association, and indeed the list goes on. A complete listing of the groups consulted is available on the Gaming web site at www.gaming.gov.ab.ca. The specific groups consulted for the purposes of Bill 14 include many of the names which I have just set out as well as the Alberta Liquor Industry Roundtable and various municipal governments.

Another area of confusion was that extended hours of bingo operation would lead to more paid staff, which would lead to organizations not having the same volunteer presence, which would lead to the government removing part of the proceeds raised. Mr. Chairman, I'm not completely sure of the logic behind this statement, but let me clarify by saying that hours of operations for casinos and bingos have not been changed for some time, and we're not looking at extending them anytime in the near future. As for the latter part of the argument, I don't know how often I need to repeat this, but we in Gaming wish to ensure maximum returns to charities. That is definitely part of our mandate, and that has not changed with respect to the new policies and this proposed legislation.

Another point raised by an hon. member had to do with the social costs of gambling, including research and benchmarks. Let me assure you that we take our commitment to social responsibility very seriously, and we've backed that up in a number of important ways. The first obviously is through our funding of AADAC, funded entirely by the Alberta lottery fund, to the tune of over $47 million. We will continue to support them in their valuable work in helping those with alcohol or gambling problems.

The second is through the ongoing support of the Alberta Gaming Research Institute. The institute is currently undertaking a variety of studies on issues surrounding gaming, and I know that they're paying special attention to the social costs of gambling, on which there is a dearth of scientific factual information worldwide. This kind of research can't be done overnight, and I would urge the hon. members opposite to give the institute the time to complete their research and to provide us with their findings.

I know that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre has in the last couple of months attended a seminar here in Edmonton that was put on by the institute, and I thank her for showing that interest. I also know, in talking to members of the institute, that while they are in their early days in this particular initiative – it's about three years old – and while there has not yet been the fruit of a great deal of published material, the institute and the people who are associated with the institute have gained a reputation, a very good reputation, and are known throughout Canada for doing very good work in this area. So I think that we in Alberta have something to be very proud of as it relates to being at the forefront of research with respect to issues associated with gaming and gambling.

Mr. Chairman, there also appeared to be some confusion with respect to provisions dealing with gaming patrons who are apparently intoxicated. Some hon. members felt that there were different standards being applied to casino workers as opposed to standards currently applied to staff of bars and lounges. Section 91 of the gaming and liquor regulations clearly states that it is an offence to sell or provide alcohol to an intoxicated person. I understand that staff of a licensed facility cannot be responsible for the behaviour of patrons prior to their arrival at the licensed facility, but once that person arrives, staff are responsible for meeting the provisions of the licence. The provision of Bill 14 would make it an offence for someone who is “apparently intoxicated” – that is, someone who has had too much to drink – to participate “in a gaming activity.” This additional provision merely reinforces our commitment to social responsibility, and it applies across the board to any licensed facility offering gaming activities, be it a casino, a bingo association, or a bar.

In conjunction with this, Mr. Chairman, there were questions raised about enforcement provisions. The Alberta Gaming and Liquor Commission employs a large number of inspectors, whose job it is to enforce the provisions of the Gaming and Liquor Act and regulations. The police are also designated as inspectors under the Gaming and Liquor Act. Between our inspectors and the police we do an excellent job of making sure that licensees follow the rules, and the provisions for apparently intoxicated gamblers will be another part of our enforcement role. Anyone who doubts this is free to take a look at the AGLC web site, where they’ll find a searchable database of infractions and penalties applied against licensees who didn’t follow the rules.

A bit later in the debate a question was posed as to whether or not we would consider having on-site enforcement staff. The answer to this is no. However, other options are available to us, and we are pursuing those. We have in place for staff of licensed premises programs covering responsible alcohol service and some of the warning signs of problem gambling. All of this adds up to effective enforcement, Mr. Chairman, and we will continue to operate this way into the future.

I heard a number of times, Mr. Chairman, that some hon. members question the amount of scrutiny that goes into gaming and liquor activities in the province. Once again let me assure you that integrity is paramount, and Bill 14 strengthens the AGLC’s regulatory authority, including expanding the reach of the background inquiries we are able to do, increasing fines for those in violation, and increasing the authority of the inspectors.

Maximizing returns to charities comes up again with questions about the option involving private operators being given facility licences for bingo. Our reasoning behind this is that the private operator concept may help to increase revenues to charities. As you know, other than a small licensing fee, all bingo revenues go to the charitable organizations. By allowing bingo licensees, which are charities, the option of involving private operators with their ability to invest in capital projects and improvements, we see the bar being raised for bingos and returns improving to charities who run bingo events. Volunteers will be able to spend more time on volunteer duties as opposed to operating what in some cases are multimillion dollar businesses. I want to reiterate, Mr. Chairman, that it will be up to the individual bingo associations if they wish to become involved with a private operator, and the AGLC will ensure that there are guaranteed returns to the charities.

Another question had to do with the option of bingos hiring paid staff, the suggestion that this would lead to the government removing part of the proceeds raised by charitable groups and facilities that choose to go this route. Nothing could be further from the truth, Mr. Chairman. It goes back to the charitable gaming model. Bingo associations are free to hire paid workers as long as they maintain their controlled expenses, which cannot exceed 10 percent of the gross revenue. The option of paid workers alleviates volunteer burnout and focuses on current business practices. Again bingo associations will be free to decide on their own if they want to go this route. All of the bingo changes stem from the reality that bingo has been a declining industry, Mr. Chairman. Members of the industry have expressed the need to have more options and flexibility. These changes to the Gaming and Liquor Act facilitate that request.

Something else that seemed to be of concern was the change in definition of VLTs and where this could lead. What this does, Mr. Chairman, is address a judicially recognized flaw in the current definition and assist the AGLC and law enforcement agencies to enforce legislation around illegal electronic gaming terminals, including slot machines and VLTs.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, there were some comments made with respect to the privative clause which is included in Bill 14. Again there seems to be some concern in certain quarters. I think it might be appropriate to explain the board hearing process. When an inspector or police officer finds evidence of a violation, the licensee is offered a specified penalty. The licensee can agree to the specified penalty, or they may choose to go before a hearing panel, an impartial panel, of the board of the AGLC. The hearing panel is an administrative tribunal, not a court of law and is not bound by formal rules of evidence. At the hearing the AGLC’s regulatory division presents its case, including witnesses. The licensee and members of the hearing panel are entitled to ask questions. The licensee then goes through the same process, including presenting witnesses and responding to questions. Both parties are allowed a summation at the end of the proceedings, after which the hearing panel takes a recess to make their decision.

The proposed amendment still gives licensees the right to ask for a board hearing. This just signals to the courts that the Legislature intended for the board to have wide jurisdiction over gaming and liquor activities in the province. It makes sense that those with the most knowledge over gaming and liquor operations would be deferred to in these instances. This is not shirking of responsibility that’s being portrayed.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, Bill 14 is intended to do a number of things, not the least of which is to ensure the integrity of gaming and liquor activities in Alberta. I believe I have addressed each of the specific concerns that were raised by members opposite in debate, and I look forward to your further comments on Bill 14.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Well, I’m glad to be able to get into Committee of the Whole on Bill 14, the Gaming and Liquor Amendment Act, 2002. Of course, this is our opportunity to go clause by clause, even word by word through the bill, and I would like to go through and talk about questions or concerns that have been raised in a number of areas.

[Mr. Klapstein in the chair]

Let me start out by saying that I appreciate the minister attempting to answer the questions or issues that were raised previously and also to answer what seems to be a query from him. In most cases we do understand what the government is doing; we just disagree with it. Certainly we’re entitled to disagree with the choices that are being made here.

9:40

As well, there’s a great deal of mistrust from the charities that I work with and, I’ll admit, from myself about where the directions and the changes in directions are going as far as gaming in this province. The minister frequently talks about his commitment to the charitable gaming model in Alberta, and I understand what he is saying. I hope he understands what I’m saying, because I see steps away from a charitable gaming model. I see charities getting as a percentage of the whole less and less money, not more and more money. I appreciate his taking the time to answer each of the questions that we did put forward. Nonetheless, I will continue to raise the issues and concerns that have been brought to me.

I understand that there were three approaches to this bill, and I did receive a briefing from the minister and his staff. He did not allow us to keep the briefing documents, as is usual when a critic meets with their minister, so I did the best I could in taking notes very quickly in going through an awful lot of information. Occasionally I miss something, and I'll admit to that. Nonetheless, in some cases I want to get the question and the answer on the record.

When I look at section 2, which is amending section 1(1), what we've done here is expand what the facility licence can do. Previously we had: a licence "that authorizes a person to operate a facility for gaming activities that are authorized by a gaming licence." Now we're being more expansive and more particular: "gaming activities that are authorized by gaming licence" and "provincial lotteries." So there has been an expansion of what that licence covers at this point. This may well be a housekeeping reason, that perhaps the legislation needed to capture operators of the Mac's store and 7-Eleven and things that were operating provincial lottery ticket sales. Perhaps that's the reason for it. I'm sure the minister can answer that.

I still have a suspicion about capturing the VLTs and slot machines and any other electronic form of gambling under the terminology of "gaming terminal." I'll admit that my suspicions are around gaming rooms. Now, there's no mention in this legislation about gaming rooms, but I know that they were raised during the consultations. I know that they're hovering around there in the background, and I'm not hearing anything more specific about them. Part of my suspicion was around changing the terminology to get away from the stigma that was attached to VLTs, in particular. Also, if you change the terminology, perhaps certain stigma and also certain rules don't apply to you anymore if you're talking about a different term for something. Certainly this government is expert at spinning and giving a different interpretation to language than it previously held. So that's part of where my concern around "gaming terminal" is coming from. I hear the minister saying that this is to correct something in legal language to allow enforcement officers to better deal with this, but I just want it on the record that I'm still deeply suspicious about whether this is to allow something to do with gaming rooms and allowing the proliferation of these machines in a gaming room.

I'm still under section 1(1). In the amending act it's section 2(c): repealing clause (k) and substituting the following. Essentially what we're doing is adding in "other than a person specified in the regulations." Now, this used to refer to an employee or an agent of the commission or to any other person, so I'm wondering: what's the specificity of this? Again it may just be housekeeping, and that's fine. Let's just get it on the record.

Now, when I look at section 3, which is amending section 9, this is where we are striking out the five-member board and creating a seven-member board. My memory from the briefing was that quite a bit of time was spent on that and that it was to give better representation and control, but I'm wondering if the minister could answer what positions got added. What was anticipated there that would be covered that wasn't before with the five-member committee?

I also note the department's approach in section 3 at(1.1), where the Lieutenant Governor is appointing the following as members of the board:

- (a) the person holding the position of Deputy Minister . . .
- (b) the person holding the position of chief executive officer of the Commission, or that person could be both of those. This is, I think, part of what is supposed to be a control function, and I'm just wondering why the act anticipated it would need more control, particularly here. This may well be referring back to issues that were raised by the Auditor General. Fine. If that's where it came from, I just want to know.

Now, I didn't have any questions that were raised on section 4 or 5, and 6 again is referring to the appointment and delegation to that deputy minister or the chair of the board.

In section 7 we're adding in application fees. Previously it read, "All fees for licences and registrations provided by the Commission." Now "all fees for licences" is replaced by "all application fees, all fees for licences." So that's being added into what's payable to the commission and deposited into the commission's accounts. I'm just wondering why that got added in here. Was it missed before and therefore extraordinary measures had to be made to account for the auditing of those application fees? I'm assuming this is housekeeping. I'm just looking for confirmation on that.

Then we have some switching around, where sections have been deleted and they're put in differently.

We have quite a bit of new additions under section 10, which is amending section 26(2). It's talking about "the Commission may pay from the revenue deposited into its accounts under subsection (1)," and what's been added into that is:

- (b) the amount the Commission pays for liquor,
- (c) an amount for deposits and charges relating to containers under the Beverage Container Recycling Regulation . . .
- (e) the Commission's operating expenses, including the portion of the operating expenses of the Western Canada Lottery Corporation that is attributable to the Province of Alberta and expenses that result from business decisions by the Commission that require additional expenditures, and
- (f) any amounts determined by the Commission to be paid as commissions to gaming licensees at whose gaming activities the Commission conducts and manages provincial lotteries pursuant to section 43.

We've got four new sections that are added in there, and I'm seeing something here. I guess I'm looking for clarification. When I look at the budget documents that are coming out this year and I look at what's happening here, it looks like we used to have figures netted out when they appeared in the Gaming ministry's budget, and this is now starting to look like we're going to have both sides reported and a flow-through. So I'm looking for confirmation on whether that's the expectation here; in other words, all moneys received would show as revenue coming in, and then all expenses going out would be shown. Generally, we haven't seen these kinds of numbers before, so that may well be what's happening. Okay. Again let's just get it on the record.

Section 12 generated a fair bit of comment from myself and others during the debate in second reading. This is about minors in a licensed facility. Again I'm wondering how any of this could relate to these gaming rooms that are anticipated eventually to be opening up in Alberta. I understand that this is trying to keep a minor out of any place where there's electronic gaming going on, so any of the gaming machines; in other words, slot machines and VLTs. In particular at this point that puts us into a casino or a racing entertainment centre. Racing entertainment centres at this point are connected only to racetracks, but I'm wondering if there's an anticipation there that they would show up in some other place as well.

When we look at the duty to an intoxicated person, which is still under section 12, 37.2, I'm wondering what resources are being committed here. This seems to be an add-on or a new expectation of gaming staff, because of course in the past people were not allowed to drink in gaming establishments. That's been changed over the last – well, I've been here six years, so it was changed a couple of years before that, but this is the first time we've had this expectation put into law on to the gaming workers. So again I'm looking to what resources are going to be made available to them for training. The minister mentioned the training that's offered to the liquor dispensing staff that one would expect in bars and restaurants. Is that the training that will then be offered to these gaming staff as well? Maybe they're already doing that, but I'm wondering where the resources are committed.

As well, where are the resources on monitoring and enforcement for this? It's easy for the government to put rules and regulations into a piece of legislation, but if there's no commitment to the resources to monitor what the rules are and to enforce them when there's an infraction that is determined through the monitoring, then we have nothing. We have a rule that nobody ever makes sure anyone is held to account for, and that doesn't move us along at all. It actually eventually encourages breaking of the law: nobody's going to catch us, so why bother? So what is the commitment of the Gaming ministry to monitoring and enforcement on any of the issues that are turning up in this legislation?

Under section 13 we're talking about gaming workers. Now, I had asked the minister a question sometime in the last three weeks about VLT technicians being classified as inspectors to be able to go into gaming establishments and fix the VLTs. The title of inspector or the classification of inspector put them in a position where the staff of the gaming establishment should be helping them, where they could require them to help them rather than to interfere with them, which sometimes is the case. Interestingly that seemed to come also with a requirement that the VLT technicians are considered essential workers. I found that very curious, that someone who fixes an electronic gaming machine, a VLT or a slot machine, is so essential to the running of government or to – what? – law and order that they have to be determined to be an essential worker. I'm looking for further explanation on that. I don't think we should be taking away a person's right to strike because the government relies on them to suck money out of a machine, and I think we need to be very careful about those designations.

There is some housekeeping and I think probably wanted legislation about the issuing of retail liquor store licences to applicants. The business has to be separate from the other business, and that's getting around those box stores that offer very high volume liquor outlets and are causing some amount of problem to local small businesspeople.

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

Now, one of the issues that was raised with me – and I'm looking at section 20 in the bill, which is repealing and substituting section 80 of the original act – is around the markups on the liquor and how the commission sells liquor, the delivery of it, and that sort of thing. I have a number of small businesspeople that might own one or two liquor stores in Edmonton-Centre. I'm sure most MLAs do at this point. This businessperson was very frustrated with what he perceived as a bottleneck in that flow. He felt that it was because it was a monopoly, which then sort of didn't play fair, didn't allow the flow through and back of what should be happening here. He felt that the privatization had indeed increased the variety of what was available, and he was very supportive of the free market and open competition for the retail and import, but with only one warehouse and everybody having to work through that warehouse, that created a monopoly. He felt that it bottlenecked it, that even if there was a monopoly in a situation, it should then be forced by the government to not be allowed to act like a monopoly. It had to be more fair and more willing to work reasonably with the suppliers. He felt that because this was a monopoly, it had no competition. You know, like Air Canada, it just made the rules, and you had to follow them whether they were reasonable or not, whether it was good for your business or not. He felt that that meant there was no flexibility.

For example, he has been told, you know, that he can only place an order on a Monday or a Wednesday. Well, I mean, in downtown we have a lot of hotels, the Convention Centre even, and they can get last-minute bookings. What if he got a booking on a Thursday? If it had happened on a Friday, well, he's now missed his ordering date, and it sounds like working through this warehouse, that's it; sorry. He's just not allowed to order because he's now missed his ordering date, and it's that kind of inflexibility that he's finding very frustrating. He feels that in some cases that's why we have antitrust laws that are available federally and that kind of thing should be looked at provincially. So that's pertaining to that section.

A lot of the rest of what's in the bill, especially when we get into the liquor sections, is housekeeping, and I'm presuming that the sections about appointing a receiver and continuing to operate the business and/or requiring that someone that's holding proceeds should be passing those proceeds on to another charity are just to keep everything moving and operating and to allow the charities to continue to have access to the activities.

I'm going to run out of time again, so I may look to rise again. I think we do want to preserve the unique charitable gaming model in Alberta. That's very important, but I think there have been choices made in the last 10 years that's made that more difficult.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Minister of Gaming.

MR. STEVENS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'd like to address some of the issues that were raised by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre. The first comment that was made is that the charitable model doesn't seem to be providing the returns to charities. In fact, if you take a look at what's happened over the last several years, the amount of money that the charities are earning as a result of licences for casinos, bingos, and raffles has gone up dramatically. While I don't have the information specifically in front of me, I believe that for the year ended March of this year, we'll probably find that it will be something in the order of $190 million that they have earned. If you go back to March of 2001, you will find it's $183 million. If you go back five or six years, you will find that at that point in time the charities were earning something in the order of $95 million to $100 million as a result of those particular licences. So in fact there has been a dramatic uptick in the amount of money that has been generated for charities that avail themselves of casino, bingo, and raffle licences.

Now, with respect to some of the specifics, a comment was made with respect to section 2(a), dealing with the definition of facility licence. This section is amended to recognize that provincial lotteries – that is, slots and VLTs – are also conducted by the government in licensed facilities. For example, racing entertainment centres can only conduct provincial lottery schemes; that is, slot machines.

A comment was made with respect to the definition of gaming terminal, which is replacing a video lottery terminal, if I recall. This particular definition once again deals with a judicially recognized flaw. The hon. member referred to gaming rooms or VLT gaming entertainment rooms that are part of the policy that was brought in in the last few months. I would encourage the member to look at the policy of the AGLC. That is where you will find the particulars with respect to gaming rooms. It is there in extensive detail, and it's just simply a matter of going to the AGLC web site, where you will find all I would ever know about what is expected of the VLT gaming entertainment rooms.

With respect to 2(c), "gaming worker," this new definition will include workers paid to assist facility licensees, slot cashiers. The current definition does not address these workers, so I think in the scheme of things it is a technical type of definition change.

There was a question with respect to 3(a), which is increasing the number of the board from five to seven. Quite frankly, the board at five works very hard. They meet on a regular basis. There are a number of hearings. What we want to do is expand the board from five to seven in order to share the load more evenly and also to ensure that we have a broader skill set of people who are on the board simply by virtue of adding additional parties. It seems to me that there will be greater efficiency in dealing with hearings and it will provide for better representation.

There was a reference to 3(b). That particular amendment entrenches the current roles and responsibilities of the chair, CEO, and deputy minister, so it's a reflection of what is. The same is true of the question with respect to section 6.

The application fee that is being added in 7(a) would refer to something, for example, in the new policy with respect to casinos. There are application fees associated with that, so the specific concept of an application fee is different than licence fees and is from my perspective technical in nature to simply reflect that aspect of the business which has an application fee as opposed to licence fees.

Under section 10 this particular provision basically reflects the fact that the Alberta Gaming and Liquor Commission operates as one entity dealing with both liquor and gaming activities. In this government the AGLC is considered a commercial enterprise and as a commercial enterprise should have the ability to make business decisions so that you can make expenditures to generate revenue or to protect current revenue streams. The Auditor General has in one part of the change questioned whether payments to charities of a share of the slot machine revenues constitutes a valid retailer commission. So we're putting in there very clearly for the Auditor General that that is a permissible payment.

There's another one dealing with the Western Canada Lottery Corporation. The AGLC incurs operating expenses for ticket lotteries that it conducts as a partner in the WCLC, so that is why that particular change is in there.

Reference was once again made to gaming rooms in section 12. The change here deals with minors in licensed facilities and the wording for that. There are specific ones that are set out, a casino and a racing entertainment centre, where minors may not enter. Otherwise, it's by licence condition. The fact is that it's going to continue to be ongoing policy. VLT gaming rooms will by nature involve electronic machines which necessitate 18 or older as a condition. So that's going to be the case. There is the possibility that there will be gaming facilities other than casinos, such as bingo halls or perhaps some kind of facility, in the future where it would not be objectionable to allow minors in. The hon. member knows that there are bingo halls in church basements, for example, where minors are allowed, and we certainly intend to continue that type of practice.

With respect to the resources that we're going to devote to allegedly intoxicated patrons of gaming establishments, we have inspectors at this point in time who are trained to observe these things. It's a matter of expanding their scope to include this new provision. They will as a matter of routine be checking that out. As the member rightly noted, there are training programs both for the liquor industry and the gaming industry which address these issues, and we intend to continue those into the future to ensure that all, in this particular case, gaming workers are trained in the area so that they understand their responsibilities.

A comment was made with respect to section 13, and that particular provision basically is as put in. Most gaming workers are hired by facility licensees, who should take responsibility for ensuring that they're registered. It's really a question of where you put the onus. We're saying to the facility licensee under this change that they should ensure that the people who work for them as gaming workers in fact are registered.

Reference was made to the contract involving workers at the AGLC. There is a history with respect to the contract of the AGLC and its predecessor to have a no-strike provision with respect to their workers. It's a part of the negotiation. It's not a matter of legislation. It's something that's negotiated. There's a history there, and it continues to this date.

In section 16 this is basically current policy which has been moved from regulation to legislation. So if you look in the current regulations, you'll find this wording.

In section 20, dealing with markup, all liquor in Alberta must be sold by or on behalf of the commission, and the commission imposes a markup or profit on the liquor. That is the way it is done, so it is current practice. The Supreme Court of Canada has acknowledged that a markup is valid and within the authority of the province, so this change is being done in order to clarify for anyone who might doubt exactly what we are doing that this particular process is in accordance with what is permitted within the jurisdiction of the province by way of a markup.

Reference was made to a bottleneck in the system, and I must say that that's news to me. At one point in time in the past, a distant past before my time, there were warehouse issues. Connect Logistics is the private company that now has the contract, and I am told that they have done such a good job that there is faith within the retailer group that they can place their order and get delivery of that order on a timely basis. So if your constituent has a concern, I'd be happy to hear about it, because truly that is the first one that I've heard of at all indicating that there is any issue whatsoever with respect to warehousing.

Lastly, the provision with respect to receiver/manager of the casino in the event of a problem with respect to licensing is an important one. As the hon. member knows, our charities plan ahead some 18 to 22 months in order to have a licence. There are many workers who work there, and it would be indeed very disruptive and very damaging to many people if in fact we could not in appropriate circumstances step in to operate the casino, for example, in order to maintain those licences, in order to maintain that employment for the benefit of the charitable model.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks. I just want to raise three quick points that I didn't get to before and one in response to the minister's comments. The first is around the expansion of the facility licence and who is able to get that. Now, I understand that in fact this is actually turning up in the regs, but it is connected to what's happening here. What I'm getting very clearly from the organizations – and I think this is supported by FABA – is that the charities really want that control if they are the facility licensee. They don't really want to relinquish that control to a landlord who can then decide to turf them or to bring in games that they don't approve of or any number of other things. I can see that the minister anticipates that this would be a partnership, but what I'm getting from the groups is that they're very unhappy about the thought of losing control of what's happening here.

The second issue I wanted to raise is that the minister pointed out – actually he was responding to my points around the social costs of gambling – that there is $47 million of a $1.1 billion budget that goes to the treatment of problem gambling, plus an additional amount of money that's going to the Alberta Gaming Research Institute. I appreciate that there is funding for both of those two. I feel very strongly that the funding for that should be tied as a percentage of the total amount of money in the lottery fund. I think there is much more potential there for AADAC to be treating people that they're not even aware of at this point because their resources are limited. If we're making that much money, I think that AADAC in particular needs to be tied as a percentage of the whole. If we're going to be investigating or researching the effects of gaming and perhaps problem gaming, I would argue for at least a percentage for the Gaming Research Institute.

The third question is the ongoing disagreement between the minister and I about the charities getting more money. Once again – I'm sure that the minister's hearing is acute, and I can see that he's got his headphone in – I'm saying very clearly that the percentage of money against the total that the charities are receiving has decreased, and I don't think he can come up with the figures that are going to show me different, because I know different. The percentage of the whole – I mean, 15 years ago charities were taking 80 percent of the pot. When we brought in the VLTs and all of a sudden it skyrocketed to a billion dollars a year, charities aren't getting 80 percent of that anymore. They're down to, like, 6 percent of the total take, and my argument here is that there are expectations, certainly from the government, who has downloaded a number of programs onto the charities and then expects them to do it. They don't have access to as much money as they need to be able to do it. So that's my argument here.

I can see there are other people anxious to get into the debate here, so I will give way to them, but I wanted to raise those last couple of points. I look forward to further debate. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I want to raise one particular question now and get the minister's comments, and it has to do with section 21, which repeals section 91 of the current act and replaces it. It talks about the suspension and cancellation of liquor licences. Now, this has been a matter of some concern I know in Edmonton, and I imagine it may in fact be a concern in parts of Calgary or perhaps other parts of the province, and it has to do with how the board deals with problematic licences. I'm thinking of a number of hotels. There are a couple in particular in the city of Edmonton that continue to be a serious problem for the community. There are a very large number of calls for service to the Edmonton Police Service at these premises, and there are cases of drugs being sold, constant fights, constant overserving, prostitution. There are any number of ongoing difficulties.

Some of these premises have been developing a very long list of calls for service, in some cases convictions – I'm not sure how many – against anybody who might be an employee of the hotel but certainly against people who are patrons. There has been a real concern that the board considers these things to be just routine, a matter of doing business. The city of Edmonton has attempted to use its licensing power – and it does have the power to license businesses, including special business licences for the serving of tobacco or the serving of liquor or so on – to get some leverage with these premises in order to get them to clean up their act, but it certainly doesn't have the same powers as the Gaming and Liquor Commission.

When I sat on the executive committee of city council several years ago, we had some officials of the Gaming and Liquor Commission before us, and we questioned them quite closely on the policies that they follow with respect to this kind of thing. It appeared to us that they were extremely reluctant to lift the licences of these establishments even when there was a long, established history of problems with the operation of those premises and violations in many cases of their licence issued by the province. So I would be very interested under this particular section to hear from the minister how he sees this being interpreted and what role he plays relative to the policies of the Gaming and Liquor Commission and whether or not he's able to assist communities, particularly some inner-city communities, to try and clean up their neighbourhoods.

Now, we have a situation in those communities where these premises, particularly two or three hotels in the city, create a very strong locus of decay because they harm other business activities. The clientele that is drawn to them and the condition the clientele is sometimes in, the activities the clientele is involved in turn away customers, so it brings down the value of the commercial property in the area. They are related to social problems. Very often when we have break-ins in communities, they are young people whose parents are either gambling or drinking in these establishments during the day. So these establishments bear, at least in the community's view and in my view as well, a significant responsibility for some of the urban decay that these communities are battling. They significantly impact communities, and it doesn't seem like the Gaming and Liquor Commission takes what I would say is its community responsibility seriously enough.

They have the powers, Mr. Chairman, to force these businesses to clean up their act and become good community citizens, yet they don't seem to use them. So I would certainly be interested in the minister's comments with respect to the application of the section dealing with the suspension of licences. It states that there are a number of things that can be done: issuing a warning, imposing conditions on the licence, imposing a fine and refusing to issue or reinstate a licence until the fine is paid, suspending or canceling the licence. It can have an investigation where there has been a charge but not necessarily a conviction. So I think that I would appreciate hearing from the minister in respect to this matter.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. minister.

MR. STEVENS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Briefly, I can say that a member or members of the AGLC have worked with other stakeholders in the city of Edmonton, for example, the city police, city council, business organizations, dealing with issues associated with alcohol and alcohol serving and so on and so forth. This has been going on, to my knowledge, for some time. I believe they meet monthly. So, for example, last year when there was an issue in this city with respect to Canada Day, it wasn't a matter of the AGLC getting involved after the fact. They'd been working with the members that I've alluded to and perhaps others prior to that point in time. So they're very involved with this particular community associated with issues that may arise as a result of the mandate of the AGLC, which of course is gaming and liquor.

With respect to this particular provision generally, obviously it deals with the suspension and cancellation of licences by the board where there has been a transgression. In my response to Edmonton-Centre I indicated that you can go onto the AGLC web site and find out exactly who has been charged and what the penalties are. I can tell you that the AGLC takes their responsibility very seriously. They have a number of inspectors who are out there on a regular basis. It's not a matter of just simply notifying the proprietors that they're there. These folks do surprise inspections. They do surveillance and all of that type of thing.

I'd also point out to the hon. member that under the provisions of this legislation the city of Edmonton police are also inspectors, so any powers that are associated with this particular legislation can be used by the city of Edmonton police in enforcing the kind of situations that may arise in your neighbourhood or other neighbourhoods in the city. From my perspective, the AGLC take their responsibilities very seriously. They are a good corporate member in this city and do work with others to try and address the kinds of issues that you have talked about.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm pleased to have an opportunity at the committee stage to make a few comments and ask some questions about Bill 14, the Gaming and Liquor Amendment Act, 2002. I would return to the comments about the name change and whether it isn't an attempt to take away from the language usage terms that many Albertans find inflammatory, like video lottery terminal. The government has a history of trying to use language to its advantage. We learned that in health care, where an overnight surgical facility replaced hospital and where budget cuts were replaced with cost containment. So the manipulation of language I think is important, and I listened to the minister's explanations, and I still can't say that I understand why the change has been made in the act that the definition of video lottery terminal has been removed.

A couple of general comments about the section that deals with minors. I applaud the government for having the section in there, as I do with the section with gamblers who are intoxicated being prohibited. But the whole notion of enforcement has been raised, and again I'm not certain that I feel very confident that the problem is going to be adequately dealt with when it comes down to someone working in an establishment actually having to take action to remove either a minor or someone who has been too long at the bar. I wouldn't mind the minister making some further comment rather than what he has already done in terms of those two situations. It seems to me that if you have a worker who is being paid minimum wage and is being fed some fairly substantial gratuities from a gambler who has been too long at the bar, then it's not very likely that any action is going to be taken against that gambler.

I'd like to drop back to amendment 14 and 15, where "video lottery" terminal is replaced with "gaming" so that sections governing the sale, advertising, and distribution of these gaming terminals are consistent and also the section prohibiting legal action in the case of removal of the gaming terminals is reworded. I think we run into the problem here that given the new gaming terminal descriptor, it's going to be difficult to determine if we are selling slots or VLTs or any other new piece of equipment on the market, and I think that that's unfortunate.

Sections 17 and 18 are fairly straightforward: you shall not water the booze with water or any other liquid. If you look under I think amendment 21, the board has the right to investigate, suspend, and cancel if a licensee is charged or convicted with offences under the act, or action can be commenced if a licensee or registrant acts contrary to the public interest or tarnishes the good name of gaming in Alberta. The increase in fines there from $100,000 to $200,000 is probably minimal in the cases where it would be applied, but I think it's a good move. Fines of $200,000 may seem minimal, but if multiple charges were laid, it could be viewed as a real deterrent, so I think we'd agree that that's a good amendment.

I guess the underlying question with section 23 and the changes that are made there is that the section is repealed and rewritten to limit the sanctions in the event of a licensee becoming ineligible, and the actions are going to be limited to the actions of the licensee or registrant or an employee or associate of the licensee or registrant. Managers, corporate employees, agents, shareholders, directors, officers, and employees of corporations are no longer explicitly included in this subsection, and it would seem then that the intent of this is to limit corporate liability. If managers and CEOs aren't associates, I guess the question then is: who does qualify? So I think the purpose of amendment 23 could be made clearer.

Section 25 provides an additional 30 days before having to hold a hearing with respect to the seizure of liquor or gaming terminals, et cetera.

Well, maybe that's far enough for me to go right now, Mr. Chairman. I think there has been some discussion and probably the privative clause of the legislation needs to be debated even more, but that may be appropriate at another time, so I'll leave it there.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Opposed? Carried.

Bill 20 Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2002

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks very much, Mr. Chairman. I'm pleased to be able to get some time this evening to speak in Committee of the Whole to Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act. When I had spoken to it in second, I wasn't able to complete my comments, and I'm going to take advantage of the time here tonight to raise some more of the issues that I had intended to raise during second.

Since we have an opportunity in Committee of the Whole to examine things in a more detailed manner, clause by clause, word by word, I'm going to look at doing that in some cases here. Essentially I'd like to do some cleanup from when I spoke in second reading on Monday, April 8, some additional comments and notes very briefly on the Survival of Actions Act and Fatal Accidents Act and a possible amendment that I'm considering around that; secondly, to look at the sections that are being proposed in this Bill 20 on victims of crime and the changes to the Limitations Act and to the Public Trustee Act and Civil Enforcement Act.

As I think most people are aware, there's certainly been quite a bit of opposing views on Bill 20, particularly around the amendments to the Fatal Accidents Act and the Survival of Actions Act. Certainly since I've spoken, I've heard from a number of people, including a former Liberal MLA who is now working in this area and took some umbrage at what I had said, but I still stand behind my comments that I made during second reading.

One of the things that I think should be made clear here is that when the courts are dealing with a tort claim or claims where someone has suffered a loss as a result of someone else's wrongful act, the courts do have jurisdiction over punitive or exemplary damages. I didn't intend to convey in any way that I didn't believe they should have that ability; they do. They certainly don't use this ability routinely. They use it sparingly, but when they do use it, they do use it to signal the court's very strong disapproval of something that they consider particularly reckless or egregious by a wrongdoer.

I'm very comfortable and the Official Opposition is very comfortable that the court retains the authority and jurisdiction to award those punitive costs. That's absolutely appropriate. I think where I'm less comfortable is in extending that kind of punitive award in the fashion that the existing Survival of Actions Act does now. That's where I'm not comfortable. You know, the courts interpret the legislation that we put in front of them, and if we don't write clear legislation, we put the courts in a position where they have to interpret. Sometimes they make it clear that they feel that we should have done a better job.

I don't know if that is the case with what happened during the Baddeley case here. I'm not a lawyer; I can't comment on that. But it's certainly back in our court. I think we need to do the right thing to make sure that we are absolutely clear on what we intend the courts to do around this, and that is that it should not be used for people who are not dependants of the person who's died as a result of a wrongful act. It should not be used for those people that aren't dependants to get themselves a windfall in some way. If they wouldn't have regularly benefited from the earnings of the person who's deceased, then why should they be able to do it after death? There are just too many unknowns there and too many things that have to line up to make all of this come true. It just doesn't sit well with me. So I think what we have to do is make clear legislation and give judges the tools to do the work that they do so well.

One of the last issues that I want raise on these two bills is that the relationship language has not been updated here. I know that we are considering an update and a clearer definition in a lot of the family law statutes. Nonetheless, I felt that when we had this bill open, that clarification should have been updated and made clearer here. We had the opportunity to do it right, and we didn't. Well, sorry; we're in Committee of the Whole, and we still have an opportunity to change that. Maybe I can talk the minister into doing it. This legislation still says "cohabitant," and that's not good enough in this day and age, particularly where this is legislation that is allowing dependent people to look after themselves. Why on earth would we be denying that to anyone that's in a same-sex relationship? They want to take advantage of what's there; they want access to the same remedies and benefits. Why on earth would we be saying no? So that's a disappointment there.

Now I'd like to go on. The other thing that I am going to bring forward while we're in Committee of the Whole is an amendment that's restoring the five-year review of the amounts of damages in the Fatal Accidents Act. I can talk more about that at the time I introduce it, probably the next time I stand during Committee of the Whole on Bill 20.

I think this government does not have a good track record in going back on a regular basis and reviewing legislation. They tend to let it go for a very long period of time. As we've seen in other examples, if we can get something in place, if it's a regular review, we're able to catch it and do a reasonable increase in amounts whether it's a fee or a licence or an award such as we're considering here. That's better done on a regular basis so we don't end up with those 20-year gaps in things and then a huge increase that really raises eyebrows because we hear that something has doubled or tripled or something like that. That does cause concern in the general public when they don't understand what's happening. If we're trying to keep pace, you know, link it to the cost of inflation, or at the very least we need to put that five-year review back in. In fact, that's part of why we're considering this now, because a five-year review has come due, and that's very appropriate.

I want to go back and look at the interrelation between the Limitations Act and the Public Trustee Act. I think what's happening here is that we're setting up a situation where minors could be squeezed or pressured; coerced I think might be too strong a word. But I'm wondering, with the changes that are anticipated here, who benefits from these changes. Really what we're looking at is a change that's essentially a new definition of a "person under disability" and a new provision dealing with minors. I think that it squeezes children because a potential defendant isn't prepared to wait for a child to achieve their majority, so what they're able to do is make notification to both the public trustee and to the guardian that they wish to commence an action, and then it's incumbent upon one of those two to respond to that. I agree that there's nothing more fundamental to our system than the right to sue, but I really don't think this should be changed or bridged or overridden when it comes to children without very strong and compelling reasons. That's my issue here. You need to be fair with the Limitations Act.

Another lawyer has raised with me the fairness of a limitations act if you're now expecting someone to come back 20 years later or 15 years later and be able to have witnesses with clear recollections of what happened or people who kept notes that couldn't be tampered with or were under lock and key in some way. The courts do tend to give the benefit of the doubt, to award the discretion to the people who are bringing the suit to the plaintiff, and this lawyer felt pretty strongly that that just wasn't fair. I mean, you just couldn't expect someone to mount a reasonable defence that many years after the fact, and he was supportive of these changes. I think we have to be very cautious in balancing the best interests of a child against the right of someone to sue or to be a defendant in a trial there. So that's what's happening in the Limitations Act.

What's happening in the Public Trustee Act is that there's a proposal to accommodate, obviously, this other amendment in the Limitations Act, namely the provision for accelerating the limitation date for a minor to sue, and I do see them as a package with the Limitations Act amendments. I'm looking to the government to explain to me or to give arguments on why they think it's reasonable to be putting these two changes in place with the Public Trustee Act and the Limitations Act. It is allowing pressure to be brought against a minor, essentially for the minor to be squeezed about their willingness to go to court prior to their coming of age. Normally it would have gone until they were 18, and this is allowing a provision where they could go earlier than that.

There is a requirement that both the public trustee and the guardian are notified, which is, I suppose, foreseen as being a balance, a way of making sure that nobody takes advantage of this situation, but there's deep concern here. So those are my concerns being raised about the Limitations Act and the Public Trustee Act.

The rest of my notes on that Limitations Act. Who was consulted with around these changes? I'm wondering if there is support for this change from the Alberta trial lawyers' association or the Canadian Bar Association or the appropriate sections in the northern and southern Alberta sections of the Canadian Bar? As well, was any work done on this by the Alberta Law Reform Institute? Again, perhaps even the government would consider delaying this particular part until the fall or taking it right out and bringing it back separately, because I think there are ramifications here that we need to consider carefully.

The Provincial Offences Procedure Act. This is interesting. This is around moneys that go to the victims of crime fund. At this point 100 percent of the Highway Traffic Act fines go to the municipalities, and the province is interested in keeping a portion of this revenue to pay itself for its administrative offences. So if there's an increase or if an increase isn't anticipated here, the old amount would go back to the municipality, but the difference between the old amount and the new one would be kept by the province as its administrative costs.

I'm wondering why there has been no mention of sections 8 and 9 of the Victims of Crime Act. Section 8(1) says:

If a fine is imposed on a person who is convicted of an offence under an enactment, the person must pay a surcharge unless

- (a) the offence is a contravention of a municipal bylaw or a Metis settlement bylaw, or
- (b) the offence is excluded from the application of . . . the regulations.

We look at section 9(1):

The Victims' Programs Assistance Fund is continued as the "Victims of Crime Fund".

(2) The following must be deposited into the Fund, and that includes "money collected from surcharges under this Act."

There are two regulations. We've got victims' benefit regulation 201/97 and victims' program regulation 135/97. Nothing in here exempts or excludes Highway Traffic Act fines from the surcharge, so why did the mover of the bill sort of skip over that? You know, when this government is supposed to be on record upholding this victims of crime fund – in fact, it runs underneath this minister's ministry – why is this being skipped over? A portion of that money or the money as spelled out in the act should still be going to the victims of crime fund. The money in question is intended for the victims, not for the province.

Now, I understand that the province is looking to recoup its administrative costs, but I don't think it should be doing that on the backs of or instead of victims of crime. There was a lot of work done to put that fund in place, and I don't think it should be overruled because the province is feeling hard done by for having to administer the cash cow of photo radar, which is what this is about. There are just a lot more fines being levied and tickets being given out because of photo radar. [interjection] Yeah, that is what it's connected to. The province has to administer this. The Member for St. Albert isn't believing me, but I'm sure she can check with her colleague the Minister of Justice to find out that in fact that is what this is about.

You know, when the victims of crime fund was brought forward in the Assembly in 1996, the then Justice minister, Brian Evans, said: "Finally, it creates a fine surcharge on provincial statute offences to help fund programs for crime victims." At the time questions were raised about what the net dollars to victims might be. The legislation was supported by both caucuses. Later in debate the same minister observed: "We've come to the conclusion that we don't have nearly enough money to deal with the kind of index of awards that we are proposing to put into force and effect." So why now would we be leeching off even more of that money so the province can pay itself for having sent out notices to collect fines from photo radar?

Now I'm down to a couple of minutes to talk about the Civil Enforcement Act. While everything that I have seen under here for the most part is housekeeping or updating or innocuous, nonetheless I think that we need to be aware of this, because of all the bills that are being changed by this Bill 20, which is an omnibus bill, the items under the Civil Enforcement Act are the most likely to affect the most number of Albertans. Why? Well, because anyone that's a creditor is affected by this act, and that's basically every Alberta business, because at some time every business is going to be trying to collect on the funds that are owed to them. The rest of us as consumers also have an interest in making sure that this process to recover funds is fair and gives us adequate opportunity as a debtor to discharge the debt before our property is snatched away from us and sold to pay off the debt. So the Civil Enforcement Act deals with a mechanism to recover money or in some cases objects to which you are legally entitled. This is the largest part of Bill 20, where all the changes are being made to civil enforcement.

I'm not going to have time to go through the points that I wanted to raise on these issues, so rather than starting into it and having to stop, I think what I'll do at this point is adjourn debate on Bill 20, and we'll return to it another day.

So thank you very much, and I do move that we adjourn debate on Bill 20.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would move that the committee now rise and report progress.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

MR. KLAPSTEIN: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration and reports Bill 7 and Bill 14. The committee reports progress on Bill 20.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Opposed? So ordered.
The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would move that the Assembly now stand adjourned until tomorrow at 1:30 p.m.

[Motion carried; at 10:55 p.m. the Assembly adjourned to Tuesday at 1:30 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

Title: Tuesday, April 23, 2002

1:30 p.m.

Date: 02/04/23

[The Speaker in the chair]

head: Prayers

THE SPEAKER: Good afternoon.

Let us pray. Our Father, we thank You for Your abundant blessings to our province and ourselves. We ask You to ensure to us Your guidance and the will to follow it. Amen.

Please be seated.

head: Introduction of Guests

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you to all hon. Members of this Legislative Assembly a group of students and parents and teachers from Hardisty school in the constituency of Edmonton-Gold Bar. I had a chat with these students earlier this afternoon, and it was, to say the least, a delight. The group is led today by teachers Mrs. Sharon Loughheed, who is the wife of the hon. Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan, and Mr. Dave Kehler. Parent helpers are Mrs. Jan Kirk, Mrs. Joanne Linden, Mr. Alain Gauthier, Mr. William Holmes, Mrs. Judy Ekkelenkamp, Mrs. Elaine Pohl, and Mrs. Diane Franke. These teachers, parents, and students are in the members' gallery, and I would now ask them to please rise and receive the warm and traditional welcome of this Assembly.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Buffalo.

MR. CENAIKO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly a 17-year veteran of the Calgary Police Service. Constable Alex Girvin is seated in the members' gallery. He is the Calgary Police Association's representative on the Special Forces Pension Plan Board, and Alex is here for a tour of the building and meetings over the next two days. I'd like to welcome Alex and ask him to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment.

MR. DUNFORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have Human Resources and Employment staff that are attending the public service orientation tour, and I would like to introduce them to you and to members of the Assembly. I would propose that I call their names out, and then perhaps when I've finished the names, they would all stand and we'd provide a warm welcome to them. We have Carmen Fortier, Brandy Strachen, Karin Steen, Lori Courtright, Joan Hilsabeck, Holley Engen, Angie Moscaluk, Jocelyn Young, Lora Phillipow, Barb Walline, Brenda Sudayko, and Sarah Meffen. If they'd please rise, we'll give them a warm welcome.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today it's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to members of this Assembly members of the Canadian Bar Association: Ms Virginia Engel, president, and Mr. Tom Achtymichuk, vice-president. Ms Engel and

Mr. Achtymichuk are here, I presume, to not only see how laws are made in this Assembly but also to witness the estimates of the Department of Justice this afternoon. Many members will be familiar with these names as they've received a considerable number of letters over the past months from the Canadian Bar Association. I'd like Tom and Virginia to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

head: Oral Question Period

THE SPEAKER: First Official Opposition main question. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

Workers' Compensation Board

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The WCB is going from a culture of denial to a further denial of workers' rights. My first question is to the Minister of Human Resources and Employment this afternoon. Who is responsible for appointing the members of the Workers' Compensation Board and the Appeals Commission?

MR. DUNFORD: Mr. Speaker, the members of the board of directors of the Workers' Compensation Board are selected from a number of men and women that would be forwarded to the chair of the board. They would be asked to be representative of perhaps employer interests, perhaps employee interests, and perhaps public interests. Then, of course, the board chair provides the minister responsible for the legislation a list of people that are to be appointed, and the minister would carry those through the order in council procedure. The same general procedure would apply to the Appeals Commission. There certainly is a desire on the part of stakeholders out there that are interested, as far as I can ascertain, that employees and employer groups would continue to make representation on recommendations for selection to the Appeals Commission.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister: given that the government through the order in council procedure appoints these people, why then is the government not accepting responsibility for the decisions of the WCB and the Appeals Commission?

MR. DUNFORD: Mr. Speaker, I think that this answer has been provided by me in this Assembly previously, but just in case it hasn't, I'll go through it again. The Workers' Compensation Act contemplates a no-fault insurance system that would be at arm's length from the government of Alberta. Certainly it provides for a definition of the operations of the Workers' Compensation Board that are the direct responsibility of the board of directors. The government as far as its involvement maintains the oversight on the legislation and through OC appoints the board chair and members of the board.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again to the same minister: why is the government saddling employers with funding retroactive benefits for long-standing claims and denying benefits to those injured workers?

MR. DUNFORD: I'm not sure I heard the question correctly, but in essence there is contemplation in the bill that was introduced yesterday that there would perhaps be some review of long-term so-called contentious claims. The situation, though, that's contemplated is that we would not proceed on that review until such time as we had all of the stakeholders, including employers, onside in terms of how that review would be conducted and what the potential costs of it might be.

THE SPEAKER: Second Official Opposition main question. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again the WCB is going from a culture of denial to further denial of workers' rights. My questions are again to the Minister of Human Resources and Employment. How much does it cost to run the WCB's secret police, or special investigative unit?

MR. DUNFORD: Last night I was on my way home, and I noticed there were quite a number of shadows that were coming across the road, and I realized that we are approaching a new moon. With that question, it seems like we're closer to the new moon than what I had anticipated.

MR. MacDONALD: Mr. Speaker, given that the WCB states that only a small fraction of 1 percent of claims are fraudulent, is the cost of the secret police recovered by reducing or terminating benefits of the injured workers?

MR. DUNFORD: Mr. Speaker, this Assembly and all of its members are responsible, of course, to debate a Workers' Compensation Act which puts in place a workers' compensation system. The act is there for any member to have full access to. Yesterday we introduced Bill 26, that will provide amendments to the Workers' Compensation Act. Now, unless the education in the English language that I received has somehow failed me, I fail to find what section a secret police service might be contemplated by that particular act. So I would suggest to Mr. Speaker and to all of those assembled that the hon. member is up to some mischievous, playful antics today.

1:40

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That secret police force is a lot more secret than I thought.

Is the minister proposing a 5,000 percent increase to the fines under the Workers' Compensation Act with the hope that the additional money can be used to finance the secret police or maybe to pay for the long-standing contentious claims?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister. [interjections] The hon. minister has the floor.

MR. DUNFORD: Mr. Speaker, help me with this. Was it not this hon. member that some time ago confronted a minister and said: now, what is it that you don't know that you're not telling me? It might apply in this particular case.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glangarry.

Municipal Funding

MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the budget the province hit municipal governments with a tax bill approaching $100 million.

They want municipal leaders to build the great communities that Albertans are proud to call home, but all the province brings to the table is unstable funding, increased taxes, and empty promises. Crisis-based, roller-coaster budgeting, that's the government's plan. To the Minister of Finance: why did you break your promise to Albertans to cap education property taxes and instead give them a tax bill for $45 million?

MRS. NELSON: Well, Mr. Speaker, the question probably should go to the Minister of Municipal Affairs, but I have to say that Alberta has clearly kept its promises to Albertans as we have the lowest overall tax regime in all of Canada. We are the one province that is leading the nation in economic growth. We are the one province that has a bright future for our children and for our own families. We are the one province that has no sales tax. We are the one province without a payroll tax. We are the one province that has kept our word.

Insofar as the education property tax I'll ask the Minister of Municipal Affairs to comment on the particulars.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. BOUTILIER: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, quite simply stated, for this year, based on the people that are coming to Alberta, we want to be able to capture that growth and reflect it so that the pie is divided up in a way that's fair. What's interesting is that for the average homeowner, on a $150,000 home the increase will be about $10.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. BONNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the Minister of Municipal Affairs: given that a fiscal stability fund would have a positive impact on municipal finances, will the minister support this idea?

MR. BOUTILIER: Mr. Speaker, the province of Alberta is viewed as a leader in the Municipal Government Act, as the hon. member is aware. We have just formed Roles and Responsibilities in the 21st Century, the only ministerial type of committee across the entire country. The Federation of Canadian Municipalities has asked for input on this. Both the mayors of Edmonton and Calgary are partnered. The presidents of the Alberta municipal association and the Alberta urban association in fact are dealing with this as well because they participate as well as three members of this Assembly. What I'd also indicate is that in fact tomorrow we're meeting with the presidents of those associations, and I'm pleased to say that as we work in this partnership, it's important that we share the ideas that best represent the ideals of Albertans, and that's what we're doing in partnership with municipalities.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. BONNER: Yes, since the minister did not give us a yes or a no. The biggest financial challenge facing municipalities is access to stable, long-term funding for essential infrastructure projects. Why is the minister rejecting the implementation of a fiscal stability fund which would help our communities upgrade the deteriorating infrastructure?

MR. BOUTILIER: The short answer to the question is that we are not rejecting anything at this time, and I do know that the Minister of Finance has supplemental information regarding the review that's taking place relative to partnerships with municipalities, important partners with our province.

MRS. NELSON: Mr. Speaker, a number of years ago Alberta established a program called the Alberta Municipal Financing Corporation, which went into an arrangement with our municipalities to recognize that they had to deal with growth and with capital projects that required a lot of dollars. As a result of the financial rating that this province has, municipalities are able to access this money, which is at a premium or at a discounted rate to what they would be able to get in the marketplace, and proceed on with a number of their capital projects. This has been a very successful fund, and municipalities have accessed it for a number of years, well over 20 years, so there is a relationship that is very near and dear. We recognize through a number of efforts, through the initiatives that the Minister of Municipal Affairs has put in place but also through the Financial Management Commission, that we have to deal with growth and pressure points not only provincewide but down on a municipal level. So we're working in partnership with our municipalities every day.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. leader of the third party, followed by the hon. Member for Whitecourt-Ste. Anne.

Delisting of Medical Services

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We hear today that retired TransAlta executive Bob Westbury may chair the government's expert panel on delisting medical services. Instead of choosing a real health care expert or even a representative of patients, seniors, or other health care users, this government is choosing yet another business representative with no expertise other than a good Conservative pedigree and powerful friends. My questions are to the Minister of Health and Wellness. Will the minister commit to including representatives of patients, seniors, or other health care users on the panel, or will he just continue to appoint friends and party supporters who can be relied upon to do the government's dirty work?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, I will not answer a question with as a premise the comments made by the leader of the third party that unfairly and inappropriately besmirch the fine name of a good person.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The minister maybe will answer my second question. Given that Albertans were led to believe that experts would decide which services to deinsure, has something changed between January and now, or did the minister always think that the word "expert" means whomever suits his political agenda?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister?
The hon. member.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The silence is quite deafening.

The third question to the minister. Since the minister has acknowledged that good, qualified people won't agree to serve on this health care expert panel, will he stand up today and admit that his government's direction is out of step with Albertans and commit to preserving medicare instead of continually chipping at it?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister?

The hon. Member for Whitecourt-Ste. Anne, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

Electricity Billings

MR. VANDERBURG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm getting many calls from upset constituents regarding their power bills in Whitecourt-Ste. Anne. The concerns are not with the energy charge, which is now the minor portion of the bill. The concerns are now with a wide range of charges that seem to be escalating at a rate that many citizens cannot afford. My question is to the Minister of Energy. The rate riders are associated with the meter, and new homeowners or new Albertans now must pay a previous resident's debt. Is that fair?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member's preamble actually was quite instructive. In fact, the comment that energy charges are now the least part of a bill I think indicates that the competitive restructuring has some benefits and also the fact that the bill reflects not only the cost of the energy but those specific charges related to transmission. The retail component indicates that there is also transparency on that bill. In fact, customers know exactly what they're paying for.

1:50

Mr. Speaker, as the member states that he's getting numerous calls, we're certainly prepared to handle every one of those numerous calls by directing them to the appropriate utility or transmission authority to which the problem should be addressed. It is true that a bill that has a deferral account on it stays with the meter. These, of course, are charges incurred from electricity purchased above the regulated rate option in the period 2001 and in the regulated rate process in the year 2000. These rates stay with the meter, but because of the transparency of the account and because the member has been astute enough to bring this up in the House, now the first-time homeowner can actually use this deferral account as a part of negotiations in the purchase and disposition of the home.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. VANDERBURG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm glad that that's recognized, but how will your department notify new homeowners, realtors, and the Law Society to make sure that everybody is aware that there is this debt occurring?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. SMITH: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly all three of those groups closely follow the proceedings of the House, closely follow legislation as it changes and relates to their industry and of course the strength of the marketplace when every consumer knows that he or she may have an advantage in purchasing a home in Alberta. There are a great number of new homeowners in Alberta, and why is that? Because this province has unprecedented growth. This province has created more jobs through energy deregulation, through oil and gas development, and it has now a vibrant, hot real estate market. These particular pieces of information will be posted on our web site, will be sent out to the member, and will be available to those three groups. I hope that every Albertan can take advantage of this, because I think that every Albertan has the capability to buy a new home in this great province.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. VANDERBURG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final question is to the same minister. Because of this hot market we're having and experiencing out in growth areas like Whitecourt-St. Anne, the sale of new homes not previously occupied have a debt attached to them because of the infrastructure in place. What will happen with the rate riders on that infrastructure?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The rate riders will continue specific to the meter. Just as a sewer charge is put on the subdivision and the particular home, that will continue as well. There's no difference in the continuity of that charge until that charge has been fully paid off. In fact, subdivision developers, real estate agents, and home builders are all aware of this, but it is important, too, that the homeowner has good counsel or does his or her own due diligence to ensure that in the period of adjustments taxes are paid, that there are no back taxes, that all electrical and utility accounts are paid and up to date, the numerous categories under the area of adjustment. Again, because we have such a strong market, I think that this information will be very on topic and au courant in the marketplace.

Private Diagnostic Facilities

DR. TAFT: Mr. Speaker, private radiology clinics in Calgary are hiring staff away from public hospitals, enticing them with various attractions including $8,000 signing bonuses. These clinics are then using these same staff to provide services back to the Calgary health region. To the Minister of Health and Wellness: does the minister have any evidence that this practice is saving the public health care system money?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, I'm happy to reply to this question, and it has been asked in a number of different ways by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview. Of course, we are putting great resources into regional health authorities and into the public health care system in this province. I think the increase in the budget of the department of health, some 7 and a half percent, an increase of nearly $500 million, which was the largest increase of any budget in this government's operations, will lead people who will look at this objectively to the conclusion that health care is the most important issue that this government is dealing with.

Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member earlier this week, we have put resources into three areas: into equipment, into plants, and most importantly into people. We are training people. We are aggressively recruiting sonographers from other jurisdictions. I outlined a number of them in some detail yesterday afternoon, and I would be happy if the hon. member would refer to Hansard of yesterday afternoon's question period and see the very things that we are doing in order to recruit good people into this jurisdiction to provide services within the public health care system.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking specifically about efforts made by private facilities that are recruiting from the public system. Those private facilities may in fact end up providing services to the public system by providing services through contracts with regional health authorities. If the hon. member wishes to have greater detail on that, I'll undertake to do that.

DR. TAFT: Why does government policy allow paid clinical directors of regional health authorities to also be partners in firms recruiting staff away from those same RHAs?

MR. MAR: If the hon. member wishes to bring forward the specific situation that he is referring to – and I don't know which specific situation he may be referring to – I'd be happy to look into that question for him.

DR. TAFT: I'll deliver the information.

Given that the Auditor of Ontario has done a very informative review of some contracted-out diagnostic services in that province, will this minister request the Auditor General of Alberta to do a similar review of business arrangements for diagnostic services in the Calgary health region including full life-cycle costs and a review of conflicts of interest?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General in this province has already looked at the issue of how we allow for contracts to be provided by regional health authorities to private providers, and that matter has been dealt with by our own Auditor General and need not be done again, nor need we be influenced by the work done by the Auditor of the province of Ontario.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-Sturgeon-St. Albert, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Electricity Transmission System

MR. HORNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is for the hon. Minister of Energy. There's been a lot said and written recently about the congestion on the Alberta electrical grid. Indeed, some major expansions are being discussed with possible deferrals. Could the minister please tell us what the current status is of the transmission system in Alberta?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. SMITH: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's important, I think, to recognize that the member's question comes from the fact that there exist at present over 700 years of low-sulphur, high-efficiency thermal coal resident in the member's riding and that it's his riding that actually lights up Alberta. Much of it is also close to Stony Plain as well. To exit that Wabamun factory and the mills, there has been a transmission established over a number of years. There has been no change to that transmission network over the last 15 years, and in fact it is somewhat near capacity. There has been, because of the change in the electricity model, a very large and open debate on transmission. In fact, the transmission administrator for the province of Alberta has conducted numerous studies and has consulted a great number of Albertans and talked about congestion and bottlenecks. That has identified major areas for upgrading: the Edmonton-Calgary corridor, particularly if we want to get more generation into that area and more power out of that area; a tremendous opportunity for natural gas cogeneration, electricity generation in the Fort McMurray area. There will be opportunities to move that electricity out of there.

In fact, the Energy and Utilities Board, Mr. Speaker, is conducting in a very open fashion, with transcribed hearings, the opportunities that sit for transmission upgrades in the province of Alberta. It is important to remember that the power buying and selling part is actually fully deregulated and now competitive in nature. The transmission side is in fact still regulated by the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board.

2:00

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. HORNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My next question is to the same minister. Given the minister's answer with regard to the transmission lines, could he also tell us what the benefits are to Albertans for upgrading the transmission system and making it larger?

MR. SMITH: Well, Mr. Speaker, as much as I would like to continue about the benefits of ample electricity transmission for all Albertans, that would continue well past the end of question period. I just want to focus on low-priced, reliable electricity in this province, which is something that is fundamental to the Alberta advantage. We do need more power generation to support the growing population and the economic base. Of course, it's a chicken and egg question. We do know that improving the transmission system will encourage new investment. New investment will lead to new generation. New supply, added supply, will result in downward pressure. [interjection] Contrary to the New Democrats' view of market pressures, the marketplace actually does work by bringing up more supply, creating downward pressure on prices.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. HORNER: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My final question to the same minister: given all the good news which he's just told us, do we expect that the consumers will end up paying for this new transmission line?

MR. SMITH: Mr. Speaker, the Energy and Utilities Board is going to identify how payments are to be made, and we won't presume that outcome. Certainly, as the Premier stated and as is the policy of this government, generators and sellers are responsible for the transmission of this power to market, and they pay the tariff that they used for the transmission system. This is all reflected in the total price of electricity to the consumer.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Library Funding

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today is Canada Book Day, but no celebrations here. The Minister of Community Development, by underfunding libraries, has pushed them to seek subsidies through the community lottery boards. Now the Minister of Gaming has cut the community lottery boards, this important source of funding for libraries, because they were not a priority. The libraries, which make a direct contribution to lifelong learning in this province, are now left without adequate financial resources. My first question is to the Minister of Learning. Given that the department's mission statement includes the promotion of lifelong learning, what will the minister do to ensure that libraries receive adequate funding?

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, libraries are a very important concept with lifelong learning in Alberta. [interjections]

THE SPEAKER: Hon. minister, please. The chair cannot hear. There seems to be a lot of chitter chatter in the front bench here to the right, and I'd like to hear the hon. minister's response.

DR. OBERG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One of the greatest things that will happen to libraries is the advent of the Supernet, where all libraries will be formed together. I'd invite the Minister of Community Development to supplement my answer. Our libraries are alive and well and are doing more than in the majority of provinces in this country.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Very briefly, it would surely interest the members of the House to know that this year's budget for public libraries, of which there are several hundred in the province, has been increased by over $700,000. That's in addition to the $700,000 increase that was provided last year. Now, we can always use more money in libraries, but that's a good start. We'll be addressing that as more moneys come available, but those are two very positive increases that we've experienced in the last two years.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. My next question is to the Minister of Gaming. Given that the Devon Public Library Board recently told its town council that children's reading programs would suffer because of the elimination of the community lottery boards program, where does this minister suggest the library go for funding?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. STEVENS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. What I've heard the Minister of Community Development indicate is that there's more money for libraries this year in his budget. That would obviously be part of the answer to the question. As it relates to the Ministry of Gaming, the hon. member knows that we have a charitable gaming model which provides funding to a number of different community activities. We have approximately $300 million this year that is going to go to the not-for-profit, volunteer sector, and that indeed is a great deal of money. It is quite conceivable that that particular example that you have referred to and others in the library sector will be able to avail themselves of some of that money.

MS BLAKEMAN: Slot machines for books.

My final question is to the Minister of Community Development. Given that this minister's underfunding of libraries will no longer be subsidized by the Minister of Gaming and he has already mentioned that there is an increase in the budget this year, is the increase enough to cover the loss of money that libraries were receiving through the community lottery boards, and will there be local decision-making that goes along with this increase?

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Mr. Speaker, I want to just firmly state that the members on this side of the House firmly support libraries in this province, and we've demonstrated that year after year. In fact, I will be demonstrating it further this weekend when I attend again the annual meeting that they're holding in the West Yellowhead constituency in Jasper, and at that time I will be talking to them about some long-range and future plans.

With respect to any specific amounts that have not materialized, hon. member, I don't know the numbers you're talking about, but in terms of my department, my department's budget has increased. It has not decreased, as you are inferring. [interjections]

THE SPEAKER: Hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, I gave you the courtesy of recognizing you to ask a question, so when the question has been asked, then the other person should have the opportunity to respond to the question.

School Closures

MS KRYCZKA: Mr. Speaker, Calgary-West has two distinct areas. The eastern one-third is an older, well-preserved area with, until recently, nine underutilized schools, and the western two-thirds is a developing area with three very full elementary schools. Battalion Park is a minischool in the west area and used to be number four on the CBE's new school priority list and is now off that list due to the new sectoral approach, which averages out utilization of all schools in the area. This has greatly lowered the overall rate. Battalion Park, however, has had to cap enrollment for local grade 1 children in September 2002. My main question is to the Minister of Infrastructure. What role does the province play when the local school board, the CBE, closes underutilized schools such as Glenmeadows elementary and now the Plains Indians cultural survival school, both in Calgary-West?

MR. LUND: Mr. Speaker, of course the closing of a school in any community is a very traumatic experience, so as a consequence we take it very seriously and have put in place a procedure under the School Act which requires a lot of public consultation. Once that is completed, the school board then can proceed with a motion to close the school. I've got to commend the Calgary board of education on the consultation work that they have done over a period of time when they've looked at the utilization and the location of their various schools. Once the board has passed a motion stating that they will close the school, then municipalities will be notified, the Department of Learning will be notified, and of course Infrastructure will be notified. We then look to see if there is another need for the school. For example, maybe a charter school or perhaps even a private school may want to locate in that location. If those are deemed to be not necessary, then we would look at other government uses for the property. If the result is that there is no further use, then with permission from the Minister of Infrastructure the school board can proceed to sell the property.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MS KRYCZKA: Yes. My first supplementary question is again to the Minister of Infrastructure. Will the funds realized from the sale of these properties reduce otherwise available provincial funding to the CBE, or will these funds be in addition to?

MR. LUND: The proceeds from the sale of the property will be distributed on a prorated basis relative to the purchase of the property and the school. All of the money stays in this case with the Calgary board of education. We will direct where the portion of our funds could be used within the Calgary board of education. The board has the option of directing their funds. The only stipulation on it is that it must be used for capital.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

2:10

Gas Flaring Study

MS CARLSON: Mr. Speaker, in March the minister of health said that he was waiting for the results of a scientific study on the effects of flaring and gas emissions on animals before starting a study on the effects of these industrial processes on human health. Will the minister of health please tell us what results from the animal health study he is anticipating will be applied to the human health study?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, I can't speak knowledgeably on the specifics of the research that is being conducted, but I can say from my time in the ministry of environmental protection that there are some issues in the research that is being done now with animal health that may have some applicability with respect to the areas of human health that we may wish to investigate in future research. That is the reason why we are awaiting the results from the one study before we commence another one.

MS CARLSON: Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us what happened to the money that was originally committed to this project?

MR. MAR: It remains committed to the project, Mr. Speaker.

MS CARLSON: Mr. Speaker, my question was: what happened to the money that was committed in prior budgets? Will he tell us how he spent that money?

MR. MAR: Mr. Speaker, if I understand the question correctly, the money which was allocated for human health studies remains committed to that area, although it is at this time unspent.*

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-Fort.

Horse Racing Industry

MR. MASON: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. The Premier is looking a little bit forlorn today, so I'll ask him a question. When it comes to getting out of the business of business, this government has a huge blind spot. The horse racing industry is getting subsidized to the tune of $33 million per year by this government, and if that wasn't enough, the Calgary Stampede and Edmonton Northlands each get an additional $7.1 million from the lottery fund. My question is to the Premier: why is the government massively subsidizing the horse racing industry when it has gotten out of the business of subsidizing business in every other industry?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, this is an arrangement that's been worked out with the horse racing industry to take additional money from gambling operations within the horse racing facility. These are primarily slot machines.

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, why does the government give the horse racing industry a 51.7 percent share of slot machine revenues while charities only get a 15 percent share?

MR. KLEIN: Mr. Speaker, this is an arrangement that has existed for some time but has been enhanced just recently. There's a reason for it, and there was an exceptionally good article, I might say, in the Edmonton Journal over the weekend relative to horse racing and the importance of that industry as an agricultural industry in the province of Alberta. Consistent with our policy and consistent with the law that is in place, the Financial Administration Act, we felt that we could not get in the business of being in business, but we recognized also that this was a faltering industry; that is, the horse industry and especially the horse industry as it related to breeding good horses for the race track and literally keeping thousands of people employed who, I venture to say, would otherwise be unemployed and perhaps on welfare or some form of UI had they not had the opportunity to work at the track. So we had to devise a way that would not involve taxpayers' dollars, would not involve direct intervention by the government. In conjunction with the horsemen and the track operators we came up with a solution that would not involve taxpayers' dollars but would involve enhanced revenues through the slot machines that now exist in at least one racing complex but are allowed to exist in others.

MR. MASON: Mr. Speaker, why does it take a New Democrat MLA to tell the Premier to get out of the business of being in business? Are there no more Conservatives, real Conservatives, over there any more?

MR. KLEIN: Well, Mr. Speaker, I find it very unusual indeed for an ND to tell any government how to get out of the business of being in business. All you have to do is look to some of the jurisdictions that have been governed by the NDs and are still governed by the NDs and you'll see a multitude of businesses that are owned by the government.

I think that this province has done an outstanding job of getting out of the business of being in business. As a matter of fact, we have a direct relationship with only one business that I know of now. That's the Alberta Treasury Branches, and that's an institution that is the subject of review from time to time. There's good reason for government to be involved, albeit at arm's length from the operation. So really we have lived to the letter of the law the Financial Administration Act.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I would point out to this ND member of the Legislature that no ND government in Canada has the kind of legislation that we have that prohibits government from getting into the business of being in business.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fort, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods.

Volunteer Sector

MR. CAO: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Albertans are well known around the world for their volunteerism and Alberta's volunteer sector plays a very important role in cost-effective delivery of community services, my questions today are to the hon. Minister of Community Development. How is Alberta volunteerism measured, and what are the trends of those measurements for the recent years?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for that very good and very important question. I want to begin by just stressing how important volunteerism is in this province and that it is something that we highly, highly value as a government. From time to time we are able to do some measurements. One of the most recent measurements we did was last year, when we contracted a private research firm to do a telephone survey of Albertans on the subject of volunteerism. The results told us that about 75 percent of Albertans had participated in some form of volunteer activity in the past year. That's a very interesting trend because it also told us that we're on the increase in terms of volunteerism in this province. One of the important trends within that trend is the fact that more volunteers are coming to us and volunteering as families, and we're attracting more youth volunteers as well, two very important things in Alberta.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. CAO: Thank you. My first supplemental is to the same minister. Again, what programs does the government, through the Community Development department, have to further develop volunteerism in Alberta?

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Mr. Speaker, our programs permeate many different departments and many different disciplines, but I would say in sort of a general sense that it's basically the Wild Rose Foundation that puts out programs and helpful grants, in the order of approximately $4 million every year, to help stimulate and motivate the volunteer sector in our province. The volunteer movement is all centred around capacity building, on providing training and leadership programs, on providing partnership arrangements with Volunteer Alberta. It's extremely important to focus on it, especially this week, which as we all know is National Volunteer Week in our province, and we're very happy to be supporting that. We do provide educational programs. Vitalize is one of our more important programs that we provide every year, and in general I would say that volunteerism in this province is alive and well. We're very proud to be supporting the arts, where we see about 60,000 volunteers every year participate; parks and protected areas, where we see about 2,000 volunteers at a minimum providing help every year; and our historic sites and museums provide over 2,000 volunteers. And that's just a few areas that are in Community Development.

2:20

MR. CAO: My last supplemental is to the same minister. In light of reductions in our budget, namely the elimination of the community lottery board grants, what are Community Development's efforts to continue sustaining our volunteer sector?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think it's important to recognize and emphasize that maintaining our volunteer sector in this province is extremely important. I don't know if there is a more critical partner to any government than the volunteer sector. We know that we have good relationships with other sectors, the business community and so on, but the volunteer sector provides a special kind of backbone that provides a different vibrancy. We're very happy to support that through the Wild Rose Foundation and others where we see help going out to nonprofit associations for very special humanitarian, social service, and other related type programs. In fact, the Wild Rose Foundation does organize the annual Vitalize provincial conference which, if I recall correctly, will be occurring again this year sometime in June. They provide board development programs, and they're available should people wish to get in touch with them for that purpose. An initiative that I'm extremely proud of as well is our youth initiatives program, which helps to stimulate more and more interest in and amongst our youth so that they will develop these early habits of volunteering at an earlier and earlier stage.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Woods, followed by the hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Special-needs Students

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Learning has done well in reaching a compromise with teachers. We can now move forward to resolve the problems that led to the strike in the first place, including the funding of children with special needs. My questions are to the Minister of Learning. How are the amounts allocated for severely disabled students determined?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

DR. OBERG: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In September of this year we changed the way the dollar amounts were determined to go to school boards. What we did in September of this year was in essence extrapolate from a school board the growth of severely disabled children and pay on the sum of the extrapolation. The reason behind this was twofold, but first of all and by far the most important is that there was a lot of money, up to a $1,000 per assessment, that was being spent to assess these kids. This was money that was taken directly from the classroom, directly from these special-needs kids, and essentially put into assessment services. The second reason is that basically I do not agree with labeling kids. We therefore have assigned the money to the school board at the rate of a little over $12,000 per severe special-needs student. We've assigned that to the school boards according to that formula.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

DR. MASSEY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: given that last year 78 percent of school districts incurred deficits in the programs for severely disabled children, will funds for these children be increased to match the costs?

DR. OBERG: Mr. Speaker, the funds for disabled children were increased this year. I believe it was 3 percent, which is consistent with every other grant increase in my department.

DR. MASSEY: Again to the same minister, Mr. Speaker: has the minister plans to provide intensive behavioural intervention service this September to beginning autistic children who've been shunned by Children's Services?

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

DR. OBERG: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. IBI therapy is something that the Minister of Children's Services and myself are presently in the process of looking at. As the hon. member knows, I brought in IBI funding two or three or four years ago when I was minister of social services. It is something that we are looking at, and hopefully we'll have a resolution to this issue very soon.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie, followed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Calder.

Aboriginal Youth

MR. LORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Aboriginal youth are among those who face some of the very biggest challenges in life. As a group they have extremely high levels of poverty, unemployment, suicide and often have reduced levels of education, health care, and so on. My questions are to the Minister of Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development. Could the minister please tell us what is being done to address the continuing needs and gaps facing aboriginal youth in our province.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. minister.

MS CALAHASEN: Mr. Speaker, thank you. First of all, a number of ways. One, through the provincial method, is to work through the aboriginal policy framework with the various ministries facilitating and co-ordinating. Secondly is to go through on the national stage. Ministers and leaders of the five national aboriginal groups endorsed the national aboriginal youth strategy in December of 1999, based on the belief that solutions and results can be realized when all stakeholders work together in partnership and to provide a framework that would assist the stakeholders in the development of a policy and design and delivery of programs and services for aboriginal youth. In fact, aboriginal youth will have opportunities to pursue career and quality-of-life goals. This is a living document, and we hope that we'll continue to do this through a 10-year window of service.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. member.

MR. LORD: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister advise us as to how these programs are expected to make a difference for aboriginal youth?

MS CALAHASEN: Well, what we've got on a provincial basis is what we call the aboriginal policy initiative, and that's where we facilitate co-operation between the various government ministries and then deal with a number of issues. Secondly, on a national scale, Mr. Speaker, was the national aboriginal youth conference at Edmonton this fall. Over 120 aboriginal youth participated. As a matter of fact, my department is leading a federal/provincial/territorial/aboriginal working group to establish a national aboriginal youth advisory committee with links to make sure that we have federal and provincial governments involved and national aboriginal organizations and other stakeholders such as the private sector. If properly structured, this committee could provide advice on program and policy development. It could also act as a national networking device with linkages to private-sector sponsors and provincial youth committees such as the Alberta Children's Services Youth Advisory Panel, which contains an excellent pool of aboriginal and nonaboriginal youth.

MR. LORD: My final question to the same minister: how would this program be implemented in terms of the action steps, the next steps to be taken?

MS CALAHASEN: Mr. Speaker, on the provincial stage certainly committees are working on a continual basis to make sure that we continue to address the gaps, but on a federal stage the federal, provincial, territorial, and aboriginal ministers and leaders will meet again this June to review the work of a working group and to provide further direction regarding the development of an action plan in collaboration with aboriginal youth to address the priorities raised at the youth conference and through the strategy.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we need not wait until the next FPTA meeting to continue our march forward. In fact, stakeholders may strive to close the gap at an accelerated rate, which is exactly what Alberta has done through the APF and API. As I was going to say, the APF is the foundation document setting out strategies to address issues facing aboriginal people, including aboriginal youth. It complements the national aboriginal youth strategy by recognizing the important role of youth in aboriginal communities and the need to have the voice of youth heard by the communities and by government.

Mr. Speaker, our goal is to make sure that the national aboriginal youth strategy closes the gap between the well-being and self-reliance of aboriginal people and other Albertans.

Speaker's Ruling Anticipation

THE SPEAKER: Hon. members, before I start receiving notes from hon. members about that last series of questions, the estimates for the department of aboriginal affairs are scheduled for today, and our tradition is that if a particular estimate is up for debate on a particular day, questions might be avoided from that area. However, the chair did listen very attentively, and the questions appeared to be in the area of policy rather than in the area of administration and budgeting, and it was the last series of questions of the question period as well.

Now, two hon. members of Executive Council have indicated that they wish to supplement an answer. Our policy is that once the minister is recognized to do such a thing, then one of the members of the Assembly who directed the question to the minister in the first place is in a position to ask a supplemental question.

So I'll first of all recognize the hon. Minister of Community Development.

PDD Boards

MR. ZWOZDESKY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition raised a question and was referring to two documents, one of which I was familiar with and one of which he didn't identify, but later on, just before question period ended, he was kind enough to provide that second document to me. I've since had a chance to review it, and I just wanted to clarify for him and for all members of this House and for our viewing public, many of whom are persons with developmental disabilities, that the total amount that was indicated in the budget for PDD programs and services and what the hon. opposition leader was referring to yesterday are identical. It's approximately $407 million.

What has changed, however, because of the community governance model is that all of the regions have received a little bit more than they were anticipating, because this is a needs-based, demand-driven program. As a result, the PDD Provincial Board, in streamlining some of its administration and cutting some of its own operating costs, was able to make more money available for program dollars in the different regions. In fact, we're just working on finalizing right now what those exact amounts will be. In the case that the hon. leader cited yesterday, Edmonton PDD regional board's funding will likely go up from about $111 million to about $115 million. So that's pretty good news, I think, for a demand-driven program, and I hope that clarifies that issue.

The second point, very quickly, Mr. Speaker, is that there is no plan within Community Development, specifically within the PDD system, to transfer PDD-eligible recipients to other departments. That does not exist. There may exist a few instances, however, where some people are receiving PDD-type funding and may not necessarily be eligible for it, and that's what we're asking to be reviewed.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We appreciate the minister clarifying his comments of yesterday.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Minister of Health and Wellness.

Gas Flaring Study

MR. MAR: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Earlier this afternoon in question period, in responding to an inquiry by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, the question was about a commitment made by the Department of Health and Wellness with respect to a study in human health. The department had committed $2 million over a four-year period for this study. A decision was made to defer that commitment to the study pending the results of the animal health portion being concluded first. Subsequent to that, last October, as part of the government's 1 percent reduction in spending, the budgeted money for that study had in fact been returned to Treasury. So I humbly apologize for my error.*

MS CARLSON: Mr. Speaker, we would have an additional question for the minister, then, which was one I had wanted to ask earlier, and that is: what are the chances of this human health study being canceled completely?

MR. MAR: It would depend largely in part on the impact and the results of the animal health study. I'm led to believe, Mr. Speaker, and am advised that one of the challenges in doing the human health study portion of this is because of the nature of the transient and sparse populations in the areas that are being looked at, so the animal health study is easier to conduct. The human part of the study is more difficult, but we will review the commitment at the time that the animal health portion of the study is completed.

Apex Youth Awards

MR. JACOBS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to give recognition and offer congratulations to the organizers of the Apex youth awards. The first annual Apex youth awards were developed by the Rotary Club of Taber and the Taber Times to recognize individuals who represent the best qualities in Taber's youth, youth that unselfishly give of themselves in the service of others. Far too often the youth of our communities are not given the recognition they deserve. Currently there are many academic as well as athletic awards for our youth, but there is a large group of children and young adults who don't fit into either of these two award categories, yet they are offering a lot to the betterment of our communities.

Growing up as a kid today is not an easy task, but there are individuals out there who strive above the rest to make life for themselves and those around them better. The Apex youth awards were created to recognize these outstanding people. Of the 26 nominations received, the judges had to decide on four that stood ahead of the others. These four outstanding citizens along with all nominees were honoured at the awards banquet on Thursday, April 11.

The four nominees chosen for $1,500 bursaries include Mitch Allard, the only boy and oldest child in a family of three, who helps his mom at home cooking, cleaning, and doing yard work. His younger sister suffers from cerebral palsy and requires extra attention and care, which he gives willingly. Nicole Kano has been a positive role model for young and old. She is always aware of other people's feelings and is there to help them out. Nikki's involvement in her school, church, air cadets, and community makes her an excellent role model for everyone. Lenny Millo is a lovable, gentle lad who brings new meaning to, "You can do it," and continually astounds his classmates, teachers, family, and friends. Even though God bestowed him with limitations, Lenny has far surpassed any expectations that the professional field had assumed. Brittany Paun is a caring and accepting young girl. She has shown that with a positive attitude and confidence in yourself, regardless of circumstances, you can accomplish anything. When Brittany was seven, she was involved in a motor vehicle accident that left her confined to a wheelchair. The limited ability she now has is nothing compared to her strong will to overcome anything that stands in her way.

Again, congratulations to the Apex youth awards organizers and the youth who were nominated. Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Redwater.

Organ and Tissue Donation

MR. BRODA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In March of this year Ipsos-Reid was commissioned by the Kidney Foundation of Canada to poll Albertans about organ donation. They found that 93 percent of Albertans are in favour of organ donation, but as many as 45 percent of us have not talked to our families about our wishes for donation. We must talk to our loved ones because they make the final decision about donation. People die waiting for organ transplants because our families don't know what to do. Talking about organ and tissue donations can be difficult. To help initiate the discussion, the Kidney Foundation developed a guide. The Let's Talk About It guide encourages Albertans to share our wishes so that we know what to do if the unthinkable should happen. At this time of great sorrow your family needs to know what to do. Your family shouldn't have to make this decision alone. During this week, National Organ and Tissue Donor Awareness Week, I encourage all members of the Assembly and all Albertans to talk to your family about your wishes for donation.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Stettler.

Economic Development in Lacombe

MRS. GORDON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday at a noon luncheon a very important event took place in Lacombe, Alberta. The very enthusiastic hon. Minister of Economic Development presented the Lacombe Economic Development Board, town of Lacombe, and Mayor Bill McQuesten with a plaque that tells the world that they are the first organization in this province, in fact the first economic development organization in all of Canada to receive accreditation under the community economic development accreditation process. When a board applies for accreditation, they must work through a rigorous 16-step process. Not an easy task.

I congratulate the Lacombe Economic Development Board on being the first to receive this status, which only confirms that Lacombe is indeed a town that is most proactive in building, maintaining, and recognizing the economic strength within their community, within their region. Well done, Eric Jerrard, economic development officer, town of Lacombe; Ian Foster, chair; all board members; and in particular board member Lori Hellofs, who spent hours utilizing her many organizational skills to assist in putting together what was indeed a winning application. Continued success as you move economically ahead.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

Provincial Fiscal Policy

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On February 26 the Lieutenant Governor delivered this government's throne speech. The speech paid typical Conservative lip service to health care and education, areas where Albertans know that Tory priorities are distorted by the urge to privatize and profiteer. The reality is that despite its token commitment to health and education, the government's priorities have little to do with supporting Alberta communities.

The starkest example of this government's skewed priorities can be seen in the allocations from the Alberta lottery fund and in the Tories' eagerness to eliminate the community lottery boards. Grants from these boards allowed volunteer organizations and local groups to be vibrant and contributing members of their community, but the government's addiction to gambling was too strong, and the program was cut. But this government is never satisfied with simply cutting a program. They also feel compelled to dismiss and discredit anyone who might present credible opposition to their plans. On April 8 of this year the Premier dismissed recipients of lottery funds as mere "pipe and bugle bands" and offhandedly assured the Legislature that the groups he was asked about received funding from the community facility enhancement program. In fact, none of them do.

So we see how the Conservative government treats Albertans who are not priorities. They are dismissed as inconsequential and then promised support that never appears. It's quite a different story if you are a Tory favourite. The horse racing industry, for example, will receive a whopping $33 million this year. This $33 million taxpayers' subsidy is nothing other than a wasteful subsidy for one of the government's favourite industries. The government is in the business of picking winners and losers. While favoured groups like the horse racing industry are allowed to continue riding high, Alberta communities are left trudging along behind the parade. It is hardly an enviable position.

Speaker's Ruling Members' Statements

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie wants to rise on a point of order, but I want to make it very clear that I will not hear points of order on members' statements. When this procedural aspect of this Assembly was dealt with a number of years ago, the intent was that hon. members would have clearly unimpeded two minutes to wax eloquent on any subject matter that they chose to wax on. That was a democratic right. That's a tradition I intend on upholding as one of the authors of the agreement.

head: Presenting Petitions

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to present a petition signed by 135 residents of Edmonton petitioning the Legislative Assembly of Alberta to urge the provincial government "to take decisive action in making safe, affordable housing a top priority of concern when making policy decisions and working with other levels of government on this issue."

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm presenting a petition signed by 153 residents of Edmonton petitioning the Legislative Assembly of Alberta to urge the provincial government "to take decisive action in making safe, affordable housing a top priority of concern when making decisions and working with other levels of government on this issue."

head: Tabling Returns and Reports

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

DR. PANNU: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've got two tablings today. The first tabling is a letter from Linda D'Angelo, government relations chair, Arthritis Society, Alberta and Northwest Territories division, requesting that two new drugs, Enbrel and Remicade, be made available to citizens of Alberta.

The second tabling, Mr. Speaker, is also a letter, this one from John Mahon, executive director, Edmonton Arts Council. Mr. Mahon believes that "the provincial government has a role in maintaining our social infrastructure" and that as such the lottery boards should be re-established.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings today. The first tabling is a letter from the chair of Community Lottery Board No. 66 addressed to the Minister of Gaming. The board is concerned with the serious threat that the elimination of the community lottery board program is posing to the survival of many volunteer organizations.

The second tabling is from the chair of the Carbon and District Recreation Board on the same subject. This board is disappointed with the government decision to eliminate the community lottery board program.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar.

MR. MacDONALD: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings this afternoon. The first tabling is a letter copied to myself and addressed to the Premier. It's from Mr. Gordon Block, the president of the South East Edmonton Seniors Association. This is a letter written, of course, to express shock and disappointment over the cancellation of the community lottery boards, and it urges the government to come to their senses and reinstate the community lottery grants.

My second tabling today, Mr. Speaker, is the actual forecast from the Power Pool from yesterday, April 22, 2002. It indicates that at 12 o'clock electricity was 15.3 cents a kilowatt-hour, at 2 o'clock it was 17.5 cents a kilowatt-hour, at 5 o'clock it was 42 cents a kilowatt-hour, and then at 10 o'clock, at bedtime in this province, it was 35.9 cents a kilowatt-hour, conclusive proof that deregulation does not work. It's expensive and unstable electricity we have now.

Thank you.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two sets of tablings today. The first set is a number of unique and interesting letters from Harald Witzler of Sherwood Park, Roy Troughton of Fallis, Harold Schroeder of Onoway, Bart Rohrick of Sherwood Park, Gene Millenaar of Edmonton, Diane Hormann of Ferintosh, Neil Hanoski of Camrose, Michael Walsh of Sherwood Park, Dennis Jettkant of Stony Plain, Irvine Boby of Calgary, Rene Michaud of Leduc, Rollie Sicotte of Edmonton, Hugh Fuller of Edmonton, Murray Knight and Janice Wournell of Strathmore, Larry Hoffman of Medicine Hat, and Walter Gripping of Granum, all requesting the government to maintain some access for off-highway vehicles in the Bighorn. [interjection] These are actually your supporters this time.

My second set of tablings, Mr. Speaker, are from Christyann Olson of Calgary, Weslyn Mather of Edmonton, Melvin Dunford of Calgary, Jorn Ole West of Calgary, Madeleine Oldershaw of Calgary, Bob Bartlett of Calgary, Torsten Buchholz of Calgary, Wendy Adams of Edmonton, and seven residents of Calgary whose signatures were not clearly identifiable. These people would like the government to designate the Bighorn wildland recreation area as a wildland park using the original 1986 boundaries.

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have four tablings today. The first is from Ray Christenson, who is the chair of the Catalyst Theatre board of directors. The letter is directed to the Premier. They note that the resources in the theatre are strained at the best of times. They were in the process of preparing an application to the community lottery board for a grant to replace their antiquated computers when it was canceled. They're urging the government to "reinstate this valuable, crucial program immediately."

My second tabling is from a series of people: Gamal Abdel-Shehid, Mark Driscoll, Anne Malena, Mark Simpson, and Heather Zwicker. They are writing to register their outrage at the provincial government's recent attacks on public education and workers' rights in Alberta and are urging an immediate repeal of Bill 12 and a return to the bargaining table.

My third tabling is from Guy Coulombe, who is the residential aide placement services board president. The letter is directed toward myself. They're urging the government "not to eliminate funding from PDD until an alternate source of funding is secure."

My final tabling on Canada Book Day is a letter from Dr. Marco Adria, who is the chair of the Edmonton Public Library Board, noting that library materials for the public and talking books for sight impaired users to construction of a nonprofit centre on the sixth floor of the Milner Library were some of the uses to which community lottery boards funds were put, and on behalf of the trustees of the Edmonton Public Library Board they ask that the government reconsider the decision and reinstate community lottery boards.

Thank you.

head: Government Bills and Orders

THE SPEAKER: The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to request unanimous consent of the House, as has become our norm, to suspend Standing Order 58(4) and allow consideration of this afternoon's estimates, being the Department of Justice and Attorney General estimates, to go beyond two hours with the vote on these estimates to take place no later than 5:15 this afternoon as per Standing Order 58(5) or sooner if no one wishes to speak.

[Unanimous consent granted]

head: Committee of Supply

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Let's call the committee to order.

head: Main Estimates 2002-03

Justice

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The first hour, as per the Standing Order, will be allocated between the minister and members of the opposition following which any other member is able to participate. The hon. Minister of Justice.

MR. HANCOCK: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm delighted this afternoon to present Alberta Justice's business plan for 2002 to 2005. I'd like to start by acknowledging members of the department who are with us today in the gallery and who have done a significant job for Albertans over the course of the past year and are anticipating doing an equally significant job for Albertans over the next year. In particular I would mention that the members of our strategic services division are shared with the Department of the Solicitor General, and as such over the course of the preparation of this business plan and these estimates have done yeoman's service, in fact have done double duty over a period of time. With us today in the gallery – and I'd ask them to rise and receive the recognition of the House – are the deputy minister, Terry Matchett; Rod Wacowich, assistant deputy minister, court services; Peggy Hartman, assistant deputy minister, legal services; Peter Teasdale, acting assistant deputy minister, criminal justice division; Dan Mercer, assistant deputy minister, strategic services; and Manuel da Costa, director of maintenance enforcement.

I'll open with a few remarks and respond then to any questions that might come up from the House this afternoon, and to the extent that either time does not permit or I'm unable to answer questions in sufficient detail, we'll certainly be prepared to respond in writing to any questions that are left unaddressed.

Through our programs and services Alberta Justice is committed to building a democratic and prosperous Alberta based on respect for the law, a province where all Albertans are safe in their homes and communities and have confidence in their justice system in a province where disputes are resolved fairly and effectively. Our mission is "to serve Albertans by promoting safe communities, by ensuring access to the courts and other methods of dispute resolution, by providing legal and related strategic services to the Government of Alberta, and by communicating with Albertans about the administration of justice."

I'd like very briefly to outline our core businesses. We will prosecute criminal and other offences giving priority to prosecution of serious and violent crime. That involves $36.3 million, or 15.4 percent of our budget. We will provide Albertans access to the courts and other dispute resolution processes: $96.3 million, 40.8 percent of our budget. Alberta Justice will work to provide excellent corporate advice and legal services to government ministries: $22.5 million, 9.5 percent of our budget. The ministry will provide support and protection to some of the province's most vulnerable citizens, such as families who depend on court-ordered maintenance payments, individuals unable to protect their financial interests, and individuals who cannot afford legal counsel: $81.1 million, 34.3 percent of our budget.

In light of our fiscal targets we've also reviewed a number of strategies for improvement to the cost-effectiveness and the efficiency of our programs and services. I know that members have had an opportunity to review the five key goals in the business plan, so I won't go into them in detail. Instead, I would like to highlight some of the significant changes from previous years and discuss some of our new strategies to meet these goals and improve our services to Albertans.

One of the changes you'll note is the new simplified format that clearly links our goals and initiatives and performance measures to ensure that our ministry business plan is clear and understandable to the public. In addition, we have focused our attention on the development of new performance measures that more accurately reflect the results that we're trying to achieve for our business plan goals. Over the coming year we will continue to refine these measures by finding better ways to measure the achievement of desired outcomes through both qualitative and quantitative analysis.

The first goal in Alberta Justice's business plan reflects goal 15 of the government of Alberta's business plan, working to ensure that "Alberta will be a safe place to live and to raise families." Achieving this goal is a shared responsibility, and we recognize the importance of continued partnerships with the department of the Solicitor General and other Alberta government departments, the judiciary, the legal community, aboriginal communities, and our stakeholders in policing, community organizations, and local government.

The Justice plan focuses on two performance measures that provide an indication of public perception of their safety in homes and communities. This will provide an overall indication of our success in achieving the goal of promoting safe communities in Alberta. The responses will also indicate how satisfied Albertans are with the administration of justice in the province.

We will work to develop alternative means to more effectively deal with young persons in conflict with the law who suffer from fetal alcohol syndrome.

As a major theme of the justice summit we recognized victims as an essential part of the justice process. To evaluate our efforts to improve services and enhance the role of victims in the justice system, we'll be developing a new measure: client satisfaction with public assistance programs. To achieve this goal we will work to "identify and implement best practices that assist child victims of crime," we will enhance awareness of victim needs by facilitating "joint sessions between community victim agencies and Crown offices," and we will "support the implementation of proposed legislation expanding the powers of the court to assist victims who had suffered a loss of property as a result of an illegal act."

The ministry also provides support and protection to Albertans in need, "including families who depend on court-ordered maintenance payments." To this end, existing measures that record the amount collected by maintenance enforcement will be supplemented by a new measure that shows the program's success in collecting scheduled payments. To achieve this goal the ministry will use technology to improve services delivered by maintenance enforcement programs and will support proposed reciprocal enforcement legislation to facilitate interaction with other Canadian jurisdictions. We will develop a public education strategy from maintenance enforcement and will work with other ministries to provide enhanced maintenance enforcement services. We will also continue to provide services through the Family Law Information Centre and will deliver high-quality parenting after separation courses.

We will participate in a cross-jurisdictional review to examine the extent of unmet needs in criminal legal aid and investigate issues in civil legal aid.

Improving access to justice remains a top priority for the department. We will review opportunities for improvements to court processes such as the establishment of specialized courts that can improve access to justice and provide better services to Albertans. The Calgary domestic violence court pilot project is a good example of how such a partnership can address some of the root causes of crime in a preventative manner. We will also continue to examine the feasibility of a unified family court in conjunction with our review of the family law to ensure that Albertans have the best access to the most appropriate way of resolving their family law disputes.

As part of our efforts to provide services in innovative ways, early case resolution remains an important priority in the ministry's business plan. This process can resolve cases earlier to the benefit of court, Crown prosecutors, and particularly the witnesses, victims, and families involved. Mediation and an alternative dispute resolution process have also improved access to our courts by providing efficient forums that allow parties to take a more active role in resolving their own problems.

Education and communication about the justice system continue to be key strategies for 2002 to 2005. They were key themes of the justice summit, and we will work to identify and respond to gaps in current resources and programs that help Albertans better understand and access the justice system.

By providing legal services, Justice can assist other ministries in achieving their policy objectives while minimizing risk, conflict, and constitutional concerns. To achieve this goal the ministry will develop recommendations on the use of legal service agreements with client ministries to enhance the provision of effective legal services. We will also explore new models of service to address the increasing volume and complexity of prosecutions arising from provincial statutes. We will implement an automated file tracking system to improve the efficiency of the provision of legal and related strategic advice to client ministries, and we will provide negotiation training courses to legal officers and training sessions in legislative development to legislative planners in client ministries.

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

The financial content of our business plan reflects Treasury Board approvals over the past year, federally funded programs, and funds for continuing initiatives. The spending profile on the last page of our business plan shows our spending targets of $236 million, $242 million, and $246 million over the next three years. The 2002-2003 budget of $236 million represents a $9 million increase over last year's forecast and a $17.7 million increase over last year's budget. These increases reflect the priority that Albertans and the Alberta government place on ensuring safe and secure communities, law and order, and a justice system that is responsive to and accessible by all Albertans.

The budget includes $7.9 million in additional funding for the 2002-2003 renewal of the prosecution and legal services project. This is over and above the $6.5 million approved last year and will allow the department to continue efforts to renew and modernize the prosecution service to ensure that Alberta retains the expertise necessary to prosecute complex cases and respond to community needs in a proactive manner. The funding will allow us to hire several new prosecutors and support staff to help ensure that accused criminals are properly and expeditiously dealt with by the justice system.

An additional $1 million has also been made available to increase funding to legal aid in our commitment to help provide justice services to Albertans in need. This funding is a continuation of the government's commitment from last year to provide increased funding to legal aid for expanding their financial eligibility guidelines, increasing compensation paid to private bar lawyers, and establishing the family law staff counsel projects in Edmonton and Calgary.

Through the new dedicated revenue initiative the fines for Highway Traffic Act offences have been raised by 20 percent. Alberta Justice will retain those funds, assuming that this Legislature passes Bill 20, to help cover administrative costs associated with processing traffic tickets in Alberta courts. Those processing costs have risen dramatically over the last few years primarily due, I think, to the increase in the use of photoradar. Nonetheless, the processing of those tickets has taken resources from the department which would more appropriately be applied elsewhere, and by increasing the fines 20 percent and keeping that 20 percent, we are both continuing the amount of money that the municipalities receive from those fines as well as providing for the coverage of the costs of processing. The initiative will allow us to collect what we need to cover our costs. Additional court ticket processors will also be hired to address pressures caused by the increased ticket volume.

Budget 2002 also includes increases to some court fees to better reflect the actual cost of providing those services. Court fees in these areas have not increased since 1993, while the cost of delivering court services has increased dramatically during that period. The increased fees will go further toward covering the costs of providing the services, but they still represent a very small fraction of them. The increased fees are expected to generate an additional $2.7 million this year.

We have also found ways to reduce our spending elsewhere in our commitment to fiscal responsibility. Across the department we have reduced our spending by over $4 million through reductions in court services, legal services, criminal justice, and maintenance enforcement. The primary object, Mr. Chairman, is not, though, the reduction of our expenditures. The primary opportunity there is to reconfigure the way we deliver our services so that we can provide more and better services in a more cost-effective manner with the same resources.

So, Mr. Chairman, that would conclude my opening remarks with respect to the Justice estimates. We are continuing our commitment to implement the priorities of Albertans made through their suggestions at the justice summit – to have a more open and effective system, a bit more accessible system, a more affordable system – and we'll continue to build on our past achievements towards ensuring that those commitments are met.

THE CHAIR: For comments and questions with respect to the estimates we'll call on the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I'm very pleased to be able to rise today and commence the debate on the estimates for the Department of Justice. Before I start, I, too, would like to acknowledge and thank the staff from the department that have joined us in the gallery. I appreciate the assistance that they give the minister, and I'm sure there will be notes coming down for the minister as the afternoon goes on.

I'm also aware that there are some members of the Canadian Bar Association joining us today to watch our proceedings, and I thank them very much for making the effort. It's always nice to have a connection with some of the other people in the field. Of course, I hope we have some fun seekers and fans here today, because nothing's more exciting than watching the budget debates, in my opinion. [interjection] Well, you know, this is democracy, right here.

I recognize that my speaking time is limited to 20 minutes, so I will likely have to rise a couple of times. If the minister would be kind enough to maybe pick off a couple of topics to respond to, certainly I would anticipate receiving the rest of the responses in writing after the fact. The only request I would make – and this is as much a request of the staff, because I think the pressure goes on them – is to receive the responses before we have to vote on the Appropriation Act. I understand that that's giving them a short time line, and I appreciate any effort they put into that.

So what I'd like to do this afternoon, first of all, is go back and do a quick review of the recommendations that came out of the justice summit in January of 1999 just to see where we are with what was recommended as long-term goals, whether we've been able to accomplish those or what's still to be done on that. I'd like to go through and review the goals and measurements that have been set out by the department. I have already asked a question in question period about the fees and the changes and increase in fees, and that's an area that I'd like to dwell on for a little bit and, finally, have a look at the Auditor General's observations and recommendations to the department and what's been done to follow up on those recommendations.

What I'm going to do is go through the eight themes and the corresponding recommendations that were made at the justice summit, which was held in Calgary in January of 1999. Now, in each case except two, for each theme there were immediate, short-term, and longer term strategies. I'll be concentrating on the longer term strategies. One assumes that the others have been dealt with or it's not happening. In 1999 these were considered longer term. We're now three years past that. How successful have we been there?

Theme 1: Improve Public Knowledge, Education and Awareness. Now, a longer term strategy was about Alberta Justice [approaching] Alberta Education, Alberta Advanced Education and Career Development and the private sector to determine how justice education can be improved through curriculum change, the development of new resources and other joint strategies.

So I'm wondering how well we've done on achieving that longer term strategy.

Theme 2: Simplify the Justice System. There was a long list of immediate and short-term strategies there. The longer term strategies were:

1. A single family law forum to deal with [any] family law matters will be explored in consultation with the judiciary and other stakeholders. The forum could include access to alternative dispute resolution processes as well as to the courts.
2. Standards will be put in place and staff training will be provided to ensure all Alberta Justice materials, including court documents and internal documents, will be in plain language.

I'm just going to stop here and ask: what progress has been made in translating other documents that are for public consumption?

As we move in Alberta to a society that does not have English as a mother tongue – and we've heard quite a bit of comment in this Assembly about the need to increase immigration to bring up our labour force and meet our labour force requirements – we are dealing with people coming and living in Alberta who do not necessarily speak English as their first language. When you're trying to understand a new country's laws, being able to access at least some rudimentary information in your mother tongue is very helpful. Now, when I have tried to inquire about what kind of information was available that's translated, I was told that there isn't any. I'm hoping that the minister will put the lie to that. If there are translations, what languages has material been translated into? If there is no translation, then why not, and how soon can we expect to see it? Or is that not contemplated at all? This was a longer term strategy under Simplifying the Justice System, but it was talking about putting material in plain language.

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

The third strategy was:

3. Alberta Justice is working with Public Works, Supply and Services to redevelop court facilities in Calgary. One of the objectives is to locate all the Calgary Courts in facilities that are in close proximity so services can be easily accessed by all users.

Well, my goodness, what a timely document this has turned out to be. So we'll have a check on how we're doing with that strategy.

Theme 3: Increase Sensitivity and Cultural Awareness. A longer term strategy under that was:

Alberta Justice will consult with First Nations and Metis organizations and other justice stakeholders to identify strategies for better informing Albertans about Aboriginal cultures and values in relation to the justice system.

So where's our checkmark on that one?

3:10

Theme 4: Enhance Community Partnerships. Long-term strategies there were:

1. Alberta Justice will identify the concerns and issues related to the police complaint processes at both the provincial and federal level and develop a plan to address these concerns.
2. Alberta Justice will pursue private-sector partnerships to promote crime prevention initiatives, for example victim services campaigns and Crime Prevention Week.
3. Alberta Justice will work with law enforcement agencies to review the feasibility of establishing a single-site, multi-use police training facility.

Again, I think this is quite timely, and I recognize that that last one now pertains more to the Solicitor General than it does to the Ministry of Justice. [interjection] Okay. Well, you have an opportunity to answer that.

Theme 5: Increase the Role of Victims. There are two long-term strategies:

1. . . . review relevant legislation and policy from a victims' perspective, identify existing rights, and make recommendations for changes to ensure a more meaningful role for victims.
2. The Crown office in Calgary is using public assistance officers to respond to the needs of victims during the time a case is being prepared and brought to trial, and following the trial. Alberta Justice is considering expanding the program to other Crown offices across the province.

Theme 6: Clarify Accountability. Our strategies there were:

1. Consideration is being given to creating a custody diversion program in Calgary similar to the diversion program currently operating in Edmonton. In light of the federal Justice minister's recently tabled youth justice legislation, this review has been expanded to consider the [full] impact of this new legislation . . .
2. Alberta Justice will evaluate and determine, in conjunction with interested justice stakeholders, how to address concerns raised by delegates with respect to accountability in sentencing, parole practices, judicial decisions and police discipline.

Under theme 7, Take Action on Previous Studies and Reports on Justice, there are no long-term strategies listed from the justice summit, and under theme 8, Increase Funding, again there are no long-term strategies listed from the justice summit in conjunction with that theme.

So that's our check back into the last century to see how well we're doing in the new century in accomplishing those.

Next I'd like to look at the 2002-2003 government and lottery fund estimates book, the ministry's business plan summary, so pages 333 onward, and I will comment again this year, as I did last year, that I find that the way this ministry business plan is laid out is much easier to read and comprehend than many of the other ministry plans that I have to deal with. So my compliments to the staff and the minister who put this together. Much more accessible.

Now performance measurements. When we're looking at the goals and the performance measurements, I have some questions that go along with that, and that will be no surprise. Under goal 1, "Promote safe communities in Alberta," when I look at the core performance measures, "public perception of safety in the home" and “public perception of safety in the neighbourhood,” in both of these we’re targeting for 95 percent of Albertans who feel somewhat safe to very safe in their homes or somewhat comfortable to very comfortable walking alone in their neighbourhoods at night. My question around this is: how useful is this performance measurement? We already know that we’re dealing with a tremendous gap in perception around public safety. We know that it’s safer than people think it is from our statistics on crime and the improvement in those crime statistics. So how useful is this measurement? This is not a new measurement, and I’m just wondering: is the ministry considering changing this, or is it giving them some information that’s useful in a way that I’m not comprehending? If I could get an answer from the minister on that, please.

Now, in goal 3, “Provide access to justice services for Albertans in need,” there are a number of new activities that are planned this year, and the minister did go through many of them in his opening comments. Goal 3.1, “Monitor the operation and evaluation of the Family Law Staff Counsel Pilot Project.” I believe we’re now in our second year of operation with that project, so I’m looking for: what was the budget on this last year, and what is the budget for this this year?

Goal 3.5, “Recommend amendments to the Public Trustee Act.” I’m assuming that this is what is currently under consideration in Bill 20, the Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2002. If it’s not, I’d be interested in knowing what other additional recommendations were being considered.

Now,

- 3.6 Design and construct a Maintenance Enforcement Program (MEP) management information system.
- 3.7 Enhance MEP web-based technology.
- 3.8 Support reciprocal maintenance enforcement legislation.
- 3.9 Develop MEP Public Education Strategy.
- 3.10 Coordinate MEP file information with other ministries.

I am struggling to believe that we are still trying to get the technology in place in the maintenance enforcement program. These recommendations came out of an MLA review in 1998, and I take it the ministry is still trying to get this management information system. That’s the database; is it not? The last time I asked this question we found out that in fact it was just going to tender many years after it had been recommended, so are we still going to tender? It says, “Design and construct a Maintenance Enforcement Program (MEP) management information system.” Good grief. How many years? You know, children will be born and graduate from university with a doctorate before this comes into being. We need this program to work more efficiently. This is about getting money to children in Alberta, and this is court-ordered support for these kids. Why are we struggling? Does the minister need assistance or lobbying another way somehow to get the resources to be able to do this and carry it through? You know, I can understand enhancing web-based technology. That’s fine. Supporting the reciprocal maintenance enforcement legislation – it’s already come and gone in the Legislature so far in this spring’s session.

I’m interested in what a “MEP Public Education Strategy” might be, and once again are we looking at translation? We’re missing the boat here if we are not offering all new public education materials at least translated into the most common second languages that we’re operating with here.

Could I also get an explanation, please, on goal 3.10: “Coordinate MEP file information with other ministries to increase administrative fairness.” What exactly is meant by that? What’s unfair right now? So I’m looking for explanations on that.

Now, I look at the performance measures under this series of goals that I’ve just gone through. The first one, “Client Satisfaction with the Services of the Public Trustee’s Office.” Once again this is an opinion poll with satisfaction in it. Why has the ministry not moved on beyond these rudimentary opinion poll based performance measurements? As much as I disagree with many of the choices that this government makes, the business planning cycle was a good choice. You know, performance measurements are hard to get right. What I keep saying is that each department got their first performance measurements and then basically stalled there, and there’s been no attempt to go back and work those performance measurements into something that’s giving them more valuable information. There seems to be a default: when you don’t know what to do, then do a satisfaction poll. I don’t see how that is giving any department managers information that’s helping them to make decisions and move forward. So I’m asking if the department is looking at adjusting these or coming up with new ones. If not and they like these satisfaction ones, then what kind of information are they really getting out of this? You know, are they processing claims better, more efficiently in some way? Well, what is that efficiency then? Does that mean less time, less money, less effort from the person that’s coming in contact with the department? The satisfaction stuff is an opinion poll. I don’t find it helpful at all, but perhaps the department staff do.

“The Amount Collected on Maintenance Enforcement Program Files.” This is “the dollars collected per file by the Maintenance Enforcement Program.” This is a long-standing performance measurement, I believe, but it does look to me like there might be a new performance measurement in here because of number 3:

Dollars Due Compared to Dollars Received (% Collected)

The program’s collection rate on scheduled support and scheduled arrears payments.

I’m still looking for whether we have been successful in developing a measurement of the amount collected against the total amount of court-ordered support payments and arrears. That looks like what number 3 is, but I’ve been hoodwinked before, so I’m willing to just come out and ask the question and see if that’s what is being measured here.

In the past the way the numbers were being kept did not enable the department to give me that answer. They could tell me that there had been activity on a certain number of files, but that activity could have been collection of $1.49 when in fact the court order was for $350 maintenance each month. I’m looking to see whether we’ve actually managed to accomplish understanding how much you’ve been able to recover and therefore how much you’ve not been able to recover that’s out there.

It’s interesting to me when I look at performance measurement 4, “Number of Eligible Albertans Receiving Legal Aid Services.” Now, usually I wouldn’t see the government planning to give more benefits or assistance to Albertans, but in fact that is what’s happening here. When we look forward at these goals, for example, the actual in 2000-2001 was 98,000 and change for people receiving legal aid. The target for this fiscal year that we’re examining is 107,454, and then that rate stays the same. So I’m wondering what accounted for the department’s willingness to look at the number jump from 98,000 to 107,000. That’s very interesting to me.

Is that the end of my first 20 minutes? Wow, that just flew by. Okay; I’ll look forward to the minister’s responses.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. minister.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Some very good questions on topics near and dear to my heart, so I’m more than pleased to provide some enlightenment – hopefully it's enlightenment – with respect to what's happening in many of these areas.

With respect to the justice summit issues, of course the department has been very significantly reviewing and monitoring its performance based on what the public of Alberta requested in the justice summit and have been measuring ourselves against that. In order to accomplish that and to make sure that we were on task, as the hon. member will know, we asked the steering committee for the justice summit to stay on as a Justice Policy Advisory Committee, and we've had significant opportunity to get good advice and direction from that Justice Policy Advisory Committee on an ongoing basis. Now with the two departments of Justice and Solicitor General we have continued the committee as an advisory to both departments, so rather than duplicating by splitting the committee, we keep the justice stakeholders together, advising both departments. That has been significant to us.

I might say that one of the most important pieces of advice we got from that was that the justice summit and the outcomes and the results of the justice summit are not owned by the Justice department or the Justice department/Solicitor General's department but in fact are owned by the stakeholders in the community and all Albertans. Therefore, we shouldn't take the view that all of what's expected out of the justice summit is the responsibility of the department, and that's not to shirk our responsibility but to say that there's a broader community. Justice is the responsibility of the whole community, and we must all work together as partners in that whole community to make sure that we achieve that.

So with respect to the first issue that was raised by the hon. member, improve public knowledge and awareness, just the fact that we have that committee, that we have ongoing discussions at least two or three times a year with the committee and through that committee to the stakeholders that they represent, there's a much better understanding of how each of the participant units in the justice community works and works together in a sharing of knowledge, which is fundamental to achieving success.

With respect to specific things that we're doing, members should be aware that we have been working very diligently, particularly in the first three months of this year, to develop actual curriculum modules for use in the high school social studies curriculum. We had teachers involved in developing the units, working with us to make sure that the units were relevant to the classroom, relevant to the students, and making sure that there were materials. One of the things we found in consulting with the education community was that the justice parts of the curriculum were not necessarily adequately covered, because there wasn't sufficient access to resource material or an easy way to find supporting material. So we have an education co-ordinator in the department, a full-time position devoted to that, and that education co-ordinator has been working, as I say, with teachers, and we've engaged consultants to work with us as well. So we're working with the Department of Learning, but we're not expecting the Department of Learning to develop the modules themselves. We're doing that and providing them so that they can be used in the high school curriculum, and I think that's a very, very positive step forward.

Of course, I would be remiss if I didn't mention the work that's being done by other stakeholder communities. The Canadian Bar Association has a classroom visitation project, working with justices of the Court of Queen's Bench and the provincial court, going into classrooms. So a lot of work has been done by stakeholders in the justice community to help improve the knowledge and awareness of Albertans about how the system works and how they can access it.

The second area that was addressed by the member was simplifying the justice system, and she went immediately of course to one of my favourite topics, and that is the single family law court. Of course, that issue is broader than just a single family law court.

As members will know, we had a task force made up of members of this Legislature as well as members of the community – a representative from the Law Society, a representative from the Court of Queen's Bench, and one from the provincial court – who did a thorough analysis of a unified family court and came back with recommendations. I hope to be able to bring responses to those recommendations to the public very shortly.

We have been looking very thoroughly and working with the federal government on how we might appropriately put together a unified law forum for Albertans that would be simple and accessible. The Unified Family Court Task Force recommended a Queen's Bench model, a model of a family court as a division of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta, and that could be done, but the provincial court sits in more locations and has more simplified rules of procedure. Although the recommendation of the task force was to go with the Queen's Bench division, primarily the reason for that recommendation seemed to be that it would be easier to accomplish that because of the potential constitutional barriers of doing a unified family court on a provincial court model.

I haven't been totally satisfied that that's the direction we should go, so I have been exploring over the course of the last year with the federal Justice minister, as she then was, my counterpart from Edmonton, the possibility of doing some sort of model which would straddle both the provincial and federal appointments and have the model of a provincial court with federal jurisdiction in it. We're still in fact working on some models and having discussions with both of the courts in Alberta as well as with the federal government, and we'll be coming forward I think fairly quickly with a response to the Unified Family Court Task Force. But, of course, one of the things that we have to be aware of in talking about a unified family court is that it's not the court itself that is the important element in family law and dispute resolution. In fact, Albertans should be aware and will become more and more aware as we move into the future of some very innovative things that are being done by the bar in this province to really improve family law dispute resolutions; the collaborative law project, for example. There's an excellent model out of Medicine Hat.

I must say that members of the bar in both Edmonton and Calgary and in other communities in Alberta are engaging in a collaborative law process in family law, and it's doing some very significant things for people who have family law disputes. Adjudication, as I've often said, is not the best way to resolve a problem, particularly where there is going to be an ongoing relationship. In family law that is more true than in probably any other area, particularly if there are kids involved. So we need to look to new ways, to better ways to help people through stressful and emotional times in their lives, to help them resolve their problems. The collaborative law project, in my view, is one of those ways, and the bar is to be commended for taking up the initiative and providing that opportunity to Albertans.

Mr. Chairman, I'd be remiss if I didn't advise this House and Albertans of some of the ways that collaborative family law works in terms of people engaging lawyers to assist them with their family law problem and having those lawyers then enter into an agreement with them that they will not go to court, that they will solve the problem through meetings between the parties involving the lawyers. Their aim is to resolve the problem themselves rather than taking it into court for adjudication and in fact go so far as to say that if the process fails and they have to go to an adjudication, they have to get another lawyer. So an incentive on all parties to sit down and resolve problems, and it has proven so effective that the chambers' lists in Medicine Hat on family law matters have diminished to the point of almost being nonexistent. Certainly we've seen the impact of that on other lists.

Another project which I was pleased to be a part of an announcement on last Monday in Calgary is the dispute resolution officer project in Calgary, and again I have to commend the bar, 35 senior members of the family bar in Calgary coming forward to volunteer one day of their time per month each to sit down with people who would be making an application to court, normally a disputed application, and working with those parties to resolve the dispute in a pre-court process which often, as much as 70 percent of the time so far in the short life of the project, ends up in a consent order going before the courts, an order which is far more effective because the parties have worked it out themselves with the assistance of the dispute resolution officer rather than having a court adjudicate.

So part of this whole process is not simply a unified family court, although that's an important part of the process, because you do need the court and you do need people to understand the accessibility issues and where they go to get satisfaction. But it's also the surrounding issues – the family law counseling, the family law mediation, the dispute resolution officers, the collaborative law processes – which are going to make family law much more modern and progressive in this province. It's going to make the system much more effective for the people who are involved and most particularly for the children who are affected by family breakdown. So I'm very positive about the work that's being done by the bar, by members of our courts, by our department, and by others to really achieve some great successes in this area and such positive progress in this area.

Plain language. Plain language is often in the eye of the beholder, I guess. I would like to think that anybody perusing the – did I say perusing? That wouldn't probably be a plain language term. Anybody looking at the Justice web site would be able to find a very effective method of moving through that web site because of its clear and succinct lines showing people where to go to get the information that they need.

With respect to translations into another language I'm not aware quite frankly of translation. I'm going to look up in the gallery and see if anybody shakes their head one way or the other. I'm not aware that we've got a project going to translate documents into other languages, nor am I sure, given the resources that we have available and the things that we need to do, that that would be high on our priority list. Certainly people who access the courts who need translation within the courts have access and can have that kind of translation in the courts, and that would be very clearly provided, but I don't believe we're at the stage where we're translating documents into other languages.

Court facilities in Calgary. One of my favourite topics, because I think we're very near to a process of starting a Calgary court strategy and building a justice facility in Calgary. Now, there's been a huge demand on our financial resources for capital projects, and as everybody in this House will not only know but will probably agree, the priority has been to build schools – the $1 billion new century school program, for example, replenishing the infrastructure in the school system across the province – build capital facilities for health care, build roads. Those have all taken a considerable amount of dollars and left little for building a justice facility in Calgary.

However, we haven't let that stand in our way, Mr. Chairman. We've been promoting the concept of a public/private partnership. I'm very hopeful that we'll be able to go to the private sector, ask them for their creativity and their ingenuity in expressing interest in developing a project for Justice. I hope we'll be able to move forward very quickly. Even a year ago we had approval in principle at some levels to develop that kind of partnership, and I think we can get a justice facility in Calgary within the next five years. Certainly we'll have to start immediately to accomplish that, and it will have the effect of bringing together the diverse court operations in Calgary, and that will be very beneficial to the Calgary community and the surrounding area.

Right now, as members will know, we have about six different locations in Calgary operating court facilities: the Provincial Court, Court of Queen's Bench, Court of Appeal. They suffer from the fact that we have to administer in six different locations. We can't utilize the courtrooms in between courts most effectively. The utilization of administrative staff is not as effective as it could be. So there are many good reasons to move ahead with this project, and I'm hoping that we will be able to advise that that project is moving ahead.

We haven't stood still. We're talking about what is needed in the Calgary court. We're talking about a private/public partnership. We're working on convincing the government that we should go out immediately to an expression of interest from the private sector as to how they could do that, how they could work with government to build the building and operate it and develop a 35- to 50-year time horizon to provide for the accommodation of the courts in Calgary. That's been a particularly important project for me as minister and one that I hope that we will be able to make some good progress on in the very next short while. So that indeed hasn't been standing still, although it's been long in the gestation period.

Sensitivity and cultural awareness. I can advise that we have, particularly in the prosecution area, moved to make sure that we had cultural awareness, cultural sensitivity programs so that the prosecutors have that knowledge base on which to operate. But it goes beyond simply a cultural sensitivity program. Many people have the perception of prosecutors, for example, as having their main job to go into court and to obtain a conviction, where appropriate, of a person who's charged with an offence. But really the role of the prosecutor is so much broader than that in terms of working with the community to make sure that we can be aware of the needs of the community, that we could deal with root causes of crime, such as the domestic violence court project and those sorts of projects, work with committees on FAS, fetal alcohol syndrome, and particularly how that might affect youth coming into the court system.

So prosecutors in our province have been empowered to be much more proactive and involved in their communities and to be aware of what's happening in the community: so cultural sensitivity training absolutely, enhanced aboriginal awareness programs particularly, but more important than that, a real understanding of the role of the prosecutor in the community, both an understanding by the prosecutors themselves but an understanding by the community as to how prosecutors can play a much more significant role in the protection of our communities as we go forward.

Enhanced community partnerships. Well, I think I've spoken to some of the concepts of enhanced community partnerships already.

AN HON. MEMBER: They still let them ask questions.

MR. HANCOCK: You'd rather hear her talk than me? I'm cut to the quick.

Increased role of victims. Well, I can say that our victims' assistance units across the province have been enhanced, that there's a much more significant role now of providing assistance to victims, in the role of advising victims; for example, when someone is being released on bail, contacting victims where early case resolution is being recommended, processing victim impact statements. We don't always get it completely right. Sometimes victim impact statements don't make it from the police station to the court file in an appropriate time frame, but we're working on those issues. For the most part I think the work of the public assistance units has been commendable. One of the things that we put first and foremost in our Justice department is that victims shouldn't continue to be victimized by the process, so we pay a lot of attention to victims and ensuring that they have an appropriate role in the system and that they understand what's happening to them and to their case.

Increased funding. No long-term goal on that. Well, it's not just a question of asking for more dollars but making sure that we use the dollars we have in an appropriate manner, but we haven't been shy about asking for more resources when they're needed. The hon. member will know that last fall in a supplementary estimate, which she and members of her caucus often rail against, when more resources were available and were needed for the justice system in order to hire more prosecutors and pay prosecutors better so that they could do this community role that I've been talking about and do it effectively, we were able to achieve those additional resources in the amount of about $6.5 million, which is not necessarily significant in everybody's budget but certainly significant to our budget. Again this year for the second stage of that project we achieved additional resources. So increased funding when it's needed and for the appropriate processes, absolutely, and restructuring the way we do business to make sure that our resources are most appropriately applied is also a key goal for us.

The hon. member asked about how useful perceptions of public safety are, and I would say this: it's always important to try and improve our accountability measures, and what's most appropriately measured is how we achieve our desired outcomes. Our desired outcome is safe communities. How do you measure safe communities? Well, one of the important measures of safe communities – and I agree with the hon. member that people's perception of their safety is somewhat less than the reality of their safety, but what's really important if we're trying to make sure that Albertans feel they're in a safe community and that they have a safe place to live and work and raise their families is how they feel about it. So, yes, it's important to continue to measure those perceptions about how safe people feel in their homes and how safe people feel in their communities. Is it the be-all and the end-all of measures? No. It's always important to use additional measures to see whether we're achieving the appropriate outcomes.

Now, we can't report a multitude of measures, so we try and pick those to develop a significant trend analysis, and we can look at those measures to see whether we've moved people from satisfied to very satisfied, for example. Those sorts of changes within the measures can be appropriate, but we also have to be consistent from year to year in some ways to make sure that there's a way of developing that trend analysis.

I see I'm out of time, and I only got through page 1 of the questions, so this is going to be an interesting afternoon.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Right onto my second go. Just a couple things I want to reference from the minister's comments. First of all, if we still have guests and fun seekers with us in the gallery, a reminder that they can check what the Hansard recording is this afternoon by going to www.assembly.ab.ca and following the links to Hansard, and they will have a verbatim transcript of the proceedings between the minister and me.

The second thing is that I'm interested if the minister could give us an indication on the unified family court project. The last time he and I talked about this at any length, he seemed to be leaning towards the provincial version of that. If he's willing to give any clearer indication than he has already given about which side of the line that one is likely to fall on.

The translations. I'm not talking about translating legislation. I'm talking about pamphlets, the very simplest pamphlets that are available that are put out for anyone to pick up on legal aid or any number of other – you know, you see them in the pamphlet racks all the time. Are those being translated? I'm not recommending in any way that we start translating our laws and statutes into Cantonese and Somali. That's not the intent of what I'm saying. It's the very simplest access route into the legal system that I'm talking about.

I'd like to ask the minister to expand on the FAS/FAE initiatives that he's taking. In Edmonton-Centre we are experiencing an increase in families moving in who have children who are FAS or FAE, and that is really affecting the schools in my constituency and the kind of programming they've got to offer, how much money they're having to put into additional services and support for these kids. I can see, looking at that microcosm, on a macro level what an effect this is going to have on all of us. So I'd like the minister to be able to detail, likely in writing on this one, what short-, medium-, and long-term initiatives they're looking at to do with FAS and FAE.

The minister mentioned the supplementary supply bill in the fall, and I was, if you will remember, very happy to support that additional money because I had been lobbying fairly hard to get it. Certainly I have a number of constituents who are Crown prosecutors, and they had made their situation very clear to me. This is a larger issue, and I'll come back to it because I have another section on it.

Before I leave the goals and measurements section, I'm going to run through goal 4, "Improve access to civil and criminal justice." I'm looking for enhancement or expansion, more detail, on some of these initiatives.

In 4.4, "Assist with the identification, development and implementation of Aboriginal and justice community initiatives." In 4.5, "Explore the use of technology to improve access to courts." Now, I know there was quite a bit of consternation around replacing the court reporters with recording devices. Are we to expect more of that to come then? What exactly is meant by improving access to courts?

In 4.7, "Review specialized courts." Now, we've talked about that a little bit before, but I would like to know what the status is of the various specialized courts that the minister has now got out there in various kinds of locations and progressions of pilot projects.

In 4.8, "Develop a process for early case resolution." Now, he's done quite a bit of work around this. I'm looking for what he's anticipating in addition to what he's already done.

In 4.9, "Undertake a renewal process to modernize the prosecution service." That sounds interesting. What's being contemplated there?

In 4.11, "Review compensation for witnesses, jurors and interpreters." I'd just like more information on what's being anticipated there. Are we looking for an increased budget line item on this one next year, or what's the time line? What are we talking about?

In 4.12, "Improve public understanding of the justice system through an education strategy." Interesting, because that in fact was part of what came out of the justice summit. The minister has already responded to this, and it's turning up again under his goals, so in addition to what he's talked about, what else is he anticipating?

In 4.13, "Develop a Lawyers Guide to the Maintenance Enforcement Program." Has there been a need demonstrated for this? I'd like to hear more about that.

In 4.15, "Examine the use of family conferencing to facilitate MEP collections." I take it that this is videoconferencing or some sort of electronic conferencing to bring people together, or do you actually expect to have them all in the same room?

What is anticipated under 4.16, "Support and develop Court Initiatives in First Nation communities"?

My final question is on 4.19, "Develop a strategy to address increased traffic and bylaw ticket volumes." Now, is that part of what is turning up under Bill 20, Justice Statutes Amendment Act, 2002, under the provincial offences section? I did speak about that in debate on Bill 20 last night. I'm a little concerned there that the victims' fund is being circumvented through what's being anticipated, so I'm looking for clarification there.

Okeydokey. Moving on, now we're into the book. This is Budget 2002: The Right Decisions for Challenging Times, Fiscal Plan. On page 27 we're looking at a discussion of safe communities, and we're talking about: "Thirty-eight Crown prosecutors will be hired over the next two years." Interestingly, I think it was in the week-end's paper that there was a discussion about the caseloads still being very high for Alberta's Crown prosecutors, although there has been, as we've already discussed, a budget item to hire I think 22 new Crown prosecutors – at the time I thought it was 17; maybe I could get clarification on that – and also to improve the grid for pay increases.

We are still in comparison not doing well. I mean, we're ranking right up there with Saskatchewan and Newfoundland as far as caseload is concerned. Do I take it that the minister is anticipating that by the time we get the 22 prosecutors on line, we will have taken ourselves from the ranks of the most overworked in Canada? Twenty-two new Crown prosecutors doesn't strike me as very many when I'm looking at that number of caseload. In comparison, in these numbers that are being quoted, Alberta is listed at 479, and I think that's down from 499 before the additional Crown prosecutors were added in the fall. That's right; 15 new prosecutors were hired in 2001-02 and 38 new ones are anticipated to be hired over the two years.

I think that's a fairly large issue, because this fits into a larger theme than I have seen and that I've developed suspicions about. It's about access to justice in Alberta. I've seen the minister take a number of initiatives and steps towards trying to keep cases out of court, in some cases good initiatives, good ideas. Yes, that's the way to go, but I also have questions about whether we aren't making access to justice more difficult in some cases, certainly when people have an experience where they have very little time to spend with their Crown prosecutor, who has very limited time to prepare for their case and rushes into court.

With some of the choices the minister is making – this is where I'm at a disadvantage not being a lawyer, because I can't remember all of the catchphrases easily – the effect has been that we're moving towards a very small collapse rate when we actually get to trial. Normally a Crown prosecutor would show up and say: okay; there are – I'm making up numbers now – 15 trials scheduled today, but I know that I'm going to settle six of them before we ever hit the doors, which is going to free up enough time that I can actually do the work to prep for the other nine cases that are now still up, and some of those will be put over anyway. Given the choices that the minister has made, I think, from what I'm understanding, that we're putting those Crown prosecutors in a position where they show up, they've got 12 cases scheduled instead of 15, but they're going to have to do every one of those 12 cases without a corresponding amount of scheduled time to get to know the cases better. Now, I could be wrong. Please correct me, but it seems to me that there's a real struggle going on here between trying to cut costs and keep costs under whatever budget the minister is assigned by the Treasury Board and citizens' access to justice in this province.

I had asked a question the other day about legal aid amounts. I think the minister and I miscommunicated on a couple of levels there, because in fact the qualifying level didn't change – and that's what I was asking about – but the amount that the ministry is giving over to that program has increased.

So what's happening with the Crown prosecutors is part of a much larger discussion, I think, about access to justice. The choices that are being made, that I see the minister making, I think are restricting the average person's access to justice, and I'll come back to that.

Also in this same document, when I look at page 51 in this fiscal plan under Justice, we have a change in the FTEs, full-time equivalents, of 57. Now, if I could get a detailed breakdown, please, about where those 57 FTEs are going. It is an increase of 57. We're going from 2,066 FTEs in budget year 2001-02 to 2,123 in the fiscal year we're examining, so that's an increase of 57. Could I know where those people are, please?

Next is under Premium, Fee and Licence Changes. Again, I asked the minister a question about this a couple of days ago or maybe at the end of last week in question period. At the time the minister's response was that the increase for small claims court had gone from $25 to $100 to cover the cost of mediators, and there was to be an encouragement to move people away from small claims court and towards mediation. I think there's an argument there that to someone walking up to the door, it still makes it look like this may not be very accessible to them anymore.

There would have to be some fairly rigorous encouragement and enticement made available to people for them to, you know, turn to the side and go and check out the mediation services that are available. Most people, if they've ended up walking up to small claims court, most of my constituents anyway, are looking for their damage deposit that they didn't get back. At this point it's $600, $700, $800, $900. Yeah, because it's the first month's rent. In downtown high-rises right now, people are paying $900 for a one-bedroom apartment. That's what people are paying. That's why we're having a homeless problem. And then they don't get their damage deposit back, and they walk up there. There is no mediating with this landlord. They already know that because they couldn't get the money the first three times they tried. So now they're going to have to pay $100 in order to get that $600 or $700 or $800 or whatever it is worth of damage deposit back. I think that is a barrier to justice, because there is no mediation there. So I don't know; maybe the minister has some percentage that he expects to be able to be encouraged or hived off into using mediation services instead of going to small claims court. Well, let's hear it.

We have a number of other changes in fees. Filing a notice of appeal and subsequent filings is going from $200 to $600. In Court of Queen's Bench, filing a certificate of readiness is going from $200 to $600. Appointment for a solicitor/client taxation is going from $25 to $100. The issuance of a civil claim and filing of notice of application under part 5 of the Residential Tenancies Act is going from $25 to $100. This was done without any consultation that I'm able to perceive. If there was consultation, I'd be interested in knowing who was consulted with that agreed or approved of this. You know, if you take a step back, this just looks like a money grab.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Hon. members, the chair needs to interject. The level of noise in the Assembly is getting higher and higher, and I caution all members to please give due respect to the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, who has the floor.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks very much, Mr. Chairman. It seemed pretty normal to me, but thanks for the interjection.

We're under court fee increases, so I'm looking for whether there was consultation about these fee increases and making the statement that it just looks like a tax grab. I mean, $200 to $600: that's more than double; that's triple. That's a lot of money. How come? Was this far behind the times? Is every other province charging significantly more than this? How was this particular fee arrived at? You say that there's a connection in the small claims with the $100 representing two mediators at 50 bucks a pop. Okay; then what's the magical connection here for the rest of these where we're going in the most part from $200 to $600?

I think that this does affect again the people that can least afford this. For what the filings are here and the fees, we're not talking big business here. This is not what corporations get into, and frankly I think they'd be less likely to notice this, but individuals are really going to notice this.

This I'm adding to my running list on the side about access to justice issues. One was the Crown prosecutor's workload. Two is this whole fee structure and the increases in fees here.

I think the next area I want to go into is connected. We have had an increase in population in Alberta. The figures I've got here are 34 percent over the last 10 years. I'm sure someone else could come up with other figures. Of course, with 34 percent more people in the province we're going to have a corresponding, one assumes, increase in the number of people that are needing to access court services. Maybe for special reasons we might have a higher percentage of people needing to access court services. So one would expect that there would be somewhat of a corresponding volume increase if nothing else to deal with the increase in population in Alberta. In fact, we have seen that. Court filings have increased, court services have been added, trials are longer and more complex, and everybody's being asked to do more with less.

If you look at the budget that goes with that, I think it can be argued that there has been a corresponding decrease in the budget. Now, some of that is in fact efficiencies, and I know that the minister can prove that, so I welcome him to do so. But I do question whether in fact we have yet another mark that goes on that side list about access to justice. There have been a number of times with episodes in the last year or so where I've been asked to comment, and to me it always looks like there was a choice made to save money, and in that saving of money we had justice slowed down or more difficult to access.

We get into a philosophical argument here, because I believe there are certain programs and services that a government must offer its people. Must. Now, whether that's constitutionally enforced or whether it's a moral obligation to provide this or whether they're the only one that can provide it, nonetheless it is there. That obligation is there, and I think access to justice and public safety is one of those areas that the government must provide. It's not a matter that you can say: oh, I think not today. [Ms Blakeman's speaking time expired] That's not my second 20 minutes.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: I regret that it is your second 20 minutes.

MS BLAKEMAN: All right; I'll come back.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. minister.

MR. HANCOCK: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'd be pleased to start where the hon. member left off, talking about the increased population in our province and the fact that many Canadians and people from other parts of the world are flocking to Alberta to be part of the Alberta advantage and the great economy that we have here and the great opportunity to live in safe communities and to raise their children in safe communities. That in fact is the attraction which brings people here, and it does indeed put more pressure on our systems. It puts more pressure on our hospital systems and our school systems and of course on our court systems.

That's one of the reasons why we have to constantly be trying to find ways to do things better, because it's not always a question of increasing the resources. Certainly when you have a system which has a huge infrastructure – and the court system is a big infrastructure in terms of both people and buildings, when I'm speaking of infrastructure, so it can be increased modestly and accommodate larger numbers of people and cases. You don't have to always be building new infrastructures, but you do have to be looking at the way that you provide services.

As we move into the 21st century and talk about how we do dispute resolution in the 21st century, it is appropriate to look at the way we've done things in the past, where we're going in the future, and see if there are better ways. We've spent a lot of time – and this is not exclusive to the Department of Justice by any stretch of the imagination. The bar and people in the community, the Better Business Bureau in Calgary and others, are saying that there are better ways to resolve our disputes, particularly when we have ongoing relationships. So we're finding that mediation processes are more and more important, even within the courts. The courts are finding that rather than simply adjudicating, judicial dispute resolution processes are important.

So we're finding new ways to resolve, to handle larger caseloads quite frankly, in one way by diverting those that should be appropriately diverted, both in the criminal system and in the civil system, diverting in the civil system to mediation processes, to giving people back their problems and providing them with assistance to resolve those problems rather than taking their problems away from them and finding an expensive way to go to battle on those problems. That's a very, very important way in which we're able to help people to get better solutions to their problems in a more effective and more efficient way. So you don't necessarily have to increase the size of your infrastructure commensurate with the size of your population.

We're always looking for ways to reinforce that kind of activity in the community. I go back again to the collaborative law projects, to the dispute resolution officers, to the civil mediation project, and the many, many ways that members of the bar and other members of the community are helping to provide more effective ways for people to solve their problems in this province. Really one might go so far as to say that that old adage about people being entitled to their day in court is not necessarily applicable any more. People are entitled to a fair and effective way to resolve their disputes, and it shouldn't necessarily involve going to court, although you always have to have the court system as a backup to that. People need to have access to justice, but that doesn't necessarily mean access to a judge. So we're finding different ways of doing things.

In fact, the allusion was made earlier to a question about the renewal of the prosecution service. We have engaged in a project within the prosecution service and in fact right across Justice about looking at how we do business. What's the best way to deliver? What are the outcomes we're trying to achieve in a safe community? How do we get there from here? The first thing we had to do, yes, was to hire more prosecutors and pay them more and pay our legal officers more, because in a strong economy such as we find in Alberta, there is competition for good resources, and there is competition for good people, and those people have to be fair to their families.

So when they're challenged with the opportunity of a job with the federal government that perhaps pays more or a job in the private sector where they could earn more, they have to balance that against the opportunity to continue to work in the Justice department and with the prosecution service in Alberta, where they're getting a very wonderful experience and a great opportunity to serve. But that has to be balanced; you have to be fair to your family. So of course we had to come up with more resources so that we could hire more prosecutors and so we could pay them fairly.

Having said that, though, that's not the end of the program. You have to also continue to look at how you can be more effective in your community to deal with the root causes of crime. If you simply deal with crime as it presents itself to you at the door, you're going to be continuing to cycle through a process that grows ever and ever larger. So we've dealt with early case resolution projects. We've dealt with ways to have the prosecutors involved in FAS and FAE and cultural sensitivity and processes. We've tried to develop new methods of dealing with courts; for example, the Tsuu T'ina court process, the domestic violence court. Prosecutors in other parts of the province are working – in Lethbridge there's a lot of innovative work being done with the community on domestic violence issues.

So those sorts of projects are very, very important, and we have made a commitment to improving our prosecution service by paying more and by hiring more people, but one must also be conscious of not getting too excited by finite measurements. It isn't necessarily a bad thing to have the highest average file load in Canada. It's not necessarily a bad thing. It depends on what you're doing, how you're doing with it, and how effectively you're able to deal with them. Now, having said that, we're aiming at trying to get our file levels down and our workloads to a manageable and acceptable level, but are we aiming to be the lowest in Canada? No. That's not the measure that's important. It is one of the inputs.

The other thing which I would point out because of something that's bothered me from time to time since I've been Justice minister – the newspaper report that the hon. member alluded to talks about an article showing that we're still the highest in Canada. What the hon. member failed to point out is the CJIS statistics report that was released was for last year, 2000-2001. We've done significant things since then. [interjection] Even earlier than that perhaps. And that's one of the problems we have with statistics in the justice system. Quite often by the time they're rolled up across the country and compared and analyzed and reported, they're so significantly out of date as to be of very little value in the true analysis of what's happening. That's something that we really do need to do more about, getting more current statistics.

However, having said that, I will acknowledge that we have not filled the full complement of prosecutors that we're hoping to hire. We do need to hire the best, the brightest, the people that are going to be long-term employees of Justice and who are going to really add to the Justice department and add to the service of Albertans. So that's something we're doing carefully, that we're doing diligently, that we hope to have accomplished, but we're not just going to go out on a hiring spree and hire everybody. We're being very careful about the process to make sure that we get the best people.

Enticements to mediation, premiums, fees, and charges. I'm not hoping to entice anybody into either the court or the mediation process. I do acknowledge that there may be people who might find a hundred dollar filing fee in Provincial Court to be a barrier, and I've discussed with the department how we might achieve a way to resolve that, working either, for example, with the Poverty Law Clinic or in other ways to make sure that people who truly can't afford to access the system do have access to the system. We don't want to be cutting anybody out of the system. That's not the intention. It should also be clear that in the court system, particularly Provincial Court, when one does obtain a judgment – in other words, when they are right about their claim for their damage deposit – they would also get their court costs. While it may be an initial barrier to filing if you don't have the money, it shouldn't be too big a barrier for most people.

So we have to weigh that. We certainly have to monitor that. We don't want to restrict access to the courts to any individual on the basis of cost, but it's a modest cost in the overall scheme of things, particularly in light of the overall costs of the courts. As I said I think in my opening remarks or perhaps in answers to earlier questions, these fees have not been raised since 1993. There's a significant increase in the cost of doing business, and the balance of who pays for that between the public and the individuals using the system has to be kept in mind.

The notice of appeal and the certificate of readiness. Those are two areas where we felt it was appropriate to make significant increases in the costs. Yes, we do need more money. People are talking all the time about the justice system needing to have more resources, and we do need those resources. So if that constitutes a money grab, well, we need to get the money. We need to have the money from the ticket collections that we're processing, and it's fair to charge that back to the people that are creating the problem, the people who are speeding or violating the Highway Traffic Act, get them to pay for the cost of processing their tickets, and I don't apologize for that. Nor do I apologize for saying to people who are filing a certificate of readiness or a notice of appeal that it costs money to access the system. The cost of the filing fee is probably the least expensive part of their lawsuit. They really should be encouraged before they file a certificate of readiness to see whether they can't resolve the matter. Very, very often we find cases resolved on the steps of the courthouse. If they would take a look at it a few days earlier or a few months earlier, prior to filing a certificate of readiness, they might well be able to resolve those problems earlier without waiting till they've booked court time and ended up in collapse rates in the court system and those sorts of things.

So it's not only an opportunity to earn a few more dollars, which can be well applied in the justice system, but it's also an opportunity to incent behaviour which suggests that people could, before they go to appeal or before they go to trial, look to see whether they can't have a resolution. We're finding that resolution is possible. Even in the Court of Appeal they're doing judicial dispute resolution, and if they can do judicial dispute resolution in the Court of Appeal successfully and have people resolve their problems before they go to appeal, then there's no good reason why the parties, well advised, couldn't sit down and come to that conclusion earlier on and save them and the system a whole lot more money. It's appropriate to incent parties to think about those things, and we certainly need to work in that direction.

With respect to the detailed breakdown of individuals that we're hiring, I presume we can provide you with a general breakdown of that, but it won't take too much for you to figure out that most of those are going into the prosecution service, both in the hiring of legal officers and in the hiring of support staff. Some of the other positions will be going into the processing of the traffic tickets area.

A question was raised about clarifying comments with respect to the unified family court. I can't go a whole lot further on that, because this is, of course, subject to some discussion that's still ongoing with the courts and with the federal government. Clearly, what I'm hoping to accomplish in that area, what I'm hoping to bring before government and then perhaps before the House in the nature of legislation, if that's required, is a model which provides the accessibility and the simplification in terms of process that's provided in the Provincial Court with the authority that's necessary from time to time from a Federal Court appointment. So we're trying to achieve that. We're still working on how we can accomplish that, and I haven't got a conclusion to that as yet to offer you, nor do I want to indicate where I think it will sit or what the model is. There's still work to be done, but we're proceeding on that work. Certainly we'll be happy to give you information on what's going on.

We're co-operating with other ministries on the FAS and FAE initiatives, which are very important to the justice system because so many of our clients, particularly on the criminal justice side, suffer from those syndromes. As I've often said, the best prevention program for our acute care justice system is to deal with some of these issues early on, help children before they get into the system by dealing with some of the root causes. We can provide you with more detail about the initiatives that are happening in that area, but we are co-operating with other initiatives.

The hon. member indicated that she was supportive of the supplementary estimates, and I very much appreciate the fact that she was supportive of the supplementary estimates in the fall. What I was alluding to when I commented about lack of support was the continual derision that we get when we come up in midterm asking for more dollars when they're needed and when they can be made available. The implication is that the opposition would prefer that we stick to our budget as put forward rather than make midcourse adjustments when the resources are available and when we can demonstrate, as we clearly did last fall, in a time when getting additional dollars was very, very difficult because of what had happened on the revenue side – but we persevered and we made the case. We were able to make a very strong case that additional resources were needed, and it shows the importance of not adhering to the concept that there should just be a budget and that you should never make any adjustments. That was an indication that supplementary estimates are so important to us and our ability to adjust and make sure that we do it.

Improved access to civil and criminal justice. I think so much has been done in these areas. The improved access to criminal justice is so important in terms of what's been happening through the public assistance units and the way that they've been able to bring victims into the system and to reduce the amount of revictimization. There's still a lot of work to be done. I've mused about how we might be able to, for example, eliminate preliminary inquiries, because with the new rules of disclosure preliminary inquiries may be less and less important. Now, the defence bar quite likely will not agree with that supposition, but I think it's an idea that needs to be floated and discussed.

At one time not too long ago all provinces had agreed at a meeting to proceed to the elimination of the preliminary inquiry, and then one of the provinces changed their mind, as often happens when you're trying to deal with a unanimous decision across the country. It can be very, very difficult to change processes and procedures at the criminal law level, but we need to look at those processes, because again, for example, victims going into a prosecution process, having to appear at the preliminary inquiry and then having to appear again at a trial, have to relive their victimization over and over again. One has to balance the rights of the accused, particularly as protected by the courts in terms of the rules of disclosure, with the rights of the victim. I think that that balance is very clear now that appropriate disclosure obviates the need for preliminary inquiries, and we should be looking at those sorts of things to see if we can improve the access and improve the time to trial by simple things like doing that.

I'll be attending a trial courts of the 21st century conference in May, and that's being run in Saskatchewan. The Chief Judge of the Provincial Court in Saskatchewan is one of the chief organizers of that conference, a very important and timely conference to talk about what our trial courts should look like. Again going back to the concept that just because we've done it this way for the last 300 years . . . [A beeper sounded] I was just getting started, Mr. Chairman.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Hon. minister, you still have time.

MR. HANCOCK: Oh, excellent. That was somebody else's beeper. I thought it was too short.

Anyway, the hon. member was referencing a number of the goals, and the technology to improve access to the courts, I believe, was one of the goals that she was referencing. There are just so many ways that we can improve access to the courts, again both on the criminal and on the civil side, through the use of technology. Imagine, if you will, that you are in the remand centre and you need to appear in court in order to be arraigned. That's a very, very short appearance in court, but you might have to get up at 6 o'clock in the morning and be transported from your cell to the courts, be held in a holding cell in the courts for some period of time until your case is called, then go into court for a brief two- or three-minute appearance, if that, then back to the holding cell, and then back to the remand centre, only to find that somebody else is occupying your cell, that you've been moved into new accommodations. Now, wouldn't it be better if you could just go down the hall and appear in court through the benefits of videoconferencing?

I think many people would realize and recognize that their rights to appear in court are not being abrogated by a simple thing like that, and of course if they needed to be in court or wanted to be in court, they could certainly do so. There's no reason why we can't move to technology which would both improve the security of the court and the community by not moving prisoners around so much. It would be more cost-effective in terms of not having to have so many people moving prisoners around the province – sometimes it's court officers, and sometimes it's the police – and in some cases moving prisoners quite some distance for arraignment. So that's the way that technology could be used on the criminal side.

On the civil side, of course, there are many ways we could improve through technology, and we're going to have to look at ways that we can do that. Particularly, of course, the constant problem is finding the resources to do it, but that doesn't mean we shouldn't be thinking about it and preparing for it and trying to move in that direction.

Again videoconferencing is a very important tool. In a recent case in Fort McMurray, for example, both parties agreed that a witness from Ontario who had a young son who was sick wouldn't have wanted to travel, that it would have been cruel to make that person travel. She would have had to bring her son. It was just before Christmas. The parties agreed that the testimony could be given by videoconferencing, and the quid pro quo was that the two witnesses from Newfoundland who needed to appear could appear by videoconferencing. Now, they would have had to travel all the way across the country, all the way up to Fort McMurray – not that going to Fort McMurray is a bad thing – and it would have taken a lot of their time and effort to appear as a witness in a trial when their time in the witness box, so to speak, was very, very short, and so is my time, I understand.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Hon. minister, your time has now run out.
The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thanks very much, Mr. Chairman. I'm pleased to rise to speak to the estimates of the Department of Justice and to put some comments and questions to the minister. The first thing that I wanted to raise was the question of court fees, and I understand that that's already been discussed to a certain degree. I see that appeal filings have been increased for the Court of Appeal from $200 to $600 and the same for a certificate of readiness with the Court of Queen's Bench. The fee for the appointment for a solicitor/client taxation with Court of Queen's Bench has gone from $25 to $100, and the fees for the issuance of a civil claim and the filing of a notice of application under part 5 of the Residential Tenancies Act will be increased from $25 to $100. So the question that arises, which I think the minister has not fully addressed, at least not to my satisfaction, is: what is the impact of these changes in fees on the principle of equal access to justice?

I note with interest comments that were recently made by the president of the Canadian Criminal Trial Lawyers Association. He says very clearly that access to justice does depend on your means. He says that those who have the means are often able to afford a defence that's not available to those without means. A staff lawyer for the Edmonton Centre for Equal Justice says that people can't afford to hire lawyers in many cases, that even the cost of filing an action in small claims court, recently raised from $25 to $100, has priced the system out of many people's hands. They conclude by saying: I think we're headed for a two-tiered justice system if we're not careful. I'd be very interested in hearing the minister's comments with respect to those perspectives by people who are directly involved in the system, at the front lines.

As well, I'd like to raise the question of fees for the legal aid system. I know that it is a concern that they recently increased from $61 to $74 an hour and will rise $2 a year until they reach $80 in 2005. There has been an increase in the department's budget, and I'd like to recognize the progress that has been made in the department in those areas, but the question is whether or not it's going to be fast enough to ensure that people dependent on legal aid have the resources that they need when they need them in order to make sure that their rights are protected just as well as any other person who may come before the courts.

I have another concern that I'd like to raise, and that is dealing with the maintenance enforcement program. The maintenance enforcement program is identified under strategies and initiatives of the government business plan under goal 3. Goals 3.6 to 3.10 all deal with some ambitious and laudable strategies for dealing with maintenance enforcement in the province, yet the maintenance enforcement program funding is being reduced nearly 10 percent in this budget, from $8,886,000 to $8,046,000, which is a reduction of $840,000. How will the department be able to meet these strategies and initiatives under goal 3 with 10 percent less money in their budget? I'd like the minister to perhaps talk about how maintenance enforcement is working in Alberta and whether or not it's being more or less successful and what changes in the development of that program may have led to the decision to reduce its funding. Perhaps there are some reasons that the minister can put forward.

I would like to also address the question of the G-8 summit, which is identified as a goal. It's interesting that this comes under strategies and initiatives for enhancing our focus on serious and violent crime. It says: "Work with the R.C.M.P., Calgary Police Service and other involved agencies, providing legal advice and assistance with planning and training, to contribute to a safe G8 Summit." So I would like to know what steps the ministry is taking to ensure that the summit is not only safe for the visiting heads of state but also safe for people who may wish to exercise their legal and democratic rights to protest. I would like him to explain, if he could, a little bit of the structure of the decision-making between the R.C.M.P., Calgary police, and his department and the Department of the Solicitor General in respect of those decisions. I think everyone is concerned that we . . . [interjection] If that were the case, hon. Minister of Environment, he might find himself considerably outgunned by the protesters. I don't know.

I certainly would appreciate some assurances from the minister that in fact people are going to be safe, that the environment in the Kananaskis is going to be safe. What steps are being taken to prevent confrontation and violence before it begins? I would hate to think that the strategy will be just to wait for something to happen and then move in with tear gas or rubber bullets or whatever else police forces have decided to use from time to time when people protest.

I had a number of reports, not the least of which from my colleague the leader of the New Democrat opposition, who attended at Quebec, that indicated that in fact very often there was a small minority of people who caused trouble and were prepared to be involved in very aggressive or violent activities but that the police response in many cases was directed against people who were not involved in those activities. I would like some assurances from the minister that he is taking steps to ensure that that in fact does not happen.

Mr. Chairman, I think that for the moment those will be my comments and questions for the minister, and I look forward to his response. Thank you.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. minister.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would start by commenting on the question relating to the decrease in expenditures for maintenance enforcement. The budget shows a budget decrease of $840,000, and most of that is due mainly to the transfer of operating expenditures to capital expenditures in the 2002-2003 budget. There is a modest decrease included in there with maintenance enforcement working with all other areas of the department to absorb the reduction targets from last fall, but most of that number has to do with the transfer to capital.

As the hon. member indicated, the goals for maintenance enforcement are both ambitious and laudable and also, I think, very much attainable. We have a very, very strong maintenance enforcement system in our province, and the director, Manuel da Costa, is here. I would like to take the opportunity to say that maintenance enforcement is doing a very good job for getting resources particularly to children and families who need them in this province. Are they collecting every dollar that's awarded by the courts? Absolutely not. You can't get blood from a stone. Sometimes the people are very effective at evading the process, but we have collection teams and we're every year finding better ways to give them more enforcement tools, and we don't apologize for that. We make it our business to make sure that to the extent possible maintenance orders are enforced.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre asked earlier about a manual with respect to lawyers. Certainly one of the things that we're trying to do is make sure that court orders, when they're granted and registered with maintenance enforcement, are orders that we can enforce. People's circumstances change from time to time, so the orders need to be changed from time to time, and unfortunately our history in the system is that people often by that time have run out of resources. They've spent far too much on their domestic disputes, and they're quite sick of being in court, so making changes to orders has been difficult. So we're working with the family law bar.

Certainly the Family Law Information Centre is working to develop standard clauses to make sure that enforcement orders are standard and enforceable and that the changes, when necessary, can be made but, for the most part, that orders will stand the test of time, where possible, so that they don't have to be changed. There will always be dissatisfaction with the maintenance enforcement program either from people who think that we're making it too difficult for them to evade their responsibilities to their children or, conversely, from people who are not getting the full amount that they've been awarded by the courts, simply because if the person is not working or if we can't find them or if we can't access their resources, we don't make that payment to them. It's a collection process. It's not a process that the government makes up the shortfall. So while the process is working very well and the people who are working in maintenance enforcement are doing an excellent job, they are doing that in a context where there are a lot of complaints to members of this House by members of the public either because they think we're being too tough or because they think we're not doing enough on their behalf. It's often a thankless job, so I'll reiterate my thanks and the thanks of government to the people who work in this area to collect money on behalf of children and families in the province. We will work to continually improve and develop the tools that they have at their disposal to do that.

The question was: why did we cut the budget 10 percent in every area of the department? I indicated to the member that we didn't actually cut the budget 10 percent. We reallocated how it is reported in here, so it shows up in a different spot. The actual cut was 1 percent, and every area of the department and every area of government took a 1 percent cut last fall, and that was absorbed. We are refining and making possible better ways for people to actually access the system as well through improved web design programs and through 24-hour telephone processes. The access to information, for those who are capable of doing it, is very good, and we're working on the other processes so that people have access to information. Again, the work that is being done by that division is exceptional.

Legal aid: the concept that legal aid is increasing the fees. We've agreed to a process where it goes up by $2 a year. We're not aiming to compensate legal aid lawyers under legal aid certificates at the same level that they could obtain in private practice. That's not the name of the game. What we're trying to do is make sure that they have sufficient resources through that program to make it attractive enough for them to continue to provide services. Most of the people who provide legal aid services are doing it because they have a professional commitment to it and want to do it, but they do need to have their expenses covered, at minimum, and they need to make a little bit because they need to feed their families. So the legal aid tariff needs to be sufficient to make sure that it does cover those expenses and does provide a little extra, but it's not the intention to make the legal aid tariff equivalent to what a lawyer would charge in private practice to anybody coming through the door.

Just to point out why that's not the case, we recently had a court case where the court ordered a higher tariff to be paid in that case, and the local lawyers then started complaining because lawyers were coming in from Vancouver and Toronto to take the cases. Even that rate was not seen to be the tariff that would be charged by lawyers at private bar to private clients. Finding the right tariff is a difficult task, I'm sure. We've entered into a new governance agreement with the Law Society and the Legal Aid Society to provide for a governance structure. We've got an agreement in place where the legal aid tariff will go up $2 a year, and we believe that that's going to be effective. It seems to be effective in terms of ensuring that there are sufficient well-qualified lawyers available to provide services to clients.

The legal aid limits went up 5 percent last year, so single persons making $13,900 or less, if they're otherwise qualified, are automatically eligible. If they're above that amount, up to $21,504, they're still eligible for legal aid provided that they make a modest co-payment. The same applies to a family of four, which could have an income of up to $32,600 and still get legal aid for some portion of their fees. Legal aid staff have the discretion to provide coverage to applicants who can't privately retain counsel, even if their income exceeds the guidelines. So the process is to make sure that people have access to lawyers when they need it, particularly when they're threatened with going to jail or losing their freedom. The system appears to be working very well. There are always concerns about whether it's sufficient, whether there's enough.

Actually, going back to the measure that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre asked about, it is an interesting measure, not one of our better measures, I think, in terms of measuring our success by how many people have accessed the system, but it's difficult to measure it in any other manner, in particular.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands was particularly concerned about affordability. That's one of the things that we've been trying to address in this whole process of making justice more accessible. He chose to focus the question of affordability on people's ability to pay to hire a lawyer and quoted the head of the Alberta Criminal Trial Lawyers Association. I think I've addressed some of that through the legal aid tariff process, which is precisely there to assist. We could of course do things in different ways to provide broader services.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre asked about the budget for the family law project in Edmonton and Calgary, which is funded by legal aid. That's a legal aid budget, not a government of Alberta budget. We provide resources to legal aid; they allocate them as they think appropriate. So she should approach legal aid for that, or perhaps the next time I file, if I do, in the House the annual report of the Legal Aid Society, she could look at that document for the numbers. Those family law projects are proving to be an effective way to corral resources and provide resources to the broadest number of people and to be very effective at it. I think those pilot projects are very effective.

Now, of course, when we made that project agreement, we agreed that we wouldn't push for a similar project on the criminal trial side, although it might well be a good way to go, but we said we wouldn't go there for a period of time. I'm not sure if I remember off the top of my head whether it was five years or not. So we're going to adhere to that. That being said, if the lawyers don't believe that we're providing sufficient access to people when they need it, then maybe one of the things we need to do is sit down and talk about how we could more appropriately provide that access to the legal system through the resources that are available. Maybe that needs to be revisited.

Suffice to say that there are concerns across the country, as well, about the contribution made by the federal government to the legal aid process, and there have been attempts to address that. I don't have the numbers at hand, but they have in the past contributed more significantly to the criminal trial side. That has dropped off. So the issue of legal aid and contributions has not been an issue that's solely relevant to Alberta but, rather, has been even more relevant in other jurisdictions in the country with respect to those contributions.

I'm quite satisfied that there isn't a two-tier system, that people do have access to appropriate counsel for defence when they need it. If in fact they make the allegation and they can make the allegation before a court that they don't have access to appropriate defence, the courts are in a position to rectify that and have taken steps in the past, whether we agree with them or not, to compensate lawyers more. I don't see that as being a particular problem.

With respect to the civil side of the system, everything we've done has been designed to try and make it more accessible and to try and make sure that people take more responsibility for the solution of their own problems. The legal system is an expensive and a complex system and not the best way to solve problems most of the time. It needs to be there to solve those essential questions of law and to be there when all else fails, but it shouldn't be the first resort. So with a move to more recognition by the public of the availability of mediation and arbitration processes and that going to arbitration processes in appropriate circumstances is a good way to solve problems without going to the expense of long and drawn-out lawsuits and without using expensive court resources, more affordable justice and better access to justice can be effected in that way.

As we take more cases out of the court system and resolve them in a more appropriate manner through dispute resolution processes, what that does is make it easier to get to court faster on those issues that do need to go to court. In fact, in Calgary when we were announcing the dispute resolution process last week, a question was asked as to whether or not the advent of the dispute resolution project was helping to clear the logjam in the courts. The Associate Chief Justice was quick to take to the microphone to insist that there wasn't a logjam in the courts in Calgary, that you could get into court before the end of the month on a one-day matter, before the end of June on a short matter, and before the fall on a longer matter. I think we're being very effective in making sure that the courts are available on a timely basis, and we're doing a lot to ensure that people look for alternatives that are less expensive to them. So that brings access to justice into a much more affordable realm for more people. I think that's a good strategy.

With respect to family law, of course if we get to a family law process, a unified family court process for example, that encourages collaborative law processes, that encourages dispute resolution processes, if you have to go to court, you can do that in a unified family court forum that's accessible in provincial court sites, if not a provincial court model, and access to justice will be increased.

So more and more we're finding ways to encourage, to educate people about the processes. We had a forum on mediation in February. The task force, or working group, is meeting through April and into May, and they'll be having recommendations coming forward to us sometime in the next few months as to whether we need to build into our legislative processes the mediation processes, precourt mediation, or whether that's something that should just be done through encouragement.

In all of those areas we're finding ways that we can improve access to justice and make it more affordable to people. So are we getting into a two-tiered system? I think we're getting into a system which is far more effective, far more enforceable, far more affordable. Quite frankly, it gives ownership of problems back to the people whose problems they are and provides them with guidance and assistance in resolving those problems, rather than the court system that we've built up where we take the problem out of the hands of the people whose problem it is and hang onto it for three or four years at a high cost and without necessarily the best resolution. That's not to say that we don't need courts or that we don't need courts in appropriate circumstances, but we should save the acute care system for the acute care needs and solve the other problems in a better way. The Department of Justice is certainly working with others to achieve that end.

With respect to the G-8 summit our role in that is modest. Certainly I wouldn't want to be discussing in any great detail anything relating to public security issues, but of course people have to be able to attend conferences in this country and be safe in doing so. There's nothing wrong with having as a goal that visitors to our country, whether they are prime ministers and premiers and presidents or whether they are individuals, have the right to feel safe in our community. So that certainly would be one of our goals, and that goal equally would apply to those who want to attend for the purposes of legitimate protest.

I think all of us in this Assembly would agree that the right to free speech, except when it's the Minister of Justice talking about his estimates at too much length, is something to be applauded. So people should have the opportunity for legitimate protest, but legitimate protest does not extend to violent demonstration. Violence will not be accommodated, and people who engage in inappropriate forms of expression of their viewpoints can expect to be dealt with in accordance with law, as any other individual in our community could be expected to be dealt with in accordance with law. So do people have the right to freely express their views? Absolutely. Should people be accorded the opportunity to freely express their views? Absolutely. Should people engage in violent protests and destruction of property in order to do that? Not in a civil society. We're a civil society. We won't be accommodating that. We will accommodate the provision of courts as necessary, not to anticipate that people will break the law but to be ready in the event that there's a need for that type of accommodation.

I think I've dealt with most of the hon. members' comments. I might spend a moment, if I have it, to go back, unless the hon. members have other questions that they would like to raise.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Hon. members, before I recognize the next speaker, may we briefly revert to Introduction of Guests?

[Unanimous consent granted]

4:50

head: Introduction of Guests

(reversion)

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Minister of Human Resources and Employment.

MR. DUNFORD: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Looking through the gallery today, I see of course a number of lawyers that have already been introduced, but I also see a gentleman that might need a lawyer. We're never sure, but as a past politician, one never knows what follows them out of this House. Gary Severtson is sitting in the audience today, a past member from Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Hey, Gary.

Justice (continued)

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Highlands.

MR. MASON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. One point that I neglected to ask about in my earlier comments has to do with the review of family law. I understand that the minister has indicated that this is a project that's going to be divided into two pieces, that he's unable in the time frame originally envisaged to complete the entire process. I would like to hear briefly from the minister which sections he's able to complete in the family law review, how that will bring the government into compliance with the court orders that have been issued, when the remaining pieces will be dealt with, how it will affect people in relationships, including same-sex relationships, in the immediate period when the first piece is completed, and when they might expect equality under the law.

Thank you.

MR. HANCOCK: Well, Mr. Chairman, a very important, timely question with respect to the family law review. For the purposes of doing public consultation, we've engaged in a review of all aspects of family law, and it is a huge project, much larger than I appreciated, actually. The department was constantly trying to advise me and admonish me that we couldn't move as quickly as I wanted to move on this particular project. I kept saying that we'd be ready for legislation in the spring of 2002, and guess what? They were right again. It is a large project. It's going to take some time to bring it to full completion.

There are a number of reasons for that, not just the size of the project in terms of bringing together issues under the Domestic Relations Act and some of the other family law statutes dealing with issues of parenting, dealing with issues of how you allocate the responsibilities of parenting and how you deal with the issues of support, those issues. As well, we had anticipated this spring that the federal government would come down with their changes in the family law area, and we were hoping to be able to align our changes with their changes, the federal law responsibility areas with the provincial law responsibility areas, so that we had a consistent pattern under the Divorce Act. That does not appear to be coming forth, so we may just have to proceed without it.

I would anticipate that the bulk of the family law project will appear hopefully either this fall, I'll still say, or perhaps more realistically next spring, although I wouldn't want anyone in the gallery to take that as a suggestion that I've acquiesced to the concept of a spring deadline. We are hoping to bring forward the omnibus family law or the family law pieces of legislation as early as this fall or as late as next spring, not this session at all.

However, while we were consulting on family law, we were also consulting on personal relationships, and I would hope that by the end of this session we would be able to bring forward a piece of legislation dealing with adult personal relationships. I'm in the process of discussing that with government caucus and government members and taking it to cabinet and to the standing policy committees. Once I've got through that process and perhaps even before, I would anticipate sitting down with members opposite and outlining for them what we're trying to accomplish and where we're going with that. I may even come back and actually ask for a little bit of help in terms of that, because the nature of the bill that I'm proposing to bring forward I think will be one of some significance to Albertans and may not be one that we want to rush on. So if it doesn't come to the House until the early weeks of May, it may be appropriate to have members of the public have a look at it, and we'll pass it in the fall. I'll certainly be prepared to discuss with members of the opposition, as I am with members of government caucus, how appropriate that might be.

That being said, there may be some work that we have to do this spring in order to meet the deadlines imposed by the courts with respect to the Intestate Succession Act. As I say, I may have to ask for some assistance from the opposition side in order to accommodate that while we deal with the full implications of personal relationships and adult relationships in the context of a larger statute.

In any event, that will unfold over the next two or three weeks as we continue this session and as I obtain appropriate approvals through our caucus processes and of course work with the opposition members to make sure that they're comfortable with what's being brought forward.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

MS BLAKEMAN: Thanks very much, Mr. Chairman. I'm back for another fun-filled go. We're coming down the homestretch here.

I wanted to pick up on just a couple of things from the couple of times now that the minister has responded and then to capture the end of the argument about decreasing budgets and growing demands. Then on to the Auditor General's observations, and that will be it for me.

I want to make just a small point, but I feel that I have to make it. The minister was talking about the $100 filing fee for small claims court, I think, and saying that that shouldn't be onerous for most people. If I could just gently reprimand the minister, it may well have been a long time since the minister was living paycheque to paycheque and where $100 was significant for him, but I would have to say that for most Albertans who are still living paycheque to paycheque, $100 can be very difficult to come up with in a short period of time. Maybe given a couple of paycheques to save toward it, fine, but we've moved away from being in a position where we're able to save a significant portion of our paycheques in any given time, and we need to be conscious of that. We can't assume that people would have that kind of money readily available.

I also think that one has to be very sensitive to putting people in a position where they might feel that they had to beg for assistance. Those are strong words, but I know that some people would feel that way. We're well aware from the studies that have been done that those who have some education behind them are better equipped at asking for assistance and have less hesitation in asking for assistance, and those who don't may well have more trouble in identifying that and in coming out and doing it, and therefore they just walk away. They just go: "This is too hard. I don't want to do this. I don't want to embarrass myself. I don't like the position I'm in, and I'm just going to walk out of here." That is not what we're trying to do. We are trying to encourage access to justice, whether that's through a system that is an institutionalized system, as we know and identify the court system today, or whether it's through some of the newer processes that have been identified and put into place by the minister. So we really have to be alive to that or I think we turn people off and they walk away from us. That doesn't help us or them.

The phrase that I was trying to dig out of my memory filing box there awhile back, when I was talking about the collapse rate for Crown prosecutors and I was trying to remember a proceeding the minister had talked about doing away with, that was preliminary inquiries. If that's done away with, then I think that would affect the collapse rate for those Crown prosecutors.

I remember now that I did hold some meetings with some people, back in the fall I think, around court-ordered mediation, and I neglected to ask specific questions about that. There was a conference – I think it was back in the fall, maybe October, November – around court-ordered mediation. I'm looking for what specific plans the minister has or the department has to implement those recommendations: a time line, budget, monitoring, et cetera, et cetera.

Another question. I'm picking up a number of sort of loose ends here. With maintenance enforcement one of the issues that still tends to really irritate people is the hold on deposits and the transfer of money to the person who is supposed to get the money. With electronic banking in this day and age we should be able to do, where we can, a direct withdrawal out of someone's account and instantaneously a direct deposit into someone's account. I'm wondering. We have reduced from 15 days of hold to 10 days of hold to I think we were down to six days of hold. Have we managed to get this down to no days of hold yet? That is immensely irritating to people when they have a court order that says that they are to be paid money at the beginning of the month. Well, the money is taken from the person that's ordered to pay on the first of the month, but meanwhile the one that's waiting for the money is waiting. It's the 2nd, the 3rd, the 4th, and the rent money is due. The landlord is yelling at them, and they still don't have the money. They cannot understand why that money can't come to them faster, especially in this day and age of electronic financial transfers. So I'm looking for the number of days we're down to in that hold rate and why we can't get it any less than that.

Also, there was a lot of money spent on that big drug trial that seems to have gone nowhere, and I'm looking for some details on that and some evaluation of what went right there and what went wrong there, because I think that that's a bit of a blob on the record. I want to know what sort of evaluation and monitoring and what lessons have been learned from that whole process and frankly how much money was spent and how usable the facilities are and the processes that were put in place and are they to be used in any other context at this point or whether that's just been blown. How could we have done that better? Okay. That's the catch-up stuff.

Just to go back and capture where we were at the end of my last set of comments – I guess this is version 3 I'm on now – the minister did attempt to answer some of this, and it is around the issue that we've had an increase in population but not a corresponding increase in the budget and the services that we're able to offer people through the court system. The minister has identified that a great deal of work was done to not necessarily offer institutionalized court services but other processes of court that in fact are less expensive to offer, arguing that they may not get their day in court but were still having access to justice. I continue to advocate vigilance in that. I often question the minister's choices when we get to that, and it seems to me that choices are increasingly made based on budget or saving money, not on fairness and access to justice. So I'll continue to stay on that.

Now, as far as the court backlogs, that was an interesting story that the minister told about there being no backlog in Calgary. I think it was in an Edmonton court where there were fairly pointed remarks on the record from a justice saying: "Look; we can't even get secretaries that can make the transcripts available to us or run the piece of paper down the hall. We don't have the staff that can escort the prisoners in or out or whatever. Things are backing up to an unacceptable level." I have not seen enough activity around here that would make me think that that issue has in fact been addressed. Again that's part of the demand upon the system, the corresponding amount of money going into the system to be able to provide the services for the number of people that we have. I'm looking for, I guess, the minister's response to the points that were raised by that justice. That case is well documented, and I'm sure the minister has a copy of it. There were some pretty pointed remarks made about availability of staff and backlogging that was happening there. I guess I'm saying that I will continue to remain vigilant on this whole issue of access to justice, and I urge the minister to do the same.

The last thing. This is a bit of a marathon. We're looking at the Auditor General's recommendations and observations and the government's response to same, page 135. Under the Justice and Attorney General there were two recommendations. In addition to that, I think there were a couple of unnumbered points of consideration. I'm not sure how the Auditor General differentiates them, but they're not numbered. These are numbered ones, one on capital asset management and one on fines and costs. Now, this is interesting. Recommendation 28, capital asset management, from the Auditor General reads:

We recommend that the Department of Justice improve its capital asset management process by completing long-term capital asset plans, and linking this information to the business planning process.

Now, the response from the minister's department is: "Accepted in principle. The Ministry intends to prepare capital project listings. The projects would be linked to business plan goals or strategies for management information." That sounds tepid, so I'm looking for an explanation. I would have expected this to be embraced more wholeheartedly, and I'm wondering exactly what the department is going to do and in what sort of time line and also what sort of resources it has in place to accomplish that.

The Auditor General's recommendation 29, fines and costs: "We again recommend the Department of Justice determine the results and costs of its fines collection activities." The response from the ministry is: "Accepted. The Ministry intends to continue with completing its current action plan." Well, I think there's a wee gap here, because in the time that I've been on the Public Accounts Committee, I think I've seen this fines collection recommendation come up from the Auditor General three or four times in six years. I know that in the beginning the ministry wasn't accepting it, and they'd started to accept it a little later on. It's still turning up every year, so what exactly is the problem that is holding this back? Is it an issue of budget? Is it an issue of priorities? What on earth is the problem that this seems to be so difficult to attain or achieve?

Those are the various concerns and questions that I wanted to put on the record with the Minister of Justice. He has attempted to respond to some of my questions verbally with me today, and I do appreciate that, but for anything that is unanswered or could be expanded upon further from what the minister did, I would ask that I receive that information in writing. I understand where the minister is trying to go in trying to be innovative, and I think that in certain circumstances that can certainly be a good idea, but I also think that ultimately this government is under an obligation to provide justice and access to justice. It is a priority. It is not something where a choice can be made to just not do it in any given year or to dump it down the priority list and maybe only do a little bit of it. There's no such thing. Justice is not useful if it's only a little bit of it. So I do hold the minister up to a high standard along with his department officials.

I'm interested to hear about the family law statutes. Having attended some of the sessions on that, I guess I'm not surprised. There's a lot of detail to be worked out there, and it can be highly emotionally charged, about how people feel different matters should be handled, and especially when we get into the whole issue of children, it can be tough, tough swimming. But I do look forward to legislation coming forward on personal relationships. I know as the critic for human rights that there are many people, certainly many of my constituents, that are keenly interested in seeing this move forward and be expanded and be far more inclusive for all Albertans.

Thank you for the opportunity to ask these questions, to bring these issues forward, and I look forward to receiving the responses from the minister and his staff prior to the appropriation being voted. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

MR. HANCOCK: Mr. Chair, I just wanted to take a brief opportunity – I don't have my glasses with me today, but I think I've spied one of our fine Crown prosecutors from the Vegreville area with us today in the gallery, Neil Wiberg. I'd ask him to stand and receive the recognition of the House.

Just to briefly touch on a couple of things so that there are no misunderstandings, the hon. member has asked about the big drug trial that went nowhere, that I think she referred to as "a blob on the record," and how much money was used. I would just, not for the purpose of deflecting anything at all, indicate to her that drug trials are generally prosecuted by the federal government. We built a very fine court facility, which will be very effectively used over the long term. It's in the subbasement of the Court of Queen's Bench building in Edmonton. It's got technological advantages that judges look to wanting to use. It's a very effective courtroom, and it will be very effectively used over the long term. Of course we need it. In my former days when I was also Solicitor General, we had CISA. We had the effective co-operation of policing services in this province and still do. I wasn't suggesting that that's gone away. We still have that. We will have large trials from time to time, and we will need that courtroom for those large trials. We probably need an additional large courtroom facility in Calgary, and when we build the new court facility in Calgary, we will accommodate a new large courtroom there. They will be effectively used. So the money that's been invested by the provincial government I think has been invested very, very well. We do have some problems coming out of that large trial process, particularly with respect to the remand centre, but that's an issue for another day and a different set of estimates.

In terms of the collapse rate of our Crown prosecutors, I can assure the hon. member that I'm not aware of any of our Crown prosecutors having collapsed. However, we are doing our best to make sure that their workload is diminished to a point where it's acceptable to them and to their families and that we take appropriate care to ensure that we are treating employees all across our department very, very well for the work that they do for the benefit of Albertans. I am pleased to advise this House that employees in the Department of Justice are working very, very hard and very, very effectively for all Albertans to make sure that they have access to justice, that they have good opportunities for justice, and that we have safe and caring communities.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: After considering the business plan and proposed estimates for the Department of Justice, are you ready for the vote?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Agreed to:
Operating Expense and Capital Investment $210,862,000

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Shall the vote be reported? Are you agreed?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE DEPUTY CHAIR: Opposed? Carried.
The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am pleased, notwithstanding the comment that was just made about that being a lot of money for justice. One of the things that I would always say is that there are more things that could be done, and I wouldn't turn down additional dollars, should you feel obliged to vote them.

The committee having finished its deliberations, I would move that we rise and report the estimates of Justice and Attorney General.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Shariff in the chair]

THE ACTING SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan.

MR. LOUGHEED: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Supply has had under consideration certain resolutions, reports as follows, and requests leave to sit again.

Resolved that a sum not exceeding the following be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2003, for the following department.

Justice: operating expense and capital investment, $210,862,000.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

THE ACTING SPEAKER: Opposed? So ordered.
The hon. Government House Leader.

MR. HANCOCK: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fine work that's been accomplished this afternoon, I would move that we adjourn until 8 p.m., at which time we'll reconvene in Committee of Supply.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:17 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

THE CHAIR: I'd like to call the Committee of Supply to order.

head: Main Estimates 2002-03

Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development

THE CHAIR: We'll begin the evening with comments and questions. We'll call on the hon. Minister of Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development.

MS CALAHASEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Before I go on, I'd like to introduce some very important people up in the gallery. These are very important people. Paddy Meade is my deputy minister. Most of you know her: the curly-haired one sitting up there. Ken Boutillier, the assistant deputy minister of aboriginal relations, is in the back, with the face hair. John McDonough, executive director of strategic services, is the small guy sitting in the front. Neil Reddekopp is the executive director, aboriginal land claims, and he's sitting, oh, just behind Paddy there. Tom Baldwin, executive director, Northern Alberta Development Council, is the man with the slightly higher forehead. Cameron Henry, director of aboriginal relations, is sitting up there too. He's the white-haired man. Peter Tadman, director of communications, the guy on the right-hand side, is my mainliner. Martin Hanly, director, aboriginal policy initiatives, back there, is the dark-haired guy. Lori Sajjad is director of ministry support services, and we share her with IIR. Lori's in front. Dale Monaghan, who is my executive assistant, is not there. He's probably in the office somewhere.

Mr. Chairman, I'm pleased to present the estimates for the Ministry of Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development, which is now about 13 months old. We are continuing to make solid progress. The ministry has three components and is responsible for aboriginal and northern affairs, the Metis Settlements Appeal Tribunal, and the Northern Alberta Development Council. With NADC I'll be calling on the chair to take you through some of its activities a little later on.

The ministry consists of three sections: aboriginal initiatives, strategic services, responsible for implementing the aboriginal policy framework and the aboriginal policy initiative, and land claims. Our plan includes four core businesses, seven goals, associated strategies, and improved performance measures to better assist and support aboriginal people and the people of northern Alberta. Our vision is an Alberta where aboriginal people and northern Albertans are recognized as equal partners and participants in the Alberta advantage. We facilitate solutions, and we do so in several different ways. We work with aboriginal governments, local communities, private industry, and municipal and federal governments. We also work with other Alberta ministries to develop strategies to address the needs of aboriginal people.

We have a complement of 61 full-time equivalents, which includes 15 within the Northern Alberta Development Council and seven within the Metis Settlements Appeal Tribunal. The total budget for fiscal 2002-2003 remains largely unchanged, decreasing marginally from $30.21 million to $30.182 million: $17.192 million is committed to the Metis settlements; nearly $2 million is dedicated to the Northern Alberta Development Council; the balance of our budget is committed to ministry priorities as defined in the business plan.

As I mentioned, our primary goal, which is goal 6 of the government business plan, is to support the pursuit: "the well-being and self-reliance of Aboriginal people will be comparable to that of other Albertans." We are continuing to pursue this goal by strengthening relationships between the government of Alberta and aboriginal people through the implementation of the government of Alberta's aboriginal policy framework, also known as the APF. The initiative addresses social and economic issues and the need for co-operation between both parties. The goal is to improve government/aboriginal relations. It means that all government ministries have a responsibility to address aboriginal issues and that these ministries must report on their achievements. The APF is the key to the vision of a future in which strong, sustainable aboriginal economies support self-reliant First Nations, Metis, and other aboriginal communities and people.

Capacity building is one process that we're collaborating with aboriginal communities and industry to achieve. It means developing tools, knowledge, skills, and abilities for communities to administer, manage, and plan for themselves. It means being able to make choices and set direction for preferred futures, and it means being able to support individual and community socioeconomic initiatives. The end result will be much more self-reliant communities. We are currently involved in several projects fostering relationships between aboriginal communities and private industry; for example, the Athabasca Tribal Council/Industry Working Group, the Little Red River Cree/Tallcree First Nations project, the Dene Tha' First Nations consultation pilot project, and a number of other important projects.

This past year has been very busy with many successful cross-ministry undertakings by way of our aboriginal policy initiative, or the API. I would like to mention a few of them. Alberta Learning greatly assisted 44 native education projects in various school jurisdictions. The Rainbow Spirit project helped six Edmonton Catholic district schools with best practices and meeting the needs of aboriginal students in an integrated setting. The aboriginal apprenticeship project was implemented. There are plans to expand it.

Human Resources and Employment continues to provide opportunities through skills training programs. Projects include the First Nations resource training project, that provided hands-on oil rig experience for members of the Kehewin, Heart Lake, Frog Lake, and Cold Lake First Nations. The Gift Lake employment training project provided settlement members with hands-on oil/gas training and employment demonstrations to prepare for work within the oil and gas industry.

More than 40 aboriginal, industry, and/or government partnerships are currently in place in Alberta. I should also mention that the 2002-2003 expanded version of the API contains 30 strategies, almost 60 targets, and includes input from almost every government department. As part of the development of consultation guidelines, we have put in place and evaluated a series of pilot projects. We are now in the process of drafting overall guidelines and implementation strategies to assist departments in managing their consultations with First Nations. We are determined to ensure that the well-being and self-reliance of aboriginal people will be compared to that of other Albertans. We continue to make improvements to the Metis settlements governing structures, systems, and accountability.

As you may know, this past year was the final year of operation for the Metis Settlements Transition Commission, an organization that had been assisting the settlements governance system for the last 12 years. The commission dissolved on March 31, 2002, and the ongoing functions it previously performed have been transferred elsewhere, either to the department or the Metis Settlements General Council. The department will administer the Metis settlements land registry, which, under the Metis Settlements Act, is a ministerial responsibility. The department will be establishing and funding a Metis settlements Ombudsman to conduct investigations into complaints regarding the administration of settlement affairs pursuant to part 7 of the Metis Settlements Act. This does not mean that as minister responsible for the settlements legislation I do not have a role. My role is similar to that of the Minister of Municipal Affairs in respect to municipalities.

Our focus for this fiscal year will be to continue to ensure that proper accountability mechanisms are in place. These mechanisms include community approved three-year business plans for each settlement. In addition, the Alberta government and the Metis Settlements General Council are establishing a process to examine financial and legislative changes for the Metis settlements. We are committed to fulfilling our obligation with regard to the settlement of outstanding treaty land entitlement claims as part of our core business. Having resolved 11 claims since 1986, our record is one of the best in Canada. We've got an awesome team. The settlement of these claims is important. Creating certainty for industry and government and providing First Nations with resources to increase their participation in the Alberta economy is important. Our goal is to achieve settlements that are fair and equitable to all parties.

On the national scene I have been working with my federal/provincial/territorial colleagues and with national aboriginal leaders. Our particular accomplishments have been the development of a national strategy to enhance aboriginal participation in the economy as well as continuing work on a national aboriginal youth strategy. In that regard, a very successful national aboriginal youth conference was held in Edmonton in October of last year. With respect to northern issues we successfully hosted the northern forum, which brought delegates from several circumpolar regions to Edmonton in September. The Northern Forum consists of 23 subnational or regional governments from 10 northern countries. As hosts it was a tremendous opportunity to showcase Alberta. I have been working with my colleagues from the Northwest Territories on the further implementation of a memorandum of understanding for co-operation and development between Alberta and the Northwest Territories. This September, as a member of the Northern Development Ministers' Forum, Alberta will be host to the federal/provincial/territorial northern development ministers' meeting to be held this fall.

I'd like to talk about northern Alberta, its significant economic activity, and its opportunities. Diamond mines, natural gas exploration, pipeline ventures are all on the table. The spin-offs from such activity will be enormous. My ministry continues to champion a wide range of northern issues, and on that score, we have undertaken a proactive, co-ordinated approach to deal with them. We have embarked on the preparation of a strategy related to the future of the north, a plan that will address a number of subjects of importance to all Albertans, including co-ordination of northern transportation systems, matching skill development to the employment needs of northern industries, outlining key connections to other provincial and territorial jurisdictions that will enhance trade and commerce, building capacity for northern communities, and expanding the northern economy through value-added manufacturing, tourism development, and increased natural resource activity.

As you know, Alberta's north encompasses many of the province's economic drivers such as oil sands development, petroleum development, forest industry operations, and agriculture. The northern development strategy will provide a framework to address these opportunities and challenges and will serve as an effective mechanism to keep the economy of northern Alberta healthy. I have requested my colleague the MLA from Peace River to lead this, and he's been doing an excellent job. As a matter of fact, under his leadership as chair of the Northern Alberta Development Council efforts have continued on addressing key opportunities and challenges. The council's work is more important than ever given the significant developments going on in the north. I'd now ask the NADC chair to discuss some of the council's activities, as we discussed.

8:10

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Peace River.

MR. FRIEDEL: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. You're going to recognize mine as the short speech. You know, my motto is speak little, work hard, and grin a lot to keep them guessing what you're up to.

I always appreciate the opportunity to speak about the activities of the Northern Alberta Development Council, and from the name itself you might guess that the mandate of our council is to promote northern development. One of the primary objectives is to ensure the development of an adequate northern highway network. Back in 1998 the western Premiers signed the northwestern Canada integrated road concept plan, and this became the basis for the northern highway strategy that NADC is just completing. We've got tremendous natural resources, but if you can't get to them or if the people who have to work there can't get around, the province isn't going to be able to enjoy the benefits.

Our council also plays a lead role in promoting value-added agriculture production in the north. For example, we provide the chair role to the Peace agricultural value-added working group. We also work with a group looking at the branding of northern value-added agricultural products.

Another very high priority for us is recruiting, training, and retaining a skilled workforce in our part of the province. Over the years NADC has sponsored the northern bursary programs as a way to encourage northern students to take postsecondary education and to return to work in our communities. It's encouraging to note, Mr. Chairman, that about 75 percent of these students do return and become valued members of our long-term human resources teams. Obviously, a few change their minds for one reason or another and have to refund the bursary, but the success rate of this program is certainly better than most. We also work closely with industry and private organizations, who partner with us to leverage the bursary program much further than we could afford to do on our own. Not only does this increase the amount of funding that's available, but there is more built-in assurance of jobs available to these students. Yet another initiative, which is our Northern Links program, provides high school students with the opportunities to look at postsecondary education options firsthand. They get to see the transitional challenges of moving from a small rural school high school, for example, to a postsecondary facility.

Our members work with the people in industry and assorted other organizations on all types of issues, whether they're challenges or opportunities, and these range from the future of the northern rail transportation to tourism to apprenticeship training to regional economic development. The challenges are as unending as the opportunities are exciting, Mr. Chairman. Fully two-thirds of our province is underdeveloped, and as a northern resident I'm often amazed at the general lack of interest in taking advantage of this situation. As a council we're very determined to realize these opportunities and to meet the challenges in a positive way.

I want to acknowledge the ongoing support of the departmental staff that the minister just introduced as well as the NADC staff. Without these dedicated people in the background many good ideas would never get past the drawing board. My colleague the minister, who is also a northern MLA, representing the Lesser Slave Lake constituency, is always there for advice and support, and on behalf of our members and staff we extend our thanks to the minister and these people.

Mr. Chairman, if there's anything that I can add during the debate on our portion of the estimates, I'd be most pleased to do so.

THE CHAIR: The hon. minister.

MS CALAHASEN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. We have made much progress, and I want to thank the chair as well as the NADC staff, who are dedicated to advancing northern development.

I want to speak a little bit about performance measures because that was an issue last time. I'm pleased to report that since the committee examined last year's business plan, my ministry has made a number of improvements. I want to remind you that quality aboriginal-specific data is not readily available. In many instances we are relying on 1996 census data. The data from the 2000 census will not be available until later next year unfortunately. I am pleased to announce, however, that Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development, Human Resources and Employment, Finance, and Statistics Canada have undertaken a pilot project to redevelop the Alberta labour force survey. This will give us accurate aboriginal-specific data on an annual basis. We are the first province to launch such an initiative. In fact, Statistics Canada is viewing our pilot project as something that could become standard practice throughout the country.

We have made significant effort this year to identify key performance measures related to the accomplishment of strategies under the aboriginal policy initiative, but we still have a long way to go. We have set a target of 75 percent of Alberta ministries to have aboriginal strategies included in their business plans, and we're trying to attempt, whichever way we can, to include more.

So, Mr. Chairman, that concludes my comments on the ministry's estimates, and I look forward to comments and questions from my colleagues.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I very much appreciated the comments of the Minister of Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development as well as of the chairman of the Northern Alberta Development Council and will engage in some discussion on the business plans and the budgets as they're laid out here and through the course of it ask some questions. Either the minister or the chairman of the council are welcome to interrupt me if they wish to respond, or we can just leave it till the end. That's really at their discretion.

[Mr. Klapstein in the chair]

I notice that the budget for the department is flat, shall we say. The funding levels for the department are virtually unchanged from a year ago, having gone in total from a forecast for last year of $30,972,000, if I'm reading the right figures, to an estimate for this year of $30,137,000. So we're looking at a drop there of about $800,000, and if we were to adjust for inflation and for the growing aboriginal population and the growing population of the north, it's an even larger drop in funding. I'm not going to complain that governments are spending less just for the sake of complaining, but given that northern Alberta is burgeoning, the population is growing, the economy is developing, given that the aboriginal population has a high birthrate and that the aboriginal population is growing, and given the severity of issues and the fact that this is an area of some priority for the government, I am concerned that the funding levels are not keeping pace even with inflation. I would certainly encourage the minister to do what she can to ensure that the resources necessary to fill her responsibilities are provided to her by her cabinet colleagues. So those would be my first comments: a general reaction to funding and a general concern for the drop in funding for an area of great priority for all of us and of profound, long-term implications for Alberta.

I'd offer the minister and her department and staff congratulations on their first full year of operation. It seems to have gone smoothly, certainly judging from appearances over here. I'm sure that reflects well on their abilities and their commitment, and I would welcome the staff of the department to the Assembly.

We'll work through, I guess, going program by program. I'm going to jump around a little bit actually if the minister doesn't mind. One of the things that jumps out when you first go through the plans and the budget includes under program 4 what looks like a brand-new budget item, an office for an ombudsman. My reading of the documents is that this is an office that wasn't there a year ago and presumably is a new program. In principle it sounds like a good idea. I'm a big supporter of an ombudsman. There is, as everybody here knows, an Ombudsman for the government in general, an Ombudsman who reports directly to the Legislature here. I know that that Ombudsman's responsibilities are limited. For example, that Ombudsman doesn't typically get involved and is not allowed to get involved in health care issues. In that case I'm referring to the Ombudsman in general. I assume, then, that the office of the Ombudsman of Alberta was prevented somehow from investigating issues in the Metis settlements and issues relating to Metis governance. So if this is a way of filling in, that's terrific. Sounds good.

I am curious: how did you ascertain that there was a need for this sort of an office, and how did you settle on the particular way of organizing it? Why an ombudsman? In the way it's organized, does the ombudsman, for example, report to the minister? Does he report back to the Metis councils or Metis settlements? What's the mandate for the ombudsman, and how will that position be staffed? Also, noting that it's budgeted to consume $450,000, where did that money come from? Is that money that was taken from another program? What is the source of that money?

There's also a new budget item for the land registry, $350,000. As with some of my questions with the ombudsman, I'm wondering: how is the need for this registry determined? What is its function? How will it be run? How does it relate to existing provisions for registering land? What's different in this office compared to other offices and services?

[Mr. Tannas in the chair]

I'm going to flip around here a bit. Going to the estimates book, on page 28 there's some revenue listed – it looks like it's stable – $285,000 in ministry revenue. There's no clear indication here – I'm sorry; I'm reading the figures wrong. It has dropped quite dramatically. It's dropped from $285,000 two years ago to an estimate this year of just $45,000. What's the explanation for that? Are more services being provided without any fees or charges, or is there some other explanation for that very dramatic drop in revenue? Where was it coming from before, where will it be coming from now, and what's the plan for the future? Is the plan in fact to eliminate that entirely?

We move to issues of performance measures, and the minister commented on these in her opening remarks. We always raise some issues around performance measures because they are absolutely crucial to the question of accountability. It's very difficult to get a performance measure right, to get it to be measuring what you want it to measure, addressing what you want it to address, to make it reliable, to make it comparable from one year to the next, so we do pay special attention to performance measures. If we go back, jumping around among the documents here, to the business plan and look at the first set of performance measures, for example, under goal 1, goal 1 is "to lead or support the implementation of commitments to action in the aboriginal policy framework." There's a whole host of strategies in here.

One of the performance measures that jumped out as a measurement of those strategies and of how that goal is to be achieved is one that the minister herself mentioned, which is that "aboriginal strategies and initiatives are identified in 75% of Alberta Ministry Business Plans." That raises for me all kinds of concerns about: what does that really mean? Seventy-five percent of Alberta ministry business plans have aboriginal strategies and initiatives, but there's no sense of which departments or ministries are priorities, and it doesn't give me any sense of what those strategies might be or what those initiatives should be aimed at. Indeed, it doesn't give me a sense of how those other ministries will be held accountable by you, by your department, for fulfilling those aboriginal strategies and initiatives. What's to prevent a department from merely paying lip service to its aboriginal strategies and initiatives? So some specifics on that particular performance measure would be helpful, and I guess in some ways my words are words of caution to the minister that the way that's set up seems very, very open to interpretation and even to becoming meaningless frankly.

If we move on from the performance measures to goal 2, goal 2 is "to strengthen working relationships with aboriginal governments, communities and organizations," obviously an important goal. But when we go through to the performance measures – and I'm reading here from page 51 of the business plan – "aboriginal governments and organizations report satisfaction in their relations with [the department] and the Government of Alberta. The target for 2002-03 is 55%." Fifty-five percent strikes me as a fairly low, fairly modest target. If 55 percent of people are satisfied, that means that 45 percent may not be satisfied, and it just seems like a very low level at which to set the bar for the performance measures. If we said that 55 percent were to be very satisfied, well, that's certainly more ambitious, but 55 percent satisfaction seems pretty modest to me. Maybe it's a realistic starting place. Maybe you start there and work your way up. I'd be prepared to accept that in a brand-new ministry, but it does seem like a low target.

Moving through the performance measures under goal 3, "To assist in furthering accountable, self-administering, self-reliant, self-regulating Metis Settlement governments," the first one is: "Increase the percentage of Metis Settlement self-generated revenues by 2%." My questions are simply more for clarification here. I take it that what you're looking for here is that the self-generated revenues of the Metis settlements, as it says, will increase by 2 percent. What are those self-generated revenues? Are those revenues that result from levies or the equivalent of taxes, or are they revenues that might reflect a strengthening economy on the Metis settlements, or are they somehow earned revenues, or are they revenues that reflect a growing prosperity? Or might they be revenues that simply reflect a local council that has jacked up the levy by 2 percent? I'm sure your department would have an answer to that. It's more a question of clarification for my own interest.

Goal 4, "To resolve land claims and other claims by aboriginal people concerning the province." Certainly I would urge the ministry to carry on in this fashion. I shared with the minister earlier in the week a newly released video which won a major award on the weekend as best documentary, a video I would recommend to everybody, called the Honour of the Crown. It follows the very long and slow process through which a land claim in northern Alberta was eventually settled.

To the credit of the government and to the credit of the department, Alberta in fact has one of the best track records, as I understand it, in the country on settling aboriginal land claims. So let's carry on with that. Let's try to settle these issues as quickly and as expeditiously as we can. It's in everybody's interest to do so. We can see what's happening in British Columbia right now when land claims are allowed to turn into a terrible, terrible mess, the profound bitterness and division that that causes in society and in fact even the problems it creates for the economic development of the society, because when land claims are not settled, our society's ability to work on that land is left up in the air.

I see that my time is starting to run out, and I want to address a couple of other issues. I haven't even touched on the Northern Alberta Development Council.

One of the profound and massive long-term issues for the whole province but I think somehow especially for northern Alberta is the issue of the health of the environment and the tradition of aboriginal people of living off the land and living in harmony with the environment. Our desire to help those cultures remain healthy raises the question: how is that going to be achieved? How do we sustain the health of our aboriginal communities, who still rely so much on fishing and trapping and hunting, when we are also looking at potentially massive industrial developments in northern Alberta with their huge impacts on the environment: on the water, on the land, on the forests, on the air. I know that the environment is clearly not the lead responsibility of this minister, but it's got to be one of profound concern not just from an economic view but from a cultural view.

I'm not aboriginal, but from watching situations, the role of the land in the culture of aboriginal people must be profound. The sense of place and even the sense of spirituality that connects people to their land is of fundamental importance I think to the health of the aboriginal communities and aboriginal society and aboriginal culture. There are risks to that land, for example, from the massive developments around Fort McMurray or indeed from the potential for huge pipeline developments. I'm wondering what the ministry's role and co-operation are with the Department of Environment and the Department of Sustainable Resource Development. How are those departments working together to make sure that the view of aboriginals is respected when it comes to the economic development of the north and the environmental impacts of that development?

I hope I'll have a chance to rise again with just a handful of other questions. So I will take my seat now and let somebody else carry away.

THE CHAIR: Hon. minister, do you want to answer, or would you like more questions?

MS CALAHASEN: I'd like more questions, if I can. We'll just keep going, and then I'll answer after two or three.

DR. PANNU: I rise to ask a few questions, but I first want to thank the minister and the chairman of the Northern Alberta Development Council for their introductory remarks. It being a new department, there seems to be lots going on in terms of planning and setting out goals and strategies and objectives. I noticed that in the business plans there's quite a bit of detail in terms of planning and things that need to be done in terms of the aspirations of the department and efforts there at goal setting. So since the department is new, I think it's perhaps inappropriate to expect too much in terms of concrete information here yet.

With respect to the office of the ombudsman, when will this office be set up and running, Minister? It's a new office; you have sought some funding for its establishment. I'd be interested to hear from you when the office will in fact be created, when the appointment will be made, and when it will be off and running.

The second question related to that is the exact responsibility of the Ombudsman: is it to hear complaints from individuals or families who are part of the Metis settlements? What exactly will the Ombudsman be doing? Whom will it be hearing from? What will it be adjudicating? It would be helpful if we had some information on it.

I just want to also share the concern expressed by the hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview that in terms of real dollars – that is, if you adjust for inflation – the budget seems to have shrunk from last year. It's a very new department. I would have thought that in the first few years of the development of the department's programs – staff development, program development – in fact one would have expected allocations of increased resources given the challenges that are set out in the business plan and the strategies and the goals. I am a bit concerned that the actual resources available from last year to this year will be smaller given the ambitious program set out here and also given the fact that the population both in northern Alberta in general and the population of First Nations and Metis portions of the Alberta population are growing faster than the rest of the population. So given the potential for increased needs of the population that you have responsibilities for, the decrease in the budget in terms of adjusted dollars is a matter of concern, and I hope that you will in your remarks explain how you are going to deal with this problem.

Northern Development, again, is sort of frozen in terms of the funds that it has, $1.954 billion, a huge area, a growing population, rapid growth, both industrial and other population movements, I guess, urbanization and all that, yet the budget is the same as last year. In effect, that will mean that fewer resources will be available for that purpose as well. So some question there.

Two other questions and I'll sit down. Maybe someone else will speak, or the minister will have some opportunity to address some of the questions already put to her.

Over the last year or so we have seen a reduction in children's services, the elimination of early childhood intervention programs targeting aboriginal families in particular. Is there room in this budget to make up for that shortfall resulting from the elimination of early intervention programs? The PDD board has also had to cut staff. Clients have been told to seek assistance through community agencies, but there are no agencies with expertise working with aboriginal clients. So, again, any comments on that from the minister as to how she plans to respond to the vacuum that has been created?

The family court worker program provided through native counseling services has been in place for some long time, and I guess that may also have suffered the same the fate as the other program that I mentioned.

The last one. The Ben Calf Robe Society has lost the funding it formerly received from the community lottery fund.

So there are growing needs here of the communities that the department is mandated to serve, and I would ask the minister to perhaps spend a few minutes commenting on the budget allocations and the growing needs indicated here. I will stop here. There's enough for the minister to talk about I guess.

MS CALAHASEN: I can go ahead and attempt to answer some of the questions that have been brought forward, and if I don't, just bring them up to my attention again. I've been trying to write madly, but it's pretty tough to write with all the questions that are coming forward. I'll do my best.

Regarding the drop of $800,000 that the Member for Edmonton-Riverview was talking about and the fact that we have quite a population to deal with, an aboriginal population as well as the increasing needs of the population, just to give you information on that, the drop is actually $848,000, the budget difference. It reflects actually the supplementary estimate that was requested to cover legal costs associated with the Peigan and Siksika Nation settlements. That's basically why we dropped there. That addressed that specific issue.

In terms of the funding and the needs that we're talking about to deal with the increasing needs of the group that we're dealing with, we did not go forward with any of the requests in this last budget. However, we have just been trying to figure out what it is we'll need to do as we implement the aboriginal policy framework and put that into place, and we don't know what the extent of those costs will be at this stage. We're just in the preliminary stages of being able to do that. As we begin to do that, as we go forward, we'll start to see what we'll need. So that's one of the areas of concern, but I thank you for your supportive comments in terms of getting more money to be able to implement that. Thank you.

Regarding the northern Alberta environment issue actually we've been working with the aboriginal people and the elders to blend the aboriginal cultural and traditional practices and to make sure that industry also becomes part of that so that they can begin to look at environmental practices that are conducive to the people within those areas. So we've been trying to get that going. As well, we've been talking about pulling together traditional practices and how those traditional practices affect some of the things that we have to do on a consultation process. The consultation processes are the ones that we've been working on with industry as well as First Nations and Metis people to see how we can ensure that those that blend can happen in that respect. So we're trying to make sure that it occurs in that way.

Regarding the Metis settlements' self-generated revenue, it's actually made up of industry tax levies, user fees, charges, revenue under comanagement agreements, and surface rights that are there. So that's basically what we've been dealing with in that respect.

You also asked a question regarding the ombudsmen, and I know that the leader of the third party also asked a question. This is an important one. I was just going through my information as we were going through it, because we've been working on this for a while. You asked a lot of questions relative to what was going to happen, who was going to be there. So just to give you an idea of what happened, this was first raised actually in a report on the mandate of the Metis Settlements Appeal Tribunal that was chaired by my colleague the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake. He did a report initially, and that report recommended that there needs to be an impartial, independent office to investigate complaints by settlement members of unfair treatment and conflicts of interest on the part of settlement councillors. That was the whole reason why it was done.

With the other component, though, there was a three-member panel made up of settlement people that went out as well to find out what the people actually wanted to see happen. They came back saying very strongly that they would like to see an ombudsman of some sort be established.

As you know, this is part of going toward a greater transparency and accountability, which the settlements would like to see happen, and we would like to see them go in that direction. In addition, as agreed in 1997, the transition commission came to an end at the end of March. That was an agreement in 1997. The dissolution of that commission created the need and provided the opportunity to take a new approach to how investigations will be carried out, because that has to be part and parcel of whatever we do with the settlements. It means, in my view, that settlements will agree to take the necessary actions to integrate the idea of an ombudsman and for their own governing structures. We haven't decided in terms of who that will be at this stage. We will be advertising to make sure that we get a person who could fit in there.

Actually, the difference between the provincial Ombudsman and what we're trying to do is that the provincial Ombudsman can only look into complaints regarding actions of the provincial government. What we're saying for our ombudsman in the budget is based on the historic costs of both the former Metis Settlements Transition Commission and the department of formal and informal investigations. So the question that the member of the third party is asking deals with those specific kinds of things.

The land registry is established – that was from the Member for Edmonton-Riverview – by the Metis Settlements Act. Previously the budget for the land registry was included in the transition commission. I don't know if you knew that, but that's where it was. When reviewing the land registry budget, it was noted that it had been increased for several years, so we sort of factored in the need to examine the operation and the technological requirements of the registry so that we could ensure that we were dealing with that.

There were a number of other questions that you asked, and I'm going to see if I can find my written stuff here. You asked about some of the goals and performance measures. I'm going to see if I can attempt to answer some of that.

Goal 1. The specifics can be found actually in part of the aboriginal policy initiative, which is in the government's business plan. If you look in the business plan, you'll see the API in there. There are specific targets that are reported on in Measuring Up as well, and you probably have read that because I've heard you quote that a few times.

We do not set the targets and strategies for other departments in our business plan. However, we work with all the ministries to support the development of effective strategies. As well, I examine every single department that impacts my area and go through the department budget plan process so that I can make sure that that's happening as well. As you can see, the business plans of other ministries that came before the House also indicated some of the areas where they put forward what they would like to see as strategies with Aboriginal Affairs. If you look closely at some of the ministries, Human Resources and Employment as an example, you will see in there that they're working on skills development and a number of other areas with projects specific to Aboriginal Affairs. If you look at Environment, you'll see that they're working with water strategy and making sure that the Aboriginal Affairs component is involved. If you look at Justice, you'll see that there are a lot of different initiatives and strategies within that budget. If you look at Solicitor General, you'll also see some of the areas where we're trying to work together to make sure that we address the issues under the APF and the API to see how those strategies can meet their goals within the government of Alberta.

So we have a number of strategies that we're working with and a number of ways to be able to do that. As well, we have the API, where my deputy is one of the ministers who co-chairs and co-leads that initiative so that we can make sure that it continues to be flowing throughout all the ministries as we work forward in that respect.

That's just goal 1. You also had a number of other questions on the other goals, and I couldn't get them all. So what I will do is I'll try to see if my staff have any of the information, and we'll certainly give it to you or have it in writing. But we'll continue on, if that's okay.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

MS CARLSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I just have a few general comments that I would like the minister to respond to, if she can, either today or at a later date. There's no doubt that this minister takes a great interest in this ministry and does the best with the resources available to her, but it is still very evident to all of us by the statistics we see that aboriginal communities are grossly overrepresented in some of the worst possible kinds of areas; for instance, in our justice system. So if she could comment briefly for us on the work that she's doing with the Justice minister and exactly how support from her ministry will try to reduce the overrepresentation we have of aboriginal populations in our detention centres throughout this province.

Along the same vein, I would like her to comment on the actual outcomes that we're starting to see in this population in terms of school graduations, postgraduate education, and the kinds of real benchmarks that we would generally measure success by but where we have a population that doesn't seem to benefit from the same kinds of support that the rest of Albertans do. So if she could comment on that.

There's also a great deal of discussion and talk these days about us importing labour from outside of Alberta, particularly skilled labour, because there aren't enough people to fill the jobs. Yet we have the population, Mr. Chairman, and a great percentage of that population are people from the aboriginal community, who for some reason we can't seem to get trained and well placed. So I wonder if she could comment on that as well.

Recently we've been hearing in constituencies across this province a bit of a backlash against aboriginal communities and members in terms of changes in tax policy and negotiations that are going on for treaty settlements. How would the minister suggest that we handle those concerns when they come to our constituencies? Do they have information available to us to use so that we can make valuable and correct presentations to people who are upset about some of the changes that are happening in our province at this time?

So, Mr. Chairman, if she could comment in those few areas for me, I think it would benefit all the members in this Assembly.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Riverview.

DR. TAFT: Thanks, Mr. Chairman. We'll follow up on my earlier comments and the comments of my colleagues with a number of other questions. I appreciate the minister's responses so far, and I'm sure she will continue responding either verbally or in writing.

I'm looking at this moment at goal 3, which is on page 51 of the business plan. The goal, as I read earlier in the evening, is "to assist in furthering accountable, self-administering, self-reliant, self-regulating Metis Settlement governments.” Under the strategies one of the three strategies is to “encourage Settlement self-reliance through the terms of Provincial/Settlement funding arrangements and the implementation of economic viability strategies.” It’s that last clause that really catches my attention tonight, the clause that says “the implementation of economic viability strategies.” It raises the whole issue around the economic development of Metis settlements or of areas where there are large aboriginal populations.

How does the minister foresee this economic development occurring? What kind of economic development is going to be encouraged? Indeed, for that matter, what makes a settlement economically viable? I suppose a settlement could be economically viable and a perfectly happy community at a fairly low standard of living by the measures of, say, a typical Edmontonian. You might have a settlement that’s viable on the basis of trapping and hunting and fishing and agriculture and is a perfectly healthy community. Is that sort of economic viability acceptable in the department? How would that sort of economic viability fit into the plans?

How does economic viability and cultural viability interrelate in the minister’s plans? Do we want to see economic development like strip malls and big-box stores, which would potentially have a devastating impact on the culture of Metis settlements, or are we looking for something different? There’s been a lot of discussion in the media in the last many months over casinos on Indian reserves. Well, I know that Indian reserves aren’t specifically in question here, but gambling as a form of economic development surely is a concern for this government and an interest of this government. Are we looking at economic viability being satisfied if there were to be a casino on every Metis settlement, for example? Are we looking at some other form of economic development? I know that’s a very difficult issue for our society and for this government and for all of us, but it’s also one of huge importance, because the strength of the economy and the nature of the economy affects so many other things.

We could in fact get more specific, and I’m now looking at some other notes I’ve got relating to that particular goal. We could ask specific questions on this budget right now: what economic viability strategies specifically will be implemented this coming year on Metis settlements? What were implemented last year? How are they coming along? How are those viability strategies developed? Who develops them? How do they encourage self-reliance and self-governance?

I’d like to now turn my attention to the question of urban aboriginals, urban aboriginals of all types: Metis or status Indians or nonstatus Indians, all of them, every one. This is, I’m sure, an area of great concern and priority for the minister and the department. I’m not sure that it’s clearly reflected and singled out as a concern in the budget here, but if it is, I’d appreciate having my attention drawn to it.

There are many concerns that all of us would have with the lives of urban aboriginals: unemployment rates, health levels, suicide rates, education levels, poverty levels. Those are all areas of real concern, and I commend the mission, I believe it is, of the department, which is to have Alberta’s aboriginal population at a level of wellness equivalent to the rest of the population. I think that’s a good idea. We have a long way to go to achieve that. So my question is: how are we proceeding in achieving that in terms of our urban aboriginals?

One of the fundamental questions around that, first of all, is: what population projections do we have for our urban aboriginal and indeed all our aboriginal people in Alberta? What growth rates are we looking at in the population of aboriginals in different regions of Alberta? Do we have that for Edmonton and for Calgary and for northern and central and southern areas? What do those projections tell us about, for example, the number of students who will be needing to be accommodated by the school systems in different regions of the province? I’ve read some figures suggesting that the percentage of students in Edmonton public schools 10 or 15 years from now who are aboriginal will be very high. What are we doing to plan for that? Do we have the baseline data, and what are we doing to plan for that? It would be really helpful and really interesting to me if the minister could provide population projections for aboriginals, however that’s defined, for different regions of the province.

There are also health issues that I want to touch on, because I’m also health critic here. One in particular comes to my mind and has been brought to my mind by others, and that’s the very profound concern over fetal alcohol syndrome and fetal alcohol effect. These are very, very difficult health problems, entirely preventable. I know they do get some attention from the provincial government, from some of the regional health authorities, but they are so important and, as I said earlier, so tragic because they are entirely preventable. I would like to see them get a very high priority from this government and from this department. What are we doing as a government to prevent or at least reduce the incidence of fetal alcohol syndrome and fetal alcohol effect? What percentage of aboriginal babies are born with these conditions now, and what targets do we have for that in the future?

There are, of course, other special needs presented by urban aboriginals, needs, as I mentioned earlier, around education and poverty and various health problems, whether that’s diabetes or alcoholism or other problems. What measures are we seeing here or what efforts are we seeing being taken here by the department in those particular areas?

Finally, I’ll shift my attention a bit to the comments from the chairman of the Northern Alberta Development Council and to the activities of that council. Goodness, the Northern Alberta Development Council has been with us for decades. I’m not sure when it was formed, but it was a long time ago. I’ve suddenly found myself wondering: why don’t we have a southern Alberta development council as well? The northern half of the province is booming in many areas; not everywhere, but certainly major centres like Fort McMurray and Grande Prairie are flourishing. There are new roads being built. There are all kinds of new developments in the northern half of the province, and I’m sure that the Northern Alberta Development Council is responsible for any number of those, has certainly contributed to them. I’m wondering if we should be considering an equivalent body for southern Alberta, which seems to be chronically functioning at, shall we say, a very flat economic level. Lethbridge and Medicine Hat aren’t experiencing the booms of northern Alberta. Anyway, that’s certainly not for the Member for Peace River to directly address tonight.

He did in his comments mention the northern highways strategy. Some information on the costs and benefits and scheduling and so on of that would be of help here. The development of the highway up to, say, the Grande Prairie district is going along great guns. What other northern highways are we going to be seeing developed? Are we going to be seeing the opening of more east/west transportation corridors across northern Alberta? Do we even want that? Maybe we’re better off leaving some parts of this province more or less in their wilderness forms.

He also mentioned the bursary program for students, and certainly that’s an issue for all northern students, whether they’re aboriginal or not. If there are documents or details on those bursary programs, I'd be interested in having a look at them. I would also be interested in what measures are being taken by the minister to encourage greater education among the aboriginal population at all levels, whether that's in schools or at postsecondary levels. So education for northern Albertans is an interest for me.

Finally – and I suppose this is a bit of a philosophical question for the chairman of the Northern Alberta Development Council – he mentioned, I think, that two-thirds of the province is underdeveloped. As I watch our province grow and, quote, develop, I find myself wondering: what does it really mean to be developed or to be underdeveloped? When he looks at two-thirds of Alberta being underdeveloped, what does the chairman mean? When is something underdeveloped and when is it developed, and is it possible for us actually to overdevelop something? Are we looking at that being a risk in our major urban centres? Do we want Edmonton and Calgary to be cities of 2 million or 3 million? By the same token, do we want Peace River to be a city of 100,000 people in 25 years, or are we happy for it to remain at the level it's at?

MR. BONNER: Our mountain parks.

DR. TAFT: Yeah. What happens to our mountain parks? What happens to the wilderness areas of our province, that we all cherish and really take for granted, when we look at development? So that's a bit of a philosophical note to end on. Maybe there's no real response from either the chairman or the minister on that, but I think it's a topic worth some serious consideration.

Actually I have one other question, just going through my notes, which has to do with financial assistance to students from northern Alberta specifically aimed at health care. Are we looking at students from northern Alberta who are studying in fields of health care being encouraged to return to their areas, or maybe are we looking at students from other parts of the province getting assistance with practicum placements in northern settlements or towns so that they can not only develop their own skills and contribute themselves but also improve the health of our northern communities? Is there assistance for that sort of practicum placement for students in northern Alberta?

Thanks very much.

THE CHAIR: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Glengarry.

MR. BONNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I just have a few comments and questions this evening for the minister. To start off with, I'd certainly like to congratulate the Minister of Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development and her department shortly after their first anniversary. I'd also like to thank the chairman of the Northern Alberta Development Council for his comments earlier tonight and the staff of the department for being here to assist on our many questions.

Now, then, earlier speakers have outlined a number of concerns, have asked a number of questions, and certainly one of the major areas is the level of funding of this particular department, particularly in regard to the issue of inflation, which continues to eat away at all budgets if you're not inflation-proofed, and as well the population growth of the aboriginal community. We have certainly seen a tremendous economic growth in northern Alberta, and I don't think it matters whether you talk to members of the aboriginal community or if you talk to other members of northern communities. They have a great concern with the tremendous amount of resource revenue that is flowing out of the north and the amount that's being returned. I would think that the minister should use that piece of information to look for an increase in her budget next year.
