Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you to the Member for St. Albert for her question and her observations. I know that indeed she has a deep, deep knowledge of this subject, having spent many years working on advocacy with the disability community.

Admittedly, I haven't had a lot of constituents who have come to me and sort of described the process of having gone through SIS.

Certainly, I've had the chance to speak with advocates from various organizations that work out of Edmonton-Centre who have shared with me that they've worked with many people who have found it to be a humiliating and intrusive process. Certainly, from their descriptions I've been able to imagine what it must be like to have to go through something like that just to try to access the kind of support and funding that you need. Certainly, I recognize that, as I said, it was a problematic system at best and deeply, deeply humiliating at worst, and it's something that indeed I'm happy to see taken away.

At this point I don't feel that I could really speak to what should replace it. Again, that's something that I haven't had the opportunity to speak deeply about with those in the community, and I think it's really important that they are the ones who are making those decisions, who are providing that insight. Indeed, Madam Speaker, this is one of the amazing opportunities we have as representatives to learn so much. Certainly, this is an area that I wasn't deeply familiar with.

As I said, I certainly have a niece who has been part of this experience and part of these systems, but for her, while she has had some challenges, they weren't of the overly severe variety. She's been able to get by fairly well and, again, has had a lot of family support.

It's a pretty wide range of experience, I think, even just within the disability community. It's an incredible opportunity, I think, for us to learn more about what others' life experiences are like, how these systems operate for them, what kinds of supports are needed, and how we as a society can go about compassionately and respectfully providing support and services that are needed while also making sure that we do so responsibly and that we're doing so with the best use of tax dollars.

It's an incredible opportunity for us to learn from folks like the Member for St. Albert who have deep experience in this community, to work with folks like the Skills Society, for myself and others in Edmonton-Centre here, who also work closely with many of these people, to learn more and indeed, Madam Speaker, to engage with some of our public servants, who have some deep knowledge of these systems and how these things operate as well, I know, some of whom have been working within our various agencies to provide insight and to help guide and try to develop better policy.

So it's a real opportunity for us all to work together now as the minister is committed to coming up with improvements and replacements for the supports intensity scale. Certainly, having someone in place like a disability advocate can help to ensure that all voices are heard at that table, that we have the best of the expertise there, and that the new systems that we put in place are truly going to be both effective, responsible, and respectful in how they support the members of the disability community in Alberta.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: A few seconds left under 29(2)(a). Any other comments? Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Yes, Madam . . . [Ms McKittrick's speaking time expired]

The Deputy Speaker: I said a few seconds.

Any other members wishing to speak to Bill 205? The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Madam Speaker. You know, I want to open up by commenting – and some members within the caucus will remember hearing this phrase – that you don't know what you don't know. It's been pretty remarkable taking on this job because over vast periods of time what I envisioned it to be versus what it's turned out to be was entirely different. I mean that in a most endearing and good way. When I ran for office, I did it with visions of concerns in relation to seniors' care, health care, with a little bit of an undertone of postsecondary and, obviously, education. Little did I know, as we entered this field, that I was going to be learning a lot about indigenous rights, people with developmental disabilities, challenges within our social services as well, and even about the adoption system, that the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills shares with us in this House from time to time.

First, as I open up, I want to thank the Member for St. Albert, who has really brought this issue to the forefront both within the Legislature but also within our government caucus, too. It has really allowed me to stay informed and to really know a lot about the issue here.

When I reflect back to where we came from with Bill 205, I reflect on the Member for Calgary-North West when she was pushing for a lot of advocacy within this field and within this area. When I saw her sitting over on this side of the House – for those who are at home, I get to sit on the opposition side of the House.

Mr. Cooper: The corner of shame.

Mr. Sucha: The corner of pride.

With that being said, when she would ask very critical questions of what the government was doing moving forward, I used to scratch my head and say, "Why is she not in our caucus?" because a lot of these values were values that we all share. So I was very happy and I welcomed having her join us because I knew that she would help us move forward on challenges for individuals who are suffering from disabilities or dealing with the challenges of disabilities.

One thing that was very remarkable as I entered the management field was one of the programs that we used to do when I worked for the Reb Lobster chain, a program called Cops and Lobsters, and it was to raise lots of funds for the Special Olympics. I remember that the last year I participated in this, we raised over $10,000 at our restaurant alone towards the Special Olympics. We'd have police officers, sheriffs, transit cops from all over the province who would come to our restaurant, and it was kind of a tip-a-cop program where you'd make donations to the Special Olympics.

We'd also have Olympians that were there, and we had an individual named Rory. My goodness, the intensity that he had was remarkable. He was helping to bus tables, and he was probably working harder than anyone else in that restaurant. So myself and my general manager went aside, and we said: you know, we need a busboy; do you think Rory would want to be a busboy here? We went to his mom, and we asked her if Rory wanted a job. It was remarkable because tears started rolling down her face. Rory was 35, and he had never had a job before. We gave him that offer. It's remarkable because I've gone back to that restaurant since leaving – this was a few years back – and he was still there, and he was succeeding.

It was through a lot of programs that were led that we could move forward. At the time when we brought him in, we were sort of trying to invent the wheel, as it goes. We hadn't reached out to some programs, some of which are now offered through Mount Royal University, to help people with disabilities enter the workforce. But going on to other restaurants, we have had a chance to experience some of these programs.

I had another individual who started at one of my restaurants about six years ago who was a prep cook. This was through programs at Mount Royal where they did placement, and they worked with us one-on-one for a few months to help develop that relationship and develop that rapport. It's remarkable because she is one of the longest serving cooks in that restaurant now. Not only that, but she was able to build up her skills, and she was able to work on the line with us in the pantry station when we were busy. So not only was she able to break down the barriers to enter the workforce, she was also able to build up her success, she was able to find coping mechanisms for anxiety. I was really excited to hear from one of my colleagues that she's moving out now. She's going to be living independently. And this all started because of these programs that we were able to leverage.

But the one thing that is important to know is that – I was just an employer. I'm not within the community. I had not studied and I had not worked with people with disabilities until I had the opportunity and the privilege for them to come and work with me. It's important that as we move forward, there are systems in place where we can find best practices that we can improve on. Because there could be practices that I'm doing or there could be ways that I'm trying to coach this individual, that may not be accurate and may not drive results. I won't know unless someone comes forward and provides me with feedback and ways that we can move forward and ways that we can improve.

So while I know that sometimes there can be a fear that an advocate, an auditor is only there to sort of be an adversarial role to a government or to a department, I can also reassure you that if it wasn't for outside supports coming to me as an employer and me being able to have that lifeline to seek feedback, we would not have had success. To be frank, my general manager who I worked with in the past, Aaron Haynes, now sits on Mount Royal's board to place individuals with disabilities into the workforce, and it's because of all the success that we had. There was a lot of trial and error and a lot of outside intervention and a lot of patience.

I see this as a phenomenally good thing because, as has been noted in these clauses, the advocate is to "review programs and policies affecting persons with disabilities." It's important that we make sure that we have those thorough outside eyes to hold us to our standards. Realistically, there's lots of research. There is lots of data. Society changes the way we do things and the practices that we have. I'm sure many individuals who have worked with people with disabilities can attest to the fact that what we are doing now is way different than what we were doing 20 or 30 years ago.

But it's not uncommon as we build hundreds, if not thousands, of policies within government departments, that there can be redundancies that we aren't catching or that there can be situations where we need fresh eyes. We need someone from the outside who's re-evaluating what we're doing to find best practices so that we can move forward and we can improve. If we fear to challenge ourselves and to reassess where we're at, we can get very stagnant and not progress at all.

You know, as I entered the realm of politics, within a couple of months after being sworn in, there were a few items that came to my attention right away. There were a lot of individuals who were suffering from disabilities and who had barriers within government supports who really didn't know where to turn. The challenge going into this office was that we're learning as we go. I was only a month into it, and I'm not an expert in this field. It was very hard to really try to direct them as to where they could go, where they could provide their feedback, and where we could really drive tangible change. Having an advocate will allow us to do that, to move forward in those ways. It's also important that we're evaluating the laws and the practices that we have in place.

You know, one of the things that I took a lot of pride in is how accommodating we were to any guests that came into our restaurant. We always ensured that we provided the best hospitality possible. I had an individual who found out where I worked before he came in and met with me. He was from the blind community.

He shook my hand, and he praised me and my co-workers for how accommodating we'd be whenever he came into our restaurant, making sure that we had Braille menus available, making sure that we were seating him in a booth that was comfortable enough for a service dog to be able to sit down, making sure that our employees were not touching that service dog because it could really interfere with the overall job that he's trying to do. The challenge, he said to me, was: we continue to go to your establishment because there are not enough places that are doing what you are doing, not being accommodating to us or even flat out rejecting us service because we have an animal coming into their establishment.

A lot of these things can be oversights through regulation and policy that come through government and also enforcement. It's important that we have an advocate who can talk about these policies that we have and how we can appropriately enforce them within government to make sure that not only are our government departments being accountable but that those who fall within oversight of government, whether it's service providers or even front-line services or the simple gestures of going to a store or riding the bus, are accountable, too.

I want to thank the Member for Calgary-North West for bringing forth this bill and the Government House Leader for expediting the process so that we can make sure that we review this more thoroughly. I'm happy to support it.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for his comments. Certainly, the systems for people with disabilities, their families, their friends are very complex, so thank you for saying that.

I was really interested in your comments about employment – okay; not to mention the fact that the Cops and Lobsters was really awesome – and I wanted to talk a little bit about inclusive employment. Inclusive employment is vital. It's actually a real skill and a science. We're lucky to have service providers all around Alberta that are very skilled at doing this. Sadly, I think it's been an undersupported area. I hope that this will begin to change that because the unemployment rate for people with disabilities is so high. It is so much higher than people without disabilities.

Anyway, I wanted to ask you to describe in a little more detail what the natural supports were for the person with a disability that you ended up hiring and how that worked. I think that's such a great example for people thinking about looking at inclusive employment for their place of work.

Thank you.

Mr. Sucha: You know, I had an individual named Alan who came to work for us. Actually, he came in as a dishwasher. It was very easy for him to get distracted, and we didn't really fully understand why. One of things that we did was we reached out to his support worker to provide us with feedback. One of the challenges was that he didn't know what time it was. He was wanting to work hard, but he didn't know when he could take his break. He wasn't very cognizant of time. So we made sure that we had a clock that was close to the dishwasher so that he could see what time it was. Then we'd go up to him, and say: okay; at 8:30 is when you take your break, and we'll bring someone in to cover for you as well. All of a sudden it was like night and day. We saw phenomenal work coming from him, and his intensity really improved.

I think the challenges that we see with some of the workforce is obviously trying to break down stigma and people not realizing what supports are available to them with work placements. A lot of times within the first few months you can have a worker who will come with the individual you're employing and provide you with that feedback and provide you with that follow-up as well.

You know, sometimes there are situations, too, where it may not work out. That's the case with any employment. Whether the individual is disabled or not, sometimes you're not a fit for each other. So it's about being very open minded and recognizing that there may be times where it may not work out, but that's the case with any individual who goes to work for any employer.

It's about making sure you maintain patience and also talking about a lot of those success stories. I think some of the challenges that occur are because a lot of employers just aren't aware that there are these supports available for you. It really drives a positive culture within your work environment. We noticed that right away. There was a strong sense of community that established and a strong sense of pride and almost, you know, a siblinghood that existed when we would open our mind to hiring different employees. I feel that I got a lot of value and that I grew as an individual, if not even as an employer, because of individuals like Rory or Alan who came to work for us.

It always made me smile when I would go back to visit and still see them there and see that they were still a successful part of our business. You know, the underlying thing that I would say as an employer is that I'm only as successful as my employees, that it is a team that is driving our success, driving our business, driving our profitability. I can tell you that individuals like Rory and Alan, speaking in a capitalistic way, helped us make a lot of money because of how strong of employees they were and how much they drove the people around them. If there is anything to say, it is that we need to make sure that we share a lot of these success stories and that we really embrace these work placements as well.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other speakers to Bill 205? Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise in support of Bill 205, the Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act. As some of you may know, I am a social worker by training. I started my career with the government of Alberta, actually, with family support for children with disabilities. My responsibility working with that organization, that part of the ministry, was in doing assessments and working with families that had children between the ages of zero and 18 to determine whether or not they would qualify for financial assistance and specialized services through the ministry.

I actually specialized in working in Lancaster Park with many of our military families. What I found was that there were actually quite a few of our military families that were requesting to be transferred to Edmonton and to the Griesbach area so that they could access the supports that were being provided with FSCD, family support for children with disabilities. It was a program that wasn't available in other provinces, so they were coming with the hope to be able to access the service and to be able to support their families and their children with the different needs that they had.

Part of that as I moved through my career was also looking at out-of-home placements. Out-of-home placements are something that is offered under family support for children with disabilities for children that are no longer able to reside with their parents, not due to any concerns around their ability to parent but due to their high needs, whether it would be high medical needs or high behavioural needs. My responsibility was to work with the family to try to identify a caregiver that would be able to provide the support and work with the family so that they would still continue to have their relationship and still have a cohesive family but also have the needs of their child met.

That seems a good idea, and it definitely worked for the children that needed the support, that had access to the medical professionals and the people that were able to deal with their complex needs. But the struggle that came with that was also that family support for children with disabilities only supports children from the ages of zero to 18. Families would have to then try to access and apply to the persons with developmental disabilities program, so that created a lot of stress for many of the families.

The reason for that was that under family support for children with disabilities, we may have deemed a child in need of additional supports for a variety of different reasons and we would continue to provide the family with the support that they needed – we would support the specialized services, behavioural management, different things like that – but what we deemed as being qualifiers for the program for zero to 18 may not be the same qualifications that were required for PDD. So we would have families that would be accessing these great supports – we would be, you know, helping a family have their child reside with them in their home because they had respite and they had the medical supports and different things that they needed so that their child could still be there, but the family could have a break when they needed to – all of a sudden finding out that they may not qualify for any type of supports with persons with developmental disabilities.

Of course, people started at the age of 16 to try to apply to PDD because it's a complex process, and as these children were aging and becoming closer and closer to 18, you could see the stress on the family. You could see their frustration with not understanding or not being able to demonstrate to the person that was doing the assessment for PDD that they needed this additional support. I mean, I think it does speak to the importance of this advocate in being able to look at how we as government, in programs, support our families in Alberta, looking at how we can support families transitioning from FSCD to persons with developmental disabilities and ensuring that we're not getting to a point where all of a sudden somebody turns 18 and the family has absolutely nothing in place to support them. So I'm a strong supporter of the advocate helping, you know, to look at that gap and look at the systemic issues and trying to be able to identify if we can do this work better.

In addition to that, when I was doing the out-of-home placements, part of the struggle was also the concern around what happened when these children turned 18. They'd been living in a home where they were supported by staff, where their medical needs were being met or their developmental needs were being met, and all of a sudden they were having to transition funding to persons with developmental disabilities. Of course, the licensing around that is different. The application process is different. They could be getting supports provided by one agency from zero to 18 that may not provide adult supports.

Then the question became, you know: do we now move this child, that's maybe lived in this home for four years, two years, whatever length of time, to another service provider because now all of a sudden they've become 18? I mean, we were able to work through that process with many of the providers that were providing zero to 18 residential supports. Many of them have transitioned to also be adult support providers. But it still created, again, undue stress and questions for the family around having to move somebody from a home that they recognized as their home and an agency that they had a great relationship with to now maybe a potentially new relationship, a new agency provider, learning the culture of that agency and that group.

I mean, it's a complex system. Of course, when you're looking at the different age groups, it does create questions and confusion. So I think, again, having the advocate there to be able to help guide some of those questions and some of those concerns is a significant benefit.

The one question that I would have around the advocate, though, is that currently I don't see anything around consent and referral. If we're looking at from zero to an 18-year-old, for example, if we look at the Child and Youth Advocate, if someone refers to the Child and Youth Advocate on behalf of a child, they still have to talk to that child, they still have to accept recommendations and different things like that, and they still have to be able to make sure that the child is wanting to have additional supports.

If we're looking at an advocate for persons with disabilities, my question would be: if they're residing with their family, is the advocate advocating on behalf of the individual with the disability, or are they actually supporting the family? What would that policy and regulation sort of look like? Again, I don't think it's a complication. I think that it's really just a policy question or a regulation question to make sure that we're actually supporting the family as a whole and that it's not that we're, you know, saying that it has to be specific to that individual, especially when it comes to the systemic issues. Because we recognize that, again, if we're looking at a transition from FSCD to PDD, it's not affecting one individual; it's affecting a group and a group of families. How can we make sure that the advocate is able to do that stuff? I do know that, of course, in the bill it does say that they can look at the systemic issues and they can have those conversations.

Again, I think that this is a fantastic bill. I recognize that people with disabilities have a right to have a voice. They are citizens of our community, no different than anybody else.

When I was going to university, I actually worked at the Robin Hood Association in Sherwood Park. The name always kind of makes me giggle. [interjection] I was not Maid Marion. I'm just saying. But the benefit of that was that they had developed really inclusive programming. Some of the great things that the association has done is that they recognized that their group was aging, and because their group was aging, they acknowledged that they were having adults with disabilities who were becoming seniors, who were being impacted by what happens as you age, whether that became dementia or physical needs or just a different sense of community, not being in a home with someone who's 18 when you're, you know, 65. They were great. They acknowledged that that was a need, so they built a retirement apartment.

Now as adults age and become seniors, they have a space where they can then move in, and they still have the medical supports or the physical and mental supports that they need, but they're in an environment that is much more adapted to their age and more relaxed, less busy, whereas in some of the other group homes that they have, you know, we've got young, vibrant adults who are 18, 19, who are going to work or going to their agency during the day and then are out at Special Olympics in the evening. Their lives are far busier than even mine in a social aspect.

I think there's an ability there to really highlight the positive things that are also happening in the community and the great work that agencies are providing for individuals with disabilities and then looking at those great success stories and figuring out how we can expand those and make them even more successful and also outside of our major urban centres. Again, I think that what has happened is that as people with disabilities age, they end up moving more into urban centres because that's where the service providers are. So it's looking again at the systemic issue around: how do we support individuals with disabilities in their communities as a whole?

Again, I support the bill, and I look forward to hearing more conversations from all of my colleagues in the House. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Under standing Order 29(2)(a), any questions or comments?

Ms Renaud: Well, thank you to the member for those comments. I always actually giggle, too, when I say: Robin Hood in Sherwood Park. And then it turns out that, you know, my father's name was Littlejohn. So I laugh a bit more.

I love your comments. I love that you talked about that difficult transition period from the time when children with disabilities and families, in many cases, are looking at making that transition. Often it does take several years to figure out the system but also to find housing if that's something they need to do or just to look at transitions to so many other very complex systems, AISH being one of them, of course. I'm just wondering if you could expand a little more on some of the things you've learned in your work that we could start to talk about, things that this advocate position, if it's approved and passed, could look at.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thanks to the member for the question. I think something that we definitely need to look at is how we are evaluating the qualifications around families that access family support for children with disabilities, our supports for permanency programs, actually, under the family enhancement act and then, as well, how we're supporting individuals with the persons with disabilities program. Again, I think it is an issue around looking at how we make sure that there's consistency. How do we make sure that families are not having expectations around things that are not consistent across all spectrums?

Again I recognize, though, that children in that zero-to-5, zero-to-6 age group need intensive supports as they're developing, especially if we recognize that they have some learning deficits or language deficits. Of course, the expectations and the services that are provided to them when they're little are far more intense than what they may necessarily get as adults. I think part of that is education as well as making sure that people understand those developmental milestones, looking at what is important at different ages and how as people age and grow, those supports may shift and may change over time. But it's ensuring that the family is aware and understands that so that it doesn't feel like they have another loss in their life.

I definitely agree that there are things that we could do to support families to make sure that they are feeling supported through the whole process as their child grows and becomes an adult because it is definitely more complex, and the needs of each individual are different. Definitely, there are areas that I think we can look at for sure.

Thanks.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, May 17, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Battle River-Wainwright.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm really honoured to be able to introduce the amazing students from the Hughenden school in my riding. I would like the teacher and the students to rise as I call out the name Shawna Tainsh. Please join me in welcoming them to this Assembly.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a real thrill to be able to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly some of the most amazing students in Edmonton-Decore from the great school of Northmount. They are joined here today by their teachers Diana Coumantarakis and Justin Hume. I would now invite the teachers and all of the students to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly a large group of students from Rimbey elementary school. Rimbey, of course, is home to the famous couple Martha and Henry, made famous by Ralph Klein, and one of the greatest places in this province. They have a lot of chaperones with them, so in the interests of time I will not try to name them all and also because I probably would accidentally butcher some of these names. But I would ask if, on both sides of the gallery, the students from Rimbey could stand up with their chaperones and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. members, are there any other school groups today?
The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly some friends of mine visiting from the MS Society. I ask them to rise and remain standing as I call their names. With us today we have Dr. Garry Wheeler, Julie Kelndorfer, Bob Macklon, Patrycia Rzechowka, Kevin O'Neil, and Gayelene Bonenfant. These people are tireless advocates for improving the lives of Albertans affected by MS, and some of them know first-hand what it's like to live with the disease. Whether it's dealing with the disease directly or assisting family, volunteering, leading, educating, spreading awareness, or fund-raising, these people all possess a passion and dedication to helping others that are truly inspiring and a great example for all of us in this House and across the province. I ask them all to please receive the traditional warm welcome of this House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a real privilege to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Mr. Stan Fisher. Stan Fisher has been contributing to the well-being of Albertans as a volunteer and a professional for over 40 years, most recently as president and CEO of the St. Michael's Health Group. Prior to that he served in senior positions with Chrysalis, the Wild Rose Foundation, and in both provincial and municipal government. His staff is with him here today to wish him well on his retirement from St. Michael's. I now welcome him and, of course, all the staff. Please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to introduce to you and through you to all members of the House today Troy Taylor and Mike Moze. As you may know, there is an upcoming rally at the Legislature to call on the government to investigate failures in the child welfare system, and both of these gentlemen are involved in that. Troy will be sitting in silence at the Legislature tomorrow morning and is here to watch question period today. He works with high-risk youth. He's founded an organization called Young Diverse Proud, working with youth in Edmonton. I ask him to rise – he has already risen – and ask that he receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's indeed a pleasure to introduce to you and through you one of my constituents and a family friend of the Boyds, John MacArthur. John is a cattle producer in our region carrying on the tradition from his father, a long-time farmer. He's here today because he can't seed because unfortunately it's raining up our way. He's able to come to the Legislature today and will be representing Alberta Beef Producers and meeting with officials at their event tonight. So I ask members of the Legislature to welcome my constituent John MacArthur.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

Crime Prevention

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, this government is completely out of touch. Crime continues to soar, and this government just doesn't seem to care. Recently in Alberta there have been three stabbings, murders, and countless fentanyl overdoses, just to mention a few. My friend's son was a victim of a senseless home invasion where burglars broke in and beat him with a baseball bat, causing loss of vision, a cracked skull, and numerous broken bones. Many Albertans no longer feel safe in their own homes.

We have seen an increase in robberies and drug use due to the economic downturn, and we must make sure that criminals cannot take advantage of the lack of government response. Criminals are preying on potentially underserved communities, which in turn puts added strain on our police forces. When there is less law enforcement, crime increases. The minister should know that.

This government has spent the vast majority of its time in office pushing its radical ideology on Albertans rather than focusing on a serious increase in crime in our province. The minister seems to be reacting rather than governing, and it seems very evident in a recent news release where they reported increasing enforcement by fish and wildlife officers to patrol public land and fine people for littering. Littering. Really, that's what the NDP government is focusing its efforts on. I can't imagine a more backwards priority in the wake of increased crime in Alberta communities. The unwillingness to take measures to protect the citizens of rural Alberta from criminal activity is shameful.

Wildrose is taking action. Last month we launched our Alberta Crime Task Force, which will listen to Albertans and find solutions to address rural crime. A Wildrose government will promote safe communities, strong families. In 2019 citizens will have their say.

Thank you.

International Day against Homophobia, Transphobia, and Biphobia

Connolly: Mr. Speaker, today is International Day against Homophobia, Transphobia, and Biphobia. As we work to end discrimination today, let us mark important milestones of the past because the fight for equality for LGBTQ-plus people began long before Canada legalized same-sex marriage. On May 20, 1999, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled, in its M. versus H. decision, that all couples, gay or straight, are entitled to the same spousal benefits and recognition as common-law couples. The court called on the provinces to fix their laws to recognize same-sex couples once and for all.

Of course, conservative politicians tried to stand in the way of progress. The Progressive Conservative government contemplated using the notwithstanding clause to challenge the court and ended up passing a bill in this Assembly to define marriage as only between a man and a woman. Even as their Justice minister warned that it had no legal effect, they did it anyway.

Another Alberta politician, Jason Kenney, has never apologized for what he said as an MP about the decision. In an article that spring he called the ruling "one of the most outrageous exercises of raw judicial power in the history of modern democracy." In Parliament he denounced the Supreme Court's decision as illegitimate. He said that judges can't change what he called a metaphysical reality and that, quote: marriage is marriage; it is between a man and a woman, and it can be between no others.

Mr. Speaker, that has changed for the better. LGBTQ-plus couples in Alberta now have the same rights as everybody else. As we work to fight homophobia, transphobia, biphobia, and all forms of discrimination against LGBTQ-plus people, we must remember that these struggles, which we have fought and often had to re-fight, always had opponents rooted in the conservative ideology. Jason Kenney and his conservative friends have stood in the way of progress at every opportunity.

Let us celebrate this day in history as a mark of success, let us take action to fight homophobia, transphobia, and biphobia everywhere we encounter it, and let us commit to never going back.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Stan C. Fisher, St. Michael's Health Group

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to honour a very special man that I've had the pleasure of working with since I became the MLA for Edmonton-Decore, Stan Fisher, who will be retiring from his position as president and CEO of St. Michael's Health Group, a position that he has held for over 11 years. I'm very fortunate to have both St. Michael's Health Group Long Term Care Centre and Millennium Pavilion in my riding.

Stan has been a tireless advocate for his organization. As such, during his time with St. Michael's the organization has grown and sought after a location for long-term care and is regularly on the forefront of new approaches to seniors' and dementia care. I'm also proud to say that because of Stan's hard work and advocacy St. Michael's Long Term Care Centre will be getting a brand new kitchen for its residents.

Unfortunately, there isn't enough time in this member's statement to list all of Stan's achievements. I will mention that he has been honoured for his hard work, being the recipient of prestigious awards such as the Queen Elizabeth II Diamond Jubilee medal and the Alberta centennial medal.

Stan, you have been absolutely wonderful to work with, and it's an honour for me to represent your organization and your residents in this Legislature. I sincerely wish you the best of luck, and may you have a happy retirement. You will be missed by many.

The Speaker: Hon. member, my apologies. The order was confused. The Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

Mount Farquhar Summit Climb 2017

Mr. Rodney: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. Countless Canadian soldiers have lost their lives fighting for ours. So many others have returned home with life-changing physical injuries, and far too many have experienced mental, emotional, and spiritual tolls that have caused disastrous lifelong or life-ending effects.

That's why the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry Foundation and the Calgary Health Trust are pleased to announce the second annual Reaching the Summit for Mental Health and Wellness fundraising initiative, which is aimed at heightening awareness of veterans and their families who are suffering from the devastating consequences of depression, posttraumatic stress disorder, and other forms of mental illness. On Saturday, June 24, two groups of climbers will reach for the summit of Mount Farquhar while others will hike Cataract Creek trail. The climbing teams will again be led by Canada's first Mount Everest summiteer, Laurie Skreslet, and yours truly.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot tell you what an honour this is. During our climb on Mount Buller last year I was truly humbled to hear the heart-wrenching stories of these true Canadian heroes. During the inaugural event over $71,000 was raised. I encourage all Albertans to offer what they can as we strive to reach the $100,000 mark.

The event begins below Mount Farquhar, which was named after the first commanding officer of the PPCLI, who's credited with establishing the regiment's sense of duty, professionalism, and fighting spirit. A dedication will be made to Lieutenant Colonel Farquhar. I look forward to seeing my hon. colleague from Livingstone-Macleod there.

Now, for more information on how to get involved as a climber, hiker, or sponsor, please visit calgaryhealthtrust.ca, Reaching the Summit for Mental Health and Wellness.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Multiple Sclerosis

Mrs. Schreiner: Good afternoon, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise in the House to remind all members about the devastating impact of multiple sclerosis. I rise to speak for everybody in the province because this chronic, often disabling disease of the central nervous system affects 1 in 400 Albertans, or almost 14,000 people.

Since its inception, in 1948, the MS Society has provided over $160 million in research dollars in support of mitigating the impact of the disease on all Canadians. The core support of the MS Society has been from tens of thousands of dedicated individuals, companies, and foundations within proud communities just like Alberta's across the country.

May is Multiple Sclerosis Awareness Month, and the campaign raises awareness of the fact that Canada has the highest rate of MS in the world. Similarly, it also serves to highlight that we have the best MS research in the world. The Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar introduced the passionate representatives of the MS Society who are here as guests today. They strive to shed light on the disease as well as the accomplishments of research.

Raising awareness is one step in ending the impact that MS has on fellow Albertans and Canadians alike. I know that the Member for Sherwood Park has been a strong advocate in support of MS research through her diligent participation in the MS bike ride. We all need to work harder to support this research because the unpredictable, episodic, and often progressive nature of MS makes it particularly challenging, and the physical, emotional, and financial impacts of MS last a lifetime.

Fellow members, I have heard from many of my Red Deer-North constituents who suffer from this disease. I hope that all members of this House will support the great work of the MS Society and the many people who support MS research.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Government and Official Opposition Policies

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, it would seem that the NDP skipped the economics 101 class, so if you will indulge me, I want to spend the next couple of minutes going over a crash course in some of the fairly rudimentary principles that they missed.

Lesson 1. There is no such thing as a free lunch. When you get something for free – i.e., freely installed light bulbs – someone else ends up paying for it, and that somebody is hard-working Albertans. Mr. Speaker, the reality is that if too many people get on the gravy train, the gravy runs out. That's exactly what is happening in Alberta right now. Businesses, you know, the ones that create jobs, are leaving this province once and for all. Over $24 billion of investment has fled since this government took office in 2015.

Lesson 2. Empower individuals to create their own prosperity through the vehicle of liberty and freedom. This path was best documented during the Reagan and Thatcher eras. It featured lower marginal tax rates, deregulation, and restrained government spending. These policies have created more wealth and prosperity than any other vehicle in modern history, full stop.

Lesson 3. Parkinson's law states that work expands so as to fill the time available for its completion. Between 2015 and 2016 Alberta's population expanded by 1.7 per cent whereas the public sector expanded by 7.1 per cent. That means that the public sector is expanding over 400 per cent compared to the expansion of population.

Lesson 4. No one spends somebody else's money as carefully as they spend their own. When you or I purchase something, price and quality are paramount. When the government spends, it is neither with their own money nor for their own consumption, and you can guess how efficient and effective that is.

Lesson 5. And I'm pretty sure I read this in an economics book somewhere. If you want a prosperous society, then don't elect an NDP government. Mr. Speaker, the NDP have chosen to increase marginal tax rates, increase regulations, and increase government spending. This has created less prosperity, liberty, and freedom. How is this making life better for Albertans?

Presenting Petitions

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I rise to table a petition containing 645 signatures calling on the government to order a proper and complete Heritage Resource Impact Assessment for the site and buildings that constitutes the former Raymond School of Agriculture, also known as the Raymond Care Centre, and to halt plans to demolish these important historic buildings until the public can fully understand the potential heritage impact of their destruction and the scope of what would be involved in preserving them.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Employment and Labour Code Consultations

Mr. Jean: The last two years have seen Alberta in the worst economic downturn since the 1980s, but you wouldn't know it from looking at the NDP's policy record. Instead of trying to do no further harm, as they should do, they have waged war on Albertans' pocketbooks and ruined investor confidence all over the world for this province. The latest misguided idea: to ram through labour legislation after just 36 days of consultation, where on Ontario's part it's been over two years, and they're still going. Does the Premier take pleasure in kicking Albertans when they're down, or is she that out of touch with how harmful her policies are?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, I have to sort of begin by responding to the preamble there. Jobs were up in Alberta by 20,000 in March. Manufacturing in Alberta is up. Drilling is up. Car sales are up. Housing starts are up. Exports are up. The only thing not up is the Wildrose's strategy for talking this economy down, and Albertans deserve better.

Mr. Jean: From where the NDP has taken our economy over the last 18 months and the first year, Mr. Speaker, it wouldn't be that difficult to be up.

The absolute bare minimum this government could do would be to take some time to allow for consultation on their labour legislation. The way this government acts, consultation may indeed be just a four-letter word. We saw it with Bill 6, and now we are seeing history repeat itself with the labour legislation. When you rush legislation, Premier, you usually get it wrong, especially if you don't listen to Albertans. Will the Premier try to show just an ounce of goodwill and agree to consult on labour legislation over the summer? Yes or no?

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, what we know is that Albertans need fair legislation that protects families. Last week, for instance, we heard the story of Amanda Jensen, who was fired when she took time off work to care for her child with leukemia. We are the only province in this country where that kind of injustice could occur under our laws. Albertans have been waiting for decades for that injustice to be fixed, and we're not going to make them wait any longer.

Mr. Jean: If they've been waiting decades, why not wait a few months to get the legislation right? Thirty-six days isn't long enough. It's not long enough to talk to . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order, please.
Please proceed.

Mr. Jean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thirty-six days isn't long enough to talk to all the concerned stakeholders in the province let alone fully consult with them. Let me be clear. It's obvious the fix is in with this review. If the Premier took the time to talk to real Albertans, small-business owners, families concerned about the economy instead of just the union bosses who sit on the NDP board of directors, they'd understand how misguided their policies are. Why does the Premier refuse to listen to everyday Albertans and fully consult with them? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order, please.

Second main question. Or second supplemental?

An Hon. Member: She didn't get to answer.

The Speaker: Oh yeah. That would be the part that I missed today, the answer. Yes. Thank you.

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I recall being advised that when you're standing, I shouldn't be, so I was just waiting there.

Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that, as I said before, it is time for Albertans to finally get fair laws that protect them in their workplace. Do you know another thing? If an Albertan is actually sick at work – perhaps they're sick because they themselves are getting cancer treatment – if they try to collect the EI benefits into which they have paid, their employer can say: "You know what? Go get those benefits, but don't expect your job to be there when you come back." Albertans deserve the right to get the benefits that they pay into. They deserve to be treated with respect.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Now it would be the second main question.

Mr. Jean: Did you hear that, Mr. Speaker? It sounds like a lot of excuses not to consult and listen to Albertans.

Family Violence Death Review Committee Report

Mr. Jean: Yesterday the NDP tabled a report that could save lives. The Family Violence Death Review Committee annual report was tabled almost a full year after it was given to the minister's office. There is absolutely no reason why this information should be delayed, yet the Minister of Community and Social Services did not release the report until he received repeated calls from the media. Ridiculous. This is unacceptable. Why does it take calls from the CBC for your minister to release a report that could save Albertans' lives?

The Speaker: Thank you.

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, I think it's important to first begin by saying that all Albertans deserve to feel safe in their homes, their communities, and their workplaces. With respect to the particular report that the member opposite is talking about, yes, it could have been tabled earlier. But it's also important to understand that the recommendations contained in that report were actually released publicly in 2015, Mr. Speaker. In the meantime our government has been working very hard to make progress on preventing family violence, and I look forward to talking about that more in answer to the member's next question.

Mr. Jean: Mr. Speaker, this minister's negligence is putting lives at risk. Now, this government may have forgotten Serenity, but we are not going to let them. Vulnerable Albertans deserve better. They deserve better from this government, and the NDP is leaving them behind, full stop. How can the same disgraced minister that failed to turn over documents to the RCMP on the death of Serenity be trusted by the Premier when he failed to produce this vital report on family violence deaths?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In fact, I am exceptionally proud of the work that this minister has done on issues related to family violence. This government, under this minister's watch, increased funding to FCSS by $25 million. They put in a $15 million increase to women's shelters, an increase that those shelters had been asking for for three decades. They put $11 million into family and community safety grants. We passed Bill 2. We've protected people fleeing family violence in their residential tenancy situations. We have done more in the last two years to support people than . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Jean: Shovelling tons of taxpayers' money towards a problem does not solve the problem.

Mr. Speaker, the last time this minister showed negligence and completely failed in his duties, the Deputy Premier told Albertans that, quote, we have full confidence in him and his abilities. End quote. The Premier just said the same thing. Talk about déjà vu. It sounds like Groundhog Day all over again. I have no confidence that there are no other reports gathering dust in the minister's office that could save lives. Does the Premier still believe that the Minister of Community and Social Services is capable of doing anything other than delaying reports and giving half-hearted apologies to Albertans?

Ms Notley: Well, again, Mr. Speaker, the member opposite seemed to miss the point where I indicated that the recommendations included in that report were actually released in late 2015. But I think the member opposite should actually give some thought to whether he really wants to stick by that comment to people that run women's shelters, to say that finally, after 30 years, giving them what they need to help run their programs is shovelling money needlessly at a problem. I would like them to go out to women who are fleeing domestic violence and say that to their faces. [interjections] That is unacceptable.

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Emergency Preparedness

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Communities like Calgary are nervously watching the weather, our flood season being in full swing, while remembering the devastation of 2013. Numbers from Environment and Parks' own website show that snowpack levels in the Bow River watershed are at or near record levels and far above the levels of 2013, that resulted in massive flooding downstream in Cochrane, Calgary, and High River. What is the Premier doing in collaboration with our communities to be ready for the potential of flooding if these conditions continue to worsen?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure and of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, recent reports indicate that there may be a risk of flooding in southern Alberta and in Calgary again. It's something this government takes very seriously. We remember the devastation to people's lives and property during the last flood in 2013. Tens of thousands were forced from their homes, and there was over $6 billion in damage. We're working hard to protect Albertans through the Springbank project and through a number of other flood mitigation projects to make sure in the event of another flood that people and their homes are protected.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Hanson: Okay. Thank you. Lessons learned from Slave Lake in 2011, Calgary in 2013, and Fort McMurray in 2016 should be a wake-up call. Disaster can strike communities at any time. Communities like Calgary, Drumheller, High River, Sundre, and more devote significant time and resources to be prepared for these natural disasters, but their citizens should not be expected to act as provincial first responders. What is the Premier doing to improve the response time of the Alberta Emergency Management Agency so regular Albertans are not put in harm's way?

2:00

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, there's no question that the 2013 floods and last year the wildfire emergency situation in Wood Buffalo brought out the best in Albertans, and now our province, in particular on the flood in question, has redoubled our efforts to ensure that our communities are safe. We have much better river forecasting than we did prior to the 2013 flood. Our government has invested in that co-ordination with municipalities as well. There's a lot more public information, and there's a lot more co-ordination with municipalities on the question of river forecasting.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you. The 2012 report from the Slave Lake fire states that the sustainable resource development strategy should be a "high state of readiness" coupled with a multiminsty approach. Albertans are counting on this government to not leave them in the lurch and to be ready when disaster strikes. In 2016 in Fort McMurray, four years after the recommendations, we did not experience a high state of readiness, nor did we see a multiministerial approach. First reaction from the province took days. Can the Premier say specifically what is being done today to make sure that our province is at a high state of readiness for fire, flood, and . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I do take some issue, again, with the preamble that the member offered. In fact, last year with the tragic situation with the Fort McMurray fire, of course, the Alberta Emergency Management Agency immediately brought everybody together into the Provincial Operations Centre, where we worked across ministries in all ways in order to support the regional municipality of Wood Buffalo in their immediate response to an unprecedented disaster. Now, as the members opposite know, there will be additional reports going out which talk about how we can do better. We can always do better, and we're committed to that.

The Speaker: Thank you.
The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Investigation into Serenity's Death

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Can any of us imagine losing a child under the most horrific circumstances and then being ignored when you ask questions about it? Today a brave, resilient family is with us, and they are seeking answers. I am honoured to be their voice. So far all of their information about Serenity's terrible fate has come from the media and the child advocate. They have asked me to ask this question: Premier, why are the ME's office, the Crown, and the department withholding basic information from Serenity's mother regarding the abuse of her children more than two and a half years ago?

The Speaker: The Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This tragedy has been extremely difficult on the family, I have no doubt, and on all Albertans. Everyone is working very hard to ensure we do the best to obtain justice for this little girl. It is true that the process did not occur as quickly as it should have done. We will ensure that in future we do a better job of moving forward in a more timely manner, but at this time we cannot prejudice any potential prosecution going forward until the investigation is complete.

Thank you.

Mr. Ellis: Serenity's mom has not only been kept in the dark about Serenity's death; this government will not even tell her about the investigation into the abuse of her other children, who were in care in the same home. Serenity's brother and sister are safe and back with their mother, and that should have been Serenity's future, too. The family will never be whole again because we all have failed them. Premier, will you look up into the gallery and tell Serenity's family and her mother watching online here today why you will not respect their wishes and call a public inquiry?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Like the Minister of Justice, of course, I need to begin by saying that all Albertans are very, very troubled and have been about the horrible circumstances that Serenity suffered up to 2014, including, of course, her tragic death in 2014. It is absolutely important that the police be allowed to proceed so that the matter can be addressed fully in the justice system. It is frustrating for all of us, but we can't compromise that because that would be yet another injustice.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Ellis: Last fall the former minister assured this House that he met with Serenity's family and offered supports. In reality, no one from the NDP government has ever reached out to Serenity's mother or her mother's immediate family to offer condolences, information, or support. And it gets worse. The former minister's office called Serenity's mother to schedule a phone call, and he never bothered to call. Premier, your government's role in this is shameful. Will you apologize to Serenity's mother and her immediate family today? And what is this man still doing on your front bench?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, when we are asked in the role of government or we are compelled to take on the responsibility of caring for children, we have an incredibly important obligation to those children and to their families, and when we don't get that done right, we absolutely owe them an apology – all of us do – because there are so many ways in which the work that we do to support these children and their families can and must be better. That's absolutely true. There's no qualification to that. It must be done better. But it's also important that we make sure that the people who were responsible for Serenity's death . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.
The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Energy Resource Revenue

Mr. Clark: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Moody's says that Alberta's deficit reduction plan relies almost entirely on higher oil prices, and they also say that this government isn't doing enough to get us off the royalty revenue roller coaster. I couldn't agree more. You know who else agrees? One of the four members of the NDP caucus who were in this House before the last election. Here's a quote. "They've failed to take us off the boom-and-bust revenue roller coaster, and they've failed to save for a rainy day . . . That's not leadership." To the Premier: which one of your four incumbent MLAs said that on March 25, 2015?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, there is no question that when oil was at $100 a barrel, it would have been prudent for the people who were in charge at the time to put together a financial and fiscal plan that would have allowed for us to have more money in savings. When we became government, we watched as the international price of oil went to an unprecedented low. Right now, as much as the issues that the member opposite talks about are important, what's important to us is standing with Albertans, having their backs, making life more affordable, creating jobs, and supporting those important programs that matter to their families.

Mr. Clark: Well, of course, it was you who said that, Madam Premier. I'm sure that you remember that well.

Here's another one, Mr. Speaker.

This government has promised for years to get [us] off the [resource revenue] roller coaster, but here we are once again coming over the top of the rickety track, about to plunge down amid screams and white knuckles. We've been on this ride too long, Mr. Speaker, and it's time the government got serious about getting off it.

Now, this is probably an easy one, but again to the Premier: which one of your members said this on November 26, 2014?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm going to hazard a guess that it was the current Minister of Transportation. That being said, I think the key issue here is that over decades when overall we had very high oil prices, there is no question that there was an obligation on the part of the people who were in charge to save for a rainy day. Right now, two years into the biggest oil price drop in decades, to suggest that now is the time to start, by closing schools, throwing nurses and teachers out of work, by eliminating jobs, that is not the way to build an economy. What we're seeing is green shoots that are looking very healthy, and that's because we did a stimulative budget . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Hon. member, I'm reminded that the questions in the House should really be to government policy and not necessarily a TV program. I'm sure that on your next supplemental you will consider that.

Mr. Clark: Why thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course the Premier is right. It was the Government House Leader who said that.

Third try.

Why didn't you fix this? Why didn't you fix it so that you were protected from changes in oil prices? Lord knows, we all know that the price of oil goes up and [the price of oil goes] down. If the government doesn't know that by now, there's something really, really seriously wrong.

Again to the Premier, I want to know who said that on December 8, 2014, and I want to know if you know that the price of oil goes up, the price of oil goes down, and that it is a tragic mistake to wager Alberta's future on the price of oil.

The Speaker: Hon. member, I just want to remind you again that it's the current government policy that I think this question period is for.

The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, again thank you, Mr. Speaker. I suppose I can just answer as I have before. The fact of the matter is that we know that Albertans and the Alberta economy and Alberta families are facing an unprecedented challenge to their economic prosperity because of an unprecedented drop in the price of oil. There are different choices that you make when that happens in the short and immediate term. Our choice was to stand with Albertans. Our choice was to invest in jobs. Our choice was to invest in infrastructure. Our choice was to protect health care and education, because that is the path out of this problem.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose.

Postsecondary Education and Health Care in Indigenous Communities

Mr. Hinkley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Constituents of mine in Maskwacis are concerned about opportunities to pursue post-secondary education at home. Given that our government is working hard to establish strong, collaborative relationships with indigenous peoples, can the Minister of Advanced Education please outline his plan to increase access to higher education in indigenous communities?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the hon. member for his commitment to higher learning opportunities for his constituents in Maskwacis. Of course, affordability is at the heart of our plan for advanced education. That's why we've maintained the tuition freeze for three years, and that's why we've provided predictable and sustainable funding for every university and college in the province, because we know that when Albertans have access to higher education, they can make life better for themselves. That includes indigenous students at Maskwacis and all over the province. What wouldn't help is cutting $600 million from the budget of Advanced Education like the PCs proposed to do or untold billions that the . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
First supplemental.

Mr. Hinkley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that we know that education is a key component in building strong communities and lifting people out of poverty, to the same minister: how are you working to ensure indigenous Albertans are well represented at postsecondary institutions across the province?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, we know that good jobs begin with a good education, but we know that for some Albertans, including indigenous learners, accessing postsecondary education can be a challenge. We've taken steps to address that, including $7 million in scholarships for indigenous students in high-demand programs. The indigenous careers award and indigenous graduate award encourage more indigenous Albertans to pursue studies in fields such as business, education, health science, and graduate studies. I just want to remind the House that the big cuts the opposition are proposing would slam the door on opportunities to indigenous students and all other students in this province . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Hinkley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that health care delivery and the quality of health care are important pillars of indigenous well-being, to the Minister of Health: what is the Ministry of Health doing to improve access to health care for residents of Maskwacis?

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am very proud that last year Alberta Innovates and AHS announced a partnership with Merck Canada to give Maskwacis moms better prenatal care closer to home. I have to say that in terms of the hospital visit we had in Wetaskiwin very recently, it was an excellent opportunity for us to see all of the good work that's happening to work with community. While members in the opposition are calling for deep, brutal cuts that would definitely undermine health and well-being of Albertans, including those who live in this community, our government has got their back. We're working to make their lives better. We're not going to fire teachers and nurses and make their lives far worse.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Addiction and Mental Health Strategy

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday we heard from Ministry of Health officials that implementing the recommendations of the Valuing Mental Health report has consisted of forming committees: an executive committee, an advisory committee, and four integration committees, whatever those would be. Minister, people are dying while your ministry forms committees to form more committees. Albertans need action, not more talk. What are the tangible actions you will take to combat the mental health crisis, and what is your timeline?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much. We know that mental health problems and struggles with addictions are serious problems in our communities. Mr. Speaker, 1 in 5 Albertans will grapple with this at some point in their lives, and 1 in 10 Albertans over the age of 15 will struggle with alcohol and drug dependency. That's why we're working to make sure that we increase opportunities for safe consumption services. I'm certain that these are going to save lives, and we're going to keep making sure that we have every opportunity. I hope that the members opposite support us in this because lives are too precious to gamble on whether or not substances are safe, and we need to make sure that we're keeping all Albertans safe.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the Auditor General called for an action plan to implement the mental health and addiction strategy, but the department cancelled the last meeting of the advisory committee because they had no meaningful next steps – they apparently sent a newsletter instead – and given that the committee is supposed to develop the next steps and given that 343 people dying from overdoses last year seems to be pretty meaningful, what does this minister have to say to the families of these Albertans, who want action instead of cancelled committee meetings and newsletters?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. We are expanding services, consistent with the mental health review recommendations, in Lethbridge, Medicine Hat, Red Deer, Calgary, and in other parts of the province. In Budget 2017-18 we're allocating over $80 million to help Albertans coping with mental health issues and substance use. I wish the members opposite would step up and actually support these kinds of recommendations, that put money where it needs to be to save lives, because these strategies are proven to work. That's a 64 per cent increase over Budget 2016. Because we know that Albertans dealing with these issues need support, we're there for them, and we are fighting to keep them alive.

Mr. Smith: Spending money without an action plan recommended by the Auditor General: hmmm.

Given that one person a day is dying of a drug overdose in Alberta and given that the department could not identify the top three deliverables of an action plan to address the crisis and given that we urged this government to declare a public health emergency and given that forming endless committees and then cancelling meetings does not get the right people in the right place at the right time with the right action plan to save Albertans' lives, when will the minister follow the example of B.C. and declare a public health emergency?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, I have to say to the families who are in the new eight-bed youth detox facility in Red Deer: spending money is a priority; making sure your children have somewhere safe to detox is a priority. And you know what? These types of investments are important. This isn't throwing money; this is saving lives, and I'm not going to apologize for that. We're going to keep making concrete actions, and we'll be happy to update the House in the days to come about additional steps. Our government funds 37 mental health capacity building initiatives, with 64 communities across this province targeting mental health and addictions prevention and promotion programs. These are saving children's lives, and I'm proud to invest in these kids and their communities.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Serenity and the Child Intervention System

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that two days ago in question period the Children's Services minister promised that the children in care minister's panel will be able to learn about the circumstances surrounding the abuse and untimely death that Serenity suffered while in care and given that I am on that panel and have not yet received news concerning that promise, to the Premier: when will your minister fulfill that promise she made two days ago, and what actions will she take to make sure the panel members know what is coming so that we can learn about Serenity and make changes?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Clearly, there are changes that need to happen within the child intervention system in this province. Everyone in this House is aware of that, and certainly Serenity's story brought that to the forefront. There have been many children over the years who, unfortunately, suffered tragedy within the child intervention system. We need to learn from all their stories. We need to look at what recommendations will lead to real change. We're very committed to taking action in terms of Children's Services, and we'll continue to provide as much information as we can that will certainly not compromise the criminal investigation as we move forward.

Mr. McIver: Promise broken so far.

Given that in question period this week the Justice minister said that the Crown is in discussion with the RCMP on investigation of Serenity's case and given that no arrests have been made, which leads us to believe that either the arrests are coming or the investigation has failed, and given that children are still residing in the home where Serenity suffered so much, to the Justice minister: since the Children's Services minister will not do her job by removing the children currently in that home, will you do your job and protect those children by removing them or at least by removing the adults responsible?

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, the protection and the belief in the support and protection of children in this province is not a partisan issue. This is a long and complex situation that started before 2014 and obviously covered the leadership of a number of individuals within this House. We both made choices in terms of the well-being of children, and we both are committed to the well-being and safety of children in this province. I stand behind the decisions to protect these children and to keep them safe and will continue to monitor and ensure the safety of all children in this province.

Mr. McIver: The minister said nonpartisan and immediately laid blame.

Mr. Speaker, given that on May 11 in question period the Children's Services minister confirmed a criminal investigation is ongoing, which would give reasonable persons cause to believe that the perpetrators of Serenity's terrible abuse and death would create living conditions unfit for children to endure, and given that charges have not been laid more than two years after Serenity's death, to the Premier: will you promise a public inquiry to get to the bottom? You didn't answer the question the first time. Will you call a public inquiry so that we can find out?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Of course, this situation has been challenging for the family, for Albertans in general, for all members of this House. I know that tragedies like this provoke strong reactions, but we absolutely need to let the criminal process play itself out before we make any more decisions. We will await the outcomes of those investigations. I have been in contact with the Crown. They are taking the matter very seriously.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Data Security in Public Bodies

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you. News broke out last night that in December 2016 our Energy Regulator was hacked and shut down for two days, but on Monday the Service Alberta minister stated in this Legislature that "we are not exposed" and that she's "proud of our systems." The real shock, though, is that Alberta's Auditor General warned the NDP that our Energy Regulator was at risk of being hacked 10 months prior to the actual attack. Minister, what is there to be proud of? Why wasn't this warning taken seriously?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Service Alberta.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the question. Our government takes security very seriously and information security very seriously. Our systems are secure and well protected because we are constantly vigilant in protecting government information and systems. As the hon. member from across the aisle knows, we provide a cybersecurity framework and expertise to agencies, boards, and commissions so that they can keep their systems secure. Ultimately, this falls within their individual responsibility. ABCs are invited to a monthly security forum meeting that Service Alberta chairs, where cybersecurity issues are discussed. Service Alberta also has a website that links to cybersecurity standards, templates, program plans, policy advisory guides . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. MacIntyre: The Minister of Service Alberta has been shirking her responsibility, claiming that agencies are responsible for their own operations. Given that the Auditor General's report states, "We recommend that the Department of Energy and Alberta Energy Regulator work together to determine whether a further assessment of threats, risks and impacts to industrial control systems used in provincially regulated oil and gas infrastructure would benefit Alberta,"

Minister, why aren't the ministries working with vulnerable agencies and commissions as per the AG's recommendation?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cooper: They don't take the AG seriously.

The Speaker: The hon. Opposition House Leader.

Ms McLean: Again, I will repeat my answer for the hon. member. Our government takes information security very seriously. That's why we provide our cybersecurity framework and expertise to agencies, boards, and commissions so that they can keep their systems secure. ABCs are invited to a monthly security forum meeting that Service Alberta chairs, where cybersecurity threats and issues are discussed. Service Alberta also has a website that links to cybersecurity standards, templates, program plans, policy advisory guides, and IT disaster recovery tools. We are available to assist all of our ABCs with cybersecurity . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. MacIntyre: Given the Auditor General's damning findings that pipeline operators use industrial control systems to control pumps and valves and to detect leaks or other problems and that if the industrial control systems are not secure, they can be misused to cause damage to critical infrastructure like oil wells, pipelines, and refineries, resulting in harm to Albertans or the environment, to the Energy minister: why didn't you instruct an Alberta government entity to assess risks to our energy infrastructure?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. minister previously answered the two questions on what is being done, and those apply to pipelines. Companies maintain their own systems, and we work with them on the systems, but at the end of the day the companies have their own systems, and we have ours.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Electric Power Prices and Transmission Costs

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When it comes to the Energy file, the NDP just doesn't get it. Day in and day out I have constituents, many already battling unemployment, bringing me outrageous power bills. Regular Albertans are concerned about the astronomical charges for power transmission, not power generation. The NDP is suing generators and capping the lowest component of their bills, which is retail, and doing nothing about the costly transmission line overbuild. To the Minister of Energy: what is this government doing to lower transmission costs for Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, we're working on all aspects of the bills. We've capped the rate at 6.8 cents, and we're working with my ministry to look at transmission. To be clear, the transmission costs that we're speaking of now were done with the previous government, not with ours, but we are looking into how those costs can be managed going forward.

Mr. Cyr: Blaming the last government: that's shameful.

Transitioning Alberta's grid to 30 per cent renewables by 2030 and stranding our coal assets will only require more transmission lines, which means higher transmission fees for Alberta. Given that the new renewable assets will need to be built in areas of the province where they perform the best and given that our coal generators are located near coal and that winds are strongest near where the sun shines the brightest, why is the government pursuing a course that will make electricity more expensive for the good people in Bonnyville-Cold Lake?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, one of the good things about having an overbuilt transmission line is that we won't need as much transmission when we're doing our renewables. I'm pleased to say that in all of our auctions, we're working with the ISO to look at where placements can be. A number of the coal facilities are already near good transmission lines, so there won't be much more cost for that.

Mr. Cyr: The NDP capping electricity retail rates at double the current price sends a signal to families and industry that they should expect electricity prices to double. Given that the NDP capped electricity prices at double so that they can hide the true costs of their costly renewables strategy with debt and given that this has had no effect but was put forward to stop the rising transmission costs, to the minister. My constituents can't afford their electricity bills now. How can they afford them when the NDP causes their bills to double?

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, the system we inherited is an energy-only market, which causes price volatility. That's why we're capping the rates. That's why we're developing a capacity market. We want consumers to have stability and predictability in their system, and we also want reliability. That's what they're going to get.

Child Protective Services and Death Reviews

Mr. Rodney: All hon. members agree that Serenity's death was a tragedy. Every one of us needs to do everything possible to prevent a situation like this from ever happening again. The office of the Child and Youth Advocate does amazing work as it offers solutions to the issues that Children's Services faces. To the Premier. You have publicly stated that all of the Child and Youth Advocate's recommendations were accepted by your government. Can you please tell the family and all Albertans: have all of these recommendations actually been implemented yet?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm thankful for the partnership we have with the Child and Youth Advocate in terms of his commitment and passion towards the safety and protection of our vulnerable children in this province. We worked very closely with the Child and Youth Advocate to understand the intent of the recommendations and to move forward. Some of the recommendations, obviously, are incredibly complex and will take years to implement, but we're making progress on them all in order to make this system better. That's why we have a Minister of Children's Services. That's why we had the panel. We're committed to working together to ensure that this system is better off than it has been for far too many years.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Rodney: Given that criminal record checks must be completed on all adults living in a residence where children in care are to be placed and given that the Child and Youth Advocate's report indicates that these checks were performed on the parents that Serenity was placed with but not on the adult children who also live there, to the Minister of Children's Services: what new directives have you issued to your department to ensure that criminal record checks occur on all adults in all care homes, as your department policy dictates?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again, I'm thankful for the team within Children's Services, who is very committed to protecting the children within Alberta. There's been much progress made over recent years in terms of ensuring that policy is implemented. We continue to provide the resources that those staff need to ensure that they are able to do the work that they're being asked to do. Absolutely, while money doesn't fix everything, money sure helps the staff to be there and to provide the services and resources that they need. We remain committed to funding the department in order to be able to implement the policy that they need to . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Rodney: Given that one of the major concerns with Serenity's case was the length of time it took to perform the autopsy and given that in 2015 1.75 per cent of autopsies took longer than nine months to perform and given that Serenity's autopsy took a full two years to complete, which may well have compromised the criminal investigation into her death, to the minister once again: how many autopsies in Alberta take two years or longer to be completed, and what are your plans to deal with this on an urgent basis?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We certainly know that the autopsy in this case did not move forward in a particularly timely manner. Obviously, there are some cases in which there are complications, but we will be looking very closely to ensure that we can expedite those processes. It's incredibly challenging, we know, for families who are waiting for the outcomes of these autopsies. We absolutely know. That's why we've made it a priority. That's why we've invested in hiring more medical examiners. We will absolutely be ensuring that those timelines come down.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Midwifery Services

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. After my sister's experience giving birth to her first son, she pursued the services and care of a midwife for her second and third pregnancies. I meet more and more women in my constituency who are seeking midwifery services that are concerned that the demand exceeds availability. Given the vital care that midwives provide throughout pregnancy, to the Minister of Health: what is this government doing to support access to these primary care practitioners?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for her important advocacy in this area. The government values Alberta midwives and their important role in the health of mothers and babies, and that's why this government has brought forward stable funding with year-over-year increases. We've already seen a 30 per cent increase in the number of midwife-attended births since we came into office, which I'm very proud of, and by the end of 2018-19 we'll see an almost 68 per cent increase compared to when we came into government. Ensuring that we have increased options for women who choose these ones is very important to us.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the number of families receiving midwifery care is increasing and midwives are currently involved in about 5 per cent of all pregnancies in Alberta, to the same minister: how is this government working with stakeholders to ensure that midwives have the capacity to handle increasing interest and demand?

Ms Hoffman: Thank you again to the member for her question and for her advocacy on this very important matter, Mr. Speaker. Midwives across this province are the ones dealing with the front lines, and they understand our pressures. Even in this tough economy we've put our money where our mouth is. We've worked with our partners to support midwives. Stable and predictable funding has made it possible for AHS and the association to reach an agreement that will increase the number of midwives in our province and improve access to underserved communities. I might add that I'm looking forward to sharing some positive news about this in the hon. member's riding in the coming weeks.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that rural families often have to travel long distances to cities to receive supports and are often forced to join wait-lists, to the same minister: what is this government doing to support rural or remote families in Alberta to address this serious inequity?

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much to the member for this question. As a rural MLA it's important that we make sure that her advocacy helps not only the residents of her constituency but all residents, Mr. Speaker. That's why we're delivering on a commitment to provide midwifery care to more Alberta families than ever before. The agreement will increase the number of midwives practising in Alberta and includes a joint process that AHS and the association will use to determine where midwives can serve more underserved rural and remote communities. What's also important is that Mount Royal graduates can start their careers here in Alberta, something I'm so proud that our government is investing in.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Landowner Property Rights

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll ask the question that the Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville should be asking. Farmers and ranchers are stewards of their land. They are the ones that have laid out the investment. They are the ones that have done the improvements. They are the ones that have paid the taxes. They feel that they should have a say to any outside corporation accessing their land. To the Minister of Transportation. You used to be an advocate for landowners' rights when you were an opposition member. How do you justify supporting the opposite position now that you are in government? Or are you being overruled by the minister of environment?

The Speaker: The Minister of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. With respect to the hon. member, that's not a question about government policy, and I don't feel inclined to answer it.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That's going to look great on Facebook.

The Speaker: No preambles, please. Keep going.

Mr. Hanson: Mr. Speaker, given that the Farmers' Advocate . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hanson: . . . is cautioning landowners regarding unregistered landmen representing speculators . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

Mr. Hanson: . . . and given that these companies are not being forthright with information that could affect landowners and their relationships with their neighbours and municipalities, what is this government doing to defend the rights of landowners to protect the interest that they have worked so hard towards?

The Speaker: The Minister of Justice.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, these questions are very complex and very interrelated. We absolutely know that it's the case that there have been long-standing issues with respect to the way property rights operate in this province. We will have more to say about it in the future. These are incredibly complicated issues. There are complicated interests on both sides of the case. This is something that needs to be taken seriously and handled in an appropriate manner, not for cheap political points. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order, please.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that bills 19, 24, 36, and 50 were seen as an attack on the rights of property owners in Alberta and given that our Bill 204 sought to remedy some of the remaining issues but was defeated in this House, to the Minister of Transportation. You have previously campaigned to repeal these bills that trampled the rights of Alberta property owners. When can we expect any of the remaining problems of these bills to be repealed?

Mr. Mason: Mr. Speaker, we have consistently stood to protect the rights of landowners and all Albertans. People have a right to fair compensation of their land. They need a right to appeal. We've always stood for these basic principles. We continue to do that now. I was in this House defending those principles when the Wildrose didn't even exist, and I'm going to continue to do it long after they're gone. [interjections]

The Speaker: What a robust day we are having today. In 20 seconds we will go to the next agenda item.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Bill 15 Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce Bill 15, Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017.

As you know, Alberta's economy and commodity tax statutes are typically amended every year. This is done in order to implement government policy decisions and make necessary changes that ensure our tax legislation remains aligned with the federal tax legislation. In addition to the technical and administrative amendments being brought forward this year, we are also proposing important changes that will affect the carbon levy rebate. The changes are specifically aimed at reducing the need for rebate amounts to be returned when a household's eligibility changes due to the death of a family member.

We heard from Albertans who were affected by this, and we've been working as quickly as possible to address it. As soon as we heard about this issue in March, we took action and directed the Canada Revenue Agency to halt these notices. Mr. Speaker, families who already received reassessment notices from the Canada Revenue Agency in these cases can disregard those notices. Those who have already returned the rebate will receive a repayment.

Mr. Speaker, this measure is also extended to the Alberta child benefit and the Alberta family employment tax credit programs as of January 1 of this year. The related amendments in this bill will ensure that this issue is resolved across all three programs going forward.

Additional changes included in this bill include implementing a broader political contribution tax credit, as announced a couple of months ago in Budget 2017. Extending the political contribution tax credit to leadership campaigns and nomination races will help encourage more participation in the political process from Albertans.

Other technical amendments included in this bill will ensure that Alberta's tuition and education tax credits are not affected by recent changes in the federal legislation. Mr. Speaker, the federal government also passed several bills this year that amended the federal Income Tax Act that now require . . .

The Speaker: Hon. minister, are you just about there?

[Motion carried; Bill 15 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the requisite five copies of the document by Moody's Investors Service that I referenced in my question today entitled Moody's Highlights Continued Credit Concern for Alberta Despite Anticipated Rebound in Revenue.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to table today an article written by Carmen Wittmeier entitled Playing House: Politicians Cower as the Supreme Court Overrides the Natural Family Order, in which the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party is quoted as saying that the ruling on LGBTQ-plus rights is "one of the most outrageous exercises of raw judicial power in the history of modern democracy."

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the appropriate number of copies of a letter submitted by a pediatrician encouraging the Education minister to establish a provincial policy for the management of type 1 diabetes in Alberta schools.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. During my speech on Bill 11 yesterday I referenced a document from the Canadian Nurses Association that I promised to table. When I went to print off copies of the document, I had trouble accessing the website, so I don't unfortunately have that with me today. As soon as I can access the website, I'll commit to tabling that.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 13 Securities Amendment Act, 2017

The Speaker: The President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to move third reading of Bill 13, the Securities Amendment Act, 2017.

It's been truly touching to hear the stories that were delivered by hon. members during the debate on this bill. The stories of their constituents' experiences are exactly why we brought this legislation forward, Mr. Speaker. I hope that we will start to hear fewer of these types of stories as the bad apples and the wrongdoers are weeded out by the stronger investment protection provided by this bill.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is another example of how this government is working harder to make life better for more Albertans by helping to ensure that their investments are safe through strong and effective enforcement measures. When wrongdoing is suspected, self-regulatory organizations will now have the ability to go after those offenders so that people have more confidence to invest in this great province's vibrant capital market.

We know that the securities regulatory landscape has become more complex, sophisticated, global, and more driven by technology than ever before. The proposed amendments were developed to support Alberta's commitment to ongoing reform by protecting investors and promoting a fair and effective Alberta capital market.

The Alberta Securities Commission is mandated to protect investors and the integrity of our province's capital market. A well-regulated and efficient financial system where investors are protected is essential for investor confidence while allowing for innovation. We must ensure that the securities regulatory system in Alberta not only continues to reflect the realities of current markets but that it is also aligned with international standards and regulatory reform. That's why we have proposed these amendments, to support our ongoing commitment to enhancing investor protection and promoting a fair and effective Alberta capital market.

The Alberta Securities Commission has statutory powers to compel attendance at and the production of evidence during both investigations and hearings. As I've mentioned, self-regulatory organizations such as the Investment Industry Regulatory Organization of Canada, or IIROC, and the Mutual Fund Dealers Association currently do not have this authority during investigations. This bill changes that.

These amendments extend the powers of self-regulatory organizations so that they can compel testimony and the production of evidence during an investigation. Providing these SROs with the same powers as the commission will strengthen their enforcement abilities and improve investor protection in Alberta.

In addition, these changes will extend immunity to the directors, officers, employees, and agencies of SROs from civil liability for the good-faith exercising of regulatory and delegated powers. Mr. Speaker, the people responsible for enforcing securities laws must be able to do their jobs without fear of being held personally liable. Protecting them from liability for carrying out their duties in good faith makes it possible to enforce the rules more effectively.

Finally, amendments to the Lieutenant Governor in Council regulation will ensure that the act is consistent and applies to all parties as intended.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, with these amendments we are ensuring that Alberta's securities regulatory framework reflects the realities of today's market and evolves with international standards and regulatory reforms. Our government is working to make life better for Albertans with practical changes that help strengthen investor protection in this province.

As I have mentioned previously, the amendments before this Chamber in the Securities Amendment Act, 2017, reflect the core principles which guide this government's approach to Alberta's capital market. These core principles are, one, a strong investor protection framework; two, continued market integrity; and finally, ensuring that we have an efficient system for capital formation. Mr. Speaker, I believe that these are the right principles to guide both the government and this legislation when we consider changes to the Securities Act, and the amendments before this House in the Securities Amendment Act, 2017, are in alignment with those very principles.

If members are concerned about investor protection, if members are concerned with the long-term integrity of our capital markets, and if members want to ensure over the long term that we continue to have an efficient system of capital formation, then I strongly urge them to support this bill. This is good legislation, Mr. Speaker. This legislation has the support of industry participants, this legislation has the support of advocacy groups who support investor protections, and of course this legislation is fully supported by the Alberta Securities Commission.

On that note, Mr. Speaker, I'd ask all members of this House to support third reading of this important bill. Thank you very much.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and support third reading of Bill 13, the Securities Amendment Act, 2017. The Alberta Securities Commission is mandated to protect investors and foster a fair and efficient Alberta capital market, as you may have heard me say in the House before when speaking to this bill and previously to a similar bill almost a year ago today.

As you've heard me say in the House – and I've echoed our Finance minister – the securities regulatory landscape has become more complex, sophisticated, global, and more driven by technology than ever before. Throughout the world regulators and legislators have to be nimble and act vigilantly while also allowing for innovation. Regulators and legislators must keep abreast of a landscape that is ever-changing and constantly evolving while at the same time being prepared to update our laws and regulations at regular intervals.

At a previous time when I spoke, I talked about crowd funding, how that's changing the landscape and how it's important for the Alberta Securities Commission to be on top of that and any changes that could potentially happen in terms of how we protect investors as we move forward.

I think it would be beneficial for all members of this Chamber to briefly review where we are and where we've come from over the past few years. Roughly a year ago this government announced that it would stand up for Alberta businesses and investors by backing our provincially led securities regulator to continue overseeing our capital markets rather than deferring this responsibility to a single national agency, and on that we all agree.

We made this decision after taking the time to fully understand the implications of regulatory oversight in our capital markets and the excellent leadership role of our provincial regulator, which has taken on the national stage. I'm proud to say that the Alberta Securities Commission has implemented many different guidelines and policies that have been adopted in other jurisdictions all across the country. For that, we must be proud.

As we made this decision, we set out three goals, the three principles that would guide the approach to our capital markets on a go-forward basis. Those were investor protection, market integrity, and an efficient system of capital formation. We all know that these goals are best achieved when our capital markets operate transparently, when regulatory standards are harmonized, and when we have effective, authoritative oversight.

All members of this House can appreciate that our capital markets are defined by the resource sector. It remains our belief that it only makes sense to have a provincially led securities regulator who understands our province's unique needs. While I'm certain that this government made the right decision to continue with our provincially led regulator, that decision requires this government and this Legislature to regularly keep our laws up to date. The responsibility falls on us, and we will not defer that responsibility to Bay Street or Ottawa.

As members of this House know well, this government has been working consistently with our industry partners to ensure that our capital markets remain well regulated, to provide effective mechanisms through which companies can raise capital, and to ensure that our laws are up to date. Alberta and this Legislature must ensure that our securities regulatory system continues to reflect the realities of current markets and aligns with international standards and regulatory reforms.

To achieve this objective, the government has brought a number of amendments before this House to ensure that our capital markets continue to function effectively. Mr. Speaker, if I'm not mistaken, all of the previous amendments that this government has introduced received the unanimous support of this House.

As a reminder, members of this Chamber have voted in favour of legislation that our minister introduced to do a number of things. Those are to amend the definitions of a derivative, a reporting issuer, and a security; amending the amount of advance notice that a witness must be provided to appear at a Securities Commission hearing; making smart changes to halt-trade provisions; harmonizing provisions related to civil liability; and the list goes on, Mr. Speaker. The important thing here is that we all acknowledge how critical it is to continue updating legislation as required to keep our capital markets strong and that we do so in a fashion in keeping with our three key operating principles.

Mr. Speaker, with that very important context in mind, let me say a few words about the Securities Amendment Act, 2017, and steps this government is taking to continue ensuring that we have strong investor protection, we continue to maintain strong market integrity, and we continue to build the necessary institutional infrastructure to allow for an efficient system of capital formation. Let me also state that the proposed amendments that we have been discussing and that are part of the Securities Amendment Act, 2017, were developed in line with our key operating principles and in co-ordination with our industry partners.

Currently the Alberta Securities Commission has statutory powers to compel attendance at and the production of evidence during both the investigation and the adjudication phases. However, self-regulatory organizations such as the Investment Industry Regulatory Organization of Canada, or IIROC, and the Mutual Fund Dealers Association do not have this authority.

It is the view of this government and the Alberta Securities Commission and the vast majority of market participants that this needs to change. We need to ensure that self-regulatory organizations have the necessary authority to do their work like other self-regulatory organizations in our society. Providing self-regulatory organizations with the same authorities as the commission will strengthen their enforcement abilities and improve investor protection.

Let me be clear. The vast majority of market participants are honest and trustworthy, and they follow the rules. As members of this House know well, trust is integral to the integrity of our capital markets. When a few bad apples take action and swindle investors, trust can quickly erode. When overall trust erodes in our capital markets, it becomes incredibly difficult, if not impossible, to raise capital.

Therefore, the proposed amendments before you with respect to self-regulatory organizations are important for two reasons. First, these changes will help protect individual investors and therefore improve investor protection. Second, and just as importantly, these changes are one step we can take to improve overall trust in the market and therefore help to improve market integrity.

Mr. Speaker, there are many, many more things that I could mention when it comes to the Securities Amendment Act, 2017, but I'm going to provide the opportunity for other members of the government caucus and perhaps even members across the way to speak to it.

With that, I want to encourage all members of this House to stand up and vote in favour of the Securities Amendment Act, 2017. Thank you very much.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to get up today and speak on this act. You know, as the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board made clear in his opening remark, this government has laid out three key principles when it comes to approaching Alberta's capital market. Throughout this debate I have always said that the government is focused on, one, investor protection; two, ensuring market integrity; and three, ensuring that we have an efficient system for capital formation.

I think we can all agree that these are very worthy and laudable goals and should serve as useful guideposts when we consider this bill. I think through Committee of the Whole we spent a lot of time considering the various amendments and statutes. We discussed them at great length, and I think it was quite enjoyable for all of us here. With all of those amendments I always said that we should ask ourselves three main things. Does the legislation serve to enhance consumer protection? I believe that it does. Does the legislation serve to further improve market integrity? I believe that it does as well. Finally, will the changes in this bill continue to ensure that we have an efficient system for capital formation? I believe the answer to all of these questions is yes.

I'm glad we're talking about investor protection. As we talked about and as we were reading through the various, you know, amendments and new investigative powers that would come forward through this bill, I'd think of my grandparents. I think of parents that are saving for their kids, perhaps saving for a disabled child in a registered retirement disability fund. I think of every working Albertan who could have their savings wiped out by scandalous, surreptitious, fraudulent – all the fun words for no-good – investors in the mutual fund market. I think about those because I think that this bill is actually part of our continuing goal to make life better for Albertans, to protect Albertans from the nogoodniks out there in the finance industry.

You know, I think it's just like how we have our support for small business with lowering the small-business tax and how we've brought in our investor tax credits as another way that we are also helping Albertans by helping small businesses, that hire many Albertans.

The opposition has said on many occasions that they will undo everything we have done. The hon. Member for Strathmore-Brooks has mentioned at length that he would wipe all record of us off the face of the Earth. I wonder. Why would they want to undo the good of this bill? Why would they want to undo the protection for those grandparents who are going to an investor, who is supposed to be a professional, and trusting that person to invest their money wisely and, instead, want to get rid of the investigative powers that would allow justice to take its course and protect Albertans from those unscrupulous dealers? I don't think the opposition should do that, and I think they should explain that in their comments to this bill if they choose to speak to it.

You know, with everything that we hear in the newspapers, on TV, on social media, I'm really glad that we are actually taking concrete action to ensure investor protection, Mr. Speaker. In this bill there are proposed changes to authorities and capacities of self-regulatory organizations. Since we do love abbreviations in this bill, they're also known as SROs, like the Mutual Fund Dealers Association, also known as the MFDA, or the Investment Industry Regulatory Organization of Canada, also known as IIROC. For those of you who are car enthusiasts, that was also a fairly excellent Camaro made in the late '80s and early '90s.

Mr. S. Anderson: That's the best abbreviation.

Mr. Malkinson: The best abbreviation.

Mr. S. Anderson: Yeah.

Mr. Malkinson: I believe the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs agrees with me on that one.

These organizations play an important role in our capital markets. These SROs have devolved authority from the Alberta Securities Commission, so it's incumbent on us to make sure that they have the best tools at their disposal to do their job.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The amendments, Madam Speaker, in the SAA, 2017, will also allow the SROs to have the same statutory powers as the ASC, which will improve their enforcement capabilities. Ensuring that SROs can compel attendance and ensure the production of evidence is critically important. It's critically important because it empowers these organizations to fulfill their mandate, which is investor protection. It's the protection of investors, which, we must remember, are everyday, hard-working Albertans throughout this province. When we create laws and rules which empower investors, that's good for capital markets. But when we create a disincentive for wrongdoers, scoundrels, as one could say, to operate in our capital markets, we improve the overall integrity of our capital markets.

Now, Madam Speaker, as we do our final consideration of this bill before us, I think it's worth reflecting on the questions I first raised in my opening, that I've talked about throughout this process, in second reading as well as extensively in Committee of the Whole. We must ask ourselves when we think of this legislation: does this legislation serve to enhance consumer protection? Does this legislation serve to further improve market integrity? Finally, will these changes continue to ensure that we have an efficient system for capital formation?

In my view, the answer to all three of these questions is, of course, yes. I believe that speaks to the thoughtfulness that the hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board and his staff and the government have put into this bill to make sure that we are there protecting consumers.

This is good, smart, and important legislation, Madam Speaker, and I'd like to take a moment before I finish off to thank all members of this House who spoke in support of this piece of legislation in the very fulsome discussion that we had on this very important but perhaps, as some people might think, dry piece of legislation.

Some Hon. Members: No. No.

Mr. Malkinson: I hear cries of no. I mean, it was amazing how great a discussion we had on this particular piece of legislation.

I'd also like to thank my colleague from Edmonton-Ellerslie, who spoke at length on this bill, as well as all other members of the House.

With that, I would like to encourage all members of this Chamber to support these critical amendments and proudly vote yea when we call the vote for third reading of the Securities Amendment Act, 2017.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) allows for five minutes of questions and answers. Does anybody wish to avail themselves of the opportunity?

Seeing none, I'll recognize the next speaker. I believe I have Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Ms McPherson: When you invest your life savings, you want to know that your money is being managed with integrity and skill. Albertans deserve this assurance when they're investing, and governments need to do everything they can to protect investors. Investment and the financial industry are critical to our economy and are an integral part of economic diversification.

In reading up on this bill, I was reminded of the Bre-X case in Calgary in the 1990s. In 1989 the company was listed on the Alberta Stock Exchange at 30 cents a share. Bre-X was a mining company, and they focused their exploration on gold in Quebec and diamonds in the Northwest Territories. Now, it was a slow start for the company, and the founder ended up with $60,000 in credit card debt in an effort to keep the company afloat, and he saw an opportunity in the Busang site in Borneo. Who says this isn't exciting? This is a compelling story.

There were productive gold discoveries on the island, and early exploration showed some evidence of gold in the Busang. Exploration is expensive, and in investigating the case, it appeared that the agents of the company were salting core samples with gold. Busang was billed as the biggest gold deposit in the world.

I remember driving past the Bre-X office on 14th Street in the mid-90s. It was world famous by then and regularly showed up in the news stories. At one point Bre-X was valued at $6 billion on the TSE and Bre-X stock reached a peak of $286 a share, which was a long way up from the opening price of 30 cents. Now, who wouldn't want to invest in the largest gold deposit in the world? Who wouldn't want to be part of a fast-growing company that seemed to have no downside?

Bre-X began to encounter a number of stock-pummelling pitfalls, the most damaging of which was a partnership with the mining company Freeport-McMoRan. This was as a result of the Indonesian government compelling them to go into this partnership. Freeport did some of their own drilling tests, and they did not get the same results that Bre-X had been reporting.

Next, the Indonesian government reported that the Busang probably wasn't a gold-producing site, and there were other independent tests that confirmed that what was being reported wasn't right, that there wasn't the world's biggest gold deposit in the Busang, that indeed there wasn't likely any gold in the Busang.

Bre-X stocks fell, the company folded, and investors lost $3 billion. Many people lost their life savings as a result of this spectacular fraud. Their lives were devastated. About the only good thing about this story is that it was adapted by Hollywood for a screenplay and movie that was loosely based on the story. It was kind of an okay movie.

This story illustrates the need for good regulation to protect investors from fraud. Albertans and industry both benefit when regulators have the tools they need to ferret out the bad actors. Regulation of the financial industry is spread across regulatory organizations much the same as it is in other provinces. This bill would strengthen the abilities of self-regulatory organizations by granting them the authority to compel attendance and to produce evidence. That means that it puts some teeth into legislation for them to make people show up as well as to produce evidence and to be able to implement consequences if they don't.

I was happy to learn about the level of consultation with stakeholders, including the Canadian Association of Retired Persons, who shared a number of stories of the devastation people have experienced when they've been bilked out of their money.

I support this bill for two reasons, Madam Speaker. First, protection of investors' money is a huge responsibility, and it's addressed well in this bill. Second, a robust, well-regulated capital market is integral to our economy now and into the future, and our citizens and business community depend on it. I encourage all members of the Assembly to support this bill as well.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to listen to my fellow Calgary colleague from Mackay-Nose Hill. You know, she spoke, actually, about a very interesting case in our history, the Bre-X scandal. I often remember my father, who was an accountant, talking about the Bre-X scandal. He, of course, became an accountant starting off in the '80s there, and he remembers the excesses of the '80s. I mean, most people think of that as sort of your Gordon Gekko, Wall Street type scenario. He spoke of Bre-X. That was a very big scandal in Canadian history, and I think the hon. member brought up a great point. It's a very perfect example of how when people are bilked out of their money, it has a very big impact on their finances. Oftentimes people think in these losses that it's just large investors or very wealthy individuals. But it also is regular, everyday Albertans. The hon. member went on talking about specifically a quote there – I believe it was from the retired people's organization – you know, talking about how this is very important to their members.

My question for the hon. member, if she would like to elaborate a little bit more, is thinking of: what would be the negative effects if somebody was to be bilked out of their investments, perhaps, if there wasn't this strong, investigative power that's in this bill? What effect might that have on those regular, everyday Albertans, and how would this bill perhaps protect them and perhaps make life better for them, Madam Speaker?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thanks for the question. I think anyone who's nearing retirement age is looking for ways to maximize their return and minimize the risk, so they rely on investment advisers to advise them as to the smart places to put their money. Without a strong regulatory framework to prevent nefarious activity – there's always going to be risk involved in investing, but you can mitigate that risk to a certain degree by using someone who's experienced, very well qualified.

But if you happen to connect with someone who isn't well qualified, it could be absolutely devastating for someone's retirement. If you're nearing retirement age and you lose your life savings – I can't imagine the psychological damage that would do to somebody, to have a future that was fairly sure all of a sudden become a future that's completely unsure and to not know how they're going to pay for things, where they're going to live and what they're going to eat, at a time in their lives when they may not be able to work as much or for as much money as they worked for before. Yeah, I can see that that would be an absolutely devastating experience for anyone.

I hope that answers the question.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other speakers to the bill? Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to have the opportunity today to rise and speak to Bill 13, the Securities Amendment Act, 2017. Admittedly, I would say that I tend to be much more of a words guy than a numbers guy. I did well in math in high school, certainly, but I've always been one to gravitate more towards words, English, that sort of thing, and away from sort of the numbers side of things. I did manage to get by in terms of budgeting and taking care of my own personal finances. For many years I operated as a musician, as a sole proprietor and as a studio engineer, so I had to do some budgeting and that sort of thing, but it wasn't a line of work that left a significant amount of money for investment, admittedly.

It took a little while before I did sort of decide that I was going to move on. I decided that I was going to go back to school. I had the opportunity to work in a number of positions where I began to accumulate a bit of a pension. Once I had that in place and then decided that I was going to move on from my work in a couple of those positions with the federal government and with the provincial government, then I found myself with sort of a large chunk of money that needed to be invested.

In 2015, actually, shortly after my opportunity to be in this House as the representative for Edmonton-Centre, I hired my first financial adviser. Certainly, it was helpful to be able to go through and sort of talk with friends and sort of get some good recommendations and find out who other people had worked with. I was able to sit down and have a very good meeting with a gentleman who I've now been able to sort of trust with my finances and to set up those investments for me.

It's reassuring, you know, to know that I have somebody who has that expertise, much the same as if I wanted to hire someone to renovate my home or fix my car or any of these other things which, I suppose, I could probably learn how to do myself if I had the time. But as I'm sure you're well aware, Madam Speaker, this is not a job that lends itself to a lot of free time for any of us in this House. Certainly, I appreciate the opportunity to avail myself of expertise to handle some of these aspects of life for which I don't have the time to dedicate myself.

I think that that's true, probably, for many Albertans. Certainly, I have some friends who I know have spent a good deal of time educating themselves about investment and securities and the different options that they have, and they personally enjoy doing some of that in their free time and doing some investment on their own. But I think there are many Albertans who require that sort of advice, require that sort of expertise and, as many have noted in speaking about this bill, who are, in fact, very dependent in a very important aspect of their lives, indeed, their financial future, their ability to retire, placing it in the hands of someone else and trusting that they are going to have their best interests in mind.

Certainly, Madam Speaker, this is in line with the other work that our government has chosen to do in terms of trying to make life better for Albertans. Shortly after our election, of course, we had our bill that we put through to tighten regulations on payday loans. I'll say that it's been incredibly encouraging to hear that that has begun, in fact, to have an impact and that we are seeing people being able to turn to other financial options, that we are seeing reductions in the number of people that are caught up in the cycle of debt through that. We, of course, banned door-to-door energy sales. We have the bill that is before us now introducing new licensing for home builders.

Madam Speaker, this is all part of work that we are trying to do to ensure that Albertans can rest assured that when they are acting as consumers, they can trust that they are protected. They can trust that they have a mechanism by which they can get redress if they are wronged or indeed they are taken advantage of. So I really appreciate the work that our ministers have been doing on this, and I appreciate that the Minister of Finance has brought forward this bill now to ensure that the same will be true of investment and securities.

Now, of course, the securities regulatory landscape in Canada has been becoming increasingly complex. It's much more sophisticated. It's involved at a much more international and global scale than it has been in the past. Of course, as the complexity grows, so grows the need for more expertise and also so grows the opportunity for people to take advantage of that complexity, to take advantage for themselves and to take advantage of other people. Certainly, since the 2007 financial crisis we recognize that it's become even more difficult to sustain quality capital markets.

The challenge that we faced here in Alberta, then, was how we would deliver the right regulations to support investor confidence and still help to encourage investment, innovation, and economic growth here in Alberta and, of course, across Canada. The important thing is that we ensure that our securities regulatory system reflects the realities of today's markets and stays in step with evolving international standards and global regulatory reform initiatives and indeed the growth of technology because as technology grows and new opportunities make themselves available, then we need to find ways that we can work these things in as well.

This bill, of course, provides, then, that regulatory organizations have the same enforcement authority as the Alberta Securities Commission and gives those regulatory organizations the ability, as some have noted, to compel attendance and production of evidence so that they're better able to do their jobs and protect Alberta investors. It also offers at the same time protection from liability for the people who will investigate these cases when carrying out their duties in good faith.

Now, of course, Madam Speaker, it's incredibly important that we do everything we can to protect investors against the very few – and, of course, as many have noted, it is indeed few. We have many who work in our financial industries here in the province who have nothing but the best interests of the people that they serve in mind. What we are focused on here, as we have been with so many of these other bills which I spoke of which are looking to protect consumers, is identifying and eliminating those few bad apples who would spoil the bunch. So we must do everything we can to protect investors against those few people in the system who would take advantage.

We recognize that we have strong organizations in Alberta. We have the Alberta Securities Commission. They're mandated to protect investors and foster a fair and efficient Alberta capital market. Of course, that commission has some statutory powers already. They can compel attendance, as I mentioned, and the production of evidence during both the investigation and adjudication phases. However, there are also self-regulatory organizations like the Investment Industry Regulatory Organization of Canada and the Mutual Fund Dealers Association who don't have that authority. The proposed changes will now give those organizations that same authority as the commission's. That's going to strengthen their abilities now to enforce and to improve investor protection amongst those that they serve and for those that they represent.

Now, of course, in most provinces across Canada provincial governments have delegated certain aspects of this authority to these sorts of regulatory organizations, providing much more efficient and effective regulation. That's something, of course, that then provides better protection for investors, and that's something that's essential if we want to have confidence in our markets. We recognize that confidence in the market is something that is essential for those markets to do well and to prosper. We recognize also, at the same time, Madam Speaker, that both in Canada and globally speaking, those markets are in fact changing. So here in Alberta we have to ensure that our system is going to align with these new international standards and the types of regulatory reforms that we're seeing in other provinces and, of course, around the world.

Another thing that these proposed amendments will do is to extend immunity to the directors, the officers, the employees, and agents of these regulatory bodies. Those amendments, therefore, will also clarify the conditions under which that immunity is granted to those organizations, which will make it possible, then, for those organizations to be able to conduct their enforcement more effectively, without having to be concerned about being found liable when they are trying to simply do work on behalf of the people of Alberta.

Now, of course, some of these proposed changes are just sort of housekeeping, just to ensure some clarity, better compliance with Alberta securities laws. We certainly heard from members in this House about the need to reduce red tape, to make things more efficient and to help government operate more efficiently, so there are some portions of this bill which are dedicated specifically to that as well. I certainly commend the minister for identifying those challenges and ensuring that those are corrected and modified to better serve Albertans.

Now, as the government was preparing these amendments, of course, there was some good consultation. Again I recognize the minister. He certainly has worked to consult on much of the work that he's done here. He certainly did a fulsome consultation before the last budget, touring across the province to speak with many Albertans about their concerns and thoughts.

Likewise, on this bill he ensured that there was consultation with the Alberta Securities Commission, the Investment Industry Regulatory Organization of Canada, good conversations with them to help draft these common-sense amendments, which, due to that consultation and support, have been recognized also by the Canadian Association of Retired Persons, which recognizes the value of having these protections in place for those they represent. Of course, Madam Speaker, that's somewhere that we all shall one day go, finding ourselves in that position of being retired, and certainly we want to be assured that we have the protections that we need in place to ensure that we will be able to retire with comfort and dignity and with good financial standing.

With that, I think that's more or less the end of my remarks. I certainly appreciate having heard from many of my colleagues, the other members, about the concerns, the issues that they've heard from their constituents and how these protections are going to help them. I look forward to hearing from a few others.

I thank you for the opportunity to speak in support of this bill.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'd really like to, you know, thank the Member for Edmonton-Centre for bringing forward his comments. I think that right at the beginning, where he was talking about how perhaps words were very much his forte in school and most definitely still are for those of us who, of course, intently listened to the hon. member in this House – but he was fine at math, too. I think that speaks to a good part of this bill. Like, when we think of the people we're protecting, we are not thinking that we are necessarily – people who get duped by these perhaps unscrupulous investors are citizens of Alberta who are, in fact, decently financially literate. Just like the hon. member said, these citizens rely on the expertise of professionals when they are making their investment decisions, whether it be as part of a business or for their own personal savings, and this act goes to creating some very large disincentives for those wrongdoers.

He went on to talk about, you know, that average citizens rely on those experts in the same way as if you're driving down the street and the battery light comes on in your car. If you've done a little bit of searching on the Internet, you know that it's probably your alternator or battery. Although both of those would be fairly easy to fix in one's driveway with a basic set of tools, perhaps that is not your forte, and you would rely on the expertise of your local mechanic. That local mechanic, of course, would very much appreciate the . . .

An Hon. Member: IROC-Z.

Mr. Malkinson: The IROC-Z, as the member said.

. . . IROC, the acronym as it relates to the Investment Industry Regulatory Organization of Canada.

That mechanic would also know another car-related reference, a Gremlin, which would be a great way to describe those bad actors in our investment community that we are trying to disincentivize here.

Trust, you know, is something that we require, that citizens expect from those financial advisers. This consumer perception is something that I think has long been ignored in Alberta. I mean, I remember reading an article – and I don't quite remember the name of it – that I think is quite relevant to the situation. It actually was talking about our hon. Minister of Treasury Board and Finance talking about how we in this government had been going after perceived deficiencies in consumer protection. The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre I think talked about some of them being, I believe, payday loans. I'm going to ask him here in a moment to sort of elaborate on some of that.

It mostly reminds me of when we were in the election debate. We got asked the question: what, at the end of the day, is that final message? The thing that I always said, compared to the people I was running against, was: at the end of the day, I view the world through the lens of what is most helpful to everyday Albertans. I believe that this act is supportive of that.

With that, I would just ask the hon. member if he would like to comment a little bit further, perhaps, on how this bill would be helpful to those who are self-employed. Thank you very much.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Calgary-Currie for his comments and thoughts on this as well. I've certainly appreciated what he's had to say on this bill and his support as a cosponsor.

Certainly, as he said, you know, we need to always be thinking about what's going to be best for Albertans. How can we best ensure that they have the protections? Certainly, for myself here in Edmonton-Centre, I represent a respectable number of seniors. There are a number of seniors' residences. During our constituency week I was out on my sort of twice-a-year tour of seniors' residences here in Edmonton-Centre. I believe that during that week there were about eight or nine that we visited, and that still left at least another half-dozen that we had yet to visit, so certainly quite a few, and then, of course, a number of seniors live independently in their own homes and condominiums, et cetera.

Certainly, we are aware that seniors can be a vulnerable population, particularly for people in the financial industry, as they're looking to, again, ensure their comfort and their security in their retirement years or as they're looking out for their children, ensuring that they're leaving something behind to help them as well. I'm very happy to see that this bill is offering protection in that respect.

That has been noted by Ms Wanda Morris, the vice-president of advocacy with the Canadian Association of Retired Persons. She said:

I've heard too many heart-wrenching stories of individuals who lost their life savings because they trusted the wrong person: an unscrupulous financial advisor. [These] changes will help hold wrongdoers to account. We welcome today's announcement as a critical step in bringing rule-breakers to justice and deterring wrongdoing, thus better protecting investors in this province. We look forward to additional, practical steps like this from the Government of Alberta.

Indeed, I appreciate what the Member for Calgary-Currie was noting about this and the protections it does provide for Albertans, that extra security that we have now in knowing of that expertise that each of us is able to access when we need to avail ourselves of it to plan for our financial future. We have that much more security, that much more protection, and the ability to seek redress when necessary should we encounter one of the few people that abuse this bill.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other hon. member wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Northern Hills.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise this afternoon to speak to Bill 13, Securities Amendment Act, 2017. I followed this debate with great interest from the beginning, and I think that we've struck the right balance with this bill. The public needs to have the confidence in our financial system and needs to have the trust in investment dealers, advisers, and their representatives when they invest their money. The organizations that regulate the investment industry need the capability to regulate effectively. The amendments in this bill will give regulatory organizations the ability to compel attendance and production of evidence so that they are able to do their jobs and protect investors; secondly, provide regulatory organizations the same enforcement authorities as the Alberta Securities Commission; and finally, protect the people who investigate these cases from liability when carrying out their duties in good faith.

Madam Speaker, I'm confident that with the proposed legislation investors would be protected. It would recognize the work of many qualified and hard-working financial advisers in this province. This government has made a commitment to ongoing reform by modernizing and harmonizing the securities laws in Canada. This is becoming increasingly necessary because Canadian and international markets are changing fast. In Alberta we must ensure that our securities regulatory systems align with international standards and regulatory reforms. This bill will ensure that the amendments proposed will extend immunity to the officers, directors, employees, and the agents of these regulatory bodies. The proposed amendments will clarify the conditions under which immunity is granted to these organizations, which will make it possible for these organizations to conduct their enforcement more effectively.

Madam Speaker, as the government prepared these amendments, they consulted with the investment industry. The Alberta Securities Commission and the Investment Industry Regulatory Organization of Canada were both engaged with the development of these changes. Just to quote Stan Magidson, the chair and CEO of the Alberta Securities Commission, "Strong investor protection is a critical component of our mandate, and we support meaningful and practical regulatory advances such as this that can have a real impact on protecting Albertans from financial misconduct."

Again, Madam Speaker, strengthening the enforcement powers of regulatory organizations is in the best interests of Albertans, the best interests of our investors, and it is in the best interests of our financial markets. I'll be supporting this bill at third reading, and I hope that many members of this Legislature will join me and do the same.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other speakers to the bill? Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just wanted to add a few more remarks to comments that I made earlier about this piece of legislation, this proposed bill to protect Albertans in the investment field in the province. I know that as a government we are very concerned about improving the financial literacy of our province, and that's certainly one education piece that we will be pursuing by other measures. Hopefully, with the review of the education curriculum that's ongoing, that will be considered there.

Even given financial literacy and the sophistication of some investors in our province, investing is a very complex field. Even the most sophisticated investors perhaps will rely upon the evidence or the advice of professionals in the field more so than anybody else. It's important that the rules governing those who give that advice are updated regularly and go a long way to making sure that unscrupulous people don't involve themselves in the field.

I know that as a real estate agent, for example, I've had individuals who were perhaps helping their kids out, individuals who were professionals in their own right wanting to make sure that they provided a down payment for them for a house, yet when I found out where those funds were invested over a long period of time to help those family members purchase their home, I discovered that they had been told to invest them in unsheltered investments, which might have had a higher rate of return. However, had they been invested in a registered home ownership savings plan, those investments, those funds, could have been withdrawn and stayed within a tax-sheltered investment and repaid over a period of 15 years without losing the tax advantage of having them sheltered in the RHOSP.

Specific examples like that tell me that even sophisticated investors require the confidence that those people who are in the field are guided and governed by legislation which insists that they follow the proper training, legislation which makes sure that individuals who are in the field of providing investment advice know what they're doing and that there is oversight in ensuring that they provide the advice that serves the best interests of their clients.

With that, I'll conclude my comments.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any further speakers to the bill?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[Motion carried; Bill 13 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 14

An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise to move second reading of Bill 14, An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation.

The cleanup of orphan oil and gas sites is a matter of concern for many Albertans. It's certainly a concern when I go home, and I'm sure many of my rural colleagues on all sides of the House hear the same thing. This includes people like farmers, rural officials, environmentalists, those involved in the oil and gas industry, indigenous people, and, of course, all of us here in this House. Sometimes the operators of these sites might not exist anymore. They might have gone bankrupt or are no longer in the business. We've always followed a polluter-pay principle here in our province, and that includes operators' responsibilities to deal with this concern. The expectation is that if you as a company go onto the land to get at the oil and gas, you will also clean up the site when you are done. Usually this is what happens but not always.

When the company that took the oil and gas out of the ground no longer exists, these wells are called orphan wells. Albertans have recently seen the worst economic downturn in over a generation, and the orphanage is full of sites without an operator to take care of them. This is why we have the industry-funded Orphan Well Association. This association is delegated the hard work of closing and reclaiming infrastructure from companies that no longer exist. Oil and gas companies that operate in Alberta pay into the orphan fund through a levy. This fiscal year the levy provides $30 million to the Orphan Well Association to do this work. With this money they are able to close around a couple of hundred wells a year on average, but with the recent economic downturn the number of orphan wells increased faster than at any time in the OWA's history, faster than the system was able to keep up with.

This presented us with the challenge of how to tackle this issue. Our government has made the argument repeatedly to our federal counterparts that Canada's economic health is intrinsically bound to the health of Alberta's energy economy. A few weeks ago the government of Canada responded to our call with a commitment of $30 million in the federal budget. This money is to be put towards supporting provincial actions that will stimulate economic activity and employment in Alberta's resource sector, and that is exactly what we are doing, Madam Speaker.

The government of Alberta is finalizing plans to assist the Orphan Well Association in the best way possible using that $30 million. Right now the OWA is unable to use the orphan fund to do anything other than pay for the suspension, abandonment, and reclamation costs for orphan wells and sites. The law is also not clear as to whether the OWA could accept a loan to address the rapid increases in orphan sites that it has to deal with.

As the hon. members can see in the legislation, amendments are required to the Oil and Gas Conservation Act to enable a loan as well as to repay a loan. Our goal is to find a way to accelerate the good work the OWA is already doing while creating more jobs in the oil field and environmental sectors, thereby keeping skilled workers here in the province that we will need as the energy sector rebounds, and we need to do it in a way that protects the polluter-pay principle and in a way that does not disrupt the OWA's current industry-funded annual program.

This legislation, Madam Speaker, will give the Orphan Well Association the tools it needs, tools that make business sense, and enable the OWA to achieve its mandate and reach these goals. We intend to work with the OWA to develop a plan for how additional dollars could be used. Details of how a program might look, things like dollar amounts, benefits to Albertans, and how it will work, will be made available very soon. No matter what, we will ensure that the OWA's annual program will continue to be funded by industry and will continue to use a risk-based approach for determining which orphan sites to prioritize and to protect Albertans. Most importantly, the polluter-pay principle and industry's responsibility for this issue will be maintained.

Madam Speaker, it is also important to point out that these legislative changes are only one small piece of the puzzle. Our government is dealing with the larger issue of old oil and gas infrastructure. For far too long the entire system for how we manage liabilities associated with the old oil and gas sites has not kept up with the challenging realities. Action is needed, so we are examining the entire system from top to bottom. This work is under way. We are talking with stakeholders to get their views on the issue and what can be done about it. That engagement started earlier this month and will continue for a number of weeks. I'm pleased to report that the early sessions have attracted a good turnout from a broad range of stakeholders, and the people's contributions have been thoughtful and they have been constructive.

Once government has collected these views, we will develop options for consideration. In working with industry, landowners, indigenous communities, and other stakeholders, we will develop a responsible plan to make lasting improvements to the system. That is the story for another day, though. Today we are here to discuss the need to take swifter action now to address the growing number of orphan wells.

I'm sure that keeping skilled oil field workers in Alberta and cleaning up more oil and gas sites is something that all members of this House can agree is a good thing for all Albertans, and for that reason, Madam Speaker, I am hopeful we can count on everyone's support.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Stony Plain.

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's important in any conversation to be clear about what we mean when we use certain terms, and that is particularly true in any debate over orphan wells. Too often people use terms like "abandoned" and "orphan" interchangeably when they don't really mean the same thing. An abandoned well is a well that is no longer needed to support oil and gas development and is permanently decommissioned, meaning that the well is plugged, cut, and capped and is left in a safe condition. In other words, the term "abandoned well" refers to the stage in the closure process that the well is in.

In contrast, an orphan well is a well, facility, or pipeline where the licensee is unable or unwilling to pay the required closure processes. Usually this happens because the licensee has gone bankrupt, and there is no one else who is able to take on the responsibility for the cleanup.

Remediation and reclamation are the final two stages of the closure process. Remediation refers to cleaning up any contamination that may be present at a site, and reclamation is the process of replacing the soil and vegetation to return the site to an approximation of its original state. The idea is that theoretically the site can be used for farming or whatever activities originally took place on that land before a well was drilled there. Wells that are no longer used for production but are not properly abandoned pose an environmental concern. These wells can become pathways for salt water and other contaminants that pollute groundwater and soil.

Madam Speaker, since oil drilling activities began here in Alberta, there have been approximately 558,000 wells drilled. Just over half of those wells, 285,000, are still deemed to be operational today, just over 100,000 of those wells are suspended, meaning that they are not currently active, and 81,000 nonoperational wells have been reclaimed and remediated. That leaves about 87,000 abandoned wells needing reclamation and remediation.

The Orphan Well Association has just a portion of those sites in its inventory. As of March 2017 they held 2,084 orphan wells that still need to go through closure activities, an additional 1,088 sites that require suspension, and 1,766 pipeline segments.

Orphan wells could pose financial and environmental liabilities for the people of Alberta. According to the Orphan Well Association the abandonment of orphan wells can cost anywhere from $12,000 to $700,000. The cost depends on the extent of contamination. In addition to removing tubing, zonal abandon, and surface abandon, which are required for every single well, many orphan wells require groundwater protection and casing leak repairs. Many historical orphan well sites require regular monitoring and maintenance. Madam Speaker, that's a lot of work.

But we didn't get here just over the course of this economic downturn. No, it's a problem that's been building up over a good number of years, and it's a problem that was neglected for far too long. Now, Madam Speaker, we have thousands and thousands of sites across the province that require urgent attention.

As I'm sure you know, Madam Speaker, the Peace River well is Alberta's most infamous orphan well. The well was drilled in 1916 by Peace River oils. That company did not find any oil. Instead, it tapped into a high-pressure aquifer flowing through a layer of highly unstable sand and gravel. Since 1916 enough salt water flowed out of the well and into the Peace River each day to fill an Olympic-sized swimming pool.

Though the Peace River oils company attempted to control the well several times, after the flow of water blew out a crater around the old cable tool rig and swallowed the derrick, the company lost interest in the well. In 1954, after the salt water had been flowing into the Peace River for nearly 37 years, the Energy Resources Conservation Board attempted to cap the well by drilling a relief well and closing it off with cement. Their efforts, however, were in vain. The board concluded that it lacked the technology to properly abandon the well, and 3,000 cubic feet of salt water continued to flow into the Peace River each day.

In 1988, after the well had collapsed into a crater, it was discovered that the salt water was contaminated with sour gas and toxic hydrogen sulphide. A burn tray was installed, but only some of the sour gas could be ignited and flared off. Most of the sour gas continued to dissolve in the salt water and flow into the Peace River. Through an assessment of the well it concluded that it had little impact on the Peace River as it was only .003 per cent of the river's flow.

In 2001 Environment Canada ordered the EUB to abandon the well. It was unclear, however, who was to pay for the cleanup as the original operator of the well, the Peace River oils company, was no longer in business. After the well was abandoned by its original operators, it became the property of the federal and then provincial governments. The responsibility fell on the Orphan Well Association. Throughout the years the EUB had spent over $968,000 monitoring and maintaining that well site. In 2003 the Orphan Well Association spent over $5 million to abandon the Peace River well. As the amount was over half of the association's annual budget, the Orphan Well Association requested that the orphan levy be collected twice in 2003 to cover the association's unusually large expenditure for the year.

Madam Speaker, that is just one story of the thousands of wells here in Alberta that are left abandoned and/or orphaned, but, you know, there's another side to this. We also have a huge number of skilled oil field service workers ready and willing to do the important work that's needed here, and it's important that we get as many of them working as possible. We will need their unique skill sets for the upcoming economic recovery, but if we want them to be available to work, we need to keep them occupied in their chosen profession. The estimate is that this will incent about 1,650 jobs, approximately 550 jobs per year, direct and indirect.

The president and CEO of PSAC, Mark Salkeld, says:

While we absolutely agree well decommissioning is the responsibility of the licensee (generally [exploration and production] companies), economic circumstances and steadily increasing costs due to ever-improving regulations are causing this work to be delayed or postponed and regular activity has almost come to a standstill due to our economic times.

Well decommissioning will help keep the expertise and intellectual capital that we have worked so hard to find and develop in Alberta so we're prepared when the turnaround comes.

He goes on to say, Madam Speaker, that they believe it is in the interests of all stakeholders to accelerate well decommissioning activity especially during this challenging and possibly prolonged economic downturn and the federal and provincial governments are looking for infrastructure investments that will help stimulate the economy. Helping to address this issue positively impacts the industry, the economy, employment, the environment and the quality of life for all Albertans by:

- Providing much-needed jobs for oilfield services workers and keeping companies afloat;
- Providing infrastructure investment opportunity for federal government to boost the economy;
- Reducing the impact of the program costs through income taxes and fuel taxes as this type of work is labour and fuel intensive;
- Enhancing the oil and gas industry's reputation as a leader in environmental protection: preventing greenhouse gas emissions including methane and remediating environmental impacts from well operations.

Madam Speaker, the Orphan Well Association is an organization funded by the upstream oil and gas companies through the orphan fund levy. It has an independent board of directors with representation from the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers, or CAPP, and the Explorers and Producers Association of Canada, EPAC, as well as one voting representative from the provincial government. We have to remember that the OWA has done a lot of good work over the years. They have decommissioned over 1,100 orphan wells, and they have reclaimed another 700 orphan wells. They've also taken on projects that would normally be outside their scope. To name another example, there was a well drilled in the 1980s to supply gas to a building in downtown Medicine Hat. It's known as the American Hotel site. The OWA took on the job of reclaiming this site due to the risk to public safety, and indeed public safety underpins everything they do. The OWA uses a risk-based approach to decide which wells will be cleaned up next.

But, Madam Speaker, it's not enough. We need to do more to reduce this huge inventory of sites that need abandonment, reclamation, and remediation. I hear about it all the time from my constituents in Stony Plain, and I'm sure my colleagues in this Assembly hear the same thing.

Madam Speaker, I would urge every member of this Assembly to please support Bill 14 as we move it through the House. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to this bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to Bill 14, An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation. I just kind of want to make something clear. There seems to be a perception that orphan wells are the result of a government policy. Today we're seeing many more orphan wells because of the downturn in oil prices, which has caused companies to either go bankrupt or to have to abandon the well site, so that is part of the issue. There does need to be a mechanism to be able to clean this up.

As I understand it, the purpose of this bill is tied up with the $30 million that the federal government is advancing to the province, money that was intended to help with the additional cleanup of orphan wells, which is a good thing. While I would have preferred to see a more substantial commitment, it's encouraging to see that the federal government is making some attempt to help with the issue of orphan wells. Extra money for orphan wells should also result in increased economic activity. As we know, there are crews out there with the appropriate skills to clean up these well sites, and they're eager to get started.

But I have to admit that I have some questions about the specifics of the bill. Firstly, what was the rationale behind giving the government the ability to loan money to the Orphan Well Association? I'm unsure why that would be a requirement to be able to allow this money to flow through from the federal government. I realize that we need some sort of mechanism to direct that money from the federal government to the OWA, but enabling them to accept and repay loans from this government seems an odd way to do that. Perhaps a cabinet member or a member of the government caucus could provide some explanation as to: why these specific amendments, which would allow for borrowing, and why was this the best way to do this?

The other question this raises is how it's going to affect the decision process for the OWA. I believe that the OWA has done some very good work on reclaiming wells, and there's no doubt that they have the expertise to address this issue. But I worry that if they're receiving money from the government under the loan model, perhaps the government will have the ability or some control over the process and the association and what wells get cleaned up. We want to see these wells reclaimed safely, with the least damage to the environment. The government might believe that their interference is going to be beneficial for this organization. I believe this is one of those situations where we have to let the experts guide our efforts, get that $30 million to the Orphan Well Association, and let them do what they're best at. I hope we'll hear some assurances that this loan isn't being used to influence the direction of the OWA.

Other than those concerns and possibly some concerns as we hear more details about the plans for the $30 million of federal money, I'm cautiously optimistic about this bill. I hope this means that we can move ahead in getting some crews out in the field working on these orphan wells.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thanks. Sounds great. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Mr. S. Anderson: It does sound great.

Mrs. Littlewood: It does sound great. I'm very excited about this piece of legislation because it is going to help support companies, put people back out into the fields to work on well reclamation and remediation.

I'm just going to go back to the start of this, first, and just remind everyone that I'm talking about Bill 14, An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation. It's a great bill that discusses some issues that have been quite paramount in my constituency of Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville. I know that we've had ongoing issues with wells that have not been remediated and wells that have been left to be taken on by the Orphan Well Association because of a lack of resources to pay leases, with landowners and companies that have also gone bankrupt.

I just want to go back to some terms of what exactly we're talking about when we're using certain phrases. Learning more about this, I realize how important it is to make sure that we're using the right words to refer to the right wells. An abandoned well is a well that is no longer supporting oil and gas development and that has been permanently decommissioned, meaning that the well has been plugged, cut, and capped and has been left in a safe condition.

I know that trying to answer questions about that by going online to the Alberta Energy Regulator has been quite difficult. If anyone has gone online to see how many regulations there are, it is quite hard to find answers for yourself that are clear because there is an amazing amount of information. I try to go to the very wonderful staff to help me in those endeavours because when you are looking for the different ways that they're capped, the different ways that they're remediated, you quickly see that there are far more definitions to talk about a well being reclaimed than only abandoned.

The term "abandoned well" is referring to that stage in the closure process that the well is in. Contrasting that, an orphan well is a well or facility or pipeline where the licensee is unable or unwilling to pay for the required closure processes. Sometimes a licensee has gone bankrupt. They've gone through the process of trying to find out if there is anyone that is ultimately responsible for that well, and after much due process it is found that no one has responsibility for it anymore, and it has become the responsibility of the Orphan Well Association.

Remediation and reclamation are the last two stages of the process. Remediation refers to cleaning up any contamination that may be present at the site, and reclamation is the process of replacing the soil and vegetation to return the site to an approximation of its original state. This is something that is incredibly important to farm owners and landowners. It can get in the way of just trying to do the common work of seeding or spraying or, you know, making sure that they don't have weed infestations that take over their lawn just because they can't come within a certain distance and be able to get their headers over a well. Actually, this weekend I will be visiting a farm where they have this ongoing problem.

Unfortunately, when the company goes bankrupt and they are having to do something like spray and the process has not gotten to the end to find out who was ultimately responsible for it, the landowner doesn't actually have the legal ability, because of liability issues, to be able to spray where the well is. So it can be very dangerous for those farmers sometimes, and they get very frustrated. They're just trying to make a living for themselves and their family, and they have these processes that get in the way of them just trying to take care of their land.

A bit of a recap, also, is that there have been over half a million wells drilled in Alberta in the last almost a century, and just over half of those wells, 285,000, are still operational today. Just over a hundred thousand of those wells are suspended, meaning that they're not currently active, and 81,000 are nonoperational wells that have been reclaimed and remediated. That's why we see these articles in the newspaper about 87,000 abandoned wells that need reclamation and remediation. We know that it has been a growing problem, with a drop in commodity prices world-wide. It has meant that the expenses to be able to draw resources out of the ground have become a losing proposition for some of these companies, so continuing to draw resources at a cost to them has become just that, a losing game.

Right now, as of March 2017, there are 2,084 orphan wells that will need to go through closure activities, including 1,088 sites that require suspension, 1,766 that are pipeline segments. Madam Speaker, it's a lot of work, but I know that with a lot of people that have become unemployed in this downturn in oil and gas, we have the expertise and the manpower and the companies that are looking at this as being a good way to manage responsible development, manage unemployment, and manage the environment. It's a lot of work, but I think that it's a good opportunity to be able to do some of that.

The number has been building up, and unfortunately the legislation that's currently in place was not built to address what would happen in the next downturn, and that's unfortunately where we are. It's time to look at how we fix these things going forward. This is one of the reasons why the government has announced that there will be a legal liability review I think it's referred to as, a liability management review, so that whatever actions the government takes to reduce the current inventory of orphan wells around the province, we will have a better approach that will make sure that we address the liability of these sites going forward.

In many cases, Madam Speaker, the question of liability for closure costs arises when an operator is getting ready to shut down a well, and by that point in time it may in fact already be too late. The operator in question could be running out of money and may be unable to afford the costs of abandonment, remediation, and reclamation. I know that in talking with people that have been doing this work, there's a wide expanse of costs that can be incurred to do this. It could cost in the tens of thousands of dollars, and for very complex remediations it could cost upwards of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Madam Speaker, too often the burden of that liability is borne by others in the industry, through the Orphan Well Association. In many cases landowners are bearing a lot of this brunt as well, and I know that there are many stakeholders that are being engaged in this process, including the freehold mineral rights holders, that are worried about the potential liability for themselves and their families going forward.

Madam Speaker, the whole system really does need a thorough review, and I'm really glad to see that the provincial government and our Energy minister have moved forward and will be doing that. On May 10 our province announced that they'll be working with industry and experts to find better ways to protect Alberta and the environment by improving policies for managing old oil and gas facilities. I'm very pleased to say that this liability management review will go through a thorough consultation process and review, and I know that people on this side of the House really do believe that the best solutions are found when you engage people that don't necessarily agree around the table.

I know that I was just having lunch, actually, with a couple of friends this afternoon, and my friend Rick said that his mom always said that there were three sides to every story. I said: oh, there must have been three children in the family, then. He laughed because, apparently, I hit the nail on the head.

People are really wanting the government to move forward on this. These pumpjacks and wells create quite a sight on the landscape when you drive through rural Alberta, and we want to make sure that landowners are not being adversely impacted after the point at which they can't get economic benefit from that well anymore. I've had multiple people come into my office and call me because they haven't been paid in three years, and they're starting to deal with people that are coming onto their property to take assets away. I know of a farmer that is on the east end of my constituency where, apparently, the county, actually, engaged with a contractor that went onto his property and took the assets, but in taking those assets, actually took the farmer's own assets as well, mistakenly.

You know, understandably, the counties and municipalities have been very stressed in the downturn because things like linear assessment have gone down and they're looking for ways to recoup costs or revenue for their counties. This is one of those unforeseen circumstances, a knock-on effect, when we actually see what happens when push comes to shove, when something is failing.

So it makes me very, very proud to say that I'm part of the government that is actually going to be taking on this issue in a substantive way and making sure that we find a solution that looks to the future as opposed to just looking at how much money we can make today.

We need to look at this in a generational way. I'm sure that there are many things that we can learn in terms of how we utilize some of these assets for geothermal. Or if we have renewable energy infrastructure coming onto people's properties, how do we make sure that the legislation doesn't leave landowners with this infrastructure that's out on their land that is hampering their abilities to put food on the table and take care of themselves?

It's my pleasure to be part of a fulsome conversation and to have meaningful debate. I'm very glad that there will be representatives from the oil and gas industry, the oil field services sector, agriculture, landowners, freehold mineral owners, environmental organizations, lenders, insolvency professionals, municipal organizations, surety companies, and lawyers who represent landowners.

With that, I will conclude my remarks.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thanks very much. Well, Madam Speaker, I was very much riveted by the comments of the hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville, and I wonder if she had any concluding comments she wished to make.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you to the member for the question. I think that what I would like to talk about is the $30 million that has been secured from the federal government in their recent budget. I think it shows some good diplomacy. It shows the ability of our government to be able to come to the table to look at how responsible development is done. You know, if they see this as a priority, it shows that we are trying to work in a collaborative way to put people's workboots back on and get them out into the field. The government is, I believe, working on options that would allow us to be able to use this money in the best way possible by assisting the Orphan Well Association.

I don't think that when the government leverages money in this way, it is necessarily a decision that would make the government the one that is making the decision on how that money is spent. The Member for Calgary-South East, I believe, was saying that the government being able to backstop a loan for an arm's-length entity is somehow interfering with the process, which doesn't make any sense to me. The government allowed Alberta Treasury Branches to be able to credit another 1 and a half billion dollars to support small and medium-sized businesses to get business loans. The government wasn't making the decisions on what to do with that money, but it gave ATB the lending capacity to be able to actually support entrepreneurs in creating businesses. I think that is the role of government, to be able to provide that capacity to do things that are in the public interest and for the public good, especially when you're putting people back to work.

I think that there are also some notes here. Specifically, the Oil and Gas Conservation Act needs to be amended in section 70(1). That would set out the uses of the orphan fund and the powers, duties, and functions that are delegated by regulation to the OWA, and this will enable the OWA to pay back that loan. You can see that currently the OWA just is not legally allowed to accept the loan, and this will enable it to do that and to actually do some good work that, I think, most of us support.

With that, Madam Speaker, I will conclude my remarks. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any further questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Rosendahl: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure today to rise and speak about Bill 14, An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation. In my constituency, of course, of West Yellowhead we have many oil and gas sites that need attention, and they're spread throughout the constituency as you travel through the different areas.

One of the things I really appreciate is the clarity that's been brought to this issue. Too often we talk about abandoned wells or orphan wells as if they are all the same thing, but, I assure you, they are not.

Madam Speaker, I am both shocked and impressed when I hear about the large number of wells that have been drilled since the activity began. Over half of those wells, or close to 285,000, as one of the other speakers has already mentioned, are still deemed to be operational today. That's quite a large number when you think about it. Drilling down further – excuse the pun; it's a term that's used in the oil and gas industry – just over 100,000 of those wells are not currently active, so they're either shut-in or just sitting there until the company decides what they're going to do with them, and 81,000 wells have been reclaimed or remediated. That's a huge number, but when you think about it, 87,000 abandoned wells require reclamation and remediation. That's a large number when you really look at the numbers that are spread out over the province.

Of these wells only a small portion of sites are actually recorded in the inventory of the Orphan Well Association. The thing is that there may be many more out there that they've lost track of over the years. Where is the paperwork and all that kind of thing when you're looking at these things and where they exist? As of March 2017, for example, 2,084 orphan wells still need to go through the closure activities. They're still not even closed.

In addition to that, there are more than 1,700 pipeline segments that need attention. I mean, you talk about the miles of pipelines that are buried out there in the land base and not only that but mention some that are sitting or laying about on the different sites that I've encountered – when you think about it, Madam Speaker, the problem is huge.

I'm proud to be part of a government that is actually, finally, going to do something about it. It's long overdue when you really think about the scope of the problem and the fact that it hasn't been addressed over the many years. For far too long the problem, like I said, was allowed to grow. This has affected thousands of Alberta residents, people like farmers who have sites on their land or municipalities – it's been already mentioned – that have abandoned wells near different communities. They have to work around them.

This didn't happen overnight or even during the course of the last five years, when the economy was in its downturn. It's been building for many years. Of course, it's gotten worse now with the downturn in the economy, where some companies have gone bankrupt and that kind of thing, so then that's only increased or caused the problem to even grow. When you really look at it, we have thousands of sites across the province that require urgent attention, and that needs to be addressed in one way or another.

This is the thing. When you talk about the sites, the earlier drilling practices were that the camps and the offices in some cases weren't even near where the drilling activities occurred or near where the wellhead was. You had larger areas that were cleared off, so you had areas where the camp was set up and in some cases the offices and stuff because there was always a fear that if something happened at the wellhead, the workers would have some place to be for the camp and that kind of thing. They didn't want to have issues like that, so there was always this great area of infrastructure between where the camp was set up and where the actual drilling occurred, out near the wellhead. Of course, it was always large areas that were cleared off.

Of course, when they did that, in some cases they had sumps near the wellhead. What the sump was used for, of course, was the storage of the used drilling mud and contaminants that occurred, and some of the material was pumped in the sump. Of course, when they abandoned the site, the sumps were left. That creates a safety problem and also the fact that in some cases the sumps were near where the camp was as well.

When you look at all these issues, plus all this infrastructure that's out there, the roads and everything else that were used to connect some of the camps to the drilling sites themselves, not to mention the huge lines of pipelines that were put in to connect the wellhead to different collection points or batteries out on the land base: it's all classed under the definition of sites. So when you're talking about thousands of these, you're talking about a lot of area.

It's important to understand the terms "abandoned" and "orphaned." It's been mentioned already, but "abandoned" is permanently decommissioned. They're plugged, cut, and capped and supposedly left in a safe condition. That's not always the case. Casings can leak over time as they're left sitting there to rust and everything else. I've come across many over the time frame, being out on the land base quadding, hunting, fishing, et cetera. We've come across many that are seeping, or you can come across some that are stinking pretty bad. Of course, if you take the GPS coordinates for them and you can find, in some cases, information about the particular site, you can report it. Quite often, in some cases somebody will show up and deal with it, but consider the fact that it's supposed to be abandoned.

Orphan wells are wells, facilities, pipelines where the original owner or licensee is not capable of paying for the required closure process. In other words, they just left it. In some cases these aren't very good either. You know, like I mentioned about the downturn in the economy: well, that's reason number two why so many of them have gone bankrupt and just left them. They aren't able to close the facility properly, aren't able to pay for remediation or reclamation.

This is where the Orphan Well Association comes into play. The Orphan Well Association, or OWA, is a not-for-profit organization funded by the oil and gas industry through the orphan fund levy, that's supposed to be collected and used for the work. It is run by an independent board of directors and has done a lot of good work over the years, which it has, but there's a lot more work that needs to be done out there.

Public safety is one of the key things that they are concerned with, and they examine the risk of every project to help determine which wells will be cleaned up. Of course, like I said, there's always a problem when you look at the infrastructure that's left with the issue of the abandoned roads, the issue of the abandoned sites, the abandoned sumps. In one particular case we encountered a situation where I drove across an abandoned site and sunk my entire truck into a sump. It took us all day to get it out of there, needless to say. The thing was abandoned, it was done, and it was supposed to be deemed safe. Well, it wasn't, and these kinds of situations exist out there.

In another case we saved a white-tailed doe that had sunk in a sump. She was in a pretty bad way by the time we found her, but we got her out of there, cleaned her up, and she was well on her way after that. Nonetheless, it's a hazard to wildlife, a hazard to the public or anybody that is just out there checking things out. That's, even more importantly, why we need to address these things.

Seven hundred orphan wells have been cleaned up to date, but it's not enough. We have another 2,000 or more that need attention. We need to do more to assist in that job, and we need everyone to recognize the seriousness of the situation. I hear all the time from my constituents – and I'm sure my colleagues in this Assembly hear the same thing – about the issues of the abandoned wells out on this land base.

At the same time, Madam Speaker, we also have a huge number of skilled oilfield service workers ready and willing to go to work. I think that we could use the expertise of these people to be out there and working on this project to clear this up or to at least start clearing it up. We need them and their experience and skills to help power the coming economic recovery, which is vital. It gets them back to work, and it helps with the economy. We also want them to be available in the near future, however, once the economy recovers in the oil and gas sector, for example.

There are several things that we can do. We can get them back to work right away and keep their skills and stuff to be used for that, but once the economy recovers, then we can use them to go back to work on new activities. That's why I'm proud to stand and support Bill 14, because it will give the Orphan Well Association the ability to act now, get those people to work, and clean up significant portions of the outstanding orphan wells.

As members of this House know, the federal government allocated $30 million in its recent budget to support our efforts to reclaim the orphan oil and gas wells. This bill would help the OWA take advantage of that funding. Right now they aren't allowed to do that, nor is the OWA legally allowed to accept the loan. What we need to do as a Legislative Assembly is to change the Oil and Gas Conservation Act and change the allowable uses for the orphan fund and the powers, duties, and functions that are delegated to the OWA. These changes will allow the OWA to acquire a loan and will allow the government to provide support so that the OWA can do their job more effectively. It's important to really think about that as a way that we can move forward.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, I'll recognize the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and speak to Bill 14 in its second reading, An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation. Something that we see recurrently in the history of Alberta is this ongoing challenge of meeting those environmental concerns that have been left from bankrupt or otherwise dissolved organizations.

The attempt by the previous government to provide through the Orphan Well Association fairly modest annual payments based on the licensing liability association regulations clearly has not met the need. It points again to other major liabilities that we and our children are facing around the oil sands and the tailings ponds, which are many more billions of dollars of potential liability because we haven't required appropriate bonding or set asides in the event of stranded assets or bankruptcies or abandonments by companies of these operations.

Clearly, this is going to take us into a more positive position in relation to these wells, and I'm pleased to see that the polluter pays principle will be front and centre in this. These will be loans. In fact, it appears – and this is my first reading of it, Madam Speaker – that there will be borrowing costs and interest associated with the loans. Very good news. I think we have to be consistent in our approach to the responsibilities of industry to meet their obligations under the act, and it would set a very dangerous precedent if it were anything but a loan.

The double benefit, of course, is that we have servicing companies that are going to be employed, in some cases after some period of time of being unemployed. So this is a win-win for the economy, for sustaining some of the jobs in the province, and for getting some appropriate cleanup. A long way to go; $30 million isn't going to go very far in the long list of potential abandonments as is needed.

While I fully support it, I guess there are lots of questions still to be considered. One of them would be whether or not the Alberta government is planning to make loans through other sources to this fund or if the federal fund is the sole fund that is going to be provided for these companies to do the reclamation and rehabilitation work. If we are borrowing more money or putting more public liability at risk through loans, I think we would have to have a very serious discussion since there's already quite a lot being put aside in terms of borrowing by this government, and I would be very concerned if it was going beyond that. But there may be some other opportunities for providing loans to companies which I haven't considered but perhaps the government has.

So my only caveat is that we not put any more public dollars in Alberta in jeopardy through further loans and that unless we have some other means of – and I hope perhaps at some time in this next year we'll see some real amendments to the orphan well fund, that we'll look at issues around reclamation of the oil sands and the tailings ponds because we'll be dealing with the same issues over the next 10 years at a much higher level with respect to abandonment or reclamation and remediation in the oil sands and the tailings ponds.

But this is a good start. I mean, to give the government credit, we are moving forward on some of the most thorny issues that this province has faced for the last 20 or 25 years. I can congratulate both the federal government and the provincial government on taking what are quite necessary steps in particular at this time.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?
The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you. I just want to stand and thank the member opposite for those kind words with regard to this government's action on orphan wells. He's right to recognize the federal government also on this issue because they have provided the $30 million which will be used to take out on behalf of the Orphan Well Association a loan that they'll then use to address the situation with as many orphan wells as they are able to, with the $30 million being able to service that loan.

The government of Alberta is not adding to that. The polluter-pay principle still remains fully intact, but the monies that we are making available are the extent, at this time, of the monies that are being contributed to address this problem. There are no provincial monies going into this. We are in a sense being the banker to assure that the Orphan Well Association can take down a loan and be able to address as many orphan wells as they can, paying that loan back with this money, the $30 million.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, I'll recognize the hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I know this will come as a surprise to some inside the Chamber, but I will keep my remarks brief today.

Mr. Orr: It's not possible.

Mr. Cooper: Some would believe that that isn't possible, but I also know that he believes that all things are possible, so we will see if we can deliver on my promise today.

As an MLA that represents a large rural riding, orphan wells are certainly a very serious concern for a number of farmers and ranchers and a number of constituents all across the constituency. It's good that we are seeing some positive steps forward with respect to dealing with orphan wells.

As an Albertan I understand that there is an importance of maintaining our land, our air, and our water for future generations. As you know, Madam Speaker, you've heard me say in this Chamber before that I am a conservative, and that means we need to conserve things, which includes our land, our air, and our water. It is very, very important that we sustain our province's legacy because long after the oil and gas is gone, our land and our agriculture and other industries will remain. As an advocate, though, for our energy industry I know and understand that the industry also recognizes some of their obligations to Albertans to develop our oil and gas assets responsibly. While they don't have a perfect track record, certainly many, many of our producers and developers of our oil and gas do so in a very responsible manner.

I also know about significant amounts of work that the players throughout our oil and gas industry put into reclaiming sites, even sites that they're not necessarily responsible for. Alberta excels at energy site reclamation, and I'm extremely proud of our industry for adopting a polluter-pay mentality and taking responsibility and accountability for ensuring sites are left better than when the energy activity started.

Now, that's not to say that there isn't a very real challenge and concern around orphan wells, and that's not to say that our industry and others can't do more and shouldn't do more. That is one of the reasons why I will be supporting this legislation, Bill 14, at second reading.

That's not to say that we don't have some additional concerns. We have some questions that would be much more appropriate to answer at the committee stage. We certainly support the purpose and the intent of this bill. As such, I will be encouraging my colleagues to support Bill 14 at second reading.

It seems that the purpose of the bill would be to allow the OWF and the oil and gas industry, which funds the OWF, some flexibility, and of course this is very important. We do want to understand what the government's full intent is to do with the bill. We have some questions around why the OWF needs to be able to take out loans and exactly how those things are going to be applied. I know that we've heard from the Minister of Finance this afternoon a little about that, but we will be seeking some further clarification.

I know that my colleagues from Cypress-Medicine Hat and Innisfail-Sylvan Lake will also be providing some additional comments around some of their concerns and some potential amendments that may or may not be needed. But at this point I do look forward to supporting Bill 14 at second reading and continuing the debate through the process.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), any questions or comments?

Seeing none, I will recognize the Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a great honour for me to rise and speak to Bill 14, An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation, particularly because as a professional geologist I have spent 13 years working in both the private sector and in the public sector on the issue of abandoned well reclamation. So it's a particular privilege for me to speak to this matter here in the Legislature of the province of Alberta. I think it's an issue that doesn't get enough attention at this level, and I'm pleased to be able to speak to it today.

First of all, I want to congratulate the Minister of Energy on creating such a short bill. Madam Speaker, I think this may be the only bill in this Legislature that gets read completely from front to end by all of the members of the Legislature. I appreciate her brevity, but that doesn't mean that what's presented in this bill isn't a good thing for the people of Alberta. Good things come in small packages, and that's certainly what we see here with Bill 14.

I also want to thank our partners in the federal government for providing us with $30 million to address the issue of orphan wells in the province of Alberta. I'm proud of the track record that this provincial government has on working with the federal government to support the energy industry in the province of Alberta. Not only have we gotten two pipelines approved, Madam Speaker, but we're also taking concrete action on addressing energy liabilities and environmental liabilities in this province, certainly something that we didn't see the Conservative government in Ottawa take any action on at all in 10 years and certainly something that we didn't see the previous Progressive Conservative government take a lot of action on over 44 years.

I'm proud of the incredible progress that we're making in such a very short time. I look forward to continuing to work on behalf of the people of Alberta to support our energy industry and also to protect and preserve the environment and make sure that our energy industry is developed and works in an environmentally responsible manner.

On this issue of environmental responsibility, certainly, any sound environmental policy is built on the polluter-pay principle, Madam Speaker, basically, the idea that people should clean up after themselves. Any child believes in the polluter-pay principle. I often have to arbitrate disputes between my own two children, Opal and Gus. I often walk into the living room and find a mess, and I ask one of them to clean it up, and they are quick to tell me that it was the other's responsibility, that they didn't make the mess, so they shouldn't be responsible for cleaning it up.

That's certainly what underpins the polluter-pay principle, Madam Speaker, the fact that the people who made the mess are the ones responsible for cleaning it up. Certainly, the way that this bill is constructed, we have preserved that principle, that's fair, that those who have made the messes are cleaning them up and that the messes aren't left for the individual landowners, who in many cases couldn't afford the incredible costs that are associated with the cleanup of these liabilities.

My colleagues on this side of the House were very detailed in discussing how much these orphan wells can cost to clean up, certainly well beyond the capacity of any individual landowner to clean up. I don't know too many Alberta families who have an extra million dollars in between the couch cushions, who can afford to look after an orphan well once an oil and gas company has pulled up stakes and blown out of town and abandoned their environmental responsibilities.

It certainly shouldn't fall on the taxpayers of Alberta, Madam Speaker. We shouldn't be left on the hook for the bad practices of the energy industry. It's the responsibility of the government of Alberta to make sure that the energy industry cleans up its messes and doesn't make the people of Alberta foot the bill. They have certainly profited from these oil and gas sites. Let's not forget that. They have made good money on most of these sites in most cases, and it's only fair that they share the cost of cleaning up the sites. That shouldn't be funded by the taxpayers of Alberta.

You know, it's important to remember that the polluter-pay principle also preserves the reputation of the industry, Madam Speaker, and this brings us back to the concept of social licence, that we're fond of talking about here on this side of the House. Certainly, the energy industry recognizes that it has to generate social licence to continue operating on the landscape in Alberta, and that's why they've created the Orphan Well Association, that collects levies from all of the industry players so that there's money in the bank to clean up the messes that are left behind by the operators that go out of business or the bad actors in the energy industry.

Most of the actors in the energy industry see themselves as sound environmental stewards. I certainly know from my own personal and professional practice that many oil companies do want to do a good job when it comes to protecting the environment, but that's not the case in all cases. That's why they've recognized as an industry that they need to collectively look after the messes that they've created, and they've created the Orphan Well Association to look after those messes that are left behind. That gives the energy industry the social licence to continue operating on the landscape, because the people of Alberta and individual landowners can be confident that the energy industry will clean up its mess when it's done.

You know, I think it's troubling to see Conservative governments in Saskatchewan and past Conservative governments in this province willing to dilute the polluter-pay principle by just putting tax dollars directly into the remediation of these orphan well sites rather than the strategy that we've adopted here on this side of the House, where we have crafted a government program that preserves the polluter-pay principle but enhances the ability of the energy industry to clean up its messes.

The Conservative option is to just shovel taxpayers' money into the energy industry with no strings attached, let the bad actors off the hook, and send the bill to the people of Alberta. We certainly don't believe that that's fair, but the Conservatives do seem to think that that's fair. That's consistent with their world view, Madam Speaker, of making sure that profits go to the private owners and that the losses go to the people. That's not something that we support as a New Democratic government, and I'm proud that we are not passing the bill for environmental remediation on to the people of Alberta.

You know, my colleagues have spoken to the importance of protecting the environment as a result of cleaning up these problem wells, and certainly the scale of the problem is growing. I know we've thrown some numbers around about the number of orphan wells that currently exist in the province of Alberta. The fact is that we don't know how many orphan wells are out there, Madam Speaker. The list continues to grow as operators continue to go out of business and we do the work of investigating whether or not there are any energy industry partners who are on the hook for the remediation.

Certainly, there are, you know, issues related to methane emissions, H₂S emissions that have been discussed, salt and hydrocarbons that can contaminate groundwater. I don't think I need to remind people about the important resource that groundwater is to the people of Alberta. There are approximately 150,000 people in the province of Alberta who rely on water from their own wells, and it's particularly important that we take concrete and immediate action to protect the groundwater resources of those people because in many cases nobody else is looking out for the protection of that groundwater resource. There is no comprehensive groundwater monitoring program on private landowners' wells. It's up to each landowner to monitor the quality of their wells, and in many cases, Madam Speaker, I can tell you that most landowners don't know what the quality of their well is from time to time, and they certainly don't know whether or not the well next door has contaminated their land, probably because they haven't even thought to look at it. That's why it's important for the Orphan Well Association to get started on this work because we certainly don't want private landowners' wells to be put at risk.

It certainly has been the case in the past. There have been some high-profile cases. I think of Rosevear, Alberta. The landowners there around an old gas plant had their wells contaminated by sulfolane because the gas plant operators let contamination flow unchecked for many, many years, and those people are still suffering the consequences of that irresponsibility to this day. I also think of the town of Fox Creek, where the municipality relies on groundwater primarily for its wells, and they're certainly very close to the energy industry. I think everybody wants to know that the energy industry is acting responsibly to protect the quality of the groundwater in that community as well.

My colleagues also touched on the importance of proper reclamation of these sites so that they're returned to equivalent land capability so that agricultural sites can be used again for agriculture and forested sites can be used for forestry. Certainly, that's something that we don't see enough of these days.

One of the final issues that I want to raise – it's been touched on a little bit – is the issue of jobs. Certainly, we're going to see people with oil field experience go back to work as a result of these investments by the Orphan Well Association. I'm quite proud as Minister of Advanced Education of the quality of the trades training that many of these people have received from our institutions. But I also want to remind everybody in the House that it's not just the oil field workers who are working on the rigs and pulling tools who are benefiting from this work. It's also very highly trained professionals who are working in the area of reclamation and remediation. You know, agrologists, geologists, biologists, toxicologists, and engineers are all employed in the area of oil field reclamation, and certainly this kind of work allows people to have good, family-supporting, mortgage-paying jobs. It's important now more than ever to be able to support those kinds of jobs here in the province of Alberta in these tough economic times.

There's also a significant amount of innovation that happens in this sector in those fields, and certainly the U of A is at the head of groundwater studies in the province and, arguably, in the country. We also have institutions like Lakeland College and Olds College that do excellent jobs of training people in the areas of site reclamation. I'm quite proud as Minister of Advanced Education, of course, of the work that our postsecondary system does to support both the job training in this area but also the innovation in the area.

One thing that I do want to highlight, of course, is NAIT. Reclaiming sites, particularly in the north, is a particularly troublesome issue. There isn't a whole lot of research on reclaiming northern sites, peatlands and forest lands, and NAIT is certainly one of the world leaders in looking at issues of reclamation in those kinds of environments, Madam Speaker. I'm quite proud of the work that the postsecondary system does in this space. I'm looking forward to the opportunities of perhaps exporting the technologies and techniques and practices that come out of this research to other northern countries that are looking to reclaim their energy industries and their other industries that have impacted landscapes in northern locations around the world.

With that, I think I will conclude my remarks by saying that I'm quite proud of our government's ability to make sure that we're putting people back to work, to make sure that the energy industry is a responsible steward of the environment, all the while protecting the pockets of taxpayers, Madam Speaker, and making sure that those responsible for cleaning up their messes are, in fact, the ones who are actually doing it.

We talk about making life better for Albertans. This short but effective bill is clear evidence of how our government is working hard every day to make life better for Albertans. I'm quite proud to stand in support of Bill 14.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?
Seeing none, are there any further speakers to the bill?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

Hon. Members: Question.

[Motion carried; Bill 14 read a second time]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I believe we've made good progress today, and I would move to adjourn until 9 a.m.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:02 p.m.]

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act

[Debate adjourned May 17]

The Deputy Speaker: Any hon. members wishing to speak to this bill? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Good morning, Madam Speaker, and thank you. I rise in support of Bill 205, Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act. I thank the Member for Calgary-North West for bringing the bill forward, and a huge thank you to the Member for St. Albert for her many, many years of work in this area. I would also like to acknowledge an activist for members with disabilities from my union involvement days – she taught me a lot about how to advocate like a dog with a bone – Pat McGrath.

Everyone has abilities, and some of us have challenges. I have challenges. Let's see. About 20 years ago there was a bit of an argument in my house about the remote control. Now, when the TV was on and there was music playing, it was really loud, but when somebody was talking, I couldn't hear what they were saying. Of course, I thought that other people in the house were messing with the remote control. My daughter said to me: mom, you need to go get your hearing checked. So I did. When I got my first set of hearing aids, I got in the car, and A Horse with No Name was playing. Now, if any of you remember back that far, that was 1971 or '72. I loved that song, and I started to sing.

An Hon. Member: By America?

Ms Fitzpatrick: Yes.

I realized I was singing the wrong words. For almost 20 years I'd actually been losing my hearing, maybe even longer than that. I was missing some nuances when anybody was speaking to me, and I often asked people to repeat what they were saying. Anyway, I thought: okay, I've got two hearing aids.

The first time I went to the hearing doctor, he said, "Well, you need to just listen more carefully, and you need to watch people's mouths when they speak." I looked at him, like: are you nuts? I need to hear what people are saying, and I don't always get to look at their mouths when they're speaking. Anyway, something happened. It might have been that somebody had come to work, and they were doing hearing testing on everybody. They said: yes, you really need to get some hearing aids because you're losing high-frequency sound. The kind of hearing loss I have is gradually going through the spectrum, so I'm hearing less and less.

I had those hearing aids for a number of years. They're pretty expensive, so I was certainly trying to make them last as long as they could. Anyway, my mother and father had passed away, and I received a small inheritance, and I thought: this is the time for me to go and get a new set of hearing aids that properly addresses my hearing needs. So $6,900 later I had a pair of hearing aids that were guaranteed for three years. They expected them to last for five. I managed to stretch it out to eight. Then the last pair of hearing aids I got was about $2,000, and the difference between the two is incredible.

I need to get a new pair. I saw one of the hearing specialists in Lethbridge, and the new hearing aids that they've recommended to address my hearing needs are $8,600. Now, I don't know. I mean, I make a reasonable wage. For me to pay $8,600 is a huge chunk of money, and I can't get them right away. I've got to save for those, but I'm in a position where I can do that.

I don't even know what the percentage of people in Alberta is that require hearing aids. Certainly, I'm a senior, and many seniors that I know have challenges with their hearing. I have a challenge here in the House. I have a challenge when I go to committees. If any of you have been in a committee meeting with me, I introduce myself, and I say: please speak into the microphone because if not, I can't hear you. Some people do; some people don't.

The other challenge I have here in this House is when people are yelling or when people, after somebody has spoken, hit the top of the desk where the speaker is. If I have the earbud in my ear – in fact, my one eardrum has been damaged because of that banging right next to the microphone. I ask people in this House: please don't do that. If you bang on your desk, that's one thing, but if you bang right next to the microphone, the intensity of the sound on my eardrum not only hurts, but it's damaging my eardrum. So I'm asking you to please not do that.

I got up to speak today, first of all, because if I'd had an advocate who could have done the work that I needed to get to that point where I had a pair of hearing aids that worked for me – it took me months and months to get two hearing aids that were appropriate for my hearing loss, and I'm pretty skilled at advocating for other people. But I've certainly met a number of seniors at Nord-Bridge, when I go there every couple of weeks, who have similar issues with their hearing, and they have absolutely no idea how to access any supports that they're entitled to so they can get to a place where they've got some quality of life in that they can hear a conversation with somebody else.

In my years as a union activist I have worked with many members that I represented with all kinds of disabilities, and I'm going to give you one example. A woman who worked with me when I was in Ottawa had a very serious disability with regard to chemical sensitivity. We went to the employer and said: you know, she's a good employee, she's got 30 years of work experience, and every single appraisal she's had done on her work was excellent. But she had this chemical sensitivity problem because there had been a spill at work. It had affected her, and it will affect her the rest of her life. Anyway, we went to the employer, and the employer agreed that they needed to provide some accommodation. We worked on the fourth floor, and there was a sign on the door to the fourth floor, there was a sign when you got off the elevator that you were not to wear scented perfumes, scented deodorant, scented hair products. It had a list.

Now, the reality is that she had to get from the front door to the fourth floor, so it would mean getting on the elevator, walking up the stairs. There were no signs as you came into the building that you should recognize that you shouldn't do these things because it would affect somebody else's life. So we pushed and we pushed, and they wouldn't put a notice up. But what I did as the union president was that I made sure everybody in the building knew about it, and I asked people not to wear perfumes or any scented products. I also asked the cleaning staff, when they were using specific products, if they would identify what chemicals were in those and check with this member or with me so that we could make sure that in fact she wasn't going to be affected.

One morning I get to work, and she gets off the bus when I get off the bus, and we walk in the building. We're not 10 feet into the building, and I turned around and looked at her, and her face and her neck were starting to swell. We were in the building maybe five, maybe eight minutes, and she could hardly breathe. I dragged her outside, and I got somebody else who worked with us to stay with her momentarily. I went back in, and I saw the management health and safety rep. I told her what happened, and I said: I'm taking her to the hospital. She could have smothered that day because her throat was closing off from whatever chemicals. I couldn't smell anything, so whatever it was didn't have a scent, but it was a chemical that affected her. I took her to the hospital. They had to give her a shot. They observed her for a number of hours until the swelling went down and then released her back to her home. She was terrified to come back in to work in case that would happen again.

The next step for me as her representative was to go to management: how can we accommodate this? They were not prepared to put up signs in the building to make sure that nobody wore anything in there that was going to affect her. I said: "Fine. The job that she does is on a computer. She has access to all the information she needs on the computer. Let's set up a workstation for her at home so that she can continue to work. She's being productive." I couldn't believe the amount of push-back from my department. The job she did didn't mean that she needed to be sitting at a desk in that building. They finally agreed to do it. They set it up. In the department where she was working, in human resources, every time there was a new manager, we had to go through the same thing. She was at her wits' end.

Anyway, in the last meeting that we had, which was the final meeting we were ever going to have about it, the new manager wanted her to come into the office to meet with him. I said: "Absolutely not. I'm not putting her life at risk by bringing her in. You can come out and meet her at the house." So he and one of the other managers from HR met me and met her at her house. She sent a list the day before that said: please do not wear blah, blah, blah, everything that would cause a reaction. You couldn't bring it into her house. I'm in her office with her, and one manager arrived and came into the office. The other manager arrived, and immediately she started to react. I said: what's going on? The manager had worn her coat. She didn't wear any perfume that day, but she wears perfume all the other times, and it's all on her coat. We had that meeting outside, in front of the garage, and it was minus 26 degrees. It was the last time we had to meet about it because the manager wasn't going to put himself in that position again.

But the reality is that we should not have had to go through that. This was time that I could have been sitting at my desk, doing my job, but because I was the union rep, I was doing this for her. She was in a unionized environment, and I was an advocate. I was able to do this for her. How many Albertans are in a position where they cannot get anybody to be an advocate for them and they need assistance? They don't even know that they could go to somebody to get some assistance. They may need assistance in three or four different areas.

I know that if they come to my office, my two staff are going to be able to help them, but the reality is that that's not the case for everybody or every office. The importance of having somebody who is going to be the go-to person – and in fact, I'm thinking, you know, that you may have one person, but you may wind up with 20 staff all having to address the number, 20 lives, maybe.

So many people in Alberta have challenges, and I'm not calling them disabilities. It is a challenge. It is a challenge every single day of their lives. We're in a position where we can do something about it, to make their lives better.

On that note, I'll say thank you, and I'll sit down.

The Deputy Speaker: Any question or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just have a quick question for the member. Thank you for your comments. They're outstanding, as always. I know that there are members of the Self Advocacy Federation in Lethbridge that are very active. I think you had them here as guests one time, Ben Rowley and his brother. I'm just wondering if you could talk a little bit about the Self Advocacy Federation in Lethbridge and what they're up to.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you very much, Member, for the question. The group in Lethbridge, in fact, on Friday had their big fundraising event, and they've changed their name to inclusion Lethbridge. Both Ben and Chris are members. There is Dave Lawson, who is kind of the person in charge there, but there are parents, and there are people who have challenges who, once they've learned how to deal with their challenges, are actually helping others.

We're very fortunate in Lethbridge. I've said over and over again what a fantastic city I live in, and we're fantastic because we have a community that looks after our community. That's not the case everywhere.

The blanket doesn't cover everybody because not everybody knows about it. I certainly try to advertise, talk about it. It's on Facebook. It's on Twitter. And when I talk to people who come into our office who have concerns, I certainly direct them to inclusion Lethbridge. Ben and Chris are fantastic. The two of them are kind of Twitter – how can I put this? They're alive on Twitter. They certainly put information out there on a very regular basis about things that are going on. Their mom is absolutely incredible.

Again, if we had somebody within the government who is able to be that advocate and provide the direction where people need to go to get the support that they need and the kinds of supports that they are entitled to, we will certainly make life better for Albertans.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I want to thank the Member for Lethbridge-East for sharing her stories about receiving her hearing aids. It actually made me smile a little bit because it reflected when my grandmother received some implants. She had measles as a child, so she lost all hearing in one ear and had only 15 per cent capacity in the other. It was the same sort of situation. You had to look at her when you were speaking to her because she would read lips.

But there was a pilot that came out in Alberta here for cochlear implants. It's a very common thing now, but at the time it was very new, and she was one of the first 50 Albertans to get a cochlear implant. It was remarkable to see this new technology that was coming out because as soon as they put them in and turned them on, it was night and day. My uncle took her to get some breakfast after, and on the way she was looking out the window, and it was because she could hear cars going by. It was the first time she'd ever heard a car going by.

Your story in relation to hearing that song and how the lyrics were different was really funny because music had entirely changed. When she passed away and we were going through her CD collection, it was remarkable because songs and music that would be unbecoming of an elderly woman to listen to were the stuff that she was listening to because it was new to her and she enjoyed it. You know, when my uncle turned on the radio, there was an R & B song that was playing. She was bobbing her head to it because she had never heard music like that before, and she was really excited to hear it.

I was wondering if in probably about 20 seconds the member could share how new technology has impacted individuals with disabilities.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you very much for the question. I will tell you that I did music my whole life in school. I sang in the glee club. I sang in the church choir. I didn't think I had perfect pitch. [Ms Fitzpatrick's speaking time expired]

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I wasn't going to speak on this bill. I spoke on it the other day, and I complimented the bill.

The Deputy Speaker: My apologies, hon. member.

Mr. McIver: Pardon me?

The Deputy Speaker: You have already spoken to the bill.

Mr. McIver: In this reading?

The Deputy Speaker: In the second reading.

Mr. McIver: I thought it was in the previous reading.

The Deputy Speaker: You'll be able to speak in committee again.

Mr. McIver: Fair enough.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek.

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm really interested in this bill, really interested in hearing what people have to say about it.

Just a quick anecdote about hearing losses. My mother was the same way, progressive hearing loss through her life. It wasn't until I was, well, an adult and she was older that I realized how much she was lip-reading. Nobody knew it. I'm not even sure she was aware of it, but I realized that if you made eye contact with her, her understanding of what was said was increased dramatically.

What I mainly wanted to speak about here today, when we're looking at the Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act, is that I worked for many years in schools with children and youth who had disabilities that were of the definitely less visible kind – you could call them invisible disabilities – but that affected their lives, nonetheless, to a great degree. Sometimes it's really hard to imagine how an advocate can help people like this because what we're talking about, the things that we would see in schools, are not things that just go away as the child grows older. They may lessen. Obviously, we see everybody in their lives trying to, you know, make it less obvious what their shortcomings are. That's natural human behaviour. But some of these things, if there is someone who could advocate on their behalf, would be really helpful.

Some of the specific things I was thinking about are people who have learning disabilities. Learning disabilities are when you have got the ability to learn but for some reason the processing, say, of language, reading or writing, or math is definitely – there's a gap. There's a delay. You're not as strong in an area as you should be. In the old days, before it was recognized, before there was a term for it, people would often either quit school quite young because they just got tired of repeating grades, or else they would hide it.

I had a friend who used to rehearse, you know, all his reading in school. He learned that if he could jump ahead in the book, in the reader, practise ahead of time before the teacher called his name, he could look as competent as anyone else. It was good practice, but that's thinking ahead. The actual reading was a challenge.

I remember talking to a parent of a child with a learning disability. They do tend to run in families. I asked the parent, who's hard working, worked at an industry near Wabamun, raised a family, a very good family man. I said, "How do you cope with your reading challenges?" He had identified as having the same challenges as his child, and he said: "Don't do much. Make sure that I've got a job where somebody else can read memos and pass it on verbally to me. In reading to my children, I'm always looking back at what I've read to see how many mistakes I've made and to try to fix them." I said, "So it never changes?" "No," he said, "You just become more aware of it, and you learn little strategies to cope." So there's an invisible disability.

Obviously, it's not going to hamper everybody in their life, but it's something to be aware of, and it's something that gets in the way of people when they have to do a lot of reading and writing like filling out forms.

Another invisible disability is intellectual disability. I met several youth in high school, when I was an educational psychologist, who looked competent and had friends and had good social skills, but when it came down to remembering information that they were reading, it was a struggle for them.

Sometimes it's not if you have somebody who can do the tasks for you. But if you could have an advocate, if a person like this, I'm thinking, going into their adult years could have somebody who could help them understand what strategies they might be able to use to overcome their weaknesses, it might be really helpful, even sometimes somebody saying: "It's not from lack of effort. You are not just not paying attention. You have a struggle here."

There are a number of other disabilities, like fetal alcohol syndrome disorder, and that's one that, unfortunately, affects a number of people. There is no cure, but they do need advocates who can be encouraging, be supportive, and can show them ways to manage things that are difficult. I used to say to children, sometimes, with memory issues: "We have our computers and our smart phones, our external memories. Use them. You can write it down, you can put it in another device, whatever. You don't have to feel yourself being put behind the eight ball because you can't remember everything you hear. You find another way of keeping track of information." That was really helpful, saying that there's more than one way to get the information to do what you need to do.

One of the most difficult ones, especially for young people, is anything that is in the mental health area – anxiety disorders, oppositional defiant disorders – because that really interferes with people's ability to interact effectively with other people. You can see sometimes, as they go into their later years, that they will compensate by isolating themselves or sometimes just getting all their information and all their social contact online, which is not as obviously productive and helpful for them as face-to-face and meeting other people.

I'm very hopeful that the advocate for persons with disabilities will make a difference for people with disabilities. I would really hope that people will be made aware, and probably the younger the better. If we can help – I'm not saying that the elementary school-aged children will be able to benefit, but if people from age 12 on are aware that there are supports out there, beyond just the school-based ones, who can help them get information and get the help that they need, that would be very good.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any others wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm proud to get up today and speak to this bill. This bill is important. When I first got elected, I came from a shop floor, mechanical, kind of sales environment. Even before I had staff, the first group that was through my door was the local PDD community. There are a lot of PDD support organizations and nonprofits headquartered in my riding, and they came to my door because they wanted to talk to me about PDD standard 8. We've heard in this House about the safety standards. I have to admit that with my background, issues of those with disabilities were not exactly at the top of things I knew.

You know, I'm no PDD specialist, but unfairness still looks the same whether you're in it or not. When talking about standard 8 and talking about where they would require things like sprinklers in regular rental homes, even to me, freshly elected, with my mechanic's brain, sitting there looking across the table from them, I'm going: yup, that doesn't make sense. I didn't know the whole history of lack of consultations or how perhaps well-meaning people came up with a solution first and consulted after the fact. I took the lessons from that, from how that came about. I'm, of course, very proud of our government and the minister for doing proper consultations and addressing those concerns that were there when I first got elected as they related to the PDD safety standards.

I really took that to heart, and when I had the opportunity to recently bring forward a private member's bill, you know, I took a lot of those lessons to heart. When I found out that I did have the opportunity to do that, I thought about: where in my community can I do the most good? I wanted with my private member's bill, just like the hon. member who proposed this bill, to do something real. As much as I enjoy a bill on Blue Sky Appreciation Day or something to that effect, I wanted to do something real and put my efforts to something that actually affects people and is helpful. So I took that to heart.

The Henson trust came across as something that was a problem. Although, of course, we are very much working to improve the AISH system, for example, and PDD – and I know the minister is taking very positive steps towards doing that – a private member's bill needs to be a little more restrained in scope than what perhaps a whole ministry could do, and the Henson trust came up. I went out to the community and said: hey, is this a problem that you would like me to try and solve? The answer to that was yes, and as a result I have gone through, and taking the lessons learned from PDD standard 8, I have thus far been going through and consulting every step of the way.

My first round of consultations had 120 people at them, fire code capacity in both Edmonton and Calgary. I have an amazingly long list of people who came to these consultations. The thing I said was: "This is what I see is the problem. The reason why I'm here is that I want to hear from you about this problem and what your feedback is on perhaps how to solve it." You know, some people in that consultation asked me, "Well, what are you going to propose for the bill?" I told them, "Well, I'm not there yet." I saw what happened with PDD standard 8 and took those lessons to heart. When I did my consultation, I said: "I have just identified what I've seen as the problem from what I've heard in my community, and I'm trying to ask two things through this consultation. One, is it actually a problem? Two, give me some feedback on what you would like to see as a solution to that."

I've gone through those consultations. I've, of course, had the what-we-heard document go back. One of the previous speakers to this bill, my colleague from Lethbridge-East, has actually been very kind and will be hosting me for the first in my second round of consultations, where I'll bring back to the community, you know, my draft ideas for the actual bill itself to again get feedback from the community before I go forward with the regular process of having Parliamentary Counsel draft it. Now, some of the people who came out have been very helpful on this bill. They are some of the same ones that have been helpful and supportive of the bill for the disability advocate.

I was so glad to have in Calgary people come up to provide me a lot of assistance: Erin Waite from Connections Counselling; Gordon VanderLeek, a lawyer for disabled children; even in Calgary my hon. opposition colleague from Chestermere-Rocky View came out as well to the consultations, and that was much appreciated; Bev Hills from the Skills Society; Jamie Post from ACDS; Amy Park from the Self Advocacy Foundation; Kary Hargreaves, a lawyer from Edmonton who also specializes in disability and trust-related law; Steven Siu from AdaptAbilities; Bruce Uditsky from Inclusion Alberta. I mean, Madam Speaker, I could go on and on. These are people with disabilities and from the disability advocacy community who also, through the course of Henson trust, did mention that what's in this bill would be helpful to them.

You know, I do believe that the hon. Member for Calgary-North West, who actually does sit in my former seat in this particular House – I think there's something about consultation on PDD advocacy that comes from that particular seat – took those same lessons to heart and has consulted on this bill. I believe that the bill responds directly to the concerns of members of the disability community, concerns that the advocates have called for as it would establish an advocate for persons with disabilities. I'm really proud of the level of consultation that the Member for Calgary-North West undertook.

I believe that creating this advocate will make Albertans' lives better, will provide much-needed support to persons with disabilities as well as their families. If we as a House feel that creating an advocate is important, if we feel that it's important for those with disabilities and it's important for making sure all citizens can participate fully, then I would suggest that in this House we lead by voting in favour of Bill 205, which would make Alberta one of only three jurisdictions in the country to have an advocate specifically dedicated to those with disabilities.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), questions or comments? The Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I think there are probably a lot of people in this House that don't quite understand what the Henson trust is. I'm wondering if you could give us more information or share some information about what that is and how that makes lives better for people with disabilities.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much for the question. In essence, the Henson trust is a way for a parent of a disabled child to be able to leave that child an inheritance, once the parents pass away, in such a way that that inheritance doesn't suddenly increase the assets of the disabled child so much that they suddenly have their government supports clawed back. In essence, it would allow a way for the support that, you know, parents always would give the disabled child, whether it be a little bit of help with clothing, a little bit of help perhaps with a trip, to be able to have those supports continue that are outside of the support they may be receiving from AISH or PDD or perhaps other mental health supports, to be able to have that continue after the parents pass away in the form of money, however much that may be, to provide those extras. I mean, it could be things as simple as an appliance if an appliance fails. It could be things such as that at some point perhaps that person may need a new vehicle, that may be more expensive than perhaps one of us would be able to buy because it would need modifications.

The idea is to have those supports continue for as long as possible after the parents pass away, because anyone with children wants to be able to leave something for their kids after they pass away. I think that currently, from what I've been hearing from, of course, the feedback, the system perhaps is a bit unfair for those who are on disabilities because an inheritance, even a very modest one, may, like I said, knock somebody over the asset or income limits for receiving supports, whether it's through AISH or PDD.

That is something that was brought to me as a problem. When my private member's bill is introduced in this House – I'm private member's Bill 211 – I hope we do get a chance to debate it. I believe that would be something, just like this bill here that we're discussing today, Bill 205, that I think would be very helpful to those with disabilities. It would go to improving their lives and making life better for Albertans, which definitely seems to be a theme of this bill and our discussion thus far this morning.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any further questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Rosendahl: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm happy to rise today to speak to Bill 205, the Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act. I want to thank the member for bringing this forward and starting an important conversation and for the hard work that she's done to consult with Albertans.

Madam Speaker, this bill would establish an advocate for persons with disabilities in Alberta with the power to represent – and this is what's so important – the rights, the interests, and the viewpoints of persons with disabilities. My wife has always said: "Why don't they listen to us? We know what's good for us, but they never ask, so how do they get to listen to what we have to say?" It's important that this point of view be looked at very carefully. Just as important, the advocate will identify concerns within the disability community, which is a huge part of it to understand.

I'm proud of the level of consultation that the hon. Member for Calgary-North West undertook. It's great that she's done this and taken on this important job.

When we look at this issue, the advocate would have a mandate to

- (a) identify and study issues of concern to persons with disabilities.

Well, how can you decide what's good for them if you don't look and listen and understand what the concerns of the people with disabilities are? That is vital.

- (b) review programs and policies affecting persons with disabilities.

Here's another good point, and it's important to understand that when you're dealing with people with disabilities.

- (c) participate in processes in which decisions are made about persons with disabilities;
- (d) promote the rights, interests and well-being of persons with disabilities through public education.

It's very important that we look at those things and say how it's important to understand. Through understanding you can develop these things, and through that you

- (e) provide information and advice to the Government with respect to any matter relating to the rights, interests and well-being of persons with disabilities.

Then when you look at it further, you say: what is the scope and the result? It's to assist those who are having difficulty accessing services, which is a common, everyday thing for them. Directing them to the appropriate resources or person or organization that may be able to help assist them: try that in rural Alberta. It's an altogether different thing.

As you know, my wife is handicapped. She doesn't see well, and from her point of view, everything is a fight. It was a fight to get her schoolwork marked. Teachers didn't want to do it for some reason. It's a fight to go to work. To get there, in the city of Edmonton you can just go get your CNIB card and show it to the bus driver, and you don't have to pay anything. Try that in rural Alberta. She had to go to town council to try and get to use the handibus because they wouldn't recognize a CNIB card. An advocate would fix that. That's why it's so important. In one case they told her that, well, she could ride the bus, but her kids could not. It was silly. She said: "What am I supposed to do? Leave my kids by the curbside?" They were okay, but they didn't know how to address that. Ridiculous. These are the kinds of things that people with disabilities face.

A lot of people don't know that I was a bus driver in the town of Hinton. I drove the Hinton handibus, and we transported handicapped kids all over the community, through different programs, to school, and those kinds of things. You'd hear the complaints from many of the parents about the issues and the concerns that that community was having and the supports that weren't there when they needed them whereas you take supports like that and everything else in the cities or urban Alberta: these programs and stuff are in place for them. But in rural Alberta those programs don't exist. That's why it's so important to have an advocate that can speak on behalf of these people. It's very important. By establishing an advocate, this government is committed to ensuring that the voices of this community and their loved ones are heard. That is vital. In other words, the advocate will be committed to making Albertans' lives better. That's important for these people.

In one case I know that the problem here is that – by having an advocate, for example, Albertans with disabilities will have a person that will look into systemic issues such as teens transitioning into adulthood. In rural Alberta there are no programs. None. By establishing an advocate, there would be somebody there who can speak up for these people and help them transition and find programs, maybe, that they can do. I know one family personally where their marriage failed because there was no such program. The mother took her child and moved to the city of Edmonton, and they ended up getting a divorce because the long-distance relationship didn't work. Well, it affected the family quite strongly in the fact that the father had a good working relationship with the daughter. It was unfortunate, but this is reality. This is why it's so important, Madam Speaker, that we establish the advocate.

I'm seeing that we're committed to establishing that. That way the advocate can listen and develop programs that are good for the people with disabilities. When it comes to making life better for Albertans with disabilities, the previous government failed in the long run. Our government's record is clear. We're committed to supporting Alberta's disability community, and that's why it's so important that we support Bill 205. It'll give the people with disabilities a voice that'll be heard, provide programs, and help these people to make their lives better, and that's what's very important here.

With that, I'll thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a) any questions or comments for the previous speaker?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park – sorry – Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: That's okay. It's a great municipality anyway.

Madam Speaker, it's really my pleasure to speak about this bill, the Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act. I wanted to start off with a quote from Gandhi. Gandhi is one of my heroes for his work around nonviolence and resistance. One of the things that he said was, "The true measure of any society can be found in how it treats its most vulnerable members." I remember from my time overseas the difference between how we treat people who are vulnerable members of our society in Canada and how they are treated in other parts of the world.

In particular, I remember in 1981 being with the person who was the president of the international year of disabilities. He was going around with me at that time in the country of Thailand. He was amazed how little had been done in that country for people with disabilities. It was challenging for him to navigate with his wheelchair, but most disturbing was that there was very little inclusion of people with disabilities. People with disabilities were hidden and not part of society. There was no provision in the workplace for people who were in wheelchairs or who had some cognitive challenges. He was really amazed at how far we had come in North America as to our inclusion of people with disabilities.

I don't think that we have fully included people with disabilities in our society. I think that the words of Gandhi still stand for us here in Alberta and in Canada and North America generally. The way that we treat our most vulnerable members is really a reflection of who we are as a society and how we are willing to provide accommodation and equality to people who have some form of disability.

First of all, I've never really liked the word "disabilities." My children happen to be hearing impaired. As many in the House know, I adopted them from an orphanage in Thailand, where their lack of hearing would have made them very marginalized in their society. There would have been no provision to help them either acquire their needed hearing aids or to provide adaptive facilities within their workplace.

Madam Speaker, one of the reasons that I am so happy that this bill has come forward from the MLA for Calgary-North West, assisted by the MLA for St. Albert, is that what this bill is really doing is ensuring that people who have challenges in our society, be it mobility issues or their ability to hear or their ability to see or cognitive challenges or any kind of challenge that they face – we're really talking about ensuring that they have full inclusion in our community.

I really want to talk about the meaning of the word "inclusion." This is what we're really talking about around this. We're talking about persons who have faced barriers through the systems that we have created in our government, and we're talking about an advocate who's going to help those people and their families to navigate those barriers and provide full inclusion for them, whatever full inclusion means in their particular circumstances.

As an MLA – and I'm sure that my colleagues in this House will testify to it – we do spend a lot of time helping people who have challenges in navigating systems and whose parents are desperate to ensure that they can access the needed support, be it help in obtaining rent for the houses or access to programs or government support through PDD or AISH. Those take up a fair amount of my constituency office time, but also they really take up a lot of my emotional time. I know as a parent the challenges that everyone faces in making sure that their children or their loved ones have access to the services.

I think I've told this House before about my issues around hearing aids. When my son was diagnosed, he needed hearing aids, and as the Member for Lethbridge-East alluded to, hearing aids are very expensive. Who would have thought that a hearing aid for a child, especially one that has very small channels in their ears, would have set me back over $2,000 per hearing aid? If I hadn't been an advocate already in my own community and I knew where I could go and I could advocate for my child, I would never have been able to afford the hearing aids for my children. This is, you know, a very small thing, but when I talk to people in my constituency office and I see the challenges that they have to access information – not because the information is not there, but very often people are very emotional. They're at the end of their rope. So what I look forward to for the advocate position is somebody who can take their problems and their questions and help them to navigate through the various systems in the community.

I think this is going to be a really, really good bill. One of the things that I'm hoping the advocate will be able to do is work with groups, including municipalities, possibly, to look at barriers. I'm very thankful for the Minister of Environment and Parks, who has created accessible areas in the parks system. I think this is something that shows this government's commitment to ensuring that people with disabilities have full inclusion. I think this is a really good example that the government is committed and has done a lot of work. I could go on and on about examples of what the government has already done to ensure inclusion in our society, but I think we have to do a lot more to really break down the barriers for people who have any kind of disability or inability to access the system or inability to be fully integrated in society.

My own particular area of real interest in this is the area of inclusion within the workplace. I have worked with a couple of young people who are visually impaired, and it's such a challenge for them to access employment and to access the aid that already exists in terms of employers having access to programs to support their employment in the workplace. I'm really also very interested in some of the work that has been going on around inclusion for people in the workplace through groups like Chrysalis, Inclusion Alberta, and a group that I just heard about this morning on CBC that is helping people to access employment by breaking down mattresses.

Madam Speaker, I think this bill directly responds to the concerns that I have heard from the disability community and from the advocates. I think that this bill will make Albertans' lives better, especially those that have been more marginalized or more vulnerable, as Gandhi said, in our community. I also think that it will really help across the government to see what barriers exist, how information may not have been communicated to people, and the kind of programs there need to be.

When I look at the lives of my own children and the fact that they were able to access the needed help at the time, I look at their success. One of my sons is a teacher, and the other son is a finance manager at a big car dealership. Their success has directly resulted because early on they were able to access the help and support that they needed.

I also would like to support the fact that while the advocate will be located within one ministry, the mandate will be broad enough to make sure that people who have any kind of disability will have access to and understand the programs across the government. I think that's really, really important because when we're talking about disability and inclusion, we're talking about access throughout the government, be it in terms of employment – we just talked about parks – also justice, you know, housing, municipal government, and the way that municipal government is creating accessibility.

Madam Speaker, I am so delighted that this private member's bill is now going to become a government bill. I look forward as an MLA to be able to refer my constituents to the office of the advocate as it is appropriate, and I especially look forward to supporting the Minister of Community and Social Services in his work with this office and to ensuring that people with disabilities in Alberta become full members of our community and indeed that they find full inclusion in terms of their work, their play, and education and that they feel that as a government we continue to support them.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a). Any questions or comments?

Seeing none, are there any further speakers to this bill in second reading? The hon. Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park.

Cortes-Vargas: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise to Bill 205. I have a lot of experience with working with people with disabilities, visible and otherwise, and I really understand the complications of it. My mother is a speech pathologist and an audiologist. She kind of raised me by going out and really working with groups with disabilities.

I think that even further than that, being part of a multicultural community and having that be embedded in the practices really taught me to understand how complicated the system is to work. I know other members have really discussed this complication, and I know that the Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek discussed the actual specifics of learning disabilities and what that can look like. I think it's important to get that context because that is the experience.

Like, people don't get diagnosed or learn that they have a learning disability and have a particular background in it a lot of the time. A lot of the time it can be families. Families experience different difficulties, and that's just an additional one, and that's something that is new to them. I really learned about this as an educational assistant having to work with parents and having to talk about their child just recently being diagnosed. Of course, there's a whole process that happens. When it's discussed, the parents might go through a denial process. The parents might go through this process of understanding. There's a lot of jargon involved as well like understanding cognitive delays. You know, all of these things are not things that we normally talk about in routine practices, yet a lot of the things that help assist these children aren't necessarily difficult; it's just new, and it is not something that we talk about.

The reason I think it's important to have a bill that would have an advocate for persons with disabilities is because I think there are many layers to the process, and it's extremely complicated. The reason why I think it's a good place to start versus going through an independent office is because by having an advocate for disabilities, we can look for some of the low-hanging fruit. Some of the things are even, like, just the forms that you're filling out that can take a long period of time and that can be rather complicated, and if you add language barriers to that, if you add just difficulties at home, it adds to the process.

So if there is an advocate that is understanding of how the system in its whole is working and that can look at these recommendations and that can bring to attention ideas to the different ministries that are involved – because it's not just Children's Services, it's not just Community and Social Services, it's not just Education. It's Health. It's all of them, and all of them have different pieces, from FSCD to early learning funding to PDD funding. Then you have the postsecondary schools as well, which have their own system.

All of that, when you put it together, becomes complex, so having someone that is viewing these and hearing these stories and being able to just advocate for those particular circumstances and being able to add that into recommendations that they can bring forward to the different departments adds the capacity for it to be accountable to the people that they're serving. I think that's extremely important, especially given that that's a conversation that people with learning disabilities have.

We allocate a certain amount of money depending on the disability, the severity, the way it's impacting functionality in the classroom in the case of a classroom setting. And it's hard for people, if they don't know what that funding model looks like, to know if they're actually getting the right level of care according to the child's severity. If you're just learning that your child has autism, you might be learning about how best to support your child, but it would be a whole other thing to figure out, you know, whether the supports that they're receiving are appropriate or consistent in those cases because you might not have a background in that.

I think it is important that we build mechanisms of accountability to the families because that's the reason that these things were put in place in the first place, to provide the services that they require in order to build the skills that can really put them in the best situation so they continue to support our society. I think, you know, it's something that I'm extremely passionate about, finding organizations that look at more than just supporting a child but finding a way for them to have contributions and give back.

I have been incredibly privileged to be able to work with many, many people with disabilities, and because of that I have been able to see those various different perspectives. I know the Member for St. Albert actually spoke about this once, the incredible learnings that you have from a different perspective. It's quite interesting because if you work with a kid with autism, they don't take those social norms and work their world out from the social norms. They'll tell you how they see it, unfiltered, and there's something absolutely beautiful in understanding society through that lens. There's something that we can learn as a society from children and then adults as well that bring that perspective. When we have organizations that really empower those students and those people in building the skills so that they can contribute what they feel they have to offer, we build a better society, we build more equality into it, and I think that's incumbent upon us.

I think the complication of doing that is that there are so many systems at play, there are so many different levels, and we have to pick a place to start. I think that's what this is. This is a good place to start. There's a lot of commitment across the board from parents, from advocacy groups, and even within departments of government that want to improve the system, but it's extremely complicated, so you have to find and build a foundation. I think our government has been incredibly good at doing just that, of looking at a problem and saying that this is extremely complex.

I think the best way to have built it in the first place was to really look at these evidence-based practices from the beginning and build it that way. But that's not what happened, so we're at a point where systems are in place, and if you change something, that might mean that someone would lose funding. There are all of these complications, so it's making sure that as you transition, as you improve the system, you're also aware of how it impacts the people that are currently using the system. I believe that we have to find a starting point for this, and I think that's what this bill brings us to, that starting point.

Before I do that, I want to talk about some of the barriers that are experienced within other marginalized groups in addition to having a disability. In this particular example, like, I think of recently landed immigrants or refugees that come, and maybe they have – and I'll speak to children because that's more of my background. I have a background in early education and as an educational assistant, so I'll speak to that example. An immigrant coming in that has a family and they're just getting settled and they're rebuilding everything and they might not have family here to support them: what they want to do is be able to get jobs to support their family and have their child, you know, have the education that they want them to get. You know, this has happened. This has happened in many situations that I've come up to.

The family learning when the child has either a learning disability or a cognitive delay, whatever level that they have, or FCD or any other complication, I think is amplified. It's amplified by the fact that they're just getting settled. It's amplified by the fact that the experts that are going to be explaining to them what's happening, what the new processes in school are might not have the cultural background that they do. They might not have the language that they do. They're speaking on issues that are hard to understand even for native English speakers. When you add the fact that – and it's not as simple as adding a translator to it because even for a translator they might be able to say, "Your child has a cognitive delay," but they might not know what that means.

For that mother that wants to explore the issue with them, it's hard because not only are you hearing, you know, that there might be something wrong and you want to protect that child, but they're also hearing things that they don't quite understand, or even if they do, they're not quite sure what to do about it. You add a translator that might not know the cultural context, the background, maybe the history of stigmatization in the country that they're coming from or the history or whatever it is: it adds a complexity to it.

I mention this because I know that there are groups within Edmonton that work on this. The example that I'll give is Multicultural Health Brokers, which have brokers from different communities, so leaders within that community can be trained on the specific area of interest. Sometimes it's prenatal care. Sometimes it's children with disabilities. Sometimes it's managing all of those different systems. But when it comes to having these conversations with the multidisciplinary teams, which usually happens because we're moving towards this multidisciplinary team so we're all working to support that child, that can be really overwhelming. You can have a teacher at a table, you can have an educational assistant at the table, a speech pathologist, an occupational therapist, and all of them have all of these perspectives and have been working with the child, and you're not even really understanding exactly what it is that they're telling you, or you're getting it through a second channel of a translation from maybe someone that knows the words but doesn't understand the context of it.

I say that it's amplified because there are systems of support that you don't have naturally as an immigrant or as a person that is speaking a different language. I think that when we talk about building a framework of supporting persons with disabilities, we have to acknowledge the immense complexity of the issue because it's not something that will be addressed in one year or two years. I think that it would be something, you know, within my lifespan. I'm one of the younger members, but I think that even within my lifespan we'll still be working on it.

But I'm very optimistic that we are learning from our mistakes. I think that the more we address the fact that just having an advocate is a building block, but that person wouldn't have the sole responsibility of advocating for people with disabilities – I think that's important because there are a multitude of views of people that experience difficulties within the system, and we have to share that responsibility because it's so complicated.

I give the example, specifically, of an immigrant that's landed as an example of how amplified it is and how complicated it is because they will always say, like, that you'll never know a better advocate than someone that has a child with a disability because they have been advocating for that child since the start. [some applause] Thank you.

I'll just add something in there. Even in the Spanish community a landed immigrant: they're coming from a community where rocking the boat is fundamentally unacceptable. Just the fact that they're receiving some attention is good enough. Even though they want to help the student, it's overwhelming and it's really difficult, so I think there are added levels. This expectation that the parent should be the number one advocate: it's difficult for parents that are coming from a different place to take on given the cultural circumstances, given that if you were to do that in a different country, that might mean that your child isn't going to get that education in that school. It's just simply going to be kicked out if you rock the boat. It's not understanding that it's different here and having no one to really discuss that with and to talk about those differences with. It's difficult for families to take on. They take on as much as they can.

On top of that, the way that government is run in Canada is significantly different than in a lot of other countries. Knowing that there are options available is actually not something that many other countries have. Where do you go for these things?

I think that's why it's important, when we discuss this, to look at the broad spectrum of people that are affected and how we can make sure that everyone has a place to go and that we're actually doing it in a culturally sensitive approach, an approach that is really equalling the playing field because at the end of the day the better we are at supporting the diverse population that we have, the stronger the economy we'll have, the stronger the workforce, and the stronger we are as a society as well. I believe that it's really a fundamental purpose that the government has, to make sure that those supports are in place and to make sure that we're thinking about that. I'm not naive enough to think that that's not a complicated process.

Speaker's Ruling Decorum

The Deputy Speaker: Before I call on 29(2)(a), I just wanted to mention this morning, hon. members, that there have been a number of side conversations happening throughout the House, particularly, I'm noticing, in this corner. They start to escalate in volume. Not only does it become difficult to hear as the Speaker, but it is somewhat disrespectful to other members who might be trying to pay attention to the speaker who has the floor. I'd encourage you, if you want to have a lengthy conversation with a colleague, to please take it outside.

Standing Order 29(2)(a)? Go ahead, hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Debate Continued

Mr. Westhead: Yeah. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I want to compliment the Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park for bringing an incredibly important perspective to the debate in terms of marginalized communities. I just wonder if she might have some more remarks that she would wish to share with us.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member.

Cortes-Vargas: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I do. I have a few more, but I'm not going to try to get through it all today. It's something that is really important. I've talked about this before, but I actually have a learning disability myself. It's something that I learned to overcome with technology. I had the luxury of having a speech pathologist for a mother, so I was able to turn to somebody and know what those practices are. My little brother as well had a speech delay, and all through my high school I spent a lot of it actually doing play therapies with him at home. Me and my mom would take turns until you wouldn't actually be able to tell that he had a speech delay.

I think that the reason I'm so passionate about it is because I've seen so many success stories when it's done right. There's an incredible amount of potential to actually support and build skills in children that could change the way that they experience life, that could build those skills so they don't have to feel that everything in life is a barrier. I think that's what drove my passion.

When I was able to see the severity of the speech delay that my little brother had – you know, I had been helping my mom from pretty young. When he was born, I was actually 15, so he's quite younger. We call him the next generation of our family. He was 18 months old – we knew the points that you have to reach, like how much vocabulary you have to have at very specific points – and we would look at each other, and we were, like: he's not quite there. But you kind of check yourself because you might know too much and you might be reading into it. You don't know, so you always get a different perspective. In fact, it was true. He did have a speech delay. It took him three years to learn how to say my first name. As a person that was a main person in his life, that kind of speaks to the difficulty that he had.

But we didn't approach it as: he had an issue to deal with. We just approached it as: this is something that he had to practise. We were able to identify the speech delay that he had, we identified the play therapies that would be most beneficial to him, and we would take turns. My mom always worked in the afternoons after I got home from school, and then I would stay with my little brother. I would do play therapies, but it was always fun. He actually became very aware of the difficulties he had when he finally learned how to say a word, and then he would forget it. I know that through the commitment that we had of continuously doing this, because we knew that there could be success on the other side.

I think the comparison is that another child that was diagnosed with a very similar severity to what he had at 7 years old was still stuttering and was still very much not able to say the words and having issues vocalizing. Yet because of the intensive approach that we took – and I say "play therapy" because it very much was playing. We were playing with him, and it was just knowing how to reinforce words, knowing how to practise with him and how to not let go of certain things. Those are the things that we were focusing on. It allowed him to practise enough times that he was able to really develop the skills he didn't naturally come into. That's when people say, you know: he'll grow out of it. Sometimes you can; sometimes you can't. Sometimes it's a reality, and sometimes it's something you have to figure out. There are ways to assist that happening.

That's why, like, I'm a big advocate for early education. It's an incredible investment we can make as a society, and I have seen the differences that it makes in children's lives. I've seen the differences that it's made in my own family's life, but I've seen the differences in the countless numbers of classrooms that I've been in when people actually focus on those very skills that allow children to overcome those barriers. I think that when we talk about the systems and we talk about building mechanisms of accountability like having an advocate that looks at the systems and makes recommendations, it allows us to really focus on what the goal is, which is supporting our communities.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other hon. members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. A pleasure to rise and support this bill at second reading this morning. I'd really like to thank the Member for Calgary-North West for putting this forward. I think it's fitting that we're debating this today, recalling that the Member for Calgary-North West previously sat across the floor in a PC caucus that ostracized her and pushed her out. We're hearing rumours of a merge between these two parties happening today.

Mr. Gill: Come on. Stick to the bill.

Mr. Westhead: So I think it's fitting that they're, you know, pushing out progressives from that side that are bringing...

Mr. Gill: Alberta is going to push you all if we get down to the matter of it. Just stick to the bill.

Mr. Westhead: The Member for Calgary-Greenway is getting pretty upset about me speaking about how they pushed progressives out. You know, he's trying to tell me what I should say here in the House. If that's the way he wants to run the province, I think that's pretty unfortunate. [interjections] Interesting, Madam Speaker, this morning. They've got a bee in their bonnet over there. I guess they don't want to step on their news release.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, are you speaking to Bill 205?

Mr. Westhead: Yes, absolutely, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Proceed.

Mr. Westhead: I'm mentioning the fact that the bill came from a caucus member that used to belong to that caucus.

More importantly, I think what I'd like to talk about is Alberta parks and their inclusivity plan. I was fortunate a couple of weeks ago to visit the Member for Calgary-Shaw in Fish Creek park, where we were on Earth Day. I had the honour of speaking on behalf of the Minister of Environment and Parks. I was speaking about the everyone belongs outside campaign. I think that this is an incredibly important aspect of making sure that Alberta parks are inclusive for all Albertans.

I think that appreciation of our natural outdoor spaces is something that Albertans have as part of their identity, that we identify with our wilderness spaces, our trees, and our wildlife habitat. That means a lot of different things to different people. Some people like to just know that that's out there, and they may never anticipate participating in that. There's a continuum of people who just like to know that it's there. Then on the other side of the continuum there are people that want to live as much as they can in the outdoors. For people with a disability that can be a barrier, so I'm really proud that the Minister of Environment and Parks is making the everyone belongs outside campaign a priority.

I'd like to talk a little bit about that in terms of my constituency because we have a lot of provincial parks in Banff-Cochrane, and one of the crown jewels of that space in Kananaskis Country is William Watson Lodge. For those who aren't familiar with William Watson Lodge, it's an accessible facility that's designed for persons with disabilities. You know, they have made renovations – I suppose, actually, it was built this way in the first place to accommodate people who may be confined to a wheelchair and need assistance with bathing and this kind of thing. There are units that are created specifically with room for lifts in the washrooms, larger bedrooms and that kind of thing to accommodate a wheelchair.

This was a vision of Premier Lougheed back in the day, that when he created Kananaskis Country, he wanted to make sure that there was an opportunity for all Albertans to get outside, and I think that kind of visionary leadership is something that we can really be proud of here in Alberta. You know, the former government lost touch with that vision, and that's unfortunate.

I think that what we're doing here today in creating an advocate for people with disabilities can go a long way, you know, to the day-to-day things that those folks find challenging but also in terms of getting people to enjoy the outdoors, too, because we don't want them to be constrained in that respect.

I had a really fortunate opportunity. I think it was in the summer of 2015 that I attended William Watson Lodge in Kananaskis Country, and they had their grand opening of what they call comfort camping. It's a unit that's kind of bare bones in terms of – like, I don't think there's a TV or that kind of thing. It's meant to be kind of an equivalent to tent camping for people with disabilities, but it has a good wheelchair ramp and good accessibility within, so it's a little bit more rustic type of facility than what you find in the rest of William Watson Lodge. That was the first of many units that they were contemplating constructing, and I understand that they've built a few more since then. I think that it's incredibly important to give everybody the ability to access parks.

I want to just go over a few of the details of the everybody belongs outside initiative that Alberta Environment and Parks has undertaken. I'd like to read a little bit from the document and the strategy in terms of planning how we want to go about making sure our parks are inclusive. There's a document that I would be happy to table. It's quite lengthy, but I think it's important in terms of the discussion that we're having today to bring that to the table and share that strategy. The document has a section entitled The Importance of Inclusion in Parks, and it begins like this.

The Alberta Human Rights Act recognizes the “inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all persons [...] without regard to race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry, place of origin, marital status, source of income, family status or sexual orientation.” The inclusion plan builds on the Alberta Human Rights Act through a commitment in Alberta's Plan for Parks to “increase opportunities for, and invite full participation of, all Albertans.” This inclusion plan is about more than [just] human rights. It is about building public support for the landscapes and experiences that make up Alberta's network of parks.

I've specifically singled out William Watson Lodge because that's what I'm most familiar with, but I do understand that in parks across the province there are plans to create pathways, paved pathways, that make it easier for folks to access those. It's a holistic strategy in terms of making our parks more accessible and allowing people to enjoy the outdoors.

Park agencies [around the world] are struggling for relevance in a changing and complex world. Alberta is no exception. Our province has experienced tremendous population growth in the past decade. Immigration and migration, more people living with disabilities, and a rise in active senior citizens make Albertans more socially diverse than ever. In addition, the growth of cities and gateway communities, the emergence of non-traditional outdoor activities, competition for the attention of youth, and the rise of nature-deficit disorder make it more challenging than ever for parks to effectively engage people.

A priority action in Alberta's Plan for Parks is to implement a province-wide inclusion strategy to remove barriers and create opportunities for all Albertans to be involved and inspired by Alberta's parks. For nature and outdoor recreation to be relevant in Alberta's changing society, park programs must engage people as diverse as the wild ecosystems protected within park boundaries.

There's a question here. How does the plan fit in the greater plan for Alberta's parks?

Alberta's Plan for Parks ensures that the management of parks aligns with the Government of Alberta's strategic direction. The Plan presents an exciting vision that Alberta Parks inspire people to discover, value, protect and enjoy the natural world, and all its benefits for current and future generations. Through inclusion, more people can be involved in making this vision a reality.

Alberta's Plan for Parks also outlines key planning elements that complement Alberta's Land-use Framework, and identifies Four Priority Actions based on feedback from Albertans. The inclusion plan supports three of these Priority Actions:

Strategy #1: Involve Albertans. Albertans want more involvement in decisions about parks and in the delivery of parks programs. The inclusion plan will ensure that Albertans from all backgrounds are invited and welcome to participate in dialogue about how parks operate.

Strategy #2: Offer Modern Facilities, Policies and Programs. Albertans want modern amenities, more inclusive facilities and well-maintained trails. The inclusion plan will create a foundation to understand and address the changing needs of visitors.

Strategy #3, Providing Recreation Opportunities, directly commits to the development and implementation of an inclusion plan. Albertans want more access to recreation opportunities and the inclusion plan will increase opportunities for, and invite full participation of, all Albertans.

Madam Speaker, whenever we engage in a strategy, we also need to look at outcomes to measure how well the plan we've put in place is working, so there are some outcomes that have been identified in this plan that I'd like to share with members this morning.

This inclusion plan supports the positive contributions that people can make in daily operations and long-term planning throughout Alberta's network of parks. A successful inclusion plan will ensure the full participation of diverse Albertans as visitors, participants, volunteers and employees, or partners. This will be measured over time by how well the Parks Division has achieved the following key outcomes:

- Decrease in physical and other barriers to accessing parks.
- Increase in knowledge of park recreation and stewardship opportunities among diverse communities.
- Increase in participation by diverse communities and new users in aspects of park programming such as experiences, consultation, volunteerism and employment and partnerships.

And, finally,

- Improved attitudes toward social diversity among visitors, partners and staff.

The second-last point I mentioned there regarding volunteers is something I'd like to expand a little bit on. I think that one of the greatest things that I've found in my role as an MLA is seeing the amount of volunteerism that our communities support. You know, I always knew this existed in Alberta and elsewhere throughout Canada. We're a very helping society, and we want to look after one another, and I think the amount of volunteerism that we see is a testament to how strong that community feeling is amongst Albertans. Volunteers make the world go around, and if it weren't for people who step up to the plate and help their neighbours and roll up their sleeves in good times and in bad times and help one another – it's a value that's held very dear by people.

One good example that I can think of specifically is from Canmore and the Nordic Centre, which was born out of the 1988 Olympics. One of the proponents of sport there told me a really telling thing about volunteers. He said that a lot of people think of the Olympic legacy as the structures that we have like the ski jump at Canada Olympic Park, the biathlon range, and the Nordic Centre in Canmore. Sometimes people point to those facilities as our Olympic legacy, but this gentleman put it another way. He said that the actual legacy is the volunteers because it takes a huge network and community of volunteers to put on events like the Special Olympics.

I understand that in cross-country skiing the athletes will have up to about eight different pairs of skis that they bring with them. It all depends on the snow conditions. Especially thinking of persons with disabilities and the Special Olympics, the snow conditions and the terrain that they're travelling on makes a big difference. It's incredible.

I enjoy skiing at the Nordic Centre myself, and I see people skiing there who have only one arm. You know, they're flying like a bird. It's incredible to see how those facilities that we have and the volunteers that help make that happen help people of all different ability levels, and it's quite heartwarming to see that. When we think about volunteers that help one another and help people in their community, I think that volunteers deserve recognition for the work that they do. It's incredibly important.

You know, I think I've touched on some fairly significant points within my constituency, and I know that we've had an interesting debate this morning. I'd like to thank everyone for the conversation that they've added to, and I certainly encourage everyone to support the bill.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? Seeing none, any other speakers to the bill? The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and speak in favour of Bill 205. I would like to begin by thanking the Member for Calgary-North West and the cosponsor, the Member for St. Albert, for bringing forward this bill and for their advocacy when it comes to persons with varying abilities.

Madam Speaker, we live in a society, if we look around, that consists of people with varying abilities. Everybody has some abilities. They may not be the same. Even in this House we all bring different skill sets, different abilities. As government I want to say that we want a society that is inclusive of people with all abilities. To that end, it's important that people have their voices heard, and this bill certainly will bring forward the voices of those who have not been included as much as they could have been. Certainly, there are many organizations out in communities, but this role of advocate will help co-ordinate those efforts and bring forward the voices of persons with disabilities.

I will have more to say about it at a later stage. I just wanted to thank the Member for Calgary-North West and the Member for St. Albert for bringing forward this bill and for their advocacy.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? Seeing none, are there any other speakers to the bill? Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

Hon. Members: Question.

[Motion carried; Bill 205 read a second time]

10:40 Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 205 Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Chair. As Minister of Community and Social Services I have a very active interest in Bill 205, introduced by the Member for Calgary-North West and sponsored by my colleague the Member for St. Albert. In discussion around this bill we had a great discussion, so I want to take this opportunity to thank all my colleagues from all sides of the House who have shared their experiences in this area. Certainly, it takes all of us working together to ensure that all Albertans can reach their full potential and can be included meaningfully in society. This legislation certainly is an example of how we as elected members can come together and make life better for all Albertans. I offer my support for this legislation. I'm of the view that this legislation will benefit and include people with disabilities. I will offer some remarks, and then I have some amendments for consideration.

The proposed role of the advocate will be to respond to concerns from the disability community and will also bring forward their voices to the table where decisions are made with respect to disabilities. What I heard very loud and clear over the period of the last two years was: Nothing about Us without Us. That means that they want to be included in those decision-making processes. They are certainly better judges of their issues, and they must be part of those discussions. This office of the advocate can serve to identify those issues of concern, review programs and policies, provide an arm's-length perspective from the work of the ministry and staff. The advocate will provide advice to government to help avoid situations where people get off track and fall through the cracks.

The legislation will also enable the advocate to promote rights and trust and well-being of persons with disabilities through public education. Education and awareness are important roles for any individual in the position of an advocate, and it works both ways. I envision that this role will also help people looking for information as not all of us are proficient at navigating through the systems. Having a person who can ensure that connections are made to information which, in turn, lead to accessing services will make a significant difference to people who can be overwhelmed in our busy and often complex world. Helping Albertans understand the experiences and challenges of individuals living with disabilities can go a long way to breaking down barriers and making our community more inclusive on many levels. By learning about the range of challenges, we can remove the obstacles that currently prevent individuals from accessing information and resources.

I see this as information sharing that works both ways. The advocate will provide information to government about where, when, what, and why people are having difficulty accessing services and programs. In turn, the government will have another direct line to hear about these challenges and work with the advocate and community members to identify a solution and make sure that information and programs are accessible.

I'm proposing a few amendments to the legislation, which I would like to outline and explain for the members. Here are the requisite number of copies. Do you want me to wait, Madam Chair?

The Chair: Please. Just give me a moment.

This will be known as amendment A1.

Go ahead, hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you. The bill is amended as follows:

- A Section 2 is amended
 - (a) in subsection (1) by striking out "duties and functions set out in this Act" and substituting "role, duties and functions and exercise the powers set out in this Act and the regulations";
 - (b) by striking out subsection (3);
 - (c) in subsection (4) by striking out "duties" and substituting "role, duties and functions and exercising the Advocate's powers".
- B Section 3(2) is amended
 - (a) in clause (c) by striking out "processes in which decisions" and substituting "consultations in which systemic decisions";
 - (b) by striking out clause (f) and substituting the following:
 - (f) provide education as needed to ensure individuals having difficulty accessing services and related programs for persons with disabilities are aware of appropriate resources, persons and organizations;
 - (c) by adding the following after clause (g):
 - (h) exercise any other power prescribed in the regulations.
- C Section 5 is amended by adding the following after clause (a):
 - (a.1) prescribing other powers of the Advocate;
- D Section 6 is amended
 - (a) in subsection (1) by striking out "one year" and substituting "2 years";

- (b) in subsection (5) by striking out "report is tabled" and substituting "report is referred".

I will try to explain the rationale behind these amendments.

The amendments with respect to section 2 are mostly administrative changes. They eliminate section 3 and combine the role, duties, and functions of the advocate under subsection (1). Subsection (4) is amended just to ensure consistent language with subsection (1), which is the role, duties, and functions.

In Section 3(2) I propose a clarifying change by amending clause (c) to clarify that the advocate will not be involved in the everyday decision-making process regarding individuals, but he will participate in more broad systemic level decision-making in any consultation with respect to disability programs. I also propose that clause (f) be amended to clarify that the advocate provides education as needed so that individuals having difficulties accessing services and related programs are aware of appropriate resources, persons, or organizations.

Certainly, there are other advisory committees as well such as the Premier's council on persons with disabilities, PDD Provincial Advisory Committee, PDD Provincial Self-advocates' Advisory Committee, FSCD Provincial Parent Advisory Committee, and FASD advisory council. Similarly, there are community organizations as well such as the Alberta Disabilities Forum, Disability Action Hall, Inclusion Alberta, Voice of Albertans with Disabilities. And there are service provider organizations: Alberta Council of Disability Services, Alberta Disability Workers Association, Align, Alberta brain injury network. Our hope is that the advocate will help us to put together information and resources for individuals who are facing any challenges accessing our programs.

The addition of clause (h) highlights the advocate's powers in the regulations, while clause (g) was only focused on functions. So this will give us room for expanding the powers of the advocate as needed.

Section 5 supports the addition of clause (a.1).

Lastly, in section 6 I propose amending the required time from one year to two years for the advocate to provide a report evaluating its effectiveness. That will give the advocate sufficient time to set up and establish normal operations and be able to meaningfully evaluate its own procedures and make suggestions to the committee for improvements.

These are all the amendments. Thank you very much. I look forward to further discussion on this issue.

The Chair: On amendment A1, the hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the chance to rise on amendment A1. It's timely, and I will consider carefully the amendment. It's particularly timely because all members of the Legislature received an e-mail from Inclusion Alberta this morning, who the mover of the amendment mentioned in his remarks.

I think it's worth reading out loud what this says.

It is the considered opinion of Inclusion Alberta that for 'Bill 205: Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act' to be effective and meaningful it must be amended and its inherent limitations understood. We appreciate having had the opportunity to discuss some of our suggestions . . . [with the MLA for Calgary-North West] who introduced the Bill and her willingness to thoughtfully consider a number of our points. In addition, we appreciate the interest of other MLAs, their respective Parties and their consideration of possible Amendments to strengthen the Act.

I understand that our Liberal Party member may have some of those amendments. Then it says to please look at the PDF attached.

I spoke in second reading in favour of this bill, Madam Chair, and my opinion hasn't changed. I still think it's a good bill. I still think the hon. member that brought it forward deserves to be thanked for that. I haven't changed my opinion on that. But I think even the hon. member that brought it forward and members of the government would say that Inclusion Alberta is one of the voices that we ought to listen to when we are considering this and other amendments to this bill.

In that vein, here are some of the things, and I will compare these things to the amendment before us because, again, I believe Inclusion Alberta is an important voice to hear. It says:

We believe, to be effective BILL 205, should be amended to ensure:

1. there is sufficient independence and power for the Advocate to make a valued and positive difference, which would require the Advocate to be situated within the Legislative Assembly and not a ministry,
2. the Advocate's actions ensure equality and equity for persons with disabilities relative to Albertans without disabilities,
3. the Act identifies which activities the Advocate must engage in and which activities are optional,
4. the Advocate is guided by the principles of community inclusion as articulated in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (UNCRPD), and
5. the Advocate, as in keeping with the title of the proposed Act, represents all individuals with disabilities, including their families, regardless of age or disability or where their interest lies with respect to government ministries, programs or funding.

It goes on to say:

In our view individuals with disabilities as Albertans and citizens are entitled and due the proper consideration of its government and Legislature and as such an Act as important as that of an Advocate for Persons with Disabilities, ought to have been brought forward by the Government and only after extensive consultation with the disability community. This approach would more likely have ensured the development of an Advocate's office for Persons with Disabilities had the authority and independence to be an effective voice.

So they seem to be complaining a little bit about the lack of consultation.

They put in red, interestingly enough:

... Private Member's Bill to become a government Bill. While we support this decision, we wish to reiterate our desire to see the government fully consult with the disability community ...

Again, a bit of a complaint by the sounds of it.

... on how an Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act can be best structured to ensure the office is both independent, supportive of inclusion as a means to equality and equity of life outcomes to Albertans without disabilities.

Now, in fairness, Madam Chair, Inclusion Alberta goes on to compliment the Member for Calgary-North West for the work she has done, and I echo that as well.

I think this is something where we should consider both the good and the bad parts, I suppose you could say, of the letter from Inclusion Alberta because I think we can all agree that they are one of those voices that has earned the right to be heard, not least of all because to a large degree they are the voice of disabled people in Alberta organized in such a fashion to make life better for disabled people in Alberta. I think all hon. members in this House ought to respect that, ought to listen to that, and ought to do our best to understand and, where possible, act on that.

Looking at the amendments – and, of course, we just got them from our Liberal member. I hope that when he gets on his feet again, he will expand a little bit about what he's got here. I'm looking particularly at part B, subsection (c), under (h), where it says: "exercise any other power prescribed in the regulations." Now, this ...

The Chair: Hon. member, are you speaking to – a government amendment is what's on the floor right now.

Mr. McIver: Madam Chair, respectfully, I was just reading right out of it so I can comment on it. So, yes, ma'am.

The Chair: I'm just making sure that you're on the correct amendment.

Mr. McIver: Yes, ma'am. What you're asking is exactly what I'm doing.

An Hon. Member: You said the Liberal member.

The Chair: Yeah. You said the member from the Liberal Party.

Mr. McIver: The Liberal member also suggested he was going to put some amendments, so thank you.

The minister's motion, again, which we just got, will take a few minutes to absorb. I may have more to say on it after we get a little more time to look at it. But, hopefully, the minister will explain part B, subsection (c), under (h): "exercise any other power prescribed in the regulations." Now, on the surface this seems a little bit at odds with what Inclusion Alberta is asking for, and I would like to explain why.

While it sounds like a good thing, it seems to be limiting the advocate's ability to advocate to what the legislation specifically allows the advocate to advocate for. I believe that Inclusion Alberta is looking for more of an open-ended ability for advocacy – because in the section that I just read it said all persons with disability without exception and their family members, without regard for their age – in other words, a more empowering scope of authority rather than a limiting scope of authority. I'm certainly not saying that the minister's amendment is not well meaning, but I think the minister might even agree with me that if you put any limits on the advocate's ability to advocate, that is at odds with what Inclusion Alberta is suggesting in the section that I read out ever so recently in this House.

Mr. Sabir: That's subsection (h)?

Mr. McIver: Subsection (h).

I would say that, again, like other members of the House other than the minister, I have only had this in my hands for a very few minutes and have not had time to do research on it, but that's the one thing that struck me immediately that requires some further explanation before we vote on it. I think, again, without being able to compare it directly, in the time allowed, with the act – and when I look at the sections by contrast, I look at the amendment in part B, under subsection (b), where it says:

- (f) provide education as needed to ensure individuals having difficulty accessing services and related programs for persons with disabilities are aware of appropriate resources, persons and organizations.

I'll have to read the rest of that section in the original legislation.

That sounds like a good thing. It sounds like people advocating for persons with disabilities and those persons that might be employed by the advocate will be given the education they need in order to do an effective job. That's where I'm hoping to get an explanation from the minister because I looked at two sections right before each other where one looks like it needs to be fixed and the other one looks like it is actually strengthening the legislation and making it better.

I probably wouldn't be surprised if I'm on my feet again later on talking about this, again, because of the short time I've had to look at it. Hopefully, at some point, Madam Chair, we will have the minister on his feet, and perhaps the minister would do me the courtesy of expanding upon and putting an explanation on those two sections that I have asked about just now.

Thank you for this opportunity.

The Chair: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 205 and the amendments. I just wanted to say a couple of things that I do appreciate about the amendment. It's extending the time to two years, which I think is important, that the folks entrusted with doing the advocacy work not be solely focused when they're getting started on preparing a report. It does take time, and as we all know, advocacy takes time.

To the member across the way, I certainly am aware of Inclusion Alberta and the work that they do, but they are one voice. It is one organization, one provincial organization, but they are one voice, and they do not speak for all people with disabilities. You know, I want to couch that with saying that they are an incredibly valuable organization. The current CEO of Inclusion Alberta and I were both able to sit on the PDD safety standards consultation, and that took many months. It took us all across Alberta. One of the recommendations that we came up with together was the creation of an advocate, and that's what this is.

I understand that they're setting the bar here. Who wouldn't want a Cadillac immediately? I would. In a real world that's just not possible. The fiscal reality that we're in right now is tough, so I would rather begin with something as good as an advocate and then work towards the Cadillac. I think that particularly when times are tight like they are, I don't want to remove any more front-line dollars than absolutely necessary, so that's why this is so important.

I wanted to speak about some of the systems that an advocate like this would use to help people with disabilities, their families, and allies. It would absolutely help them navigate and sort through these very complex and, in many cases, very, very old systems.

The first one I want to talk about is assured income for the severely handicapped. Let's just put it right out there: you know, maybe it's time for a name change. Assured income for the severely handicapped isn't exactly respectful and doesn't really address the sort of reality of the folks who are receiving that benefit. Obviously, the Auditor General made some very good recommendations, which I wasn't surprised to see, which I was actually very happy to see, and I'm also very happy to hear from the minister that they are seriously looking at making systemic changes. This has been long overdue. I think the community has been asking for changes for many, many years.

I think what's really important is about consultation. As we're making changes to AISH, every piece of AISH, it's important to bring in people with disabilities, their families, and allies and get them to tell us what would work.

The other thing I wanted to say about AISH is that we already know it's tough to get on. It's also tough sometimes for people who are working. It's very easy for them to get kicked off. For example, if they forget to send in pay stubs for a month or two, very quickly they find themselves in a really serious situation. So there are a lot of examples of where advocates are needed.

You know, another question that an advocate may in fact be faced with and help someone navigate is that – I don't know if AISH is still doing this – at one point people were encouraged to apply for early CPP, and what that meant was a reduction in their overall benefit as well as a reduction overall because of the early application. It would reduce the monthly amount they'd be eligible for. Those are really important things to look at and to talk about.

The other issue that an advocate might look at is that people with disabilities, just like all of us, sometimes end up in trouble and sometimes end up in the justice system. It is the practice right now that for people who are incarcerated or hospitalized long term, for more than three months, they lose their benefits. What that translates to is sometimes a loss of housing, so it is contributing to a homelessness problem. Those are just some examples of some of the systemic problems in AISH that I know an advocate would help with.

Another system that I don't know if all members are aware of is called aids to daily living. It's also a support that people with disabilities and chronic illnesses are able to apply for, and it helps them with the cost of supplies and equipment to manage a long-term disability or illness. It's about $500 a month. You know, sometimes that is difficult to navigate, and I think an advocate would also help here. One of the suggestions that I know we've talked about and that we will be, I'm sure, looking at in the near future is that there are other things that are not listed on ADL, or aids to daily living, that I know would be of help to people with disabilities, things like the cost, care, and maintenance of a service dog.

I'm going to spend a little bit of time on persons with developmental disabilities because this is a system that I do know quite well. Obviously, it's a massive system. It supports over 11,000 people across Alberta. It's an old system, that was created a long time ago, and I think it's trying its very best to meet the very real and new needs of people with disabilities, but it's struggling. I'm glad that we are open and ready to look at what needs to be changed, what needs to be enhanced, and where an advocate is needed.

For those of you that don't know, persons with developmental disabilities provides support to people with disabilities and their families in a couple of different ways. Sometimes a person with a disability will receive support, and they pay for staffing hours. They don't pay for rent; they pay for staffing hours. It'll pay through a service provider – we've heard lots of them named here today – or they'll go through a contract that's called family-managed care. Family-managed care is really just what it says, that a person with a disability is able to either receive the funding themselves or have a family member or a friend manage that contract so that they can hire staff and get the training they need and can have the assistance they need to live in their community, to work in their community, to access their community. Through a service provider it is a little different. The service provider will receive the funds to be able to hire the staff for the person with a disability.

I want to tell you a little bit of a story that I think will illustrate some of the systemic issues that are facing people with disabilities and their supporters in Alberta. They're very real examples, and I think they illustrate why these changes are so important. Inclusion Alberta, as we've heard from a lot of people, is an organization that advocates for people with disabilities in Alberta. They've been really outside of the box and forward thinking, and they certainly deserve a lot of credit. One of the programs they operate is around postsecondary education. It actually started at the U of A – it was called on campus – and what they do is that they work with the university and they work with a student with a disability so that they're able to attend that postsecondary institution as a noncredit student. They're able to attend different classes. They get involved in all the social activities. When they finish in four years, just like any other student, it enhances their resume. It helps to promote employment. It's just part of a normal continuum. So they've come from elementary, junior high, high school, where they've been included, and they go on to postsecondary education and then, hopefully, employment if that's something that they're able to do.

The problem is that there are limited spaces, and Inclusion Alberta or programs like on campus are unable to meet everybody's needs. I have a story about a woman – and this is why Inclusion Alberta does not speak for everybody. They have a wonderful voice, but they don't speak for everybody. I'm sure you've heard me speak about Leah McRorie before. She is an advocate. She's just a tiny little thing, but she's an advocate that is a force to be reckoned with. I think somebody said earlier today that the most powerful advocates are parents of children with disabilities, and they are. She is one of those people.

When her daughter Taisa was a young student, Leah noticed that she was a musician. She had the spirit of a musician. She may have had some mobility challenges, she was unable to communicate verbally, but she was still a musician. She wanted to go to Vic high school – well, comprehensive school now, I suppose – so she showed up there. She didn't have any assistance from an organization. She showed up there, and she paved the way for her daughter to be able to attend Vic. She even, from what I hear, got her daughter to band camp at Vic. She tells me a little bit about what it did for her daughter but also what it did for the students and the staff of Vic.

Anyway, of course, her daughter Taisa wanted to go on to postsecondary education, and they were unable to get support through Inclusion Alberta. By the way, I just want to say that there are 18 postsecondary institutions across Alberta that now include students with a disability. So she showed up at MacEwan, their arts program, and she talked to them about Taisa. Of course, you know, the normal reaction is: "What? You can't do this. She's not able to communicate verbally. This is an audition-based program. She doesn't have the academic ability." But Leah doesn't stop ever, so she continued to advocate, and she connected with a man who is actually with fine arts and communications, I believe. His name is Allan Gilliland. I'm mispronouncing his name, I'm sure. So she started to advocate and speak to this man. As it turns out, this man was also involved in the band camp that her daughter had gone to, so he knew exactly who Taisa was.

So her daughter attended. Through family-managed supports her daughter attended, and she went to MacEwan for four years. She's finished now, and she's a musician. She had family-managed supports. Her mom, Leah, helped her with staffing and transportation. The staff provided all of that support while she was on campus, and four years later this young woman has graduated in her own way, in a way that meets her needs. I know that is life changing for people. But she wouldn't have been able to do that had she not had the advocate mom that she has.

Now, sadly, far too many people with disabilities do not have those kinds of advocates. Often they don't have family members. Often they've grown up in care. They may have a public guardian whose caseloads are massive, or they have a private guardian who just doesn't have the ability to advocate for the things that their person needs. So an advocate like the one we're proposing is so incredibly vital.

I want to tell you a little bit about another sort of systemic problem that will also highlight the importance of an advocate. A few years ago, when I was the director of an organization, a service provider that provides people with disabilities, we were approached by government to take on some people that were going to be moved from the Michener Centre in Red Deer to Edmonton. It was three men, three of which who had spent the majority of their lives in Michener Centre, and they were going to be transitioned out.

Now, the previous government did undertake sort of a movement to close Michener Centre and to move people out to the community. I'm not going to speak to that necessarily. What I will say is that I will always support community living over segregation in any way, shape, or form. However, there are always mitigating factors.

There were problems with the plan although there were a number of people from different ministries involved in the transition planning. When the rubber hit the road, the transition plan truly fell apart. I think you probably heard in the news about six people, seniors, who had spent their lives there that had been transitioned out, put into long-term care, and died very soon after that. It's not really surprising, you know, if they were taken out of an environment that's the only environment they've really known.

The three people that we took on and brought were also very challenging as they had spent the majority of their lives there. Now, you have to understand what that means. They don't have the connections to their communities. They don't have connections to their families. They don't have the natural supports that we all enjoy. They don't have the supports that people who grow up and live in the community have. It's just not there. When you pluck them out of their home, the only home they've known, and you put them in a community for their well-being – and it was well intentioned; I know this – you're going to cause a lot of problems.

For us it was reintegrating these folks into a community or into relationships that they had not had since they were young children with siblings. Their parents had passed on. It was incredibly stressful and tough, and it was incredibly stressful and tough for the family members, who were now dealing with these adult siblings that they really didn't know and they didn't understand. I won't even get into all of the other things that present if you institutionalize someone, but they are truly, truly significant.

The other thing I want to talk a little bit about with persons with developmental disabilities, which is really a department of the ministry, is that it was established and built a long time ago, and the criteria for those supports were also built a very long time ago.

There are three things that they talk about that you need to meet in order to be eligible for support, one of which is IQ. Your IQ has to be at 70 or lower. The other thing is that I believe you need to meet 6 out of the 24 skill sets or domains that they identify. Those would be things like: do you need assistance with grooming or personal care; do you need assistance with transportation; do you need assistance with, you know, managing daily living things like preparing food or eating, those kinds of things? The other piece is that, obviously, you have to be an adult and you have to be an Albertan or you have to have lived here, I think, for a certain amount of time. The other piece, if I'm not mistaken, is that the disability has to have been acquired before the age of 18. Obviously, this is a problem.

I'm sure many of you have had constituents come into your office and say: "You know, listen. I'm not sure what to do. I don't meet the criteria established by PDD, but I can't function in the community. I can't get a job. I can't learn a job. I can't learn a bus route. I can't prepare my own food. I can't manage my money. I can't apply for AISH. I can't do all of these things because I don't have the assistance that I need." This is another example of why an advocate is so essential.

I'll tell you about a person that I know. I won't say his real name because he's still around. He was diagnosed as a young person with Asperger's, which is on the autism spectrum. He could probably recite every word that is written in all of the Harry Potter books, but he couldn't really do a grocery shopping list, buy his groceries, and prepare his food without assistance. You can see how things get a little tough for people.

The other issue that I wanted to talk a little bit about around advocacy is that when service providers or larger organizations – sometimes they're small – provide supports to people with disabilities and they're full or they don't have the capacity to take on new people or the waiting list gets too large, people are sometimes forced or encouraged, because there isn't a whole lot else around, to seek out family-managed care. That can be really tough.

For any of you that have run a business or managed an organization, you know what's involved with human resources, with recruiting staff, with doing background checks, with doing police clearance, with signing them up, with the ongoing training, even with remittances, with payroll. All of those things are very, very tough. Now, imagine having to do that yourself. You're a parent, you might have a job, maybe you're a senior, and you're trying to do this for your adult child because there is nothing else. It's like a full-time job when you're trying to manage probably a job of your own to support yourself. This is tough.

I know that there are only a few centres in Alberta that actually are set up, hubs, to support people on family-managed care. I know that Gateway provides some assistance. I'm quite certain Inclusion Alberta does. I think there's one in Calgary. I know there's a group . . . [Ms Renaud's speaking time expired]

Thanks.

The Chair: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Chair. I will speak briefly to the comments made by the hon. Member for Calgary-Hays. The first thing changed was that the bill as it's drafted now only refers to duties and functions, so we expanded that to include role, duties, functions, and exercise of power. That change made section 2(3) redundant with this section. That's why we took out that section. Since we are giving that power in section 2, in the role and functions of the advocate section, we needed to include to perform any functions and exercise the powers. That was flowing from that change that we made in section 2.

With respect to education as needed, as the Member for St. Albert pointed out, there are many organizations out there who have information available, so we don't want the advocate to duplicate all those resources. Wherever the advocate sees a gap, they can provide that information as needed. That was, I guess, the purpose behind it. I guess that will also allow the advocate to choose where he thinks that education is necessary.

In section 5 the change with respect to prescribing power was just to correspond with what his roles and functions are, which are about the exercise of power, so they needed authority to create those powers. That was the change.

In the last section I don't think you commented with respect to two years. That's what we thought would be a reasonable time for an advocate to get set up, established, and be able to provide a meaningful report about the role and what needed to be improved.

With that, I move to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Mr. Sabir: I move that the committee rise and report progress.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Ms Sweet: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 205. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Opposed? So ordered.

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: I'll call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 11 Public Interest Disclosure (Whistleblower Protection) Amendment Act, 2017

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek.

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to speak in support of Bill 11, the Public Interest Disclosure (Whistleblower Protection) Amendment Act, 2017, a little bit in the area of reprisals because that's one thing that concerns a lot of people. When they think about speaking up about a concern or of evidence of wrongdoing in their workplace, it's very worrying because they don't know what the consequences will be. Obviously, we do want a good public service. We want a fair, honest, and transparent public sector. So it's very important that people be given the protection to be able to speak up when they decide it's appropriate.

Of course, one of the fears is that they will have reprisals brought by their employers. There is some protection in regard to that right now. Right now any employer in the public sector can be prosecuted for punishing an employee who exposes a wrongdoing, but there's no mechanism in place at the present time to determine what kind of restitution should be made to the whistle-blower if they are the subject of an unlawful punishment. I'm delighted to say that the new regulation would enable the Labour Relations Board to order remedies when there has been a reprisal.

There are certain cases where having their job back might just not work. If there's been a very poisonous atmosphere created through the wrongdoing, through the whistle-blowing, or whatever conflict there was, that may be very difficult, so a worker might be entitled to compensation. In that case the board can decide what is appropriate, and the board's order would be enforceable like a court order, which is really good to hear. Of course, one difficulty is that a lot of times these things take their own sweet time to work their way through, but hopefully there will be some more protection maybe written into the bill for situations like that.

It's very important that employees feel safe and free from reprisal. We talked about government-contracted entities, too, people not directly employed by the government but contracted. If there's alleged wrongdoing in those situations, the legislation is being proposed to cover the government-contracted people and that they have some protections given, too. There will be some consultation with government contractors and delegated service providers to look at details of how to move on there.

One of the questions that came up was about when the person is not able to lay a complaint of wrongdoing with their official agent. That is a little bit tricky because that means they are applying to or will go straight to the Public Interest Commissioner. That's really important. The commissioner would investigate situations like that, that come directly before them, and the person is protected from reprisal.

There are a number of things here. The commissioner investigates incidents of workplace bullying and harassment. We've talked about that a lot. In the event of wrongdoing in relation to that, any collective agreement or employer policy would have to be accessed first, and then the commissioner has jurisdiction after other options have been exhausted.

Government department and public-sector entities covered by the act are required to have procedures related to how their designated officer will investigate and address complaints, but that's the thing that I was mentioning. If the officer fails to investigate or if the whistle-blower is not satisfied with the decision of the designated officer, then the Public Interest Commissioner can begin their own investigation. In that case, the whistle-blower could approach their boss or direct supervisor about a wrongdoing, and at that moment their protection from reprisal would start. Then they would go directly to the commissioner. The official report would still have to be made to the designated officer or directly to the commissioner.

The whistle-blower and their supervisor could discuss the issue beforehand if the whistle-blower chooses. If the supervisor is supportive, then they could help the whistle-blower take the matter to the designated officer or the commissioner. That way, designated officers would still be responsible for investigating all complaints. There's no obligation for the supervisor to take that job on.

Since the act applies to a very large assortment of public-sector entities, maintaining a formal disclosure process helps to ensure consistency in the application of the act. It makes the process more comfortable and accessible for potential whistle-blowers, but it still makes sure that everybody is on the same page as far as reporting information.

That's about it. The process. The Public Interest Commissioner also investigates reprisal claims. And I mentioned the Labour Relations Board. The board would appoint one of its senior members, either the chair or one of the vice-chairs, to hear the matter and order the remedy. Hearings would be conducted as determined by the board. They could summon witnesses, and their decision would be final. Remedies could include reinstatement, compensation for lost wages, or other such things. Then the board would be required to provide a copy of all their reasons and restitution orders to the commissioner for inclusion in the commissioner's annual report.

Thank you, Madam Chair. That's about all I wish to add at this time.

The Chair: Any other questions, comments, or amendments with respect to Bill 11?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[The remaining clauses of Bill 11 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Opposed? That's carried.

Mr. Carlier: I would like the committee to now rise and report.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bill with amendments: Bill 11.

The Deputy Speaker: Having heard the report, does the Assembly concur?

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Opposed? So ordered.

Government Bills and Orders

Third Reading

New Home Buyer Protection Amendment Act, 2017

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today to move third reading on behalf of the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Since the introduction of this bill I've had many conversations with the people in my community, and they are very thankful for us moving forward with this important piece of legislation. I can tell you that I've heard many similar stories throughout the years. A family works hard to save up for their dream home. They do as much research as they can to find a reputable builder who seems experienced, only to later find out that the deal has fallen through and to have to deal with the ramifications of such. These stories are not unique. They have been shared with many of us in the room, and we've heard many stories from the members here as well as in our constituencies and throughout the community.

It is our duty as elected representatives of the people of Alberta to ensure that we are protecting the best interests of those we represent. That's why I am proud to be a part of this government. We have an opportunity today to pass legislation that would protect consumers and empower them to make informed decisions.

Bill 12 will create a builder licensing framework that will put consumers first while supporting Alberta's many reputable builders. As we've debated builder licensing, members on both sides of the aisle have shared their stories of working in residential construction, and they have experienced first-hand the professionalism and knowledge of many of Alberta's builders. Under this new framework these good builders will no longer be competing with fly-by-night companies that cut corners and undercut good builders out of the market. We've worked hand in hand with builders along with other key industry stakeholders and Alberta homeowners in the development of this licensing framework.

This licensing framework includes requirements for residential builders to hold an active licence in order to obtain a building permit; requirements for licence applicants to submit information about their history, business practices, finances, and corporate structure to determine whether they pose a risk to consumers; the authority to suspend, revoke, or deny licences or to issue licences with conditions; and the creation of a public online registry of licensed builders to help consumers make informed decisions.

By working collaboratively with all stakeholders, this made-in-Alberta framework is unique because it creates a system of checks and balances through full integration with the New Home Warranty Program. Unlike other jurisdictions, both the licensing and warranty program will be run in-house, requiring the builder to receive a licence in order to apply for a warranty and a warranty in order to apply for a building permit. This framework is designed to put consumers first so that they don't fall through the cracks and to promote the builders with great track records.

Part of protecting Albertans is also empowering them with the tools to become informed consumers. An issue we heard frequently throughout our consultation was the lack of publicly accessible information about the residential construction industry. Consumers felt it was difficult to research potential builders. This is why we are creating a new public online registry of licensed builders. The online registry will allow consumers to look up corporate histories, build histories, and financial records of licensed builders and allow them to track these over the years. This will provide consumers with a single source of information, a one-stop shop to help Albertans make informed decisions. It will also promote the many experienced and trustworthy builders here in our province.

We have an opportunity today to give Albertans the protection of builder licensing currently enjoyed by 75 per cent of Canadians. Not having one means that Albertans currently have less consumer protection than the majority of Canadians. While builder licensing will offer new-home buyers proactive protection when looking to build a home, the New Home Warranty Program will continue to protect new homeowners after they've moved in. I want to remind the House that nearly 80 per cent of consulted Albertans agreed with the government exploring builder licensing and reiterate that most Albertans who have approached me since its introduction were more shocked than anything that it's not already in place.

Our government will continue to engage with stakeholders and industry on the implementation of builder licensing to ensure that this program comes together in the best way to protect Albertans and support and strengthen Alberta's home building industry. Our government made a commitment to make Albertans' lives better. Homeownership is one of the largest purchases we make as Albertans, and when Albertans make that investment, they deserve the ability to make informed decisions and feel secure in the knowledge that they are protected.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Stier: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and good morning, all. It's great to be with you all here again this morning. I rise once again today to speak to Bill 12, the New Home Buyer Protection Amendment Act, 2017. The stated intent of Bill 12 is to reduce the number of dishonest and fraudulent builders in Alberta, which in turn will improve the quality of homes being built in our province and ultimately build up the public's trust and confidence in that industry overall. I think I'm safe in saying that those are things that all of us support. The purchase of a home represents the biggest investment most Albertans will make in their entire lifetime. They deserve to have confidence that it was built to code and that if faulty workmanship is found, they have the protection of a warranty.

As Bill 12 has proceeded through the debate process, many of the questions I had have been answered, not just by the government, although the debate has been quite informative, but also by different stakeholders and stakeholder groups that are supportive of the bill, which weighed heavily in my decision to support this bill here today at third reading.

For example, when the licensing framework was first announced in February, Canadian Home Builders' Association CEO Donna Moore said, "CHBA – Alberta welcomes the opportunity to work in collaboration with Government and other stakeholders to develop a Builder Licensing program." Another example. During the announcement of Bill 12 earlier this month CHBA – Alberta President Ryan Scott said, "The ability to remove builders who demonstrate a proven, negative track record will be a benefit to every Albertan – including those in the industry." So that seems quite positive, Madam Speaker.

In my comments to the House during debate at second reading I had a number of questions about the bill. For the most part I'm somewhat satisfied with what I heard from the minister during debate and, too, feedback from those stakeholders. For example, a concern I had was the impact that this licensing regime would have on small, independent home builders, those that only build a few houses in a year. I wondered and I still somewhat wonder today: how will they be impacted by this licensing requirement? I turn again, in reflection to that, to the Canadian Home Builders' Association, whose membership roll boasts around 500 home builders, of which around half build less than 10 homes per year, and many of them do support Bill 12.

Another question I had was: who is going to be ultimately responsible for overseeing and issuing the licences, for doing the background work, reviewing the applications, and approving the licences? On May 11 during Committee of the Whole debate the Minister of Municipal Affairs said:

The builder licensing program will be administered from within government in the new-home buyer protection office. The program will not require any additional staffing resources. It will be administered through a reallocation of existing staffing resources.

Well, while that sounded okay, there sure would have been a lot more detail that I could have heard there, and I'm still wondering just exactly where people in the small towns go to get these permits, how it's going to be rolled out. It would have been nice to hear that.

Anyway, he went on to say – and I'm paraphrasing – that this integration would allow for better flow-through with the province's safety code system, warranty providers, and municipal partners. As a proponent of smaller, seamless government I believe it's critical to ensure that the government can and, more importantly, does communicate with itself effectively. Therefore, I will be connecting with home builders in the months and years ahead to ensure that this synergy is indeed taking place and there are not unnecessary delays in approving licences for home builders because of the typical government red tape situation that can happen.

That being said, every member of this Assembly, I think, has a responsibility also to ensure that the government does what it says it's going to do, so you can rest assured that while I will be keeping a watchful eye to ensure that this program does indeed serve the people of Alberta and that it doesn't become just another layer of expensive red tape, I think that other members, in doing their jobs as they usually do, will do the same. You see, too often as elected members I think we can get focused on our duty to debate and review proposed legislation, and there can be no doubt that it is vitally important as part of our jobs to also monitor how these things do roll out and occur. I believe we have the responsibility as elected officials representing the people of Alberta to ensure that the legislation that was passed is functioning in the best interests of all Albertans.

As I mentioned earlier, buying a home is an expensive investment. Housing prices are already high. We cannot afford for this program to become a hindrance to industry to do what they do best: build high-quality, reliable, and affordable homes in Alberta.

So far I believe that Bill 12 strikes an appropriate balance, and primarily due to its overwhelming support amongst the stakeholders that we've been in touch with, I will be supporting this bill at third reading. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

Hon. Members: Question.

[Motion carried; Bill 12 read a third time]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I really enjoyed the debate this morning. I think we did some good work. We're close to 12 o'clock, so I move that we adjourn until 1:30 this afternoon.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:49 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, May 18, 2017

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: Good afternoon, everyone. Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my honour and privilege today to introduce to you and through you to the House students from Langevin science school in the fabulous constituency of Calgary-Mountain View. The students are accompanied by their teachers Elaine McCrady, Kate Logan, and Tim Bowles along with chaperones Milica Legault, Grant Lewis, Patty Ross-O'Donnell, and Carlos Ferreira. I would ask them to stand and receive the warm welcome of the Legislative Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Ms Miller: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you 70 amazing students from Eastview middle school in the amazing riding of Red Deer-South. With them are teachers Mr. Bob Rutz, Miss Victory Shewchuk, and Mrs. Bev Wilibnisky. I'd like them all to rise and receive the warm traditional welcome of the Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any other school groups?

Seeing none, I will now call on the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a privilege to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Legislature the Alberta Donates Life Coalition, which was formed in 2012 to address the urgent need for increased numbers of organ and tissue donors in Alberta. I would ask Barbara Esdale to rise. She's from the great constituency of Edmonton-Whitemud and is the co-chair of the coalition. Her husband received the gift of life with a double lung transplant in 2009. Neil Folkins is the national membership director for the Canadian Transplant Association. He received a liver transplant first in 1996, and he received a second one in 2004. Lionel Jensen is a PhD student at the University of Alberta. A long-time blood donor, he established the Organ and Tissue Donation Awareness club at the U of A in 2015. The club's charter and materials can provide a model for other postsecondary institutions in Alberta. I would ask the other folks with the life coalition to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Strathmore-Brooks.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and introduce Barry Morishita. Barry Morishita is the mayor of Brooks and also the chairman of the Newell Foundation in the Brooks region, which is heading up the Bassano project for seniors' care. He is here today advocating on behalf of the project to ensure that people in the Brooks-Newell region get the seniors' care that they need. I ask that he stand and receive the warm welcome of every member of the Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my privilege to rise and introduce to you and through you councillors from the town of Vegreville: Councillor Marielle Brodziak, Councillor David Berry, and Councillor Tim MacPhee. They are here as I will be giving a member's statement about the CPC centre in Vegreville. I would ask them to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is my privilege to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Myrna Wisdom. Myrna is a third-generation descendant of the original Amber Valley settlers, where she grew up. She has been a tireless advocate for the community and is responsible for Amber Valley having recently been designated as a national historic site. Myrna, I see you've already risen. Please receive the customary warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you a constituent of mine, Audrey Martyn. Audrey represents the Canadian National Institute for the Blind as a CNIB champion. CNIB advocates at various levels of government and community to extend services to the blind and low visioned to improve their quality of life. In addition to this, Audrey also organizes with the Alberta Donates Life Coalition, that has been recognized already today, a group that helped to bring in Bill 207, from which the donor registry for human tissue and organ donation was born. Please welcome Audrey, an advocate for community members in my constituency in Alberta and across Canada, and extend the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you three guests visiting us today from the town of Jasper. I ask that they please rise as I call their names: Jasper's mayor, Richard Ireland; Councillor Gilbert Wall; and Kathleen Waxer, a director of Community and Family Services for the town. They are here advocating for the family and community support services program. That incredible preventive social services program is jointly funded by municipalities and the province. I ask that the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly be given to them.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Donations to Political Parties

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. In June 2015 I was very proud to vote for Bill 1, An Act to Renew Democracy in Alberta. Nearly two years ago that bill banned corporate and union donations in this province. I was very pleased to see this whole Assembly, including the Wildrose and PC caucuses, vote to ban those donations to political parties.

But I was really dismayed to read in the news this morning that these two dance partner parties still don't think the rules apply to them. The Unite the Right folks on the opposition benches don't seem to find any rule too big or too small to break when it comes to fundraising and party operations.

Madam Speaker, last night the Member for Strathmore-Brooks and his buddies the Member for Calgary-Greenway and the Member for Calgary-West held a meeting about uniting their parties. They were able to get about 50 people into a theatre that holds about 460 people. Their own party advertising originally listed the event as sponsored by a business.

Even as the Leader of the Opposition said yesterday that corporate donations to his party are wrong, he's still listed online as holding a fundraiser next week where a corporation is bidding on tickets. As of this morning that event is still on the Facebook page.

Mr. Kenney is no better. Remember that his own party fined him $5,000 because he fought the definition of what near a ballot box means.

Albertans expect politicians to be honest, to be committed to upholding the law in this province, and to be graceful when they make a mistake. But these parties don't seem to think there's anything wrong with accepting corporate donations. Jason Kenney still hasn't said who he got funds from for his leadership campaign, that began last July. He has yet to reveal who his for-profit corporation solicited for donations even though they apparently stopped accepting money last October.

Albertans want a government that respects the rules, respects the laws. The Unite the Right dance-off needs to stop making excuses.

1:40 Conservative Party Merger Agreement

Mr. Nixon: Madam Speaker, did you hear the good news? The path to unite the right has been paved. Last night a unity framework was reached between the Wildrose and the PC leadership, and as always, the power is in the hands of our membership, who will make the final decision. However, I believe I can safely say that my children will not have to live under an NDP regime ever again, nor will my grandchildren. We put our differences aside and came together for hard-working Albertans who have been waiting for this day for a very long time. To them I say: wait no more; the NDP will soon be political history. Alberta small "c" conservatives will not let Alberta become another casualty of the NDP world view on the scrap heap of history. The countdown is on. The dark days of the NDP will soon be over.

This government has fundamentally changed our province for the worst in two short years, imposing crushing tax increases that they never campaigned on, filling the hallowed halls of this building with anti-Alberta activists who have the audacity to collect a cheque from taxpayers while they conspire to sabotage our pipelines. The NDP has turned our province into a pariah, a province once a lighthouse of fiscal hope to the world, but this is nothing that cannot be undone.

Alberta's former prosperity was built on hard work, self-determination, and it will be restored on such things. Our members will now pave the path forward, and the next steps in unity take shape. Unlike the NDP, who serve special interests, we serve our members, honest Albertans who want their province back. Every member of our two parties believes there is no one person bigger than doing what is right for the families of this great province, so what we are doing is to honour the legacy of our two great parties, the wishes of Albertans today, and the hopes of all our future generations. [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, I know today is Thursday.

The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Vegreville Immigration Centre

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Madam Speaker. When I was first elected as the MLA to represent Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville, people would often ask me about the big Ukrainian egg. Now the first thing I hear is: how goes the fight for the CPC centre?

Madam Speaker, Albertans are frustrated by the federal government's decision to close the Canadian immigration case processing centre in Vegreville, but no one is more frustrated than the town. Global News is now reporting that internal federal government documents show that it will cost an extra $10.8 million to move it.

Council members joining us here today were informed by frantic texts from workers, who were told unceremoniously at a staff meeting that the centre was closing. Council got to work immediately, contacting their federal and provincial representatives, and the Respect Vegreville campaign was started. Two town halls have been held. We've knocked on hundreds of doors with petitions. Many of us have written letters, only to receive canned responses. Our Minister of Labour held a face-to-face meeting on April 27 with federal minister Ahmed Hussen and fought for these workers.

Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, we go unheard. Recently I was forwarded a letter written by Minister Hussen in which he continues to refuse the responsibility for this decision. He says, "The decision to relocate the CPC in Vegreville to downtown Edmonton was a difficult one for the management of Immigration, Refugees and Citizenship Canada."

Madam Speaker, the difficult decisions won't be made in Ottawa. The difficult decisions will be made by town council, by families around the kitchen table, by schools trying to figure out how to make up a million dollars if they lose 130 students.

Prime Minister Trudeau stood in the train station in Vegreville and promised to support rural Canada. When he won, he said the words, "Sunny ways my friends, sunny ways." Madam Speaker, the sun is shining on parts of Canada, but the sunlight has not yet reached Vegreville.

Conservative Opposition Policies

Mr. Westhead: As the conservative parties merge, it's important to know where they stand on issues that matter to Albertans, but their memes and buzzwords only serve to obscure a serious problem with their intellectual balance sheet. It's obvious there's a deficit of ideas and facts from the conservative opposition members, no matter what they choose to call themselves. Albertans deserve better than the UCP.

Just how low is the opposition on intellectual capital? So low that the Member for Strathmore-Brooks proposes borrowing a Soviet-era idea to erase history. They'll have a lot of explaining to do when they wipe out school nutrition programs, slash the minimum wage, and cancel Black History Month. Just like their shadow budget, opposition policies have yet to see the light of day. If the opposition has a better way to do things and truly cares about Alberta, they owe it to all of us to share those ideas. But the cupboard is bare. Either they don't care about Alberta, don't have any ideas, or are scared that Albertans will reject their intolerant, slash-and-burn approach. To avoid making tough decisions, they've proposed a Dragons' Den style reality TV scenario that pits teachers against nurses and special-needs children against seniors in a no-holds-barred battle royal to avoid their damaging cuts.

The Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner attended a rally opposing women's reproductive rights. I guess that counts as an idea, but it's a deeply troubling one. It seems the conservatives don't care who gets hurt as long as they win the next election.

We must acknowledge the absence of solutions being offered by the members opposite. Madam Speaker, Alberta's opposition has a profound deficit of ideas, and their credit rating has been downgraded to an F minus. The next step for them is to declare intellectual bankruptcy. [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, just a reminder. We are on Members' Statements, and if we could be respectful to the speaker, please. You'll have time later.

Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Vaisakhi Nagar Kirtan

Loyola: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to recognize the organizers of the Vaisakhi Nagar Kirtan, a procession held annually in southeast Edmonton in the constituencies of Edmonton-Mill Woods and Edmonton-Ellerslie. I'd also like to thank the broader Sikh community of Alberta who host the Nagar Kirtan in Calgary as well.

The Nagar Kirtan is an important Sikh tradition for commemorating special occasions in the Sikh calendar. Traditionally the procession is led by the saffron-robed Panj Pyare, who are the spiritual and temporal embodiment of the collective Sikh community, who are followed by the Guru Granth Sahib, the holy scripture, which is placed on a float. Commonly, members of the procession are unshod in a deference to the displayed scripture. As bystanders bow their heads to the holy scripture as it passes, they may receive food provided to them from floats. The procession concludes at the gurdwara with prayers.

I am always encouraged when hearing about the three pillars of the Sikh faith: to constantly remember the oneness that unites us all, to work with integrity while earning an honest living, and to share that wealth with all those in the broader community.

Madam Speaker, it is the sharing of our cultures that makes Alberta a great place to call home. As a Canadian not born in Canada, I give thanks that we have a culture of respect and understanding. As people who have come from a foreign land to now call Alberta home, we are not expected to fit the mold of a Eurocentric definition of what it means to be Canadian. It is exactly that multicultural nature of Canada that enriches Alberta society.

I'm proud to be part of a government that declared April 2017 as Sikh Heritage Month in Alberta and recognizes that cultural diversity can still embrace common values, values such as dedication to one's family, profession, and community while at the same time being compassionate to those in need.

Again, I thank all the organizers of the Nagar Kirtan for sharing their values with us, values that we share and respect as we continue to build Alberta into a stronger place to call home for everyone.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Amber Valley National Historic Site

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Madam Speaker. In February of this year, thanks in great part to the work of my colleague the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, Alberta celebrated its very first Black History Month, and Amber Valley has always been a big part of that history.

This past weekend I had the good fortune to bring greetings on behalf of our Premier to Amber Valley and share in the celebration of their official designation as a national historic site. This designation is in recognition of the arrival of over a thousand African-American settlers to Canada between 1908 and 1911, seeking to escape discrimination and in hope of a better future.

Amber Valley itself was home to over 150 of these individuals and is unique in having some of their descendants still living on their original homesteads. Growing up, my grandfather used to tell me stories about Amber Valley. Their baseball team was legendary across northeastern Alberta, as were their annual three-day picnics. These courageous settlers established their own institutions, created a rich social life, and forged vibrant farming communities. The arrival of these black pioneers to our province has been and will forever be an integral part of our western heritage.

Sadly, the initial rush of black settlers caused a racist backlash by our governments of the time, and the door was then shut to black immigrants until the early '60s, to our collective shame and also our collective loss. Those who did come have enriched our diversity and our society well out of proportion to their numbers, playing a vital role in battling discrimination and advocating for equality, tolerance, and justice for all.

Today the Amber Valley community centre, museum, and historic pioneer cabin is largely maintained by the Amber Valley historical society, dedicated volunteers who rely on their own hard work and by raising funds through hosting music jams and, of course, their famous chicken dinners. I wish to commend their community spirit and their dedication to preserving this truly unique piece of Alberta's heritage.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Carbon Levy and Pipeline Approvals

Mr. Cooper: Alberta's energy industry is the engine of Canada's economy and the reason why people across our country enjoy such a high quality of life, yet important pipelines that could bring our product to tidewater face significant opposition, including from the Premier's NDP friends in British Columbia. How could this be? The Premier promised that the carbon tax would buy social licence from the very same people that oppose these vital projects. Premier, your plan is failing. It's hurting Albertans. When will you admit that this carbon tax isn't working and that social licence is a hoax?

Ms. Notley: Well, Madam Speaker, I appreciate that members opposite love to dine out on the words of the opponents of the pipeline for their own political gain. That's, unfortunately, not good for Alberta. What is good for Alberta is the fact that the decision around the pipeline is within the authority of the federal government. The federal government considered a number of issues, including our government's commitment to reducing and combating climate change, and as a result, they approved the pipeline, something that would not have happened under their watch.

Mr. Cooper: Albertans can't stand the carbon tax, and opponents of pipelines are indifferent to it. Insolvencies and bankruptcies are on the rise, and while Albertans are scrimping and saving to make ends meet, this NDP government is running a deficit that is four times the size of all other provinces combined. Still, this ideological government is charging ahead with increases to the carbon tax that are only making things worse. Is this what the Premier meant when she said that the carbon tax would buy social licence?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. What our government meant when we said that we were going to stand up for Albertans and have their backs was that we were going to focus on building our economy and supporting Albertans as we come through this recovery. What's going on now is that we have the third consecutive month where new jobs have been created, and in the last nine out of 10 months we've seen jobs created. Manufacturing is up. Exports are up. Car sales are up. Housing prices are up. That's because we have Albertans' backs. We're not pretending that problems don't exist, and we are not going after cuts as a means . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Cooper: Albertans are beyond tired of hearing from this government trying to take credit for pipeline approvals that had nothing to do with their terrible climate leadership plan. Albertans aren't buying it. What this government should do is take some responsibility for a damaging tax that has done nothing to gain social licence and get new pipelines built. Can the Premier tell Albertans why she insists on keeping this carbon tax, that has done nothing but drive investment and people from our province?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. In fact, since the minister of environment and I first announced our climate leadership plan, here's what has happened. We've got not one but two pipelines approved by the people who have the authority to approve them. This year our province will lead the country in growth. This year our province will lead the country in investment. This year our province will lead the country in manufacturing growth. These are the kinds of things that happen when you invest in your province rather than cutting it down and slashing and burning to help your . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.
The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Surgery Wait Times

Mr. Yao: Madam Speaker, the Wildrose has repeatedly called for solutions to address unreasonably long wait times. Sadly, not only is Alberta behind other provinces despite our big spending; some Albertans are even further behind, depending on where they live. For example, the average wait time for a knee replacement in south zone is 60 weeks, yet the wait time for the same surgery in Calgary zone is 36 weeks. That's almost a six-month difference. To the Minister of Health: why are there such major discrepancies for wait times in regions and centres?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise on behalf of the Minister of Health to answer this question. Let me be clear that if you are an urgent patient, you will get urgent care. There have been some good improvements on wait times for things like hip fracture repair, radiation therapy, and our 17 stroke treatment centres are now among the fastest in the world. But we recognize that there is more to do, and as our population grows and ages, we're seeing a significant increase in demand for health procedures, and that's why we're working with physicians to increase efficiencies and capacity while we're reducing inappropriate testing. I'll be pleased to address more comments.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Yao: Madam Speaker, we already spend more per capita than both Saskatchewan and B.C. on health care, yet we are not seeing better results. You can only throw so much money at a problem before you run out of money. We can speculate as to why. Is it the number of operating rooms, is it perhaps the recovering surgery bed availability, is it staffing levels of front-line workers, or is it just simply bureaucratic red tape? To the Minister of Health: do you know why Albertans aren't receiving equal and effective health care?

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Again, you know, we've seen some significant improvements in wait times. We have a 25 per cent decrease in wait times for neurosurgery. We've seen a 20 per cent wait time decrease in general surgery, 21 per cent decrease in internal medicine, and a 14 per cent wait time decrease for specialists focusing on ears, necks, and throats. The member opposite is obviously very concerned about how much money we're spending on health care because he wants to cut $2 billion out of the budget and make sure that every patient has to wait forever to get health care in this province.

Mr. Yao: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Advanced Education doesn't know health care.

Excessively long wait times compound an already bad situation, resulting in increased costs and strains on our health care system. In this last budget we learned that the Health Quality Council of Alberta received an increase of almost 10 per cent and that they have capacity. Under the previous government they were tasked with measuring ER wait times and providing real-time reports on the website. Under this government they have been tasked with creating a report on the separation of lab services. To the Premier: will you give direction to the Health Quality Council of Alberta to conduct a study on surgical wait times so that we can understand why?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Of course, the Minister of Advanced Education on behalf of the Minister of Health has already outlined what the members opposite don't want to acknowledge, which is that we've actually made improvements on wait times on a number of different levels and that, in fact, we are going to continue to do that work. What we're not going to do is lay off nurses, we're not going to privatize health care, and we're not going to do the kinds of things that the members opposite have said publicly that they want to do in order to finance their tax breaks for the wealthiest Albertans. That is not what we will do because we care about growing the health of Albertans.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Marijuana Legalization in Canada

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. With the recent announcements made by the federal government to legalize marijuana, it appears that the bulk of the decisions will be downloaded to the provincial government. With a deadline of a little over a year away, many things will have to be decided, including distribution and point-of-sale law. When it comes to the sale of liquor, Alberta is leading in providing free-market choice through the regulator AGLC. To the minister: will your government implement a free-market style system for the distribution and sale of marijuana?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Of course, this is an issue that is of great interest to all Canadians and all Albertans. Before we make any final decisions, we are absolutely going to be going out to speak to Albertans, to consult with them because we feel that it is absolutely critical for the voices of those Albertans to be heard in the policy.

Mrs. Pitt: Madam Speaker, the federal government has decided to legalize marijuana and has provided no oversight to provincial governments on the implementation. Strict guidelines must be in place to protect our youth and ensure that they do not have access to these drugs. Another area that Albertans need answers on is around the age of consumption. The minister has promised just now to consult with Albertans, but we haven't heard anything about this plan. To the minister: where is this review; when is it happening?

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. We've been quite clear that we think it's absolutely important to hear from Albertans on this issue. We'll be going out to consult on a number of issues to ensure that those views are taken into account not only in areas of provincial jurisdiction but potentially in areas of federal jurisdiction as well. It is certainly an aggressive time frame, but at the end of the day, it is the safety of Albertans that is at stake. So I think it's really important that we go out and talk to them about those decisions.

Mrs. Pitt: Madam Speaker, all too often Albertans lose loved ones in avoidable workplace accidents. There are fatal consequences of on-the-job drug use, which is why Alberta's construction industry has implemented strict drug-testing policies. However, employers are concerned that they may not be able to detect levels of marijuana impairment. The government needs to consider restrictions on marijuana use in high-impact workplaces. Will the legalization of marijuana make it impossible for employers to enforce drug policies?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It is absolutely the case that we will be able to impose those sorts of safety restrictions. Alcohol is currently legal. It is nonetheless permissible to impose restrictions on the use of alcohol while one is at work. We will be working very closely with employer groups and with unions to make sure that we are doing those rules in a way that's reasonable for all Albertans. We have no intention of bogarting this decision. [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members. [interjections] Members. Thank you.
The hon. leader of the third party.

Teachers' Working Time

Mr. McIver: Madam Speaker, the Premier and her Education minister have stood in this House and lauded the new ATA deal as something almost revolutionary in that it buys two years of labour peace at a zero wage increase. The revolution is that they've given away management rights to the union by eliminating how teachers allocate their time and created a $75 million fund to be administered by the union. To the Premier. This is a very simple question: who is in charge of education in Alberta today, you and your government or your union pals?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question because it is a tremendous opportunity for me to talk about the $75 million investment that our government ran on in the last election about investing into our classrooms to improve the quality of classroom experience for kids. At the end of the day, that's where our money should be going. It should be going into the classrooms to ensure a better learning experience. We ran on that in the election, and I'm very pleased that that $75 million will be going into classrooms to provide even better educational supports to our kids. We all care about getting exactly the best outcomes for our kids.

The Acting Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. McIver: Thank you. The Premier herself should be directing that money to the classroom.

Madam Speaker, this agreement will handcuff all boards but mostly rural boards. The cap on instructional hours will take away flexibility from rural boards. Teachers, who will not want to run afoul, will be forced to refuse duties like supervision, administrative duties assigned outside of instructional time, not to mention possibly shortening the school year, with impacts to high school programs like RAP. Again to the Premier: in your haste to shore up your union base, why did you bargain away these basic rights, that will drive up the cost of education and throw rural Alberta under the bus?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I think it's important for the member opposite to understand that the cap on instructional hours was agreed to after thorough consideration was given to how many boards have teachers that actually ever come close to that cap or exceed it. In fact, the number is infinitesimal, so it should have no impact on the quality of education and the time dedicated to education by our hard-working teachers. What will however have an impact is $75 million going to support our classrooms.

Mr. McIver: Madam Speaker, rural boards have already complained that they'll have to lay off teachers because of this. The narrow-sighted rush to a deal has put in jeopardy the great work done by parents and teachers and school boards across this province, and they've tried to find a balance of delivery between quality education in a fiscally challenging environment. Unlike this government, they know there is a finite source of funding. This bungled agreement, if ratified, will require a complete revamp of the funding framework. To the Premier: will you stop the madness, send your Education minister back to do the job properly, and find an agreement that's actually good for Alberta kids?

Ms Notley: Well, once again, Madam Speaker, I'm very pleased that teachers in Alberta have understood that the province of Alberta is under fiscal restraints and so have accepted a deal with zero per cent increases, and I think that sets a very good example. On the flip side, I'm very proud that our government is putting more money into our classrooms because, in fact, we do have kids in our classrooms – special-needs kids, ESL, or English language learning children – that need extra supports. We've heard from rural school boards and urban school boards that they need more support to be able to deal with those kids and give them the education they deserve, and I'm proud our government is delivering that.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Logging in Kananaskis Country

Dr. Swann: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Kananaskis Country includes vital headwaters, prime outdoor recreation for Calgarians, an attraction for tourists from all over the world. That's why a plan for large-scale clear-cut logging in the Highwood region is very concerning to residents from Black Diamond, Turner Valley, and High River. The allocation of trees was supposed to be over a five-year period, yet they're planning to take it all this year, before the NDP government can amend logging plans or put in additional conservation measures. To the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry: are you aware this is happening, and what are you doing about it?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Madam Speaker and to the member for the question. Our government remains committed to protecting and improving the things that make a difference in Albertans' lives. That includes protection of land and water. We have good partnerships with our lumber industry right across the province to ensure that sustainable practices are maintained across the province and continue to be so. The partnership is working well. We'll continue working with those lumbering partners in the province, including in the area that the member is talking about, to ensure that those sustainable practices are maintained.

Dr. Swann: Madam Speaker, this clear-cut is part of the quota operated by Balcaen Consolidated Contracting, a company from B.C., and the timber will be processed in B.C. This means there are very few jobs for Albertans in this plan to clear-cut a significant part of Kananaskis Country. To make matters worse, it will reduce tourism and recreational economic opportunities, having a negative impact on livelihoods that are based on the region's intact forest. What is the minister doing to protect jobs and support the economic diversification this provides to Alberta?

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Madam Speaker and to the member for the question. Up to 70 communities in the province and over 19,000 workers are in the lumber industry, so it's a very important industry. We continue to support that industry both nationally and internationally. We're continually monitoring the harvest operation, whoever is doing that harvest operation, to ensure that sustainable practices are maintained and to meet those standards. Governments, communities, and industries must continue to work together to maintain those standards and ensure the sustainable management of Alberta's important forestry resources.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Dr. Swann: Madam Speaker, the creeks in the forested slopes feeding the upper Highwood River also contain pure strain cutthroat trout, an endangered species in Alberta, and this activity threatens their further recovery. High River also depends on the forest for flood mitigation. Nonetheless, this operation is slated to start in August even as many concerned citizens are speaking up to protect the local economy, the watershed, and the wildlife. Again to the minister: will you put this logging on hold and order a proper impact assessment before proceeding with this plan?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Madam Speaker. All harvesting operations are done in accordance with operating ground rules in the area. Companies have to work with the department to ensure that their harvesting plans meet those standards. The department then periodically goes out, making sure those standards are maintained. I have confidence that those are maintained. For example, the logging companies must maintain a tree buffer zone around creeks, et cetera, to ensure that we do protect all species, endangered or otherwise, in those harvested areas.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Just a reminder that there will be no preambles, please.

The hon. Member for St. Albert.

AISH and PDD Programs

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Both the PDD and AISH systems have been around for a long time and continue to face enormous challenges given the complexity of the system and the difficult economic reality and depth of need. To the Minister of Community and Social Services: what is this government doing to modernize and integrate both of these systems?

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to my colleague for the question. PDD and AISH are more than government programs; they are a comprehensive set of supports. We have increased funding to both of the programs. We have stopped restrictive PDD safety standards and the SIS, supports intensity scale, and we have released a comprehensive plan, the AISH action plan, to overhaul the system. We will continue to work with the community to make sure we get it right.

The Acting Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Given that Alberta's population is growing and the demand for supports is also growing, to the same minister: what steps are being taken to ensure the PDD program manages the growing list of people waiting for services?

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member. When it comes to making life better for Albertans with disabilities, we know that PDD service providers are facing pressure due to growing demand for PDD services. That is why we increased funding to PDD and are prioritizing access to PDD funding services for those who have health and safety risks to ensure that their needs are quickly assessed, as opposed to cutting and burning these services and cutting operational dollars from these programs.

The Acting Speaker: Second supplemental.

Ms Renaud: I know who cut it.

Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm very thankful that our government understands the importance of addressing recommendations about the AISH program that have been repeated for many years. To the minister: what progress have you made with the AISH action plan?

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. In my previous answer I didn't mention who will cut it because the member knows that very well.

Just to the question, at this point we have made improvements to the application process and how we collect the information about the program. We are making progress by developing a more accessible and streamlined application process, improving staff training, and finding better ways to monitor and report progress on the program. All these things are set out in our AISH plan, and we will continue to monitor the progress of this plan.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Job Creation

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Madam Speaker, the NDP government likes to paint a rosy picture of the Alberta economy and jobs, but according to Stats Canada almost net 11,000 people have left Alberta for other parts of Canada since October 2015. That is the equivalent of the towns of Hinton or Morinville or Strathmore packing up and leaving. To the Premier: how can you say that your programs to create jobs are working if more people are leaving Alberta for other provinces than coming in?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I can talk about the jobs that are growing in this province because it is happening. The Alberta investment tax credit is bringing investment to this province and capital investment tax credits are bringing capital to this province from all over the place. AIMCo is investing in this province, which is creating more jobs. Jobs are coming back. Investment is happening because of this government. They would cut all of that. They've done it before. We're not better off with that side.

Mr. Panda: Given that the minister didn't have a clue about how many jobs were created by all the programs like AITC and CITC and given that Stats Canada also shows that the number of people drawing EI in Alberta is still almost double and that when the benefits run out, people give up and drop off EI and unemployment stats even though still unemployed, is the minister of social services prepared for the onslaught of people demanding income supports once their benefits and personal savings run out?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. During these tough economic times job creation is a priority for our government, and we are investing in that area. At the same time, we have invested in the programs that provide support to Albertans who are looking for those supports. They would have cut $2.6 billion. That means more than half of the Ministry of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Panda: Madam Speaker, in order to weather the downturn, some engineering firms in Alberta have turned to work sharing overseas to get jobs done competitively. Given that much of this work sharing is being done by offshore offices in low-cost places like India and South Korea and given that hard-working Albertans are sick and tired of hearing talking points from all these ministers, what is the NDP government doing to get unemployed Albertans back to work, and after two years where are the measurable results?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to talk about an announcement we made this morning about jobs that will be created in the next three years to recover orphan wells. The government today announced $235 million in a loan that'll be repaid by industry over 10 years. That's 1,650 jobs. Many of those are engineering jobs. I talked to an engineer this morning who was excited about this plan. It's going to rehabilitate one-third of the existing orphan wells we have.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

Serenity and the Child Intervention System

Mr. Rodney: Thank you, Madam Speaker. When it became public that children continue to reside in the home where Serenity had lived, the Premier was questioned directly about how this was allowed to happen. The Premier responded: "The matter actually went before the courts. Indeed, in that case the judge indicated that what should happen is that monitoring should continue." To the Minister of Children's Services. Please confirm for Serenity's family and for all Albertans: did your department seek to remove the other children from the home where Serenity had lived, or did you choose not to?

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Certainly, the safety and well-being of all vulnerable children in this province are our core responsibilities. Absolutely, we looked at the best interests of the child. The courts looked at the best interests of the child and decided that monitoring was the best way to proceed. We continue to monitor the safety and well-being of those children. Absolutely, I'm proud of the work that's been done to support Alberta's children, to protect their safety.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Rodney: The non answer makes the answer clear.

Now, given that just yesterday Serenity's family was present in this gallery here in this Assembly hoping for answers, hoping they could be reassured that what happened to Serenity would never happen again to any child in Alberta and given that they were wholly disappointed with the answers they received and stated unequivocally their demand for a public inquiry into Serenity's death, again to the minister: will you listen to Serenity's family? Will you launch a public inquiry into her death, or will you choose not to?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Albertans and Serenity's family are right to want to know that we are doing everything we can to improve the way that we support vulnerable children, but what the member is asking me to do would interfere with an ongoing criminal investigation, and that is not something I will do.

Every Albertan wants justice for Serenity, and I will not do anything to jeopardize that. The member knows it would be completely inappropriate to hold any kind of inquiry when a criminal investigation into this case is ongoing. I want justice for Serenity. Everyone in this House, every Albertan wants the same, and we will do everything to make sure that happens.

Mr. Rodney: If that's true, I'm sure she'll agree to this.

Given that bringing forward Serenity's law as the next bill to be discussed in this Legislature would save the lives of vulnerable children across Alberta and given that Serenity's family is very supportive of this bill and articulated that fact to the Minister of Children's Services after the minister was pressured into meeting with them yesterday afternoon, Minister, will you bring forward and support Serenity's law during this spring session of this Legislature, or will you choose not to?

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I want to say that when we learned about the tragic loss of Serenity and the heartbreak that her mother was going through, we reached out to Serenity's mom, just as we reached out to the family yesterday. Certainly, the work that the panel is doing to create good work for protecting children is incredibly important, and certainly they can consider Serenity's law. We need to do consultation with parties such as the police, who would be highly impacted by that. I look forward to hearing the outcomes of the panel's consideration of that so that we can continue to improve the child intervention system. [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Members, please.

Schoolchildren's Transportation

Mrs. Aheer: Changes to transportation costs and busing routes as a result of Bill 1 are causing some very real concerns for Albertans. For example, a group of young children in Calgary will have to walk to a transit station, take the bus, walk to a train, take the train, walk to another bus, and then, finally, get out and walk to school, which will take over an hour each way and is completely unsafe and an unreal expectation for young children. How will the minister work with families to address the unintended consequences of Bill 1?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Certainly, as we work through Bill 1, which is An Act to Reduce School Fees, we're working closely with school boards to make sure we're getting the money into families' pockets that they deserve. We're taking the instructional supply and materials fees and some bus fees as well. The Calgary board of education is working through other issues around their routes and so forth, and we're happy to work closely with them to ensure that we have good service for everyone in Calgary.

The Acting Speaker: First supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. Well, let's talk about Rocky View schools, then. Given that Rocky View schools is one of the fastest growing school districts in the province, with 50 schools and 21,000 students, and given that some families will see an increase in transportation costs by as much as 47 per cent downloaded onto them next school year and given that reduced school fees will be undermined by the increasing costs for transportation and given that new busing routes will include unsafe conditions, crossing major highways, and unacceptable long walks on country roads, how is this making life better for Albertans?

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you very much for the question. Again, we're working very closely with Rocky View schools. You know, what is important to note, because we had the bill here not long ago, is that it's An Act to Reduce School Fees, but it's also an act to monitor to make sure that school fees are not going up in an inordinate way. So the Rocky View school board must submit those fees to . . . [interjections] Excuse me. You know, if this was my classroom, someone would get a detention right now for interrupting while we're trying to put important information forward for parents to hear.

Mrs. Aheer: Well, after detention – he's talking about detention here.

Given that all of us in good faith voted for Bill 1 and given now that school boards are scrambling to accommodate the needs of families as they implement Bill 1 and given that one unintended consequence will be that families are now going to drive their children instead of using school buses and since, I would think, that contradicts the government's supposed commitment around sound environmental stewardship and punishes parents through increased taxes on fuel at a time when thousands of Albertans are unemployed, again, how is this making life better for Albertans?

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's very important to remember that we are building on An Act to Reduce School Fees. We're going to be putting many millions of dollars, for example, into Rocky View schools. They'll see more than $3.6 million going into the pockets of families. For so long the school fee situation was way out of control. The former government just let it go wild, and we are bringing it in. The school boards cannot increase their fees by 40-some per cent because it has to come by my desk first to see that they're not increasing other fees when we're reducing in other places. Rocky View is doing a good job to talk to us.

Seniors' Housing Construction in Bassano

Mr. Fildebrandt: For years volunteers at the Newell Foundation have been working towards a vision of seniors' care in the Brooks region that would see the Bassano hospital integrated with an assisted living complex. We would leverage private-sector resources to ensure that seniors living there can get the care they need. It's an innovative model for seniors' care that could serve as an example for rural communities across Alberta. The only thing that is needed now is for the Minister of Health to sign off on the integration with the Bassano hospital. Last week she said no without explanation. Why?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm quite delighted to hear that the Member for Strathmore-Brooks actually made the trip to Bassano from his home in Calgary.

On the issue of the ASLI grants and the seniors' lodge, of course, we're pleased that our government has pledged $3.4 million for the ASLI grants and $9.6 million for the seniors' lodge. We continue to provide predictable and sustainable funding for health care all across the province so that patients in Alberta can get the right care at the right place at the right time.

Mr. Fildebrandt: The disdain of the minister for the people of Bassano and Strathmore-Brooks is incredible.

Given, Madam Speaker, that Infrastructure Alberta did a cost analysis of the different options available to the Bassano hospital and they found that integration with the proposed seniors' facility was the most cost-effective option – it's good value for money, and seniors in the region have been depending on the project going forward for years – and given that this is a classic case of a government unable to smartly prioritize spending, instead of spending $21 million on free light bulbs and $9 million on carbon tax propaganda ads, why doesn't the minister think that those are better uses of . . .

The Acting Speaker: I'm trying to give you some cues, Member. The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm quite proud of our government's investments of $3.4 million into the ASLI grant for the Newell Foundation and a $9.6 million seniors' lodge grant for the new seniors' lodge in Bassano. If the member opposite is so concerned about health care for the people of Bassano, then he shouldn't be running on a platform of cutting $2 billion from the budget and $9 billion from capital, that would probably close down the existing hospital in Bassano.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Minister Magoo doesn't even know what the Bassano project is.

Mr. Mason: Point of order.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Given, Madam Speaker, that the Newell Foundation volunteers have been working on this project for years, it's critical for seniors in my constituency, and it's the most cost-effective option by the government's own studies. In her rejection letter the Minister of Health refused to give any explanation for her decision. Given that she has refused to meet with the chairman of the Newell Foundation, who is right here today, will she give a clear answer as to why she will not sign off on the integration of the hospital, and will she commit to meet with the chairman of the Newell Foundation, who is here right now?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Of course, both Associate Minister Payne and the Health minister have met with the Newell Foundation over the last year. . . .

Some Hon. Members: Names.

Mr. Schmidt: Sorry. The Associate Minister of Health – I beg your forgiveness, Madam Speaker – and the Minister of Health have met with the Newell Foundation over the last year. We're committed to working with them as we roll out the ASLI grant and the support for the new seniors' lodge. Of course, we're proud of our investments in health care not only in Bassano but for patients all across the province.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Kinder Morgan Trans Mountain Pipeline

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Madam Speaker. As B.C.'s election results remain murky, what is clear is that Alberta may end up the loser no matter the outcome. With the Green Party potentially holding the balance of power, Doctor Weaver has reaffirmed the Greens' election campaign promise to oppose Trans Mountain, stating that he and his members believe it is their responsibility to stop the project. To the Minister of Energy: your public confidence is admirable, but can you confidently say today that the Trans Mountain pipeline is any closer to being built than the Northern Gateway ever was?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. You know, we continue to do the work we've done, and so does Kinder Morgan with Trans Mountain. As we speak, they are in B.C. talking. We continue with our relationships, as we've done. These relationships and this adult way of dealing with pipelines has gotten us not just one but two approvals. It's also been our climate leadership plan that got us those approvals as well, and we're going to continue that good work.

Mr. Gotfried: So the answer is no.

Madam Speaker, given that the Trans Mountain pipeline was approved after a rigorous assessment by the National Energy Board and given that B.C. had negotiated $1.5 billion with their environmental protection and services with the federal government and a 20-year revenue-sharing agreement worth $1 billion with Kinder Morgan and given that these factors coupled with carbon taxes in both B.C. and Alberta have resulted in absolutely zero compromise from those who oppose pipelines, again to the minister: will you admit today that your attempts to obtain social licence have been an abysmal failure?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. What I will admit is that our plan is working. We got permission for two pipelines. We'll continue that work until shovels are in the ground. None of that has changed. We've formed good relationships with B.C. and across Canada. The only ones who don't seem to want these pipelines are across the way. These pipelines are not just good for Alberta. They're good for Canada, for Saskatchewan pipeline-makers, for our workers in Alberta. I don't know why you oppose it. On this side of the House we're standing up for those pipelines.

The Acting Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The current flow measurement is zero.

Given that throughout the B.C. elections Albertans got to see their favourite ecoradical stand with a leader and a party that are wholly opposed to Alberta's best interests and given that the minister of environment seemed to indicate during question period last week that the composition of the oil sands advisory group would be changing, to the Minister of Energy: as we have called for repeatedly, will Tzeponah Berman be removed from the oil sands advisory group by the time we return for the fall session, thereby making life better for Albertans?

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Environment and Parks and minister responsible for the climate change office.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Of course, what makes life better for Albertans is getting those pipelines approved and getting shovels in the ground as soon as possible. The other thing that makes life better is working with oil sands companies in order to invest in innovation, which is the second phase of the work that will be undertaken by the oil sands advisory group. We're working in consultation with industry and with community groups and with First Nations in a respectful way in the oil sands region to ensure that we are moving forward with developing our economy and our resources in a way that's responsible for future generations.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Invasive Mussel Species

Ms Luff: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The waterways of the northwest region are the only ones in North America still free of invasive zebra and quagga mussels. If these invasive species got into Alberta's waterways, they could destroy irrigation infrastructure and cause up to $75 million of damage annually. Given that last November these mussels were detected just south of the border in Montana, to the Minister of Environment and Parks: what measures are you taking to ensure Alberta's waterways are protected?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker and to the hon. member for the question. What we have done this year is that we've expanded our number of watercraft inspectors. We have inspection stations along all of Alberta's major highways. We also have 24-hour inspections happening in addition to our K-9 sniffer dog units, which we also have moving again this year. We are leaders recognized in western Canada and throughout the western United States on this matter of ensuring that zebra and quagga mussels stay out of our waterways.

The Acting Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Given that recreational boats are the main vector for transporting these invasive mussels and given that boating season is upon us, what do you recommend Alberta boaters do to help prevent the spread of these mussels? [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Of course, while the opposition laughs at this, it's actually a very serious matter. If we get aquatic invasive species in our waterways, it's about a $75 million cost to our irrigation districts and our farmers. That's really important to the government on this side of the House. That's why we have new legislation that it's mandatory to stop at watercraft inspection stations. It's not just motorized boats; it's also if you are carrying a canoe or a kayak.

The Acting Speaker: Second supplemental.

Ms Luff: Thank you. To the same minister: given the massive impact that these mussels can have, what work is being done to ensure that Alberta could respond quickly in the event that invasive mussels are detected?

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. You know, it's well established that our programs have established leadership throughout western Canada. Indeed, when Montana had a detection of invasive mussels, we were there with them on the ground in response. That's the kind of collaboration that we've undertaken as a program, and that's why we're recognized as leaders. What wouldn't help is firing all of those watercraft inspectors, conservation officers, fish and wildlife officers, commercial vehicle inspectors, all of the front-line workers that deliver this program, through massive and drastic cuts to the Environment budget, which, of course, the Wildrose is proposing.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie.

2:40 Queen Elizabeth II Highway Interchange at Balzac

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. For two years I have been advocating for this government to fix the Balzac interchange. I'm extremely frustrated that the government will not take action to alleviate the safety concerns and traffic congestion. Both the MLA for Chestermere-Rocky View and myself have submitted this as a priority for the last two years on the capital submissions list. This is currently Rocky View county's number one priority as well. When will the minister listen to the community and fix this problem?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure and of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Well, this government is committed to the transportation needs of all Albertans. I have met extensively with municipalities, both urban and rural, during my tenure as Minister of Transportation and of Infrastructure, and we have been moving ahead with a significant increase in the capital plan for Transportation. We've had announcements of interchanges, of improvements to our highway system as well as funding for transit.

The Acting Speaker: First supplemental.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Given that Alberta Transportation has cut the budget to build interchanges and given that Alberta Transportation placed this on the three-year priority list but under this government it's since been removed and given that this poses a serious safety risk to constituents in Airdrie, Chestermere, and the surrounding area in Calgary, to the minister: how did this fall off the priority list?

The Acting Speaker: The Minister of Infrastructure and of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you, Madam Speaker. We have removed some projects on the 2016 unfunded list. Others have remained unfunded, and there are new projects in the capital plan that were not on the unfunded list in 2016. Our historic $29.5 billion capital plan means that these funds have been flowing to projects that make life better across Alberta, and we are planning to increase our spending on Transportation.

Mrs. Pitt: Madam Speaker, dollars ain't flowing in the Balzac area.

Given that Alberta Transportation knew the overpass could not handle existing or future traffic and given that the minister's department has completed a review – the study is done; the only thing missing is action from this government – to the minister: does someone have to die before you fix this interchange?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Obviously, with this Wildrose opposition if it bleeds, it leads. Quite frankly, safety is our top priority, and it's going to be maintained as our top priority. We look at every interchange in this province and every request that we get through the lens of safety, and that's because we want to make life safer for everyday Albertans.

Notices of Motions

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure and Minister of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. On behalf of my colleague the hon. Minister of Energy I would like to give oral notice of a bill for the Order Paper, this being Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates, another part of our plan to make life more affordable for Albertans.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm tabling the requisite five copies of a letter that I submitted to the Jewish Free Press about how honoured I was to participate in a Yom ha-Shoah service in my riding, standing alongside the Jewish community to memorialize the 6 million Jews who were targeted and killed in the Holocaust.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of Dr. Swann, hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View, map image indicating 2016-2021 timber harvest quota for Balcaen Consolidated Contracting Ltd.; second, report updated, entitled Bill 205: Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act, Proposed Amendments and Review of Limitations, prepared by Inclusion Alberta.

The Acting Speaker: I believe there's a . . .

Mr. Hanson: Madam Speaker, I'm sorry, but they missed the tablings.

The Acting Speaker: You'll have to do it next week. You'll have to table them on Tuesday.

Mr. Mason: I request unanimous consent from the House to revert to tablings, Madam Speaker.

[Unanimous consent denied]

The Acting Speaker: We'll wait till next week. [interjections] Members. Members.

My understanding is that there is a point of order.

Point of Order Insulting Language

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. During question period today the Member for Strathmore-Brooks referred to the Minister of Advanced Education as Minister Magoo. Of course, Mr. Magoo was a cartoon character, a bumbling and nearly blind character. As such, I would suggest that 23(j), a member who "uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder," has been breached. Moreover, in House of Commons Procedure and Practice on page 613 it says, "Members do not refer to one another by their names but rather by title, position or constituency name in order to guard against the tendency to personalize debate. A Minister is referred to by the portfolio he or she holds."

Clearly, Madam Speaker, the hon. member used a personalized and insulting reference to the hon. Minister of Advanced Education. It's unacceptable. It's clearly in violation of the rules and the traditions of the House. I would ask that you rule that there's a valid point of order and ask the hon. member to appear in this Chamber personally to stand up and apologize to the House and to the hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

The Acting Speaker: The deputy Official Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I think the leader is getting a little desperate to find points of order, especially when it comes to the Member for Strathmore-Brooks. A couple of weeks back he actually called a point of order on the Member for Strathmore-Brooks for using an acronym, where he referred to the climate leadership plan as "the CLAP." You know, that's how simple it was. Then he quickly followed up. If you missed it, it was CLP. The argument was used . . . [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Members.

Hon. member, if you could just speak to this point of order, please.

Mr. Hanson: I'm getting to it. Thank you very much. It's relevant, believe me.

The argument he used against that was that there was no "A" in climate leadership plan. He then called a point of order on the point of order. [interjections] Okay. I'll get right to it.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Hanson: On this point of order for calling the Advanced Education minister Minister Magoo, I find it rich, coming from a government that uses name-calling as its first line of defence in question period, that they would be offended by a reference to a famous cartoon character like Mr. Magoo. That being said, if the Advanced Education minister found offence, on behalf of the Member for Strathmore-Brooks I will withdraw and apologize.

The Acting Speaker: All right, hon. members. I do have a copy of the Blues. The hon. Member for Strathmore-Brooks did refer to the minister as Minister Magoo. In saying that, this was clearly a comment that was meant to be disrespectful. The language's intent was to create disorder in the House, so I do find this a point of order, and he should withdraw the comment and apologize.

I would also like to just caution all members in the House, though, that the exchange between the minister and the hon. member was also creating disorder, so if we could just remember the kind of comments that we make when we're responding to questions, too. Thank you.

Hon. member, could you please apologize to the House on behalf of the member?

Mr. Hanson: I just actually did. I said . . . [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Members.

The hon. member.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I do believe I ended my comments with: on behalf of the Member for Strathmore-Brooks I withdraw and apologize.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you very much.

Orders of the Day
Government Bills and Orders
Second Reading

Bill 15
Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017

The Acting Speaker: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to move second reading of Bill 15, the Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017.

As I mentioned during the introduction of this legislation, Alberta's income and commodity tax statutes are typically amended every year. This is necessary to ensure that government policy decisions are implemented and our tax legislation continues to be aligned with federal tax legislation.

Allow me to briefly present the proposed changes being brought forward this year, starting with the most significant one. Madam Speaker, when I introduced this bill, I mentioned that we've heard from Albertans whose carbon levy rebates were affected by the death of a family member. We are taking measures to ensure that their rebates do not have to be returned. Repayments will be issued later this year for households that have already returned those amounts. Households that have not yet repaid will not be required to do so.

The same will apply to benefits received under the Alberta child benefit and the Alberta family employment tax credit going back to January 1 of this year. We heard and listened to Albertans and are making some changes and extending those changes to the Alberta child benefit and the family employment tax credit programs. We're taking action to protect these benefits and make this right for those families.

In addition to forgiving amounts owing to these situations, we are also proposing an amendment to the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act that will address the issue with the carbon levy rebates program so that it does not recur in the future. As most of you know, the Canada Revenue Agency, or CRA, administers a carbon levy rebate program on behalf of this province. Currently the program has a $100 minimum payment rule in place. This means that total annual rebate entitlements of $100 are paid in a single amount, a single allowable payment at the beginning of the benefit year. Essentially, in these cases we are prepaying the rebate in advance for the entire year.

However, the eligibility for the rebate may be affected later due to changes in residency or a death in the family, so if a household is no longer eligible for the prepaid rebate they received, CRA will seek repayment of any excess amount. We heard from a number of Albertans who received a reassessment notice after the death of a family member. This was an unintended consequence of the $100 minimum payment rule that affected a very small number of the overall 1.2 million payments that were issued. But we recognized that families coping with the death of a loved one should not face the indignity of a notice requesting that they pay back a benefit that was meant to make their lives better.

[Mr. Sucha in the chair]

What we are proposing is an amendment to the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act that will allow for rebate entitlements to be delivered in quarterly payments as low as $25. This will prevent the prepayment of benefits and eliminate the need to recover those payments when a family member dies. I want to point out that the minimum annual rebate entitlement still continues to be $100 per year, so rebates for less than that amount over the year will still not be paid. We are just changing the legislation to allow for quarterly payments as low as $25.

Mr. Speaker, we're also continuing to work with the CRA to ensure recovery notices use language that is more sensitive to grieving families, and we expect to see meaningful changes on that front by next year.

As I mentioned, this is the most significant amendment being brought forward in this bill, but there are additional changes that I'll briefly outline now, starting with other amendments to the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act.

One change relates to the government's decision to extend the political contributions tax credit to leadership campaigns and nomination races. As you know, our government has made important changes to provincial election financing to get big money out of politics, including banning corporate and union contributions and putting a cap on individual donations. These measures will remain in place. The amendment we've brought forward here implements a broader political contribution tax credit, as announced in Budget 2017. The aim with this change is to encourage provincial participation in the political process while fostering a healthy and competitive political environment.

Mr. Speaker, other technical amendments to this act are also needed to ensure that Alberta's policies with regard to provincial dividend tax credits along with our tuition and education tax credits are not affected by recent changes to federal legislation.

I'll move on now to changes related to the Alberta Corporate Tax Act. The Canadian Parliament recently passed legislation last year that amended the federal Income Tax Act. Federal changes to the Income Tax Act generally result in technical changes to our legislation to ensure that there is alignment.

For instance, our Corporate Tax Act needs to be amended to parallel the 2016 federal changes that aim to reduce misuse of the preferential 2 per cent small-business tax rate. These amendments will protect provincial revenue and the integrity of our tax system by preventing a few small businesses from using certain structures to multiply their access to the small-business tax rate. The intent of the existing legislation is for the preferential rate to only apply to a small business's first $500,000 of income. These amendments are consistent with the intent and ensure that small businesses do not take advantage of a loophole.

Although Alberta administers its own corporate tax system, we rely on the federal government for the calculations and verifications of income that is eligible for the small-business rate. As a result, Alberta must adopt these federal changes to ensure the province can continue to rely on the federal calculations of income eligibility for the small-business tax rate. It was an automatic change for all other provinces, except for Alberta and Quebec, as we administer our own corporate tax system, so it makes sense to ensure that our corporate tax system stays aligned with theirs.

In addition, the act will also be amended to require tax preparers who fill out 10 or more provincial tax returns to file those returns electronically. It will also implement a penalty if they fail to comply with this requirement. A separate penalty will be implemented for corporations that fail to file tax returns electronically if required to do so. These penalty provisions are consistent with federal tax legislation and are necessary to promote compliance with Alberta's tax laws.

Finally, we've included an amendment that will apply to the Tourism Levy Act. It will allow levy collectors, more specifically accommodations operators, to file a waiver to extend the assessment period when an assessment is issued against them. This provides operators additional time to resolve issues if there is a dispute over the amount of tax owing and also aligns administrative processes among Alberta's tax statutes.

Mr. Speaker, to recap, this bill will address issues with the carbon levy rebate to prevent rebates from being recovered when a family member dies. It will adopt federal changes that will protect tax revenue and ensure consistency between our tax system and the federal tax system. It will help to protect the integrity and fairness of Alberta's tax system and ensure that government policies are implemented.

I'm pleased with the practical changes we've brought forward here, Mr. Speaker, and I have no doubt they will make a meaningful difference for all Albertans. I look forward to the debate on this bill.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, Minister of Finance. I just want to confirm that you're moving second reading of this bill.

Mr. Ceci: I am.

The Acting Speaker: Okay.

The Chair will recognize the Member for Strathmore-Brooks.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the majority of this bill deals with changes brought about due to changes on the federal side, I'll keep my remarks rather brief. Most of the content of this bill is rather technocratic changes to refer to federal taxation changes brought about by the federal government. These are necessary changes in order to keep government running relatively smoothly. Some loopholes are closed, and some old legislation has been updated to align with the digital age. The major changes revolve around the carbon tax partial rebates, which I'll need some more information on before I can make a more informed decision on that front. I hope the Minister of Finance will be able to provide us with those details before this bill is passed.

First, I want to touch on a few of the changes in the bill. The closure of the small-business loophole, which allowed organizations to avoid paying higher taxes, gets my seal of approval. The more tax-avoidance loopholes that are closed: that is directly related to the amount of sleep I get at night. For those listening at home, there are instances where a group could create a separate, smaller business in order to not pay the larger corporate tax. Instead, their separate, smaller business would pay a small-business tax in an attempt to avoid paying the correct level of corporate tax. The initial intent of this portion of legislation will now be written as it was intended if the bill is passed.

Another change revolves around the fact that the federal government removed two tax credits for university students, the textbook tax credits and the education tax credit referred to in this legislation. Since they no longer exist, references to them are being edited out of our provincial legislation. This change is pretty much just housekeeping.

Another housekeeping aspect was brought about by this Legislature. Donation limits to political parties, nomination races, and leadership races were recently changed. With that change came a change to the fact that Albertans now receive a taxable credit for donating to nomination races and leadership races. This bill edits our legislation to allow those tax credits to be issued. As you saw from our announcement today, there will be many tax credits probably being issued in the near future.

Three pieces of legislation are being edited in order to bring them up to our digital-age standards. The tobacco, tourism, and fuel tax acts have been updated within them to allow individuals to file notice via digital means.

Now, the changes I would like to spend most of the time on are the changes being made around the carbon tax rebates. As was first pointed out by someone in my constituency, right in Strathmore, this government in their relative ineptitude clawed back the carbon tax rebate from the recently deceased spouse of one of my constituents. This was completely unacceptable and, frankly, disgusting of this government. While I'm glad that this government is finally doing something about this to prevent it from happening again, I'm disappointed that incompetence within the ranks of the government could allow this to happen in the first place. I'm not surprised by this incompetence, but at least it is being rectified now.

I have concerns about this change, though. I believe that clawing back deceased people's money is just not right, but I'm not necessarily sure yet that this is the most correct way to go about making this happen. As it is set out in this legislation, rebate cheques will go out more often instead of in one lump sum. Now, this might be how the NDP have determined to go about avoiding the desire to claw back people's carbon tax money, but I'm interested to know if the cost of administering thousands and thousands of additional cheques outweighs the cost of letting people just keep the extra $50 or $100. How many people have had to deal with the CRA and the NDP clawing back their money?

If the minister could provide a figure on how many Albertans are actually affected by this along with how much it will cost to administer the additional issuing of cheques per year, that would allow us to determine which is more cost-effective. Should we be issuing more cheques every year, or should we just allow the spouse of a deceased individual to just keep the carbon tax money, which shouldn't have been collected in the first place?

I'm quite sure Albertans would like to spend a lesser amount of their money on a carbon tax, until we repeal it in 2019, but I have a feeling that the amount that it will cost to administer the cheques could very well be higher than just letting deceased people keep the cheques issued to their spouses. And technically it was their money to begin with since it was their tax dollars that were being mailed back to them.

I'll be supporting this bill at second reading, but for me and my caucus to support this bill at further readings, we will need to see an estimate of the costs for the administration issuing more cheques and the estimated cost of letting people just keep cheques when their spouse passes away. I hope that the Minister of Finance will be able to provide the opposition parties with that information so that we can hopefully come to a consensus on this bill.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The chair will recognize the hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I always seem to stand right after the Member for Strathmore-Brooks. I'm happy that today he actually spoke about things about Alberta and not Saskatchewan or B.C. It's a really welcome change in the Legislative Assembly.

Mr. Speaker, I'm really happy to support Bill 15, the Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017, that was earlier introduced for second reading by the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance. As he mentioned in his introduction to second reading of this bill, this is something that is done regularly in Alberta because the commodity tax statutes and income tax laws change, and, as was referred to earlier, things happen in Ottawa that necessitate changes in Alberta.

This bill is necessary to ensure government policy decisions are implemented and that our tax legislation continues to be aligned with the federal tax legislation. These are some of the changes that are in this bill. I think the first change that is important is the fact that the government has heard from Albertans where carbon levy rebates were affected by the death of a family member. We all know how challenging those situations were, and I'm really pleased to be part of a government that is acting quickly to put a remedy to the situation. We are taking measures to ensure that the rebates do not have to be returned if somebody dies in the family. Repayments will be issued later this year for households that may have already returned these amounts, and households that have not yet repaid the amount will not be required to do so.

The same will apply to benefits received under the Alberta child benefit and the Alberta family employment tax credit going back to January 1 of this year. I would really like to thank the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance for ensuring that in situations where somebody is facing a very tough time due to the death of a loved one, they are not faced with letters from CRA or the Alberta government asking for repayment. We have heard and listened to Albertans and are making those changes.

We're also taking action to protect these benefits and make this right for them. In addition to forgiving amounts owing in these situations, we are also proposing an amendment to the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act that will address the issues with a carbon levy rebate program so that this does not reoccur in the future. As most of you know, the Canada Revenue Agency, or the CRA, administers the carbon levy rebate program on behalf of the province. Currently the program has a $100 minimum payment rule in place. This means that the total annual rebate entitlements of $100 are paid in a single-amount payment at the beginning of the benefit year, as happened this year in January for those who qualified.

Essentially, in these cases we are prepaying the rebate in advance for the entire year. However, eligibility for the rebate may be affected later due to changes in residency or a death in the family. So if a household is no longer eligible for the prepaid rebate they received, CRA will seek repayment of any excess amount.

We've heard from a number of Albertans who received their reassessment notice after the death of a family member. This was an unintended consequence of the $100 minimum payment rule that affected a very small number of the overall 1.2 million payments that were issued, and I want to emphasize that this was an unintended consequence. We recognize that families coping with the death of a loved one should not face the indignity of a notice requesting that they pay back a benefit that was meant to make their lives better. I think I can speak on behalf of all Members of the Legislative Assembly that we've all faced helping someone who experienced a death in their family and the number of letters and information that has to be communicated to CRA and various government levels, and just receiving a letter from the CRA asking for repayment added to the grief and the burden.

What we are proposing is an amendment to the Alberta Personal Income Act that will allow for rebate entitlements to be delivered in quarterly payments of as low as $25. This will prevent the prepayment of benefits and eliminate the need to recover those payments when a family member dies. I want to point out that the minimum annual rebate entitlement still continues to be $100 per year, so rebates of less than this amount over the year will still not be paid. We are just changing the legislation to allow quarterly payments of as low as $25.

Mr. Speaker, we are continuing to work with the CRA to ensure recovery notices use language that is more sensitive to grieving families, and we expect to see meaningful changes on that front by next year. As I mentioned, this is the most significant amendment being brought forward in this bill, but there are some other changes.

Some of the other changes are other amendments to the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act. I think one change that is probably important to my colleagues across the way, who have just formed another entity, which I cannot say the name of without laughing, so I will not . . . [interjection] One change relates to the government's decision to extend the political contributions tax credit to leadership campaigns and nomination races. [interjection] I'm sorry if I'm laughing. I just have a really, really hard time with acronyms.

As I mentioned and has been mentioned by the hon. minister, in one of the first bills that the government put forth, there was a decision to extend the political contributions tax credit to leadership campaigns and nomination races. As you know, we made important changes to election financing to get big money out of politics, including banning corporate and union contributions and putting the cap on individual donations.

I just find myself really frustrated by the way that our government has worked so hard to get the corporate contributions out of politics and how we just found out yesterday that the opposition may be contravening these.

These measures will remain in place. The amendment we brought forward here implements a broader political contribution tax credit, as announced in Budget 2017. The aim of this change is to encourage participation in the political process while fostering a healthy and competitive political environment. I want to really emphasize that the purpose of these changes is to encourage participation in the political process while fostering a healthy and competitive political environment, and this applies to all parties in the Legislative Assembly and for all Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, other technical amendments to this act are also needed to ensure Alberta's policies with regard to provincial dividend tax credits along with our tuition and education tax credits are not affected by recent changes to federal legislation. The Alberta Corporate Tax Act also needed to be amended because of what was passed by the federal government. Changes to the federal Income Tax Act generally result in technical changes to our legislation to ensure there is alignment.

For instance, our Corporate Tax Act needs to be amended to parallel the 2016 federal changes that aimed to reduce misuse of the preferential 2 per cent small-business tax rate. These amendments will protect provincial revenue and the integrity of our tax system by preventing a few small businesses from using certain structures to multiply their access to the small-business rate. The intent of the existing legislation is for the preferential rate to only apply to a small business's first $500,000 of income. These amendments are consistent with this intent and ensure small businesses do not take advantage of a loophole.

Although Alberta administers its own corporate tax system, we rely on the federal government for the calculation and verification of income that is eligible for the small-business rate. As a result, Alberta must adopt these federal changes to ensure the province can continue to rely on the federal calculation of income eligibility for the small-business rate. Maybe it's really good to remind everyone in the House that this government lowered the small-business rate from 3 per cent to 2 per cent in the last budget. It was an automatic change for all other provinces except for Alberta and Quebec as we administer our own corporate tax system, so it makes sense to ensure our corporate tax systems stay aligned.

In addition, the act will also be amended to require tax preparers who file 10 or more provincial tax returns to file the returns electronically. It will also implement a penalty if they fail to comply with this requirement. A separate penalty will be implemented for corporations that fail to file their tax return electronically if required to do so. These penalty provisions are consistent with federal tax legislation and are necessary to promote compliance with Alberta tax laws.

Mr. Speaker, we will be amending the Tourism Levy Act through Bill 15. It will allow levy collectors – more specifically, accommodation operators – to file a waiver to extend the assessment period when an assessment is issued against them. This provides operators additional time to resolve issues if there is a dispute over the amount of tax owing and also aligns administrative processes among Alberta tax statutes.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, this bill will do a lot of things. I know a lot of people think that tax bills are really, really boring, but tax bills are really enabling bills to allow the government to do what it set out to do in its budget, and they are some very important bills. This bill will address issues with the carbon levy rebate, to prevent rebates from being recovered when a family member dies. It will adopt federal changes that will protect tax revenue and ensure consistency between our tax system and the federal tax system, and it will help to protect the integrity and fairness of Alberta's tax system and ensure government policies are implemented.

I am pleased with the practical changes that are brought in by this bill. I would like to thank once again the President of the Treasury Board and Minister of Finance for the careful preparation of this bill. I look forward to the debate and for all Members of this Legislative Assembly to support second reading of this bill.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That was interesting to watch, that's for sure. I do have a question. You know, it's sort of an ironic situation, more or less. I'm pretty sure that during the carbon tax debate the opposition members raised several questions and amendments that spoke to the unintended consequences of the implementation of the carbon tax, and, sure enough, we're here – what? – one year later dealing with the unintended consequences of the NDP carbon tax here in Alberta. We now have to bring in legislation so that we are no longer taking money back from those that have passed away. This is crazy.

I can't even imagine how many more times this government is going to come back to the House, their tail between their legs, with a piece of legislation and go: "Oops. We've got to fix this stupid, crappy thing we did earlier." I just want to point out that this is actually absolutely ridiculous. Maybe next time do your homework and work through all the unintended consequences of a tax that is very harmful to everyone in Alberta. Most people don't like it, and I'm sure they're going to be really kind of annoyed that this government is wasting time with legislation here in this House to fix their mistakes.

Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: The Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: I think the member opposite is not understanding the quick action that the government took as soon as the government realized that there were some challenges with prepaying the rebate. The minister alerted CRA, and things were set in motion quickly. This bill is to make sure that there are no unforeseen consequences to the payment of the carbon levy rebate, so it's changing the way that the payment will happen. It's going to be in quarterly payments so that nobody is faced with a situation where they've been paid for something and they have to give it back.

Actually, rather than putting the government down, I am really pleased to be part of a government that acted right away when the problem was brought up publicly and worked with the CRA to rectify the problem. Now, through this bill, the problem will no longer exist because people are being paid in quarterly payments. On top of that, the people have been prepaid, and if they lost someone in their family, they will not have to repay the prepayment of $100. That will be forgiven by the government. So rather than knocking the government down all the time, please pay some attention to how quickly the government has moved and how sensitive the minister and the Premier have been to this issue.

The Acting Speaker: Any other speakers under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park.

Cortes-Vargas: Yeah. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to comment on the intended consequences of the carbon levy because I think the members opposite forget that their approach and their continuous resistance to being able to talk to people that have different opinions than them created a polarized conversation that resulted in zero pipelines to tidewater. The fact is that the carbon levy and the ability to actually talk to people that are different than their world view has built a capacity for our government to build social licence and be able to talk to the members opposite.

I think they reflected on the election across our boundaries, Mr. Speaker. I think they need to remember that one of the top issues within that province is actually electoral reform. One of the reasons that that is happening is because the democratic process that we have has been affected by the fact that people haven't been listened to. The members opposite will soon find out that compromises are difficult, because they're about to create and are creating a merger between the two parties, and they can barely agree on who's going to finish the press conference. The fact of the matter is that the member opposite has failed to talk to what has been created by the carbon levy, and it's something incredibly important in our economy, and it's something that this government will not stop fighting for.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: With only five seconds left, I'll remind members that 29(2)(a) is for questions or comments relevant to the prior speaker.

The chair will recognize the Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is a pleasure to get up and talk about the Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017. I think this is actually the first time I've gotten up to speak with this particular Mr. Speaker in the chair.

You know, I want to start off with some comments. I mean, this is a very important bill, and it does talk about that we are making some changes as they relate to the implementation of the carbon levy rebate as well as various other tax changes.

I want to start off by talking about this bill through some of the comments that had just come up under the previous 29(2)(a). You know, the opposition Member for Airdrie is correct that they did talk at length about what they perceived to be unintended consequences of the carbon levy, but unfortunately for them the unintended consequences that they were talking about are that they felt that there was going to be some version of economic doom that would come from it, and that is, in fact, not what happened, I will reiterate.

In fact, I believe that the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance actually mentioned in question period just today that housing starts are up, Mr. Speaker, that jobs are up, that rig activity and working rigs are up. I would submit to the hon. Member for Airdrie that it sounds like what they thought would be unintended consequences have not at all come true and that our plan for making life better for Albertans through taking action on climate change is, in fact, working and that the hon. member's assertion is wrong.

You know, in their plan that they propose – I mean, we're now at the two-year mark of this mandate, and all the opposition has been giving us is anecdotes, if you will. They are purely opposing, and at this point in their mandate I would suggest it would be useful for them to ante up an actual plan so that Albertans can see what they think.

An Hon. Member: Table the napkin.

Mr. Malkinson: They can table the napkin, because so far the only thing that they've presented when we've gone to debate things over and over in this House, whether it's on the Tax Statutes Amendment Act, whether it was on the budget – that's all I hear over and over and over again from the opposition.

The only part I've heard that's a concrete plan from them is that they want to undo everything we've done, and unfortunately for them I think they need to explain to Albertans why they would undo the good that is in this bill. The hon. Minister of Treasury Board and Finance has gone on at length about why he's brought this forward. I think we've heard an excellent summary from my colleague.

You know, we've got to think about this. What do we want to do? Do we want to do good, or do we want to have an opposition that continually just opposes even when it's administrative changes to fix a problem that we identified and that the Premier committed to taking quick action on? I will point out, Mr. Speaker, that the Premier committed to take quick action on this, and here we are. We are here with the solution to that. I think it speaks to our continuing commitment to do what's best for Albertans, no matter what it is, whether it's providing daycare spaces or whether it's updating our tax statutes in order to make them run more efficiently and to keep them in line with the federal government.

I think we've already gone on somewhat at length about why these changes needed to be in there. I think I'll take a moment just to quickly mention about what happens with people who move out of Alberta and then receive a rebate. I think a question that most people would reasonably ask, which is, in all honesty, the only question I've actually gotten on this particular bill, is: what would happen in that case? Well, Mr. Speaker, people who leave the province and are no longer paying into Alberta's carbon levy should not be entitled to the rebate.

By switching to this quarterly payment system for the rebate, it will also help address this situation as well as the situation of what happens when a loved one or family member passes away. That's a traumatic time for anyone, and it's important that we do our best to make sure that we are not being petty by going after a couple of dollars from the carbon levy rebate. I don't think that's something that's good policy and that we need to do, and it's not in the interests of making life better for Albertans.

I'd also like to bring the House's attention to one other thing we're doing in here. In particular, as a result of the small-business tax we are closing a bit of a loophole, actually, in the small-business tax system because our government has the backs of small-business owners. Those are small-business owners that are in every single one of our ridings.

I know the hon. member from Fort McMurray, of course, laughs at that because he does want to cut everything we've done. He wants to put the small-business tax back up to its old rate. I'm very curious to see how he's going to explain and justify that to his constituents. Like was mentioned earlier, we've seen no plan from that hon. member. I think it's high time that the opposition starts anteing up specifics to what they would do differently, especially as they merge into a new party.

We made this change. It was also to mirror changes that happened to the federal tax system to close a loophole that gave some small businesses an unfair advantage. But I'll also point out that it was our government that lowered small-business taxes, Mr. Speaker – our government, an NDP government – because we are there supporting small businesses, because we are always there.

We are making changes to make life better for Albertans. As part of our budgets we're also building new roads and new schools, which support various trades and contractors throughout the province, and that's jobs for other small businesses that happen to be in the infrastructure sector.

We've also had the hon. minister of economic development introduce various tax credits and incentives for investors to invest in Albertan businesses, whether they be in my home riding of Calgary-Currie, whether they be in the Finance minister's riding of Calgary-Fort, or whether they be in Fort McMurray, in the riding of the previous member who was, you know, laughing about these changes earlier.

I think it's important that we talk about these and that we pass this bill because it is one small part of how we're working to make life better for Albertans, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, the hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance to close debate.

Mr. Ceci: Well, thank you very much for the debate that's gone on with regard to the Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017, Mr. Speaker. We on this side, of course, believe very strongly that the carbon levy rebates that are being issued to Albertans at $410 million in 2017-2018 will make life better for those families. It will assist them in being able to address either costs to their households, to help ameliorate those costs, to improve their households, or lower their emissions.

It will also be something that helps this province, Mr. Speaker. As many have said around this side of the House, the climate leadership plan that has been brought forward is having a positive effect on this province. It is improving the ability of the province to achieve a connection to the west coast through access to tidewater, and that will help our economy so much.

We've been at the behest of one customer. The major competitor to Canadian oil sands is in the United States, and that situation has left us without a great deal of leverage power when it comes to getting world prices. We get a discounted price, and that discounted price directly affects the bottom line of this province. It directly affects the amount of resource revenues that come into this province, and as a result it has challenged this province financially.

We are taking action to change that, Mr. Speaker. The Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017, while not directly changing that, does improve the situation that we have discovered and quickly acted on. The quarterly payments to Albertans who are eligible to receive these carbon rebates will make it so that the unfortunate circumstance of CRA asking to recover a portion of those funds from families will not occur going forward. We have taken the view that this is the best way to address this so that we're not in this situation as a government, as Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to that, though, changes to the small-business taxation loophole that was there are a good thing. I mean, it means that there won't be leakage from inappropriate use of that rate. We need to appreciate that the federal government moved on that quickly, and that has helped as well.

Just back to the benefit, of course, of the carbon levy and the rebates that are going back to Albertans. You know, Mr. Speaker, that helped us understand that we can do similar improvements with regard to the Alberta child benefit and the Alberta family employment tax credit. While we don't see the same number of situations occurring in those benefits to Albertans, which are very, very helpful, again, we have taken action to make sure that the same sort of thing doesn't happen there. Though there were far fewer numbers of circumstances in those other two benefit programs to Albertans, there were still impacts.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues again who have stood up and talked about these important changes. Typically, you know, they're not the kinds of things that would attract a lot of attention. They're more mundane and regularized. But because we have brought in an important program in terms of the Alberta climate leadership plan, important rebates going out to families, it is worth noting and it is worth bringing forward that we have quickly addressed this. We have worked with our partner in CRA to make sure that they provide more sensitive information to individuals who receive these notices going forward. We are going to make sure that that happens as quickly as possible.

Thank you very much for the opportunity to close debate on second reading.

[Motion carried; Bill 15 read a second time]

Cortes-Vargas: Seeing the great progress that we've made this afternoon, I would move to adjourn the House and come back on Tuesday at 10 o'clock.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 3:40 p.m.]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Deputy Speaker: Good morning.

Hon. members, let us please take a moment to send our thoughts and prayers to all those who were killed and injured by the bombing in Manchester, England. We are thinking of the victims, family, friends, first responders, and so many others who will forever be affected by this intolerable act. Please know that we are here with you.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 205

Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act

The Chair: We are currently debating amendment A1. Are there any further speakers to this amendment? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you, Madam Chair. I would like to propose an amendment, and I have spoken to both the minister and the Member for Calgary-North West about the concerns with the current proposed amendment from the government.

The Chair: Hon. member, can I just clarify? Are you proposing a subamendment to amendment A1?

Dr. Swann: Yes.

The Chair: Okay.

Dr. Swann: My understanding is that unless the government withdraws its amendment, this would not be . . .

The Chair: Just clarifying that it's a subamendment, to get the terminology right.

Dr. Swann: Okay.

The Chair: Go ahead.

Dr. Swann: Well, I have the appropriate number of copies, Madam Chair. My understanding is that – yeah. Well, I'll propose it as is. It seeks to establish the advocate for persons with disabilities as an officer of the Legislature instead of an advocate within the ministry.

The Chair: Hon. member, if you could give me a second until we have the original here at the table so we can make sure we've got . . .

Dr. Swann: Sure.

The Chair: Hon. member, I've been advised that this is not in a subamendment format. It's an actual amendment, so we have to deal with amendment A1 first before we can get to your proposed amendment. It's not in order to move it right at the moment. We have to finish up with amendment A1.

Dr. Swann: Could I speak, then, to the amendment and why I think . . .

The Chair: You could speak to amendment A1 if you wish, but you can't move another amendment while we've got A1 on the floor.

Dr. Swann: Well, I guess my argument, then, would be that I would request that the minister withdraw his amendment to allow the debate to happen on this amendment because otherwise there won't be a debate on the independence of the advocate. That would be my argument, Madam Chair. Could I proceed?

The Chair: Go ahead if you want to speak to the amendment, and you can, you know, make your case, as it may be. Absolutely.

Dr. Swann: Thank you. I understand that the establishment of an advocate for persons with disabilities under the ministry is being proposed. I am suggesting that the advocate be independent of the ministry and that the advocate be an independent officer of the Legislature.

The amendment obviously cannot be introduced at this time because there is an amendment on the floor which would preclude the opportunity to have this debate. It raises the whole question of informing the government of amendments when they have the ability to stop that amendment by anticipating the proposal of an amendment.

Let me first say that I fully support the establishment of an advocate for persons with disabilities. It's laudable. It's essential. Unfortunately, in this case it is not going to be as effective or create the accountability that I think we all want in an advocate. Having been an MLA for over a decade, I can tell you that there have always been constituents seeking navigation and system change within the AISH and the PDD systems. Bill 205 proposes the creation of an advocate's office similar to the Health, Seniors, and Mental Health Patient advocates, all of whom report to the minister and whose funding is determined by the minister. In the past this has led to advocates being unable to fulfill their mandates due to lack of resources or impingement on their freedom to express concerns because they are employed by the ministry.

That's why after almost a decade the Child and Youth Advocate became independent, because it was clear that the advocate was not able to say the tough things that the minister didn't want to hear. It took a tremendous amount of leadership and political will from the public and child advocates to get that advocate independent. Indeed, in the 2014-15 annual report of the mental health advocate, it was stated explicitly:

The past year posed challenges to fulfill our . . . mandate in a timely manner . . . largely due to the loss of a position and the subsequent reassignment of duties, along with the Government of Alberta's restraint measures. It had a direct impact on the number of Albertans we served and the inability to perform formal investigations.

Bill 205 is silent on anything related to an independent advocate because it's not the model the government has opted for. The bill merely states that the government or Lieutenant Governor in Council may appoint an advocate and that the minister may make funds available for an advocate and his or her staff.

There's nothing saying that an advocate who is an officer of the Legislature necessarily has to have a larger budget than one who is not, but that tends to be the case. The question, I guess, would be: will a larger budget allocated to an advocate reduce the funding for that ministry? And, as some have said in the PDD community, would that affect their own income as caregivers of people with disabilities? That seems to be a fear out there. In fact, the reverse would be true. If the advocate was independent, there would be no impact of budgetary decisions in the ministry because the budget for the advocate would be created by the Legislature generally. The fear that has been expressed by front-line workers, that their salaries might be impacted by establishing a budget for the advocate, is unfounded in this context.

In a lot of ways this discounts our advocates, who are only as effective as the government allows within the ministry. The government appears to want the advocate to fulfill a very specific role, mostly assisting and advising AISH and PDD clients, but one that does not include challenging government to improve the management culture and the management system of PDD and AISH. I envision the advocate as having an expanded role similar to that of the Child and Youth Advocate, not necessarily with a big budget but at least starting off with the independence and accountability that I think everyone wants, including those with disabilities. My current move with this amendment would have the support of groups like the Disability Action Hall and Inclusion Alberta, who are also proposing the creation of an independent advocate.

I think it's disingenuous to attach independence to a high, big budget. It doesn't have to be. What it needs is accountability and transparency, which I think can be as much as the government and the legislative committee decide is appropriate based on the budget of the day. If it's worth doing, it's worth doing right. Putting our money where our mouth is, whether it's a million-dollar budget or a $14 million budget, I think, is really what this question is about. Besides, an independent officer will have a budget then set by the all-party committee, based on, again, the current need and the financial realities that the government is facing, in an open and transparent manner.

The argument over money misses the point, and that is that to be truly effective, the advocate needs to be independent of the ministry. The question, then, is whether this is the appearance of more accountability for the PDD community or if it's a real commitment to listening and advocating for some of the concerns of this long-beleaguered community. It needs a different reporting structure and greater accountability, which is what we will get with an independent advocate. The advocate will also have the ability to exercise judgment on what areas need investigation and improvement. I view both of these aspects as desirable, and I expect the government of today to do so as well.

I certainly hope the government will do the right thing and consider establishing the advocate for persons with disabilities as an independent officer of the Legislature. After all, that is what Albertans, the PDD community, families, and caregivers expect.

I think, in passing, that there still is a strong need for consultation with the community. I know the member has done some consultation through her office. This is now a significant bill affecting thousands and thousands of Albertans, and it's clear to me that if the government is serious, they should withdraw the amendment currently on the table and allow this whole question of independence to be debated. I leave that to the government.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

Ms Jansen: I want to thank the Member for Calgary-Mountain View for his comments because I have a great deal of respect for his years of service in this House and for his comments on, clearly, a community that he has had some valuable input on. I think that's fantastic, and I appreciated the conversation that you took pains to have with me on this particular issue.

We're going to agree to disagree on a couple of points here, and one of them is the role of the advocate. When I first started talking about this bill, when I was, certainly, on the other side of the House, one of the things the initial conversation was about was an independent advocate. Now, with a price tag like the Child and Youth Advocate's of about $14 million – that's a pretty big price tag for an advocate, so I thought to myself: well, in this current economic climate how do we move these issues forward when the resources don't seem to be there to put an independent office into place?

Now, one of the things you mentioned to me was that you believed that on a budget of less than a million dollars this advocate could do the same thing as an independent advocate. I would say that one of my concerns when amendments come forward is that we're not putting suggestions forward that would essentially set the advocate up to fail. When we talk about what this advocate would do, when I talked about what I wanted the advocate to do, it was to identify issues and concerns for people with disabilities. It was to review programs and policies that we have in place in our government. It was about promoting the rights and interests of people with disabilities. It was about providing advice to government with respect to matters relating to programs that we have.

Now, if you are to give – and you know that comparisons are made. Comparisons are always made between programs. Comparisons are being made right now between the advocate programs we have in place, the different advocates. You made them yourself. So the idea that you would give all the expectations of the Child and Youth Advocate, with its budget of $15 million, and give those expectations now to an advocate for people with disabilities, with a budget of $800,000 or $900,000, strikes me as setting that person up for an onerous task.

Now, between adults and children with disabilities in this province they number almost 500,000 people, half a million people. If you're saying that with our budget of $800,000 this advocate is then going to be an individual advocate or representative for more than 500,000 people, that is a huge task. I worry that in the first year or two that the advocate is up and running and if all those people's needs aren't met individually, what then do they say about the advocate?

When I envisioned this advocate, considering the resources that we had available to us – and then the question is: if we did put the additional resources in, where would they come from? That's another area which now would come up short, and that's concerning to me.

In a perfect world I would love to see an independent advocate. The struggle right now is to be able to provide as much in the way of services as possible within the constraints we have in the current economic climate. So with all due respect, you know, I don't think I'm arguing against a subamendment because you haven't put it forward, but I would say to the main amendment that in order to accomplish what is a pretty onerous task in the first year or two of forming this advocate, they have a lot on their plate already.

What I hope in the longer term is that we grow this position with constant feedback, with consultation with a broad number of groups – you're right that we haven't consulted all the people we need to consult with; that's ongoing, and that's something that the advocate is going to be able to do – and that by the time we get to the review period, we know exactly where we want to go in the future.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to move a subamendment to Bill 205, Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act.

The Chair: It will be known as SA1.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. I would move that amendment A1 to Bill 205, Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act, be amended as follows. Part B is struck out, and the following is substituted. In part B section 3 is amended (a) in subsection (1) by adding "and persons who are employed to provide services to persons with disabilities" after "viewpoints of persons with disabilities"; (b) in subsection (2) by (i) striking out clause (b) and substituting the following:

- (b) review programs and policies to ensure the rights and safety of persons with disabilities and persons who are employed to provide services to persons with disabilities are protected;

(ii) in clause (c) by striking out "processes in which decisions" and substituting "consultations in which systemic decisions"; (iii) in clause (e) by adding "and persons who are employed to provide services to persons with disabilities" after "and well-being of persons with disabilities"; (iv) by striking out clause (f) and substituting the following:

- (f) provide education as needed to ensure individuals having difficulty accessing services and related programs for persons with disabilities are aware of appropriate resources, persons and organizations; and (v) by adding the following after clause (g):

- (h) exercise any other power prescribed in the regulations.

Part D is struck out, and the following is substituted. In part D section 6 is amended (a) in subsection (1) by (i) striking out "one year" and substituting "2 years"; (ii) by adding "and persons who are employed to provide services to persons with disabilities" after "relating to persons with disabilities"; and (b) by striking out subsection (5) and substituting the following:

- (5) The committee to which a report is referred must, within 90 days of the report being referred to the committee,
 - (a) consult with the public about the report, in a form and manner satisfactory to the committee, and
 - (b) report back to the Legislative Assembly with any recommendations, if it is then sitting or, if it is not then sitting, within 15 days after the commencement of the next sitting.

Madam Chair, I would like to speak briefly to the government's amendment and propose a subamendment. In this bill as it is currently written, the advocate must submit a review after one year has passed. The government is now amending this to be two years, and I think it would be fair to give the advocate this time to actually get settled into the role, to have some experience and see how things are working before it's expected to review what is working and what isn't. So we would support two years as being reasonable, and we would move forward and support that change.

Now, our subamendment also speaks to this review. This review should involve, we believe, consultation with stakeholders. As the advocate is moving forward, they might take a look at and meet with front-line workers that may have a different viewpoint that needs to be addressed so that we can determine what is working and what isn't. Obviously, we would like the advocate to be able to meet with those front-line workers and to be able to get their take on how things are working.

You know, the advocate may be aware of some of the gaps that occur in service or where there are some issues with the service that is being provided to Albertans. I believe that the legislators and the advocate alike would benefit from hearing that point of view in the review by the advocate. We're just really encouraging some more fulsome consultation with stakeholders on the advocate's review to ensure that their input is considered and that as the Legislative Assembly moves forward and considers changes to the act, they would have included in the advocate's review considerations from front-line workers.

Similarly, right now we see that this is working in things like the Legislative Offices Committee, that is doing a review of the Child and Youth Advocate Act. We've heard from colleagues on that committee that it's been very helpful to hear from stakeholders, from front-line workers on what is working and what could be improved. For instance, the Child and Youth Advocate was not aware that many Albertans thought that an adult could not call their office on behalf of a young person. This misunderstanding highlights – and it only came to light when the advocate heard testimony from stakeholders, so during the committee meetings, and the advocate was able to quickly resolve this issue. So we would like to see something similar happen with the review, and this is one portion of my subamendment, that we would like to include consultation with front-line workers.

I'd like to see something similar happen with the review, and this part of our amendment simply adds that the committee to which the advocate's report is referred must within 90 days of the report being referred consult with the public about the report in a form and in a manner that is satisfactory to the committee. I don't think we're doing anything too prescriptive here. We'd be saying that the committee should consider what others have to say about the effectiveness of the act as well.

Another aspect of our subamendment would bring workers within the disability sector into the advocate's purview. I think it's safe to say that it's in the best interests of persons with disabilities to have a staff worker or the staff working with them well trained and to have a good work environment. More importantly, we all know that good staff morale is critical to effective service.

Stories like the tragic death of Valerie Wolski come to mind. You know, if a support worker is placed in a risky situation yet they are responsible for a high-risk individual that they care about, well, whom do they turn to? We believe that since this advocate is to be involved in a broad, systemic level of decision-making, I think it should have a mandate to consider those employed within the sector as well and to include that information in any review being sent forward.

In summary, we would support the government amendment to clarify the role of the advocate and to increase the time frame to two years before a review is undertaken. We would hope that the members of this House will also see the subamendment that we're proposing, of adding workers within the disabilities sector to the act and adding public input to the review of the act, as a way of strengthening this bill even further.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

Ms Jansen: I want to thank the member for his subamendment, and I want to say that I'm a little disappointed right now because when I first stood to talk about this bill, I talked about how I wanted us to be postpartisan about this and all work together. When I get two pages put in front of me that we never – you know, the Member for Calgary-Mountain View phoned me and talked to me about his amendment beforehand. We had a chance to have a good discussion about it, and I knew it was coming and had a chance to talk with some folks about what it meant. This is presented to us with no discussion, no idea that it was coming forward. There's a part of me that says: why would you do that? Why would you not – if you were really serious about amendments that you thought would make this better, why did you not pick up the phone and call me like other folks have done? Even the Member for Calgary-Greenway did that.

An Hon. Member: Even him?

Ms Jansen: Even him.

You know, I would say that there are actually things in here I like but put together in a basket of stuff that, meh, I'm not so fond of. I guess I'm a little bit frustrated right now because I think you were going some good places here. If we had a chance to sit down and talk about it, I think – that's what I wanted this bill to be was an opportunity to sit down and amongst 87 members of the Legislature come up with something that fits every single constituency in the province.

As a whole, unfortunately, I can't support the subamendment. There are parts of it I like, and if we continue to have this conversation, I would be delighted to sit down and have a conversation when we actually have a little time to sort of talk about the individual implications.

So I thank you because there is a lot here. I just really wish, for myself and for quite a few of the members on this side of the House, that we had a chance to kind of noodle it over, and that hasn't been given to us.

The Chair: Any other speakers to SA1?

Seeing none, are you ready for the vote?

[Motion on subamendment SA1 lost]

The Chair: We're back on amendment A1. Are there any further speakers to this amendment?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[Motion on amendment A1 carried]

The Chair: Back on Bill 205, are there any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my honour to rise to speak to Bill 205, Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act. First, I would like to take a moment to thank the Member for Calgary-North West for bringing the bill forward. It's important we have opportunities to discuss and understand the barriers that those with disabilities face. Some of the conversations that have taken place since the introduction of this bill have given me a better understanding of the challenges, but of course I still have so much to learn. I'd also like to thank the MLA for St. Albert for her many years of work advocating for and working with the disabled community.

Edmonton-Meadowlark is lucky to be home to many incredible organizations that work within this community: the Gateway Association, Alberta Committee of Citizens with Disabilities, Children's Ability Fund, AdaptAbilities, just to name a few. Each of these organizations serves different purposes, but they are all equally important not only in their ability to advocate for and support those they serve but also to teach us as representatives of our community how to be better and how to do better by this community.

Madam Chair, of course, that starts by us being able to listen to the issues that affect them. There are varying levels of abilities within our communities, some more visible than others, but we must do our best to address the issues that keep them from living the best lives possible.

It wasn't long ago that I was at a local fast-food chain, and a man stopped me, after recognizing me as the MLA for the community, to explain that the automatic door openers were not working and hadn't been for weeks. He was on crutches and was able to navigate this barrier, but he was concerned about others who might not have the ability to do so. Madam Chair, this is something that most of us take for granted, being able to make it through doorways of establishments, let alone the other barriers that arise after making it through those doors. The issue of having working automatic doors seems so simple, yet I can admit that previously I seldom checked to make sure that they worked.

But that is why these conversations are so important for those in the disability community to show us our own privilege and the negative effect it can have on them when we don't address it and create legislation to break these barriers down. Now, the moment the man stopped me in the fast-food store to explain the obstacles, it was easy for me to understand the situation – he had a visible disability, and there was a somewhat clear solution moving forward, at least in this specific instance – but then I think about my friend who has MS, a debilitating condition which has taken away her ability to drive to work and do many other activities that we take for granted. But you wouldn't know this by looking at her. The challenges that she faces are completely different, but the importance of an advocate to her is the same.

Now, I want to give my colleagues more time to speak, so I'll keep this as short as possible. I know that there are a few more, I believe, wanting to speak to this. But I also want to recognize the community of advocates for people with developmental disabilities, that work day in and day out to teach us more about their issues. Members in this House have already recognized many of them by name. Your tireless work to bring understanding to us is greatly appreciated, and it truly is making a difference. An advocate will help us better understand each of these unique situations and bring accountability to the government when it comes to supporting this community, especially as it relates to government services, which is why I'm so proud to stand here in the Chamber to support this bill.

Now, I just want to comment on something that happened this weekend, something that I am unbelievably saddened to see, the advocate for persons with disabilities from the PC caucus, the Member for Calgary-Greenway, validating some of the most hateful language that can be used within this community, a word that our caucus has pledged to stand against whenever we hear it. Though he did apologize, with, I would say, a somewhat canned apology, Madam Chair, he hurt that community deeply, and I hope that he will stand in this House to apologize on the record.

But I do digress. Once again I would just like to say thank you to the many tireless advocates in our province who spend countless hours reaching out to us as representatives to help us better understand the challenges within the community. You have taught me a lot, but I recognize that I have so, so much more to learn. The most important piece I can take away from this is that we must not make decisions without fully consulting with the community, and I pledge to do that as much as possible.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Red Deer-North.

Mrs. Schreiner: Thank you, Madam Chair. First of all, I'd like to thank the Member for Calgary-North West for introducing Bill 205 and recognizing the need for the advocate for persons with disabilities. In an effort to make life better for all Albertans, Bill 205 is a strong response to the call for advocacy regarding vulnerable Albertans.

Madam Chair, I support this bill for many reasons. I have seen many instances within my riding of the particular need. Our vulnerable require a voice that appropriately addresses the rights, interests, and viewpoints of those who may be unable to represent themselves. Without this voice advocating, we are seeing those who are unable to represent themselves fall victim to a system that is not representing the true essence of their concerns. We cannot identify appropriate resources and recommendations without the input and dialogue of those who are entangled in a system they find difficult to navigate.

By establishing an advocacy body for susceptible Albertans, our Ministry of Community and Social Services will have front-line information regarding viable recommendations to enhance the lives of Albertans. With a mandate to identify and study issues of concern, review programs and policies affecting persons with disabilities, support direct participation in processes, promote rights and well-being, we can strive towards a more systematic understanding of the issues faced and identify potential solutions to these barriers.

Madam Chair, it is no secret that my constituency has seen how misrepresenting the vulnerable can traumatically impact them. The Michener Centre has made headlines continuously as a result of less than favourable decisions made by the previous government. Members of the House, the Keep Michener Open campaign has provided insight into the true need for advocacy for persons with disabilities. When the previous government announced their plans for closure, the impact was felt throughout Alberta. Michener represented a community for persons with disabilities. Community is the true fabric of our great province, and when it is systematically dismantled, it presents a great loss to its clients. It removed the peace of mind encompassed by their family members, who recognize the importance of maintaining the community.

I am proud to be part of a government that sees the need to provide assistance to vulnerable Albertans, who can essentially become victims of the very protocol that is meant to serve them and their needs.

To the House, let me detail how advocacy imparts a strong response. Michener was a hub that provided the opportunity for persons with disabilities to come together within their own special dynamics and to experience the world together. This hub provided the care and attention that was specific to them. They hosted weekly dances and provided the socialization that is necessary for inclusion. This is where they found their sense of belonging. Residents took part in planning activities and events. They were their own micro-society, with protocols that catered to their diverse needs. Residents lived in, participated in, contributed to, and nurtured their community so that it resonated the true wants of the residents. They gathered socially and made a home into a community where disabilities did not hinder their lives.

Albertans responded to this decision with the help of AUPE and the parents' society, who sought 80,000-plus signatures in a campaign to keep Michener open. Two thousand lawn signs, rallies, door-knocking blitzes, and media announced the importance of allowing residents to reside where they were comfortable and had a choice. If an advocate had been established, this situation may have presented differently. Madam Chair, Bill 205 gives a voice to those who cannot speak for themselves, to the concerns that impact their lives.

Recently the Member for Calgary-McCall responded to concerns within the PDD system, and I thank him for that.

The Auditor General engaged recommendations in support of creating a more streamlined system to access resources for our disabled Albertans. These are the direct measures that support viable recommendations that dive deep into the concerns impacting our vulnerable Albertans.

We must recognize that disabled Albertans deserve to live safely and inclusively in our communities and, as a result, strive to make life better for them. We can no longer enable the mindset that disabilities are merely physical.

The 2012 Canadian survey of disabilities identified that 436,000 adults and 31,000 children lived with disabilities in Alberta. This makes a strong case for advocacy as outlined in Bill 205. Numerous consultations with service providers in various regions alluded to gaps in the present systems that are difficult to navigate and negotiate without strong advocacy. These consultations are pinnacles of providing the necessary input to improve and streamline the services provided currently and recognize how change elicits a more dynamic model of service provision. The needs of our vulnerable are changing, and we need to recognize the importance of programs and services that are adaptable and resilient to their needs.

Thank you to the Member for Calgary-North West for shedding light on a situation that enables progress in a time of difficulty, for realizing the importance of a system that needs to align with the specific needs of those impacted by them.

Madam Chair, I am grateful to a government that realizes that we cannot tuck our vulnerable under the rug and ignore their needs. Bill 205 speaks to progress in an antiquated arena. Our ability to impart positive change is a strong initiation of momentum and speaks to our recognition that we need to alleviate barriers for those who cannot negotiate them for themselves. Inclusion is extremely important to everyone, and this is a sound step in harnessing resources through advocacy.

I am proud to speak to Bill 205 and the progress it represents. I encourage all in the House to support this bill.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other speakers to the bill? Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my privilege and, I believe, actually my obligation to rise to speak in support of this bill. I've had a great opportunity to hear, you know, the excellent points made by my colleagues.

For myself, I've had a bit more of a personal view than some of what it's like to work through the system. I have two sons, and my youngest son is on the autism spectrum. As well, he has other challenges, so he's presently receiving services through FSCD and looking to go on to PDD. He's going to be turning 18. Now, I guess the first thing I'd like to say about our present system is how grateful I am as a parent and as an Albertan for the level of services that we actually do get in this province. I mean, this is something that you do not find in many other jurisdictions.

My youngest son was actually born in South Korea, where I was living and working, you know, with my wife. Well, it was complicated, back and forth, but he was diagnosed when he was in Korea. At that time – and it's surprising, I mean, how it wasn't that long ago – the whole refrigerator mother theory of autism still held sway there, and there was really no recognition that this was something that could be really treated. We had to cobble together treatment. I happened to teach at a college where there was a professor of occupational therapy that agreed to help me, and we set this up. I paid out of my pocket, it was ad hoc, it was confusing, and there was no support. In coming back to Alberta, it was, you know, a lot better. I know that previous members have mentioned how you've had people from across Canada move to Alberta to access their services.

Now, that being said, I think there's definitely, you know, a role for an advocate to review the services as they stand now. I'm a relatively well-resourced individual, but I found it quite overwhelming trying to figure out how to navigate my way through the system, how to get my son qualified for supports and services. Once qualified, the real challenge has been to actually access services. My son had some challenges. It was very, very difficult to get any sort of respite care. It was very difficult to be able to get after-school care. It was difficult to get consistent therapy and supports. That's for a host of reasons. I mean, it can be a real challenge for the families of children with disabilities, and this is something, of course, I'd heard previous to becoming an MLA but after becoming an MLA as well.

I do have families that will reach out to me, and they have concerns, you know: how am I going to find a therapist? Nobody wants to come out to rural Alberta for some of these services, or it's difficult to find people. It's very difficult to find care sometimes. If you place too much of a burden on families to be able to assist with their loved ones, you can break families. Statistics for divorces and family breakdowns for families with children with disabilities is over 50 per cent is my understanding. It's a pretty high statistic. Then the consequences. When you do have families break down and these children and youth lose their supports, their needs don't go away, but they're either not met or, when they are met, it's at a greater cost to the rest of society.

If our social systems, you know, if our aids to disabled individuals don't respond, maybe other aspects of our governmental system respond instead and not in a positive way. Everybody has, I think, a strong, vested interest in having these systems work as they're intended to and to make sure that people do not fall through the cracks, through sometimes the patchwork of services they have to cobble together, the lack of information, lack of social or cultural capital to be able to stand up and demand the services that they're eligible for. These definitely have impacts and costs that can be very long term.

It's not just the cost. I think also the big thing is the loss of the potential benefits that you could get from these individuals themselves. I've been quite fortunate with my own son. We've had some pretty rough times, you know, when things might have turned out a little bit for the worse, but thankfully with the supports we were able to put together, he's an amazing young man, an incredible artist, a beautiful singer. He's a real asset to his school community. He has friends at school and teachers that really appreciate being around him, and I know that he is going to contribute to society in a positive way. He'll be giving back. On the other hand, had these supports and services not been available, had things gone differently, who knows what would be lost?

I just wanted to put that forward. Sometimes these things are viewed as a type of charity or as something, you know: well, we kind of have to give this. This is actually, I think, something that not only saves us money to make sure these services are working properly; it also can provide all sorts of benefits that we wouldn't have otherwise. If having this advocate in place is going to help to improve the system in any way, I think that's an excellent thing. Of course, we have lots of challenges. Resources are always a problem. Accessing resources in rural areas is a continuing challenge, but I think this is a good step in the right direction.

I'd like to congratulate the member for bringing this forward, and I'd like to urge all my colleagues to support this bill. Thank you very much.

The Chair: Any further questions, comments, or amendments? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to have the opportunity to stand and speak again to Bill 205, obviously, I think, a piece of legislation which has captured the interest of many of us here in the House and certainly those in the community, the Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act. I just wanted to make a few comments just from my perspective as chair of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices regarding some of the discussion that's been had on interest, I guess, in seeing the position of advocate being made an independent officer of the Legislature.

Madam Chair, I've had the opportunity to be involved, I guess, in various aspects of the work that the committee does in terms of working with the officers of the Legislature, one of those most recently being the process to form a search committee to look for a new Ombudsman and Public Interest Commissioner for the province of Alberta. It's just my observation from having been involved in that process that, as some have discussed, there needn't be a lot of additional costs for the disability advocate to operate as an independent officer of the Legislature. I think the Member for Calgary-North West put it quite well and explained some of the concerns around that, the additional pressures it could put on this sort of office if they were given a very small budget to work with but asked to take on such an enormous task. Indeed, that's a kind of pressure that might be unreasonable.

I also just wanted to observe that there are other costs that also come with appointing an independent officer of the Legislature. For example, in appointing a new independent officer of the Legislature, we've had to go through a significant search process, which has involved a number of meetings with committee members, which has involved having to take time and go off-site and book rooms off-site. It involves extra time where the legislative office's staff has to be involved as part of that process, hiring an external HR firm to help as part of that search. So there are number of other ancillary costs which come with appointing and in creating a new officer of the Legislature.

I would observe, Madam Chair, that at present Alberta has seven independent officers of the Legislature. That's about on par with the average for most Canadian jurisdictions. I note that B.C. has eight. Saskatchewan has seven. Manitoba, interestingly, has only four. Ontario also has seven. Quebec has, I believe, five; New Brunswick, interestingly enough, eight; Nova Scotia, four; Newfoundland, five; Prince Edward Island, about four. I think it's something that we want to think about very seriously. It's not something that one wants to just do idly. It's a very significant thing to invest in somebody as an independent officer of the Legislature.

I think the opportunity for us to begin with the advocate working within the ministry, having the opportunity to work with a modest budget to begin but to be able to first set up and determine the scope of their work – they have the opportunity to investigate the different opportunities that are available, to begin to liaise with some of the other contacts that they have. Certainly, Madam Chair, we saw that the office of the Auditor General conducted an excellent audit into the AISH system here in the province of Alberta, provided some excellent advice, which the Ministry of Community and Social Services has taken under advisement and has indeed already begun to make many improvements to that system based on that report.

I think, Madam Chair, we have many resources that are already available and in existence within the Legislature, within the mechanisms of government. Indeed, some of those are independent officers of the Legislature. A disability advocate will have the opportunity to establish their office, to draw on the resources that are available, and to collaborate with some of the other individuals that serve the people of Alberta to begin to lay the foundation and the groundwork to truly be able to support those who are in need in our province. Indeed, we recognize that there is definitely a need for this advocate.

You know, when I rose earlier, I had the opportunity to speak about my niece and the great growth and great strides she's been able to make because of the many supports that she's been able to access and how that was because of the advocacy of my mom in being able to work and look out for her and being able to help find the resources that were available and help ensure that she was able to access what she needed, that the teachers were there, the speech therapists, the other people that she needed to be able to help her learn and develop and truly develop her own real personal potential, a significant potential, I'll tell you. I'm very excited to see where her life is going to go. But it's because my mom was able to do that work that she was able to do as well as she has. Of course, we recognize that there are many who don't have that, who may not have family who are able to advocate for them, whose family may not have the time or the resources to be able to do that kind of advocacy.

Certainly, having the disability advocate, somebody who is able to provide better information, who is able to better study these systems to determine what work needs to be done, what things need to be changed, and how we can better support individuals in the disability community: that is indeed an incredibly important position, I think, to have and to fill here within the province of Alberta.

So I appreciate what all the members have had to say so far. There's been some very good discussion. I've appreciated the amendments that have been brought forward and the opportunities we've had to discuss those as well, and I look forward to further opportunities to discuss this as we continue on this bill.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other questions, comments, or amendments? The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Madam Chair. I've been reflecting a lot on the conversations we've had over the last week around this act, and for me the best part of it is not only what's going to happen when this bill is passed and people with disabilities have an advocate, but also, for me, the really greatest benefit of this act is the fact that we have spent so much time in this Legislative Assembly talking about people with disabilities, their needs, and the need for inclusion.

I appreciate the fact that so many people have shared personal stories, that they've talked about their own personal experience with the systems and also how things have really changed over the years. I wanted to really commend my colleagues in the Legislative Assembly for their willingness, as we all should, to learn from people with disabilities, to listen to their voice, to ensure that we include them in the decision-making, and that we really work hard towards inclusion.

My own personal interest around inclusion is around employment. I know there are so many barriers to people with disabilities to be employed. I'm really hoping that when the bill is passed and the advocate is in place, we can really work collectively with the communities, with the organizations that the Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark mentioned, Chrysalis, the organizations that already provide a voice for people with disability. I really think that inclusion in the workplace is something that's very much needed.

Once again, I'm so happy that we're talking about this issue in the Legislative Assembly, that we all agree that this is something that needs to be done, and I really look forward to the work that is going to happen with the advocate once the bill is passed.

I also really wanted to thank the members for sharing their personal stories about their families, as the Member for Edmonton-Centre did, or personal stories of their children. I'm hoping that as we pass the bill the way that it is, I'm sure that over the next few years we're going to be seeing the results of having an advocate and that we will continue to work collaboratively with the people that are most affected by this office to ensure that their voices are heard, that we have the programs in place to offer them full inclusion.

Madam Chair, I'm so glad that we're spending the time to talk about this bill. I'm looking forward to every member of this Assembly voting in favour. Thank you.

The Chair: Any further questions, comments? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm very happy to rise today and speak to Bill 205, the Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act. I just wanted to let it be known that I am currently in my capacity as MLA for Edmonton-McClung exploring work opportunities with Inclusion Alberta for a member referred by them to my office to work in my office. We are trying to match work opportunities to available individuals to see if indeed we can come up with a program that will allow somebody referred to me by Inclusion Alberta to be an active participant and actually work in my office. I'm very pleased to say that that's now under way, and hopefully soon we'll be able to indeed have a good match, with an individual coming from Inclusion Alberta working in my office and enriching our workspace.

I know from my former experience driving a DATS bus, disabled adult transportation service bus, that many individuals with various disabilities often had complaints or concerns that really went unattended to. I would hear these complaints or concerns as I would transport individuals from one place to another in my DATS bus, and I'm very, very pleased to know that Bill 205 will now give an opportunity, give a place for individuals with disabilities to register their complaints and know that they're going to be followed up in a respectful and an official capacity.

While it's not an official legislative officer position that we're bringing forward with this bill, what it will do, as the Member for Calgary-North West indicated, is to give us an opportunity over time to determine exactly the development of the role. We will look forward to perhaps making further changes to the legislation as time shows us what direction we should be going with the legislation.

Now, I know that many individuals come forward to offices of the MLAs in all parts of the province who are involved with the advocacy for PDD or individuals who are suffering a disability themselves. My office is no different. I did introduce to this Legislature Mr. Tim Parnett a while ago, who had started a website, called mightywheels.ca, whereby he seeks to improve the infrastructure that people with disabilities use in rolling along, let's say, the people who use wheels to get by. He's not only looking to improve the lives of those who may be in wheelchairs but also of anybody who uses wheels: mothers with strollers, children with roller skates and other means of wheeled devices. His advocacy is quite broad.

I know that Mr. Parnett was looking for an outlet to ensure that his voice was heard, so we are doing our best to have him work with the city committee but know also that in the background there is an opportunity for individuals like Mr. Parnett to raise his voice, if he feels he's not being heard, to the advocate for individuals with disabilities proposed under this legislation, that there is a guarantee that his advocacy will not be falling on deaf ears.

I'm very pleased to rise, and I want to thank the member for bringing forward this bill, starting an important conversation, and for the hard work she has done to consult with Albertans. As we said before, this bill would establish an advocate for persons with disabilities in Alberta with the power to represent the rights, interests, and viewpoints of persons with disabilities. Just as importantly, the advocate will identify concerns within the disability community.

I'm very proud of the level of consultation that also has taken place with respect to developing this legislation by the hon. Member for Calgary-North West, who undertook to make sure that she did consult with the community. It responds to the calls within the disability advocate community, and more importantly it responds to the concerns of members of the PDD community such as Mr. Parnett.

By creating an advocate, our government is working towards making the lives of Albertans better, and it will provide much-needed support to persons with disabilities and their families in the province. The bill will support the ongoing work of the Ministry of Community and Social Services. The final report of the PDD safety standard consultations of 2016 identified and recommended that advocacy is critical within the PDD community to ensuring that individuals with disabilities are supported to lead more fulfilling lives. The bill proposes a new advocate position that will report to and advise the Minister of Community and Social Services.

The advocate would have a mandate to identify and study issues of concern to persons with disabilities; review programs and policies affecting persons with disabilities; participate in processes in which decisions are made about persons with disabilities; promote the rights, interests, and well-being of persons with disabilities through public education; provide information and advice to the government with respect to any matter relating to the rights, interests, and well-being of persons with disabilities; and assist individuals who are having difficulty accessing services for persons with disabilities and related programs, including directing them to an appropriate resource, person, or organization that may be able to assist them.

I know that when Mr. Parnett visited my office, he wanted me to accompany him on a small trip of about three blocks between my office and his residential high-rise tower where he lives just to show how difficult it was for him as an individual using a wheelchair to actually roll along. In that little three-block trip his wheelchair upended, and luckily I happened to be in a spot that I was able to stop it from completely turning right over. It showed me just how easily an individual who's using a chair can reinjure themselves or suffer worse injuries because the surfaces that they travel on are quite often dangerous, and it's not just simply a curb cut that's not there; it's broken pavement and concrete. That's something that individuals with disabilities who use wheelchairs face every day.

I actually captured that whole walk on video, and it was very, very revealing as to the difficulties that individuals face in going short distances within their own communities, who end up, perhaps, injuring themselves because they can't get it through to the city and in some cases perhaps the province, when we're talking about building codes, that real attention has to be paid to the smooth surfaces that are required by individuals who roll on wheels to transport themselves.

The provision of this legislation, Bill 205, to provide an advocate, that individuals who want to get their message across can now turn to, is very welcome news. If Bill 205 is passed, as I said, it would establish an advocate for persons with disabilities in Alberta, which will allow for a more systematic understanding of the issues faced by persons with disabilities and identify potential solutions to these barriers.

I'm very pleased to be part of a government caucus that is moving forward on an issue that has been ignored for too long in this province. By having an advocate, Albertans with disabilities will have a person that will look into systemic issues such as teens transitioning into adulthood or create resources to navigate government programs and services by looking into systemic ways to address these issues such as ensuring that our streets and roadways don't provide hazards to those individuals who are forced to walk with canes or use wheelchairs.

Madam Chair, by establishing an advocate, this government is committed to ensuring the voices of this community and their loved ones are heard. In other words, the advocate will be committed to making Albertans' lives better. The advocate would be able to help identify barriers and provide information and advice to the government with respect to any matter relating to the rights, interests, and well-being of persons with disabilities.

When it comes to making life better for Albertans with disabilities, the previous government was a lot of talk and not a lot of action. The Official Opposition has a plan to cut services like health and education that Albertans rely on. Our government's record is clear. We're committed to supporting Alberta's disability community. We stopped the PDD safety standards, and we stopped SIS. We recognize that PDD service providers are facing pressures due to a growing demand for PDD services. That is why we increased funding for PDD. Our government is protecting and improving things that matter to Albertans, and that's why we continue to listen to the disability community about their ideas to fix issues the previous government created.

The final report of the PDD safety standards consultations found that advocacy is critical within the PDD community to ensuring that individuals with developmental disabilities are supported to achieve the best possible outcomes. In fact, recommendation 10 of that report asked the government of Alberta to investigate the creation of a formal advocate for persons with disabilities, and Bill 205 aims to do just that.

In conclusion, Madam Chair, I rise very happily to support the provisions of Bill 205, and I know that the people with disabilities in this province will be taking a large step forward in terms of having their voice heard through official government channels and making sure that they don't fall through the cracks, as they say, as Mr. Parnett literally did while he was wheeling alongside me between my office and his residence.

That concludes my remarks.

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 11 Public Interest Disclosure (Whistleblower Protection) Amendment Act, 2017

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to move third reading of Bill 11, Public Interest Disclosure (Whistleblower Protection) Amendment Act, 2017, on behalf of the Minister of Labour and minister responsible for democratic renewal.

With this bill our government is taking the next step in our commitment to renew democracy in Alberta. Bill 11 is a direct result of the hard work done by all members of the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee, and it is our hope that this legislation will stand as a shining example of what can be accomplished when all parties work together. I think it is clear that we all agree on the importance of ensuring that serious wrongdoings in the public sector are both reported and addressed, and it has been heartening to see the support of this bill from both sides of the House. By strengthening existing legislation and by better protecting whistle-blowers from reprisal, we hope to encourage more people to come forward when a matter needs to be investigated.

One of the most important goals of this legislation is to protect whistle-blowers from any sort of punishment or retaliation from their employer. In order to help achieve this goal, the all-party committee recommended that the act be amended to ensure that whistle-blowers are entitled to some sort of remedy if they suffer a reprisal.

We have accepted the all-party committee's recommendation, and this bill will enable the Labour Relations Board to order remedies. The board would appoint one of its senior members, either the chair or one of the vice-chairs, to hear the matter and order a remedy. Hearings would be conducted as determined by the board. They would be able to summon witnesses, and their decision would be final. For example, the board may decide that the whistle-blower should get their job back if they were fired for blowing the whistle. In other cases they may be entitled to compensation for lost wages. The board would also be required to provide a copy of all their restitution orders to the commissioner for inclusion in the commissioner's annual report. Madam Speaker, when someone reports a serious wrongdoing, that person is acting in the public interest, and these changes will help ensure that they are protected.

The all-party committee also recommended that acts be amended so that it more clearly applies to ministers and Members of the Legislative Assembly. This bill clearly lays out that, subject to parliamentary privilege, MLAs, ministers, and the Premier can all be investigated when a disclosure is made to the Public Interest Commissioner. Likewise, political staff will be protected from reprisal should they choose to blow the whistle. Currently no other jurisdiction in Canada has whistle-blower legislation that applies to MLAs in this way, and Ontario is the only jurisdiction that covers ministers.

The Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster also proposed an amendment that would ensure the timely reporting of information concerning reprisals in relation to the office of a Member of the Legislative Assembly. If the commissioner finds that such a reprisal has occurred, the bill states that the commissioner must submit a report to the Speaker that sets out the commissioner's finding, reasoning, and recommendations. The Speaker would then be required to table the report in the Legislative Assembly. With the amendment, if the Legislative Assembly is not in session, the Speaker would be required to table the report within 15 days of the beginning of the next sitting. It's important for the Legislative Assembly to be informed of these matters in a timely way, and I am pleased to say that this amendment was passed.

The new legislation would also allow the Public Interest Commissioner to investigate a wider variety of wrongdoings, including some forms of mismanagement or abuse of human resources in the public sector. Under certain circumstances this may include bullying and harassment in the workplace. Of course, other options already exist to address human resource issues and breaches of code of conduct. We already have human rights legislation, ordinary employment law, and collective bargaining mechanisms to help ensure healthy work environments in the public sector. To be clear, in the event of a wrongdoing related to workplace bullying or harassment in the public sector, any collective agreement or employer policies would be accessed first, but if these processes are not adequate to resolve the problem, this bill would allow the Public Interest Commissioner to investigate egregious and systemic cases of bullying and harassment.

In addition, this bill would help improve the process whistle-blowers must go through to report a wrongdoing and ensure that they are protected when they need it. Under the old legislation a potential whistle-blower is required to report the details of the alleged wrongdoing to a designated officer. Our new legislation would allow potential whistle-blowers to bypass their designated officer and report directly to the Public Interest Commissioner if they so choose.

Furthermore, the new act would clarify that a whistle-blower may approach their boss about a wrongdoing, and their protection from reprisal would start at that very moment. In some cases a potential whistle-blower may not know their designated officer, and as a result they may be more comfortable speaking with their supervisor before going to the designated officer. In other cases a potential whistle-blower may prefer to go directly to the commissioner.

The Member for Calgary-Mountain View also proposed amending the act to ensure that the commissioner's decision or proceedings can be called into question in court. Currently the act provides that no proceeding or decision of the commissioner may be challenged in court except on jurisdictional grounds. The bill maintains this premise with one important exception. The bill states that the commissioner's decision regarding a reprisal may be questioned through a judicial review. As laid out in the bill, the commissioner will investigate and decide whether or not a reprisal has occurred. If the commissioner finds there has been a reprisal, the matter is then referred to the Labour Relations Board to decide on restitution. Ultimately, the employer may be required to offer some kind of remedy to the whistle-blower. Therefore, as decisions on reprisal can be legally binding, the commissioner's decision-making process is subject to a judicial review.

However, investigations into wrongdoing are different than investigations into reprisal. If the commissioner concludes that there has been a wrongdoing as defined by the act, they will make recommendations to the government department or public entity responsible. The department or public entity must work with the commissioner and report on the steps taken to fix the problem. The commissioner does not issue orders or set out requirements, so it is unclear what purpose would be served by questioning the commissioner's decision or proceedings in court.

Lastly, the bill is based on recommendations from the all-party committee, and there were no recommendations on judicial review. Thus, the existing protection for the commissioner is preserved except as mentioned in relation to reprisals.

As members of the all-party committee will know, there were many recommendations, and our government considered each and every one very carefully. The committee's work on this legislation and the broad support this bill has received here in the Legislative Assembly are proof of what can be accomplished by working together. If passed, I'm confident that our proposed legislation would be among the most comprehensive of its kind in Canada. Madam Speaker, it is clear that the Members of this Legislative Assembly recognize that wrongdoings need to be reported and addressed and that when someone blows the whistle, they should be celebrated and encouraged rather than punished.

I'd like to thank all members for their comments and support up to this point and to encourage everyone to continue to back the bill at this stage. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and speak once more to Bill 11, the Public Interest Disclosure (Whistleblower Protection) Amendment Act, 2017, which has been tabled by the Minister of Labour and democratic renewal.

Just to remind everyone, on June 25, 2015, the Legislative Assembly passed Government Motion 12, which appointed the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee, an all-party committee made up of 17 members, to review the Public Interest Disclosure (Whistleblower Protection) Act along with other bills. I was very proud to sit on that committee for, while not the entire tenure, a large portion of the mandate. This all-party committee put forward a number of recommendations, all of which were seriously considered in the making of this bill. Some of them are incorporated into the legislation, and some are not. I'll read out details about each recommendation and how they're handled by the bill as we go along.

Albertans deserve a government that is committed to the highest standards of responsibility, accountability, ethics, and transparency. It's important that public-sector employees feel safe and are free from reprisal when they report serious wrongdoings. This legislation will help increase the chances of wrongdoings being both reported and addressed, and that is the right thing to do, both for employees and Albertans in general. By strengthening this act, we hope that it will encourage more people to come forward when a matter needs to be investigated, and it will also help protect these whistle-blowers from reprisal by their employers. That's the main part of this bill. Why it's so important is because we need people to come forward when something does arise, whether that be someone from an MLA's office, whether that be someone from a ministry's office, whether that be anyone in the public sector. We do need those people to come forward because sometimes there are wrongdoings, and we need to address those.

It's important that employees feel safe and free from reprisal when they report serious wrongdoings, and that includes employees contracted to fill government services. At the same time, these government-contracted entities should also be investigated if there is an alleged wrongdoing related to their work in the public sector. The all-party committee recommended that the legislation be expanded to these entities, and it is only fair that they be consulted before moving ahead. That's why we need to make sure that we look at that before we put that in the regulations.

At this time we are accepting the all-party committee's recommendations, but much more work needs to be done to determine how to cover public-sector services carried out by third parties without stepping over the line into the private sector. If the act is passed – and I certainly hope all members will vote for this bill – we will consult with government contractors and delegated service providers to determine how best to move forward on the details of this recommendation.

The all-party committee that reviewed the legislation, which, of course, many members sat on, agreed that there was significant room for improvement. By strengthening the act, we hope it will encourage more people to come forward when a matter needs to be investigated. It will also help protect these whistle-blowers from reprisal by their employers. For example, the existing legislation needs to be changed to ensure that a whistle-blower who has suffered punishment or retaliation from their employer is entitled to a remedy. Our proposed legislation also clarifies that staff in the offices of the Premier and ministers, like I was saying, are protected as well and that members of cabinet could be investigated when a disclosure is made. The bill also addresses some administrative issues experienced by the commissioner, including access to records, records management and retention, and the authority to delegate.

Does this legislation capture agencies, boards, and commissions such as AHS? That is very important. ABCs are already covered as provincial corporations as defined in the Financial Administration Act. School boards, AHS, Covenant Health, and other health entities are also covered already. While this legislation does not expand the purview over agencies, boards, and commissions, it does strengthen those people's rights to come forward and makes sure that there are no reprisals if they do end up coming forward.

In the 2015-16 fiscal year the commissioner received 17 disclosures of wrongdoing and seven complaints of reprisal. Two investigations identified instances of wrongdoing. The year before 21 disclosures of wrongdoing were received along with eight complaints of reprisal. The year before that was the first year of the commissioner's existence, and there were five disclosures of wrongdoing but no complaints of reprisal. There is certainly a problem, and we're hoping that this legislation, if it is passed here in the Legislature, will aid more people and encourage more people to come forward to disclose wrongdoings within government agencies and government in general.

The current act establishes strict penalties, up to $25,000 for the first offence and up to $100,000 for each subsequent offence. Offences include the following: committing a reprisal; withholding information; making a false or misleading statement or counselling or directing another person to do so; obstructing or counselling or directing another person to obstruct any individual acting in an official capacity under the act; destroying, mutilating, altering, falsifying, or concealing any documents or a thing that may be relevant to an investigation or directing or counselling another person to do so. There are no new penalties under the new legislation being put forward though whistle-blowers who are subjected to retaliation would now be entitled to remediation as determined by the Labour Relations Board.

The act has a formal disclosure process, which does not include disclosures to the media to help ensure that investigators are able to conduct their work without undue influence from outside parties. Whistle-blowers are protected as long as they make a disclosure in accordance with the act, and with our amendments whistle-blowers will have more options and greater protection. Since the act applies to a very large assortment of public-sector entities, maintaining a formal disclosure process will also help ensure consistency in the application of the act. The office of the commissioner publishes investigative reports on their website, of course. This commissioner is also required to publish annual reports, and the proposed legislation would require these reports to be much more detailed than they are now. Of course, it adds to transparency within governments and adds to what can be shown in the media.

The current act states that it “applies only in respect of wrongdoings that occur after the coming into force of this Act,” which was in 2013. The current act also states:

- (2) The Commissioner is not required to investigate a disclosure . . .
 - (a) if more than 2 years has passed since the date that the wrongdoing was discovered.

Our amendments are based on recommendations from the all-party committee, of course, and none of their recommendations involve changing these provisions. When an employee has reason to believe there has been wrongdoing, we would encourage them to bring it to their designated officer as soon as possible so that it can be investigated and addressed in a timely manner.

Of course, the all-party committee noted that there are many outsourced government functions or governmentlike functions that do not fall within the scope of the act but for which government spends a lot of time and money to provide a service to the public. In other words, those who carry out activities on behalf of the government should feel safe and free from reprisal when they report serious wrongdoings rather than just those who are directly employed by government. At the same time, these entities should also be investigated if there is an alleged wrongdoing related to their work in the public sector.

However, the all-party committee also recommended that the act not be expanded to include the private sector. At this time we are accepting the all-party committee recommendations, but much more work needs to be done to determine how to cover public-sector services carried out by a third party without stepping over the line into the private sector. So if this act is passed, we will consult with government contractors and delegated service providers to determine how best to move forward on these details with recommendations. Of course, it will be in the regulations, which is currently stated in the act, as to what we’ll do.

Who, exactly, will be covered under this expansion of the act? More work needs to be done to determine how to cover public-sector services carried out by third parties without stepping over the line of the private sector, like I said before. If this act is passed, we’ll certainly be consulting with contractors and delegated service providers to determine how best to move forward on the details of the recommendation. After a complete analysis of who should be added and any consequences of doing so, we will draft regulations to fully and properly implement the all-party committee’s recommendations.

To be clear, no contractors or delegated service providers will be subject to this act until consultations have occurred and regulations have been drafted. That’s, of course, to make sure that we are not stepping on anyone’s toes, not stepping over the line when looking into the private sector but also ensuring that we are safe, that government agencies, that ministries are being transparent and that people who are being contracted have the right to come forward as whistle-blowers. It is incredibly important because they do work that, well, people in government ministries cannot do. That’s why we outsource to private enterprises. Having those people under the regulations is something that we certainly need, and I’m quite glad that we are waiting for the regulations to make sure that we’re doing it right.

Like I was saying, very soon after our government was elected, we reached out to all political parties to come together and review the legislation. The all-party committee concluded that “no changes [should] be made to the Act to expand its scope to the private sector.” The legislation is meant to improve ethics and transparency in the public sector and to help ensure accountability to taxpayers, so, really, to all Albertans. That’s certainly why we’re not expanding into the private sector and why we’re waiting to review the regulations before we look at our private-sector contractors. As of right now Manitoba is the only place that prevents reprisals against a contractor if the contractor or an employee of the contractor makes a disclosure.

With that, I will just ask all my colleagues in the Legislature to support this piece of legislation. I look forward to working with all of you again.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It’s my honour to stand and speak in favour of Bill 11, Public Interest Disclosure (Whistleblower Protection) Amendment Act, 2017, in third reading.

Similar to the Member for Calgary-Hawkwood, I had an opportunity in the last segment of the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee to sit in during deliberations on the recommendations we were going to make for the whistle-blower disclosure act. I think it was quite a constructive experience. We worked diligently into the summer to make sure that we could hold a bit more transparency towards our public service.

When I reflect on how we want our public service to operate – and I don’t necessarily disagree with the bulk of this – we want to make sure that we have good governance. We took a lot of cues off what we already see within the private sector and some of the leadership that we see there. At the end of the day, when it’s private-sector businesses and their operation, they’re utilizing other people’s money to operate. Many of them are publicly trusted and held companies, and they’re accountable to their shareholders. Similar to that, our public service here in Alberta is accountable to its shareholders, which are the millions of people who pay taxes, are users of these services, and live in this province. It’s great to see that, you know, we’ve expanded the scope of what this is. At the end of the day, we as MLAs, whether it’s the MLA, the Premier, or any of our ministers, are employees of the people within Alberta.

With that being said, I’ll quickly sort of reflect back on one popular culture reference for those watching at home to kind of understand what I’m getting at with the fear of reprisal. In the film Alien the Nostramo was responding to a distress call, and it was a very adverse situation. They went onto the ship, and they noticed some weird eggs, and someone was attacked. Science Officer Ash ignored Warrant Officer Ripley's wanting to abide by quarantine regulations because she was really worried that they were going to infect the other people on the ship. As it turned out, these aliens came to life and murdered a lot of people. If she had had a system in place in which she could have blown the whistle on the leaders within that scenario, I think the outcome of that story would have been a lot different.

I say these popular culture references in a positive light as it's very hard for some of us who may not have been involved in a situation where we had to blow the whistle on an employer or have been in an unethical workforce to understand the challenges that happen when someone is not following proper conduct or regulations or rules within a system.

I think it's important, as we move forward, that we don't have any adverse disasters happen within our province, that we have safe, secure workforces, that we're using the public purse appropriately. That's why I'm going to support Bill 11 in its third reading, and I encourage all members to do the same.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) comes into effect if there are any questions or comments for the previous speaker.

Seeing none, I will recognize Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to stand and just share a few words on third reading of Bill 11, Public Interest Disclosure (Whistleblower Protection) Amendment Act, 2017. I just wanted to say that it was an incredible honour to be involved with the committee last year, to go through all of the public submissions and all of the different stakeholder submissions and especially the submission that came from the Public Interest Commissioner, Mr. Peter Hourihan, and his office. I want to thank them all for their work and wish Mr. Peter Hourihan all the best and just say that we learned a lot from him and that he's been an incredible asset to the province in that role and that I look forward to seeing a new Ombudsman and Public Interest Commissioner come into the office that will bring the same level of scrutiny and investigation and trustworthiness.

I just wanted to quote from Chief Justice Milvain from 1970, who wrote that the Ombudsman "can bring the lamp of scrutiny to otherwise dark places, even over the resistance of those who would draw the blinds," just to remind us all of what we're talking about when we make sure that legislation like this is working to the best of its ability for the public and for the province.

With that, I will conclude my remarks and just again thank Mr. Peter Hourihan for all of his service.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any further members wishing to speak to the bill in third reading?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[Motion carried; Bill 11 read a third time]

Cortes-Vargas: Madam Speaker, seeing the great progress that we've made this Tuesday morning, I say that we call it 12 o'clock and come back at 1:30 p.m. I move to adjourn.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:41 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, May 23, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. I know the prayer referenced it this morning when the session started, but let us all remember the disasters of violence when it is used throughout the world.

We will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by Mr. Robert Clark. Please join us in the language of your choice if you would like.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all thy sons command.
Car ton bras sait porter l'épée,
Il sait porter la croix!
Ton histoire est une épopée
Des plus brillants exploits.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South West.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly some of my friends who are visiting from Saskatchewan today. Carla Beck is the NDP MLA for Regina Lakeview and is seated in your gallery today. Carla serves as the deputy opposition whip and is the critic for Education, early learning, and child care, the Crown Investments Corporation, Saskatchewan Government Insurance, and SaskEnergy, a lot of files, something that our caucus is very familiar with. Carla was also a school trustee with the Regina public school board prior to being elected as an MLA. Before entering politics, Carla was a registered social worker with over 20 years of experience in that field. Seated with her in the gallery today is Carla's daughter Hannah Marsden-Beck, who is currently a grade 11 student in Regina, visiting Edmonton today because she's considering attending the University of Alberta to pursue a degree in engineering. Carla and Hannah both know the importance of a strong, progressive government and have come to see how an NDP government makes lives better for all Albertans. Now I'd ask them to please receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Hon. members from Saskatchewan, there may be a counteropinion on that particular matter.

The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a delight for me to introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly a delegation representing the Council of State Governments Midwest, or CSG Midwest, of which Alberta has been an affiliate member since 2010, and I'm honoured to represent Alberta on behalf of the Minister of Economic Development and Trade. They are Indiana state Senator Ed Charbonneau, co-chair of the Midwest-Canada Relations Committee; Mike McCabe, director of the CSG Midwest; and Ilene Grossman, assistant director of the CSG Midwest. The CSG Midwest is a regional forum made up of 11 Midwestern states that include Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin, and the Canadian provinces of Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario, and Saskatchewan. Alberta's participation in the CSG Midwest gives us the opportunity to engage with U.S. state legislators like Senator Charbonneau to share information, build consensus, and promote common interests on a number of regional issues.

Mr. Speaker, the member states of CSG Midwest are some of the most important trading partners for Alberta. To put this in perspective, in 2016 Alberta exports to the 11 CSG Midwest region were valued at $30.4 billion, and imports from the CSG Midwest region to Alberta totalled more than $5.9 billion. For example, to the state of Indiana, where Senator Charbonneau serves his constituents, Alberta exports were valued at $284 million, and imports from Indiana to Alberta totalled more than $223 million.

The Speaker: Hon. member, I hope you get to the introduction soon.

Mr. Westhead: Yes.

In regard to oil, our single biggest trading partnership with the U.S., we supplied approximately 34 per cent of U.S. oil imports.

We appreciate this visit by CSG Midwest representatives and this opportunity to build on our relationships with the member states. Mr. Speaker, the delegation has risen, and I'd ask the members to extend the warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Ms Jabbour: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For several years the Legislative Assembly has supported the Edmonton Regional Heritage Fair, which provides an opportunity for students in Edmonton and the surrounding area to research and present projects celebrating Canada's heritage. The Legislative Assembly Office recognizes one outstanding presentation that specifically relates to Alberta's history, politics, or governance. It is my pleasure to introduce this year's award winners, Medina Assiff and Madeena Jallal Tarrabain, grade 7 students at the Edmonton Islamic Academy. Their presentation, entitled The Trudeaus: Past and Present, was well researched and engaging. Accompanying Medina and Madeena today are their mothers, Hoda Assaf and Mahassen Assiff, and their teacher, Kirstie Elsa Jensch. They are seated in your gallery, and I'd ask them all to rise, please, and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to introduce to you and through you to all members of the House a fantastic group of kids, who I had the pleasure of having a fun picture with and doing the dab with downstairs, from Father Leduc Catholic school in Leduc and their teacher, Mrs. Janelle Kowerchuk. Hopefully, I said that right. I'm glad that they got to come here today and have a great visit. It was a pleasure meeting them, and I'd like to get to their school to see them again sometime. I'd invite them to rise and have us give them the traditional warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Ms Miller: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you 73 students from the amazing constituency of Red Deer-South. They attend Eastview middle school. The students are accompanied by their teachers, Jennifer Neis and Greg Boulay, and 11 chaperones. I would like them to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you on behalf of my colleague from Battle River-Wainwright people from the Holden school. The students are accompanied by their teachers, Mrs. Amanda Hewlett, Karen Arychuk, and Nicole Suchy, along with their chaperones, Annette Hrabec, Marilyn Koch, and Michelle Albrecht. If the students, staff, and chaperones could please rise and accept the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly the students from Erle Rivers high school in Milk River in my riding. I'd like to ask Courtney and Barb and the students to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. members, are there any other school groups? The Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you a group of students visiting from a local school in my riding of Edmonton-Rutherford. L'école Greenfield is one of several bilingual schools in my district and takes pride in furthering French education here in this province and especially in Edmonton. I would like to thank them for taking the time to come visit us today, and I'd ask the entire House to join me in saying hello and bonjour to the guests. If they'd please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly a constituent from the wonderful riding of Edmonton-Riverview. Marie Walker is a retired nurse and a dedicated volunteer in the community. She volunteers with the Autism Society, the Edmonton Native Plant Group, and the United Church of Canada. Marie is also a long-term volunteer in my constituency association, and I'm grateful for her significant contributions. She is joined today by her grandchildren Taiyo and Tsukino Walker; Dylan, Mason, and Cora Ramirez; and their friend Ismael Booq. I would like them all to please rise – there they are – and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Are there any other guests today?

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is not a member's statement; it's an introduction. It's a privilege to rise and introduce to you and through you . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, you need unanimous consent if you'd like to introduce a guest. Have you a visitor here today?

Dr. Turner: Yes.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House. It's a privilege to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Jake Bainbridge and Ryan Dick from Terrapin Geothermics, the topic of my member's statement to come. Jake is Terrapin's senior engineer. After studying aerospace engineering in the U.K., Jake moved to Alberta to work in Canada's oil and gas industry. Jake oversees technology development and industrial projects. Ryan has an extensive background in project development, financing, and PPA negotiations for renewable energy projects. He returns to Alberta to work with Terrapin after stints in Ecuador as well as Silicon Valley. I invite them to rise, as they have, and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The Speaker: Now, hon. member, your member's statement.

Terrapin Geothermics Investor Tax Credit

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's obvious I'm still learning in here.

This government's energy efficiency programs are helping Albertans save up to $112 each year by switching their light bulbs alone. This isn't trivial and is one of the reasons that over 100,000 Alberta families have signed up with efficiencyalberta.ca. This sort of information resonates with constituents of Edmonton-Whitemud, who are excited to hear of the many other energy savings through efficiencyalberta.ca. Indeed, homeowners in Edmonton-Whitemud have registered in really large numbers. They're also signing up for the installation of solar panels, and developers such as Landmark Homes and Melcor have successfully marketed net-zero homes and solar-panelled townhouses in Edmonton-Whitemud. Our community cares about climate change and energy efficiency.

In this vein, I would like to tell the Assembly about an Alberta-based renewable energy company which is among the first companies to offer investors the Alberta investor tax credit. With this approval for its proprietary waste heat generator Alberta-based investors and Terrapin Geothermics can receive a 30 per cent Alberta tax credit. Terrapin is an example of the AITC program creating a strong incentive to support high-growth, innovative opportunities in Alberta.

The Terrapin engine produces clean baseload power from sources of waste heat such as oil and gas wells as well as SAGD sites. A single SAGD can lose over 17 terajoules of waste energy daily. Harnessing this could provide power for 60,000 homes. The Terrapin engine is a technology coming from the University of Alberta, and the technology is particularly suited to a climate with low average ambient temperatures.

Terrapin Geothermics is also expert in geothermal mapping. It has created 3-D models of geothermal reservoirs in Alberta which have tremendous potential for both investment and job creation.

I'm proud to be part of a government that is building on local expertise and using the AITC to develop our economy while protecting the environment.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Violence against Women and Girls

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is with an extremely heavy heart that I rise to pay homage to the numerous young people who died at the Ariana Grande concert last night in Manchester. As the details of this horrific terrorist event emerge, we are learning more about the victims. As expected, a disproportionate number of young girls are expected to have died.

Some of Ariana Grande's top songs: Into You, Break Free, and a modern-version theme from Beauty and the Beast.

When I saw the news, I instantly felt sick, keenly aware that youth, young girls, were targeted because they were young and happy and free, the embodiment of the ideals that those who inflict terror hate so much. When I was made the shadow minister of Status of Women, I pledged to work towards the advancement of women's causes in Alberta and around the world. Women are pillars in our communities, leaders in business, trailblazers in science and technology, and so much more, but women, girls especially, are still a primary target for sexual, psychological, and extreme religious violence around the globe.

Many of these young girls were likely going to their first pop concert, a rite of passage that should be a part of growing up. They were there to laugh and dance and sing along to one of their favourite songs. These are the activities that terrorists want to take away. They feel that the oppression of women is their right. They want to replace the uninhibited joy of a young girl going to a concert with fear instead.

Above all else, in the coming days and weeks and months as the stories of the precious young men and women who lost their lives in these attacks come out, we must always remember: we cannot let fear win. I feel fortunate every day to live in this beautiful country, one of the freest and most tolerant nations of the world, but Canada is not immune to the ideologies that treat women as subhuman or expendable. Last night's attack served as a reminder that all decent people must be on guard, even in a free nation, against the ideologies that seek to repress girls into cycles of violence and abuse. Society is counting on us.

Thank you.

Government Policies

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, as time goes on, it becomes more obvious that this NDP government must be replaced. A government typically uses Bill 1 to set a positive tone. This government used it to break their election promise of eliminating all school fees. They took over $50 million away from school boards, leaving the parents, who now won't be paying those fees, to wonder what else will be taken away from their school to make up for the money.

Bill 3 does nothing to make the blood supply in Alberta safer. It does, however, give a monopoly in providing blood services to the union employing the Premier's husband.

The Children's Services minister has left kids in the same home where Serenity was abused and eventually killed, hiding behind legislation that the minister will not specify.

The Education minister has signed an agreement which limits hard-working and caring teachers' hours and actually prevents them from being the best they can be.

The postsecondary minister has ignored warnings from the Auditor General, forcing him to single out the minister.

The Environment minister has carbon taxed Albertans and spent the money in Ontario for light bulbs and to buy advertisements which have failed to convince Albertans.

The Service Alberta minister has stopped telling drivers when their vehicle registrations will expire.

The Labour minister is so disrespectful to Alberta workers that she answers serious questions about the hundreds and thousands of lost jobs with pop culture references, ignoring the real and current plight of families.

The Justice minister has insulted virtually every judge in Alberta by denigrating their appointments, which should be a fireable offence, all the while dithering on fentanyl and Serenity's file.

The Finance minister is unable to put forward a credible plan to run the province today, to protect the future of our grandchildren, or to even begin paying back $75 billion in debt that he will accumulate before the next election.

The Premier should fire all these ministers and resign as leader of this out-of-tune band. I have no faith, Mr. Speaker, that will happen.

The answer is a new, united conservative government in 2019. Albertans are actively shopping for a new government. Our job is to be the best choice to fix the mess created by the current group of ministers, who are completely out of touch with Alberta.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Carbon Levy and Energy Industry Image

Mr. Jean: Social licence is fast becoming a snake oil of the 21st century. The concept that social licence is needed to get pipelines built is not only wrong, but it's dangerous. The NDP government just doesn't get how important getting our energy products to market is. They are consumed with a misguided feeling that they somehow must apologize for our energy sector with a carbon tax and are taking away from the world-class NEB process we already have. Will the Premier face the facts, realize she is hurting our economy and Albertans, and give up her career as a snake oil salesperson?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms. Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I must say that the people in this House who are selling snake oil are those who want us to pretend that climate change isn't an issue and that the government has no responsibility to deal with it. Thankfully, those snake oil salespeople aren't in government; we are. We are moving very carefully, very forcefully on this issue while at the same time working with the progressive members of our oil and gas industry to grow our industry sustainably and prosperously for years to come.

Mr. Jean: Mr. Speaker, the SS Climate Change Fearmongering has sailed. The Premier just doesn't get it. You can't earn social licence, because it doesn't exist. Albertans are paying the price for the Premier's misguided belief in the form of a carbon tax that is only hurting hard-working Albertans, they're paying the price in opportunities lost and fleeing investment because of the economic conditions created by this NDP government, and they're paying the price when this government puts all of its eggs in the social licence basket. Will the Premier wake up to the facts and cancel the carbon tax, that is only hurting our province when Albertans can least afford it?

Ms Notley: Well, as the member opposite knows but hates to admit, the fact that we have not one but two pipelines approved is absolutely, completely connected to our climate leadership plan. So not only are we diversifying the economy, creating jobs, and taking action to reduce emissions; we're also getting our product to tide-water, Mr. Speaker, overall a good record that I'm happy to speak to Albertans about.

Mr. Jean: I think, Mr. Speaker, we heard it best. If you're so justified, call an election.

Rex Murphy has it right on social licence. The Premier missed the central point of social licence: its preconditions can never be met, and are not meant to be. It is an obstructionist tactic, designed to forestall and delay, till whatever its target has been become so worn down by process and protest and delay that it is simply taken off the policy table.

Will the Premier please stop making Albertans pay for her misguided ideas and stop chasing after this figment of imagination called a social licence? [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, there's no question that the member opposite and his soon-to-be dance partners could school this whole House on how to break an election law and call an election early. However, the lesson from that particular schooling is not one that I think they'd like, and certainly it didn't help them out very much.

Mr. Speaker, we are proud of our record on this. The federal government has the authority to make the decision. They have made the decision. The pipelines are approved, and this is because of our work on climate leadership. That is a record I will be proud to run on when it's a legal time to call an election. [interjection]

The Speaker: Hon. member.
Second main question.

Opioid Overdoses

Mr. Jean: Late Friday Alberta Health posted the first-quarter report on opioid and substance misuse: 113 Albertans overdosed and died in the first three months of 2017. That's a 61 per cent increase. Every day someone in Alberta lost their life as a result of this crisis. You wouldn't know it, though, from the NDP quietly posting these numbers without any comment before a long weekend: no news conference, no news release, no statement even from the minister. Why is the Premier treating overdose deaths in our province as something to hide on a Friday afternoon instead of a full-blown crisis as it should be and recognize it with Albertans . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, you know, each and every member of this government is incredibly concerned and focused on dealing with the tragedies that occur every day as a result of this opioid crisis. One of the things that we've done is we've improved transparency and reporting to Albertans, and that's exactly why the information that was released on Friday was released at the request of the chief medical health officer: because it was ready to go. That's how we do things.

You know what, Mr. Speaker? We are also working very, very hard through a number of different measures to address this crisis. It's not an easy one, but we will not stop until we get it right.

Mr. Jean: The federal Health minister has called this the biggest overdose epidemic in our country's history and an unprecedented public health crisis. Premier, the NDP government has tasked a junior minister with the file, who can only be bothered to take cheap, partisan shots instead of trying to address this serious problem. Every day of inaction from this government results in more Albertans losing their lives to this crisis. It's essential. Why on earth won't the Premier do the right thing, step up, and call this what it is, an unprecedented crisis that deserves the full attention of her government?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, the federal minister is absolutely right. This is an unprecedented crisis. This is an unprecedented problem with opioid deaths. That's why our government has put $56 million so far into prevention. That's why we are working very, very hard to get safe injection sites in more and more places in order to prevent those deaths. That's why we've put more money into detox beds. We're going to continue to work on this, and there will be more work going forward because this is a very complex and difficult challenge. We can't take our eye off the ball, and neither of the ministers who are dealing with it have done that.

Mr. Jean: The opioid crisis has multiple root causes and deserves multiple solutions, not just greater access to naloxone. The right way to co-ordinate a response and better share information across ministries is through calling a public health emergency. Time and time again the Premier has rejected the call from the opposition for a public health emergency, but I'll try again. Premier, since you agree that it's important given the unprecedented magnitude of this crisis, will you do the right thing and call for a public health emergency? Yes or no?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I know that even the member opposite has to have taken the time to read the legislation. Calling this in our province a public health emergency would give the province the ability to take property from people, to go into their homes, and to conscript them. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

Ms Notley: That is what our legislation says, Mr. Speaker. The work that's going on in other provinces – co-ordinating services, investing money, sharing information, working with doctors, ensuring that there are more resources for people suffering from addictions – is going on in Alberta already. It is not necessary to put in the War Measures Act.

The Speaker: Third main question.

Student Assessment and Curriculum Review

Mr. Jean: Mr. Speaker, today I also want to ask some questions about accountability in education. Just four years ago mandatory grade 3 provincial achievement tests, PATs, were replaced with student learning assessments, SLAs. Now we hear that the SLAs will become optional. Believe this or not, teachers will decide if they want to administer them. No one is asking parents, the actual people that should be in charge. How will this lead to accountability, and what will the minister say to Alberta parents, who need to know how their child is doing in grade 3, if testing is actually up to the teachers to do?

Ms Notley: Well, you know what, Mr. Speaker? If the members opposite were to actually go out and talk to parents and talk to Albertans, what they would hear from parents of kids who are in grade 3 is that those grade 3 exams cause nothing but stress and anxiety for those kids and that experts from all across the board think that they are a bad idea. Indeed, that's why their dance partner actually supported a private member's bill several years ago to get rid of the grade 3 test. The minister is working on this issue. You know what? We have to have balance, and subjecting grade 3 kids to these tests just so that they can measure things is not . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Jean: Optional testing, Mr. Speaker? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Jean: There are also accountability issues in the NDP's massive curriculum development project. Albertans worry about this government's NDP world view becoming ingrained in our curriculum. This government doesn't want to disclose which outside groups are even being consulted on the curriculum, and they won't release the actual comments that Albertans provided on the government's flawed consultation process. Why is the minister ducking accountability? If he is confident that what he is doing is what Alberta parents want, why won't he release the actual comments submitted by parents on the surveys?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you very much for the question. Alberta is engaged in the very largest curriculum rewrite in the history of the province and the most transparent rewrite of curriculum in the history of the province as well. We have literally hundreds and hundreds of interactions with the public, with different groups coming in. We even have different territories. Our curriculum is so good that Nunavut and the NWT also use our curriculum. So I defend the position that we have to build curriculum. We're doing it in a very transparent way, and we're doing it with the expertise that we have on the ground.

Mr. Jean: Wow, Mr. Speaker. This NDP government is so out of touch with parents in Alberta. This week we are starting to see the NDP world view creeping into the proposed social studies curriculum. As one columnist noted, there seems to be precious little history in the draft curriculum. Instead, there is a focus on – wait for this – prejudicial policies and perspectives on activism. When you look at the new list of things being taught, you might think that Alberta is a horrible place and not one of the safest, freest, and most tolerant places in the entire world. Can the minister please explain why the draft social studies curriculum takes such a negative view . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, the program that we are building for curriculum is transparent in the broadest possible way. We have literally hundreds of different individuals and groups presenting. I would advise the hon. member opposite to actually read what we're putting forward instead of just reading second-hand Twitter quotes. What we have, in substance, is not only setting a new standard for curriculum, but it is also, I think, going to be something that will help us all in the future for all of our children. I think that it's something we will be very, very proud of.

The Speaker: The hon. leader of the third party.

Teachers' Working Time

Mr. McIver: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, the Premier and her Education minister have thrown rural Alberta under the bus. The ATA agreement, just ratified, caps both instructional and assignable time for every teacher in the province. To the Premier: how will teachers who want to help kids be able to do their jobs when they are told that they have used up their assignable hours, so no more help after class, no more phone calls from parents, no more field trips, no more coaching of sports?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Again, as we've outlined before, the doomsday scenario that the member opposite is describing is actually not what's happening. In fact, we were fully aware of what the implications of that policy would be. I would say, however, that what families would wonder is how their kids are going to learn if all the teachers that those guys had planned to lay off were in fact laid off, how their kids are going to learn if that extra $70 million that our government committed as a result of that agreement isn't actually injected into the classrooms, how well students will learn as a result of getting school lunch programs if the members opposite can't even decide they support . . .

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, this Premier has thrown teachers under the bus. The agreement will handcuff all boards but more so rural boards. The cap on instructional hours will take away the flexibility from these boards and also from the teachers, who care deeply about kids. Again to the Premier. You have knowingly allowed instructional hours to be capped, which means you've taken away the ability of teachers to be the best they can be. How will Albertans' kids get the help they need after class when their teacher is told they've run out of instructional hours?

Ms Notley: Well, again, Mr. Speaker, the member opposite doesn't seem to understand how this policy would actually work or the degree to which the scenario he outlined would ever happen, because the reality is that it wouldn't. To be clear, what this does ensure is that teachers are still spending time preparing for their work in the classroom, because that's something else that teachers also do right now, so this will assist in greater quality within the classrooms. But we are absolutely sure that the quality of education received by Alberta children, something that we care very deeply about, will absolutely continue to improve under the watch of this government, and we are very proud of that.

Mr. McIver: Sending teachers home before they're finished will not help.

Mr. Speaker, this Premier has thrown Alberta kids under the bus. Teachers are amongst the most respected of all professions, in part because of their dedication to working with kids and parents, sometimes for long hours, to give each kid what he needs to succeed. This agreement caps instructional hours, limiting those amazing teachers from doing their best. Premier, since you are clearly ignoring the best interests of teachers, parents, and kids with this latest agreement, whose interests were you protecting?

Ms Notley: Again, Mr. Speaker, just to re-emphasize, the scenario that the member opposite describes is not going to happen, but what I can say is that we increased funding. The members opposite introduced a budget that wouldn't fund school boards for enrolment increases. That would have undermined. That would have thrown teachers under the bus. They were planning on not hiring teachers for new kids coming in. That would have thrown kids under the bus. They were planning on laying off about 800 educational assistants. That would have thrown kids under the bus. They have no interest at all in our school lunch program. That throws kids under the bus. I could go on forever. The fact is . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

Affordable Housing

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Many lower income seniors and families are struggling to make ends meet due to the high cost of housing in our province. We know that to keep rental housing affordable, the stock of rental housing must keep up with population growth. My question is for the Minister of Seniors and Housing. What is the government doing to reduce the strain of housing costs on low-income renters?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. All Albertans deserve a safe and affordable place to call home, and that's why our 2016 capital plan will build over 6,000 units of affordable housing. This will mean thousands of families will soon have a safe and affordable place to call home. Additionally, we're supporting housing management bodies to do the repairs that they need to do, projects like replacing hot water tanks and furnaces. We know that the opposition would make very drastic cuts to the investment in affordable housing in this province.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the previous government failed to make sufficient investments in the Capital Region Housing Corporation and other housing bodies across the province and, in fact, made drastic cuts to these programs even during the most recent economic boom, to the same minister: what is this government doing to correct the affordable housing deficit left behind by that government?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government is taking action to make life better for Albertans. Our government is following through on our $1.2 billion commitment to build more affordable housing. We have over 40 projects on the go: Deer Lane in Banff, London Road in Lethbridge. Because our government stepped in with our investments, these projects are now moving forward.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that access to safe, affordable housing is one of the most essential needs of a healthy community, can the minister please provide the House with more details on the government's commitment to an affordable housing strategy in our province?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We expect to launch the strategy later in the spring. One thing I've heard is how the current housing system essentially penalizes tenants for improving their financial situation. Currently if a tenant gets a better job and their income level increases to just over the income cut-off for eligibility, they risk losing their home. This type of instability is detrimental to their long-term success. Our government wants to support tenants to improve their financial situation, and that's why I'm looking at this issue, to make life better for Albertans.

Employment and Labour Legislation

Mr. Fildebrandt: When the NDP were in opposition, they had a tradition of filibustering bills to delay them when they didn't have the votes to outright stop them. But even though they now sit on the government side of the House, the NDP are working hard to be Alberta's opposition-in-waiting. For the last two weeks they have been filibustering their own legislation because they don't have their union boss empowerment bill ready yet. It now appears the NDP will attempt to force that union boss bill through the House with rushed late-night sittings. Will the opposition-in-waiting commit that they won't force the bill through late at night?

Mr. Mason: Mr. Speaker, it's well known that you can't ask questions of the opposition, so he can't have it both ways.

We're committed, Mr. Speaker, to getting our legislative agenda through with full debate and to allow as much time as it takes to debate and improve the legislation as we go.

The Speaker: Your first supplemental.

Mr. Fildebrandt: If the question was to us, we'd actually answer.

The Speaker: No preamble.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Given, Mr. Speaker, that the CFIB has released a survey today showing that just 13 per cent of their small-business members agree with the NDP about taking away the right of workers to a secret ballot . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, I know I don't need to tell you again. Forget the preamble.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Given, Mr. Speaker . . .

The Speaker: Sit down, please. Too many times you continue to put in inserts as preambles. You know the rules of this House.

Please proceed with your first supplemental again.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Given, Mr. Speaker, that the CFIB released a survey, given that workers have a right to join a union but that they also have a fundamental right to a secret ballot, given that everyone in this place was elected using a secret ballot, which is good because it's getting hard to find anyone who will admit that they actually voted for the NDP anymore, why do the NDP believe in the right to a secret ballot for elections but not for unions?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Albertans deserve fair workplace legislation that protects them, their families, and supports a strong economy. When we introduce legislation, I will be pleased to discuss individual items with the member, but I can assure you that the legislation we bring forward will be fair and family friendly. It will reflect a consultation that engaged thousands of Albertans, including me sitting down personally to meet with the CFIB, Merit Contractors, and chambers of commerce. I look forward to introducing that legislation and moving Alberta forward.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Given, Mr. Speaker, that the NDP chose to name their union boss empowerment bill the Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act, which is funny because taking away the secret ballot is not fair and intimidation and bullying from union bosses is not friendly, and given that without the protection of a secret ballot...

The Speaker: Get to your question.

Mr. Fildebrandt: ... workplaces will be significantly more prone to workplace bullying and intimidation as paid union bosses cajole their way, why would this government force through...

The Speaker: Hon. member, when I stand, you sit. Understand that part? Hon. member, look at me, please. Do you understand that part? Tell me yes or no.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Sure.

The Speaker: Great. Next time put a question in there.

Who would like to respond to the question? The Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Again, making sure that Alberta does have fair and family-friendly legislation is important, and I can tell you that right now Alberta does not have fair legislation because we have stories like Amanda Jensen's, who lost her job because her son got leukemia, and she asked for an unpaid leave to take care of a son that needed chemotherapy, that needed treatments. That is not fair. Through my consultation with thousands of Albertans we found agreement on that. Making sure that we have workplace laws that serve our province, serve our economy, and help workers to take care of their families is important.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

The Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Care Worker Safety

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. More than four months ago a 60-year-old staff member was attacked and almost killed at the Elk Island youth ranch near Lamont. The vicious assault prompted questions about the safety of staff working for the government-contracted service providers throughout Alberta. To the Minister of Labour: since occupational health and safety's investigation could take up to two years, what changes have you introduced for the interim to protect all contracted care workers?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd be happy to speak about the fact that we take the workers that work in our contracted facilities very seriously. From the moment that we heard about it, we took action not only in that facility but to start conversations about what we can do right across this province. Certainly, the workers who take care of vulnerable youth across this province make tremendous sacrifices in order to do so, but one of those sacrifices should not be their safety. So, absolutely, we took it very seriously, stepped in very quickly in that facility, and we'll continue to work to move right across this province to ensure the safety...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

First supplemental.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that on March 7 the minister said in this House that Children's Services is reviewing policy and licensing requirements and accreditation. We will certainly be acting quickly on any findings because ... our government believes that no one's life and safety should be put unnecessarily at risk when they go to work, let me try it again. To the Minister of Labour: what specific action has your ministry taken to ensure the safety of all care workers in Alberta since the February attack?

The Speaker: The Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, as the government of Alberta we're very committed to worker safety in every area of this province, but certainly when it comes to our contract providers, we need to make sure that we continue to work with the actual service providers to ensure that workers are safe, that the staffing is at a safe level, because no one's life and safety should unnecessarily be put at risk when they go to work. We are taking a closer look at how we support safety for contract staff. I'm proud of the work Children's Services is doing to make some changes in this area in order to make sure that workers can feel safe when...

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that physical harm to the government-contracted care worker does occur, including harm of the most serious nature, and given that the victim of the Elk Island attack suffered debilitating physical and emotional injuries and given that Albertans expect contracted employees to have access to a full scope of health benefits should they suffer on-the-job injuries, Minister, can you personally assure this House that the victim of the Elk Island incident has access to comprehensive health support to assist her recovery from this dreadful attack?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. All Alberta workers are covered through our workers' compensation system, which we have been reviewing over the past year to make sure that we have fair compensation for all workers, to make sure that the system is sustainable. In this case, for this specific worker, making sure that there is that appropriate coverage and that we have a system that is sustainable is a priority for our government because this is a tragic situation. No Alberta worker should go to work and not be able to come home safely. We want to do everything we can to protect...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Vegreville Immigration Centre

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the federal government is shutting down the immigration case processing centre in Vegreville. Albertans have heard very little from the NDP and absolutely nothing, zero – zero – from the Premier. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cooper: Clearly, the Premier would rather leave this community behind instead of rocking the boat with her best friend in Ottawa. Mr. Speaker, why doesn't the Premier do more than just wear a button and actually stand up for the people of Vegreville?

The Speaker: The Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am so proud of this government, standing with the people of Vegreville from day one. The MLA for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville has been a champion for this. Through her activism I have had the opportunity to not only sit down with the minister responsible and look him in the eye and talk to him about the importance of Vegreville, but we have sent numerous corresponding letters to the federal government to make sure that they understand the impact that closing this facility will have on Vegreville. This government has Vegreville's back, and I'm very proud of the actions we've taken.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, given that the Premier has not said one word publicly and given that Albertans have received word that Ottawa is planning on moving the National Energy Board out of Alberta and given that the feds appear unwilling to stop the move of the immigration case processing centre out of Vegreville and since these are the kinds of results that Albertans have come to expect from this Premier's experiment, that has failed, in quiet diplomacy, to the Premier: when are you actually going to stand up and fight for the people of Vegreville?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm so proud that our Premier and this government fight every day for Albertans, including making public statements about the National Energy Board moving, making sure that I as the minister responsible am engaging directly with the minister responsible for this decision in the federal government. I had an opportunity to sit down with him. The Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville has done member's statements in this House and has helped to organize the petitions that have been circulated throughout the community of Vegreville. We continue to fight for that community. We have been publicly fighting for that community, and I am proud of that work.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, given that Vegreville was first given notice that it would be losing this major employer last October and since this move could result in the relocation of almost 10 per cent of the town's population, the results of which would be devastating, how has the Premier been silent for seven months, turning her back on rural Alberta, while this community loses a major employer? How can she care so little about Vegreville? Will she commit today to calling the Prime Minister himself and defending Vegreville?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This government has been anything but silent. We have been fighting for Vegreville. We have been talking to the federal government about the impact of their decision. Making sure that we can support our rural communities and understand the impact that closing this centre would have on schools, on businesses, on this thriving community has been a priority for us. We have done so in numerous ways, including in-person discussions. I'm proud of this government's efforts to fight for Vegreville. We will continue to support Vegreville through services and through investments in that community however we can. We are fighting for Albertans.

The Speaker: Thank you.
The Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Capital Project Tendering Process

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Recently it was brought to my attention that the government was restricting who could and could not submit tenders for government capital builds. This they called prequalification. In my riding a reputable local builder of provincial public facilities known for excellent quality and on-time project completion was told that they would not even be able to bid on the government tender. Can the Minister of Infrastructure confirm for this House if this is happening or not?

Mr. Mason: Mr. Speaker, it's not my practice to talk about individual contract bids in the Assembly. I can assure the hon. member, however, that the process was fair and that all the bids were evaluated properly. I've asked the department to confirm that for me, and I believe it to be true.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, when the tender process is not open to all bidders, the government runs the risk of allowing price-fixing. Given that this is the practice where a small group of contractors who were permitted to bid on a job adds an amount to each of their bids and then the company who gets the bid distributes and adds the amount to each of the other unsuccessful bidders, to the minister: how can you be sure that by restricting the companies who can bid on a job, you are not opening up the Alberta taxpayer to price-fixing?

Mr. Mason: I want to thank the hon. member for explaining the basics of this to me, Mr. Speaker, but I can assure him that the process is fair and that qualified bidders are allowed to bid and that their bids are evaluated fairly and that the best choice, in the opinion of nonpolitical, nonpartisan, skilled public servants, is made in the interests of the people and in the interests of the taxes that they pay.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, he forgot to say Scout's honour on that one.

Given that the Alberta purchasing connection inconsistently displays who bid what dollar amount and who won the bid for government procurement of goods and services and given that the purchasing connection also removes access to the tender documents once the competition closes, will the minister increase transparency and accountability and make these necessary changes to the purchasing connection in order to help the private sector offer goods and services at a lower rate?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, I can tell the hon. member and I can tell the House that we are in the process of revising and updating the procurement process across government. It's a multidepartmental initiative, and we're looking at finding ways to encourage innovation, to encourage local economic investment, to increase green practices. Transparency is part of that process, I want to assure the hon. member.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Fentanyl- and Carfentanil-related Deaths

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The first-quarter stats for this year's fentanyl-related deaths are definitive. The crisis is not abating. Of tremendous concern is that, of the 113 fatalities in the first three months of this year, almost 20 per cent were due to carfentanil. When asked last month what this government is doing to address public awareness about carfentanil, the minister said it had, quote, released a report, unquote. We now have another report, and fentanyl has taken even more lives. Minister, clearly, reports are not enough. Why are you not declaring a public health emergency?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the very important question. This crisis is devastating for all Albertans, for families, communities, and, of course, for victims, and that's why this year alone our government is investing $56 million in support of treatment and prevention. With that money we're going to be expanding the access to life-saving naloxone kits as well as expanding access to supervised consumption services and other wraparound services, plus expanding access to opioid dependency treatment, which is considered best practice when helping people deal with an addiction.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, this is an emergency.

Given that there have been incidents around North America that have seen first responders fall ill at overdose scenes involving carfentanyl and given that with 50 carfentanyl deaths in Alberta over the past 15 months the danger to our front-line emergency workers is extreme and given that Alberta created the first known test to detect carfentanyl in blood, which allows this government to act nimbly upon learning that it's present in specific areas, to the same minister: why have you not raised the urgent alarm about the grave public health emergency of carfentanyl?

The Speaker: The hon. associate minister.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Our government is committed to working in close partnership with members in law enforcement as well as other first responders. We're working really hard to make sure that they've got the tools that they need to do their jobs and to keep themselves safe in any situation where there might be carfentanyl present. That is why we've worked to expand access to naloxone kits for first responders, which was, you know, leadership taken by this government in order to address this crisis.

Mr. Ellis: The opposition has been calling upon the province to declare a public health emergency to create a co-ordinated response to this epidemic. Given that we have been assured that there is no need to make that declaration because co-ordination is occurring and given that the Justice minister said in estimates that police services are not required to share information with the province – so co-ordination is not happening, then, but what is happening is that Albertans are dying. Premier, will you show leadership here and order your minister to launch a co-ordinated attack on this crisis?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the opportunity to further highlight some of the work that our government has been doing as part of our co-ordinated response to this. The chief medical officer of health in Alberta has been leading our response and is best suited to do so as a leading epidemiologist in our province. Further, we've been working with partners in the community as well as in partnership with law enforcement and other first responders, increasing access to naloxone, which has saved lives. There were 1,130 reports of life-saving reversals last quarter alone, and we are going to continue to do that work in partnership, continue to share that, and move . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Indigenous Workforce Participation

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. As you well know, indigenous people in Alberta face many barriers when finding employment. In fact, the percentage of unemployed off-reserve indigenous population compared to the nonindigenous population in 2015 was almost 6 per cent higher. This is unacceptable. To the Minister of Indigenous Relations: what is the government doing to help indigenous peoples find employment?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you very much for the question. I was very happy last week to announce, along with the Minister of Advanced Education and the MLA for Edmonton-Meadowlark, a grant to Trade Winds to Success, an organization that supports academic upgrading and skills training to help indigenous people make a successful entry into the trades, leading to good jobs and careers. Trade Winds to Success has graduated more than 1,000 indigenous students from its preapprenticeship program since the program began in 2009. As a former student stated at the event, "My life would not be what it is today without Trade Winds." Through programs such as this our government is providing funding that helps indigenous people get the skills they need.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
First supplemental.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the unemployment rate for young people is almost always higher when compared to other age groups, to the same minister: are there any programs designed to help young indigenous people enter the workforce?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to highlight a program that Indigenous Relations offers called the Alberta indigenous internship program. This is a two-year program open to postsecondary graduates who have an interest in working with the Alberta government and possess a good knowledge of aboriginal initiatives, people, communities, and culture. The program offers graduates work experience, professional development, and the opportunity to work with an aboriginal community partner. Interns spend the first year working in one of the participating ministries, followed by nine months of working with a community nongovernment partner before returning to the ministry for the last three months. Currently we have six interns in year 1 and 11 in year 2.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Minister, are there any other programs that your ministry funds to boost employment in indigenous communities?

2:30

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There is also the employment partnership program, which supports employment and training initiatives for indigenous people to enter the workforce. Specifically, it supports indigenous people in overcoming barriers, learning new skills, and adapting to changing labour market demands. Last year the employment partnership program provided funding worth $5.9 million to over 35 employment and training projects. All these programs invest in employment opportunities for indigenous people to help make life better for these individuals and support Alberta's economy now and into the future.

Thank you.

Provincial Spending

Mr. Loewen: Recently the Premier said that Alberta needed the Trans Mountain pipeline because the revenues that it will produce, quote, will give us more money for health care, more money for education, for renewables, and the technologies to reduce emissions. End quote. Premier, can you tell us here today: if Alberta receives more money because of pipelines, will your plans be to spend it on light bulbs, or will you at least put some towards the astronomical deficit that causes debt and enormous interest payments?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Our Premier has been steadfast in her commitment to making sure that we gain new market access, and that's because Albertans deserve the very best price for their resources. We are going to move forward with the plan that we've brought forward, which includes a plan to get us back to balance within six years, instead of moving forward with rash cuts, as the members opposite are proposing, and getting us there possibly one year earlier. We're not going to fire teachers and nurses. We're going to keep moving forward with a reasonable, balanced approach that stands up for Alberta families and gets us better market access.

Mr. Loewen: Since the NDP government has an apparent spending addiction on things like light bulbs from an Ontario company, a government laundry service, and millions on carbon tax advertisements, will you tell us how much money the NDP government will spend before it decides that enough is enough, or will the Minister of Finance at least tell us here today how high the price of oil needs to be in order for him to balance the budget?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, both parties, the future whatever party they call themselves – one party, two parties, three parties – are pushing for rash, ideological cuts. They don't want to stand up for Alberta families. On this side of the House we're capping electricity rates. They'd jack them up. We're capping school fees, and we're making them affordable. They'd jack them up. We're making sure that if you go to university in this province, you can afford to pay your tuition. They want to jack it up. The choice is clear. You guys are wrong. We're moving forward with the right plan.

Mr. Loewen: Given that the minister cannot and will not tell us how much money the NDP government has to collect in order to balance the budget and since the NDP government's debt problem is something that credit-rating agency DBRS says "demonstrates a lack of willingness to contain debt growth" and since it's clear that this government has a spending addiction and that the first step to recovery is admitting that you have a problem, for the sake of the province when is the Minister of Finance going to admit that he has a spending problem and seek credit counselling?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm so proud of our Minister of Finance for bringing forward a plan that protects Alberta families. It does that within reason. In the past under Conservative governments we've seen increases to health care expenditure in excess of 6 per cent. Under our government it's about 3 and a half per cent. That's reasonable. We've also seen deep ideological cuts on the other side. That's the problem. The problem is that the folks on the other side are spending all of their time trying to beat up health care, trying to beat up education. And you know what? Albertans deserve better. They've got better. They've got an NDP government.

North West Refinery

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, the North West refinery is getting closer to completion, and we're eager to begin seeing the benefits to the economy that refining bitumen in Alberta will bring. However, the downside is that as the refinery comes online, the hard-working Albertans who built it will be losing their jobs. With no confidence that the second phase of the refinery will be built, many of these workers are concerned for their future. To the Minister of Energy: when can we expect this government to make a decision on the second phase of the North West refinery to give these workers some certainty for their future?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, we are in constant contact with the North West refinery to see how the first phase goes. They're wrapping it up at this point. They need to meet some targets as we go along. But we are in constant talks, and we know that this refinery will be opening in the fall.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that many of the workers who are part of this project have amassed a wealth of expertise and first-hand knowledge building the first phase and given that the longer the government delays making a decision, the more workers will leave the area and possibly Alberta and given that continued loss of these workers may harm the economics to continuing phase 2, to the same minister. Albertans are concerned that you may be dragging your feet on this decision, hoping that your delay will force the abandonment of the second phase without you actually having to make the decision.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, we've got a lot of – Alberta is very proud of all the skilled tradespeople we have. While we're waiting to see how the North West refinery starts up and works, we also are proud to say that we have two PDP projects that are going to be needing workers – one will be making final decisions in the next while – and workers will have plenty of opportunity to work on either of those two projects.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that phase 1 of the North West refinery was part of the PC government's diversification plan, with upgraded products helping to mitigate the impact of the low price for bitumen, and given that phase 2 of the upgrader would provide both long-term employment for Albertans and allow for more value-added production, to the same minister: will you acknowledge that the North West refinery is an important piece of Alberta's petrochemical diversification and assure Albertans that this decision isn't being held up for political reasons?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Absolutely, the North West refinery is important. It's the first refinery in a number of years that is being built in Alberta. We're looking forward to it opening up in the fall. It has to finish the last bits of its last phase. We have to see how it works. Again, we are in contact with the owners regarding the next phase.

The Speaker: Edmonton-Mill Creek.

Mental Health Services for Children

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My constituency of Edmonton-Mill Creek is a vibrant part of Alberta due in no small part to the large number of children being raised in the area. Over 25 per cent of the residents are under the age of 18, well above the average even for our young province. As a teacher and psychologist I'm very concerned with children's mental health. Given that mental health has been emphasized as a top priority, to the Associate Minister of Health: what is this government doing to support the mental health of children in Edmonton-Mill Creek?

The Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for this very important question as well as for her strong advocacy on this issue. You know, members on the other side of the House like to dismiss social issues, but we're working on building a healthier and stronger province when we take care of one another. Our government has increased the addictions and mental health budget by $45 million this year alone, with children and youth as one of the target populations for investment under the valuing mental health plan. This government is keeping its commitments to make life better for Albertans of all ages.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that many programs and professionals are embedded within the school system and given that the school year is now winding down, to the same minister: what mental health supports are available for children in the community during the summer months?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, we all know that mental health issues don't fall neatly into business hours or into the school calendar, which is why we're working to make sure that children have access to help whenever they need it, wherever they are. We've already launched help4me.ca, an Internet portal that provides 24/7 support to children struggling with addiction or mental illness or looking to help their friends.

I'd like to again thank the member for her ongoing advocacy. We'll have more to say on our work to increase the number of treatment beds and counselling supports available for children in the coming weeks.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that some children require more intensive supports as well as familial supports, to the Associate Minister of Health: how is this government expanding access to more specialized mental health for children?

The Speaker: The hon. associate minister.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When families and children are in crisis, they need access to the wraparound services that are ready to support them. These include organizations such as CASA, the centre for Child, Adolescent and Family Mental Health, which this government has committed more than $14 million in funding for through 2018. While the members opposite would promise deep cuts and widespread cuts, I would ask them which families they would abandon. These are investments that we think are vital to making life better for all Albertans, and this is work that we will continue to support.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds we will proceed with Members' Statements.

London Road Gateway Housing Project in Lethbridge

Ms Fitzpatrick: Mr. Speaker, I'm so pleased to rise and speak about the London Road gateway project in my community of Lethbridge. In 2011 this affordable housing project was approved by the Lethbridge city council through the Lethbridge Housing Authority and presented to the previous provincial government, who had yet again failed to invest in Albertans.

Following the election of 2015 I moved into my constituency office in the London Road neighbourhood. I was very quickly visited by neighbours, the architect, the Lethbridge Housing Authority, and the mayor. They all shared the importance and urgency of this project. They shared the design and identified why this is such a good project to address affordable housing in our community. This project is shovel ready and is so good that I was stunned by the fact that it had not received approval by the previous government.

The London Road gateway project will provide eight semi-detached units with two bedrooms, three barrier-free studio units, and three detached homes with two bedrooms each. Units will share a common courtyard. The housing authority will scale its rental fees to the tenant's income.

Mr. Speaker, initiatives such as these are needed to reduce homelessness, and I am proud to be part of a government that takes the needs of all Albertans seriously. On behalf of my constituents, some of whom asked the questions that my colleague asked today, I thank our government from the bottom of my heart for its decision to provide $3.5 million to fund the construction of the London Road gateway affordable housing project.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Tsuut'ina First Nation

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to speak of a great people and a great neighbour to my constituency of Calgary-Glenmore, the Tsuut'ina Nation. The Tsuut'ina First Nation is part of the Athapaskan-speaking language group, which is spread across North America and has a history of 3,000 years.

Recently I had the opportunity to greet Hal Eagletail of the Tsuut'ina Nation when he came to the Lakeview community and offer him the traditional gift of tobacco from the constituency of Calgary-Glenmore. There were many people who came to see Mr. Eagletail and to listen to his presentation.

He told the story of how the Tsuut'ina came to be and how their people had ranged across much of the continent. He also explained the devastating effect that European settlement had on his nation. When their chief signed Treaty 7 in 1877, their population was only 150 people; before European settlement their nation had numbered over 1,000. I want to mention this sad fact because it relates directly to the subject of his visit to Calgary-Glenmore. He came to build relationships with us as good neighbours.

We are neighbours in many ways, and one of them is the southwest ring road project in Calgary. This project would not have been able to go ahead without the Tsuut'ina Nation. This road connects people around the city and strengthens relationships between us and our partners everywhere. Mr. Speaker, a popular definition of "neighbour" is someone who provides kindness or helpfulness toward their fellow humans. I would argue that for generations the Tsuut'ina people were not treated that way.

I'm incredibly proud to be part of a government that is working hard to correct that historic wrong and develop a new relationship based on the principles and objectives of the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples. Mr. Speaker, our success lies in the strength of our relationships, and building a good relationship with our neighbours will build success for everyone.

Thank you.

Vegreville Immigration Centre

Mr. Cooper: Today across our province a new generation of conservative leaders is stepping forward to defend our communities from an anti-Alberta establishment in Ottawa. These next generation conservatives are strong, smart, confident people who are capable and ready to lead. One of them, the Member of Parliament for Lakeland, is fighting a heated battle to protect the town of Vegreville. Prime Minister Justin Trudeau plans to relocate the community's immigration case processing centre, at a devastating cost to workers, to the community, and to taxpayers.

Here are the facts. Over a five-year period it will cost taxpayers $22 million to relocate the processing centre but just $7 million to keep it in Vegreville. The move strips a minimum of 236 direct jobs from the community as well as dozens and dozens of secondary and tertiary jobs. This decision will be devastating for the people of Vegreville, but the Premier has been absolutely silent. The quiet diplomacy being pursued by this administration has done nothing to make the lives better for Albertans. One needs to look no further than to the Premier sitting on her hands with this situation in Vegreville. You would think that the Premier's best friend in Ottawa wouldn't be treating her like this, especially with all the so-called social licence she's been building up.

The next generation of conservative leaders, folks like MP Shannon Stubbs, know that standing up for Alberta isn't just about looking at the past, but it's about implementing a vision for Alberta's future. Thirty years from now we'll be able to look back and say: "Yes, we fought for the community of Vegreville. Yes, we stood up to the Prime Minister when he said that the oil sands should be phased out. Yes, we fought to keep the National Energy Board here in Alberta, where it belongs. And, yes, Mr. Speaker, we fought for an Alberta where hard work and dedication bring new hope and new prosperity." And that's what it means to be a conservative in the 21st century.

Presenting Petitions

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my delight today to rise and table two petitions sponsored by one of my constituents. The first petition urges the government of Alberta to

- (1) encourage the use of materials in industrial projects in Alberta that are fabricated in Canada;
- (2) facilitate the transition of unionized workers from major construction projects by ensuring that new major construction projects only commence once active major construction projects near completion; and
- (3) ensure that trade unions bring any new construction project agreements to their membership for approval prior to the expiry of current construction project agreements.

The second one, Mr. Speaker, urges the government of Alberta to

- (1) increase the basic entitlement of annual holidays for all workers to four weeks with pay;
- (2) prohibit employers from hiring replacement workers once a bargaining unit is on strike; and
- (3) implement a standard 40-hour work week for all workers.

I'm delighted, Mr. Speaker, to encourage constituents to be active. Thank you.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Bill 16

An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I request leave to introduce Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates. This being a money bill, the Administrator, having been informed of the contents of this bill, recommends the same to the Assembly.

In the fall we announced a cap on electricity prices to protect Alberta consumers. The proposed bill would cap electricity rates for a four-year period, protecting Albertans from the electricity rate spikes that it has been seeing under the existing market structure. If passed, this act would build a bridge of stability as we transition to a cleaner and more stable electricity system.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 16 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Strathmore-Brooks.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've got a rather hefty tabling to make today. I have the requisite five copies of a petition. In my constituency I mailed everybody a cheque for $5 billion. The other side says: "This is not a cheque to buy you off with your own money. [It's] a petition to cancel & repeal the job-killing carbon tax." I have well over a thousand responses. You may want a few pages here.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite five copies of the socioeconomic impact assessment of the CPC closure. Hopefully, the Wildrose opposition won't prevent me from tabling it today. [interjection] No? That's fine? You'll let me table it today? Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Also, I have five copies of a letter from NDP MP Jenny Kwan, MP for Vancouver East, and Sheri Benson, MP for Saskatoon West, a letter to the hon. Ahmed Hussen asking for a reversal of the decision about the CPC centre.

Also, I have a response to that, that I quoted from in my member's statement on Thursday, from the same minister, where he goes through the trouble of reiterating that this was a difficult decision for management of immigration case processing.

I also have five copies of the Global News article that references an extra $10.8 million that it'll cost to move it to Edmonton as opposed to staying in Vegreville.

While I would have loved to table five copies of a letter in support from the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, unfortunately, that doesn't exist.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. [interjections]

Hon. members.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have three tablings today. I have five copies of an article from the Financial Post from May 15 in reference to AIMCo. It says: Tension Keeps Rising over Alberta's Heritage Fund After Another Ambush of Political Tampering from [Premier's] NDP.

I have five copies of the front page of the ATA News, talking about teachers having their assignable as well as their instructional time capped.

Five copies, Mr. Speaker, of a PDF sent to all members from Inclusion Alberta entitled Bill 205: Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act, Proposed Amendments and Review of Limitations.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today at the Public Accounts Committee meeting there were questions about protecting the independence of government-appointed tribunal chairs like OHS, which is supposed to be arm's length. That chair actually last year went public, and CBC interviewed him about a fundraising e-mail he got from the NDP, which the NDP acknowledged was wrong. I agreed to table this document wherein the OHS chair felt the pressure of donating to the NDP. If not, he may not . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have three documents to table today. The first one is dated Sunday, May 21, from the Allstate Arena in Chicago, Illinois, by the WWE Network: Jinder Mahal Def. Randy Orton to Become the New WWE Champion.

The second document is from Times of India, entitled I Want to Represent India and Make Them Proud: WWE Champion Jinder Mahal, in reference to his WWE Backlash win.

This document is from the Calgary Herald. Don't Hinder Jinder Mahal: He's the First Calgarian Professional Wrestler to Win WWE Championship in 20 Years, with the subtext, "It's been 20 years since Calgary last saw a WWE Champion when wrestling legend Bret 'The Hitman' Hart claimed his fourth [title] in 1997."

I think I speak for all Albertans that I would like to congratulate this talented wrestler from Calgary on his championship win.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: Good afternoon. I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 15

Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to offer in regard to this bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'm happy to hear the support we've had in second reading for this important Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017, that we've put forward here. As discussed during second reading, Alberta's income and commodity tax statutes are typically amended every year. This is necessary to ensure government policy decisions are implemented and our tax legislation continues to align with federal tax legislation.

I'd like to highlight two aspects of this particular bill. Our intent is to continue to work to make life better for Albertans and for Albertan businesses. The amendments in Bill 15 do just that not only by keeping our tax system aligned with the federal system but also by ensuring that small businesses in this province are operating on a level playing field and by ensuring that rebates and benefit programs delivered through the tax system are administered consistently and, most importantly, efficiently.

In regard to the small-business tax rate I was really pleased to hear agreement from other members of this House for the small-business-rate component of this bill. I want to emphasize once again that the changes we're making simply parallel changes made at the federal level last year. Those changes were necessary to address the misuse of the preferential 2 per cent small-business rate and to maintain the integrity of the tax system. Although this is not a prevalent issue, it is one that deserves our attention.

We pride ourselves on a tax system that is attractive not only to families wanting to build a better life but also to businesses wanting to invest and to grow. In order for this to continue being the case, we have to ensure Alberta's taxes are applied fairly and consistently. The preferential business tax rate is meant to apply only once, to a small business's first $500,000 of income. These changes we're making are consistent with this intent and ensure small businesses don't take advantage of a loophole to multiply their access to this preferential rate.

This doesn't change the benefits enjoyed by Albertans' small businesses, which represent 96 per cent of all Alberta businesses in this province. Let's not forget that we are leaders among Canadian provinces, consistently generating a GDP per capita that exceeds the national average, Madam Chair. There is no question of the importance to our province's economic health.

That is why our government has been working to support small businesses by cutting the small-business tax rate to 2 per cent at the start of the year, which was previously 3 per cent; by introducing a capital tax investment credit and the Alberta investor tax credit, which is expected to support at least 9,000 jobs and add $1.2 billion to Alberta's GDP – I know many businesses in my riding and many constituents of mine were very supportive of this particular investor tax credit – by capping electricity rates, protecting Albertans and Alberta businesses from sudden price spikes; by increasing capital available to ATB by $1.5 billion to support small and medium-sized business loans; and lastly, by introducing energy efficiency programming that will help businesses save money.

We've made a commitment to have the backs of Alberta businesses, and we will continue to honour that commitment, Madam

Chair. Amending our Corporate Tax Act to remain consistent with the federal Income Tax Act will affect a very small fraction of the overall number of small businesses in the province, but it will serve the important purpose of protecting the integrity of the tax system by closing a loophole and ensuring small businesses are operating on a level playing field. We're not introducing anything new here. We're just clarifying the intent of the small-business rate so that it applies fairly and consistently, something that I think everyone can agree makes good sense.

Now, Madam Chair, I'd also like to highlight an amendment to the payment rules for the carbon levy rebate. As this House has heard, families who had recently lost a loved one were receiving notices from the Canada Revenue Agency requiring the repayment of all or part of that deceased person's rebate. I was disappointed that those letters compounded the distress of the loved ones of that person, and our Premier was clear, and this House as well, that that was not the right way to do things. The intent of the rebate is to help lower and middle-income families adjust to the additional costs of the carbon levy. We set a $100 minimum payment rule to ensure these families would receive meaningful payments that would make a difference as they balance their chequebooks at home, and we allowed for the prepayment of rebates so that these families would have the support they needed in a timely fashion.

The recovery of these rebates when a death changed a household's eligibility was an unintended consequence of that threshold, and it certainly wasn't something we wanted to happen. That is why we immediately notified the Canada Revenue Agency when we became aware of this issue, and we asked them to stop sending these letters while we worked out a permanent solution. A permanent solution is contained in this bill, Madam Chair, and we are letting Albertans know that these notices can be disregarded and that any rebates received by family members who have passed away do not have to be returned.

The Canada Revenue Agency is working as we speak to update their systems so that rebates can be repaid to any families that had already returned their payment. This, Madam Chair, is a labour-intensive process, so it will take some time, and we ask those who have done that to be patient with us. We expect these repayments to be completed in the fall, and we appreciate the continued patience of those affected families.

The recovery of benefits will also be waived under the Alberta child benefit and Alberta family employment tax credit programs. No parent should ever have to deal with the loss of a child, and they shouldn't have the added grief of a collection notice for a benefit that's supposed to make their life better. Madam Chair, we recognize that, and similar to the carbon levy rebate, processes could be improved. So we're working with the Canada Revenue Agency to implement changes that will allow the parents of deceased children to keep any benefit amounts they received for that deceased child. This will apply to all benefit payments from January 1, 2017, onwards.

Also, Madam Chair, families in this situation who receive a notice of reassessment after that date can disregard the notice. They do not have to return the money. I want to be clear about that. They do not have to return the money of any overpayments from 2017 onwards. All families who have already repaid any amounts will of course be reimbursed.

These are practical changes to benefits provided through the tax system, and I know they will make a meaningful difference to the, thankfully, few families in these particular circumstances. We, of course, should not lose sight of the fact that more than 1 million payments were delivered to Albertans with no problems at all. This rebate was deposited in their bank account or mailed to their home, and they were able to use that money to help pay their gas bill, make their home more energy efficient, or put it to other priorities that they deemed worthy.

Unexpected issues sometimes arise in new programs of this magnitude, but I'm proud of the work we've done to resolve this as quickly and efficiently as possible. Great credit, Madam Chair, I think, goes to the Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board and his staff in the ministry for working to fix this problem quickly; hence, the bill we have in front of us.

Going forward, Madam Chair, we're confident that the legislative amendments included in this bill will prevent these situations from occurring again. Pro-rating the annual $100 minimum threshold to a $25 quarterly minimum threshold means the rebates will be paid more frequently and in a way that is more responsive to a particular household's current situation. Rebate entitlements below $200 will no longer have to be prepaid up front. For example, a household entitled to a $150 rebate will receive four payments of $37.50 rather than the full amount in one payment at the beginning of the benefit year.

During debate we heard from the Member for Strathmore-Brooks about his concern that making this legislative amendment might be more costly than simply continuing to waive the recovery of amounts in these particular aforementioned situations. I think it's important to understand the amount of work that went into identifying these cases and updating the systems to reflect the forgiveness of these amounts. This was not an automatic process for the Canada Revenue Agency. They had to manually go back to determine which of the recovery notices were sent out as the result of a death. Those 4,400 cases had to be individually identified from a total of 1.2 million payments that went out. I think we can all agree that this would not be a practical or efficient approach to dealing with this into the future, and the Canada Revenue Agency certainly wouldn't be doing it for free.

Now, of course, administrative costs will be higher with more payments being issued, but we in the ministry don't expect the increase to be significant, Madam Chair, and even with the change we estimate the cost of administering the rebate to remain below $10 million annually. That's about 2 per cent of the total amount that's going out in rebates to the households, at $410 million, in 2017-2018. The administrative costs and the costs of the benefits provided are all funded from carbon levy revenue.

The new payment rules will not only resolve issues with recovery of payments but will also make the programs more responsive. For example, as eligible families grow or move into the province, they can start receiving the rebate at the next payment cycle. Without this amendment, they might have to wait until the next benefit year to start receiving these valuable payments. This ensures that as families bear the additional cost of the carbon levy, they will have the support they need to adjust.

I should note that for the next benefit year, which starts just over a month from now, in July, eligibility will be based on the 2016 tax returns. We know that many Albertan families were affected by unexpected layoffs in 2016. Because the current rebate benefit year is based on 2015 tax returns, some of these families were not eligible to receive it because their 2015 income did not meet the eligibility parameters, but I'm pleased, Madam Chair, that they will start benefiting from the rebate program soon, and I know they will welcome that support.

Now, Madam Chair, I thought it would be very interesting, since we talked about this at length, just to briefly mention the section –

I know that in Committee of the Whole we didn't go over this – that actually allows this to happen. It is:

(7) Section 35.3(5) is repealed and the following is substituted.
What it's saying there is:

(5) The amount deemed to have been paid by an eligible individual for a taxation year is nil where the amount in relation to a month specified for the taxation year that would otherwise be deemed by subsection (3) to have been paid on account of the eligible individual's tax payable under this Act is less than $25.

That, in effect, Madam Chair, is the section, which is referring to many other parts of the tax code, that allows this to happen, and I think it's important that that gets read into the record because that is the piece that is actually fixing what we want to fix. It's the intent of this bill, and it's a small part of how we're making life better for everyday Albertans.

Now, I want to just talk briefly about why families, even in the first place, were being asked by Revenue Canada to pay back these rebates after a loved one dies. Well, in short, it's because the Canada Revenue Agency administers the rebate program, and their system, when it discovered that somebody was perhaps ineligible for a rebate because of a death, saw that there would be an overpayment and then autogenerated letters to go out to claim the overpayment back. The system, of course, was automated and administered by the Canada Revenue Agency but was not what we intended with the carbon levy payment rebates, and although I don't personally blame Revenue Canada for that, I could see how that could happen. This bill makes it clear that the Canada Revenue Agency could set up their systems to appropriately address this issue through the amendments in Bill 15, Tax Statutes Amendment Act.

Now, Madam Chair, I think I'm going to head into my closing here so that I can hear from other members of the House about the Tax Statutes Amendment Act. As I said earlier, Bill 15 is about making life better for Albertans and for Alberta businesses. We're continuing our good work to support entrepreneurs and job creators in this province by clarifying the policy intent of the small-business rate so that it is accessed fairly and consistently. We're protecting the integrity of our tax system by ensuring that it remains aligned with the federal tax system. Of course, we're making practical, meaningful changes that help keep more money in families' pockets by improving the administration of the carbon levy rebate and the child benefit programs.

Now, Madam Chair, I'd request that all members of this House, if they haven't done so already, read through the important amendments in this bill and listen to the remainder of the debate here. Finally, of course, I'd ask that all members of this House support this important bill, that is making life better for everyday Albertans.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. That is a tough act to follow. Boy, I will try to ramp it up just a little so that I can kind of go over and above my constituency neighbour from Calgary-Currie there, and I will do that by proposing an amendment. I will hand the requisite number of copies to you and wait for you to receive it.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, I have the original. Please go ahead.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much. The amendment itself is simple. It reads that I will move that Bill 15, Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017, be amended in section 2 by striking out subsections (6) and (10). Those sections are the two sections that deal with political tax credits applying to both leadership and nomination contests.

I have a number of reasons why I believe this should be removed from the bill. As members will recall, I was a member of the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee, which reviewed all aspects of our province's campaign finance rules, and at no time, in my recollection, did that committee ever recommend or even discuss whether political contribution tax credits ought to be extended to leadership contests or nomination contests. We did have a long and robust debate about whether or not leadership contests or, more fittingly, nomination contests should in fact be included in the contribution limit. Certainly, in the global $4,000 contribution limit there was considerable disagreement as to whether or not both leadership but especially nomination contests should be included in that.

So I'm curious why this shows up in this particular bill. And then I thought: well, did we think about the level of the limit for political contributions? The answer is that, yes, we did. We had a long debate and discussion about the political contribution tax credit and whether, in fact, it's fair when you compare that tax credit to charitable tax credits. There was a strong belief, led particularly by the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster, that charitable tax credits, in fact, should be increased or political tax credits should be decreased or both. I happen to agree with that.

Now, this amendment won't specifically do that. We can't do that. I couldn't bring that specific amendment to this bill because this bill does not contemplate any changes to the charitable tax credit provisions. So, unfortunately, I was unable to bring that particular amendment as much as I would have liked to.

We actually talked about lowering political contribution tax credits, not increasing that. Then I thought: well, perhaps this is just the government aligning the province of Alberta with other jurisdictions in this country. Perhaps the federal government, at the very least, that has a reasonably similar donation restriction to what Alberta currently has or is in the process of putting into place, or other provinces, surely, would at least have this in place. The answer, Madam Chair, is that no other province in this country has a tax receipt for any donation to a leadership contest. No other province in this country has donation tax receipts to nomination contests, and neither does the federal government. Alberta will stand alone on this particular provision.

So I asked myself: "Why would that be? What is this government trying to achieve by extending political contribution tax credits to leadership contests in particular but also to nomination contests?" I think: what could be to this government's advantage in doing that? Well, very few NDP MLAs faced a nomination contest. I don't know how many on this side faced a nomination contest in the last election, but other parties tend to have more nomination contests. Now, perhaps this next go-round we'll see a flurry of nomination contests on the NDP side of things. Entirely possible. Entirely possible. So far as we know, I suppose anything is possible in Alberta politics these days. Things seem to be weirder and weirder by the day.

Madam Chair, I suppose it's possible that the government will face a leadership contest before the next election, but let's just assume that's unlikely. That leaves one – it's currently two, but I suppose eventually one – party in this House that will be facing a leadership contest before the next election. Then we think: why would it matter if political contributions could be tax receipted for that particular campaign, especially because there's the $4,000 aggregate limit? If people are donating to a leadership contest, even if there's no tax receipt, that still counts against their global donation limit.

But then I think, you know, that if the dollars are going to go into leadership campaigns and there's an incentive for doing that, more money goes into a leadership campaign and less money goes into the core party itself, so less money ends up in the coffers of that party to contest and fight the next election. I think there's very clearly something that this government is trying to sneak in there.

Now, I don't know, frankly, if my friends in the united conservative movement here, the two parties – I actually haven't talked with them about their . . . [interjections] You would like me to say the UCP acronym? [interjections] You're welcome. You're welcome. Maybe I stand as the first person to read that into Hansard in this province, and if so, I feel like I really have left my mark. [laughter] Thank you. Thank you very much. I'm here all week. Back on task, my friends. It's only Tuesday. Imagine how this week is going to go.

But, you know, the point is – and I think this is an important point – that Albertans in the process of the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee and absolutely zero of my constituents or any Albertans I've talked with have said: "You know, Member, what is really important is that we make sure that more of my political contribution gets tax receipted at 75 per cent for the first $250, and 50 per cent of the next amount, and a third for the rest of that up to a fairly high limit. That's the most important issue facing Alberta today. By the way, I'd also like you to sneak that in to an omnibus tax statutes amendment bill which is as boring as the day is long and most people aren't going to really pay any attention to. We would really like for that to happen."

Well, of course, Madam Chair, no one says that. But that's what this government has done. They've snuck these changes in. Again, I haven't talked to my hon. opposition colleagues. I don't know what their perspective on this is. It doesn't feel right to me.

So this amendment seeks to simply remove that provision from the bill. I think it improves the bill. I think it returns Alberta into alignment with every other province in this country and with the federal government. If we allow this to stay in, Alberta is the only jurisdiction in Canada to have this provision. It feels wrong because it is wrong, Madam Chair, and I would encourage both sides of the House to support this amendment.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Madam Chair, and I want to thank the member for his interest in this bill and especially for anything that encourages Albertans to participate in democracy. I want the member to go back to page 97 of the fiscal plan, and I'm going to speak to it in answer to his suggestion. If you look at page 97 of the fiscal plan, that was tabled earlier on this year, it talks about personal income tax.

Political Contributions Tax Credit

Albertans who contribute funds to registered candidates, constituency associations and political parties can claim the political contributions tax credit. The credit is worth 75% on the first $200 in donations, 50% on the next $900 and 33.33% on the next $1,200, for a maximum credit of $1,000 on total contributions of $2,300.

The government has implemented a number of reforms to election financing. Changes in 2015 prohibited corporate and union contributions. More recently, the Fair Elections Financing Act of 2016 extended the prohibition on corporate and union contributions to leadership contests, set limits on individual contributions and established overall campaign spending limits.

In connection with these reforms, and to help encourage a healthy democracy, the existing political contributions tax credit will be extended to contributions to party leadership elections and candidate nomination races that meet the criteria established under the Election Finances and Contributions Disclosure Act. This change is effective for contributions made on or after January 1, 2017. The existing structure for calculating the credit remains in place, including the maximum of $2,300 in total contributions eligible for the credit.

Madam Chair, when I read the government's plan – and although I wasn't part of the committee, I understand that this issue was discussed at length in the committee that discussed the Election Act and the whistle-blower act and so on. The idea is to keep a leadership and a nomination contest on the same footing as other political activity so that the same limits would apply that have been discussed previously.

While I understand the member's interest in the election process, I would like to say that this amendment is not in keeping with what the government had in mind with its fiscal plan and the discussion that happened at the committee, that it's really important for nomination and especially leadership contests to be under the same kind of regulations and laws and limits that exist for all kinds of involvement in the political process. I'd like to remind the House, because it was stated a number of times by my colleagues, that this bill would only apply to new leadership contests and does not apply to any prior leadership contests as we have seen for the PC Party, although I understand we're still waiting for the gentleman who did win this nomination to disclose who his donors were and so on.

This amendment, suggested by the Member for Calgary-Elbow, is not one that I'm going to be supporting. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Just ever so briefly to speak on this, I know the hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow knows I'm a tough act to follow, and I can always return the favour and follow him. So just to quickly comment, my colleague here did an excellent job of sort of, I think, explaining the technical reasons why this amendment is out of order. I just want to comment on some of his comments around this amendment and about where he was saying that, you know, perhaps this was a backdoor way for us to get the PC Party to spend all their money as opposed – to have the PC membership base spend all their money on leadership campaigns as opposed to the party. I would suggest to the hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow that that's perhaps a little tinfoil hattish.

The Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017, is not a conspiracy, nor is any part of it trying to sneak in things that are part of some security. I can assure the member that that is not the case. I want to put on the record that that is indeed what is going on and that there is no nefariousness in the Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

3:30

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you. I very briefly just want to respond to that. You know, given everything that's gone on with election financing in this province, with tremendous respect to my colleague from Calgary-Currie, I just don't believe them. I really don't. I see a government that has tried to do everything they can to stack the deck in their favour for this upcoming election, whenever it may be.

I don't know specifically what the motivation is. It feels wrong. It really, genuinely does. Where there's smoke, there's fire.

To the hon. Member for Sherwood Park, you know: the conversation that happened at the committee was very different from what we see here in this bill. At no time did it come up that tax receipts ought to be expanded. If anything, in fact, there was a discussion about tax receipts being contracted, about the donation limit, the amount of money you get in a tax receipt being reduced, not increased. Unfortunately, that was ruled to be out of order for that particular committee, so no motion was brought, although I do know for sure that the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster had tried to bring exactly that amendment.

Again, absolutely no one that I know of has asked for this. When a government comes up with something out of the blue that absolutely no one asked for even if it was in their fiscal plan from the budget, I get very suspicious. I absolutely would not put it past the government to have thought through how this somehow may benefit them. Regardless, I don't feel that it's inappropriate, especially in this challenging fiscal time. Whether the numbers that we're talking about here are large or not, this is money that ought not to be routed from Alberta taxpayer coffers into political party hands. That's ultimately what this does, so that's what my amendment seeks to change, to fix what is a flaw in what otherwise appears to be a housekeeping bill.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Mr. Panda: Madam Chair, I would like to request unanimous consent to introduce guests. They're a school group from my riding.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Introduction of Guests

(reversion)

The Deputy Chair: Please go ahead.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to introduce to you and through you grade 6 students from the outstanding Renert School in the riding of Calgary-Foothills. Today we have grade 6 teachers Mr. Eriksen, Ms Banakar, Mr. Wilcox, and Ms Molloy with the grade 6 students visiting and learning how we work here. I had the opportunity to tour the school last year, and I was quite impressed with the way they learn. I witnessed myself how well the students were educated practically with projects. This school used to be – I mean, when they started, it was tutoring services, and now they have become a fully accredited school. It's a private school. It's a great success story of Calgary. Actually, my son took the tutoring a long time ago, and I'm sure it worked well for him. That's why today he's in med school. I wish all the students all the best in their careers. I ask them to rise along with their teachers and receive the warm welcome of the House.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Welcome.

Bill 15

The Deputy Chair: Are there any other speakers wishing to speak to the amendment to Bill 15? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Madam Chair. I do rise to speak to the amendment put forward by the Member for Calgary-Elbow. I rise to speak against this. You know, this amendment would actually really disturb the equilibrium that has been developed with the Fair Elections Financing Act. There is a total of $4,000 per year that is allowed for political contributions, whether it's to a constituency, to the party, in a nomination battle for an upcoming election or a leadership.

I think, too, that one of the main reasons that I'm suggesting that this Legislature not adopt this amendment is that we would return to the era of big money in politics. If we gave this loophole that the Member for Calgary-Elbow is suggesting, what will stop the purchase of a nomination, as was seen over the last 40 years in multiple constituency associations of the Progressive Conservative Association of Alberta? What would stop a leadership candidate basically buying delegates?

I think that what has been suggested by the Fair Elections Financing Act or what has been passed in that makes a lot of sense, levels the playing field so that every Albertan has an equal opportunity to participate in the democratic process. Just because you have more financial resources than your neighbour doesn't give you the right to influence a nomination battle or a leadership battle, in my opinion. I think that what the Member for Calgary-Elbow is suggesting would actually promote that nefarious activity. We do need to get big money out of politics in this province. We do need to make it a community effort rather than the effort of a few very wealthy individuals.

I only look to the experience that our American cousins are going through at the present time. They have the opposite situation in terms of election financing, and I would call it unfair election financing. Corporations are considered to be the equivalent of an individual in the United States. That was a Supreme Court ruling in the United States that I disagree with vehemently.

I think that the single mother that wants to volunteer and go door-knocking with a candidate or the single mother that wants to run for a nomination or even for the leadership of a party should be on relatively equal footing with a professional, let's say, a physician like myself, that has considerable financial resources. I think that the Fair Elections Financing Act has done that.

I think that if we were to subvert that by passing this amendment, it would be a shame, so I am suggesting that we turn down this amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to start by thanking my hon. colleague from Calgary-Elbow for bringing this excellent amendment forward. I'm going to be supporting it.

First reason, as was clearly stated – to me, it's amazing that the donation to a political party or a political leadership race is higher than what it would be to a charity, what it would be to a much-needed health or family or community organization in our communities all throughout Alberta. Again, I think it's crucial that this Legislature, this government be focused on communities and families and making them stronger so everyday Albertans have a better opportunity and philanthropy can grow in our province. You know, in my five years of doing this and my many, many years of living in Alberta – my goodness, we've got so many good people that are willing to share their wealth and willing to share what they have.

Again, we're looking at a bill, as it is currently written, that promotes more money into political leadership and political activity than it does into everyday charity, so I think my hon. colleague got it exactly right when he wants to exclude that part.

I'm sitting here listening to the pros and cons of this and to: let's take the big money out of politics. Well, I think I'm seeing big money in politics now, with all of these changes. I think Alberta has got several PACs that are raising tens of thousands, maybe millions of dollars. Where is this money going to come into effect? I think the transparency, you know, where it's risen from and how it's spent: it may be less open than we want but a result of what this government has done in their two years, created several PACs, created the potential for more of an American-style political landscape. Hey, let's see where that goes.

You know, I think back to the Ontario election of two or three years ago and how the talk, I think, was that political parties spent $2 million each – there was some kind of cap like that – but unions in Ontario spent $9 million. We have the opposite, the government telling us that we're going to take the big money out of politics. Uh-huh. You're leaving big union money in politics, guys. It sounds like a heck of a double standard to me.

Again, you're doing it at the expense of the taxpayer. Currently we have a situation where a leadership contest is not tax receiptable. Now it's going to be. You're going to be dragging in the taxpayer at a different level.

You know, there were many, many reasons for the 2015 result. I congratulate every single one of the 87 of us that are sitting here, but a lot of us got here without spending a lot of money. So let's talk about how important big money is in politics compared to a broken election promise, compared to not being able to listen to Albertans, compared to where we were at.

Again, it's always hard to know the consequences of a bill; it's impossible to know the unintended consequences. But I think my hon. colleague from Calgary-Elbow got this right. Let's not put the taxpayer involved in leadership races – let's not have their money, taxpayers' money, go there rather than into their families and communities, and let's ensure that we do all we can to increase our charitable sector and make sure that, at the very least, charity is recognized as much as political leadership battles are.

I will be supporting this amendment, and I thank my hon. colleague.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, followed by the Member for Calgary-Klein. Go ahead.

Loyola: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate it. First of all, I want to say that – well, number one, I'm getting up to speak against this amendment. I want to echo the words of my hon. colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud in that when we were in committee, the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee, and we were talking about these issues, members of the opposition were completely against regulating leadership races and nomination races. We all understand that if we did that, we would be creating a loophole, so I find it very disingenuous that members from the other side would get up and say: oh, you want to leave big money in politics. No, no, no. Let me be absolutely clear, hon. member. This is a way to create more transparency so that we see exactly who is giving money at all stages of the political process. If you don't regulate nomination and leadership races, then you can have a whole bunch of money coming into the process, and we wouldn't know where that money was coming from. No one is accountable for it, and there would be no transparency.

Hon. members, this amendment wouldn't allow us to do that. You want to talk about getting big money out of politics? This is not the way we do it. This amendment would not be the way that we would contribute to that. [interjections]

The Deputy Chair: Members, we could let the member finish.

Loyola: Thank you, Madam Chair. Yeah. I want to say how important it is to regulate all levels of the election process.

Now, hon. members on the other side of the House get up and say: oh, well, you guys want to keep big money or corporate or union donations inside the process. Our very first bill – our very first bill – that we introduced in this House when we became government was to ban union and corporate donations.

Cortes-Vargas: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Cortes-Vargas: Sorry, Madam Chair. I just need to get up to make sure – to just bring to your attention that the Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky is insinuating that the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie is getting his money from people in South America, which I find extremely offensive on multiple levels. Further to it being a racist statement, it also insinuates that he's breaking the law. I want him to retract the statement and apologize and know that this Chamber needs to be a respectful place for everyone, regardless of where you're from.

Madam Chair, I didn't state the citation, which is 23(j): "uses abusive or insulting language . . . likely to create disorder." I believe that the member is using language that is inherently hurtful, and it perpetuates a racist culture that we experience as immigrants. I think he should apologize, and I hope that he will just withdraw his statements.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's been quite a robust discussion below the scenes. A lot of it probably didn't make it to Hansard, chatter back and forth, but we've been listening to chatter back and forth here all afternoon. I don't believe that this is a point of order. You know, the member was bantering back and forth with other members.

An Hon. Member: He made a racist comment.

The Deputy Chair: Members.

Mr. Hanson: Pardon me? Can you control yourself a minute, just for a minute?

The Deputy Chair: Members . . .

Mr. Hanson: I believe I have the floor.

The Deputy Chair: . . . on both sides, please.

Mr. Hanson: This is exactly what I mean, Madam Chair. This is not a point of order. It's been going on all afternoon, and it will probably continue well into the 6 o'clock hour, when we leave this place.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Hon. members, there have been a lot of cross-paths of conversation happening outside of the actual debate of the bill. At this point I will not see it as a point of order. However, I would ask that both sides try to not maintain the side chatter. Focus on the bill, please.

Debate Continued

The Deputy Chair: Are there any members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you, Madam Chair, for recognizing me once again because I wasn't finished, and I was speaking to the amendment. I was very much focused on the amendment itself and how this amendment, instead of contributing to transparency, which I personally know that the Member for Calgary-Elbow is very much in favour of because he's gotten up not only in this House, but he's also gotten up in committee – he's spoken to the importance of transparency in our democratic system, especially when it comes to money and the contributions that are given to political parties. [interjections] I know.

However, the amendment that he has presented today in this House would go against that, and I think that we've worked really hard over the past two years to bring more transparency to the political process and the financing of elections in this province. We've come a long way. I'll remind every member in this House that under the previous legislation that existed, an individual, a wealthy individual, could give up to $105,000 to a political party within an election cycle. A hundred and five thousand dollars. Now, when I was out door-knocking on people's doors in my constituency, I'd ask people: do you have $105,000 to give to a political party? You can imagine what the response was. Not one person that I asked had $105,000 to give to a political party, never mind $50,000 or $20,000 or $10,000. Under the previous legislation that's what was happening. That's what was being permitted in this province.

I'm glad that this government has stood up, presented new legislation where now the maximum that an individual can give every year is $4,000. That's how we clean up, that's how we make our system more democratic, that's how we make elections about ideas and not about who has the deepest pockets. That's how we do it, and I'm really proud of what we've done. While members of the opposition hurl insults, I'm proud of the work that we've done in this House.

I want to echo again my hon. colleague the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud, who was talking about how this levels the playing field because – again I'm going to go back to speaking about how under nominations and leadership races we can't control how much money is coming in from those same wealthy individuals that under the previous legislation were being allowed to contribute up to a maximum of $105,000 in an election cycle: preposterous, that we would continue to do that, to permit that. By accepting this amendment, we would be providing that loophole for these individuals to do exactly that. Madam Chair, under my watch that's not going to happen. Under our watch that's not going to happen.

That's why I want to say to all the members of this House that I strongly encourage you to vote against this amendment because this is about accountability, this is about Elections Alberta having the ability to look and see who is contributing to leadership races, who is contributing to nomination races, and providing that opportunity so that we can make our electoral system more democratic, more accountable. At the end of the day, that's what our objective in this House should be always, to strengthen our democracy. Again, I'll remind members: elections should be about ideas, not about who has the deepest pocketbook, okay?

With that, again I urge all members to strongly vote against this amendment. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Northern Hills.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd just like to speak as well against the amendment, and I'd like to just clarify a point, I think, made by the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat where he was talking about political contributions. I think he was mentioning that they were more valuable than the charitable donations credit, but it's not, in fact, true, and I've got a few statistics here. The cost of the political contributions tax credit is around $3.6 million, and that's pretty minimal relative to that of the charitable contributions credit, which is $302.3 million. Now, the political credit is capped at the maximum of $1,000 for any one individual. In contrast, individuals can make charitable donations and receive a tax credit on the donations equalling up to 75 per cent of their income.

Madam Chair, I believe that the political contributions credit helps to encourage a healthy and competitive political environment, a cornerstone of our democratic system, in fact, just as a charitable donation credit helps to encourage donations to charitable organizations, organizations that provide significant benefits to our province.

I'd like to add those statistics to the record and just mention that I will not be supporting the amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Mr. Clark: Well, this is fun. No one suggested that we should raise the $4,000 donation limit. No one suggested that we should change the current rules that require leadership campaigns to fully disclose all of their donors. The Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie should know that as a member of the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee. That was a recommendation of that committee, and it also was in the legislation that this House passed last fall or it might even have been last spring. Nothing in this amendment would hide who donates to political campaigns or leadership campaigns. Nothing in this amendment would raise the $4,000 limit or put big money back into politics.

You know, it's interesting. In year 1 of this government their theme was, "We're taking big money out of politics," every single thing. What day of the week is it? "We're taking big money out of politics." Today, well, what's the temperature outside? "We're making life better for Albertans."

Dr. Turner: Two pipelines.

Mr. Clark: Oh, "Two pipelines." I'm sorry. Thank you very much, Edmonton-Whitemud. I'd forgotten about two pipelines. There was one in the middle there.

I think year 3, speaking of pipelines – I imagine the theme for next year is going to be "Hoping to goodness the price of oil goes up," and the theme in year 4 is just "I'm sorry about that." I think that this government's theme next year is going to be "Sorry about that."

Look, let's just be very clear on what the purpose of this is. Nobody asked for political parties' leadership contests to be eligible for tax receipts. No one. It didn't come in any of the written submissions to Select Special Ethics and Accountability. Absolutely no one anywhere in my constituency has asked me for that. I strongly suspect, if we're all honest with ourselves, that not a single Albertan has asked us for that particular change, but here it is.

Let's talk about money in politics. The changes this government made allow just three people donating the maximum $4,000 to a constituency association over four years to fund an entire campaign. If we want to have less influence in politics, I think we would all agree that having one MLA's seat beholden to just three people is not a good thing. But that's effectively what this government has done.

The other thing that this government has done, perhaps inadvertently, perhaps deliberately, is to enable or compel or even require the rise of super PACs, or political action committees, because so many restrictions have been placed on political contributions and political parties that the only possible way anyone can express their views is through a political action committee. So what do PACs do? Well, PACs attack. We see that all the time. It's already happening in this province, and, heaven forbid, it's going to happen in the next election. I don't like it. I wish it wasn't that way. It's one of those unintended or possibly intended consequences of the electoral changes that this government has made.

I just want to speak to the comments from the Member for Calgary-Northern Hills. He talked about the total amount of money that was refunded for political contributions versus charitable contributions. That may very well be the case, that political contributions and charitable contributions are similar in terms of gross dollars, but I'd love to know: how many actual contributions? How many actual Albertans contributed to charity at the lower, I believe it's 20 per cent rate versus the higher, 75 per cent rate of political contributions? The numbers, I'm sure, are wildly different. Albertans are incredibly charitable and generous people, and I know that they will donate, tens and hundreds of thousands of Albertans. I know it. Millions of Albertans, I suspect, will donate to charity every year, and far fewer will donate to political parties, yet the numbers are similar. That exactly proves my point that what we need to be doing is lowering the political contribution tax limits, raising the charitable contribution tax limits, and not sneaking in and, through an omnibus bill, expanding political contribution tax credits to places no one wants them. That's what this amendment seeks to fix.

Let's be very clear that this has nothing to do with reducing transparency, that this has nothing to do with putting big money back into politics. This only has to do with this government trying to sneak in changes that nobody wants for no good purpose that I can see except for some possible way of sticking it to the opposition for the process it looks like they're about to go through.

With that, I would return to my seat and encourage all members of the House to please support this amendment. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the amendment?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

[The voice vote indicated that amendment A1 lost]

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Deputy Chair: We are now back on the original bill, Bill 15. Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Northern Hills.

Mr. Kleinsteinuber: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to take a moment to speak to Bill 15, Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017, in Committee of the Whole here. As we move forward as a government, making lives better for Albertans, there are aspects to our democratic system that constantly need adjustments and some tweaks to keep our legislation up to date and relevant. This is why, as the Minister of Finance and Treasury Board stated earlier in the debate, it is necessary to update tax statutes on a yearly basis. Not only is this necessary to implement government policy decisions in a fair and equitable way, but it's also to make sure that our legislation is in alignment with federal tax legislation.

To be specific, within this legislation there are three programs that will be primarily affected by this act. Number one, the Alberta child benefit; number two, the Alberta family employment tax credit; and number three, the carbon levy rebate. I might add, Mr. Chair, that I've heard from residents at the doors in my riding that these are very helpful for many families. Many of us know that these programs were introduced to make life more affordable for Albertans, and we are seeing that these policies are having a positive effect on the finances of Albertans with families and for those with lower incomes.

A few months ago, Mr. Chair, I thought it was extremely unfortunate to hear that some families when facing the loss of a loved one were also affected when the Canada Revenue Agency requested that some of those carbon levy rebates had to be returned. That's why I'm glad that this bill will take immediate action and request that the CRA stop that practice. I've heard the opposition parties criticize this irregularity with the carbon levy as well, and now it's being corrected with this legislation. I'm hopeful that we will have their support to ensure the passage of this bill as soon as possible and to ensure that this practice does not continue further. After all, these programs were put in place to help people, not cause them added stress.

Another reason I support this proposed amendment is because it ensures that big money is out of politics. More specifically, this act extends the political contribution tax credit to leadership campaigns and nomination races, which will encourage participation in the political process and help guide a healthy and competitive political environment. I heard a little bit about this previously with the previous amendment there, and I think we can move forward with that point of view at this point.

Mr. Chair, further changes from the bill, Bill 15, will be to the Personal Income Tax Act. The Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017, will also make changes to the Alberta Corporate Tax Act. As many are aware, Alberta continues to collect our own corporate taxes, and each year we have to amend our tax legislation so that it aligns with the federal government's Income Tax Act. When federal changes to the Income Tax Act are applied, this results in technical changes to our legislation to ensure that there is an alignment. In 2016 the federal act was changed to reduce misuse of the preferential small-business tax rate. In Alberta we intend that our 2 per cent small-business tax rate applies to small businesses on their first $500,000 worth of income.

Mr. Chair, there was a loophole in the system, and a very small number of companies were designing certain business structures that allowed them to apply that rate to more of their income. I think many of us here believe that this was unfair to the other small businesses that were applying the rules properly and to the Albertan taxpayer, so I think many of us can agree that this irregularity should be corrected. Again, this bill will accomplish that.

Finally, Mr. Chair, there are proposed changes that include an amendment that will apply to the Tourism Levy Act. For those following at home, this can be found on page 21 of the bill.

5(1) The Tourism Levy Act is amended by this section.

(2) Section 5 is amended by adding the following after subsection (1.2):

(1.3) If an operator has filed a waiver in a form established by the Minister within 4 years from the end of the calendar year in which a tourism levy became payable and

- (a) the operator has not revoked the waiver, the Minister may, in accordance with the terms of the waiver, assess the amount of the tourism levy payable under this section at any time, or
- (b) the operator has revoked the waiver, the Minister may, in accordance with the terms of the waiver, assess the amount of the tourism levy payable under this section within 6 months after the Minister receives notice of the revocation.

These changes will allow levy collectors – and by levy collectors I'm referring to the accommodation operators – to file a waiver to extend the assessment period when an assessment is issued against them. This will provide operators additional time to resolve issues if there is a dispute over the amount of tax owing and also aligns administrative processes along Alberta's tax statutes.

So just to wrap up, Mr. Chair, I just wanted to compliment the Ministry of Treasury Board and Finance on their ability to keep up with these changes with an excellent level of dedication and detail and to make sure that Alberta is up to date with both the federal government and other provinces. I'd also like to thank the Minister of Finance for his diligent work on this file.

I'll be supporting this bill at Committee of the Whole, and I hope many other colleagues in this Legislature do the same. Thank you.

The Acting Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to Bill 15? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Chair. The legislation before us is not necessarily simply housekeeping or enabling legislation; it is the mechanism through which the legislation actually lives. It's been fascinating to see this process move forward as we move forward to make life better for Albertans. There are aspects in our democratic system that constantly need adjustment and renewal, and income taxes and commodity taxes are some of them.

Now, where this particular piece of legislation touches me most pointedly is around the political contributions component that the bill seeks to implement. I do recall during debates, particularly in committee, when members of the opposition were quite vehement in that they felt that, and almost to quote them, political parties were not subject or should not be subject to the light of day. They called them private clubs and that political parties, as such, as private clubs shouldn't be scrutinized by the government or the state or be subject to the types of political contribution limitations that the legislation encompasses.

That was a very telling statement to me, when members of the opposition would get up and very, very clearly articulate how they thought that political parties were private clubs and that the very entry point at which an individual would become first eligible to either run for a party or enter into a leadership race was a bit of private information that the public, the government, people of this province had no right to scrutinize. I disagree with that absolutely wholeheartedly. When a person does put their name forward for nomination, when you decide you're going to enter into a leadership contest, your private club stops right there, and that's when public scrutiny should definitely be part of the process.

This legislation, by bringing the political financing act in to encompass those two levels of political engagement, is well past time. I'm very pleased particularly to see these two elements encompassed into legislation and enter into the realm of public scrutiny. That, for me, is one of the largest highlights of this legislation and one of the reasons I'm most pleased to support it.

With that, I'll conclude my brief remarks on this portion of the legislation as it affects me most pointedly and invite other members to join the debate, add their remarks and comments. I look forward to passage of the legislation.

Thank you.

The Acting Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 15? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I, too, rise to speak in support in the Committee of the Whole of this bill. You know, these amendments are going to ensure that our government's policy decisions are implemented and our tax legislation continues to be aligned with the federal situation.

The sort of headline part of this bill is, really, compassion. What is happening here is that, due to an unfortunate situation where a relatively unthinking and uncomprehending federal tax system was utilized in order to save administrative costs and other expenses in getting this rebate out to Albertans – and it had some unintended consequences of us trying to save Albertan taxpayers some money. It's a relatively small number, but that number did have – when the situation occurred to families who had lost a loved one, it was devastating, I'm sure. This legislation is well designed on a going-forward basis to prevent that unfortunate situation.

We do care about Albertans. We care about all Albertans. We want to make sure that the benefits of the rebate of the carbon levy are not a concern to Albertans. You know, one of the things that I'm particularly pleased with and what the Minister of Finance has done is that he's announced that the government will be forgiving the amounts currently owed in the situations that I've described. I think this is very compassionate, and I'm proud to be associated with a government like that.

You know, there are two other programs that are a part of this system, too, the Alberta child benefit and the Alberta family employment tax credit, and we're going to be able to regularize the situation if some unfortunate event occurs related to those.

You know, the part of the bill that I wanted to speak to, actually, is one of its more arcane parts, I think. It's something that I actually have a fair bit of experience with, being the parent of two children who, I can proudly say, were very successful at their university education. For about 10 years or so I was able to avail myself of the education tax credit that could be transferred from a child to the parent, and this was an important part of my tax planning. I'm not sure that my children appreciate the fact that I took those tax credits, but I did try to explain to them that they were actually not making very much money and that I could use that benefit better.

Basically, section 16 is being amended, and, you know, we're going to make it easier for parents or grandparents of persons taking education, whether it's in a college or an institution like NAIT or SAIT or at a university, to improve their financial situation. This relates to the unused tuition and education credits and how they're calculated.

As I said, it sounds kind of arcane, but in fact, having just come through filing my income tax on April 30, I do have, actually, very good memories of seeing that positive credit that I used to get after I had transferred that. I think many of you will know that you actually have to get your child to file their income tax and claim the amount that's going to be transferred.

Again, this is an example where the Minister of Finance and minister responsible for the Treasury Board is making sure that all Albertans are going to be able to get that credit, and that will actually improve the situation for those of us that are lucky enough to have children that are pursuing their education.

I'm also pleased with the changes that are being made to the corporate tax situation. I have to declare some conflict of interest in that I do have a professional corporation, as, I would assume, some other members of this House do. The way that the corporate tax is being reorganized is a good thing, and I'm pleased to support this bill in this regard.

You know, what's the government doing for families who had to return benefits they received under the Alberta child benefit or the other situations? Basically, what is being suggested in this act is that we would deal with those things similar to the way the carbon levy rebate is being dealt with. The processes are going to be improved. The Canada Revenue Agency is going to implement change that's going to allow parents of deceased children to keep rebate amounts. This is going to apply in cases of children who passed away on or after January 1, 2017. Families who receive a notice of reassessment in this situation after the specified date don't have to return the money. Again, it's a very compassionate approach and one which, I'm sure, all members of this Legislature will support.

In summary, this might be called a housekeeping bill, but the housekeeping that's being done I think is vitally important, not only on the carbon levy situation but on several other taxation measures, and I would encourage all members of this House to support this bill.

The Acting Chair: Are there any other comments, questions, or amendments in relation to Bill 15? The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Chair. I think the MLA for Edmonton-Whitemud and, I believe, a number of us spoke to the fact that a tax statutes bill appears to be a very boring bill, but when you start to look at it, you realize that the Minister of Finance and Treasury Board spent quite a bit of time putting a bill together to benefit families.

I think I might have said earlier in this Assembly that I really very much respect how quickly the government realized that there was some problem with the way the rebate for the carbon levy was handled and that they immediately worked with CRA and then ensured that there would be a bill introduced in the House to ensure that any challenges that had been created by the collection of the carbon levy would be finished. I think that that not only shows that the government is always trying to make things better for Albertans but also that we understand the importance of the rebate to families.

But this bill doesn't just do this. This bill doesn't just allow families to receive their carbon levies in four equal payments and ensure that no rebate has to be returned for the carbon levy and for the other two provincial programs that families benefit from, including the child tax credit. This is only one part of the bill. In this House this afternoon we discussed some other parts of the bill. The Member for Edmonton-Whitemud talked about the tuition tax credit, and I also have used that tuition tax credit in the past when my young children went to university.

But what I really wanted to talk about today, again, was the issue that we just discussed a little bit around an amendment. I don't know about other members, but it seems to me that when leadership contests do happen – and we are seeing this currently federally with the leadership contests in both the Conservative Party and the NDP Party – the stakes are very, very, very high. I haven't had a chance to look at the discrepancy, for example, in money raised by the two leadership contestants in the PC Party, Mr. Kenney and the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster. I know from experience that leadership contests tend to draw a lot of money, and as has been pointed out in this House a number of times this afternoon, what the government did from the first bill that it introduced in this place was that we wanted to remove big money from the election process.

I'm really thankful that we did because the idea is to ensure that everyone feels that they can contribute to a process and that no election process, including leadership contests, is influenced by so-called big money. I think the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie spoke about the fact that in the past people donated over $105,000 for a leadership contest and how crazy that was.

I wanted to just reinforce the fact that the political contributions tax credit makes life better by encouraging a healthy democracy and by providing financial support to individuals participating in the provincial election process. The Alberta government has worked to make important changes to election financing to get big money out of politics, including banning corporate and union contributions. The political contributions tax credit will encourage Albertans to participate in the political process. I understand that there might be a leadership contest happening for a party that is proposing to be formed, and I think we're all going to be really happy to know that big money has been removed from that leadership contest.

The cost of the political contributions tax credit is estimated to be $3.6 million, which is minimal relative to that of the charitable contribution credit, which is $302.3 million. I know that the Member for Calgary-Elbow spoke to that earlier on and was wondering why the political contributions tax credit was higher than the charitable contributions tax credit. The thing is that there are a lot more tax credits given for charitable contributions than political contributions. The political credit is capped at a maximum of $1,000 for any one individual. In contrast, individuals can make charitable donations and receive a credit on donations equalling up to 75 per cent of their income.

As we're talking about charitable donations, I'm really hoping that each member of this House is as supportive of the charitable sector as Albertans are and that we are all taking the opportunity to earn tax credits by making a lot of charitable donations because I know that the charitable sector really relies on donations.

The political contributions credit helps to encourage a healthy and competitive political environment, a cornerstone of our democratic system. I wanted to speak a little about that because I think some members of this House, like myself, have lived in places where the political environment is not as healthy as ours, where the processes are not as open, not as democratic, and don't give everybody the opportunity for a chance. One of the things that I've always appreciated in Canada is that everybody has the opportunity to present themselves for election, to be part of the democratic system, to vote, to debate, to be engaged, and I think we really treasure this. That's why the proposed changes that are made through Bill 15 are really part of this government's support for a healthy and competitive political environment, the cornerstone of our democratic system, where everybody can participate and everybody can contribute to their ability.

Consistent with the Fair Elections Financing Act, any leadership race that was ongoing at the time of that act's passage is exempt, so I wanted to reassure the people who were involved in the leadership races before this bill has passed – I believe that there are two political parties who have been involved in the leadership race – that this bill exempts them at this point. Future leadership and nomination contests will be subject to that act and this one if passed.

We have about two years to get used to working under this act if it's passed in the House. I'm hoping that everyone in this House considers this bill and that they fully understand the way that the bill is going to benefit families by ensuring that no one is asked to return their carbon levy rebate or the child tax credit if there is an unforeseen death in the family. This bill also supports the government's agenda to ensure that the democratic process is fair and allows everybody to contribute.

Mr. Chair, I really urge everyone to support this bill. I once again want to thank the minister for quickly reacting to the problem that was identified around rebates and ensuring that each family that does receive a rebate where there is a death in the family does not have to return the rebate.

Thank you.

The Acting Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 15?

Seeing none, are we ready for the question?

[The remaining clauses of Bill 15 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Acting Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Chair: Opposed? That's carried.

Bill 14

An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation

The Acting Chair: Hon. members, are there any questions, comments, or amendments on Bill 14? The hon. Member for Stony Plain.

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Mr. Chair. Bill 14, An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation, is amending the Oil and Gas Conservation Act, and it should be starting to move our economy before the end of the year. As you know, the federal government allocated $30 million in its recent budget to support our efforts to reclaim orphan oil and gas wells. The government of Alberta is working on options to leverage that money to assist the Orphan Well Association in the best way possible using that $30 million. Right now the OWA is unable to use the orphan fund to do anything other than pay for the suspension, abandonment, and reclamation costs in respect to orphan wells and sites, nor is the OWA legally allowed to accept a loan.

As you can see, legislation amendments are required to the Oil and Gas Conservation Act to enable a loan as well as to repay a loan. Specifically, the Oil and Gas Conservation Act needs to be amended in section 70(1), which sets out the uses for the orphan fund and the powers, duties, and functions that are delegated by regulation to the OWA. This will enable the OWA to pay back a loan. Amendments are also needed to add a new provision in section 76 to allow Alberta to provide a loan to the OWA as required by section 42(2) of the Financial Administration Act. Mr. Chair, these changes will give the government of Alberta the legal authority to provide the OWA with the support it needs to support further orphan well rehabilitation.

I'm confident that the plan that the government of Alberta will bring forward will adhere to the key principle of polluter pays. Simply put, Mr. Chair, Albertans should not be on the hook to clean up oil and gas sites – the previous government failed to ensure that companies were held properly accountable for their actions – and whatever actions we take as a government and a Legislature to support orphan well rehabilitation should not change that.

Mr. Chair, with whatever actions we take to reduce the current inventory of orphan wells around the province, the fact is that we need a better approach to the question of liability for these sites going forward. In too many cases the question of liability for closure costs arises only when an operator is getting ready to shut down a well, and by that time it may be too late. The operator in question may be running out of money and may be unable to afford the cost of abandonment, remediation, and reclamation. Too often the burden of that liability is borne by others in the industry through the Orphan Well Association. In many cases landowners are bearing the brunt of this as well, and some, like freehold mineral rights holders, are worried about the potential liability for themselves and their families going forward.

Mr. Chair, the whole system needs a thorough review, and I'm pleased to see that the government is doing just that. On May 10 the province announced that they would be working with industry and experts to find better ways to protect Albertans and the environment by improving policies for managing old oil and gas facilities.

Alberta Launches Review of Aging Oil and Gas Wells

The Alberta government says it's moving to tackle the growing problem of orphaned and aging oil and gas wells by drafting a new strategy to manage liabilities.

Starting Wednesday, the government and Alberta Energy Regulator will meet with industry, landowners and other interested groups to begin work on a policy to address the costs associated with the cleanup of aging energy infrastructure across the province.

Energy Minister Marg McCuaig-Boyd said changes are needed to protect Albertans from the financial and environmental costs associated with well remediation.

"Landowners are worried, the industry itself is worried, so it's time to take some action," she said in an interview.

The province currently works under a polluter-pay principle, where industry is responsible for the abandonment and remediation of old wells. However, as low oil prices and the recession have forced more companies into bankruptcy, more inactive wells are left without an owner.

"I'm a bit disappointed that when oil and gas was booming nobody took this seriously, and now that we're in a downturn there's not the mechanisms in place," said McCuaig-Boyd, who expects the review to be completed by the end of 2017.

The Acting Chair: Hon. member, remember that referring to a member . . .

Ms Babcock: I'm quoting.

The Acting Chair: You still can't refer to members by name.

Ms Babcock: Okay. I apologize.

Responsibility for the remediation of orphaned wells – those without an active owner – has fallen to the Alberta Orphan Well Association. The industry-funded organization has more than 2,000 orphan wells on its books, more than double from a year ago. Last year, it managed to close 185 wells.

"We think it's critical to open the dialogue with Albertans and jointly develop a framework that improves the management of unproductive upstream oil and natural gas assets," Brad Herald, chairman of the Orphan Well Association, said in a statement.

Mr. Chair, this is why I'm pleased to say that this liability management review isn't a one-sided consultation, the way reviews have often been in the past. We believe that the best solutions are found when you engage individuals who don't normally agree on an issue and encourage them to work together to find that common ground. That, of course, is an approach that is new since 2015 in this House. Before 2015, their approach was to fix on one solution, no matter how ill considered, and then put together a group of people who agreed with them.

Mr. Chair, I'm very proud of the work the government is doing to ensure that we hear a range of opinions and perspectives on this very important issue, an issue that we see too often in rural Alberta. The government has engaged representatives of the oil and gas industry, the oil field services sector, agriculture, landowners, freehold mineral rights owners, environmental organizations, lenders, insolvency professionals, principal organizations, surety companies, and lawyers who represent landowners. In the coming weeks those stakeholders will be delving more deeply into the technical issues around fiscal policies and programs, inventory management and legacy sites, and postregulatory closure.

There is one other part of this liability management review process that is worth highlighting, sir. I'm proud of the work that our government is doing to renew our relationship with Alberta's indigenous peoples. Too often in the past governments ignored their responsibilities to meaningfully engage with First Nations and Métis communities, so I'm pleased to note that there will indeed be a parallel engagement with the First Nations and Métis communities on this very important topic, starting in June. These engagement sessions will be taking place in different parts of the province to ensure we hear from a good cross-section of people. It's critically important that indigenous perspectives be included in this debate, and, Mr. Chair, they will be.

Mr. Chair, I'm excited to see that the funding in question will address about a third of the OWA's current and projected inventory in just three years. That's the kind of meaningful progress that my constituents and Albertans have been calling for.

It's also important to note the number of jobs that this program will create, 1,650 jobs over three years. That's approximately 550 jobs per year. The increase in annual jobs is equal to about 10 per cent of the number of current jobs in the waste management and remediation services industry.

It's important to remember here that the economic benefits of this bill go beyond the sheer number of jobs created. This initiative will help keep skilled workers in a dynamic sector employed here in Alberta, workers whose particular skill set will be in great demand as the recovery in the energy sector takes hold.

There's every reason to be confident that the polluter-pay principle will be respected no matter what happens in the years to come in the industry. The OWA is funded from an industry levy imposed on oil and gas companies. Moreover, the government of Alberta has regulatory tools and other legal remedies to require individual companies to pay their industry levy. The Alberta Energy Regulator can issue penalties on the outstanding levy owed and ultimately issue closure or abandonment orders or cancel approvals of licences if levy payments are not received. The Minister of Energy can also refuse to issue an agreement or register a transfer if debts are owed to the Crown in right of Alberta or the AER. Those are extraordinary tools, Mr. Chair, and frankly, given the size of the industry and the small percentage of industry revenues that this represents, it is difficult to imagine a scenario where such actions would be necessary.

Bill 14 enables the government to take long-overdue action to reduce the inventory of orphan wells in our province. It ensures that hundreds of sites that pose a risk to the health and safety of Albertans and our environment will be cleaned up in a short period of time.

Again, to quote Brad Herald, chairman of the Orphan Well Association, he says:

Environmental protection and safety of communities is paramount to our industry. We think it's critical to open the dialogue with Albertans and jointly develop a framework that improves the management of unproductive upstream oil and natural gas assets. As part of our commitment, we will take part in that conversation and support solutions to improve policy and manage these [unproductive assets.]

They want to take part in the conversation with us.

This puts hundreds of Albertans back to work. It keeps skilled workers in our province, that we will need as the energy sector recovers, and it does so while maintaining the principle of polluter pay. This is the kind of work that Albertans sent us here to do.

I'm pleased to support Bill 14, and I urge all of my colleagues in this Assembly to do the same. Thank you.

The Acting Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 14? The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate the chance to rise as well. I, too, would like to co-operate and support Bill 14. Three principal reasons come to mind. I remember about a year and a half ago when Premier Brad Wall first announced this idea in Saskatchewan and the great support it had throughout Alberta. It was maybe at the start or the front of the downturn, and we were concerned about Alberta families. We were concerned about Alberta communities and Alberta individuals. It was absolutely clear that Albertans were in favour of some support for our good oil and gas workers and of what the Conservative Premier to the east of us had suggested.

So I'm grateful that, you know, the federal government has come to the plate to clean up some of their legacy stuff from prior to the '50s, and I hope that as this bill goes through, the NDP government will get it right to ensure that the maximum employment happens, the maximum cleanup happens, and Albertans are honoured constituents.

Cypress-Medicine Hat – my goodness – was a leading part of the gas and the oil and gas industries in Alberta. We're blessed with the Suffield Block just to the west of Medicine Hat, which is now maybe mostly famous for the fact that some side of approximately 10,000 British soldiers annually come and train there. But initially it was where Alberta Energy got its start. It's where so many southeastern Albertans learned the trade, built wealth, and made things happen for the province of Alberta.

When I talked to constituents about orphan wells and about where we are at, many of them pointed out that in spite of some years of oil and gas companies having huge revenues, they were paying huge royalties. They were paying huge lease payments to the citizens of Alberta. My goodness. They were providing prosperity and wealth and opportunity for their employees, for employees' families and communities. Of course, you know, the oil and gas business is an expensive business to be in a lot of times, and a lot of times capital was a problem. What they were telling me was that a necessity or an opportunity to have more capital could go a long, long way in their desire to speed up the cleaning, to get their liability risk rating in order, to ensure that they could continue to employ Albertans, that they could continue to hire subtrades. So this appears to be a shot in the arm, you know, for a lot of our industry to get the capital that they need to do the job that they want to do.

We can't forget what the oil and gas industry has done for Alberta, and we also can't forget that they, too, are responsible for the cleanup of these wells. They want to be responsible for the cleanup of these wells, and of course they are, through their payment into the fund. Again, you don't have to go far in Cypress-Medicine Hat to talk to somebody that hasn't had a good quality of life, hasn't had part of rural Alberta developed, whether it's roads or electricity, because of what the oil and gas industry has brought to Alberta. Again, they absolutely want to be responsible for their own cleanup. They absolutely want to ensure that they are the best corporate player possible.

I'm looking to co-operate on and support this bill and hope that that will continue, but I do have some questions of the government that I hope they can answer. Parts of this bill just haven't been fully explained and expanded upon yet, and as this moves through the stage, you know, of Committee of the Whole onto the next stage of reading, I'd like to know some things like: of course, industry will be responsible for this loan, as it should be, but what mechanism and consultation have occurred to ensure that industry is in favour of taking this loan?

You know, has the government only met with industry advocacy groups? Will the government be meeting with individual players as well? Mr. Chair, as we have seen in the past, we all know that industry groups at times have ignored the voice of smaller players in favour of larger players. Possibly, probably the number one thing that I've heard in my two years since the government changed and in my three or four months as energy critic is about the four or five companies that were on the stage with the Premier and the socialism entrepreneurship that that is and the fairness and the unfairness that that may lead to. I would just hope that this government doesn't create a situation where small players are disadvantaged, where all companies aren't treated as fair as possible. We're going to have to get some answers on that.

One of the questions that's hanging out there for me is the repayment timeline. When the liability risk rating was changed, it especially affected smaller oil and gas companies, I think, three or four years ago, when that happened. Yes, it's important – it's important – to ensure that industry cleans up their residual, absolutely, for future generations and the environment, but it's also important to make sure that there's a mechanism for appeal, there's a mechanism for employment, there's a mechanism for growth. So unless we know the repayment timeline, Mr. Chair, for some smaller companies, maybe even some bigger companies, you know, who run into some bad luck drilling wells or whatever – maybe a longer timeline is important. So I'd like to hear what the industry has to say on that.

Thirty million dollars, I believe, we got from the feds. Will that cover the full cost of the interest on this, or will there be interest that will potentially have to be picked up by industry? Do we know what the mechanism will be for that?

What will be the level of increased activity due to the administration size of the Orphan Well Association? As we start to clean up more and more wells, will the size of the association increase? You know, how much will it increase by? Who will bear the cost of that? I would hope that this government has fully, fully consulted with our industry to make sure that the level is set with their agreement – this is their association; this is their cleanup – and is not going to be a hardship. Then, of course, I hope this government has a plan for decreasing the administrative body once the work is complete.

One of the main criticisms I hear about this government, of course, is how the size of government has grown and grown and grown while the private sector has had hardship and difficulty in the oil and gas business. I was talking to one of my friends the other day who's gone from over $30 an hour to $15 an hour and less pay when he's out of town and stuff like that. Mr. Chair, I would just ask: don't put too big a tax burden on these young families as they start to recover.

I'm also hoping and wondering: will the minister be tabling a timeline detailing the remediation schedule? Are we going to see, you know, exactly how this is going to be done?

I've also met with industry people, Mr. Chair, that talk about some situations where productive wells are in the middle of some orphan wells or some abandoned wells or some low-producing wells. Are we going to have a mechanism to possibly, you know, return some of these productive wells to the pool and an opportunity for creditors, for subtrades, for people like that to have an opportunity to participate in the Alberta advantage again?

It's also interesting: I understand that the skills for well reclamation on oil and gas works are not directly transferable from drilling or fracking or servicing a well, so maybe we have to ensure that we can meet the labour demand and the labour skills with what needs to be done to make sure that we can meet this timetable.

Mr. Chair, in summary, I'm glad that the feds stepped up to the plate to help us. I'm glad that they've taken some ownership on the legacy well problem, that is their responsibility. I'm hopeful that the government will get it as right as possible when it comes to ensuring that the environment gets maximum cleanup but that we give Albertans, employees and companies, the maximum opportunity to take advantage of this. I hope that I can get some of these questions answered during the Committee of the Whole.

Thank you very much.

The Acting Chair: The chair will recognize the Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thanks very much, Mr. Chair. I'm pleased to speak in committee on Bill 14, An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation, clearly a win-win, with the federal government offering to front the interest, at least, on a significant loan to industry. At the same time we're going to create jobs and clean up some important liabilities for all Albertans, particularly our children and grandchildren, with the Orphan Well Association. Presently the orphan well fund can only be used to pay for suspension, abandonment, and related reclamation costs in respect to orphan well facilities and sites.

The bill also proposes to authorize the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance to make loans. In its current form the Oil and Gas Conservation Act does not specifically allow that. This is obviously enabling legislation that will potentially be a win-win for employment, our economy, and these important delayed and deferred cleanup costs, that hold a potentially fairly large liability for future generations. The government is making the changes to allow a $235 million loan to the Orphan Well Association, to allow the fund to repay the loan.

As has been stated, there are 83,000 inactive wells and 69,000 abandoned. In March of this year the Orphan Well Association had an inventory of 2,000 orphan wells to go through closure activities. It managed only 185 wells last year with an annual budget of $30 million. It's scheduled to increase to $60 million in the 2019-20 fiscal year. This will entirely be covered by industry levies.

I have only a few questions that don't appear to be clear in the current bill. It authorizes the loan money to the Orphan Well Association but doesn't specify a loan ceiling or a repayment schedule apart from the 10-year, full repayment. It's not clear how that's to be shared, especially with companies that are perhaps struggling financially, and whether, in fact, at the end of the day, we will see the big companies stepping up with their share and the smaller companies again deferring and declining. Those are some specific details, but it seems to me that Albertans deserve to know how and in what manner the loans will be repaid, and we have a right to know at the start just what those terms of repayment are in the interest of protecting taxpayers from undue risk. They should be written into the bill.

This loan should also be a one-time deal, and it should reflect that, that this is not a pattern for future decades. While Premier Notley insisted that the $235 million loan doesn't replace the orphan levy or the polluter-pay principle . . .

The Acting Chair: Hon. member, refrain from using names.

Dr. Swann: Sorry?

The Acting Chair: Refrain from using names. You used the Premier's name.

Dr. Swann: Oh, thank you. Yes.

Bill 14 is worded in such a way that the door is being left wide open for government to make future loans. That needs to be addressed, too, I think. In terms of honouring the polluter-pay principle, we need to ensure that that is clear, that this is not setting a pattern for future defaults, I guess, by the industry.

Bill 14 is also not prescriptive about what any loans to the orphan wells can be used for. I guess, if the price of oil happened to jump by double, I would wonder whether some of this money already given could then be used for other purposes besides the purposes of abandonment and reclamation. Without it being more specific, I wonder if we are again not quite holding them sufficiently to account.

Finally, I think there is a reason to call for this bill to have a review process, to within one to two years report back to Albertans to let us know how this fund is being used and how effectively it is accomplishing the goals it set out to do. It's part of due diligence, accountability. It also, in my view, should be written into the bill, certainly, before any future lending is given. It seems to me that within the next one to two years it would be good to know what's working and how well it's working.

Those are some of the concerns in an otherwise laudable bill, that, as I say, is a win-win for Albertans, for our environment, and for our workplace. Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Acting Chair: The chair will recognize the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm very pleased to stand to speak to this piece of legislation, which is going to be, as noted by previous speakers, a win-win situation for many people in this province, people in the oil and gas sector, people in the environmental sector. Economically, for the province it's a means of addressing a problem that only gets worse over time if it doesn't get attention paid to it.

Now, in my constituency of Edmonton-McClung I have no oil and gas sites that need remediation. There are, in fact, no oil or gas wells that I know of unless somebody drilled one in the last half an hour. We do however have a pipeline. The existing Kinder Morgan pipeline goes smack dab through the constituency, crosses the river from Edmonton-Whitemud and comes in through the Edmonton-McClung riding. They had been very, very attentive to the community's needs when they were addressing how indeed they would ensure that that pipeline right-of-way was kept safe and clear of vegetation and trees that needed to be removed. There's been an ongoing, long-term process. Kinder Morgan has been involved deeply with the community in discussing how that gets done.

However, with respect to the situation regarding oil and gas wells, abandoned versus orphaned, I learned early on, when I had an opportunity for one summer to work in the oil patch, about the difference between these two terms. I often wondered even as a rig hand, when I worked for one summer on service rigs, how indeed — when I was doing service work around Redwater and St. Paul or Fort Saskatchewan, mostly northeast of Edmonton, you'd hear that some of these wells, even back then in the 1980s, in a field that you thought was a productive oil field, the Redwater oilfield in particular, were only producing one or two barrels a day. They were still operational, but you'd think: oh, how can this be economical? Even as a rig hand you wondered how that was possible. In fact, of course, it wasn't.

Back then they would do certain things to try to increase the productivity of the wells. There would be a process called a cement squeeze, which was basically a process where high-pressure fluids were pumped down a well in order to raise the fluid level of the whole underground resource. The water and oil, in particular, would all be raised up so that oil could be pumped once again. That was an afternoon of heavy, intense activity and quite a lot of excitement, actually, when the trucks from companies like Schlumberger would come in and pump those fluid levels down under such high pressure and get that oil to come up. And not always did it work. Now we may end up seeing other procedures used like hydraulic fracking, which may be more successful.

But even with today's technology not all wells can be remediated. A lot of them are owned by small oil companies, which end up not being able to sustain the well. Rather than being abandoned, as has happened with some of the larger companies, smaller companies simply orphan the well. That ends up in the lap of the Alberta taxpayer. This is what's happened with a lot of these wells that we're going to be employing people to remediate over the next number of years with this program under Bill 14.

I was actually shocked and impressed by the large number of wells that have been drilled in our province. Over half a million wells have been drilled since drilling activities began. Over half of those wells, or close to 285,000, are still deemed to be operational. However, a hundred thousand of those wells are not currently active. Eighty-one thousand wells have been reclaimed and remediated, leaving somewhere around 87,000 abandoned wells that require reclamation and remediation. Only a small portion of these sites are actually recorded in the inventory of the Orphan Well Association. As of March 2017 they held 2,084 orphan wells that still need to go through closure activities. In addition to that, there are some 1,700 pipeline segments that need attention.

The problem, Mr. Chair, is large. It's something that we've been aware of for a long, long time in this province, and the can has just been kicked down the road. Even back when I worked in the oil patch, there were lots and lots of wells where you'd see that the pumpjack wasn't working. Parts of it were not even there, or sometimes it would just be a hunk of steel sticking out of the ground, and you wondered: gee, that used to be a well site; what's happened to that? Well, they are nonfunctional orphan well sites. Some of them have been sitting there for decades, and now we're finally addressing the issue.

I'm proud to be part of a government that has Alberta's back on this and is finally doing something significant about it. For too long the problem was allowed to grow. This has affected thousands of Alberta residents, people like farmers who have these sites on their land, many of which can be seen. Just drive northeast of Edmonton through Thorhild county or up in Fort Saskatchewan, and you'll see them. Many of these farmers have sites on their land or municipalities have these unclaimed sites in their areas and can't work around them. It didn't happen overnight or even during the course of the last five years, when the economy was in a downturn. It's been building up for many years.

As I mentioned, in the '80s, when I worked in the oil patch, it was a known difficulty, a known problem that hasn't really been addressed over the years. Now we're finally doing something about it. In doing so, we're putting Albertans back to work, keeping the skill set in this province that is necessary and, as other people have alluded to, perhaps even creating a resource of individuals with specialized skills for addressing this problem in Alberta over the long term as we continue to pay attention to the issue of orphaned wells and not let it get to the point where there's a backlog of wells over time that ends up facing us as an overwhelmingly difficult problem but one that we have no choice but to dig into and solve now.

These orphan wells are wells, facilities, or pipelines where the original owner or the licensee is not capable of paying for the required closure processes. It can happen for any number of reasons, but quite often it means that the licensee has gone bankrupt, as I alluded to before, quite often a smaller company who ends up not being able to afford or have any funds left to remediate the well site. If they aren't going to close the facility properly, they're not going to be able to pay for remediation or reclamation either, and that's where the Orphan Well Association comes into play.

The OWA, the Orphan Well Association, is a not-for-profit organization funded by the oil and gas industry through the orphan levy fund. It's run by an independent board of directors and has done a lot of good work over the years. They have decommissioned over 1,100 orphan wells, and they have reclaimed another 700 orphan wells. Public safety is one of the key things they are concerned with. They examine the risk of every project to help to determine which wells will be cleaned up. But the 700 orphan wells they've cleaned up to date is not enough when we have another 2,000 or more that need attention.

We need to do more to assist them in their job, and we need everyone to recognize the seriousness of the situation. We can't continue to put off the problem. I think that's a question that I asked myself even working in the oil patch in the '80s: why are these just allowed to sit there? Now we're finally doing something about them. But they never should have been allowed to sit and have the problem fester for decades. I hear it all the time from my constituents, and I'm sure my colleagues in the Assembly hear the same thing: why was this problem allowed to fester, and why did it grow so large?

However, at the same time, Mr. Chair, we have a huge number of skilled oil field service workers ready and willing to go, many of whom will be employed in this project over the next three years, 1,650 of them who will be developing a significant and unique set of skills to address the problem of orphan wells. It's a set of skills that we hope to maintain in this province as we solve the backlog. Hopefully, we don't end up having a large backlog. We maintain this skill set and these individual crews so that as wells do become orphaned and the OWA seeks to address the problem, they'll have their valuable skills available to us on an ongoing basis, a team of skilled people to protect Albertans from the harm of possible abandoned and orphaned wells. So we want to keep them available for the near future. We need to keep them working now.

I know when talking with constituents at a recent school function, who were involved in the oil patch, they were really quite pleased to hear about this program. Some of them weren't aware of it. Those that I know who are also involved in the oil field supply service are quite excited about it as well. Those that are making hoses and pumps and all the other pieces of equipment that are necessary in the servicing industry and the specialized equipment that will be needed for the remediation of well sites and the orphan wells are only going to add to the level of economic activity that we already see beginning to happen in the oil patch. We look forward to as many individuals as possible of the 1,650 being employed in this rather specialized field of remediation of the orphan wells.

With that, I conclude my remarks and encourage all members to support this win-win-win legislation. Thank you.

The Acting Chair: The chair will recognize the Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Mr. Piquette: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm happy to rise in the House today to support Bill 14, An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation. You know, specifically, as opposed to those who spoke earlier, we can talk about the decision of our government to provide a loan for the Orphan Well Association, as other members have discussed. I'm very happy to support this bill because I think it strikes a very good balance between some competing interests. As well, it speaks to a real need for employment for rig hands in our province. I think it's one of these win-win situations.

Now, as the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung alluded to, there are indeed a lot of old well casings, rusting pumpjacks. It's hard to tell when you look at a well whether it is an orphan well, whether it's an abandoned well, or whether it's a well that, you know, in theory is still in production.

I do know that you do see a lot of these in and around Redwater, one of the oldest oil fields in the province, in fact the second oldest, and also up into Thorhild county, I think, with several, actually, around Boyle and around Athabasca. I know there are some within Lac La Biche county in my neighbouring riding. As well, Lamont county has quite a number of them.

Of course, these wells are a hazard while they remain in place if they are indeed orphan and the proper steps haven't been taken. It's kind of ironic in a way, you know, a lot of the concerns that some groups have around hydraulic fracturing, when the main risk for water contamination from that is surface water spills. Meanwhile you have these old well casings in place, where the older they get and the less they're being maintained and looked after, the greater the chance you are going to have cracks in the casing and, actually, indeed, potentially contaminated groundwater as well as contaminated soil, and of course there's the ongoing nuisance for farmers where it makes parts of their land unusable, sometimes for decades. Obviously, it's not an acceptable situation.

This has been a debt that we've been accruing over decades. It's, unfortunately, part of the pattern of our previous administrations. They almost sort of worked counter to common sense. A common-sense approach to problems like this is that when you've got the labour available, when you have the workers looking for work, when you don't have a lot of competition for them, you can get them fairly reasonably, so willing and able to work at a reasonable cost. In the past, because that happened during a downturn, that tended to be precisely the time when, you know, previous administrations would actually cut back, and then during the boom time, when wages would be skyrocketing and you'd actually be competing with private industry for production for these types of things, that's where they'd start to ramp up. I'm very happy that I'm part of a government that understands that that's when people want these types of things, when they're unemployed, and with the fact that we can do this in a way that's going to address the unfortunate backlog of the past, I mean, it's really nice. To have in three years one-third retirement is actually pretty significant, but we can also do that while maintaining intact the principle of polluter pay.

In talking about striking the right balance, I'm really impressed by that because definitely we're in a dilemma. I'd have people approaching me, as I know many members would as well. I mean, you had people from PSAC coming, and not only that, but you would have individual companies and just individuals, farmers, concerned residents. They were pushing: "Well, now is the time to do that. I mean, it just needs to be done. We have workers here." But at the same time, you have others who could say, "But it's unfair that we should have to pay for industry, you know, perhaps not setting aside enough money or just basically for problems in liability management from the industry." I think this strikes a good balance.

We're not actually spending taxpayers' money directly. What we're doing is that we're using money from the federal government to leverage loans over time – they will be paid back – in order to get these things accelerated, so I think this is a win-win-win. It's the best bang for the buck we could get, I think, for that money if we wanted to shut in as many abandoned wells as possible. It keeps principles intact and puts people back to work when they need it.

With that, I guess that's good. I hope everybody votes for it and that we get unanimous consent on this.

Thank you.

The Acting Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to Bill 14? The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

5:30

Mr. Gotfried: I'll keep it brief, Mr. Chair. I'd also like to speak in support of this bill. I think that the opportunity is there. In my conversations with many different organizations – the Petroleum Services Association of Canada, the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors, CAPP, and, of course, the Orphan Well Association – there was universal support of the principle that industry must pay for the cost of well reclamation. However, I think we're in an opportunity right now where we would like to see this accelerated during a time period where we actually have excess capacity in the industry, and actually we can accelerate this process through the loan process, again respecting the principle that industry will pay it back. So this is an opportunity for us to invest in reclaiming these and doing the right thing in terms of the environmental impact of these wells, the fact that they are orphan wells. Otherwise, it will take much longer for us to address that concern. But, again, that financial commitment is there from the industry to do so.

The other thing is that we still have a lot of unemployed oil field workers out there who can be retrained to do this reclamation work. We also have a lot of idle equipment as well. There's going to be a great opportunity to ensure that this land not only is reclaimed but that it's put back to productive use within our economy. If some of that land can be utilized again in terms of the agricultural impact that it can have, it can reduce the land that is taken out of production for those purposes.

As I said, I will keep this short and sweet. It looks like everybody is very much in support of this bill. I'd like to add my support and encourage everybody to support this bill and move forward to allow the industry to take care of an issue which will help many, many people, I think, in terms of employment and reclamation.

Thank you.

The Acting Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 14?

Seeing none, are we ready for the question on Bill 14?

[The clauses of Bill 14 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Acting Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Chair: Opposed? That's carried.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'd like to move that the committee rise and report.

[Motion carried]

[Mr. Sucha in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bills: Bill 15, Bill 14. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Acting Speaker: Opposed? So ordered.

Mr. Westhead: Mr. Speaker, I move that as we've made some good progress, we call it 6 o'clock and adjourn until tomorrow morning.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:34 p.m.]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Deputy Speaker: Good morning.

Let us just take a moment to remember that as elected officials and leaders we must not remain silent when events such as those that have just happened in Manchester occur. It is our responsibility to make known that we condemn these acts and that we will stand with our brothers and sisters during this very difficult time.

Please be seated.

Third Reading

Bill 205

Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-North West.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is my great pleasure to rise and move third reading of Bill 205.

As I begin, I think one of the points that I want to make is that we've had some good discussion here in the House, and we've also seen what happens when folks don't have the respect and the understanding about the language that we use around disability rights. One of our colleagues in the Legislature, the MLA for Calgary-Greenway, retweeted or validated some extremely negative language around people with disabilities, and it gave us an opportunity to have a discussion about what is unacceptable. That is unacceptable, and I think people know that now. But something else struck me as interesting in looking at this member's Twitter account. The description under his name said, "With a focus on the most vulnerable Albertans." I thought: why is that bothering me? The term "vulnerable Albertans" as applied to people with disabilities seems to me to be words we use when we have failed people with disabilities. What makes you vulnerable?

Well, in the case of people with disabilities in Alberta it is bad policy, indifferent policy, and the fact that we have not put the measures in place for people with disabilities to easily access the services and supports they need. That's one of the reasons why a disability advocate is so important. There are folks out there who have family members who will advocate for them, and that's wonderful. I've heard amazing stories of families doing that work, but I've also heard stories about families at the end of an exhausting day having to spend hours trying to get paperwork done, trying to help their children and family members transition at age 18 and age 65 to go from one level of support to another. That is why we need an advocate. There are lots of people with disabilities out there who don't have family members to do that work for them. There are parents that I spoke to who said: we're getting older, and as we do, we are worried sick about what happens to our adult child.

I am so proud, Madam Speaker, to be part of a government that has said: "You know what? We're not going to use the term 'most vulnerable Albertans.' We're going to use the term 'Albertans who deserve our respect and good policy to match it.'"

When we talk about what the advocate does, one of the things that we felt was most important is to set out an agenda for that first year or two years and identify and study the issues of concern for people with disabilities, to review our programs and policies because, clearly, from the feedback we heard, there's a lot that isn't working right right now, and there are no better people to tell us what's not working than people with disabilities who are accessing the system and their advocates currently who are helping them do that. When we say participating in processes in which decisions are made about people with disabilities, that's an important piece because as we move forward and talk about what supports and services we need to have in Alberta, what we need to make easier, all of those things, that is a really important point. To give advice to the government on how to make things better: that is the whole process of consultation.

You know, when I first started talking about this bill, Madam Speaker, I was a member of the opposition and began to have these conversations about it. When I came over and joined this government, I was really delighted at the level of enthusiasm and excitement for this bill. I want to make a special point of recognizing the MLA for St. Albert, who really was doing this work across the aisle from me for quite some time but always – always – in a really postpartisan way took the time to explain to me some of the things that were most important about where we needed to head in terms of disability rights in Alberta. She has so many years of experience, and really I would not have been able to do the work I did without her advice and without the work she had done initially in order to get us to this point in the conversation.

With the input of the disability community, of people with disabilities, we can get to a place where their safety, their inclusion, their well-being becomes something that we don't strive for but something that we fully expect every day and maintain at a level that is important in this province. I know we're not there yet, but I'm so happy that we're having this discussion because in this caucus we believe social issues are important issues.

We know that when we develop good, strong legislation that helps people with disabilities, the LGBTQ community, when we help any number of people who need our help, people fleeing domestic violence, we not only create life-changing opportunities for them, but at the end of the day we save money. We save money when Albertans are happy and they're comfortable and they're not going to emergency rooms to access care, when they feel safe, when we understand that their mental health and their personal safety and everything else is a part of their quality of living, but it's also something that is a responsibility that we hold as lawmakers in this province. I think that it's important to remember that as lawmakers in this province we are responsible for making sure that everybody has a level playing field, and that, I think, ultimately is what the disability advocate does. It is an attempt to create a level playing field where there isn't one now.

I want to thank everyone on both sides of the aisle for their input. I think that we've had an excellent discussion. I look forward to more of it today. I just want to say, Madam Speaker, that when we consider policy like this, what we are saying to people in this province is: we've got your back.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to speak to Bill 205, Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act. Let me just start off by saying first of all that this bill is a good step forward, a good step forward to finding ways for the system to be improved and better serve people with disabilities in our province. Dealing with bureaucracy can be very painful at times. It can be a very painful process, and I sincerely hope that this advocate will be able to resolve some of the issues with the present system. I personally will be monitoring the implementation of this act, and I know that stakeholders that I'm speaking to will be watching it very closely as well.

On that note, I would also like to take a moment, Madam Speaker, to express my extreme disappointment that the government did not give any thought to our subamendment, which would have seen the public and stakeholders give input during the review of this act, give input on the act's effectiveness after two years of being in place. Our understanding is that the Member for Calgary-North West dismissed our reasonable amendment because she was offended because apparently she didn't receive a personal phone call ahead of time. Now, I don't know about you, but my personal offence would not stand in my way of making sure that legislation was right for the people that I was advocating for, and it's extremely disappointing that something as small and petty as not receiving a personal phone call would stand in the way of the member supporting a good amendment – a good amendment – that was being asked for by many stakeholders, including some stakeholders that I'm leaving here shortly to meet with, that are extremely disappointed in this government's behaviour when it comes to that.

It becomes even more appalling, in my mind, Madam Speaker, when you realize that this government on short notice changed this private member's bill to be a government bill and then didn't notify us in advance about their own amendment, so there's definitely a double standard right there when it comes to time constraints. But, again, despite the fact that we didn't receive a personal phone call, we are still rising to support this bill in general because it's the right thing for Albertans. Hopefully, in the future the hon. member can put some of that pettiness aside.

Now, in addition to that, Madam Speaker, her caucus voted down our amendment very quickly and without almost any thought. There could not have been any thought. I don't think it's just my caucus that's disappointed. As I said earlier, I know for sure that there are many stakeholder groups that are offended and very disappointed in that behaviour.

One other thing I wanted to note on it is that there is no preamble in this bill. Now, preambles give an indication as to the spirit of the law and can guide the crafting of regulations and other details later on. The Child and Youth Advocate Act has a preamble pointing out a couple of things: one, that children and youth are our greatest resource;

secondly, that the Government of Alberta is committed to ensuring that the rights, interests and viewpoints of [our] most vulnerable children and youth . . . are considered in matters affecting those children and youth;

and that the government recognizes the importance of continual improvement in the provision of services to vulnerable children and youth.

Now, those are good things to have in the preamble.

It's also interesting to note that the other night in Legislative Offices this caucus across from us inside there voted to stop debate on including children with disabilities under the Child and Youth Advocate. It was shocking.

But not having a preamble is problematic, so I'd like to be on the record stating a possible preamble of sorts for this bill. One, the government of Alberta supports persons with disabilities to be fully included in their communities; two, the government of Alberta is committed to ensuring that the rights, interests, and viewpoints of persons with disabilities are considered in matters affecting them; and the government of Alberta recognizes the importance of continual improvement in the provision of services to persons with disabilities. Again, you could have a solid preamble like that, Madam Speaker, if the government wasn't rushing through the bill and spending their time being offended because they didn't get personal phone calls about amendments.

On this issue, the bill becoming a government bill: I support this move. Now, I've heard from several stakeholders that more consultation with the disability community was needed and is needed. In an analysis on their website Inclusion Alberta writes:

Since this analysis was completed it is our understanding that as of today May 17, 2017 Bill 205 will be moved from a Private Member's Bill to become a government Bill. While we support this decision, we wish to reiterate our desire to see the government fully consult with the disability community on how an Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act can be best structured to ensure the office is both independent, supportive of inclusion as a means to equality and equity of life outcomes to Albertans without disabilities and effective.

Now, Madam Speaker, I appreciate the work that's been done here, and I do believe that it's a good start. I believe it is the beginning of a very important conversation. I applaud the member for her hard work on this bill while I also encourage the government to continue to listen to those directly impacted by this new office as it works to implement this advocate.

In summary, I again would like to commend the government on this bill and to further encourage all members of this House to consider more broadly how we can continually support Albertans who use these services. Let's not stop with this bill, and let's certainly not let our petty feelings get in the way of moving forward with good legislation.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm getting up to give just quick, brief words that I support this bill. This is a group of people that for too long has heard just talk from previous governments.

Here on this side of the House we aim to make life better for Albertans, all Albertans. What I have heard from my consultation with constituents – as some of you know, I'm working on a private member's bill on Henson trust, which means I'm consulting with a lot of the same groups of people that the hon. member consulted with for this bill. What they tell me is that they are supportive of this bill, Madam Speaker.

Now, of course, the work continues when it comes to issues facing these groups of constituents that are on AISH or receive various PDD supports. We have gotten rid of SIS, our minister is working diligently to make recommended changes to the AISH system, and of course in my own office we have done continuing work in consulting with the PDD and AISH communities every step of the way as I work to form and bring forward my private member's bill on Henson trust, which will most likely happen in the fall.

Now, these groups of constituents that I am talking with – and they're constituents, the same as any other – support having this advocate. They support this bill, and as a representative of those constituents and a supporter of this bill being the right thing to do, the right thing to make life better for Albertans, I will be voting in support of this bill.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), the hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'd like to thank the Member for Calgary-Currie for his supporting words. I know that the member himself has been a champion for persons with disabilities, and he's got a private member's bill on the Order Paper regarding Henson trust. I just wonder if he can tell us a little bit more about the work that he's been doing on that particular issue to support persons with disabilities and how the consultations that he's undertaken have gone.

The Deputy Speaker: Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much. I have private member's Bill 211. When I first got elected, one of the first groups of constituents to visit me in my office was members from the PDD community who were upset about the previous government and safety standard 8, which meant that those of the PDD community who were renting independent residences would basically force their landlords to start putting in full sprinkler systems, bringing private residences up to the full code standards of a full-living facility. As you can imagine, putting full sprinkler systems into a private residence is a bit of a massive and perhaps unreasonable undertaking.

Now, I'm sure that the people that brought this in had the best of intentions, but unfortunately they talked to the community after the fact. I heard loud and clear from that so that when I brought forward this bill, I consulted every step of the way. I saw that there was a problem that I had heard. Henson trusts, in short, are a way for parents of disabled children to leave an inheritance for their children in such a way that when they pass away, that particular child's assets don't suddenly become so large that they have their AISH benefits clawed back, which I think is very reasonable. That's something that pretty much all other provinces in this country do.

My first step was not to draft an idea of what the solution would be. My first step in that consultation was to go out to the community and say: "This is what I see as a problem for my private member's bill. You tell me what you want to see as a solution for that. You tell me." So I consulted in both Edmonton and Calgary. I had above the fire code capacity in attendance at both consultations, which was quite the experience. From there, I took all the feedback that I heard from all the various constituents who were affected by this as well as from their advocates, and since this also deals with what happens when a parent passes away, I heard as well from accountants and lawyers who specialize in this particular area of law, on how you set up inheritances and trusts for those with disabilities.

From that, Madam Speaker, I sent out to all the stakeholders a what-I-heard document, a summary of everything I heard from those consultations. Currently, for about the next three weeks, I am finishing off my first draft of what I would give to our table officers and Parliamentary Counsel to draft the bill. I'm going to bring that draft of what I think the solution would be to the community again for another round of consultation and go to the community and say: "This is what I heard. This is what I am proposing would be the content and the specifics of the bill." Assuming that that consultation goes well, that's what I'll give to Parliamentary Counsel, and that's what we'll see before the House, hopefully sometime in the fall.

That's the meaning of consultation: every step of the way making sure that the community is involved and that what I'm interpreting from them to be their optimal solution, of course within the restrictions of what I can do in a private member's bill, is there. We've listened to the community.

For the second round of consultations I'm happy to say that, due to the great amount of support from members of my caucus, I will be going down to Lethbridge, actually, to open up those consultations. I will of course be back in Calgary to do another round of consultations. We're working with my colleagues in Edmonton to host bigger consultations. We're also working with some other colleagues to perhaps go a little bit further afield into rural Alberta as well to sort of get a little bit more of the rural members of the PDD community, to make sure that this private member's bill meets their needs, and to make sure I have, as much as possible, the full diversity of viewpoints. Should that come out as positive, that's what I'll bring forward.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? I'll recognize Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to Bill 205, the Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act. I want to thank the hon. Member for Calgary-North West for her efforts on this bill.

You know, I don't think it's a news flash to anybody that for Albertans sometimes trying to navigate through the labyrinth of government is often very difficult. If you think of the government as the largest business, perhaps, in the province, it's often very difficult to get through the layers of bureaucracy and to actually make the provincial government work for you. My constituents are often in my office to ask me and my office to try to help them work their way through government. The bureaucracy, the regulations, the timelines, the forms, the technicalities: all of these things combine at times to make it almost impossible for the people of my constituency to work through the government and to make the government work for them. Of course, it's even harder when you're an Albertan that has a disability that you suffer from. So it's a good idea to bring forward Bill 205 to create an advocate for persons with disabilities, and I would applaud the member for bringing this forward.

It's clear that an advocate in this bill has been empowered with the ability to identify and to study issues. Each one of the people that walks into our offices has a unique life and unique challenges. People with disabilities are no different. As they come into our lives and come into our offices and ask government to be a part of their lives, it's important for this advocate to be able to study and to be able to identify the unique situations that people with disabilities face, whether that's a physical disability or a mental disability, whatever that disability may be. Having an advocate that can study and identify those issues is a good thing. To review the programs and the policies that we create as a government to try to help the people of Alberta with disabilities: that's an important thing for an advocate to be able to do, to see if those programs and those policies are actually fulfilling the purpose for which they were designed.

Allowing that advocate to have consultations and to help make and to advise the government on systemic decisions that could help people with disabilities is an important role for this advocate to play, so I'm glad to see that it's built into this bill, to a degree at least. That they can promote the rights and the interests and the well-being of the person that is seeking access to government service is a good idea; it's a good thing. That this advocate would be able to provide information and advice to the government is actually really crucial.

We must as a government be self-reflective. We must be looking at how we can do things better for the people of Alberta, how we can make our systems more efficient and more effective, and an advocate allows us to be able to do that, to help those people that perhaps cannot speak on their own behalf or cannot help themselves.

An advocate can help provide people with disabilities or their families with an educational component. They can help educate these families to see how they can work through the system. This is accessing the services and the related programs for that individual. They can help make them aware of the appropriate resources and the people in the organizations that the government has available, and they can, like we've done with other advocates, reach out to Albertans, whether it's the Child and Youth Advocate or whether it's the Seniors Advocate. These advocates can help the government work for the people, and if nothing else, that's what a democracy should be about. It should be about helping the government work for the people.

For those that do not have the resources or the capacity to advocate on their own, I believe that an advocate will assume, to a certain degree, that role, that capacity of advocacy. These are all positive things that I wanted to bring to the attention of the House. It's the reason that we will and I will be supporting this bill.

That doesn't mean that this bill couldn't have been better. This bill provides for the advocate for persons with disabilities to improve the government capacity by identifying and studying issues, by reviewing programs, by providing information, and while I support these objectives – and they are worthy objectives – I believe we could have made this bill even better. I really wish the government had been willing to support the subamendment that I put forward in the House. The subamendment would have encouraged the advocate when they review policies and programs, when they identify issues, and when they provide advice to the government. This subamendment would have helped strengthen the mandate of the advocate in order to be able to help Albertans. I believe that it would have made a better bill.

When you ask to allow and encourage the advocate to consult with stakeholders and when the advocate puts forward a report to a committee, upon 90 days of receiving that report, the committee would then consult with the public about that report and maybe ask for some of those stakeholders to come before the committee. That's how committees work. We take a problem, we take an issue, and we study it. We bring in the consultation.

I'm very happy to hear the hon. Member for Calgary-Currie, I believe, say that in his private member's bill he's done all of this consultation leading up. Why would we not encourage our advocate to do the same thing? The amendment asks for front-line workers, that maybe have a different viewpoint, to be involved, that there would be fulsome consultation with those stakeholders. We're simply asking for the advocate to have the capacity to do what the member across is doing for his private member's bill, and that's a good thing.

We asked for the committee to have more consultation with stakeholders coming out of that report. We've asked in that subamendment for the advocate to have the capacity to speak on behalf of those that are being employed, that are looking after many of the people that have disabilities, that they would be able to advocate on their behalf as well. If you're advocating on behalf of the people that are working with people with disabilities, you are advocating for that person with a disability.

I wish that the government had been willing to consider and to vote in favour of that subamendment because I believe that it would have made this a better bill. I guess we can only take the government and the hon. member and the reasons that she gave for why she wouldn't consider this subamendment. I guess that was, from my perspective, quite disappointing.

At any rate, to sum it up, I believe that there is much in this bill that's worthy of support. It will receive my support. I thank the government and the hon. member for bringing it forward. I just wish that we had been able to make it a little bit better.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I was very interested in the words that the hon. member had to share. I recall that earlier on in this session the member was talking about opposition that he and other people had to a group home in his own cul-de-sac. It seems so interesting that here he is advocating for persons with disabilities, you know, a group of people that, quote, unquote, people say are vulnerable, yet in another instance he was completely opposing a group that could be considered part of that category. So I'd like the hon. member to get on the record as to what the difference is and why there's a difference in advocating for some as opposed to others who desperately need our help and should all be treated with dignity.

The Deputy Speaker: Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. This is now several times that I've come up and spoken to this issue. I believe that the root of it comes back down to that important word that we've talked about, consultation. We saw just how much difficulty this government worked itself into when it did not do a proper job of consulting with farmers over Bill 6. You see, when governments make decisions, they impact individual people's lives. Before they go about doing that, whether it's with zoning laws or whether it's with a Bill 6, they better make sure that they've done the job of consulting because, at the end of the day, government is supposed to be about serving the people regardless of the issue.

What happened in both Bill 6 and with the issue that he's referring to in my life is that there was not proper consultation. This government learned the hard way how Bill 6 came back to bite them because the people of Alberta realized that this government was not working in their favour but, rather, was trying to impose an ideological point of view on free Alberta citizens. Now, in this case of mine we saw again a government making a decision without appropriate consultation. At the end of the day, the appeals panel came out in favour of our position, that there had not been appropriate consultation and that the issue was in our favour.

While we all want to help people – and I even believe that the government wants to try to help the people of Alberta at times – we see that when you do not do the appropriate consultation, that consultation or lack thereof can create a whole series of problems that government creates for itself. So I would encourage this government to continue to learn. We realize that many of us in this Legislature are first-time MLAs. There is a learning curve. I believe that this government has started to learn at least a little bit about the idea of consultation. I think we saw the Member for Calgary-Currie stand up and give a speech here just a few minutes ago all about the role of consultation that he's taking, and I believe that that's probably as a result of the problems that were created at least in part by Bill 6.

So when we start to think about how government works in people's lives and when we start looking at this bill, let's remember that consultation is always a good thing. Asking the advocate to be able to consult, to talk with front-line workers, to advocate on behalf of the people that are, in turn, working with people with disabilities, that consultation and having the committees that will review the reports of the advocate, have an opportunity to take that information and to be able to go back and to consult with the people, is actually a really, really important part of the process of government. At the end of the day, when you do that, it's a part of getting the government to be able to actually work for the people. And in the case of people with disabilities that's a very important thing that government can do for them, advocate for them, not be a part of the problem.

So while again I would speak to this bill and say that there are major portions of it that are worthy of our support, I believe that it could have been tweaked. It's, again, disappointing that the government is unwilling or unable . . .

The Deputy Speaker: I'll recognize Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to have the opportunity to rise and speak to third reading of Bill 205. I'd like to start by just talking a little bit about some statements that were made earlier today. The Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre seemed quite disappointed that the subamendment, which was just spoken about by the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon, was voted down in the Assembly.

Now, Madam Speaker, this was a two-page subamendment incorporating a number of changes for which, frankly, I heard very little explanation or clarification offered in this House. I know that after I listened to the member present the subamendment, I had very little understanding of precisely what it was he was asking for. He gave a much more eloquent explanation of it here this morning. I, frankly, wish he would have made so eloquent an explanation on that day. However, you know, as was said by the Member for Calgary-North West, there had been no previous consultation or indication that that subamendment would be brought forward, no opportunity to correctly understand how it would fit within the bill, and, as I said, little explanation offered in the House.

I will note, Madam Speaker, that the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre himself did not speak to this subamendment that he apparently felt so passionately about, much as he had almost nothing to say in our last meeting of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices, where I was pleased to serve as chair, in which he somewhat misleadingly suggested that government members at that committee chose to stop debate on aspects of the Child and Youth Advocate Act, when in fact they simply chose to adjourn discussion of further expanding the scope of the advocate to a future date and another committee meeting.

Now, I suppose there are many reasons why a member may choose not to speak to a particular debate. Perhaps they've chosen not to be present for a particular discussion, in which case it's a bit disingenuous to cast aspersions on those who are there. Perhaps they didn't feel strongly enough about something to be there to take part in that debate – I suppose that's a possibility – or I suppose they just might not feel passionately enough or be concerned enough about that issue to rise and make their opinion known at the time. I suppose that's for the member in question to determine or to know for themselves. At any rate, I'll say for my own part that I did not find that that amendment was very clearly explained or presented on the record, so I did not find that I could support it.

Now if we can go back then, Madam Speaker, to the actual substance of the bill, as I hope all members will be able to today. I'm very happy to have seen this bill brought forward by the Member for Calgary-North West. You know, when I first was elected, I admit I did not have much, if any, knowledge about the realities for the disability community in Alberta.

Shortly after I was elected I did meet with Ms Bev Hills of the Skills Society, who came to my office, and we had a very good discussion. That was my first opportunity to learn about some of the difficulties and indeed many challenges that that community had faced in trying to communicate with the previous government. There were a number of issues that they had encountered, a number of challenges on which they had tried to be heard but on which they found that they were not able to gain any purchase. They were not able to gain any ground. They were not able to get their concerns recognized, indeed, or things changed.

As I continued to serve and I had the opportunity, Madam Speaker, to have the honour of chairing our caucus committee on social policy, I began to have the opportunity to learn from the Member for St. Albert, who many of us have spoken of in regard to this bill given her deep knowledge of this area, given her many, many years of work with this community and advocacy on behalf of this community. From her and through her I began to learn about the concerns around standard 8, the safety standards that were brought in under the previous government, and the implications that those held for the disability community and indeed very dire implications that could have cost many people from the disability community their very homes.

I was very pleased, Madam Speaker, to see that the minister for human services at the time, now the Minister of Community and Social Services, undertook a consultation to sit down with that community, to hear directly from them their concerns. Indeed, again, the Member for St. Albert was a leader in part of that consultation and in ensuring that the voices of the people in our disability community here in Alberta were heard. I'm very happy to say that as a result of that fulsome consultation, those standards were repealed.

Madam Speaker, I've had the opportunity to continue to learn. I've been able to continue to learn because there have been people within our government caucus who have that knowledge. The Member for Calgary-North West, whichever side of this aisle she has been on, has indeed endeavoured to become that advocate as well. She spent much time with people in that community, learning from them, understanding the issues, and she repeatedly rose in this House – repeatedly rose in this House – unlike some other members, to advocate for this community not just when it was politically convenient but out of true concern, to make sure that their voices were heard at this table.

That is an excellent example of why a disability advocate in this province is so badly needed and of the great value that it can provide to the disability community in our province. Madam Speaker, when we have someone who is dedicated to examining the systems of support, to examining the things that are in place to help those who are in need, as was so eloquently put earlier this morning, not those who are just vulnerable, not those whom we want to look at as victims but simply those who need help from their government, as so many of us do in so many different areas, those people would have someone who can help them to navigate the systems because, as has been observed, these systems can be complex. They can be somewhat labyrinthine.

As I noted yesterday, the Auditor General had identified how bad things had gotten with the AISH system in our province. I'm very happy that the Minister of Community and Social Services has made many improvements. I know that my office, in terms of our casework, had many people come to us who were struggling with trying to get through the AISH system, having to make repeated applications before they were finally able to access the services and the supports that they needed and indeed deserved.

Having a disability advocate who could report to and advise the Minister of Community and Social Services, to identify and study issues of concern to people with disabilities, to review those programs and policies that are there to support them, to participate in the processes through which decisions are made, indeed to consult with and promote the rights and interests and well-being of persons with disabilities through public education: Madam Speaker, this is an incredibly valuable thing. This is a good step forward. We have much work left to do with the disability community. There are many things left to address.

We had an excellent report, which was released last fall, again which the Member for St. Albert was a key part in bringing together as a member of the committee that looked at this. I look forward to working with the Minister of Community and Social Services to see how that report can be implemented and how we can begin to take further steps forward to ensure that all Albertans receive the support and services from their government that they deserve. Madam Speaker, to be clear, we are here to make life better for Albertans. We make life better for Albertans by standing together and supporting each other, not by pitting Albertans against each other, not by suggesting who is and who is not truly Albertan but by supporting all Albertans regardless of their political bent or stripe.

I appreciate this opportunity to stand today and again express my support for Bill 205, to thank the Member for Calgary-North West for bringing this bill forward, to recognize the Member for St. Albert for her continued and ongoing advocacy for this community. I look forward to seeing this bill pass and to working with the new disability advocate in the province of Alberta to make sure, again, that we are making life better for all Albertans.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any further speakers to the bill? Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just want to rise in support of Bill 205 and thank the Member for Calgary-North West for bringing it forward and, of course, thank the Member for St. Albert for her lifetime of advocacy on this matter. You know, this is one of those bills where I think to myself: why wasn't this done years ago? That's been happening a lot over here, actually. I've been really enjoying the dialogue on this bill as well – well, until the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre got up to speak. But it's been very positive, and it's what we really need.

An advocate is going to be very important for this community. An advocate for persons with disabilities in Alberta will allow for a more systemic understanding of the issues faced by persons with disabilities and will identify potential solutions to these barriers. That's exactly what an advocate does. They will recognize items in the community that aren't being addressed. I have an example from Calgary's greatest riding, Calgary-Klein.

Ms McPherson: The second greatest.

Mr. Coolahan: The second greatest, yeah.

It's funny that the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie addressed the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon on keeping the youth house in his cul-de-sac. In my community of Capitol Hill, my own community, construction is under way right now on accessible housing that was originally there. It had 14 rooms, and now it's being expanded to 42 rooms for people with disabilities. It's really fantastic.

This was a combination of private donors, the government of Alberta, and many advocacy groups. What happened there was that with the members from the Capitol Hill Community Association, who I thank very much for this, there was no objection to this accessible housing development being expanded. You have to understand that. They advocated for this, absolutely. This is what an advocate who is in place would do on a continual basis, not just sort of an ad hoc advocacy when something is recognized. I'm very proud of the Capitol Hill community and the association.

You have to understand where this is being built, Madam Speaker. I mean, it would leave developers salivating. It overlooks beautiful Confederation park. They developed it so that people with disabilities, who are in chairs or scooters or these kinds of things, can actually go right into the park. It's very beautiful land. Again, I'm just so proud of my community for helping make that happen.

You know another thing an advocate can do? I just wanted to bring this up because it's kind of interesting. When I was in high school many, many years ago . . .

Ms McPherson: Not that long ago.

Mr. Coolahan: It's quite a while ago.

. . . I actually earned a credit for being what they called a buddy to people with developmental disabilities and physical disabilities. What a great program. This is something an advocate in Alberta might actually advocate for in the education system here. It really gave me an understanding as a young person, a teenager, of the challenges that are faced by people with disabilities but also of their abilities, what they are able to accomplish, and how much they contribute to communities.

I don't want to take up too much time on this, Madam Speaker, because a lot has been said, and I really do want to see this bill passed, as I'm sure it will be. Again, thank you so much to the Member for Calgary-North West for bringing this forward. I'm sure we are going to see this bill passed, and we're going to see an improvement in the lives of people with disabilities in this province.

Thank you so much.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Before I begin, I want to thank the Member for Calgary-North West for her work in putting this forward and for all the consultation that she's done for this bill, and I also want to thank the Member for St. Albert, who has worked her entire adult life advocating for people with disabilities. The work that she has done has helped our government and has helped all Albertans move forward when it comes to helping persons with disabilities. I am very proud to be in a caucus that has people from all pasts, from all walks of life, who can bring their expertise to our government, and if we don't have that expertise, we can go out and seek that expertise. We are nowhere near as blind as previous governments have been when it comes to talking to other people, so I'm so proud to be part of this government and our caucus.

Now, I have never been anywhere near an expert on persons with disabilities, but I knew that about myself before I was elected. As a brand new candidate I sought out an expert. When I was getting signatures for my nomination, I sat down with a friend, my grades 11 and 12 social studies teacher, actually, Jean-Pascal Morin. While he hasn't always been an expert either, a few years ago he and his wife were blessed with their first child, Isaac, who was born with Down syndrome. I knew about this because he always talked about Isaac in class, and he even brought him a few times. Isaac was the happiest kid I have ever met. He loved everyone, and quite frankly everybody loved him. He was just a barrel of joy and always brought a smile to everyone's face when he was able to come to school with his father.

Now, I don't know if you've recently visited a high school, Madam Speaker, or if anyone here has recently visited a high school, but high school has never been, really, a bastion of proper language. Quite frankly, the number of times I heard the R word is astounding, but in M. Morin's class I learned quite quickly why that word is inappropriate and how to shut it down when I see it or hear it. As high school students we learn that this word is inappropriate and that it can be hurtful to so many people across our province and even in the microcosm that was our school, and we did learn. It was like night and day from when we entered M. Morin's class at the beginning of the year to when we exited after two years. No one used the R word because we all loved M. Morin, and we knew that it upset him and for good reasons. It's insulting, it's degrading, and I wish the Member for Calgary-Greenway would have talked to the family of a person with disabilities before he supported the use of such a degrading word.

That is why this bill is so important, because we have people who believe that using the R word is worth their validation, because we have people even in this Chamber who don't understand the harm that can be done when you stand aside and let people use degrading language to Albertans and to people whom we love.

When I was getting my nomination paper signed, I went to see M. Morin and his family to talk about politics and what I needed to know about persons with disabilities. I wanted to know what I could do to help. I needed a crash course because, like I said, I knew very little about the subject. I wish members of the opposition would have done the same because I learned a lot in our short meeting. When I asked what needed to be done, he pretty much said: everything. It's incredibly difficult to raise a child with a developmental disability. They lack support, they lack information about what supports do exist for them, and they lack someone to speak on their behalf.

The previous government failed persons with disabilities. I vowed that I would do better not just for Isaac but for all Albertans. There's a lot that needs to be better. There's a lot that needs to be done. Because of the lack of will and because of the lack of caring from people on the other side of the House, we have inherited a deficit of empathy from the previous government. We will not leave people with disabilities behind, because we care about Albertans, we care about people with developmental disabilities, and we will make sure that this and what happened in the past 10 years never happens again.

This bill responds to calls within the disability community for an advocate, and more importantly it responds to concerns of members of the PDD community. I couldn't be happier to support this bill, and I couldn't be happier to be with a government that puts legislation like this forward, and I am so proud of the Member for Calgary-North West and the Member for St. Albert for all their hard work in helping people with disabilities.

While people on the other side have their headphones in, while people on the other side decide not to talk, that is why we're here. We're here to make sure that we bring their stories forward, because the people in the opposition are so blind to what's happening with social issues. It may not be in their top 100 things of why they ran, but it's important to people in this province. Those 100 issues, those social issues: that is why people ran. That is why people need a government. They need government to speak on their behalf to help them with social issues because they have never had a voice in this Legislature or very rarely get a voice in this Legislature.

Once again, I am so proud of people who have gone out into the communities to talk to people in these communities, who took the time to actually ask them what they needed. That's why I am proud to be part of this government, and I am proud to support this bill.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other speakers to the bill? Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise on Bill 205. I also want to add my congratulations to the Member for Calgary-North West and to her colleague and my colleague as well the Member for St. Albert, who together are a force to be reckoned with when it comes to advocacy for individuals who need support in this province and deserve the support of this government.

This legislation will bring forward a long-desired advocate for persons with disabilities. I do want to thank the member for bringing forward this bill, starting an important conversation, and for the work she's done to consult with Albertans. Madam Speaker, this bill would establish an advocate for persons with disabilities in Alberta with the power to represent the rights, interests, and viewpoints of persons with disabilities. Just as important, the advocate will identify concerns within the disability community.

Some of these concerns I've mentioned before in the House and I've had the opportunity to witness and learn about earlier in other capacities, while driving a DATS bus or working with geriatric patients as a nursing orderly trainee. Those early impressions never left me, and I'm very, very proud to know that we recognize the need and the wisdom of bringing forward legislation which creates an office whereby individuals with disabilities can turn to an advocate and have their voices heard.

Many were the times when passengers on my bus or individuals who now are my constituents sought to gain access to government programs or services that they really shouldn't have to ask twice for, yet they didn't seem to be able to obtain them as easily as one would expect. To have this office available for them to turn to is something they've been calling for a long time, and I'm proud that this government is finally responding and turning to that community of Albertans and saying: "Yes, you belong. Yes, we value you. Yes, you're important. Yes, we understand."

When it comes to making life better for Albertans with disabilities, the previous government was a lot of talk and not a lot of action. The Official Opposition has a plan to cut services like health and education, that Albertans rely on. Our government's record is clear. We are committed to supporting Alberta's disability community. We stopped the PDD safety standards, and we stopped SIS. We recognize that PDD service providers are facing pressures due to a growing demand for PDD services. That's why we increased funding for PDD. Our government is protecting and improving the things that matter to Albertans, and that's why we continue to listen to the disability community about their ideas to fix the issues that the previous government created.

Now, many Albertans who don't have a relative or a close friend or maybe don't run across in their own workplace individuals who face the challenges of having a disability may not be aware of some of the statistics about the individuals and the size of the community who live with disabilities in Alberta. Overall, we know that individuals with disabilities face unique challenges. A few examples include an employment rate of 47 per cent compared with individuals without disabilities at 74 per cent.

One of the things that an advocate will be able to do is raise awareness amongst employers about the value of employing individuals with disabilities. There are many benefits to having someone in your employ, as an employer, who otherwise wouldn't be working, if one takes the opportunity to realize the value of employing somebody with a disability, realizing that in many cases those employees have lower absentee rates, better job dedication, longer term employment in one place, and genuinely add an element to your workplace that basically improves the camaraderie and self-respect of everybody in the workplace because they know that they're reaching out and valuing somebody else in our society.

Right now I'm in the process of working with Inclusion Alberta to match the work that I have available to the skills of somebody that they will refer. Hopefully, very soon there'll be somebody in my office who is living with a disability, gainfully employed in some capacity, that we can enrich our workplace with. I look forward very much to doing so and, hopefully, by example, will encourage others in the constituency of Edmonton-McClung to really consider looking at how they could employ an individual with a disability as well.

Now, a bit more background as far as the quality of life for adult Albertans with developmental disabilities goes, as measured by a personal outcomes index. It demonstrates that the ability to get around within one's community, i.e. transportation, is positively related to all domains of quality of life. The greatest gap between quality of life for adults with developmental disabilities and other adult Albertans was in the domains of rights and self-determination.

Research shows that in comparison to parents of typically developing children, parents of children with disabilities are more likely to turn down a promotion, work reduced hours, or not work, and have a lower income. Many of us have seen this first-hand, where you'll have a dedicated set of parents or a single parent looking after an individual who has a disability in their home, quite often with other children as well. They will do everything, as one would expect, to ensure that that child has the best outcomes as they grow towards adulthood within that family but at great sacrifice.

Those are some of the things that I expect the advocate will address when the office is in place should we pass this legislation, as I expect we will. The advocate will, I believe, become a very worthy advocate for parents raising children with disabilities in ensuring that the access to government services or development of new programs and services is something that reaches the attention of the government sooner rather than later so that individuals don't end up suffering unnecessarily as they do their very best to raise children with disabilities within families and, hopefully, minimize the sacrifices that they have to make compared to families who are not suffering the same challenges.

According to the 2012 Canadian survey of disabilities by Statistics Canada – get this – there are approximately 436,000 adults with disabilities and 31,000 children with disabilities in Alberta, a huge number. Many of us don't realize just how large that number is: 436,000 adults and 31,000 children with disabilities. What an absolutely wonderful resource of individuals that we can welcome into the workplace and into our schools to ensure that they know they're valued. This legislation, which brings forward an advocate for those with disabilities, will go a long way to signify that the government values individuals who have disabilities as they would any other Albertan. The Canadian survey on people with disabilities conducted by Statistics Canada is collecting data between March and June 2017. Updated results will be available in the winter of 2018 and '19, but even as the numbers stand now, from 2012, 436,000 adults with disabilities and 31,000 children with disabilities in Alberta are significant numbers which, I'm sure, come as a shock to many Albertans to know.

There are a number of programs in the province designed to provide supports to individuals with disabilities, but those support programs will always need to be reviewed, updated, reconsidered. An advocate for persons with disabilities will be a very significant and useful instrument, officially, for individuals and families who wish to address government and make sure that changes are made to programs as they develop over time and as needs change.

Thirty-seven hundred children, youth, and adults are either affected by fetal alcohol spectrum disorder or are caregivers of those affected, accessing support. That's a significant number, and it's a very, very difficult situation to be in as a caregiver for somebody suffering from FASD. I know an individual in my constituency who was a foster mom to one individual with FASD, and it's total dedication, and it's nonstop. It's heartwarming to see that child, that young boy, grow into a young adult under the care of this mother who has taken that responsibility on, but the supports that need to be there for individuals in that situation are not always what they should be.

I know from having conversations with her that the power, the resource, the office of an advocate for those with disabilities would be an asset to her. As an individual MLA one can make representations, but for, officially, that office to be available to mothers in her situation looking after a child with FASD would be a real recognition of the value of the role that they play in extending themselves to really take on a very, very difficult and challenging task. Raising somebody with FASD: well, it's really heartwarming to see that effort and that dedication. People who are in that situation deserve nothing but our absolute support and deserve to be elevated to a status of the highest order in our society. Giving them the recognition they deserve by implementing an advocate for people with disabilities in this province is one way of honouring that dedication that caregivers for those with FASD exhibit every day.

The family support for children with disabilities program supports more than 13,400 families and their children with disabilities. Other programs: the persons with developmental disabilities program supports over 11,300 individuals; 570 Albertans accessed the residential access modification program; approximately 150 Albertans have a qualified service dog under the Service Dogs Act and service dogs qualifications regulation. Supports and services cover a broad range and can include community-based assessment and diagnosis, targeted and indicated prevention, support services for people affected by FASD and their caregivers, a range of respite options, targeted behavioural and developmental strategies, work-related and/or developmental child care, assistance with some extraordinary costs related to health and medical needs, and out-of-home care for the child when necessary through FSCD.

A number of programs exist, and they do need to be revisited over time. The needs of families change. Situations change within the workplace. The individuals who suffer the disability and live with the challenges of disability themselves will often, as they grow older, have their needs change, go from school to the workplace. It's the transition quite often from school to workplace that these individuals have difficulty manipulating. The advocate will look at transitional problems that individuals suffer when they try to go through even a change of academic institution. From high school to university is quite often a challenge, and there are barriers there that need to be addressed on an ongoing basis. This is one area where I'm really quite hopeful we'll see some progress made with the assistance of the advocate, in having more people go from high school into postsecondary institutions and be accommodated.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

Drever: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm proud to rise to speak to Bill 205, the Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act. I would like to thank the Member for Calgary-North West for putting forward this bill and also the Member for St. Albert for cosponsoring. I know that these two members have been huge advocates on this issue, and I and many other Albertans certainly commend them for that.

I would like to begin by saying that it is our government's first priority to ensure that Albertans with disabilities continue to receive the supports they need, not just to continue to support them but to add to that support in a meaningful way to smooth over the problem areas and find solutions to the frustrations that people of the disability community have experienced for years.

We saw one important example of frustration in the disability community in the form of incredibly damaging language validated by a member of the Legislature, the Member for Calgary-Greenway. He responded to a blistering criticism of the government that included an offensive term to the disability community. In responding both positively and excitedly to the person who made the insult, he validated a term that the disability community and its allies have worked so incredibly hard to make unacceptable. When he was finally pushed into apologizing, he used the opportunity to take yet another swipe at the government, and he didn't even use the word "disability." This is the same member who offered up a substantial bill-changing amendment, which actually he never even bothered to bring to the House. That was about two weeks ago, and it just left us wondering and left me wondering whether he had the best interest of this bill at heart.

You see, Madam Speaker, prejudice is everywhere and even in this House, but I am confident in saying that prejudice of any kind does not exist on this side of the House. Our government has always valued the input of the disability community into how we can best support their safety and inclusion. That's why we continue to make thoughtful, measured changes to improve the way the PDD programs meet the needs of Albertans with developmental disabilities. Our government recognizes that both individual and family advocacy is important for addressing issues and creating meaningful changes to systems and supports.

The ministry has existing relationships with the disability community, providing avenues for both engagement and advocacy. Just to list off the advocacy committees, that includes the Premier's Council on the Status of Persons with Disabilities, PDD provincial advocacy committee, PDD Provincial Self-Advocates' Advisory Committee, PDD contacts advisory committee, family support for children with disabilities, provincial parent advisory committee, fetal alcohol spectrum disorder family advisory council. Community advocacy organizations also include the Alberta Disabilities Forum, Disability Action Hall, Inclusion Alberta, voices of Albertans, Voice of Albertans with Disabilities. Service provider organizations also include Alberta Council of Disability Services, Alberta Disability Workers Association, Align Association of Community Services, Alberta brain injury network, PDD regional service provider council.

Madam Speaker, our government is listening to Albertans. As you can see with the long list of organizations that I just listed, we are engaging with Albertans. The message Albertans are sending is loud and clear. Establishing an advocate will make the lives of Albertans better.

I'd like to get into the role and the mandate of the advocate:

- (a) identify and study issues of concern to persons with disabilities . . .
- (c) participate in processes in which decisions are made about persons with disabilities;
- (d) promote the rights, interests and well-being of persons with disabilities through public education;

- (e) provide information and advice to the Government with respect to any matter relating to the rights, interests and well-being of persons with disabilities;
- (f) assist individuals who are having difficulty accessing services and related programs for persons with disabilities, including directing them to an appropriate resource, person or organization [that may be able to assist them].

Madam Speaker, simply put, this bill gives the disability community a voice. By having an advocate, Albertans with disabilities will have a point person when, for example, teens transition into adulthood or need assistance navigating government programs and services by providing advice, information, and assistance with resolution concerns through third-party support.

Madam Speaker, in my fundamental role as the elected representative of the fabulous riding of Calgary-Bow, I must reflect on how this bill will affect my constituents. I have reached out to many stakeholders in my riding. In the community of Bowness I have met with the Resicare Society, which is a wonderful organization. The Resicare Society was formed by a group of concerned parents and individuals who believe that persons with disabilities have the right to a stable home environment offering supports for growth and development.

I had the opportunity to tour their facility and attend their AGM, which I spoke at on behalf of the government. I was greeted by their CEO, Maline Jenkinson, and we discussed her organization's experience in serving people with developmental disabilities and the barriers that they face in working with the PDD legislation because the previous government just failed them for far too long, Madam Speaker. I was happy to add their voice to the PDD safety standards consultation in 2016, which I know the Member for St. Albert was deeply involved in. This is just another example of how our government is listening to Albertans. By having an advocate, it will help the people who live at the Resicare Society by reducing barriers and giving them a voice, and this is one example of why I support this legislation.

Another organization that will benefit from this bill is Accessible Housing. I know that the Member for Calgary-Klein also spoke about this earlier, and it is in his riding as well. The CEO, Jeff Dyer – well, he was the CEO; now he's the CEO of Boys & Girls Clubs – at the time invited me because he is a constituent of mine. He lives in Bowness, and he wanted me to tour their facility. For people who don't know what Accessible Housing is, it's a not-for-profit organization and registered charity with a mandate to open doors to homes that are accessible and affordable for people with limited mobility. Through their outreach and residential programs they provide housing and personal supports so that everyone can have a home, belong, and participate in their community. I thank him for having me as it was an enriching experience which led to conversations on how they can help accessibility in Calgary-Bow. Actually, something that he mentioned was that a former MLA, Kent Hehr, used Accessible Housing. I found that interesting.

Mr. Dyer mentioned that they had a project called ramp it up. This is a project that helps remove physical barriers by providing single-step storefront custom-made ramps, at no cost, to businesses who need them. In collaboration with the Bowness improvement area and this program we were able to put up ramps all over Bowness to help people with accessibility. I highly recommend to anyone in this House to use that program as well because, you know, a single step can definitely be a huge barrier for someone who has accessibility issues.

This is just a great example of community engagement. When there is community engagement, it protects and improves the lives of Albertans, and I feel like Bill 205 does just that. If passed, it would establish an advocate for persons with disabilities in Alberta, which will allow for a systematic understanding of the issues faced by persons with disabilities and identify solutions to those barriers.

With that, I support this bill, and I urge my fellow colleagues to support this bill as well and to give to the disability community what they've been asking for for far too long. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I want to express my appreciation to the Member for Calgary-Bow for those remarks, and I wonder if she would expand on the experience of the previous MLA in that great riding and how his experience with affordable housing informed yours.

Drever: Well, thank you for that question. Mr. Dyer and I had a really good conversation around how accessible housing really has benefited Calgarians. He did mention that former MLA Kent Hehr did use their facility and that it really was life changing for that individual. I mean, like many other members of this House, I didn't have a lot of knowledge about people with disabilities, and listening to other people's stories is really eye opening for me. I didn't talk to Mr. Hehr myself, but I did hear his story through Jeff Dyer. He said that, you know, it made him feel like he had a family. It made him feel like he had a home. Those are just the fundamental basics that I feel everyone deserves and has the right to. Just because you have a disability, it doesn't mean that you don't get that right. He did express that Mr. Hehr was very happy that he was able to use that, and I think that that helped him be an advocate for other people with disabilities because he knows where they're coming from.

The Deputy Speaker: Any further questions under 29(2)(a)? Seeing none, any other speakers to the bill? Lethbridge-East.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rose in support of this bill during second reading, and I did so because it was and is the right thing to do. As I mentioned before, I'm a person living with the challenge of hearing loss. I have worked within the disability community for about 20 to 25 years in Edmonton, Ottawa, and Lethbridge. I consider myself to be a vehicle for change within this and many other communities.

As I've said previously, Lethbridge is an incredible community, and it is so because it exemplifies what I believe a community should be. Perhaps a definition which encompasses it: a group of people living in the same place or having a particular characteristic in common, a feeling of fellowship with others as a result of sharing common attitudes, interests, and goals. I believe the attitude, interests, and goals in Lethbridge are of inclusion and sharing our diversity. There are a number of groups which have taken a lead role in this area in Lethbridge. One of those groups is inclusion Lethbridge. It was formerly known as Lethbridge Association for Community Living. I believe that I have a good working and personal relationship with inclusion Lethbridge.

Last Friday I had a very positive and, I think, productive discussion with Dani. Dani is a mom who works tirelessly as an advocate for her daughter, who is amazing, and also for others in our community with developmental disabilities. I prefer to say developmental challenges. Dani provided me with a great deal of feedback on the issue, which I've shared with my colleagues. She recognizes that this bill and the appointment of an advocate is a first step. Dani wants her daughter to have a rich and meaningful life. She recognizes the depth and breadth of the needs of her daughter.

It is this knowledge and the leadership and advocacy by herself and other parents which provides the information we need to make positive and productive steps forward. Information like this will be shared with the advocate.

I'm a member of the Ministerial Panel on Child Intervention, and as such I'm learning much more about the role of an advocate. I am also learning about the actual costs to have such a role as an independent entity or within a branch of the government. I know that our budget is limited. In fact, I hear from the opposition every day where they are directing us to cut everywhere. I also know we cannot do that.

It has been recommended that an independent office of the Legislature similar to that of the office of the Child and Youth Advocate be formed. As much as I would like this to happen, I would point out, as my colleague from Edmonton-Centre did, that the cost of such an entity in this framework would be in the area of $14 million. This bill is proposing an advocate that sits within the Ministry of Community and Social Services, which is similar to the successful B.C. model. In this model the advocate is appointed and reports to the government. This allows the advocate to provide direct advice and recommendations to the government. On that note, groups such as Inclusion Alberta and inclusion Lethbridge provide to the government information on the challenges, the barriers, et cetera, that impact the service sector and family capacity of those who provide service to Albertans experiencing such challenges.

One of my concerns with respect to a separate entity is that the money would have to be redirected from elsewhere within the overall government budget. Where could one possibly make those cuts to do this? In having the advocate within a ministry which would have the supports available through that ministry and being able to listen, assess, and provide both advice and recommendations to the government directly, this position would look at systemic issues brought forward. It will provide the government the ability to address the gaps within the system much more quickly, and in fact this is one of the things that has been requested through the PDD consultation.

I am convinced that the advocate as being proposed by this bill will begin to make the lives of Albertans better. I'm very pleased to be part of a government that is taking action to do just that. As a person with a disability, my challenge of hearing loss, I thank the Member for Calgary-North West for bringing this bill forward and the Member for St. Albert for the advocacy work she has done over many, many years within this community.

I know how important it is to have somebody there that listens, that understands and actually makes a movement forward so that our government can make those changes. I absolutely support this bill, and I just won't be able to believe it if anybody voted against it.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It gives me great pleasure to get up and speak to Bill 205. I want to thank the Member for Calgary-North West for bringing it forward and for all the work that she's done in consulting with members from the persons with disabilities community and how she's been out there listening. I also want to thank the Member for St. Albert, who, as we all know and as has been commented on several times in the House, spent not only her time as an MLA but previously, before she became an MLA, working so closely with this community.

I wanted to speak to the issue of that when it comes to persons with disabilities and the reality that they experience day in and day out. Now, of course, I am not a person with a disability. I don't experience life as they do, and that's why it's so important to take time out of our busy schedules to actually sit down and talk to people who experience the kind of marginalization that they experience on a daily basis no matter what the issue is: if it's persons with disabilities or if it's people from the LGBTQ-plus community, people from different ethnic communities. Let me tell you, discrimination exists in so many different forms. I wanted to speak specifically about that.

At the end of the day, the objective behind this bill, as was pointed out very clearly by the Member for Calgary-North West, is that all people should be treated with dignity and that government policy should be focused on treating everybody with dignity. Yet we live in a culture that discriminates all the time against people who are different. I want to ask not only the members of this House but all Albertans and not just those who are watching us right now: why does this culture of indifference and discrimination exist in the first place?

I remember being in grade 1. There was a little girl that was in my class. She came in about halfway through the year, and she had to wear a respirator on her back. I remember that when she came into the class, her mother and the teacher made a special point of pulling us all and getting us to focus and understand difference and stating to us how important it was that we shouldn't be discriminating against her because she has this respirator on her back. I don't know why, regardless of that, we were still having students in the school that would bully this young girl because of her disability, because she looked different. I've got to ask us again: where does that culture come from? Why are we so scared of what's different?

We have a long way to go in order to curb the discrimination experienced by people with disabilities in this province. I know for a fact that sometimes it's out of ignorance, yet we can't blame it on ignorance. Each and every one of us has the responsibility to go out there and learn. It's not necessarily someone from the disabilities community that has to come and teach us. We just need to take the time to go out there and speak to people. There's that wonderful thing called Google. We can go on the Internet, and we can learn, educate ourselves about the reality that people with disabilities have to go through day in and day out.

That's one of the main reasons why I'm standing up to speak in favour of this bill, and I strongly recommend that all members of this House vote in favour of this bill.

The other thing I want to say is that consultation is so important. Now, before becoming an MLA, I remember being a little boy and being a human rights advocate and activist and being out on the streets demonstrating for human rights issues because, of course, the reality that I came from was a dictatorship. When my family came here to Canada, we were trying to create awareness around the dictatorship in Chile, and I remember being on the streets of this fine city talking about those kinds of things. As I grew and became older, I remember not being consulted. I remember whole communities not being consulted about issues that were being discussed in this House. Policy was being created that was continuing to marginalize people here in our own province.

Let me say, Madam Speaker, that I find it absolutely rich that we have members on the other side of this House that get up and criticize this government about consultation. When did they ever provide the opportunity for consultation when we were in opposition?

I remember being with our now Premier on the steps of this Legislature, with those steps being absolutely full when it came to issues of PDD. I remember that many people here who are sitting amongst us were part of that crowd when the previous government wasn't listening to members of the persons with disabilities community.

I remember that when we came into power, I had the opportunity to sit down and specifically speak to parents of children with disabilities and parents of children with learning challenges. They said: look, we're tired of stating again and again and again that we're not being listened to, or at best we get a lot of words but no action.

I'm so happy that now we have before this House a bill that is going to give that opportunity to people in our community that they can have dignity by having an advocate that will work hard on their behalf to make sure that our government programs are going to be there and be able to provide what they need. I know it's not going to be all roses. It's going to take time, but the important thing is that they will have an advocate.

The other thing that I wanted to stress very quickly is that especially when it comes to parents of children with disabilities and, specifically, learning challenges in schools, when the parents themselves advocate on behalf of their own children, there are some people who look at them and say: "Oh, they're squeaky wheels. They're challenging the system." Of course, I understand that there's frustration and that there are issues with resources and money and that you can have to apply to this and that. A parent standing up for their child should not be seen as something negative, yet those are the conditions that we're in, and it has to do with the fact that for so long there was a government that wasn't listening to this community and wasn't creating policy to address the issues.

Now, one of the things that I want to say specifically to those parents is that, yeah, not every parent has the energy to be that kind of advocate. First of all, you shouldn't be stigmatized for standing up for your child. You shouldn't be stigmatized for it. Keep doing it. But I also understand that there are some parents out there and maybe even some single parents out there who are working two jobs, three jobs, and they just don't have the energy to advocate for their child, or they don't know where to go. They don't understand well how the system works. That's why it's so important that we have an advocate for them, so that they can advocate for their child or loved one with a disability.

This government is focused on creating good policy as we move forward, and this is a beginning for that. I want to say that it was this party that was on the steps of the Legislature in the past together with that community, and we were fighting for the same things. We always have been listening. We always have been listening to marginalized people in this province. We've been with them, whether it comes to issues with racism or any other kind of discrimination, LGBTQ-plus, and specifically in this case with people with disabilities.

To the community I want to say that this is a first step. We're moving in the right direction. We need to continue working together, listening, and understanding how we can create better policy, but now you have a government that's going to listen, and we're going to create that great policy together.

With that, I'll encourage every member of this House to vote in favour of this bill. Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), questions or comments? Calgary-Bow.

Drever: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I want to thank the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie for his passionate speech on Bill 205. He did mention parents who have children with learning disabilities and some of the challenges that they face. As someone who was diagnosed with a learning disability, I absolutely understand the challenges that come with that. Having an advocate for myself during that time would have been really helpful. Unfortunately, I didn't have a government that supported me in that. I wanted to ask the member what challenges he's heard from constituents in this area.

The Deputy Speaker: Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the hon. member and my colleague for such an important question. You know, over the past summer – it's almost been a year now – I was approached by a constituent of mine who's a parent of children with learning disabilities, and she was so passionate about this issue. To be quite honest, I remember the way that I met her, when I was door-knocking back in 2012 for that election campaign. At that time I said: "You know what? This is a really important issue. I think that it would be really great if we could find more parents that are concerned about this issue and sit down and have a conversation."

And soon after she did. She went out and she organized a meeting of more parents in the constituency and specialists across the city that were willing to come in and talk about this issue. Let me tell you, the challenges are immense. There are a lot, and they intersect with issues of the Ministry of Health, with issues of the Ministry of Advanced Education. What I'm very happy to say is that the group that this lady was able to put together identified all these things, and they put together an action plan about how they are engaging with our government on this particular issue. There are many things that we can do, and I'm so happy that we're working together with her group, which is now specifically focused on several children throughout the province with learning challenges.

I could go on for days about all the problems that there are, and you know them well. Most importantly, specifically, these people need an advocate, so I'm happy that we're working on such an important bill.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any further questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any further speakers to the bill? Strathcona-Sherwood Park.

Cortes-Vargas: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's an honour to rise to speak on Bill 205, introduced by the Member for Calgary-North West. It has actually been really incredible to see all of the stories and all of the people that have come together to try to tackle and put things in place so we can address the really broad issues faced by the communities that have disabilities. I've already spoken to this bill once before, talking about the difficulties if you add socioeconomic status into the mix or if you add the fact that maybe you're a recent immigrant and the struggles that you can experience with those things.

But I think that today it's also just important to know that even within organizations that we have that advocate for different groups, it's important to make sure that we make spaces for all those voices, that one doesn't trump the others. I think the member that spoke before me, Edmonton-Ellerslie, was speaking about a group of parents that got together, and the reason that they formed their own organization versus just joining one that already existed – I mean, there's Autism Alberta, there's the advocate for communities with disabilities, there's a whole group of people. I think the diversity in organizations is because the experiences differ and the points of view differ as to how best to address the issues. I think that these are legitimate conversations to have because there are a multitude of approaches to address any given situation, and I think that having that diversity and discourse and having the diversity in organizations are completely important to finding solutions that serve as many people as possible.

I think that what we have by introducing an advocate within the ministry is that what we're really focusing on is actually just listening to the ways that we can make those initial changes and be able to not have to – like, we're still working within the parameters of a limited budget. We've supported very small increases within Community and Social Services, and that means that there's a limit to the amount of funds that would be able to address any issues that come up.

When we're putting an initial process in place, it's important to make sure that we don't go to what was referred to by the Member for St. Albert as a Cadillac – don't start off with a Cadillac, like, when a Honda Civic will do – in the sense that if we just get in and we start driving and start addressing some of the initial speed bumps and barriers, we start building something, and we are able to direct the money where it's most effective and where it impacts people the most.

You know, I think it's actually wonderful to have reports that point us in the direction, but I believe a lot of work has already been done on this matter. I believe that there's a fundamental understanding that there are some processes within how you have to apply for funding, within how you get services in schools, that there are discrepancies and some things that can be easily fixed and some things that are much more complex. That's where the reports are really helpful.

But there's some kind of lower hanging fruit that really changes people's everyday experiences in accessing those services that we can address, and we can direct the funds to where people feel it the most. I think it is important within a government to evaluate where you can do those things and how you can improve those systems.

Some of them don't even take money. It just takes rewriting a form. I mean, that might be simple to one person, but being able to submit a form that actually gets you the result that you were looking for is actually something that has been documented as a system of oppression, just a systemized way to reduce the number of applications that get approved by making a form complicated. It's something that is largely experienced by people that are searching for supports and services. Instead of actually getting the services, they spend more time figuring out how to access them. Reducing that and being able to look at those issues and being able to find solutions are some things I believe the advocate can really provide advice to the minister on and provide advice to the departments as well to be able to implement them successfully.

I know that it is an absolutely difficult undertaking to be an advocate because there's an incredibly complex intersection of needs that comes. When I say "intersection," I mean that there are different experiences based on socioeconomic status, race, ethnicity, and on the level of severity of the disability, and based on that, you might be more or less successful. I think that when an advocate has to listen to all of the different stories, they have to try to find the places where people are really experiencing the higher number of difficulties.

I'm very proud that this bill was brought forward and that what we're doing is really looking for a way to fix what hasn't been addressed for many decades. I think there have been attempts to fix some of those things, and I think those things should be acknowledged. But acknowledge as well that in order to truly be able to move forward, the voices of the very people that are affected need to be there, need to be a part of the conversation.

I know that the members opposite were saying that not enough people are talked to, but I really believe that having an advocate will actually allow those conversations to exist. By not having an advocate, there are all of these different avenues and ministries that could be affected. It could be the ministries of Health, Education, Children's Services, or Community and Social Services. They're all getting dispersed, and because of the complex nature of each of those ministries maybe the discussion between them hasn't been as frequent as it may need to be. Having one person where it could be directed to means that all of those issues are being – the bigger picture is being seen by one person, at least. I think there's something incredibly powerful about putting something in place like that.

I appreciate the comments that are made and all of the organizations that continue to advocate, and I think they should continue to advocate even more. I don't think that the government should ever stop working for people. I think that as we grow as a society, as an aging population, the needs change, and I think that part of government is actually progressing with your society and making sure that things that are supporting the community are still current.

I think that actually part of the issue of what happened with the former government was that they didn't change the policies. Year after year we saw labour laws that weren't introduced for a long period of time, and those things end up affecting people. They end up affecting even people within the disability community. When you think about employment standards and you think about the laws that were put in place there, not being able to take compassionate care leave or a stress leave, because maybe you just found out that your world has been turned around and you have to figure out all of these different things, creates a lot of stress in your life. Having to meet with doctors all the time and being uncertain create a lot of stress. Not being able to have job protection when you have stress leave contributes to the issues that are faced within the community. It might not be directed to the person with a disability, but it might be to someone that is supporting them.

I think what happens when we don't evaluate how laws affect other people is that the laws become wrong. They are wrong, and they're not serving people. It is incumbent upon governments to make sure that they are looking at these, reviewing them, and not just to have a review. I think there have been lots of situations where the former government actually did a review. They've done reviews of the labour code and the employment standards, and they did a five-week review, and all of a sudden nothing happened. The reviews happened, and nothing happened. Nothing was changed. It was just too complicated, too complex. They just didn't want to maybe anger some people: we're just not going to touch it.

The thing is that the lack of integrity in being able to address issues and being able to come to compromises and to look for solutions is part of the problem and is part of what contributes to these laws remaining inadequate for the people that they're meant to serve. Laws are put in place to protect people. I think that that's something we need to continuously work on.

I'm incredibly proud to support and to be supporting this bill, and I'm incredibly proud of the work that has been done across the board on this. I know that there's going to be so much more work ahead of us, and I know that we will be committed to coming to the table and having those conversations again and again and disagreeing some days and then coming to the table and finding other solutions and then finding a way for us to move forward.

I think, Madam Speaker, that with that, I will conclude my statements and put my wholehearted support in supporting this bill.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any further speakers to the bill?

The hon. Member for Calgary-North West to close debate.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I want to thank everyone who took the time over the last number of days to talk about Bill 205 and to talk about the idea of what an advocate for people with disabilities can do. I want to thank this government for taking a private member's bill and turning it into a government bill. For those folks who are watching via the Internet – and I know that a lot of folks are – what that enabled us to do was to take a bill that we would normally have discussed one day a week and to discuss it on multiple days. At the end of the day, what that also did was to enable us to take a private member's bill that might not have gone through all its stages before the Legislature broke for the summer and to stand up day after day and to give members from all sides the opportunity to talk about it and what it means to them.

I want to address something I think it was the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre said earlier. His criticism was that we had moved it to a government bill without talking about it, and I thought – it struck me as odd because the very act of moving it from a private member's bill to a government bill enabled everyone to have the opportunity to speak to it. I would have liked to have seen more people in opposition speak to it, but, you know, I mean, it's not up to me to determine their priorities.

What I can say is that lots of people spoke to this bill. The support was wonderful. I am very hopeful that we continue this discussion because getting the position of an advocate is one step; moving a person into that job and having them do the work is another mountain to climb. Really, I think what we've seen here is a lot of great discussion about a very important subject, and I thank everyone who contributed to it.

Thank you.

Bill 14

An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to move third reading of Bill 14, An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation.

I'm proud of this bill, Madam Speaker. It is the product of months of work on this side of the House and within the Ministry of Energy to bring forward a plan that will significantly reduce the inventory of orphan wells in this province, and I'm gratified to see that it appears to have received support on all sides of this House and that members are prepared to move quickly to pass this bill and enable important work to begin.

As members know, Bill 14 will amend the Oil and Gas Conservation Act to enable the government to provide the Orphan Well Association with a loan and to allow the Orphan Well Association to use funds from the orphan well fund levy imposed on industry to pay it back. I think it's worth while spending a few moments to clarify some of the details of just how that will work, particularly in light of important questions that have been raised during the debate on this bill. Many of them are the same questions that our government considered as we deliberated the best way to take advantage of the $30 million allocated in the federal budget.

First, this government takes the principle of polluter pay very seriously, as do the vast majority of Albertans. I'm sure that members on all sides of the House have heard this from constituents who want to ensure that industry lives up to its obligations to pay the costs of cleaning up orphan wells and not the provincial taxpayers. Madam Speaker, I am pleased to confirm that Bill 14 will respect this principle. The $30 million allocated by the federal government in its recent budget will be used to pay any interest incurred by the provincial government in providing this loan. No provincial government funds will be required to pay the interest on this loan. The $235 million loan figure was chosen with that consideration foremost in our mind, and the loan will be repaid by industry through the orphan fund levy imposed on industry.

Second, this government believes very strongly that decisions about which wells should be rehabilitated first should be made on the basis of greatest need. Resources should not be allocated based on political considerations. They should be allocated based on which wells pose the greatest immediate risk to communities, to public health, to safety, and to our environment.

Madam Speaker, the Orphan Well Association, or OWA, was established precisely for this purpose. The OWA is a delegated administrative authority, meaning that it operates at arm's length from government. More than 80 per cent of its board members are chosen by industry: three members from the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers, or CAPP; two members from the Explorers and Producers Association of Canada, or EPAC. The vice-president of the Alberta Energy Regulator's closure and liability branch is the only voting member of this board who is chosen by a public body.

Similarly, the OWA is funded by industry through an annual orphan fund levy charged to industry by the Alberta Energy Regulator. The orphan fund levy is distributed amongst industry licensees according to their proportionate share of the total liability of the industry. In other words, the bigger your share of the active licences in Alberta, the more you pay. Bill 14 will allow the OWA to use some of the annual proceeds from that industry levy to repay the loan, thereby preserving the principle of polluter pay.

If we receive the support of this House and pass this bill, we will work quickly to finalize the terms of the loan agreement. The government is planning to have the loan fully repaid within 10 years, and the first repayment is planned for 2019-2020. Again, Madam Speaker, I want to underscore this point. The loan will be repaid by industry through the orphan fund levy. This government is ensuring that industry lives up to its responsibilities.

The OWA selects for rehabilitation based on its professional, risk-based assessment. I expect that if there are a number of orphan wells in a given area, some projects may be grouped together because it makes more economical sense to do that, but overall risk is the main factor in determining which wells will be cleaned up first. The OWA does have procurement principles that apply to the selection of contractors to undertake this work. The contractors are selected by the OWA, not by government.

If I might add, Madam Speaker, that I got calls in my constituency office immediately after this bill was announced, and I expect others would have. I would direct you to orphanwell.ca. There's a link there for people who wish to register for contract work.

The OWA will also be responsible for determining what additional staff resources they may need internally in order to manage this accelerated program. The government is planning to issue the loan in stages over a three-year period to allow the OWA to ramp up and maximize the benefits of these additional funds. The OWA publishes an annual report detailing its work over the previous year, including which wells were rehabilitated and at what cost. If you look at page 17 of the 2015-16 OWA annual report, for example, you will see that abandonment work was completed on 80 wells formerly licensed to Fairwest Energy Corporation in southeast central Alberta at an average cost of just under $37,000 each.

Madam Speaker, I believe Albertans will receive a full and detailed accounting of just how these funds are being spent by the OWA, and for greater certainty my department is working on performance measures to help government evaluate the effectiveness of this program.

Third, the OWA will continue to have the option of selling productive orphan wells to interested buyers. Those decisions should of course be made in consultation with the affected landowners, who may have strong views on whether they wish production to continue on their property. I'm sure members on all sides of this House would agree that it is important for landowners to have a vote in this process.

Fourth, I want to underscore the benefits to our energy economy in ramping up this work at this time. There are many skilled workers in the oil field services sector, Madam Speaker. Those workers possess valuable skills, expertise that we will need as our energy economy recovers. Moreover, as long as there is drilling activity in our province, we will need workers with the necessary skills to one day shut in those wells, to undertake the necessary work to decommission those wells and remediate and ultimately reclaim those sites. If we want those workers to be here in the years to come, we need them now. We need to keep them here through the downturn, and I'm very pleased that this bill will allow us to do precisely that.

In conclusion, I'm gratified by the support this bill has already received. It is an important initiative for our province. It will accelerate the cleanup of orphan and gas well sites; it will protect communities, public health, safety, and our environment; it will create good jobs at a time when our energy economy is still emerging from the downturn caused by an unprecedented drop in the price of oil; it will keep skilled workers in our province; and it will ensure that industry lives up to its responsibilities to Albertans.

Madam Speaker, I'm proud to move third reading of this bill, and I look forward to its passage so we can get on with the important work it enables. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I will be keeping my closing remarks brief. We are not thrilled that the $30 million coming from Ottawa is taxpayer funded, taxpayer money. Our industry knows that they have the obligation to clean up. They believe in and they follow the polluter-pay model, and taking taxpayer money for regular orphan wells is, of course, a violation of that model.

However, I am supporting this bill in spite of this flaw because the reality is that the federal government does have an obligation to help with reclamation costs from a time when responsibility for wells was federal. The federal money that was given in the 2017 budget should be focused on reclaiming these legacy infrastructure wells from the period before industry and the province shifted to the industry reclamation model. Because the federal government does owe money to Alberta's oil and gas reclamation system from a time when the federal government failed to take reclamation seriously, Alberta's industry can reasonably accept this contribution. We as Official Opposition will support them in that request.

Industry, however, should not come to expect Albertans to take on the responsibility of cleaning up the mess that industry makes, and with that in mind, I was glad to hear the minister talk about a 10-year time limit on the fact that this has to be restored and the taxpayers' liability reduced. I have no reason to think our world-class energy sector will expect the taxpayer to clean up after them. Industry needs to fulfill its obligation to repay this loan, not the Alberta taxpayer.

Madam Speaker, I will be voting in support of this bill. Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm happy to rise to speak in support of Bill 14, An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation. I thought it might be a good time to just revisit what an orphan well is. I know it's been spoken about before, but it certainly bears repeating. From the Orphan Well Association website:

In the upstream oil and gas industry, an orphan is a well, pipeline, facility or associated site which has been investigated and confirmed as not having any legally responsible and/or financially able party to deal with its abandonment and reclamation responsibilities.

We may see an abandoned well, but what we don't see is the farmer who isn't farming the land, the small businesses that aren't spending their money, the children that aren't getting to do as many activities as they could if that land was being farmed. Here's what else we aren't seeing. We aren't seeing the risk posed by unremediated or unrehabilitated wells, the risks to the environment, to safety, and to public health.

I worked in oil and gas for over 20 years, and I was fortunate to work for companies that took their responsibility seriously and developed their assets with rehabilitation and remediation in mind. It's something that's built into the business case for any well by a responsible exploration company. Currently the orphan well levy collected by the Alberta Energy Regulator goes into a fund that's administered by the Orphan Well Association. This was a fair-weather structure that wasn't designed for the more challenging times we're facing now.

What happens if we don't do anything? Well, the number of orphan wells will continue to increase. There are currently over 2,000 orphan wells on the books with the Orphan Well Association. This is more than double the number of wells that they were dealing with last year. The rate of orphan wells has definitely accelerated.

As Brad Herald, chair of the OWA, was recently quoted: "We think it's critical to open the dialogue with Albertans and jointly develop a framework that improves the management of unproductive upstream oil and natural gas assets." This bill is an integral part of the process of remediation, reclamation, and rehabilitation of orphan wells.

We have a couple of options to address the issue of orphan wells. We can do nothing. We can stick our heads in the sand and be immobilized by how large the problem is. We would be letting down the people who own these lands, and we'd be letting down future generations. It's their environment that's being compromised. Or we can leverage the $30 million federal funding to address the backlog while also creating good jobs for Albertans, the many skilled Albertans who have a great deal of experience in oil and gas operations and who can help address this very large problem.

The Energy ministry and this government recognize the scope and the seriousness of the issue. They've worked closely with industry, who raised the issue, and our government listened. Some of the best parts of Bill 14 include the liability management review. It's obvious the process that's been in place isn't robust enough to address this growing problem. The review will include industry experts to find better ways to protect Albertans and the environment. The review won't be one-sided because it's important that it's not. It's also important to engage people who normally don't agree on an issue and encourage them to work together to find common ground. This is certainly an improvement over simply engaging people who agree, as the government has been urged to do with other files. Without this legislation, without taking advantage of this funding, we will continue to see the problem grow.

The president of the AAMDC, Al Kemmere, recently stated: "Rural landowners and municipal districts have many concerns surrounding this issue. We're pleased to see [the] government is beginning its review and look forward to learning more about how we can address it."

This is timely and important legislation. Alberta has long relied on energy and agriculture to drive the economy of our province. This bill will ensure a brighter future for both industries, and for that reason, Madam Speaker, I encourage all members to support this bill.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any members wishing to speak to third reading? The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Rosendahl: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today to talk to Bill 14, An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation. We know that Albertans are concerned about the growing problem of orphan and aging oil and gas wells in many constituencies throughout the province. Many landowners, municipalities, other stakeholders, indigenous groups are concerned about the impact that these have, and they deserve a government that has their backs. That's why we're leveraging the $30 million federal assistance into a significant loan so that the Orphan Well Association can address the significant backlog of facilities needing attention while maintaining the polluter-pay principle. It's important that we maintain that.

When we look at the definition, as I explained before, it goes beyond, that orphan wells are wells, facilities, or pipelines where the original owner or licensee is not capable of paying for the required closure processes. This includes the many miles of pipe that we know exist out there: infrastructure, roads, well sites, office sites, and old camps that exist everywhere out there on the land base. These are the things that certainly need to be addressed when we're talking about the issue of orphan wells and those kinds of things.

The Orphan Well Association, or the OWA – let's be clear – is a not-for-profit organization funded by the oil and gas industry through the orphan fund levy. It's important to remember that concept. It is run by an independent board of directors and has done a lot of good work over the years. It was stated by the minister about the reports that you can access. It is not connected to the government. They decide which contractors get the work, not the government. It's important to remember that basic fact.

The government of Alberta has regulatory tools, for example, and other legal remedies to require the individual companies to pay the industry levy, so it's important to understand that.

My constituents tell me all the time that the industry is not living up to its responsibility to clean up the abandoned oil and well sites all throughout the constituency, and it's important that that needs to be addressed. We agree that it's important to escalate the important work of cleaning these up to minimize the environmental risks that exist out there. The other part of it is to keep skilled oil field workers working in this economic downturn. It's important to understand that this process is important to do that. But if you look at why we got ourselves into the mess in the first place, it was that fact that the previous government failed to address it over the years.

Albertans won't pay the cost of providing this loan. Instead, they'll enjoy the benefit it brings. The loan would mean employment benefits of 1,650 jobs over three years that will be created in the oil field and environmental service sectors, keeping those industry jobs in Alberta, which is so important. This will allow important work to happen quickly. The opportunity has knocked, and we're opening that door. In quoting the Premier of Alberta:

This is about creating jobs and fixing a long-standing problem. Albertans are concerned about the growing number of orphaned oil and gas wells, and the landowners directly impacted deserve a government that takes this issue seriously. We're proud to work with industry to get orphaned wells cleaned up – it's good for our environment, good for landowners and the jobs created will help make life better for [all] Albertans.

Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just wanted to close by thanking all the members for the very good debate, the very good questions that we got.

I did want to acknowledge – and I failed to do that in my comments – that this was an idea that we worked on with industry, and they take this problem as seriously as we do in government. I wanted to also acknowledge that the vast majority of industry does their job in reclaiming sites, but this bill is about working with those who have failed in their responsibilities.

I'm very excited for the support that we are getting on this bill, and I look forward to getting on this with important work.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 14 read a third time]

Bill 15

11:40 Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017

The Acting Speaker: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my privilege to rise today to move third reading of Bill 15, the Tax Statutes Amendment Act, 2017.

I appreciate the fruitful discussions on this bill and the general understanding of its importance. This bill makes necessary changes that not only ensure our tax legislation remains aligned with federal tax legislation but also ensure support programs delivered through the tax system are administered as consistently and efficiently as possible.

Madam Speaker, I'll quickly recap the amendments. The Alberta Corporate Tax Act. We're updating this act to reflect changes that were made to the federal Income Tax Act. This will protect provincial revenue and the integrity of our tax system by preventing a few small businesses from using certain structures to multiply their access to the small-business tax rate. The intent of the existing legislation is for the preferential rate to only apply to a small business's first $500,000 of income. These amendments are consistent with the intent and ensure small businesses do not take advantage of a loophole.

The act will also be amended to require tax preparers who fill out 10 or more provincial tax returns to file the returns electronically. It will also implement a penalty if they fail to comply with this requirement. A separate penalty will be implemented for corporations that fail to file tax returns electronically if required to do so. These penalty provisions are consistent with federal tax legislation and are necessary to promote compliance with Alberta's tax laws. Electronic filing also reduces administration and compliance costs for both government and businesses, Madam Speaker.

With regard to the Tourism Levy Act an amendment to the Tourism Levy Act will allow levy collectors, more specifically accommodation operators, to file a waiver to extend the assessment period when an assessment is issued against them. This means operators will have more time to resolve issues if there is a dispute over the amount of tax owing.

With regard to the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act on the personal income tax side we are making several changes to the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act. The most significant change relates to the carbon levy rebate payments. We're making an amendment that will allow for rebate entitlements to be delivered in quarterly payments as low as $25 rather than the current $100 minimum payment. With this change, the program will no longer have to prepay rebates. Prepaying rebates for up to six months resulted in recoveries when household compositions changed or people moved away from this province. This will ensure that going forward, carbon levy rebate payments do not have to be recovered when changes in household status affect eligibility for that rebate.

Madam Speaker, this directly addresses the concern we heard from Albertans who received a reassessment notice from the Canada Revenue Agency seeking to recover rebate amounts received by a family member who had died. In order to rectify the situation for those who received these notices, we are also taking measures to forgive these amounts. Families in these circumstances do not have to return rebate payments, and those who already have will be reimbursed later this year. The same will apply to benefits received under the Alberta child benefit and the Alberta family employment tax credit going back to January 1 of this year.

We're also amending the Alberta Personal Income Tax Act to implement a broader political contributions tax credit, as announced in Budget 2017. The objective of that is to encourage greater participation in the political process while fostering a healthy and competitive political environment. Additional technical amendments to this act will ensure Alberta's policies with regard to provincial dividend tax credits as well as our tuition and education tax credits are not affected by recent changes to federal legislation.

In closing, Madam Speaker, this legislation is just another example of how this government is working to make life better for all Albertans by protecting the integrity of our tax system and by helping families keep more money in their pockets.

I request that all members of this House support this bill so that we can move forward with implementing these important changes. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Strathmore-Brooks.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Now, with the government filibustering their own bills lately, you'd think that, at the very least, they could provide a bit more information about some of the effects that this bill will have. When I first spoke to this bill, at second reading, I asked the minister for information that would assist this side of the House in making an informed decision. I wanted to know the costs that would be incurred by Alberta taxpayers to issue more carbon tax rebate cheques on a quarterly basis.

I will repeat that question now in the hope that at least someone on that side of the House can provide an answer before we vote. We want to know: how many people are estimated to be affected by this change in the legislation? How many people would the Canada Revenue Agency try and claw back the rebates from in the instance of a death in the family? If the number is low, it may be cheaper for the government to simply eat the cost of a $25 or $50 cheque instead. This bill will instead pay for almost 30 per cent more cheques to be issued every year. If the government would be willing to provide the administrative costs of this expanded endeavour, that would at least allow us to make a more informed decision before we vote.

But so far, at least, instead of providing us with this information, the government has decided to rag the puck on bills that have the unanimous support of all parties in this House. If the cost of administering and mailing out almost 30 per cent more cheques a year is a larger cost than forgiving the $25 or $50 rebates of those who have passed away, then we need to determine if this portion of the bill should be changed or not. We as stewards of the province's finances should choose the most prudent and cost-effective way to operate. That's what this government does not yet seem to understand. They're not watching their pennies or, for that matter, their nickels, their dimes, their quarters, their loonies, their millions or billions.

A few extra envelopes, a few extra postage stamps, a few extra hours spent administering the carbon tax rebate will add up as a real cost to taxpayers. Let's say that the cost of this expanded carbon tax rebate costs only 1 per cent of the total rebate program. That would be over $100,000 in additional costs to taxpayers. I'm quite sure that we would not have to cover that much money if we were to cover the costs of just a few $25 or $50 rebate cheques when someone passes away.

Yet the government does not view finances this way. The Minister of Finance said that he would keep spending in the budget to inflation plus population, yet he's increased – he's increased – the budget of his own ministry by three times that amount. They've excluded the entire cost of the CLAP from the budget as a way of trying to fool Albertans into believing that they've kept spending below the rates of inflation and population, yet this is a spending increase that will add up to $5 billion a year, and they won't even address it as a part of the main set of books in the budget. It's just one more example of how this government is overlooking smaller costs, allowing them to pile on yet more debt.

When we proposed savings of $293 million by reducing regulations, it was no shock that the NDP refused to even consider the idea. By streamlining our government, we can save hundreds of millions of dollars. It means reducing the work when it is not needed. Are the administrative hours needed for almost 30 per cent more rebate cheques to be sent out, or is there a cheaper way to solve the problem? Is it cheaper to let a widow or a grandchild or a child just keep the $25 or $50 cheque when it's sent in error? This is a textbook example of regulatory overreach increasing the cost of government. We need to be watching our pennies. It's necessary to pay for almost 30 per cent more stamps and envelopes to send these rebate cheques.

Perhaps it's not, but the government has thus far refused to provide these numbers to make a more informed decision. Frankly, the private members on the government side of the House should be asking this information of their cabinet. Their job is not just to sit there and vote for whatever is put in front of them. Their job is to also ask questions of their own ministers, to get more information, to make an informed choice themselves, not to be mere voting machines for a government. Perhaps that is a too optimistic view to take of how this government would work, however. This government refuses to provide these numbers and allow members of this House, at least on this side, to make an informed decision. We know that this government has these numbers, or at least we hope that they would have these numbers.

This all began because a constituent of mine from Strathmore brought this issue forward. She works in an office right near the A&W, actually, beside my office. I know her quite well, Darlene. She brought this forward, and we would probably not be debating it right now if she had not.

Darlene's grandmother had passed away, and she was the first person to vocalize her opposition to this government's incompetence in the carbon tax rebate system. She was asked by this government to return her deceased grandmother's carbon tax rebate cheque, an absolutely disgusting act on the part of a government that couldn't have the foresight to think: what would happen if cheques were issued to deceased people? Now, those deceased people will have actually been paying the carbon tax, but apparently the estate of that family is not entitled to the rebate for that. So this government, without thinking ahead, asked for the money back from her. She came to my office, and she came to some of our local papers like the Strathmore Standard and the Strathmore Times, and soon enough it became a big issue.

You know, yesterday I had a school group visiting from the Brentwood elementary school in Strathmore. You know, we were doing some questions and answers, and one of the students asked me, "How many people have to complain before the government changes something?" I said: "Oh, that's actually a very interesting question. It really depends."

The examples I gave him were two contrasting examples. Yesterday, members might recall, I had a rather large box of petitions on my desk. They were not a prop, Madam Speaker; they were petitions. They were petitions from people in Strathmore-Brooks against the carbon tax, thousands of petitions from constituents of mine who do not want the carbon tax. Albertans are overwhelmingly against the carbon tax, but the government refuses to listen. I told the student: "Sometimes that's just the way it is. You can beat the government with facts. You can have overwhelming public sentiment on your side. Sometimes they just won't listen. The only way to deal with that is to defeat them, and that's what we're going to do."

But, on the other side, sometimes one person makes a difference, just one person. In this case Darlene made a difference. Darlene spoke up, and she just had one case. It wasn't a petition; it was just her case. She spoke up, and she caught the attention of Albertans across the province and, frankly, a lot of people across the country because people saw how unjust and ridiculous it was for the NDP to be demanding carbon tax rebates back from deceased family members. So I told the student who was here, who actually will be joining us for question period later today: "You know, sometimes you can have thousands of people on your side, and it won't make a difference. The government won't listen. But sometimes one voice can make a difference, and Darlene made a difference here."

Her case, I think, became the impetus for this change. While it certainly shouldn't have happened to begin with, we'll give credit where credit is due. Governments make mistakes, and if governments recognize those mistakes, take responsibility, and change them, we should commend that. So I commend the Minister of Finance for listening on this issue and fixing what needed to be changed.

Now, my constituents voted for me because they wanted to get back to balanced budgets. They didn't want more debt, they didn't want more spending, and they didn't want more regulations. When Darlene came to me about the Canada Revenue Agency clawing back her deceased grandmother's carbon tax rebate money, she wanted action. She wanted to protect her finances. She was watching every penny, and she expects her government to do the same. I know that she would not want us to spend a thousand times more than her rebate cheque to solve a problem that could potentially be fixed by this government simply allowing folks to keep the money. Again, we need more information to make an informed decision here.

The entire carbon tax, though, has been a mess from the very start. Albertans are overwhelmingly opposed to it. Even the majority of people who voted for the NDP are now against it. The NDP did not run on a carbon tax. They have no democratic mandate for it. They are making the carbon tax potentially even more expensive to administer now. The NDP refuses to disclose the information that we've requested. It's very simple information, and if the government would simply put it on the table and if it matches up to show that it is the most cost-effective way forward, we would be very happy to support that.

Now, the only instance of a member being close to giving us the information was my very good friend from Calgary-Currie. He hates it when I do this, but my very good friend from Calgary-Currie said:

Now, of course, administrative costs will be higher with more payments being issued, but we in the ministry don't expect the increase to be significant, Madam Chair, and even with the change we estimate the cost of administering the rebate to remain below $10 million annually.

We'll take him at his word that the cost of issuing 30 per cent more cheques will remain under $10 million.

That is almost the same cost as the request by the Newell Foundation in my constituency to integrate the Bassano hospital with the Bassano seniors' care project. Instead of important projects in this province, the government would rather spend it on a failed attempt at some elusive social licence, which, as the great Canadian prophet Rex Murphy said, is never meant to be given when granted. He's a sort of John the Baptist of pipelines, if you will.

This government has decided that it will tax Albertans for the privilege of driving their cars and heating their homes. Then the NDP will spend another $10 million a year to mail back cheques to those they have just taxed for that privilege. The government is taking money away from Albertans and charging them just to mail it back to them, and now they want to charge Albertans potentially even more to administer it because they couldn't figure out how not to rip off families who have deceased ones.

If this is the most cost-effective way to stop the Canada Revenue Agency from clawing back dead family members' money, then I'll support the bill, but I hope that they have learned an important lesson from this and that they do not repeat this kind of bureaucratic bungling moving forward in the future.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak?

The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance to close debate.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you. I just wish to say that I appreciate my cosponsors, who were here in the House when I couldn't be here. It seems clear that the bill is needed at this time to redress some important things that we found out as a result of bringing in an important rebate for families, which will be a total of $410 million in 2017-18. Madam Speaker, that is good news.

It's clear that our friend across the floor has no intention of supporting this bill, so I don't really think we need to wait too much longer before we vote. I hope that all members of this House can support it.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 15 read a third time]

The Acting Speaker: The Assembly will stand adjourned until 1:30 this afternoon.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, May 24, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise to introduce to you and to this Assembly a distinguished visitor, the consul of Mexico for Alberta, Mrs. Cecilia Villanueva Bracho. The consul has served in this post since 2014 and will soon be assuming new duties for the government of Mexico.

Mexico is an important trading partner for Alberta and is the fourth-largest customer for Alberta exports, at nearly $1 billion in 2016. We support this important relationship through the Alberta Mexico office. Mexico is also one of our most popular holiday destinations for Albertans, where they enjoy the warm hospitality of the Mexican people and enriching cultural experiences. Mr. Speaker, I'm happy to say that our relationship with Mexico is growing. For example, our province and the Mexican state of Jalisco share a collaborative agreement on commercializing technology, an agreement that is creating opportunities in both jurisdictions. We also share ties between our postsecondary institutions, including a collaborative sustainable energy project at the University of Calgary funded with $46 million from the Mexican Ministry of Energy.

I'd also like to mention that during the wildfires in the Wood Buffalo region Mexican firefighters joined with our first responders, putting themselves in harm's way to protect Albertans. I join with all Albertans to thank them for their service.

It is my honour to say on behalf of our government thank you to Consul Villanueva for her work to build our relationship with Mexico. We appreciate the global experience you brought to your posting in Alberta and the stronger connections you helped to create between Alberta and Mexico. I now ask the consul to rise and accept the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Strathmore-Brooks.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure today to introduce to you and all members of the Assembly students, teachers, and chaperones from Brentwood elementary in Strathmore. They won a contest on CTV to be special guests here today. They've been here for several days, learning about our parliamentary and democratic institutions, and they've been having a great time. They submitted a bunch of written questions to me in advance. Most of them were very technical and parliamentary questions, but one question in particular stood out. A student asked me if it was possible to outlaw homework. While I explained that it is theoretically possible to outlaw homework, it would also be a great lesson in the law of unintended consequences. I want to ask that they rise as I call their names: their teacher, Mrs. Amy White; parents Krista, Jay, Donalda, and Ben; and all the students from Brentwood elementary, who it's been my real pleasure to have here today. I believe there's probably a future Prime Minister up there. Let's give them a hand.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Thank you, hon. member. I hope they listen carefully to you.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise in the House today to introduce to you and through you the students of grade 6, accompanied by their teachers, Jill Morgan and Michael Steinberg, from Calgary Jewish Academy in the great constituency of Calgary-Glenmore. They're highly engaged students, and I've enjoyed my conversations with them about politics. I wish them all the very best, and I would ask them to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-St. Albert.

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly 32 students from Woodhaven middle school, a school that recently hosted both the Premier and the Minister of Education. The students are accompanied by their teachers, Ms Sarah Cresswell and Ms Helen Kinnee, and their chaperones, Bethany Adair, Trina Merkel, Darlene Taylor, Heather Kleckner, and Colleen Oshak. I would ask them to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. members, are there any other school groups here today?

Seeing and hearing none, the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today and introduce a guest that is seated in your gallery. You might not know it, but there is a political legend amongst us. If you're a political watcher of the Maritimes, in particular P.E.I., you know this man. He is Ronnie MacKinley. He has enjoyed a long political career. He was first elected in the riding he represented in 1985, long before some members of this Assembly were even born, and he served continuously in that role until 2015, over 30 years.

In the year 2000 in the provincial election the Liberals in P.E.I. had a little bit of a setback. In fact, he was the only member of the opposition that was elected as a member of the Liberal Party at the time. As a result, he served as the Leader of the Opposition, the de facto leader of the Liberal Party until 2003, when he was then replaced by Robert Ghiz, who would become the Premier. MacKinley served, as you can imagine, as the opposition critic for Transportation and Public Works, Agriculture, Forestry, Fisheries and Aquaculture, and he was the chairman of the Public Accounts Committee. Perhaps our colleague from Calgary-Mountain View knows a little bit about what it is to be all of those things. On June 12, 2007, MacKinley assumed the office of the Minister of Transportation and Public Works, where he served in the Robert Ghiz cabinet. More importantly than all of those things, he is one heck of a good guy, and he is joined by perhaps the person responsible for all of his success, his wife, Ann. I invite them to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome. It's not often that we get an opportunity to have visitors from the east coast, and it's even less often that we would have the hon. Opposition House Leader be so kind to a Liberal.

The Minister of Labour and minister responsible for democratic renewal.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly Amanda

Jensen as well as her son Jake, who's seven, and Ben, who's 14. When Jake was diagnosed with cancer, Amanda requested leave from work to care for him like any mother would. However, Amanda did not meet the qualification period for job-protected compassionate care leave, and Alberta does not have job protection for leave to care for a critically ill child. As a result, she was terminated from her workplace. Our laws are wrong in this, and they failed this family. No parent should have to face the stress of losing their job on top of dealing with an urgent family situation. That's why I'm very pleased to introduce them today, the day that I'll be introducing legislation that will amend our laws and ensure that parents like Amanda are protected. I thank her and her family for joining us, and I ask them to rise. [Standing ovation]

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

1:40

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It gives me immense pleasure to rise today and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Luanne Whitmarsh. Luanne is the CEO of the Kerby Centre, which is located in the beautiful riding of Calgary-Buffalo. She's dedicated to enhancing the lives of seniors in her community through active living programs and social supports. Luanne has been an advocate and an activist for many years. She speaks for those who need assistance speaking for themselves and has been a tireless advocate on behalf of seniors since taking on the Kerby Centre. I have had the great pleasure of working very closely with Luanne since I was elected, and I would like her to now rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The Minister of Infrastructure and of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and to all members of this Assembly a group of brilliant students from the Nebula Academy, which is housed in the Elmwood Park neighbourhood, located within the constituency of Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood. The academy offers kindergarten through grade 5, with a focus on Turkish culture. This spring two grade 4 students from the school won a silver medal at the Edmonton Regional Science Fair. The students are accompanied by the school's director, Mr. Nedim Istemil, Acting Principal Robin Murphy, Guidance Counsellor Selda Benli, and volunteers Serif Aydin and Taryn Putinta. I would ask them to now please rise and accept the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Schreiner: Good afternoon, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of the House my guests from The Lending Cupboard. Dawna Morey joined The Lending Cupboard as executive director in 2015. She brings much experience and expertise to the table as well as a strong motivation to support individuals and families in our community. Chris Hume participates in The Lending Cupboard board of directors as secretary. Chris is committed to seeing people live with independence and dignity. I ask my guests to rise and receive the warm traditional welcome of the House.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a privilege to rise and introduce to you and through you to the members of the Assembly

Andrea Myers. Andrea grew up in the Edmonton area and is a graduate of NAIT. For the last five years she's been working as business manager for RiverWatch. She's here to hear a member's statement on that same subject today. I would ask her to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly three people attending today: my legislative assistant, Andrew Koning; his wife, Sarah Patricia Koning; and their seven-year-old daughter, Adriana, who is spending the day not at school but here at work with her father. It's always a pleasure to have families in the Legislature, of course. Of course, I'd be remiss if I didn't say how much I appreciate the good work that the staff does for the Wildrose caucus, in particular Andrew. I also have to point out how much the spouses and the families of the people that work with us sacrifice to have their spouses here working with us all these crazy hours. If we could give them the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly, that'd be great, and if they can stand.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. Minister of Labour, I believe you had another introduction.

Ms Gray: Yes. Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly Ken Kobly, the president and CEO of the Alberta Chambers of Commerce. As an advocate for Alberta business the Alberta Chambers of Commerce is a local resource, bringing together chambers and business owners from across the province to champion new ideas and solutions. The Alberta Chambers of Commerce is also very supportive of the proposed Energy East project, which will boost our economy and help Alberta reach new markets. I'd like to thank Mr. Kobly for all his contributions to this government's consultations, and I'd ask him to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Thank you. Hon. member, you may not know it, but the guest today is from the best city in the province of Alberta, Medicine Hat.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Employment and Labour Code Legislation

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The NDP government has said precious little about its plan to uproot years of labour peace and impose sweeping labour changes on Alberta. Now, no one disagrees with the spirit of ideas like allowing workers to take time off to attend to sick or dying loved ones, but the opposition has asked many meaningful questions about union certification, collective bargaining, and specific rumours that this government plans on scrapping secret ballots, a move that could expose workers to bullying and intimidation in the workplace. The minister has only fuelled these concerns by discussing off-topic employment standards and making silly references to '80s pop songs in response to direct questions on these topics. These issues are serious, and this government failed in its duty by avoiding them.

The NDP also failed to properly consult, which is par for the course from the government that walked blindly into the Bill 6 disaster with its government-knows-best ideology. Only four in-person, invitation-only consultations were held. Not surprisingly, certain big union bosses were always present while certain business advocates were barely involved. Even more worrisome is the thought that this government could be taking its cues from its union boss friends, who have been wanting to scrap secret ballots for years and who have very close relationships with members of this government.

Not only could these changes negatively affect workers, but they could destabilize our economy even further by discouraging even more investment in our province. It's ironic that the NDP claim to be on the side of workers when its policies have led to a record number of Albertans collecting unemployment insurance and more than 84,000 good, full-time jobs being lost.

Today we will find out exactly what this insular NDP government has in store for Albertans, but right now all signs point to the fix being in on this legislation.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Wild Mountain Music Festival

Mr. Rosendahl: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to speak about an exciting music festival taking place in my constituency this summer. The Wild Mountain Music Festival runs July 14 to 16 at the historic Entrance Ranch just off highway 40. This year's lineup includes an impressive array of Juno award winners and nominees as well as local up-and-coming groups and artists from Alberta and across Canada: 54-40, David Wilcox, the Sadies, Big Sugar, the Jerry Cans, Matt Andersen, and crowd favourite Digging Roots will join many other exciting entertainers.

Rustic camping is included with every weekend pass, so bring everything you need. There's plenty of room. This family-friendly event includes performers, activities for children, and for adults the impressive beer tent has a great view of both performance stages. Shuttles operate from three pickup and drop-off spots in Hinton to the festival site starting prior to the music and running well after so that you don't miss out on any of the fun.

Started in 2007, this 100 per cent community-owned and volunteer-run music festival has relied on sponsors to grow into one of this province's most important artistic events. This year it's expected to attract 9,000 people to our region and make a major contribution to the local economy while bringing a unique arts event to West Yellowhead.

I would like to take this opportunity to recognize the individuals and organizations who make this event possible. There are too many sponsors to mention, but I encourage everyone to check out the website for their names, to get more information. Please attend the Wild Mountain Music Festival in Hinton this July.

Thank you very much.

Pipeline Approvals

Mr. Loewen: It seems the NDP cannot resist taking credit for just about everything. This was brought to a whole new level of lunacy when the members for Calgary-Currie and Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville pronounced in the Legislature that the approval of the Keystone XL pipeline was due to — you guessed it — this government's climate leadership plan.

Now, we know the NDP have a propensity to ship supporters and their MLAs all across Canada to campaign for their anti-oil friends, but in a first for this government they appear to have sent a delegation of supporters to the United States to campaign for Donald Trump since he had promised to and did sign the Keystone XL deal.

Let's just talk about the Trans Mountain and line 3 pipelines. These are both existing lines, not new lines. One is an expansion; the other is a replacement with more volume. Now, they may have been approved under the NDP time and power, but to say that these pipelines were approved because of the NDP government is just not true. They were approved in spite of the Alberta NDP, in spite of the antipipeline activists within the NDP. If the NDP wants to take credit for them, they also have to take the blame for the cancellation of the Northern Gateway pipeline and the west coast tanker ban. Those also happened under their watch, and their mythical social licence was no help there.

This government's quiet diplomacy equals silent insolence. When the leader of the Wildrose opposition was in Ottawa, they got four approved pipelines, four major pipelines, in spite of the NDP protesting them.

Now, since the NDP has been elected, Alberta has lost over 100,000 jobs, but the NDP continue taking credit and bragging about creating new jobs. Fact: this government promised to create 100,000 jobs but can only muster 20,000 and caused 100,000 jobs to be lost. I'd say that it's a loss of 80,000 and 180,000 fewer than they promised, not something to brag about.

This government likes to take credit for every possible positive thing that happens, but the facts are that investor confidence has been crushed since they took office and that Albertans are suffering due to the poor choices this government continues to make.

There's only one question left. Will anyone over there take responsibility for the 100,000 jobs lost, the tanker ban, the cancellation of Northern Gateway, and running the economy into the ground? Take responsibility and apologize.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Employment and Labour Code Legislation

Mr. Jean: Today the NDP will introduce changes to the Employment Standards Code and the Labour Relations Code. Now, Amanda Jensen was fired from her job for seeking time off to care for her child suffering from leukemia. I spoke to Amanda yesterday and told her that I'd support changes to protect people in her situation from losing their job, but unfortunately this NDP bill is rumoured to go far beyond that. Why would the Premier want to possibly remove a worker's right to a secret ballot for union certification in this bill if all this is really about is protecting the livelihoods of people like Amanda Jensen?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms. Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, without getting into the details of the bill, which, of course, is going to be introduced today, generally speaking, it is the policy of this government to promote at long last a balanced playing field for all workers in Alberta after decades of that being in complete opposition to the work of this government. You know what? That will not only make life better for middle-class Albertans; it will also help employers, those responsible employers who do the right thing by their workers each and every day. They need to know that everybody has to play by the rules, and under our watch they will.

Mr. Jean: I know the importance of being with loved ones when they're sick. The Wildrose campaigned to extend support for those caring for loved ones, but this omnibus legislation isn't just about protecting those who need to care for loved ones. It makes sweeping changes to the labour code, and that has 90 per cent of businesses surveyed worried about their ability to keep Albertans working. That should worry this government. Why won't the government pass the protections for people seeking compassionate care and then table the rest of the changes for greater consultation with Albertans over the summer?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the member opposite is, as far as I can tell, still in consultations over whether he can actually support school lunches. However, we are not going to approach dealing with long-overdue problems being fixed that way. We are going to ensure that we promote fairness across the board in Alberta, and we are going to do it without fearmongering. We're going to do it by simply engaging in a balanced, down-the-middle kind of approach, and I'm proud of our government for doing that. It is about time.

Mr. Jean: Thirty-six days is not consultation. Four come-and-be-told meetings is not consultation, Mr. Speaker.

The NDP are trying to use compassionate care leave, which the Wildrose also supports, as cover for drastic measures to tilt the playing field in favour of the NDP's big labour friends. Eliminating a worker's right to a secret ballot for union certification has nothing whatsoever to do with protecting people like Amanda Jensen. It only puts the jobs of other Albertans at risk. Why does the Premier insist on ramming through a union-friendly omnibus bill instead of splitting the bill in half, making sense, and seeking further consultation on labour code changes with Albertans?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, it really does demonstrate quite a bit that the member opposite automatically equates unions with job killing. You know what? The fact of the matter is that unions include nurses, they include teachers, they include restaurant workers, they include police, they include middle-class Albertans across the province. In fact, those other Albertans who would like the opportunity to engage in their constitutionally protected rights in this province should be able to have those rights, and that is what our government is going to ensure happens. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, caution. It's windy outside. We don't need to be windy in here.

The second main question.

Electricity Prices

Mr. Jean: This NDP government just doesn't get how important and how significant the impact of their policy decisions are. Yesterday we saw the NDP formalize their cap on electricity prices. One problem with their scheme, Mr. Speaker: for every cent the rate goes above 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour, the taxpayers, Albertans, will be on the hook for an extra – you got it – $10 million a month. Where is this cash coming from? Well, it's coming from the funny money bank account funded by the NDP's carbon tax. Why does the Premier think it's okay to throw Albertans' hard-earned money away to compensate for her government's mistakes?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, when it comes to dealing with the challenges with our electricity system, caused, in fact, by the fact that it was on the verge of breaking as a result of the wacky system that the previous government had put in place, there's a choice. Their plan would ensure higher bills, more market volatility for Alberta families. It would ensure burning coal even though everyone knows that it's not healthy, and it would ensure ignoring expert advice about how to best transition to a stable energy market. That's not the plan that we will follow. We will protect Alberta families, we will protect stability in their bills, and we will make sure that we get off coal.

Mr. Jean: Wacky system, Mr. Speaker? Consistently the lowest energy prices in North America.

Whether the Premier likes it or not, ratepayers and taxpayers are one and the same. A subsidy on an electricity bill is going to show up on the bottom line at tax time to all Albertans. I can't decide what's worse, the NDP trying to pull the wool over Albertans' eyes or that they just don't care and are doing this move for ideology's sake no matter what Albertans think or believe. Why does the Premier respect Albertans so little that she's willing to make them pay a lot more for electricity in the name of ideology?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When it comes to making short-sighted, ideological decisions, I have to tell you that the members opposite can school us all. They are so committed to a free-market, full-market system that they would move to the Texas model of putting the electricity cap from $1,000 to $10,000 just to keep that free-market system going, and they'd just let families deal with that volatility day in and day out because that's the way the market works. That's not what Albertans voted for. That doesn't give stability to Albertans. That doesn't make their life better, but we will.

Mr. Jean: Speaking of the NDP copying other jurisdictions that fail taxpayers and citizens, Mr. Speaker, just today Ontario's budget watchdog released a report that the Liberal government's plan to lower electricity bills artificially will ultimately cost Ontarians over $21 billion. Their scheme to subsidize electricity rates is opposed by the Tories and, believe it or not, even the NDP in Ontario. Why? Well, they've seen how damaging the Liberal's electricity plan is, the same plan, by the way, that Alberta's NDP are now copying. Why won't the Premier face the facts, look out for Albertans, and cancel this NDP risky electricity plan? [interjections]

The Speaker: Stay calm, please.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'll tell you that there's one thing that the members opposite are very good at. I guess it's two, fearmongering and alternative facts. The reality is that our electricity system is nothing like the Ontario electricity system. What we've done is that we've moved to a capacity market as a result of the advice of independent experts who are leaders in their field in North America, and we are moving into a bidding process that will not create the kinds of cost overruns that you've seen in Ontario. The members opposite, one or two of them, might even understand that, but the member instead insists on making claims that people know aren't true. Albertans deserve better.

The Speaker: Third main question.

Educational Curriculum Review

Mr. Jean: Albertans don't trust the NDP government's mismanagement of the economy, and they certainly don't trust them when it comes to the current curriculum review either. Parents are sick and tired of their children being treated like guinea pigs in the classroom, and the latest survey doesn't show anything is going to change under this government. Let me be clear. This is not what parents want or asked their government to do. Will the Premier please listen to the parents of Alberta and not impose her NDP world view on our school system and our children?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that a modern, 21st-century curriculum is the key to preparing our kids for success in a fast-changing world, and that's exactly the reasons why we're engaging in this curriculum review. We are consulting across the board – with kids, with parents, with teachers, with Albertans who don't fit any of those descriptions – and we are going to as a result move forward in a way that reflects the fact that we are now in the 21st century. I appreciate that the members opposite are a little uncomfortable with that fact, but you know what? We know that what's good for Albertans is to . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Jean: Experts on the subject of curriculum review share my concerns about the current overhaul. The former director of curriculum review in Edmonton public schools has said what they believe of the Premier's modern interpretation, quote: knowledge outcomes don't figure very prominently in this curriculum. This is all about teaching opinions. It's teaching the opinion of the extreme left, an opinion of radical socialism. End quote. The Premier would be out organizing protests if extreme right or social conservative views were being pushed right now, so how on earth is the Premier letting this kind of thing happen in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, the document to which the member appears to be referring actually includes the goal, this notion of encouraging the development of "engaged citizens." Somehow they've taken that phrase and converted it to some kind of socialist plot. Now, the reality, I believe, is that all Alberta parents want their kids to grow up to be engaged citizens: to engage in critical analysis, to question alternative facts wherever they might arise, and, in fact, to engage in their province. I am very hopeful that our kids will continue to do just that.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Jean: I know the Premier doesn't talk to everyday, normal Albertans, but I do, and I hear very valid concerns right across Alberta when I talk to parents that they want to go back to the basics in our education system. They want their kids to be grounded in math, reading, and writing and to have an understanding of the world, not learning how to become social activists like some people. Will the Premier agree that she's setting up Alberta students to fail and that, in the words of the former EPSB curriculum director, this curriculum will end up with very opinionated but poorly educated students?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, again, if the member opposite had engaged in this issue to any level of detail, he would know that our government has been very focused on improving those core learning outcomes and, in particular, that we asked for and received a review of our math curriculum that is actually going to be very much focused on improving the way we teach math and ensuring that the focus on math actually gets better in our schools. Indeed, at the time a lot of people that you wouldn't expect to agree actually did agree on the direction that we're moving forward in. Being an engaged citizen doesn't negate understanding math and doesn't negate knowing . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

The hon. leader of the third party.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Let's see if we can get a better answer from the Education minister.

The proposed rewrite of the social studies curriculum is a travesty that could be foisted upon Alberta students. The NDP world view guidelines are pushing social change and not the usual focus on history. It seeks to turn students into agents of change. If students are not grounded in the fundamentals of where we came from, how can they be equipped to steer us where we're going to go in the future? To the Minister of Education: why are you downplaying the value of history and feel the need to re-engineer such a vital part of the curriculum with a narrow focus . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you. I appreciate that. You know, questions like that make me realize that we need to redouble our efforts to teach these basic skills because, clearly, this member is lacking in many of those critical analysis skills that actually allow people to understand what we're doing. We're building a new curriculum, and we're doing a very good job of it. They left the curriculum for 30 years. We're getting the job done. Albertans will benefit as a result.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, indeed, it is the Education minister that needs to take a lesson. The fact is that Stuart Wachowicz, a former director of curriculum for Edmonton public schools, said that students under this system will graduate with opinions of the extreme left, of radical socialism. The government is trying to train children to fight their battles for them rather than get them ready for being successful in society. Minister, will you stop this madness? Will you actually care for children and help to prepare them through the curriculum to be successful in the world in which they must survive? [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members. [interjections] Hon. members.

The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, as a former history teacher myself and as an English teacher, no, we're not going to stop teaching history. In fact, we will redouble our efforts to ensure that students have the critical thinking skills, the rational skills, the communication skills, the math skills to make sure that they can interpret history as it moves through the past, the present, and the future. We know that it's important to learn from history so that we do not repeat the mistakes of the past. We do that right here right now. We've voted a new government in because, certainly, the past was way past due.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, it's even more pathetic that the minister, a teacher, is going down this road. You know what? They're cherry-picking things on the flavour of the day, and they shouldn't do that, whether it's on the left or the right side of the political spectrum. They should be preparing kids for the future they choose and not choosing it for them. To the minister: will you stop this madness and send your officials back to change the planning documents and widen the focus instead of narrowing it on the NDP world view, which seems to be the only dogma that you will pay attention to?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, we have been working with literally thousands of Albertans building curriculum. We had 32,000 responses last time. We only started the new response this week, and we've already had 9,000 submissions. You know, it's very important to make informed decisions and to make sure that we're including what we need as 21st-century learners here in the province of Alberta. We're including such things as computer literacy, entrepreneurship, working with the oil industry, working with the forestry industry, with agriculture as well. So, you know, this sort of inflamed rhetoric, this sort of hyperbole, which is deliberate exaggeration, for anyone that needs to know . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

2:10 Domestic Violence in Airdrie

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Alberta has among the highest rates of domestic violence in the country, and 4 out of 5 victims are women. A very troubling report, released yesterday, shows that Airdrie's rate of intimate partner violence is four times higher than in the rest of the province. To the Premier: are you aware of this report, and what is your government doing to address this issue in Airdrie specifically?

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much to the member for this very important question. It is, without question, a very, very important issue. No one should live in fear for their life, for their safety, or in fear for the life and safety of their children. Our government has been working on this issue. The minister has met with a group called Airdrie POWER, a nonprofit group committed to improving supports for survivors, and they'll continue to work with them. They are also providing funding to a number of programs to address family violence in the Airdrie area, and they also now have an outreach worker through the Calgary Women's Emergency Shelter Association. But I agree that we need to do more.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.
First supplemental.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, perhaps even more troubling is the fact that Airdrie numbers are based on police-reported incidents, and we know that many instances of domestic violence go unreported. One of the challenges Airdrie faces is a lack of shelter beds. While similar-sized cities like Grande Prairie and Medicine Hat have dedicated shelters, Airdrie has no shelter at all, which means they rely entirely on overstretched services in Calgary. Again to the Premier. I know your government has made additional investments in women's shelters. Will any of this money flow to Airdrie?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As the member opposite has indicated, our government has in fact been taking long-overdue action on this issue. As he knows, we've passed legislation to make it easier for victims of domestic violence to get out of these dangerous situations, we've increased funding to FCSS by $25 million – some of that money, obviously, would have gone to Airdrie – and of course we've increased funding for women's shelters. I'm not able to answer the specific question about women's shelters in Airdrie, but I do believe he's identified a very, very important area that needs to be in focus. We actually know that these numbers have been the case for Airdrie for a very, very long time, and we need to move on it more effectively.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Even better than shelters is preventing domestic violence in the first place. HomeFront is a unique collaboration between Calgary police and CFS that pairs an officer with a domestic violence caseworker. They provide early intervention for at-risk families, including counselling, risk assessment, and safety planning. HomeFront has been remarkably successful. Eighty-three per cent of families they work with report the reduction or cessation of domestic conflict, and domestic violence calls to police have been reduced by 70 per cent. To the Minister of Justice. All Albertans should have access to this service. What are you doing to ensure that they do?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. I certainly agree that prevention needs to be focused on, and that's the reason we have increased funding to the FCSS organizations by $25 million so that prevention-focused services can be provided. I certainly appreciate the work HomeFront and many organizations like HomeFront do across this province. We are continuing to have stable funding for these organizations so that we can deliver our services in the best way possible. Thank you again.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-St. Albert.

Environmental Programs for Municipalities

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Municipalities provide leadership to Albertans on many issues, and when I meet with municipal leaders across Alberta, they have made it clear that they are eager to make use of alternative energy to reduce their greenhouse gas emissions and their operating costs. To the Minister of Environment and Parks: what has this government done to assist municipalities wanting to use alternative energy?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. There's no question that municipalities are leaders when it comes to renewable energy and energy efficiency. We have towns like Camrose, who installed the second-largest solar installation in Canada on the roof of the recreation centre last year. We are supporting those efforts. We've invested $5 million in the Alberta municipal solar program. There will be more to come as we work with municipalities to ensure that they can lower their operating costs and make life better for all Albertans.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that municipalities such as the city of Edmonton have committed to reducing greenhouse gas emissions from their operations, what programs can municipalities look forward to on this important issue?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we're committed to working with municipalities to reinvest the $1.3 billion in green infrastructure that we have set aside for those municipal leadership activities, whether it's transit, whether it's retrofits, whether it's smaller transit systems in smaller centres. We're open to all of those initiatives, and we'll be moving forward on them in the coming weeks and months. You know, it's really important that we reinvest in creating those jobs in energy efficiency, that we know those investments create, and in making life better as we invest in transit. [interjections]

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very troubled to hear that the opposition doesn't think this is an important issue.

Given that municipal leaders are not always clear on the programs available to them, to the same minister: how is the government working with municipalities to ensure they have the necessary information?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, efficiencyalberta.ca is always a good source of information on new energy efficiency programs and new programs that we're moving forward with. Now, there's no question that the UCP would flush all of those programs and that they would reject all of that municipal leadership in solar, energy efficiency, transit, all of those things that make our daily lives better, but on this side of the House we are supporting that leadership.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Opioid Use

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Quote: this is not the time for key messages. End quote. Those words come from an expert in the field tired of hearing NDP talking points about the opioid crisis. Two years ago the Auditor General recommended that this government display leadership and develop an action plan. This government has no co-ordination of services, no action plan, and ministry officials can't even identify three priorities. How many Albertans have to die before you'll stop being part of the problem, declare a public health emergency, and table a comprehensive action plan to address it?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the opportunity to talk some more about the work that our government is doing to address the overdose deaths crisis in our province. Albertans want to know that their government is responding to the overdose crisis as a top priority. We are. We've expanded access to the take-home naloxone kit program, we're expanding access to treatment such as opioid replacement therapies, and we are doing everything that we can to support the opening of supervised consumption services in our province.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that in 2014 Michael Trew, the former chief addiction and mental health officer, asked the government for a bigger role in fighting the opioid crisis or epidemic and given that Mr. Trew maintains that had he been given that role, quote, we would have been at least two years ahead of where we are today, end quote, and given that Mr. Trew was on the front lines of the opioid epidemic but that in 2015 this NDP government disbanded his office, Premier, why did you ignore

Michael Trew's advice and then act so short sighted in disbanding his office?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The addiction and mental health officer position was specifically tasked with dealing with the aftermath of the 2013 floods, and that position wrapped up in 2015. Since then, the top-ranking medical officer in our province, the chief medical officer of health, Dr. Karen Grimsrud, has been leading this fight as she is the one with the appropriate expertise to support this work leading what is indeed a public health crisis. The previous government failed to recognize that addiction and substance use are medical issues. Our government knows that they are, and we're providing the medical supports that are needed.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this government's mishandling of the opioid crisis is having deadly results and given that the government announced that a total of $62 million in federal and provincial funding was going to help Albertans get the treatment that they need and given that Suboxone provides enough stability to allow clients to address issues that impact their mental and physical health but given that Suboxone may be too expensive for many who do not have health benefits, how much money has this government put aside for this critical first-line medication?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm so grateful for the opportunity to talk about opioid replacement therapy in this House. Our government has done much work to expand opioid replacement therapy programs existing through Alberta Health Services. Currently Albertans who are on any of the low-income drug plans or the seniors' drug plan are covered for their Suboxone prescription, and our government is looking at ways that we can expand that access because we don't believe that the ability to afford your medication should be a barrier for treatment.

Government Policies

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, this government has become masters of unintended consequences, and I'm concerned this trend will continue. From the minimum wage increase to the carbon tax and the Bill 6 fiasco, this government has demonstrated a lack of understanding of how their policies are burdening many of the small to medium-sized employers in Alberta. To the Minister of Labour: do you perform analyses which indicate the cost of any policy changes to small-business owners prior to implementing new policy?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very proud of the relationship that we've developed with our small businesses, the consultations that we undertake through organizations like the Chambers of Commerce, CFIB so that when we're looking at making life better for Albertans, we can make sure that we are updating legislation like our labour legislation and employment standards so that it takes care of a strong economy, so that it makes sure that it's supporting families, so that we can have modern and up-to-date legislation in this province, which we are sorely lacking.

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, nothing beats face-to-face consultation.

Given the government's track record of hiding poor policy within bills which contain justifiable changes, I'm concerned the government will once again use positive change as cover for their true intentions and given that a number of small and medium-sized businesses have reached out to our caucus to express their deep concern with the government's intentions, again to the minister: when drafting legislation, do you analyze and consider the effect your changes will have on the viability and sustainability of Alberta's private sector?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased to hear the member opposite say that he's happy to support positive change because the bill that I will be tabling later today deals with a lack of action from the previous government, that has gone on for decades. I am so proud to be able to look at our work legislation, to talk to all stakeholders, to approach this with a fair and balanced legislation that will support a strong economy and will support families in this province.

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, nothing beats face-to-face meetings with businesses.

Given that this government is very fond of singing the praises of a particular policy only for that policy to end up harming Albertans and given that the increase to the corporate income tax is a prime example given that a recent study from the U of C demonstrated that the 2 per cent increase in the CIT resulted in $830 less in earnings for the average dual-income Alberta family, again to the minister: how can Albertans trust you to understand their reality when drafting policy given your government's track record of introducing changes which negatively impact their earnings and employment opportunities?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have personally met with the CFIB, with the Chambers of Commerce, with businesses across this province, and I have also personally met with individual Albertans who are benefiting from our policies like an increase to minimum wage so that they can put food on the table for their families. Making sure that we have Albertans' backs, that we are implementing policies that take care of individual families is a priority for our government, and I'm very proud to be part of that.

Air Ambulance Service Contract

Mr. Barnes: This week rural Albertans learned that the successful bid for operating the fixed-wing air ambulance was awarded. The winning bid, CanWest, does not have a local hangar at Medicine Hat airport or Peace River. Without a fixed-wing ambulance aircraft base timely medical care could be compromised. Rural Albertans need answers. Minister, why wasn't there more oversight? How did CanWest win the request for proposal without a hangar in Medicine Hat or Peace River?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Certainly, there was significant foresight in this process. One of the reasons why there was was because a number of years ago – it had been over 13 years since there had been an open RFP process, and when there was one under the former government, the RFP didn't require there to be local housing of that air ambulance. AHS learned from what happened under the former government, and they moved forward in a way that would ensure that a contract would be assigned only if the successful component could secure local hangar space and be able to house those air ambulances locally. So please, as the Premier said earlier, stop the fearmongering on the other side.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, if an aircraft has to first travel through a major hub to pick up a patient and then return to that hub, the critical window for patient safety is missed. Given that this means an unacceptable delay for the patient and will impact patient care and given the losses to the local economies of both Peace River and Medicine Hat, to the Minister of Health: will you commit to finally – finally – providing oversight by retendering the bid if CanWest cannot fulfill the obligations set out in the request for proposal?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have to say that the members opposite tout the free market, and then they light their hair on fire every opportunity they get. What's happening right now is that the concerns that were received are being reviewed. No contracts have been signed. They are moving forward and making sure that the terms of the RFP can be achieved, and if they can't, then we'll examine next steps. The members opposite should take it a little bit easy and rest assured that the terms of the RFP that went out ensure that we are going to have local air ambulance in those same communities where they are today.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, the minister should light her hair on fire because this will greatly affect the economy and quality of care for rural Alberta.

Given that Medicine Hat's council has demanded answers from this Minister of Health and given that the request to meet with the minister has now been ignored for weeks, to the Minister of Health: will you commit here and now to meeting the Medicine Hat council and the mayor to solve this?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I said in my previous answer, the RFP is being awarded, but no contracts have been signed. It would be premature to assume that the RFP terms can't be met. I think that it's important for us to trust the companies that are involved to be able to work on the details, and if they aren't successful, I will happily be part of the discussion. At this point I think it's important to respect the parties that are at the table, that are in negotiations. Obviously, safety for all Albertans is my number one concern, and making sure that we spend health care dollars is also very important. The members opposite are asking for cuts. Then they're asking me to . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Central Alberta Concerns

Mr. MacIntyre: Central Alberta has been hit hard by this economic recession and this government's policies. Our big resource-servicing companies are at a standstill, many of our farmers face damaged 2016 crops, and local manufacturing is suffering under the onerous carbon tax. Central Alberta needs some hope. When will this government provide central Alberta with the tools they need for some serious economic development?

Mr. Ceci: Well, there is hope. There is hope. There's hope in the sense that Alberta is going to grow further than any province this year. GDP growth will be 2.7 per cent. That will affect the people in central Alberta just as it'll affect people throughout Alberta.

Mr. MacIntyre: Well, Red Deer College services a community of 350,000 people, and given that this community is particularly affected by the accelerated coal phase-out and given the immense demand for retraining that is already bubbling to the surface in the outcries of desperate coal workers, when will this government be providing Red Deer College with the polytechnic degree-granting status that they need to service my community?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we're quite proud of the work that Red Deer College does to support students in central Alberta, and we're quite pleased to have a new board chair at Red Deer College, Mr. Morris Flewelling, who is serving the people of central Alberta admirably in that role. If the members opposite were so concerned about providing education for the people of central Alberta, they would at least tell them how much their cuts would affect Red Deer College in their ability to deliver education to the people of central Alberta.

Mr. MacIntyre: The economic impact assessment of granting Red Deer College polytechnic status shows an addition of tens of millions of dollars to our local economy. Given that it is beyond the right time for this government to prioritize central Alberta as the right place, to the Minister of Advanced Education: are you sticking it to central Alberta by delaying the granting of polytechnic status so you can keep it in your back pocket as an election plum for a pair of floundering central Alberta MLAs?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we are working with all of our universities and colleges in reviewing the roles and mandates, and we will make decisions about the future of Red Deer College later this year. The members opposite are campaigning on cuts that would close down Red Deer College and not just Red Deer College but colleges and universities all over this province. They should be ashamed of themselves for promoting those kinds of policies.

2:30 Registry Service Personal Information Collection

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, last week I received a call from an 86-year-old constituent who had recently lost her husband of 66 years. Now, they both owned vehicles registered in both names, and when she went to renew the registration on her car, she informed the registry agent that her husband had passed away and that his name should be removed from the registration. The agent asked her to provide a copy of her husband's will. Afterwards she was very upset at what she feels is an invasion of her privacy. To the Minister of Service Alberta. Even the staff that we spoke with in your department feel that this policy is wrong. Why are registry agents being required to do this?

Mr. Schmidt: Well, I want to thank the hon. member for raising this question, and I'm pleased to, of course, represent the Minister of Service Alberta on this issue. I'm not familiar with the issue, and I will communicate this to the Service Alberta department, who will take this issue under advisement and get back to the hon. member.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Dr. Starke: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that registry offices are where Albertans receive key services from their government and given that high levels of courtesy, compassion, and customer service should be goals in all of these offices' interactions and given that asking a grieving widow to produce her late husband's will to be copied and read by strangers is a cruel and heartless invasion of privacy, to the minister: why isn't simply producing a copy of the death certificate sufficient in this sensitive situation?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and again thank you to the hon. member for the question. Of course, we expect all of our service agents to deal with everybody with kindness and empathy . . .

Mr. Cooper: You should deal with us with kindness.

Mr. Schmidt: . . . and we will continue to communicate that expectation to the service agents who are delivering this. On this particular issue, of course, we will contact the department and get back to the hon. member with some more information. Hopefully, we can rectify this situation.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Dr. Starke: Well, thanks, Mr. Speaker. I couldn't hear all of the answer owing to the jocularity going on on this serious matter. Given that there are growing concerns about the security of personal data that is stored on computers by government and other institutions and given that just last week a major malware threat caused significant disruption world-wide in a number of jurisdictions and given that these threats are growing in their scope and sophistication, to the minister. No one can absolutely guarantee the security of these personal and private documents. Why are you requiring registry agents to collect, copy, scan, and store all of this information?

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, as I mentioned in my previous answers on behalf of the Minister of Service Alberta, we will look into this matter further and reply to the hon. member with some advice on how we can rectify this situation.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls

Ms Miller: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The federal government's National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls has been under way for some time. Given that my constituents in Red Deer-South have expressed frustration over the delays with the federal inquiry, to the Minister of Indigenous Relations: what actions has the government of Alberta undertaken to support this inquiry?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you very much for the question. As the member may remember, in September of last year we had an order in council that allowed us to bring the commission here into Alberta and for them to have full access to all Alberta records. In May of this year we also applied for standing to allow ourselves to have records for the national inquiry. We met with many of the family members together to talk to them about their experiences of all of this process and to ask them about what it is they would like going forward. We are happy to announce this week that the family information liaison units will be open. I'll speak a little bit more about that in further answers.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms Miller: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that some of my constituents are involved in the federal inquiry, to the same minister: how will the family information liaison unit help these individuals and families during the inquiry?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. As you can well imagine, the circumstances for family members who have lost a member, murdered or missing, are quite difficult. As a result, trying to navigate the very many systems involved can be problematic. The family information liaison unit members will help them to gather specific case information from police investigations, court records, coroners' investigations, and inquests. They'll also have access to counselling elders and spiritual support to help them through this very difficult time, which this government is very concerned about, for the family members.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Ms Miller: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Albertans across the province will want to access the services provided by the family information liaison units, to the same minister: how will the families access these services?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We're very concerned that the family liaison information workers actually have direct, face-to-face contact with family members. As a result, they'll be travelling throughout the province of Alberta and meeting people face to face, and we encourage family members to register with the system. They can call 780.427.3460 or 310.0000 and identify themselves so that they can have the individualized support they muchly deserve.

Child Protective Services and Death Reviews

Mr. Nixon: Today the Child and Youth Advocate released a report about the death of 15-year-old Levi. This is the story of another child who did not have to die. His mother stated many times that she could not take care of him. Levi himself asked to move to a safe home. In his home there was drinking, domestic violence, and unexplained gaps in his child intervention file. To the Minister of Children's Services: you say we need to do better, but how are we supposed to believe your ministry is taking this seriously when we keep hearing tragic stories like this one day after day?

Ms Hoffman: I want to thank the office of the Child and Youth Advocate for sharing these stories. I think it's important for us to hear them and have an opportunity to learn and be able to move forward. I know all members of this House feel for this young man and for his family. He faced unspeakable hardship and pain in his life, and it's tragic and in need of support. It's clear that the former ministry of human services did not do everything possible to support this young man. That is unacceptable. We accept the recommendations, and we will move forward to make sure that we do better, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nixon: Given the minister has the gall to say that the government created the child intervention panel to help kids but knows full well the panel does not look at case-level data and given that I have no confidence that any meaningful change is going to happen for kids like Levi and given that Levi's story isn't new either – in the advocate's report into his death there are similar recommendations that have been made in three previous reviews. Minister, the panel isn't helping kids like Levi. When are you going to take some accountability and actually do your job, make some changes that the advocate is asking for?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Again, we fully accept these recommendations. We believe that they are important, and we look forward to working closely with the advocate around implementation and further improvements. All young people should have their voices listened to and have access to the help that they need. When a young person asks for help, we need to do whatever we can to support them; however, it's clear that that did not happen for Levi. We expect that the committee is going to bring forward very good recommendations. We'll be able to act on them, and life will get better for young people. It needs to.

Mr. Nixon: Given that there were so many times in Levi's short life where he and others cried for help and he never received it, given that in the past police had found several intoxicated adults in Levi's home and him missing for large periods of time, given that it was documented that he missed a significant amount of school and that at age 12 he was found living in a tent because of his mother's drinking, and given that this is yet another case where there were clear cries for help from a child and those associated with the child that were ignored, to the minister: how will you make changes in the system so that when a young person asks for help out of a dangerous situation, they actually get it? Stop making excuses, stop saying it's the panel, because it's not, and tell us what you're going to do.

The Speaker: The hon. Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. That's why I'm asking Alberta Health, Alberta Health Services, and the college of physicians to examine this heartbreaking situation, ensure protocols are in place to care for vulnerable youth. When children ask for help, they need it, and Levi deserved better. That's why we created a ministerial panel, to take a very serious look at child intervention systems and make recommendations for improvement. It's clear that significant changes must be made, and we await the panel's recommendations. We hope that they are supportive, and we look forward to moving quickly to make changes for Alberta's children and youth.

Mr. Nixon: Point of order.

The Speaker: Point of order.
The Member for Calgary-Lougheed.

Economic Indicators

Mr. Rodney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. According to Statistics Canada monthly manufacturing in Alberta is down by over half a billion dollars since the NDP became the government, a nearly 10 per cent drop, but only $30 million of that was in petroleum- and coal-related manufacturing. The rest came from industries such as food, fabricated metal, machinery, computers, furniture, and transportation equipment manufacturing. To the Premier: when will you stop using low oil prices as a false excuse for the negative impact that the NDP's misguided policies are having on Albertans?

Mr. Ceci: Well, it gives me an opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to talk again about how those oil forecasts are generated for the province of Alberta. We look at five private-sector averages, and we usually take the average of those five entities, but this year we took the lowest number, which was $55 for '17 and '18. That same number is what Saskatchewan has brought forward for their budget, the same number or higher.

Mr. Rodney: Given that nondurable goods manufacturing, which includes oil and gas, was down $139 million per month but durable goods manufacturing was down $395 million and given that some Alberta industries have shrunk to the point of no longer even being reported by Statistics Canada, including primary metal manufacturing, down 40 per cent, and electrical equipment, appliances, and components, down 45 per cent, to the minister: how can the NDP claim that its economic diversification and export development plan is working when manufacturing even beyond oil and gas has been decimated?

Mr. Ceci: You know, I think that today is an example of the questions where the glass is half empty with that person over there. We know, Mr. Speaker, that, for instance, a Ford distribution warehouse is opening in Leduc. Champion Petfoods is building a 37,000-square-metre pet food facility in Parkland county. Tourism is up across this province. The GDP is going to be leading this province. The glass is half full, not empty.

Mr. Rodney: Perhaps the minister doesn't know that you don't even measure tourism anymore. We're asking about Albertans, not us.

Given that the value-added manufacturing exports that should be driving the economy outside our big cities are also down, with industries from animal food manufacturing to pulp and paper suffering millions of dollars in lower project activity, and given that agriculture, construction, and manufacturing are also down by tens of millions of dollars and given the impending devastation to the coal industry workers' families, who are often coemployed in the agricultural sector, how can the agriculture minister claim to be protecting and growing Alberta's ag industry when the numbers clearly show the exact opposite?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the opportunity to talk about the good work that agriculture and agrifood processing are doing in Alberta. Currently agrifood processing is the largest manufacturing sector in Alberta, contributing about $12 billion to the economy. It's a sector that continues to grow with the policies of this government. The Minister of Finance has highlighted some of the great work that has been going on: Champion Petfoods, Cavendish foods down in southern Alberta. There are a lot of great things happening in this province around the agriculture industry because of the policies of this government, because this government has Alberta's back.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

RiverWatch Science Program

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Back in 1994 a group of three teachers envisioned taking lessons on aquatic ecosystems from the classroom to the outdoors so that students could experience their neighbourhood rivers up close. In the spring of 1995 Cal Kullman's grade 9 students from Louis Riel school piloted lessons, science experiments, and a raft route along the Bow River through Calgary. In this way RiverWatch was born, and by the fall of that year 22 teachers and nearly 600 students adventured out for the first season. Two decades later RiverWatch is now a nonprofit organization, an award-winning river monitoring program, and host to the 10,000 students which participate in the program annually from across Alberta.

Last Friday, May 19, I joined the Member for Calgary-Fort, the Member for Calgary-East, and many other Albertans on a RiverWatch expedition. We embarked from Pearce Estate Park in Inglewood and set off down the Bow. As we passed the Inglewood bird sanctuary, our guide surveyed the group regarding the health of the river, and the group assumed that it was about a 3 out of 5. Further down the river we beached the rafts to do a few science experiments. My partner and I checked the pH of the river and discovered that it was about 8.3, within the norms of a healthy river.

Relaunching the boats, we reached the Bonnybrook waste-water treatment plant, where students get to tour this state-of-the-art water treatment facility. Our group continued to the area where the treatment plant's effluent discharges into the Bow and where the students get a chance to consider the ways of how our water usage impacts the river's health. A full-day tour also includes a final science checkpoint across from the Beaverdam Flats park, where students repeat the same science experiment as earlier, and groups often decide that the river quality is, in fact, a 4 out of 5.

On behalf of myself and my MLA colleagues I'd like to thank Cal Kullman, Andrea Myers, and the RiverWatch team for an educational morning float down the Bow. RiverWatch helps students see that water connects us all and that whatever we do to the river, we do to ourselves.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Red Deer's Lending Cupboard Society

Mrs. Schreiner: Good afternoon, Mr. Speaker. I am sure everyone in the House knows that I am immensely proud of the great city which I call home. Red Deer has earned the title of volunteer capital. That speaks to our strong sense of loyalty and community, and I never run out of reasons to sing its praises.

I would like to shed light on The Lending Cupboard Society, which embodies this strong sense of community. Established in July 2006, with services provided to 456 clients, the mission was to provide medical equipment to those in need. Today their tremendous growth supports a diverse model incorporating a more holistic approach, including wellness, mobility, independence, and dignity.

The Lending Cupboard Society helps make Albertans' lives better. As the only established nonprofit organization of its kind in central Alberta their mission has touched the lives of many family, friends, and constituents of many of our members in the House today. It is not only the services and equipment that make The Lending Cupboard such a success. The service it provides supplements Alberta Health Services by ensuring that Albertans have access to the medical devices they need to maintain their independence and dignity.

On January 30 I had the pleasure of introducing the hon. Minister of Health to the gem that The Lending Cupboard is and to showcase the caring community that is Red Deer and its impact on central Alberta. With the dedication of many volunteers and phenomenal staff The Lending Cupboard Society meets a strong community need by supporting individuals when illness or tragedy strikes.

Mr. Speaker, today I applaud the great strides that have been made in supporting Albertans who are vulnerable, and I compliment The Lending Cupboard Society for the leadership and compassion that motivates the great work they do in the community I call home.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Energy Policies

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to read a quote from the very first Alberta NDP election platform. "Alberta has among its many power sources: coal, water-power and petroleum. This is a substantial basis upon which to establish profitable industries within the province." It continues: "The development of coal-burning thermal units for electric power in coal mining areas of the province will be encouraged as economic aids to . . . depressed areas and as an added source of power for industry and domestic use." They actually advocated for an east coast pipeline, the same one that the Alberta Wildrose has urged them to advocate for.

But sadly, Mr. Speaker, these values have been replaced by this radical manifesto that the NDP has moved forward on, which is aimed at killing jobs and completely shutting down the petroleum sector. Instead of concern for hard-working families and the economy, the NDP are now more concerned with a 21st-century version of snake oil, also known as a social licence.

They have lost touch with regular, everyday Albertans and instead have decided to cozy up with their Trudeau Liberal BFFs from Ontario. That's shameful. We have seen the NDP demonize our energy industry and state that Albertans are the embarrassing cousins of Canada. We have seen the NDP shutting down the coal plants. We have seen the NDP hire antipipeline activists to key positions within their government. That also is shameful.

The real threat to Alberta right now is this NDP government. The NDP have departed from the principles that Albertans hold dear and that they once believed in, too. This is why Albertans are demanding a conservative government to move forward, to start working together to prevent this from ever happening again. But this . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and minister responsible for democratic renewal.

Bill 17

Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to rise and introduce Bill 17, the Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act.

With this bill our government is supporting family-friendly workplaces and giving Alberta workers and employers rights and protections similar to other Canadians. If passed, this bill will make changes to the Employment Standards Code and the Labour Relations Code. The proposed changes to these labour codes are based on consultations with Albertans. With this input, Mr. Speaker, Bill 17 strikes the right balance between the needs of workers and employers and brings Alberta's workplace legislation into the 21st century.

I'd like to thank those in the gallery for being here to witness this today.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Introduction of Guests

Ms Gray: Thank you very much to the House. Mr. Speaker, it's a pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of this House a member of the legal services team who was instrumental in helping to draft the Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act. I'd like to introduce Ms Chelsea Evans-Rymes, who's come with some family, perhaps, and some friends. Ms Evans-Rymes and I actually were camp counsellors together, so it's been interesting to get reacquainted many, many years later. I'd like her to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: Hon. members, pursuant to section 5(3) of the Property Rights Advocate Act the chair is pleased to table in the Assembly five copies of the 2016 annual report of the Alberta Property Rights Advocate office.

The Clerk: Tablings to the Clerk.

The Speaker: The Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure today to table five copies of an article titled India Cancels Plans for Huge Coal Power Stations as Solar Energy Prices Hit Record Low, the article noting that India has cancelled plans to build nearly 14 gigawatts of coal-fired power stations. That's about the same as the total amount in the entire United Kingdom.

The Speaker: On a go-forward basis, hon. members – it's a procedural matter that I should have been more aware of – it's the Clerk that tables at that particular section. The document is accepted, but in the future we should avoid, as members, using that to table documents.

I believe we are at points of order. The hon. member for Olds – excuse me. Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Nixon: That's okay. I spend a lot of time with the hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, but you might have noticed, Mr. Speaker, that there is a slight height difference. Just slight.

I rise on 23(j), use of “abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder.” During my questions to the Children's Services minister, which the Deputy Premier answered, the Deputy Premier during that time made some statements that do not accurately represent the facts. Several ministers have in the past, but particularly during those questions the minister continued to again make statements that do not accurately represent the facts, which creates disorder when the minister knows that her statements are not accurately representing the facts.

It is clear, without a doubt, and the minister is aware that the child intervention panel, that the minister continues to refer to in her answers to our questions, is not allowed – and the reason it's not allowed, Mr. Speaker, is because the NDP has blocked it – to deal with any case-level data, compare it to the Serenity or the Levi cases, which we were speaking about in particular today. When the minister keeps rising and telling Albertans and the opposition that we are allowed to refer to that and that that panel is actually dealing with that issue when in fact it is not, that is language that will cause disorder in the House. I would appreciate it if the minister would stop that.

The Speaker: The Acting Deputy Government House Leader.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, the member opposite is upset. There is a dispute as to what the facts are. I don't believe this is anything resembling a point of order. You know, saying that as we move forward, the entire child intervention system is something that we should look at, saying that we should move forward and look at systemic issues that affect all children and that we should work as a House, all together, to make those systemic issues better: I don't know how that could possibly create disorder.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the way this panel has moved forward and the speed with which they are doing their work and the speed with which they are moving to create a better system for all children in Alberta, which is obviously desperately needed – and I think all sides of the House are going to agree on that – is pretty phenomenal. To say, you know, that the minister standing up and saying, “Of course we care about this issue; that's why we continue to invest money and that's why we have a panel that's going to deal with these systemic issues” is not, I think, likely to create any disorder amongst any reasonable individuals. Obviously, this is just a dispute as to the facts and whether or not there are systemic issues.

The Speaker: The House leader of the third party.

Mr. Rodney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There is one reason there is a panel, and that's because the hon. leader of the PC caucus asked repeatedly for it, and I really appreciate that the government agreed that it was indeed a good idea. I appreciate the input of all the caucuses on that panel, but as has been demonstrated by the hon. Official Opposition deputy House leader, this is an ongoing issue that needs to be addressed. We've asked on many occasions for the same rule to apply, so I'll thank you for your ruling.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I think that in this instance there is no point of order. It is a difference of opinion. However, let me remind all of the House that sensitive issues like this are very visceral to all of us. They impact considerably on this province, that we represent in this House. I ask all of you to be conscious of that when comments are being made in the House.

Private Bills

Third Reading

Bill Pr. 1

Calgary Jewish Centre Amendment Act, 2017

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I move third reading of Bill Pr. 1, Calgary Jewish Centre Amendment Act, 2017.

This bill has been recommended by the Standing Committee on Private Bills, and I encourage all the members of the House to support it. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, would anyone like to speak to third reading of Bill Pr. 1, Calgary Jewish Centre Amendment Act? The hon. Member for Calgary-Northern Hills.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise this afternoon to speak to Pr. 1, the Calgary Jewish Centre Amendment Act, 2017. As a member of the Standing Committee on Private Bills I was able to attend the presentation by Mr. Bruce Libin, the president of the Calgary Jewish Federation, on May 1 to understand the requests of the organization. The overall proposal of the request is to, one, change the name of the Calgary Jewish Centre Amendment Act to the Calgary Jewish Community Campus Corporation Act to better reflect the objects of the corporation.

The second part is to change the objects so that this organization can expand on their campus plans. I'll highlight some of the details here now.

- (a) To promote health by encouraging and facilitating general physical fitness by operating and maintaining recreational facilities . . . for the general public,
- (b) to advance education by operating and maintaining a daycare facility . . . [for] both Jewish and non-Jewish communities of Calgary,
- (c) to advance education and culture by providing educational programs . . . ,
- (d) to relieve poverty by providing free or subsidized educational, cultural and recreational programs to individuals in need,
- (e) . . . by providing specially adapted residential accommodation . . . and other support services to Jewish and non-Jewish seniors.

In the committee we were told that there had been talk for a long time about the opportunities and vision of expanding facilities on that land adjacent to the existing Calgary Jewish Community Centre, and the bill would allow for the development of that space. As a first step we were told that there are plans to expand and renovate the existing building and to expand the daycare at that facility.

Mr. Speaker, having listened to the presentation, witnessed the expansion diagrams, and seen the future potential of this campus, I will be supporting Bill Pr. 1 at third reading. I encourage all others to do the same.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any other members that wish to speak to Bill Pr. 1?

Seeing and hearing none, the Member for Calgary-Glenmore to close debate.

Ms Kazim: Yeah. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise to support the bill. I would like to elaborate a little bit more on the contributions this particular bill will have in the constituency of Calgary-Glenmore as well as the entire city of Calgary.

The expansion is basically including more facilities, and it will be more inclusive for our communities. It serves not only Jewish people but others as well, as mentioned earlier. It's a very multi-faceted organization, and it has facilities that are catering to the needs of seniors, children, adults, young adults, and to all families and friends. People can utilize it for multiple purposes. It's a great venue. Whenever I visit the facility, I can see that it's a great venue to bring people together, and whenever people are together, that means that we are strengthening our communities. It is a hub for our communities, particularly when I look at Calgary-Glenmore.

I can't explain how happy I am to have this opportunity today to support this expansion because it is basically looking, with foresight, at how our communities are going to look in the next 20 years. Expanding this campus and having more senior care facilities offering kosher food and also having daycare facilities on-site, where we are basically bridging the generation gap that we face and bringing people together: it's a beautiful vision, and when I imagine it, it makes me happy. I'm looking forward to seeing this imagination become a reality soon. I'm more than happy to support this bill, and I would like to congratulate the Calgary Jewish Centre for such a great initiative.

Now I would like to close debate. Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill Pr. 1 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 16

An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to move second reading of Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates.

This proposed act marks another step our government is taking to protect the pocketbooks of Albertans and to make life more affordable for all. Last fall we committed to fixing Alberta's broken electricity system, the volatile system we inherited, that exposes consumers to vicious price swings and no longer attracts investors. At that time we promised to cap electricity rates while we do the necessary and long-overdue work to modernize our system. This bill follows through on that promise.

If passed, Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates, would protect Albertans from volatile electricity prices by capping prices at 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour on the regulated rate option, or the RRO, rate. The RRO rate is the default retail electricity option for most Alberta consumers.

Just to put that rate into perspective, since the start of 2017 the average rate charged by the major providers has been in the range of 4.2 cents to 2.9 cents per kilowatt hour, but prices have spiked more than double the 6.8-cent price cap in recent years. In the past five years we've seen the RRO spike as high as 15.3 cents per kilowatt hour, and it has regularly risen to over 8 cents, 10 cents, and even breaking 12 cents more than once in the years past.

This is unacceptable, Mr. Speaker. How can we expect families to afford those sorts of energy prices? How can we ask families to live from month to month afraid that their energy prices will spike suddenly and without warning? How can families plan and budget with this sort of uncertainty? How could any responsible government blithely stand by through months of price spikes like that and not have enough sense or enough compassion to address the problem? Well, this government won't give this dysfunctional electricity system the chance to wreak its havoc on Albertans under our watch.

With this bill Albertans on the RRO would have electricity price protection for a four-year period from June 1 of this year to May 21, 2021. This bill would provide those families and those small businesses with the assurance that they will never have to pay more than 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour for their electric energy. When they open their energy bill, they won't have to worry and fret about what part of the roller-coaster ride they're on. They'll have the certainty of knowing that their electricity rate will not be higher than 6.8 cents. That rate can be lower than the cap, just as it is today, but it will not rise above the cap.

Mr. Speaker, Bill 16 clearly sets the term and level of the price cap. Full details as to how providers will be paid should rates exceed the 6.8-cent price cap will be provided in associated regulations. When we announced our intention to cap electricity rates last November, we said that we would do so over a four-year period, beginning June 1 of this year. Our proposed legislation sets out this term. The cap would be in place, providing Albertans with stable rates while we make the necessary reforms to transition the province's electricity system.

This bill also outlines the operation of the price cap for the different RRO providers. For providers regulated by the Alberta Utilities Commission, the bill simply outlines the four-year term and the requirement that these providers charge their customers either 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour or their approved RRO rate if it is lower than the 6.8 cents. For those providers not regulated by the Alberta Utilities Commission, specifically rural electrification associations and municipalities, the legislation is more detailed to address the unique nature of these entities. While it outlines the four-year term and the 6.8-cent level of the price cap, it also provides for some flexibility as to how the price cap is applied in the regulations. This is to ensure that government is not removing the independence of some municipalities and the rural electrification associations to set their own rates and to ensure that government will not be responsible for compensating providers for unreasonable rates.

Bill 16 also includes provisions for the city of Medicine Hat, which does not offer a regulated rate option, to be included in the price cap program once the appropriate arrangements are in place. Medicine Hat, as you know, Mr. Speaker, is in a unique situation in managing their own electricity system, and we are committed to working toward appropriate arrangements that maintain their independence. Our government committed to providing this price protection to all eligible Albertans, and with these provisions to include municipalities and REAs, we are doing just that.

Bill 16 would include amendments to two other pieces of legislation, the Alberta Utilities Commission Act and the Climate Leadership Act. The change to the Alberta Utilities Commission Act would give authority to the Market Surveillance Administrator to enforce the provisions of Bill 16. We believe strongly in the important oversight functions of the MSA, and this bill would expand them to enforce its effective implementation. [interjection]

The Speaker: Hon. member. [interjection] Hon. member.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: May I continue, please, Mr. Speaker?

The Speaker: Please proceed.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: The change to the Climate Leadership Act would enable funding for this program to come from the carbon levy if the funding is needed. Funding will only be required if the rates exceed the cap. The use of carbon funds is appropriate. It's a natural fit to use the carbon levy to protect consumers from any potential spikes in our current carbon-intensive system while we transition to a new electricity market system, a system that is not only more stable but is focused on using greener, healthier power sources.

Now, the regulations to define all the details of how this legislation would be implemented still need to be finalized. There are a number of complexities, and it is important to get them right. These regulations will establish the approach to account for any payments should rates exceed the price cap and the appropriate regulatory oversight from Alberta's regulatory authorities. In the case of providers whose rates aren't overseen by the Alberta Utilities Commission such as municipalities and rural electrification associations, the regulations will outline a mechanism that will ensure government does not reimburse providers for unreasonable rates.

Mr. Speaker, this proposed act would provide consumers with more predictable electricity bills as we work to reform Alberta's electricity system. For too long Albertans have been paying the price for a broken electricity system, and we are changing that. Many of us in our caucus have seen families struggle with energy bills and worry about how they'll make ends meet if the price spikes again next month. Some of us have even experienced these hardships ourselves. I remember back to when we ran a cattle operation, and from month to month the bills were quite steep.

Not to act in the face of these real challenges that we've seen in the past years was both senseless and heartless. It leaves one to wonder if previous decision-makers even noticed the problem. Well, we certainly did. In our respective places, in our communities we couldn't help but notice. That's why we're doing the necessary work, the work that was left undone, to get the electricity retail system and the broader generation system right to benefit both consumers and investors.

This proposed act would protect RRO consumers from sudden price spike increases while we do this work. Consumers would not be subjected to the wild price swings that have defined this province's electricity system, rates that have climbed to over 15 cents per kilowatt hour and rates that have increased by as much as 65 per cent in one month. The cap outlined in this act would make life more affordable for Alberta families and small businesses and farms by ensuring Albertans don't have to worry about price volatility as we transition to a cleaner electricity grid and a more stable electricity market.

I urge all members to support this bill. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, those wishing to speak to Bill 16? The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think it's always important for all of us in this Chamber, whenever we're looking at any new piece of legislation, to ask ourselves: why is this bill necessary? What is the backstory? Why does this government think that this bill needs to be here?

Just to give us a little understanding of how we got to this point where this government thinks this bill is so very necessary, the tangled web this government has woven throughout the electricity file all began with an order in council just weeks after coming to power after the May 2015 election. Without any guidance from experts whatsoever, without any consultation with industry, the newly elected NDP launched their first missile at Alberta's job creators and rashly changed the old carbon tax under the specified gas emitters regulation. It was at $15. It rose to $20, then $30. The percentage of emissions it applied to rose from 12 per cent of emissions, then to 15 per cent of emissions, and now to 20 per cent. Essentially, the tax on our generators rose 70 per cent in just one year. Starting next year, it'll continue at $30, but it's going to apply to 60 per cent of emissions.

In hindsight, in real dollars that initial increase under SGER brought in revenue for this government that was something less than only a couple hundred million dollars, but, oh, the cost. The government's own estimates recently put the consequential damages of just that first ill-conceived move at something north of $4 billion.

Mr. Rodney: Sorry. What?

Mr. MacIntyre: Four billion dollars. With a B. Yeah.

If you did a real simple return on investment calculation here, it doesn't wash too well. The result of just that initial move weeks after coming into power was the famous "or more unprofitable" clause, section 4.3(j) in the power purchase agreements. It was triggered, and a mass cancellation of power purchase arrangements flooded the Balancing Pool. Up until this point Albertans didn't even know what a balancing pool was. Today almost everybody understands what it is.

Initially the government claimed they had no idea this clause existed. Initially they even blamed their own officials for not telling them about it. It wasn't in the binder. Then they blamed, collectively, the government's own Balancing Pool, dozens of industry players and consumer groups who had a hand in designing the power purchase arrangements, and even PricewaterhouseCoopers was blamed. I mean, they're an esteemed company. They were tasked with overseeing the appropriateness of the PPA design.

Mr. Rodney: You're making this up.

Mr. MacIntyre: Nah. This is a true story.

The government claimed this was all a secret deal, and they even raised the spectre of Enron, calling the clause the Enron clause in a vain attempt to convince Albertans they'd been swindled by a bunch of greedy crooks in a secret backroom somewhere.

The truth of the matter is that the only people who didn't know about this so-called secret clause was the new government. They didn't do their homework. To their credit the Alberta press did some research and discovered there were so many people involved in the design of these PPAs, and there were so many e-mails obtained through FOIP proving they knew full well about it. The NDP's attempt at pushing an Enron narrative failed miserably. Undaunted, the government went even further. They filed a lawsuit, a lawsuit to prove they didn't know about the clause 4.3(j), and absurdly asked the court to undo the PPA contracts, now 16 years old.

Mr. Rodney: Now you're making that up.

Mr. MacIntyre: Nah. It's a true story.

That one action – that one action – made by an order in council just weeks after coming into power without doing their homework sent shivers through the investment community. They were already fleeing this province with their capital because of this government's antibusiness attitude, a royalty review that ended up we didn't really need it. The court action named Enmax, wholly owned by Calgarians, TransCanada, and Capital Power, but it went further. Their court action also named the electricity generator ATCO and their own Balancing Pool, which is a public body and its own power regulator. They were all named as defendants in this action. They were suing anybody and everybody.

In effect, the government was suing Albertans and even its own departments because a small group of ill-informed politicians at the top, who did not and in many respects still do not understand the nature of our electricity system or the value of a free-market approach to an economy – they simply did not do their homework, and they did not listen to the warnings that were repeatedly given to them from within the department and within the industry.

Now, I would be remiss if I did not point out that from the moment this government attacked our power industry, these job creators tried and tried desperately to warn this government of the consequences of their ill-conceived moves. Industry stepped up with a variety of proposals in the fall of 2015 to address the issue, even to reduce capacity voluntarily, to reduce emissions without job loss, without asking for subsidy or compensation, but still this government strangely refused to listen. These consequences were even noted in submissions to the climate leadership panel in the fall of 2015, and there were countless meetings between companies and departments. We have documents and e-mails showing interdepartmental communications and more from the chairman of the Balancing Pool warning the ministers and Premier's office about the consequences, but, no, the politicians ignored every warning and rejected every solution presented to them.

Even after realizing their error, the NDP still had six months to undo the rash changes to the specified gas emitters regulation, but in spite – and I say in spite – of the consequences, this government, knowing full well that companies would have the right to terminate their contracts if the NDP didn't undo their decision to force the generators into the margins of more unprofitability, forged on anyway. Ideology once again came before common sense, and it came before Albertans. We've seen this repeatedly throughout their dealings with our economy and our job creators. Remember Bill 6? Remember the cap on development of our oil sands? Remember Bill 27, which prohibits the MSA from investigating wrongdoing when it comes to renewable developments? Over and over again, Mr. Speaker, ideology trumps common sense in the world of economics, with the NDP world view, anyway.

Well, the NDP didn't back down on their tax hike to our generators, and, as warned, the generators exercised their right to turn back the PPAs to the Balancing Pool. Enmax, owned by Calgarians, was the first to receive a ruling from the Balancing Pool that indeed the government's actions had triggered section 4.3(j), and Enmax had the right, not privilege but right, under that contract to turn back their PPA. But the government instead started a smear campaign, of course, evoking the name of long-discredited Enron in a pathetic, desperate attempt to divert attention away from the previous disregard for the economic well-being of Albertans.

But the Balancing Pool recognized Enmax's right to terminate, and I should point out to this House and to Albertans that that was the last time the Balancing Pool exercised their independence. That was the last independent act that we can see from them. This government has been meddling ever since. In fact, their meddling in the independence of the Balancing Pool was caught by the pool's own banker, the Toronto-Dominion Bank. They chopped the Balancing Pool's line of credit down from, I believe, $70 million to just $4 million, and they cited in their letter that the reason is the fact that the Balancing Pool could no longer, quote, demonstrate independence. They could no longer demonstrate independence, Mr. Speaker, from the political meddling of the Department of Energy.

Even the Auditor General is looking into the meddling by the government in the Balancing Pool's independence and financial decision-making. Specifically, he is assessing whether or not the Department of Energy, through its recent actions, controls the Balancing Pool for financial reporting purposes. Control for financial reporting purposes means the ability to govern the financial and operating policies of another organization with expected benefits or the risk of loss to the government from the other organization's activities. Let's take a look at that last line from the AG: with expected benefits or the risk of loss to the government from the other organization's activities.

We had a bill come before this House called Bill 34. I called it the blank cheque act. It is a bill extending an open-ended line of credit to the Balancing Pool to cover its losses, losses which would never have been incurred had it not been for this government's meddling in PPAs in the first place, hence the AG's statement that they're looking into the meddling of this government into the financial and operating policies of the other organization, the Balancing Pool, with expected benefits or risk of loss to the government from the other organization's activities.

The Balancing Pool was originally mandated to be at arm's length from the government, free from political interference. Its mandate was to operate independently and in the best interests of Albertans and, furthermore, specifically to operate its assets in a commercial manner. It has not been permitted to do that. There is communication from the chair of the Balancing Pool to the minister asking for permission. Should never have had to ask for permission.

There is another document, a letter from the pool to the minister citing that because the minister had delayed responding to the pool, the pool was now subject to a $29 million penalty, a penalty that they had to pay because of delays in waiting for the minister to make a decision. That is not acting independently, nor is it acting in the best interests of Albertans, nor is it acting in a commercial manner. Well, the meddling in the financial affairs of the pool was so acute that e-mails obtained through FOIP indicate the pool's officers actually communicating with accountants and lawyers to explore ramifications from the pool declaring bankruptcy. This minister stood in this House and talked about how broken the electricity system was before she showed up on the job. Frankly, that is being extremely economical with the truth. It was not broken until this government started meddling with it. We had reasonable prices for electricity and no utility debt. We're never going to be in that position again under this government.

Then along came Bill 34, essentially writing a blank cheque to the Balancing Pool to prevent it from going bankrupt. A few short months ago, when the blank cheque act, Bill 34, passed, the expected cost was a mere $600 million, but weeks ago costs skyrocketed to over $4 billion. Now we have the Balancing Pool being investigated by the MSA for using money from the blank cheque act as an open-ended, taxpayer-funded subsidy to undermine the competitive power market.

It's just one catastrophe after another after another, and this minister runs from crisis to crisis to crisis with Band-Aids. The fact of the matter is that the entire fiasco began by an order in council just weeks after this government came to power, making an order in council to amend SGER without considering the ramifications of it, without listening to industry's concerns, without even listening to their own departmental memos coming to them warning them: don't do that. Well, the fateful decision to change SGER, by the government's own estimates, is going to be $4.437 billion. Making life more affordable for Albertans, indeed.

The taxpayer and the ratepayer – I have said it many times – are the same person. They really are. The government says: well, we're going to pay for some things out of the carbon tax for some of the problems we're experiencing in the electricity sector. Well, who in the world pays the carbon tax? It's the electricity ratepayers and the taxpayers that pay that, too. They're going to be taking money out of our pockets over here, running it through the government, and saying: "Oh, well, your electricity bill is too high. Here. We'll give you some of your own money back. Don't you feel better about that?" I'll tell you what. I'm not going to feel better about that.

Moving charges to a tax bill instead of to the more politically dangerous monthly electricity bill doesn't help struggling families, doesn't make life more affordable for Albertans at all. This government does not get to play hero for protecting Albertans from the very harm this government inflicts on us. It doesn't work that way. They should be ashamed to support this misguided action.

They've got this bill here, Bill 16, that's going to cap the regulated electricity rate at 6.8 cents as though there is nothing else in the whole wide electricity system to protect consumers. Well, news flash: we've been able to get fixed-rate contracts for years. There have been dozens of energy retailers in this province offering all kinds of deals. You can lock down your electricity price right now. The current 13-month average for fixed-rate contracts is 6.8 cents – 6.8 cents – per kilowatt hour. That is cheaper than the cap on RRO. Retailers within the free market of our electricity market have had offers like that for years, where people could lock down their price of electricity to prevent volatility. If you listen to this government's narrative, it's like: oh, my God, we could be seeing spikes tomorrow.

I wonder why. Why would we be seeing spikes in the first place? Our electricity market is already some 30 per cent oversupplied. When you're in an oversupply situation in a free-market enterprise, prices stay low. If you look at your electricity today and you're on an RRO, you're probably paying something around 3 cents. The reason for that is because we have an oversupply of electricity in a free-market economy right now.

Those prices will go up as the available electricity supply goes down. The only way those prices will go up is by that reduction in supply, and the only way we're going to see a reduction in supply is for this government to artificially start shutting down generation. This government is purposely forcing shortfall to increase the price of electricity, putting a cap on the RRO so that their actions don't show up on people's monthly electricity bills and they start getting 1.6 million phone calls. That's about how many people are at least eligible to be on the RRO.

But this cap does nothing to protect our job creators. Users of greater than 250,000 kilowatts don't get any protection under this at all. Furthermore, should the price of electricity exceed 6.8 cents, for every cent it is above 6.8, the government is going to have to shell out about $10 million a month. But where does that come from? It comes from the very people they say that they are trying to protect.

An Hon. Member: No. They borrow it from fairyland.

Mr. MacIntyre: No. They take it out of the carbon tax, they said. In fact, they're having to amend the Climate Leadership Act so that they can do it.

An Hon. Member: Hey, you read it.

Mr. MacIntyre: Yes, I've read it. I shall not tell you where it went.

Really, this bill is an admission. It's an admission that sometime over the next four years because of this government's actions retail electricity prices are going to go up. As I've said, we're sitting at about 3 cents right now on the RRO, and this cap is at 6.8, so we're going to see power prices going up at least to 6.8.

They keep saying: "No, we're not following Ontario. No, no, no, we're not following Ontario." Yet every little footie print in the sand sure looks like an Ontario footie print from this government.

They really need to turn back the clock. They need to turn back the clock on their reckless and expensive transition to renewables. They need to start standing up for Albertans. They claim that they're solving issues with power price volatility, but as I've said, we have had options for a long time to bring stability to our electricity prices.

Furthermore, if you look at your electricity bill, the actual power price, that amount of money we pay for the electricity that we consume, is just a small piece on your electricity bill. There are multiple line items there that are not directly connected to consumption. There is nothing here in this bill for that, and there won't be. In reality, what's the need for this bill? Well, in my opinion . . . [Mr. MacIntyre's speaking time expired] I have an opinion.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Oh, sorry. I want to speak to the main bill.

The Speaker: There is no 29(2)(a) in this situation.

Mr. Coolahan: Oh, well, then I'm up. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today and speak in support of Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates. Our government is working to make life better for Albertans, and this does include capping electricity prices. This bill is one part of our plan to ensure a reliable, sustainable, and affordable electricity system. It protects Alberta's families, farms, and small businesses from sudden spikes in electricity prices and sustained high electricity prices. [interjections] This part is key. Listen. It helps the province transition to a more stable and greener electricity system.

Beginning June 1, consumers will be protected through a four-year, 6.8 cent per kilowatt hour regulated rate option, the default electricity contract available to most Alberta households, farms, and small businesses. With this cap, should the market price rise above 6.8 cents, consumers will not see an increase on their bills. This protection gives Alberta households peace of mind that there is no shock on their electricity bill – pardon the pun – and it gives entrepreneurs and small businesses the stability they need to move their businesses forward without having to worry about electricity price spikes.

Let's be clear. Albertans have seen price spikes over the years, Mr. Speaker. In the past six years alone consumers on the regulated rate option, RRO, have paid as much as 15.3 cents per kilowatt hour.

Mr. MacIntyre: They didn't have to.

Mr. Coolahan: They really have. Well, it was long before us.

Should the RRO go above 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour, funds from the carbon levy will be used to support this program, and I suggest that it is an appropriate use of the funds given that it supports Albertans as we transition to a more stable and greener electricity system.

Mr. Speaker, many seniors call the amazing communities in Calgary-Klein home, and when I speak with them, explain to them the climate leadership plan and the carbon levy and they see what they've received in rebates and now that there's a cap on the RRO, well, they're extremely happy. They're extremely happy with the certainty about what they will be paying. Of course, in many cases these are people living on fixed incomes.

In addition to protecting Albertans from high electricity prices, the other cornerstone of this bill is helping the province transition to a more stable and greener electricity system. Now, Mr. Speaker, I worked in the utility industry for a decade before being elected, and I can tell you that the system that we inherited as a government was broken. Changes are needed, and the changes are needed for several reasons. They're needed not only to protect consumers and to create investment but also to transition to a greener future. Our current electricity system does not benefit consumers or investors. It is a volatile system that relies on price spikes, which we actually heard the member from the opposition say, and, you know, that's not good news for Albertans.

You know, we need a reliable system with stable, predictable rates, and our move to a capacity market will get us there. Moving to a capacity market has been done in jurisdictions all over North America, and we're slow in getting there. This moving to a capacity market was actually a recommendation by the AESO, the Alberta Electric System Operator, several years ago. Several years ago they said that we should consider moving to that market as a result of the volatility in the generation market. There have been indications for several years that the current generation market was not only volatile in terms of price but that it was not reliable and wasn't serving the needs of Albertans, and it won't work for the future.

In the summer of 2012 there was quite a heat wave, and there was a huge demand for electricity. For various reasons, including unscheduled shutdowns, the system could not keep up, and there were rolling blackouts, and prices spiked. In the wake of this, the then Premier appointed a committee of PC MLAs to implement changes to the retail electricity market to reduce the volatility. Now, clearly, they recognized that something was up, that something was wrong, that something needed to change. I have no idea if a report ever came out of that. I don't know. Perhaps some of the members of the third party who are still here would know that. I'm not sure.

But released or not, I sense that nothing would have been done anyway, Mr. Speaker. Let's face it. You know, the previous government demonstrated that it was in a state of sort of legislative paralysis for many years, so I doubt anything would have happened. And when they do consult with people on what we should do with things as important as the electricity system, it's a very limited audience – very limited – so I doubt that they would have had the wherewithal to actually move forward with anything that might have impacted Albertans positively.

But on the other side of that, Mr. Speaker, I'm proud that in this government we make hard decisions like this that positively impact the majority of Albertans and have the prescience and the understanding and courage to implement a move towards a capacity market and greener generation and to decrease emissions and position Alberta for a greener future.

But this isn't just an Alberta movement, Mr. Speaker. It's the way the world is moving, to both cleaner technology and to capacity generation. By taking action now, we're staying ahead of the curve to ensure that we remain competitive now and in the future.

Mr. MacIntyre: It ain't working.

Mr. Coolahan: This is a very difficult concept for those over there. It's very difficult. Doing this is going to help ensure prosperity for our children and generations to come. This bill is one example of how we do take action, how we are taking action on this file.

Through the climate leadership plan we outlined the blueprint to develop more renewable energy. The unpredictability in electricity rates is one illustration of how the system isn't working. Consumers are paying the price every time they open their monthly electricity bill, not knowing what to expect or what household decisions to make. Mr. Speaker, we've seen the RRO for electricity as high, as I said, as 15.3 cents per kilowatt hour and as low as 2.7 in just the last six years. If that's not volatile, I'm not sure what is. We've heard time and time again how this uncertainty takes a toll on the average Albertan household and the small-business owner, but this unpredictability isn't just impacting the average homeowner in Calgary or Lethbridge or the restaurant owner in Cold Lake or Red Deer. It has a wider economic impact.

What we're doing is we're changing the system so that we will have a system that can attract new investment. This investment is crucial because it's what drives innovation in the entire system. It also transitions the system for the future to support economic growth and an increasing population. This is why last fall we made a commitment to fix Alberta's broken electricity system, starting with a cap on electricity rates, while we do the necessary and long-overdue work to modernize our system.

This bill shows how we're acting on our promise by implementing a price cap of 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour on the RRO. This cap will take effect on June 1 and ensure that Albertans on the RRO have electricity price protection for four years. Funding will only be required if the provider rates exceed the cap and does not reimburse – I'm sorry. Hold on a sec. If it goes well over, we will only reimburse for reasonable rates. This bill also outlines the operation of the price cap for the different RRO providers. With the cap in place we're doing the work necessary to get the electricity retail system and broader generation system right.

One key component of this work is developing more renewable energy, as we know. The renewable energy program will add 5,000 megawatts of new electricity capacity by 2030.

Another key component of developing greener electricity is empowering Albertans to generate their own power. To encourage more owners and small businesses to generate electricity, our government amended the rules for microgeneration last December. That's going to increase capacity size and allow for more flexibility in the system. We're currently exploring ways to develop small-scale community generation as well, which is really the big next step in renewable energy. Underpinning this transition is the movement to a capacity market, that will attract new investment and provide the foundation needed to increase renewable energy.

Mr. Speaker, with that, I will say that I am proud to support this bill and proud to be able to speak on behalf of hard-working Albertans, who deserve affordable electricity rates and deserve an electricity system that works for them and all Albertans.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any questions under 29(2)(a) for the Member for Calgary-Klein? Edmonton-Whitemud, under 29(2)(a)?

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes, under 29(2)(a). I did really appreciate the Member for Calgary-Klein's exposition of the actual facts behind this bill. I mean, we were exposed to a litany of very biased observations by the previous speaker, and I really appreciated the balanced and thoughtful approach of the Member for Calgary-Klein.

My question actually relates to terminology used in describing the rolling blackouts of 2012. I actually feel sorry for my Calgary colleagues. Edmonton, actually, wasn't affected by those blackouts to any degree, and one of the reasons that we weren't affected by them was that one of the major power suppliers to the Calgary market had unscheduled maintenance. It just happened to be, I think, at midnight on a Sunday or something like that, the unscheduled maintenance.

You know, as I understand it – and I liked the comments from the MLA for Calgary-Klein – in this great system that the Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake espoused, there was a term called “economic withholding,” which basically meant that a company could do this at exactly the right time to maximize their profits and at exactly the right time to cause discomfiture to the citizens of Alberta. Am I correct in that analysis, MLA?

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Coolahan: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. My recollection of that time period was this. I believe there was one generator that did go offline like that. It is well known that price-spiking volatility is what makes these companies money, right? I don't necessarily want to get into that. It's a bit of a legal grey area. Certainly, it's been done. That's for sure.

However, my recollection of that blackout was that, I believe, there was one generator that went down like that as a result, but I believe three went down as a result of malfunctions. So, yes, they were unscheduled blackouts, but they were malfunctions. That just goes to show you, as I've been saying, that this system is not supporting Albertans the way that it needs to. We need to have a better system, a more green system, and have better equipment, that isn't subject to these unscheduled shutdowns because, you know, living through a blackout is tough on everybody. It's tough on the economy, as we know.

Yeah. I think moving towards the system that we're going towards, the capacity market, is going to mean that we will always have electricity in the hopper ready to go, and we shouldn't have these blackout issues when it comes to unscheduled maintenance.

Thank you for the question.

The Speaker: Any other questions or comments for the Member for Calgary-Klein under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing and hearing none, the Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, I think I can speak with certainty and with truth. If I recall, the wind farms in southern Alberta have been there for quite a long time. In fact, I can also speak with truth that Alberta was the first jurisdiction to put a price on carbon on heavy emitters, before this government. For anybody who's actually tuning in, they know that if they are paying an electricity bill right now, they are also the taxpayer. They're likely paying taxes.

An Hon. Member: Are you sure?

Mr. Fraser: I'm pretty sure.

At the end of the day, Mr. Speaker, let's be honest. The member talked quite a bit about a capacity market. Well, if he goes back in the books, he will see that under Premier Redford and Premier Prentice there was a move to move to that capacity market to, yeah, support more renewable energy, which is – come on – abundant in this province.

Now, the member also talks about a broken electricity system. Let's remember that those investors who built those coal-fired generation plants took losses many times but still provided reliable electricity to Albertans. Even when you have the green electricity grid, Mr. Speaker, you still have to have a baseload. You still have to have something there, whether it's natural gas, which this government is moving to, and I say that with certainty.

When we're talking about this today, the other part, too – you know what? We in the former government, without a doubt, made mistakes, and without a doubt we look back and we see where we could have done better. Now, my heart goes out to every senior citizen, every single person on a fixed income, a low income that struggled with spike volatilities. But, Mr. Speaker, let's also be honest. The companies that provided this electricity for generations in this province also came up with a plan to help those folks.

This is nothing new. In fact, Mr. Speaker, this is the government saying that they're fixing a problem that is not a problem. There is already something out there provided to consumers to get on that. It is no different with your city taxes. What's next? You know, it is important for our children to drink milk, to have balanced food, so are we going to put a price stop on the cost of milk and some of those necessities?

My problem with this, Mr. Speaker – and I understand the intent. It's a good intent. But, at the end of the day, it's almost like we're telling the companies: charge 6.8 cents. It's almost like insider trading. We've set the market when right now prices are so low and have been so low for a long time.

I understand the intent, but let's be honest. The electricity system – and let's be really clear. For a long time this province has been and I still believe is, even though I disagree with this government on a lot of their economical policies, number one in Canada over and over and over again, generating wealth for Albertans and Canadians over and over again to support social programs right across this country. When that government says that we don't champion Alberta – Mr. Speaker, this government talks like Alberta was in the Stone Age and didn't contribute anything, that the former government didn't contribute anything, which is a falsehood. A lot of the good things that these members grew up under they can attribute to people like Peter Lougheed, Ralph Klein, and former MLAs.

The system wasn't broken. You don't get that kind of investment, you don't get that kind of growth in oil sands, in fact, you don't get the green energy companies wanting to come here if the system is broken. You don't actually become the hub. Long before this government ever came into power, we already were the hub in western Canada for distribution when you look at the Walmarts, when you look at the Home Hardwares, when you look at all those distribution plants, the Canadian Tires. We are the gateway to the west, Mr. Speaker, and those companies don't come here if there is a grid that's not reliable and affordable. You don't have constituencies like mine, that grow twice in size, with young families, progressive families.

These members should be careful when they speak in this House, when they speak to me with disrespect, saying that I don't know anything. Mr. Speaker, I'm the conduit to my constituents. It's their voice that I champion in this House. When I speak right now, it's their voice. It is not my own. My goal, unlike maybe this government, because they are scratching the bottom of the barrel right now trying to get re-elected – it's not my job to get re-elected. It is never my job to step in this House to try to get Rick Fraser re-elected. It is my job to do my job for the constituents in Calgary-South East.

Mr. Speaker, I'm going to end with that. The system wasn't broken. We have many things in this province to champion, things that went very well. This province, many of the systems, many of the institutions were not broken. As representatives in this House we should always be looking to try to improve, to take steps forward, to work collaboratively, to not laugh every time a member steps up and speaks in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I will say this. At one point I sat on those benches, I sat in cabinet, and I said to myself, with the same arrogance that I'm getting from this government – and I failed. I failed myself with that arrogance. Now I proudly sit in the third party, representing my constituents with conviction. This government, these MLAs: may they be so fortunate in the next election.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there any questions under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Calgary-South East?

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to speak to Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates. I think it's important to call it what it is. A cap suggests that there's a limit. Indeed, the government is putting a limit on what people will pay in the short term, but clearly they're hiding the real price of electricity from consumers when it goes over 6.8 cents.

When it goes over 6.8 cents to produce, somebody's going to have to pay it. So why not be honest with people? Why not send them the true price of electricity so that we will all change behaviour if we need to? We will start to look at more efficient appliances. We will start to look at different ways of using our electricity and, potentially, make the changes they say that we're needing to make instead of hiding it and passing it on through taxes and through, I guess, whatever's left of the carbon levy, although it's been relegated to so many different areas, I'm not sure how that will go.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

Frankly, Madam Speaker, it's disingenuous to pretend that we're actually going to protect people. If we really are trying to protect vulnerable people from high electricity prices, help them financially, those who need the help, but don't fail to give Albertans the true cost of our electricity. That, I think, troubles me as much as anything because we're already racking up other debts, but here we're hiding a debt instead of being honest with people about where we're going with this.

Since 2001 Albertans have been able to choose to receive their electricity either from a retailer that's regulated by the AUC or from a competitive retailer. The regulated rate option was established to provide a default option for consumers who decide not to choose a competitive retail product. To be clear, the regulated rate option does not ensure a single low rate; rather, rates change from month to month depending on the real price of power.

In 2006 the regulated rate regulation was changed to encourage customers to switch to competitive retail products and foster development of the competitive retail market. But retail statistics from the Alberta Market Surveillance Administrator indicated that as of last year about half of residential customers had switched to competitive contracts and half remained on the regulated rate option. That means that despite the availability of the product from competitive retailers, consumers did not choose that option. Fair enough. However, the problem with the current regulated rate option is that it actually leads to higher electricity costs for consumers.

When the electricity market was deregulated, the promise that was made was one of low energy costs and reduced price volatility. However, the deregulated market clearly did not deliver that in all cases. Something definitely needs to be done. In fact, over the many years that I've served here as MLA, one of the most frequent concerns of constituents was the high cost and volatility of energy bills. Clearly, the default option for electricity needs to be affordable and protect consumers, but it also has to send an honest price to people so that they can change their ways.

I support the government's efforts to create a market for renewables and diversify our electricity generation. However, simply putting a cap on the regulated rate option is not the answer. It could potentially, I believe it will, cause serious problems down the line, as prices inevitably increase with all of our expensive new infrastructure. Consumers should always have a price reference based on the actual costs in order to make efficient and effective consumption and investment choices. If energy costs are deemed to be too high, vulnerable folks can be reimbursed with rebates and subsidies, but we should never mask the true price signal. Otherwise, we could end up moving much closer to Ontario's reality.

A price cap will not reduce the cost of electricity. It merely defers payment to another pocket, to our children, to our grandchildren. It will undoubtedly have a negative impact on the viability of the competitive market. It basically sends the wrong message to real competition and incentives for people to build new stuff and to try and get into the game of producing electricity and getting some income in a business. As I said, it won't change behaviour and it won't change purchasing if we stifle the real price.

Funding the RRO from carbon revenue is the worst possible policy that the NDP government could have picked. The RRO retailers will continue to get what they always got, which is quite high revenue, but rather than reforming the RRO, which is what I suggested in Motion 502, the government took the political way out, hiding the real price from Albertans. The four-year time frame of the regulated rate option cap appears to be more about political expediency than fixing the system. The only change that happens is that the NDP government removes the risk of a price spike during the next election. I think that's disingenuous.

The important question is: what is the NDP's real motivation? It must be contemplating other changes such as turning back the PPAs to the owners, converting the coal plants to gas, which would significantly increase prices in the next four years. It has to because making these changes will be expensive. Fair enough. But let's start paying it now and not pass it on to our children and our grandchildren and take it out of a new tax. We're going to have to start paying some of these extra expenses.

Specific recommendations that I think I've made before in relation to the regulated rate option. Number one, preserve and enhance the integrity and operation of some competitive retail. Most economists believe that competition rather than regulation has the best chance of achieving economic efficiency. I'm one of those. A competitive market will force down prices and encourage innovation and change behaviour.

Alberta has embarked on a program to restructure the electricity market by setting an objective of 30 per cent of renewable energy by 2030 and implementing a capacity market. I applaud that. A highly competitive retail market will help ensure that the benefits of changes in the wholesale market will be transferred to retail customers.

The second recommendation: preserve the ability of consumers to choose the retail service that best meets their needs. Don't treat Albertans like ignoramuses. It's very unlikely that a single product or service can meet the needs of all consumers, so let people choose what is best for them. It's because of their interests, needs, and preferences that we have new businesses in Alberta who can meet some of the unique needs of every person.

Funding the RRO from the carbon revenue: I've said that already.

Electricity is no different from any other product. For example, some consumers prefer fixed prices and are willing to pay a premium to eliminate volatility, some prefer variable prices to obtain the lowest costs, and some consumers simply don't care and are price takers. That's their choice. Consumer choice is a key feature of Alberta since it was regulated in 2001, albeit not as well as it could have been managed. I've made some suggestions about how the regulated rate option, in particular, could save people $12 a month if we did a flow-through option instead of the current approach.

It's worth noting that consumers already have the ability to protect themselves from volatility and can choose a retail product that best serves their needs. The implications of the government's strategy is that it eliminates the incentive for consumers to make any decision or to make any changes. That's not really what we want. It makes consumers who don't choose a competitive retail product for whatever reason into free riders. In other words, the regulated rate option people will get subsidized by the carbon tax if the price goes over 6.8 cents. The rest of us will be paying for those on the regulated rate option. Guess what people are going to choose? It unfairly penalizes consumers who have made the effort to educate themselves and try for more efficient, competitive retail options.

The third recommendation: drop the requirement that consumers should know the price of energy in advance of consumption. The RRO is based on the presumption that consumers should know in advance the price of energy before it's consumed. While this is an important principle for virtually all other consumer products, it is not for the purposes of electricity prices. Electricity is an essential good that consumers cannot function without. I know of no consumers who can monitor the RRO price prior to consumption. As a result, consumers tend to be price inelastic and consume electricity regardless of price. Consumers tend to respond more to price trends and price spikes when making decisions about the purchase, management, and consumption of their energy.

The fourth recommendation: the RRO should be renamed the default rate option. The name of the RRO is a misnomer. RRO is not a regulated price in the traditional sense. Default rate is a more appropriate description and reflects exactly what it is, a rate that applies when consumers decide not to choose a competitive option.

The fifth recommendation: the default rate should be based on the pool price. As I spoke about in Motion 502, the pool price is the actual cost of power and ultimately is the price paid by consumers. All other prices are derivatives of the pool price. Because the pool price is the cost of power, it will tend to be the lowest price over time.

While other prices may be lower from time to time, particularly the forward price, the long-term tendency is for the pool price to be the lowest price because it represents the actual cost of power. The price differential between the pool price and the forward price fluctuates and is based on the time value of money and other factors related to varying perspectives amongst buyers and sellers concerning the future price. The spot power floating rate likely includes adjustments for its consumer load profile and other costs related to the risk of supplying the floating rate, and the RRO rate includes the risk and return premium that increases the cost of power.

There are many reasons supporting the use of the pool price as the default rate, but three reasons stand out. Number one, the pool price will tend to be the lowest cost over time. Number two, the pool price will serve as a benchmark. It will allow consumers to accurately compare the cost of energy products among different retailers. Number three, the pool price is the closest thing we have to a price signal that will guide consumers in terms of making effective energy efficiency decisions and policy-makers in terms of resource allocation in the Alberta energy economy.

The number one issue related to the use of the pool price as the default rate is the fact that it is the most volatile price. As I said, if it's too volatile and vulnerable people need to be supported, then let's support the vulnerable people. Let's not compromise the whole system on the basis that volatility might compromise our most vulnerable.

Government has implemented two structural changes in the electricity market that will have a profound impact on reducing future pool price volatility. This will happen because the transition to renewable energy will likely be financed by capacity payments to cover the fixed cost of generation. As the reliance on capacity payments grows, it will change the composition of the pool price into a weighting of capacity payment plus energy costs. In effect, the pool price will be self-stabilizing and will substantially contribute to the realization of the government's pricing objective.

One possibility that could accelerate the transition to a capacity market is the recent proposal by ATCO and TransAlta to convert coal-fired generating plants to natural gas. If adopted, this proposal would accelerate the phase-out of coal plants, thus achieving our transition to a low-carbon economy sooner than anticipated, but the method of financing this transition is still unknown. Using capacity payments for this has the benefit of providing a way to facilitate project financing that is acceptable to financial lenders. In addition, this will benefit consumers in terms of helping to stabilize the pool price.

The proposal is not without its challenges, however. For example, how will the capacity payment be determined in an environment where a fair competitive price might not be available in this particular instance? The capacity market will take time to develop. In the short term there are, fortunately, several very effective and low-cost ways of mitigating the volatility inherent in a pool price. Two of these methods are price caps and fixed prices.

A final comment on the use of the pool price flow through as the default rate is the significant reduction in regulation burden. The regulatory process surrounding the review and approval of the RRO is complicated and time consuming. It requires significant commitment by stakeholders, consumers, retailers, and regulators in terms of money and staff. Adoption of the pool price as the default rate will eliminate all of that requirement.

4:30

Madam Speaker, I am once again appealing to this government to reconsider eliminating all price signals to our people. It may not be a perfect system that we have, but let's retain some element of the price signals so that people actually get real, honest feedback on how their use of energy is costing them and costing the environment in that sense. You don't have to eliminate the deregulation completely. You have the best of both worlds right now. By putting a price cap and not taking advantage of a different way of calculating the regulated rate option, I don't think you're getting what you want. I haven't been able to get that through, but I hope the government is listening and will consider those options further.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Great timing, Member. Thank you so much.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. This bill is definitely an interesting bill. This is a bill that the government has been promising to bring forward, and we've been awaiting it to see exactly how they were going to implement it.

Now, for me, what I like to do is that I like to go through the bill – and you can see that I've got notes and stuff – and get my thoughts down, and then I like to see what the government has to say about the bill, because, really, what's important is saying: do the government releases match what actually is within the bill?

I'd like to just go through a release that was done on May 23, 2017. The title of it is Taking Action to Protect Electricity Consumers. What I'd like to go off is a quote that our hon. Minister of Energy put in this release. I'd like to actually break down the parts of the quote and give my thoughts on exactly what it is that she said and how, in this case, they may not be achieving what their intentions are. I'm going to read through the entire quote and then break it down by sentence from there.

With this bill, we're following through on the promise we made last fall to protect Albertans from electricity price spikes. Volatility and uncertainty have been hallmarks of our electricity system for years. Electricity is a basic necessity and Albertans shouldn't have to worry about their power bills spiking from one month to the next. This cap would help make life more affordable by ensuring Albertans aren't burdened with price volatility as we transition to a cleaner electricity grid and a more stable electricity market.

All right. The first one. "With this bill, we're following through on the promise we made last fall to protect Albertans from electricity price spikes." Now, what's important – and I'll go to another document that is on the government website. For Hansard's sake I will read out the address. It's <https://www.alberta.ca/electricity-price-protection.aspx>. The title of it is Electricity Price Protection.

On that one website there what we've got is a wonderful little graph. For illustration purposes you can see that it's got lots of peaks, but what's important here is that it's got a line going through the graph at 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour. When we look at this, if you look at from about, I would say, the middle of 2014 all the way back to about 2006, there are significant spikes that go through that 6.8-cent average. And what happens here is that – and we've heard this from the government – as things come forward like a shutdown to maintain a plant, suddenly we have less supply for the market, and that means that in the end what happens is that the price spikes. What happens here is that we see significant spikes.

Now, at the very bottom here in a little box below the graph we've got:

Historically, regulated electricity rates have been extremely volatile – increasing by as much as 65% ... in a single month ...

It actually says in brackets "April 2011."

... and crashing by as much as 42% ... in a single month.

And it goes with "June 2014."

Now, I would like to move, and then I'll go back to the graph. What I've got is an article by the Globe and Mail. It's written by Kelly Cryderman, and the title of the article is TransAlta Reaches Tentative Deal to Settle Power Price-fixing Charges. All right. This is a quote from the article.

In 2014, the province's Market Surveillance Administrator alleged that TransAlta engaged in "anti-competitive conduct" in 2010 and 2011 by taking three coal-fired power plants off line on four cold days, during high-demand hours and in periods when other players in Alberta's competitive power market were the least likely to be able to pick up the slack. This, the administrator said, drove up electricity prices and allowed TransAlta to reap millions in additional profits.

Now, using the example here from the graph again, that that is a typical power spike, I think, is a little misleading, especially when we had an intentional act to make profit. In the end there was, I believe, a $56 million settlement. They got caught doing it. We had our watchdogs. They did their job. They got the profit out of there. It went back to the consumers. This is terrible stuff, right? But using that one example to justify that these spikes are the norm in Alberta, again, is definitely misleading.

If we look at this graph again and we look at just after 2014, actually closer to the beginning of 2015, we're going to see that the power rates stabilized, didn't actually go beyond the 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour. It's not a coincidence because, from what I understand, we had Enmax Calgary bring on a plant, a generating plant, and what happened is that they added more supply to the market. Now, this is what a healthy market looks like. As there is profit-taking, people build plants, and then what happens is that the profits go down, and in the end we end up with lower charges for our electricity.

So to go back to where the Minister of Energy says, "With this bill, we're following through on the promise we made last fall to protect Albertans from electricity price spikes," I question whether there was actually a crisis here because in the end it appears that the market sorted itself out. The market sorted itself out, and we actually haven't seen a price spike over 6.8 cents.

Now, it makes sense that the government will look at this and say: wow, that looks terrible over the last few years. You know what? Giving the ability for more power to get into the market was definitely the goal the government should have been on. They should have been saying: there is the ability to be able to make money at this; let's make this happen. And maybe diversification through dams or other, different ways of going about it would have been a great way of going about it. Again, the market was taking care of itself. This first sentence: it seems like we're correcting something that had already corrected itself.

"Volatility and uncertainty have been hallmarks of our electricity system for years." Well, again, if you look at this graph – and it doesn't go beyond 2002, so maybe it was more volatile back then – what I'm looking at is only a couple of years here and a few months there that it was actually volatile. Again, when we're looking at the free-market system, what we end up seeing is that the market will correct itself, and that's what you see here. You see the markets correcting themselves. I'm going to speculate that you are going to be able to say that there were coal plants brought on or gas plants to help fix these spikes in power costs.

Now, what we're looking at here is a government that is saying: we are going to regulate something because we believe that we need to prevent something from happening. Okay. That makes sense. You know what? I don't want to see a vulnerable Albertan be hurt anymore by volatile power prices. I don't think anybody in this Chamber does. Everybody wants to make sure that our seniors and our disabled are able to go through their lives able to pay for their power bills and able to have a life that we would all want them to have. So when we look at this and we look at the government saying, "We are trying to bring uncertainty out of the market" – I don't believe you can ever do that because in the end what we're looking at here is a government that is relying on actual machinery. That machinery breaks down. That machinery needs to be fixed, maintained. So in the end what we need to say is that there's always going to be some volatility there.

Now, we look at the coal plants in this province, and from what I understand, anywhere from 50 to 55 per cent of our power is generated by coal right now. What happens is that as we phase out coal for Alberta, we're going to see more volatility in the system, and the reason that we're going to see that is that – guess what? – when the sun doesn't shine, we don't make power; when the wind doesn't blow, we don't make power. So what ends up happening is that we're going to see spikes, and we're going to see lots of spikes, which is why I believe the NDP are bringing this in. They already know that this is coming. They already know that we're going to see massive spikes that are going to have to be addressed someday. So what do they do? Well, they hide it. They cap it.

You know, I will say that it appears that they have taken on a lot of the Ontario approach, if you will, on how to deal with the power markets. Now what we are seeing is volatility in their markets, seeing price spikes. And guess what? People are angry there. People can't afford their power bills. Energy poverty is a real thing over there – a real thing – and that is something that we were going down the road to, but our fix is to hide it, to hide it by making sure that somebody else pays it, to hide it from the taxpayer. Again, my colleague who's the shadow minister for renewables has repeatedly said that the ratepayer and the taxpayer are the same person – the same person – so if we take away from one, we're putting it on the other.

Now, the third sentence in this is: "Electricity is a basic necessity and Albertans shouldn't have to worry about their power bills spiking from one month to the next." I agree with the fact that electricity is a basic necessity. Cheap power brings prosperity. We all heard today that the first platform that the NDP brought forward in this province was very clear: power brings prosperity, brings business. Yet somehow this government has decided to deviate from that.

Now, when we start looking at this and we start treating this like a pet project, then we end up with the blackouts or the brownouts, that the government was talking about before, because we don't have a stable system. We have nothing to back this system up. So we end up having more brownouts, we have volatility, and we have incredibly high power spikes. And guess what? We end up with extreme profits going to our generators.

An Hon. Member: It's a free market.

Mr. Cyr: Well, that isn't a free market because you're limiting coal.

The government said: well, that's a free market. Well, when you go after something that is actually creating more than 50 per cent of our power right now, how exactly is free market involved in that? There is no such thing as free market when you restrict players from getting into the market at the point – now, we hear all these things about justification and why we need to move in this direction. But we have heard consistently over and over that, actually, this decision has nothing to do with coal. It has to do with an ideology, a radical ideology at that.

Now, to go on with the fourth point here: "This cap [will] help make life more affordable by ensuring Albertans aren't burdened with price volatility . . ."

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you. Well, I've enjoyed very much listening to my esteemed hon. colleague from Bonnyville-Cold Lake. He is a bean-counter by trade, just to be clear, and of course graphs are exciting to him. I'm glad that they are. There were some things in his speech here that did catch my attention, and I wanted him, if he wouldn't mind, just to expand a little bit. Please correct me if I'm wrong, hon. member, but is it true that what you saw in that graph was price spikes that led to more generation without a government insisting it happen, that the investment community saw that as something worth while to invest in, and that no government law had to be passed to create that generation? Please correct me there if I got that wrong.

The other thing. It's amazing – is it not? – that these price spikes actually attracted investment, yet this government claims that the current energy-only market was not attracting investment. According to the graph that you have, was there not some investment happening? Could you please expand on that a little bit?

Also, I'd be curious to hear your thoughts on these fixed-price contracts that have already been available to vulnerable Albertans for a long time. I don't know. You have an REA in your area. I'm aware that most REAs also have programs – do they not, hon. member? – protecting vulnerable co-op members from electricity pricing and helping them to pay their electricity bills, again with no law coming from a government forcing them to do so. They just do it out of the goodness of their hearts. Could you expand on that?

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have to thank my colleague for his really great questions when it comes to reviewing these graphs. I will tell you that when you start looking at this, if we look at the logic that the NDP has used, saying that this system is broken and it's not working and they need to fix it, this graph would be going up, would be going all the way up. It wouldn't be going up and down. It wouldn't be consistent. There wouldn't be a 6.8-cent average, if you will, that they would be able to put on here. What we're looking at here is a system that was correcting itself. It was working very well.

We have a system that always can improve. There's no doubting that. But the industry itself was the partners and the ones that were wanting to make this happen. I don't believe that any Albertan wants pollution. I don't believe any Albertan wants to see anything that's leading to health problems. So you were seeing the industry itself start to move in these directions, bringing safety onto work sites. We're hearing that that is a big thing today, with the labour bill. We're hearing all these different things, but what we aren't hearing is that the system itself was working. We're fixing it.

Now, when it comes to the fixed prices that the hon. member was bringing up, I believe it is at 6.8 cents where we can get a contract right now. It's ironic that what we're seeing as a market right now is 6.8 cents as a fixed one. That actually brought out the volatility altogether. If you are on a fixed income and you were saying, "You know what? This volatile price environment is something that I need to deal with," it already had the mechanism. Guess what? The industry did that. The industry saw that they could actually bring volatility out and still be able to make profits with it.

Now, myself, I like the variable market. In the end I was willing to take the risk that I would pay less over time because I believed in the market. In the end what happens here is that – in these last two years I've won. Now, I might not have been very good in, say, 2009. There was a spike there. But I believe that when we look at it, that is the consumer's choice, to go on a variable plan or a fixed plan. That's the beauty of the system.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Well, this has been an interesting discussion. It's really, really nice to be speaking on the Energy portfolio again. It's very nice.

Well, the supposed green shoots of the government are starting to turn into a bit more of a tangled web of onerous and deceptive weeds. This unwieldy garden is growing faster and taking over the seeds of a once prosperous and high-functioning energy-only market.

What is a little bit more than concerning is the smoke and mirrors that this capacity-market model falls underneath. What continues to amaze me is the perspective that somehow it's going to protect consumers from price volatility. That truly is misrepresentative of the market and the way that Albertans use electricity, but that would require that the government would understand how the market was working before in order to understand the difficulties that this capacity market is going to bring forward. The fact that the government continues to perpetuate the myth that the capacity market reduces wholesale price volatility, including the spike in prices, which we've heard about over and over again – to his credit, my colleague from Bonnyville-Cold Lake has explained very, very well why those spikes occurred and the mechanism that actually creates them in the first place. As we've said a couple of times, there are mechanisms in the system that actually help to mitigate those spikes.

I feel that when we're speaking about this particular situation, especially when we're talking about the capacity market and the myth that is coming from the government, it's extremely disrespectful of the government to Albertans and to their needs when it comes to electricity and the cost of electricity in this province right now. As has been said by many of my colleagues on this side of the House, electricity is at low prices right now, and the cap that is being put on is artificial and does nothing to protect Albertans. In fact, if anything, it's going to cost Albertans a whole lot more money.

One thing I want to ask this government is: do you really think that you can hide the cost of what you're trying to do with this cap? That's actually the question I want to know. You really, really believe that Albertans are not savvy enough to understand what you're trying to do here. Believe me, it's not a possibility. They know. This bill actually tells all and is exactly the missing piece of the puzzle to all of the other bills that came before: 34, 27, all of those other bills together. This is the descriptor.

This cap in itself is exactly – we knew it was coming, and Albertans knew it was coming. It's extremely disrespectful to Albertans. The reason is because the government is actually going to more than double the costs to the ratepayer/taxpayer. To reiterate what my colleagues have said, they are the same person, the consumer. These people are going to see more than double the costs within the next four years. Maybe somebody can answer for me how that's going to make life better for Albertans. I'd like to know.

Some of our colleagues on the government side were saying that they had spoken to people and that they had heard from people that this cap is good. I would love to understand how it was that that was explained to them given the fact that right now electricity is as low as it is and given the fact that in the next little while we're going to see massive jumps. The worst part is that once this cap is done, Albertans are going to get slammed by the capacity market. That's the most interesting part of all of this, but I'll get to that.

If the government was willing to look historically at the deregulated market – and, again, we've heard this before. The free market actually provides signals, and those signals are to invest or not to invest. That is the question. Those are the signals. We had places like the Shepard facility, to name one. It's one of the largest gas-powered facilities of its kind in Alberta, 800 megawatts. This happened as a result of the industry understanding the signals that are put out by the free market.

Right now this is a market that benefits the consumer. Investors are going to look at the models at any given time and say: this is a time to invest. When prices are low, it completely benefits the consumer. An investor is going to look at those signals and find out what is the best decision for them at that time, and it actually draws in investment, which is contradictory to what is on the government website, saying that "investors like the stability, predictability and familiarity of capacity markets" and that this capacity market is going to have "Albertans have reliable, affordable electricity in the future" and help "facilitate the transition away from coal-fired." Well, actually, investors need to understand how the market is working, Madam Speaker, in order to understand when it is a good time to invest. The Shepard facility is a good example of that because they made one of those investment decisions, and Calgarians benefit from understanding those signals.

We've continually said to this government: stand up for Alberta. We were already on track to phase out coal and bring natural gas online. That would have reduced, actually reduced, emissions by 50 per cent per megawatt hour generated. This was already in the works. The accelerated phase-outs – and I won't go into everything that my colleagues have already spoken about and the events, this domino effect, but it's quite amazing to watch the whole puzzle get put together. Even when we were debating bills 34, 27, and 25, it was disconcerting to see how much damage was being done by government all at one time, and then to see this little piece get put on is the icing on the cake.

Just to be clear, before this government started on its warpath against our energy industry, people – the taxpayer, the ratepayer – had the ability to manage the way that their electricity bills came to them. Again, I know I'm reiterating a few of the things that we've talked about already. Just to give an example, a fixed-rate option, that actually protects the consumer from volatility, was one of those ways. It was a choice that the ratepayer/taxpayer/consumer could make, a decision as to how they would have their electricity delivered to them. This is choice. This is what Albertans want.

Now, that volatility, the one that the government keeps talking about: guess who that falls on now, Madam Speaker? That falls on the shoulders of the consumer because – guess what? – the providers no longer bear the risk. They don't bear the risk anymore. In the past they bore the risk, which is why we were able to have the low-cost electricity that we've had in the past.

We have zero utility debt right now. Zero. That is amazing. Do you even understand what that means? That is unique across Canada, zero utility debt. Now the government, Madam Speaker, is creating debt where there was none. I mean, that speaks oodles about what's been going on in all sorts of things.

Again, I just can't understand why the government would feel in any way that they can pull the wool over Albertans' eyes. Albertans are way too intelligent. They're way too savvy. Believe me, since we started down this path with this government, they know way more about the electricity models and the capacity models and deregulation and their bills and everything else than, I'm sure, any of us ever probably thought we would know. I am impressed and absolutely humbled every single time I talk to a person because they know. They know. They know what this cap is, let me tell you. They know a lot more than I know. I am constantly educated and amazed by the people that I have the privilege of meeting. I guarantee you, Madam Speaker, they're not going to fall for it.

You want to hide your intentions. The government wants to hide their intentions from the people who elected them to be here. Does the government intend to take advantage of what the government feels and believes to be a lack of knowledge regarding how people understand their bills? I don't know how else to ask the question because, to me, that's what it feels like.

Well, understand this. When that cap is removed and that capacity market hits with a full swing to the pocketbooks of Albertans, they will be slammed, Madam Speaker. Slammed. We here in the opposition will have made sure that every Albertan that we come in contact with is fully informed and educated, every single one of them, and that they understand that the Balancing Pool is a blank cheque that this government gave to them, that the government under Bill 27 decided to take away the ability for the electricity police to be able to do their job, to actually make sure that Albertans cannot be overcharged for electricity.

These are the kinds of things. We brought amendments forward. We brought all sorts of ideas on how to change that and to strengthen some of that legislation. But, no, now the minister is able to make changes on renewable electricity in those bills, with this one being the cream of the crop, without ever asking a single Albertan how they feel about that or what's going to happen to their bill. Every single Albertan will understand that.

We will not hide behind smoke and mirrors, Madam Speaker. The government keeps saying that the industry is aligned with you. Well, maybe you should explain to Albertans why some of the major industry giants are onside. Because they no longer bear the responsibility of the volatility of the market. In other words, they bear no risk. Alberta families do, along with the burden of the carbon tax, a tax on the energy industry; environmental activists running amok and being paid and defended by this government to lobby against our natural resources; the cap on the oil sands; one thing after another.

Again I bring up Bill 34, a blank cheque, which, I might add, shortly after it was brought forward was used, and dollars were disbursed into the Balancing Pool already. I mean, again, look at the domino effect. The government cannot hide from this. This cap is simply smoke and mirrors until this capacity market comes in, and, whammo, every single Albertan will be impacted. That is the unintended consequence of what happened to this market when we were first elected.

The government, by the very nature of this bill and the other bills, is mandating the end of the competitive and fair pricing that happens in an energy market, straight up. When you put the cap where there did not need to be one, this tells us, tells every Albertan, in fact, that the prices are going to be crazy high, through the roof. Somebody has to pay the piper, folks, and now that is burdened on every single Albertan. Every single one. Again, I need to have it explained to me as to how this is making life better for Albertans.

Let's talk about volatility for a moment. This is the word that, you know, probably best describes the way that this market is at times, and I understand that. But it's also the government's favourite word to use when describing the industry, and it adds a few more puffs of smoke to bring this illusion full circle. That's what this is. If you're wanting to harm investment, Madam Speaker, this is the way to go about it because volatility – and I'll say this again – provides signals to the industry for them to understand how to invest, when to invest, what to invest.

On top of that, we also have the fact that under Bill 27 the minister now has the purview to be able to bring renewables online, and we will have absolutely no idea how much it's going to cost. None. There is zero accountability. Accountability was taken out. The actual word "accountability" was taken out of the bill. It was amended in Bill 27 in order for the minister to be able to make changes without having to ever – ever – let Albertans know the impact.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is an absolute pleasure to rise today and speak to Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates. This bill does little more than scare the industry about high costs of electricity coming because of bad NDP policy and showcases that instead of fixing the problem of high electricity prices, this government wants to shove it under the rug, hiding the high cost of electricity in the tax bill of Albertans.

The good news, Madam Speaker, is that this government has an opportunity to correct its path. I know that you will be familiar with an amendment that I like to move from time to time about referring pieces of legislation to committee. I think this afternoon we've heard from my colleagues, who have done a very, very good job of discussing some of the very significant challenges that you'll find inside this particular piece of legislation. I will pass the amendment to the pages. I'll speak broadly until you have a copy and they're distributed, and then I'll be happy to read the amendment into the record.

We've heard from my colleague from Chestermere-Rocky View, however brief it was. I know that she's looking forward to being able to speak to this particular amendment. We've heard from my colleague from Innisfail-Sylvan Lake and others in the House about a lot of the challenges, a lot of the self-inflicted pain that this government is experiencing. Whether it's through the cancellation of the PPAs, whether it's suing Enmax, whether it's shaking investor confidence, the NDP has just done so, so much damage on the electricity file that it's impossible to list it all here today, but I know that it's important that we still talk about that. There are some very specific reasons why this particular piece of legislation should go to committee, and I'll speak about those briefly in just a moment.

But why don't I start by just reading into the record that I move a motion that second reading of Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

Madam Speaker, it is very, very, very critical, not just because referring legislation to committee makes good sense and not just because virtually every other jurisdiction in this fair land of ours refers legislation to committee. I know that you've been paying such close attention and know that this is, I believe, my first referral motion of this session. I know that you've been waiting for this to happen because you'll know that it's an important part of this process. We could send this piece of legislation to committee, have experts come and provide expert testimony and witness and discuss a lot of the things that we've heard here today from our colleague the independent Member for Calgary-Mountain View and leader of the Liberal Party.

We have a wide range of opinions on this particular piece of legislation, and committee would allow not just the opinions of members to be heard but the opinions of experts. I'm certain that the government would roll out some of the folks that they have consulted, and it would provide the opposition and members of the Assembly and, perhaps more importantly than those folks, Albertans with a much clearer picture of the consequences of this legislation.

I'm certain that the government will rise and talk about how the opposition just wants to delay this, but nothing could be further from the truth. We have been waiting for a period of time for this legislation, and I'm certain that if we were to do a thorough review over the summer and come back in the fall – and I'm just speculating on what might happen in the House over the next couple of days with respect to other referral motions, particularly around some labour legislation – my guess is that it would be a really, really good idea for us to send this to committee and then consult more thoroughly instead of the 36 days that the government has offered up as their consultation on a 124-page bill. But I digress for the time being.

This isn't about just delaying this piece of legislation; it's about making sure that we get it right. One of the things that is very, very, very problematic that is included in Bill 16 and a very, very good reason why we ought to be sending it to committee is some of the powers that it changes around the ability of the minister. In section 6(1) it states:

The Minister may make regulations . . .

- (f) adding to, clarifying, limiting or restricting any powers, duties or functions of the Commission or the Market Surveillance Administrator as the Minister considers necessary or advisable to enable the Commission or the Market Surveillance Administrator to exercise powers, duties or functions for the purposes of this Act.

Madam Speaker, we have a situation where Bill 16 is providing the minister additional abilities to change regulation that could restrict any powers or duties or functions of the MSA, the Market Surveillance Administrator. The big challenge with this is that less than two weeks after the MSA launched their investigation into the Balancing Pool, the government with this legislation has the potential to intervene to restrict the MSA's very power and duties and functions in ensuring the electricity market is fair. So we have the MSA currently investigating the Balancing Pool, and then you lay on top of that a piece of legislation that could potentially restrict the MSA's ability to get to the bottom of exactly what was happening at the Balancing Pool.

It's not just the MSA who has expressed some concerns. We heard from my colleague from Innisfail-Sylvan Lake about the Auditor General's concerns with respect to what's happening at the Balancing Pool. We have an incredible amount of FOIPed information that clearly lays out political meddling from this government. The optics, if nothing else, for the government on this should be concerning. One of the great ways to clear that up is to refer this to committee. We can have members of the MSA come. We can have members of the Balancing Pool come. We can have a discussion around what potential risks there are to the MSA's ability to do their job if by the very clause in section 6(1)(f) the minister now has the ability to say, "Uh-uh; the MSA can't do any of these sorts of investigations any longer," or they can limit the scope of the MSA or otherwise.

It is critically important for the government's reputation, for the MSA's ability to provide light and shine light on this particular situation that we do take time and not rush another piece of legislation through this House in the dying days of a session, just like we saw in the last session, with the power bills, just like we saw two sessions ago, with Bill 6. The government is putting together a really concerning track record of rushing legislation through this Assembly.

Now, I wouldn't want to guess what's going to happen with Bill 17, but it seems to me that the government introduced a piece of legislation that's 142 pages long with a mere 36 days of consultation with less than eight days left in the legislative session. It sure appears to me that they're not only going to do that to Bill 16 but also to Bill 17. The only thing that stands between bad legislation getting passed is the opposition, so we have this duty to ensure that good legislation is passed.

Right now there are a ton of things in Bill 16 that present a challenge. Instead of doing a rush job, we ought to send it to committee and take the time to make sure we get this right over the summer, hear from the Balancing Pool, hear from the MSA, hear from the Auditor General, and ensure that the government actually isn't interfering with the process, that we're not seeing a consolidation of power into the minister's office and into the regulations, and that we can move forward in a way that is open and transparent because one thing that this bill doesn't do is provide the same sort of openness and transparency to the consumer. Even my colleague from the Liberal Party – we don't necessarily see eye to eye on all things. We do on this, that the government is trying to hide the true costs of electricity to the consumer.

Committee is a great spot for folks to be able to hear about that, for Albertans to be aware of exactly what's taking place. So I encourage all members of the Assembly to support this amendment and send this bill to committee so that we, too, can get to the bottom of the very important details, particularly the one that I highlighted in this speech but also the ones that have been highlighted by members of the opposition, from all parties in the opposition. Any time that that happens, the government ought to touch the brakes, heed the advice of the opposition, and move forward in a much more cautious manner. Now, I'm not very optimistic that that's going to happen, but I would encourage all members of the Assembly to vote in favour of this amendment.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I do appreciate the member's enthusiasm for committee work. That's great. But this bill has been drafted with input from industry experts, and it's being done in the best interests of Albertans and the actual electricity system. And let's not forget that we will be going to Committee of the Whole with this, so there'll be an opportunity for a lot more fulsome discussion on this bill.

With that said, I'll say that I cannot support this amendment. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any comments or questions under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I thank my hon. colleague from the outstanding riding of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills for giving us some wise words on the benefit of referring this bill to committee. This government has a bad habit of not doing that, not taking full advantage of the processes within this Legislature that are there, intended to do two things: improve legislation but also to allow everyday Albertans to come and address those pieces of legislation that are going to impact their lives, for Albertans to have a say. I think that it behooves any government in power to take every opportunity to hear directly from Albertans regarding legislation that is before this Assembly. This government, as I said, doesn't have a real good track record in that regard.

There are some organizations, I believe, that would want to come and address this Legislature in a committee setting to talk about this legislation and the impact that it may have on them. It's interesting to note that over time our electricity system, which this government claims is so broken, that this government claims needed help directly from this government in order to make the transition to renewables – it's interesting that if you look at the historical record, the truth comes out. If you go back through the history of our electricity system, you have a number of players that are currently in our market, and I believe that every single one of those players would have something to say about this legislation before us and others as well.

[Mr. Hinkley in the chair]

But I want to just bring to the House's attention who some of these players are. I know that for a lot of people if you were to take a poll right here in this room or even amongst Albertans and ask, "Who are the people in the electricity system; who are the players?" they would probably list off TransAlta, ATCO, Enmax, Capital, EPCOR. They might struggle getting beyond the big five into any of the other players that are out there. Frankly, we have many, many companies involved in our electricity system, and they all have opinions, and they all have a lot of skin in this game. The majority of their investors are everyday Albertans, people with pension funds, people with RRSPs, mutual funds. I believe that every piece of legislation and the policies from this government that we have seen come through this House that have impacted our electricity system – I believe that every single one of those players has an opinion that should be heard, should be heeded, should be taken under advisement in all that is being done by this government to completely overhaul what was an electricity system that was actually working quite well. Was it perfect? No. Did it need to be completely destroyed? No.

I want to just let everyone here know who some of these players are that I think would want to see this bill go to committee and come and talk to us about what they've done. I'm not sure if people are aware that we have a power station in Balzac. It's natural gas, and – guess what? – no government had to force them to build it. The signals that my hon. colleague from Bonnyville-Cold Lake talked about indicated to them that there was an opportunity for them, and they built it. It came online in 2001.

We have the Bellshill power centre at Galahad. It, too, is natural gas. Came on stream in 2015. Again, no government had to force them to do this. No government had to force them to do it. I believe they would have something to say about this.

I believe that our rural electricity associations would have a great deal to say about, well, practically every bill regarding electricity that's come through here.

There are pages and pages of natural gas systems coming online. Anyone ever heard of the MacKay River power plant in Fort McMurray? It's natural gas. Came online in 2003. No government had to tell them to do it. They made a business decision to do that. Imagine that.

Then this government is saying: well, you know, we have to do this in order to get renewables to come online. Oh, really? In 1993 Alberta-Pacific Forest created a biomass plant in Athabasca, 131 megawatts of capacity, way back in '93. No NDP government in power at that time. No government had to force them to come online, and there was no debt thrown on the backs of Alberta taxpayers on account of it.

Another biomass plant: 2002, Bear Creek steam turbine in Grande Prairie. TransCanada owns that. They built that. Again, no debt on the backs of taxpayers. I would reckon that they might have something to say to this government, especially in relation to an electricity bill like this.

How about waste heat recovery in Medicine Hat? Waste heat recovery came on stream in 2000 right in Medicine Hat. TransCanada owns that. A great alternative energy plant. Again, no taxpayer debt on there. Imagine that.

An Hon. Member: Waste heat recovery in Joffre.

Mr. MacIntyre: Yes, as my hon. colleague is pointing out, waste heat recovery in Joffre.

Another waste heat recovery in Caroline, the Caroline gas complex, 20 megawatts of capacity. No government had to tell them to do that. They did that because it was a good business model to do that. If you allow the free market to be free, people will innovate. We've had tons of innovation.

Another biomass, 25 megawatts in Grande Prairie.

Another 50 megawatts – oh my goodness – came online in 1985. Hinton. No NDP government in power at that time. Nobody had to tell them to do that, and no debt on the backs of taxpayers.

Another waste heat came online in Swan Hills.

Another biomass in Peace River. Fifty two megawatts at the Peace River pulp mill. My goodness.

To listen to the minister and the members opposite, you would think that there was never a renewables plant that came online until this government, this NDP government, came to power in May 2015, yet nothing could be further from the truth. They claim that it was broken and there's no way they could attract investment for renewables. That is an untrue statement that has come from this government repeatedly. I'm reading you renewable projects, alternative energy projects that came online without the government having to force it, without taxpayers having to bear the burden.

Now this government is running through this Legislature Bill 16, and let's get 'er through. Let's get it done lickety-split. Let's not look at it, and, for goodness' sake, let's not invite Albertans to come talk to us about it.

5:30

The hon. member is claiming: no, I don't think I can support this going to committee. This government has repeatedly indicated their fear of having Albertans talk to them about their legislation. We saw that with Bill 6. We saw it with bills 27, 25, 34. We're seeing it again with Bill 16. It's shameful.

Another biomass project, 48 megawatts, came online in 2011, the Grande Prairie pulp mill. Weyerhaeuser, again, made a business decision because it was sound business economics to do so. If you allow the free market to do its job, it will always correct itself.

We also had some hydro happen. TransAlta has got a number of hydro assets at Barrier, Bearspaw, going all the way back to 1991. In 1972 it was Big Horn. At Brazeau it's 355. Again, no government had to order them to do that. TransAlta did it because it was a great business decision to do so. They approached their shareholders, and the shareholders said: yep; sounds like a good plan; let's do it. No government came. There was no NDP government then. Look at all the hydro in Raymond and Cochrane and Seebe and Kananaskis, page after page. ATCO owns some. TransAlta owns most.

And then wind power. Oh, my goodness. We actually had wind power in this province before this NDP government came along. Can you imagine?

An Hon. Member: No way.

Mr. MacIntyre: Yeah. It's true. It's actually true.

We had 66 megawatts come on at the Ardenville wind farm, owned by TransAlta, down by Fort Macleod. No government had to order them to do that. They did it because it was a good business case. Then they built 66 more megawatts, Blue Trail, down by Fort Macleod again. At Pincher Creek 44 megawatts came online in 2000; at Drumheller more wind power, 77 megawatts; the Castle Rock wind farm, owned by Enel. No government had to order them or tell them or try to coax them to do it. They did it because it was a good, sound business decision. The government didn't have to artificially create an environment that attracted investment. It happened naturally in a free-market enterprise.

But this government doesn't understand basic economics. They think that they have to force things, they have to create a false environment, they have to forcibly shut down perfectly good coal generation to create a shortfall, to make some kind of business case for renewables to come in when we're already over capacity, to build generation we do not actually need right now, to try to protect consumers from some sort of price spike, that they know full well is coming when they short the power system.

Look at all the wind power. We've got 150 megawatts installed in Halkirk. It came online in 2012 from Capital Power. In 2012 it came online. This government claims that the system was broken, that we couldn't get any renewables investment. There are at least 40 renewables projects in my hand that somehow or other these investors thought were a great idea, without the NDP government trying to entice them with a false market that they're creating. No. They did it because it was a sound business decision. And it was all kinds of companies: Enmax, TransAlta, Capital Power, Nextera. These companies all have something to say.

This government needs to put this bill to committee so that everyday Albertans can come and talk to them. Consumer groups are going to have a lot to say about this. Rural electrification associations are going to have a lot to say about this. Alberta's retailers of energy are going to have a lot to say about this. This government has not fairly consulted with the people of this province and the energy providers in this province. They cannot sit there or even stand there with a straight face and say: yeah; we've talked to everybody, and they're all good to go. No.

The purpose of having a committee is so that we can talk to Albertans. They can come and talk to us, and we can hear what they've got to say about this piece of legislation and others. I'm a firm believer in having bills go to committee so that Albertans and business owners in our province can come talk to us. There are other segments of our economy that are going to have words of wisdom, and this government is not availing themselves of it. It's shameful. I would hope that every member of this Legislature would look forward to hearing from Albertans on every piece of legislation so that we get it right.

Either this is a democracy or it isn't. If we're going to claim to be a democracy, then that means we need to listen to the people. We need to listen to them more than once every four years during an election cycle. They need to have a continual conversation with their representatives in this House, informing us of what they think about particular pieces of legislation, especially legislation like this, that directly impacts their pocketbook, that has the potential of doing harm.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members with questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thanks. Yes, I would like to speak to the referral motion. I really do think that we need to take the time to hear the people who are going to have to pay for the consequences of this. The opportunity to refer it to committee really gives a little bit of time to give some sober second thought and allow people to express their fears and their concerns.

I'd like to focus a little bit on the human side of this, why it's urgent. We've heard all of the technical stuff. We've heard lots of detail. But the reality is that there is a human price to misguided policy on electrical legislation. There's a human price to the overpricing of power. For that reason, I think the people that have to pay for it and live with it need an opportunity to speak, an opportunity to express their fears and their concerns.

I'd like to share a bit of a story of where this misguided power and policy leads to from a current article, actually today, an opportunity just to look at what's actually happening in other jurisdictions as a warning to us about the human cost of all of this. This isn't some imaginary dystopian future. It's what's actually happening, reported today in a paper, of what happens when government introduces policy after policy with harmful and predictable consequences of increasing electricity prices.

The article comes from the Recorder & Times in Brockville, Ontario.

Nearly 500 local jobs will be lost within three years after Proctor and Gamble announced Wednesday it will close its Brockville operations [in] 2020.

Employees of the Brockville site were informed at a meeting early Wednesday of the decision.

And they've attributed it to a review of their North American supply network design.

So they are going to relocate to West Virginia, out of Ontario and actually out of Canada, which will impact their business immensely. Mostly what I want to focus on is that it will impact the 480 or so people who actually work in this plant. The transitions are announced. They've been feared for some time. But the result will be the permanent closure of this Brockville plant by 2020, and these people will be out of work.

I think in order to bring that a little bit closer to home, we need to very carefully relate this to exactly what the federal government has done in closing down their office in Vegreville. The families there have suffered their future loss of income, the fear of the loss of real estate values in that town, the emotional trauma. The anxiety that that has caused in Vegreville is no different than what happens in Brockville when a plant closes down and 480 people, who all represent families, are thrown out of work. That's the human consequence of what happens with endlessly escalating power increases.

These people, Procter & Gamble, had been doing a study of their North American supply network for several years, and the reality is that the supply of electricity is part of that equation. For them, they just realized that there were much better opportunities elsewhere, so they decided to close down the plant and move.

Jeff LeRoy, a Procter & Gamble company communications spokesperson, said exactly what you would expect him to say. He said that the decision to close production in Brockville was difficult. But the reality is that excessive costs always trump the difficult emotional realities of these kinds of decisions. While it's difficult, they do it anyway, and people are put out of jobs. Their lives are thrown against the rock, so to speak. They have no ability to pay their mortgage. Maybe their real estate prices drop. Their whole lives are seriously impacted. We need to think about the human costs of this, which is why we need to take the time to send this to committee and give it some sober second thought.

Brockville Mayor David Henderson said that the news is a blow that was not entirely unexpected. Why not entirely unexpected? They knew that the price of power was forcing these kinds of reviews. Other companies in Ontario have done exactly the same thing. He said that everybody has been on the edge of their seats for some time, waiting for this whole thing to happen. Then he said that when it actually happens, it's brutal. That's the human pain of driving up electricity costs by bad regulation and by misguided policy. That's the reality of lives that need to be considered.

The news of the pending plant closure was devastating to all of these people, and I think it's something that we really need to take into consideration when we think about a bill like this because the facts are quite simple. We are following essentially in the same direction as Ontario, and Ontario, ahead of us, has actively driven away manufacturers and businesses with overpriced electricity and in the same way has driven away jobs, prosperity, family security, and all that goes with it. The results are heartbreaking for the families that depend on these things for their livelihoods.

Ontario has gone from at one point in time having some of the most affordable electricity in North America to now having some of the most expensive, and there is a true human cost to this. From 2013-15 alone, just a couple of years, industrial electricity rates rose 16 per cent in Ontario. Now here in Alberta we're probably going to see a policy that's going to drive electricity rates to more than double.

The high cost of electricity is unavoidably harmful because – I mean, it's something that can be managed differently. Electricity is not one of those things that you can not use. It's an essential item in our lifestyle. The reality of the cap that we're here debating today and the need to send it to committee is that the businesses that provide jobs for people and a lifestyle and an income, these industries, especially the bigger industries, are not protected from this cap. They are going to get hit with the price of this, and when they re-evaluate the realities of their economic survival in a particular jurisdiction over time, if it becomes unbearable, they do exactly what's been happening in Ontario. They pack up and move somewhere else and leave the people behind with no hope. There is no hope in this when your job walks away from you.

Our heavy industry in Alberta provides the employment that families need to pay their bills. These are our job creators, and this bill is an admission that retail prices will probably more than double in the next four years due to this crazy kind of policy and legislation that we're pushing forward here. So we need to take a step back. We need to take a breath. We need to allow the people to come before us and share their heartbreaking stories and fears of what's going to happen in their lives.

This is just one, this story that I've shared with you, of many more warning signs to our industry that prices will drive out business, will leave families suffering, will leave families without income, without the ability to provide for their living, and businesses will consider other jurisdictions. The high cost of electricity puts Ontario businesses at a severe disadvantage, and now we're importing exactly the same thing into Alberta with all of these policies.

The reality is that I have to support the motion because I cannot support the bill. The truth is that by pushing this forward without going to committee, this government doesn't have Albertans' backs. You're hiding the real price of power behind their backs. You haven't got their backs. You're hiding it behind their backs. You're not making life better for Albertans; you're going to be making life a whole lot more bitter for Albertans. You're going to be driving them into power poverty. They're going to be losing their life-giving jobs like Ontario's thousands of people with no power supply because they can't afford to pay their bill and they can't afford to live with a permanently spiked power price. When you follow these kinds of policies, what happens is that the power price spikes and it stays spiked. People can't afford to pay for that, so then there are thousands of people in Alberta who have no power at all. Then the government has to come along – well, we won't even go there.

Like Ontario, businesses are going to be going away. Economic diversity is destroyed by high power prices. Economic opportunity is denied. The economy shrinks. Prosperity vanishes. When you double and quadruple the price from the current 3 cents – this is complete doublespeak. You are not protecting people. You are exposing them in extremely serious ways.

We need to send this to committee. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Anybody wishing to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just wanted to speak to what my colleague from Lacombe-Ponoka was speaking about and specifically to Ontario.

But before I get to that, I just want to also mention that my colleague from Innisfail-Sylvan Lake was bringing up a whole bunch of different companies that were already investing. If you actually look at TransAlta's history of what they've invested, I mean, they own wind, solar, natural gas, and 27 hydro facilities that have a total capacity of 936 megawatts. That was long before this government ever came into being. Again, it's imperative that that free market is there so that renewables, when they do come online, are economically viable and we can actually afford to pay for them and give people the choice and the opportunity to choose how they want their electricity brought to them.

But of note in Ontario – and this is from the financial accountability office – Ontario will spend $45 billion to save ratepayers $24 billion on their electricity bills. This is from their watchdog, which, I might add, on renewables on our side of things has kind of been undercut here. What it says here is that Ontario's budget watchdog says that the Liberal government will spend $45 billion over the life of its hydro plan, Madam Speaker, to save people $24 billion on their electricity bills. This report from the financial accountability office says that this means there will be a net cost of $21 billion to Ontarians over the approximately 30 years of the plan. This is because of the rebates. Through the debt the cost to the province could balloon up to as much as $93 billion. Take note. Here we go.

An Hon. Member: It sounds like Bill 34.

Mrs. Aheer: It does sound an awful lot like Bill 34, doesn't it? There is your Balancing Pool, and there is your blank cheque. It's identical, just to be clear.

The Premier of that province is spending again in the same way that Ontario got into trouble the last time. Maybe we could learn a thing or two from that mistake. The legislation to cut electricity bills by 17 per cent on average on top of the 8 per cent rebate is before the House, and if this passes, this is what they're going to be looking at.

I don't understand. The whole point of referring this to committee is to try and avoid these kinds of boondoggles. If you actually talked to the industry that's been involved up until now, that, I would have to say, has a whole lot more expertise than I do in this House – I would certainly like to be able to hear from them so that as legislation comes forward, we actually can make good legislation, that is not going to hurt the families that the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka was speaking about.

Is it the government's intent to erase all competition so that it can control supply and demand? Well, again, it didn't work, did it? No, it didn't. Again, just in case you didn't get this message, the shift of the burden goes to the taxpayer and the ratepayer, from the investor to my shoulders, to our constituents' shoulders, to the taxpayers' shoulders. That's where this goes. I personally am going to spend every single day making sure that Albertans understand this, especially if we don't even have a chance to go to committee and talk about this reasonably in a place where we can actually hash out some of the details. I will personally make sure that everybody I come in contact with knows what they're doing and help them understand how this is going to negatively impact them because – let me tell you, Albertans better get ready for this onslaught. It will be huge once it hits.

The NDP wants a centrally planned system, with no consumer input, obviously, if we're not going to even refer it to committee. We're not asking for the moon here. We're asking for a little bit of time to actually discuss this legitimately, to find out the direction that this needs to go. The government has purposely created this mess. The government and the industry have zero risk. You know why? Because it's not their money. The government keeps forgetting. This is a privilege that you have, spending hard-earned tax dollars. This government is going to be responsible for future generations of debt, destroying industry, and our children and grandchildren will inherit this mess. So send this bill to committee. Here's an opportunity to fix this before it gets off the ground.

The transition from coal-fired has already happened. We already know that. Investors were onboard with that transition. We knew that, too.

But on top of the billions lost on the PPA debacle – the fact that accountability has been removed from the minister's purview as to Bill 27 gave her all the ammunition she needs to build new infrastructure without ever having to speak to Albertans, whether there's a need for it or not. That demands a motion to go to committee. The MSA can no longer take complaints about renewables unless the minister decides she wants to do that. She can go whichever direction she wants to go. The MSA has also been demoted and can no longer take investigative action against the minister with respect to bringing renewables online. Another reason to go to committee. But the bill goes even further. Now the minister can actually direct the MSA to go against filling its own mandate, which is policing the industry. Yet another reason to go to committee. I think Albertans will be very interested in understanding that the government has zero – zero – accountability to them when it comes to bringing renewables online.

This cap is a deliberate deception, and the consumer takes all of the risk, Madam Speaker. The energy-only model was competitive. The auction goes to the lowest bidder winning, thereby protecting the customer.

The renewables target of 30 per cent: why that number? Again, maybe we should go to committee.

The carbon tax is not a bottomless pit. It comes from our taxpayers. The carbon tax comes from Albertans. Then the government is going to subsidize the generators with our money.

You claim to ride in on a white horse to save us from the evil of price volatility and the evil twin of the deregulated market, but the Balancing Pool has no accountability because of Bill 34, and then the taxpayers are going to pay for that. Twenty billion dollars is actually the price tag for that. You might want to go to committee.

Plus, there's the $600,000, that Terry Boston wrote the four-page letter about confirming this boondoggle. You might want to go to committee.

Now the government will determine the price, and we will pay for it. That's how the government intends to make life better for Albertans.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other speakers to the referral amendment?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

[Motion on amendment to second reading of Bill 16 lost]

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, I will recognize the hon. Minister of Energy to close debate.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: No. I'm good.

The Acting Speaker: Okay.

[Motion carried; Bill 16 read a second time]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I think we've made some excellent progress here today, with some vigorous debate. Seeing the time, I move that we call it 6 o'clock and adjourn until tomorrow morning.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:57 p.m.]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Deputy Speaker: Good morning.

Let us reflect. As we conclude our work here this week, let us take extra time to show appreciation for our families. They stand by us, support us, and make it possible for us to do our jobs. Let us seek opportunities this weekend to rest, rejuvenate, and energize alongside our families and loved ones so that we can return energized and strengthened, able to continue our work on behalf of our communities and of all Albertans.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 16

An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Chair. Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates: at a quick look at this you would think, "That's great. It's going to reduce electricity for Albertans. What could go wrong?" Well, unfortunately, a lot could go wrong. We've sat here with this government over the past two years and looked at the multiple bills that they've brought forward, and a lot has gone wrong. We look at the carbon tax and the widespread effects of the carbon tax on the economy in Alberta, on jobs, on business. We look at the accelerated coal phase-out and the cost on communities, on jobs, on the cost of electricity. All of these things have a ripple effect in our economy and our society.

Each time this government brings up these bills, we sit here on this side of the House and warn them of the things that could go wrong, and they shrug their shoulders. Then they bring forward something else. It seems like half the bills that they bring forward now are damage control for the bills that they've already passed, that we warned them were going to be a problem. Nobody likes an I told you so, but what else are we to do when we're representing the people of Alberta and their best interests? Now, the members on the other side, I guess, think that's funny, all these damaging effects of the bills that they've passed, but it's really not that funny.

Now, obviously, when you put a cap on electricity that's twice the current rate, that would indicate that there's some concern that the electricity rates are going to double. Why would you put a cap at double the existing rate if you weren't concerned that it was going to raise to that point or beyond?

Now, obviously, there seem to be some problems understanding, I guess, the difference between a ratepayer and a taxpayer. A ratepayer is somebody that purchases electricity or relies on any form of electricity in their lives. I would challenge anybody in this House to find me some person in Alberta that doesn't rely on electricity for something in their life. If this cap actually comes into effect, where that actually stops the rate of climb of electricity in Alberta, who's going to pay for that? If that company cannot operate with the electricity rate at 6.8 cents a kilowatt hour, then what options does that company have? There are really only two options. It can shut down its business because, obviously, if we can't make money, it's going to have to do something. Or, of course, the government is going to have to pay for it. Now, the government doesn't have any money that it doesn't take from the taxpayer, so therein lies the problem, the difference between a ratepayer and a taxpayer.

If this cap comes into place and the company cannot keep operating at 6.8 cents a kilowatt hour or less, then the government comes in and uses taxpayer money to fund electricity. Now, I don't understand where there's an actual benefit to Albertans because either way they're paying for it. But what I can see is the government being able to say, "Well, lookit, our electricity rates are only 6.8 cents a kilowatt hour," but that's not the full cost of it when we're using taxpayer money to subsidize it. So, Madam Chair, ratepayer, taxpayer: they're both Albertans. Every Albertan relies on electricity at some point in their life, probably at some point in their day, and I would suggest that almost all Albertans rely on electricity at some point every single day if not every single hour or minute of their lives.

Mr. Coolahan: Not me.

Mr. Loewen: Actually, one of the members opposite in the NDP suggested that they don't, but I presume they must not exist in this building right now that has lights on. I guess they think they're pretty funny over there, but I don't think Albertans are laughing, Madam Chair. [interjections] I don't think Albertans are laughing.

Now, this bill is an admission that the retail rates . . .

Mr. Hunter: Point of order.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

The Chair: We have a point of order. Go ahead, hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Madam Chair, you know what? There's a lot of banter going back and forth, which is understandable, but I think that the comment of calling the member a racist is completely out of line. I would say that definitely an apology is in order.

The Chair: Do you wish to respond to this, Acting Deputy Government House Leader?

Cortes-Vargas: Madam Chair, as was brought forward a few days ago, heckles are happening in the Chamber, and I think that that's exactly what's happened.

The Chair: Hon. members, I was focused on the member who had the floor, Grande Prairie-Smoky. I didn't hear those kinds of comments. I'd be concerned if those were the types of things that were being said. There are certainly appropriate heckles, and there are things that are inappropriate to ever be said in this House. So I would encourage all hon. members to please be aware of that and conduct themselves appropriately.

Let's move on. Grande Prairie-Smoky has the floor.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Chair. Now, this bill is an admission that the government expects retail rates to more than double within the next four years, and this is due to reckless NDP policy on this electricity file.

Now, not everybody in Alberta is protected by this cap. Some of our largest job creators in the province aren't covered by this. So if electricity rates balloon past this and these job creators in Alberta are subject to astronomical electricity rates, that makes them less competitive in the global economy, even the Canada-wide economy. If they're not competitive, what are they going to do? Lose money? Move their corporations elsewhere? Not expand in Alberta? Those are the unintended consequences that some of these bills that this government has brought forward cause. What we need to do is that we need to stop these damaging bills, these bills that are hurting our economy. They're hurting our jobs. They're making Alberta less competitive. They are not helpful to Albertans. This government talks about having Albertans' backs, but there's nothing in these bills that has Albertans' backs. This one right here: regardless of what the cost of electricity is, Albertans will be paying for it. Either they'll be paying for it in taxes, or they'll be paying for it in electricity rates. It's very simple.

Now, we have to have at least learned something from the Ontario experience with electricity and what it's done to them. There's another government that's constantly trying to undo the damage that they created themselves. This bill is really all about hiding the true cost of electricity from Albertans. Because Albertans won't see the exact cost on their bill, the government is taking cover with that. Since the full price won't be on the bill and it actually comes from the taxpayers' money unseen – but because it's unseen, it doesn't mean it's not happening. There are other options available to accomplish some of the same things that this government wants to do, but they always seem to take the worst path, and that's not necessary.

Again, I mean, we have an opportunity to see this same thing in action in Ontario, and for some reason we ignore that here in this House. I shouldn't say that we ignore it. On this side of the House we bring it up all the time. Look at Ontario. Look what it cost the people of Ontario. This government, I guess, doesn't hear that or doesn't want to listen to that, but I think we can learn a lot by looking at what others have done and have failed at.

Now, I guess if there's anything they did learn from Ontario, that's how to hide the high cost of this irresponsible transition to renewables. I guess that's one thing they did learn: "Okay. We can hide this. We can hide this by having it subsidized by taxpayer money, unseen on a bill." But I don't think taxpayers are so excited to have what they pay be for something hidden, and I don't think they want to pay for this government's poor policies. I think Albertans are frustrated by the carbon tax. That's shown in every poll that's ever been done on the carbon tax. What's interesting is that the more the government spends advertising the carbon tax, the more Albertans hate it. That's a fact. This doesn't protect Albertans. All it does is show that this government admits that their electricity policies are going to drive up the cost of electricity. That's plain and simple.

Now, when we talk about the regulated rate option, that's offered to residential and small-business customers who consume less than 250,000 kilowatt hours per year. There are 1.6 million users eligible for an RRO, but most of our larger, job-creating industries are not eligible for the RRO and will not be protected from this government's costly and misguided overhaul of our electricity system.

Now, we understand that this government has a certain ideology that they want to put into Alberta, this NDP world view that we hear about, but I don't think Albertans want to pay for that world view. The RRO is the rate that customers who have not chosen to enter into a contract with an electricity retail supplier receive automatically, and most consumers continue with this default rate. Again, it's roughly half of what this cap is.

Now, most Albertans have the option of choosing between three rates: the floating rate, the fixed rate, and the regulated retail rate. The floating rate is highly variable, changing with ups and downs of the market, but it is currently the lowest, at 3.14 cents per kilowatt hour.

The fixed rate varies by company. It is generally a three- to five-year, fixed-rate, locked-in price per kilowatt hour that is guaranteed throughout the term of the contract. The fixed rate offers a maximum insulation against price shocks and currently averages 6.08 cents. That's using a 13-month average.

These just show how unnecessary this bill is. There are already options, and in fact all the options are less than the electricity cap that this government wants to put forward. The only reason to have this bill is if this government expects electricity rates to double. That's clear, and I think Albertans are finding that alarming. I find it alarming. This is basically foreshadowing the future that this government sees for Albertans, more than doubled electricity rates.

Now, this is on top of the government's last two budgets, which added over $10 billion a year to the government's debt. There's no shortage of money being spent by this government. There's no shortage of taxes being collected. We look at the carbon tax that this government implemented, the largest tax increase in Alberta's history. I always get a kick out of listening to the government talk about the levy. It's a tax. In their own government budget it's listed under taxes. When the money is being clawed back from widows, who's clawing it back? Revenue Canada. What's Revenue Canada's job? Taxes. It is interesting to hear this government talk about things like that.

Again, they seem to think it's funny. The carbon tax is funny to them. I don't think it's funny to the Albertans that have to pay this, the people that looked at their gas bill at the end of January and realized how much it cost, and then to realize that the carbon tax is going up 50 per cent at the beginning of the year, so even more.

Now, we've talked about how unfair the carbon tax is to all Albertans but especially to Albertans who live in northern Alberta, where we travel greater distances for services. We travel greater distances to go to work. It tends to be a little colder, so it costs a little more to heat our buildings. The cost of transportation of goods up there is more. All these different things that the carbon tax has increased the cost of and burdened Albertans with: what do we get for it? We get free light bulbs installed by an Ontario company, and we get bills like this.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Madam Chair. This bill was introduced by this government, who voiced the reason that Alberta ratepayers needed protection from something. This government felt like they needed to step in and protect the good people of Alberta from what they called spiking, volatile, and uncertain electricity prices, that it was necessary for this government to come along and be the saviour, so to speak, of Albertans from what this government claimed could be extraordinarily high electricity prices, and that this government was going to cap those retail prices at 6.8 cents as a means of ensuring that Albertans would never feel the pinch of electricity price spikes.

One of the things that the government pointed out was that prices for electricity under the RRO had spiked to as high as 15 cents, and as my hon. colleague from Bonnyville-Cold Lake pointed out yesterday, that was actually an illegal activity that was done by TransAlta, for which they got themselves in a good deal of trouble and got a $56 million fine. The Market Surveillance Administrator caught them red-handed and did what the MSA does. They're our electricity police, as I like to call them. So to use that as some kind of an example of an extreme price spike that we need protection from is really kind of smoke and mirrors in that the MSA did their job, caught TransAlta at it. They were fined. The problem was solved.

It's interesting to note that this government, that is claiming they need to do this today to protect Albertans from a potential price spike, is the same government that is denying the MSA the liberty to investigate renewable projects under Bill 27 if you recall. I find it kind of laughable that the government is claiming to be the saviour, the great protector of Albertans on the one hand and on the other hand is denying the MSA the right to do their job as the electricity police but only with regard to renewable projects, that somehow we don't need that kind of protection.

When I look at the reasons this government is putting forward for this bill, that it is to protect Albertans from price spikes, the only way anyone would actually believe that is if they didn't realize that there is already protection and has been protection for a long time. As of right now, today, this day, you could sign up with a number of providers for a two-year contract at 5.49 cents, fixed for a whole two years. If you didn't want to stay on a fixed-rate option, some of these providers will allow you to cancel your contract and go back on the RRO if you can do better on the RRO. We have some members right in this House who chose to do things like that, who chose to leave their fixed contract because they felt they could do better on the floating rate. So they did that, and they saved money. I believe that the floating rate right now is somewhere around 3 cents.

The market had provided protection from price spikes all the way along, right from the beginning of our deregulated market. There was that option available to Albertans, and significant numbers of Albertans took advantage of locking in their power prices for long periods of time. I should also say that lots of Albertans also take advantage of locking in their natural gas prices for long periods of time. I say locking in, but I'm not aware of any of these retail contracts that you can't jump out of, giving sometimes one month's, sometimes two months' notice. For some of them it's just a few days' notice, and you can leave your fixed rate and go to a floating rate.

The point is that Albertans have had choice, and when you have a free market like that, with many, many choices, it is in that that there is protection. We are protected from all kinds of inordinately high prices by choices, competitive choices that we can look for as consumers in buying just about everything. In buying a cup of coffee, we don't need the government to protect us from price spikes in the world of coffee. We can choose to pay $7 to a certain trendy little place, or we could make it ourselves for pennies, and there's everything in the middle there that we can pick from. That's where consumers have the greatest protection, in the choice given to us, offered to us in a free-market economy.

I understand, you know, that for people with a really strong socialist bent a free-market economy is scary. I don't understand why, because if you look at places around the world where socialism has gone to the nth degree, their economies break down. Take a look at Venezuela today. It's all falling down. I'm sure that that government thought at the time that they were doing a lot of things to protect their people.

In many regards the best protection consumers can ever have is a competitive market, where companies have to compete for our business and I am free to make a choice between company A or B or C based on what I think is best for me. It's my money. I'm the best decider as to how to spend it.

Now, when you look at the backstory behind this bill – and I did mention some things about this last night – some of the history as to how we got to this place legislatively has been one disastrous decision after another made by this government, to the point now where this government obviously has done some calculating and this government is absolutely certain that prices are going to go up. Otherwise, there would be no need whatsoever to cap the RRO. There would be no need. But, obviously, prices are going to go up so much because of this government's mismanagement of the electricity file that this government is terrified of seeing their mismanagement printed out on electricity bills that will be in the hands of every Albertan every month, reminding them month after month after month of the calamity this government has caused in what was actually a very stable electricity market. But somehow this government figures people need protecting from that, from spikes.

But let's be really clear as to who is the culprit causing these spikes. It is this NDP government and this government's mismanagement of this file beginning in July of 2015, just days after they came to power. They decided they had a hate on for coal and they were going to attack our coal industry, and that has not abated one bit. So here we are today, one misstep after another after another, and now the government is so terrified of having their mismanagement shown on an electricity bill. They want to protect Albertans? No. They are out to protect themselves. This cap on the RRO is nothing more than a cap on the public relations disaster that would occur if Albertans actually saw the real cost of this government's mismanagement on the electricity file.

This government is also terrified of seeing anything of the like that Ontarians are going through right now, where they are suffering from severe energy poverty over there and it's only growing day by day. As we heard last night, the Ontario government is going to spend $48 billion to save $24 billion. I have hon. members over here that are businessmen. How's that for an ROI? Buy high, sell low: how does that work? It's just phenomenal mismanagement on a horrific scale. This government has tried repeatedly to distance themselves from their friends in Ontario. That debacle, nevertheless, step after step after step, is definitely following in their footsteps, forcibly retiring coal plants that still had lots of life left in them, that had been deploying all kinds of antipollution devices and cleanup within their systems, making them the best they possibly can, and then punishing them for it.

It's just one thing after another, forcibly taking offline all of that generation to force up prices to make it more attractive for renewables to come here and invest, so they claim. Yet last night before this House I went through some of the many renewable and alternative energy generators that have done things in this province without having to throw utility debt on the back of our taxpayers, without having to cap an RRO, without having the government come in like some pretend white knight to save the day. They made sound business discussions and installed things like biomass, like wind generation, hydro, and so on. We've had businesses in this province do exploratory work on run of the river.

There's been work done here to explore even using our flowing gas and oil wells that we have and using the heat energy from those wells to generate electricity. It's being done just south of the border. Resource companies have been taking marginal wells that still have some pressure in them – they're marginal, but the fluids coming out are still hot enough – and taking that heat and converting it to electricity, and now that well that was only marginal has become very profitable. They didn't need the government to tell them to do that. It was a sound business decision. They're selling electricity into the grid, improving their cash flow on that well. That kind of work has been looked at here, too, without having a government to tell them that we need to do this. In the business world there are choices in a free market economy, and for us consumers we need choices, too. That is always the very best protection for us.

Now, we have a government that thinks that unless the government does it, it isn't going to get done. That, too, is not actually true. Governments have an incredible ability for getting things wrong. As my hon. colleague has already said, this bill really is an admission that prices are going to be pressured upwards, and this government is terrified of seeing that happen.

Now, we have some issues, of course, because we've got a situation where this government has so meddled in our electricity system that the business environment in this province has now been turned on its head. I remember speaking to some of the executives within the industry in the fall of 2015. They had communicated to me that they'd been speaking with the government, trying to get the government to understand that the industry had some answers for the government's direction towards lessening our carbon footprint. They attempted repeatedly to communicate those plans to the government, and the government continually turned them down.

Those plans that they put forward would have spared us getting to this point today where we are looking at some serious price hikes in the cost of electricity. The industry's plans, if the government had accepted them, I can tell you, would have saved us at least $4.437 billion because the proposals put forward by those companies would not have resulted in the power purchase arrangements being thrown back into the Balancing Pool. We would have been spared that. In addition, those proposals from industry would have resulted in an immediate reduction in our carbon footprint. Immediate. By I guess it was November of 2015 we would have seen a reduction in emissions from coal-fired generation immediately. But, no, the government turned them down.

That proposal was put forward voluntarily by industry with a solution that would have worked, that would have actually preserved jobs. It wouldn't have cost any jobs. I specifically spoke to those executives about that: are you telling me that the proposal that you put forward to this government to reduce capacity would not have cost any jobs? They guaranteed me that, no, not one job would have been lost. "But what about compensation?" I asked. "How much compensation were you asking for to go forward with this?" "Zero dollars. No compensation costs whatsoever." So I can say with surety in this House that if this government had listened to the experts in the industry in the fall of 2015, it would have spared Albertan taxpayers this looming debt in the pool of $4.437 billion. That's a significant misstep on the part of this government, and now here we are today.

Now, this government introduced a Bill 34 to also protect them in the same way that this bill is an attempt to protect them, to protect them from the reality of an angry Alberta voter base because under the problems this government had created in the Balancing Pool, the Balancing Pool was facing insolvency. We received through FOIP the actual communications of executives in the pool wanting to meet with lawyers and accountants to discuss insolvency. This government broke the electricity system. It was not broken until they started meddling with it. That narrative that they've been trying to push, that this Bill 16 is part and parcel of a great big plan they have to fix a broken electricity system, is actually not true. I wish we could use the L-word in here because that's exactly what they have been doing to Albertans on this narrative.

There is no way our electricity system was broken. Did it need tweaking? Absolutely it did. But the manner in which this government has gone about doing it is entirely wrong. They have been hurting our electricity system from the get-go. They are not protecting Albertans with this bill, nor were they protecting Albertans with Bill 34. The reason for Bill 34 was simply because the Balancing Pool was going broke because of this government's inaction and some policies that they had in place. The pool needed money. The government wasn't going to allow the pool to put their losses on our electric bill under the consumer allocation line item.

As a result of this Minister of Energy's constant delay in communicating with the chair of the Balancing Pool, the Balancing Pool suffered a $29 million penalty, that they had to pay out while they waited and waited and waited for the minister to make up her mind about the consumer allocation. What's interesting is that the initial request from the pool to the minister regarding the consumer allocation was 10 bucks. Ten bucks. That's all they were asking for, a consumer allocation of $10, but this government was so terrified of seeing any – any – increase whatsoever in people's electricity bill that the minister delayed responding and delayed responding.

Another letter went from the pool to the minister saying, well, more or less – I'm paraphrasing – I'm still waiting for your answer, but oh, by the way, we'll need a little more now in the consumer allocation, $13. I think we even have one letter later on: still waiting. The consumer allocation went up to 16 bucks. Over and over again the pool was trying to do the pool's job, and they'd been doing a very, very excellent job as an independent, arm's-length agency in looking after Albertans and our electricity system until this government started meddling in that independence.

At one point the pool simply was at a point where: we're going broke; we'd better do something about it. They let the government know. Their banker knew. Everyone knew. This government was so terrified ...

The Chair: Any other questions, comments, or amendments? The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Madam Chair. Just a few comments here. You know, this bill was put forward because we genuinely are concerned about Alberta citizens and their families and Alberta businesses, about price spikes in the electricity market. The other part of this bill is to transition into a more reliable, greener electricity system.

Mr. MacIntyre: It was already reliable.

Mr. Coolahan: Well, let's talk about if it was reliable or not and if price spikes were going to happen. What we are seeing: it was particularly acute and a bad system from about 2010 to 2014. Lots of headlines. I guess the opposition didn't read the newspaper back then. Let's just read some of the headlines. November 2010: Frigid Weather Sees Power Price Spike. July 2011: August Brings 30% Spike in Local Power Bills. December 2011: Anger over Electricity Prices Puts Producers on Edge. We are being genuine in our move to protect Albertans. Unfortunately, I believe, the opposition is being genuine in their defence of a system that they created, that isn't working for anybody.

Ms McPherson: The status quo.

Mr. Coolahan: The status quo. I talked about the legislative paralysis yesterday as well.

Here's another interesting tidbit from 2012, in which a steel producer outside of Edmonton says that every single day on their board – they have a board on their shop floor – that's the first thing they look at: what is the price of electricity? They pay by the hour, and if it gets too high, they just shut operations down. Is that the type of system we want? Absolutely not. We want protection for these businesses to keep people working and to keep production going. I'm not sure why they are defending this system at all.

Let's look at a couple more headlines before I sit down because I think we need to understand this. July 2012: now in a free market system, where private companies assume all risk, there's no incentive to build anything that isn't practically profitable; that makes the system less elastic and could lead us into occasional darkness. Now, we talked about the rolling blackouts in 2012 yesterday. April 2014: Albertans Warned of Power "Price Spike."

You know, this system is all based on volatility. That's how these companies make money. I'm not sure why the opposition continues to defend this practice and to defend this system. We are trying to make it better. We're trying to make it better for Albertans with this bill. We're trying to make it better for consumers. We're trying to make it better for businesses. We're trying to make it better for farms. Over there they just continue to defend an outdated system, and they continue to defend the decisions that they made back then. I think it's a shame that they don't allow Alberta to move forward. I mean, for many years they haven't allowed Alberta to move forward. I'm very proud that this government actually takes a stance and does the right thing for Albertans.

I'd like to hear more from the opposition, so I'm going to sit down for now, Madam Chair, but I look forward to it.

The Chair: Hon. member, just a reminder. You had a number of quotes. You will be tabling those documents later, please.

Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate it very much. Again, as always, I'm honoured to stand and speak to any bill that's in the House, especially when it comes to defending a sector that creates prosperity for all of us in this province and across Canada. Any time you look at putting caps on things, you have to remember that you could be capping prosperity. We saw that with Bill 25, with the cap on the oil sands. We brought a lot of things forward about those caps and about how that was going to impact the economy of Canada and the province. With respect to this cap, what's happening here is that it's a phony mechanism to use smoke and mirrors, to in some ways mislead Albertans into thinking that they're actually going to be saving money based on this cap on residential electricity. The truth is that right now we are at low prices.

The way that the electricity market works right now works and benefits the people of this province, including all of the industries that are in this province. We're just talking about residential specifically, but it's interesting because when you look at the dollar figure and how it works and the way that the pool works and the competitive market, that's actually what works for people, that market, if you let the market decide. When we're talking about renewables specifically, renewables are something that Alberta has been great at for a long time, as we described yesterday, Madam Chair. I mean, we have a tremendous amount of renewables already online. Bringing those online isn't the issue; it's about how it gets brought online.

A couple of the things. There was actually a really interesting article that I read. I won't quote from it because I don't have it front me, but there are two really fantastic environmental women that are working out in Ontario, and they were actually speaking about how to bring environmental pieces online.

Mr. Coolahan: Friends of Science?

Mrs. Aheer: No, no. They work with environmental sciences at the university. One of them actually has a doctorate, so she's actually sort of more towards the side about bringing renewables online.

The way that they talk about it is about how you engage the public to get the buy-in from the public. So you're looking at the environmental piece, but you're also looking at the economic piece and making sure that it's actually economically viable when you bring it online, whether that is upkeep of the particular infrastructure that's coming in, building new infrastructure, the costs of that really being transparent. There are a lot of issues when you're building new infrastructure with property rights and dealing with disturbance and all of those kinds of things, so there are a lot of discussions that need to happen with stakeholders, which is why we wanted to have this brought to committee, so that we could bring in a lot more people to have the discussion to find out what would be the appropriate way to move forward.

The concern here with Bill 27 is that it gave the minister the right to bring renewables online without actually letting the public know how that was going to work and how it's actually going to impact their pocketbook and the bill at the end of the day. So it's not even about whether or not to bring on renewables; it's how you do it – right? – when you bring them online. If they're economically viable, you're going to have buy-in from the public because they're going to understand. They're brought into the discussion, Madam Chair. They understand what's going on, and most people are going to want – if they have the choice to make that choice, they're going to make choices based on what's best for them and their families, the environment, all of the things that are important to people. But if it is rammed down their throat and into their taxes – like, right now, that 6.8 cap, the thing that I keep trying to say is that after four years, when the capacity market actually hits full swing, that's when we're going to see massive changes to people's bills. What are you going to do then? I mean, everybody in here keeps saying: well, we're not like Ontario. Well, I'm sorry. That's how they ended up like this, because of the situations of smoke and mirrors and not explaining how those dollars were coming forward.

Right now, like, the government keeps saying that the system is broken. Well, there are things that certainly could have been fixed, but to take a system like this that has no debt attached to it right now – we have no utility debt, Madam Chair, none. To take a system that has come to this mechanism and cap it in a way where with 6.8 cents, the minute that we go 1 cent over that, it's $10 million. Where is that coming from? Who's paying that? What about the money that goes to the Balancing Pool? Who's paying for that? What about the $600,000 that was spent by this government on the Boston report that basically explained how this was – where is that coming from?

I mean, let me bring this up, too. We have a 30 per cent target – right? – that requires the government to build in order to reach the targets. Well, does the government realize that that requires 100 per cent backup for wind and solar? One hundred per cent. That's a double build on absolutely everything in case the wind doesn't blow or the sun doesn't shine, one hundred per cent backup because, obviously, these pieces of infrastructure and these types of energy are not reliable.

So you look at that, and you're going to increase costs to bring on this infrastructure that, I think, given the market – and if the market was working and if the market flows and that is the right infrastructure to come online, the market will allow for that to happen. If they came online and are not subsidized, which they are everywhere else in the world, they come online and they have economic viability and the province buys into it and has the choice to have that infrastructure, well, then, you're not going to increase costs to people. But as it stands right now, by building that infrastructure plus having to double-build to make sure that you have 100 per cent backup because you have to have a baseload all the time – in order to have the lights go on, you have to have a baseload. That double build actually makes it that – why would you cap residential rates, then? It doesn't make any sense. The reason you have to cap it is because of the double build, because you have to be able to pay for it.

Madam Chair, that's the smoke and mirrors. That is absolutely the vision that is going on here. Behind the smoke and mirrors the capacity model has to be there in order to cover up all of the things that have to be done to build the infrastructure to get us to be able to have this stuff come online more than it already does. I mean, of course, the government has to realize that we already have wind online; we already have solar online. We have these things. I mean, there are a gazillion examples that the hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake gave yesterday and today.

Mr. MacIntyre: It was a gazillion?

Mrs. Aheer: Well, I'm exaggerating, but you know what I mean. Maybe not a gazillion but at least 80. We know there are 80, my point being: imagine, they did that all on their own without subsidy, without any input from the government. Imagine that.

If you're actually wanting to incite and bring people online, let's open up the market to allow for that to happen so that the market determines how that goes forward. We all have to be able to turn on our lights. We all have to be able to heat our houses. I mean, if we're looking at any of the other situations like vulnerable people, if we're talking about seniors' homes or any of the group homes like Wood's Homes or any of those, they're actually being negatively impacted by this carbon tax. Well, how is this going to impact groups like that, especially once that cap is done in four years and the capacity market hits full on?

Have we thought about that? Have we looked ahead to what that's actually going to cost these groups? Have we looked ahead to understand how that's going to impact young families who are buying houses, who are trying to come on and buy? I mean, they might not necessarily be buying new infrastructure. A lot of new families that are buying new homes are buying old homes. They're getting into homes. You know, they're getting mortgages for the first time. Like, we have to think about those things. By the time my son, for example, is old enough to purchase a house – well, he could probably purchase a house now. When he's able to actually settle down and buy a house, four years from now – guess what? – he's going to be getting hit with that capacity market full on, full stop. What is he going to do? He's 20 now, so when he's 24. My other son: same thing.

Do you know what I find really interesting, too? It's kind of off topic, but it's interesting. My younger son, who's 18, who lives at home with me, who does not drive a car and does not pay for electricity, got a carbon tax cheque. Yeah. I find it interesting that my son, who lives at home, who lives with me, does not own a car, does not pay for gas, does not pay for electricity, does not in any way get impacted right now by any payments into that, got a carbon tax cheque. It's interesting because the government keeps saying: oh, we're going to help people. Well, no, you're not. Those dollars, when my son lives in my house, certainly could have gone to somebody who needed it. I can guarantee you that. He doesn't need it. Anyway, he donated it to a charity of his choice.

The point is that $100 and the amount of money that actually went into creating that cheque and carving that cheque and the bureaucracy that was – we all know that that's not just $100. There's an entire piece of bureaucracy that was attached to creating that cheque to go out to my son. We know that it's worth well over $100 by the time it leaves my pocket, goes to the government, and comes back to my son. Let's just be clear there.

The other thing, too, is that the carbon tax cheque, for example – and we were talking about this yesterday. The carbon tax is what the government keeps saying that they're going to use in order to make sure that this capacity model and the cap works. Well, again, guess what? Those are taxpayer dollars. Holy double-dipping. You have the carbon tax, which you're ding people for, and then you're going to cap electricity, whereby all of the other pieces of infrastructure coming along are going to come through their property taxes and their personal taxes on top of that. And then by the time four years goes by, you're going to hit them with a capacity market. Wow. Thank you. I'm sure Albertans are thanking you. I'm sure that when you go out and speak to the people in your constituencies, they're going to be thanking you for this. Like I said yesterday, I'll make sure that every single person I come in contact with has the facts. Every single person.

Honestly, like, Albertans are savvy. If I'm wrong, they'll tell me that I'm wrong. There are a lot of people who are way more intelligent on this file than I am – that's for sure – and most of them are the people that I just get to talk to every day. People know their bills. By the way, people are going to be looking at their bills. The minute that they see a movement, a shift, or anything, believe me, you're going to know about it. I already hear about those things, just in case you haven't. It sounds to me like the government is getting lots of pats on the back for their choices. Well, I have a feeling that's going to change very soon.

The other thing is that the backup energy that I was speaking about with regard to this infrastructure is wasteful. I mean, first of all, it shows no significant changes in GHGs, and it has to run a baseload in order to make sure that renewables can work. How does that work? I don't understand how in any way that's more efficient, how you're going to save money. You're double-building infrastructure absolutely everywhere. Oh, and on top of that, solar and wind is not necessarily near the infrastructure it needs to be in order to get it to people's homes. Isn't that interesting how that works? There's an entire chunk of infrastructure in there that's going to need to be built in order to get that to people's homes.

The market has to decide what the best mix of renewables and nonrenewables are, otherwise the government is subsidizing, and they're subsidizing unreliable renewables. You have to manipulate the ratepayer in order to be able to do that. I just don't understand how that's sound policy.

Again, I think what's really disconcerting for me, having had the privilege of having the energy portfolio when I was first elected – I mean, I came into that portfolio with, you know, a teeny-weeny bit of knowledge, a bit of savvy and understanding. My dad was a chemical engineer, so I had a little bit of understanding. The energy industry just opened its arms just wonderfully, just took me in and educated me on all sorts of things. I still feel like I only have, like, a 30,000-foot view. It's a very humble view. But it's about listening to people – right? – and understanding that in this province we have the best of the best when it comes to this industry. The best of the best. That's everything from electricity markets to geologists and everybody in between.

These people love this province desperately, and they also know what it means to create prosperity. When you have people that create prosperity, that know that it's not just for them but that it's for the entire country, you're dealing with a completely different group of people. Their reach is so much more beyond just their company or what they're doing. They know that they're job creators. They know that their families will be successful because their neighbour is successful. They know how that works. That's a fabric of the communities. For those of us who live in, you know, communities that surround the cities and stuff, we know what that's like. It wouldn't matter what your political stripe is. It wouldn't matter if you're a competitor. It doesn't matter. People come together. It's beautiful, actually.

Really, again, it's so frustrating when you see divisive politics come in that actually look at an industry that – sure, it needed help. There are lots of things that I don't disagree with, but the manner in which you bring those policies online is a testament to who's governing and how you do that. I have to tell you that the message is not resonating right now, especially with this. This is particularly nasty because it manipulates the taxpayer, ratepayer, consumer. However you want to look, they're all the same person. It manipulates them because you make them think that you're actually saving them money.

But after the light bulb fiasco, the carbon tax ads, the PPA fiasco, Bill 6, and a whole bunch of other things, I can tell you that the trust is not there. They're going to be asking you questions, and I really hope that you can answer them because, for me, my answer is going to be what I'm saying to you right now, clear as day, transparent. You know how I feel. That's how my message will transfer out to the public. Like I said, if I am proven wrong, I'll happily stand here and admit that. But right now the way that I look at it and my understanding of this model: not impressed.

I honestly believe – like, the other bills that came through, 34, 27, and 25 before Christmas: I mean, we brought amendments and processes, we talked about renewables, we talked about companies, we talked about what they do. What I'd love to see is that the government actually stand up and say how proud they are of these companies and the groups and the people and the Albertans that they represent.

Do you understand that the taxpayer dollars that are coming in are not your money? They're not yours. I was at one of the CRCAG meetings. That's the residents of Elbow Park that are on the flood mitigation teams, and I went to that meeting downtown. As you know, there are a lot of sides to the flood mitigation piece, but what was interesting to me wasn't so much the discussion around flood mitigation, which was also very interesting. I learned a lot from that. It was that when the minister stood up to speak about the dollars that would be coming in for the dam itself, for the Springbank dam, the language that was used was that the Minister of Finance was there and that he was going to bankroll that project. That was the exact language used: bankroll that project.

Do you know what that means to Albertans? That means that you think that that's your money. Oh, my goodness. That language is so inappropriate. I can't even believe it. I couldn't believe it. I was standing there listening to that, that the minister is going to bankroll that. No, he's not. Taxpayers are paying for that, and you have the privilege to disburse those funds. Absolutely appalling. I couldn't believe it, and I was standing there going: well, that's the mentality – that's the mentality – of a government that doesn't understand the privilege of the dollars that they receive. You're getting money through a carbon tax. You're getting money through taxation. The job of government is to collect that and then bring projects forward, not to take advantage of the people that pay our wages to be here.

Taking advantage of the people who put you here is what that cap does, and the minute that that capacity model comes forward: bam. My goodness. Like, have a look at your own policies, please, and look at the dollar figures and understand that this is not whether to not bring renewables online or not. That's not what this discussion is about. This is about how you do it. This is about policy. This is about the dollars that you're spending and actually allowing the market to decide. I do not understand what's so scary about that concept. Electricity is inelastic. We all need it, so you can either choose to do what's best for Albertans, or you can use an ideology to push an agenda forward and not even think for one minute about what the consequences are.

As the hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake has laid out time and time and time again, this domino effect, the impact that the policies of this government have had on our energy sector, is far, far, far reaching. You know, last night a lot of you were at the meeting at the Matrix with a lot of our energy producers here, and they did a beautiful video of young children talking about what their priorities are. A lot of them spoke about environment. They spoke about petrochemicals. They spoke about prosperity. I mean, these young kids are brilliant, right? If you want to learn something, it's out of the mouths of babes, right? They're just superintelligent kids.

One thing I realized being there and what they showed in their video is that $225 billion of investment is going to the United States and only $1 billion here. Holy moly. Like, something is wrong. We've got the best of the best in this province, and they are looking for business elsewhere, not because they want to. That group of people that was there last night – those of you who were there know this – are Alberta-based companies. They have a vested interest in this province. They want to work here. They want to produce here. They want to diversify here. That whole group is based on petrochemical diversification. That whole group.

Please, folks, like, let's listen to these people. These are the experts in the field. They're the experts in understanding that if you attack the residents of this province over and over and over again, whether it's a cap on electricity or bills that make their lives more difficult, we're going to not only lose population; we're losing people in the industry. That means that ultimately we don't – we actually are short on labour right now in the field, not because everybody is working but because everybody has left.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Madam Chair. Just another couple of quick comments. I'm enjoying the diatribe over there on defending high electricity rates for Alberta's families. We've always said that the rate cap is a transitional measure as we move to a capacity market. You know, we're taking time to design that market with affordability for consumers in mind. Other capacity markets are seeing reasonable prices and healthy competition, and we will as well.

Over time prices will of course rise, as they do in any market – and we've never said otherwise, which is why we're bringing in the cap – but we are working to ensure that those prices will be reasonable and stable and predictable for families, small businesses, and farms, who depend on the electricity system. The 6.8 cent cap: I hope the opposition understands this, that if the prices don't rise above that, then the government doesn't have to make the businesses whole.

Mrs. Aheer: Why are you doing it, then?

Mr. Coolahan: It's being done because it's an insurance policy as we transition. That's what it is. It's ensuring that small businesses are protected, that Alberta's families are protected.

The members opposite, again, you know, believe that utility rates were reasonable under the old system. When you hear statements like that, you can't help but wonder if they actually pay their bills in their own households, or perhaps they just lack basic human empathy. I don't know. Try telling that to a single parent who had to pay 11.82 cents per kilowatt hour in April of 2011. Try telling a small-business owner that these rates were reasonable at 12.34 cents or the senior on a fixed income who had to pay 13.32 cents in December of 2011 and 15.06 cents in January of 2012. That's not reasonable, Madam Chair. If the opposition believes that this does sound reasonable and that those are signs of a system that's working well, then they are woefully out of touch.

My last point I'm going to make in response is that, you know, the capacity market works well in other jurisdictions because the generators are paid to generate, and that's what keeps the stability in the market, because we always have reserves of electricity. I'm looking forward to the transition to this market and when we're going to reach 30 per cent renewables on our grid and eventually even more. I think that in the future we're going to be praised for this move and for having the courage to do so.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

10:10

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Madam Chair. Well, it's becoming very obvious why we have this bill, and that is a gross misunderstanding on the part of this government and members opposite of just how our electricity system functions and the beauty of it.

I was privileged to be in a meeting with a number of American counterparts. These were state-level legislators from across the United States, and we were talking about electricity. What was really fascinating is that they all had capacity markets, every one of them. My turn came. They wanted to know what our market looked like, and I said, "Well, we have an energy-only market, and we have no utility debt." They couldn't believe it. They said, "Well, what's the price of power right now?" I looked it up, and it was low.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

They just couldn't understand how you could possibly have an energy-only market with no utility debt and low prices, so I explained briefly what our electricity market looked like, who the players were, the size of population we were serving, and the industries that we had here. Those legislators wanted to know – the discussion then became: "How can we do what you're doing in Alberta? How can we switch our system over to what you've got, where you don't have your taxpayers with any utility debt?" They were very intrigued by that.

Now, this government and members opposite in the backbenches have been pointing to our energy-only market as some kind of an outlier, and the whole rest of North America is in a capacity-market system, and that's better. Well, the legislators I spoke to looked upon our energy-only market with envy. They would love to have something like what we have, where there's no utility debt, there is affordable power, and there are all kinds of choices.

Let's just talk about some choices here. I don't know if the members opposite understand how the RRO works, but it's averaged over 45 to 120 days, depending on the provider you're buying from, based on the wholesale price of power. If you don't want to have the RRO, you are free to choose something to protect yourself from price spikes. This government continues to state, the Member for Calgary-Klein in particular, how we have to have this to protect Albertans from price spikes.

Well, guess what? The market already has that. It's called a fixed rate. Perhaps no one over there has ever bought one, but you can get a fixed rate right now for five years, longer than this bill, by the way, and cheaper. This bill is pegged at 6.8 cents as a cap. Well, for fixed-rate contracts right now you can get 6.29 for five whole years from an Alberta company. You can get another one here – I'm looking at it – for 6.59 cents, again a five-year guaranteed rate. There's no fee, and there's only a 15-day notice required if you want to jump off and go back to the RRO.

Freedom to choose: that is the best protection consumers can ever have, a competitive market where people are competing for my energy dollars. People that want my business are going to have to compete for it. I want choices in the marketplace, and I am quite able to protect myself from price spikes by either choosing a fixed contract or, when it's in my best interests, jumping over to the RRO. I have the freedom to do that. I didn't need this government to come along and protect me from something that didn't actually exist.

What they claim never existed was protection for consumers. Well, that is patently not true. Consumers have had the opportunity to protect themselves all along. Currently they can still protect themselves for longer than the life of this bill, cheaper than the 6.8 cents that this bill is putting forward. The affordability has always been there. It's just patently untrue, what this government is claiming, that we need protection and that this government is going to be our saviour. The reality is that the marketplace provided us the protection that we needed through choice. Through choice. Over and over again we're seeing this government not understanding the marketplace, not understanding basic economics. You can even get better rates if you go to things like three-year fixed-rate contracts, and again you can jump into and out of these contracts if you so choose. Choice is still the best protection for any one of us.

The reason for this bill – I'll repeat it again – is not to protect Albertans from price spikes. It is to protect this government from a bad PR problem. That's what this bill is really about.

I will stop for the moment, but I'll be back.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Rosendahl: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to go over some history as to why we are where we are today on this. I want to make sure that some of these tidbits are on record. Let's start by saying that Alberta's foray into deregulated power began in April 1998 – I mean, you can find these tidbits, and as you dig through, you can find different things – when Ralph Klein's Progressive Conservative government passed the utilities amendment act. [interjections] Interesting. You won't be cheering here when I get through this.

The act paved the way for an open electricity market on January 1, 2001 – okay? – where power companies could compete for customers and government would step away from setting prices. This is where the problem started. Competition and the introduction of contracts were supposed to keep the prices low. Did it happen? No. The reality wasn't that straightforward, and consumers were in for a wild ride. Boy, were they ever. Before deregulation took effect, power generators were barely keeping up with the demand, right? They were making about 1 per cent more power than what they needed. They said that they needed about a 20 per cent increase in there so that they could maintain the system's stability.

On June 12, 1998, when two major power generators were down for maintenance, utilities were forced to cut power to thousands of people – Edmonton, Calgary – to prevent a province-wide blackout. They just didn't have the power. In October 15,000 Calgary homes lost electricity, and companies told Edmonton industries to cut consumption when turbines broke down. It led to allegations and an investigation that companies purposely withheld power to inflate prices during high demand. That's all in history. And we don't need Bill 16 to protect consumers, do we? Okay.

Let's get back into this. As the first day of deregulation approached in late 2000, power prices soared. That's a fact. The Klein government had already promised a $20-a-month rebate to consumers to protect consumers in 2000, and you're talking about what we're doing under Bill 16? Very interesting. Klein also promised – get this – $300 to every Albertan from the proceeds of the first power auction, which netted the government $1.1 billion on the backs of all Albertans. That's who paid the price for this. That's who paid the price, not the carbon tax or anything else. But the political blowback was growing over this, right? Surcharges to power bills pushed the government to halt fee hike requests so that they could be evaluated for fairness. Obviously, they knew it was unfair at that time, did they not?

An Hon. Member: I don't know.

Mr. Rosendahl: Yeah. Obviously.

A month before the market was supposed to operate unhindered, the government suddenly imposed an 8-cent-per-kilowatt-hour cap on the price of power to prevent prices from skyrocketing in 2001. Interesting, isn't it? Twenty-one days later the government changed its plan again, raising the cap to 11 cents per kilowatt hour . . .

Ms Renaud: It's almost like they didn't know what they were doing.

Mr. Rosendahl: Go figure. And we don't need Bill 16, do we? Right?

. . . and doubling the consumer power rebate to $40 a month. By early 2001 researchers who had studied the deregulation move said that it had already cost Alberta consumers billions of dollars. Billions of dollars it cost Alberta consumers.

Here's another interesting tidbit that's out there, okay? Small towns were particularly hard hit by the new regime. By 2003 village community halls, ice arenas, and curling rinks were facing shutdown over power bills that had tripled or quadrupled. In some cases counties had to step in to keep the recreational facilities open. It's all there. [interjections] You can't deny that. The utilities are the biggest single factor. A Grande Prairie city councillor said at the time: there's no question in my mind that it's killing the small communities little by little, and it's killing the clubs. That is what they said at the time. By then Klein acknowledged that deregulation had not gone well. Go figure.

Here's another interesting tidbit, okay? That same year the government also changed the way the cost of electrical infrastructure was covered, shifting the entire cost of transmission onto consumer bills. One-half of the costs were covered by the generators before. Consumers are still on the hook today for that. We get complaints every day into my office about that very thing and about how unfair that was, how totally unfair. But, then, we don't need Bill 16, do we? Well, I disagree. I was paying this price, and I still am. And that's fair? Well, it isn't.

Three years later power prices rose to among the highest in the country. The Liberals, who had opposed the rapid pace of deregulation more than a decade earlier, said that it was time to admit deregulation had not attracted more competition or better service. Well, that is a fact. And we don't need Bill 16? Really? You know, you hear all the tidbits over there. I mean, these are the facts that are out there. This is why we need it, to protect consumers.

Supply problems caused two more major blackouts in cities, one in 2006, another in 2012. Suspicion persisted that companies purposely cut their supply load to keep prices high. And we don't need to protect consumers? Really? In 2011 TransAlta was fined, which they should have been, after admitting it turned away power from B.C. to artificially inflate prices.

Mr. Taylor: That's called the rule of law.

Mr. Rosendahl: Yeah. Right. The rule of law. They got fined for doing that, didn't they?

Mr. Taylor: And it worked.

Mr. Rosendahl: So this is why we need Bill 16. That's why it's important that we support it, and I support it wholeheartedly.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Battle River-Wainwright.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm rising here today to speak to Bill 16, which really should be called An Act to Hide Regulated Electricity Rates, and also to call out some real reasons why this ideological government is bringing forward this bill. You know, what we should be talking about – the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View said that it was smoke and mirrors, but really I think this is more a shell game. That is what's been happening with regard to things.

Let's go back to the Member for West Yellowhead. He wants to talk about history. I'm going to talk about a brief history. I'm going to do a couple of things. We know what a shell game is, I think. I'll explain it briefly. You've got the three shells. You put a ball underneath there, and you move the ball around. Eventually you lift it up, and it's not there. And it's not there. Oh, it's underneath this one. Well, this is what this government has been trying to do.

I'll give my part of the history on the shell game that this government has been trying to put forward here. We go back to Bill 10, the Fiscal Statutes Amendment Act, 2016. We all remember that one. We sat here and we talked about it. It really gives this government the ability to have unlimited debt. Where is the debt ceiling? We don't know. That bill did not put a ceiling on the debt. The government, then, can borrow as much as they want. That's a problem. It's a problem, and it's a fact. We go back to history. It's a fact that you brought forward that bill that allows you to borrow whatever you need to.

Then let's go forward in time a little bit more. I've got the bill here in front of me, Bill 34, the Electric Utilities Amendment Act, 2016. I mean, this is it. We're looking at it. It has, really, just this one page and a couple of lines on the other one. It says here under Loans to the Balancing Pool and Guarantee:

82.1 The President of Treasury Board, Minister of Finance may, on the recommendation of the Minister of Energy, make loans to the Balancing Pool and guarantee the obligations of the Balancing Pool.

They're guaranteeing the obligations of the Balancing Pool.

Where does Bill 10 come and fit into this? They get to guarantee when all of a sudden you've spent too much on electricity as a result of these actions that you're bringing forward. You've capped it at 6.8 cents, yes, but who has to pay for that? All of a sudden, with how much we're borrowing and how much we're in debt, we look like we're going to be $71 billion in debt by 2019, and it could be greater than that. If you're looking at that, the $71 billion in debt, you know, you still have one ratepayer, one taxpayer, so that taxpayer and that ratepayer are still on the hook. They still have to pay for that electricity. Even though you've capped it at 6.8 cents, they've still got to pay back that much money. It's going to come out of their pocket one way or the other. Let's be clear about that.

This government is not clear. They're not up front. They're using a shell game to hide what's really happening here. They don't know what they're doing with this. They are over their head with this file, and unfortunately that's been the problem the whole time with this file. They really don't know what they're doing.

They're bringing forward this particular bill at this time because they know that retail rates will more than double within the next four years as a result of them moving towards 30 per cent renewables by 2030. It's not going to keep the rates low when you start to do that. It's going to make those rates climb. When those rates climb and they go beyond that 6.8 cents a kilowatt hour, then, unfortunately, you have to borrow more money. In borrowing more money, you're not protecting the taxpayers. You're not protecting Albertans. You're in fact making Albertans have to pay it from a different part of their pockets. There is, like I say, one ratepayer, the same taxpayer, and they're footing that bill.

They're trying to cover up. This bill is them admitting that this will happen. They know it's going to happen, and it's an admission on their part that this will happen, that the rates will climb and they will go beyond 6.8 cents a kilowatt hour. They know it. What their actions are doing is going to be detrimental for this province. They're trying to cover up the mistakes they made by transitioning to renewables too quickly. I agree that renewables are a great thing, but forcing it to be done that fast, that much: it's not going to work.

The Member for Calgary-Klein – I have to now go back, and we have to talk about that. There was a steel company that you were referring to. The steel company needed to be protected at that 6.8 cents. Well, they are not on the RRO. They are a high user. They use more than 250,000 kilowatt hours a year. That's a fact, too. You don't produce things like that and stay at that level. So I don't know why you were going down that angle and saying that you want to protect those people. Well, frankly, it's not going to work that way, Madam Chair.

What they do is that they're on a managed system with places like the steel company. They are not on the RRO, as suggested, so they work with the floating rate. Unfortunately, the floating rate will likely be increasing and increasing and increasing in this province, and they won't be protected, and we will lose jobs as a result of them not being protected. The system, I think, is going to crater here in the future as a result of what they're doing, and we'll see jobs being lost in this province as a result of high electricity rates.

These large manufacturers, Madam Chair, are not going to be able to stay. They'll find that their ability to produce is not going to be here and cheap, like we need to have it. We will be losing jobs to the United States. We already are. People are looking at the writing on the wall, and they're saying: this is not going to work. Unfortunately, people are moving. There are a lot of jobs already being moved out to the States. I know of several companies in my riding that have chosen that option just in the past couple of weeks, and it's shameful.

They don't care less about the cost, the real cost to Albertans. The cost of this cap will either be covered by the carbon slush fund that we as Albertans already pay for, or the cost will be coming out of the general revenue. Let's be real. If it's coming out of the general revenue, it's going to be borrowed money. All that money I talked about that we have on Bill 10 that allows you to have that keep going up, once Bill 34 – well, if Bill 34 is enacted and once we have the rates go higher, we'll be borrowing money, and it'll be coming through the general revenue, and that will be, say, $71 billion by 2019, but maybe it's going to be $75 billion. I don't know. Then if you go forward in time, it's going to be greater. So the potential cost to this cap is $4.437 billion in losses that taxpayers will now be on the hook for over the Balancing Pool's mismanagement.

We already know that they won't devise a bill that will actually be in Albertans' best interests. You're trying to say that it's in Alberta's best interest, but this is not in Alberta's best interest. This bill, folks, has been devised to hide the truth of what is really happening.

Let me explain. Electricity rates will increase due to the NDP government's reckless, ideological policy on the electricity file. If this bill is passed, this bill will cap the regulated rate at 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour. Currently the RRO is 3.8 cents a kilowatt hour. It's fluctuating around that 3 cents, 4 cents. That's reasonable. That is cheap. That's cheap electricity. We should be thankful that we have this rate in Alberta.

But the cap isn't for everyone. The first ones who will be affected – and I mentioned it before – will be the large industries, as we talked about with the steel industry, who Albertans rely on for jobs. These producers that create jobs: well, they're going to go to wherever they can make the most money for the shareholders. The shareholders demand that they make a profit.

And profit is not a dirty word. Profit is a good thing. Profit is what creates jobs and makes Alberta move. It has given us the Alberta advantage. The more people that we have working, the more tax that is being paid by the average person, and the more Alberta advantage that we can have. That's why we have such low taxes. That's why we were the envy of the world.

Our job creators will not be protected from the drastic increase to electricity rates, and this increase will go directly to them. What they may try to do is to pass it on to the consumer if it's just here in Alberta, but if they pass it on to the consumer, how did that protect the taxpayers or the ratepayers in Alberta? If the amount they have to charge goes up and then they have to pass it on to the consumer and the consumer then has to pay more money, you have not protected the consumer. What you're doing is not working, and it will not work, Madam Chair.

Once again, this government refuses to acknowledge that this, like so many of their policies, will have a harmful trickle-down effect on the Alberta economy. You know, I have businesses telling me all the time that it's affecting jobs in my riding. These things always have consequences. All the policies that you're putting forward have consequences. The electricity rates being capped the way they are and then some other consumers not being affected by it: it's affecting them. The minimum wage: it's affecting them.

Take grocery stores, for example. Well, you like having your food fresh. You don't want it spoiled. They have to have freezers, and they have to have coolers. As a result, they use a huge amount of electricity to make those compressors run. Those compressors don't run just while the doors are open. They run 24/7. People like to have their places air conditioned when they go in there, and that, in fact, actually keeps the fruits and vegetables better when you keep it cooler in there. That is more electricity. All these things that use electricity make them a higher user of electricity, and now they're not protected if they go beyond the 250,000 kilowatt hours per year. So the cost of food, you'll see, is going to be affected as a result of it as well.

One thing this government is good at is repelling and destroying businesses in this province. That's what's happening. People are leaving. That's what's happened in Ontario and now here. People don't want to invest. I listened to the people that came over, and they spoke to us. They came over and said: "Frankly, we don't want to" – these were many businesses that have come and talked to me and to a variety of other people here in the Wildrose Party. They said: "We're waiting. We want to see what's going to happen, but right now the climate isn't such that we want to invest. We don't want to pour a ton of money into this province." As they've mentioned, there have been jobs that have been created, but we've lost 100,000 jobs to get 20,000 jobs. That's a net 80,000 jobs lost.

If I'm correct in this, this is them trying to correct their radical policies. This is the NDP trying to correct their radical policies, so let me tell you all that – news flash – the NDP policies are not working, and they're meddling in a file that they don't understand. This will be another hit to our already devastated economy, and on top of all the personal businesses and carbon tax hikes and the minimum wage hikes, the emission cap. When will they learn? We keep speaking about it. We have the opportunity. We're in here, and we discuss it, and we still see that there are negative effects to it.

When I brought forward Motion 505 with the minimum wage, I asked for us to pause to see what the economic impact would be to the stakeholders, to the industry. You know, there are other ways that we could have – I heard from across the aisle that there were single mothers and that we need to protect them and get the minimum wage up for that. There are other methods to be able to do that, and that's what was happening. They were identified as needing to have extra support. This is what the government should have been doing, trying to look at supporting those people.

But what about the other people that are looking at trying to get jobs in Alberta for the first time? They're a young student, they want a job, but it's a $15 minimum wage, and unfortunately the employers would rather hire somebody that's got three, four, five years experience, that they don't have to train. It costs a lot to train a person. We could have worked with this properly. My point is that we're not looking at all the ramifications and all the implications of the bill, and this Bill 16 is just another one that you're not stopping and pausing and looking at all the unintended consequences and added expenses that are going to cost Albertans as a result of what you're doing.

If this isn't so, then please find a way to explain to the House why you would need to cap regulated electricity rates. Why do you need to do it if it's not going to go up because of what you're doing, if it won't go up past 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour? Again, the taxpayers will have to pay for it. For only residential consumers, small farms, or smaller businesses – why only those who consume less than 250,000 kilowatt hours per year? Why on earth do large businesses and industry in this province of Alberta get the brunt of the repercussions of this bill and other ideological, damaging changes that this government has inflicted on them? These businesses, doggone it, you know, they create the jobs, but the actions that you've got going are driving businesses out, and I find that shameful.

What we're asking you to do is to pause and to look at what's going to happen. Really, I think you should be saying that this is all wrong, and we should actually kill this bill. This bill is a harmful bill for Alberta, and let's start making some corrections right along the way. Otherwise, I guess, you know, another government is going to have to come along and be the adult and make the necessary changes to do what the hard choices are.

Madam Chair, the target of 30 per cent by 2030, the renewables target, that this government has legislated is a complete mistake. Scientific estimates indicate that our grid will experience instability once we get to 25 per cent of renewables. That's 25 per cent; that's not 30 per cent. I don't know how you got to that number because it caps out somewhere around that 25 per cent.

This is going to cost our province dearly. Does the government not see that these practices will be further hurting our job creators? When businesses are starving, they will move to where they can make a living and create work, make a profit, pay their employees – make sure that they can pay their employees – and pay their shareholders. Shareholders, if they're going to invest money . . .

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. W. Anderson: Thank you, Madam Chair. Well, I've been listening with intent to what I'm hearing from the opposition and from my fellow members and colleagues. I think there's some confusion here because I don't think you really understand the electricity bill. This electricity file is being orchestrated just to fix a problem that was caused by this government. The only reason we need this bill is because I think you're really worried that the retail rates are going to quadruple over the next four years. It's another warning sign to Albertans and especially to our industries that prices are going to get out of control, because they're not covered. Big business is not covered by this, and I know how much you love big business. Our job creators are not protected by this scheme, and Alberta is going to suffer. You're just going to push them out of this province.

A carbon tax, corporate tax, and now exorbitant electricity costs are going to drive the business investors out of our province, and that's my big concern. I really think you should look at this and do a complete one-eighty on this bill and double back on this reckless, expensive ideological transition to renewables and also fight the federal Liberal Party on their costly accelerated coal phase-out program. Do it in proper phases. Do it over a period of time so that businesses and corporations and individuals can actually afford to absorb it. Thoughtless and careless decisions can make a government impose and create mistake after mistake, especially, I think, on this electricity file.

From raising the SGER levy in June of 2015 to introducing a capacity model that shifts the risk of electricity investment away from private companies and puts it back on Alberta taxpayers, I think this government is attempting to profess that they're actually solving a problem or solving a matter and a question of power price volatility. This is not the case. Fixed-price contracts are already available to Alberta consumers, and they're recommended to consumers on all fixed incomes. As a matter of fact, most Albertans have a fixed-rate option already available to them, and this offers the utmost protection from unpredictability in electricity prices through long-term fixed contracts. In other words, they're already covered. The consumers are covered, so why are we going through this bill and going through this exercise, yet leaving businesses alone unprotected?

Madam Chair, it comes as a surprise that the current 13-month average for fixed-rate contracts is approximately 6 cents per kilowatt hour. That already exists in the marketplace. As my hon. colleague mentioned earlier, their rates are even better. So it's already covered. But now with your regulated cap it's going to be 6.8 cents. I can't believe that that's an effective way of managing taxpayers' money or managing what you call covering and protecting the consumer market.

You're introducing a bill that kind of misguides Albertans into believing their rates are protected when, in fact, retailers within our free electrical market already offer more protection than this government and this bill are offering. So why do it? The fact is that for every 1 cent of capital above the cap, it's going to cost $10 million to the taxpayers of Alberta. Think about that: an additional $10 million. You've got a $49 billion corporation, you need $59 billion now to run it, and now you're going to add more debt and more debt and more debt. These things are not good for Alberta consumers.

Again, I'm going to repeat myself. Businesses are not protected by this, and if businesses don't have that kind of offer of protection or the ability under that to manage this, they're going to leave our province. The estimation right now from the oil and gas sector is that we've lost anywhere between $8 billion and $10 billion to the U.S. market, and it's not coming back. People are not investing in our province anymore. To pay for the cap, funds will have to be disbursed from the carbon tax, from the carbon tax slush fund, or from government revenues, which is already borrowed capital. That means that children, grandchildren, and future taxpayers, if there are going to be any left, are going to be burdened with this debt load, the same ratepayers, the same taxpayers that this government is trying to hide the truth from. Juggling money, moving money around from one ministry to another is not the proper way to run a business. Accelerating massive debt for taxpayers does not protect Albertans. This is a taxpayer burden. NDP policies are hurting Albertans. You're hurting families, but really what you're doing here is hurting job creators.

Now, my biggest fear is that we're going to end up like Ontario. Right now in Ontario they're losing $5 billion to $8 billion worth of industry every year because their electricity rates are out of control. And there's no guarantee; there's no protection. Think about that. If that happens here, it's not just the oil and gas sector that's been deflated with investment; you're going to get more manufacturers. Even the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein stated that he knows of a business that shut down. In his own words, it shuts itself down. Think about that. When you shut a business down, nothing is going on. Nothing is being produced. People lose their jobs. I don't know. The Ontario debacle is something you should learn from. Read what's been going on there. This bill is about giving Albertans a false sense of security so that when they see their monthly electricity bill, they won't see how badly the policies are hurting this province.

Electrical transition is moving way too fast. The provincial and federal governments are working together to arbitrarily accelerate the transition from coal to natural gas, wind farms by a whopping 20 to 30 per cent. This is just too fast. Bringing in renewables by 2030 is moving too quickly. You're putting a burden on the taxpayer. You're putting a burden on industry. Is 30 per cent by 2030 necessary? Is it evidence based? I think it's just an arbitrary target. I haven't seen much consultation, no business sense, no economic development strategies, nothing.

The potential cost of the cap is significant. It will drive out job creators and add approximately $4.4 billion in losses, that taxpayers are now on the hook for in the Balancing Pool's mismanagement. Twenty billion dollars will be needed, according to Terry Boston, your own consultant, to get this province to the 30 per cent by 2030. That's a lot of money. That's your consultant telling you that. All of this combined does not make life more affordable for Albertans. You're not protecting anybody.

What's more, scientific estimates state that our grid will experience instability once we get to 25 per cent renewables. So are you going to build another grid? You put that already on the taxpayers' back, and now you have to build another one? Think about that. You can't run solely on the sun and wind to power the entire province of Alberta without some sort of expensive backup to keep the power load evened out. This policy to accelerate by 2030 will require either costly systems integrated with other jurisdictions or a peak plant overbuild over the reliability of the current network. No wonder the province's economy is going down. This is not a way to treat investors. You can't treat investors this way. People will not invest in an environment where it is not business friendly. It's basic economics.

You know, just a sidebar. I think of the hon. member for Tim Hortons with his tidbits. Quoting Ralph Klein – I mean, I owned a business in the private sector, and I worked with the Alberta advantage. It was a good time to be in Alberta. It wasn't perfect, but it was a good time. Investors were coming into Alberta. People were bringing billions of dollars into Alberta, and you cannot argue against that. It worked. It worked really well, and we kept investing in Alberta.

Now owning a business no longer, I'm here listening to the backbench talk as if they ran a business, as if they signed a paycheque, as if they actually did something like that. They didn't. You haven't had the privilege yet. Listen, let me tell you something. The private sector was glad to deal with the Alberta advantage when it was available.

Loyola: I used to run a business.

Mr. W. Anderson: In Venezuela?

Mr. Westhead: Point of order.

The Deputy Chair: Member.

Mr. W. Anderson: This government . . .

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member.

Mr. W. Anderson: Yes.

The Deputy Chair: Sit down, please.

The Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Westhead: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'd like to rise on a point of order under Standing Order 23(j), "uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder." I'm pretty sure we all heard what the member said, which was a racist statement against us on this side, and I think the member should apologize and retract.

The Deputy Chair: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Again, as to the point of order that was raised yesterday, this is kind of the same thing. The banter goes back and forth. Earlier this morning the member in question, that just took this shot about Venezuela, who has spoken favourably in speeches in the House, actually called one of our members a racist today. You know, if he's willing to stand up and apologize for that comment, then I would apologize for and withdraw this one.

The Deputy Chair: Hon. members, this has been an ongoing issue for the last few days around the language that's been used in this House. I did hear it today. I would recommend – actually, I will rule that it is a point of order and that you need to stand up and apologize, please, and that the language in this House needs to be more respectful around people's diversity and their cultures and that we need to make sure that we are not using language in this House to try to create disorder.

Mr. W. Anderson: Madam Chair, thank you for that ruling. Much appreciated. I will apologize for mentioning the country Venezuela, which this hon. member has spoken favourably of in the past, but I will apologize to the hon. member.

May I continue?

The Deputy Chair: Please go ahead.

Debate Continued

Mr. W. Anderson: Just to close on my points, again, my biggest concern is that this government is forcing businesses out of our province, and you're going to continue to do so with Bill 16. You're going to continue putting the tax burden on the citizens of Alberta, another onerous tax, a tax that will drive and force . . . [interjection]

The Deputy Chair: Member.

Mr. W. Anderson: . . . hard-working citizens of Alberta into a situation where they will no longer have a job or an opportunity to be employed. [interjections]

The Deputy Chair: Hon. members and the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills, if we could please refrain from trying to engage in the conversation after I've ruled. Please let the Member for Highwood continue.

Mr. W. Anderson: Thank you, Madam Chair. Just in closing, again, as I said earlier, my concern is that if we continue to create a business vacuum in this province, a vacuum that is going to be so difficult for us to overcome with additional taxes and taxations like Bill 16 and like so many others and like the onerous debt that is now on this province, that my grandchildren are now going to have to pay back because of this government's policies – fast and loose and reckless with the economy is no way to run a business, no way to run a government.

Madam Chair, thank you for your time.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like now to move that the committee rise and report progress.

[Motion carried]

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 16.

The Acting Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Acting Speaker: Opposed, please say no. So ordered.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: I'd like to call the committee to order.

Bill 16

An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates (continued)

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered in respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Why, thank you very much, Madam Chair. I have many comments, many questions, so far no amendments, but that may change over time. I can't support this bill because this is part of a continuing trend of the NDP's haphazard dismantling of Alberta's electricity system.

Let's just go back in history and recall how it is that we've managed to get to this point, coming up on almost two years exactly, maybe two years less a month, to where this all started. This all started with the government's very first ever bill, Bill 1. The government's first-ever Bill 1, as those of you, I'm sure, remember and recall vividly and fondly, increased Alberta's original carbon tax, the specified gas emitters regulation on large emitters. At the time I'm sure the government thought: well, that seems like a good idea. You know what? In general terms and broadly speaking, I actually am in favour of these sorts of things, of a properly structured carbon tax, with the money going into innovation, allowing Alberta companies to innovate and to help solve the carbon problem not just for our province, not just for our country, but for the world. This is the contribution that, done properly, Alberta can make to the world.

But as with many things this government didn't fully think it through, didn't fully understand market forces, didn't especially understand the implications on power purchase arrangements. They were warned repeatedly following the passage of the bill, leading to the end of 2015, that their actions were going to trigger the “or more unprofitable” clause of power purchase arrangements. They were warned. And if they weren’t warned – well, I happen to know for absolute certainty that they were warned and that they knew. The minister knew or ought to have known. Senior administration, political staff, deputy ministers, associate deputy ministers either knew or ought to have known that that was going to trigger the “or more unprofitable” clause.

That’s part of the deal when you’re in government, is understanding the contractual obligations that government has agreed to, whether it was your government at the time or not. You inherit everything that government in Alberta has ever done over the course of time. You may like some of it. You probably don’t like most of it because that’s what happens when we change government. It doesn’t change the fact that there are contractual obligations that the government of Alberta, which you now are – although, being nerdy and technical, there are only two members on the front bench here, which is technically government. [interjections] I’m just giving everyone a civics lesson on what government is.

Mr. Westhead: Point of order.

The Deputy Chair: A point of order has been called. The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Madam Chair, it’s against good parliamentary practice to refer to the presence or absence of members, and I would ask the member to refrain from doing so.

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, although you are correct on the standing order, the member did not actually refer to any particular member being absent, so it’s not a point of order.

The Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Madam Chair. My point being that when you become government of the province of Alberta, you inherit all of the obligations and contractual arrangements that have been entered into by government. That’s what you do. As a result of not understanding that, of either not doing your homework or, worse, perhaps simply ignoring the advice that you were given and feeling that somehow you could legislate your way out of it, you find yourself in a position where you’re chasing your tail. So Bill 16 is the logical next step in a who-knows-how-many-steps process this government is going to have to go through to dismantle what was a very effective deregulated electricity market.

Now, I’ve heard some of the debate and commentary this morning about some of the challenges and price spikes and ups and downs and whether Albertans need to be market traders to lock in an electricity price. While I have some sympathy for that, there is no question that the market forces that were in play in Alberta’s electricity system were working. How do we know that? Well, here we are with historically low electricity prices. The bill that Albertans actually pay is far higher than that because there are administrative fees, there are transmission fees, there are all sorts of fees on top of fees that end up on your electricity bill, but the energy portion itself is historically low. That is because market signals were sent, generation was built, and it was working. But now, as the NDP have discovered, once you start to pull the thread, the thing starts to unravel pretty quickly and in unpredictable ways.

Here we are in this strange situation, which is not the same as Ontario. It has shades of Ontario, but Ontarians are paying enormous electricity bills. As the government there faces an election, coming relatively soon, they undertake extreme measures to reduce end-user consumer electricity prices that had already spiked. They’re doing so in a cynical political move. I note with interest that the electricity bill that they passed is called the fair hydro plan. Any time government puts the word “fair” into a bill title, I get very worried. That makes me feel like perhaps they’re trying to pull the wool over our eyes. That’s what we see here as well.

The situation here is different because Albertans’ electricity prices haven’t spiked yet, which makes me wonder. My goodness, what’s going on behind the scenes here in the Energy department that’s telling this government: “Guess what, folks? At some point in the next four years, maybe in a very inconvenient time relative to the next election, electricity bills are going to go shooting through the roof, you know, just FYI.” Then the political wheels start to move, and the folks, the secret squirrels who run around behind the scenes making these sorts of political decisions will decide: “All right. You know what we’ll do? We’ll cap consumer electricity prices, that are actually paid by Albertans. Let’s not worry about how exactly we’re going to pay for that. That’s an issue to be dealt with later. But on the political side, you know, we’d better identify who our voters are going to be and make sure that they don’t feel any pain at an inconvenient time, say, fall of ’18 or spring of ’19. So let’s come forward with a bill.” And that’s what they’ve done here.

The billions of dollars of losses. What I can’t fully grasp, and perhaps this is a failing on my part in opposition, is how it is that $2.2 billion has gone into the Balancing Pool, backstopped by Alberta taxpayers, and it isn’t the single greatest scandal that Albertans have seen. It is a scandal. It is absolutely a scandal. The amount of money is stunning to me. That it went from a $600 million or $700 million surplus now to $2.2 billion backstopped by Alberta taxpayers is unbelievable to me.

Now we have a bill that seeks to use Alberta’s carbon tax revenue, this slush fund . . .

Mr. Gill: Levy.

Mr. Clark: I don’t mean levy, hon. member. I mean tax. It is a tax.

11:10

Mr. Gill: Okay. I just wanted clarification.

Mr. Clark: Yeah. Absolutely. There’s no question there.

The carbon tax revenue is now going to be used. First, that money comes from the carbon tax, which the government likes to just go back to this well. It seems like it’s this unlimited mythical source of funding that they can just dip into for everything from light bulbs to multibillion-dollar backstops to our electricity market. But guess what? At some point that money is gone. And given what is likely to happen in our electricity sector with this bill, that money is going to go pretty darn quickly, and when that money is gone, well, it’s more backstop from general revenues. And guess what? Our general revenues, topline revenues this year, I have a feeling are not going to meet the government’s projections this year.

Already the price of oil has trended downward below what the government’s estimates were. Just today the price of oil, WTI, is off another 4 per cent. Now, I’ll never cheer against Alberta. That’s not a good thing. I want that price of oil to go up. There’s nothing I want more: $60, $70, $80 oil. That’s good for Albertans; it’s good for our province. Unfortunately, this government has relied on crossing their fingers, just like every government before them, on the price of oil going up. Well, guess what? It hasn’t. And if it doesn’t, our deficit goes higher. That means that we need to borrow even more money.

Now we have a bill before us that’s going to see perhaps another raid on the treasury just to support electricity prices at the consumer level just because of all of the changes this government has brought in without thinking them through. So I'm asking: what problem are we trying to solve? We're trying to solve a problem created by the government. Either you're simply cutting a blind cheque here because you have a sense of what this is actually going to cost or, worst yet, you have no idea what this is actually going to cost, and you refuse to share that information with us. Right now today, well, prices are low. Where are prices going to be in six months or a year or a year and a half or three years or by the end of this? The only reason that you would bring this bill forward is that you have pretty good information that consumer electricity prices are going to be a heck of a lot higher than 6.8 cents a kilowatt hour. That's going to hit Albertans in the pocketbook. Well, guess what? It's going to hit Albertans in the pocketbook no matter what. The money has got to come from somewhere. All these changes mean that the money has got to come from somewhere.

Now, don't think for a moment that any of this means that I don't think we should phase out coal-fired power, because I do. The Alberta Party ran on a platform of phasing out coal-fired electricity. I'm in favour of doing that. I'm in favour of taking action on climate change. I think climate change is real. I think climate change is human caused. I think it's a problem. I think it's something we ought to deal with. But I also think that, done properly, Alberta's response to climate change could be the single greatest market opportunity of our lifetimes. If we put Albertan entrepreneurs to work, if we create a true frame for innovation, if we use carbon tax revenues for appropriate things like cutting personal and corporate income taxes so that people can keep more of their hard-earned money, that we create an attractive investment climate, that we make real and substantial investments in Alberta innovation, in our postsecondary institutions, in our research institutions: these are the kinds of things we should be doing with carbon tax money, not light bulb programs, not backstopping your changes to electricity, that you didn't think through.

By the way, did it have to be this bad? Did we have to find ourselves in a position where we already have backstopped a $2.2 billion loan to the Balancing Pool, which probably gets worse over time? Well, the answer is no, actually. It didn't need to be this bad, no less than the economist Trevor Tombe and a fellow by the name of Dr. Andrew Leach – now, you might have heard his name. He's someone that this government ought to be familiar with. He did the climate plan, didn't he? He worked with Trevor Tombe, and they discovered that had the government simply accepted back the PPAs, for which their policy change triggered the “or more unprofitable” clause, that, at most, the losses would have been $600 million. At most. How did it get to $2.2 billion? I support phasing out coal. My point is that there's a much better way of doing it.

The other challenge with this particular bill and the entire approach the government has taken to electricity goes far beyond the electricity market. It goes to confidence in Alberta as a place to invest. Why would someone invest money, why would a company invest money, why would an individual buy or start a business in Alberta when they don't know what the rules are going to be a year or two or three or four or five down the road, when things are constantly changing, when they don't know what their electricity prices are going to be? That instability and unpredictability in the market make Alberta an unattractive place to invest.

It's unnecessary. It's hurtful to the people of Alberta. If you truly do want to make life better for Albertans – TM, trademark, copyright, quote, whatever – you will not pursue policies that drive capital out of the province of Alberta, that drive companies to invest somewhere else. That hurts our province. It breaks my heart to see it happen because you are hurting the province of Alberta. You are hurting Albertans. You are not incenting and rewarding people for taking an entrepreneurial risk, which, by the way, doesn't guarantee success. Investing in a company, investing in a business, starting a business: there's no guarantee that it's going to work. In fact, the numbers will tell you that it fails far more often than it succeeds. But Albertans are diligent, responsible, hard-working people, and they're going to take those risks if you give them the chance to do that, if you give them the chance for a reasonable return on investment should that investment work out for them.

When you have unpredictable government and unpredictable legislation, you never quite know what's going to happen. With a government that relies far too heavily on the price of oil, there's a chance that our deficit could be $11 billion or $12 billion or $13 billion this year. I don't want to see that happen – I genuinely don't – but there's a huge risk that it does. When it is that high, now what? Do we see more tax increases? What do we see? How are you going to find your way out of that particular problem that you've put yourself in?

Instead of using the carbon tax money to backstop electricity like you're doing, you could use it for substantial, real innovation. We could invest in Alberta research. We could invest in Alberta companies. We could invest in targeted tax credits, not the $30-million-a-year innovation tax credit you've already done. A good idea – I like it – but it's far too complicated. It's too small. It's too narrow. That innovation tax credit is the right vehicle. You've just got an 80 CC Honda motorcycle when what you really need is a big Ford F-150 truck.

I looked at this bill, and I asked my team: what do you see when you see Bill 16? One of my staff said that this bill seems designed to waste the most amount of money possible.

Mr. Hanson: Sorry. I missed that.

Mr. Clark: I said that this bill seems designed to waste the most amount of money possible. Now, that's interesting. I'm not sure this is the only bill that seems designed to waste the most amount of money possible, but it's right up there. It really is. You have an unlimited backstop on the price of electricity. Once that carbon tax money is gone, we'll dip into general revenues, and with general revenues already in the red, it means we borrow more money in this province.

Our credit rating is under threat. Interest rates are going up, not just globally but in Canada. If you saw it, Canada's central bankers yesterday indicated that it looks like our interest rates are likely headed higher. That means the money Alberta has already borrowed is going to cost more, that the money we're going to borrow in the future is going to cost more, and we create this debt spiral. It's a huge challenge.

I also want to make an important point, also, actually, borrowed from an insightful tweet from Andrew Leach. This bill doesn't prevent price spikes. Prices will still spike. Consumers won't see the impact of that. Money has got to come from somewhere. Wholesale prices have still spiked. This does not prevent price spikes. It prevents people seeing the impact of that on their electricity bill, but it doesn't mean that Albertans don't pay for it. The money has got to come from somewhere. It's not magic. The money has got to come from somewhere.

Dr. Starke: It's a transparency thing.

Mr. Clark: It is a transparency thing. That's exactly right.

The government is using the complexity of the electricity system. Trust me, having done a little bit of work in trying to unravel some of this stuff, it is complex. There's no way of truly simplifying it. But when you have a bill that just simply seeks to backstop it, it shows that this government hasn't done their homework. They haven't actually sought to truly understand the implications, so we see this piecemeal, step-by-step, put out one foot and then see where you end up. There's no road map here beyond, really, an ideological route in saying: we don't like the idea of deregulation. Okay. But why don't you put together a fully baked, thoughtful plan that thinks about all of the different implications? You haven't done that.

No matter what, one way or the other Albertans are going to have to pay for this. This isn't magical. Money has to come from somewhere. My greatest concern is that you're doing this at a time when electricity prices are at historic lows. Back in the depths of the Energy department and back in the depths of government I am truly worried about what those forecasts look like. I've asked my team to look into some of that. It's obviously a little more difficult when we don't have the resources of government, but I'm very concerned that the numbers are going to get very big very quickly and that they will start to get out of control, certainly over the course of the four years that this bill is in force.

For all of those reasons and many, many, many more, I certainly cannot support this bill and would seriously and sincerely hope that the government would rethink their approach to electricity deregulation. This bill is troubling, to say the least.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Acting Chair: The chair will recognize the Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate being able to stand and speak on Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates. I want to start off first of all by saying that there's a quote by JFK. He once said that an error does not become a blunder unless you refuse to own up to it. Unfortunately, what I'm seeing here is that when the NDP government decided they were going to transition into renewable energy – and it was done, I think, probably in the best interests of Albertans and in the best interests of what they felt was best for their children. The problem is that the unintended consequences are something that I think Bill 16 is trying to address, and that is a spike in the cost of electricity.

I want to really quickly discuss some of the things that were stated by the Member for West Yellowhead. He gave some one-off examples that I think were interesting but didn't really give a full picture of what's been happening in Alberta. I think it hasn't been, Mr. Chair. The reason why it hasn't is because when you take a look at our electrical system in Alberta, there are three parts to it. You've got the retail, you've got the distribution, and you've got the transmission. Now, if you take a look at all three of those things together as the cost that Albertans bear, the problem is that what the Member for West Yellowhead has not established and stated is that the costs in transmission and distribution have skyrocketed and that the costs in retail have gone down. Everybody in the House knows this.

The question is: why? Why did this happen? What the Member for West Yellowhead did not explain is that the only part that was actually deregulated was the retail side. The parts that were not deregulated, the transmission and distribution sides, have increased substantially. The cost of retail has gone down. The only component, the only part of those three parts that has actually gone down is the deregulated part. History always gives us 20/20 vision of how things really happened versus what we speculate can happen.

I get that there are members opposite that have given examples of where businesses have taken advantage of our system, but remember that our system works best when we allow competition to drive down price so that the supply of the producers increases. It drives the equilibrium price down. That's, again, simple economics. But the other part to this whole thing is that it cannot work unless you have the rule of law. The Member for West Yellowhead has explained this. I thought he explained it very well, but the outcome that he got from it was different than mine. The outcome is that that rule of law worked, and the system is working. Why do we need to change it?

Now, I agree that we do need to start looking at the transmission and distribution parts of this electrical system because they are going up, but again you're allowing a small group of suppliers of that distribution and transmission to be able to provide that service to Albertans. Because you have restricted the supply in those sectors, you have driven the price of those things up. So I don't understand the argument that he gave.

The other part that I wanted to point out is that I've heard over and over again from the members opposite that they did this to protect Albertans. Two points I want to make. One, if you really did want to protect Albertans, then why are you setting the price at 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour versus setting it at 3.6 cents per kilowatt hour? If you truly believe that you need to protect Albertans, why do you have to wait for it to double in order for you to all of a sudden start kicking in to protect Albertans? If you do not believe that that is the reason why you're doing this, then obviously you'd go to 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour.

You have capped tuition rates for students at the present rate, yet you didn't say in that situation: let's cap it at a future rate, increasing it by a hundred per cent. You didn't do that. What you said is that we need to cap it now in order to protect our students. You did that. But in this situation what you're saying is that we need to protect Albertans but only after the cost or price of this goes up a hundred per cent. How does that protect Albertans?

Now, one thing that I love is history. I will admit that I was 10 years old when this happened, but I'm going to tell you about a situation, a story about Jimmy Carter back in 1977, '78, I believe. That would put me at about 10 years old. But, listen, this situation is very similar, so I wanted to give this kind of a scenario to explain how I would say that Liberal thinking or NDP thinking would take a look at this situation. What he did was – and you could always tell when Jimmy Carter was concerned, because he always put on his green jacket. That meant that big problems were coming and that he needed to save Americans. As you can see, I've got a green shirt on here, so I'm concerned.

Anyway, he had a real concerned look on his face, and he got up and said to the people: listen, we're running out of natural gas; this is a five-alarm fire; we need to save the little old lady in the house who is really struggling, who's not going to have enough gas to be able to heat her house in the winter. And he created a huge storm over this situation, to the point where the States passed legislation that restricted any use of natural gas except for residents.

What was the outcome? What was the effect of this? The fallout was that greenhouses the next day went out of business. The employees of those greenhouses were out on the street. They lost their jobs. The people who owned these greenhouses, the ma's and pa's that owned these – these were not big operations or organizations – went out of business because of this concept of, you know, "The sky is falling; we need to save the world," which I hear constantly from the other side. You continue to say that we are the ones who are fearmongering, yet your policies constantly are: hey, listen, we've got a big problem here, and we need to fix it.

Again, I said, Madam Chair, that hindsight is 20/20 vision – '78, '88, '98, 2007, 2008, 2017 – as 39 years later we now know that we have over a hundred years' worth of natural gas. Hindsight has shown us that that was a bad policy, that was a bad mistake. The President of the United States was fearmongering. Whether he had bad information, bad intel, or whatever happened, the information that he gave to Americans created a terrible, terrible fallout. This is what I see when I look at this bill. I take a look at it, and I see that there is a reaction to a bad strategy at the beginning, and instead of doing like JFK says – an error does not become a blunder unless you refuse to own up to it – the government is refusing to own up to the problem of their greening of the economy.

I actually thought that my colleague next to me explained it very well when he said that this is, you know, a shell game, but I'm going to call it something different. I'm going to say that this is actually more like a wag-the-dog scenario. What happens in this situation is that while you're watching the tail wag, the head is coming around and biting you, so it's just a way of being able to keep people and distract people from, really, what's going on.

In reality, this is exactly what this bill does. Bill 16 says: we are not protecting you – we are not protecting Albertans – because if we really were, we would protect them at 3.6 cents per kilowatt hour; we would not be waiting till it doubles to a hundred per cent increase before we protect you. In reality, the argument is flawed. What it is saying is: we are creating a bill that will try to hide what we're really doing to Albertans, and that is that we are going to increase the cost of electricity. We've seen this in Europe, we've seen this in Ontario, and we've seen this in many jurisdictions throughout the world. In Ontario: look at the situation there. Businesses are leaving Ontario because they cannot afford the electricity bills. The utility bills are out of control.

Bill 16, in my opinion, is a way to be able to distract Albertans from the real cost or real fallout of their failed approach to green our economy. I can tell you straight out that I'm a champion of and I believe in green energy, but I do not believe in green energy at the expense of Albertans. The cost of this bill, the cost of this strategy, this broad strategy, of greening the economy of Alberta, in my opinion, is going to be staggering for Albertans, and I don't think that the single mom with three young children is going to appreciate that. They're not going to appreciate losing their job. They're not going to appreciate the increased cost to their electricity bills. They're not going to appreciate it.

Whenever we take a look at the bills that are presented by the government, we do go through a cost-benefit approach, where we talk about the pros and we talk about the cons, and we do actually look at what the pros are. We really try to look at it. We have certain groups that are saying: okay, well, you be the good cop, and you be the bad cop. We really try to look at these things in an objective way. The potential benefit of this bill is that electricity bills will be lower, but again the caveat here is: the electricity bills will be lower for how long? Is it a sustainable system, where if you drive up the cost of the electricity, then at some point it's going to have to boomerang back to the real price of the electricity?

Unless your goal is to completely take all competition out of the electrical system – if your final goal is to be able to do that, then just come out and tell Albertans that. If that is your goal, come out and tell them, "You know, we're going to restrict supply of how many people can actually create electricity in Alberta, and we're going to pick winners and losers, and we'll just guarantee that your price is going to be at this level, but it's going to be subsidized somewhere else." Come out and say that. Let Albertans make the decision. Let them be able to vote yes or no on that strategy, but at least be honest with Albertans and let them know that's what's happening.

When we took a look at what the cons or the cost of this bill would be, obviously we saw that the idea of doubling electricity rates is really going to cause a lot of problems for Albertans that are already being kicked in this low economy right now. We felt that, in all good conscience, we cannot vote for this bill. We cannot support it because, again, it's just covering up the failed policies and strategies of the past.

Now, I think that a lot of information has been presented by my other colleagues, Madam Chair, that have talked about those costs, and I think they've done a great job on it. So I will finish by again asking the government to follow the advice of JFK. If you make an error, don't make it into a blunder by not owning up to it. Own up to it. Say: "You know what? We planned, we did, we checked, and now we've got to adjust." If you do that, I think that Albertans will appreciate it. They'll certainly appreciate it in their pocketbooks.

With that, Madam Chair, I'd like to finish my remarks. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise today to speak to Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates. Bill 16 is being presented by this government as kind of a consumer protection bill, but in this case what consumers really need protection against is the government. The government is touting this bill as a way to protect consumers against spikes in the price of electricity, but those spikes in electricity prices are going to be as a result of government's changes to the electricity system, the bungling of the PPA deals, the early shutdown of coal, the carbon tax. Decisions like these are likely to drive up the price of electricity. Even though the government claims that we won't go the way of Ontario, that all of these changes are not going to push the price of electricity through the roof, they are all clearly concerned that it will.

The price of electricity has come nowhere near 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour in the past few years. If prices are going to remain at the same low mark that the competitive market has given us, there would be no need for a cap on the rates. The government will be hoping that average Albertans don't dig too deep into their electricity bills because once the changes the government is envisioning come into effect, those bills are going to start going up. The government will probably start spending more tax dollars trying to convince the public that the rising prices are a result of anything but their own policy. It's not what they created, but actually it will be the result of this bill.

They'll blame greedy power companies, the previous government – notorious; the 44-year regime of PCs – what they'll call the reasons why the electricity rates are going up now all of a sudden. They'll probably even try to blame the price of oil because this government seems absolutely incapable of admitting the negative consequences to their actions. I don't think they have admitted so far that they have made any mistakes, which puts this electricity rate cap into even better context, because the government thinks that they have found the perfect answer to their driving up electricity prices.

They said to themselves: "What if we just say that the prices won't go up? Let's assume we're just going to say that, and life is going to be good.” That’s what they want Albertans to believe. You know, what a revelation that must have seemed like to them. They can just make another law so that Albertans won’t get mad at the consequences of the other laws that they have already made; let’s throw another bad legislation at them. Of course, most members on the other side of the House won’t see the problem with that solution.

If your law drives up the cost of producing electricity but you won’t let the companies charge enough to cover their costs, suddenly there won’t be any companies. As the Member for Calgary-Elbow said earlier, there won’t be any companies willing to invest, and I think that most Albertans would probably choose paying a little more for electricity as opposed to not being able to buy electricity at all.

The government got their brain trust back together, and they came up with another of their now famous consequence-free decisions: if the consumers aren’t going to pay the true cost of electricity, then we’ll just make it so we can give tax dollars directly to the electricity companies to cover their difference. And this is where the government settled. Most NDP policies find their way into the pockets of the taxpayers because when you’re borrowing billions of dollars that you won’t be responsible for paying back, when you have no problem saddling unwilling or unaware Albertans with debt, tax money always seems like a great solution. After two years the majority of the members on this side are not going to be here, but Albertans are going to still be on the hook for over $75 billion of debt. Our generation, no matter whether they’re NDP, PC, conservatives, Liberals, will be on the hook for this massive, massive debt.

One of the left’s favourite accusations about fiscally conservative politics is that we want to privatize profits and socialize losses. That’s what they claim, yet here the government is enacting law to do exactly that. Members on the opposition side of the House likely see what I mean, but I’ll walk through it in case the government benches haven’t gone through it. Electricity companies make a not insignificant portion of their profits from high points or spikes in the price of electricity. The government is driving up the price of electricity with their policies, leading to higher and more frequent spikes in the price of electricity. The cap on electricity and the payments to the electricity companies to make up the difference mean that the government and all taxpayers will foot the bill for these large spikes in the rates. The companies have their profits protected, backstopped by every tax-paying Albertan.

That sounds to me like a policy that the NDP would make up during an election to fearmonger about conservative politics, yet here they are happily jumping in with both feet. That is what can happen when you start making policies and laws without considering the real consequences for the people of Alberta, when you assume that because you have good intentions, only good can come from your actions, nothing negative. Every time your actions result in something negative, you just slap another poorly considered decision over top and cross your fingers that this thing is going to be better than the last decision we had, and on and on and on until, in the end, all this ends up being the problem of the taxpayer. It always ends up being the taxpayer footing the bill. This bill, like all the other pieces of legislation, is another example of that process, which I don’t think anybody on this side of House is supporting and that definitely I can’t support.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise today to speak against Bill 16 for all the reasons explained by the previous speakers. This bill is, to my knowledge, a make-work bill. This government lost their thought process when they brought in this bill.

Let’s look into why this bill is required first. I think that the origin of this bill is their big climate change plan, which is the NDP’s ideological, risky policy that has driven them to bring in this bill. They wanted to phase out coal. Once in a while they quote the former Harper federal government. They say that even Harper wanted to phase out coal, but the difference is that the Harper government didn’t want to replace 30 per cent of cheap, coal-fired electric generation with renewables by 2030.

Because they’re doing it so fast and because instead of having natural gas, which is cheap and readily available and which could have employed thousands of Albertans, which would not have necessitated any backup, unlike wind and solar, this government chose not to ramp up natural gas. Rather, they want to employ renewable energy to replace 30 per cent by 2030. That will spike the prices of electricity here.

This government speaks about making life better and making life affordable. This bill does neither of those. We have cheap electricity prices here, which this government is trying to jack up by replacing cheap, coal-fired electricity. And now, to hide their incompetence and inefficiency, to mask their ideological policies, they bring in these kinds of bills to show the little guy that they’re doing something to keep the prices lower artificially. But like the Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake said many times, there is only one ratepayer, who is the taxpayer. In the end, it’s not making life more affordable. It is actually making life more expensive, and it’s not making life better because people are losing jobs.

Talking about jobs, Madam Chair, last year the Minister of Economic Development and Trade brought in their flagship, signature bill, Bill 1, which was supposed to create 100,000 jobs. In reality, we lost almost 100,000 jobs. We asked those questions every day to the minister, and he couldn’t give any convincing answer on how he was going to replace those well-paid jobs that were lost. He just goes off the talking points and says: oh, we’re creating this many jobs and this many jobs. But there is no measurable outcome of his policies.

They bring in bills like this, and the direction they get is from their role models and idols in Ontario. Yesterday we got the news that the Ontario government spent $45 billion to save the ratepayers of Ontario $24 billion. So let’s get this math correct. To save $24 billion, our Alberta NDP’s role model in Ontario, the Liberal government, spent $45 billion. That means there will be a net cost of $21 billion to Ontarians. That’s the path this NDP government is taking Albertans down.

Now, I know the NDP are drooling at the prospect of such a large taxpayer liability in Alberta, but the taxpayer and the ratepayer are actually the same person. We keep saying that, but it seems that the other side is not getting that point. There is only one taxpayer, and that is the ratepayer. When the taxpayer subsidizes the ratepayer, families still suffer the consequences of bad government policy, which we have seen in Ontario.

We heard some fascinatingly untrue things from my good friend the Member for Calgary-Klein yesterday. We were told earlier that the system failures won’t happen in a model with more renewables. Let me quote:

Yeah. I think moving towards the system that we’re going towards, the capacity market, is going to mean that we will always have electricity in the hopper ready to go, and we shouldn't have these blackout issues when it comes to unscheduled maintenance.

I want to assure the member that I'll have his delusional quote archived for the next time a power generator has to go offline due to a safety issue. It is strange to me that in the member's time as a technical writer for a Calgary-based utility company, the member managed to completely miss the fact that planned maintenance is necessary, but I won't pretend that this is the first time you have missed something completely obvious directly under your nose, Member for Calgary-Klein.

Unplanned system failures occur in any system, whether it is renewable or nonrenewable, especially in a system with a high variability of renewables. In a system heavily reliant on renewables there are days when the wind doesn't blow and the sun doesn't shine. That causes rolling blackouts. System maintenance blackouts are a risk in any system. The irony of the NDP citing this as a failure of the former system while they transition us to a system with more variability, more cost, a system that will require more maintenance days due to the forced renewables, is not lost on anyone here, Madam Chair.

Now, I think we also need to talk about economic withholding. Since the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud was so eager to tell a story he clearly didn't understand yesterday, I think it is extremely important that I spend some time telling my colleagues from across the aisle about the time TransAlta was fined $56 million for market manipulation. Madam Chair, $56 million. The Member for Edmonton-Whitemud sarcastically declared:

In this great system that the Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake espoused, there was a term called "economic withholding," which basically meant that a company could [withhold] at exactly the right time to maximize their profits and at exactly the right time to cause discomfiture to the citizens of Alberta.

To put the reality of Alberta's market into context, most residential consumers do not face the hourly price volatility of the spot market because they either pay a contracted price or they pay the regulated rate option or the default rate, which averages prices from the previous 45 to 120 days, depending on the provider.

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but pursuant to Standing Order 4(3) we shall now rise and report progress.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Rosendahl: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 16.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, May 25, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. M. le Président, it is my pleasure to introduce to you and to all members of this Assembly on behalf of the Minister of Municipal Affairs a group of 75 brilliant grade 6 students from l'école Coloniale Estates in the beautiful town of Beaumont. L'école Coloniale Estates offers programming in both French immersion and English. The students are accompanied by their teacher, M. Mario Lemay, and five parent assistants and chaperones. I'll just go through them: Mrs. Kimberly Epp, Mrs. Barb Parolin, Mrs. Linda Bouyea, Miss Addie Hobbins, and Mrs. Kim Tremblay. I would ask them to now rise across both sides of the House and accept the warm traditional welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Battle River-Wainwright.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly the outstanding grade 6 students, teachers, and parents of the Forestburg school in my beautiful riding of Battle River-Wainwright. Forestburg, as you may know or may not know, is a coal mining community that produces electricity, that Albertans depend upon, through the Battle River power generating station, the Westmoreland coal mine, and ATCO Power. Among many other things, this is a community of farmers. The people here are hard working, and they have awesome students and teachers. Would you please rise as I call out your name: the teacher, Mrs. Laura Pfeffer; chaperones Brock Bartlett and Dion Burlock; and the students. Please help me give them the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. members, are there any other school groups here today?
Seeing and hearing none, the hon. Member for Peace River.

Ms Jabbour: Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce to you and to the Assembly the members of the 2016-17 Alberta Electoral Boundaries Commission, who are sitting in your gallery. This commission was established in October 2016 with the task of reviewing Alberta's 87 constituencies using a whole number of factors to make sure that they are fair and equitable. The commission had a series of hearings across the province, and now they are issuing their interim report. I had the honour of meeting them when they visited Peace River, and I saw first-hand the integrity and dedication that they all bring to this role. I'm very, very pleased to introduce the members of the commission. We have Hon. Justice Myra Bielby, chair, and members Laurie Livingstone, Gwen Day, Bruce McLeod, and Jean Munn. I would ask that our guests rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome, and thank you.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise in the House today to introduce to you and through you my mother, Shaheen Asad, who lives in Toronto with my father, Asad Kazim. She's visiting me from Toronto to celebrate the two-year anniversary of our government after she and my father attended my swearing-in ceremony. I appreciate her indulgence in politics and would like to thank her for her blessings and support in my political journey. I would like to request her to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome, Mom.

The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my absolute pleasure to introduce to you and through you Theresa Jenkins, the executive director at Servants Anonymous, and Victoria Bailey, the research, communications, and development manager at Servants Anonymous. The goal of Servants Anonymous is for all women who are at risk of or who have experienced sexual exploitation to know faith, hope, and love and to be empowered to rebuild their lives. These incredible women have completely inspired me, and I've spoken about them nonstop since I've met them. They are passionately committed to the women and children that they work for and to providing women a lifeline to exit sexual exploitation and trafficking. I'm honoured to introduce them in the House. I would ask them to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Samantha Christie. Samantha is a communications practicum student working in Seniors and Housing. She holds a bachelor of arts degree in political science and is completing her public relations certificate at MacEwan University. Samantha, please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured today to rise and introduce to you and through you two amazing community leaders from the Al-Rashid mosque. Mr. Khalid Tarabain is the president, and Mr. Omar Najmeddine is the executive director for Al-Rashid and the chair of the board of directors of the Edmonton Islamic Academy, which is located in the beautiful constituency of Edmonton-Castle Downs. I want to thank you for your years of dedication and support in the community and all across Alberta. I will speak more about this in my member's statement this afternoon. I would ask my guests to now please rise and accept the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a couple of introductions today. It's a privilege to rise and recognize this week, when the House voted on Bill 205 to create an advocate for people with disabilities, and to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Teresa Pinkoski, who I believe is sitting right there. Teresa has demonstrated remarkable leadership through her impressive areas of volunteer work in the community, including Fort Edmonton, a child care centre, and the Strathcona county library. Last year she earned her early learning and child care diploma at MacEwan. This year Teresa is one of two recipients of the inspiration award, presented by the Canadian Down Syndrome Society, for her accomplishments. She is here with her mother and with her friends Cosima Vicente; Amanda Riley, who's her support worker; May Carter; and Joe Carter. It's really a great pleasure for her to be recognized today. I would like to ask everyone to stand and receive the customary welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Ms McKittrick: Mr. Speaker, it's also a privilege to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Nathan Ip. Nathan Ip is a trustee with the Edmonton public school board, but he's also a campus connections worker who provided support to Teresa during her time at MacEwan University and was part of her success. I would like to ask Nathan to rise now and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour and privilege to introduce to you and to all the members of this Assembly 37 members of Global Pravasi Seniors Society visiting from Calgary, many of whom are living in the most beautiful, diverse, and outstanding riding of Calgary-McCall. This society is dedicated to providing resources to seniors, identifying opportunities for them to be engaged and involved in society, and protecting seniors from financial or age-related abuse. I will not name all of them, but I would like to name the executive. I would like them to rise as I call their names: Sat Paul Kaushal, the president; Subash Kalia, vice-president of Global Pravasi and also the president of the Hindu Society of Calgary; Prem Bhandari, secretary; Pritam Singh, treasurer; Sarabjit Randhawa; Baldev Singh Kang; Raj Kumar Handa; Balwant Sharma. I thank them for their important work as advocates for seniors and ask all of them to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

1:40

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to introduce to you and through you to all Members of the Legislative Assembly staff from the Property Rights Advocate's office in Edmonton: Ms Karen Johnson, Alberta's Acting Property Rights Advocate, and Ms Angela Balec, the public engagement officer. The office has been around for about four and a half years, providing an evidence-based, unbiased voice to government about current and future property rights and laws and policies. The staff of the office listen to and document stories of Albertans as they share their concerns about property rights. I'd ask Karen and Angela to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

Violence against Women and Girls

Ms McPherson: Women in Alberta continue to face discrimination, sexism in the workplace and in public, lower pay than men, violence in their homes, harassment on the street, and the low opinion of traditionalists, and it's time for it to stop. Earlier this week we were all reminded of the urgent need to address this, not only in Alberta but throughout the world, when a suicide bomber targeted young people, specifically young women, at a concert, killing 22.

The United Nations has designated the 25th of every month Orange Day as part of the Unite campaign to end violence against women. Goal 5 from the 2030 agenda for sustainable development identifies gender equality and the empowerment of women as key priorities and a key to ending violence against women and girls in our world. Mr. Speaker, on this Orange Day I am so proud to be part of a government that is taking action to promote the equality and empowerment of women. Ours is the first gender-balanced cabinet in Canada, and our province has the first Status of Women ministry, unlike the opposition, who have consistently acted against equality by voting against increased funding for women's shelters; voting against Status of Women grants for achieving women's equality; opposing minimum wage increases, which primarily affect women; making public statements encouraging violence against women; and heckling sexual abuse survivors in this House.

We have lifted thousands of children out of poverty with the Alberta child benefit and the family employment tax credit. We've taken action on violence against women by funding women's shelters and passing a law to help women get out of leases trapping them in dangerous situations.

How can you support equality for the women and girls in your life? Tell your daughters how smart they are. If someone discloses they've been sexually assaulted, believe them. Support capable women in your life running for office. Donate time and money to organizations that support women fleeing violence. Question the subtle ways that women are discriminated against every day. And if you want to continue to see the advancement of women, vote NDP in the next election.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Servants Anonymous Society of Calgary

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is horrifying when you know that young teen girls are being sexually exploited or that little girls are being raped, abused, and held in bondage by pimps. The mortality rates are staggering. Women and girls are dying. However, over 800 women and children owe a new life to an organization called Servants Anonymous Society, started as a true grassroots initiative in 2017, and this marks their 29th year of providing life-saving services. SAS provides immediate, safe, rapid exit programming and 24/7 long-term support to women and girls from across Canada fleeing sexual exploitation and sex trafficking.

SAS programs stabilize, heal, reconnect, help women and girls exit sexual exploitation and then positively, completely help them rebuild their lives. They run many programs, including a cuddle and care child care system in which there are activities and resources that promote healthy child development and allow exit participants to work in a program of recovery while knowing that their children are safe while on-site. The social return on this investment: analysis conducted in 2009 to 2012 shows that the SAS rapid-exit safe program was effective and cost efficient, creating nearly $9 in social value for every dollar invested. This social value results in decreases of emergency services use, police involvement, incarceration, violent victimization, addictions and substance abuse, and increased employment in the mainstream economy.

Mr. Speaker, the safe program was closed in February of 2016 due to lack of dedicated funding from this government. Alberta can be a leader in helping women and girls to not only exit sexual exploitation but also as a unique service provider that does not typically fit into existing provincial funding models for vulnerable women. Supporting SAS to provide a safe haven for women fleeing sexual exploiters can literally mean the difference between life and death for them and their children.

I'd like to thank the ministries of Finance, Status of Women, and human services for finding the time to meet with these advocates today.

Opioid Use

Dr. Swann: The opioid death crisis is unprecedented, ripping apart families of all socioeconomic groups, including First Nations. The continual and dramatic increases in opioid deaths since 2013 are extremely saddening given that they are all preventable. While we see increased investment, it's not clear that mental health experts are leading, what the overall strategy is, or how current efforts are being evaluated since there has been no public analysis and reporting. Last year we had 363 deaths due to fentanyl. In the first three months of this year 113 Albertans lost their lives, a 61 per cent increase in deaths over the same period of 2016.

We're starting to see the same disturbing trends here as in B.C., without basic analysis of why we continue to lose ground even after four years, nor have we chosen to call this a public health emergency to mobilize all related resources. This is a mistake. B.C.'s declaration of a public health emergency led to resources being mobilized through the Health ministry across all government departments and between all stakeholders in a co-ordinated plan, with monthly reporting on what is working and what is not. Alberta struggles to report quarterly on fentanyl and other opioid deaths. B.C. embraced an early harm-reduction measure, including safe injection sites. We have yet to see a safe injection site in Alberta.

Naloxone kits are undoubtedly saving lives. The associate minister yesterday admitted there were 1,130 life-saving doses of naloxone given in the first three months of this year. That's 13 near deaths every day in Alberta. Clearly, we are not getting ahead of this devastation.

Wait times have improved for opioid replacement therapy, but outside of Edmonton and Calgary people seeking help continue to wait too long.

Numbers are not enough. There is a troubling lack of analysis of what changes are needed and where for an accurate picture of this epidemic. Strong new leadership from a mental health and addictions expert is needed, who can focus and oversee an evidence-based, co-ordinated plan and overcome the silos. This terribly stigmatized illness needs a new approach, and now is the time for the government to admit that its approach is not working.

This is the most important preventable public health crisis of our time. The lives of our children depend on it.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Government Caucus

Cortes-Vargas: Two years ago Albertans elected a new government, and this new government for the first time in 40 years reflected a province that is diverse, inclusive, and full of fresh ideas. I was one of those new faces, a proud member of the LGBTQ community, a Canadian-Columbian immigrant looking for a better life. My experiences and those of my amazingly diverse caucus members are setting the foundation for the kind of legislation that is making this province better.

I am proud to serve as part of a caucus of people that come from all walks of life. We are a group of people who know what it is like to work in all parts of the Alberta economy. On topics like fair and balanced workplace legislation in this House this diversity of views helps us get things right.

Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House our members have signed both the front and the back of paycheques. We are nurses. We are teachers. We have run our own businesses, worked for other businesses. We have bus drivers, electricians, and realtors. We have come from pulp mills, autobody shops, farms, and we are from the resource sector, nonprofits, and schools. We have helped people with disability take their place in the community and have fought for their dignity and quality of life. We are social workers. We are psychologists, doctors and lawyers. We are writers. We are ship-pers, activists, school trustees, and, yes, some of us even became union representatives.

Mr. Speaker, our diversity is the strength of our province. While the two right-wing parties believe that working people don't belong in government or in decision-making, it is pretty clear from the last election that that is exactly what Albertans wanted.

I am proud of our fair and balanced plan for family-friendly workplaces, and I am proud that with this diverse team we will make life better for Albertans.

1:50

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act

Mr. Jean: The NDP introduced their omnibus labour legislation just yesterday. I want to state once again very clearly that Wildrose is in favour of the compassionate care changes made in this bill. If the government splits the bill into two, we would happily pass those changes through every single stage right now, today. If the Premier was sincere in wanting to help Albertans like Amanda Jensen and was not using her story as a PR exercise, she would agree. To the Premier: will you commit to splitting this bill in two right now and passing it at all stages this afternoon and fast-tracking all the compassionate components of the bill? Yes or no?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, it's really quite interesting. I recall the member opposite being part of a government that stuffed unrelated issues into bills that were thousands of pages long, and that was the way they did business each and every day. This bill that we're talking about is about modernizing workplace rules and bringing them up to date across the scope to support working families across Alberta. Now, if there are specific parts of it that he'd like to change, I welcome the debate in Committee of the Whole. That's where the debate should occur. Our government's focus is on making life better for working Albertans.

Mr. Jean: No, Mr. Speaker. The debate should happen in front of Albertans. That's called consultation, and you can do that this summer. It would be a great thing to hear from them.

It's sad to hear the Premier using Albertans as props to score political points. The NDP are being incredibly callous with this legislation. They're using common-sense employment standards changes as cover for significant changes to the labour code. These changes will hurt Alberta's economy when we can least afford it. Listen, please, to Albertans. The Calgary Chamber of commerce says that Bill 17 will make it harder to run a business in Alberta. I agree. Why won't the Premier use common sense and split this bill in two and take the time to actually consult with Albertans?

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, with each passing day the member's rhetoric gets more extreme. I guess it's because he's fighting Jason Kenney for his job. Let's review this session. The Wildrose leader didn't support providing school lunches, he flip-flopped on GSAs, he called regular Albertans who belonged to unions thugs, and now he's shouting about a bill that even Lorne Gunter thinks is noncontroversial. I honestly didn't believe it was possible to run right of Lorne Gunter.

Mr. Jean: News flash, Mr. Speaker. I don't work for Lorne Gunter; I work for Albertans. They should try to do the same thing.

No consultation, no economic impact study, no problem: that's the NDP way of doing things and the examples of how their ideological fly by the seat of their pants policy methods are piling up. Bill 6, the carbon tax, now sweeping labour changes to change Alberta: all done without consultation and without a sound economic plan. No surprise. It's the NDP. Since the Premier won't hit the pause button in the name of consultation, would she at least recognize that an economic impact study is necessary before forging ahead with this bill?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, I don't need an economic impact study to know that fairness for working Albertans finally coming into line with the rest of the country is good for business. It's good for people. It's good for the economy. Here's what the president of the Progressive Contractors Association, not normally a big-union-friendly group, said. "The government appears to have genuinely sought a 'middle-ground'." People understand that that's what we're doing. I think the member opposite should just get onboard and vote to support working Albertans.

The Speaker: Second main question.

Mr. Jean: Removing secret ballots for Alberta workers is not middle of the ground.

Educational Curriculum Review

Mr. Jean: The Premier ought to spend more time with parents so that she can actually understand why Albertans have serious concerns about her government's curriculum overhaul. In the real world parents are seeing scores slipping, and they don't want their kids being used as guinea pigs for yet another educational fad by this government. In the real world parents have a strong desire to be involved in their child's education, and they have the right to. Why isn't the Premier taking the time to listen to parents in this curriculum review and not just her bureaucratic buddies in Edmonton?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, the curriculum review is part of one of the biggest engagements with Albertans of any curriculum review ever. Students have been invited to participate. Parents have been invited to participate. Teachers have been invited to participate. The member opposite is actually quite welcome to participate. We are moving forward to make sure that we have a curriculum that serves Albertan students and kids going forward to help them get ready for the new economy, and it's really about time.

Mr. Jean: Come-and-be-told meetings are not consultation.

You'll forgive me if I'm a little bit skeptical about where this review is taking us. You see, buzzwords might work for bureaucrats, but parents want to actually see a strong foundation in reading, writing, and understanding of history. You see, the Premier talks all the time about being future ready, but you can't be future ready if you haven't learned from the past. When will the Premier realize that getting back to basics in education is exactly what parents are asking for and what our students need to compete in an evermore competitive world?

Ms Notley: Well, as I said yesterday, Mr. Speaker, it was our government that actually did a math review that very much focused on improving the kind of work that's going on in math and raising accountability levels throughout the education system to improve the math education received by Alberta students. Many people who often align with the members opposite actually thought that it was a good thing, so I'm pleased that some people were able to acknowledge that. Generally speaking, there is a lot more consultation to go forward. The draft document is just out there, and we look forward to hearing more from people across the province, including, as I said before, the member opposite, because I think at the end of the day we're going to produce . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Jean: If the NDP are going to fundamentally change our curriculum system, as all signs seem to suggest they're going to do, then the very least they can do is publicly post the results of their reviews. That includes going back to the fall review and posting written suggestions, and that means doing the same thing for the online survey that's under way now. Will the Premier agree to publicly posting all results of these surveys, including written responses from all Albertans, for all Albertans to see? Yes or no?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. What we commit to doing is carrying on with this consultation, carrying on with the very open dialogue about the matters that are in front of us. In fact, it absolutely boggles the mind that the kinds of things that are in the draft document now the member opposite sees as bad. The notion of engaged citizens is somehow seen as a socialist plot to the members opposite. I said before that they are moving to the extreme, but even this seems too much for them. Engaged citizenship is good for all Alberta, and we are proud to support that.

The Speaker: Third main question.

Child and Youth Advocate Death Review

Mr. Jean: Yesterday the Child and Youth Advocate released another heartbreaking report that highlights again ongoing problems in our child welfare system. Levi was 15 when he took his own life. In one four-year stretch he was moved 12 times between the homes of his mother, relatives, and his foster families. He had nightmares that he would have to move again. This was a child who was bounced around by a system that ultimately failed him. Premier, why don't you have a policy to limit the number of times a child can be bounced around until action is taken?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much. I want to begin, of course, by thanking the advocate for sharing Levi's story. It's absolutely heartbreaking that Levi did not get the support that he needed, and our thoughts go out to not only Levi's family as they grieve for the loss of their son and their brother and their grandson but to all people who find themselves in those situations.

We accept these important recommendations, and we will work closely with the advocate to move forward on them. We know that we need to do better, and we look forward to hearing productive and effective recommendations from the all-party committee that we've set up to focus on exactly these kinds of issues, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jean: Sounds like no policy, Mr. Speaker.

Levi repeatedly told adults that he did not like being around his mother when she drank. When he was eight, he wrote to his mother asking to stay with his foster family, but Levi was returned to her care. When he was 12, Levi was found living in a tent because of his mother's drinking. No action was taken. Levi's voice was ignored. Now, the advocate recommends that children be actively engaged in decisions that affect them. It makes a lot of sense. What is the Premier going to make sure and do so that kids are being heard in our system in the future?

2:00

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. There's no question that the facts that the member describes and that the advocate describes demonstrate that it's clear that the former human services ministry was not able to do everything possible that should have happened for this young man. You know, when the people decide that we need to focus on keeping families together in order to correct the mistakes of the past, when people felt that families were split too often, sometimes what happens is that families are kept together when they shouldn't be. The advocate is absolutely correct that what we need to do is listen to these kids. That work has already started within the ministry. I know it has. And we'll keep . . .

The Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Jean: A shocking response, Mr. Speaker. In fact, a shocking nonresponse.

The Child and Youth Advocate shouldn't have to scream and shout to be taken seriously. It's nice to hear the Premier saying that she's listening, but his report into Levi's death is the fourth time that he's made recommendations about the effects that exposure to parental violence or addictions has on a child. We hear the ministry accept the recommendation, but there seems no will to actually implement these changes. A new system is needed, and it's needed now. Will the Premier agree to bring in the advocate's recommendations to a committee of the Legislature immediately so we can hold the minister and her staff fully accountable?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In fact, we've gone one step further. We've set up an all-party committee which is reviewing all of these issues. This is exactly the opportunity for us to do what the member has asked us to do. So I hope that when they go to the committee, they focus on these difficult challenges, these large problems, these issues of how we care for kids and care for families, all of whom are struggling, to ensure the best outcomes for kids and keeping people together. That's what we'll continue to work on, and I invite the members opposite to participate fully in that committee.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

The hon. leader of the third party.

Mr. McIver: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, this NDP government is hiding bad policy behind good policy. Yesterday they introduced Ashley Jensen to highlight employment standards changes, that we on this side support, to protect the job of a mother who takes time off to care for her child with cancer. Of course, we support that. Sadly, the NDP is using Ashley as a human shield for bad policy in the same bill. Shame. To the Premier. It's obvious you're using this Albertan for political cover. Why wouldn't you separate two different bills, the positive changes for job protection from the many negative changes that you are pushing?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, it's all fine for the member opposite to say that it's an automatic thing that we should move forward with the kinds of leaves that – the many stories that Albertans have been telling about the struggles they've had under the leadership of the former government come to the forefront. I'm glad that he's finally seen the light. For 44 years that government failed to bring in the kinds of changes that every other worker in this country had and deserved, and for him to come here now and complain about us moving forward on it is the most hypocritical thing I've seen in this House in some time. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. McIver: Wrong again. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

Mr. McIver: The Premier sat here last term when we introduced compassionate care changes . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

Mr. McIver: . . . brought in by MLA Jeneroux.

The Labour minister was asked repeatedly if she'd take the private ballot away for union certification. She said no, but it turns out that it does happen. By the time a vote can happen, after six months of card signing, everyone will know who signed a card and who has not, leaving workers open to intimidation from both sides, union and management. To the Premier: why are you leaving Alberta workers vulnerable to intimidation from all sides by removing the secret ballot provision?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, under the rules that were put in place by the Conservative government back in the '80s, a system was created that left Alberta workers vulnerable in a way that no other worker in the country had experienced. Quite frankly, the Supreme Court of Canada has issued so many decisions about matters related to labour relations that if you applied those decisions to our labour laws, there are so many ways in which we were in breach of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms under the leadership of the former government. We are righting the balance. We are about creating a fair and modern workplace, and it is about time.

Mr. McIver: The Premier is making it worse.

Mr. Speaker, many nonprofits and charities manage their budgets by working long hours near key times of the year and then letting employees take banked hours off during slower times. Bill 17 now means that they have to pay 1.5 times the hourly pay. Now nonprofits will need to raise more money to provide the same service or provide less mission-based work per year. Congratulations. You fixed what wasn't broken. To the Premier. Your government is constantly hurting the people you claim to help. Are you that beholden to your union masters that charities are just collateral damage?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Whether the hard-working people of Alberta are earning a living as workers working for oil companies, working for banks, working for accountants, or working for charities, each and every one of them deserves to have certain basic rights in the employment sector. Quite frankly, people who work for charities deserve to be treated fairly. The don't deserve to be told to work volunteer hours because somehow what they do is less valuable. It is not less valuable; it is as valuable. That's what our rules will make sure happens. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order, please. [interjection] Hon. minister.
The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Some Hon. Members: Calgary-Mountain View.

The Speaker: It must have been that introduction by the Opposition House Leader yesterday that caused me to overlook it.
The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: That's twice, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Twice.

Health Information Reporting

Dr. Swann: This afternoon the Auditor General is set to release a report called Better Healthcare for Albertans, which analyzes the root causes of the government's lack of progress in specific parts of the health care system. One way to gauge the system is to look at the AHS quarterly performance reports. However, the last quarter of 2016 came out in April 2017, and this quarter's performance is still not on the AHS website. The PCs often delayed, changed, or stopped reporting altogether when it failed to meet targets. I had hoped that the NDP would do better. To the Minister of Health: where is the report, and why the delays?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the question from the hon. member. I haven't seen the report yet, but I will certainly follow up with AHS immediately and follow up with the House and with the public as soon as possible.

Dr. Swann: Well, last week, Mr. Speaker, the Métis Nation of Alberta released three new health reports detailing higher rates of injury, tobacco-related disease, and problems with Métis people accessing the health system. However, as Keith Gerein's article points out, these studies are based on outdated information, including one report that doesn't have data more recent than 2009-10. Again to the Minister: given the importance of these issues what are you doing to improve the quality and availability of Métis health information to address specific concerns raised in the report?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Our government has committed to rebuilding the relationship with the indigenous peoples of this land. In February of 2017 our government signed a 10-year framework agreement with the Métis Nation of Alberta, and we are very proud of that. This commitment includes working with indigenous communities, including the $300,000 that we used to develop these reports, and also providing analytical support to the community. We're proud to work with them and not do things to them.

Dr. Swann: Mr. Speaker, late Friday afternoon, just ahead of a long weekend, Alberta Health posted the first-quarter opioid death reports, showing a 61 per cent increase over the same quarter in 2016, without so much as a comment from the minister, much less a thoughtful analysis of what's working and what's not working in our approach. Surely we deserve a higher degree of reporting and transparency. Will the minister commit today to establishing a predictable, monthly reporting to the public and some analysis of how the program is working? If not, why not?

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much for the question. Mr. Speaker, we had a choice. As soon as the data was available, we chose to release it rather than holding on to that data and waiting through the whole weekend. We thought it was important to be open and public with that data, so we made it available as soon as we possibly could. In terms of availability I was actually at a press conference that afternoon where we were talking about work that we're doing to help with truth and reconciliation as well as with missing and murdered indigenous women and girls. I'm very happy to answer questions, and if the member has some that he'd like to pose, I would be happy to continue to enter into this dialogue. We've been doing extensive work, and we want to be open with our data. That's why we made it available as soon as possible.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Supportive Living Accommodations for Rural Seniors

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. After much anticipation the greatly needed Boyle supportive living facility has now been built, but it is not fully operational because sections of the building were not built to code. Given the relatively small number of residents in the facility and given that the Greater North Foundation believes the facility can safely function at a level 3 to 4 care, as it was intended, in its current state, to the Minister of Seniors and Housing: can the government confirm whether this will happen?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Seniors built this province, and they deserve to retire in dignity. Our government is proud to invest over $13 million in the Boyle supportive living facility to make life better for seniors in this area. The facility is designed and constructed to the B3 building code. I understand that many housing management bodies want to ensure that these facilities serve seniors as their required level of care increases. We have been working with Municipal Affairs on this to create clarity over the building codes needed for seniors' facilities, and I will have more to say on this in the coming weeks.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that seniors living in partnerships are far too often split up by the requirements for differing levels of care and given that the Boyle supportive living facility will offer both enhanced lodge accommodations and levels 3 to 4 care, which supports the needs of smaller rural communities, to the same minister: will the government use the approach taken in this case for other rural facilities?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Seniors tell me that they want to age in the community where they have lived most of their lives, close to family and friends. My ministry has been working with Health to create these campuses of care. This is a priority for our government, and that's why we're investing $1.2 billion in seniors' lodges and affordable housing. For example, in Canmore the Bow River seniors' lodge project will house both lodge and supportive care units to allow seniors to stay in the facility while accessing additional services. I'm looking forward to the completion of the Boyle supportive living facility such as this.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the demand for services for seniors will only keep increasing across rural Alberta, to the same minister: what is the government doing to ensure that seniors, especially those living in rural Alberta, will have access to the services they require?

Ms Sigurdson: Mr. Speaker, having grown up in a small town in northern Alberta, Valleyview, I understand the importance of providing services to seniors in rural communities. That's why we've introduced the seniors' home adaptation repair program, which supports seniors to access up to $40,000 to make necessary home adaptations. We've also enhanced the special-needs assistance for seniors who have to travel long distances for medical appointments. Through Health our government has invested an additional $200 million for home-care services. These are a few of the things our government is doing to make life better for seniors in Alberta.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Energy Industry Opposition

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the 2015 federal election foreign money and third parties were very active. One of the worst offenders was the Tides Foundation. Tides has been funding antipipeline activism for years. Between 2009 and 2015 Tides made over 400 payments to anti oil sands and antipipeline groups. My question is simple. If this NDP government doesn't have a soft spot for Tides, why don't you file a case against them for interference in the 2015 election?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Our government has made sure that our elections financing rules are some of the strongest in the country, including strong protections against third-party advertising. Any third-party advertiser needs to register with Elections Alberta and needs to disclose their donors, increasing the transparency so that we know where big money is in play in our political system and all Albertans can be aware of that. This is groundbreaking. It was passed last session. I'm quite proud that we now have these rules in place.

Mr. Panda: Given that the Tides Foundation gave $615,000 to Stand, the Pembina Institute, Environmental Defence, and Équiterre, four groups who helped develop the NDP's climate plan, and given that the national director for Stand, Karen Mahon, is serving as an oil sands adviser to this Premier while at the same time she's working to destroy the Kinder Morgan pipeline, why is the NDP government denying their involvement with the Tides Foundation when the proof is in the pudding?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, we are incredibly proud of the fact that with our very first bill we took corporate and union money out of campaigns. It was very important and long overdue. It's time to make sure that we ensure that the people of Alberta have as strong a voice as possible, and fortunately we have a majority government and the ability to do that, no matter what the members opposite try to do.

There are, as the member said, very clear guidelines around third-party advertising. We take them very seriously, and we hope that the members opposite abide by the legislation and ensure that corporations don't buy tickets to fundraisers.

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, given that the New Venture Fund started a website called Dirty Oil Sands, which, according to the Financial Post, was registered to Tzporah Berman, the Premier's other top oil sands adviser, and given that the Dirty Oil Sands campaign conceivably received funds from foreign governments, why is the NDP government working with the anti-Alberta organizations like Tides and radical activists like Karen Mahon and Tzporah Berman, who are clearly on the take from people who would ruin Alberta?

The Speaker: All hon. members, but specifically, hon. member, be cautious about the use of names in the House and any allegations about their character because, remember, they cannot be represented in this House.

The hon. minister.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, this side of the government has taken a different approach because, we know, for far too long the other side wanted to go full John Wayne and pull everybody against each other. Our side is not doing that. We've gathered oil companies together, we've gathered environmental groups and everyday Albertans, and you know what the results were? Two pipelines. We've got the permissions, we're going to keep going, and we're going to get those pipeline shovels in the ground soon.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Calgary Cancer Centre

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This year's budget allocated $370 million to a number of health facilities in Alberta. This included the Calgary cancer centre. The Minister of Infrastructure stated that the increased amount of capital investment of $110 million this year was mainly the result of moving cash flows to reflect the progress of facilities, including the Calgary cancer centre. To the Minister of Infrastructure: with the money allocated in this budget, can you tell us what tangible results we can expect to see this year?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure and Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, our capital plan has been expanded significantly in order to take advantage of lower prices and to keep Albertans working and to catch up on the terrible infrastructure deficit which was left to us by the previous government. By reprofiling money forward into the current year, we can ensure that the construction continues to increase and take place so that we're able to finish and get in the ground new projects that will benefit all Albertans.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
First supplemental.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that in estimates you stated that the Calgary cancer centre is a design/bid/build and given that the design will be done when the tender is awarded, to the minister: can you tell us if the Calgary cancer centre has been tendered?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. I will get that information as to when the project will be tendered and provide it to him directly.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that in estimates the Minister of Infrastructure expressed his concerns that the previous government was designing the Grande Prairie hospital to a political announcement and didn't take into account the actual needs, to the minister: as you have announced that the Calgary cancer centre is to be built but don't yet have a design, wouldn't you say that you are now designing the Calgary cancer centre to your political announcement?

The Speaker: The hon. Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the Minister of Infrastructure for giving me the opportunity to answer this question. For more than 10 years the people of Calgary waited, announcement after announcement after announcement, on that Conservative government. Guess what? Lots of evidence was gathered. The design/build will be completed by the end of the summer, and we expect construction to start later this year as well. It's about time. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

2:20 Sexual Exploitation and Trafficking

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Sexual exploitation and trafficking is growing, and it is full of complexities. The city of Calgary estimates that there are 3,000 women and girls experiencing sexual exploitation in Calgary alone. Barriers to leaving include a lack of money or food, addictions and mental health issues, or concerns about children and family members. One of the main policy areas of Status of Women is preventing and addressing gender-based violence. To the Minister of Status of Women: what are you doing for supports to eliminate sexual exploitation?

Ms McLean: Thank you for the question. Mr. Speaker, we must stop trafficking before it starts and provide needed supports so that the victims can heal and rebuild their lives. That's why we're working in partnership with Community and Social Services as well as the Department of Justice to combat human trafficking, sexual violence, and family violence. Our government provides funding to community agencies directly addressing the needs of human trafficking victims, including the Strathcona Shelter Society, the Centre to End all Sexual Exploitation, and the Action Coalition on Human Trafficking, which is a partnership of government, community partners, and survivors.

Mrs. Aheer: Well, hopefully, that funding will fund SAS as well.

Given that courageous victims are taking early steps to exit sexual exploitation and sex trafficking – they need wraparound supports like those provided by Servants Anonymous Society – and given that these supports like housing, mental health, addictions care, child care, and employment training cross many different government ministries and given that Community and Social Services was just separated from the Ministry of Children's Services, to the Minister of Community and Social Services: what is your government doing to make sure that all of these separate services are available specifically to those exiting sexual exploitation?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the important question. I met with the Servants Anonymous Society of Calgary this morning and had an opportunity to learn about the important work they do. We have family and community support program grants, and we will work with an organization like Servants Anonymous and other organizations across the province to make sure that survivors have the supports they need. In addition to that, we have also increased FCSS funding, that goes to prevention programs, and also added ...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. Given that the problem isn't going away and more and more women and girls are at risk every day and given that most women become involved in sexual exploitation at the average age of 12 and given that youth are at risk and are much more likely to be sexually exploited, to the Minister of Children's Services: how is your ministry responding to this increasing problem, and what are you going to do to ensure that Alberta's at-risk youth are not falling into the hands of predators?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you again, Member, for the question. As she stated, the new research suggests that it starts fairly early on, and I guess it's incumbent on us as government that we must stop trafficking before it begins. My colleague from Status of Women has outlined certain programs that we fund. In addition to that, Justice is also participating in the implementation of a federal action plan on human trafficking through work on the federal-provincial-territorial working group on human trafficking. As I said earlier, we will be there for ...

Whirling Disease in Alberta Fish

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The outbreak of whirling disease on Alberta fish farms has led to them being quarantined since the fall of 2016. Very little communication has been provided to some in the industry. One quarantined fish farm has received no written confirmation of test results or any other documents. At the time of inspection he asked for copies of the documents and was told: no, you don't get a copy. Is this normal practice, that affected farms do not get copies of documents or written confirmation of test results?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to report that our government is taking swift action to protect our fish population from whirling disease. The day after whirling disease was detected in Banff national park, we signed a ministerial order outlining the three-point action plan to educate Albertans, detect and contain the disease. In order to expedite the communication with stakeholders, we formed a whirling disease committee. A representative from the aquaculture industry sits on that committee. This allows us to communicate quickly with stakeholders and get their input on how to contain this disease.

Mr. Orr: The fish farm industry is struggling to manage this outbreak. I would hope that the government would consult and work with them. Instead, operators are saying that they are being ignored and that the government is only focused on public fish farms instead of private commercial fish farms. It appears that the government is going into competition with the commercial fish industry. Will the government save the future of fish farms, both public and private, by working with them, or will your competition just be forced out of business?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have sent information packages to registered fish farm operators, and staff have met with those operators. We will continue working for fish farm operators as we continue to combat whirling disease.

Mr. Orr: The ministry has written a letter to some quarantined trout farms offering them a paltry $25,000, and no explanation of how this figure was arrived at has been provided. Given that in the livestock industries quarantined and slaughtered animals are compensated at fair market value and since these are the livelihoods of families and communities – if they're not compensated at fair market value, a family may not have food on their table – how was this figure calculated, is it negotiable, and is it meant to be fair market value or just a silencer?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you. We did offer ex gratia payments to certain operators who were placed under quarantine. Staff are working with operators to help them apply for those payments. I would encourage the hon. member, if there's a specific constituent, to contact the Minister of Environment and Parks' office. There may be more questions we can help them with. But I need to reiterate that whirling disease is seriously impacting Alberta's world-famous fishery. The CFIA now requires a permit when transferring fish and fish farm equipment from an infected area. For more information I would suggest you contact the Environment and Parks website.

Tax Policies

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, recently the Finance minister trumpeted how the indexed exemption amounts on Alberta's income taxes were yet another example of how this government is making life better for Albertans. You know, it sounds wonderful, but the minister is taking credit for something he had nothing to do with. It kind of reminds me of the ranchers I used to do work for who said how great their calves looked until I pointed out that the calves all looked like the neighbour's bull. But I digress. To the minister: are you claiming that indexing the exemption amount to inflation is something you came up with, or are you simply taking credit for something that was done by the previous government?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We carried on something that was done by the previous government, but we carried it on because we know that we don't want to see incomes further eroded. It's important. We expanded it. We had the choice not to expand it to the lower income people, but we did, and we'll continue to do that.

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that a two-income family with two children and a household income of $105,000 will pay $100 less in income tax thanks to this measure that the minister had nothing to do with and given that the same family will pay roughly $400 more in carbon taxes, that this minister had everything to do with, and given that the minister is only telling Albertans half the story, the $100 part and not the $400 part, to the minister: when can we expect your department to issue a press release to correct the error you've made?

Mr. Ceci: Mr. Speaker, I won't be issuing a press release on Friday afternoon or any other time, I can tell you, because there is no need to introduce a press release. You know, we are making life more affordable for Alberta families. We are cutting school fees. We are freezing tuition. We are doing things like capping electricity rates. That side made life more expensive. We're making it cheaper for Albertans.

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that this government brags about a $7.5 billion tax advantage over the next lowest taxed jurisdiction in Canada and that this advantage will grow to $8.7 billion this year – but, of course, they had nothing to do with that either – and given that this advantage was $11 billion when this government took office, to the Finance minister: is this taxation advantage that you inherited and have already eroded by one-third something that you try to maintain, or is this just the room that you have to play with before Alberta is no longer the lowest taxed jurisdiction in the country?

Mr. Ceci: Mr. Speaker, I know we've all been here for a while, two years, but you know, there's been a recession in this province for two years. Has that side not been aware that it's been the toughest recession? We've contracted 3.5 per cent of our GDP in 2015-16. We didn't cause it. We're fixing it. We're bringing diversification into this province. We've got the backs of Albertans, and we're investing across this province. That'll get us back.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Digital Media and Postproduction Grant Programs

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Calgary-Currie has hundreds of people whose livelihood is in the cultural sector, and I know that culture is an economic driver in our province. To the Minister of Culture and Tourism: what is this government doing to help Albertans looking for work in the post-production, digital animation, visual effects, and interactive digital media sectors?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of culture.

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. I'm very happy to share with you that two new pilot grant programs, worth $3 million, will be put in to make it easier for Albertans looking to work in these sectors. A $1.5 million interactive digital media grant will cover up to 35 per cent of labour costs for new hires, and a $1.5 million postproduction, digital animation, and visual effects grant will cover up to 18 per cent of eligible labour expenses. These grants were designed with input from industry stakeholders, who are very excited to see our government's involvement and support of the industry.

Thank you.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is great news. Can the Minister of Culture and Tourism inform the House who will ultimately benefit from these grants?

The Speaker: Point of order is noted.

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. These grants will help Alberta's postproduction and digital media companies grow and create jobs, diversify our economy, and make life better for Albertans, and they are expected to benefit Albertans looking to get into the cultural industry, many of them being recent graduates. The grants will benefit any small to medium-sized businesses by helping to offset the costs of hiring new labour in the postproduction, visual effects, digital animation, and interactive media sectors. Eligible companies can apply for grant funding using albertamediafund.ca.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the conservatives across the way have no plans for this sector and given that their reckless cuts across this government would only make the lives of Albertans worse in this tough economy, can the Minister of Culture and Tourism explain how this will protect and diversify our economy, create more jobs, and make life better for Albertans?

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order, please.

Miranda: The interactive digital media and postproduction grants offer much-needed stimulus and support for the cultural industry, Mr. Speaker. We're going to help attract more film and television, digital media products, games, and animation production here to our province. It will also help individuals and companies develop technical expertise that is very much needed. Overall, these grants will help Alberta's postproduction and digital media companies grow, create jobs, and make life better for Albertans.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Midwifery Services

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last year the Wildrose called on the NDP government to remove the cap on midwife funding. We explained the importance of giving women choice instead of instituting artificial funding caps. Small midwifery clinics in locations across our province are still worried that this health service is not being properly funded. To the Minister of Health: will you remove the cap for midwife funding?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. I'd like to remind everyone that this government values

Alberta midwives and their important role in the health and well-being of mothers and their babies, and even in this tough economy we've supported midwives with a large commitment to expand funding for access to midwifery services. By working with the Alberta Association of Midwives, I'm pleased to report that the funding we've put in place means almost 600 more midwife-attended births this fiscal year alone, and that number is going to continue to go up over the next two years.

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, given that this government likes to brag about their 68 per cent increase to midwife funding and while this stat may sound all great and good, it only increases the number of midwife births by 3 per cent, which doesn't even address the waiting list, and considering that this is only a fraction of the 50,000 to 55,000 births each year, when is the Minister of Status of Women going to stop the smoke and mirrors and stand up for women's choice? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Ms Payne: Mr. Speaker, our government absolutely supports women's choice in all aspects of their reproduction. Frankly, the member opposite might do well to compare the midwives' agreement here in Alberta with some of the other jurisdictions across this country. We have some of the most generous policies available for midwives and are continuing to work in partnership with the Alberta Association of Midwives to expand access to this very important service for Alberta women. Meanwhile the opposition rattles on about removing the midwifery budget while at the same time talking about cutting billions from our health care system.

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, given that a midwife birth can offer substantial cost savings to the entire health care system and given that this government is currently running a $10.3 billion deficit, will the minister take the advice of the Wildrose Official Opposition, save taxpayers' money, improve choice for women, and immediately remove the cap on midwifery services?

Ms Payne: Mr. Speaker, we absolutely value the work of midwives and the benefit that they provide for mothers and their babies. In fact, I was lucky enough to have midwives attend both of my births. You know, frankly, we do know that midwifery has the possibility of helping to save dollars in the system, often with reduced medical intervention through the course of both pregnancy as well as during the birth itself. That said, our government is pleased to be working in co-operation with the Alberta Association of Midwives to expand further access to midwifery care for Alberta women, unlike the opposition.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act

Mr. Gottfried: Mr. Speaker, Bill 17 includes some positive change for Albertans. We can all support job-protected leave for victims of domestic violence or for parents who need to care for critically ill or injured children. However, this government exploits the emotional elements of the bill to shield themselves from valid criticism while refusing to admit that many . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Please.

Mr. Gottfried: . . . of the sections clearly pander the bill to special-interest groups. To the Minister of Labour: were you afraid that if you introduced the labour code provisions separately from employment standards, you wouldn't be able to conveniently hide behind vulnerable Albertans when debating this bill? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. [interjection] Order. Calgary-Hays.
The Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a disgrace to hear the Member for Calgary-Hays misname Amanda Jensen. For over 30 years that party didn't do anything, and she fell through the cracks because although they held consultations, they did not make any changes that would help everyday Albertans. They had consultations. They knew there were problems. Amanda Jensen was let go because of laws that that government allowed to stand. [interjections]

The Speaker: Quiet down, folks.

Mr. Gotfried: So you are hiding behind vulnerable Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, given this government has once caved to union pressure and introduced an antidemocratic hybrid card check system for union certification and given that the government's own press release states that Bill 17 will "simplify union certification" and given that the Alberta Federation of Labour was in full force on social media yesterday singing the praises of this bill and attacking its critics, again to the minister. You stated publicly that protecting the secret ballot process for union certification was of paramount concern for employers. Why did you ignore them in favour of your union comrades? [interjection]

The Speaker: Hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Sorry.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We have kept the secret ballot vote as part of our labour relations system. It's ironic to see the member opposite stand up and talk about intimidation when his party's leader was accused of intimidating voters during the leadership race. His own leader was forced to return thousands of dollars of donations because the supporters gave more than the law allowed when he was an MP. On this side of the House we are going to keep standing up for Alberta families. We're going to stand up for Albertans like Amanda Jensen. The opposition wants to sit on their hands and let these Albertans slip through the cracks. We will not let that happen. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order.

Government House Leader, remind the caucus again of that earlier rule I've advised. When I stand, you be quiet, okay?

Mr. Mason: Yes. I'll do that, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you.
Second supplemental.

2:40

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. No consultation and hiding behind Albertans: that's the way it's going to be.

Given how obvious it is that the government was afraid of losing the narrative on Bill 17 before it was even introduced given the ad campaign they rolled out yesterday and given that this government has a long history of wasting taxpayer dollars on propaganda in support of pending legislation to make themselves feel good or convince themselves that Albertans support their misguided policies, again to the minister: what is the total cost of the ad campaign launched in support of Bill 17? Please share this information with Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Making sure that Alberta has fair and family-friendly workplace legislation is a priority of this government. Making sure that people can take time off to care for themselves or their loved ones when someone is sick is a priority as is making sure that Albertans know about these important changes so that they will be able to be more protected when they are sick. Today I spoke with two doctors who every day in their practice talk to people who are afraid to call in sick because they might lose their jobs. Making sure that Albertans know about this through a small ad campaign is a priority for us.

The Speaker: Hon. members, unanimous consent to introduce some guests who have arrived?

[Unanimous consent granted]

Introduction of Guests (continued)

The Speaker: The Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and introduce to you and through you to all members of the House some friends of the Speaker's and mine from Medicine Hat. Now, everybody knows that Medicine Hat has the best weather. They know we have great people. But more people need to know that we have one of the best chambers of commerce in all of Canada. I would like to take a few minutes and introduce five of the people, volunteers and staff, that make this happen. As I call your name, if you could please rise. I'd like to introduce the president of the Medicine Hat chamber of commerce, Aaron Fleming. Next, I'd like to introduce our second vice-president, Sarah MacKenzie. Then I'd like to introduce the treasurer, Tracy Noullet; our executive director, Lisa Kowalchuk; and her executive assistant, Katalin Lang. If everyone would please share in the normal warm reception for our guests. Thank you for coming.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The Speaker: Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ramadan

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to have the opportunity to rise and wish Ramadan Mubarak to all and especially those of my constituents and those Albertans of the Muslim faith. Ramadan is the ninth month of the Islamic calendar. During this month adult Muslims fast from sunrise to sunset and are also expected to abstain from other activities which keep their hearts and minds tied to earthly things. It is a time of renewed devotion to the spiritual practice of Islam and is meant to not only cleanse the body and spirit but also increase empathy for others who may be suffering from hunger. I would especially like to recognize the devotion and discipline of those members of the Muslim faith who observe Ramadan in a northern climate like ours. With long hours of daylight may come long hours of fasting, and those of us who are not Muslim should recognize and support our friends and neighbours.

One of the reasons that Ramadan is held to be sacred is that the Quran, Islam's holy book, was revealed to the Prophet Muhammad, peace be upon him, during this month. Observing Ramadan is one of the core tenets of Islam and is observed widely amongst all Muslims. Muslims believe in the oneness of God, the importance of regular prayer, the giving of charity to the poor, and the importance of pilgrimage.

The Muslim community has been a part of Alberta for many years. The oldest mosque in Canada, the Al-Rashid mosque, was built in Edmonton and officially opened in 1938. Over the years Muslim Albertans have made many contributions to this province, not least during the fire in Fort McMurray last year, when Muslim charitable organizations contributed generously. It is a reminder that all of us share a responsibility for our neighbours of all faiths, cultures, and ethnicities.

As Muslims take this time to renew their faith and devotion, may we all take this time to consider our own faith and renew our pledge to build a strong, inclusive, and caring society.

Once again Ramadan Mubarak to all. Assalamu Alaikum. Peace be with you.

Thank you.

Municipal Minimum Property Tax

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, in Hamlet Polonius offers this advice to Laertes.

This above all: to thine own self be true,
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.

Now, this NDP government appears to be following Polonius's advice. Higher taxes, runaway spending, massive deficits, ballooning debts: these are all, certainly, them being true to their NDP selves.

But on one issue the NDP supports transferring wealth from the poor to the rich. Over 70 Alberta municipalities apply minimum tax, which allows municipalities to levy a property tax bill that in some cases is higher than the assessed value of the property. Poor people pay more, and rich people get a tax break. Now, the first two NDP Municipal Affairs ministers could have changed this reverse Robin Hood policy, but they didn't. What do NDP stalwarts have to say about this? Well, the late Jack Layton in his book Homelessness: How to End the National Crisis describes how shifting property taxes from higher to lower income Canadians, as minimum tax does, makes homelessness worse. A recent survey by the Broadbent Institute showed that 82 per cent of respondents believe that the gap between the rich and the poor in Canada is growing. Minimum tax widens that gap.

Now, recently the Premier's former chief of staff advised the NDP to challenge what he ironically called reverse Robin Hood policies that transfer wealth from ordinary people to the rich. It's strange, Mr. Speaker, because when it comes to things this government is eager to change, minimum tax meets all the criteria. It was brought in by the previous government – yes, those evil PCs they love to blame for everything – and Alberta is the only province that allows minimum tax. Normally this government rushes to bring us in line with the other provinces, but on minimum tax this government has ignored its own party sages as well as Polonius's counsel.

But perhaps we shouldn't be surprised because earlier in the same speech Polonius recommends, "Neither a borrower nor a lender be," and we all know how well the NDP has followed that. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As chair of the Select Special Ombudsman and Public Interest Commissioner Search Committee it is my honour to table our report, which recommends the appointment of Marianne Ryan as the next Ombudsman and Public Interest Commissioner for the province of Alberta. This will be for a five-year term commencing July 1, 2017.

Now that our committee's mandate is complete, I'd like to quickly thank all of my committee colleagues for their co-operation and dedication throughout the search process and to acknowledge the valuable and important support provided to the committee by the staff from executive search and the Legislative Assembly Office.

Introduction of Bills

Bill 207

Regulatory Burden Reduction Act

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I rise and beg leave to introduce Bill 207, Regulatory Burden Reduction Act.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is very short and was deliberately made so in order to illustrate brevity and simplicity in creating regulations. I will get right to the point of the bill. It is simple. For every regulation created or amended that adds a burden to business, one or more regulations need to be eliminated.

In this depressed economic environment business owners want to spend their time and money working to create jobs, not filling out red tape and forms. Red tape manifested throughout government regulations takes business owners away from doing what they do best. Instead, they have to spend time on government administration and reporting.

In Canada regulatory compliance costs business owners over $30 billion a year. Outdated, redundant, or excessive regulations hobble businesses and are silent eliminators of jobs. Regulatory compliance costs are disproportionately borne by small businesses. Small and medium-sized firms constitute the largest segment of the Canadian economy and consistently account for the lion's share of new job creation.

I look forward to a productive debate on Bill 207 and urge the Assembly to help eliminate barriers.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As chair of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices and in accordance with section 20(2) of the Auditor General Act I'm pleased to table five copies of the following report: Better Healthcare for Albertans, A Report by the Office of the Auditor General of Alberta, May 2017. Copies of this report will be provided to all members.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and table this article from February 15, 2005, the same year, actually, that the PCs announced the Calgary cancer centre, where the title is Gays Can Marry – But Not Each Other. Calgary MP Jason Kenney says discrimination is okay. Then it goes on to cite that Libby Davies and Svend Robinson, the first two openly gay MPs, are reasons why gays shouldn't be able to marry.

The Speaker: Thank you.

The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table three reports. I have the requisite number of copies for that. The first one is the '15-16 annual report for Alberta's Promise.

The second is the Social Care Facilities Review Committee reports for '14-15 and '15-16.

I have the requisite number of copies for all three of them. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View, did you have a tabling today?

Dr. Swann: Oh, yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have several tablings today. The first is an article by Chris Nelson from the Calgary Herald called: politicians may run, but they can't hide. It's about the opioid crisis.

The second is based on my questions around the recent Métis health burdens and the delays and late reporting on statistics for their health concerns.

The final is from former MLA Harry Chase, who comments on the clear-cut logging in the Kananaskis area and his concerns as a former watchdog and campground manager and the devastation he's witnessed in the past.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Dr. Starke: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two items for tabling today. I'd like to table the requisite number of copies of a couple of items that I quoted from in my member's statement. The first, an op-ed opinion piece by Mr. Tom Parkin, Postmedia Network, entitled The Next NDP Leader Needs Western Support – Here's How to Earn It.

The second item, Mr. Speaker, is five copies of a summary entitled Progress Summit 2017: Progress in the Age of Trump, a Polling Presentation for the Broadbent Institute.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've got a tabling as well. This is the Alberta NDP Party platform for 1963. This is one that I believe that they should actually read, especially when it comes to the fact that they're phasing out coal.

Thank you very much. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order. Order, please.

Hon. members, pursuant to section 6 of the Electoral Boundaries Commission Act the chair is pleased to table with the Assembly and, by doing so, make public the interim report of the 2016-17 Alberta Electoral Boundaries Commission. I would ask that the pages provide each member with a copy of the report.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk. On behalf of the hon. Mr. Mason, Minister of Infrastructure and Minister of Transportation, responses to questions raised by Mr. Taylor, the hon. Member for Battle River-Wainwright; Mr. Drysdale, the hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti; and Mr. Orr, the hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka, the April 12, 2017, Ministry of Infrastructure 2017-18 main estimates debate.

The Speaker: I believe we have two points of order.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, as much as I dislike puffballs and feel they're a monumental waste of the House's time, I will withdraw that point of order for today. Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you.

The Government House Leader.

Questions on Large Policy Matters

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. During question period today the hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek asked a number of questions with respect to a bill that is currently on the Order Paper. I let the first one go by, but the first supplemental clearly had to do with policy and items that were contained within the bill itself and such. I believe that those questions were out of order.

The Speaker: The member that would like to speak to this point of order?

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek we will remind him to be more careful in the future and to not be offside with this particular rule. We thank the Government House Leader for this valuable reminder.

The Speaker: Thank you very much.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 17

Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm very pleased to kick off debate about the merits of Bill 17, the Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act.

Workplaces legislation touches the lives of every Albertan. Nearly everyone in this province works to make a living or depends on someone who does. Unfortunately for Albertans, the rules that govern our workplaces haven't been updated since 1988. That's nearly three decades with no major changes, just some minor tweaking every now and then. Think about how much our workplaces and our world have changed over the past 30 years, Madam Speaker. Not only have Alberta's workplace laws lagged behind the times; they've lagged behind the rest of Canada as well, and Albertans deserve better than this. Albertans deserve fair and family-friendly workplace laws that support a strong economy and ensure they can take care of themselves and their families. Albertans need modern, balanced workplace legislation that protects the rights of hard-working Albertans and helps businesses to stay competitive.

Madam Speaker, Bill 17, the Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act, is the legislation that Albertans deserve and need. If passed, this bill would make a number of important updates to our workplace legislation that would make life better for Albertans and protect those who rely on the basic rights and protections enshrined in law. The bill does this by addressing issues that are keys to how Albertans work today, including family-friendly leaves, youth employment, modernized workplace standards, administrative penalties, labour relations, and application to farms and ranches. I'd like to touch on each of these sections of the bill in turn.

The first is family-friendly leaves. Bill 17 enhances existing job-protected leaves and introduces new categories of leave so that Albertans can take care of their family responsibilities without fear of losing their jobs. Madam Speaker, in consulting with Albertans, we posted comparisons between Alberta's leaves that we currently have and other jurisdictions'. Alberta had four job-protected leaves: maternity, paternity, reservist, and an eight-week compassionate care. Most of our other provinces had somewhere between 10 and 14 job-protected leaves, so there was a gap identified. In the survey results that we received from Albertans, a majority of Albertans, including employers, supported matching our federally supported employment insurance leaves, that Canadians pay into and Albertans pay into. That is a key part of what I have brought forward and introduced with this package. To match the federal employment insurance system, we are reducing the eligibility requirements for maternity leave and, again, making sure that the lengths of our leaves in all cases line up with employment insurance.

We are introducing new leaves as well, Madam Speaker, including a leave that supports victims of domestic violence so that they can seek help without worrying about losing their job. Bill 17 also provides leaves for those struggling with short-term illness, mourning the loss of a loved one, or for someone who might need to care for their critically ill child, and it gives new Canadians attending a citizenship ceremony an unpaid half day off to recognize this important milestone in their life. We can all empathize with someone who is in each of these positions, and that's why we must enshrine these protections and allow Albertans to tend to their personal responsibilities without being worried about losing their jobs.

The second area of updates has to do with our youth employment. Madam Speaker, as it stands, Alberta's workplace rules do not align with our international labour obligations such as the International Labour Organization's convention 138 on youth employment, which Canada has agreed to ratify and which comes into effect in just a short while.

To line up with the ILO obligations and, more importantly, to protect young Albertans, Bill 17 makes several changes. First, the minimum age for light work would be set at 13, with 12-year-olds only able to work in artistic endeavours through a permit process. Youth aged 15 and under will be required to choose work from an allowable light work list. The hours youth work and the duties they're permitted to perform will be restricted. My department will consult with stakeholders to develop these lists of light work and hazardous work, and these sections to do with youth work will be proclaimed once that work is completed. All of these changes will help ensure that young Albertans have the proper protections from exploitation and for their safety.

I would like to note, Madam Speaker, that the changes I'm describing speak specifically to true employment relationships and not to children helping with chores, doing casual babysitting, or participating in 4-H. The government has no interest in disrupting these traditional and beneficial roles for young Albertans, but we do think it's important that Alberta follow the conventions that the ILO has recommended and that we make sure we are putting in laws that protect our young people.

The next area I'll discuss is simplifying and modernizing workplace standards. This is a broad subject that covers many aspects of Albertans' daily experiences on the job, and it makes up a large part of Bill 17. In keeping with other Canadian jurisdictions, we are proposing that rates of banked overtime and pay be no less than time and a half, something that other Canadians have had for quite some time. The bill would update the rules around hours of work, including rest periods and compressed work weeks. In the case of Alberta, Madam Speaker, we had a rule that allowed a 30-minute rest break if you worked more than five hours, and we're adjusting that to match other jurisdictions where you receive a 30-minute rest break for every five hours so that someone who works that 12-hour shift would have an adequate rest break.

Likewise, vacation rules and holiday pay would be updated and better clarified under the bill. We're also proposing that employers no longer be allowed to pay an employee with a disability less than minimum wage and that wage deduction rules be clarified so that employees are not held responsible in dine-and-dash or gas-and-dash situations.

We are also introducing minimum notice periods for termination by an employer, making sure that the employees would be better protected and that there is some sense and clarity in how those termination notices operate. Under Bill 17 employees would be provided with a minimum notice for their termination based on how long they have held their position, and if an employee provides less notice than required, employers would have the option to pay wages only for the notice that has been given.

I look forward to discussing the merits of these changes and all of the changes that Alberta employees and employers have asked for as we work through the bill in detail.

The fourth area that Bill 17 deals with is administrative penalties. After all, delinquent employers have no motivation to follow the proposed new rules if they don't have any teeth to them. While most Alberta employers treat employees with fairness and respect, during consultations we heard too many stories of others who skirted the rules and neglected their duties.

To ensure that employers follow the proposed guidelines, one of the critical provisions of this legislation calls for the creation of an administrative penalty system. Employers who contravene the law would face reasonable and enforceable penalties, and those who do so repeatedly would face further disciplinary action. In this way, Bill 17 would set up a much stronger system to ensure that Alberta workers enjoy the protections and rights they deserve. Madam Speaker, I have to tell you that when I was at the round-table sessions and when we looked at the survey submissions from our stakeholders, having an administrative penalty system that held employers to account and made sure we were enforcing our legislation was something that everyone seemed to agree on. This was a point of common ground between our stakeholders.

Bill 17 also ensures that Alberta has a fair and balanced labour relations system that respects the collective bargaining rights of both employees and employers. For example, if this legislation passes, it would implement first contract arbitration when an agreement between parties has not been reached after 90 days. This helps limit the number of strikes, that can harm long-term relationships between parties. Within our first contract solution, Madam Speaker, we have tried to make sure that it is the responsibility of the two parties to come to an agreement, giving the Labour Relations Board tools to help them reach that agreement by having them go back to mediation or adjust in other ways. Those tools will be very important because we believe the best settlements are those that are reached between the two parties, so our legislation is designed to help facilitate just that.

We've also introduced a hybrid system for certification, where based on verified membership cards from more than 65 per cent of employees, a union can be certified. If 40 to 65 per cent of eligible employees sign cards, a supervised vote would be conducted, and the Labour Relations Board still retains the ability to hold a vote where it believes appropriate, such as when there might be conflicting evidence of support. Our proposed system will help avoid the intimidation that can occur on both sides of a negotiation between that first and second vote. These changes balance the interests of employers and employees and ensure businesses are on a level and competitive playing field and that they will contribute to a strong economy.

Finally, the last aspect of Bill 17 I'll discuss is how the changes I've described apply to Alberta's agricultural community. The technical working groups gathered extensive input from Albertans. With that feedback we have been able to strike the right balance in ensuring that waged, nonfamily workers on farms and ranches have the same rights as their peers in other sectors while also respecting the unique qualities of farms and ranches in Alberta. Exemptions for family members for both new and existing employment standards remain in place. New protections include tools to end strikes during critical times like harvest and adjustments to balance work and rest requirements. All of these are to ensure that Alberta's proud agricultural traditions can continue and thrive.

Madam Speaker, we took with great seriousness the suggestions made by our technical working groups, and I would once again like to thank those who participated and submitted their thoughts both through the technical working group process and through the consultation that we hosted afterwards.

Madam Speaker, as you can see, this government has been working hard to make life better for Albertans. Through this badly needed update to our province's workplace legislation, Albertans would have family-friendly workplaces that empower them to take care of their personal responsibilities. We heard from employers and employees alike that these proposed changes would help protect vulnerable Albertans and support a strong, competitive economy. These sensible, balanced changes have been a long time coming. After nearly three decades of inaction, Albertans deserve safe, up-to-date workplace legislation, and that's why I'm very proud to be moving forward with Bill 17, the Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act. I look forward to debating it further with my colleagues.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

3:10

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 17. First of all, I'd like to say that there are some great parts to this bill, and we all acknowledge that and have asked to actually have those parts separated out of the bill so that they could be passed through the House before, you know, the end of this week even. We could have had it done today or first thing Monday as well. There are some great things about it.

But, again, it's 124 pages long. We've heard that people are looking for consultation. The business community, chambers of commerce, and just regular, concerned Albertans would like to have their say in something so fundamental as this 124-page bill. Therefore, I will be presenting an amendment. If I can get the pages to pass it out, I'll wait until you have a copy of it.

The Acting Speaker: Please go ahead.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I move that the motion for second reading of Bill 17, Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 17, Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

Now, the reason for this amendment, Madam Speaker, is that this will provide time for proper consultation with affected parties, concerned businesses, chambers of commerce, and concerned Albertans. It will also give the government time to consider splitting this bill into two parts, as we suggested, as was suggested by the Leader of the Official Opposition as well as the House leader of the third party. As well, it would give members of the government time to reflect on whether or not they should actually be speaking to this bill and voting on the stages of this bill or on amendments to it based on recent rulings on the Member for Calgary-Hays and also the fact that during the debates on Bill 12 17 per cent of the Official Opposition had to recuse itself from discussion or voting on Bill 12 because they had interests, although indirect, in the housing industry.

Now, I'd just like to point out a few things for the members opposite to reflect on. Affiliated union members contribute $16.04 per year to the Alberta Federation of Labour. The Alberta Federation of Labour was fined $50,000 for robodialing during the 2012 election, and I can guarantee you it wasn't for the Wildrose Party. Major contributions to the NDP leadership campaign were from union organizations: our Premier, $42,050 from union donations; the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie, over 50 per cent from union support, a total of $5,443; the Member for Edmonton-Calder, 60 per cent of the donations came from unions, to a total of $21,250.

Madam Speaker, I would just like the members opposite to take this into consideration, reflect on what's happened in this House in the very recent past, in this spring session, and really, really consider whether they should actually speak to this bill, vote on it, or recuse themselves, which would be the proper thing to do.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to REF1? The hon. Minister of Labour and democratic renewal.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I stand to say that I will not be supporting this amendment. Making sure that we have fair and family-friendly workplaces in this province is of high priority. Albertans have been done a disservice by being left with workplace legislation that had not been kept up to date, that did not give them the rights that other Canadians have enjoyed. We have Albertans who are paying into the employment insurance system and then are not able to access the leaves that they pay into, that all Canadians agree are an important safety net. We want to care for our neighbours. We want to make sure people can care for their family's responsibilities. We have legislation that is not in line with Supreme Court rulings. Making sure that we have legislation that is not at risk of being challenged should be a priority for any government. Keeping legislation up to date is a priority.

For these reasons I will not be supporting the member's motion, and I must say that I'm very proud that on this side of the House I work with a caucus filled with teachers and electricians, people who worked in grocery stores, people who worked in hospitals, people who worked in good, hard-working jobs. It's because we have caucus members with such a wide variety of experience that we represent Alberta, and it's because of caucus members like that that we've been able to bring forward groundbreaking legislation that better reflects Alberta.

I'm quite proud of my caucus, Madam Speaker, and I will not be supporting this amendment.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the referral REF1? Oh, sorry; 29(2)(a) first.

Seeing none, I will recognize the hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I definitely agree that the amendment to send this to committee is the right thing to do. I was hoping that the government across the aisle here would have realized how important consultation is by now. With the fiasco that was created by Bill 6 due to lack of consultations, I was hoping they wouldn't make the same mistake twice, but it doesn't appear that that's the case. Thirty days is just simply not enough time to consult on such an extensive bill as this, and even now, since yesterday, companies of all stripes are issuing releases saying that there needs to be some consultation on this. The Progressive Contractors Association of Canada just recently said: we also note our deep concerns with the very compressed consultation period that was undertaken prior to the introduction of this bill. They are among the many who are concerned that not enough consultation has been done.

I have a feeling that even the NDP themselves were not ready with this bill as they wanted to put a constituency week into the schedule that wasn't in the schedule. They needed a break in order to get this ready. They filibustered their own bills all last week in order to create time to dream this thing up in a hurry. They weren't ready then, they're not ready for debate now, and I can assure you that if they weren't ready, Albertans aren't ready because they haven't even had time to look at it.

Not only that, but it seems now that they want to get rid of the family-friendly Legislature idea by invoking night sittings all of a sudden. They want to introduce a week off, then they want night-friendly sittings so that they can ram this bill through in the night as fast as possible, and then also they're going to extend the House, so here we are at the very end of session sticking this thing through in a hurry. I find it interesting, actually, that the House staff, NDP caucus staff, opposition staff will actually have to work contrary to the contents of this bill in order to pass this very legislation. It makes no sense. We'll be working late into the night, more than 12-hour days, overtime questionable. I guess that doesn't even count for MLAs.

This bill needs to be sent to committee. That's the reality of it. There are parts of this bill that we actually would like to pass very quickly if the NDP would be willing to separate it into two different parts, which is another reason that it should go to committee, but it doesn't seem they want to pass it that way. They would rather sneak labour in on top of something else, and it's negatively going to affect the businesses of Alberta. It's 124 pages long. They've sent bills that are only three or four pages long to committee for further study, but here we have 124 pages. It has to be rushed through, not willing to let committee look at it.

It's interesting that, in fact, the government approached us for our support to send their time zone bill to committee for further study, yet this bill, that would affect all aspects of all working people and as well employers, needs to be passed in a matter of a couple of weeks with virtually no consultation. We're willing to pass parts of it now, but that would require the NDP to actually play nice and split the bill apart as it should have been presented.

Not only are they trying to rush this bill through without consultations, but they give opposition parties just a matter of days to consult with their constituents and stakeholders. Actually, it isn't even days. We've had 24 hours to consult with stakeholders and constituents . . . [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members. Sorry, Member. I recognize you're all interested in the material in front of you. If you could all please be respectful to the members as they're speaking and stop moving around the House and/or hanging over each other's desks, that would be much appreciated, please.

Member, please continue.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. If the NDP were back in the opposition role, where they used to be and might soon be, they would be screaming mad at this kind of a procedural process. They seem to have taken on the mantle of being an oppressive, unfair government who doesn't care for anything except their own agenda, and it is disappointing. Any single MLA across the aisle who ever once said that they wanted to make this House a better place: well, we have all failed in that, apparently.

Make this House a better place. Allow us to send this to committee, properly consult with stakeholders. Allow us to talk to our constituents and find out how they actually want us to vote. That's our job, and if this bill is rushed through in the night, we are prevented from doing our jobs, and it's not how we should function in this House or in our province. They are not allowing our elected officials to be good elected officials when we have this kind of process.

I just say that to do this properly, we need more than a few hours, more than a week. We need time to consult on this massive document that drastically alters the landscape of our labour in Alberta. If the members opposite believe that a week is long enough, then they really don't know what it means to consult with constituents or stakeholders. Again, the bill needs to be sent to committee. It needs more consultation. Please vote to send it to committee. Give me something to believe in, that there is good in this House still. If we don't learn from our mistakes, I don't know where we're going to end up because we will be creating the same kind of public outcry that we had on Bill 6.

There has been no real consultation in this, just a sham approach to it. The bill has been written in a rush, without due deliberation or stakeholder review at all except for some union bosses. To present it at the very end of session, to extend this session, to squeeze it in so that it runs through the night to minimize news coverage, to hope it's over before Albertans can speak up: you haven't got Albertans' backs. You're trying to do it behind their backs. Send it to committee and support democracy.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to – oh, 29(2)(a). My apologies.

Seeing none, are there any members wishing to speak to the referral? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this amendment to Bill 17, the so-called Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act. This is a thoughtful amendment, particularly in light of the history that we've seen carry on in this House. As I begin, I can't help but comment on the Labour minister's remarks when she took the floor talking about electricians in her caucus. I know she's got at least one caucus member that's on the record for not being fond of electricians. I'm sure that the minister will deal with that.

It is important that the labour bill is respectful to people in every line of work because all work is valuable, all people that do work need to be valued, and they all need to have a chance to comment and, hopefully, have some influence on legislation that will affect their working lives from now until the legislation changes.

What we have here is a government in a rush to do some good things, surely, in the leaves for vulnerable people. Despite the fact that the government has brought in a person, Ms Jensen, that was really badly treated under the previous legislation – unfortunately, they're using her for cover for a lot of other things that are in this legislation that are not nearly as family friendly or nearly as good for the workplace or the workforce as the leave provisions that the government has chosen to add. As we've made clear on this side of the House, we'll be happy to support those leave provisions that are in this legislation.

However, Madam Speaker, those are not the only things in this legislation. We probably could have gone a little bit further down the road if a few things had happened better; first of all, if there had been a legitimate consultation process. We've heard in question period over the last few weeks, knowing this legislation was cooking somewhere in the back halls and the backrooms of NDP land, the Labour minister talk about how there had been consultation. What we heard at the briefing for the bill was that essentially Mr. Sims was hired to do consultation, but we're not sure how little the minister actually attended the consultations.

I know I heard from at least one business group that had a, quote, consultation, where the minister sat there playing on her cellphone the whole time and not listening to a thing, looked at her watch when the time was up, and said: I guess we've consulted; it's time to go. They don't know for sure what the minister listened to, but they told me that they were pretty sure the minister didn't listen to a syllable that they said when they were there. She was just checking a box so that she could come into this House and say: I consulted with this group of businesses. You know what? That is exactly the problem when you have invitation-only consultation, which is what this ministry and this government and this Premier have decided to go with on this piece of important legislation. They've tried to break the province up into groups of people that were outnumbered by their friends. A lot of Albertans that will be affected by this legislation would have liked to have had their voices truly heard and considered. They were really left out, and you just cannot argue with that if you're honest as the government, but of course they will argue with it.

The fact is that this bill was brought in at the end of a legislative session. You know how they say, "The end is near"? Well, in this case the end was near because – you know what? There's no excuse for this government not to have been prepared. They started this legislative session about a month later than legislative sessions usually start. The government with their majority is in complete control of the timing of the legislative session. They're in complete control of the government's legislative agenda. They're in control of what gets to move and how fast it gets to move. In fact, they were so disorganized – some would say that they couldn't organize a two-car parade – that they actually spent the last 10 days filibustering their own bills because they were so unorganized, Madam Speaker. I know you know that, and I know you can't comment on that, and I won't ask you to because you're in the chair, but you know.

The government was completely disorganized and not ready to go on time with their legislation to the point where there are several pieces of legislation that members of all the opposition said, "Yeah, we'll support this," and the government stood up and filibustered them for days on end because they were completely unorganized and could not get ready. Well, if they weren't ready for this legislation up until two days ago, how can they possibly expect that Albertans across this province were consulted and were ready for this legislation? To make that argument by the government would be completely less than credible, completely inconsistent, completely wrong, completely beyond the ability of most Albertans to believe because, frankly, the government just doesn't have their act together. This is just one more example.

As was said by my colleague, in the name of family-friendly workplaces the government has decided to stay up all night and pass it in the middle of the night if necessary, as they put a motion in the House today to do. It's not what a government that's proud of a piece of legislation would do. It's what a government would do when they're trying to sneak something through when no one is looking and make it as close as possible to summer vacation. Let's face it. I love Alberta. I will say that I believe all members of this House love Alberta, but even those of us that love Alberta know the summer is short, and we Albertans love to spend as much time outside running and jumping and playing and such when the summer is short. And this government, in their attempt to hide this very negative bill, has decided to sneak it through as close to summer as possible, when people are paying the least attention possible, having done the poorest and least amount of consultation possible on something that will affect everybody's life that works in this province and, in some cases, in a very negative way.

When you look at the amendment suggesting that it be referred to a standing committee, where, actually, Albertans would have a chance to talk to members of the Legislature after having seen the bill, to give us advice on what they like about the bill – there are things to like, Madam Speaker. There are, but there are also things to strongly and vehemently dislike in this bill. Either way, Albertans deserve to have the opportunity to make their feelings and their thoughts and their intentions known about it rather than having this government try to ram it through right before summer, at the last minute, with night sittings, when most people intended to be home with their families. It's completely reasonable that all members of this House would support this amendment to make sure that this bill gets to actually be heard, discussed, considered by the 4 million plus people in Alberta, that will be affected by the bill.

Madam Speaker, there are so many things in the bill. To be clear, I don't pretend that I understand it all yet because, again, we just had it dropped on our desks yesterday. It's as thick as a phone book. Although those that are less than 25 years old may not know what a phone book is, I don't blame them for that because they just haven't been around for the last few years. That's only a function of some of them having never needed to use a phone book. We older people at some point in our lives had no other choice but to use a phone book. I'm not blaming you who are younger and probably, by extension, better looking than me. But the fact is that it's as thick as a phone book, and to try to drop it on the table and have night sittings and run it through this House when nobody has the time to absorb it, to understand it, to get advice on it, to talk about it with their friends and their neighbours is completely unfair, completely out of step with how a democracy should run, certainly one that cares about her citizens.

This amendment actually is going to help the government do a better job. If the government was to be wise enough to vote for this, they actually might look, for one of the rare times since they've been elected, like they care about the citizens of Alberta, like they actually might want to listen a little bit to the citizens of Alberta, because, Madam Speaker, there's been precious, precious, precious little evidence that this government has had a lick of patience to listen to Albertans and what matters to them before they ram through this huge piece of legislation.

Again, fair and family-friendly and even the small parts that I have been able to see from reading the bill in the short period of time we've had: the minister was asked in the House several times – she could have had us doing some research on this before – whether she was going to get rid of the secret ballot provision in the legislation. The fact is that, for all intents and purposes, she has.

Now, I expect to hear the government-side people howling and saying: sure, there are private votes there. But they know, because they were able to consider it in the government caucus before we got to see it yesterday, that under the current legislation, with the way it's structured, after a card check has been going on now for up to six months, there might be a ballot that's secret, but it won't really be a secret because everybody will pretty much know who's signed the card and who hasn't, leaving those employees at risk of being intimidated by their company and intimidated by the union that wants to start. Both sides, they could be intimidated by. Again, I know that members of the House will say that only one side or the other is guilty of doing this. But, I think, if we're honest with ourselves, at different times both sides, over the history of time, have been guilty of intimidating employees in situations like this.

Employees need to be protected from intimidation from whatever source, from the company or from the union that wants to establish itself. There's no excuse ever for employees to be intimidated. That is just one of the many things that this government and the opposition need to hear about from Albertans, to know what they think, to know whether they like this, to know whether they don't like this. I'll call it a fake secret ballot because you can't call it a real secret ballot after you've been outside getting cards signed up for six months. Perhaps there are improvements that can be made.

For the government to carry on now night and day – again, even by the fact that the government has now put itself in a position to add night sittings, Madam Speaker, they've put themselves in a position to have a great deal of the debate take place late at night, when most Albertans are home in bed, home spending time with their spouses, home spending time with their kids. Of course, that just makes it harder than ever for people to keep track of this legislation, which just makes it absolutely more logical that you would send this to committee – that you would send this to committee – where all members of this House are privy to those committee deliberations as opposed to just the government side being privy to the caucus deliberations, where all members of this House could reach out to employees and workers across each of our ridings and across Alberta and find out what they like and dislike about this legislation.

The government needs to acknowledge that if they're as proud of it as they claim they are, although I'm a little stretched to believe that – but let's just take their word for it just for a second, for argument's sake. If they're as proud of it and Albertans are as proud of it as the government claims they are, then the message that we opposition members are going to hear is: you better vote for this legislation because we love every paragraph, we love every syllable, we love every sentence, we love every word. But, Madam Speaker, the government doesn't believe we're going to hear that because they know they've got nasty stuff in this bill, things that will actually make it harder on workers in Alberta, make it harder on small businesses in Alberta, and things that actually appear to be tipping the level playing field that's largely existed in Alberta for a long time.

I can tell you that I spent some time as labour minister. When I talked to people largely from all stripes of the labour movement when I was there, what I heard when we looked at making some changes here was that – and we decided that the changes being presented weren't good enough. One of the few things that I'll agree with the minister on is that we didn't move on that. But I can tell you that having talked to everybody from Merit Contractors, who, I think it would be reasonable to say, are not the most pro-union people in the province – I also talked to the people in the unionized construction contractors. They all said to me at the time and in between, the progressive contractors in CLAC and other members: you know, as long as you don't make any bad changes, there are some things that could probably be tweaked and made better in the legislation, but things are largely in balance right now. They all said to me: there are a few little changes we would have liked, but as long as you don't upset the balance that largely exists, then things are okay.

So I acknowledge that there are some tweaks and improvements that can be made to the legislation, but there's no reason we can't talk about it. There's no reason that all Albertans, no matter what their beliefs are, no matter what stripe they are, no matter how they make their living, whether they're a professional or a tradesperson or a labourer or somebody just learning on the job to do something, shouldn't have their voices heard, because all work is honest. All work is important, and all Albertans doing that work must be respected. We can't really know whether this legislation does that until those workers get a chance to peek at it and communicate to the government through their MLAs, whether the MLA is on the opposition side or the government side. Albertans need a chance to communicate that, which is all the more reason why this legislation should be fleshed out in a committee.

Again, the other thing about it, too, is that committees are usually, not always, I think all members of this House would agree, but usually less adversarial than this House is.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the referral?

Some Hon. Members: It's 29(2)(a).

The Acting Speaker: Oh, 29(2)(a). I will get there.

Mr. Gotfried: Under 29(2)(a), I'd actually like to hear a little bit more of the member's comments on his thoughts on some of the reasons for referral of this bill.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, Member.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek asking me that question because there is a lot more to be said on this bill. What's most important is that members of this House – their voices are important but not as important as the voices from across Alberta, and those voices have not yet been heard. They haven't been heard because the government hasn't given them a chance to be heard.

This actually gives the government a chance to have a better track record of listening. This amendment actually gives the government a chance to say: "You know, having thought about it, we realize that what's obvious is right and that Albertans haven't had a chance. Alberta businesses, large, haven't had a chance. Alberta businesses, small, haven't had a chance. Alberta workers have not had a chance. Whether they're higher earning professionals or starting out and not making so much money or whether they're labourers or tradespeople or whatever type of work they're in, they haven't had a chance to look at this and say: 'How will this affect my work life?'"

What would I like to tell my MLA about what I would like to see changed in this bill?"

You know what? There are bound to be things where those workers will come to me and other MLAs and say: don't you dare change this section because I love it. But we won't know until they actually get a chance to see it, to understand it, to talk about it with people they trust, to have those conversations back and forth, to relay that information to members of this House, whose job it is to serve Albertans and to make sure that the bill can be protected where it's right and can be improved where it's wrong.

Madam Speaker, actually, when it comes to labour legislation – and I can assure you, though I was a labour minister for a little bit of time, that there are some experts around here, and I am not one of them. I am not one of them.

Ms Hoffman: Yep.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Health minister, for agreeing with me on that. I appreciate that.

Madam Speaker, most other members of this House are not experts on it either, and if they're honest with themselves, a little more time for them to look at this thing and talk to their constituents – I know what it's like when you're in government. Even the government members, private members and ministers alike, can't talk openly and publicly about a piece of legislation that hasn't been released yet because, of course, there are rules about talking out in the public about the final text of a bill before it's presented in the House.

I'm sure that the government members all have obeyed that rule, which, by extension, means that they actually haven't had the opportunity to go out and fully discuss it with their constituents because that would be wrong – and I know they wouldn't do that – which makes this amendment to refer this bill to committee all the more important, all the more valuable, all the more necessary, all the more in the government's favour, putting them in a position to look Albertans in the eye and say, "We actually did try to listen to you this time," because, Madam Speaker, as you know, they failed so miserably so many times. They failed miserably on Bill 6. They failed miserably on their budget. They failed miserably on the amount of debt that they are putting Albertans under. They failed miserably so many times.

This amendment actually offers the government some redemption, one shining example – and they need redemption, believe me – where they can actually go out to Albertans and say, "I know we haven't listened to you for two years," because they haven't, and Albertans will say, "We know you haven't listened to us for two years." But if the government-side members were to support this amendment, it would put them in a position, for the first time, probably, in the two years that they've had the privilege of being government, to go out to their constituents and say, "I know we've got it wrong almost all of the last two years, but this time we're actually going to make the effort to get it right."

For that reason and so many more reasons, the government ought to support this amendment. They ought to actually walk the walk instead of just talking the talk and vote yes.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any other members wishing to speak to the referral? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I really appreciate this opportunity to ask that our members consider this referral motion. Now, I know that there are a lot of people here that know that I like to really dig into the past, so after hearing our Labour minister go on and on about all of the movies in 1988 – Beetlejuice and Die

Hard and all those movies – I thought: "You know what? I'd love to read Hansard and see what they had to say at the time regarding this legislation that they put through in 1988. What process did they use that was able to get that piece of legislation through?"

Now, I'm going to be reading a large portion from Hansard here. It's going to show that there is a significant difference between what was done in 1988 and what is being done today: 36 days of consultation and then a bill that they had to filibuster their own legislation to be able to get to. If you look at it, they couldn't even staple it because it's so thick. It's quite the bill that we've got, 124 pages. I have to say that it's quite a weighty bill.

But to get back to this, I'd like to read from June 6, 1988. This is regarding Bill 21, the Employment Standards Code, and this is at second reading. Actually, it's pretty similar if you look at it. We're right around that same time frame, right? Now, the start of the quote says:

Before going into some of the provisions of Bill 21, I would like to briefly review the process by which we reached the stage we are now at with the second reading of a new Employment Standards Code. In the Speech from the Throne in the second week of June 1986,

Two full years in advance, by the way. Two full years.

there was a specific commitment to a thorough review of labour legislation in the province. There was some discussion about how that commitment should be met, and there was an unprecedented process initiated. The process, first of all, was that of appointing a multisector-based committee of Albertans:

Now, I didn't see any appointments or any discussions or any committees, which is why this referral is so important. This is why we actually need to engage Albertans, because we've already seen with Bill 6 what has happened when we don't engage Albertans.

It says:

three from organized labour,

Three.

three representing employers, and three from the general public. Those members were chosen not as specific representatives for their own narrow group – be it city management or be it the operating engineers – but they were chosen to represent in a reasonably sized committee as much as possible of the economic activity in the province and, as much as possible, all of the different employee/employer relations that exist in the province: manufacturing, construction, public sector, private sector, male, female, the teaching profession, and others. The result was a committee that, although numbering nine, covered a very broad spectrum of Alberta society, Alberta economic activity, and Alberta employment.

What we've got here is that they struck a group. They took that group, and they said: "Let's start the process of talking about what this is going to look like. Let's involve different people and get the process started." Now, this is important because if they would have started with a 50-person committee, this may not have been moving forward anywhere. What they needed to do was start the process. This is what they did back then. They started the process through a committee.

Then to continue on:

The committee looked at legislation and at the systems in several other jurisdictions, and in November of 1986 published an interim report which included information from those jurisdictions and asked certain questions of Albertans prior to a very thorough process of public meetings.

Public meetings. Did you hear? They didn't say: hidden meetings or special invitation committees. They said: public meetings to bring Albertans together to discuss this. That's what's important here. They brought Albertans together to discuss this. They brought the nine people together. Then they said: let's come out with an interim report, and then let's go out and talk to Albertans. Inside of that report we actually had comparisons done to other provinces to see where we were at.

3:50

At those public hearings, interest groups, individuals, organized labour, individual employees, employer associations, and individual employers came and spoke to the committee. In addition to that, there was a large number of briefs submitted in written form. Some of those were supplementary to the verbal statements made to the committee at those public meetings, and some of them had no verbal statement attached to them. There was, as I say, an extremely large public input into the process.

Again, we're going into the fact that this was a public process, not something that was rushed, like we saw with this. It was something that was actually thought out and moved forward.

Now, let's start with:

Subsequent to the tabling for first reading in this Legislature of Bill 60, the government received over 300 written submissions from all types of Albertans, employers and employees: individual employers, associations of employers; individual employees, unions, associations of unions – in other words, a very broad input again. I myself held over 200 meetings with various groups of Albertans –

Now, I think I heard – and the government can correct me if I am wrong – that the minister held four. That seems quite a bit lower than 200.

Then it goes on:

– public meetings, private meetings – and again that input was considered in the process over the winter of 1987-88, subsequent to which again the government caucus considered the input. The result was two separate Bills, one of which I am currently addressing, Bill 21, the Employment Standards Code, the other being Bill 22, the Labour Relations Code.

So now we're hearing that they saw the wisdom of splitting this into two bills, which is exactly what the Wildrose is asking right at this point. Why are we rushing through this? We understand that there are things that vulnerable Albertans need addressed. We agree that those needed to be addressed, so moving those forward in two bills – yet we had foresight in the past government. Am I the only one reading Hansard? Apparently. [interjections] Apparently this is funny as well.

It is now, Mr. Speaker, some seven weeks since the introduction of Bills 21 and 22 on April 15 of this year. During that time, again we have received input, but the input has changed very much. The input now is, in general, an acceptance of the provisions in the Employment Standards Code and is also, quite naturally, specific requests for individual items to be reconsidered or for individual items to be deleted or to be added. But I might say, Mr. Speaker, that in general the responses have been remarkably favourable to the concepts that are in Bill 21, the Employment Standards Code.

That's how you do consultation.

Now, it's remarkable that we couldn't even do like we did with the MGA. This was tabled in the spring, and then we went through the summer and saw consultation done by this government, and then what happened in the fall, once we actually had feedback from the AUMA, the AAMD and C, and municipalities and stakeholders, is that we were able to tailor that. Then we came up with another bill and said: okay; we got some more feedback that we need to work on. That is the correct way. That way, unfortunately, wasn't started by the NDP government. That was by the past government. There were two years, I believe, for that MGA to be reviewed.

When you're looking at large-scale reviews of legislation like these, you need more than 36 days. You need more. You need to talk to more than the two or three people that are on the NDP board of directors.

What we need to go with here is: how exactly is this consultation done? You knew how it was done before, yet you decided just to fall off the rails and do it on your own, do it quickly, get through this as fast as you possibly could. You put some really good stuff in here, and then you put a poison pill in. Then what happens is that you said: let's launch this out to the press, and we will condemn anybody that says that there's something wrong with this legislation. That is the wrong way of doing this. What we need to do is make sure Albertans are heard. The process that we've got here is that we're going to see labour legislation that is 124 pages thick going through this House within two weeks, possibly three weeks. That is an incredible, incredible insult to Albertans.

That is why we need to consider this referral. The referral itself is saying: let's step back; let's put this to a committee. The committee can at least go out to Albertans, maybe bring some stakeholders out here. Let's hear what Albertans have to say, which is why this motion for a referral makes so much sense. Let's slow this process down.

If at the end we still hear that Albertans really want to make sure that they get rid of the secret ballot system for unions, then possibly – I can't see how that's democratic, but at least you've done your due diligence. But by rushing this through, it only reinforces that this government is only for unions right now, and that is a shame. I will tell you that I have a deep respect when it comes to our unions and hard-working men and women on the front lines, and from the fact that they're not able to even be consulted on this as well, because they're seeing this and going through it in three weeks as well, we need to be making sure that all Albertans are included in this process.

Now, the fact that we've had 12 weeks during the spring session and that they gave five weeks in total consultation is something that needs to be changed. I can't tell you enough that when we see a government moving this rapidly, all we're looking for is trouble. We're looking at a point where we're going to be correcting this bill six months from now because we rushed through it too fast. We're going to find that things aren't working quite right or quite the way we anticipated it. That's because excluding the groups that are involved or are going to be impacted by this is fundamentally wrong. This is something that we as Albertans rejected with Bill 6 and that we are going to continue to reject as this government pushes through legislation that radically changes the direction of Alberta without consultation with Albertans.

Now, what we need to do is bring this back to a healthy piece. It appears that this government isn't interested in the two-year consultation period that we've done in the past, but at least give us through the summer. At least give us some time with a committee so that we're able to move forward with this. But you know what? So far this government has had its blinders on. When it gets something like this moving forward, all it does is that it wants to get it through as fast as it possibly can, and then we have to live with the consequences.

Now, I sat on the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee. We sat as a group, and we debated as a committee. Well, we had the wonderful witness . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak? Comments or questions under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any members wishing to speak to the referral? The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gottfried: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you for the opportunity to speak today. I wanted to thank the Member for Lac

La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills for proposing this amendment and the referral of Bill 17, Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act.

Madam Speaker, there are a few things I want to talk about here. I mean, I think that in this House we all want what's best for Albertans, and I like to believe that that's true of all members of this House.

4:00

An Hon. Member: All members of this House.

Mr. Gottfried: All members.

It was mentioned by the Minister of Labour that this bill was about everyday Albertans, that it was about working Albertans, that it was about their futures, about their livelihoods. Madam Speaker, I think that therein lie some of our concerns with this. This isn't about us in this House. This is for us to do what's best for Albertans. They deserve the attention, they deserve the consultation, and they deserve the opportunity to understand what we're doing in here, in the 124 pages here, that's supposed to benefit them, not just benefit them but protect them, give them the opportunity to live the life, and have the opportunities that they feel are most important to them.

Madam Speaker, it's been mentioned by some of the other members here about the opportunity to split this bill, that there are some things in the employment standards, some good things in there. But we're also hearing – I'm already getting feedback – that there are some things in that particular bill that deserve attention as well, some unintended consequences. I think we've heard that statement before in this House. However, the big concerns we have are on the labour code side. Again, I agree that, really, these should be split, but the opportunity for us to refer this to a committee maybe will allow us to find a way to address them separately but equally with Albertans and with the key stakeholders.

When we're talking about things like secret ballots, Madam Speaker, I worry about the removal of the secret balloting process, which, to me, is a fundamental expectation within a democratic society. I think we owe it to Albertans to let a committee have a look at those principles that our forefathers fought for, democratic principles of being able to vote freely, that we shouldn't take for granted. I think that in elections in Alberta, all kinds of elections, every eligible Canadian should have the right to vote freely, without fear of intimidation or reprisal. Really, nobody should have the right to know whom we voted for. I talk to people all the time who say: "Well, I might be supporting you, I might not be supporting you, but that's my business. That's my choice. That's my privacy. It's my freedom to do so." I think those are principles that everybody in this House can agree with.

It would be kind of like us going out to our constituencies and saying: "Well, whichever party can sell the most memberships wins the election. We don't need to have an election. If you sell more, if you sell 65 per cent or more, you just win. We don't need to have a vote. We'll just card check in our communities for the next election. How about that?" Maybe we need to push this to committee, where they can take a look at those principles and decide whether those need to be defended.

Madam Speaker, we've also talked here about some of the concerns about conflict of interest. The government may want to consider that maybe they should refer this bill before half of their caucus has to recuse themselves on a vote. Wouldn't that be interesting? Numbers could be changed drastically here so that maybe the balance of power isn't on that side when they have to recuse half of their members there. I guess we'll hear from the Ethics Commissioner on that in the future. To maybe change a little bit of a phrase from Abraham Lincoln, I don't think this government wants to be seen as the government of the unions, by the unions, and for the unions. I don't have the beard to do that one. I don't think this government wants to be the one that takes that time-honoured phrase and is accused of having conflicts of interest in that regard.

We've also talked about the lack of consultation. One of our members has talked about 36 days of consultation. It's actually not 36 days; it was 27 working days. Twenty-seven working days for a very detailed, very robust, 124-page piece of legislation, which, by the way, we hear has had some extractions from what was rumoured to be a 1,200-page submission from the AFL. So at just 10 per cent of that, we've thrown that in the legislation, and, you know, that should be good enough for Albertans; we don't need to consult anymore because we consulted with the AFL: government of the unions, by the unions, and for the unions.

Talking about timing and about consultation and lack of robust consultation, we also got unbound copies of this bill again. We've had that happen a few times in this House. That means it probably didn't make it to the printer's in time to get done in the proper way. Maybe the ink is not dry. Boy, we're going to have to look at that final copy to see if there were some final changes that didn't make it there in time so that we had to use quick copy or someone to do that. It should be a very interesting thing as we get those final copies out, that phone book that the Member for Calgary-Hays referred to, which we all will of course have plenty of time over this weekend to look through and find out along with our fellow Albertans what's in there, what lurks in there.

There are some good things, admittedly. We've discussed that in this House. There are some things that are protective of Albertans during difficult times, during vulnerable times, during crises in their lives, and we have no problem with and, in fact, fully support those types of things. But we're also hearing from some of our private-sector partners out there that hidden sometimes even in the employment standards are some things that are going to be very costly for Alberta businesses and Alberta employers and that could affect the sustainability, viability, and economics of our private-sector employers. Admittedly, I think everyone in this House can agree that most of the jobs in this province are created not only by private-sector employers but by small and medium-sized enterprises out there. That's where the bulk of our employment is created.

Everything we do has unintended consequences, and we need to know that, and we need to consult on that. I believe that in a committee setting, an all-party committee setting, where we can consult Albertans in a more robust way, we have an opportunity to ensure, as, again, I believe all members of this House want, that we have the best legislation for Albertans.

Madam Speaker, there are many other things that we could talk about around this bill in terms of employees' rights, not about what's best for employers or businesses, not about what's best for unions but about what's best for Albertans, for those employees in all of those sectors we talked about – the electricians and the teachers and the construction workers and the airline workers and all of these different categories of workers in our society – who, again, deserve the opportunity to do what's best for themselves, what's best for their families, to earn a living.

Some will agree that unionization is the way to go, and some will disagree, but I think we need to afford that protection to them so that they can make that decision freely, so that they're not influenced by peer pressure – I think we've all felt that, whether that's in a school or a workplace – so that they're not concerned about the potential of being outcast or of having repercussions or of being ostracized in the workplace or about intimidation or, God forbid, the B word, the "bullying" word.

Again, we should do all we can in this Legislature to ensure that there is no opportunity for things like workplace bullying, whether that's intentional or unintentional or driven by an employer or an employee group or a union group. We need to protect Albertans as best we can with this legislation to achieve that, Madam Speaker.

I would like to support doing the right thing today, doing what's best for Albertans, putting aside our ideologies, and putting this legislation in front of a committee. I've had the pleasure of working on some committees, and when they are working well, they work very well. When the people come to the table with the right intentions, which is to be nonpartisan, to park their ideologies at the door as much as they possibly can and to do what's best for Albertans, it can and does work well. I think we've collaborated with many of the members, on all sides of this House, on achieving positive results from those committee settings.

Madam Speaker, in closing, I'd just again like to thank the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills for his very thoughtful amendment to this, and I would encourage all members of the House to put their ideologies and partisanship aside and support this opportunity for us to ensure that this is the best legislation it can possibly be.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you. I'd like the hon. member to comment on how he feels about taking this over the summer – it'll be a little more work when a lot of people want to have time off – and about whether he believes this is an important enough issue that it actually should go over whatever period of time it needs to to make sure that we can deal with something as important as labour legislation, that affects all Albertans.

4:10

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Calgary-Hays for his very thoughtful question. To the member, I'd like to say that I think all of us in this House are here to do a job. We're here, we're elected, and we're hired by Albertans – they're our bosses – to come here and do the work that will ensure that we work for and protect Albertans as best as we can.

Madam Speaker, one of my committees will be meeting over the summer to talk about daylight saving time. I respect the opportunity to provide some committee work on that particular bill, but I can tell you that this labour legislation is much more important to Albertans' everyday lives, to their livelihoods, to their futures than whether they change a clock in the spring and the fall, with all due respect. I know that we'll get to the right result on that particular piece of legislation as well.

I think it's incumbent upon us to do what's right for Albertans here, and if referring it to a committee and doing some work over the summer is what needs to be done, I know that I'm prepared to do it, I know that my colleagues are prepared to do it, and I would expect that all members of this House are prepared to do it to ensure that we do come out of this with the best legislation, that we do listen in a robust manner, in an open and transparent manner, not by invitation but by invitation for all to give us their opinions: employers, employees, small businesses, medium-sized businesses, large businesses, union groups, employee associations, all the groups that will matter, and, Madam Speaker, even some individual Albertans. What a unique and refreshing thought, that maybe some individual Albertans might want to step forward and give us their opinions. I hope that we'll have the opportunity, and I hope that if we have the opportunity to put this to committee, those Albertans will come to our constituency offices, which are a place for them to connect with this House, with this Legislature, and share with us.

I know I have my MLA cafés, and I know that there are many members that have many opportunities to engage their constituents. This is a great opportunity for us to do that, to ensure that we are not doing it only as a regular course of business but that we have a very specific piece of business that we're seeking their input on.

Again, I thank the Member for Calgary-Hays for his question. I know that I'm prepared to do the work that is required to ensure that we have the best legislation, and I challenge the rest of this House to step up to the plate and be ready to sacrifice some of their summer. We all know that we like to spend some time with our families and friends and our constituents as much as we can, but this is too important for us not to do, Madam Speaker.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. McIver: Yeah.

The Acting Speaker: Please go ahead.

Mr. McIver: I just wanted to know whether the hon. member has heard from workers in his riding, not employers but workers. Have any of them told you that they know what's in this legislation and what their opinion is? What's their depth of knowledge so far on this after it's been out in the public for one day?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you again to the Member for Calgary-Hays. He's got some very insightful questions about how we engage with our constituents.

To honestly answer that question, I have to tell you that this all came so quickly for most Albertans. We only started to hear from our constituents with only a couple of weeks left in the consultation, which tells me that the consultation was not robust enough.

I've been putting into my newsletters that we're addressing this labour bill, but Albertans are busy. They're trying to stay employed. They're trying to get gainful employment. They're trying to provide for their families. Let's be honest; they're struggling. Many Albertans are struggling, and this is not top of mind for them. But it is coming up. They're seeing that there are some things here that will impact them, that will impact their futures and their livelihoods and their ability to provide for themselves and their families.

Madam Speaker, I think that this is a great question . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak to the referral amendment on Bill 17, Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act. You know, we have been given a rare opportunity in this House as Members of the Legislative Assembly to represent the people of Alberta; more specifically, to represent our constituents on the issues of the day that come before this House. I can't think of too many things that are more important in the lives of Albertans than their jobs and their capacity to be able to meet the needs of their families, their financial needs. So when we start talking about the Employment Standards Code and the Labour Relations Code, Madam Speaker, this is a very important piece of legislation that we need to deal with.

As I said, I'm glad they built this into the title. We do need a fair and family-friendly workplace. That's why we work. That's why we spend the long hours and we give our best efforts in our jobs, so that we can take care of our families. Any legislation that deals with that is important, and it's why we need to make sure, Madam Speaker, that we get this right. It's why we need to make sure and why I will support this referral amendment, because it speaks to the very heart of our capacity as families and as men and women to be able to take care of those families and to earn a living and to do so in a way that provides us with not only job satisfaction but with the capacity to make sure that we take care of the most important people in our lives.

As I said, we have a rare privilege in this House in that we get the opportunity to speak to these kinds of issues, and we must always remember that in a democracy it's about providing and crafting legislation that will actually meet the needs of the people of Alberta. I see some problems with the Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act, which I believe a referral to committee would help us with. We know that there are times – and I think this government has shown a trend, a pattern, that they are indeed struggling with this whole idea of consultation. We've had many members of the Legislature here today mention the fact that for a 124-page document – some are calling it an omnibus bill – this document has had very little consultation, that prior legislation in this area, in the 1980s, had years of consultation whereas this has had anywhere between 27 business days or 36 days total.

Madam Speaker, we would argue and we would suggest that this is part of the pattern that we see in this government of a lack of consultation. We know that starting in the very first session, we brought this to the government's attention. There are times, when you don't consult with the people of Alberta, when you find yourself out of step with those people. In a democracy that's a very serious thing, to be out of step with the people that you're called to represent.

We know that right out of the gate, when they were first elected, they voted for a 7.25 per cent raise for senior government officials. They were out of step because they did not do the appropriate amount of consultation. My colleague from Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre said at that time:

This sends the completely wrong message to Albertans struggling and looking for leadership from their government during difficult economic times . . . The economy is hurting, the NDP are threatening new and higher taxes, and now they are voting for massive pay increases for senior government officials.

That was not done on our part just to try and bring the government down. Rather, it was there as a sincere attempt to help them reconnect as a young government with the people of Alberta, to make sure that they were indeed listening to the people and not out of step with Albertans. That's one of the things that a referral to committee will do. It will help this government to reconnect, to make sure that they are indeed voicing the opinions and the desires of the people of Alberta.

You know we've seen a pattern of lack of consultation on things like Bill 6, the carbon tax, the Climate Leadership Implementation Act, and the Renewable Electricity Act. To simply ignore this amendment is to ignore the fact that they are being given a chance to again go back to the public to consult before they table most of their legislation, before they bring it back into the House. This is a wise thing to do because at the end of the day this legislation has to be able to have the support of the people of Alberta. Right now we're hearing from many stakeholders that they are very concerned about this legislation. When you don't consult, you run the risk of having a bill die a death by a thousand cuts as one stakeholder after the other after the other after the other begins to voice their disagreement with that bill. So we would suggest that this government would be wise, rather than eroding public confidence in this bill and in this government, to go back to the table and do more consultation.

Let me be clear, Madam Speaker. We and I on this side of the House see that there is a value to some portions and parts of this bill. We can see that in the portions that deal with the Employment Standards Codes, there's much to be supported in that. There is no question that the compassionate care issues that are enshrined in this legislation can be addressed immediately and can be addressed with the support of this House. There are some very good pieces here. When we take a look at maternity leave and the parental leave clauses and the compassionate care leave, the death or disappearance of a child leave or critical illness of a child leave; long-term illness, domestic violence, bereavement leave; leave for citizenship ceremonies, these are all good things that need to be incorporated into the fabric of Alberta working society. These can and should and will be supported, I believe, not only by members of this House but by the general public, Albertans in general.

But there are significant portions of this bill, especially in the Labour Relations Code, that we need to take another look at. That's why I will support this referral to a committee. We need to understand and we need to realize that there are problems when you place an omnibus bill before a House. We've seen government after government all across this country – federally, provincially – get into trouble when they try to package large numbers of ideas into one bill. They run the risk, because they haven't done the consultation and because they've packaged it into such a large document, that one or two pieces of that omnibus bill can actually bring down some potentially good legislation.

As the opposition, who is charged with providing accountability to the government and trying to offer suggestions as to how the government could pass better legislation, we are as the opposition, as the Wildrose, suggesting to the government that they would be further ahead and that they would be wise to separate and split this omnibus bill into two parts, one that would pass through very quickly with the support of the House, the compassionate leave portions of this omnibus bill, but that it would then take more time at committee. Through this referral amendment they could then take the time to listen to Albertans and to listen to the stakeholders that need to deal with those portions of this bill that have some significant issues with them.

You know, that's the problem with an omnibus bill. The portions that Albertans would support can be held up and maybe even be lost when you do not separate those portions of the bill that do not have the support of Albertans and, as far as we're concerned, will not have the support of the opposition. A wise government would listen to this, would not dig in their heels, but instead would listen to the wise counsel of the opposition.

A referral to committee allows for that extra consultation. We've heard that already. You know, this is not consultation just for one segment of Albertans. This is not a consultation on this bill that should be just for unions. We've heard that in many cases the small amount of consultation that occurred over that 36 days was attended on a regular basis, all of them, by unions but that very few major stakeholders from the other side of the equation were allowed or capable of attending. We believe as the opposition that there needs to be more consultation and stakeholders from the business community allowed and brought before the committee, or the committee could go out to the business community and receive their feedback on the Labour Relations Code portion of this bill, we believe, from stakeholders like the Chambers of Commerce. We need expert testimony. We need the testimony of those people that are involved in business, that understand how the business community works.

You know, we just spent time last night at the Resource Diversification Council. In my conversations with some of the businesses at the Resource Diversification Council they were saying: "You know, we're now in an economic climate where even the pennies have to be counted. Any increase to our input costs are going to seriously influence and impact our capacity to hire people and to do business." If that's what they're saying – and I know the hon. members from the NDP were there. Many of them were there. I saw them there last night. They must have been having those conversations. They must have had those kinds of conversations. I know that's what I was hearing last night. Because of that, we need to make sure that we've included those business perspectives in this consultation. This is just simply good governance. This is simply a model of good government, and it allows us the capacity to make good legislation.

When I was in my social studies class, I made sure that my kids had the ability to look at both sides of the issue, look at case study examples from one point of view and from another point of view. My response to them was always: "I don't care what your position is on the paper that I'm assigning you. I don't care which way you go on this. What I care about is that you have the capacity to be able to explain your position and to be able to defend your position using relevant case study examples." That's a good educational tool. That's what good education looks like. I would argue that in the Legislature making sure that we've listened to all of the stakeholders and that we have a balanced perspective so that we have good legislation is always a good thing, and referring this to committee will allow us to do that, Madam Speaker.

A referral amendment like we're looking at right here recognizes that we live in unique times, that these are difficult economic times, and that anything that we choose to do in this House will have ramifications to Albertans and to their capacity to have jobs, to the capital that needs to be spent in this province. We cannot be passing legislation that's going to hurt the economy of Alberta. This is a very serious issue. We have to make sure that we are making the wise choices based on information, and the only way that we're going to be able to get that is if we refer this to committee. You know, I believe that this government does need to take time to reflect, and this committee would allow it to be able to do that.

You know, it's been brought up that there may be a conflict of interest, that we may have the Ethics Commissioner ruling on whether some of us can speak to this bill or not speak to this bill. I believe that it would be wise and it would be a good thing for this government if this is referred to committee, for them to take the time and to reflect and have that second sober thought as to whether or not this is the opportunity that they're going to take to realize or to think about whether they should indeed be addressing this issue right now. [interjection] You know what? As a social studies teacher that means very little.

We're looking at a situation here for referral to committee that I believe has really got an opportunity for us to be able to pass better legislation. Let's use the summer to receive the meaningful feedback that we need so that we can bring all the changes that are needed.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The House now stands adjourned until Monday afternoon at 1:30.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Good afternoon.

Let us each reflect or pray, each in our own way. Friday, May 26, marked the month of Ramadan. During this time Albertans who are Muslims, our fellow Muslims world-wide fast to remind themselves of the suffering of those less fortunate. This month also focuses on spiritual discipline, deep contemplation, and increased generosity towards others. Regardless of our own faith and beliefs, this key message of Ramadan is something we should all reflect upon.

Hon. members and ladies and gentlemen, we will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by Mr. Robert Clark.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all thy sons command.
Car ton bras sait porter l'épée,
Il sait porter la croix!
Ton histoire est une épopée
Des plus brillants exploits.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my privilege to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly students from Landing Trail intermediate school. I had the pleasure of visiting with them not too long ago. Excellent questions: I have to say that they'd give us a run for our money although they were a bit more polite than we tend to be. They are joined by their teacher, Mrs. Laura Pope, and their chaperone, Mrs. Barbara Nicholl. If the class, teacher, and chaperone could please rise and receive the customary – oh, I'm looking at the wrong group. All right. Okay. Well, I guess you guys know what to do.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. member, you're correct. I know that each one of you has much to learn from these children about how to be nice to each other.

The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you. M. le Président, c'est avec fierté que je me lève à ce Chambre aujourd'hui pour introduire les étudiants qui viennent de l'école Father Jan. The students are accompanied by their teacher, Natalie Jurick, and their chaperones, Sarah Macsymic, Heidi Pisani, and David Fisher. I would ask that – oh, they've risen already. Please join me in welcoming this group to the Chamber.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Are there any other school groups today, hon. members?

Seeing and hearing none, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today on your behalf to introduce to all members of the Assembly 10 recipients of the sovereign's medal for volunteers. This Canadian honour recognizes the exceptional achievement of volunteers from across the country in a wide range of fields. This inspirational group of Albertans demonstrates selfless dedication of time, passion, and energy to a variety of causes and communities across the province. The recipients and their guests are seated in the Speaker's gallery, and I would ask them to please rise as I call their names: Mr. James Bourgoin, Ms Christine McCourt-Reid, Captain Barbara Sand, Ms Barbara Furuness, Captain Sidney Furuness, Cadet Sergeant Avery Nham, Mr. Harold Lefebvre, Warrant Officer Kristopher Porlier, Mr. George Lucki, and the hon. Lieutenant Colonel Gordon Steinke. If we can all please give them the warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We're joined here today by recipients of the Ernest Manning innovation award. Since 1982 the Ernest Manning innovation awards have recognized Canadians whose pioneering technologies have helped grow their local economies, protect the environment, and save lives. The awards honour scientists, businesspeople, and community activists who aspire to do good for the common good. Leaders do not only develop creative products but also improve the standard of living for all Canadians. Today I'm honoured to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly seven distinguished Albertans nominated by the northern Alberta chapter of the 2017 Ernest Manning awards. I'll ask that they rise as I call their names: Sophia Fairweather, James Keirstead, Jim Qualie, Gordon Molnar, Dr. Jianhua Zhu, Tim Battle, Des Quinn. I'd also like to welcome Sol Rolingher, chair of the northern Alberta chapter, who is accompanying the nominees. I want to thank them for their hard work and wish them the best of luck in the innovation awards this fall. Please join me in giving them the traditional welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise today and introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly two constituents of Edmonton-Centre and former pages in this Assembly, Mr. Myles Chykerda and Mr. Edward Davies. Myles joined the House as a page from his home constituency of Lacombe-Ponoka in early 2000 and then moved to Edmonton-Centre to begin studies at the University of Alberta. He went on to become a government documents page in the Legislature Library and a historical researcher before leaving the Assembly to pursue graduate studies at the U of A. In 2011 he moved to Los Angeles, where he has been pursuing a doctorate in archeology, University of California in Los Angeles, where he remains proud of his Alberta heritage and education and is happy to return here this summer to focus on his dissertation.

Edward joined the House as a page in 2008 and has continued that work during his undergraduate studies at the University of Alberta until the conclusion of the spring session in 2010. He received his bachelor of arts with distinction from the University of Alberta in 2013, where he studied political science and music, and went on to earn his juris doctor from the University of Ottawa in 2016. He recently returned home to Alberta to accept a position with the Edmonton law firm McAllister LLP, where he is currently rounding out his articles and will be continuing as an associate.

I would ask both Edward and Myles to rise and receive the warm welcome of this House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. Minister of Education, I understand you have two groups.

Mr. Eggen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Legislature some pretty amazing people from the city of Red Deer. First, here are two incredibly brave students from Lindsay Thurber high school, Ursella Khan and Thomas Gower. These two students stood up to racism last week, when a group of people gathered outside Lindsay Thurber high school in Red Deer to hold an anti-immigration protest. Ursella and Thomas sent a clear message to the protestors and to all Albertans about the importance of making our schools welcome and safe and treating people with respect. I would also like to introduce Dan Lower, the principal of Lindsay Thurber high school; superintendent Stu Henry; and board chair Bev Manning. I want to thank all of you for the role that you played in standing up against hatred and standing up for love and understanding. Please, let's rise and give them a very traditional warm welcome. [Standing ovation]

1:40

Not to be outdone by that by any means, Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce the members of my family that are here today, though you don't have to give them a standing ovation. I have my mom here, Marion Eggen. I have my daughter Ava Eggen, my son Jonathan Wales, and my niece Madeleine Elkins. If they could stand and get a warm, you know, subdued greeting.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Health. The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you. Sorry, Mr. Speaker. I was so taken by the last two sets of introductions. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you five Alberta paramedics, who are seated in our members' gallery today. This week is dedicated to paramedic services to celebrate the vital services performed by our front-line professionals to ensure that Albertans are provided with the very best care. I ask that they rise as I call their names: Andrew Scobbie, advanced care paramedic from Calgary, with 28 years of service; Holly Howard, primary care paramedic from Edmonton, with three years of service; Stu Snowdon, advanced care paramedic from Edmonton, with 12 years of service; Melanie Howard, advanced care paramedic from Calgary, with seven years of service; and Alex Campbell, public education officer from Edmonton, with 15 years of service. Please join me in extending the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly to our guests.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It gives me great pleasure to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly a group of 10 employees from various areas within Alberta Justice and Solicitor General. I'd like to thank them for the hard work they do every day on behalf of all Albertans. I would now ask that they rise, and I would ask that the members join me in giving them the traditional warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Are there any other introductions today, hon. members?

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Decorum and Civility in the Assembly

Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms citizens of this country are provided the right of freedom to believe in whatever they wish to believe. Under section 2 it specifically states, "Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms." Subsection (b) specifically states that everyone has "freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression." This is absolutely necessary in a democracy.

However, the opposition in this House consistently ridicules those who do not share their point of view. Just last week I was the subject of racially focused, discriminatory remarks in this very House during Committee of the Whole. How can we expect better for our society and our children if in this House members are the subject of such personal attacks?

Our children deserve better. Albertans want a governing body that will focus on the issues, that will develop policy in their best interests, and a government and an opposition that are willing to debate and, at the end of the day, work together towards that end. However, Mr. Speaker, what they get instead is an opposition that bullies its way through sitting after sitting, hurling insults and racist remarks at members of this House for their beliefs rather than focusing on policy.

A few months ago, after a visit from Meyokumin school, an elementary school in my riding, a student reached out to me and asked a couple of questions, and I quote:

When the assembly is in their meeting and someone is talking, why do members of other parties start to be rude to them? I noticed . . . today when someone from the NDP was talking, members from the opposition were laughing. Why do they do that?

Mr. Speaker, I have also heard from other constituents that are tired of the fact that we act worse than schoolchildren in this House. You have mentioned it repeatedly yourself.

Albertans are tired, and this behaviour must end, if not for our sake then at least for the sake of our children and future generations. As we all know, children learn by example. Let us do our best to be the good example they aspire us to be and, once and for all, put an end to personal attacks in this House.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

PDD Service Eligibility

Mr. W. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I sent the minister of human services a letter back in March of this year outlining a particular problem Bruce Bolton, one of my constituents, is having receiving PDD benefits for his autistic son. In the letter I outlined how Mr. Bolton has applied twice, appealed once, and has been denied based on a current blanket ban on services for any person having an IQ higher than 70.

Travis Bolton, Mr. Bolton's son, has autism, which impairs his executive functioning. It means he has very poor problem-solving skills, lacks impulse control, does not read social cues appropriately, and has significant other issues. If something were to happen to Travis's parents today, Travis would not be able to take care of himself. Period. As outlined in my letter, Travis is an individual that needs the support that only PDD funding can provide.

On May 26, 2016, we brought forward certain individuals who were experiencing problems with eligibility requirements and were unable to receive PDD benefits. Over a year has passed since the minister at the time made a promise to this House and to Albertans that he would "work with the sector, work with the individuals, and work with the advocates to make sure that Albertans get the supports they need." He also stated that same day that "usually a detailed response and follow-up is provided by the staff, and that will be the case in this particular instance as well.” However, no one has contacted either Mr. Bolton or my office regarding this matter.

I need the minister to carry out his promise and have his staff contact my staff to formulate a plan that involves making sure Travis Bolton has the necessary PDD funding in place.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Grande Prairie Diversity Award

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The city of Grande Prairie recently received the peace and friendship diversity award. This award is given out annually by the indigenous community to Albertans who promote diversity and inclusion through community work, volunteerism, relationship development, shared programs, and consistent efforts to support, build, and maintain good relations with indigenous communities.

The city of Grande Prairie received the 2017 peace and friendship diversity award for their ceremonial smudging policy, which has been created to honour sacred smudging and the burning of sacred medicines as a traditional practice of the First Nations, Métis, and Inuit people. Smudging rituals are an important part of FNMI culture. The smoke is used to heal, bless, and cleanse. The city’s policy permits smudging rituals in certain city facilities such as the Grande Prairie museum and Revolution Place. The city of Grande Prairie is the first western Canadian municipality to develop a policy of this nature.

There are many other examples of Grande Prairie pulling together to build community relationships. In January 2017 the Grande Prairie Regional College signed its indigenous education protocol with the Circle of Indigenous Students. The Rotary clubs in Grande Prairie work closely with the Grande Prairie Friendship Centre to build community relationships and to serve community members in need. They are continually working to better relationships with FNMI communities and recognize them for their historic and continuing role in the development of the Grande Prairie area.

As Albertans we have work to do to further develop collaborative relationships with our FNMI communities, and I’m proud to see policies such as this being developed in my great constituency of Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

NDP and Conservative Policies

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On May 18 the Leader of the Opposition and Jason Kenney announced the formation of the united conservative party. As usual, Jason Kenney made sure he repeated the same old tired lines he’s always used about the NDP.

We hear the same from the Kenney foot soldiers in the Chamber. It’s like they’re auditioning. Remember when the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek compared the NDP to the Chinese Communists? Remember when the Member for Strathmore-Brooks tried to slap us with a bizarre Thatcher quote on International Women’s Day? The Wildrose and PCs are good at throwing names across the aisle and making speeches about why they’re entitled to run Alberta, they’re entitled to power.

NDP governments have initiated a lot of what makes Canada the place we know and love today. Universal access to health care, employment insurance, workers’ compensation, old age pension: all things that are NDP initiatives. Publicly funded education for all students, even those who want GSAs: definitely NDP. Working with Alberta’s private energy sector to increase market access: NDP.

Back to Mr. Kenney for a moment. When he was in cabinet, the Conservative government set the record for the highest per capita spending in Canadian history. Don’t believe me? Ask the Fraser Institute.

Wildrose and PCs will both tell you they want a balanced budget, but they will not tell you what their plan is. They have no plan. It’s just an excuse for attacking public health, education, and social services. The members opposite will theatrically complain about the deficit spending that will put our children into indentured servitude and then, in the next breath, demand more capital spending in their constituencies for hospitals, schools, and seniors. The science of economics tells us that deficit spending pulls economies out of recession faster, and that’s why we’re recovering, but they reject the science just like they reject the science of climate change.

With the UCP we can expect more of the same. Repeal everything: repeal all the growth, repeal a disability services advocate, repeal minimum wages, repeal reduced school fees. Mr. Speaker, to quote Jason Kenney, that’s catastrophic.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Statement by the Speaker

Use of Electronic Devices in the Chamber

The Speaker: On April 12, 2017, I shared the following reminder with this House.

Hon. members . . . I just want to, as a courtesy to all, remind members of the memo that was distributed to everyone . . . on February 13. Just to refresh your memory, “Members may use their mobile devices during Oral Question Period but must only use them as reading devices and not for streaming, sending or receiving messages.”

I want to remind each and every member of this. As hon. members I’m sure you will not incur this practice, that I’ve outlined on several occasions to you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Provincial Credit Rating

Mr. Jean: Last election the Premier promised balanced budgets. What did Albertans get instead? Well, they got record levels of debt, endless multibillion-dollar deficits, a massive expansion in the size of government, the biggest tax hike in our history, and now our fifth credit downgrade. That’s more than just an accounting error; it’s gross negligence. It shows a pattern of waste and excess across government while ordinary, everyday Albertans are struggling to pay their bills. How many more hits to our province’s credit rating will this Premier tolerate until she realizes her plan is failing and changes Alberta’s course?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, just this morning the Conference Board of Canada upgraded Alberta’s economic growth forecast to 3.3 per cent, the fastest growth in the country. Now, the Wildrose would like to kill that recovery with brutal cuts, putting people out of work and hurting the middle class, all to satisfy one rating agency. You know what? We’re not going to do that. We’re going to continue on the path. We’ve got Albertans’ backs. The economy is going to continue growing, and we are going to make life better for all Albertans.

Mr. Jean: Albertans' backs, Mr. Speaker? Well, Standard & Poor's says this about your attempt to get Albertans' backs. It has the provincial debt set to skyrocket to $94 billion by 2020. What does that mean for 1.5 million or so households in Alberta? Well, it means about $63,000 in extra debt that ultimately they'll be responsible to pay for and pay interest payments on. That doesn't even touch the billions and billions of dollars the government will pay on interest payments every year rather than on hospitals, schools, nurses, teachers, all those things that are so important to Albertans. It's time the NDP stopped living in a fantasy world. When will they admit that five credit downgrades in less than two years . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. Thank you.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, quite frankly, this particular rating agency is using a brand new criterion that decides to discount a whole bunch of revenue, so whatever. But this particular agency would have us earn their support by cutting $3.5 billion out of our operating or raising taxes by that much. That is almost half the Education budget, $3.5 billion. To the member opposite: what will he do? Will he cut $3.5 billion or raise that much in taxes? Tell Albertans. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Schmidt: You guys love transparency. Be open to Albertans.

The Speaker: Please don't speak, hon. minister, while I'm standing. Thank you.

Second supplemental.

Mr. Jean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, the Finance minister's response to the downgrade has been to pretend that billions in new spending are actually helping Albertans. Let's look at the NDP record so far: 60,000 full-time jobs have vanished under their watch, they've brought in a $5 billion carbon tax, they put a cap on our oil sands, and they've spent billions to kill off our industries just because they don't like them. All we get in return is – you know it – free light bulbs. It's an absolutely appalling record of incompetence. Not a single dollar of NDP spending has created one net new job, not even close. How can the NDP or the Premier possibly justify their record?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, when our government came into office, we inherited the biggest recession that this province has seen in over 50 years. But since then jobs are up, drilling is up, manufacturing is up, housing starts are up, exports are up, and all the Wildrose wants to do is cut. I appreciate that good economic news is bad political news for them, but it is time they start putting Albertans' economic interests before their political ones.

The Speaker: Second main question.

Mr. Jean: Yes, it's up, Mr. Speaker. Debt is up, deficit is up, and unemployment is up.

Provincial Fiscal Policies

Mr. Jean: Alberta now shares a credit rating with Ontario, a jurisdiction with the highest level of subnational debt in the world, Mr. Speaker – it's disgraceful – and the Premier's only plan is to cross her fingers and hope that oil will soon be roaring back at $100 a barrel. The Finance minister can't just fly to Toronto and New York and hope that smiling at credit agencies will work. They expect to see a real plan. We haven't seen one from this NDP government, not even close. When can Albertans ever hope to see a plan that isn't just borrowing billions of dollars off the backs of future generations of Albertans?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm still waiting for the member opposite to answer: is he going to cut $3.5 billion or raise taxes by $3.5 billion? In the meantime Albertans do have an answer from us. They have a plan that is focused on making life better for Albertans. Increasing jobs, increasing investment, important public sector, and making life more affordable: these things together are the foundation of a growing and renewing economy, exactly what we are seeing now.

Mr. Jean: Ideas, Mr. Speaker? Suggestions? Well, the NDP wouldn't know how to hit low-hanging fruit if it was staring them in the face. Here are a few ideas that maybe would help them: end the tens of millions spent on budget and carbon tax ads, stop the hundreds of millions of dollars spent on shoring up government-run linen services, and save more by thinning out layers of managers that are currently managing managers that manage managers. Just some of these things would be a good idea. Stop the billions of dollars wasted on free light bulb programs and stop killing coal jobs. There are some ideas. Maybe they should think about those. Why not just implement one of those ideas to start saving some money?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I don't think that hitting low-hanging fruit is actually a way to save money, so I'm not going to go with that.

What I am going to do, however, is to not stop the very plan that got us a pipeline, a pipeline where on Friday a final investment decision was made that is worth $7 billion dollars for Albertans. Just on Friday. No celebrating: I hear no celebrating from the members opposite. To be clear, that decision was made by the federal government because of our climate leadership plan. Mr. Speaker, we are not going to back down on that.

Mr. Jean: Here's the big picture, Mr. Speaker. The NDP is more interested in serving their own world view, an antipipeline view, I might add, than doing what is right by the people of Alberta. They are driving our province nearly $100 billion in debt, without one net new job to show for it, and an endless series of credit downgrades. In the meantime they've ripped billions of dollars out of the economy through higher taxes, and they've sent billions more away with their reckless policies. How does the Premier ever expect anyone, especially Albertans, to trust her again with this disastrous record?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the alt-facts machine is blowing quite a lot of smoke over there in the Official Opposition office. That was quite a list.

Mr. Speaker, what I will say is that we will continue on the plan that we've put into place. We made a choice. We will have Albertans' backs. We will support those important public services. We will support our schools and our hospitals. We will finally invest in infrastructure. We will create jobs, and we will not apologize for making life more affordable for Albertans, because that is the way you rebuild an economy, that's the way you support Albertans when things are down, and that's why we got elected.

The Speaker: Third main question.

Economic Conditions in Calgary

Mr. Jean: More affordable for Albertans? Well, on Friday new StatsCan data was released that shows that the median income in Calgary plunged more than 15 per cent, the second-worst decline on record for this city. Couple that with the current unemployment rate, and it's no surprise that Calgarians are having a tough time right now with this NDP government. Instead of doing no further harm, the NDP government continues to plunge ahead with policies damaging to our economy. Will the Premier just admit the truth, that her government doesn't have the backs of the people of Calgary?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We know, of course, that people across Alberta are suffering as a result of the drop in the price of oil, and of course we know that that is the case in Calgary even though we still have the lowest overall taxes in the country. That's why we will not jack up their tuition rates. We will cut their school fees. We will protect them from skyrocketing electricity rates. Those are the things you do when people are already struggling. You don't pile on $3.5 billion worth of cuts.

Mr. Jean: Fearmongering will not make what this NDP government says true, Mr. Speaker. The accusations are ridiculous. Here's how the NDP is actually helping Calgary: a carbon tax that is raising the price of groceries, gas, and too many other items to count; an increase in business taxes that is causing investments to flee downtown and all over Calgary and southern Alberta; and a lawsuit, of course, against Enmax over the NDP's lack of understanding about PPAs. And you guessed it, Mr. Speaker. It's against the people of Calgary. No wonder Calgarians feel ignored by this Premier and this NDP government. Why won't the Premier back down from her reckless policies, that are only hurting Calgarians when they can least afford it?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In fact, what our government is doing is working with Calgary to help their economy renew. As we've said, the Conference Board of Canada is projecting that Calgary's economy will grow by 2.3 per cent this year, adding 9,000 jobs this year and 10,000 new jobs next year. We've been working with Calgary Economic Development to attract even more jobs to Calgary. Seventeen of the world's 20 largest investment banks have offices in Calgary. Calgary is home to the highest concentration of international headquarters in Canada. We are investing in infrastructure in Calgary each and every day, including a cancer hospital that those fellows over there couldn't make . . .

The Speaker: Hon. Premier, thank you. [interjections] Order, please.

Mr. Jean: Mr. Speaker, could the Premier please walk downtown in Calgary and see the people, see the devastation, see the 30 per cent vacancy? The NDP just doesn't get it. So many of their actions send direct signals to investors that Alberta is simply not open for business. Maybe if the Premier spent a bit of time in Calgary, she'd hear the same stories that I do of businesses that are barely getting by or that have had to close up shop because of the downturn. When will the Premier realize that her government's policies are the straw that broke the camel's back when oil prices are low?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, when will the member opposite quit cheering for Albertans to fail? That's what he's doing right now. Over and over and over again we are seeing indications that things are slowly getting better. Is it better? No, Mr. Speaker. Do we have more to do? Absolutely, Mr. Speaker. Do we have the lowest overall tax rate in the country still? Yes, Mr. Speaker. Have we brought in tax credits, both investment tax credits and capital tax credits, that will help business? Yes, Mr. Speaker. Is our member working every day with Calgary Economic Development to grow the economy in Calgary? Yes, Mr. Speaker, and we'll keep doing it. So stop with the exaggeration and . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

The hon. leader of the third party.

Provincial Credit Rating

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. NDP government policy hasn't satisfied any credit-rating agency. They've taken us from a surplus and a triple-A credit rating down to a single-A plus as ranked by Standard & Poor's. We're now halfway from double-A, which is the highest investment grade, to speculative grade, which is sometimes referred to as junk bond status. This government's direction is clearly wrong and headed for worse. To the Premier: how can you and your Finance minister claim to have the backs of Albertans when you are on the path to a third-world credit rating?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, how can the member opposite care about the backs of Albertans while walking around throwing around statements like "third-world credit rating"? That's the kind of thing that scares away investment, not the good policies that this government is bringing into place, with 3.3 per cent growth this year. Now, I appreciate that that member opposite also doesn't want to engage in any kind of celebration of the green shoots that are going forward, but could he please refrain from the rhetorical name-calling of business leaders and the business climate here in Alberta?

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Premier is the problem; businesspeople are the solution. She should learn that.

Alberta will run deficits of 26 per cent after capital expenditures according to Standard & Poor's. That's like a family with a $60,000 income raising their credit card debt by over $15,000. By 2020 the debt in the province will be $94 billion, 180 per cent of operating. When I was on city council, the province made us stop our debt at 150 per cent of revenue. Is it possible the Premier could take the government's own advice and control the amount of debt which the government acknowledges through legislation . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you again, Mr. Speaker. As I've said before, our government has taken a very clear approach to how we will help Albertans and Alberta businesses and Alberta citizens through these difficult economic times. Again, the same question that I gave to the member opposite also applies to his kissing cousins or whatever they are in the third party. What would they do? Would they cut $3.5 billion in services – that's $3.5 billion, about 40 per cent of the Education budget – or would they raise taxes by $3.5 billion? That's how we get out of the so-called junk bond rating that the member so callously threw out there. Which would he do? Come clean.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. News flash for the Premier: people with jobs pay more taxes and require less social services. That's how you do it, Premier. It's not that difficult. I just said that I'd help people get jobs. Standard & Poor's said that this has not happened. Standard & Poor's says that there's still a downside risk. We have to stop maxing out the credit card. Premier, will you direct your Finance minister to take a remedial course in budgeting so that you can get off this roller coaster, which is leading to third-world status, and will you do it now? Albertans need those jobs. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.
The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. A clear little economics lesson here. When you raise taxes by $3.5 billion and pull it out of the economy or when you cut services by $3.5 billion, you know what doesn't happen? Jobs. That's what doesn't happen when you make those kinds of cuts. You know what does create jobs? Investing in infrastructure long overdue for many, many years, supporting important public services, and making life more affordable so people have more money in their pocket. This is what creates jobs. That is what is creating jobs, and that's why we're leading...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier. [interjection]
Hon. Member for Calgary-Hays, keep your volume down, please.
The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Auditor General Recommendations on Health Care

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last week the Auditor General released a groundbreaking report on Alberta's health care system, including a recommendation that funding should be linked to outcomes. He argues for the use of market mechanisms within a public health care system, and I couldn't agree more. Let me be very clear. I believe passionately in public health care, and this report says nothing about privatization, but we know we need to set aspirational goals to deliver better care to more people for the same amount of money. To the Minister of Health: do you accept this recommendation, and if so, when are you going to link funding to outcomes?

2:10

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the Auditor General for his report. His ideas support our push to make life better for Albertans by improving access to team-based care, integrated care in their communities. That's why we're better integrating doctors and supporting better care for patients through our new AMA agreement. This work is well under way. I'm very proud of it. Instead of pushing for rash, ideological cuts, as both conservative parties, three conservative parties, one conservative party want to push for on the other side, we're making life better and working with front-line workers to do that. I'm so proud of our progress.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I'm over here, and I'm not part of any of those parties, and I never will be, so I'd appreciate an answer to my question.

The Auditor General called for bold action, for taking a quantum leap rather than incremental changes, but I've seen no evidence that this government is up to the task. Albertans pay more for health care here than anywhere else in Canada, and we need leadership to ensure that we get what we pay for. Again to the Minister of Health. Your changes to date are just nibbling around the edges. Will you commit to making the fundamental transformational changes that the Auditor General called for?

Ms Hoffman: If the member opposite wants to pretend he's not united with the other folks, maybe he should look at his own voting record, Mr. Speaker.

I have to say that we deserve better integration, and we're proud to move forward on that, Mr. Speaker. That's why we're investing $400 million to better integrate and share information across the health care system, improving access to accountability within primary care networks. We have been working and making very significant progress in partnership. We're working with health professionals, not doing things to them. I'm so proud of the paramedics who are in our audience, who are doing work around the Health Professions Act. They're expanding their scope of practice as well, making health care better for every Albertan.

Mr. Clark: I'll put my voting record up against theirs and yours because Albertans know there's a middle way and a better way, Mr. Speaker.

The Auditor General also found significant overlap between Alberta Health and AHS. This is something we've known for a long time, and it's certainly a legacy of the previous government. But they're not in charge anymore, Mr. Speaker. This government is, so it's time to stop making excuses. Again to the Minister of Health: what specifically are you doing to eliminate duplication between Alberta Health and AHS, and what metrics are you using to track your progress?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. I am so proud of the work we're doing, the fact that we are working together as many different parts to make health care better instead of having infighting between two different organizations. We've been very effective in moving things forward. There isn't a parallel management function between the two organizations but, rather, a close working relationship that determines how policies will be reflected and the services delivered for Albertans. Alberta Health sets the policies. AHS carries them out on the front lines through front-line health care providers, including the paramedics who are here today. For example, AHS sets continuing care standards. AH sets them; AHS implements them. That's the right division of power.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Economic Recovery

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With the low price of oil, the last two years have been hard on Alberta families and Alberta businesses. In Calgary-Currie we are now seeing signs that Alberta is emerging from one of the worst recessions in a generation. To the Minister of Economic Development and Trade: what are the latest economic indicators saying about the provincial economy?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'll thank the member for being a very strong advocate for the business community. I'm happy to share that full-time employment rose for the third straight month, reaching the highest level in the past year. Last year we led the country in private-sector investment and are on track to lead the country again this year. Rig drilling is up a hundred per cent. Our exports are up 68 per cent over the same time last year. Manufacturing was up in March and reached $5.8 billion. Housing starts are up. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business reported that small-business confidence is up, at its highest level since 2014.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that my constituents and Albertans across the province are anxious about the recovery of the economy and the creation of jobs, to the same minister: what are you hearing from economic forecasters about the provincial economy going forward?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta's economy will be the fastest growing this year. The Conference Board of Canada increased its projection of GDP growth to 3.3 per cent, the highest in the country. I can tell you that they said that nonconventional oil production in the province will see a big increase this year thanks to new capacity. Energy investment is expected to make a comeback this year and next year. Outside of the energy sector Alberta is benefiting from improvements in labour markets, consumer demand, and the housing sector, and I can tell you that the manufacturing sector has also been bolstered significantly by the new ...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Albertans have been on a resource roller coaster due to the previous government's inability to diversify the economy, to the same minister: what industries outside of the energy sector are facilitating Alberta's economic recovery?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know what? I'm proud of the work our government is doing to diversify the economy. We've got the Official Opposition, who doesn't believe in diversification, and the third party, that failed to diversify the economy. I can tell you that in manufacturing, Ford is opening a new parts and distribution warehouse in Leduc. Champion Petfoods is building a 37,000-square-foot facility in Parkland county. In tourism our market monitor shows the province's national parks are experiencing record visitation, and Edmonton will host the first-ever international Cities and Climate Change Science Conference, that will welcome up to a thousand representatives. I encourage the opposition ...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, last week the Auditor General released a report about how the health care system is still failing patients. The AG was clear when he said that putting more money into the system is not the answer. This government thinks that spending millions on government-run linen services is a priority. For two years the NDP has shown no will to get costs under control, and they've attacked the opposition for proposing good ideas that would not affect the front lines. Does this NDP government finally understand that they can't simply keep throwing money at the problem?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You mean, like, not firing teachers? He says that that's throwing money at the problem. You mean not firing nurses, protecting front-line services? I'm proud to do that. While his dance partners saw increases in health expenditure in excess of 6 per cent regularly, we've gotten them down to 3 and a half per cent. So if you want to talk about who's got better control of making sure we're making life better for Albertans and spending on important services that Albertans care about, it's the NDP government.

Mr. Yao: It's easy to spend somebody else's money, Mr. Speaker. Here's another quote from the AG. "Albertans [deserve] the best. Why would they not [expect] the best?" Given that Health is one of the biggest line items in our budget and given that the AG has said that our weakness has many organizational weaknesses in areas as far-reaching as from information management to the integration of allied health services, is the minister planning on implementing the AG's recommendations which seek to empower patients and front-line workers? Yes or no?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. That's one of the reasons why we're proud to be investing in the very skills and services that the OAG recommends. That's why we're spending $400 million to ensure that Albertans can have access to better integration of their own patient information through the clinical information system. We're so proud of that. Members opposite want to push for deep, ideological cuts. We're actually moving forward with reasonable investments to make sure that patients can be partners in their care and have better care tomorrow than they did yesterday. I'll tell you that the members opposite say that they are doing nothing that would compromise front-line care, for the rich. They want to move forward with two-tiered, privatized health care, and we won't stand for that.

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, this government does promote and support private health care. Let's be clear.

The AG makes it crystal clear that these recommendations are necessary and long overdue. Given that the NDP said that they were going to implement changes in the health care system but quickly adopted the status quo of inefficient centralized health care and given that the Auditor said that change will not be possible until health care shifts its weight from the bureaucracy, how is the minister going to fix our health care system when she barely admits that there's a problem, and what's her timeline?

Ms Hoffman: Every day, Mr. Speaker, I talk to Albertans, and when I see them, I say: how do you feel about the health care services you're getting? The vast, vast majority are very proud. They're proud to have a public health care system. Is there room for improvement? Yes. Do they want us to cut billions of dollars from health care? No way. They want to see strategic, smart investment that will enable them to get better public health care tomorrow than they had yesterday, and that's exactly what they're getting from this government instead of deep, ideological cuts from the opposition.

2:20 Provincial Credit Rating

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, last week I quoted Polonius' advice to Laertes from Shakespeare's Hamlet. Now, among other things Polonius advised his son:

Neither a borrower nor a lender be,
For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry.

To the Finance minister. I understand you played Laertes in school. Now, you've borrowed a lot, and Standard & Poor's clearly stated that all that borrowing has dulled the edge of your husbandry. Minister, when are you going to sharpen up?

Mr. Ceci: Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed my high school years. I also played Tybalt in I think it was Romeo and Juliet.

With regard to the debt and the deficit I have said many times in this House that we will thoughtfully and prudently bring down our deficit. It's going to be a third reduced from where it is today at the end of our fiscal plan. That's the fiscal plan we have before us right now. We know that Albertans want us to control that. We are controlling our spending. We're looking to the future. The economy is coming back, and the Conference Board of Canada said that it's going to grow 3.3 per cent . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, the Finance minister is now playing that role.

Given that the Fraser Forum has shown that the increase in this government's spending over the last two years is the highest of any Canadian province, at 10.99 per cent, and given this government's refusal to even attempt to rein in its spending, which is cited by Standard & Poor's as a major consideration in its credit downgrade, to the minister. You've brushed off this two-step downgrade and the messages it is sending you. When do you intend to give up the position you've earned as the most profligate of Canada's finance ministers?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It gives me a great opportunity to talk about some of the things we have done that will get us back to balance. We are finding savings by cutting CEOs' salaries, something that side left in place for far too long. We are cutting salaries and services by 2 per cent. We saved $121 million by doing that. We froze management's salaries, cabinet ministers', MLAs', political staff's. We have amalgamated or dissolved public agencies, something that side left in place for far too long. We're making lives better for Albertans. They would make it worse.

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, given that this credit rating has real consequences as Alberta sinks ever deeper into this government's pit of debt and given that each credit downgrade makes it harder and more expensive for our government to debt finance both capital and, thanks to this government, operational spending, to the minister. Here's your chance to show the world how firm a handle you have on things. You must know this, so tell Albertans: what is the estimated increase in the cost of borrowing caused by this latest credit downgrade?

Mr. Ceci: You know, Mr. Speaker, I've said it before. I'll say it in this House: $3.4 million is a cost that we will have to bear, but I think that is far better than cutting billions of dollars out of the budget, billions of dollars that would make life more difficult for Albertans, billions of dollars that would probably come from raising taxes or cutting services. That's not what Albertans want. We've got the lowest tax structure. We're going to keep it there. We're growing faster than any other province.

2014 Commercial Fishery Closures

Mr. Loewen: Commercial fishing across Alberta was shut down in 2014. At that time the minister committed to fair compensation. Now this government has changed from compensation to goodwill payments, which are only about a third of the previous compensation discussed. This government is giving billions of dollars to coal generators to shut down. Do you feel what you're doing is fair to commercial fishers?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, our government took swift action to protect our fish population from whirling disease. The day after whirling disease was detected in Banff national park by the federal government, we signed a ministerial order outlining our three-point action plan to educate Albertans. In order to expedite communication with key stakeholders, including commercial fishery operations, we formed a whirling disease committee. That had been disbanded by the Wildrose's new dance partner. We are investing, and we will have more to say about commercial fisheries in the supplementals.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Loewen: Given that I'm talking about the 2014 commercial fisheries shutdown, not the 2017 . . .

The Speaker: No preamble on this question.

Mr. Loewen: . . . whirling disease issue, and given that much of the commercial fishing is conducted by indigenous and Métis individuals and companies and since these communities need jobs and it is an important employment income source for many indigenous families, not to mention that it helps to diversify the economy, something this government talks about all the time, and given that government is at least giving lip service to communities that are affected by the coal phase-out, what has this government done to help these families and communities?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, with the commercial fisheries we have discussed the ex gratia payments, and I'm advised by the Minister of Indigenous Relations that indigenous communities support these ex gratia payments. Those arrangements are now concluded. We have worked hard with those communities to ensure that that structure is relevant and fair to all parties involved.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Loewen: Given that to this day the Minister of Environment and Parks has not met with the commercial fishers and since this is not surprising based on this government's record with consultation, will the minister extend the deadline for commercial fishers to accept payouts beyond the June 15 deadline and commit today to meet with an industry that is clearly under her mandate and deeply affected by government policy? Yes or no?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the decision to close the commercial fishery came as a result of decisions made by the PC environment minister, so the member may want to bring this matter up at the next Unite the Right meeting. However, we will take the matter under advisement, and we will ensure that all parties are treated fairly through the ex gratia payment process and through subsequent processes for rural economic development in our province.

Thank you.

Farm and Ranch Worker Legislation

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, it was in November of 2015 when this government first introduced their flawed Enhanced Protection for Farm and Ranch Workers Act. This labour bill under the guise of a farm safety bill was rolled out with notoriously little consultation, sadly, a theme that Albertans would become all too familiar with. The uproar and resentment that this bill created still resonates today. What I would like to know from the Minister of Labour is: if this bill was about safety, then why were the safety aspects of the bill not the priority yet the labour portions of the bill were?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. This government, as do most Albertans, realizes that basic workers' rights are important for all Albertans. As far as farm and ranch workers, they now, finally, enjoy rights that most Albertans enjoy, that all farmers across Canada enjoy, and for that we are extremely proud. We're glad of the work that we're doing, making all Albertans' lives better, including farm and ranch workers.

Mr. Schneider: Congratulations to the minister on his promotion to Labour.

Given that a year and a half after the outrageous way that Bill 6 was dumped on farmers and ranchers the only safety aspect provided to us currently consists of OH and S being responsible for accident investigations and workers being allowed to refuse unsafe work and given that it appears that an OH and S bureaucrat could show up in a farmer's yard one morning and start writing tickets, Minister, do you have an update on the OH and S round-tables? Will the forthcoming regulations consist of purely punitive penalties, or will there actually be an educational component for these farmers and ranchers?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. There are aspects of the occupational health and safety that are continuing to be worked on. It's not a stagnant thing. We do not all of a sudden reach a point where things don't change. Agriculture, as any industry, changes continuously. Those conversations with the agriculture community will continue; for instance, making sure that we define more clearly what constitutes dangerous work for youth workers. We're going to ensure that this legislation and other legislation will ensure that all of our workers, especially our youth workers, are protected while they learn and experience agriculture.

Mr. Schneider: Given that the Supreme Court ruled on the right of collective bargaining and the right to strike and given that there is still a great deal of rural distrust with this government and getting to be more by the day, actually, will the same minister please clarify who determines what constitutes a public emergency sufficient enough to stop the compassionate care of livestock or irreversible damage to crops? Do farmers and ranchers get to do that, I wonder, or will it be some bureaucrat that's charged with that responsibility, you know, to make lives better for Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of agriculture.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Yes, we do make life better for Albertans, and we'll continue to do so. It's the belief of this government and most Albertans, most Canadians that workers should have basic human rights, and that includes labour legislation. I would encourage the member opposite to look perhaps even to our cousins to the east, where they've had labour legislation that allows workers to unionize for decades – decades – and now we have something that exists here in Alberta. If you looked again to our friends to the east, you'd realize that very little unionization goes on.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

School Fees

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When the government introduced Bill 1, they stood in this House and claimed that they were going to make life better for Albertans. Well, Albertans, apparently, didn't get the memo. I attended a meeting last Thursday where concerned parents of school-aged children talked about how the school boards' reaction to Bill 1, including changing bell times and a move to more city transit for alternative programs, would actually cost them more money and force their children to take longer, more dangerous commutes. To the Minister of Education: why are you making life harder for these families?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, you know, it's a good reminder that Bill 1 is An Act to Reduce School Fees. Almost 600,000 families across the province will see a reduction in their school fees in Alberta, particularly in the city of Calgary, too. We're working closely with boards to maintain and to make sure that we look for other ways by which we can reduce school fees. With the co-operation of parents and schools and boards I know that we can achieve that goal.

Mr. Fraser: Given the number of families that elect to have their children educated in alternative programs that emphasize cultural or second-language learning and given that this diversity in education both reflects and strengthens the cultural diversity of this province and given that Bill 1 is causing costs associated with these programs such as transportation to rise, to the same minister: was the decision to exclude certain programs from fee reductions designed to discourage participation in alternative programs, or is it the result of insufficient consultation with school boards and parents?

Mr. Eggen: Well, Mr. Speaker, as we hear the members opposite talking about credit ratings and cuts and so forth, the main reason that we were working with Bill 1 as An Act to Reduce School Fees and not eliminate them is because we have fiscal realities to deal with. So, yes, we are reducing school fees in different areas, and we will expand that as we get an opportunity to do so. You can't talk out of both sides of your mouth. You know, you talk about making massive cuts and then wanting more programming to reduce school fees. We at least have a coherent plan to reduce school fees here in the province.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, the minister should focus on children, education, and families, not the other things.

Given that this government has increased spending by billions of dollars on your priorities, including subsidized light bulb installation, and given the relatively minuscule cost of extending fee reductions to important alternative education programs and given that this government has consistently claimed that education and making life more affordable for Albertans are some of their top priorities, to the same minister: if you're willing to spend billions on your priorities and unwilling to spend a few million to make alternative programs affordable, are you saying that these families simply aren't a priority?

Mr. Eggen: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, when building Bill 1, part of it was to make sure that the landscape that was created by the previous government, where it was the Wild West of school fees all over the place – we're bringing them in, we're lassoing them in, and making sure that we make life affordable for Alberta families, particularly in September. We will see literally 600,000 people with a reduced school fee bill in September as opposed to the many years when the member opposite and his government were in office.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Adult Literacy

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We know that roughly 1 in 5 Albertans has a low literacy rate and this impedes their progress and chances of getting good jobs. To the Minister of Advanced Education: given that adult learning is a crucial tool for improving literacy and other essential skills, what is our government doing to support adult learning programs?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for that important question. We know that literacy is absolutely fundamental to making Albertans' lives better, and that's why it's a key priority for our government. Through the community adult learning program more than 125 organizations deliver adult learning to over 600 communities in Alberta. Earlier this month in Calgary I was proud to announce our government's Budget 2017 commitment of $18 million to these programs, an increase of $900,000 from the previous year. This increase means that our partner organizations will have more tools to reach more Albertans who struggle with literacy, and this will help ensure that Albertans have the literacy and skills they need to succeed and get a good job.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
First supplemental.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Like the rest of the province, Calgarians deserve to have the best chance at success, and this includes helping those in our cities struggling with literacy. Again to the Minister of Advanced Education: how is your ministry specifically supporting Calgary in this area?

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for advocating for foundational learning needs in Calgary. Recently I had the pleasure of helping recognize outstanding Albertans at the life of learning awards in Calgary, organized by one of our partners, called Calgary Learns. My ministry recently provided an additional $500,000 to Calgary Learns so that they can meet higher demands for literacy and other essential skills in the Calgary region. In the previous year Calgary Learns served over 2,000 people looking to improve their literacy. We're also proud to support other providers like Bow Valley College, Immigrant Services Calgary in the important work they do, important work that they wouldn't be able to do with the $600 million . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The second supplemental.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: how does our government's support for community and adult learning make life better for Albertans in my city and across the province?

Mr. Schmidt: Well, Mr. Speaker, community adult learning programs open doors for Albertans that the opposition wants to shut. These programs ensure that Albertans have not only the skills to make their lives better but also the encouragement and support to persevere because it can be overwhelming to take the first step to overcoming literacy barriers on your own. At the life of learning awards I had the honour of meeting several outstanding Calgarians with stories of bravery in the face of learning deficiencies. One young woman, who had a serious brain injury, came forward and got the help that she needed from Calgary Learns and is now enrolled in a program at college which will help her find meaningful work and success. These programs are crucial to making Albertans' lives better.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

British Columbia Provincial Election

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, in just a few minutes from now the NDP in British Columbia and the Green Party are set to announce that they are about to cut a deal to form government. It's clear that this will not be good for the interests of Alberta. Both parties said that they oppose Kinder Morgan. Both oppose LNG exports. To the Premier: what is your government going to do to ensure that your friends out west don't hurt Albertans here at home?

The Speaker: The hon. Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Again, we extend our congratulations to all three parties on their electoral success in the last election. We are proud to work with whoever is in the Premier's office and their cabinet. But do you know who we're going to be working for? We're going to be working for Albertans. We've done that every day. That's why we brought in a leadership plan that got us two pipeline approvals. We've been continuing to speak with the federal government and with others, and those pipelines: we're committed to seeing them forward. That's why we got intervenor status, because we are standing up for Alberta jobs and Alberta pipelines.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, given that we just heard the Alberta NDP has sought intervenor status and so has the British Columbia NDP and Green Party, my question to the Deputy Premier is: where exactly are her oil sands advisors going to come down in the courtroom, with Albertans or with the British Columbia NDP?

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, unlike the members opposite, I am proud of our energy industry. Our government on this side of the House was proud when Kinder Morgan stood up on Friday, with not a peep from the other side of the House, when they made their final investment decision. That's $7 billion of new investment that's going to move our energy industry forward. Instead of getting out their pompoms and cheerleading for Alberta's demise, stand up for this province. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, that's exactly what we're doing. We're standing up for Albertans right here, right now because the British Columbia NDP and British Columbia Greens are anti-oil and antipipeline approval, and the folks on that side of the House have all been there at one point in time. My question to the Deputy Premier is: what exactly is she going to do to ensure that Alberta interests are heard while her friends and colleagues are working every day against Alberta?

2:40

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am so proud to have a government and a Premier that has been respectful and has engaged in real, meaningful action, and as a result we got two federal approvals. That's significant. The proof is in the pipelines. We're going to keep moving forward, standing up for Alberta jobs, Alberta pipelines, and making sure we get the very best opportunities for not just Alberta's economy but Canada's economy to succeed. This can be done while protecting the environment, and we've proven just that.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Child and Youth Advocate Death Review

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Child and Youth Advocate plays a vitally important role in our province because he's the voice for children who either cannot speak or whose voices are not heard. Last week the advocate released a report on Levi, whose voice was muted at best, ignored at worst. In response to the advocate's report the minister says that her government, quote, accepts these important recommendations, unquote. Minister: what is the exact procedure in your office when the Child and Youth Advocate releases a report?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, I want to say that it is absolutely heartbreaking that Levi did not get the support that he needed, and our thoughts continue to be with his family and with his community. Again, these recommendations are important and need to be acted on closely. Certainly, my staff within Children's Services will work closely with the Child and Youth Advocate to talk about what the best way is to move forward to implement those recommendations. It is completely unacceptable what happened to Levi, and that should never happen again. We're committed to moving forward and making the system better for the vulnerable children in this province.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that in his report on Levi's lonely suicide, which was the end result of lifelong neglect, the advocate recommends that the department pay serious attention to a child's needs and given that these recommendations have been made numerous times and this government has had two years and two ministers to address them, Minister: what have you done, personally, since becoming a minister to ensure that the system never again loses track of neglected children like Levi or Serenity?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud of the record that this government has in advocating for vulnerable children in this province before we became government and, certainly, as government. We've invested in the child intervention system. We've invested in families in the province with the Alberta child benefit. We have moved forward with the most open review of the child intervention system with the ministerial panel to talk about moving forward. We moved from recommendations on the child death review, just a month ago received, to introducing . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Gill: Given that the advocate is critical of a system that pays more heed to the needs and the wants of parents than that of children and given that the United Nations convention on the rights of the child states that every child has the right to participate in the decisions that affect them and to have their opinion seriously considered and given that this convention should inform every decision made by every staff member, minister: since your business plan makes no mention of this powerful international convention, does this mean it is of no consequence to your ministry?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Absolutely, the best interests of the vulnerable youth and children in this province are the primary focus of this ministry. It is very clear that when it comes to Levi, the ministry did not do everything possible to support that young man. Again, that is completely unacceptable. When a young person asks for help, as Levi did, we must do whatever we can to support them. Yes, we will work with the Child and Youth Advocate to make sure that the vulnerable youth and children of this province have the voice that they have deserved for so long in a system that was neglected for . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Tourism Week

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today is the start of Tourism Week in Canada, and we couldn't be more proud of our dynamic and resilient tourism industry. That's because Alberta's reputation as a world-class tourist destination continues to grow. Publications like National Geographic, Lonely Planet, the New York Times, TripAdvisor, and many more have put Alberta on the top of their list of best places to visit in 2017.

And why not? Because whether it's digging for dinosaurs in the Canadian badlands or canoeing in paradise in our provincial parks, going ice fishing with bannock in the bag, following the northern lights like a few nights ago in Elk Island, driving the scenic highways in the breathtaking Rockies, attending the Stampede in Calgary, walking through our mixed-woods forests, gazing at the wind farms of Pincher Creek, or exploring the centuries-old heritage of indigenous peoples right here in Alberta, our province has it all, Mr. Speaker. Some of my personal favourites include the pysanka in Vegreville, the perogy in Glendon, and, of course, our Star Trek landing pad in Vulcan along with their themed hotel and museum.

Mr. Speaker, I'm very proud of the fact that the government of Alberta is investing in indigenous tourism and providing the Aboriginal Tourism Association of Canada with a $100,000 grant to help establish a provincial indigenous tourism organization to grow tourism-related businesses across this province. The economic impact of tourism is huge. Tourism in Alberta is an $8 billion industry, supporting more than 19,000 businesses and 127,000 jobs. That's why growing Alberta's tourism industry is a key priority for our government. It creates jobs, it diversifies our economy, and it makes lives better for Albertans.

I encourage everyone this week to participate in Tourism Week. This week provides an opportunity for organizations, regions, cities, towns, and everyday Albertans to collaborate and to promote Alberta as a tourism destination for the world and as a fantastic place to live. Mr. Speaker, when tourism works, we all work.

Dave Kirschner

Fort McMurray Continuing Care Facility

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, Dave Kirschner was a tireless advocate for my community, and he dedicated his life to making Fort McMurray a better place. In 1978 he moved to Fort McMurray with his loving wife, Iris, to start a trucking company. They made Fort McMurray home and started a family. They helped found the food bank in Fort McMurray as well as our first homeless shelter. Throughout the years Dave devoted so much of his time, talent, and treasure to charitable organizations throughout our community. He even served a term on council.

He spent years advocating for a continuing care facility in town, many years before it was even known that he himself would need this. Sadly, when Dave was diagnosed in 2011 with multiple systems atrophy, a rare neurological disorder, they had to leave their home, their family, and their friends in Fort McMurray in order to get the care that Dave needed. The Kirschners were keen to return to Fort McMurray upon the completion of the continuing care facility.

Arguments have been made that Fort McMurray doesn't need a facility as seniors don't want to retire in Fort McMurray; however, this is not the case. They don't stay because there is no place for them, from the indigenous community that have lived here for generations to those that followed their children, that live and work in Fort McMurray, to be closer to their grandkids or those that simply call Fort McMurray home. Willow Square, our continuing care facility, still has not been built. In fact, there aren't even shovels in the ground, and this is despite countless announcements by almost as many governments and Premiers. This lack of a continuing care facility hurts our community and forces many to leave town to get the care they need.

Sadly, Dave passed away yesterday before getting a chance to see Willow Square completed, as is, sadly, the case for far too many of our seniors. Rest in peace, Dave, and God bless.

Presenting Petitions

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table three petitions, all with the appropriate number of copies, sponsored by some of my constituents in Edmonton-Decore. The first petition urges the government of Alberta to "introduce legislation to amend the Labour Relations Code to prohibit the practice" of what's known in some industries as "double-breasting."

The second petition that I would also like to table is sponsored again by some of my constituents. This petition urges the government of Alberta to

- (1) construct a memorial on public land adjacent to Highway 63 near Fort McMurray to honour the skilled trade workers who have been injured or killed ... on oil sands projects and to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the production of the first barrel of oil from Alberta's oil sands on September 30, 2017; and
- (2) introduce legislation to recognize May 1st in Alberta as an annual statutory holiday known as "International Workers' Day".

Third, a petition to urge the government of Alberta to

- (1) repeal sections 34(1)(e) and 38(2) of the Labour Relations Code, to remove the prohibition on certifying a trade union as a bargaining agent when engaged in certain types of picketing;
- (2) end the practice of grouping trade unions by repealing section 172 of the Labour Relations Code, and making any necessary consequential amendments to the legislation; and
- (3) repeal amendments to the Labour Relations Code contained in the Labour Relations Amendment Act, 2008.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have three tablings today. One is the legal definition of a junk bond. The other one is the definition of a junk bond.

The next one, which I shared with the Finance minister today, is Standard & Poor's Ratings Services Guide to Credit Rating Essentials: What Are Credit Ratings and How Do They Work?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Dr. Starke: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. At this time I rise to table the requisite number of copies of a report from the Fraser Forum entitled Alberta Leads the Country in Spending Growth.

Orders of the Day

Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 206

Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, good afternoon. It is my absolute pleasure to rise and move second reading of Bill 206.

This bill amends the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act to change the restriction on advertising for prospective adoptive parents here in Alberta. Up until now in Alberta parents hoping to adopt a child have not been able to advertise a profile online. In Ontario, Yukon, and British Columbia prospective adoptive parents create profiles for expectant parents to look at.

We know that how we communicate has changed, dramatically actually. Most people are now more comfortable learning, researching, and interacting online, and because of this, both adoption agencies and government provide in-depth information about the adoption process on websites. Many agencies provide text lines so that expectant parents can reach out to them by text as well as by phone or e-mail.

It's really important that it's as easy and as accessible as possible for people who need the support and information to be able to access it. Hopefully, they're able to use whatever means necessary, that they're most comfortable with, so that when considering adoption, it can be a process that – right now I think for anybody who's been through this process, it's an extremely stressful and overwhelming time, so if there's some way that we can help to reduce some of that stress and have the ability to bring families together. We know that it would be easier also for the expecting parents to look at profiles online and do this at their own pace and participate even more so in the process.

Many of those who work to make adoptions possible have said that the restrictions need to change. There is even concern that birth parents, expectant moms, and parents in Alberta are finding parents from other provinces because prospective parents in Alberta just simply are not able to post their profiles online and connect with them as easily. For example, the website Canada Adopts, which posts the profiles of parents, has been in operation since 2001. I really hope that Alberta families can soon be eligible to use that service.

There is also an inconsistency that needs to be corrected. For a long time now – and I found this very interesting – it's been possible for Alberta children who are waiting for adoption to be profiled online. You may have seen certain things like Wednesday's Child on the website or on TV, but adoptive parents have not been able to post their profiles. This is part of the law in Alberta that doesn't seem to make a whole lot of sense, and I believe that that needs to change.

This bill, if passed, doesn't allow prospective parents to post a profile without some guidelines. Obviously, we need to make sure that we're protecting these precious children and make sure that all of the necessary guidelines are there to make sure we protect all of the families and children that are involved, especially the expectant families. But it's important to make sure that prospective parents have the ability and are able to take the required steps by the province to be eligible for adoption and that they have worked with the adoption agencies before they publicly share their profile.

I would especially like to thank the NDP MLA for Calgary-East for introducing the private member's motion addressing the issue of prospective adoptive families being able to post information online. Thank you so much for doing that. Advocates for open adoptions have been saying this for some time in Alberta, and the government needs to update this little-known publication ban.

They say that it's putting local adoptive parents at a disadvantage when it comes to matching new babies with parents. Under the current legislation, Mr. Speaker, Alberta couples are not allowed to create public profiles of themselves on websites such as canadaadopts.com. This site helps match prospective adopters with birth parents and expectant moms and families from across the country. Many, many families are extremely frustrated. They're stressed and trying desperately to complete their families, and they've waited for many years to do this. To bring these families together, expecting moms and families looking to place these precious babies for adoption deserve to have access to a system that helps them advocate on behalf of their unborn child and helps to reduce the stigma around adoption.

There are so many reasons why expecting moms and parents may create an adoption plan, and it's imperative that we look at making the system as fluid and as open as possible. These expecting moms are heroes to many families who are looking to adopt, and this gives the expecting moms a chance to take a look as well. Being able to look at the profiles really, really engages them in being part of the process. We want to give everyone who is part of this process acknowledgement and to acknowledge the struggles and the sacrifice it takes to entrust a child with new parents. I can't even imagine all that I've been able to experience from my perspective of seeing friends and family that I just adore who have gone through this process and have been able to complete their families through adoption. I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it's just a miracle when you see these families come together.

This is really about embracing the future and providing different options, offering chances to adopting parents. This legislation will bring us one step closer to the goal of an expecting mom finding a forever home for her baby. The decision to adopt, the decision to place a child up for adoption is a journey that is emotional, and it tests a family to its very core. Many families looking to adopt have gone through many, many unsuccessful cycles of fertility, drugs, testing, and years and years of waiting. This process to adopt is stressful, and the process takes a long time. We need to open the doors so that these families can begin their lives together, and this legislation certainly helps that.

It's time to bring this legislation into the 21st century and allow parents to advertise their profiles online. This is about providing all the information to prospective expecting moms and to the adoptive families. This normalizes the process and, again, removes stigmas and is a beautiful option for an expecting family willing to consider putting their child up for adoption. This lack of access is heart-breaking for so many families who are looking to adopt and for those expecting families looking to place their child into the system for adoption. Expecting parents are giving the greatest, most precious gift possible to these waiting families. Adoption is an expression of complete love on both sides.

Bill 206 allows “the publication of an advertisement by a licensed adoption agency publicizing the profiles of prospective adoptive parents that meets the requirements prescribed in the regulations.” This bill is meant to change the act and begin the conversation with the government, with Alberta's adoption agencies, and with prospective adoptive parents so that we can develop the best possible guidelines and rules. It is time to update the law, Mr. Speaker, here in Alberta to keep up with the times, and we need to be sure, we need to be absolutely certain that we do it right. I am looking extremely forward to the debate and to the feedback from all parties and stakeholders, who I know will have an immense number of suggestions and thoughtful common sense for how to make these changes.

I ask that all members of this House support this legislation. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have risen in the House before to discuss this very important topic, to discuss issues that are addressing potential adoptive families. Adoption is really a wonderful thing, and we should be as supportive as we can of both birth families and adoptive families who choose this option here in Alberta. I would like to thank the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View for bringing forward this bill, for continuing some of the work that I started last session, and for bringing it forward in bill form. I appreciate that this is an issue that I think we agree on. We share a common interest in modernizing a regulation that's out of date, and through doing this we can help to give a little bit more hope to families who are looking to adopt here in Alberta.

I do have some questions surrounding this bill, and I think the member explained it a little bit more to me in the course of her speech, about looking to flesh this out, perhaps, a little bit more in the regulations and talking to adoption agencies. As it reads right now, to me, anyway, it says that it would allow “the publication of an advertisement by a licensed adoption agency publicizing the profiles of prospective adoptive parents that meets the requirements prescribed in the regulations.”

My question, I suppose, is: does this mean that the only people who can publish a profile are private adoption agencies? If so, would they be using a website such as Canada Adopts? Most of the folks who came to me who had concerns were upset about not being able to publish a profile on Canada Adopts. These were people who were often registered with, you know, the government of Alberta who were looking to adopt potential children out of care in Alberta. They were people who had looked at private agencies and had found them to be very expensive. They saw Canada Adopts as an option to help them be able to connect with somebody outside of using a fully private agency.

I do know it's very important that we get this right. It's very important that we protect potential adoptive children. It's very important that, you know, the regulations are in place to make sure that no one is offering money in exchange for potential adoptive children, so it is something that we have to look at very closely. Those were just some questions that I had, and potentially we will be able to look at them going forward in Committee of the Whole.

It was disappointing that, you know, when you start talking about this, you start hearing stories from parents all over the province who have had issues with this. I've heard from parents who have been actively discouraged in seeking another child for their family because they're told that they're too old – right? – or I've had parents who have been actively discouraged because agencies thought that they didn't have a high enough income to support an adoptive child, and that can be just really crushing to families who are really looking to open their hearts and open their homes to love another child. So looking at those issues, what can we do to work at reducing stigma, reducing discrimination based on certain factors for people who could really provide wonderful, loving homes for children in Alberta?

I do just want to take this opportunity to speak a little bit more about my story because I think it's really indicative of how adoption can come together and be a fantastic example of how a family can work. It occurred to me when I was speaking to my motion that I talked about myself being adopted, but I hadn't mentioned my brother at all. A typical first child, I just, you know, forgot that he existed. I think it really is an additional bit of the story that is worth telling.

My family adopted me locally, obviously, out of British Columbia through the public adoption system in British Columbia in the '80s, but my brother is an international adoption, so he's actually from Bolivia. The way that that happened was – so when I was about three years old, my family had a Rotary exchange student from Bolivia. My dad was a lawyer at the time. She had come and spent a year with us and was lovely. We're friends on Facebook now.

When she went back to Bolivia – her dad was a doctor who worked at a hospital in Bolivia. It just so happened that he was present at the delivery of a baby boy whose parents couldn't care for him and left him at the hospital. We got a call in Canada, my mom and dad did, that said: “Hey, we have a baby. Are you interested in potentially coming to get him?” You know, it was the '80s. Regulations were maybe a little lax back then, but my parents, you know, talked about it and thought about it and were, like: “Yeah, we can do this.” They flew down to Bolivia to pick up my little brother.

It did take a while, so they had to spend – and I don't remember because I was four, but it was a longish period of time. It was maybe four or five months that I was staying with my grandparents while my parents were going through the legal work and paperwork and everything that had to be done in Bolivia to bring home this baby.

Anyway, they finally did. They managed to, you know, get all the paperwork done, and they brought home this baby. I remember being very excited, and, you know, I saw my mom come through the doors at the airport in Vancouver, and I ran to greet her. They let me in behind the little partition because she had to wait because she had this baby who was from out of the country. I got my first look at him, and he was just skinny and covered in this rash. He had this really awful rash, and I was, like, “Uh, Mom, can we, like, send him back?” and she was, like: “No, we can't. We have to keep him.”

That was my little brother, Pete. Over the course of growing up together we were siblings like any other siblings are, but we look quite different. I could easily pass. If my family had only ever adopted me, we could have easily passed as any other regular family. In fact, quite often when I was a child and we were in grocery stores, people would go, “Oh, you look so much like your mom,” and I, being a child, would go, “No, I don't; I'm adopted,” because my parents did a really excellent job of making me feel special and letting me know that being adopted was a result of being loved so much by so many people. I was proud and happy to tell people that.

My brother, on the other hand – growing up, we would play with each other, and it really opened my eyes to the challenges of adoption because he did look different from us. Unfortunately, there was a lot of racism in my small town growing up. I remember just playing in the school yard with him and having boys pick on him and say, like, “You don't look like us; where are you from?” and having to stand up for him and being, like, “That's my brother. You leave him alone. He's from Bolivia,” and just having to deal with bullies.

He once, while he was in school, had a teacher straight up tell him that he was lying when he said that he was from Bolivia. He was, like, “I'm from Bolivia; I'm adopted,” and a teacher told him “No, you're not,” – right? – because he looks a lot like many of the First Nations people who live in my town. They thought that he was making up a story. There are issues of racism and feeling different when you do go through international adoptions. That's always something that's important to consider when that's something the families are looking at.

The other things were just the challenges like: he didn't get a Canadian passport until he was six years old, I think. It took six years to get him his Canadian passport, and when that happened, my grandparents took us all on a trip to Disneyland because he could finally leave the country. It was wonderful for all of us that we got to celebrate my brother finally fully being Canadian, but that was another challenge that existed with adoption as well.

The third thing is that it's expensive. Adoption can be very expensive. It can be very taxing on a family's finances. When my parents went through this in the '80s, it was during, you know, the early 1980s, which was when interest rates were skyrocketing. There were a bunch of compounding factors, but shortly after we adopted my brother, we lost our house, and we had to move in with my grandparents.

There were a lot of things happening at the time, but, you know, we've come through it. We are absolutely a family like any other family, and it's really opened my eyes at the same time to experiences of what it's like to be different. I thought it was a story that was worth telling. Adoptive families really can face so many challenges, so really whatever we can do in this House through legislation to make that process easier for people, to give them a little bit more hope, if it is just a simple change, something like allowing the posting of a profile, that's something that can give families a little bit of extra hope, a little bit of extra encouragement, and they can see the stories of other families who've had success. I know right now a lot of people tell me: I like to go on Canada Adopts and look at the profiles, but I also don't like to look at the profiles because it's something that I am not able to do as a prospective adoptive parent here in Alberta.

You know, I think I've mentioned that there are some questions that I have, and we have to be very careful moving forward in terms of making sure that everyone is safe and that we're not unduly publishing any information anyone wouldn't want published, but I look forward to more discussion.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, if you would allow me. The challenges in this House are many, but a sincere privilege it is to hear the stories that each of you tell. We can learn so much more from each other when we listen to the stories.

The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is indeed a privilege to rise and speak to Bill 206, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017. I want to thank the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View for bringing this to the House. You know, this bill amends the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, and it's going to change some of the restrictions on advertising for prospective and adoptive parents.

I don't think that there are too many people in this House that would disagree that whatever we can do in our society to create strong families and strong communities, we should take those steps. Indeed, the future of Alberta and of our society, I believe, is integrally connected to strong families and to strong communities, and I believe that this Bill 206 will help us do that.

You know, the adoption system, I think we all would agree, needs to adapt and to change in order to meet the challenges of our modern society. Obviously, the current advertising legislation is well over 30 years old, and it's out of sync with the modern technologies. I only have to think back to when I was starting my teaching career and to the Gestetner machine that was there and how we used to stand there and crank that Gestetner to try to get – yeah. I'm that old. I am that old. If we were trying to run our school system on that same kind of technology today, people would give their heads a shake and wonder why we were still trapped in that era, in that time. I think that it's about time that we had the opportunity to take a look at the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act and to update it, especially on an issue that's as important as adoption, to make the system of adoption more responsive to the modern needs of, I think, all of the parties that are involved here, whether it's the kids or whether it's the families that are looking to adopt, so I would speak in favour wholeheartedly of this bill.

You know, I don't think that it takes any of us very long to reflect on the people that are in our lives that are important to see that adoption intersects all of our lives at some point in time. As I was growing up, my Uncle Dale and Auntie Sandy adopted three kids. They were just our cousins. One of them was born full-blooded Hawaiian. Two were First Nations. It never even crossed our mind; they were just family. Didn't matter that they were adopted. Didn't matter how they came into the family. They were just family. Perhaps my best friend – I had the pleasure of introducing him to the House here one day: adopted, he and his sister. Three families in our church that I can think of off the top of my head have children that they've brought into their lives. I can't think of a single instance where this has been negative, where adoption has been nothing but a positive for not only the children involved but for the parents that were involved, and anything that we can do that would allow children to be placed into loving families is something that we should pursue. So I speak in favour. I believe that this is truly a good thing that we can do in this Legislature when we support Bill 206.

I was kind of surprised when this came forward. I guess I had just always believed that parents could advertise, that they could help to increase that communication between prospective parents who are looking to give their children up for adoption and those that are choosing to find children that they can love, that we communicate in a whole wide range of ways in our society today.

I know that as a teacher I sometimes wondered what was the big deal about having a cellphone until I realized once I got one that it was the best way of opening up communication with my kids. They could listen to announcements and ignore announcements forever, but when I texted them, they had to answer, it seems. It was almost physically impossible for them not to answer that text. My kids, when I started off as a teacher, going to the library and getting out, yes, something called an encyclopedia or having to go through the card catalogue and trying to research: how limited they were to the resources that they had in that square room we call the library. Today our children in our schools literally have the world at their fingertips, and I wonder why we can't have that as a part of the adoption process.

You know, most people are comfortable today learning and researching and interacting online, and I believe that it's time in the 21st century that we have that possibility for people that are looking to increase their understanding and in-depth knowledge and pursue the process of adoption. I believe it's important for expectant parents to be able to reach out, for parents that are looking for how to get involved in that adoption process to be able to use all of the means of communication that we have available to us today, whatever that method may be. For expectant parents to be able to look at profiles online, to be able to do it at their own pace, to be able to consider, to think, perhaps to pray as they move forward in that whole process is a very important thing.

The goal here is to make sure that the families that have pursued adoption all are in favour and feel comfortable and agree and will pursue and be able to put the love that they need to into these children. Birth parents in Alberta need to be able to find the people and the families that they feel comfortable with, that they know will provide the firm foundation, the love, the guidance that these children will need. I believe that Bill 206 will help to do that.

I'd never heard of Canada Adopts before I started looking at this bill. So I went on it, and I started to look and to read through some of the profiles. I don't think that it takes a person very long to see how valuable that exercise could be. The profiles of these prospective families are varied, but in all of them, in every single one that I read through – and I must have read through dozens of them – I think that it would help a parent feel more comfortable with the decisions that they were making. At the end of the day, this is about the children. Potential parents looking to invest their lives in raising one or more children through adoption need to be able to have that infrastructure that allows them to communicate. I don't know if there could be anything more important than allowing prospective parents to be able to connect and begin to process their feelings and their emotions so that they can find that perfect adoption, that perfect family.

You know, children who are waiting to be adopted sometimes will have their own profiles placed on . . . [Mr. Smith's speaking time expired]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. member, I didn't know there was anyone else in the House old enough to remember a Gestetner. I remember because it was at the time that the pen replaced the quill. That's why it sticks in my mind.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise on Bill 206, the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017. I want to thank the hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View for bringing this forward and also members from all sides of the House for their thoughtful comments and questions today. I think this bill is one of those things that probably will bring us together, unlike a lot of other things in this House. I think this is important because when someone is considering adoption or when someone is making a decision on whether they can keep a child that's on the way, in my view in all cases it's a very emotional, a very tough time and a time when people are under a great deal of stress.

The ability for those people to express their desire to adopt or their need to give up a child or their need to express that they are considering giving up a child for adoption: all of those situations really require the birth parents or the adoptive parents to have more information, to have communication, to know that they're not alone, to know other people have gone through this before, and to know that other people will go through this again. Limitations on advertising amount to a limitation on communication, communication which can not only help people to find a child to adopt but birth parents to find a couple to look after their child. Also, it's the lack of ability to maybe understand some of the feelings that they may have, some of the stresses, some of the societal pressures that they may feel and to be able to find other people in the same circumstance, to be able to talk to them, to be able to express how important it is to be either a receiving or a giving partner in the adoption process. I can only imagine how helpful that could be.

Obviously, one of the most wonderful expressions of love is when a couple can have a child, and I'm sure one of the most stressful, troubling, and worrying situations occurs when a couple wants to have a child and they cannot. Of course, there are many, many avenues previous to adoption that can be explored: in vitro fertilization, different medical procedures, different tests, and one thing and another. But the fact is that when a couple comes to the place in their life where they realize that adoption is perhaps the only path left to them for them to be parents, I cannot imagine just how lonely that could be if they can't actually talk about it with people that have the experience, and I can't imagine how wonderful it would be for people that want to adopt to be able to talk to other parents that have adopted, to be in touch with other parents that are in the same situation as them, and even to talk to potential birth parents that are trying to make a very difficult decision.

So I'm in support of this. I'm grateful that this is forward. It's one of these things that as society evolves some of these things can't be done – well, I guess they can all be done sooner, but if it should have been done sooner, like all things that should have been done sooner, the second-best day is today. On that basis I'm happy to express my support for Bill 206. I'm grateful for the commentary, again, from all sides of the House, and I look forward to the remaining part of the debate, and I look forward to voting in favour of Bill 206.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Adoption often starts with the pain of infertility, and the pain of infertility is terrible. People marry and, as the Member for Calgary-Hays just mentioned, the most wonderful thing about getting married is having a child. Even though marriage has really changed over many years and birthing a child may look different for different couples, the pain of infertility is terrible. Month after month you think that this time, this month, you may be pregnant, and you are not pregnant. I think we have to remember that it's a very emotional, just a terrible time for couples when they are trying to have children.

It's also painful for birth parents, for the mother, the decisions that they consider through the months of pregnancy, after the birth of the child. I've worked with single mothers, and I admire their ability to always think of their child first. I want to acknowledge, as we're talking about this bill, the pain of both infertile couples, as my husband and I went through, and the pain of birth mothers and birth fathers as they seek to make the best decision for the child.

I also want to talk about the language of adoption. I never thought that the birth mothers of my children gave up something. They actually gave something to their child, and when I talk to my children about their adoption story, I always talk about their birth parents as people who knew that they wanted to give the child an opportunity. I would like to encourage us in the House to really think carefully about the language that we use when talking about adoption. On this matter I personally get so angry every year at Christmas when we talk about adopting a family at Christmastime, because for my children, for our families, and for many, many families adoption is a permanent, committed relationship with a child. It is not a one-time thing that one does at Christmastime, so I would like to encourage all of us to carefully think about how we use the word "adoption" and how we refer to children whose parents lovingly gave them an opportunity for life.

I think we also have to be reminded that adoption is increasingly open, with birth parents involved, so the birth parents may stay in the life of their children and depending on the arrangements may actually be part of the extended family. I know many families who have chosen this, and it's been wonderful to see. Unfortunately, it is not the opportunity for my children as we cannot find their birth parents.

What happens to a family when, after many months or very often many years of trying to have a child, they find out that they are infertile and cannot conceive naturally? Very often the first step is medical procedures. These medical procedures, as many of us know, can be very costly, very invasive, and the pain continues month after month because the procedures haven't worked for you.

In the case of myself and my husband, we decided not to go through the medical procedures for a number of reasons. Part of the reason was that I had worked overseas for many, many years, and I realized that in some countries some people did not have access to basic health care. We decided not to burden our health care system and not to spend a lot of money on medical procedures.

The other thing that happens when you're considering adoption is the reality – and I think this is one of the issues that we should really be straight up about in the House as we're talking about this bill – that there are very few babies available. We have done a wonderful job in Canada in terms of accepting the fact that babies are born to single mothers, to couples, be it same-sex couples, that having a child, in whatever way you have a child, is acceptable. We provide amazing support in our communities for these moms who raise their children even if they don't have the support of their partner. I think we need to acknowledge this. I wanted to thank the government of Alberta for the work that it's doing in ensuring that children are provided with a safe environment to grow and for empowering mothers who give birth to have those supports.

I think that's part of the challenge around the adoption story when parents consider adoption after they've gone through the pain of infertility, that we all want to have a baby in our hands. We all want to have a baby because this is something that we are kind of raised with, that having a child is having a baby. Parents want to have a baby, but there aren't that many babies available.

In my own life, through the adoption and fertility journey that we took on, we became convinced that our adoption story should really be of adopting children where adoption was the only option. We also felt that children were not a commodity. One of the issues that I have with the bill a little bit is that by parents advertising, mostly linked to a private agency, it really seems like what we're talking about is a market-driven approach to finding the right family for a child, and I just have some concern around that.

In our own story we went through the government, then we went through a private agency, and then we were actually even approached by a lawyer on behalf of a birth mother. You know how it is. When you start telling people that you're considering adoption, people approach you. But because we had decided to move overseas and I was going to work overseas, we decided that what we would do was that we would adopt through the Thai government because we were living there. Even though we were offered babies by a local hospital as we lived in a small rural town – people said, “Oh, these foreigners are going to be adopting through the government, but maybe they might like to have a baby” – we always said, “No, we don't want a baby because we know there are children in Thailand that are in an orphanage and whose families have decided that they cannot take care of the child, and we will be going through the government.”

We adopted two boys. They were about two years of age. In Thailand, before a child is adopted, the government wants to make sure that the birth parents cannot take care of the child and are not looking for the child again. We really, really appreciated it. We let the government choose our boys. It was kind of really interesting because they told us that they chose boys that looked like us. Well, of course, my boys don't look like me. But, you know, from the first time that I saw my first son, Sam – he was just about two years of age – it was love at first sight. I can still remember that time. Our second son, Isaac, was about 18 months when we got to take him home. It's a wonderful story.

I feel that I have to tell you a story about each of my boys because I want to emphasize that it doesn't really matter at what age you have a child, that it doesn't really matter if they look like you or not. Adoption is not about all that stuff. Adoption is really about a permanent relationship between a child and parents who are going to take care of them, and in some cases it might involve their birth parents.

A few weeks ago we were in the market for buying a car. My son loves cars. He's very good; he actually works in the business. So we took him car shopping with us, and we told the car salesman that he was my boy, that he was our son, right? Of course, you can well imagine that the car salesperson did not believe that he was our boy. He thought that we had hired someone to help us buy a car. It strikes me all the time because I keep forgetting that my boys are adopted.

Then I want to tell a story about Isaac. Isaac was teaching in Egypt. This son, Isaac, is a fantastic teacher. He spent two years teaching in Egypt and is just finishing three years teaching in China. Actually, Isaac looks very much Chinese because his birth father was Chinese, and his birth mother was Thai.

So we were in Egypt. We had just arrived in Egypt, and we went to see Isaac in his school. He was teaching in an international school...

The Speaker: Hon. member, I'm very disappointed that we aren't able to hear the last part of that story, but I hope that maybe it might happen in the future.

The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today and speak to Bill 206, the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017. We're here today to update this legislation.

Shortly after I was elected, I was invited to attend a meeting in Okotoks, with my hon. colleague from that area, to meet with a couple who were advocating at that time to have these adoption rules updated in the legislation. They had adopted one child, and they were looking to adopt another. They were frustrated, and they wanted to help other couples who were going through the adoption process, to help make it easier for them. They also shared a really unique view of birth moms, and this was in an effort to reduce any barriers that a birth mom might face when choosing adoption.

When families like this family that I met with are sitting and waiting on an adoption list, there's not much they can do. They came with this beautiful book. It was their family book. It had pictures of the child that they had adopted previously and the wonderful things that they did together as a family. It was a family book, just like any of us here would have of our families. It was wonderful, and they were able to share it. It catered towards a potential adoptive family, but the only way that they could get this book into a birth mother's hands was if that mother contacted the adoption agency and went through that process and was able to find families that way.

Nowadays everybody just goes on the Internet for everything. Certainly, I think that for anybody looking to adopt, this might help them to make a choice by finding a family online and saying: hey, look, I choose adoption. I mean, it's because I have been inspired by the families looking to adopt children online. That family really, really touched me that day, and I'm glad to see that we're here today talking about the very thing that they were advocating for. That's really special, I think, for any of us in this role as an MLA, to be able to make a difference in someone's life because they've been advocating for it.

I personally don't have a lot of instances where I've been touched by adoption or in that realm of life, and it's not a hot-button issue in the constituency of Airdrie, but I can guarantee you there are families that are impacted by this, and I'd certainly support this amendment to the act.

I'm very grateful to hear the stories here today in this Legislature. I agree with you, Mr. Speaker. It's quite a good day to be on House duty, a Monday afternoon for private members' business, because of some of the great things that we're able to do here in this Legislature.

I'm really excited to be able to support this bill in updating this act and also in taking that further step, along with the MLA for Calgary-East, on the motion that we debated here not too long ago. I'm in support of that, absolutely.

Just one more thing I wanted to mention before I do sit down. I think it's commendable at this time to recognize birth mothers and the choice that they are faced with in being able to give to another family. I agree that it's not something that someone always gives up. In some cases I think it is, absolutely, but I think that when you're able to give, especially something so precious as a child to another family, we should do whatever we can to be able to support those people in those roles. These are all emotional times for everyone, with a range of emotions that, you know, we see from birth mom to new mom. It's a wonderful, beautiful, special time.

I know my colleague from Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills has two children that he's been through the adoption process with, and it's just been such a special time for him and his family to be able to bring those children into his home and welcome them as his own. You know, we see them all the time in this Legislature. They're going to be very well-adapted children to the political world thanks to their upbringing. I mean, they're just wonderful, happy, beautiful children that belong so much in my hon. colleague's family. We're so touched that we as his colleagues in the office get to see this family operate just as any other family. They've been given the gift of children, and that's exactly where they're supposed to be.

There are children who have yet to be born that this legislation would affect, but there are also, you know, children in care that may also find forever homes because of the updating of this legislation. I think that's the goal here, to find children forever homes, where mom and dad are forever, just like for any of us.

I'm so honoured to be able to speak to this amendment to the legislation and to vote in favour of it, and I support all of my hon. colleagues in this House to do the same.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker. Thank you very much.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If you can just give me a moment here.

As other MLAs have said in this discussion, I really want to express my appreciation to the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View for bringing this forward. I also want to commend my colleague from Calgary-East for leading the way in discussing this in the last session. I also want to express my appreciation, as the Speaker has, for the profound effect of these speeches on me.

It isn't only that I've learned a lot about a very important subject, but it's also shown a humanity in this place that we don't often get to see, unfortunately. I mean, like, bills have been brought forward before, many of them as private members' bills, but when good ideas come forward like the daylight saving time legislation or the disability advocate legislation or the cyberbullying act – these are all good ideas – we can work together on these and really improve the lives of Albertans.

I don't have a lot of personal experience with adoption – I feel in some ways very fortunate about that – but I do have constituents that have brought to me this very issue, and it's been one that I have sort of struggled with in terms of responding to my constituents because it doesn't really make sense to me that a prospective parent couple couldn't let it be known that they are available.

Along with that, though, I would also mention that I really hope that this sort of legislation can be expanded to the prospective adoptee, the Wednesday's Child, the single mother, the woman who's single and perhaps still in high school or in university that wants to be able to ensure an appropriate placement for her offspring. There's a lot in terms of this advertising that we still need to work on.

I did make inquiries with the ministry of child and social services. Is it children? It's CSS – right? – or CCS? Anyways, you know, the Minister of Children's Services did respond to me and actually commended me on my advocacy for adoptive families and expectant parents in Alberta and agreed with me that there should be more options available for families and parents participating in the adoption process.

Each province and territory in Canada has its own legislation regarding adoption advertising and disclosure of personal information. British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, and the Yukon are the only jurisdictions that allow the posting of adoptive family profiles online, and there are families in those jurisdictions that do use that facility. There will be an opportunity to consider the publication of information related to the adoption of a child, including the posting of prospective parents' profiles online, when Alberta's Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, the legislation governing adoption in this province, is reviewed. The ministry does plan on having a fulsome review of this. I'm going to be encouraging my constituents to participate in that review so that Alberta's laws can be brought up to at least a similar level as in those four other provinces.

You know, our government and, I'm sure, the opposition do share a deep concern for this issue, and we're always looking for ways to improve core supports and programs for all sorts of social activities, including adoption. I think that this is one of the main points that I want to get across today, that while this is a significant issue for Albertans who are infertile or who want to go through the adoption process, there is a whole panoply of other, related issues that we need to consider. This government is committed to providing a loving, nurturing home to all children who need care because every child does deserve to grow up in a healthy, loving environment that supports healthy development and prepares them for a bright future. So we need a good education system, we need a good health care system, and we need a system that protects the identity of the adoptee as well as the prospective adoption family. There are many other things that we need to work at comprehensively, and I'm hoping to discuss this more when we get into Committee of the Whole.

As a physician one of the times that I've gotten into consideration of this part of our legislation is when persons who may have been adopted actually are concerned about their genetic background. This is a significant concern for persons who might have cancer because there are identifiable genetic risk factors for particular kinds of cancers. I think the one that my colleagues might be most aware of is a genetic condition called BRCA 1 and 2. This is a very important contributor to the genetic cause of breast cancer as well as other cancers such as ovarian cancer and even gastrointestinal cancer. Similarly, prostate cancer patients often are concerned that they may have inherited a predisposition to this condition.

The current situation in Alberta in particular but in Canada in general and, I think, even in the United States is that it's often very difficult for the adoption records to be accessed in a credible way that allows persons to get that information. Now, this does have a double edge to the sword in that that same information can be misused by insurance companies, for instance, if it's found out, so we have to have protections in place. But this idea of being able to have a registry where information about the families can be accessed under the appropriate safeguards, I think, is a really important adjunct to what's being talked about in this bill.

You know, some of the other provinces in this country have legislation in this regard. My native province of Manitoba is one that has excellent legislation in this regard, and I think that if I were to make some suggestions to the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View, it would be to take a look at the Manitoba legislation as to how this might transpire.

You know, in the previous session we did support a motion by the Member for Calgary-East on this issue, and I think that – again, I mentioned this before – this is an issue that all of us can stand behind. The work that the Member for Calgary-East did on this was really exemplary, and I think we should be trying to combine those two.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to commend the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View for bringing this bill forward. There are few acts more generous and compassionate than the adoption of a child. Adoptive parents are taking on an incredible responsibility to care for that child that would otherwise not benefit by being raised by loving parents.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

I believe that given all the good that is derived from the adoption of children, we should do what we can, within reason and with the safety of the child foremost, to make that process easier. I believe that the amendment proposed in this private member's bill will make it that much easier for prospective adoptive parents to move forward in the adoption process. I hope the discussion of adoption in this House encourages more Albertans to consider adopting a child. Therefore, Madam Speaker, I will be supporting this bill, and I encourage all members of this House to do the same.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake, followed by Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have the pleasure of speaking on Bill 206, the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017. This is something that I actually spoke on before, not this specific bill but the motion that was brought forward by Calgary-East. At that time I had some encouraging words for the motion that the member had brought forward because, in the end, I think that we all want to see children inside happy families. A happy family unit will be better for everybody. That includes Albertans, the children.

I'd like to just say that when you look at the motion that was brought forward by the Member for Calgary-East, this is the next step. The first step is to draft a motion that says: let's make sure the government moves in a certain direction. This motion said:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to review section 85(1) of the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act and section 25(2)(d)(iii) of adoption regulation AR 187/2004 with a view to removing the prohibition on prospective adoptive parents that currently prevents them from advertising and publishing a profile.

So we're urging the government to move this forward.

Now, this was done, I believe, in December, so we've had a little bit of time to have this moved forward by the government. Actually, if you look at it, we're near the end of the session. Usually what happens is that the government would look at this, and they move it forward. What happens is that they would come out with a government bill. Having not seen that, I have to say that the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View saw this as a good piece of legislation to bring forward. The government didn't do it; the Wildrose Party did.

I have to commend the member because she is actually moving forward legislation that is going to help people within my constituency. That is actually very important because when I had talked on that motion about this adoption being a real problem and hampered by the fact that we can't advertise – this is an actual, real-life concern for somebody within my constituency. Actually, it was my local bank manager for the commercial lending arm. It's people in everyday life that you don't realize are going through this struggle right now. That's the thing. It's really a problem that seems to be hidden because what happens is that in order to get a child, you want to be going through the process.

I'm going to start reading, and I did read some of this into Hansard on December 5, 2016.

My wife and I are . . . going through the process of adopting a child in Alberta. We are working with Adoption Options and we are now on the waiting list for a child. The wait for a child is approximately 2 – 3 years and the wait is completely out of . . . control as we have to await a birth parent [or parents] to select us.

He's saying that the process right now takes two to three years to be able to move through it. You know what? That is something that could have been really moved forward, and I again have to commend my colleague because, really, what she's trying to do is to reduce this waiting time on these lists. We need to make sure that parents that are wanting to give a safe place to a child are able to get that child in a reasonable, timely manner and, again, safely.

But what happens here is that we aren't competitive here in Alberta, where there are different, competing avenues for other provinces. If we were competing at the same level as other provinces for these children, we would be sitting here going: well, how can we reduce it? But right now what it is is that we need to be addressing the fact that social media is an important part of this process whether we like it or not.

Now, to go into this:

Something that surprised my wife and I when we were going through the approval process is that we found out that waiting adoptive parents are not allowed to make it known on social media that we are looking to adopt a child nor are we allowed to announce that we are on the "approved list." This to us seemed archaic, and runs counter to other provinces/territories (namely BC, Ontario and Yukon) in Canada where these provinces/territories allow adoptive parents to make such announcements on social media. This puts potential adoptive parents in Alberta at a disadvantage to other prospective adoptive parents in other parts of the country. Often birth parents in Alberta will end up connecting with prospective adoptive parents in other provinces simply because they have online profiles.

It seems that we have an imbalance, if you will. We have different parts of the country – all reside in Canada, and if we've got parents here in Alberta wanting to raise children in Alberta, why would we not put the priority on those children to stay here? We need to make sure that we give every opportunity to parents that are able to do that, especially when it comes to being local.

It's clear that online profiles in this case – this letter that my constituent had sent to me is clearly laying out that we need to address this promptly. Now we are into May, and we haven't seen any legislation put forward by the government. Again, it's nice to see that our member of the Wildrose is saying that this is important. It's something that we are going to take to the next step, and we need the government to move this piece of legislation along with us because it's important. It was important because it was passed unanimously by this entire House through a government motion, so it was important to the government. It's important to us. How could this not flow through the House unanimously?

Now, I do understand that when we have pieces of legislation, we always need to be looking at how to make it better. So I encourage the government that if there are concerns when it comes to this piece of legislation, this bill, they reach out to our member here, the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View, and bring those amendments forward so that we can make this the best and then fix this clear imbalance within the system. What happens here is that we are hearing that this is not a problem that has just been identified in my local constituency. So what we've got here is that we've had adoptive parents reaching out to a lot of our constituency offices saying that this needs to be fixed.

I believe that when it came to this government motion, we moved the motion. Then the next step would have been a government act coming forward. I would love to hear, when it comes to Committee of the Whole, where the government was in the process of moving this forward because of their own motion and, if they are going to be moving this forward, what kind of amendments they would consider. I think this is a great piece of legislation. I think the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View has done a great job on it. But, again, it all comes down to co-ordinating and co-operating with each other to make the best legislation going forward.

Now, with Bill 202 we did that. We went out and said that distribution of nonconsensual images is something that is important to this entire House. I think we can find a middle ground on Bill 206 that says the exact same thing. We can say that we need to put children first. Let's do that as a group. I think this is something that we can actually move forward unanimously because I think every person in this House believes that children should be put first.

When looking at this, we see that we've got parents reaching out to MLAs. The next part is that we've got MLAs creating motions saying that this is important to us. The next step is to create a bill that corrects this. The last step... [Mr. Cyr's speaking time expired]

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I feel compelled to speak to Bill 206, the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017. I'll start by thanking the hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View for bringing this important issue to the House and also my colleague from Calgary-East for her motion when she brought that forward.

When I first heard that this bill was coming forward, I had a little knot in my stomach. I am a mom. I'm a stepmom, and I am also a birth mom to my son, who I reluctantly relinquished to social services for adoption. I knew that I was not in a position to care for him in the way that I wished. A number of people who knew that I was pregnant and would be in a position where I would have to surrender my child for adoption offered to become parents. They cited that they could provide everything that my son could possibly need if they were to become parents. The decision to relinquish my son was probably the most difficult decision I made in my life, and it's certainly impacted the rest of my life ever since.

I have to respond to two comments that were made by members opposite with respect to loving families. They talked about a child being adopted so that they would have a loving family. I relinquished my son. I loved him, and I would have provided a loving family for my son had that option been available to Matthew and myself. So I was not happy with those two comments that were made.

When I found out that I was pregnant, I was in my early years at university, and I did not have support to keep my son. But I had time to think about what I wanted to do and how I would do it so that he would have the best possible home that he could have. I spoke with social services on a number of occasions. I did all the things that you have to do, all the blood work, all the physical stuff that you have to do. I signed the papers.

The social worker came to see me the day I was to leave the hospital. Now, initially when I had him, I thought: I can't even see him because I don't know if I can go through with this decision if I see him. But after he was born, I had no choice but to see him. I held him. I changed his diapers. I counted his fingers and his toes. I checked the medical reports on him to make sure that he was all right. The day I left the hospital, I went to the nursery and looked at him for the last time. I didn't think that I'd even be able to walk out of the hospital.

The social worker came, and she said: in six months you have to sign the final paperwork. Well, I couldn't because I was in Montreal when I gave birth to him, and I was going back to Newfoundland, so I had to sign those papers then. For the next six months I don't think there was a night that I didn't go to bed and cry because I didn't want that to be finalized. I didn't know how I would be able to change it, but I begged for some option to be able to take back that final signature that I gave. Needless to say, I wasn't able to change that decision, and sometimes those decisions are the best decisions one can make.

When my son turned 18, I started to search for him because up to that point I didn't think that I had a moral or ethical right to disturb his life or to disturb the lives of the parents who chose to bring him into their family. I searched for him from the time he was 18 until he was 24, when I was able to reunite with him. I was able to meet his family. I was able to share many of the experiences that he had growing up because his family had kept an album for me, had kept report cards, had kept all kinds of things to share with me.

I know that this is a difficult decision. My son was not chattel. My son was not a commodity to barter. He was my son. He is a human being, and he's a wonderful, wonderful man. I've now had the opportunity to have a relationship with him for almost 24 years. I don't get to see him as often as I'd like, but I do get to see him, and I do get to talk to him on the phone and through e-mails.

I don't know that I'm going to be able to support this bill as it is. I think there are some things that need to be done differently. The concern, the gnaw that I have in my stomach, is that he was not a commodity. Social services found incredible parents for him, and I thank them every day that they provided him with a home that was a loving home. They didn't have any other children when they adopted him. Joan told me that they were trying for about 10 years to have a child. When they adopted Matthew, she then became pregnant, and they had three sons of their own. So he had three brothers, and he had two sisters because I had two other children.

Certainly, if I was advocating for anything, it would be for open adoptions. I'm going to have to think about this some more in terms of some kind of an amendment. But I don't know that anybody else in here was a birth mother that gave a child up for adoption, so I really felt compelled that I had to stand and tell you about my experience. Even though I have contact with Matthew, I still go to bed at night and when I say a few prayers and ask God to protect my kids, he's certainly there and I ask for protection for him, too. I ask that all of my kids have a decent life and that good things come to them. But I know that life has ups and downs, and all of my kids have had ups and downs. So whether he was with me or with his family, he had ups and downs, and I know that everybody did what they could to make life for him the best that it could be.

Even though I think that this is certainly a good issue to bring forward and to have that discussion on – and I certainly understand how many people who have not been able to have children of their own want to be able to adopt – my instincts tell me that if we're going to do anything, then maybe we need a stronger, more robust social services entity that is able to look after that.

I'm going to sit down, and I'd like everybody to think about what kind of options will make a bill like this the best bill that can go forward. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 206. I'd like to first begin by thanking my colleague from Lethbridge-East for her comments and all those who've spoken in the House this afternoon on this very important issue of adoption. I, too, have an adoption story to tell, which is much different than some others as each adoption story is different and each adoption story is unique. I would like to thank the Member for Lethbridge-East for sharing her story and her bravery in that.

[The Speaker in the chair]

I think it's important that the purpose in many respects – and I had the privilege and honour of working very closely with my colleague from Chestermere on this piece of legislation. This legislation was never intended to be all-encompassing. This piece of legislation was never intended to fix every challenge within the context of the adoption system or in the child and family services system. Mr. Speaker, you'll know that you've heard me say in this House on numerous occasions, even within the context of having two adopted children myself, that I wished we lived in a world where there was no need for adoption at all, where every situation was perfect. Unfortunately, we don't live in that scenario, so there is a need for this adoption story amongst many folks.

I think I'd just like to point out that in Bill 206 – I'll come back around to that – much of the purpose was to provide the opportunity to speak about this important issue and to speak about the important issue not just around advertising, which Bill 206 does, but around the very, very important issue of ensuring that we talk about adoption and some of the challenges around that and that we have the opportunity to speak about some of the stigmas that are associated with adoption, that we have the opportunity to speak and champion both birth parents and adoptive parents, that adoption is not possible without both of those folks.

Sometimes we see situations where a prospective birth parent wilfully makes that decision, and then we also see adoptions take place where those children, for whatever reason – something very traumatic has happened in their lives – have become a ward or a permanent guardianship of the government and the government is then making decisions on behalf of those children when it comes to adoption. Adoption covers such a broad, wide spectrum.

Bill 206 allowed us this afternoon and my colleague from across the way, when we had the opportunity to speak about a motion around a very similar topic, to really speak about this very, very important issue. It's not always in the House that we have the opportunity to speak about these sorts of issues, but today is one of those days. Equally as important as the piece of legislation is our opportunity to speak about the impact of adoption because adoption has such – such – an impact on the lives of everyone that's involved, whether it's the biological parents, who've made that conscious decision to put their child up for adoption, whether it's the biological mom, who has gone through a decision-making process to arrive at that case.

It's my sense that Bill 206 will actually promote more open adoptions, which is one of the challenges or concerns that we heard from our colleague from Lethbridge-East, because this reduces barriers to connecting prospective birth parents to adoptive parents. So there is a very likely opportunity that more open adoptions will take place because of it, because when the birth parent is involved in the decision-making process of the prospective adoptive parent, almost exclusively those result in open adoptions.

Now, in my situation, Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure of working through the department of child and family services, and our adoptions weren't open. The government, at the time of permanent guardianship, had made a decision that that would be the best case moving forward, and there is no communication between our children and their biological parents. Now, that may change at some point in time in the future, but currently it is not an option. Not exclusively but often when a child has been placed in care and subsequently a permanent guardianship order granted and then into permanent adoption, often inside the context of child and family services, those adoptions wind up remaining closed for significant periods of time and perhaps never opened. Now, that's not to say that we aren't open with our children about adoption, but it is that there's no ongoing context.

There is this wide swath of adoption stories, and each one of them is so critically important. In our case we, Mr. Speaker, as you know, had the opportunity, the fortune, the blessing to have our first child. His name is Porter. We were fortunate to have him biologically through a fairly tumultuous time of a pregnancy and wound up with just a tiny, tiny, tiny, little wee one – “No bigger than a ham sandwich, really,” we used to joke about him – a tiny shade over four pounds and six weeks early. Lots of excitement in our home, as you can imagine. Then we went on to suffer significant losses in our lives and multiple, multiple pregnancies that were not carried to term.

We had always felt like we would have a family with lots of short people in our lives and weren't always sure how that was going to happen but had always assumed that it would be a traditional way. But that didn't prove to be the case for our family, so we started to walk down this path of adoption and have known many folks who have also walked down that path. At the end of the day, we had an opportunity to bring a child into our home, and what an incredible miracle that is. In many ways adoption, just like childbirth, I think, really is a miracle because it takes so many complex factors to come together.

In this case, you know, in an open adoption situation like we're primarily speaking about today, with removing the barriers to advertising, the biological parents or birth mother will make the choice of where that child goes. But in our case it is the government that makes the best available decision, based on that child, to choose – so it's not like you have input into any of those scenarios.

But I remember so clearly the day that our social worker called. I was at my office in northeast Calgary, and the actual question that the social worker asked was: what is your definition of complex medical needs? In the situation of our second child, Paxton had some significant medical needs, so the social worker was reaching out to us . . .

The Speaker: Hon. members, let me say again how unfortunate it is that we can't finish many of these stories. They are so interesting.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. An important bill to be sure, Bill 206, the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017. I appreciate all of the comments of those in the House who have had personal experience with it. While I have not had personal experience in that sense, I certainly, through my two daughters, have had two international adoptions, one from east Africa, Uganda, which I participated in very actively, and the other through my other daughter, who adopted two from Haiti: certainly, lengthy processes and challenging to deal with the other governments on these issues.

I think, like others who have spoken, that there's a tremendous need for more openness and access not only for the birth parents to feel like they can connect with the adoptive parents but also for the adoptive parents to be able to be more public about their desire to connect with the birth parents. This bill proposes to amend the act to allow licensed adoption agencies in Alberta to publicize the profiles of prospective adoptive parents, bringing Alberta in line with B.C., Ontario, and the Yukon.

Presently Alberta couples seeking open adoptions are not allowed to create public profiles of themselves on websites such as canadaadopts.com. Conversely, profiles of children that are up for adoption are featured on television and Alberta human services' website, leading critics to charge that there is an inconsistency in the law. I think that's part of what this worthy bill is trying to amend. I won't take a long time to comment on it, but under the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act there is an inconsistency that needs to be addressed. There's really no reason why prospective adoptive parents should not be permitted to advertise online as long as proper safeguards are in place.

In this context, I guess, my daughter has advised me – and she's head of Christian Adoption in Canada – that without going through an agency, there is a risk of misrepresentation of adoptive parents, a need to ensure that they not have access directly to the birth parents. A lot of birth parents considering putting a child up for adoption are doing their research and communications online today – and that's fine; it makes sense – but without a home visit and without proper counselling for the birth parent, it's really open to abuse. Those are the concerns, I'm sure, that we are all wanting to see addressed. There's a reason why there are so many regulations and oversights, and there's a reason why birth parents get counselling to be clear on the full implications of what they're doing, the emotional as well as the legal implications of what they're doing. It behooves us to do this carefully, to make sure that we are protecting the interests, particularly, of the child and the birth parents.

I mentioned counselling for the birth parent or parents to make sure they're clear and have some ability to go through a grieving process in a mature and responsible way, ensuring that there's no money or other incentives being exchanged for the placement of a child, ensuring that a proper home study is done so that the adoptive parents are found to be legitimate, capable, that the setting is appropriate and healthy, and that, by all means, information is shared through a reputable agency. The birth parent then can work through the agency to get the full contact information. I guess the concern is that there need to be appropriate checks and balances, and I think we'll be dealing with those perhaps and some suggested amendments, then, as we get through to other stages of the bill.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

4:30

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to start by thanking the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View as well as the Member for Calgary-East for her motion. I think that talking about adoption and ways that we can reduce barriers to both birth families and adoptive families is so important. I know that as a young mom having an unplanned pregnancy, having to consider my options was something that I dealt with, and in looking at my peer group at the time, I was surrounded by other young moms who were also facing similar circumstances.

One of my very best friends chose to place her son for adoption. Being with her – the late nights, the crying, the indecisiveness, being unsure of what was going to be the future for her son – was something that was so incredibly powerful and so emotional, to be on that side of it, to hear the birth mother's perspective. At that time there weren't a lot of options for her as a birth mom. She didn't have a lot of access to information about who these potential other family members were going to be, who would raise her son when she wasn't able to. What she did at the time was that she explored other young moms who perhaps had placed their children in other homes and got to know their stories and talked to social services and talked to some of the adoption agencies at the time just to determine what her options were as a mom who wasn't able to raise her son at that time in her life.

In just thinking about reducing some of these barriers, allowing the birth parents to access information online would open so many more doors to give them a little bit more of a connection to what their options are when they're choosing this incredibly difficult option for their child.

As a social worker I've worked with families on both sides. I've worked with parents who were at the point where they were looking at adoption as an option as well as with young families and all different types of families about wanting to add to their family for whatever reasons, whether it was infertility or just a time in their life where they were not wanting to perhaps carry a pregnancy but wanting to add to their family, just the different available things that were open to them at the time. I think that having the ability to advertise approved adoptive families would be in the best interests of birth families and adoptive families.

I know that we've had people reach out to my office, families that are seeking adoption, grandparents whose children are looking at adoption, and they've identified some of the barriers. They talked about, you know, being on a wait-list for over a year and being told by the agency that perhaps it could be another three years before there's a potential match for their home, the incredible cost of the infertility medicine, sometimes upwards of $20,000, in their attempts to try and have a family. I think that eliminating some of these barriers that are faced by our adoptive parents is a huge step in the right direction. I think that having Alberta come forward to this like some of our other provinces have done is an incredible first step.

Being a worker with Children's Services, knowing the importance of having the parents able to identify online as wanting to adopt a child – they need to be approved, and I think that that's such an important part of this so that it's not just anybody that can come forward and say that they're interested in adopting a child. It needs to be families that have gone through the process of vetting and making sure that their home would be appropriate and suitable for a potential child to be placed with them.

I think that this is just an incredible opportunity for Alberta, to be able to move this legislation forward. Just in hearing the stories in the House about how many people are impacted, I'm sure every one of us has had constituents reach out to us advocating for better laws in Alberta to allow those opportunities for birth families to be able to look online and for adoptive families to be able to advertise that way should they choose.

I would also like to thank the hon. Member for Lethbridge-East for sharing her incredible story and just acknowledging the strength that it takes to be able to stand up and talk about such a personal moment and to be able to advocate for this legislation to be the absolute best that it can be. Yeah, I just wanted to say that it's such an honour to be able to stand up here and advocate for something that I think is well overdue.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any other members who would like to speak to Bill 206, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017?

Seeing none, I will allow the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View to close debate.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would also like to reiterate how amazing it's been hearing some of the other stories in the House. It's incredible when you have the opportunity to speak about something like this and when you hear the contributions of people, what they've been through. You learn a little bit more about all of the people that are in this House and about the diversity of people that we have in here and how they've been impacted from all sides of this.

One of the things that inspired me at the very beginning of this was the story of my friend from Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills. Many of you have probably seen his beautiful children around in this area and coming in to see their dad debate and speak and do introductions and his beautiful wife and their incredible family. Quite often when they've been up in my office, my shoes are usually distributed across the floor because they go and try on all my shoes in there. They're just a beautiful family. Seeing how this family came together and what they've been through and the struggles, on both sides, again, I can't imagine what it must be like to be in that position, where you are even considering an option of putting your child forward into adoption.

Like I said in my earlier speeches, for the families who have found that this is the way for them to complete their families, these expectant moms and families are heroes to these families who've been through cycles of fertility and have tried so many options and have looked for various ways. I mean, it's just an absolute miracle for them. Again, from the bottom of my heart, there is just nothing more miraculous than seeing a birth mom, an expectant mom, an expectant family make the decision to take this precious human being and place it into the hands of a family with complete trust, also, as the Member for Lethbridge-East said, putting your faith in a system that is going to raise your child, and then potentially even at some point in time having a relationship with that child.

There are so many things. It's extremely complex. This legislation starts off with the most simple pieces, giving these expectant families an opportunity to actually look at the families that are available. It will get rid of certain stigmas, like the Member for Calgary-East was speaking about, with regard to socioeconomic or race, religion, all of these kinds of things. When a family is able to put themselves into and be able to publicly show that they're interested in participating in an adoption, the expectant moms and families will have the opportunity to really look at that and imagine that this gift that they have will be raised in a family that they can relate to or understand.

If it is an open adoption or whatever version of adoption it is, like the member had said, there are some regulations and things that we need to look at to make sure that all pieces are protected, because the last thing we want to see happen is predators also being able to participate and get involved in this. So there are things that we need to look at very closely. I think we can do some cross-jurisdictional checks to see what's working and what's not. Also, the stakeholder outreach has to continue on. I'm not sure about the government, but I know that, for myself, we've had a ton of feedback from families.

I can say, without a shadow of a doubt, that this is definitely positive legislation, that it will lead to seeing more adoptions happen. At the end of the day, that's what we're looking for – isn't it? – to complete these families and to give options to expectant moms and families that are in situations where they are going to be part of the adoption process.

I'd also like to say that the amount of courage it takes on both sides of this is just massive, isn't it? When you hear about the situations of unplanned pregnancies – of course, when we're looking at adoption, there are all different age groups and reasons and all sorts of things that determine why an expectant family would be putting their child into adoption. I think what goes without saying – but it's worth reiterating – is the courage that it takes for a family to make the decision to adopt and, especially from the expectant family side, to go through that process, like the member was saying, to cry and just go through that over and over again.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Accessibility Legislation Review Committee

507. Mr. Fraser moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to establish a special committee to review accessibility legislation and consider potential amendments to legislation, including but not limited to the Safety Codes Act and the elevating devices codes regulation, Alta. reg. 192/2015, with the intent to ensure accessibility for Albertans that exceeds the base requirements of the Alberta Building Code 2014.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am very happy to move a motion that calls for the creation of a special select committee, a committee that will look at possible amendments to several pieces of legislation that impact accessibility to public buildings. I know that people who are in charge of updating these codes do great work, and I don't mean this motion to be a criticism to them as they do great work on a day-to-day basis. My motion is in response to Albertans that I've met in my work as an MLA who have expressed to me a desire not just to increase access to public buildings but also that they be more involved in the process.

Accessibility is an important issue for many Albertans, and we are a stronger province when we make a deliberate effort to make our public spaces more available. My hope is that by establishing this committee to examine the issue, we can solicit feedback from affected members of the province and all stakeholders. A greater understanding of what barriers are being faced with respect to accessibility will help us as legislators to ensure that future changes to building codes are done with the best possible information.

No member of this House can be an expert in every area, so we must take advantage of opportunities to further educate ourselves on important issues to our constituents. I believe that this motion and this committee will give us a chance to do that. It's my hope that this motion will receive broad support in this House and that we can move forward with examining this very important issue.

It's very difficult if we do not put ourselves in a position to try to understand somebody with a disability, perhaps a physical disability, a mental disability, how hard it is for them on a day-to-day basis to access just very simple, basic things, Mr. Speaker, but this motion also goes beyond that. Consider folks that are suffering from a broken leg or a back injury or some other form of injury, somebody who is in the early stages or late stages of multiple sclerosis. What this does is it allows this government, allows the opposition, allows the members, and allows the people that do the day-to-day work in this Legislature to show what's best about what we do. It's to create a committee to come together to talk about issues that are facing Albertans today, issues that faced Albertans yesterday, and issues that will face Albertans in the future.

Mr. Speaker, my hope is that collectively we can show Albertans that we all care about this issue and that we want to do what's right and what's in the very best interest of these folks. It is truly about making the best decisions as legislators to improve the quality of life for all Albertans. So I would urge all members to support this motion, and I look forward to listening to the feedback.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, anyone wishing to speak to Motion 507? The Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the member bringing forth this private motion to address accessibility and, essentially, the rights of persons with varying abilities.

I'll begin by saying that our government is committed to working with the community and with people with varying abilities to support their safety and inclusion in whatever way possible. In addition to our work already taking place to address these problems around elevator accessibility and supports and promoting barrier-free access, it is worth mentioning that we have taken a number of steps to promote accessibility not just in terms of removing barriers to physical structures but bureaucratic or organizational as well. We have acted to repeal PDD safety standards regulations, stopped using the supports intensity scale, and have changed service dog regulations.

Albertans told us that safety is important but that the PDD safety standards regulation was not the right solution. That's why we acted to repeal the regulation after phase 1 of the consultation last year. In June of 2016 I announced that our government stopped using the supports intensity scale and committed to using policies that are respectful in engaging the supports that people with developmental disabilities need. Finally, the service dog regulation changes will increase the capacity to train and test qualified service dogs in Alberta, maintain high training standards, align them with ADI, and ensure public safety. Increased capacity to train and test qualified service dogs supports inclusion and accessibility for persons with disabilities in their communities.

We do all of this because we believe that everyone deserves to live safely, with dignity and with the supports they need to reach their full potential. Our government is protecting and improving the things that matter and ensuring that Albertans with all abilities are supported to be included in their communities.

On that note, I will ask all of my colleagues to support the motion brought forward by the member. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Stier: Good afternoon and thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise this afternoon and speak to the hon. member's private member's motion, Motion 507, today. I think it's a very important suggestion. I will be supporting the motion, and I encourage all of my colleagues in the House to support the motion as well.

Mr. Speaker, the building code is an incredibly complex, technical, and exhaustive regulation that establishes how buildings in Alberta are to be built. During Municipal Affairs estimates this spring, my hon. colleague from Calgary-Elbow asked the minister a number of questions relating to the building code. Through answers to his questions, we learned that the building code is developed on a five-year cycle. Basically, as soon as they issue the latest version, the process of developing the next version begins.

According to what we learned in estimates, it starts with consultations at the national level first. While the consultation starts at the federal level, it ends up back at the province, and consideration is always brought back to the Safety Codes Council here in Alberta. According to the Safety Codes Council website:

Established by the Government of Alberta in 1993, the Safety Codes Council is responsible to the Minister of Municipal Affairs to administer portions of the safety system, including accrediting the municipalities, corporations, and agencies that sell permits and inspect the work carried out under these permits, certifying and training safety codes officers who do the inspections, administering the Alberta Master Electrician Program, and working with industry through our sub-councils to recommend codes and standards.

The elevating devices code regulation is another one. It covers elevating devices such as elevators, industrial lifts, dumb waiters, et cetera, and established the Alberta Elevating Devices and Amusement Rides Safety Association, which – I am summarizing from the website – is a delegated regulatory authority that oversees the installation and ongoing safety compliance of elevating devices, amusement rides, and passenger ropeways in the province.

I think we can all agree that the Safety Codes Council, the Alberta Elevating Devices and Amusement Rides Safety Association, and the current building codes approval processes have been working pretty well for most Albertans. But that doesn't seem to be the case for every Albertan, specifically those with physical limitations. We did some research, and according to government data 15.8 per cent of the population are persons with disabilities. In 2006, when this was reported, that equalled 410,600 people in Alberta, actually. If the rate stayed the same, in 2017 that would mean that there are possibly over 650,000 people with disabilities in the province right now. Just imagine. That's a substantial figure.

Many of you may have heard the saying: if it ain't broke, don't fix it. It's an important thing to remember that concept and, in fact, something this government would be well placed to remember. However, there is also another equally important saying: if better is possible, is good just good enough? Now, the only way to really determine which of these is true is that you've got to consult and research and investigate. It's entirely possible that the Safety Codes Act and the elevating devices codes act are perfect, but that's not necessarily the case. We don't think that really is the case. I don't think that they are perfect, but the only way to really determine that would be to bring in the experts and persons with disabilities who have a much better understanding.

I like the committee idea proposed by my hon. colleague, Mr. Speaker. I think it hits the right balance. That is why I'll be supporting this motion. Again, I encourage all members of the Assembly to do so as well.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Motion 507. I'd like to thank the member for proposing this motion. As I've said before, I think that any time we stand up in this House and talk about issues that are related to people with disabilities, people with mobility challenges, it's a great discussion. For a very long time it hasn't been a topic always on the top of our minds or front and centre. We're starting to speak about this community more, and I'm eternally grateful for that.

Before I begin, because we're considering this motion – it's actually a very complex system, as I'm sure you know – I think it's worth while to discuss some of the existing systems for reviewing and developing building codes for accessibility. Currently our provincial code review and update system to support barrier-free access is well established and highly consulted. The Alberta code changes for accessibility in buildings are reviewed by Municipal Affairs and the Safety Codes Council. The review is undertaken by expert safety officials, construction design stakeholders, and representatives from disability and seniors' organizations among many other stakeholders.

Alberta currently has a committee to review and make recommendations on the accessibility of buildings, and it's called the Barrier Free Sub-Council of the Safety Codes Council. The Barrier Free Sub-Council is comprised of a range of stakeholders, including a ministerial representative that makes recommendations to the Minister of Municipal Affairs on barrier-free standards. The subcouncil is also comprised of representatives, some of which are people with disabilities, municipal officials who enforce the building code, and members of industry who must comply with the code's requirements. Several disability organizations are also represented. Industry includes the rental industry, hotels, building managers, commercial construction, home builders, and architects. The council ensures that a wide range of experiences of persons with mobility and sensory disabilities are considered. Our provincial code review system is well established, and as you can imagine, there are many layers to it.

Originally, when I read the motion, I did have some concerns about, you know, maybe just the wording, and I'll explain a little bit why that is. Many of you will remember the PDD safety standards. These standards were introduced under the previous government. As I've said before in this House, they were done – they were certainly well meaning; they were not meant to harm anybody – in an effort to keep people safe, but the steps that were missed were the important consultation pieces. Because this legislation is so complex and has so many moving pieces, what was missed is that by just including all people with disabilities or all people with mobility needs under these standards, they were inadvertently triggering some activity that was not necessarily conducive to community living.

For example, you would have maybe a person or two with a label of developmental disability; whether or not they had a mobility challenge was up in the air. These folks living in the community would be subject to these standards that would require inspections under the safety codes, under Health, and that would trigger fire inspection. What was happening is that people just trying to live in their community, live a normal life, were faced with a number of inspections, and then the resulting recommendations were very expensive. In many cases people had to leave their homes or find other places to rent with things like fire suppression, that they didn't necessarily need. You had people with developmental disabilities or mobility issues living in the community, and standards were being applied to them, standards similar to detention centres or hospitals or sort of long-term care facilities.

That being said, I know the member and I had a chance to chat earlier today. Of course, the intent of this motion is absolutely to do the best thing for Albertans and to make barrier-free access in Alberta, you know, the most important goal, and that's what I believe this motion does.

The Speaker: Hon. member, if I might, I'd like to intervene. Respectfully, I've been advised that there has been an error made between what's on the Order Paper and the signed motion. I respectfully suggest that the House consider an adjournment at this juncture.

The motion that is on the Order Paper references "urge the government," whereas the motion that was signed does not make reference to the government. Therefore, you are debating an issue which has not had the correct processes followed leading up to this. I'm advised that it would be in the best interests of the motion as well as the House that the House adjourn at this juncture. It would then, I think, come back with the necessary corrections.

I'll just read this. The motion that was signed is as follows.

Mr. Cooper: Are we talking about the amendment, not the motion?

The Speaker: I haven't accepted an amendment here yet. We're talking about the original motion.

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly establish a special committee to review accessibility legislation and consider potential amendments to legislation, including but not limited to the Safety Codes Act and the elevating devices codes regulation, Alta. reg. 192/2015, with the intent to ensure accessibility for Albertans that exceeds the base requirements of the Alberta Building Code 2014.

The motion as presented on the Order Paper – I think you have copies of this – reads as follows:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to establish a special committee to review accessibility legislation and consider potential amendments to legislation, including but not limited to the Safety Codes Act and the elevating devices codes regulation, Alta. reg. 192/2015, with the intent to ensure accessibility for Albertans that exceeds the base requirements of the Alberta Building Code 2014.

The Opposition House Leader.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am just curious to know – and perhaps it may not be possible – if this could be addressed through unanimous consent of the House for us to be able to continue, that we might be able to ask for a motion for unanimous consent of the House to have the document read as such, making a correction to the document through a motion. The table officers would then have the ability to correct the document on a go-forward basis. That would allow us to continue debate this evening and, by the sounds of things, see a successful conclusion to the motion.

The Speaker: For clarification, would it be the one that's signed?

Mr. Cooper: Correct.

Cortes-Vargas: Just to verify, we would be debating the motion that he read earlier on – correct? – not the one on the Order Paper.

The Speaker: Go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I'll effort to provide some clarification. The original document, the motion that was initially signed by the hon. member and then turned in to the bills and Journals clerk, failed to have the word "government" in that motion. As such, there was an error because in most motions that are debated in this Chamber, it says "urge the government." There was a discrepancy between the original document, that was signed by the member, and the motion that we have on the Order Paper before us.

It would be my recommendation that through unanimous consent of the House we provide a correction to that document through a motion. Then they will be the same, we will be debating it appropriately, and we can all proceed with the debate.

The Speaker: To be clear, hon. member, I'm confused as to which motion we would be following. Would it be the intent of the House that it would be the wording which is on the Order Paper, which uses the phrase "urge the government"? It's the other one, I'm being advised, that would be debated. Is there agreement that we would urge the government? Is that your proposal, hon. member?

Mr. Cooper: Yes.

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Calgary-South East, it's your motion. I'll give you the opportunity to speak to the matter.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Sorry; I apologize to this House if there is this mix-up. However, this is what we were presented with, exactly what I've read from the Order Paper. If the House would agree, I'd love to continue.

The Speaker: Hon. member, might I clarify, then, again? Your intent would be that the motion that you would task the House with is the one that's on the Order Paper, not the one which you signed. Is that correct?

Let me read it again. This would be with the assumption that this is what would be moved. The motion would now read: "Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to establish a special committee to review accessibility legislation," et cetera, et cetera. Is that the mover's intent?

Mr. Fraser: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I'd ask for unanimous consent for us to continue.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Speaker: Hon. members, I've been advised – and it certainly was my understanding as well and I think shared by the House – that the time that we have just used with respect to this correction has not been counted and that you will get the adequate time for the motion as agreed to under standing orders.

Hon. Member for St. Albert, accordingly, you would have approximately five minutes left to speak. Please proceed.

Ms Renaud: Okay. Thank you. I'd like to propose this amendment to Motion 507, (a) striking out "consider" and substituting "conduct a thorough consultation regarding" and (b) striking out all of the words that follow "Albertans."

The member and I had a chance to chat briefly earlier today. The reason that I'm asking for this amendment is that it's been the experience of the community of people with disabilities and their allies that, I think, well-meaning legislation and well-meaning activities don't always turn out that way.

I think the original wording was "to ensure accessibility for Albertans that exceeds the base requirements of the Alberta Building Code," when, in fact, this community of people, people with disabilities, doesn't necessarily want to be excluded or doesn't want any more. So while barrier-free is certainly the goal for all Canadians, all Albertans, people with disabilities don't necessarily want to be singled out. For example, labour legislation: I think there was a suggestion the other day about the issue that people with disabilities be pulled out and dealt with separately. That's a really good example of that. People with disabilities want to be included in schools, in work, in legislation.

So this amendment proposes to slightly change the wording. I think, though, that the intent of the motion is still there. I think the member is talking about aligning some legislation, working together, strengthening things so that barrier-free and access are the focus, not just people with disabilities going over and above what is there in legislation.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, an amendment has been proposed, which you will have a copy of, which will be identified as A1.

The Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, thank you. I'd just like to thank the member for her comments. Absolutely, one of the things that I think we can learn as Albertans, certainly – at least, what I've learned is that when you talk to people with disability or different challenges from our challenges, what I find is that more often than not, some of us that have everything at our fingertips get stuck in a fixed mindset where we're always considering our failures and we're always considering our barriers. However, what we see with people with disabilities is that they have a different mindset. It's a growth mindset. They don't always see a barrier; what they see is an opportunity. They see things completely differently, and we can learn so much from them.

That's why I would urge the House to support this amendment, that shows that when we speak about Albertans, there should be no classification. It should all be equal, and we should be considering accessibility for all Albertans, not one specific person. I would support this amendment. I thank the member for bringing it forward.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there any other members who would like to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise in support of this amendment. Any time that we can make our communities and our province more accessible is a time that we should all take advantage of. I sense a willingness in this room to support this amendment and therefore to support this motion, so I urge my colleagues to do the same.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Any other members who would like to speak to A1? The Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just wanted to rise briefly in support of the amendment. If it keeps us all on the same page in looking at making Alberta more accessible for all of its citizens, then that can only end up being a good thing. If we're going to work on it together in consultation with those people that we need to help have access, then that can't be anything but a good thing, too. So I'm happy to support both the amendment and the main motion.

The Speaker: The Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Just to speak on my support of this amendment, something that I have learned, that stays with me, from the Member for St. Albert as well as from those that have the disabilities is: Nothing about Us without Us. I remember that every time I talk about issues that affect them.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any other members who would speak to amendment A1?

[Motion on amendment A1 carried]

5:30

The Speaker: Now we're back to the amended motion. Hon. members, anyone wishing to speak to the amended motion?

Do you wish the opportunity for closure?

Mr. Fraser: Sure. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again I'd like to thank this House and this Chamber. I mean, I really do believe that when we put before us the important things that we can agree on, there is a symbiotic relationship here. It's encouraging. I just want to thank everybody for their comments. Certainly, hopefully, we can move forward with this committee to truly make Alberta more accessible for all people.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Motion Other than Government Motion 507 as amended carried]

The Speaker: The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for an interesting afternoon. I believe I learn something every time I sit in this chair. Today was no exception.

I would move that we adjourn this afternoon and reconvene at 7:30 this evening.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:32 p.m.]

The Deputy Speaker: Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: I'll call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 16 An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates

The Chair: Hon. members, are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to speak to Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates. I have not been impressed by this bill that tries to help the poor, only to end up taking the money out of their pockets through higher taxes. I'm also not impressed with the sign that this bill will send to our industry, that they should expect a significant increase in rates in the near future. The NDP has set us up on a path that will force rates to soar, hurt businesses, hurt our job creators, and truly upset Alberta's economy.

Madam Chair, we talked about the different policies of this government in the past, too. We gave them honest feedback on most of their policies in the past, and here we are again trying to make their unreasonable bills better in the interests of Albertans. We are here again at that work.

That's why I actually wanted to introduce an amendment to this bill. I'll read the amendment, and I have the requisite copies. I'll give them to the page here.

Madam Chair, my amendment reads as follows. I move that Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates, be amended as follows. The following is added after section 2:

Economic impact assessment

2.1(1) One month after the date on which this Act receives Royal Assent, the Minister shall prepare a projection of the economic impact of the imposition of maximum rates established in section 2 on electricity consumers who are not regulated rate customers.

(2) The Minister shall lay a copy of the projection prepared under subsection (1) as soon as practicable before the Assembly if it is then sitting or, if it is not sitting, within 15 days after the commencement of the next sitting.

In part B section 8 is struck out, and the following is substituted:

Coming into force

8 Sections 2(2), 3 and 6(1)(c) and (d)(iii) come into force on the later of the following:

(a) January 1, 2018;

(b) 30 days after the date on which the Minister lays the projection prepared under section 2.1(2) before the Assembly.

Madam Chair, that's my amendment, which is very reasonable. Now every member has a copy of this. They have the opportunity to read this.

Madam Chair, we gave lots of feedback on NDP policies in the past, and we talked about the economic impacts of their policies. I don't know how many antibusiness policies have been promoted by this government without looking at the big picture. Just look at the big picture: that's what you used to say when you sat on this side, but now you've lost sight. You've stopped looking at the big picture.

The corporate tax hike: you never thought it through; you never did the economic impact analysis. The minimum wage 50 per cent hike: you didn't think it through; you didn't do the economic impact analysis. We asked for it. If you have done that, you didn't share it with us. It takes the Calgary Herald or someone else to leak that after the session is over. That's what happened last time. [interjection] Yeah, we'll stay tuned to what else you leak after this session.

Now, the labour bill, which is just your ideology, with no analysis of how many jobs it will kill... [interjections] Yeah, you've already killed 100,000, so you should have the joy of the killjoy by now. [interjections]

The Chair: Hon. members.

Mr. Panda: You should be on the high. Minister of technical education, you should be on the high of that killjoy.

The Chair: Hon. member, we are on Bill 16, amendment A1.

Mr. Panda: I'm speaking to that, Madam Chair. If I'm engaged, I have to answer them.

The Chair: Through the chair, please.

Mr. Panda: Sure.

The Chair: Thank you.

Mr. Panda: As long as they direct to you, I'll direct through you.

Madam Chair, we talked about some of those risky ideological policies like a 100-megatonne cap. We asked when they introduced that and when they brought in Bill 25, Bill 27, Bill 30, at every stage of those bills, for a simple economic impact analysis, and we never got it. That's why I made one more attempt here to get the message across the aisle. If they consider the big picture and consider this reasonable amendment to this important bill, that will help all Albertans. It is clear that the Department of Energy believes that electricity rates are going up significantly over the next four years. You're only there for two years, but it's going to go up for four years.

Those rate increases are going to happen over the lifespan of this bill, Madam Chair, yet we have not seen the economic impact assessment for the job creators that will not qualify for the RRO, the regulated rate option. As all of the MLAs in this House should know, the regulated rate option is only offered to residential and small-business customers who consume less than 250,000 kilowatt hours per year, leaving our job creators to face market rates.

An Hon. Member: You believe in the market, don't you?

Mr. Panda: Yeah. If it is truly the market, we do believe in that, but you're trying to tinker with the free-market system here.

If I know the public servants – and I'm starting to now, Madam Chair; after two years in this job I'm getting to know the public servants – they would have figured this out and identified this problem and have likely done some kind of economic impact assessment on the business community to find out what doubling electricity rates, as this cap projects, will mean to those businesses. But in case the public servants have not done their homework for the minister, I'm giving them a month to produce a report. As per this amendment that is just 20 working days.

Madam Chair, 250,000 kilowatt hours per year is a lot of electricity. [interjections] This is not a laughing matter for the job creators. You know, it's not a laughing matter, Madam Premier. There are employers in Alberta who will use even more than 250,000 kilowatt hours per year. There are lots of them, and they will not be protected by this bill. No. Will those employers pack up and leave and go elsewhere because of rising electricity prices? Possibly. You were very successful in driving out those businesses so far.

So that's why this amendment. Please check out the amendment. It's very reasonable. Electricity costs are a key input for industry and often a determining factor in whether a company stays in a jurisdiction or not. I'll give you an example. The aluminum smelter in Kitimat, B.C., was set up there because of the cheap electricity available at that location. That's why they have a smelter for aluminum there and not in Alberta.

Ontario has seen a mass exodus of industry overseas and to the U.S.A. because of the outrageous power prices. Ontario gets the double whammy of Kathleen Wynne's green jobs, a coal phase-out, a natural gas phase-out but also aging facilities like Pickering and Darlington nuclear generation, that need to be replaced, refurbished, or phased out. We don't want to follow Ontario's route here.

When an Albertan loses their job, Madam Chair, it doesn't matter what the price of electricity is. They just aren't going to be able to pay their bills because they don't have a job. This cap is fundamentally wrong. If you use power, you pay for it. It's a simple principle. When you use power, you pay for it. It's that simple. No gimmicks that saddle the taxpayers with the burden and then rob the ratepayer through their income tax or other taxes. My colleague here from Innisfail-Sylvan Lake: he educated us so many times that there is only one ratepayer and one taxpayer. Somehow we miss that point every time.

That's why, Madam Chair, we have to look at this amendment. Don't get me wrong here. I like the renewables, but this is not the way to do it. The NDP need to turn back the clock on the reckless, expensive, and ideological transition to plan the renewables. That's why I have brought this amendment forward. Albertans deserve to know what the economic impact of this policy is. If the NDP truly isn't worried that electricity rates will double in the next four years, then you would table an economic impact study showing that that isn't the motivation for the bill.

I see some of the backbenchers over there nodding in agreement. They know I'm right. They know their government is wrong on this, but for some reason, whatever it is, they'll support team orange and green – we'll see some news across the neighbouring province tomorrow – their brothers and sisters in their misguided do-goodism, Madam Chair.

That's why I encourage everyone to look at this amendment and do what is right for Albertans. In this industry, which uses more than 250,000 kilowatt hours per year, they can't afford such high electricity prices. As a result, they close the shop and move to other jurisdictions. That's why I challenge the members to recognize the economic impact that this bill will have and to work to amend the bill to table an economic impact assessment.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the Member for Calgary-Foothills for the amendment. He's talking about us missing the big picture. Well, it seems like he's watching the feature-length film with his eyes closed, but that's okay.

You know, to have the economic impact assessment for those who aren't RRO customers, it doesn't make any sense at this point because if they aren't, they're locked into a different contract anyhow. We won't know what that result is for four years down the road, anyway.

Also, we have to understand that with this bill there's no intention to put retailers out of business whatsoever. I mean, the rate cap is not designed to hurt competitive retailers in this space. Its intent is to protect Albertans from high electricity prices. There's no intent to phase out the electricity market either. You know, this actually provides opportunities for retailers to come up with innovative products that work for consumers and help keep the costs low as well.

In terms of customers that use over 250,000 kilowatts, I mean, again, with the big picture, the big film here that we're talking about, actually, the design of this program is to move into a greener, more stable electricity environment for these customers as well.

Mrs. Littlewood: That's going to be a blockbuster.

Mr. Coolahan: It's going to be a blockbuster, Madam Chair. A blockbuster.

Anyhow, with that said, I'm going to say thank you for the amendment, but I will not be supporting it at this time. Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose.

Mr. Hinkley: Thank you, Madam Chair. I as well will not be supporting this particular amendment because part of it is asking that we provide an impact study showing what the cap's impact will be on Albertans. I would like to see their impact study showing that the cap is indeed wrong. Since they do not have an impact study showing it's wrong, it's just pure speculation. Therefore, I will not be supporting it.

What we can be sure of is that it will protect Alberta families, it will protect farms, and it will protect businesses because they will know exactly what their rate will be, 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour, so they will have certainty and stability. That's the impact, that they will know for sure for the next four years, and that is the impact that they are looking for. That protection is exactly what this government is offering to families, small businesses, and farms.

Again, I will not be supporting that amendment. Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Chair, and good evening, everyone. As always, I'm happy to stand to speak to this bill and bills on energy. To speak to a couple of the comments from the government side here, I just wanted to make sure I understood this correctly, that the economic assessment is not necessary because we don't have an economic assessment to show that it wouldn't work. I just wanted to make sure that I was clear about that. I'm going to give lots of opportunity to actually speak about that in just a minute. Just to be clear, when we're talking about protecting people, that's one thing, but if you're killing the business and the job creators in this province, you are in no way protecting people. Just to be clear.

Let's talk about the RRO for a minute. I just wanted to throw out some numbers here. The current rate, just to be clear, is right now, I think, 3.5 to 3.8 cents per kilowatt hour. I just don't understand how that cap of 6.8 cents is in any way possibly protecting Albertans right now, especially when we're talking about small business. In fact, at 250,000 kilowatt hours we're actually disincentivizing business. We're actually disincentivizing. As far as I can tell, the current rate of the RRO is actually beneficial to consumers right now. Any Albertan could have ended their long-term contracts and levelled out their price of electricity from any of the many, many independent companies that we have here, just to be clear. I just wanted to make sure. I mean, if we're looking at independent retailers or Enmax, you can sit down and sign a contract that would eliminate price volatility. We have several different versions to actually eliminate volatility. It's actually choice, which is huge for Albertans. Just in case you haven't had a chance to talk to people in your constituencies, that's a big deal for people.

I also wanted to say that an RRO is actually a temporary window design. It's smoke and mirrors to stop them from showing what the market is actually going to be doing. Let me tell you that in four years, when that cap is gone, whammo. There you go. The truth will be clear as day, and all of a sudden what we're going to be seeing is a doubling of that cost. So I'm not quite sure how it is that you intend to protect people with this, especially if you're killing job creators.

If the Department of Energy believes that a significant increase in electricity is going to happen within the next four years, which, it's my understanding, is the reason for this cap, if I understand correctly, it is because the government saw that there would be a large increase over the next four years, during the duration of this bill. That is why we need an economic assessment, because that is actually for the job creators that don't qualify. So is the next step, then, to cap industry? Yikes. I really hope that that's not next on the list because that's certainly not what we're asking for.

In fact, not having a cap is allowing the market to send signals to investors, and those signals actually tell those investors when it's a good time to invest and when it's not. It's actually imperative to the market, and it's actually part of the advantage that we had here in this province. Understand that those market changes are warning signs. When you are looking at the disincentive, those are warning signs to an industry. You are removing signals that help point industry towards investment.

To talk about the amendment for a moment, the reason why we're asking for one month on the day – we're asking for a projection. That's actually a very reasonable request because the government would not have come up with a random number on a cap if they hadn't already projected what that outcome was going to be for the people of Alberta, Madam Chair. It's actually a very reasonable request. In fact, I would have assumed that in order to come up with the idea of a cap or any aspect that is going to change the industry, that is ultimately going to change the way job creators can come in, that is going to limit them to a 250,000 kilowatt hours capacity, you would have already as a government had the capacity explained to anybody who is going to be involved, anybody who is going to be impacted, about what that imposition is going to mean.

I don't really think we're asking for anything that's unusual. Any business plan would require some understanding of the projection of an economic impact analysis. What I find really interesting is that this isn't the first, second, third, fourth, or fifth time that we have asked for an economic impact analysis. In fact, I would have to say that with any bills that regularly impact money, business, any aspect that impacts Albertans in their pocketbook, we have asked. I have to point to the hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner. He has consistently asked over and over again for an economic impact analysis pretty much on every bill. The reason for that is because we owe it to Albertans. We're using their money. It's not your money. It is not the government's money. You are not bankrolling this. This is Albertans' hard-earned cash. They need to understand from you, the government, what it is that you're doing with their dollars.

You keep saying that you're going to use the carbon tax, this very overpromised carbon tax, to somehow compensate for the decisions that you're making. I'm a small-business owner. I own three businesses, in fact. And I'm not alone. There are a lot of people on this side. I can honestly tell you as a person who's in business that if I put forward a business plan like this and went to the bank, went to ask for money, they would laugh at me. You have to have some sort of understanding of the imposition of the change that you're making on the businesses that are the fabric of this province. Small business, agriculture, and oil and gas are the fabric of this province. They're what built this province. Please don't forget that when you're making these decisions. Every decision, every policy that has led to this moment right here is an absolutely horrible domino effect of impact to an industry that provides for the entire country.

Let's talk about Ontario for just a moment. We're looking at potentially a mass exodus of businesses from here. [interjection] And from there, too, actually. You're correct, yeah, from there and from here.

I just wanted to bring up something that was posted about the Liberals, and I'll table this, Madam Chair. This is from an article by Allison Jones of the Canadian Press on financial accountability. In here it says:

The Liberals have said after the initial cut to bills this year, rate increases will be held to inflation for the next four years . . .

Sounds very similar to what's going on here.

. . . and in 10 years ratepayers will have to start paying back debt that will be accumulated in order to finance lower rates for the next decade.

Do you know what that means, Madam Chair? That means that from 2017 to 2027 electricity costs will be lower than they would have otherwise been, saving . . .

Initially it sounds good.

. . . $33 billion, but after that, electricity costs will be higher than under the status quo, with ratepayers spending $9 billion more through to 2045.

So you spend $45 billion to save the ratepayer, taxpayer, consumer – they're all the same person – $24 billion. I don't understand it. We are on the same path here. Within four years to pay back all of the decisions that are going to be made: $10 million a month is what's going to happen. If we look at that, I mean, this is a possibility with this legislation because the problem is that at 6.8 cents somebody has to pay the difference. Somebody has to pay that difference. Who's going to do that? That's all going to come from the carbon tax? I don't think so. It will not come from the carbon tax.

Then the cost of paying back that debt with interest – this is in Ontario again – which the government has said will be up to $28 billion, will go back onto ratepayers' bills for the next 20 years as a clean-energy adjustment. I'm just curious if that's going to be one of the bills up in the next session here. Just keep that in mind, guys, a clean-energy adjustment. That's what we might be looking at here in the future.

The rates are going to double, and I just can't understand how that's competitive. Let's use the greatest claim to fame of this government as an example. I mean, we've got the credit downgrade – right? – from a double-A to an A-plus rating. That is because this government actively attacks its citizens and its industry and its job creators, and they do not table economic plans. The downgrade happened because there was no economic plan tabled. That's why we were downgraded. The government isn't going to raise taxes except for the ones that it decided to raise: personal taxes, business taxes, beer taxes, carbon taxes. It's a lot of taxes for a government that said that they weren't going to raise taxes, isn't it? Then the overpromised slush fund is going to supposedly and magically pay for all of this increase, right? The government needs to go back in time and undo policies that have led us here. There are some simple, simple facts here. Right now, Madam Chair, the government is in serious damage control. The rates are going to double, and then we'll all have to pay that rate.

The RRO doesn't even apply to the industry. Does this government not understand that oversupply in the energy industry actually benefits industry? Yes, we are intense users of energy because we produce energy that is used by every single Canadian, used all over the world, in fact.

We are in direct competition with our neighbours, and our industry is being welcomed with open arms in Houston. I talked to five men, actually, just a few days ago, all of whom have transferred their industry to Houston. All of them. They're actually travelling every other week. They're 10 days out, two days back, 10 days out. It's absolutely amazing the amount of work that they're actually getting in the United States. It's not just them. These are oil and gas guys. I'm not talking about the geophysicists, the geotechnicians, any of the geologists, all of these people that are underutilized right now, some of the best minds in the industry. We are chasing them away.

Our grid is used by the industry. I don't know if you have any idea, Madam Chair, how unique it is that we're actually able to supply all of the energy necessary in order to do such energy-intensive work in this province. It's very unusual. That creates jobs. In fact, the industry learns to be – I think this is in response, actually, to the member across the way talking about learning about efficiencies. That's actually how it happens, right? The industry learns to be more efficient because they want to help the environment. They want to do better. They care about the earth, air, and water, all of them do, so they want to be more efficient. It's actually good for business because if they save money with their energy – in fact, so many of them are able to create their own energy onsite. It's absolutely incredible the number of changes that have happened in the industry in order for them to be able to support themselves, to be able to move forward, to find ways to cut down on all sorts of NOx and SOx going into the air. Incredible. In fact, if the government actually supported industry, the possibilities of actually increasing the ability to reduce harmful toxins going into our air would be massively increased.

Jobs in Alberta are power intensive. Just to talk about out east again, 7 million light vehicles and over 70,000 medium trucks can be used in Ontario, 33 million vehicles in all of Canada. I would sure like it to be that we are the ones who are supplying energy to these folks. We do it better than anywhere else in the world. On one hand, the government says that they love pipelines and that they're supporting the industry, yet everywhere else we see caps, we see restrictions, and we see stops in everything that's important to the energy industry. Consistently we're seeing these job creators, especially the small-industry people that have actually created a lot of the big changes in terms of efficiencies – because they're smaller, they have to save money. We're attacking these people. We're attacking these industries. Thirty-three million vehicles, cars and trucks, on the roads in all of Canada: I'm sure that all of us would like to be the ones that get to participate in providing them energy, and we are energy intensive.

If you want to talk about how that's working, we can talk about carbon leakage again. We talked about this a great deal in Bill 25 and the cap on the oil sands. If we're talking about carbon leakage, the biggest piece of that is that every single time we put a cap on industry here, Madam Chair, somebody else is going to do it. It's not going to stop.

Wouldn't you rather have the rules and regulations here in our province, the way that we do things, and do more here and have control over how we produce in this province? We are the best. We are the greenest. We are the cleanest. We are third in Canada – actually, third in the world for renewables in terms of renewables online for the size of country that we have. We have so much to be proud of. Yet this government keeps capping and putting behind smoke and mirrors that somehow that's going to help out the people of this province. There's a huge differential in there that is going to be paid. It doesn't make any sense.

I wanted to also bring this up, that the second piece of the impact study says that "the Minister shall lay a copy of the projection prepared under subsection (1) as soon as practicable before the Assembly if it is then sitting or, if it is not sitting, within 15 days." I don't understand why there's a problem in laying out a plan of what this is going to look like. If you are correct about this, if you truly feel that this cap on industry is the way to go for the RRO, wouldn't you like to be able to show how your numbers are working? Show us the metrics, that this is actually going to work.

It's not possible because right now people are paying less for energy. You're going to be actually charging more. Right now there is a competitive market. Right now we are competitive with everywhere else, and it's a jurisdiction that people would like to invest in. But you removed the markers, you removed the signals, and you removed accountability from the electricity. That happened in Bill 34, where you removed accountability from electricity by removing the ability for anybody to see how renewables were being brought online. It is a blank cheque to the industry, without any accountability to Albertans about how renewables will be brought online.

Guess what? That's going to be hidden in that 6.8 cents. That's where it's hidden. Honestly, if you were able to make it viable and economical, you don't think people would choose these things? Let them choose. Give them the opportunity. Let's make it economically viable. Let's let these companies come in and have the market decide. Let's get a competition going for solar panels and competition for wind and competition for all of the construction industry that would be involved in building the massive concrete windmills that are located in southern Alberta. Let's get that going. I mean, I thought they were already doing that. Am I wrong? It seems to me there were an awful lot of windmills before the NDP was in government, right?

I certainly did not need government to tell me to put solar panels on my house. I love my solar panels, but I'll also tell you that in 25 years I'm going to have 40 solar panels, that are as wide and as tall as the length of me, that I'm going to have to replace or recycle or put somewhere. I don't know where those are going to go, not to mention that it's like a hundred thousand dollars of infrastructure that had to be built in order to support those. There are a lot of things that are involved here that would require and, I think, demand the ability to make sure that there's accountability from the government for what this cap is actually trying to accomplish.

I mean, I've got so many notes here that I don't even know where to go. Like, let's look at how we got to this point. The reason we're asking for accountability is because the puzzle pieces that are lining up to show what this government is trying to do with respect to our energy industry are scary. I mean, we began with the order in council just after you came to power, and then without any guidance from experts and no consultation with industry we all of a sudden have the carbon tax under the specified emitters. It went from $15 and then rose to $20 and then $30, and the percentage of emissions applied rose from 12 per cent of emissions to 15 per cent of emissions and now to 20 per cent. Basically, you're taxing our generators 70 per cent in one year. I'm sorry. How is that good for Albertans? How is that making life better for Albertans? I really don't understand that. I would love for somebody to explain that to me.

In hindsight, that initial increase under the SGERs, that was going to bring revenue for this government, was only a couple of hundred million dollars. Like, it doesn't make any sense. And now the PPA debacle is going to cost Albertans 4 billion plus dollars. Four billion plus dollars. How is it that the government is going to justify that? Oh, right. The green slush fund. I forgot. That's that oversell on the slush fund, that's actually going to pay for all of the difficulties that one single act created. Four billion dollars. So your return-on-investment calculation doesn't really add up.

Then if we look at the power purchase agreements, again, it triggered a mass cancellation – a mass cancellation – of purchase arrangements and flooded the Balancing Pool. Honestly, that was the one thing that kept everybody accountable. You buy in at the lowest value. That is the best thing for Albertans. You purchase at the lowest purchase price possible. That is why we have such good prices for electricity right now, because it's a competitive market, and the competition starts every single day, and you buy in. On top of that, we have a baseline of power that keeps our lights on at all times and, on top of that, makes us able to run industries that are energy intensive off our own grid. That is spectacular. It's spectacular that we can do that. I wish the government could see how spectacular that is.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other speakers to amendment A1? Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Chair. We're here tonight talking about an economic impact assessment. We're sitting here, and presently the rate is about 3.8 cents a kilowatt hour. The government is proposing to put a cap at 6.8 cents a kilowatt hour, which is almost double. Now, I would presume it only makes sense that if you want to put a cap that's almost double the existing rate, you must be expecting the rate to go up more than double or else you wouldn't be interested in putting a cap on that. The suggestion of an economic impact assessment, I would suggest, only makes sense.

Now, we did hear from the Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose, who suggested that because we would like an economic impact assessment, we should do it in order to prove that we need an economic impact assessment. I think that's how I understood that. The silliness continues. It's bizarre.

But I would have to suggest, Madam Chair, that the government came up with a number, 6.8 cents. Now, where did that number come from? That's not a random number, I would guess. I mean, I guess there are two choices. Either it's a random number that somebody just picked out of the air – that's scary – or maybe, what's scarier, they actually worked this all out somehow and won't provide that information to Albertans. I don't know which is worse, actually. They're probably equally scary, to think that either the number was picked out of the air or that they'd done some work and some calculations to figure it out and won't show it to anybody. Honestly, I don't know which is worse. There has to be some sort of way to get these numbers, I'm guessing. I don't know. Maybe they've got a little wheel with numbers, and they spin it around, and whatever it ends up at, that's what it's going to be. I don't know.

Madam Chair, we're sitting here at a time when this government has just had its fifth credit downgrade, something that this side of the House warned them about every single time. Every single budget we warned them, they laughed it off, and now they're laughing off an economic impact assessment, an assessment that would show Albertans what the effects of this could be. I don't understand. I think Albertans deserve to understand the economic impact of this policy. If they're not worried about electricity rates doubling in the next four years, then why not do the economic impact study? Why not?

When you put a cap at almost double the present rate, then obviously there's some sort of expectation it's going to get there and beyond, because a cap is no good unless it goes beyond. That's the only time the cap will actually be implemented, if the price goes beyond that cap. That's the only time it'll actually make a difference.

Now, why would the electricity go up that high? I would suggest that it would probably have to do with all the other bills that this government has passed dealing with electricity. Again, we warned them about the effects they were going to cause. This government needs to turn back the clock. They need to stop this ideological transition to renewables, this thought process that they can manipulate the market, that they can influence the market with taxpayer money and not get bad results.

Again, we seem to be in this House all the time debating bills that are damage control for the previous bills that they've passed. Over and over again we're in here doing this, and had they listened the first time, with the carbon tax, for instance, then we wouldn't be in this situation. Their early phase-out of coal and the billions of dollars that cost, the PPA issues and the billions that cost: that's all taxpayer money.

Now, when Albertans lose their jobs due to bad government policy, it doesn't matter what their electricity rates are; they can't pay their bills. All these different things that this government is doing to drive investment out of this province cost jobs, and that hurts Albertans. If we look at Ontario, it's already seen industry leave because of its bad policies, policies that this government just seems to want to follow. I guess this government just can't see past this narrow, ideological trail that they're on. They can't seem to see beyond that in any way to see what could happen when they do this. Every time we show you: what could go wrong with a carbon tax? Lots of things could go wrong. They are going wrong.

The worst part is that the larger industrial consumers are not going to be protected by this, and we don't need this. That's the problem. We don't need this cap if this government would quit messing with every other part of the system. That's the problem. They're trying to protect themselves. What they're trying to do here is that they're trying to hide the true cost of electricity because if the cap is reached and the cap is implemented, then we know that the cost of electricity is actually, realistically, beyond that. We know that either the companies are going to have to declare bankruptcy because they can't make money or the government is going to have to shovel taxpayer money to them. Those are the only two ways it can work. This solves nothing. In fact, what it is is a way to hide their bad policies.

Now, when industry is trying to decide where they want to set up or if they want to expand their existing business, electricity is a factor. It's a big factor for some industries. They look at Alberta and say: "Okay; look at this. They've messed around with the electricity market here. They've messed it around there. Now they're putting a cap at double the price." What is that company going to think? They're going to think: "Wow. Obviously, the price of electricity is going to double. Can we afford to do business in an area like that, in a jurisdiction like that? Probably not." They'll go somewhere else. That's the problem, Madam Chair. As this government goes through and passes these bills one by one by one, they have a cumulative effect on industry, on business, on the job creators. They have to decide: am I going to set up business here or not?

Some are forced to because the only place they can do business is in Alberta because that's where their leases are or whatever. But other companies have a choice. They can take their capital. They can go anywhere and invest it, but they want a decent return on it. By looking at this government's policies and the bills that they've passed and the instability that they've created in the environment, they're going to have to make a decision: do we set up business here or not? And they're not, Madam Chair. We're losing billions of dollars of investment because of this government's policies. That's the truth. Again, this is a warning sign to our industry that prices in Alberta will accelerate rapidly, and that will push them to decide on other jurisdictions to do business in.

Madam Chair, it only makes sense to do an economic impact assessment. I don't know how many amendments we've brought forward to this Legislature asking for an economic impact assessment, and this government has done none. None. Not one have they passed. Not one have they passed. So it's either one of two things. They're either scared of the results, or they already know the results and don't want to make them public. An economic impact assessment: any $40 billion to $50 billion a year business would do an economic impact assessment. This province spends $40 billion to $50 billion a year, and they don't want to do an economic impact assessment on something that could affect virtually every Albertan economically? It doesn't make sense. It just doesn't make sense.

We've seen what's happened in Ontario. They've gone down this road before. What did it get them? Billions and billions of dollars in boondoggles. Who's paying for those? Well, the people of Ontario are paying for their boondoggles. Who's going to be paying for ours here? Albertans, whether it's with higher electricity rates or higher taxes, debt, interest payments. Now, we heard earlier about Ontario spending $45 billion to save the ratepayers $24 billion on their electricity bills. That's the kind of road we're on here, Madam Chair, spending billions and billions of dollars with nothing to show for it. Nothing.

Again, I just don't understand what the problem would be with having an economic impact assessment. If this is so great, then it will stand up to an economic impact assessment. Why wouldn't it? The time frames on this amendment are plenty generous enough to make sure it can be done. Where's the fear? Why would somebody be scared of doing an economic impact assessment on something like this if it's so good? It should stand up to the scrutiny of an economic impact assessment. That should be straightforward.

Now, it seems like this government, when it comes to what fits into their ideology, the NDP world view, bulls ahead, with no economic impact assessments, no looking at any other options. They just bull straight ahead. If it doesn't fit into it: "Well, we'll send it to committee. We'll take a look at it here. We'll look at this. We'll look at that. We'll shuffle it around, kick it around a little bit, watch it die on the Order Paper, like property rights." Madam Chair, if there's nothing to be scared of here, do the economic impact assessment. Prove to Albertans that this is a great idea. It's really simple.

It's clear that they believe there's going to be a significant rise in electricity rates. That's clear. Why would they do it if they didn't think it was possible? It would be senseless to even bring it forward. Obviously, they believe that electricity rates are going to double. They believe they are. Why won't they do an economic impact assessment? Or maybe just show us what you've already done. There must be something that produced the 6.8 cents. There are probably some notes around somewhere on that. Why not show it to Albertans? What's there to hide? If this is going to work out great for Albertans, show us. If not, do an economic impact assessment. Prove it that way. It's very simple.

Madam Chair, I'll leave it at that. I'm going to support this amendment. It makes sense. It's what Albertans expect when we're dealing with their money. That's what they expect, and they deserve that. It's all about accountability. Those are the people that we're responsible to when we sit here in this Legislature, the people of Alberta. That's who we're here representing. Those are the people that will be affected by this, the people of Alberta, so they deserve to have this opportunity to see what this is going to do.

It's not too much to ask. It's common sense. Any business that was going to do something like this would have done some sort of assessment. Whether the government did or not, we don't know. I would like to think that they did, but I would hate to think that they're hiding it from Albertans.

Mrs. Pitt: It sounds like they are.

Mr. Loewen: It sounds like they are, but I don't know.

Madam Chair, I'm going to support this amendment. We need to have economic impact assessments on things like this that are going to affect every single Albertan.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein on amendment A1.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Madam Chair. Just briefly, because, goodness knows, somebody should be, on just how we got to the 6.8 cents. I'm pretty sure it was in the briefing notes for the bill. I think I'm reading the same ones. Anyhow, the 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour price cap was taken as an average equal to the five-year, fixed-price competitive retail contracts when the price was announced to be capped in November 2016. We also understand that a lot of consumers felt the pinch when the price went above 6.8 cents.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Chair. Well, another day, another request from the opposition asking to see how exactly it is that we are going to see an impact on our economy with a decision based on ideology from the NDP. At this point here I've got a colleague from Calgary-Foothills who has brought forward a sensible amendment that says: "Well, you know what? Before we go down this path too far and before we shut down the businesses that this bill is going to be impacting, maybe we should consider doing an impact study."

What we're hearing is that there is a mass exodus out of Ontario right now based on the fact that their energy prices have gotten out of control for them. I know that we're sitting here again talking about out of control, so I'd like to talk about some of the specifics, about how we were sold a bill of goods by this government that, I would argue, is taking us down a very misleading road. What I've got here is an article by the Pembina Institute. This is a group that is normally very government friendly, NDP friendly. Very NDP friendly. If I brought something up from, say, the Fraser Institute, we would hear groans from the other side. But this one here is actually from the Pembina Institute.

I'm going to, for Hansard's sake, make sure that I read this into the record so that they are able to find this article for me. It's <https://www.pembina.org/reports/faq1-clp-effect-on-electricity-costs.pdf>. It is a long one, and I apologize for that. For those who are looking for the article by Google, the name of the article is The Impact of Alberta's Climate Leadership Plan on Electricity Costs. This is dated June 15, 2016, and it was done by Benjamin Thibault. He has an article that says that, clearly, this is the way to go. I'm going to walk through this because this was before we actually saw this bill being brought into place.

What we've got here is a question that it starts off with:

Will electricity bills triple as a result of the Climate Leadership Plan?

The answer to this was:

There is no analysis that backs up any such assertion. These claims have been made without any analytical support. The tripling assertion has been cited widely, including by several media outlets, with absolutely no reference to a particular study or other analysis.

Well, you know what? That is exactly what we've been asking for. We've been asking this NDP government for an analysis to bring forward what the impacts of this climate change bill are going to be. When we look at this amendment, that is asking for another impact study to make sure that we're not shutting down our largest businesses, well, again, it looks like the government isn't going to move in this direction. The government has already been saying: "You know what? This isn't going to impact anything."

Here is where we go:

Will the carbon levy increase electricity rates by 2-3 ¢/kWh?

The answer here is:

No. Erroneous claims like this have been made that much more expensive electricity will result from the carbon levy.

An Hon. Member: Tax.

Mr. Cyr: My colleague is correcting me with "tax." Unfortunately, I do need to read the article's quote here.

But they are based on misunderstandings of how the price of electricity is set and how the carbon levy is applied to power generators. In fact, the carbon levy could eventually lower electricity [prices].

What we're hearing from this report by Pembina is that not only is this going to not increase our electricity rates but potentially decrease – decrease – the energy rates.

Now, why is this important? Well, according to this article it shows that we are putting forward a cap that we shouldn't need. We're putting a cap on electricity that Albertans shouldn't need. Now, if you look at the graph that I referred to in my last speech, we actually hadn't seen a spike above 6.8 cents for the last two years. So we're already seeing that with this projection that he's got, he's saying that we should see stability because of this climate action plan. What we're looking at here is a government that says: we don't have faith in the plan that we're bringing forward; we're going to see an extensive increase in the price of electricity.

This article goes on, and it says, "How the market works to set the wholesale price." This is important. This is exactly what the Wildrose has been maintaining, that the market that we had was working, and it was working just fine. But what happens here is that when you change something like, say, adding a carbon tax and suddenly all of your generators are handing their PPAs in, then suddenly what ends up happening is that you create a market imbalance that you need to correct, and then you need to recorrect and then recorrect again and then recorrect again.

Had we done an impact study or a review of the initial decision to put a carbon tax on Albertans, we would have known that the PPAs would have been at risk. But now, because we're too far down that road, we're suing companies in Alberta. We're suing the very companies that have provided us with power for the last – what? – 18 years under this system. They can correct me if I'm wrong on that number of years.

Now to go back to this.

The wholesale [electricity] price is set by only one generation bid in any hour. The energy price that consumers pay depends on the type of retail contract or regulated rate they have chosen – but one way or another, these are ultimately determined as something of an average of the hourly prices or expected future prices, with retail markup.

Supply and demand sets the wholesale energy price.

This is the important part here, supply and demand.

Now, this climate action plan that the government is bringing forward is going to be taking off our coal plants, which make up more than 50 per cent of our energy being provided to Alberta right now. Again, we've got imbalance happening. So what happens is that we are needing to replace this energy very quickly, and the question is: how are we going to be able to bring this energy online by the time we take off this coal?

Now, we hear the government saying that they've got everything under control, but if that was the case, we wouldn't need a 6.8-cent cap put on this. That is the very important point here, the fact that if we were going towards your plan and we were taking this report that was written clearly to justify the government's move to bring in the carbon tax – how is it that it's clear that now we've lost faith in the direction that we're going and we're putting caps on? And then not only are we putting caps on; we're changing directions and putting it on the taxpayer. As my colleague the shadow minister for renewable energy continues to point out, the ratepayer is the same person as the taxpayer. This is important because what happens is that you might not be paying this in the utility bill for your home, but you are paying it in additional taxes the NDP bring forward.

Now, when we're looking at this, we're seeing that we have a government that is expecting big spikes in the cost of power. If they weren't expecting a big spike in this cost, they would never have excluded our biggest businesses. They are anticipating that the decisions that they've made are going to lead to spikes. This is tragic when you look at the fact that this was supposed to make all our lives better by actually bringing on this carbon tax. I still can't get from point A to point Z on that one, where taking money out of the economy and putting it into a green slush fund will eventually somehow make jobs, because, in the end, we're attacking our biggest businesses.

When we start looking at this, we need to be asking ourselves: what is the impact to our big businesses? My colleague from Calgary-Foothills has done a very good job of explaining that this needs to happen. We can wait until it's too late, but then what ends up happening is that we end up with businesses going out of Alberta, and by that time it's too late. I would argue that Ontario is already starting to see a lot of their big businesses saying: we just can't afford to be here anymore. Had they done an impact study, they would have been able to forecast the fact that this is a result of raising the cost and creating those spikes. This is, in the end, a decision and a policy direction that this government has made to go to renewables.

Now, let's talk about renewables here because it's important. When the sun doesn't shine, we don't get power. When the wind doesn't blow, we don't get power. What's important here is that we are going to have a lot of spikes. We're hearing that a lot of countries that went with a very large percentage of their energy production in renewable energy are now moving back to coal. How is it that we are moving away from coal? How is it that we're looking at moving away from the one thing that brings constant power?

For those that are wondering, I will say that when we look at the fact that we're seeing a cap here, we are already under the understanding that what we're looking for is more instability within the markets. You know what that leads to? The fact is that what we're going to see is a move towards more blackouts or brownouts, if you will, and this is distressing because what we need is consistent power. We need cheap power. We also need environmentally responsible power, which, I would argue, our clean coal can do. Our clean coal is cheap, it makes everybody's life better, and it brings business to Alberta. What it does is make sure that we have the jobs.

Going back to this economic impact study, I am going to say that if we did the study, we would probably see that coal is a necessity to be able to maintain the businesses that we've got in our area in Alberta. When we start looking at the fact that we're phasing out of this so quickly, without any justification of exactly how we got here – we have repeatedly asked for impact studies when it comes to our climate action plan. How is it that we haven't seen one yet?

This government has had two years – two years – to be able to bring forward an impact study that we can follow, but I don't believe that they want to release one. We do know that one was leaked. We ended up with it. It didn't have the answers they wanted, so they said: we changed our minds on how to do it; that one there is irrelevant. Well, now we're looking at it, and we're still seeing that the government is trying to fix the problems it's created.

Now, next I want to go to the Speech from the Throne. This is interesting. What we've got, I believe, is a government that really, genuinely wants to make jobs. I don't believe you're out to destroy jobs. I truly don't believe that. I think that the radical decisions you're making are doing that.

I believe that the Bill 1 that the minister of economic development put out was a clear indication – when I stood up in the House and told him, “This isn't going to work,” he should have listened. He could have listened. He had the opportunity to listen. You know what? Even though it had his job description there, in the end, consultations were important here, and if he had requested an impact study, it would have been a better solution. But, no. Again, what we end up with is a government that just chooses to say: we're going in that direction, and – guess what? – we'll fix it as we go along. Well, that's a very poor way of going.

Let's go to the throne speech. This is where I was saying that we were going to go. Creating and Supporting Jobs: this is the heading. It's on page 5.

Mr. Panda: How many jobs will be created in Bonnyville-Cold Lake?

Mr. Cyr: Well, thank you. I'll get to that.

What we've got here is that “Alberta's energy industry creates good jobs, and good jobs are the bedrock of a strong province.” I believe that everybody in this room would agree with that. I truly believe that. I think that some of the decisions you make end up setting us back, but in the end I believe that all of our goals are moving in that direction.

Since the beginning of its mandate, your government has zeroed in on the task of supporting Alberta's energy industry. Now, I think that this is a little misleading because when we end up with a government where we couldn't get them to answer whether or not they believed in pipelines – they would not answer the question. It was only after they were pressured into it that we actually saw them starting to answer these questions, and now they're bragging about not one but two pipelines. [interjections] Yes, two pipelines. Two pipelines that our opposition has been pressing for from the very beginning. That was our mandate. I will tell you that when it came to Wildrose, we were looking at, for sure, the economy, jobs, and – guess what? – pipelines. We've been consistent with our messaging: consistent, consistent, consistent. What we've heard from this government has been that profits are not good for Alberta. And that is always distressing.

To wrap up – I will get to some more of this later, and I know that depresses everybody – what we're looking at here is an impact study that we are hoping to move forward with. We are asking for a reasonable expectation. What impact is it to jobs? You've got it in your throne speech, so please do an impact study. Vote for this amendment.

Thank you.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 17

Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act

Mr. Hanson moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 17, Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 17, Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Debate adjourned on the amendment May 25]

Mr. Fildebrandt: This bill is an attack on the rights of workers, and that is why it must be sent to a committee. This bill is an attack on the rights of workers. In this piece of legislation the NDP are selling out workers to union bosses who are more focused on maintaining and increasing their own wealth and their own power than the interests of the workers that they claim to represent. This bill strips Alberta workers of the right to a secret ballot.

Canadian voters have had the right to a secret ballot since 1880. We have a secret ballot in our general elections because before this, without it, politicians and governments would regularly bribe, cajole, threaten, or even punish people who didn't toe the party line. The secret ballot is considered an uncompromisable pillar of democracy, something so basic that even most banana republics, pseudodemocracies, have at least the pretense of it. Taking away a worker's right to a secret ballot is taking away their democratic rights. Taking away the secret ballot is taking away a worker's right to a free and fair election without fear of bullying, intimidation, trickery, or manipulation.

Alberta has the lowest rate of unionization in the country while having the lowest threshold yet to trigger a union ratification vote. Alberta has a 40 per cent threshold for card check to start the unionization process. Yet even with this threshold, which is in some instances 25 per cent less than in other provinces for card check, unions are still not as common here. The reason for this: the secret ballot. An attack on the secret ballot is an attack on the rights of workers.

But, in a way, I want to thank the NDP for putting this topic on the agenda, for making Alberta workers think about the proper role of legislated union power in a free society. Workers have a right to act and organize collectively. They have a right to come together and bargain for their working conditions, for their benefits, and for their compensation. But every worker is also an individual, sovereign in his or her individual choices so long as they do not hurt anyone else, a free man or a free woman with a right to self-determination, independent of what anyone else tells them they need to do. If union leaders are representatives and not bosses, then they can only ever provide advice and leadership, never orders. The moment that a union representative can tell any worker what they can or cannot do, they are no longer the leader of a democratic and free organization of consenting individuals but the boss of a cartel.

Freedom of assembly means the right to form and join voluntary organizations without obstruction from the state, but equally freedom of assembly means the right to not join unions and organizations compelled by the power of the state. Workers have a right to form and join unions, but they also have a God-given right not to be members of a union. They have a God-given right to exercise their own liberty in deciding what organization they will or will not give their money to. Members of any organization, especially one whose membership is compelled by the power of the state, have a right to demand accountability from that organization. They have a right to hold their leaders' feet to the fire, and they have a right to know how their money is being spent.

This bill strips workers of those basic rights. This bill is written by and for undemocratic union bosses, with the acquiescence of the NDP. Theirs is a symbiotic relationship designed for one purpose: to use the power of the state to force workers, against their will, to pay dues into organizations that are hell bent on keeping this party in power.

Instead of a bill stripping workers of the right to a secret ballot to certify a union, we should instead legislate mandatory votes on recertification every four years. If workers are satisfied with the union representing them, then surely they will vote to recertify that union. But if they are dissatisfied with that union, they will have the right that voters have with their government every four years and throw them out.

Right now the overwhelming majority of Albertans are dissatisfied with their representatives in power. They have demanded that the conservative movement in Alberta unite itself, energize itself, and prepare itself to throw this government to the ash heap of history at the first opportunity. I believe that this will be their first and last four years in power. At that time Alberta workers will begin to see their rights restored.

Alberta workers deserve more than just a secret ballot to certify and decertify their union if they choose to do so. If they want a union, they should have the right to hold those unions accountable. That means opening the books to see how unions spend their dues. Unions funnelling dues to partisan propaganda arms of the NDP should be strictly prohibited. When the vast majority of workers pay their dues, they expect that their hard-earned dollars will go exclusively to the purpose of collective bargaining. They expect that every dollar that they pay in union dues will go to improving working conditions and compensation and not towards anti-Israel boycotts, socialist international congresses, Press Progress, Progress Alberta, or re-electing the NDP.

Now, any voluntary and democratic organization should also be responsible for collecting their own membership dues. When the Canadian Federation of Independent Business collects the dues of their small-business members, they have to sing for their supper. They have to go to their members every year and explain to them how they have spent their money wisely and why they should continue their voluntary membership in that organization. By contrast, this government wants to force workers to continue to pay mandatory dues, collected automatically off their paycheques, even if that union is engaged in an illegal strike. An illegal strike. Surely, if there was ever a circumstance under which a worker should be allowed to withhold their dues from a union, it would be when that union is breaking the laws of our country.

When the Wildrose Party seeks to renew our members every year, we have to go to them cap in hand and explain to them how we have spent their money and why they should continue to support us. We have to ask them for their voluntary and consensual contribution to the membership of our party. Could we for just one moment imagine a scenario where, after winning a slim majority in a constituency, the victorious party could use the power of government to compel everyone in that constituency to be a member of that party and collect money off their paycheque without the consent of each and every individual man and woman? Unions, like business organizations, like the world wildlife foundation, like Ducks Unlimited, like every other organization, should be required to collect the dues of their members themselves.

Alberta deserves a bill not for the rights of union bosses but for the rights of workers. Unions began in the 19th century because workers needed the right to band together to demand safe working conditions, to demand reasonable benefits, to demand time off like a five-day work week, and to demand fair and reasonable wages. My great-great-grandfather used to be the president of a coal miners' union in Scotland. I may not share his politics, but I share his belief in the right of workers to form and join a union. Those are workers' rights. The right of workers to join a union should never be misconstrued with the government-granted right of a union boss to force any individual worker to submit to his will.

The NDP have filibustered their own legislation for two weeks now because they were busy rushing to slap together this bill so that it could be forced down the throats of this Legislature in late-night sittings. We know that even if the legal text of this bill was not written in time, the substantive content of the bill was written years ago by the bosses at the Federation of Labour and the special-interest groups that permeate the NDP and this government.

Instead of getting what they want in return for helping to elect the NDP, they have awoken thousands of Alberta workers to the reality of the NDP, and very soon that reality is going to come crashing down on the NDP and the special-interest groups that they represent. In two years from now Alberta will be rid of the NDP, and we will begin to repeal their socialist programs piece by piece. Taxpayers will not have to pay the carbon tax anymore, farmers will not be subject to Bill 6 anymore, our children will not have to pay today's debts anymore, and workers will not be taken for granted and used as political pawns by this government anymore. We will repeal any attempt to destroy the secret ballot in Alberta and restore real workers' rights in Alberta, not union boss rights.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, before I recognize the next speaker to the bill, I've had a request to revert to Introduction of Guests.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Introduction of Guests

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South West.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you – and I believe he's still in the public gallery, but my position and stature make it hard to tell – a good friend of mine, Brendon Legault, who is the constituency manager for the Member of Parliament for Edmonton Centre and the former executive assistant of the Member for Calgary-Mountain View. He joins us here tonight to learn how a progressive government actually passes legislation to make life better for Albertans. If he'd please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 17

Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act

The Deputy Speaker: Back on Bill 17. Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. You know, after listening to that, jeez, I'm ready to submit you for the next Razzie award. That was quite a display. I think that for somebody that, you know, claims to know so much about unions, maybe we need to find you a union so you can learn how they operate.

Madam Speaker, it's very, very clear in the bill, assuming that folks actually read it, that the secret ballot is still there. It's not being taken away. You know, this rhetoric that we're hearing about how it's being denied and that we're taking democracy and trying to ship it off to the moon or something like that: I would suggest that maybe the member go back and take a little time to read the bill.

You know, in regard to this referral motion, Madam Speaker, let's be honest. We have not seen any significant updates to our labour legislation since 1988. I don't know about anybody else here, but 1988 was quite a while ago, just about 30 years ago. Not being from Calgary, I'm pretty sure that's when Calgary was hosting the Olympics. It was hosting the Olympics back in 1988, yet we have not been able to find the time in that time to update some of our legislation. As a result, we've very, very clearly fallen behind the rest of Canada because they're enjoying all of these great things that Bill 17 is going to be offering to them in terms of leaves and whatnot.

You know, let's be very clear here. I think the opposition really is not behind trying to make life better for Albertans, but certainly on this side of the House we are. It's our top priority to make sure that that happens, Madam Speaker. On this side of the House we want to make sure – when a mother needs to take time off because they have a sick child, the last thing they need to be worrying about is whether they're going to be keeping their job. That's something that I can relate to very, very personally because I've been in that position where I've had a sick child, but thankfully – maybe the member might have known this – there were rules in place that protected my job. Yet we're talking about repealing those kinds of things. If a worker happens to lose a family member, needs a day or two off to attend a funeral, we're going to repeal that kind of thing? That is absolutely shameful.

But that's not going to happen on this side of the House because on this side of the House we have Albertans' backs. We're going to make sure that their lives are better, and we're going to make sure that their rights are protected because that's what every other Canadian enjoys in this country. We're going to make sure that Albertans get the chance to finally enjoy those same benefits as well. We're talking about making modest changes here: fair, family workplaces. The other side is talking about getting rid of them and taking us back to – what was it? – the 1920s. Unbelievable.

So I will not be supporting this referral motion, Madam Speaker, and I would certainly urge all my other colleagues to not support this motion either.

With that, I would move to adjourn debate, Madam Speaker.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion to adjourn debate carried]

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Good morning.

It's a beautiful day in which we can just reflect and pray, each in our own way. As we enjoy this privilege to start yet another day in such a beautiful province, in such a wonderful country, let us remind each other of our responsibility to find a democratic solution to the issues that our province faces.

Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 17

Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act

Mr. Hanson moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 17, Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 17, Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment May 29: Mr. Nielsen]

The Speaker: Anyone wishing to speak to the referral amendment? Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to support my hon. colleague in this referral amendment. The government should separate the job leave components of Bill 17 for immediate passage and send the bulk of the bill to committee. We have a system of democracy in place, and this government continues to disregard the importance of that process in crafting workable legislation for the benefit of all Albertans. The result is that all too often things are gotten wrong and we have to come back here in a two-year period to get them right, wasting the time and energy of Albertans.

This government is rushing through major changes. A 124-page bill was introduced yesterday afternoon, and we're already expected to be educated on it and to debate it intelligently. Come on. This is far too quick. We are all hon. colleagues working on behalf of Albertans. The least we can do is to get this right the first time, and it takes a little longer than the short period they've given us.

A 36-day consultation is not enough. Send it to a legislative standing committee to examine and to call witnesses. Then we can be sure to get a fair and balanced consultation. Maybe the government intended for very little discussion to happen. That's what happens when you have 124 pages go through so quickly. I'll be anxious to see if the House leader invokes closure, or time allocation, on this.

This legislation from the NDP government is omnibus in nature and would be best served if split into two distinct components to allow for faster passage of compassionate care leaves. This government is being disingenuous by lumping together changes to both the Labour Relations Code and the Employment Standards Code into one big omnibus bill.

This bill is far reaching and has the potential to change the economic landscape of this province. Alberta has been a prosperous, peaceful province for decades. We've had labour peace for decades, and the government's move could have incalculable consequences, consequences that could lower wages. I have even seen things in this bill already about allowing a union onto private property. Private property, Mr. Speaker. Those are property rights that we're dealing with. I don't allow anyone into my house that I don't want. Why should a private business allow someone unwelcome onto their property? It is a show of government having an unhealthy view of private property rights despite whatever the Government House Leader says as he rises to defend property rights. By their deeds you shall know them. Now the NDP will force employers to allow office space for unions on business property and allow access to their private property. This is scary stuff. This is why this bill needs to be split and sent to committee.

Should the government decide to split the current omnibus legislation into two components, it would allow for quick passage of compassionate care while allowing the summer to be used to consult on Labour Relations Code changes and other changes to employment standards, as was done last year with the Municipal Government Act. We have a session in October. That is plenty of time to get the consultation right. People that need to be consulted include Merit and the Progressive Contractors Association. I'm sure they have plenty to say about allowing salting and MERFing into Alberta. I'm also sure the Christian Labour Association of Canada would have much to say about these practices.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, this is why I need to see this bill sent to committee. Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Are there any questions under 29(2)(a) to the hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner?

Are there any other members who would like to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today in full support of the referral motion. Now, that motion revolves around the government separating the job leave components of Bill 17 for immediate passage and sending the bulk of the bill to committee. If the NDP were true, if they were sincere in their often-expressed desire to work with all parties of the House, then it is only logical that they would separate this bill and, like I just said, send most of this bill to committee for real and extensive consultation with all interested parties, not just those that the government chose to consult with privately.

You know, before I move on, I just want to address that last statement on consultation. I'm not sure that the other side of the House is hearing what I hear when I run into people, but consulting with those that the government chooses rather than everyone in the province that may have an opinion or wish to make a submission on whatever the subject may be is not going unnoticed.

Anyway, it was a few short days ago that the Member for Calgary-North West was lamenting the lack of co-operation in this House. She commented how disappointed she was that an opposition member didn't give her a chance to sit down and discuss an amendment he had proposed. She was frustrated that there wasn't the opportunity for back and forth, and rightly so, on some of the good ideas of the amendment, and she didn't feel there was time to discuss the subamendment on her private member's bill.

Well, you know, folks, this side of the House knows only too well that feeling as the government side had every opportunity to do just that with Bill 204, the Protection of Property Rights Statutes Amendment Act, 2017. Instead, they chose to use their majority to outright kill that bill, not propose reasonable amendments or send it to committee for submissions from Albertans. They just plain and simple completely destroyed it instead with a majority.

On reflection, this is the perfect time for the government to put their words into action. Let's truly consult on this bill. Let's take the time to truly work together and have some back and forth here. Opposition members are sincere in updating employment standards for the province to protect those on compassionate leave and are more than prepared to work with the government to have those portions of the bill pass as quickly as possible. Splitting up this 124-page monstrosity would help us do just that.

Rushing through this giant omnibus bill is a great disservice to Albertans. How can we as legislators be expected to properly do our job when we have this enormous bill to go through and be expected to educate ourselves and those we are entrusted to represent in this House? How do we speak for them? Or does this government have such short memories concerning how their hubris got them in trouble with the farming and ranching communities? But they still believe they know best.

The government needs to stop pretending that it's a reasonable idea to lump the Employment Standards Code changes in with the Labour Relations Code changes. Government wasn't even that disingenuous to do that for the farm and safety round-tables. You knew that these two issues were so completely complex and far reaching that you realized it was best served to separate them into two different tables. I wonder why it is okay to do that for the round-tables and not for Bill 17. What is the government afraid of? Is it possible that the government rightly believes that the best case is for the government to jam through the more contentious aspects of this omnibus bill by hiding them under the reasonable aspects of the employment standards parts? That's just a notion, but I'm just going to talk about that notion for a moment.

Government set up two distinct tables under the enhanced safety for farm and ranch workers round-tables, obviously because they are two separate and distinct issues. Interestingly enough, in discussions with members of those tables as well as in review of the reports from the same, it came as no surprise and was easy and reasonable to see how those tables came about to almost complete consensus on the employment standards. There were good discussions back and forth and a respectful give-and-take. As a result, there was only one minor issue that wasn't agreed upon. I think it was light work for teenagers. The term "light work" has yet to be defined by regulation after consultation with the public as a matter of fact. Also, 16- and 17-year-olds cannot be employed in any hazardous activity without a permit. Hazardous activity is defined in future regulations after consultation with the public, something that's already been going on.

You know, it was a pretty good discussion if the final report came out with only those minor points that couldn't be agreed upon, obviously some give-and-take. As a result, it came as no surprise to me or anyone else, actually, that had seen Bill 17 that when the aspects of the farm and ranch employment standards portion of the bill were put forth, it was clear that they were being rolled out almost exactly as the recommendations from the round-table report.

Now, as far as the labour relations round-table discussions went, good discussions and respectful back and forth and give-and-take were not the case. As one member put it to me, quote: we strongly disagreed going into the discussions at the table, and we strongly disagreed coming out of those discussions. Unquote. I don't think it will surprise anyone here that the comment that I just quoted came from a rural resident, obviously, a farmer, actually, one of the few that was allowed on those farm and ranch safety round-tables, a farmer that over and above the busy life of just being a farmer is involved with many of the aspects of the ag coalition. But I digress.

I doubt it is much of a leap to figure out that the government knew there would be backlash, and that is why they brought forth Bill 17 as a giant omnibus bill rather than bringing it out as separate entities. Once again it bears repeating that the Wildrose would support those employment standards changes that make life better for everyone. Heck; we could move forward immediately, straight through to Royal Assent if there was the political will from the government. But it appears that the government is going to be taking the spoonful of honey with the bitter medicine approach here in trying to make a bitter labour-friendly bill more publicly palatable by including the feel-good employment standards changes that they knew opposition parties would all agree on.

This is an obvious ploy that the government publicity machine is churning out on the social media feeds of the NDP members, tweets of feigned outrage that the opposition is voting against domestic violence leave, compassionate leave, et cetera, et cetera. All that is just a red herring. For a year and a half we've heard this stuff. I scrape it off my boots every weekend when I go home to work with cattle.

You know, the government pulled this on Bill 6. They do their best to change the channel every single time they know they are in the wrong. Mr. Speaker, the stick from the government side of the House is getting tiring. If the government is truly sincere about this, then take the time to get this legislation right. After all, doing what is right for all Albertans is our responsibility. That is a phrase that the government side uses every time someone from the front bench stands up to speak. It would be best for all of us to use the summer to receive meaningful feedback on all the proposed changes and come back in the fall with recommendations to committee and also to suggest stakeholders who may wish to appear or submit. Rushing through such important legislation at the end of session under the guise of a 124-page bill is a ploy that Albertans will see right through. If the government continues to move forward in the direction it appears it's going to take, their credibility will fall faster than Alberta's credit rating from Standard & Poor's.

Everyone in this House has a responsibility to all Albertans to respect the process and the role of democracy and make sure that the government puts forth workable legislation that benefits us all. Separate this bill into usable pieces. Identify all of the best of the employment standards legislation that will protect the vulnerable and the marginalized, get these solid pieces passed quickly, and take the time to properly consult with Albertans on the rest. It's imperative that we work together and send the unwieldy parts to committee, where it can get its proper due diligence, not a rushed, 30-day cursory consultation with private, hand-picked groups. We need to throw light on the process. Make it public, make it engaged, and make it fair for all people.

Once again, the members of the Official Opposition are willing to provide unanimous consent for all three stages of reading for the components of the bill that relate to protecting workers from being fired for taking a sick day, protecting workers from being fired for caring for a baby, protecting workers from being fired for attending a citizenship ceremony, for looking after a sick relative, or for taking time off as a victim of domestic violence. I'm sure that the other members in opposition would agree. The fact is that there are good, solid pieces of legislation here, but the government needs to show Albertans they are serious about working for all of them. They need to show that they aren't just about ideology and protecting their labour friends, because, folks, that's what it looks like.

Mr. Speaker, there's no need for the haste in which this bill is being pushed through. There is no public emergency like with our current fentanyl crisis. It's simply the government being lazy in their approach and lazy in their preparation. We've already acknowledged the good that many aspects of this bill can achieve, but it's the education of it that is suspect.

We've seen weeks of the NDP backbench tossing up speeches on their own legislation in order to string out the session. It speaks volumes about the preparedness of the government. If the session needed to be extended because you thought you had so much important work to do, then why did we not start session a month earlier? Remember how you wanted to make the Legislature more family friendly? I'm sure running night sittings is the exact opposite of family friendly, Mr. Speaker.

It's time to show this province what kind of government you want to be known for, a reasonable one that can work with opposition or the type of government that bullies its legislation through simply because it can, the same type that several members of the government used to decry when they sat on opposition benches.

There is no way – no way – that you can sell the urgency of the labour aspect of this bill. Even the most uninformed Albertan knows that anything as hefty as a labour bill such as the one before us now cannot have received proper consultation in a mere 36 days. If anything, you will gain support by taking the time to send this bill to committee and using the summer to consult with all affected parties, not just those chosen and hand-picked. Do the right thing, separate this bill, and let's pass the good pieces quickly and start consultation on the labour process.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Under 29(2)(a) are there any questions for the Member for Little Bow?

Seeing and hearing none, speaking to the amendment, the Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's interesting. I enjoyed your comments at the opening of our morning session, talking about using democracy to achieve an end here. That's what I'm hoping we're going to do here today. It's a fine day in Alberta, and democracy is well achieved on days like this, sir. I appreciate that.

Some of the early commentary and the banter in the Chamber reminded me of early days in my farming background when I was asked to go out and gather the eggs and I heard a lot of cackling and chortling in the farmyard. It was interesting to watch the chickens scratching around in the dirt, and then you'd hear the cackling and chortling. And as members came to the Chamber, there seemed to be a lot of that going on in here, but now everybody has settled down and seems to be occupied with some form of reading and modern material.

I'm going to continue on with my opinion in support of this amendment. An option could be to refer it to a standing committee. That, too, Mr. Speaker, is some of the important work that we do here. To reiterate, this bill does have important aspects that, I believe, all members should be able to agree on. For example, parental leave extension, compassionate leave, and time for citizenship ceremonies are easy to get behind. Coming from a rural background – and many people know of this era – we take our days of compassion and respect for death and/or other humanistic functions at our own choice. In many ways they don't have to be legislated. They are done out of complete and absolute respect for the people that have earned that relationship with those who attend either at a wedding or a church service or a funeral service to exhibit their personal and open respect. They don't need legislation to force them there.

I'm going to be reiterating in some cases what my opposition colleagues have said over and over again, that we sincerely have no issue with updating these employment standards components of the bill. We are here willing to work with the government to get these passed as quickly as possible. What we won't do is allow the government to use these compassionate changes to bulldoze through labour changes without proper consultation. That's a good part, Mr. Speaker, of the frustration coming from the opposition side of the Chamber through all this. This legislation from the government is, for all purposes, a bulky 124-page bill and would be best served if split into two distinct components to allow for quick passage of the compassionate care components.

It is no secret that this government has an atrocious record when it comes to proper consultation on legislation. They failed miserably on Bill 6, to the point of mass protests outside this Chamber, historical sized protests. Over 1,800 people were hoping to have their representation heard outside the Chamber.

They failed on consulting on the carbon tax, opting for a weighted, highly biased, and leading questionnaire instead of public consultation. They're failing to do a proper public consultation with the education curriculum, and they're once again failing to adequately consult on this labour legislation.

Webster's defines consultation as "the act of consulting or conferring," a meeting for deliberation, discussion, or decision. Public consultation is defined as a process by which the public's input on matters affecting them is sought. That can be done in many different ways, whether it be by referendum or broad white paper consultations, for example.

Mr. Speaker, inviting select groups who are primarily favourable to this government's world view isn't exactly the definition of proper, fair, or equitable consultation. It doesn't take a Leap Manifesto of logic to predict that those types of consultations will come down heavily on the government's side. What needs to happen is to separate the components of this bill into employment standards and labour elements, much like the government recognized was needed on the farm safety round-tables. This precedent has already been established by the government. They recognized that the issues were too complex to simply lump together into one round-table.

In this case, the case of this legislation, 124 pages of eloquent reading: what has changed? This government has rushed through major changes introduced late last week, and we're already expected to be fully educated on it and debate it in a robust, educated way. Could it be that the government intended for little discussion to happen and simply wanted to move it on through or jam it on through? Why can't we ensure that this is done properly? Why not take this summer to consult with Albertans and amend it if necessary? We can fast-track the important employment aspects without opposition. Why the artificially set urgency in this legislation? Some would even say that there is contempt to including the public in the consultation process. That does not lead, Mr. Speaker, to the democracy you talked about in the opening of this morning's session.

Alberta's current union certification system has resulted in 30-plus years of stable labour peace and the highest wages in the nation. How would taking the summer to gather more public and business opinions hurt that process? What harm would sending it off to a standing committee that's dominated by government backbenchers possibly have in the passing of the legislation? Is there a question of solidarity in the government ranks?

We need to take the time to do this right, and that means more than barely a month of consultation and a week of debate or less.

Ontario has taken years of consultation for their labour rewrite. Why not take a minimum of five or six months for Alberta's legislation?

Mr. Speaker, there are several troubling aspects of these labour changes that I can highlight here. Let's use this example. The restriction requiring employees in the construction industry to have worked for an employer for 30 days in order to participate in a union certification vote would be removed. In addition, employees would not have up to 90 days to reconsider their decision. So you can literally have people join your workforce today with the full intention of unionizing the workplace. They get hired to work a job and get to work on unionizing the workforce immediately before even knowing anything about the actual job participation or anything about you or your co-workers or anyone involved in the workplace. This is known as salting, by the way, and it's a tactic that unions commonly use. Bill 17 removes the protection that the Labour Relations Amendment Act of 2008 provided against such a tactic. I note, in particular, a hyperbole from the other side claiming no changes to the labour act for decades. Perhaps they meant no changes favourable to big labour.

Another problematic notion is the fact that under the current provisions of the code it suspends the collection and remittance of union dues during an illegal strike, which would be removed under Bill 17. If the strike is illegal, why should the union be entitled to have the employer continue to collect and send those union dues in?

Lastly, this new legislation gives the Labour Relations Board new powers, including the ability to "decide how and whether to publish any of its decisions." Only under the NDP world view would anyone think that this constitutes an open and transparent process. It's just not clear what the impact would be to Alberta businesses should these labour provisions be rushed through. Again, you need to broadly consult with Alberta's businesses.

Mr. Speaker, these are but a few examples of some of the more contentious issues that need to be addressed. That's why it is so important that we take the time to get this right, and that means more than 30-odd days of consultation and a brief week of debate.

Should the government decide to split the current 124-page chunk of legislation into two components, it would allow quicker passage of compassionate care while allowing for the summer to be used to consult on Labour Relations Code changes and other changes to employment standards. This was successfully done last year with the Municipal Government Act, so why couldn't the same be done with this legislation?

This bill has far-reaching, possibly unintended consequences and has the potential to change the economic landscape of this province. Again I reiterate that it can possibly create a myriad of unintended consequences. Why not take the time to ensure that we get it right? I simply don't see the harm in doing that despite the purely hysterical attempt by the government to paint the opposition as villains. I quite enjoy the charades that that creates, and I'm enjoying hearing some of the comments from, again, across the aisle.

I'd like to reiterate what the Leader of the Opposition said from day one. We are more than willing to provide unanimous consent for all three stages of reading for the components of the bill that relate to protecting workers from being fired for taking sick days, looking after a sick relative, attending a citizenship ceremony, for example, or taking time off as a victim of domestic violence. These are all examples, Mr. Speaker, and in my upbringing and history or background we didn't need legislation to do that. They were done out of earned compassion and respect for the citizenry that we lived and worked with every day. We could get those most important aspects done within a very few days. We just need this government to show a willingness to get this done in an amicable fashion. This can be done.

Again, Mr. Speaker, let's work together. Let's split this bill up and pass the solid pieces that we can agree on and potentially move the rest to committee. Let's take the summer to consult with all the groups affected by this proposed legislation and get them in front of a committee to publicly share their thoughts, take a broad reading on the perceptions and the perspectives of a greater portion of Albertans. It boggles the mind that this government would be content to have its legacy defined by their inability to get a simple thing like a public consultation done correctly.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I'd ask and plead: do the right thing, government, for the right reasons. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. member for Rocky Mountain House-Sundre. Under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Nixon: Of course, Mr. Speaker, and of course I don't want you to forget about the great community of Rimbey. I can't forget about the good people of Rimbey.

Under 29(2)(a) to the member for Strathmore-Drumheller. No. That'll be soon, from what I understand. But for Drumheller-Stettler I do have a question.

The Speaker: I need to remember Rimbey, and then you can remember Stettler.

Mr. Nixon: I'll try, Mr. Speaker, for sure. We might be able to practise together later on.

Anyway, I would like to ask a question to the hon. member under 29(2)(a). I was very interested in hearing his remarks, particularly around the need for consultation and how some of the actions of this government, not yours, of course, Mr. Speaker, but how this government's behaviour in their time in power has impacted his constituents and their inability to consult, to talk to the people that they're attempting to govern, and how they're often changing the way that they've done things for long periods of time. He referred to lots of good issues, including Bill 6. I know, Mr. Speaker, you saw that debacle first-hand, and I know that you, without a doubt, were disappointed in that, as I was.

One of the areas I like to talk about is the democracy portion of this. It is interesting that the only time this government seems to want to consult with the people that they're attempting to write legislation for is on things like time change bills or the hon. member's private member's bill that would stop taxpayer money from being used to advertise for the benefit of the governing party during by-elections or elections, something I think most Albertans would be behind right away. Those bills were sent off to committee, and we've never seen them again since. When it comes to a bill of this magnitude, the largest bill that I have seen in my elected life, this government wants to try to force it through this House in one week. One week. In one week they want to try to bring it through the House. I know they think it's funny that they want to do that to Albertans, but I certainly don't, Mr. Speaker. They want to bring it through in one week, but they'll go and consult on other stuff.

I mean, there was also another situation, of course, over the last year where this government, as you know, Mr. Speaker, spent all their time trying to get their campaign finances paid for instead of consulting Albertans on that, where this side of the House had to fight on behalf of Albertans to finally get that silly behaviour to stop. In regard to this government now, with this bill, trying to take away secret ballots, it's so appalling, just appalling behaviour.

Ms Jansen: Super PACs and you guys.

Mr. Nixon: I know the Member for Calgary-North West seems to be trying to defend that behaviour. It would very interesting for me to hear . . . [interjection] Oh, then the Minister for Education really wants to defend that behaviour, too. That doesn't surprise me as much as the Member for Calgary-North West.

Mr. Speaker, I would be interested in hearing the member's comments on how his constituents feel about this great attack on democracy by the current NDP government, which, in some ways, maybe we shouldn't be surprised at because they've been attacking democracy since they were elected, over and over and over, trying to stack the deck to their advantage. Maybe I would be interested in hearing what the Member for Drumheller-Stettler thinks of this continued behaviour by this government to attack democracy in the province of Alberta.

The Speaker: Hon. member, I'd just caution on using the words "attack democracy." It's a pretty sensitive issue.

Mr. Strankman: Well, thank you to the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre. It still is Drumheller-Stettler, the diverse constituency of which I'm proud to be the representative only. And, yes, I do take great umbrage at the democracy that Bill 6 did or did not represent for the constituency.

To that end, I'd like to relate a situation that occurred on the last day of passing that legislation. Some members may remember the emotion expressed by government members in the House that day. Some people may not know that during that debate, when there were some 1,800 people out in front of the Legislature here, I personally received a note from the Sergeant-at-Arms requesting my presence at the front door. There were great concerns that those gentlemen had that day at the front door regarding the security that would be exhibited by the demonstrators, who were right on the steps. They were right at the door. They were right up at the steps. The gentlemen down there asked me to go out and speak to those people while we were having our QP session here, Mr. Speaker. Not a lot of people know this, but I actually went down there and was asked by the security of this building to go and speak to the demonstrators down there. I said, "Why do you want some humble farmer from Drumheller-Stettler?" "Because," they said, "they know you, and they know what you're going to do."

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members? The Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat. We're speaking to the amendment.

Mr. Barnes: Yes, please. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise this morning to speak to the referral amendment on Bill 17, the Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act. This amendment seeks to ensure that all Albertans have an opportunity to provide input and advice to the government on this critical bill. This is what this amendment seeks to ensure.

This is a massive omnibus labour bill – a massive omnibus labour bill – that brings forward sweeping changes to both our Employment Standards Code and our Labour Relations Code. While many of the changes proposed in this bill on their own might be defensible, we need to stop and ask ourselves: what is the big picture? Although several of the changes that have been proposed in this ominous bill were more or less expected and not terribly controversial – in fact, some of them are supported by the Wildrose – this bill has dozens of small and large sections that chip away at employers, that chip away at employers while we are already facing tremendously challenging economic times. In fact, Mr. Speaker, we are sincere in wanting to update our employment standards in the province to protect those on compassionate leave, and we want to work with this government to have them pass it as quickly as possible.

But this NDP government needs to realize that more consultations and analysis are needed before making these sweeping changes, again, Mr. Speaker, especially because of these challenging economic times. Alberta's job creators have already taken so many blows from this NDP government's insistence on putting ideology over reason. The best protection for employees is a strong and stable economy. Sadly, this government continually puts ideology and imposing their NDP world view above keeping our economy strong.

Mr. Speaker, I want to talk about that strong and stable economy for a couple of seconds. I think back to my high school and university years, where for fellow students and fellow Medicine Hatters there wasn't a need to look for a job before the last day of school because the economy was so strong, jobs were everywhere and plentiful, pay was good. Employees had tremendous, tremendous options.

Up until three or four years ago, up until two years ago especially, that same type of labour market existed for employees, where lots of employers went above and beyond, knew that being fair, providing good options and good pay for their employees were ways to everyone's success: employers, employees, Albertans. I think John F. Kennedy said, "a rising tide lifts all boats." Well, when the tide used to rise in this province – Mr. Speaker, when the tide used to rise – many, many Albertans benefited, including our employees.

Sadly, Mr. Speaker, this government continually puts ideology and imposing the NDP world view above, before keeping our economy strong, and this government doesn't understand what it costs Alberta families, what it costs Albertans, what it costs Alberta communities. And I'm not talking about debt ratings plummeting; I'm talking about families not being able to afford the basics. Alberta's economy simply cannot afford to absorb it. This NDP government is sacrificing jobs, our jobs, purely to please their base.

I would implore this government to do the right thing, split this bill in two so that we can pass the compassionate leave portions of this bill as quickly as possible and send other components of the bill for further review to experts, to Albertans, to employees and employers, to those Albertans that spend most every day out there making our province, our communities, and our families strong. If they are sincere in taking the time to get this right, the NDP government will use the summer to receive meaningful feedback on all of the changes and the combined ramifications, including a closer look at their unintended consequences.

As has already been stated by some of my hon. colleagues, we will even provide unanimous consent for all three stages of reading for the components of the bill that relate to protecting workers. We will provide unanimous consent for protecting workers from being fired for taking a sick day or looking after a sick relative, caring for a baby, attending a citizenship ceremony, or taking time off as a victim of domestic violence, those changes in life where we all can support each other and will. Again, I'm just asking the NDP government to do the right thing and make this part go unanimously and quickly.

Mr. Speaker, the changes being proposed in this bill are not subtle and minor changes. They will have drastic intended and unintended consequences for our labour market. It's supply and demand. It will affect everyone both ways. They are not aspects that Albertans want to see rushed through. For example, the changes to the Labour Relations Code include card check certification – goodbye, secret ballot – salting and MERFing, farm and ranch workers, first contract arbitration, essential services, dependent contractors, the Rand formula, suspension of dues, reverse onus, secondary picketing, enhancement of powers of Labour Relations Board arbitrators, duty of fair representation, greater transparency, and international loopholes. Sadly, those are only the changes to the labour relations portion of this bill, an omnibus bill at its worst.

There are also substantial changes to the employment standards, with underage workers, leaves, overtime pay, holiday pay, farm and ranch – back to that Bill 6 nightmare – temporary layoff periods, persons with disabilities, termination, and administrative penalties taking away more control of Albertans' lives.

Changes to workplace-related legislation are important, and, Mr. Speaker, they will have a direct impact on businesses, employees, supply and demand of labour, and the province's overall economic future. Due to the large impacts workplace-related legislation has on the province as a whole, some other governments that have endeavoured to make significant changes to their workplace legislation have embarked on formal reviews and lengthy consultative processes. For example, in Ontario – even in Ontario – there was the changing workplaces review, which took place over a two-year span. It focused on reviewing their employment standards code and their labour relations code. Over this two-year span there were over 200 public presentations, over 500 written submissions, which resulted in 173 recommendations being put forward. My goodness, it's nice to see an Alberta NDP government learn something from a left Ontario government.

This is in stark contrast to this government's consultations, a mere 36 days of consultations and a week of debate in the Legislature: instead of two years, a week of debate and 36 days. Changes of this magnitude, that carry this much weight on the overall economic well-being of our province, deserve and need to have more consultation. Mr. Speaker, I'm sure there's a happy medium between the two-year process in Ontario and a five-week process that this government thinks is good enough.

Mr. Speaker, I must say that I've noticed an alarming trend, whether it's a carbon tax, changes to our electricity market that soon will have the taxpayers subsidizing the ratepayer at perhaps $10 million a week, tax hikes, or the minimum wage. This NDP government either refuses – refuses – to do an impact assessment, or they just completely ignore the evidence in favour of advancing the NDP world view and ideology.

Mr. Speaker, another alarming trend is their lack of consultation, something they campaigned on doing the opposite, but whether it's budget, farm safety, emissions caps, and the carbon tax – totally silent on the carbon tax – once again one could only assume that they either don't want to hear what Albertans have to say, or they don't care and once again push their NDP world view.

Mr. Speaker, we both know that Albertans deserve better. I would encourage all of my hon. colleagues to support this excellent referral amendment and allow the sweeping changes being proposed in this omnibus bill to have more thorough consultation with stakeholders and Albertans. We cannot go wrong if we allow Albertans a bigger voice. This would allow government to split apart the bill and bring forward a bill that would protect those on compassionate leave – a good thing – and let us pass this portion as quickly as possible.

As I said earlier, we will even provide unanimous consent for all three stages of reading for the components of the bill that relate to protecting workers from being fired after taking a sick day or looking after a sick relative, caring for a baby, attending a citizenship ceremony, or taking time off as a victim of domestic violence. Mr. Speaker, this also allows the government to bring other aspects of the bill forward for further consultation and study.

Mr. Speaker, this is why this is so clearly a win-win and something that Albertans deserve. I ask all of my hon. colleagues to support this referral amendment.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any questions or comments? The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Well, thanks, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the hon. member for an excellent speech. I found it very informative and educating.

An Hon. Member: Riveting.

Mr. Nixon: Riveting. Speaking towards the amendment, I can see, of course, Mr. Speaker, that it seems the government agrees with me on that assessment, which is excellent. I'm always happy when the NDP is following the opposition's example. That's usually when they're doing good work. In this case I would strongly suggest that they take the member's words seriously to heart and have a look at this amendment and the importance of consultation.

One of the questions that I have for the member, after listening to his presentation, is around this whole concept of consultation. Some of the concerns that I know I hear from my constituents and, I suspect, that he hears from his constituents are about this government's tendency not to consult on bills, particularly on bills where I think they're probably nervous about the reaction of the public.

As I was talking about earlier in the day, Mr. Speaker, we see stuff like a time change bill go to committee for lots of consultation. Stuff like the hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler's private member's bill, stopping taxpayer money from being used by the governing party of the day during elections to be able to finance campaign-funded advertisement stuff, went off to committee. We never saw it again inside this Chamber. But a bill of this magnitude is all of a sudden being pushed through within a week, with no consultation. Certainly, the constituents that I represent don't feel that they've been consulted with. The government says that they consulted with them, with these come-and-be-told meetings. It's quite shocking.

Now, some of the other examples I could think of since this government has come into power is stuff like Bill 6, which, of course, has been talked about many times in this House. You know, the government's behaviour on Bill 6 has made it so that generations of people inside of rural Alberta and farming and ranching communities will never look to the NDP again. I was at a 4-H sale last night in Sundre, Mr. Speaker, and little kids showing me their projects, their steers and their sheep and stuff that are going into their sales, are still talking about the government's blatant – blatant – disregard for their way of life and complete inability to consult with them. That's just one example.

The hon. member brought up carbon tax. Carbon tax: that's another one. I see, Mr. Speaker, that the minister of agriculture is really, really concerned about it. I don't blame him. Based on the reaction there and the fact that he represents a rural riding, I would be very, very concerned, too, about how they're feeling, which is the point of this referral. Instead of making the same mistakes that the hon. minister made with Bill 6, with the complete disregard for all of rural Alberta and our second-largest industry, maybe they should not make the same mistake that his department made during that debacle, and they should consult with the people of Alberta. That is the core of this amendment that we're debating right now, whether or not this should be referred to committee.

Now, the carbon tax is another good example. The hon. member talked about the carbon tax, again something – I know, Mr. Speaker, as you travel around your constituency, you're hearing from just as many constituents as I would hear from in regard to their concern over the carbon tax and the fact that this government never campaigned on it. They brought forward a tax that's buying people light bulbs but not doing much else. They didn't consult with the people of Alberta. If they did, they would have heard that our schools are having trouble staying open now as a result of the decisions associated with the carbon tax. Our municipalities are struggling, are going to have to raise property taxes. How do we know with this bill right now, that the government is trying to ram through this House in a week, that there aren't going to be similar consequences?

Mr. Bilous: Hey, we can stay for three weeks.

Mr. Nixon: Now, I know that the hon. Deputy Government House Leader wants to stay for three weeks. Well, certainly, we should stay for three weeks if that's what it takes to get the work done. What would be nice, though, Mr. Speaker, is if the hon. Deputy Government House Leader would take the time to consult with the people of Alberta rather than just coming here.

That is what's most disappointing. This government continues over and over and over not to want to talk to the people of Alberta, not to want to talk . . . [interjections] This is 29(2)(a), questions and comments, of course, for the hon. member. The government continues to not want to consult with the people of Alberta, and there are serious consequences of that decision. There are serious consequences to the future of this government.

Now, I don't care about the reputation of this government – it's shot with the people of Alberta, again, for generations – but I do care about the people of Alberta, who can have consequences. We've seen it with Bill 6, the carbon tax, election changes, all these things that are coming from this government as a result of their complete and utter refusal to communicate with the people of Alberta.

So I would like to hear, under my 29(2)(a) questions and comments, what the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat feels about . . . [interjections] Well, you know, I've got five minutes to talk on comments. That's what the standing orders say, and I'm quite happy to do that, Mr. Speaker. It appears that the government really wants to hear from me by their reaction, so I'm quite enjoying that.

With that said, though, I would like to hear from the hon. member . . . [interjections] Of course they want to. Agreed. They want to hear from me. So enjoyable, Mr. Speaker, the time and the behaviour of the government.

Now I would really like to hear from the hon. member on what he thinks about the consultation question. [Mr. Nixon's speaking time expired]

The Speaker: Are there any other members who wish to speak to the amendment on Bill 17? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am very happy to rise and speak to this bill, and it's with concern, of course, that I'm rising to speak about this. There are a couple of things that I wanted to speak about today. In my mind, I'm extremely confused, I guess, for lack of a better word, and my confusion is based on the language that is used in the title of this piece of legislation and what is actually being accomplished.

To reiterate what some of the members on this side have said, there is a very good reason to be looking at the compassionate care. As a private-sector worker I probably – we've got a roomful of experts here who work in the public sector, who have worked under the auspices of unions and have a great deal of knowledge. So I certainly do look towards that knowledge in order to understand a little bit more about this legislation.

But coming from an area of the private sector, Mr. Speaker, you know, when I look at things that are in the compassionate care, these are things that, when you're in the private sector, you also have to follow through with as well. It never occurred to me that we wouldn't do these things for people that work for us. I think one of the things that was devastating to read was the fact that there has to be legislation for the death or disappearance of a child, that it actually has to be written into legislation to make sure that people can have leave for something so absolutely horrible. I just can't imagine that an employer would not allow that to happen.

If that is the case, obviously, this legislation needs to be changed in order to make sure that the people that are working in these unions are able to actually access the ability to leave if they need to. I didn't realize until after reading this that the jobs in a labour union would not allow for a person to leave if their child had disappeared, and with the fact that it has to be put into legislation, well, I'm grateful. I'm grateful that it's in there. Obviously, if it has to be listed, it's something that somebody has suffered within the labour legislation. So thank you for making those much-needed changes in order to make sure that people who work for labour unions are actually protected and are able to leave if a child disappears or dies or for miscarriages or any of those other things.

Like I said, in the private sector, for the folks that work for us, anyway, these are things that you would take care of within the business that you work in. I've never actually had a contract that I've had to have one of the people that work for me sign where I had to lay out the number of days for a particular issue such as domestic violence or bereavement leave or any of those kinds of things. Those are usually negotiated upon. I mean, especially when somebody is bereaved or if your child went missing, I can't even imagine having to go negotiate with your adviser to see if you could actually leave to go and take care of your family.

Anyway, I'm very grateful that the legislation is being changed. So thank you to the government for putting in these changes, where people within the industry have been obviously hurt by not having this in the legislation. I think that's why it's so important to make sure and why we've said on a couple of occasions to actually split the legislation. The name of the legislation refers, I think, to this piece, and I think there's a lot of work that could be done on this piece to make sure that these numbers are correct. Potentially, the government has consulted on these particular things through hearing from people who work for labour unions that they're not being taken care of by the people they work for in order to have to lay these kinds of things out. So thank you for doing that, and thank you for making sure that the folks that work for labour unions have these things.

Aside from that, we're talking about two different chunks of this bill. We're talking about compassionate care – that's this piece – so things like maternity leave, parental leave, compassionate care, death or disappearance of a child, critical illness, long-term illness, domestic violence, personal and family responsibility leave, bereavement leave, citizenship ceremonies, overtime pay, a lot of these things that I've seen that are listed in the legislation. So thank you for making sure that the workers are protected from the people that they work for.

One of the things that I wanted to bring up, too, is that we've got the family-friendly piece – that's that – but then we also have the piece on the Labour Relations Code changes. When we're talking about that, that's where I'm particularly confused. Why we're asking to keep this legislation going a little bit longer is because we really believe that 36 days is not long enough. I have a document that I'm going to table a little bit later. It talks about the need to actually take a look more deeply at the legislation, especially because we're looking at federal changes for this legislation as well as provincial changes for the legislation. [interjection]

One of the members across the way said: 30 years. You might be correct that 30 years have passed since the legislation has changed, but please don't mince words in that there has not been 30 years of consultation. If you have that, please present it. If you have 30 years of consultation, please present that. That would be wonderful. There are some things that you can say, you know, that in 30 years haven't been changed – that's fair; nobody is saying that the legislation doesn't need to be looked at – but to assume that for 30 years you've consulted and that you have the data that you need in order to make sure that these changes are actually appropriate, that's a completely different argument.

Like I said, if we're talking about the compassionate care pieces, I couldn't agree more. If it has to be detailed and written out like that to protect the workers that work for unions, yes, I agree one hundred per cent. Aside from that, if we're looking at the other parts of this legislation, I think we have some discussion that we need to have, and why not take the summer? It's really only a couple of months. I mean, we're back here at the end of October. Some of our legislation that we've had the privilege of putting forward here in this session will actually be put to the next session. It actually gives all of us a little bit more time to consult. I'm certainly grateful for time to consult on my bill, and I'm very, very grateful that that stakeholder outreach will continue to go on.

Like many members have said and upon speaking to some of the people in my constituency, I'm pretty sure that union workers would appreciate an opportunity to chime in on this a little bit more. There's no harm. What is the difference of four months at this point in time, Mr. Speaker? To take the time, which is why we want to refer it to committee – right? – it would be absolutely within the auspices of serving Albertans. That's what we're put here to do, to serve Albertans. So why not take a few more months, four to six months, and put it into committee? We can have a chance to talk about it, and then when that legislation comes forward, you are absolutely certain that all of the folks that are going to be impacted by this have had a chance to speak up, to speak their minds.

Again, I think that the title is wrong, but that's just my opinion.

Mr. Nixon: It's a good opinion.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you.

I think that any time you're bringing in a large piece of legislation like this, any time you do something like that, you have to ask a couple of questions. One of those things is: what does this bill mean to the people that it's impacting, right? The second piece is: has there been enough time or ability? There are a lot of reasons why consultation may or may not happen, right? So have you had the time and the ability to consult to minimize any of the unintended consequences? It's just another piece that needs to be looked at.

Then, the third piece is: have you actually drawn on the wisdom and the strengths of Albertans in crafting the legislation? As you look at other pieces of legislation, as the hon. members on this side have mentioned very eloquently, there has been lack of consultation on many, many pieces. I could go through and list them again, but, believe me, people know.

Again, it just goes to show that here's a government that really has a good chunk of experts on this particular piece of legislation, a lot of experts in the room, that could use that expertise and that knowledge and that ability to really reach out and take the time to make sure that this legislation is really solid. There are some really good things in here as well. I'm only looking at the critical parts of it because that's my job. My job is to hopefully give you some interpretation of my eyes on it. Whether you choose to agree or disagree, you're completely entitled to your opinion, and that's fair, but I also believe that my eyes on it, coming from my perspective, will do nothing but help to enhance and strengthen this legislation. So it would be very, very appropriate for the government just to listen and actually to listen to Albertans and take that opportunity.

I don't even know how many pieces of legislation we've put to committee. I'd have to go through everything that I've actually spoken on to see.

Mr. Bilous: Almost everything. Almost every piece.

Mrs. Aheer: I think the minister is correct. I think that it could be close to almost every large piece of legislation.

Part of the reason that happens is because we're concerned about the consultation, but we're also concerned that a lot of the legislation packs in a ton of things into one piece of legislation that doesn't actually represent everything at one time, because if you vote against one thing, you end up negating an entire bill. There are good pieces of this bill. What does that say about the government that they would put pieces of this in a piece of legislation that you look at and you're going, "Yup, that's good; that's good," but there's no way without consultation that we can take a look at this bill in good faith and say we can vote for this?

So why not split it? Why not split it? I just don't understand why we can't put compassionate care through and protect the people that are working for labour unions and then take a look at the other pieces of this legislation a little bit more closely.

I mean, our job in being here is to try and work through the confusion. A lot of the confusion that I'm laying out for the government right now is confusion that is coming from people that I've spoken to. I don't think that that's a bad thing. I think it is fair to bring forward that and ask for clarity. So I'd like to have some clarity as to why we can't split this piece of legislation. Why? Why wouldn't you do that? It's a really, really easy request. Why?

Ms Fitzpatrick: You're going to chop everything up.

Mrs. Aheer: Well, why not chop everything up? There are a lot of good reasons, actually, to do that. It's actually a really fair, fair question.

The Speaker: Folks, I'd like to remind you to stay on the amendment.

Mrs. Aheer: Then, in terms of putting it to committee, that's exactly why I'm asking about that, Mr. Speaker, because there are so many pieces of this. With 36 days of consultation under their belt and the inability to actually talk to people succinctly about how this is – and the reason I bring this up is that I'd like to move forward on a couple of things here.

One of those is the secret ballot. Yesterday we brought that up in a couple of other speeches. I think that the government thinks that by what they're doing right now, Albertans don't understand the difference between having a secret ballot and not having a secret ballot.

I know this is going to bring some giggles, but I just have to do it. I'm going to table a policy brief from the Manning centre. [interjections] The reason why I'm tabling this brief...

The Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. member, if you're tabling it, table it this afternoon.

Mrs. Aheer: Oh, sorry. I apologize. I'm sorry, Mr. Speaker. I will table this later.

The Speaker: Thank you. Stay on the amendment, the issue.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, sir. This is towards the amendment.

The reason why I'm tabling this particular brief isn't so much about the opinions, which I think are interesting, which I'd like to bring up, but more than that is that this actually has data in it, like, actual data. That's why I want to make sure that the government gets this document, so that we can have a chance to maybe talk about it . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Order, please. Keep it down. Keep it down.

Mrs. Aheer: . . . and maybe have an opportunity to look at it from a different perspective, Mr. Speaker.

One of the things that I wanted to bring up is that Manitoba right now is trying to change it so that there is a mandatory secret ballot. Up until now, Mr. Speaker, in a lot of jurisdictions 40 per cent would trigger that vote.

I have to say after reading this that quite often the secret ballot, just for the information of people like myself who are just actually in the process of learning about this legislation – what I found was interesting. The secret ballot actually doesn't take away from a union being able to unionize. In fact, the secret ballot is one of those pieces of democracy that strengthens a union's ability to bring forward and unionize. However, right now with the legislation that's being presented – and we're assuming that people have their own free will to sign these cards, so let's assume that that's true – at 65 per cent there's no more secret ballot. There's no more. The members were telling me: no; the secret ballot is in there. It's actually not. It's been negated completely by that piece of legislation.

Now, my question is: why did the secret ballot come to be in the first place? Why was it even necessary? Why did we need it? Well, the secret ballot was invoked for the very reason that under the auspices of democracy in a group of people, people could make that decision because you have the right to change your mind, I would assume. You sign a card saying: yes, this union looks good. Then you have a chance to look at the information, and you're like: maybe not.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any questions under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am rising to speak against this amendment.

The Speaker: Hon. member, you can't rise to speak to the amendment. You can make a comment or a question to the member, but it's, really, the statements now.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Yeah. What I'd like to know is that basically – there are a number of things. You've talked about how much you support different kinds of leaves, so I'm going to first talk about family-friendly leaves, in particular about the leave with respect to domestic violence.

I've shared my experience about domestic violence previously. When I finally charged my ex with domestic violence, I called the police 16 times in 14 days. One of those calls was when he showed up at my place of employment and was waving a gun. I worked at a brace shop, a private business. There were patients in the waiting room waiting to be measured or fitted for different kinds of orthopaedic or prosthetic devices. There were a number of men who worked in my place of employment with me, and they came out to support and protect me. The police were called, and he left before the police arrived. My boss called me into the office and told me that he would have to let me go because our clients and other staff were put at risk.

I left and went home and felt absolutely devastated. I was at my wits' end. What was I going to do? Later that evening . . .

The Speaker: I need to remind you again that it's to the amendment that we're speaking.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Yeah. I'm going to get to it.

Later he called me. He apologized. He asked me to come back to work. He said that I was a great employee, and he was not going to put me at further risk; they would figure out what to do. I told him that I also worried about those things because I cared about the people I worked with. He apologized again and said that I could come back to work when I was ready, and they would figure out how to deal with the work situation to keep us all safe.

Situations similar to this happen over and over again. It happened when I was in corrections. I heard it from parolees, colleagues. I heard telephone conversations from open cubicles. As a union representative I heard those things. Within the public we don't hear about those incidents unless there is a death and the police become involved. The reality is that we all need to recognize those signs, and we need to take action. This bill takes action.

Certainly, one of the first things that we can do is having that time so that the person can go see a lawyer and not lose their job because things have to be done . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, don't dialogue.

Ms Fitzpatrick: . . . and she or he is out of the workplace. [interjections]

11:10

The Speaker: Hon. members, don't dialogue directly. Comment through the chair.

Please get to the amendment motion. That's what we're talking about.

Thank you.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Okay. Again, in terms of different kinds of leave we heard from Amanda Jensen last week. We know that those things are important. Keeping your job when you're going through this kind of stressful situation is really important.

Now, you've spoken a number of times about these leave items and said that you're committed to them. If you're really committed to them, then support the legislation rather than putting forward this amendment.

I'm going to give you another example. I worked with the federal government for 33 years. There were problems in the workplace just as I had experience with in private industry, problems which restricted the productivity in the workplace, things like harassment, unsafe workplace conditions. As an example, during my years as a parole officer I attended both the home and workplace of parolees I supervised. A day of community supervision meant that I was out of the office, meeting with parolees in the community from 7 a.m. until 6 p.m. I had no cellphone. I asked and didn't get one, but my supervisor had one. He was sitting at a desk with a cellphone. It wasn't until Louise Pargeter was killed – she was a parole officer in Yellowknife – that finally things changed, but it took my union fighting for this.

The importance of having a union in the workplace is what makes this, so I don't understand why you are opposed to this.

Speaker's Ruling Question-and-comment Period

The Speaker: Hon. members [interjections] Hon. members, let me remind the House again.

Hon. Member for Lethbridge-East and hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, I want to remind each of you to continue to focus your questions on the amendment that's at hand and direct your questions or comments to the member who made the initial presentation. It's important to the debate that takes place. There may well be points that were made that can be made in your actual 15 minutes, but under 29(2)(a) please be more conscious of directing the comments to the member who made the initial comments.

Debate Continued

The Speaker: Are there any other members who wish to speak? The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, I rise to speak to the referral amendment today. I do appreciate the hon. member bringing forward the referral amendment. I'd like to open up where the last speaker left off, and that was in regard to the compassionate portion of this legislation. Now, every member of the opposition that has risen to speak on this bill has made it clear that they support that, all of those portions of the bill. In fact, what we have proposed to this House – and this is why it's important for the referral amendment – is to separate those from the larger issues in the labour code, get those compassionate issues dealt with immediately. As the hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View did a great job of articulating, if there is that much detail that needs to go in, we are with it to support being able to get union workers what they need.

We have said that we would provide unanimous consent immediately, Mr. Speaker, to pass all stages of that legislation right now, right here, today. So if the hon. members across the way in the government truly believe that – and I believe that they do; I know that I do as well – they would support that, and they would immediately take steps to move to pass all of those compassionate issues through this Assembly today and get them to Royal Assent as fast as possible. But that's not what's happening, and that's why you're seeing this referral amendment come forward. Instead, what we're seeing is these compassionate issues being mixed up with extremely complicated labour issues, and the two issues are happening at once.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I want to be clear. I know that the hon. members across the way don't like to be called out, but they're being called out right now. We will pass that all today. They should do their job and pass that all through this House today, but they won't. Instead, they will continue to make this a significant bill, well over 100-some pages, 124 pages to be exact, and they will try to combine it all into one, without consulting – and this is important for the referral amendment because that's what this is about; it's about consultation – the people of Alberta adequately. They have no clue. They've been asked questions in question period for months leading up to this. They've been asked questions during this debate. They've had lots of time for them to communicate. It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that this government has no clue what the true impacts of this legislation will be on my constituents and my colleagues' constituents and on the good people of Alberta.

I want to reiterate, though, to be very, very clear, that the compassionate portion of this bill is something that all parties support, as far I'm aware, inside this Legislature right now and that we will pass today. We will provide unanimous consent. Let's move it through the House. Let's get it done. It's important.

The question we have to ask ourselves now, Mr. Speaker, is on why this government doesn't want to do that. Why this government would want to delay the passage of such an important issue goes to the core of the question that we are facing here today. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

Mr. Nixon: Instead, they want to keep it attached to other issues that clearly need more consultation. Mr. Speaker, we have talked about this many times in this Legislature, you and I, and that is the concern. I know I've been to Medicine Hat, your constituency. Great place. And I know I hear from the constituents of Medicine Hat the concerns that they have with this government's lack of consultation on many – many – bills. Instead, we have to continue to rise in this Assembly to try to get this government to do their jobs and consult with the people of Alberta; to use the committee process, that you would see in other provinces and with our federal government, to make sure that we get this legislation right; to be able to come forward to this House with clear assessments of what the consequences, both pro and con, will be for the legislation that they're bringing forward in this Assembly.

Well, Mr. Speaker, they don't do that. It's extremely disappointing that they don't do that. It's had tremendous impacts on the people of Alberta because of the behaviour of this government when they don't consult with the people of Alberta. It's sad. My family, my friends, my neighbours, my constituents that sent me here to represent them in this Chamber have been severely – severely – hurt because of this government's actions when it comes to consultation, and it is no different with this bill that is before us right now, which is why we see a referral amendment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have to ask myself why there's so much concern from the NDP about talking to the people of Alberta. They are Alberta's government. It is their job to speak to the people of Alberta. But, in fact, I'll go further than that. It is their job to talk to the people of Alberta and hear from them. Instead, what we continue to see with this government is that they think they know better than the people of Alberta. They think they know better than the people of Alberta, and they keep telling the people of Alberta what they should think. Well, I reject that. I can tell you that the people of Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre don't want to hear from the government what they should think; they want to tell the government what the government should think.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Well, you're not listening to them.

Mr. Nixon: Now, the hon. member is telling me that I am not listening to my constituents in Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre. I assure you that I am listening to my constituents in Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, and the number one issue that you hear from them if you go anywhere within my constituency – I'd invite you any time, Mr. Speaker. I have before. Come and visit the Sundre A&W in the middle of the day, a great place to come and talk to many constituents around the Sundre community to hear how they're feeling. The number one thing that they'll bring up is this government's lack of consultation. At Tim Hortons in Rocky Mountain House the number one thing that they'll bring up is the lack of consultation. In Rimbey, at the old motel, another great place to meet constituents, they'll say that the number one thing is lack of consultation.

The problem this government has is that they live in a bubble, and that's why they keep turning down motions like this. They live with their ideological friends and their people that have the NDP world view, and that's all they hear from. They don't leave this place and talk to the people of Alberta.

Ms Jansen: They listen to me.

Mr. Nixon: The MLA for Calgary-North West is heckling to me that they listen to her. No. If she was listening to her constituents, she wouldn't have crossed the floor, but I digress. [interjection]

The Speaker: Hon. member.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the core of this amendment is the fact that this government won't do its job and consult with the people of Alberta. I'm hearing it from the minister of agriculture. One of the worst examples of lack of consultation in this Legislature is Bill 6. He oversaw that, didn't consult with the farmers and ranchers of this great province, and brought forward legislation that still, to this day, is not operating properly: a great example of why you need to take something like this to committee. Take time to make sure that you get it right for the people of Alberta. It is a great responsibility to be a member of the Legislature. It is a great responsibility, even greater, to be a member of the government.

Drever: Shame on you.

11:20

Mr. Nixon: The Member for Calgary-Bow is yelling shame on me. No. Shame on her for not listening to her constituents, Mr. Speaker. Shame on her. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members. Again, direct your comments to the chair and not directly to the party. Please continue.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The core, though, of the discussion today is how much this could or could not impact the people of Alberta and whether or not the government has truly shown to this Assembly that they have figured out all the consequences and that they have consulted the people of Alberta. That's the point of the referral amendment. If the government has not adequately done its job in consulting with Albertans, then the amendment is correct and this should go to committee to make sure the government can do its job, to make sure they hear from the people of Alberta.

I don't think anybody in this Assembly can argue that it is our responsibility to listen to our constituents and to the people of Alberta. Nobody in this Assembly should argue that. I don't think they would. I don't think the government members would. I think they would agree that that is their responsibility.

When we look at this amendment, Mr. Speaker, that's the question that we need to be asking ourselves as members before we vote on it: did the government adequately do its job and consult with Albertans? If not, we should be voting for this amendment, sending it to committee, determining the consequences, making sure that Albertans get a chance to participate in the legislative process. That, at its core, is what this is about. The concern I continue to have – and I rise in this House many times to talk about it – is the complete disdain of this governing party for democracy and for communication with the people of Alberta.

We have seen them over and over send legislation to committee. This is very relevant to this amendment. We need to ask: what bills does the government send to committee? When you're asking why they would or would not send . . .

Ms Jansen: That your constituents didn't vote for?

The Speaker: Member for Calgary-North West.

Mr. Nixon: I hear the Member for Calgary-North West still heckling me. I don't understand what the issue is because the core of the issue here is this: whether or not this amendment should be passed and this bill should be sent to committee. That's the question we are asking. When we ask that question, we should ask ourselves . . .

Drever: Talk to Amanda Jensen. Tell them to wait a little longer because of your ideology.

The Speaker: Calgary-Bow.

Mr. Nixon: . . . what bills does this government send to committee, and why would they or why would they not send this to this committee? That would be a valid comparison.

We've seen recently that they sent a private member's bill on time change to committee to receive more consultation: consultation is good; we better get that right. That makes sense. You don't have to look too far back to see that the hon. member for Drumheller-Strathmore brought forward a bill to make sure that this government and all future governing parties could not use taxpayer dollars . . .

Drever: You mean Drumheller-Stettler? You don't even know your own area?

Mr. Nixon: I hear the Member for Calgary-Bow heckling again. She likes to use taxpayer dollars for expenses. We know. She worked in a committee this summer to try to get money for her political expenses.

The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler had a private member's bill that would stop this government from using taxpayer dollars to advertise during political campaigns. Do you know where that bill went, Mr. Speaker? It went to committee, and this House has never seen it again. A pretty simple bill. It was a couple of pages long. It went to committee because the government didn't want to pass it. We have to ask ourselves: why? Well, I would assume it's because they want to continue to use the good people of Alberta's hard-earned dollars to pay for their political campaigns, which we, then, again saw them this summer spending their main focus on. Disappointing. The Member for Calgary-North West agreed with me on that at the time. I do commend her for that.

Second, we have now a bill with 124 pages that only was put before us last week, that has only been consulted on with limited people in this province, limited by the NDP, at come-and-be-told meetings. They have not talked to Albertans at large, they have not talked to a large scope of Albertans to make sure that they understand, they have not adequately talked to employers, they do not know the consequences that are associated with the bill, but that bill doesn't go to committee to make sure we get it right when the hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler's bill goes to committee and never comes back to this Assembly? It was just a little, tiny bill to make sure the government couldn't use taxpayer dollars to pay for political expenses during campaigns.

Now, the core of this is consultation. If you went to Sundre with me on Friday and toured around and talked to everybody across Sundre and you explained that, saying that a bill of this size won't go to committee but that a private member's bill that stops their money from being used for their political expenses goes to committee and never comes back, Mr. Speaker, what do you think the average person in Sundre will think when you explain that to them? They would say: "I don't think so. This is wrong. This is the NDP's continued behaviour to not consult with the people of Alberta. This is the NDP's continued behaviour to move forward their ideological agenda no matter what the people of this province think."

In the end, Mr. Speaker, it's not the members across the way that will be negatively impacted by it; it's possibly the people of Alberta, the employers of Alberta. Without taking the time to properly consult – that’s why we continue to stand in this House and have to rise to speak to an important amendment like this to try to get the good people of Alberta an opportunity to be able to speak about legislation that will impact them, to be able to tell the government what they think, to be able to give the government advice.

Mr. Speaker, where the NDP has gone wrong on this and so much is that they think it’s their job to tell Albertans what they should think. The people of Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre outright reject that idea, and I think the people of Alberta outright reject that idea. We work for Albertans, and if this government wants to bring this big a legislation forward with no consultation with the people that I represent or my colleagues on this side of the House represent and, quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, with no consultation with the people you represent or they represent, then it is our job to rise in this House and to try to get this bill to a committee process so we can make sure we get it right for the people of Alberta.

It’s unfortunate that the government continues over and over not to think about the consequences to Albertans. They certainly don’t think about the consequences to them, but that’s really in some ways irrelevant. As I said, Mr. Speaker, I don’t care about this government’s reputation. It’s tarnished because of their behaviour. But because they continue it, they’re hurting the people that I care about. They’re hurting Albertans. They’re hurting business owners and employees by rushing things through. Instead, if we did the process appropriately through committee, we could come out with a bill – as has been said, there are many things in this we agree with, in fact, I would suggest, probably the majority of it. The government is essentially putting poison pills in certain areas of this to try to push forward their ideological, union-based agenda.

Mr. Bilous: Radical.

Mr. Nixon: It is a radical agenda. I mean, the Deputy Government House Leader just said “radical,” and I think that’s right. I think that is a good assessment of the agenda that he is putting forward. It’s radical.

How do you get around that, Mr. Speaker? The core of this amendment, that has been brought forward by the hon. member, is to get this to a body that could take the time to study it, take the time to communicate with the people that are impacted by it, and be able to come back to this Assembly and say: “Here are the consequences, both good and bad, of this legislation. Here are things that we heard from Albertans that could make this legislation better. Here are things we heard from the opposition that could make this legislation better.”

Now, the big argument right now – and it’s in some ways reasonable at face value – is that there are a lot of compassionate issues within this legislation. That is why this side of the House offered, again, to pass it in one day and get those compassionate issues immediately dealt with for the people of Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. Sucha: Under 29(2)(a), Mr. Speaker. Thank you. I have a question here, but I want to make sure that I provide context for those who are watching the debate or watching this at home. There’s a long-acting tradition that we have whenever we vote on first reading of a bill in which we pass it so we can actually read the bill and we can debate the bill. You don’t have to look any further for legislation that we and, actually, the PC caucus at the time didn’t like, which was recall legislation, because it had been debated in the House many times. We recognized it was likely going to be unconstitutional, that there were going to be challenges with it costing taxpayers lots of money, but we still passed it at first reading so we could debate it in this House, and ultimately it did not pass.

Now, I want to throw this ironic sort of context onto it – and I want to first apologize to my constituents. I was unable to vote for first reading of Bill 1 because I was actually at home sick. I had pink eye, and I had to go to the doctor. You know what’s crazy? I didn’t lose my job for it, and some people could.

With that being said, I’ve heard from members of the opposition that they would like to amend the bill. I’ve heard from members of the opposition that they would like to see this bill split up. I have to ask the question: why did they vote against it in first reading before they read it? Further to it, when the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre is talking to the average person in Sundre on Friday, would they be okay with him voting a bill down without reading it or voting down compassionate care amendments in that bill without reading it?

I would love to hear from the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, who is the opposition whip and can speak about why his caucus voted against this bill before they even had an opportunity to read it, about why it was reasonable to do so. Ultimately, this is an important bill. We’ve heard very important facts around compassionate care. I’ve heard from many members in this House who have heard from individuals who have lost their jobs over compassionate care. We’ve heard many of the members of the opposition talking about the importance of compassionate care and talking about how we need to protect the rights of workers who are either sick or their kids are sick.

Mr. Hanson: Apparently, that’s a union problem.

Mr. Sucha: Well, I hear some heckling from the hon. member that apparently compassionate care is a union problem. No. It’s an everyone problem, Mr. Speaker.

You know, it’s remarkable when I hear some of these comments that are coming on this. Many of them talk about how they’re business leaders, and they’re right now heckling me over compassionate care. I ran a business as well, and at the end of the day, if someone was sick, we made sure that we took care of that individual. So I’m a bit disappointed that I’m hearing those comments coming from that side of the bench here.

I further want to ask this: what are the member’s true motives in relation to compassionate care? What is the member hearing from the constituents in Sundre in relation to this? As he’s talked about consulting with individuals in his constituency, I can ultimately tell you that within the constituency of Calgary-Shaw we have spent many times . . . [interjections] I hear a lot of heckling about this, and I’m still talking about compassionate care. I’m a bit disappointed that I’m hearing this heckling while I’m trying to speak about compassionate care.

Even within the constituency of Calgary-Shaw we’ve made a huge point to reach out to third-party groups, to make sure that we reach out to many individuals throughout the riding. We’ve sent letters to every registered small business in the constituency to get their feedback, to have open houses, to discuss with them . . . [interjections] I’m still hearing a bit of heckling, and I’m still trying to tie it in with compassionate care.

I think it’s important, if we want to try to break up this bill, if we want to try to look at it in two different formats, that I ultimately hear what the constituents from that area are feeling about compassionate care, and if they feel all right . . . [interjections] I’m still hearing heckling over compassionate care, and I’m a bit disappointed over this. At the end of the day, I’m sure the constituents in Sundre think that if someone is sick, if someone has had a baby or happened to have had a miscarriage, they don’t want to lose their job. They would think that this is very important.

I'm extraordinarily disappointed that I'm hearing this while I'm trying to dig deep into the fact that they voted against this bill in first reading despite the fact that they're now talking about how they support elements around compassionate care. So I would be happy to hear from the member in relation to if he thinks that his constituents think this is appropriate.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we're short on time because of how long the hon. member took, which is fine, so let me be very clear. We say that we'll bring it through in one day. They did not bring it till the last week of session because they don't care. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

The hon. Member for Battle River-Wainwright.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to speak on this referral amendment to Bill 17, the Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act. You know, we're talking about taking this and bringing this to committee, to refer this to a committee, and that is super important because this is a huge bill. It's not one piece of a bill. We go back to the part we were talking about, the compassionate care portion. We would have passed that a month ago had this government brought this forward with that portion. This would have been done, and we could have dealt with the labour portion as a separate issue. But that's not what happened.

This is an omnibus bill, that puts everything in there together. That creates problems. It creates problems for us. We want to say, "Yeah, this is a bill I would support," but, you know, they didn't separate those two, and that's the unfortunate part.

You know, when you look at this bill and you look at how they've gone about the consultation part of this bill, Mr. Speaker, it's like when you were in school. We used to have show and tell. [interjections] I can hear from people that, yes, they remember show and tell. What we're seeing from this government is the opposite. We're seeing tell and show. They tell us, "This is the bill," and then they're going to show us through regulation what's going to happen afterwards. That's completely backwards. When we were in school, we had to show and we had to give reasons for what we were talking about, and then we'd tell them about it. Then people would be able to have feedback. Instead, this is just being told, and it is being rammed down the throats of the people.

So we need to separate these portions of the bill. If we take this and put it into a committee that can fully vet it, understand it, we'll be able to make some progress, I believe. Unfortunately, what we've got here is something that I won't be able to support as a whole because you've taken labour and then you've taken parts of compassionate care. That's the unfortunate part. I cannot support the bill because of all the different aspects that are, frankly, wrong with the bill.

You know, you're allowing salting, and I would like to know more about why you're allowing salting. For the people that aren't aware, who are listening or who may be seeing this in Hansard or who might be watching this, salting is when a union employee or a union sympathizer gets a job at a non-union workplace solely in order to organize the workers or the workplace and disrupt the company's operations. You know, with this, the person only has to be employed for one day. Hey, if they've only been employed one day – they've just gotten into the job – and in the first hour they're saying, "Let's unionize this thing," how do they even know what that workplace is like? As it stands, there are 30 days, but right now this could be changed over to one day, and that's not fair for the people that are working in that job and who actually like that job. This person wants to jump in there because they're a union supporter, a union sympathizer. They want to make it a union, and all of a sudden they can actually disrupt or change what's actually happening in that business.

The business of salting is, you know, something that is part of this bill. We need to go back, and we need to be able to take this to a committee and talk about that. Frankly, if I take that to my constituents – and I've been talking to my constituents. They've had portions of this. They've said that they cannot support anything that goes with this bill. I've talked to the people in Wainwright. I've talked to the people in Killam and Bruce and Holden and throughout my riding of Battle River-Wainwright, and they're looking at this. I was in Provost the other day, and one of the people in the businesses there was looking at that, and they're, frankly, upset with this bill.

You know, the government, I think, did a reasonably good job of trying to talk about the compassionate care part of the bill. They went forward and they made sure that people understood that this bill is all about the compassionate care part. They put in the Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act, but that's only a portion of this bill. When you're looking at, again, as I talked about, salting, does that sound like that's a fair and family-friendly workplace part of it? No. It's an omnibus-type bill, and this amendment will stop that. The name is misleading. I just would have trouble supporting the bill as it is, Bill 17. That's why we need to make this referral to a committee.

Major changes need to be made, and there's just, frankly, not enough time. When we're looking at just days, mere days, to be able to do this bill and they've taken – what? – two years in Ontario to look at the same kind of legislation, that's not fair to Albertans. That's not fair to my constituents. It's not fair to the people that own businesses. It's just, frankly, wrong.

Major changes need to be made, and there's not been consultation. I understand from my colleague over here that he was doing consultation, going out into his riding, but the people in my riding weren't given that same opportunity. They weren't able to see – perhaps you were highlighting some of the parts of the bill that we weren't able to see. You were given that part of the consultation or the compassionate care part. It's not fair that that information that you were giving was not spread out to all Albertans.

The member said that he gave it to his constituents, but it didn't go to all the constituents across all of Alberta so that all of Alberta could actually have a chance to see what was going to be contained in this bill, and never once did I hear anything about salting. I don't know if the member shared that with them. These are things where substantive amendments would need to be made to this bill to make it family friendly because the vast majority is not family friendly.

The constituents I've talked to agree. They were not advised. They never heard about most of these things. Now they're learning it for the first time, and they cannot support it. If the government were truly sincere in getting this bill right and took the necessary amount of time, like Ontario – they've taken two years. We're even asking just to take this until the fall session. We can talk about it over the summer. But we're not getting this whole summer to be able to talk about this. That, I think, would be a minimum, necessary amount of time to be able to make this bill workable, something that we can talk about to our constituents, to Albertans, and take this out and meet our constituents.

The government needs to put aside pursuing their ideological beliefs. Then they would be able to perhaps – perhaps – create something that we here in this House and all Albertans could stand behind. That's when you're taking the proper amount of consultation. We saw on Bill 6 that they rammed that legislation through and enacted it as of January 1 of that year, and frankly my constituents said that they wanted to be able to be heard on that bill. They wanted to be consulted. Time after time we're seeing bills coming through where the consultation is just not happening. Instead, they rush it through without thought or consideration.

Job creators – and we’re talking about job creators, Mr. Speaker – have taken hit after hit due to this NDP government’s legislative decisions. As the opposition we must stand for the people of Alberta and for the economy. I’m certainly standing up for the people in my constituency. The people in my constituency are clearly asking me to ask you these kinds of questions and ask you to pause and to consider what you’re doing and allow them to have input through sending us e-mails, writing us letters, making phone calls. There’s, frankly, not enough time for me to be able to get all that information. I first have to give them the information that’s contained in this bill and then wait for them to respond. That does not just happen overnight.

After all, they really would have to be serious about getting it right. They would have to have taken the summer. Let’s talk about it. They would have to have taken the summer to work things out and get it right. Instead, they have decided to rush through this legislation so that they could tick off another legislative, political item on their wish list. This is wrong, and I implore this government to consider taking more time. If we take it to the committee and do the referral – and I would support this referral. I would truly support the referral. The referral would allow this to go to committee.

Mr. Speaker, with that, thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General under 29(2)(a)?

Ms Ganley: Under 29(2)(a), Mr. Speaker. Thank you very much. I think that I just feel compelled at this point to rise and make a couple of comments on this speech. This legislation and the things that are being said about it in this House are near and dear to my heart. As many members of this House will know, labour and employment was, in fact, my area of practice before I came to this job, so this is, of course, something that I’m quite familiar with. I’m certainly familiar with hearing from Albertans about it, taking calls day in and day out from people who had experienced a termination because of a maternity leave, who had experienced a termination because, you know, they had a child who was ill or because that child passed away and they needed to take counselling as a result of that. I heard from these individuals all the time, Mr. Speaker, so I’ve certainly had a lot of experience with this. I think, you know, it’s...

The Speaker: Hon. minister, you will speak to the amendment.

Ms Ganley: Absolutely.

I think that it is absolutely about time, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member across the way rises to say that we should refer this bill to committee, but it has been years – years and years – in the making. Those are people’s lives. Actual individuals who are experiencing these unfair labour practices are people; they’re Albertans who deserve to have their rights protected.

Just to comment on a few things that the member said, I’d like to begin by talking about the definition of what an omnibus bill is. An omnibus bill is something that combines disparate things that have nothing to do with each other. Fair workplace legislation, protecting the rights of workers, whether they are in a unionized environment or a non-unionized environment, regardless of who they work for in this province, Mr. Speaker, is one issue. It’s quite clearly tied together. In fact, it was not only my area but many people’s area of practice. So to say that this is an omnibus bill because it combines related pieces of legislation that impact the same thing – i.e., the rights of workers and employers vis-à-vis one another – is just a little absurd. I think that that’s the first thing that I’d like to comment on.

The second thing I’d like to comment on, Mr. Speaker, is the title of the bill. The title of the bill is Fair and Family-friendly Workplace Act. The member seemed to be objecting to the fact that some of the fairness pieces affect people who have families and some affect people who don’t necessarily have children, so not everybody is in the same circumstances. Well, that’s the case with almost every bill that we pass. They affect different people across different circumstances at the same time. In this case we’re protecting workers’ rights, all workers’ rights: workers with children, workers with sick parents, all different workers, workers who don’t have those things. So I think it’s perfectly reasonable that these things would come together.

The primary objection, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member seems to have to this bill is its length. I mean, we’ve certainly had a reasonable amount of time to debate this bill. I think it’s been before the House for about a week now, and, you know, I think asking to read 120 pages in a week isn’t actually that extraordinary a request. It’s totally reasonable that people would be able to do that and to debate it, and I absolutely think that that is what the public expects of us.

You know, I think that this has been an extremely long time coming. The members opposite say that we need more time, that we’re moving too quickly, but workers have been waiting for these rights for years, Mr. Speaker, and workers are being affected right now, each day, even as we speak. When I was in my practice and even now in my MLA office I have people coming to me all the time who have had these sorts of issues with their employer, who have experienced an unfair workplace practice. Those workers are across the spectrum. Some of them may be in unionized workplaces. Some of them may be in non-unionized workplaces. I think that, you know, to say that all workers ought to have rights, that all workers ought to have access to fair workplaces is a totally reasonable thing to do.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, May 30, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. A beautiful day out there, folks. Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my great pleasure to introduce to you and through you to this Assembly a group of 26 students from the combined grade 5/6 class of Hazeldean elementary school in my constituency who are here with educational assistant Jennifer Soon and parent volunteers Rita Djukich, Amanda Serbu, and Nikki Mauer. These bright young Albertans are in the public gallery, and question period comes at the end of a very busy day. They learned about a number of things today, including participating in the mock Legislature and touring this venerable building. Now they are here to watch the Legislature in action and, I'm sure, to go home thinking they could do this job better than all of us. I ask that these students rise and that all members give these young Albertans our traditional warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater, I believe you have two.

Mr. Piquette: Yeah. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly two grade 6 classes from Landing Trail intermediate. This is the same school that I had the pleasure of having visitors from yesterday, and I had a chance to speak to these young people, and they're just as sharp and nice as the group yesterday. They're accompanied by their teachers Jeff Semenchuk and Jennifer Jones as well as their chaperones Stacey Taylor, Alice Tieulie, and Lorelei O'Brien. Could students and teachers and chaperones please rise and receive the customary warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Another introduction, hon. member? Not a second one?

Mr. Piquette: Oh, I put them together.

The Speaker: Good. Efficiency.

The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As part of Paramedic Services Week it's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you a number of veteran front-line paramedics who are seated today in your gallery. I ask that each of them rise as I introduce them: Mark Carson, peer support team lead and paramedic addressing PTSD among first responders; Delanie Spangler, an advanced care paramedic I first met in my constituency on a tour of Edmonton Glenora station; Lisa Swanson, an advanced care paramedic and supervisor of the critical care transport team; Amy Benson, a community paramedic who works with vulnerable populations in Edmonton. Thank you for your combined 80 years of service to Edmonton residents and those who are in crisis, and as one of our Edmonton students wrote recently: you are superheroes. Indeed, you are. Please join me in extending the warm welcome to our guests.

The Speaker: Welcome and thank you.

The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to introduce to you and through you to all members of this House Tim Dixon and Karen Munkedal. These two Calgary-West constituents have worked hard on behalf of their fellow residents to advocate for the government to address health and safety concerns related to the southwest Calgary ring road. Tim even spearheaded a 724-name petition, which I will table later on today. My guests are seated in the public gallery, and I ask them to stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my absolute pleasure to introduce to you and through you to the members of the Legislature members of the Josephburg Agricultural Society, who I will be talking about later in my member's statement. We have – and if you don't mind rising as I speak your names – Joanne Heckbert, who is a member of Josephburg Presents, who has been a key member, doing the work for her community there. Also, we have Billie Borys, who is a director and has taken numbers in T-ball and softball from 20 to 95, from what I understand; and Sharon Loughheed, who is a director and has been doing that for a number of years; as well as her husband, former MLA Rob Loughheed, who served three terms from 1997 to 2008, representing first Clover Bar-Fort Saskatchewan and later Strathcona. It's my absolute privilege to be able to have them here with us in the House, and I ask everyone to extend the traditional warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a real privilege to rise today and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly a group from the Millennium Pavilion Seniors' Lodge, one of the buildings in my riding that is part of St. Michael's Health Group. Since 1990 the Millennium Pavilion Seniors' Lodge has provided a 75-unit supportive housing facility for the elderly who wish to live in an independent, apartment-style setting with full services. I have the honour of attending numerous events at Millennium Pavilion, and I can truly tell you that Edmonton-Decore has the best seniors in the province. I would now welcome all of my guests, and if they are able to stand, please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly over a hundred members of the group of unemployed energy workers. The NDP government is not making their lives better, and many of these new Canadians now find themselves out of work. The engineering design of new projects is not happening. My colleagues here on this side will help me to introduce some of those guests. I have some names here. If we pronounce any of their names with a little bit of difficulty, please excuse us, because there are so many of them from different countries. I'll take a first stab here. I ask that as I read these names, they stand up and receive a warm welcome here.

The Speaker: Hon. member, is it your intention to introduce all 100?

Mr. Panda: No.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Panda: Some of them can't make it because school groups are there. As they come in, we'll catch them all at the end of QP. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Isaac Bernard, Anilkumar Madhava, Ravi Selvarajan, Santhanam Swaminathan, Muhammad Asim Farooqi, Muhammad Yasin, Naresh Pasalkar, Roopendra Singh, Rajan Pallipat, Kuldeep Sodhi, Sri Valsan. Please stand up and receive the warm welcome of this House.

The Speaker: Welcome. Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members Tom Genore, a constituent and also the president of my constituency association. He served for six years, two tours, with the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry and is currently employed as a heavy-duty mechanic and heavy equipment technician. Please join me in welcoming him to this House.

Thanks.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly another group of unemployed energy workers. I have engineers who have made the trip from Calgary, engineers who for eight months have been trying to get a meeting with this government, and their requests have been totally ignored. I would like to introduce eight of them. As I say your names, please rise: Arun Mukherjee, Narayanan Marath, Vikas Sood, Jinju Antony, Bhavik Trivedi, Naresh Kumar, Ravi Injal, Sivarkamani Karatholuvu, and Kulandaivelal Manickavasakam. Please rise and accept the traditional warm welcome of the House.

1:40

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly some unemployed energy workers. I was wondering if anyone here can give them a job. I ask that as I say your name, you rise and stay standing. Their names are Kumaragurubaran Palanisubramaniam, Balamurali Babykrishnan, Velappa Reddy Bala, Srivalsan Kochugovindan, Norm Ferguson, Irfan Chughtai, Usman Choudhry, Deepu Chandran, and Hoshiyar Singh Panghal. Thank you very much. Everyone, give them the warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly more highly skilled technical energy workers from Calgary who are looking for work. Their names are Vikaskumar Bhatt, Rajan Pendharkar, Rizwan Khan, Xuequin Zhu, Xuejun Zhu, Tamar Bourne, Sureshbabu. If they'd all please rise. These are the faces of real people. These are the faces of Alberta. Please join me in welcoming them with the traditional warm welcome.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Macleod-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Close. Mr. Speaker, I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly the next group of unemployed energy workers. Their names are Kuljeet Dhillon, Swaminathan Jayaraman, Akshat Agrawal, Jaison James, Alex Lechadores, Sanjay Chaudhari, Sanjoy Das, and Chandrasekhar Ramalingam. I'd like to have them please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: My apologies to the member. Your electorate is Cardston-Taber-Warner.

The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise today to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly some unemployed energy workers from the wonderful city of Calgary and area who have travelled up here today to put a real face to the NDP's disastrous policies that have led them to be unemployed here. Would you please stand as I call your name: Mr. Rajesh Somaya, Mrs. Maheswari Atchudda Reddy, Diwakar Selva Ravi, Mrs. Harjeet Sodhi, and Mrs. Beena Jaison. Weiers, AUPE vice-president, Rose Read, Nancy Woods, Brian Cook, José Osmel Reyes, Thelma Ogden, and Bill Erickson. These individuals work hard every day ensuring the flawless execution of services our Albertans rely on from health and long-term care to utilities, building maintenance, and more. I ask that my guests rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Welcome.

If they could rise as I read their names and stay standing until we give you the appropriate response: Mrs. Radha Narayanaswamy, Mrs. Supriya Pendharkar, Serena Pendharkar, and Mrs. Nalini Vallala. If you could join me in giving them the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Josephburg Agricultural Society

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For more than 100 years agricultural societies, including the Josephburg Agricultural Society, have been working to make life in rural Alberta better. Yoga, T-ball, softball, minor hockey, Christmas in the heartland, scholarships, Josephburg Presents: this group puts true sweat equity into our community.

May 28 and 29 marked the UFA Country Classic, a broad-based event welcoming families from across western Canada and giving young people a chance to compete in Josephburg. The annual north country classic horse show held at Birch Bay Ranch was attended by over 50 participants, with exhibitors showing in halter, English, and western riding classes and competing for high points awards in five age divisions. It was the first circuit show of the season, where judges foster the love and enthusiasm of these young equestrian riders.

The UFA Country Classic is also a major stop on the junior show circuit, where participants come to cut their teeth before going on to the summer cattle shows. They learn research, genetics, biology, and how to make mistakes and learn from them. Each youth receives an award or prize to encourage them to stay engaged and feel successful. This year marked the first Elaine Hiller memorial herdsman award, handed out to Bailey Deitrich, a youth who embodies that same love and passion for agriculture as Elaine did in her own life and who puts his efforts into the cattle industry both inside the rink and out.

Mr. Speaker, shows like this are a major cultural component of how we achieve sustainable agriculture in Alberta and encourage the next generation of farmers, teaching the ropes of business and agricultural science. These youth learn how to be entrepreneurs and create the best beef for our own plate here and across the world.

I'd like to thank Kelsey Knott for chairing this year's event and the entire executive of the Josephburg Agricultural Society.

I invite all members of the Legislature to venture out east and check out everything that Josephburg has to offer and to mark their 2018 calendar with the UFA Country Classic.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Energy-sector Unemployment

Mr. Barnes: Today we are joined by 94 energy workers and engineers, many of whom are struggling with unemployment due to NDP government policies that have not put Albertans first. There are many more outside. I urge the members of this House, especially those in government, to look their way and to really see them. These men and women are the backbone of our nation's economy, and they have been for decades. They possess good Canadian values, a tireless work ethic, and specialized technical skills. The work they do is so important. But still they find themselves the targets of unfair attacks from radical environmental groups, groups who are funded by foreign interests like the Tides Foundation and who want to see our province fail.

Today I rise to tell these workers and engineers thank you. You have not been forgotten. Thank you for making Alberta a lighthouse of economic opportunity for families in search of a better life no matter where they're from. Thank you for creating good jobs that allow countless Albertans to buy homes, vehicles, and hockey equipment, all those ties that bind our communities. Thank you for supporting the essential services we hold dear like health care and education. Thank you for providing job training to our aboriginal youth, which for many is a gift that will keep on giving. Thank you for being a leader in land reclamation and never compromising on human rights in the name of higher profits.

I want the NDP to stop treating this Legislature like a safe space. Face the Albertans hurt by your policies such as the oil sands caps, the carbon tax, the doubling of the LMR, the royalty review, and higher business taxes. These are some of our finest citizens.

This NDP government needs to understand that actions have consequences. This war on energy, the deliberate weakening of our own economic position just to satisfy NDP cohorts in B.C. and elsewhere is irrational and needs to end. Stand with the engineers of our province and stop apologizing for our industry. The hard-working men and women who joined us are the lifeblood of Alberta.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Kinder Morgan Trans Mountain Pipeline

Mr. Jean: Since forming government, the NDP have tried to have their cake and eat it too when it comes to pipelines. From day one they have failed to realize that pipelines in every single direction would be good news for Albertans. They protested Keystone XL, they were complicit in the tanker ban that absolutely killed Northern Gateway, and now their brothers and sisters in the B.C. NDP are determined to block the Trans Mountain pipeline. Does the Premier realize just how much pain her waffling on pipelines is causing our province?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, there they go again: sound and fury signifying nothing, hoping against hope that Alberta will fail, making the Green Party's case for them for their own political gain, folding at the first hint of opposition. Pipeline opponents don't need friends; they've got the Wildrose. This pipeline will be built. Albertans fought for it,

Albertans won approval for it, and they won't let the Wildrose Party or anyone else stand in the way. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

Mr. Jean: Pipelines are happening in Alberta despite the NDP and the Premier, Mr. Speaker. The Premier and Prime Minister are setting themselves up for failure when it comes to pipelines. They've tried to sell Albertans the snake oil of the 21st century, social licence, with the myth that it will get pipelines built. News flash: social licence doesn't get pipelines built; our world-class NEB approval process does. But the Premier has given an inch in the name of social licence, and now the B.C. NDP, the B.C. Greens, and ecoradicals are taking a mile. Will the Premier please wake up to the facts and realize her social licence . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to pipelines, the Leader of the Opposition is a sheep in sheep's clothing. Every time he stands in this House, pipeline opponents cheer. Here's the bottom line. The twinning of the Trans Mountain pipeline was approved by the federal government, and guess what? Those are the people that get to approve it. The pipeline will get built. Albertans will benefit. So I ask the member opposite to stop taking this sky-is-falling routine, to stop talking down Alberta, and to instead stand with Albertans.

Mr. Jean: Baloney, Mr. Speaker. It's not just the B.C. NDP and Green parties that are showing their true colours on pipelines. There's also the antipipeline celebration of the Premier's closest oil sands advisers, Tzaporah Berman and Karen Mahon. You can't make this stuff up. Berman is actively celebrating the likely demise of Trans Mountain under the NDP's and the Greens' watch all while collecting a healthy paycheque from – you've got it – Alberta taxpayers. They are an insult to our province and to everyday Albertans. An insult. Will the Premier do the right thing today and fire Berman and Mahon? Yes or no?

Ms Notley: Well, you know what, Mr. Speaker? What our government will do is continue working on the climate leadership plan and the emissions cap, which is fundamental to the approval that this government received from the federal government for the Trans Mountain pipeline. That is exactly what we will do. I know the Wildrose panics easily, but Albertans don't. We are getting this done, our economy is growing, and this pipeline will get built.

The Speaker: Second main question.

Mr. Jean: Mr. Speaker, we could make a huge sandwich with all the baloney coming from the Premier today.

Auditor General Recommendations on Health Care

Mr. Jean: Alberta's health care system should never be about dollars spent but should be about people cured. When you put money over people, it means patients get left behind. It's the story of my family and thousands of families right across Alberta. The Auditor General made it very clear in his report released last week that, quote, pumping more money into the most expensive health care system isn't the answer; change is needed. End quote. I agree. When will the Premier show Albertans that we'll get to see real reforms instead of billions of dollars just being poured into a system that, obviously, is very . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Notley: You know, Mr. Speaker, when we ran in the last election, we said to Albertans that it is time for people to stop experimenting with ideology in our health care system, that instead what they need is stable, predictable funding and supportive planning, and that's exactly what we've got. Two per cent a year is not shovelling money into the system. Moreover, you know what we won't do? We will not privatize our health care system. We will not create a two-tiered health care system. We will not create opportunities for the rich to buy better services while others get sicker. That is absolutely what this government will never do.

Mr. Jean: Mr. Speaker, this Premier and this government are failing Albertans when it comes to health care. The fact is that despite the NDP boasting about record levels of spending across our health care system, they have absolutely nothing to show for it. No improvements. Nothing. Wait times for key procedures in Alberta remain embarrassingly long. If you need a cataract surgery or a knee replacement, you're waiting almost – get it? – 240 days, far too long, almost a year. Two hundred and forty days is too long. The Auditor General has a novel idea. How about linking funding to outcomes, not just volume? Will the NDP stand on the side of patients and make this reform, or will they continue to put the quality of life of Albertans at risk?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, what our government will continue to do is the work that we have been doing, which is making slow, progressive improvement on a number of different wait times in a lot of different areas.

You know what else our government is doing? Just today we announced that we will be opening up a new hospital in southern Edmonton, the first hospital built in over a generation. I wonder if the member opposite plans to tell Edmontonians that they are not going to get that hospital.

Mr. Jean: It's the management, Mr. Speaker. The waste across our health care system is excessive, with duplication and layers of managers managing managers that manage managers. It is, as the AG put it, "an orchestra without a conductor." You can imagine the sound. It would be nothing but disaster. Here's an example. If it was run like a bank, our health care system would have 1,300 separate IT systems totally incapable of communicating with the other 1,299. Today we are spending over $600 million on IT, with no plan to get it working properly or to keep it up to date. This is incompetence.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, one of the other things that the Auditor General pointed out is that the administrative costs at AHS are the lowest per capita in the country. It's not the doom and gloom that the members opposite keep talking about.

2:00

But you know what would be doom and gloom, Mr. Speaker? The election platform of the members opposite, creating new systems for the wealthy and shutting other people out, taking billions of dollars out of the health care budget, which is what those folks over there thought they could do with no plan put in place. They would have laid off nurses, they would have laid off care workers, they would have closed beds, and they would have hurt Albertans all across the province. We won't do that.

The Speaker: Third main question.

Mr. Jean: A record today, Mr. Speaker: I have enough baloney for a couple of sandwiches.

Energy-sector Unemployment

Mr. Jean: Today we are joined at the Legislature – and today we're enjoyed by them as well, Mr. Speaker – by unemployed oil and gas workers and engineers. They are the faces of women and men that are too often forgotten by all levels of government. When oil was crashing, they got a carbon tax. Then they got caps on the oil sands. Then they got Ottawa piling higher taxes on oil and gas exploration. These folks aren't feeling any sort of recovery. They're hurting right now. What does the Premier have to say to them about the damage her economy and policies have had on their livelihoods?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to begin by welcoming our guests to the House today. We understand that the collapse in energy prices is hurting workers, families, and communities across the country. That's why our government has chosen to stand with workers and families. For instance, a year ago we introduced the PDP program. As a result of that, just a few days ago they announced that they would be tendering a hundred million dollars' worth of engineering design work in weeks to come. That is the kind of thing that will put folks like this back to work, and it's a direct result of the PDP program that our government brought in.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Jean: One of the people in the gallery today is a recent engineering graduate. His is the story of many young Albertans. He worked and studied hard but now, after leaving university, can't find a job. Times are tough. Alberta isn't the same place it was even when he started his education. Young Albertans deserve better than seeing antipipeline activists like Tzeporah Berman, the Premier's good friend, serving as an oil sands adviser. They want to see the government fight harder for our oil and gas sector than they do for new carbon taxes, as they're doing. When will the Premier start to give Albertans and unemployed Albertans a break?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I've been saying repeatedly, our government is absolutely focused on the need to promote job growth and to promote economic recovery in this province. That's why we have been a very big advocate for the Kinder Morgan project instead of predicting its demise, as the members opposite want to gleefully do, and that's why we've been working on a number of projects like the one I just announced, the PDP program, which will create jobs for exactly the folks who are here today.

Overall, Mr. Speaker, our plan is working. Drilling is up. Capital investment is up. Jobs are coming back. Is there more work to do? Yes. But the members opposite have no plan and would only have made things worse.

Mr. Jean: Making things worse, Mr. Speaker? I don't think anybody could make the economy worse than what this NDP government has done. The NDP will pretend that all is good and that the economy is just fine, but these are real people who are hurting, real people, real Albertans that are hurting. Sixty thousand full-time jobs have vanished, and these people laugh about it. Carbon taxes, tax hikes, credit downgrades, new regulations and red tape, all from this government: none of these things are helping. They are making a bad situation much worse. When things start to stabilize, they've strangled our full potential to grow. This government's policies have made it harder for Albertans and the people who came here today . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, the Leader of the Opposition and their new friends' plan would have made a tough situation much worse for working families. Those folks over there drove the economy into the ditch and did nothing to prepare for a potential oil price collapse. We've taken a different approach. We're investing in apprenticeship and training, we're working with the industry to connect workers to opportunities, and we're keeping postsecondary education affordable because we believe that in a tough economy the government needs to stand with people, not fire them, not fire their family members, not pull back services, not shut the doors on them. We'll be there for them.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Hon. members, I've seen a note. I did not hear this myself, but I'm sure that no hon. member would say this, that nobody in the House would say, "Not telling the truth," and I just want to make sure. I don't know who that would be. I didn't hear it.

The leader of the third party.

Kinder Morgan Trans Mountain Pipeline (continued)

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, the Premier has paid lip service to supporting the Kinder Morgan pipeline. The problem is that the B.C. NDP Party, which is the Premier's party, will be in a position to interfere with the construction. The federal NDP, which is the Premier's party, are opposed to Trans Mountain. The Premier is outnumbered in the family. No wonder her minister is running away from unemployed engineers today. To the Premier. It is time for you to stand up for Alberta. Will you ask your party, the Alberta NDP Party, to divorce themselves from the national and B.C. parties so that you can actually support Albertans? Right now most of your family doesn't.

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Let me begin, of course, by correcting the record. The Minister of Energy did meet in March with a number of the people who are here today, and the minister of economic development will be meeting with more of them.

To the member's question, let me just say this. I don't believe that there is a government in the country that has done more work to get the Kinder Morgan project approved, Mr. Speaker, than ours. Moreover, the people that we have lobbied are the people who actually have the authority to make the decision, the federal government. When the federal government approved the Kinder Morgan project, they did so on the basis of the work that this government had done, not on . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.
First supplemental.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Premier finally admitted that the Prime Minister, who treats Alberta like a doormat, in this case approved the pipelines. She tries to take credit when the news is good and runs like a rabbit when trouble rears its head, like her minister running from hundreds of unemployed engineers today – yes, minister of postsecondary – who are looking for work. The Premier continues to employ Tzeporah Berman to attack Alberta's interest with the B.C. wing of her party. Premier, when will you match your actions with some support by firing Berman and have your ministers talk to unemployed engineers?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that the members opposite believe that question period is all about theatre, but I really wish that they would just listen to the answers a little bit, because, as I've said already, the Minister of Energy has already met with some of these workers, and the Minister of Labour and the minister of economic development will be doing so again. I think that part of the question has been answered twice now.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, as I've already indicated, what our government did to get the approval of the pipeline from the federal government was develop a climate leadership plan which included an emissions cap. The work on that must be done, and it must be finished, and we will make sure that happens.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.
Second supplemental.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Premier continues to appease Alberta's enemies. She's invited activists onto the oil sands advisory panel, she's burned Alberta with a job-killing carbon tax, she's sacrificed whole towns where coal jobs are to make her fancy friends in France happy, and now she refuses to divorce herself from the national and British Columbia NDP parties, who cheerlead against Alberta every single day. She's breaking the backs of Alberta families. To the Premier: will you finally admit that your policy of appeasing Alberta's enemies is not working and actually stand up for Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am very proud of our government's record with respect to standing up for Albertans on a whole range of issues, also including this pipeline. We worked to get a plan in place that would ensure that the federal government could move forward with approving this pipeline, and that decision stands. I know the members opposite want to join together with their little friends over there and hope, gleefully, for the potential failure of the pipeline for their own political interests. Quite frankly, it is utterly shameful, and unemployed Albertans should be watching the politics that these folks are playing.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Stony Plain.

2:10 Coal-fired Electric Power Plant Retirement

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Having grown up in an oil and gas family, I understand the concerns of boom-and-bust cycles. Many of my constituents in Stony Plain have built their livelihood around coal plants, and it is understandable that they are very worried about transitioning off coal-powered electricity. To the minister of economic development: how is the government creating stability for families such as my constituents to support them through this transition?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to start off by thanking the member for being a tireless advocate for her constituency. First of all, coal communities have helped make our province a prosperous and industrious place, where many people have come to build good lives for themselves and their families. Canada is one of the many countries that are moving away from coal-fired electricity. During my visits to these communities and in a town hall the Minister of Municipal Affairs hosted earlier this month on my behalf, we had an opportunity to talk to a lot of the community members, workers, and municipal leaders about what this is doing and looking at opportunities for economic growth and development in the future.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

It seems that today there are small, little details that I just need to reinforce. I want to remind the members of a reminder that I gave them – and today will be the third time – that the use of electronic equipment, putting earplugs in, except for communicating, is not acceptable.

The first supplemental.

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this issue crosses jurisdictions and that the federal, provincial, and local governments all need to sit at the table as partners to build an end result that works for all, to the same minister: what is this government doing to make sure we have a plan and a process that work for Albertans?

The Speaker: I want to just clarify the point I made. I'm not referring to the earplugs that are provided with the Chamber. It's other electronic material. [interjections] Hon. members. [interjections] Hon. members, are we ready to continue?

The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think it's important to clarify that back in 2012 the opposition leader along with his Ottawa BFF, Jason Kenney, were part of a federal government that passed regulations to close Alberta coal plants and prevent them from converting to natural gas. They were turning out the lights and their backs on Albertans and Alberta communities. Our government has been working respectfully and collaboratively with the federal government to allow coal plants to convert to natural gas producing facilities here in Alberta. The Minister of Environment and Parks has been working diligently to get this done, and we did. We are working with the communities to ensure that they can . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: what is being done to ensure that the impacted companies aren't leaving the Alberta energy market?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I'll thank the member for the question. Our government has reached agreements with TransAlta, Capital Power, and ATCO in order to ensure that they're going to fulfill their obligations, first and foremost to workers, including severance pay and pensions. They're going to keep their head offices here in Alberta, and they're going to continue to generate power for Alberta's electricity grid. At the same time, we are moving toward a capacity market that will help maintain reliability in our electricity system as we transition off coal and at the same time ensure that electricity remains reasonable as far as pricing and that we'll continue to be competitive in our province.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Calgary-Foothills.

Energy-sector Unemployment (continued)

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It seems this government wants to enact a brain drain to foreign countries. The Calgary engineers and design forum has asked for a meeting with the ministers of Energy and Economic Development and Trade. They were redirected to the Minister of Labour, who would not meet and directed them to the Labour workforce strategies team, who cannot answer the questions and redirected them back to the ministers. To the Premier: will you stop this merry-go-round and make yourself available to meet with the unemployed engineers, who are here at your convenience, in Calgary or in Edmonton?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to start off by welcoming our guests and acknowledging that they've travelled up here. The Minister of Energy, including representatives from my Ministry of Economic Development and Trade and representatives from Labour, did sit down with them in March and talked to them about a number of programs. I'm sure the Minister of Labour will tell the House of the work that she's been doing to ensure that jobs go to Albertans and Alberta engineers first and foremost. We met with them. Today after question period the Minister of Labour and I will be sitting down with them again. I can tell you that Alberta is the best place in Canada to be an engineer.

The Speaker: Thank you.
First supplemental.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the unholy alliance next door in British Columbia does not shed crocodile tears over pipelines not achieving social licence and given that the carbon tax and 100-megatonne cap on oil sands production is creating an oligopoly in the oil sands, as predicted by Wildrose, to the Minister of Advanced Education: what message are you sending to the new engineering graduates from the universities if you can't stop to speak to your former colleagues protesting at lunch?

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, because of our government we are having a historic infrastructure build that will create 10,000 jobs per year, and – guess what? – we need engineers to do detailed design work for those projects. We have two pipeline approvals that will create 22,000 jobs. We need engineers to do the detailed design work. As the Premier mentioned, we have two successful petrochemicals diversification program applicants. One will have shovels in the ground this fall. The other just announced that they will be putting out a tender for $100 million worth of contracts for engineers to do detailed design work here in Alberta. The Conference Board of Canada is . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, given that when the Premier was in China over a month ago, the Chinese ambassador to Canada was saying that Chinese enterprises are not interested in the oil sands anymore and given that last session when Bill 1 was introduced, the minister of economic development was all smiles about going to spend us $100 billion into debt and create 100,000 jobs, how about the minister stop paying Albertans lip service and tell everyone and those in the gallery today where the 100,000 jobs are that you boasted about a year ago? These engineers want to meet their Premier. They want to meet . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Mr. Bilous: You know, Mr. Speaker, I wish that members opposite would stop running down our province, our employers, our workers and actually stand up for them the way this side of the House is. Last year we led the country in private-sector investment. We're on track to lead the country again this year. Drilling in the province is up 100 per cent over last year. Our exports are up 68 per cent over the same time last year. Wholesale trade rose for the sixth month in a row and reached its highest level since June 2015. Manufacturing is up. Housing starts are up. I wish that the . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The Member for Calgary-West.

Calgary Southwest Ring Road Construction Concerns

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My caucus colleagues and I have been assisting residents living along the route of the southwest ring road as they attempt to convince this NDP government to address their health and safety concerns. Once again let me remind this government that they are all in support of this project. They just don't want gravel-crushing and asphalt operations over their back fence for the next four years, and they need noise and safety issues addressed. These are all reasonable concerns. Minister, time is ticking. Do you believe the residents' concerns are valid or not?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation and Infrastructure.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, building the ring road is very important to Alberta, and it's something that the government takes very seriously. But we also want to make sure that neighbouring communities are protected, as much as that is possible, and we are working to mitigate any impacts of gravel crushing. I've been meeting regularly with the department on this matter. We're looking at new locations for the asphalt plants so that the nuisance odours will be minimized, and in certain cases we're going to be working to reduce the amount of dust and so on through various mitigation . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

2:20

Mr. Ellis: Given that the minister has been invited to attend a meeting organized by numerous communities along the construction route and given that they are offering the minister a broad timeline to confirm his attendance and then they will set the date to take care of all the other meeting logistics and given that they are only asking the minister to attend, Minister, will you meet with the communities in the June 12 to 23 window that they have provided? Yes or no?

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, we're very concerned about minimizing the impact and making sure that we have good communication. We have been working through the MLAs in the area. Officials from our department have been available as well to interact with the communities, and that's going to continue.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Ellis: Those same residents have been contacting me, Minister.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that my request to meet with the minister to discuss the residents' concerns was ignored and given that the residents have also written directly to the minister to invite him to attend a public meeting to hear their common-sense solutions and given that I am now asking the minister to just let the residents know if he intends to meet with them or not, Minister, will you or will you not attend a meeting on one of the many days the residents are offering to you to hear them?

Mr. Mason: Mr. Speaker, it's not true that I've refused to meet with the hon. member. In fact, I have met with him. I went down to Calgary to meet with him, as a matter of fact, on the ring road and the construction, so it's simply not true. With respect to residents we are having good communication with them through the MLAs and through department officials, who are available to talk to the community on the issues that are of concern to them.

The Speaker: Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My riding of Bonnyville-Cold Lake is the home to many unemployed energy workers, who can't believe what they're seeing. The Premier's top oil adviser, Tzeporah Berman, is actually cheering a new agreement between the B.C. NDP and the Greens, which is built on their election promise to kill the Kinder Morgan. On Twitter she called for the deal to be a turning point for our climate. It is time for the Premier to pick a side. Is she with Tzeporah Berman, or is she with Alberta jobs?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, making life better means a strong oil and gas industry. That is why we are committed to ensuring that Albertans get full value for their resources through pipeline approvals, of which we have secured two. That is also why we're committed to working with industry on a strong clean-tech component to our climate leadership plan, and that is why we are moving forward with innovation investments. It's also why we are working with industry with respect to oil sands emissions. When we conclude that work with industry, we'll be moving on. In terms of the detail around our innovation investments I'm happy to speak about those in the sup.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Premier is subsidizing Ms Berman's activities with Albertans' money. Hundreds of engineers are here today to say that this is disgraceful. Given that the Premier is refusing to stand up for Albertans and fire Ms Berman, is she willing to bear the responsibility if some of her oil sands advisers are successful in killing our pipeline?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the oil sands advisory group is made up of companies like Cenovus, Athabasca, CNRL, MEG Energy, Suncor. They've endured endless reputational attacks from the Wildrose. They've endured endless conspiracies, having their names dragged through the mud, all for the alleged crime, for the Wildrose, of daring to say that, yes, we can grow our investment in the oil sands, but we can also reduce our emissions. For that, the Wildrose talks them down. For that, the Wildrose says that, you know, we need to drag their names through the mud. It's simply not acceptable.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Those are companies that I respect in my constituency.

Given that this government has a long history of environmental activism from the environment minister, who helped edit a book called An Action a Day: Keeps Global Capitalism Away, and the Education minister, who stood on the steps of this very Legislature and chanted, "No new approvals," why should energy workers in Bonnyville-Cold Lake trust this government when it's so painfully obvious that this government wants to shut down our oil sands?

Ms Phillips: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, there are a number of oil sands companies that have told us and have told the public that they would like to reduce their emissions while continuing to produce oil sands, and when they say those things, we believe them. That is what we have done on this side of the House. When those companies come to us and say, "Yes, we can be a global leader," we don't shout them out of the room. We believe them. When they say to us, "We want to work with environmental groups, with communities, with First Nations, with the government in order to move this province forward," we don't shout Cenovus or Athabasca or Suncor or CNRL out of the room. We don't drag their names through the mud. The Wildrose does that.

Provincial Credit Rating and Fiscal Policies

Mr. Fildebrandt: On Friday I was in Toronto to meet with the DBRS credit-rating agency. It was illuminating. These agencies are not conservatives nor liberals nor socialists. They are sober-minded analysts who take a dispassionate view of the hard numbers. On the same day that I was meeting with DBRS, Standard & Poor's handed Alberta its fifth credit downgrade under the watch of this Finance minister. His response was to blame the creditors and anyone else with even an elementary understanding of finances as having a conservative agenda. Does the minister take his latest credit downgrade seriously?

Mr. Ceci: Mr. Speaker, we take everything on this side seriously, and we work for Albertans. We are making life better in this province as a result of our investments for capital, our investments for infrastructure across the province, including a new hospital announcement today in Edmonton. That particular credit-rating agency wanted us to cut $3.5 billion out of our budget or raise taxes. We won't do either because we have Albertans' backs. We're going to get through this into recovery, and we're doing that now.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Given, Mr. Speaker, that when the Premier appointed this Finance minister, she knew that he had virtually no background in economics, in finance, or in any serious understanding of government budgets and given that the minister's shortcomings could have been somehow overcome with the advice of people who know better but so far he has shown an unwillingness to listen to economists, to fiscal experts, to credit-rating agencies, or even most Albertans, this leads me to wonder: is he taking his advice from Kathleen Wynne?

Mr. Ceci: You know, Mr. Speaker, before I got elected to the government of Alberta, I was on city council for 15 years – 15 years – with that member over there. I served together with that member.

The hon. member asking me the question was an outreach worker for an agency that looked at small businesses. He was an outreach worker. That's his background.

An Hon. Member: This is your second job.

The Speaker: Hon. minister. [interjections] Hon. minister.

Hon. members, I just want to caution about making personal references.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Given, Mr. Speaker, that nothing seems capable of making this minister listen to sound advice or take the finances of this province seriously and that if he is going to start acting competently, then clearly he's going to need a little motivation and given that the number one job of the Minister of Finance is to responsibly manage the finances of Alberta – and if he can't do that, then he's not doing his job right – my question is: if Alberta receives yet another credit downgrade, will this minister take a pay cut?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. On to more germane things, you know, the finances of the province. The people of this province are struggling right now. We're coming into recovery. This government is supporting Albertans, and we are going to grow fastest in the nation, 3.3 per cent. That's an upgrade of half a per cent, from 2.8 per cent, from the Conference Board of Canada. We're on the right track. They would put everything at risk.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Carbon Levy Revenue

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Since the inception of this government's climate leadership plan we've seen a steady stream of spending announcements and subsidies. The majority of these announcements were to be funded through the collection of the carbon tax on all Albertans. Now that we've had a year living under this government's climate plan and some time for the government to evaluate and estimate the yearly revenue of the carbon tax, to the Minister of Environment and Parks: how much of that money is expected to be collected by the carbon tax, how much of it has been spent or committed so far, and does your government anticipate needing to dip into general revenue?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The answer to the second question is no. The answer to the first question is that we will have a quarterly update, which is fast upon us, and the information will be contained therein.

Thank you.

Mr. Fraser: Given the government's confidence that the carbon tax will be sufficient to pay for all of the spending that they have announced under the climate leadership plan and given that if they are correct in the assumption, there will likely be money collected from the carbon tax left over from year to year and given this government's enthusiasm for spending found money, to the same minister: if the amount of the carbon tax collected exceeds the amount needed for you to pay for announcements and subsidies, will you make the right choice and return that money to Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The short answer to the question is: it won't.

Mr. Fraser: Given that the B.C. NDP has campaigned against the approval of the Trans Mountain pipeline and given that the NDP blocking the Trans Mountain pipeline will impact growth in the oil sands, affecting money raised from the royalties and from SGER as well as the provincial economy at large, and given that the government's climate plan relied on increasing carbon tax revenue, to the same minister: will a reduction in the carbon tax collected force the government to raise taxes further to meet their commitments, or will long-term green infrastructure plans suffer because of the unpredictable funding?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the commitments that we have made are through stable and predictable funding to a number of different initiatives, including our indigenous investments, including our investments in on-farm solar PV and efficiency, including a number of green infrastructure investments that we are examining right now. We will be making sure that those fit within the projected revenues so that communities can have what they need in order to build transit systems, in order to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, and in order to diversify the economy while creating jobs, which, of course, is the outcome of the climate leadership plan.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Social Studies Curriculum Review

Connolly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the second-youngest person in the Legislature I have actually been through the current social studies curriculum. Now, given that the current grades 7 to 9 social studies curriculum includes perspectives on Canada, international world views, and issues for Canadians and that the grades 10 to 12 social studies curriculum consists of globalization, nationalism, and ideologies, there seem to be some gross misconceptions about what's in the draft curriculum documents, which include many of the same themes. To the Minister of Education: why did you feel the need to revise Alberta's education curriculum?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you very much for that question. Of course, we know that our current curriculum has enabled our students to achieve a very great deal, but we also know that it's always important to upgrade. Some of the curriculum is more than 30 years old. Our kids deserve a modern curriculum that builds on strengths, including literacy, mathematics, and history. They deserve an education that prepares them for success. That's why we're making life better by not only building new curriculum but building new schools, ensuring our classrooms are well resourced, and making sure that Albertans can see themselves in the curriculum when they take it.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Connolly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that some of the misconceptions are centred around the draft social studies scope and sequencing, which includes questions such as how events, groups, and individuals can shape views on freedom, responsibilities, rights, and reconciliation, and given that the new PC leader says that there's no mention of history in the documents, to the same minister: is this odd statement true?

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you for asking that. Certainly, the leader of the third party's statements are absolutely one hundred per cent not true. The words "history" or "historical" appear more than a dozen times in the scope and sequence. I know as well as a history teacher myself that I can assure any member or any Albertan that the social studies curriculum that I sign off on will have a very strong focus on history.

We also are working with people such as junior achievement, universities, the energy industry, agriculture and the like to make sure that we have a reflection of who we are as Albertans in the curriculum. The curriculum, some of it, hasn't been updated . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Connolly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the new leader of the third party has accused the government of politicizing social studies, a subject that is to ensure students develop critical thinking skills, in the draft curriculum documents, to the same minister: how does the government respond to these accusations?

Mr. Eggen: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, thank you for that. I mean, we are certainly not the ones playing politics on curriculum. Let's review the Conservative record on education. They proposed deep cuts, which would close schools and lay off teachers. They did not do any curriculum updates, so we're left in the position that we are in today. Now they're attacking very common-sense curriculum changes coming from the teachers and postsecondary institutions, from parents and students. The president of the PC Party even said that this curriculum review would turn our kids into Nazis somehow. That sort of talk is abhorrent. I find it disgusting. Sir, we are focusing on regular folks and regular curriculum.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Agricultural Concerns

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My constituency of Drayton Valley-Devon has declared an agricultural disaster twice in the last two years. Drought one year and saturation the next are devastating our farmers. Farmers are telling me that the AFSC managers appear to be hamstrung at times, having to wait on people up the chain of command before they can take action that will get farmers into their fields. To the minister of agriculture. Preharvest inspections were carried out by AFSC in February and March. Have all the farmers eligible for the 25 per cent advance been issued cheques?

The Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. I couldn't be happier with the inspectors that have been going out there and doing the work. All 120 inspectors in the province have been in the hardest hit areas. They've been doing very good work. As of last week only 20 per cent of unharvestable crops are still left over there. We've had some really good progress. We've had some good weather this week. We're looking forward to good weather and to farmers doing what they do best, and that's to get the seed in the ground and growing food for all of us.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that many farmers are struggling to get a crop in this year – they've had to fight the elements and the red tape and the inefficiencies of AFSC – and given that many farmers tell me that they've been very disappointed in the payment process for crop insurance through AFSC, what is this government doing to improve the process of paying out crop insurance in a timely fashion so that farmers in my constituency can face the next potential agricultural disaster and continue farming with more confidence?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. As I said in the answer to the previous question, the inspectors have been out there doing their work. All the unharvested claims have been paid out. Now they're looking forward to getting the seed in the ground. There are, no doubt, still some wet areas in the province. We'll have to wait for Mother Nature to make it a little bit dryer. For instance, in the northwest region, where just last week they had only 5 per cent seeded, they're actually up to 35 per cent seeded now. Mother Nature is co-operating as we are making lives better for farmers.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that many farmers in my constituency have had to subsidize their income by working off farm and given that your climate leadership plan has eliminated well-paying oil and gas jobs that many farmers depended on and given that you sped up the dates for the elimination of the coal-powered electricity generating plans such as the Genesee power plant in my constituency, which, once again, will eliminate an important source of additional income for some farmers, will this government and this minister please explain how they are possibly making life better for the Albertans in my constituency?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know what? The world is moving away from coal, and no one knows this better than the Leader of the Official Opposition, who in 2012 was part of a government that would not only have killed these coal-fired plants but also stopped them from converting to natural gas. I've met with miners, municipal and community leaders, and power companies, and together we're building a plan that will diversify the local economy and allow these plants to convert to natural gas. What I'd like to know is: when will the Leader of the Official Opposition apologize for turning his back on these communities and leaving them in the dark?

2:40 Crime Prevention in Rural Communities.

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, one of the most common calls we receive in our constituency offices comes from rural residents who have been victims of criminal activity. Brazen, broad-daylight thefts of property as well as threats to personal security have become an all-too-frequent occurrence. Now, the Justice minister has been repeatedly questioned on this, and she brushes off these concerns with talk about more money for legal aid and more money for judges, but most of these cases never get to court. The RCMP have done their best, but the situation is overwhelming their resources, and rural Albertans are outraged. Minister, specifically what are you doing about solving the problem?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we take the concerns of all Albertans seriously. This is a genuine and serious concern, and we do take it seriously. That's why we have continued to invest in policing. We spend over half a billion dollars on policing in this province. That's why this government stepped in and increased the funding to ALERT, that helps rural communities all over this province. That's why we've taken so many measures to ensure that officers can be back on the street instead of back at the office doing paperwork. I'll be happy to talk about that in my supplemental answers.

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, the funding to ALERT is certainly appreciated, but it's not getting the job done. Given that the perpetrators of these crimes know full well that the RCMP can't get to the crime scene quickly enough to apprehend them and given that anger and frustration among victims is growing along with the desire to do what it takes to protect their property and given that this increases the risk of people taking the law into their own hands, to the minister: what measures have you been taking or will you be taking to defuse this potentially volatile situation?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I said in the first answer, we will continue to advance that police funding, which is a more generous flow to municipalities than in any other western province.

In addition to that, I think it's important that we look at efficiencies and that we look at ensuring those officers are out on the street protecting Albertans rather than back at the office. That's why we brought in Bill 9, which allows e-ticketing as well as ensuring that they're not executing warrants for minor offences so that they can be on the street doing more important work. We'll be taking a number of measures to ensure that we are focusing justice system resources in the right places.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that local law enforcement officials have also expressed frustration at the rising rate of crime in rural communities and given that they have recommended increased surveillance among neighbours to gather evidence, monitor, and report suspicious activity and given that there's been considerably new technology developed to deal with surveillance and with evidence gathering, to the minister: instead of giving away free light bulbs, clotheslines, and shower heads, would you consider a program to encourage the purchase of trail cams and other security monitoring equipment for rural Albertans?

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, we're in close contact all the time with the RCMP and with law enforcement professionals, who are, in fact, the experts in this area, and we take their advice very seriously. We certainly haven't heard about that particular advice, but moving forward, we will listen to what they have to say.

Mr. Speaker, what we have been hearing from law enforcement professionals is that they spend a lot of their time on things that they don't need to be spending their time on. That's why it is so important to invest in mental health, to invest in affordable housing, to invest in education, so that those police officers can focus on serious crime. You know what definitely wouldn't help? The proposals of the folks over there to cut 10 per cent out of my budget.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds we'll continue with Members' Statements.

Calgary Southwest Ring Road Construction Concerns

Mr. Ellis: Great. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, another three weeks have gone by, and we still wait for the government to deal with this valid concern of residents living along the construction route of the southwest ring road. Representatives were sitting in the gallery today as I asked the minister to meet with them. It seems clear now that he won't do so, but I'm going to take another opportunity to urge him to change his mind.

Mr. Speaker, all Calgarians want this project, but those who will be directly affected by years of construction are simply asking for this government to lessen the impact on their lives and protect their health and their safety. Let me run down a few specific concerns. West Springs in Calgary-Bow and Bridlewood in Calgary-Lougheed are asking this government to relocate gravel-crushing operations away from their homes and their schools; residents of The Slopes in Calgary-West are greatly concerned about the plans to locate an asphalt plant near them, especially when there are other options; Discovery Ridge has concerns about safety, environmental impact, and noise attenuation; and Lakeview and Discovery Ridge are fearful that a road dam will put them at risk of flooding. More than 700 residents of Discovery Ridge have signed a petition, which I will table later today, laying out their concerns.

The communities are inviting the Minister of Transportation and Infrastructure, who is responsible for all aspects of this project, to listen to their common-sense solutions and have a respectful dialogue with them. To date, unfortunately, including today, they have been ignored, so our PC caucus has been acting as their voice because we know, through experience in government, that this consultation should and can occur.

But construction season is upon us. There is still time to meet with the residents in the coming weeks and quell their concerns, but the minister seems to have no interest in doing so. Minister, please do not dismiss the reasonable health and safety concerns of these communities in Calgary.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Culture Days Grant Program

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today with pleasure to talk about an opportunity for local organizations all over the province to apply for funding that is being made available by Alberta Culture and Tourism.

Alberta Culture Days, September 29 to October 1, is an annual celebration that promotes the benefits of diversity and encourages participation in cultural experiences across the province. Last year 315 events took place in 87 Alberta communities, and I was personally honoured to represent Minister Miranda in Lac La Biche for one of the site announcements. As an aside, if you haven't had an opportunity to visit northeast Alberta, you're definitely missing out. This year, especially since it is the 150th birthday of Canada, we are hoping that even more communities take the opportunity to become involved.

This funding isn't just for sites that are named official celebration sites; it is for any community or organization that wants to share their ideas and their culture. Communities can participate in any number of ways, Mr. Speaker. They can create events and celebrate their local culture, their heritage and history, their artistic diversity, and their pride in being Albertan. Alberta Culture Days is intended to help build community partnerships, boost the impact and reach of local programming, and increase Albertans' access to cultural experiences. We live in a wonderful province, and we want everyone to know about the people, cultures, and communities who live in it. We want everyone to share their creativity and their pride.

Cultural organizations, nonprofit groups, libraries, venues and facilities, schools, and community groups are all encouraged to apply. Consideration will be given to those who partner with others in their community. The deadline for applying for this grant funding is June 16 this year. I encourage every member of this House to spread the word in their constituencies and show off their communities and their cultures to the world.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Edmonton Islamic Academy Model UN Participation

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my privilege to rise and honour the students, staff, and family of Edmonton Islamic Academy who join us in the House this afternoon. The academy has been operating since 1987 and now serves over 1,000 students.

Fifteen high school students join us here today. This group was invited to New York from March 9 to 13 to participate in the 43rd annual National High School Model United Nations Conference. This program offers the chance for schools to register and attend. Each school then provides their top three choices for the countries they wish to represent. The model UN then selects which schools represent which country. Edmonton Islamic Academy was chosen to represent the country they chose as number one, Canada.

This model UN conference is known for its diverse, prestigious attendees, its world-class staff, and its engaging committee simulations. EIA students were provided with opportunities to interact with high-profile, relevant United Nations figures and were joined by hundreds of schools and thousands of delegates from around the world. The students participated in academically rigorous material, thought-provoking debate, and an immersive experience in the world of international affairs, problem solving, and diplomacy.

I would especially like to recognize the devotion and dedication of Dr. Mona Nashman-Smith. I want to sincerely thank you for providing and organizing experiences like this trip for our future leaders of tomorrow. Dr. Nashman-Smith has spent countless hours supporting and creating an incredible curriculum for the students and families who attend EIA. Her work and that of countless others has made the school a pillar in the community of Edmonton-Castle Downs. It was an honour to have the EIA represent Canada this year at the high school model UN conference.

Thank you, and Ramadan Mubarak.

Engineering Profession

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, I cannot think of a better mascot for an engineer than the beaver. This Canadian animal is capable of building homes, dams, and altering waterways to suit their needs. Beavers build for their families, just like our engineers.

The downturn in the economy is in its third year and has hit our engineers and technologists hard. They have a petition, with over 4,000 signatures, calling for help. Local engineering work is now being exported, through outsourcing and work sharing, to far-off countries for completion. While this might be a cost savings for the business, it's not without risks of not meeting Alberta's rigorous safety, integrity, quality, and cold-weather standards.

There are perceived biases that just because an engineer worked in the energy sector, it means that they do not have the transferable skills to work in other sectors or are overqualified and a flight risk when the energy sector comes back.

Some engineers and technologists have watched and waited patiently for new training and skills upgrade programs, to qualify for the new growth sectors of renewables and petrochemicals. Those programs are not to be found. The government has failed to meet with the representatives and get their side of the story. Even the Minister of Advanced Education refused to stop and speak to this group on the Legislature steps at noon.

Everything that was built in Alberta was done by engineers. Engineers and scientists unlocked the secret of separating oil from sand. They will be the ones to solve our environmental challenges, not politicians.

But with the current government's policies of capping oil sands production, carbon taxing, and scaring investment away with our out-of-control deficit and debt, the government has commenced a brain drain. Like the beaver who needs to turn a river into a pond to make a home for his family . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Presenting Petitions

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to present a petition signed by 724 residents of Discovery Ridge neighbourhood in my constituency of Calgary-West. They petition the Legislative Assembly to urge the government of Alberta to mitigate the health, safety, environmental, and quality-of-life impacts resulting from the construction of the southwest Calgary ring road.

Thank you again for the opportunity, Mr. Speaker.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Bill 18

Child Protection and Accountability Act

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to request leave to introduce Bill 18, the Child Protection and Accountability Act.

If passed, this new act will transform how the deaths of children who've received intervention services are reviewed in Alberta. When these heartbreaking tragedies happen, Albertans expect their government to take a hard, honest look at the system and what may have gone wrong, to rapidly adapt and improve its services, and, ultimately, to do everything it can to learn from these tragedies and prevent similar tragedies from happening.

With this legislation we would empower the Child and Youth Advocate, creating for the first time in Alberta a primary authority for reviewing the deaths of children and young people in care. We would eliminate gaps and roadblocks that prevent important information from being shared across the system. We would improve accountability so that Albertans know we are doing everything we can to protect children in care, and we would help to ensure that every review from the Child and Youth Advocate is as transparent, timely, and culturally competent as possible.

This legislation is founded on the recommendations of the all-party Ministerial Panel on Child Intervention, all of which our government is taking action to implement. I would like to acknowledge the outstanding work of this panel and extend my heartfelt gratitude to all its members for putting Alberta's vulnerable children first. I look forward to discussion and deliberations with my colleagues on this important legislation to ensure that the Child and Youth Advocate reviews every death of a child in care and strengthens the way we support children and families.

Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 18 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Yeah. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I would like to rise on behalf of my colleague from Calgary-Foothills – he had to step out – and just table five copies of the document that shows that there are over 4,000 signatures by the unemployed oil field workers in Calgary.

The Speaker: Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to table a policy brief that I used this morning during the debate on Bill 17, and I have five copies.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 16

An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to rise and table an amendment to Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates.

The Chair: This will be known as amendment A2.
Go ahead, hon. member.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to move that Bill 16, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates, be amended as follows. Section 2(2) is amended by striking out clause (b) and substituting the following:

- (b) the rate of 6.8 cents per kWh if that rate is lower than the rate referred to in clause (a).

And section 6(1) is amended by striking out clause (b).

Section 2(2) will be amended by striking out clause (b) and substituting the following: the rate of 6.8 cents – for clarity, clause 2(2)(b) currently reads:

- (b) whichever of the following rates applies, if that rate is lower than the rate referred to in clause (a):
 - (i) the applicable rate per kWh, if any, provided for by regulations under section 6(1)(b);
 - (ii) if no applicable rate is provided for by regulations under section 6(1)(b), the rate of 6.8 cents per kWh.

Section 6(1) is amended by striking out clause (b). Just for a bit of clarity, clause (b) currently reads:

- (b) determining or providing for mechanisms for determining one or more rates per kWh for purposes of section 2(2)(b)(i) and determining the rate, if any, that applies to a particular owner or rate class of a particular owner.

3:00

The intention of this amendment is to prevent the Minister of Energy from changing the regulated rate option cap in regulations. The cap stated in the bill and in all of the government publications on the bill states that the cap will be set at 6.8 cents, which is double the current RRO. That has been the number that has been put out in public; that is the number that we understand. The way that it's presently written, the Minister of Energy has the ability to alter that without coming before the Legislature. In spite of the fact that the government never consulted with Albertans about a rate cap other than the 6.8 cents, and even that is questionable, the consultation there, the bill is crafted in a way that allows the minister to arbitrarily change the cap without consultation – without consultation – so without debate or consent of this Legislature on something beyond 6.8 cents.

This is an important and needed check. At this point presently we've been trying to explain what the RRO looks like and what it is going to mean for Albertans and residential payers – taxpayers, ratepayers, consumers, all the same person – the impact of 6.8 cents presently. We need to have that check and balance to make sure, if anything changes, that this minister is responsible to the people of Alberta and that that comes before this Legislature and is thoughtfully brought forward so we have an opportunity to discuss what that's going to mean for Albertans.

The draft of the bill provides the minister with two options. The minister actually at this point in time, unamended, can raise the cap so it's higher than 6.8 cents and can lower the cap so it is lower than the set 6.8 cents. These are massive changes that will, again, hamper the industry's ability to look at what's going on. We've already removed their signals from the market. This is another way that this government can undermine their own bill and actually come in and alter those changes without bringing it before the Legislature. If the minister needs to raise the cap for some reason, because the cost of electricity rises and the government needs to increase cost-sharing between the ratepayer and the taxpayer, who is the same person, then she should bring this request to the Legislature. That amendment needs to happen. That is a check and balance. That is about accountability. She should bring that request to the Legislature, where we can debate and discuss the increase in the cap.

If the minister wants to lower the cap, then the minister is exposing the taxpayer to more risk. What does that mean? Well, it's clear from the bill that the minister is allowed to pay that debt incurred under the cap through general revenue, which, as we know, under 6.8 cents right now doesn't describe anything about what's going on. It's complete smoke and mirrors. There's no accountability under that cap. On top of that, now with the legislation reading as it is, this minister has zero accountability for any changes that may happen. That means that through general revenue and using carbon tax revenue, that's just simply an option, an option available to the minister, who willy-nilly, at will, can change those numbers without even consulting Albertans, us, the Legislature, anybody. At $10 million per month per cent – $10 million per month per cent above that cap – which can happen, again, without consultation in this House, that that RRO rises as a consequence of this government's bad policy, the risk to the taxpayer: to say that that's significant is an understatement.

What's worse about this is that there's zero accountability to the average Albertan about how that's going to impact them. Right now we have zero utility debt. Why? Because right now, as much as it may be frustrating and as much as there are issues, everybody knows what they're paying. It is listed; it is there; it is clear as day. Under the 6.8 cap there are all sorts of things that can be hidden. On top of that, now the minister has the right and the ability to change that without actually coming before the Legislature.

Everybody in this room knows that the NDP is just trying to hide those costs of their poor electricity policy instead of facing the demands from Albertans who receive a monthly bill to actually improve their policy, to monitor rising costs, and to deal with the transmission line overbuild. These are things that are going to be hidden in that 6.8-cent cap. If the minister finds that all of a sudden we don't have the infrastructure for the renewables coming online, she has the ability not only under this bill but also under Bill 34 and Bill 27 to just absolutely without consultation make changes to that legislation and not be accountable to Albertans.

This is piece three, major piece three of the accountability issues. All of a sudden the minister has all of the power in the world to make these changes without bringing it before Albertans, smoke and mirrors, hiding the changes and the bringing in of new technologies under the 6.8-cent cap without actually talking to Albertans, subsidizing industries without talking to Albertans, bringing on all sorts of projects without talking to Albertans, building new infrastructure without talking to Albertans. I think that it would be a very good idea to look at this amendment and to apply some much-needed accountability so that at least within the Legislature, if we're talking about changing that cap, that has to be brought here and have that discussion with those of us who are also representing Albertans, who are, quite frankly, very frustrated right now.

If the minister wanted, she could set that cap to zero and hide the entire cost of the RRO – the entire cost – which means that those dollars could come from a bunch of other places: property taxes, business taxes, carbon taxes. There are so many little nooks and crannies where these taxes can be pulled out of from the taxpayer, ratepayer, consumer in order for the minister to be able to cover up the decisions that she is making with her ministry with respect to Albertans' money.

As we know, Bill 27 did just exactly what we expected. Bill 27 already gave her the power to bring renewables online without actually discussing it with Albertans and, on top of that, got rid of the MSA so that the electricity police cannot have any issues. They cannot bring anything before this Legislature if they have an issue with how renewables are being brought online. They are actually completely cut out of that discussion.

Now we don't have electricity police. Now we have a Balancing Pool, that is a blank cheque. And the third beautiful piece of this legislation is that now the minister has the complete capability to raise or lower this cap as she sees fit, without bringing it in front of this Legislature. The bill is deliberately designed to reduce awareness about the NDP meddling – meddling – in the energy sector, in the electricity sector. That meddling misrepresents Albertans and is absolutely manipulative of this situation because there is zero accountability for any of the numbers that people will get on their regular bill. It's a complete manipulation of the people that are being represented in this Legislature.

I think the most frustrating part of this is that if this is the right idea, if this is the right bill, the minister has absolutely zero reason to have to hide this. She would be proud about the decisions that she's making because she's talked to the sector and she's got accountability to the sector and to Albertans to let them know that this is the best thing for them. But no. Not only is the 6.8 hiding all of those things, but now, on top of that, she is able to manipulate those numbers as she sees fit for anything that is coming online without letting Albertans know.

So far every bill this government has passed on electricity will cause costs to rise, at the minimum. We're not only talking about costs rising but also about the industry's ability to buy in and find a competitive market in which to bring industry here and create jobs, which is what I thought this government was interested in doing. Let's talk about this for a second. Let's talk about the various bills that have been passed with respect to electricity. The biggest one: guess what it is. The carbon tax. This carbon tax was not campaigned on by this government. This carbon tax is a slush fund and, let me tell you, super-duper overpromised. Every time we hear about where money is going to come from, it's going to come from the carbon tax.

The coal phase-out. It was interesting today because the Minister of Economic Development and Trade was talking about how the Leader of the Opposition had talked in 2012 about phasing out coal. Yes, he did. This was an agreed-upon phase-out by industry, by government, a phase-out in six years that the industry actually agreed to, which meant, Madam Chair, that there were no stranded assets. In fact, many of the places that were built in order to do coal fire were built with the phase-out in mind. We're now talking about a boulder rolling downhill at warp speed, that was already going that way, that is going to cost this province and everybody else billions of dollars. We were already headed in that direction. It was already set up. It was already there. The industry understood it. We understood it.

This accelerated phase-out was an absolute debacle. We were already set. Yes. You're right. The Leader of the Opposition in 2012 was absolutely part of that phase-out, something that everybody could get behind, including the industry, which did not put the taxpayer, ratepayer, consumer at risk. In fact, it gave the industry the opportunity to have the right signals to know what to buy into, what to invest into, and to understand what that transition was going to look like. Right now none of us even understands that transition.

As renewables come online, Madam Chair, does everybody here understand that those are double-billed on almost anything because when the wind doesn't blow and the sun doesn't shine, we have to have capacity. There has to be baseline capacity there. That is extremely expensive. It's not just for one piece of infrastructure, not just one windmill. No. There has to be some sort of natural gas electricity provided for when that wind doesn't blow. I might also add that if it's blowing too fast, then the mechanism has to be working so it can slow it down. If it's not blowing at all, then the mechanism has to work so that it can get them moving again.

We have all sorts of issues there. We've got the coal phase-out, the 30 per cent renewables by 2030 strategy, which is a random number, picked out of thin air. Then I think that probably one of the most frustrating things is that when we were in here discussing the caps on the oil sands and the megatonne cap bill and the cogeneration, we came up with – I don't know – it must have been at least 14 amendments to bring cogeneration into the discussion. All the industry provided us, including the government, with tons of information on cogeneration. What did the NDP do? They are penalizing cogeneration at oil sands facilities. These are efficient and excellent uses of energy for an energy-intensive group of people. Yes, we are energy intensive. We provide energy for all of Canada and a good chunk of the world. We're also competing with our neighbours right now. It's something you might want to think about when they're looking at the economies here. When they're creating policy that's an absolute attack on the industry, they're at war with the industry.

They're penalizing cogeneration of the oil sands facilities under the 100-megatonne cap, and I still to this day do not have a description or an understanding as to why that 100-megatonne cap was picked on cogeneration. Cogeneration could be a lot of different things. We brought forward a lot of amendments about different kinds of cogeneration.

In addition to the bills, we have seen gross incompetence in the way that the NDP managed the PPA file. What I'm interested in finding out is: under this government, with all the smoke and mirrors and with the ability of the minister to make random decisions without bringing them in front of the Legislature, what is it that we are signing up for now? I am so curious. In 20 years what are my grandchildren going to be on the hook for outside of the debt that this government is incurring? What kinds of deals are being made with renewable companies that none of us are participating in, that we don't understand, that my kids and my grandkids are going to pay for? I'd like to know about the overbuilds, bringing renewables online without bringing it before the Legislature. What kind of deals?

This government uses the Enron clause, saying that all of this was done in the background somewhere, with nobody knowing what was going on. Well, I'd like to know what's going on behind these closed doors right now because under that 6.8 cap it could be anything. Absolutely anything.

Just a few weeks into introducing an increase to the SGER levy, that has now resulted in – let's say it again – a $4 billion loss for the Balancing Pool. Four billion dollars. I'm sure, absolutely sure that that's covered by that carbon levy – that's what you call the carbon tax, right? – $4 billion plus everything else that is going to somehow be given back to Albertans as a result of this smoke-and-mirrors deal that hides everything under the mat, that is completely manipulative of the Albertans that all of us represent in this House. There are losses that the taxpayer is on the hook for, the taxpayer, ratepayer, consumer. That is why this transparency matters so much, Madam Chair. That is why it is imperative that this minister ask and participate fully in making sure that this Legislature understands what her role is, what her responsibilities are, what she is going to do, and how that comes online so that Albertans understand.

Believe me, renewables are something that everybody wants, but you have to have economic viability and you have to have buy-in. Allow the people to make choices. The government is assuming that people are going to make bad choices, but if you reward people for good choices, they're going to make good choices. Most of the people who have made these decisions made them without government intervention. I know I sure did. I didn't need a government to tell me to put solar panels on my house. That was a decision I made, but I would not expect my neighbour to spend the number of dollars and everything that I did on mine. That would be completely unfair. You have to look at the economy, and you have to look at the viability of these things. As people are more interested, the costs will come down, and more and more people will be able to put solar panels, should they desire, on their houses. They're going to be able to put all sorts of other different kinds of energy to use.

On top of that, even if that was the direction we're going, we don't have the infrastructure. These solar panels and wind farms are not necessarily on site to where we can connect to the grid. How much is that going to cost? On top of that, it's in the bill somewhere under regulations, where we have no say, no debate, no ability to chime in on how that's going to impact Albertans. You're going to hide the cost of your plan instead of fixing the plan to cost less, which does not benefit Albertans at all. How does this government justify this? How?

Again, the major issue here and why the amendment is being brought forward is because the minister has the ability to do this without consulting Albertans. That impacts the market. The beautiful thing about our deregulated market is that it's a free market. Millions upon millions of price signals and indicators from consumers are what dictate to the industry what the market should build and how much the consumers are demanding and what price the consumer is willing to pay. That is a good thing. That is being erased by these bills, completely erased.

The competitive nature of our market has resulted in a sustained period of lower prices. This cap more than doubles the RRO. We are already paying less. We are already there. I think, again, one of the most disconcerting things is that the government thinks that Albertans don't know that. Oh, they know, and they're not buying it.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A2? The hon. Member for Sylvan Lake . . .

Mr. MacIntyre: Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

The Chair: Innisfail.

Mr. MacIntyre: Innisfail would not be happy if we forgot it.

The Chair: Innisfail-Sylvan Lake. I got it.

Mr. MacIntyre: I'd be hearing about it.

Thank you, Madam Chair. I am very pleased to stand today and speak in support of the hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View's amendment to this bill, An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates. Whenever we're looking at legislation, of course, it's important to understand why the legislation is even in this House. When it comes to amendments, it's important to understand the need for this amendment. Well, of course, we understand the story behind Bill 16 in general. It's a story of mismanagement that has been consistent almost from the first day this government came to power. With specific regard to this minister and the minister's conduct in handling the electricity file, we have seen mismanagement after mismanagement, misstep after misstep, which brings us to this day where we have Bill 16 before this House, capping the RRO.

3:20

As I read through Bill 16 and I see the conditions within it, it seems to me that what we're looking at here is a bait and switch, a classic bait and switch. This government and this minister in particular spent a considerable amount of time and resources justifying a 6.8 cent cap on the regulated rate option; not 6.7, not 6.9, not some other number but 6.8 cents. I asked the minister and the government to justify the choice of 6.8. I got no answers. I asked the government for the analysis that led to the determination of 6.8. I've seen nothing. All this time the government has been out there with their flags and banners waving this 6.8 cent cap on the RRO, which, I should point out, is somewhere around 3 cents right now, so a cap at more than double where we're currently at with no justification, no analysis presented to this House, repeatedly asked for, repeatedly denied.

It makes me wonder: why, then, do we have 6.8 written into this piece of legislation when the minister is now being given substantial overreach to change that rate to whatever her little heart desires without having to come back in this Legislature and answer for it? Not only is this a bait and switch – classic bait and switch – there is zero accountability for what the switch will look like. This is what we're faced with right now. This government has been declaring to the good people of Alberta, "We're here to protect you; here's a 6.8 cent cap on the RRO," but the Minister of Energy also has the authority, unchallenged by this Legislature, to change that rate after the fact. No accountability. Madam Chair, that really is false pretense here. There's no justification, no analysis, nothing.

This is classic flying by the seat of your pants. We have seen that from the Minister of Energy from the get-go, from this government from the get-go. They changed the carbon tax under the specified gas emitters rate without reading the contract, without understanding the implications. They were warned from within their department and from within industry that doing so was going to result in substantial consequences. They ignored the warnings both from inside the government and from industry and pressed on ahead. That is gross mismanagement, and now here we have a bill before this House giving that same minister and this same government absolute arbitrary authority to change this cap to whatever they want. No. Not acceptable. Absolutely not acceptable.

If we had a minister and a government that had demonstrated some really good common-sense management on the electricity file from the get-go, that would be a different situation, but that's not the case. We have gone from a Balancing Pool with a surplus in their account of $705 million, and this government vaporized that in less than 12 months and so harmed the financial viability of the pool that they actually were going out for advice on what to do in case of insolvency due to the mismanagement of this government and the constant delays in giving direction to the Balancing Pool by this Minister of Energy specifically. Letter after letter from the chair of the pool to the minister asking for direction on the consumer allocation. No answer, no answer, no answer repeatedly. That is mismanagement, and now we're supposed to just: oh, yes; yes, we'll give the minister absolute, unquestioned authority to change this cap to whatever she wants now. Having gone before the people of Alberta in the press and here saying, "Oh, 6.8 is the number; 6.8 is what people need" but then giving her absolute authority to go change that willy-nilly whenever she wants either up or down – I'm sure part of the reason is because the minister is well aware that for every cent over that 6.8 it's going to cost Alberta taxpayers another $10 million a month.

But, then, what this government has been up to with the electricity file is shifting the burden onto the taxpayer because of their constant mismanagement of this file. As I started to say, the Balancing Pool started out with a surplus of $705 million. This government's inaction vaporized that in less than a year, putting the pool in an insolvent situation. The government came and introduced Bill 34 to bail the pool out. It never ever in its history needed that in the past till that Minister of Energy mismanaged this file. By the government's own projections under Bill 34 this government is going to have to extend some $4.437 billion to the pool to bail it out for no other reason than this government's mishandling of the file. That is not only unfair to Albertans; it's just plain unfair every way you want to look at it. It's unfair that the people of Alberta are going to be burdened with billions of dollars of debt through the ineptness of this government. And now we're supposed to just sit back and say: oh, well, yeah; they are talking about 6.8 cents, but we'll just let the minister change that if she wants to. No coming back to this House to face any kind of questioning about it. No, she just can do it on the fly.

So there are some questions. What are the anticipated financial and economic impacts, then, of Bill 16? Is this minister going to table these sorts of things? Good managers do things like that. They do economic impact assessments. They do a financial impact assessment. They do consultation broadly. Where's the consultation? There are well over 80 players in the Balancing Pool. I'm sure there are 80 companies with opinions. We have dozens and dozens of retail energy suppliers and providers out there. I'm sure there are dozens and dozens of opinions that they have. These are the people who are being impacted by this. There are consumer groups. There are REAs. We should have the city of Medicine Hat here. There are all kinds of consultations that need to take place over this, especially in view of this minister asking for arbitrary power to change that cap to whatever it is that she wants.

There's a significant backstory behind Bill 16, Bill 34, Bill 27. There's a huge backstory, and that backstory is fraught with mismanagement, with mishandling, misstep after misstep. I wholeheartedly support the hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View's amendment because what it does is cause at least a modicum of accountability so that the minister will have to come back here to change that 6.8 cent cap to something else, and she will have to answer to the Legislature and the people of Alberta and the businesses that are involved and justify that change. There has been no justification for choosing 6.8 cents thus far, none whatsoever. There has been no presentation, tabling, or anything to support that number being chosen. We've gotten vague non answers every time we've asked about it. Now here we have the minister putting forward a bill that says 6.8, but – but – she can change it any day she wants to. Frankly, this is a bait and switch, and it's a very poorly executed one.

3:30

I think it's very important to this Legislature and to the people of Alberta that the Minister of Energy take time – and today would be a fine day – to stand in this Legislature and explain to the people of Alberta how she came up with 6.8 cents to begin with. Who were the stakeholders that were consulted on this? Let's have a list of them. I'm familiar with a significant number of the players in the electricity market. As I said, I think there are well over 80 of them in the pool alone and dozens and dozens of retailers. Then there are the generators, too. Everybody has skin in this game, and a significant amount. Every time this government touches the electricity file, someone is being harmed, whether it be the taxpayer, the ratepayer, or the players themselves and the stakeholders themselves.

In a democracy it behooves the government in power to take the time and take care. Be gentle on people. That's not been a hallmark of this government's legislative history, to be gentle on Albertans, to be gentle on our industry, to be gentle on our job creators. No. This government just runs roughshod over everybody because they've got an ideology and they've got a plan and they've got everything figured out and they push on ahead. Well, all right. I think it would behoove the Minister of Energy to come before this House with a list of who was consulted. What was said in those discussions? What was actually said? It's one thing to say: yes, we consulted a dozen companies or two dozen stakeholders. But what did they say?

You know, just on a note that is perhaps a side note, but it is relevant to this, Madam Chair: that's why putting bills in committee is so important. It's so that the entire Legislature here and the members of the committee and the public have an open discussion about a piece of legislation coming before this Legislature. In a healthy democracy it seems to me only sensible that things would go to committee on a consistent basis so that people could discuss these things with us before we get to third reading, before it is proclaimed as law, before it's going to impact them, not after the fact.

If we recall, back in the Bill 6 debacle this government assured us on the day that the bill was dropped in this House that it was fine the way it was. Well, farmers disagreed, and eventually the government even listened, at least partly, and put forward in this House six pages of amendments to their perfectly fine five-page bill. Here we have another bill, Bill 16, coming before this Legislature, and it is fine like it is. Well, no it's not.

I think it makes sense that there be some further consultation on this, but I understand the minister will say that she has consulted. I would like to know who. I think the people of Alberta deserve to know who. What did they say? What kind of analysis led to choosing 6.8 cents? Why is there a clause within this in section 2(2) giving the minister arbitrary power to change that rate? Why would that rate have to change given that the current RRO is less than half of where the 6.8 cent cap is now? What is about to transpire? What forward projections has the government made that determined 6.8 to be the magic number that we need to cap the RRO at? Why wasn't it some other number? None of these questions have been answered. The procedures that have even been used to develop this entire bill: those need to be spelled out to Albertans. Why is this government doing what they're doing?

We're putting forward an amendment here, Madam Chair, in an attempt to do our job as the Official Opposition to hold this government accountable for its actions, and I realize this government has an aversion to that. Nevertheless, this amendment is extremely important in that it will require the minister to come and answer the big question: why? Why do you need to change that cap, if you need to change it? And it will require of the minister the analysis that led to the decision, just like I'm asking for the analysis that led to this decision in the first place.

This is not an unreasonable request – in the business world these kinds of analyses are done all the time – and especially so when you consider that every time this government does something on the electricity file, it's not just a buck or two impact. It seems like every time they turn around and do something on the electricity file, it costs us another billion. Well, that's a ton of money at a time when we don't have it. It's important that this government be much more responsible with other people's money than they have been. So I think it's quite sensible to insist on the analysis. Let's see. How did you arrive at these numbers? How is it that you believe you need to have this kind of overreaching authority to change it on the fly? Those are very serious questions that, I believe, this government needs to answer.

Further to that, I would hope that as we go forward, all members in this House will support this amendment, want to ensure that we do the very best for the people of Alberta that we possibly can and ensure that everything that goes through this Legislature has a very valid reason for being here. Passing a law for the sake of passing a law is simply not acceptable to the people of Alberta. We need to have legislation that actually improves life here, and if this government believes that Bill 16 is going to improve life here, then I think it behooves them to present their rationale and justification for it. Let's see the numbers. The numbers always tell a story. Let's hear what the people that the government consulted with said about this. If the government isn't prepared to do that, then I guess the next question that needs to be asked is: why? What are you hiding? This is a democracy. It's supposed to be open and transparent governance. I think it's only fair and reasonable that the government comes clean on some of the rationale behind not only Bill 16, but that's where we are right now.

I mean, I have given and my hon. colleague for Chestermere-Rocky View has given substantial reason and rationale for this amendment. We're concerned that this Bill 16 is giving the government and the Minister of Energy in particular much too much unaccountable authority to do something that has a very far-reaching impact on the electricity sector in our province.

I will remind the House that for every cent over the 6.8 cent cap, that costs us another $10 million a month. Ten million dollars a month. I realize that this government will do what they can to make sure that doesn't appear on our electricity bills because, as I've said before, this government is terrified of seeing increases in electricity costs on a monthly electricity bill.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the member for the amendment. You know, there is a pragmatic reason for having section 6(1)(b) in the legislation, and it has absolutely nothing to do with the fearmongering that's being spouted right now.

Some Albertans get their electricity from sources other than major providers that are overseen by the AUC, the Alberta Utilities Commission, specifically many rural Albertans and the residents of Medicine Hat. So, you know, the government does expect rural electrification associations, the REAs, and municipalities to charge reasonable rates that are in line with other providers, and that will include being in line with the 6.8 cent cap. Government does not intend to remove the powers of the REA boards of directors or city councils that independently set their own rates. However, to help ensure that rates are reasonable, the government will put a mechanism in place that will provide reimbursement for reasonable rates, and here we have our mechanism that we're discussing in this section.

Should these providers choose to put in place unreasonable rates, the government will work with them and the relevant regulatory authorities to ensure that rates are consistent with other providers and in line with the regulatory requirements. You know, the reality is that the opposition wants to obstruct the introduction of these protection measures for consumers, and I find that a bit shameful.

With that said, Madam Chair, I will not be supporting this amendment. Thank you for your time.

The Chair: Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Madam Chair. Poppcock. I find it absolutely amazing that that hon. member would suggest for one moment that REAs, which are a co-operative, which are owned by their members, managed by their members, directed by their members, are going to charge, quote, unreasonable rates. It is absolute insanity that this hon. member would charge rural electrification association members and member-driven boards with the potential for being unreasonable to their own people. They are not the NDP government. They are local people.

The last thing they need is big, heavy-handed government stepping in where they are not wanted. I know so many people in those REA boards and members of those REAs, and I will stand in this House and defend their integrity to this member and any other that should dare to charge them with the potential for being unreasonable to their own families. REAs are member-driven organizations. These are farmers and acreage owners and small-business owners. They know one another. They're related many times. They've been farming in the same community for generations.

Those REAs are the lifeblood of rural economic development. They got there in spite of being neglected by successive generations of government who focused on putting electricity supply in larger communities and left rural communities to fend for themselves. Those farmers – God bless them – stood up together. They created REAs, they put poles in the ground, they strung wire themselves in those old days, and they powered up rural Alberta. We would not have a rural Alberta today like it is if it hadn't been for REAs. It is shameful for that member or any other member in this House to suggest for one moment that those dear souls are unreasonable or could possibly be unreasonable and need this socialist government to come in heavy handed and knock them down. Shame on that hon. member. He owes an apology to the REAs in Alberta.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise today to speak against the amendment proposed by the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View. Let me begin by saying that the member in no way, shape, or manner was saying that any REA is charging unreasonable rates. What he was alluding to is that there are 32 different REAs... [interjections] If the member for Chestermere would let me speak, I would be grateful. It's my right to speak freely in this House.

There are 32 different REAs across Alberta. They are facing different realities than in Calgary and Edmonton. What this provision, section 2, does is that it provides in section 2(1) for those providers who are governed by or where AUC, the Alberta Utilities Commission, has oversight. Those will be dealt with under 2(1). Under section 2 there are those REAs, 32 of them, and then there are five municipalities, which are not governed under the previous section. They will be going under section 2. Unless the minister makes regulation, the 6.8-cent cap applies. But rural realities can be different, and that provision gives the minister an ability to look into the specific circumstances affecting those REAs and to set the rates and deal with them in a manner that is appropriate and that is best suited to the needs of those REAs. That's all these two provisions do.

On that note, I will urge all members to vote against this amendment. Thank you.

The Chair: Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. You know, the reality facing REAs, the biggest issue that REAs have, is that they're profitable. Nobody wanted anything to do with rural Alberta because it was an expense and a liability. When the REAs stepped in, they built the infrastructure. Everybody that belongs to the REA is a part of that corporation. They profit from it. But now that they're profitable, of course, the big corporations want to step in and take them over, and that's the biggest reality and the biggest problem facing REAs today.

Now, the idea that this government can arbitrarily step in and set the rates for the REAs and make them noncompetitive with...

An Hon. Member: That's not going to happen.

Mr. Hanson: Well, we would sure like some clarification on that because, you know, if I look back in Hansard to what you just said, it sure appears that way. Now, I'm sure that the REAs are going to be very nervous when they hear that, that they may be treated differently from larger distributors in the province, that are going to make them less profitable, less competitive, and make it more attractive for their members to sell out to a large corporation. It is absolutely ludicrous that the government would expect that people are going to sit back and allow that to happen after all their hard work.

One of the greatest things about the REAs that I've seen – and I've talked to them on many occasions at their meetings, and the Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville was with me at one, I believe out in Willingdon. When we spoke to them, I assured them that their fight is our fight, that their fight is Alberta's fight. They're the last man standing in this fight for control and to not have a monopoly in this province. We commend them. Also, this government, rather than hindering them and making it harder for them to operate and be competitive, should be standing in and protecting that small guy so that we can eliminate the chance of a monopoly in this province.

Now, if that's what this bill is projecting – and we'll be looking into that a little bit more, and we'll be looking into Hansard to see exactly what was said there – and if there is an explanation, it would be great if the minister would stand up and say it in the House, in Hansard, so that we could have it, have the explanation. Tell us what it's all about. I give you that opportunity right now.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A2? The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. W. Anderson: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like now to rise and speak to the amendment to Bill 16 by the hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View regarding regulated rates. I think this amendment notes that section 2(2) is amended by striking out clause (b) and substituting the following:

- (b) the rate of 6.8 cents per kWh if that rate is lower than the rate referred to in clause (a).

Clause 2(2)(b) currently reads:

- (b) whichever of the following rates applies, if that rate is lower than the rate referred to in clause (a):
 - (i) the applicable rate per kWh, if any, provided for by regulations under section 6(1)(b);
 - (ii) if no applicable rate is provided for by regulations under section 6(1)(b), the rate of 6.8 cents per kWh applies.

Also, section 6(1) is amended by striking out clause (b), which currently reads:

- (b) determining or providing for mechanisms for determining one or more rates per kWh for the purposes of section 2(2)(b)(i) and determining that rate, if any, that applies to a particular owner or rate class of [that] particular owner.

If the true intent of this government was to build in an expiry date of 2021, why on earth would this government need to build in legislation that permits the minister at any time the flexibility to increase that rate? This once again proves a gross overreach of power for the minister to pass a bill under the pretense that the RRO cap must be 6.8 cents and then have clauses to insert that give the minister the power to change it at will.

Are Albertans supposed to trust that the cap on regulated rates will not be changed at any given minute like they trusted the cap that the government put on the borrowing line? They then came back into this House and rejected it only a couple of months later. Why should Albertans trust this government?

If the minister wants to raise the rate after imposing such legislation, then she should be required to seek consent of this Legislature. It seems pretty pretentious that this government would write this bill, tell Albertans what they are doing to protect them, and then also drop in any way out through the clauses that perhaps the general public would not see or catch onto. How can this government be trusted?

What happened to their nice little cap gesture when it came to the province's debt load? They said one thing, and then just as fast as making that decision, they came back to destroy that debt load cap. Now they want to write in a clause that they wouldn't even have to come back to the House if they wanted to get rid of the cap. This is truly preposterous.

Every time we are called to this House to debate a bill this government has put through, they never cease to amaze me how they can create such crafty legislation, saying one thing to the public and then building in duck-outs in the very same legislation. This is backward and hypocritical and just proves why this government cannot be trusted.

Madam Chair, this bill has a built-in expiry date for 2021, which is four years from now. This minister does not need the option given to her to arbitrarily determine a rate after she has made the promise to Albertans to cap their electricity cost rates at 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour. The cap that the minister is setting with this legislation is already double the current RRO, and after this bill is passed, she is going to be permitted to change the agreed-upon rate to any rate of her choosing.

Just for a reference, the cost is driven up by $10 million for every 1 cent above the cap that the RRO price reaches. Ten million dollars. This exponentially increases the risk to taxpayers if the minister were to arbitrarily decide to lower the cap. Like I mentioned last week, the ratepayer and the taxpayer are the same person. If the consumer is not paying the price, the taxpayer is. Someone has to pay for this power, whether it comes out directly from their pocket or in the form of a bill or if it comes directly out of your pocket through the carbon tax, that each and every Albertan is forced to pay.

The other way the taxpayer is directly paying for anything above the cap is through general revenue. That will not only come directly out of the taxpayer's pocket but will be coming out of their children's and grandchildren's pockets for decades – decades – to come. This government doesn't care about that. They only care about now and about anything they think might get them re-elected.

The minister needs to come out and tell Albertans what her true intention really is with this bill. The 6.8-cent cap should not be changeable in regulation, and the minister needs to come clean on why she has added this clause into this legislation. If the minister wants to change up the legislated cap, she should have to come back to this House and explain to Albertans and everyone in this House why she would like to do so instead of just arbitrarily being able to do so within regulations.

I would ask those in this House to please support this amendment. Those sitting on the other side: just talk to your constituents, get some feedback from them, consult with them, see what they think, and tell them what this bill is really all about, if not for yourselves, then for your constituents and for your children and for your grandchildren. Ask everybody who voted for you and put you in a position of power. Your constituents need answers.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Chair. A couple of things I just wanted to address here. When the member was talking about the REAs and all of this, I just wanted to – the REAs are our families, okay? Just to reiterate what the hon. members from the opposition side said, these folks are already competitive. They already function. And, just so you know, they are not governed by the AUC. They are not governed. The minister was trying to explain about the number of REAs and who is involved – thank you for that description – but the concern that we have right now, after the other member's comments, is very, very simple and, actually, glaring because of the fact that the two would have been brought together in the same conversation.

Let's talk about this for a minute. I don't have the Blues in front of me, but I'd like to understand what the member meant by reimbursement. First of all, to whom? By whom? Through the AUC to consumers that are already being taken care of by the REAs, which are more competitive in some aspects than a lot of other places? I mean, a lot of the larger companies are trying to buy these guys out. They're highly profitable. So that's the first thing.

The second piece is that I'd like to understand what he meant by unreasonable rates and to whom he's speaking. That needs to be clarified. Then the real concern is that because the AUC does not govern the REAs, now are the REAs the next thing to be removed in some piece of this legislation? Is that the next piece that we have to look forward to? I hope that this government can stand up, without a shadow of a doubt, and say that that's not going to happen, because that is a concern. Now, is the agriculture minister under that going to remove the REAs and put them under the governance of the AUC? Is that what's next on the docket here? I would like to have some clarity about that. I can tell you that with those 32 groups that the minister was talking about and all of those, you're going to have an uprising here if that's what's on the docket. If this minister, the Minister of Energy, is allowed to do that in the regulations without bringing it forward to Albertans and to change the way that the REAs function with their electricity within rural Alberta, that is not the way to do this.

I'm extremely concerned, based on what this member said, that all of a sudden the folks of the REAs, because they're competitive, might be at risk now of losing their ability to run their electricity the way that they do. They stay competitive because they understand the market. Now, the government has already removed the market signals in order for anybody to be competitive, so now is the plan that the government is going to go after REAs? I would like a very clear answer to this: yes or no? The other part is that the REAs can only compete within their service areas, so they can only compete with Fortis and ATCO, with those people, in those service areas. Outside of those service areas they can't compete.

It makes no sense that this member would bring up the AUC along with the REAs and then give the impression that somehow they would charge unreasonable rates to the families that they serve who are also members of that REA. Is this a concern? Should we be concerned on this side that the government's next piece of legislation is going to remove REAs? Literally, I want to know because we need to understand that now, and we'd better start doing some consultation. I can guarantee you that you're going to have a gallery full of angry members coming in to fight to make sure that their competitive model is not run by a socialist government.

Thank you.

Ms McKittrick: Madam Chair, I've been listening for the last few minutes to the opposition really misconstruing words that may have been said by the hon. member, and I'm standing here today to be very clear that the government is actually protecting the REAs through this bill, that we are not disadvantaging the REAs, and that we have spent a lot of time trying to figure out how to keep the REAs functioning while they have faced no support from the opposition for so many years. The reason the REAs have been perishing and have been taken over by Fortis and by others is because they had no support from the opposition, but here on this side we are working very hard with the REAs.

We understand the word "co-operatives." I hate to tell the opposition, but the REAs were formed because there were no electricity providers in the rural areas, so they went to the roots, through the chair, of what we believe as New Democrats, and they actually formed a co-operative. A co-operative is where people pool their resources to be able to provide services that they really need.

Madam Chair, I just want to really emphasize again and again that the government has been working with the REAs. There's been a lot of consultation with both the minister of agriculture and the Minister of Energy to make sure that the REAs maintain their strength in our rural communities and can be really functioning. I personally have really appreciated the work that has happened with both ministries. Through this bill and other acts we're really working hard to make sure that the REAs can survive even though they have been totally not supported by the former government.

What this section reflects is the significant effort of the government to accommodate the REAs' unique circumstances and contribution to Alberta's economy, especially the rural economies, whereby they are not regulated, as with the other RRO providers. The other side is undermining this work, which is the result of significant consultation with the REAs. I know that I myself and the members for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville and Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater and all of the other rural MLAs, the Member for Stony Plain have spent a lot of time with our REAs because we understand the power of the REAs in the economy of rural Alberta. This provision, as was discussed, is the result of that, and we are proud to have done the hard work to include them in the collaboration.

Now, my understanding is that there are a number of consultations at the moment, and I know that all of the REAs have been involved because I've been in touch with many of the REAs. Actually, I'm working very closely with the REAs to make sure that they are involved. So what I would really appreciate, Madam Chair, from the opposition is that they would acknowledge the work that our government has done to recognize the work of the REAs in rural Alberta and the contribution they are making to energy rates, especially the work that's happening.

Thank you.

The Chair: I'll recognize Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I do appreciate the last member's passionate comments in defence of REAs, and I do agree with her on the need to defend REAs and the importance of them in the history of our province, our whole province but particularly rural Alberta.

But the issue that we have – and we were watching the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein speaking on this bill, speaking specifically on the amendment. The reason that he would not support the amendment, he made very, very clear, was that there were concerns that REAs would take advantage of their members. Now, the hon. member who just spoke was very passionate about her concern for the way REAs are treated, and I want to be clear, Madam Chair, that I agree with her on that. She should be upset that one of her hon. colleagues has either shown a complete ignorance of what an REA is or that this is actually something that the government is trying to bring forward with this bill. This is an issue, so the hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake, who rose immediately after hearing those comments, asked some very clear questions of the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein on whether or not this was the intent of this bill.

If the point is to protect REAs, then they should be supporting the hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View's amendment because that's the point of that amendment as well, as has been pointed out by the hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

An Hon. Member: I think we need a standing vote on that.

Mr. Nixon: Yeah. I mean, the standing vote on this will be interesting.

The Member for Calgary-Klein clearly rose in this House and said that, basically, the government's policy and the reason that they were bringing forward this legislation was because they were concerned that REAs would take advantage of their members.

Now, does the government know what an REA is? Does the hon. member know what an REA is? REAs are run by their members. Their boards are run by their members. They're made up of their members. They have a long history in this province of making sure that rural Albertans could have electricity. In fact, we would not have electricity in rural Alberta if it wasn't for REAs.

Why would it be implied, when we're talking about an amendment designed to protect REAs' autonomy and their ability to be able to do what they do – why the member would rise and say that is confusing. Certainly, I think it's the government's responsibility to rise and acknowledge that statement and explain it. If the member misspoke or misunderstood what an REA is, that's fine, but there needs to be some clarification now, for those of us who represent REAs like myself, of what exactly the government's intention is for REAs because it's very, very concerning.

Now, the hon. Member for Sherwood Park, I believe, also rose, talking about Fortis and making disparaging comments about Fortis. Why are we specifically talking about companies or specific REAs in the middle of this debate? If that is the intention of this bill, then that needs to be explained. If that is why this government is voting against this very, very reasonable amendment, because they have some sort of hidden agenda when it comes to the REAs or Fortis, that needs to be explained.
