One of the four objectives, as you say, is to eliminate the black market, but most recently one of your MLAs has speculated that you may be considering a franchise model. Aside from this not being one of the two models contemplated on your cannabis framework website, there is a significant risk that an inflexible retail model wouldn’t meet consumer demand, allowing the black market to thrive. Again to the Premier: is your government actually considering a franchise system, or is it just unauthorized speculation from an MLA?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very proud of the work we've done around cannabis and of the consultation that we've gone out with, not once but twice, to ensure that we're talking to Albertans, that we're getting to all perspectives. We've had over 80 meetings with different stakeholders and different groups with different perspectives on things. We're going to take that all into account, we're going to make decisions, and we're not going to engage in wild speculation.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, if the government does do the right thing and allow Alberta entrepreneurs to operate cannabis retail shops, another important question is: who will be allowed to invest? There are potential benefits to allowing vertical integration, which is not part of Alberta's liquor retailing system. Cannabis producers understand the security considerations, and they understand the market. Again to the Premier: if you do allow private investment in retail cannabis, have you given consideration to allowing producers to open and operate retail stores?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I've said, we've heard a lot of different perspectives from across Alberta. We do certainly understand that Albertans support our main values, which are to ensure that we are getting the black market out and to ensure that we are keeping the health and safety of children and of our roads and of our workplaces at forefront of mind. We intend to do exactly that as we work forward. Obviously, we've done a lot of thinking about this and a lot of modelling and a lot of conversations, but this is not the time for wild speculation. This is a very important issue.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Service Dog Training and Certification

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Service dogs are vital supports for people with disabilities. Long wait-lists, unmanageable expenses, and restrictive legislation created by the previous government have resulted in Alberta's reality, only approximately 80 to 100 active service dog teams. In March of 2017 our government announced a pilot that would seek to improve the qualified list of trainers and testers. To the Minister of Community and Social Services: how has this pilot progressed in the last seven months?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. We know that Albertans have faced long wait-lists for too many years, and that is why we are taking steps to make life better for Albertans with disabilities. Last spring we took action to increase access to service dogs with $250,000 of funding for a new training pilot. We are supporting more schools to train dogs, and we are making it easier for owner-trained dogs to get public access.

Thank you.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms Renaud: Thank you. There has been a great deal of work across the country developing national service dog team standards. How will the Alberta regulations and standards align with these national standards?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question and for her advocacy on this issue. As I said, we will continue to monitor the progress of this pilot in our work, and in the meantime our new regulation makes it easier for Albertans with disabilities to have their service dog qualified. From March to July several organizations tested Alberta's new standard and qualified list process. The new qualified list of providers will be available in the coming weeks.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Ms Renaud: Thank you. Not all service animals come from accredited organizations. Some are trained by their owners. How will this pilot support non traditionally trained service dog teams in terms of testing?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. Our new regulation allows dogs that are trained by their owners to take a test and become qualified in Alberta. Through our new regulation we are certainly making life better for Albertans with disabilities, and unfortunately the opposition wants to make life harder. They view support for Albertans with disabilities as a giveaway and want to slash 20 per cent of that, and we won't let that happen. We will continue to work with Albertans with disabilities to make sure they get the supports they need.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The NDP has repeatedly talked about getting our resources to tidewater, and unfortunately all they do is talk. According to the Petroleum Services Association, who are industry experts, you know, those people that actually work in the industry, the only thing this government has been successful at is destroying investor confidence, and it's time for the Alberta Premier and Trudeau to stand up for the oil industry. The PSAC president may agree with me when I say that this government needs a proctologist to do a cranium exam if they think that Albertans are buying that the carbon tax has bought this mythical social licence. When will this government stop the talk and start the walk?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, when we talk about investment in Alberta, we're proud of Alberta companies who have stepped up and are doubling down on oil sands investment. We're proud of the recent Japanese investment in Alberta of $2 billion. Those investments are because of our climate leadership plan, which is bringing carbon out of the oil and becoming a product that people want. We're working very hard for access to tidewater. Again, we have one pipeline under construction . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Loewen: Given that that is more rhetoric and not an answer . . .

The Speaker: No preambles, please.

Mr. Loewen: . . . and given that when it was announced in 2015, the carbon tax was to reduce emissions and buy social licence for pipelines and that earlier this week the Finance minister claimed that the carbon tax was responsible for the reduction of small-business taxes and that this summer the government claimed that it was for green line transit, Mr. Speaker, this government needs to get its story straight. I believe in recycling as much as anyone, but could the minister please explain how many times the same money from the carbon tax can be recycled and reannounced?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, the climate leadership plan and the carbon levy money are being used to innovate and make Alberta greener not just in the energy industry, which is full of innovation and doing a lot of things to make the carbon greener in the oil industry, but we're making investments in things like the green line and green technology. Unfortunately, our opposition would make $9 billion in cuts to those structures, which would take away the green line in Calgary, for example, something we don't want. We're working very hard in Alberta to create green . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Hon. member, no preambles. Second supplemental. Go ahead.

Mr. Loewen: Given that the carbon tax was supposed to buy social licence for pipelines and that now Albertans just want a return for their defective social licence, which was simply not as advertised, and that this government claims two pipelines as a result of the carbon tax when in reality two pipelines have been cancelled and their friends are protesting the others and that just like the St. Lawrence Seaway downstream of Montreal, this doesn't pass the smell test, when will this government consider their own toxic emissions, simply admit that their crowning achievement is an abject failure, repeal the carbon tax, and start supporting Alberta with actions, not just words?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, our climate leadership plan was cited by the Prime Minister when he gave permission for the two pipelines, one of which is being built as we speak. But other investments that are being done with that with respect to the energy industry are $998 million for large-scale renewable energy, bioenergy, technology, coal community transition, and other climate leadership plan initiatives. Because of the climate leadership plan we're looking at $566 million for energy efficiency, $565 million for the small business . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Workers' Compensation Board Surplus Funds Support for Small Business

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, today the CFIB released a report showing that workers' compensation boards across the country are retaining approximately $6.8 billion in surplus funds, with Alberta's share amounting to $1.9 billion. Typically Alberta employers see rebates, but in the wake of the WCB review panel report Alberta job creators have yet to see anything come back in 2016. To the Minister of Labour: will you confirm that your government will not be transferring WCB surpluses into general government revenue?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of seniors.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, all employees have the right to a safe, fair, and healthy work environment, and our review of the WCB is supporting that to happen. We are absolutely committed to working with the WCB, who works with workers throughout the province to make sure that they're treated fairly, and we'll be following the recommendations.

Mr. Hunter: Given that Alberta employers paid their premiums in good faith with the understanding that any surpluses would be returned to them at the end of the year and given that all the additional costs imposed on Alberta businesses by this NDP government are really starting to add up, to the same minister: will you do the right thing and direct the WCB to follow past practices and immediately return the $1.9 billion to Alberta employers? That could really help them right now.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Of course, it's absolutely crucial that Albertans feel confident that the Workers' Compensation Board provide fair compensation and meaningful rehabilitation. The last comprehensive review was back 15 years ago. Certainly, we're working hard to make sure that Albertans are treated fairly, employers and workers, and we know that the opposition would be cutting billions from our budget and making it much harder for Albertans.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, given that in addition to corporate tax increases, minimum wage increases, and the carbon tax, the federal government now wants to impose punishing new tax increases on Canadian small businesses and given that this NDP government has consistently shown a propensity not to stand up to the Trudeau Liberals and fight for Alberta businesses, Minister, will you not help them now when they really need it? Small businesses desperately need you to champion them.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'll thank the member for the question. Our government has stood with and stands up for small businesses. We know that Alberta small businesses have a larger impact on the economy than businesses anywhere in the country. That's why we reduced the small-business tax rate by a third. We are the second lowest in the country. There are a number of initiatives that we've introduced that are supporting businesses, whether they are starting up or they're looking at growing, including the investor tax credit, which will see Albertans have the ability to invest in companies in their own backyard. We support small business. The opposition would cut billions to hurt businesses even more. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order, please.

Opioid Use Prevention and Treatment

Mr. Fildebrandt: In March the opposition asked for an emergency debate on the opioid crisis in Alberta. All members of this House worked together to help those battling addiction. Since the minister struck the opioid emergency commission six months ago, it has held just three meetings and made only one recommendation, the creation of safe injection sites. Between April 1 and June 30 119 people have died from opioid overdoses. Will the minister please tell this House why the emergency commission has not yet provided any recommendation on addictions treatment or prevention?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am so happy to be able to comment on this. Just earlier today the opioid commission posted a series of other recommendations. I have accepted all of the commission's recommendations to date. These include funding substance abuse treatment for doctors' offices at primary care networks, funding for indigenous communities to develop resources tailored to their specific needs, and exploration of supervised injectable opioid replacement therapy for Albertans who've not responded to other treatments. We've also made improvements and expansions to the provincial naloxone program as well as expanding treatment across the province.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Mr. Speaker, given that in April a 17-year-old boy from a village in my constituency was thrown from his horse, breaking his spine, and was discharged from the hospital with 80 hydromorphone tablets, which pulled this previously clean kid down into the world of addictions and street drugs, and given that he went to his mother seeking help but that in southeastern Alberta there was nothing available for him, what is this government doing to ensure that youth have access to detox treatment in rural Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First, I would like to express my condolences for the member's constituent. That is a tale that is far too often told throughout Alberta, which is why we've been working very carefully with the members of the College of Physicians & Surgeons of Alberta to ensure that not only are opioids prescribed properly in our province but that there's also an extended treatment plan that involves tapering off in appropriate doses and supports as an individual ends their prescription period.

With respect to the question around treatment, we have worked to expand access to opioid replacement therapy treatments across the province, including telehealth, through . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, given that the family of this boy paid $18,000 out of pocket to send him to a youth detox centre in Winnipeg and that his mother came to me not asking for the government to reimburse them but to ensure that in the future our youth have access to detox treatment in a timely fashion and given that I've seen first-hand the devastation that the opioid crisis is having in rural and First Nations communities, will the minister speed up her work to provide real results to prevent and treat youth addiction in our rural and First Nations communities?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. One of the key findings of the opioid response commission has been that there is a need for additional services across our province. We have moved forward on expanding many of the treatments that are currently available. There is more work to be done. The work that we have done is saving lives, but our work will continue.

2:30 E-mail Management in Government

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, yesterday this government outrageously claimed to be the most open and transparent that anyone had ever seen. The facts are different. Just ask the Information Commissioner. The facts are that the Premier's most trusted advisers and inner circle, Brian Topp and Anne McGrath, sent a total of two e-mails between them in their entire time at the Premier's office. No one believes this. The Premier needs to come clean. What are the Premier's key decision-makers hiding from Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Service Alberta.

Ms McLean: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I have stated, we believe that government should be open and transparent. These are values that we work on very hard. Access to information is an important issue that we take very seriously. That's why we're practically sharing more information with the public than the government has ever before.

Mr. Speaker, with respect to the issue of e-mails, certainly I can attest to the fact that our ministerial offices receive training in terms of FOIP. With respect to what types of records need to be saved . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
First supplemental.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this secretive government has welcomed the opportunity to clear the air on the mass deletion of 800,000 government records unearthed by the Official Opposition, will the Premier reassure the people of Alberta that her innermost circle has not, is not, will not be using private e-mail servers to conduct government business and hide from Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I've stated, we welcome the investigation, and we're confident that our actions with respect to records management are in line with the law. The opposition might like to yell and scream more than they like to listen, but I would like to give some facts to put in context. The government of Alberta processes approximately 1 million incoming and outgoing e-mails each and every day. When we put 800,000 in context, it might sound huge, but I think we need to put it in context of the government of Alberta, not our personal e-mail inboxes.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cooper: Given that the United Conservative opposition uncovered a shady scheme to reward government employees for deleting records and since yesterday this minister admitted that these incentives were not allowed by government policies, can the minister please update the House: what other rule-breaking, illegal government activities is her government turning a blind eye to?

The Speaker: I caution again the use of certain words and the implications that come along with them.

The hon. minister.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would invite the member opposite to wait upon the results of the Privacy Commissioner. I certainly intend to take her guidance on this issue, although he seems more interested in a smear campaign despite the fact that his own leader of his own party absolutely refuses to abide by honesty and transparency and the promises that he's made to Albertans. That's why I'm so concerned by the fact that Jason Kenney . . .

Mr. Nixon: Point of order.

The Speaker: Point of order noted.

Ms McLean: . . . has continued to break a promise to Albertans with respect to disclosure of his list of donors.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
A point of order was noted.
The Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Carbon Levy and Agricultural Costs

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The opposition has been warning this government that their carbon tax, like their federal pal's plan, will do nothing to help emissions but continue to punish farmers and consumers. While it's long been maintained by this side that agriculture provides a carbon sink, a federal ministerial memo has now confirmed this. Minister, will your government stop your war on Alberta's farmers and roll back plans to increase the carbon tax January 1?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. In my travels across the province talking to producers, processors, importers, exporters, they don't ask me about the carbon levy, about what a burden it is. They ask me what more they can do to do their part on the climate leadership policy. They believe it's the right thing to do, as we do. Obviously, they do not.

Thank you.

Mr. Strankman: Again, Mr. Speaker, given that this recent federal memorandum, which I will happily table, shows that a carbon tax of $50 per tonne will cost the average farmer $3,700 per year in increased costs without any measurable lowering of emissions – in fact, the same document states that Canadian agriculture is creating more economic activity without increasing its GHG emissions – Minister, do you have any internal briefing notes, memos, or research documents disproving this federal memo's findings and, if so, would you table them in this House?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very proud of this government's climate leadership policy. It also extends to the agricultural community. The agricultural community is looking for those incentives to be able to do their part for climate leadership, to do their part to lower emissions, to do their part to diversify this economy. When you lower your emissions, when you take advantage of the climate leadership plan, you also grow economically. Our farmers know that, and I'm assuming that eventually this side also will clue in to that fact.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Strankman: Given that this memorandum also discusses a regional disparity between east and west – these ag input costs are primarily due to the different sources of electricity available to farmers; farmers in Alberta are punished financially because of the abundance of fossil fuels – Minister, will you admit that your carbon tax is more about punishing Albertans for certain geological realities and your negative ideological slants rather than actually reducing pollution?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The facts will speak for themselves. We had some major investments in agriculture in just this past year. The Cavendish expansion in Lethbridge is the largest expansion in Lethbridge's history, a $360 million expansion. Champion Petfoods near Spruce Grove will be able to increase their plant. It's a $250 million expansion. These expansions are taking place because agriculture in Alberta is robust, will continue to be robust, and will continue to be even more robust because of our climate leadership plan.

Unharvested 2017 Crops

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Although the grain harvest seems to have gone well in much of the province, many parts of north-central and northeast Alberta are not so fortunate. Because of the wet spring many farmers were forced to seed later in the season and are now scrambling to bring in the crops against rain and snow. To the minister of agriculture: could the minister update the House on the harvest progress to date and where there might be areas of concern?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. Last year's harvest was certainly a challenge, and that continued into the spring, with wet conditions in many parts of the province. While crops in some regions did get planted later than usual, producers have been very busy this fall, and the vast majority of the harvest is in. As of this week about 98.6 per cent of crops have been harvested, leaving about 170,000 acres still unharvested, compared to 1 million last year. I'm being very optimistic this year that our harvest is going very well.

Thank you.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: given the number of farmers that may be impacted this year – I'm glad to hear it's a few less than it looked like a week ago – what plans does AFSC have in place to expedite claims, adjustments, and settlements?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again to the member. First off, I'd like to thank the crop commissions from Team Alberta for their work representing their members, providing the AFSC, the department, and my office with day-to-day information throughout the harvest. This valuable insight comes to how the government and AFSC can help producers get crops in the bin.

Last season was marred with very difficult weather. In response to this I directed AFSC to take action to streamline its process in order to deal with the high volume of claims. This season we've seen much better weather for harvest, so process has not been an issue. That said, AFSC and department staff learned a lot from last year's harvest, and we'll look into ways to be able to expedite . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Second supplemental.

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that last year many farmers in my riding questioned whether the present insurance coverage is sufficient in how it addresses their costs and covers their needs, in the recent talks with our federal partners was there any discussion on improving the program?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again to the member. Taxpayers have long been supporting crop insurance as a very valuable way for our farmers to manage business risk so that they can put food on Alberta's tables and onto the market. The RME programs are robust and largely work well, but sometimes it's good to see if they can work even better. This was a topic during federal-provincial discussions, and we're currently undergoing a review of business risk management products within the current federal-provincial agreement. As part of this review last week I had a round-table with agriculture stakeholders to find out where more of those opportunities for improvement are, and I look forward to more opportunities to discuss with producers.

Data Security in Postsecondary Institutions

Mr. W. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, Albertans expect that when they provide private information to public institutions, this same information is kept secure and is not to be used or held in jeopardy. Last year the University of Calgary's information and data systems were held for ransom, and the university was locked out of their information system by a third party, a hacker if you will. The university was forced to spend 20,000 ransom dollars to unlock their data systems, which they paid, I assume, with taxpayers' dollars. As the Minister of Advanced Education, what specifically have you done to assist the university to ensure this does not happen again?

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you to the Member for Highwood for that question. Of course, I did send out a letter to all of the institutions in Alberta to address these issues of cybersecurity. We are convening a working group of members from each of those institutions as well as the government department to look into the issue, to share best practices, and to make sure that these kinds of security breaches don't happen again.

Mr. W. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, given that, interestingly enough, this year Grant MacEwan's information systems were also hacked and their information and data systems were manipulated by criminals to the extent that 11.8 million taxpayer dollars were extorted, redirected, and lost, can the minister tell us specifically how his department is assisting these institutions that he is responsible for and how he will reassure taxpayers that this will not happen again? Not just a letter.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, after that incident came to light, I asked the board of Grant MacEwan to conduct an investigation and provide a report to me. We had a preliminary report submitted to us a couple of months ago, and a full report will be submitted to us in the fullness of time. Of course, we're very concerned about these incidents. We're working with our institutions to make sure that all of the proper financial controls are in place so that these incidents don't happen again and that taxpayer dollars that are going to students are used for that purpose and not stolen by bad people out there.

Mr. W. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a pattern here. Perhaps the minister in conjunction with, oh, say, the Solicitor General: please explain to Albertans what specifically they are doing to prevent this type of criminal activity from happening again and again. What exactly are they doing to get the 12 million taxpayer dollars back from these criminals?

Mr. Schmidt: Well, as I said in my previous answer to the member, of course, we asked MacEwan University to provide us with the results of the full investigation. We continue to make sure that all of our institutions have the best financial controls in place so that we prevent these things from happening again. There is an ongoing investigation into the particular matter the member raises, and once that matter is concluded, I will endeavour to inform the House of the results of that investigation to make sure that we've done all we could to recover taxpayers' dollars, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Highway 1 and 791 Intersection Safety

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Jaydon Sommerfeld tragically lost his life at the age of 17 in Chestermere in June of 2015. His parents, my friends Kenton and Sheri Sommerfeld, and the entire city of Chestermere have looked at measures to improve safety. In fact, I was out with Sheri a couple of weeks ago at the intersection, and she put flowers there for her son, where he was killed. Minister, I have begged this government to do something to improve the safety of this intersection. An acceleration lane was added on highway 1 going west, and the speed limit has now been decreased to 80 kilometres an hour, which has actually made this intersection a whole lot more dangerous. I'm asking: what will the government do to improve the safety at this intersection?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, I can tell the hon. member that I have met with the mayor following this incident, and the department has studied it closely and has implemented a number of measures, including acceleration lanes and so on. So it is my view that the steps that have been taken will make the intersection or have made the intersection more safe. If the hon. member wishes to discuss with me why she doesn't think that's the case, I'm happy to do that and pleased to listen to what her concerns are.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, it's actually made it more dangerous.

Given that the concerned residents of Chestermere were actually invited to participate in an open house in April of 2017 and presented options for improving the safety at the intersection and given that many options are far too expensive given the economic downturn and the hemorrhaging budget deficit, the parents voted overwhelmingly in favour of a set of traffic lights that, using common sense, only need to be running during school hours at a cost of about $800,000, so why hasn't the government listened to the people of Chestermere? Can you please explain to me what you know that we don't?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, the department did evaluate that option, and quite frankly I think it would make the intersection and the highway very much less safe. We're going from a highway where the speed limit is 100 kilometres an hour or 110 kilometres an hour, then you've got to slow the traffic down, and then you put a red light there that only operates part of the time. You know, you create a lot of opportunities for very serious rear-end accidents and so on. So the department's professional assessment is that this particular solution would not make the intersection more safe but actually quite the opposite.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Actually, in the evaluation given by Alberta Transportation, they actually made it clear that this option of reducing the speed does nothing to address the root causes of the collision. In fact, it's in the report. Given that this reduction contributed to new hazards and that the school buses don't even turn there at this intersection, can the minister please invoke some common sense and listen to the people, install a set of traffic lights at that intersection so that anybody coming onto highway 1, all drivers leaving the high school can drive safely, or does somebody else need to die?

Mr. Mason: Mr. Speaker, of course, we all mourn the tragic death of the young man, but we want to make sure that this kind of thing doesn't happen again. If we're slowing down the traffic and that doesn't work in the hon. member's opinion, then adding a red light that only operates intermittently is going to actually create greater hazards, and it is not something that traffic experts recommend at all.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds we will continue with Members' Statements.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Energy Policies

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. By now you probably might have heard that the Petroleum Services Association of Canada, PSAC, lambasted our Premier and our Prime Minister for not standing up for the oil and gas industry.

The PSAC president said, quote, it's totally irresponsible that Canada is not getting its oil and gas to tidewater, to other parts of the world. Mr. Speaker, this is just common sense. Karen Mahon in her petroleum-made kayaks should have been out protesting the city of Victoria, not Kinder Morgan, for dumping untreated sewage into the ocean.

The PSAC president also said that the social licence thing is a myth; it's a set of goalposts that will never stop moving. He is right. You cannot tame a tiger when your head is in its mouth. He said that the number of wells to be drilled in Alberta could have been higher, but investor confidence is low, and the cancellation of Energy East is a blow to investor confidence.

This Premier's NDP celebrated the cancellation of the Northern Gateway pipeline. Coupled with the carbon tax going up by 50 per cent in just two months, carbon leakage to the U.S.A. will accelerate. Our Legislature passed my Motion 505, which, if implemented, would have brought more Alberta oil to replace dictator oil in the Canadian market.

I have written to the Transport minister, Marc Garneau, opposing the unconstitutional tanker ban in B.C. One can only hope for the arrival of Jason Kenney's United Conservative Party government to let the world know that Alberta is open for business again.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore. Excuse me. I would try Edmonton-Castle Downs. My apologies.

Dieppe

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On August 19, 1942, the 14th Canadian Army Tank Regiment took part in Operation Jubilee and landed on the beaches of Dieppe, France. As the tanks came to shore, they were brought to a halt by German fire and were trapped on the beach. They managed to form a protective ring of steel around the infantry who were under fire, and their efforts helped in the withdrawal of many soldiers. The valiant tankers fought until all their ammunition had been expended. All the tanks that landed were captured along with 167 men. Thirteen men, including the commanding officer, were killed in action.

Mr. Stan Edwards, who I introduced earlier this afternoon, was a private at the time of landing on Dieppe. This summer he returned to Dieppe after 75 years to take part in the unveiling ceremony of a monument dedicated to those who died or were captured.

At a ceremony held in Calgary this summer, I was honoured to meet Trooper (Retired) Tommy Baker and Tank Gunner (Retired) Bill Stewart. Another veteran, Trooper (Retired) Bernard Johnson, also lives in Calgary. Unfortunately, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Baker, and Mr. Stewart were not able to attend today.

Mr. Edwards and Mr. Stewart joined the Calgary tank regiment at the same time. While in Dieppe they were part of that valiant effort to protect the infantry. Both were taken as prisoners of war. To this day they remain close friends.

I want to thank these Albertans, Trooper (Retired) Johnson, Trooper (Retired) Baker, Tank Gunner (Retired) Stewart, and Private (Retired) Edwards, for your sacrifice. To those who paid the ultimate price, to surviving veterans, to serving members and their families across Alberta and this nation: thank you. Lest we forget.

2017 Municipal Elections

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, as you know, a couple of weeks ago Alberta cities and municipalities held elections for town councils. I believe everyone here understands and appreciates the time, the effort, and the dedication that all candidates put forward in their bids to be elected. Today I want to thank everyone who put their names forward for public office, and I want to congratulate all those elected. It takes a lot of grit and confidence to step forward, and it takes even more once you're in office.

As provincially elected officials we have the honour of working with our municipal counterparts regardless of political leaning, and I'd like to take this opportunity to remind reeves, councillors, and mayors that their duty is not a light one but one which involves standing up for constituents and working for what's best for them.

Increasing tax burdens is not the way to do that, so I encourage each town council to exercise fiscal conservatism so that their cities and towns do not struggle with ballooning debt from the federal and provincial governments in addition to their own. There are lessons to be learned, Mr. Speaker, and not every government is a good example to follow, especially the provincial and federal governments, I might add. However, they can give you advice on good grooming techniques and selfies.

I urge these new municipal governments to encourage small business and industry to invest in their areas so that residents can see additional jobs and prosperity. I urge them not to put any ideology before the needs and concerns of the people they serve. I caution them not to make enemies of business by taking them to court or creating reasons for businesses to file lawsuits. Rather, I encourage each elected official to use common sense, so often lacking in government, to work with businesses and individuals to create healthy, prosperous towns, cities, and regions.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I request unanimous consent of the Assembly to extend the Orders of the Day to completion past 3 o'clock.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Athabasca District Business Awards

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On October 19 of this year I was delighted to attend the fifth annual Athabasca District Chamber of Commerce business awards night. There was a great turnout, especially considering it was a good night for combining, and the buzz in the room was very positive, a far cry from the perpetual doom and gloom we hear from the other side of the House. Optimism is justified. BMO's latest provincial forecast states, "Alberta's economy has returned to growth, and could potentially lead the country this year at 4.1%"

It is a testament to the entrepreneurial spirit of Albertans and the value of diversification that such a wide range of small businesses are able to thrive in our communities. But not only do small businesses pay taxes and create jobs; they can also help to reduce waste and help the environment and support worthy causes. Today I am happy to recognize a local business that does all of these at the same time.

The Lolly Pop Thrift Shop was the winner of the chamber's 2017 green business award, an inspired choice. Why the green award? Because what they do is accept and process community donations of books, clothing, and household goods otherwise destined for disposal, which they use to stock their store with extremely reasonably priced items. Then they in turn donate the cleaned and sorted remainder to other worthy groups.

Why do they do this? They do it for the environment, they do it to help low-income families get the products they need, but they especially do it for the children. Every child that walks into their store gets two free books, a lollipop, and a toy. But what's more, every month they use part of their proceeds to support local youth sports and literacy groups, truly a virtuous business model. Like so many of our small businesses, they put community first. I am proud to recognize them in the House today for the wonderful work that they do.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, today I rise to salute the men and women who have just completed a provincial megaproject, men and women who have toiled many long hours and at times were concerned whether or not they would be able to finish the project in time. Thankfully most in Alberta's largest renewable industry are now able to proclaim that they have successfully completed the harvest of 2017. Alberta farmers faced many challenges this growing season, but I'm proud to say that once again they've done a magnificent job growing many diverse crops and doing their part to feed the world.

Although the focus is so often on the harvest activity on farms, many industries and individuals are required to get the harvest done and to market, from equipment manufacturing and maintenance to the fuel and fertilizer supply chains, from businesses necessary to process and market the crop to the transportation industry providing the roads and rail necessary to deliver the product.

In all of this it is important to recognize it will be that bushel of wheat, oats, barley, peas, or canola paying the bills. It will be the sugar beets, potatoes, pork, or lamb paying for the jobs in all of these support industries. The jobs Albertans rely on are created and paid for by the commodities we produce, harvest, and process.

Mr. Speaker, this evening Chops and Crops gives MLAs an opportunity to meet directly with producers and their associations to learn about key issues faced by the agricultural industry while enjoying some delectable Alberta-grown food products. We as legislators need to recognize the role we play in maintaining a globally competitive and viable agricultural sector. Any extra cost public policy adds is paid for by the products we produce and sell. We have a huge responsibility to get it right, so I hope all MLAs take the time to attend Chops and Crops this evening to demonstrate our commitment to agriculture in this province and its contribution to both the economy and the health and wellness of all Albertans.

Thank you.

Mace Tour

Ms Jabbour: All of us are aware of the importance and the significance of the Mace. It is a powerful symbol of democracy and of the rights of the common people to pass legislation here in this House. What members may not be aware of is that our Alberta Mace has embarked on a series of adventures of its own.

As part of Mr. Speaker's Outreach, you, Mr. Speaker, and I along with the Sergeant-at-Arms and visitor services staff have accompanied our Mace on trips around the province so that those who live long distances from the Legislature can connect with our work and understand the democratic process. While on the road the Sergeant-at-Arms closely guards the Mace and ensures that it is treated with the utmost respect. At the same time, the opportunity to see the Mace up close and learn about its history has been an unforgettable experience for the communities we have visited.

Our first visit was to Medicine Hat, including a stop at Siksika First Nation, where a group of dynamic young people shared ideas about incorporating a First Nation presence into the Legislature. The second visit was to Fort McMurray, Fort MacKay, and Anzac. This was around the anniversary of the fire, which reminded us of the important role government plays in caring for Albertans in times of need.

This month the Mace tour came to my own constituency of Peace River. Because of its size we only toured the northern part this time, including High Level, La Crête, Fort Vermilion, Manning, Blue Hills, Paddle Prairie, and Beaver First Nation. On our visit to Beaver First Nation one of the community leaders suggested that, given the important role of the Mace in making good legislation, perhaps the Mace should be smudged. We agreed, and the smudging ceremony we participated in was a solemn and profound moment that felt absolutely right and truly historic, another small step forward in forging new relationships with Alberta's indigenous peoples.

The Mace adventure continued as we crossed the Peace River by ferry. The Mace has now crossed most of Alberta's major rivers: the Peace, the North and South Saskatchewan, the Red Deer, and the Athabasca.

Other areas of the province will be visited in months to come. Mr. Speaker's Mace outreach tour is an important way to connect with Albertans, and I'm proud to be part of the adventure.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce first reading of Bill 23, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017.

Bill 23 would add age as a prohibited ground of discrimination to the Alberta Human Rights Act under the areas of tenancies and goods, services, accommodations, or facilities. Earlier this year the government agreed to these changes by way of agreement to a court order.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 23 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

Mr. Mason: I'm not on your list, Mr. Speaker, but I do have some things to table on behalf of the hon. Premier. First, I would like to table the appropriate number of copies of the latest Toronto-Dominion Bank provincial economic forecast, which says that Alberta will lead the country in economic growth next year, and they are predicting a 4.2 per cent growth rate.

Secondly, it is also my pleasure to rise and table the appropriate number of copies of the latest provincial forecast from the Bank of Montreal, Mr. Speaker. This forecast indicates that Alberta is slated to grow by 4.1 per cent this year. They're one point off, but, you know, it's in the ballpark.

The third one I'd like to table, Mr. Speaker, is the economic forecast for the province of Alberta from the Royal Bank of Canada. This one agrees with the TD one, which says it's going to be 4.2.

I think that it's pretty clear that the economists at the banks are very bullish on the Alberta economy, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the appropriate number of copies of the CFIB report that earlier I mentioned in my question, Finding Funding Fairness in Workers' Compensation.

Point of Order

Language Creating Disorder Reflections on a Nonmember

The Speaker: Hon. members, I believe we had a point of order today. The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: Thanks, Mr. Speaker, for recognizing me. I rise about some comments from the Minister of Service Alberta at the time that I raised the point of order in question period. At that time the minister, unfortunately, referred to the leader of the United Conservative Party as completely dishonest. First, I would draw your attention to 23(j) in our Standing Orders, which says: "uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder." I would first suggest to you that referring to anybody would create disorder in this Assembly but particularly referring to the Leader of the Official Opposition or the party that is the Official Opposition as dishonest will certainly create disorder.

I would also go further than that, Mr. Speaker, and draw your attention to the House of Commons Procedure and Practice, pages 616 and 617, where it refers to reference by name to members of the public. For those following along at home, it says:

Members are discouraged from referring by name to persons who are not Members of Parliament and who do not enjoy parliamentary immunity, except in extraordinary circumstances when the national interest calls for this. The Speaker has ruled that Members have a responsibility to protect the innocent, not only from outright slander, but from any slur directly or indirectly implied.

Furthermore, the Speaker

suggested that Members avoid as much as possible mentioning by name people from outside the House who are unable to reply in their own defence.

Now, I have already risen on this once in a similar situation this week, Mr. Speaker, and you ruled in my favour, if you will, at that time over those concerns. Here we are now, three days into this week, seeing the same things. I am as excited as anybody about the election of the Hon. Jason Kenney as the leader of the United Conservative Party. I am thrilled, and I look forward to seeing him sitting shortly in this chair that I have the privilege of sitting in for the time being and, further to that, sitting in the chair that is across from me in the next two years.

But ministers referring to the leader of the United Conservative Party, a person who is not a member of this Chamber, who cannot defend themselves, is certainly slander. It is completely inappropriate, and, to my first point, Mr. Speaker, it's going to cause disorder in this House. So I would ask that the government stop calling people dishonest and start focusing on the work that they've been sent here to do, which is standing up for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I do not have, of course, the Blues, so I don't have a very comprehensive recollection of what was stated, but I will say, subject to your correction, that the hon. minister talked about the leader of the United Conservatives. I don't recall her mentioning him by name in this particular instance, but what the minister was referring to is the refusal of the leader of the United Conservative Party to disclose the dark money that he's received to finance his leadership race. This is an important issue, I think, that needs to be canvassed. I'm not sure what were the exact words used by the minister, so I'm at a disadvantage in that regard.

The Speaker: Let me read that to you, to all of the House: "despite the fact that his own leader of his own party absolutely refuses to abide by honesty and transparency and the promises that he's made to Albertans." I share that with you.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, that's quite a bit different from what we've heard from the hon. House leader in his point of order. You know, one of the things that happens in political discourse is that the veracity of statements made by different individuals is often made – it's certainly made on the other side as well. I don't recall any prohibited language being used. I know that the individual in this case was not named, as suggested by the House leader for the United Conservative Party.

I think that it is within the range of comments that are within the normal range of political discourse. A little harsh, but I think that it was a clear reference to the fact that Mr. Kenney has received money for his leadership campaign which he is refusing to disclose. That was the subject of what the minister was trying to get at. I think that many Albertans are indeed deeply concerned about the source of Mr. Kenney's funds. I think that it would be resolved if the leader of the UCP would simply stand up and tell Albertans where he got his money.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Government House Leader has chosen to go where the minister earlier didn't, clearly finishing the job of slandering that was incomplete during the question period.

I would also point out, Mr. Speaker, that the Government House Leader, obviously, didn't address the issue of creating disorder in the House, I think, clearly because he's fully aware that that's exactly what occurred here, which is why I would respectfully ask you to ask the hon. minister to withdraw those remarks and apologize.

The Speaker: I'm sorry. Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've been following the discussion and just wanted to ask if as part of your ruling there could be a point of clarification as well because members opposite used the names of many private individuals today, including former members of the oil sands advisory group, who also are not in this House to defend themselves and also could be considered slandered, I suppose. Could you clarify for us what the rules are around private names, if that applies simply to members of the opposition, the particular leader, or if that's all people outside this House?

Thank you.

The Speaker: I see that considerably more discussion of this will add limited value. First of all, to the point made by the Leader of the Official Opposition with respect to the individual's name, in this instance it was not actually identified. However, there were references to the leader of a party. With respect to that, I'm not sure that a point of order has been made.

However, the question before: you'll recall, some of you, that just prior to the minister making these comments, I cautioned the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills about the language that he was using and cautioned immediately prior to the minister responding. And if I've learned anything in this House, it is about context.

To the question from Edmonton-Centre, we've discussed this many, many times. There is no exact science to these words, as to what's on the list. I continue being asked: what are the lists of what I can say and what I can't say? Well, you've proven in here that it's an impossible task, and it is contextual.

In this situation the minister did say: "despite the fact that his own leader of his own party absolutely refuses to abide by honesty and transparency and the promises that he's made to Albertans." She went on to clarify that it was the promise issue that she was intending, I believe. Nonetheless, I'd ask that the Government House Leader address all of his members. That includes the other side as well. However, in this instance I would ask that you caution the minister to not make those kinds of responses, making reference to the character of individuals.

Will I rule that there's actually a point of order? Today I will not. But it seems to me that you all have the responsibility to avoid that kind of language. It's certainly not contributing to the tone and production of this House.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 22

Resident and Family Councils Act

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-North on behalf of the hon. Deputy Premier and Minister of Health.

Mrs. Schreiner: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is my pleasure to rise today to move second reading of Bill 22, the Resident and Family Councils Act.

If passed, this legislation will expect the establishment of resident and family councils in all long-term care and licensed supportive living facilities. In facilities that already have them, resident and family councils are an important mechanism for enabling residents and families to present requests, concerns, and propose solutions to a facility representative or operator. A number of Alberta Health and Alberta Health Services initiatives and activities over the last five years have identified resident and family councils as a means of improving the experiences of residents in licensed supportive living and long-term care facilities.

The Resident and Family Councils Act aligns with this government's direction by engaging and empowering Albertans living in facilities to take an active and engaged role in their own care. Furthermore, it will support traditionally underrepresented individuals and communities to be heard and participate more fully in their facilities if they so choose. The Resident and Family Councils Act will expand on the existing concerns and complaints processes and provide new opportunities for residents, families, and operators to work together on issues that affect them.

Madam Speaker, our government is committed to enhancing the delivery of continuing care in Alberta's facilities, and we believe that those most affected by these services should have a say in how care and supports are being delivered and how they can be improved. With this legislation residents of Alberta's licensed supportive living and long-term care facilities can be assured that no matter whether their facility is private or publicly funded, they will have a forum to voice concerns and share feedback with their facility operator.

I'd like to now go over the legislation in detail. The Resident and Family Councils Act includes all licensed supportive living and long-term care facilities serving four or more residents. A supportive living accommodation is a facility where the operator provides for the safety and security of four or more residents and offers at least one meal per day or housekeeping services. Seniors' lodges as supportive living accommodations would also be included under the legislation. Long-term care facilities include nursing homes and auxiliary hospitals.

The requirements within this legislation will apply to facilities operated by public operators as well as those that are operated by private for-profit and not-for-profit providers.

It will also cover residences that support persons with developmental disabilities that have four or more residents, which are licensed under the Supportive Living Accommodation Licensing Act. The decision to include PDD residences was determined after initial conversations with advocates representing residents and families. They felt that councils would be a benefit to residents and family members and would give them greater opportunity to voice their concerns to facility operators.

Government is currently developing a plan to engage the PDD community should this legislation pass. This will be done to engage persons with disabilities, their families and guardians, who also support this decision to include PDD residences in this legislation.

Should the legislation pass and once it comes into force, any facility resident or family member will be able to establish a family or resident council. The act supports self-governing councils and is flexible to enable residents and family members to determine their council processes and procedures, procedures such as members' roles, meeting format and frequency, and when and how facility representatives should be involved in council meetings. If a facility already has some form of group in place at the time, the group will be considered a resident and family council for the purposes of this legislation.

Facilities with three or fewer residents, which fall outside the Supportive Living Accommodation Licensing Act, will not be affected by this legislation. Though residents of these facilities are welcome to establish councils, we recognize that the mechanism of a council may not be appropriate for residences of this size.

Under the Resident and Family Councils Act operators will be required to do the following once the act comes into force. They must ensure a resident and family council can be established within a facility. Operators must notify residents and family members of their right to establish councils within 60 days of the act coming into force. Operators must also provide the council with assistance in making other residents and their families aware of the council and provide administrative support upon request of the council. They must provide facility performance information to the council; for example, results of inspections and survey results; consult with the council on issues; for example, meals, personal choice services, and social or leisure activities; develop and implement a written response process to address feedback brought forward by the council; provide the council information on how to access an Alberta health complaints officer; and attend council meetings when invited by the council.

Compliance with the act and its requirements would be monitored by Alberta health inspectors through the existing accommodation licensing process. Monitoring for compliance would include, for example, interviews with resident and family council members and a review of documentation to see whether feedback is being collected and that complaints are being logged and rectified.

If passed, the Ministry of Health will take a number of actions to ensure a smooth transition when the act eventually comes into force. First, as I mentioned, Health will engage PDD stakeholders, including meaningful engagement with persons with disabilities, their family members and guardians, to make sure the unique needs of their community are considered. Some early engagement has already occurred with PDD organizations, including the PDD Provincial Self-Advocates' Advisory Committee and Inclusion Alberta.

Secondly, Health will be developing a tool kit intended to help residents and family members establish effective councils. This will contain helpful advice and useful templates such as sample terms of reference to support new councils. The tool kit will be shared with stakeholders from both the continuing care and PDD communities, including operators, residents, and family members.

Alberta Health will also be developing an information guide to support operators in complying with the requirements. Associations representing operators will be given the opportunity to provide feedback on the tool kit and information guide.

In conclusion, colleagues, the Resident and Family Councils Act will support long-term care and supportive living residents and their family members to take an engaged and active role in the delivery of care and accommodation services. It will strengthen the relationship between operators and residents and ensure that residents and their loved ones will have a voice in improving Alberta's continuing care facilities.

I would like to take this opportunity to encourage my colleagues to support this bill, and I look forward to hearing the debate. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to speak to the second reading of Bill 22, the Resident and Family Councils Act. As a representative of Albertans and especially those from the Drayton Valley-Devon constituency I feel strongly that we have a critical and important responsibility to protect the vulnerable Albertans and Albertans that built our province especially and that are now in lodges and nursing homes and long-term care facilities. Bill 22 guarantees that the residents of long-term and licensed supportive care facilities will have the right to establish self-governing councils that would allow them to pursue and to engage and to work towards ensuring a strong, healthy, high quality of life, and I will be supporting this initiative.

As the previous critic for Seniors and Housing and mental health for my caucus I've done research and outreach with residents of the facilities that we're talking about today across this province. I've met with these facilities and with the seniors that are living in them, and I can see that this piece of legislation can have a positive effect on their lives.

Now, there have been times over the last two years where we've been shocked and, quite honestly, appalled at some of the stories and some of the things that have happened to our vulnerable citizens and our seniors in this province. Albertans feel that sometimes our seniors do not have a strong enough voice in the current system that they're a part of. It should not take a story leaking to the press for changes to be made to a facility. As we saw last spring at the Lacombe long-term care facility, it should not take the events that occurred around that facility for something to be done.

Our caucus, the former legacy Wildrose caucus, shared and shone some of the light on some of those glaring issues, and while it's hard to say if a council would have been able to intervene effectively, it may have been capable of preventing some of the issues seen there. I would hope and I would believe that had there been a council of residents there, this facility would not have been allowed to deteriorate in the quality of its care to the extent that it did, and I believe that if the residents had been granted a seat at the table, they would have been more effective in their capacity to ensure a high quality of life. Ideally this legislation will give residents a voice and the power to make meaningful suggestions and to create change in the places that they live.

While I would hope that the facilities' operators would already be working with residents to improve practice and to improve quality-of-life outcomes and to address concerns, there are clearly facilities where this is not the practice. We can, through this legislation, encourage that to occur.

Bill 22 will grant the residents of long-term care facilities the right to establish a self-governing council and to work with facility operators to ensure that many of the quality-of-life concerns that they have identified are going to be addressed. I think that it's critically important that this legislation also allow for members of the residents' families to initiate the establishment of a resident and family council given that family members are frequently heavily involved in the decision-making and protection of their parents or their grandparents and other members of their extended family.

I think all of us have had family members that have been in some of these institutions, and I believe that for all of us it's not a stretch to understand that our loved ones at times need people to advocate on their behalf and to oversee and to make sure that our loved ones are being taken care of.

I've heard from many constituents that sometimes they feel discouraged by their lack of ability to protect their loved ones within a care facility. They feel that they are sometimes pitted against the facility's management in defence of their loved ones. They should be working together. Families, seniors, and the operators of these facilities should be working together, but that's not always the case, and sometimes that can lead to an incredible amount of frustration as family members are simply trying to take care of the people that they love. I believe that this legislation, which regulates the creation of a meaningful council that will promote dialogue between residents and family members and care providers, will help to ensure that the ultimate goal of providing for the residents will occur and that it will occur with the highest quality of life possible.

Legislating that one or more representatives from the facility must be present at the meetings that they are invited to is also important for without the facility input and without the facility operators in attendance, changes cannot be effectively communicated nor probably implemented. So I believe it's important for there to be a place for the operators at the table on these councils. It is not helpful for residents of the facility to simply talk amongst themselves if that information is not transferred to the people that can effectively make those changes.

I've travelled across my constituency and have seen first-hand and have been involved in many of the lodges and the nursing homes and the long-term care facilities across my constituency. I've seen first-hand the wonderful work that is being done to support the seniors in my constituency. But I've also seen some of the pitfalls, and I've had feedback on many occasions from the seniors across my constituency. I can tell you that it is important to them to have a high quality of life. That doesn't mean a high standard of living sometimes. Quality of life and standard of living are distinct and different.

Quality of life is a far broader category. Quality of life includes not only the income but the health care, the nutrition, the transportation, the entertainment, the relationships, and the community that our seniors fall into when they are part of a nursing home or a lodge. All of these are important. We as people are far more than the income that we make, and our quality of life is very important. It's complicated, it's intricate, it's individual, and it's ever-changing. I believe these councils can help seniors come together to define for them within their individual communities what is a high quality of life and what are the necessary things that need to be improved as they live together in community.

When Albertans transition from being independent and from independent living into a lodge or a nursing home, often control of their individual decisions in life starts to be taken away a little bit, and many of the aspects of a person's life that previously were decisions that you and you alone would make now begin to be transferred to others in our lives or even to the facility operators. It's because of this reality that we need to ensure that there is regular communication between the residents and those that manage the facilities to ensure that all aspects of a resident's quality of life are being reasonably fulfilled.

Now, I've seen amazing initiatives across my constituency that take place in many of the lodges and nursing homes that my constituents are in. I've been asked to be part of church services, to help to barbecue at barbecues. I've been to dances, had picnics and entertainment nights, all of the things that make a community in our nursing homes and lodges and extended care facilities. I believe that most if not all of them do an incredible job of trying to make sure that the quality of life of our seniors is high and that it meets their needs and their desires. Events such as the ones I've talked about here allow our seniors and the vulnerable population to continue to be involved in their communities.

Unfortunately, I've also seen and heard that there are not always the logistics in place to facilitate community and to engage our seniors not only in the community of the lodge or the facility that they're in but even outside in the wider community that they're a part of. I know that residents of several facilities, lodges, and other nursing homes in my community and my constituency have been plagued with issues of not being able to access off-site services. Doctors' appointments, dentists' appointments, and even the capacity to go shopping for many of our rural seniors is very difficult.

I believe that a council that we're talking about in this bill, Bill 22, may be a vehicle by which they could communicate and work together to try to address some of these really important needs, needs that will allow them to be independent, to move about, to go shopping, to be able to be a part of community. Should they have access to forming a council with a representative from the facility, I believe they would be better able to more effectively organize and to lobby not only the facility but the government and the organizations that serve their needs.

If these councils meet, listen, address the issues of our seniors, we can sidestep some of the things and some of the issues that we've seen occur even in this last year. You need look no further than the Berwyn lodge to see a prime example of what happens when there's a lack of communication between residents and the facilities and the operators that oversee those seniors. The lodge has been deemed financially unviable and is being closed down. The residents were informed of this. However, clearly, communication fell apart.

As a result, we now have some seniors who've had to do at their stage of life far too much worrying about being displaced and about even where they were going to end up. This poses a significant stressor for the residents and the families alike. They're already hard-pressed to find suitable seniors' housing in Alberta. Given the shortage of available housing, perhaps a council that would have supported communication and the capacity to be able to listen to the seniors would have allowed for some of the stress not to be placed on the seniors. Had there been a council of residents that was consulted, they could have taken steps to address the issues, and this would have led to the time that was necessary and needed to make alternative arrangements.

I believe that the document-tracking portion of this legislation is important for ensuring that a paper trail of the issues is highlighted, so that there is some accountability and so that residents and facility representatives can monitor the progress of the various projects and initiatives that they are working through.

Madam Speaker, a crucial portion of governance is outreach and stakeholder feedback. The United Conservative Party strongly believes in local decision-making and accountability. I hope this legislation will give the residents of our long-term and supportive living facilities the ability to provide regular feedback as they are the local experts. They are the ones that understand best how their facilities are affecting their lives and whether they're meeting their needs. These residents represent a font of knowledge, of wisdom, or of expertise that at this moment has not been given the weight that it deserves. We owe it to our seniors, the people that built this great province of Alberta, to ensure that they have a seat at the table and to empower them to be local decision-makers – dare I say, in the parlance of the new curriculum, “agents of change”? – regarding their quality of life.

I urge all members of this Assembly to support this legislation and to put the power back in the hands of the residents of our long-term care facilities. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to this bill? The hon. Member for Stony Plain . . .

Mr. Horne: Spruce Grove-St. Albert, Madam Speaker. Still across Boundary Road but a totally different community.

Thank you, Madam Speaker. You know, when I first saw this bill, I was very intrigued. It reminded me a bit of my visits with the residents' councils in my own riding and the feedback that I hear from these people. Some of them have come to me with everything from, you know, that they've heard about a community event and they want to see me at it. My office is within a couple of blocks of several facilities, so they're by for coffee every once in a while. But we've also heard about residents being concerned about other residents' health as they're aging and whether or not the facility is still an appropriate place for them. So I think that the level of engagement that I've seen from these councils is very hopeful.

I was also reminded of somebody very important in my life, my great-grandmother, who, unfortunately, just passed away this summer. Any of the members across the aisle who have been active politically for a long time might know her. She was at one point the president of the now outgoing Progressive Conservative Association of Alberta. I know she was aware that I was elected. She was always keenly interested in my education. I'm still not sure if she ever knew what party I was elected for, but this was a woman who was always engaged in her community. For the Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock, she at one point served on the town council of Westlock. She was one of the forces behind the founding of the museum there. There's a story that my grandma likes to tell where they were on vacation in Banff. They went to the Banff Springs Hotel, and the staff there said: "Oh, ma'am, you are far too elegant to be at the normal tables in the restaurant. We must give you the presidential table."

She was so involved in her community that this is something that I know she would have been involved in. In her old age she wasn't in a designated facility until much later, when it would have been beyond her to engage in something like this, but she was so engaged in her community that I am positive that had she been, she would have been on a residents' council. There are so many people in communities like this, you know, people who serve on their ag association, or they're active with 4-H and volunteer at the library, often former principals. Then, as they age, they move into more supportive housing, but they still want to be involved in their community. This gives them a very great opportunity to engage in that community with their fellow residents.

This also gives them an opportunity to continue to work to make life better for their fellow Albertans through ensuring quality of life for the entire community, for the residents, and to really help provide that communication channel between the operators, even in some cases the owners, and the residents. You know, that's something that's very important in any situation. Even in our elementary schools we have feedback systems between the students and the administration, and certainly there is currently the Education Minister's Youth Council out. I had an opportunity to meet with them, and they provided excellent feedback. I think of examples like this, where we have feedback between, really, the people who are receiving the service and the front-line people who are providing the service as well as the upper management, effectively, managing the service. Having those feedback systems is something that is very positive and really helps to build a better quality of life for everybody involved.

I noticed, as I was looking over this bill and thinking about it, that AHS estimates that the majority of facilities already have a council like this. The only reason I can think of for so many facilities to be adopting this is that it's something that has been proven to work, that has been proven to show results for the residents and for the operators themselves. You know, sometimes for management, any management, really, whether it's myself and my office staff or the CEO of a large corporation, it's really easy to see an issue, think you know the answer, pursue it, and completely not address the actual issue. Having that communication with the people receiving your services as well as the people providing the services themselves is something that is really important.

I am really happy to see this bill come forward. I'd like to thank both of our ministers of Health for all of their work on this. I know that the Minister of, if I can remember the name of it, Community and Social Services also put in some work engaging with the PDD community on this bill. My understanding is that most of them already have very similar structures in place, but the PDD community wanted to be included in this. I think that that is, again, a sign that these are systems that work, that have been proven to help provide better services for our communities.

I am very happy to see this go forward. I hope all members in this Legislature support it, and I look forward to the ongoing debate.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, another member to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to speak on Bill 22. In the last two and a half years I've been a Member of this Legislative Assembly, and I've had the opportunity to be the critic of both Seniors and Housing as well as Health. In these roles I've heard complaints from all sides, including continuing care facilities and families, on a number of different issues. Hopefully, this bill will identify and help resolve some of these concerns that parents or families have, and it will give them some sort of a formalized influence on what happens in where they live. Let's face it. We all do want to have the ability to have a measure of influence and control over our lives and surroundings. That doesn't end when a person enters into a long-term care facility or supportive living. The difference is that you and I have greater ability to advocate for ourselves. Establishing these councils could create a better quality of life for residents and could help them retain a sense of independence while also enabling them to achieve and receive things that will increase their happiness.

But before you think this is a blanket approval for your bill, please understand that I should mention that I think there are a handful of things that could be addressed here to ensure that the bill actually does what I think the minister wants it to do. We need to ensure that the facility representatives are able to attend the meetings required, and we need to ensure that the facility representatives have the ability to carry out all their duties as an extension and integrated part of their duties and not as an impediment.

I mention these examples because we need to be prepared for the very possibility of very eager councils made up of very eager individuals. While we want to empower these councils and the individuals that serve on them, I'm sure that many of us can think of boards or councils that become unreasonably or overly demanding in their requests. Such a council could unduly and unintentionally put a strain on the facility representative.

In addition, what about membership? While each council does have the ability to determine its own governance structure and procedures, could that lead to unfair representation either by a proportion of people from the same background or family or to some groups of people being left on the sidelines for whatever reason?

What if multiple councils are set up within the same facility? This could happen if you have members who don't work well together or want to work for separate or opposing things.

These are items that should be considered, and these are certainly items that we will bring forward. We have life experience. We have work experience. We've dealt with a lot of these things before, and we're here to guide and promote.

But there's something else I was wondering about, Madam Speaker, and hopefully I can get answers on this. The government mentioned that "a toolkit and information guide would be developed by Alberta Health in consultation with residents, families, and operators." Now, that quote is from the government's news release on the Resident and Family Councils Act, but it does raise a question for me. You see, I was able to find online, dated September 30, 2017, a resident family council tool kit. Of course, I will table this later. My concern stems from the fact that it appears that the department is already trying to duplicate work that has already been done by Covenant Health, Covenant Care, Covenant Living, and Alberta Health Services.

Not only that, but the news release talks about conducting future consultations, yet it looks like they've already created the document. This represents a troubling scenario, that the government continues to do work first and consult later. Like I said, Madam Speaker, I know that this wording was found in the news release, but it's troubling to me because it once again looks like the government is jumping ahead without first consulting despite the fact that they say the opposite. This highlights some key things about bureaucracy and the parallel features of Alberta Health and Alberta Health Services. One doesn't know what the other is doing. They are working towards the same goal, but there's a lot of repetitive work that gets done. We're here to help clean that up.

I'll move back specifically to the bill, Madam Speaker, and I'm looking forward to further conversation on this. I think we need to polish it up a little bit, and of course the Official Opposition is happy to help with that. You've seen us in action trying to clean up and improve bits of legislation before, and we'll do it again this time.

I don't want to take up too much time this afternoon, so I'll run through a quick summary with you, Madam Speaker. Overall, this bill in its core intent is decent. It has some good ideas behind it, ideas that could help improve the lives of some of our residents in long-term and supportive living facilities if executed correctly. It's important that residents and their families have a venue where they can raise concerns and work towards improving circumstances and situations. It's important that we ensure the voices of residents and their families are heard, that council will not operate in isolation but will include facility representatives so that there is a direct link between residents and operators.

Like I mentioned earlier, we might need to make a couple of changes to this. We want to ensure it's done correctly, and we don't want to open up operators to the possibility of being dragged down by an overly bureaucratic council.

With that, Madam Speaker, I will take my seat in anticipation of further conversation to come later. Thank you so much.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's amazing sometimes how the disrespect and the tone from some hon. members in this House can really impact you personally when you're thinking about your own personal experiences that many of us have lived through and that many of us have experienced, whether it's been working as front-line care providers in care facilities, whether it's been caring for somebody who also needed to move to a care facility and engaging, indeed, in these kinds of councils. I want to honour the life experience of all of my colleagues, and I think that's very important for us to know, that there is a great deal of lived experience in this Chamber.

That being said, it's also important that we help all operators meet this rising tide, and while there are a number of tool kit documents that have been designed by service providers, it is certainly not a consistent standard that is being achieved throughout our province. That's why we're bringing this legislation forward, Madam Speaker. About 30 per cent do not have any kind of council that would actually create an environment for this type of work to happen, and of those 70 per cent that do, approximately, the standard is not consistent in terms of the engagement, in terms of the involvement of council members, in terms of the staff engagement, in terms of ensuring that the people who are living there have a voice themselves. They have some type of council, but not always is it even inviting the residents themselves to participate.

While some people speak in a very disrespectful tone and attitude, I think it's important for us all to reflect on the fact that we are here to serve Albertans. That includes making sure that the kits that are available through individual operators are aligned and that they are brought to the highest possible standard to ensure the highest possible level of engagement. That is my commitment, Madam Speaker. My commitment is to ensuring that we take the very best pieces that are available from other organizations and help them engage their residents and the family members to ensure that their voices are heard and actively considered.

I hope that my colleague who just spoke takes some of that under advisement and reflection. I would say that there are many people on this side of the House who have sat with somebody in a care facility either as a family member or as somebody who has worked in one of those care facilities, and I honour that experience. I honour their expertise. I know that if any of us were to relive those experiences, we would want to ensure that we were supporting each other and the other residents and family members in having those opportunities to engage.

I can't help but think about my own experience with my grandmother, who lived for over three years in a care facility. One day we were talking, and she said: "You know, it's so sad for me to see my clothes that I care about so much being folded and put in a drawer when I always took such painstaking measures to ensure that they were nicely ironed and hung neatly in my closet. That's why I have clothes that are as old as they are and they still look good." And I said, "You know, is that something you want to talk about with the operator here because I think that's something that they can probably accommodate?" and they did, because we had a structured environment to be able to bring that up.

I think this is actually going to make life easier for operators as well because they will have a co-ordinated flow of information to be able to access opinions of their residents and their family members. I think that that is important as well, as opposed to getting a bunch of one-off, individualized feedback.

One of the reasons why we very intentionally, in collaboration with service providers and residents and their family members, kept the organizational structure for the individual councils open is because we know that they have expertise of their own. We know that somebody who's living in a facility that provides care for people with developmental disabilities has expertise in how best they want to communicate and with whom best they want to communicate. Ensuring that we have the flexibility for the residents to be true agents for themselves is a value that we are bringing forward in this legislation, Madam Speaker.

I have to say that I brought this forward hoping that we would have respectful, productive conversations that would result in actions that will indeed make life better not just for the 30 per cent of facilities that have no resident or family councils right now but also for those that do to ensure that they are working in a way that meets the very best standard.

Madam Speaker, I guess my question would be: does the hon. member want to work collaboratively to make this happen, or does he want . . . [Ms Hoffman's speaking time expired]

The Deputy Speaker: Speaking to the bill, the hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and speak in support of Bill 22, the Resident and Family Councils Act. Many of my colleagues have discussed that this legislation, if passed, will establish resident and family councils in long-term care and licensed supportive living facilities. It also covers the residences that support persons with developmental disabilities that have four or more residents which are licensed under the Supportive Living Accommodation Licensing Act, also known as SLALA. That falls within my ministry's purview, so I thought I would speak to that part specifically and add my support to this bill.

Ever since we've been in government, one thing we've heard very loud and clear from persons with disabilities, their advocates, and their service providers is: nothing about us without us. What that means is that any decision that impacts their lives and their services needs to be taken with careful consideration to and in consultation with those who that decision will affect. We are committed to listening to Albertans with disabilities, their families, and advocates on the issues that matter to them.

All licensed facilities under the Supportive Living Accommodation Licensing Act are currently included in the bill – they are all included – and we will be reaching out to all of them and will have a robust conversation with them on how best we can move forward with these councils. Those Albertans who live in licensed facilities, their service providers, their guardians, their advocates will all be consulted prior to establishing those councils. We have not and we will not impose any changes on Albertans with disabilities like the previous government used to do, and our track record proves that.

We listened to the community and repealed the previous government's supports intensity scale policy, a policy that was imposed by the previous government on the persons with developmental disabilities program. No one in the province liked it, but they were all subjected to that. We listened to the community, and we repealed that scale. As we move forward with these councils, we will certainly engage with them prior to establishing these councils.

We also repealed the persons with developmental disabilities safety standard, another example where the previous government just imposed a standard on persons with developmental disabilities without adequately consulting them or at all consulting them. When we became government, that was the number one issue. We worked with them, we listened to them, and we repealed that.

In this case we will listen to the community and work with the individuals with developmental disabilities to figure out the best approach to move forward with these councils. We will be sharing further details in the coming weeks about our engagement plan and how the individuals, families, agencies, and advocates in health care can participate in that process.

As this work proceeds, we will continue with our other work to make life better for Albertans with disabilities as we have increased funding for the persons with developmental disabilities program so that more Albertans can get the services they need. With increased funding for AISH, we are making improvements to the AISH program as well. The establishment of these councils will ensure that those individuals have a direct say in the services they are receiving, in the decisions that are impacting their lives, and it will create a collaborative environment within those facilities. The individuals, their service providers, their families, guardians, and all concerned can sit down and address the issues facing individual persons with developmental disabilities.

Unfortunately, from the opposite side we have heard views such as that investment in disabilities are giveaways, and they also suggest that they want to cut it by 20 per cent. I think we are making life better for Albertans. We don't see those as giveaways. We think that vulnerable Albertans deserve the supports they need to be successful and be meaningfully included in our communities. We think that any suggestions that investment in disabilities are giveaways are reckless and wrong and heartless, and under our watch we won't let that happen. We will continue to work hard to make life better for all Albertans, including Albertans with varying abilities, and we will continue to listen and collaborate instead of imposing damaging policies on Albertans with disabilities.

Having said that, I look forward to working with the community and working with individuals with developmental disabilities, their families, guardians, service providers, and advocates to make sure that we get this right. Our hope is that having these councils in place will provide those individuals with yet another opportunity to get involved in decisions that impact their lives.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and respond to the hon. minister's remarks, which I thought were a little bit fantastic, particularly when he bragged about getting rid of the SIS standards, which he did, but he left a few important details out. He left the detail out that he was asked by the opposition for weeks and months on end to do this while he sat on his hands and did nothing. In fact, he sat on his hands for so long, he got fired from half of his ministry, between botching that and botching the children in care file. So when the minister stands up now and talks about what a great job he did, he actually ought to be pleased that he still has the half of a ministry left that he has before he loses it. If there was ever a minister that can't handle his ministry, that was the one that was pointing his finger just now, one of the least competent in the House. I just thought I would set the record straight since the minister seems unable to do so on his own.

Now, back to Bill 22, Madam Speaker. I think the idea in general of having residents of long-term and supportive care facilities take an active role in the care they receive is probably well intentioned and probably a good idea. Of course, the residents living there are the ones that experience the facilities day in and day out, which, actually, by definition, in my opinion, makes them experts at those facilities, just as, in my opinion, each of us are experts at the home, the block, and the neighbourhood in which we live. No one would be more experienced at those facilities than the people that actually live there and deal with the good service and not-so-good service and the good food and not-so-good food and whatever variations there are. Consequently, their voices could be valuable and important. This indeed extends to the families of the residents.

I have a couple of parents – one is 85, and one is 90 – and I'm blessed to still have them with me. My father is less able to make decisions for himself than he once was. My mother still lives independently. For seniors that are in a position where they can't always make decisions for themselves, I think having family available to be involved in these councils could be very valuable, having advocates. Perhaps it should be extended to an advocate beyond the family if indeed a particular senior doesn't have any family prepared to come and advocate for them and they need that advocate. That's just a thought that goes through my mind as I speak to this.

I think that giving the family members that love and care for the seniors in these facilities a venue and an avenue to come in and advocate for and be involved in their loved ones' lives has value. I believe it could actually help the operators of the facilities do a better job, help the people living there have a better quality of life. It's certainly worthy of consideration. I'm sure there are other members of this House that do have or have had loved ones in long-term care facilities that may actually see that value as well.

The other thing, too, while we do this – and I think it's important to hold operators to account – is that it's really important not to demonize them. You know, I'm sure there are different opinions in this Legislature, on all sides, that some homes . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, are you speaking on 29(2)(a)?

Mr. McIver: Yes, I am. I am responding to the minister's comments.

The Deputy Speaker: Okay. Continue.

Mr. McIver: And I would say to the minister and all members of the House that while it's important to comment and make improvements, I think it's necessary not to demonize the operators, Madam Speaker, because I believe that no one gets into the business of operating a seniors' home without intending to do an amazing job for the seniors that are there. Indeed, it could be said that some will be better or worse than others. While we are striving for improvements, I think we need to avoid the demonization, and I think that that's something to keep in mind.

I think there's some value in this bill, so I would ask the minister to think about that and perhaps comment on that when he gets . . . [Mr. McIver's speaking time expired] Sorry, Minister.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Dr. Starke: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's certainly my pleasure to speak to Bill 22, the Resident and Family Councils Act. I want to commend the Health minister for introducing this measure. Even though, you know, perhaps some 70 to 80 per cent of the existing facilities in the province have these councils, I think it's good that they should all have these councils and that these councils can bring about a great deal of benefit for the residents, and I think that's a very positive thing.

My experience personally – and the minister mentioned it – is that, you know, in terms of the experience you have, whether it's visiting residents or spending time in these facilities or elsewhere, it's something that I think is truly eye-opening because it can provide a real perspective in terms of the compassion and care of the staff that work in these facilities. Universally, I never cease to be amazed at their compassion, their patience, their willingness to do for patients who in some cases aren't able to express their gratitude or in some cases, in fact, are almost reluctant to be helped. That can be a very challenging situation, yet they do this job, and they do it very, very well.

Some of my earliest experiences as an adult with these long-term care facilities actually were visiting these care facilities with animals. This was something that in the '80s was not very commonplace, and I wonder, as we're debating this particular measure, had there been these councils in place in some of the facilities that I visited in the '80s, whether it would have been, in fact, easier to get access because it was quite a hurdle to get access. The administrators generally hadn't heard about the benefits of pet visitation in these facilities, and sometimes even some of the staff members were unconvinced until we arrived.

We would arrive usually with dogs and cats. Especially in Lloydminster and Vermilion a lot of these facilities housed people who were from rural areas. If there's one thing that had significantly changed in their lives other than, of course, moving from their homes, it was that they no longer had daily contact with animals, and that was a significant change for them. To have the opportunity to once again have contact with animals, that had been an important part of their lives, was something that was in some cases really changing for them.

In fact, my best recollection of that was when we went to one facility. I would always bring our clinic cat. We had a great, big, long-haired, orange tabby cat named Marmalade, and Marm was great for these visits because he was quiet, he was docile, he never scratched, and he was so calm. If you just put him anywhere near someone, he would start to purr. As we know, a purring cat lowers blood pressure and does, you know, a lot of benefit. I remember taking Marm into one patient in particular, and this was a very elderly lady. As soon as I put Marm next to her on the bed, she started talking about cats that she had owned, and she started talking about her recollection of cats that she'd been with. Pretty soon I saw the staff gathering around the door, and I thought this was odd. It wasn't until after I left that one of the staff members said that that particular resident had been there for over year and hadn't spoken the entire time. But she talked to Marm, and she talked to me about her experience with cats.

You know, what does this have to do with the debate? Well, what this has to do with the debate is that I think resident and family councils could provide a mechanism whereby things that are beneficial to residents in long-term care facilities – they would have an avenue to bringing these in. I think it's valuable. I think it has tremendous value.

I will issue a word of caution to the minister that these things can sometimes be a little bit controversial. My experience in that was actually after I was elected in 2012. Some members will remember that the decision was made to make sure that the food preparation for facilities happened in facilities. There had been an experiment to try bringing in food. It was a mess. It was ended, and that was a good thing, and the food preparation was returned to the facilities.

There was a general meeting of the residents of the Mannville continuing care centre about the food that should be prepared at this facility. Everything was going very, very well, and there were no particular issues until it came to the subject – and I'm looking over at my colleague the Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, the Minister of Advanced Education – of cabbage rolls. Of course, the issue became what should be stuffed inside the cabbage rolls, whether it should be rice or ground beef. Well, I will tell you that I was waiting for the canes and the walkers to start flying across the room because the battle over cabbage rolls was the first thing that became a significant issue in the discussion. Everything else had gone very smoothly, but we had the hamburger, or the ground beef, faction and the rice faction. Then, to make matters worse, we had the argument as to whether the tomato sauce should be put on before baking the cabbage rolls or only afterwards.

Ms Hoffman: Not at all.

Dr. Starke: Or not at all. My goodness. A third faction.

Madam Speaker, you can see that the concept is excellent, and I would encourage it to go ahead, but, you know, sometimes we talk about unanticipated consequences. Well, I can tell you that the very fact that we would have conversations and discussions about the food, about other issues that affect the residents, I think, is very positive. From that standpoint, I'm in favour of this bill.

I'm in favour of this initiative going forward, but I want to also encourage the Health minister to consider taking this initiative farther, and that is to take it not just to our long-term care facilities but to our active treatment hospitals, to the patient and family council model that has been used for over 20 years in the province of Ontario. I first heard about patient and family councils in active treatment hospitals when one time I was listening to a program, believe it or not, on the CBC. Now, I'm a Progressive Conservative, so I listen to the CBC, especially on weekends, when I find the programming to be especially entertaining. I for one terribly miss Stuart McLean.

I will tell you that on this program, specifically the CBC radio's medical program, White Coat, Black Art, which is an excellent program, they talked about the patient and family council that was at the Kingston General hospital and had been in place there for some years. What was especially interesting to me was how that patient and family council had done something that we have been striving for in Alberta for years, but somehow we just can't seem to grasp it, and that is to provide patient-centred care. We talk about patient-centred care. We talk about putting the patient at the centre or, in the case of long-term care facilities, the resident at the centre, but the challenge is that there always seem to be things that get in the way. Well, at the Kingston General hospital the patient and family council, it appears, at least, is helping break down that barrier, making sure that patients' concerns and patients' needs are front and centre and that they are brought on a regular basis to the administration of the hospital.

According to a report that's published online from the Ontario ministry of health – it was a review report of how patient and family councils are working in Ontario at acute treatment hospitals, April 2016, and I can send the minister the link because it's outstanding reading. It talks about the changes that have resulted in some of these facilities because of the presence of a patient and family council. In some cases, you know, you might consider them to be small things like changes to visiting hours or adjustments to the policy with regard to how and when patients can leave the facility. In some cases they're bigger things like allowing parents to be present when pediatric patients going into surgery, going under anaesthesia, are anaesthetized. I will tell you that that's a big change if you're that child or you're the mother or the father or the guardian of that child.

These are things I think that we should look at very carefully because, you know, even to the point whereby in one of the active treatment hospitals in Ontario because of a patient and family council they found that the procedure of making sure that health care givers were washing their hands consistently when moving from room to room, which is the simplest, most basic – you know, you think, "Well, that's obvious," but unfortunately the rates of doing that are much less than they should be in our active treatment hospitals, and what changed it after many, many attempts in some of these hospitals is the recommendation of a patient and family council.

So I'm going to encourage the minister to look at doing that in active treatment hospitals in Alberta. Who knows? There may be some that already have them, and that's great. But in the meantime, when we're considering Bill 22, whether it's considering cabbage rolls or visits from cats, I think this is something that is positive, and I think it's something that, certainly, I support.

We obviously will watch out. We need to watch for things and make sure that we're not duplicating, you know, the document that the hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo mentioned. I think that's important. Let's not try to reinvent the wheel. I know that the Health minister is always looking for ways to save money, and that's one of her concerns. If we don't have to spend that $150,000 to produce this document, you know, maybe we'll have to spend a third of that or a quarter of that or none of that if, in fact, the document that's already available can be used or largely plagiarized from or tweaked or whatever the verb you want to use.

But I do think that this is a positive development. I think any time that we can take our residents and their families and get them more actively involved with the operation of a facility, whether it's a private facility or a public facility, to me, makes less of a difference. What makes a difference is having residents and their families involved because I think that's very positive. It is a place where grievances and concerns can be aired on a regular basis, and they can be addressed before they snowball into something much larger, that becomes a concern for both the resident and the family.

I think it's incredibly important that we realize that many of our residents in these care facilities are vulnerable and in some cases have either a medical condition or some other situation that means that they are less able to care for themselves and that every mechanism that we can put in place possible to ensure that their needs are met and that their needs are addressed in a timely basis – and I see this is one of them – we embrace and we adopt.

So, Madam Speaker, I'm wholeheartedly in favour of this bill. I'll look forward to the debate in committee, and I'll also look forward to considering, perhaps, some amendments to the bill. But I commend the minister for introducing it, and, again, as I said before, I would certainly encourage her to consider expansion of this program to our active treatment hospitals.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Red Deer-North on behalf of the Minister of Health to close debate.

Mrs. Schreiner: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to thank all the members in the House today who engaged in the conversation on Bill 22, Resident and Family Councils Act, the act that gives residents and family members of long-term care, licensed supportive living facilities as well as the PDD community a mechanism for healthy dialogue with their facility operators. Truly a win-win for all. Even though I thoroughly enjoyed the debate today – cabbage rolls, cats, and all – at this time I would like to close debate.

Thank you.

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 19
An Act to Protect Gas and Convenience Store Workers

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to rise in Committee of the Whole to speak to Bill 19, An Act to Protect Gas and Convenience Store Workers. I'd just like to take a few moments of everyone's time here because I don't think we should delay passing this bill for another minute. Again, I'm very proud to be part of this bill and part of a government that is getting the job done in protecting our gas and convenience store workers.

This bill is necessary. It's a necessary bill and a bill that epitomizes how extensive consultation results in a bill that both protects workers and ensures that employers can be easily compliant with the mandates in this bill. It's also a bill that demonstrates that this government keeps its promises. We promised to move on protecting these workers in 2015 after the tragedy in Calgary, and we started last session doing that with Bill 17, which ensured that workers would not be liable for loss of money due to theft. Here we are with Bill 19, Madam Chair, further protecting Alberta's gas and convenience store workers. That's what this bill is all about, protecting those workers.

Also, just briefly, I know we haven't talked too much about this, but I don't anticipate that consumers will find these new laws to be burdensome at all. Most people already pay at the pump, and many gas stations who don't have that technology have a prepay mandated at their stations anyhow. Frankly, I can't remember the last time I walked into a gas bar and paid. Bill 19 also mandates that gas stations have signage indicating that prepay is in place, so I think that that's another item that will alleviate any confusion for consumers over what's required in order to get gas.

As you know, Madam Chair, on Monday, when this bill was introduced in first reading, Mr. Jo's family was here, the gas station owner who was the recent victim of senseless gas-and-dash violence. His family was in the gallery as well as his son. You know, his son was quoted in the newspaper after that devastating incident, and he said something that really gets to the heart of why we need to push this bill through. It was this, paraphrased. He said that my dad tried to make people prepay before fuelling, but many would say to him: it's not the law, so I'm not going to do it. So they would fuel up, and some would just take off after they fuelled up. But here we are now, and it is going to be the law. Signage will be out in these gas stations, and there will be no confusion that this is the law and that everyone must prepay for their fuel.

I want to thank all the members in this Assembly on both sides for the positive input that's been given on this bill. I really do appreciate it, and I do think that they see the urgency for this bill as well. Madam Chair, every time a death occurs at a gas station or a convenience store, it breaks my heart, and it breaks all Albertans' hearts. It's for this reason that I urge everyone in this committee to stop the heartbreak and support Bill 19.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to Bill 19? The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to speak to this bill in Committee of the Whole this afternoon. I agree with what my colleague from Calgary-Klein said regarding, you know, how our feelings go out to the families that have been affected by these tragedies. This is why I'm really proud of the Minister of Labour for putting this bill forward and protecting these families so that this kind of thing doesn't happen again. It's common-sense legislation that we have before us. I'm pleased to see the support we have from the opposition as well.

You know, it's interesting that in Alberta sometimes we lead on legislation, and sometimes we don't. I'm really proud that we're stepping up with this bill here today. This is something where I wonder why we didn't have it before, and I wonder about the priorities of the former government and why, perhaps, they hadn't planned ahead and put this kind of thing in place a long time ago. I understand that there are a lot of things that have to be navigated in terms of small businesses and confusion at the pumps, but these are things that we can work out when we sit down at the table with our partners in business. I'm really proud that we're here today and doing this.

I really look forward to hearing what other members of the House have to say on this bill. This is something that affects all of us in each of our constituencies. Like the member said, I think we should pass this as soon as we can. But I think there's more to be said on this bill this afternoon, and I want to make sure that people get a chance to have their say and chime in on how important this is to them and their constituencies.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other questions, comments, or amendments? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise today to speak to Bill 19, An Act to Protect Gas and Convenience Store Workers. Just a couple of months after I was first elected, a woman was killed on 16th Avenue. The Member for Calgary-Klein was talking about this. On June 7, 2015, Maryam Rashidi was killed when she was working at the Centex on 16th Avenue. She died just four months after leaving Iran with her husband and child and arriving in Calgary to work as an engineer. However, she was laid off soon after arriving and was working at the Centex just to make ends meet. I believe it was on her fourth shift at that Centex. She died because she was told that if somebody was in a gas and dash while she was on duty, she would be responsible for those funds. [interjection] No? I think I have that wrong. However, she did die because she was trying to protect the business and she was trying to protect those funds. If that person was forced to prepay for their gas, this would not have happened.

I was able to go to her funeral just a couple of weeks later. I told everyone present that her death would not be forgotten, and it hasn't been forgotten because we are here today to put forward legislation, just like we did with Bill 17, to protect these workers, because they truly do need protection. It's precarious work when you work for a gas station. It's not always the most secure job. It's nowhere near the highest paying job, but a lot of people do it because they need to make ends meet. That's what becomes a precarious job.

Just being able to put forward this legislation to show people that their lives matter and that the deaths of these people – I believe it's been five in just the past few years – are not forgotten, and we are making concrete action to make sure that nobody dies in the future because they have to stop a gas and dash, because they need to protect their place of employment and their job on top of that.

I'm really proud to stand here today to support this legislation. I'd really hope that every member of this Assembly supports this legislation as well because it's incredibly important not just to people who are working in convenience stores today but who'll work there in the future. Because these are jobs that will always be needed, we will always need people to work these precarious jobs. So I'm very happy to stand and support this bill.

I really want to thank the Member for Calgary-Klein for his words and everyone who has spoken because it is very important that we get up, that we support this legislation. I want to, of course, thank the Member for . . .

Mr. Smith: Drayton Valley-Devon.

Connolly: . . . Drayton Valley-Devon because, I know, just being from a community where somebody has recently died trying to protect his business, it is so important. We've all seen how it affects the families, how it affects the communities. No matter what someone's job is, you shouldn't have to go to work thinking — people go to work thinking that they may die. However, that shouldn't be one of your job descriptors. Everyone needs to come home safe, and everyone has the right to come home safe. I'm really proud to have this legislation and to bring it forward and to support it with all my might.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my privilege to stand up and speak to Bill 19, An Act to Protect Gas and Convenience Store Workers. It was with great happiness that I heard that this was coming forward. I think that it is a long time coming, and I know that the Alberta Association of Chiefs of Police have been in support of this coming forward for a number of years now, which is why they were an incredibly important validator of this. Other leaders such as Husky and 7-Eleven have also said that they are coming onboard to make sure that there is prepay available at their stores.

Of course, one of my biggest concerns in my constituency of Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville was that there would not be undue burden put on convenience stores or gas stations that are small, that cannot afford the cost of arming these gas stations with prepay technology, because it can cost $30,000 or more per pump. That was a big concern of mine, so I was glad that the government did do very, very thorough consultation with the different stakeholders, that they went out and that occupational health and safety did thorough checks of hundreds of operations across Alberta to really see exactly what the story was with different types of operations, different numbers of staffing, different training levels, different models of how businesses have policies for how workers can keep themselves safe. There was a really good amount of working knowledge that the government undertook over the last almost two years to do that, so it's with confidence that I can support this.

I want to recognize and remember the people that have lost their lives over the years, families, including the families of Ki Yun Jo and Surinder Pal Singh, who were here to join us as we introduced this legislation, because, of course, every death is one death too many. It's with a lot of sadness but gratefulness that we were able to have them with us that day in the Legislature.

Of course, there are some questions that people have in terms of the rollout of the legislation. You know, people were asking, "Why have a mandatory violence prevention plan?" and "Is that what's best?" I know from the data that was gathered that having a plan is the most important thing, that the data does not back up having extra staff overnight necessarily. What is proven is having clear steps in place so that workers know that there is a set of standards that they can adhere to when they are at work and a certain set of standards that the business is adhering to to make sure that they can be seen, that they can see what's going on outside of the store, that there wouldn't necessarily be more money or more cigarettes, something like that, overnight that is not secured, that might be a reason why someone would target a business for theft.

Also, people are asking questions about the length of time to introduce this. It is important to make sure that we know what the effects are and would be of implementing legislation like this here in Alberta. We need to know what Alberta businesses' concerns are, that they're not being overly burdened with something like this. So I'm glad to know that if a business is concerned about the costs that will be incurred or their ability to institute what the law is asking them to do, they can work with the Ministry of Labour, with occupational health and safety to look at exactly what their own picture is of what they can and cannot do.

Of course, prepaying doesn't mean a card at the pump. I know that in different co-op stores and Husky stores that I've gone to, it's not necessarily a matter of being able to pay at the pump, but you can go into the store. That, I know, is important to a lot of businesses because they want you to be able to come out of your car, come into the store, and actually buy the things in the store that have a greater profit to the store so that the businesses can stay viable. This was a concern that was voiced here and in Lloydminster when we were talking about the difference of the levy on fuel at gas pumps, that people might travel a distance to go to a different store because the margins that are at the pump are not actually a lot compared to the need for business, for people to come into the store.

That is something that I had asked the ministry about, to see what those effects would be. Apparently, what the research says is that it's possible that there might be some change in people's spending behaviour in the very initial weeks after implementing but that when people kind of get the way that they do business around this new way, a prepay system, they go back into the store. It resolves itself within a few months. I'm glad to hear that because I want to make sure that the stores that are out in our small rural communities are able to still keep their employees employed and are able to stay open in some of our smaller communities, that need to have availability to fuel and of necessities that are at the corner.

There were also questions about supports, and we know that these businesses will be able to work closely with the Ministry of Labour's support staff to be able to ensure that we are working with them every step of the way.

Some of the other points that I wanted to touch upon are that there would be time-locked safes, that there would be some methods of having that in place or having minimal amounts of cash on hand. Some have already gone to video monitoring.

It's important to make sure that we have workers safe because healthy workers that are safe are the first and most important necessity to a business being successful. Businesses can't be successful without having healthy workers that are safe and can go back home to their family at the end of the night, which is what every worker has an absolute right to do. So it's incumbent upon us to do what we can to make sure that we do everything within our power to make sure that that happens.

You know, I had heard some concerns from gas station workers that they have unfortunately come into contact with customers that have been quite combative and have blamed these sorts of prepay systems on the workers themselves, so it's good that part of the work is to make sure that there'll be signage so that people become more accustomed to the way that things are changing. We know that it's been working in B.C., so I have faith that it will work here in Alberta as well.

I think it's important to not just talk with the companies that represent these businesses and represent these workers but to talk to the workers themselves and really see what the impacts have been on their lives up until now and what they hope to see going forward so that we can let them know that their voices are important, that their safety is important.

I'm looking forward to seeing this legislation passed, and I appreciate the opportunity to be able to speak on behalf of some of the workers within my constituency of Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville because they are incredible people who do a very tough job.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek.

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm not going to take long. I think things have been covered very thoroughly, but a few things I want to talk about were – the fact is that this is a wonderful move. This is a wonderful bill. I'm so happy to see it.

I remember when they first brought this in in B.C. because I travel to B.C. fairly often. I have family there. I was like: "What? You have to go in to pay first, then get your gas?" I thought that was a little convoluted, but one adjusts. You adjust. After a few times you don't even think about it. Then I started thinking back to a long time ago when we always prepaid our gas. It was what we did, you know, before we commonly used credit cards to pay for gas, and a lot of times when we had full service, you would pay ahead of time.

Dr. Turner: You used to have to pump.

Ms Woollard: Oh, yes. I don't go that far back.

I'm making the point that people adjust. If we want to keep travelling, we buy gas. We adjust.

This is one that is so wonderful to finally bring in. I mean, the fact that B.C. has had no gas-and-dash deaths since 2008, when they brought this legislation in, like, is fantastic. You and I, if we have children or grandchildren going off to do work in all the many areas that they work at while they're going through school or postsecondary education, want them to know that they're going to be coming home at the end of their shifts and not be falling prey to someone who takes advantage of them and often takes advantage of the fact that they think they'll be on the hook for any losses incurred, which they may or may not be.

So, bottom line, I think that the more things we do, within reason of course, to try to help people to do their jobs and be able to come home safely at the end of the day is a good thing. You know, I was thinking, too, that back before we paid at the pump, we'd have to go inside to pay. We'll do the same thing now, just in a different order. This is pay first, pump later.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Madam Chair. I've really been enjoying the conversation this afternoon. I've actually been scratching my mind, desperately thinking: how could I relate climate change to this act? I know that dealing with climate change is a good thing, but how can I actually get climate change into this? I mean, I realize that burning gasoline actually leads to some adverse effects of climate change, so probably I can't get there, right?

Anyway, I do want to stand and actually congratulate the House on the discussion this afternoon. This is a good act. This needs to be done. I have a personal history that I can relate to this. When I was a university student, one of my summer jobs was actually in a gas station, and this was in the era that was referred to. It was not so long ago that you actually had to pump the gas. That's where the name "gas pump" comes from, by the way. You actually had to pump by hand like, you know, a pump handle.

Ms Woollard: I've heard stories.

Dr. Turner: Yeah. I'm not that old that I had to do that when I was a university student, but I did have to work in a gas station on a busy highway, similar to the tragedy that occurred in Thorsby. I did have to work by myself in that environment on a busy highway in the evenings, and I did have to manage cash at the time, so I actually can really empathize with this situation and with the workers who are in that situation.

From that perspective, I can tell you that this legislation is good legislation, and it is going to save lives, as it has in British Columbia. It's going to improve the quality of life of the people that work in that environment and, I actually dare say, the small-business owners, that are going to basically have a more secure source of revenue from their operations. As was attested to by the presence of the folks from Husky, which is not a small business, the major chains like Husky and probably the others are going to benefit from this legislation as well, and that's going to add to the corporate taxes that we can collect in this province. I think all of us should be really happy about that.

I'm not all that worried about whether or not we have to go in and leave a credit card or other identification ahead of time. I'm actually doing that presently with the Element card that we have to pay for gasoline and other things as members of the Legislature. It adds about 30 seconds to the whole transaction, and the small businesses perhaps can get some benefit from it by having the customer come into the store and possibly purchase some other quote, necessities, unquote, at the same time. I think there really isn't a problem with that.

I would remind all members, actually, that Costco works on this model right now. They're very successful. You cannot buy gasoline at Costco without having a membership or a credit card or a debit card, and by the looks of it, from the lines that are at the gas bars at Costco, it's a pretty successful proposition. I think that these are things where, basically, we're moving with the times here, and we should get on with it.

I want to mention not just the gas-and-dash aspects of this bill. The other aspects of this bill are also very important, that cash management that I referred to from my experience when I was a university student. In those days we didn't have lottery tickets, but now there are lottery tickets which are fungible, and with having cash available, potentially, to be robbed, you know, with violence, because of that, I think it is a real major concern. I'm really happy to see that this legislation will go some way to ameliorating that situation. I think there are still other things that may need to be done, but we're going to probably continue with the consultation as we go forward.

This is good legislation. I'm happy to see that it's getting support from both sides of the House, and I'm happy to see that it's going to help with the economy if not with climate change. At least this province will be moving ahead.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: Any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

Prayers

The Acting Speaker: Good morning.

Let us reflect or pray, each in our own way. In our mind's eye let us see the awesome grandeur of the Rockies, the density of our forests, the fertility of our farmlands, the splendour of our rivers, the richness of our resources, and the energy of our people. Then let us rededicate ourselves as committed stewards of such bounty on behalf of all Albertans. Amen.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: Good morning. I'd like to call the committee to order.

Agencies, Boards and Commissions Review Statutes Amendment Act, 2017

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered in respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thanks, Madam Chair. I rise to speak to part 4 of Bill 21, the Alberta heritage fund scholarship committees. I do have some concerns here about how this has been managed and wonder if the transition that's taking place has been helpful or actually quite unhelpful.

I have in my hand a series of letters from a school in my riding. For the last couple of years they have been contacting me and challenging me about trying to do something about this. In one letter here from April of this year she continues to say:

I really appreciate Mr. Orr staying on top of this. I have not heard anything further from Scholarships Alberta regarding the Rutherford Scholarships, so I assume that there has been no change in policy and that they will continue to refuse to provide schools with lists of Rutherford recipients.

That began a couple of years ago. The schools always used to get the lists. The schools used to be able to celebrate with their students, with their staff the successes of students who had done well. The teachers had the opportunity to be encouraged and to be excited about their students.

But when this began to be changed over and, as is indicated, was I guess we could say absorbed into the government department rather than being handled by the committee, the policy changed. I wonder why, when it was brought back into government, the functionality of this thing declined. For the last couple of years students have been denied the right to receive the list of the students in their school that have received scholarships. As a result, when they try to hold scholarship award ceremonies, when they try to promote the scholarship, the whole thing is essentially stonewalled by the department refusing to provide to them the lists of who their students are.

I think this is entirely not helpful for the schools. The schools, clearly, are not very happy with it. Back in April as well I brought this up with the Minister of Advanced Education. He has been aware of it, but so far the policy doesn't seem to have changed. It continues to be the situation.

I've got other letters here going back a further year, to November 2016. She says: "Hello, Mr. Orr. I don't know whether you've managed to make any headway [at all on this] regarding the new policies." Anyway, she carries on: I want you to continue to work on it.

Here is the correct time and opportunity to ask this question: why are schools not being allowed to be included to celebrate, to acknowledge the students that are receiving the awards? The reason that was given to the school is because it's a privacy of information matter, which, quite frankly, I find extremely hard to believe. It would simply take one line on the application form when the students apply to say that they give permission for the school to receive the names and to recognize the students in their school. I don't see in any way how this policy is helpful. I would like to know if it's going to continue to be the policy of the department to refuse schools the opportunity to recognize their students, to receive the names, to know who in their school has received scholarships. That's my question to the government.

If getting rid of this committee is partly an attempt to deny schools and keep schools in the dark, then I think this is very retrograde policy. I do question what's happening here and would appreciate some answers from the government for the schools in our province in that regard.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to comment, question? The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Chair. I want to thank the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka for continuing to raise this issue on behalf of his constituents. Certainly, I think we need to first be clear that we are talking about two very different things. The Member for Lacombe-Ponoka is talking about the Rutherford scholarships and the lists of Rutherford scholarship recipients that used to be provided to schools on behalf of the department as well as the Alberta heritage scholarship committee. I think it's important for everyone in this House to recognize that the Rutherford scholarships were never administered by the Alberta heritage scholarship committee. They were always administered by the government of Alberta. There are thousands and thousands of Rutherford scholarship recipients every year, and, of course, that's part of Alberta's promise. We have committed to making sure that every qualified Alberta student not only has a space in a university or college but has the financial means to get the higher education that they need to make their lives better.

By dissolving the heritage scholarship committee, we are in no way impacting government's ability to administer the Rutherford scholarship or any of the other scholarships that are funded by the heritage trust fund, Madam Chair. I just want to allay the concerns of the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka and anybody else who may be worried that the heritage scholarships are in any way at risk by dissolving this committee. They are not. The heritage scholarships are in very good hands, and our students will continue to get them as they always have to pursue the higher education that will make their lives better.

With respect to providing lists to schools of the recipients from their schools, of course, it's a little bit ironic that the members opposite are asking for more red tape on the administration of a government program. That seems to be uncharacteristic of the way the members opposite carry themselves, but I have committed personally to the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka in the past to look into this. We're still waiting for the department to provide me with a response on why the policy shift changed in the first place and what the factors are that we need to consider before we decide to make the policy shift back to providing lists to schools. Certainly, I will promise to the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka and anybody else who is concerned about this to look further into the matter and certainly appreciate the delicious irony of being asked to create more red tape for our schools and for the department.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: My thanks to the Minister of Advanced Education for the clarification. We did check on the Internet, and I guess maybe we misread there. I actually thought the Rutherford fund was under the heritage fund. So thank you for the clarification. That's very helpful.

I do trust we will be able to resolve the issue of the schools at least somehow being able to know who their students are because I do think it adds a real value to the schools and the teachers and the students.

Thank you. I appreciate it.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek.

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Madam Chair. First of all, I'd just like to recap the phases and timelines for the review of agencies, boards, and commissions, or ABCs. The ABC review was launched in November 2015 and released the first set of phase 1 results during Budget 2016, announcing the dissolution of 26 public agencies at that time. Phase 1 covered 135 agencies governed by the Alberta Public Agencies Governance Act, or APAGA. This review has resulted in the amalgamation or dissolution now complete or under way of a total of 56 phase 1 agencies, boards, and commissions.

The ABC review has now reached another critical milestone with the initial review of all ABCs in phase 2 along with additional recommendations from phase 1. Phase 2 reviewed 140 agencies that are not subject to APAGA, which include a large number of self-regulated professional organizations. As a result of phase 2, an additional eight agencies, boards, and commissions are proposed to be dissolved or amalgamated. Another 24 are undergoing further review to ensure alignment with significant ministry initiatives, broader systems reviews, or legislative reviews. The rest of the phase 2 agencies will be maintained at this point in time.

Various administrative and process efficiencies have been found and will be implemented to help ensure ABCs are efficient and effective in delivering their mandates and goals. We will continue to evaluate all agencies to ensure Albertans continue to be well served and represented.

The third and final review phase is under way now and is focused on executive compensation, roles, mandates, and governance excellence in public postsecondary education. Advanced Education is leading the work on this phase.

Turning our attention now to the bill that is before us, Bill 21, the Agencies, Boards and Commissions Review Statutes Amendment Act, 2017, will enable us to implement dissolutions where legislative amendments are required for 14 ABCs. I'd like to take the opportunity to clarify a couple of questions from second reading as to which phases of the review of the agencies, boards, and commissions are covered by Bill 21. To clarify, Bill 21 covers phases 1 and 2 of the ABC review. Thirteen of the dissolutions proposed in this bill are from phase 1, and one is under phase 2.

I've also noted a few additional questions from yesterday, and I'd like to provide some additional information at this time. First, let me be clear that work continues on phase 3 of the ABC review with a focus on postsecondary institutions. We'll have more to say on this in the future.

Second, members asked about the savings of $33 million over three years from the ongoing work of the ABC review. I am pleased that our government is working hard to find savings in a thoughtful and measured approach. For example, part of that $33 million, including savings of about $5 million in CEO compensation and additional savings, is being found through streamlined processes and efficiencies.

Third, let me take a moment to say a few words about the Alberta Heritage Scholarship Act committees for advanced education. As you recall, during second reading I explained that the Alberta heritage scholarship committees select about 70 of the 49,000 scholarship and award recipients supported by Advanced Education each year. These are specialized selection committees that were stood up on an as-needed basis to adjudicate certain scholarship and award applications. Recommendations were made to the department and finalists selected. Dissolving these committees essentially saves a step in the selection process, and Albertans will not experience any disruption in services. More importantly, Madam Chair, the changes we're bringing forward make the system more efficient, and that's a large part of the goal the government is trying to achieve with our review of ABCs.

In summary, Madam Chair, all of the changes being brought forward by this bill will make government as a whole more efficient, more streamlined, and will remove ABCs which no longer meet the requirements of government and of all Albertans. I strongly urge all members of the Assembly to support this bill.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thanks to my colleague across the way for some clarification on the government's intentions. You know, I'm still concerned about a couple of things in general.

First of all, again, we thought on this side that step 3 was going to look at some more value for the taxpayer, some more value for students, some more value and some efficiency and some effectiveness in our advanced education system, and it's not here. Hearing now that this is a consolidation of steps 1 and 2 and that step 3 is still to come, you know, two and a half years into this government's mandate, it makes me wonder. Why the delay? Why the wait? It's something where the opposition has stood up time and time again and said: "Yes. We applaud this. We look for efficiencies. We look for the opportunity for key agencies to be arm's-length and independent from government." So let's get on it.

But in two and a half years the other thing that surprises me is that we're starting to hear from some of our stakeholders about areas where what the government is doing in these changes may have severe unintended consequences. It may lead to more problems for Albertans conducting wealth, Albertans farming, Albertans ranching, Albertans out there who actually have built Alberta and are actually the ones we rely on to feed us, to create wealth, to provide jobs. When we're getting information on this on such a fast basis, it's good for us to consult, but, again, we didn't have the time frame to know this was coming.

I'm most concerned about the unintended consequences of what this government's doing as it impacts the Agricultural Operation Practices Act. I said this yesterday in second reading. I said that I supported the intent, but did the government get it right? Obviously, in timing and consultation it appears that they haven't.

Apparently, the Agricultural Operation Practices Act is known by Alberta farmers as their right-to-farm law. For years and years there has been great concern about urban sprawl taking up important food production, agriculture land, and it's not easy to balance between people's freedom to choose where they live and how they live and our need to farm and our need to ensure that we live up to our opportunity to feed Albertans and feed the world.

We were originally told that even though this committee has been set and this act is there, it hasn't been used. Well, now we're hearing about a court case that's actually under way under the powers granted through the Alberta Operation Practices Act. Sometimes, you know, when a committee is there, that allows people to operate a little more openly, a little more transparently and make the right decision without going to court.

Of course, we've seen time and time again from this government, from what's happening in Alberta that our court system is so delayed and so clogged up and so backed up. Unfortunately, that makes it so very, very expensive for everyone. If the unintended consequence of what this government is doing with Bill 21 is to force agriculture producers or to force urban dwellers to a very, very expensive court situation, a very, very timely court situation, my goodness, what could the unintended consequences of this government once again not being prepared and consulting on a timely basis be? That greatly concerns me.

The right-to-farm law provides farmers with protection from lawsuits based on the common-law cause of action known as nuisance. I talk to my colleagues in my caucus about it, and they talk about how sometimes it's 2 in the morning and it's the best time to go and get that crop harvested. It's got to be done. We saw it this last fall with our producers when it snowed early, when it formed ice, when it cleared up and unfortunately hit them again, and the crop damage was severe. A lot of the crops stayed on the fields until the spring, and then that caused other problems. My goodness, if we ended up in a situation where a producer was in a lawsuit or a producer had to face an injunction because of the ability to take off his crop on a timely basis, on the highest yield basis – and consumers and Albertans depend on this. The more efficient, the more effective our producers are, the more supply there'll be, the more commodity there'll be, and, obviously, then the cheaper the prices can be for all of our consumers.

Of course, government's main goal, other than being prepared and consulting, is to ensure that competition is enhanced and to ensure that the producers have the best chance to produce effectively and with the highest yields they can.

Now, I guess what I'd like to hear at this point from somebody on the other side is: have we considered what may happen to farmers under the Agricultural Operation Practices Act if all these situations start to get dragged into court? You know, we have the Farmers' Advocate's office right now, which acts as an administrator for the committee, and then the complaint goes before the committee. We'd heard that there wasn't one; now we hear that there is one. I guess, you know, Madam Chair, my concern is: when it comes to our solid agricultural producers, has the government thought this out?

I'm looking forward to further discussion on this, and I'm looking forward to amendments. I'm hoping that the government has analyzed their unintended consequences.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Madam Chair. You know, hearing what the member has to say about, you know, the farming community and the concerns they have, he's right when he talks about how the Agricultural Operation Practices Act is an act that farmers and the farming, agricultural community use, as he characterizes, as the right to farm.

Now, he also the other day talked about how the public agency, the AOPA review committee, hasn't met in six years. They haven't. There are no public members on that committee. It doesn't preclude the ability for the ministry to be able to create an AOPA public review committee if needed. It will draw on members of the public. You can still do that. It doesn't need to draw on the public agency that, as far we're concerned, has become redundant, and I think that redundancy is obvious when it hasn't had any members on it and hasn't had any duties, you know, for the past six years.

I think it is clearing up, you know, some of that red tape. It is clearing up and perhaps streamlining the ability for farmers to do just that, and that's to get on with the business of actual farming. The Agricultural Operation Practices Act still exists. It's the main piece of legislation that gives the right to farmers to do just that, and that is farm. It's in place to look after especially those intensive livestock operations when there are issues of concern that can be brought up and can be addressed, can be rectified so they can get on again with the business of doing that actual farming.

You know, being able to dissolve the public agency will in no shape or form affect the ability of AOPA to do its job, the ability of the ministry to appoint, draw members from the public for a public review committee when and if it's needed. The ability still stays there. There's no loss of that ability to ensure that the work still continues. At the same time, there's an opportunity now to get rid of a portion that had become redundant and, in my mind, is no longer needed, stressing that the ministry still will have the ability to appoint a public review committee when and if needed.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Madam Chair, and good morning, everyone. It's a good day in Alberta to be in the Chamber here, and I appreciate the comments of the minister going forward in regard to this bill and the portions of it.

I think the minister knows that we live and die by the words of this Chamber. That's the reason for the recording of Hansard, to make sure that everything is recorded in a legal manner so that, should legislation be brought forward, everyone can publicly inspect the words that we use and, therefore, the way that they are interpreted beyond that, possibly even in courts, and the use of the legislation going forward.

I'd primarily like to speak to what the agriculture minister spoke to, the agricultural practices review act and, stemming from that, the review committee. There are important things going forward there.

Madam Chair, I'd like to table an amendment going forward, and then I'd like to be able to speak to that. Would it be your preference that I do that now?

The Deputy Chair: Yes, please. If you can just provide me with the original.

Mr. Strankman: I'll keep one. The original is on the top.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member. Your amendment will be referred to as A1. Please proceed.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Madam Chair. To my previous conversation and the conversation from the minister, I'd like to present the amendment and read it as an amendment to Bill 21. I would like to move that Bill 21, Agencies, Boards and Commissions Review Statutes Amendment Act, 2017, be amended by striking out part 2 of the bill completely.

My understanding of the bill, then, would be that any review or any inclusion of part 2 would be stricken from the act, and therefore we would not be faced with a review committee amendment.

I think, Madam Chair, that in reviewing the bill – and I have a copy of the bill right in front of me – it's important, as I've stated to the minister and to others in the Chamber and in Hansard, that we live and die by the words even though it's a small, two-letter word in the portion of the section under part 2.

Amends RSA 2000 cA-7

3 The Agricultural Operation Practices Act is amended in section 4 by adding "if a practice review committee is appointed to consider the referral," after "made and."

Now, I know that it's a small word. This may be some sort of a technical technicality, but I've seen it in legal precedent personally and in other cases, in this case the word "if." It's a small word. Even the minister in his dissertation moments ago said of the review committee, which is a part of the agricultural practices act: if the minister decides.

I think that's an important qualification, Madam Chair, because the Agricultural Operation Practices Act, which the farmers of rural Alberta and indeed many parts of the country view, perceive to be their right to farm as part of their heritage, is part of the property rights that they have. It was created as a protection of those property rights and a protection of their heritage and a protection of their ability to operate their farming practices as normal farm practices.

As a long-time and former aerial applicator I've applied chemical in and around farming communities and acreage communities from Innisfail, Alberta, to Frontier and Carlyle, Saskatchewan. In some of the cases where there are acreages involved and we're out there applying chemical, those acreage owners take great aversion to what they perceive to be the dangerous flying manoeuvres and application procedures of aerial applicators in applying chemical to the neighbouring farmland, but that aerial application manoeuvre is actually a standard practice. It's part of a standard practice, not unlike chasing cattle down a roadway, which can create dust, the spreading of farm waste, manure from hog operations that may have gone on on a farm operation for generations. Then they are forced by someone who moves there, as my colleague from Cypress-Medicine Hat has stated, in an urban sprawl situation, where those people take great offence to something that was actually a normal practice before they moved there.

Madam Chair, I think it's important that we be exercising and cognizant of our due diligence in this Chamber to protect the rights of agricultural producers. It's part of the heritage of where our food comes from, and I think it's very important. As my colleague mentioned and as I've been made aware of, there actually is now a court case that is in procedure under the auspices of this act. The maintenance of this review committee is not necessarily a financial burden. These people do not get paid per diems. The maintenance of this committee is not an ongoing financial burden to the government. It's simply a definitive, verbal recognition of a legal requirement under the present legislation.

Not unlike my friends on this side in the Chamber, Madam Chair, I'm respectfully trying to make this argument to the minister and my colleagues, and many of my colleagues of the government and in the government are from rural-based areas, whether it be, in the case of some members, even an agricultural process called forestry. There is action that goes on that people who may move to an acreage feel offends them, but that has been a practice in those areas for a long time, and we need to have a respectful way, not based on the word "if" the minister decides. It should be enshrined in legislation as "when" there is a complaint so that we could go forward on and actually understand it. I think it's important to get this on the record, and I'm anxious and respectful, hopefully, of our time here today to hear what the rest of my legislative colleagues have to say about this. Even though it may sound like a technical argument, it is very important to a good part of the constituents of Alberta.

I need people to know that one of the pairs of legal eyes that saw and caught this was a property rights lawyer, actually, from St. Albert, who in a past time travelled throughout the province, with north of 50 presentations throughout Alberta. The previous government in this province faced the wrath of his presentations. That could quite possibly be one of the reasons why they are not in government this day, the information that he provided to Albertans about property rights and about the negativity of legislation where the government sloppily, I will say, or without due care and attention created unintended consequences that this gentleman spotted and referred to the rural people. There was a province-wide negative uprising to the legislation, Bill 36, that was presented at the time.

Madam Chair, I'm anxious to hear the comments of the rest of my colleagues. I stand down.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the Member for Drumheller-Stettler for his comments. I understand his concerns, the concerns of his constituents – his constituents are very similar to my constituents – to be able to have their operations. In the case of AOPA reviews it's often of intensive livestock operations. Now, the Agricultural Operation Practices Act Practice Review Committee hasn't had any members on it since 2011, right? Since that time, in this interim of six years or so, there have been new, you know, operations. New intensive livestock operations have taken place.

In many respects the public agency, you know, has become redundant. No new members have been appointed. Under AOPA, the Agricultural Operations Practices Act, the minister, myself, has the ability to appoint public members. In the past you drew on that public agency to draw those members from. There were no members to draw from because no one had been sitting on that agency since 2011.

This, you know, in many respects is clearing up red tape. It doesn't take away from the ability of the minister, myself, to be able to appoint members for a review when they come up. It is, I think, somewhat good news that a lot of reviews don't take place. I think the vast majority of Albertans understand the importance of agriculture to the economy of Alberta and how important it is to our culture, a backbone of who we are.

Saying that, it is appointing individuals to the public review committee who would be picked from the agriculture community itself. We're making sure we have the expertise on the review committee to be able to review whatever the complaint might be. The complaints are often around dust, noise, odour in the case of intensive livestock operations. All of these are taken into consideration with the review committee. Like I say, the ability for myself as minister to be able to appoint from the public still exists. It always has. Now it does away with an agency that hasn't had anyone on it. It doesn't now, in fact, really exist.

I want to assure the Member for Drumheller-Stettler and I want to assure the members and Albertans that the ability to review any problems, any complaints based on the Agricultural Operation Practices Act will still continue as it always has. This is just clearing up a little bit that has become redundant over the past six years and continuing to do the good work that Albertans see that the department does, that the government does to ensure that agriculture remains the economic force in Alberta that it always has been.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Chair. I find it interesting that we're going to, by putting forward this part 2 in Bill 21, possibly drop a piece of a committee that has been very effective in allowing us to move forward with no cost involved. I believe that the fact that the committee is there has allowed Albertans to operate in a fashion where they know they need to operate fairly and in co-operation with each other, neighbours being able to get along and recognizing that there is a committee there to protect normal farming operation practices. If we move in a direction where we no longer have a committee there – you know, in the '90s it became very evident that the farmers' right to farm needed to be put into place to ensure that they could continue on with normal farming practices. Now we are to a point where it's been very effective, the fact that the committee is there and that people are not going to all of a sudden get into court challenges and that type of thing.

I do believe that with something that is costing us nothing yet is being very effective in allowing this Agricultural Operation Practices Act to be effective, we do it an injustice in recognizing how effective it has been by now getting rid of it. The fact that there's no activity, in my opinion, does not justify removing it. I actually believe that no activity in this instance is justifying the relevance of it being there. If it was a consideration based on excess funds having to be spent in order to keep this committee in place, that might be a different story, but in reality this costs us next to nothing – no money, maybe a limited amount of funds – to ensure that farmers continue to have the right to farm and that we have a mechanism in place that does not have to rely on court proceedings and those types of actions in order to protect farmers' right to farm and go about their normal farming practices.

So I speak in favour of the amendment as it's worded. I believe that this is definitely not necessary at this time and that we should move forward to ensure that with the right-to-farm laws and what other Canadian provinces were enacting at the same time, in the '90s, we ensure that this type of committee is in place and that we protect that right to farm.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the member for his comments. I would, you know, agree and disagree with some of the comments he's talking about. I agree about the importance of agriculture in Alberta, without a doubt, but I disagree about the effectiveness of this committee, which, in fact, hasn't had anyone sitting on it since October 6, 2011, right? The committee: there's no one sitting on it. It's hard to validate the effectiveness of a committee that, in reality, doesn't exist.

At the same time, I want to again stress that under the Agricultural Operation Practices Act it doesn't preclude the ability for me to be able to appoint a practice review committee when complaints do come up. That still exists. The ability to protect the potential operation of a new facility anywhere in the province still exists and will continue to exist and always has. The fact still remains – you know, facts are facts – that the effectiveness of this committee doesn't exist because for the past six years there was nobody sitting on it, right? In that six-year time we've seen intensive livestock operations, new operations, open up across the province as farmers, ranchers, producers expand their operations. Maybe there are some new entrants into the industry that are operating new businesses, which is all great news.

Part of that great news is the ability of the Agricultural Operation Practices Act to continue the work that that act enables the minister and the department to do to ensure that those operations become viable and at the same time protect the interests of the public when there are some valid concerns. It's doing a dual job, and that is protecting the producers and protecting the public, you know, from potential issues that they might have. It goes a long way to educate the public as well of the importance of agriculture and the ability of farmers to do what they should be doing, and that's doing the good job they are of feeding us all.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. minister – or the hon. Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: Oh, thank you very much.

The Deputy Chair: I just wanted to make sure that you were listening.

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Madam Chair. The government's press release describes Bill 21, the Agencies, Boards and Commissions Review Statutes Amendment Act, 2017 – and I've been asked to be very short, so I will be – as a proposal “to repeal or amend nine pieces of legislation [in Alberta and] to dissolve 14 public agencies,” including the farm practices review committee under the Agricultural Operation Practices Act.

Now, as has been said here by both sides of the House, the AOPA is known by Alberta farmers as their right to farm, and it provides farmers with protection from lawsuits based on the common-law cause of action known as nuisance. Now, that common law allows a neighbour to seek damages and an injunction when they feel they are impacted by operations of a farm, which could be dust or noise or odour that comes from normal farming practices. In the '90s Alberta followed the lead of other Canadian provinces and enacted the right so that farmers would have the ability to have complaints by neighbours such as this go to a committee. That committee is purely a peer committee; that is, made up of people that, you know, would be understanding of what goes on in farming operations.

If we were to look at a farmer that may just be outside of an urban centre, say he's been farming in Alberta since his grandfather homesteaded in the early 1900s and is still farming on the same land, and someone from a new subdivision that Joe farms beside – Joe Schmo, let's say, is the name of this farmer who determines that he has to combine until 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, and he does this everywhere, but it just happens to be beside some people that have moved into a new subdivision.

You know, folks, there's one thing to remember here. In this agricultural life there's only one payday, and every farmer that actually has to get a crop off spends every waking minute either doing it or thinking about doing it. It's an important part of the entire agriculture industry in the province.

One more point I just should make – I was asked to be short, so I will. This committee at the moment has a case currently under way, if I'm not mistaken, under the powers granted under AOPA in regard to a hog barn and smells. Is the committee active and hearing this particular complaint? I guess that's a question for the minister. I have it under pretty good information that the committee has a case currently under way under the powers granted to them under the AOPA.

I mean, once again, if a different level of government, a municipality, decides setbacks for a hog barn, let's say, in this case, that's determined at that level of government. This is what always happens when, probably, urban sprawl starts and folks move into the rural areas and, with respect, bring urban ideas with them. We always have to be respectful of the fact that Albertan farmers and farmers all over the world are charged with feeding the world. Like I say, there's only one payday in this business, and you have to go and get it. The short amount of time that it actually takes for these guys to get this job completed has to be taken into consideration.

With that, I will just say that I do support the amendment and hope that the rest of my colleagues do as well. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Madam Chair. Just a couple of more thoughts. I wholeheartedly support my colleague from Drumheller-Stettler's amendment for a number of reasons. First of all, the committee doesn't cost us any money – so it's not a valid argument that this consolidation saves us money – and it's working.

Potentially, the fact that right now all the complaints go through the Farmers' Advocate's office, who appoints a committee and then delivers a binding decision on whether the farmer is following generally accepted practices: it's obviously a situation where experts, where industry best practices are adhered to and honoured. As my colleague said and as I said earlier, at a time that we need more than ever our good agriculture producers, anything that a government does that could reduce a farmer's right-to-farm protection could have severe – severe – unintended consequences.

As my colleague from Drumheller-Stettler said, the word "if" concerns me greatly and the potential to make it political. What isn't an "if," as my colleague from Little Bow just stated, is that the common law, the generally practised law, allows neighbours to seek damages and an injunction where they feel they are impacted by dust, noise, and odours that can arise from a normal farming practice. Thank goodness we live in a society and a province where legal remedies are there for all.

But, again, we've talked about urban sprawl and how the nature of the two ways of life can sometimes collide. Now we have a situation where the agriculture minister or the cabinet can make it political if – if – the minister decides to appoint the board, if a practice review committee is appointed to consider the referral. So "if" means "if not"?

My concern is that sometimes when something's there and is quiet, that means it's working. Madam Chair, I would seriously ask all of my colleagues in this House to stand up for farmers and ranchers, to stand up at a time when this industry has been again under attack from all sides, whether it's the environment, fires and snow, attack from urban sprawl and environment groups.

Mr. Minister, I'm very, very concerned that the lack of consultation, that the unintended consequences will come right out of Albertans' lifestyle and will come right out of Albertans' pockets and our heritage of fifth- and sixth-generation farmers and ranchers. I would ask you and your colleagues to reflect on this, to act with caution, and support my colleague's amendment to strike the word "if."

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Chair. I seek unanimous consent of all in the Chamber to revert to Introduction of Guests.

Introduction of Guests

The Deputy Chair: Hon. minister, please proceed.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise on your behalf and to introduce some of the smartest and hardest working students in the whole province of Alberta, the grade 6 class of McLeod elementary school. They are here to attend School at the Legislature this week, and they have the privilege of watching us make life better for Albertans this morning. I appreciate them joining us, and I wish them all the best in learning about the practice of democracy here in our great province.

The Deputy Chair: Welcome.

The Deputy Chair: We are now back on the original bill, Bill 21. Are there any other comments, questions, or amendments? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Chair. I have to commend my colleague for putting forward such a good amendment. The fact is that we're trying to improve this legislation and work with government, and sometimes it appears that partisanship gets in the way of actual common sense.

Now, this is something I'd like to discuss moving forward, the Alberta Economic Development Authority. This was something that was established in 1994, and I would say that from the notes I've got, the last time it met was early 2015. What's important to recognize here is that this group regularly puts forward reports on the competitiveness of government. The last report, coincidentally, was done in 2014, and this authority is now more or less no longer meeting.

It's interesting to see exactly what it is that this authority had done in previous years, so I'd like to read from a report that was moved in June of 2015, just after we actually took office. This is important. Now, the report itself is the Report on Competitiveness: Alberta 2014 from the AEDA. I'm going to quote from the message from the AEDA. Specifically here what's important and what they're trying to bring forward is information.

Alberta continues to perform very well in the benchmarking comparison – the province continues to have a high level of GDP per capita, low unemployment rate, and strong job creation. Gains in Alberta's relative ranking in productivity and innovation are also evident in the report. These improvements have come at a [critical] time for the province, as these support sustained prosperity for Alberta during downward cycles in resource prices. Alberta continues to be a leader in tax competitiveness and fiscal policy.

However, the economic landscape is changing as Alberta faces the challenges of a new low oil price environment. The impact of low oil prices on Alberta's economy and competitiveness will depend on how responsive the key players in the economy are to opportunities to innovate, improve productivity, and enhance competitiveness. Low oil prices will result in lower growth and higher unemployment in the short to medium term, but the slowdown in the energy sector gives rise to new opportunities for diversification (as human capital and resources are freed up for [each of the] other sectors) and also leads to a strong incentive to innovate and improve productivity and competitiveness.

Now, we recognize that low oil has had an impact on our economy. There's no disputing that. The move the government had made was that they started the Economic Development and Trade department. That was according to the press release – and I can be corrected if I'm wrong here – on October 22, 2015.

What we have is a group that rates our competitiveness, the Alberta Economic Development Authority. What they're doing is trying to see where we fit in the grand scheme of things. Now, we end up with a new ministry to focus on economic development. I will go and read from the press release from October 22, 2015, New Ministry to Focus on Economic Development. I'd like to specifically focus on the two quotes from the Premier herself and the Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Our government will be a good partner to job creators, by supporting the development of a more diversified and resilient economy. The new Economic Development and Trade department will provide leadership in efforts to create opportunity and lasting prosperity for all Albertans.

Now, that's the Premier.

Let's go on to what the Minister of Economic Development and Trade had said in the same press release.

We need to take the qualities that have made Alberta an energy leader – including an innovative, entrepreneurial culture and a highly skilled workforce – and apply them to the challenge of building a diversified, 21st century economy.

This was where the minister goes on and creates the wonderful Bill 1, the notorious Bill 1, that is more or less a job description of what he is supposed to do. It is Bill 1, Promoting Job Creation and Diversification Act. What's important here is that the minister was supposed to create partnerships that support entrepreneurship and focus on innovation. This goes right within this Bill 1. What we see here is that the minister more or less starts making new ways of creating grants; specifically, I believe it was $5,000 for every new employee. This is something that was very underutilized because the fact is that almost all businesses within Alberta were shrinking.

Now, if the minister had been meeting regularly with a group of stakeholders, like possibly the Alberta Economic Development Authority, they probably would have been able to tell him that this was a mistake. They would have been able to go on and say: "We understand where you want to go with this. We understand that you want to get the money to the small-business owners to grow their businesses, but right now is not the time for us to be increasing taxes."

That is actually where we're needing to be very clear, which is why it appears that this government shut down this authority because we started to see reports or were concerned about seeing reports from this group saying that we were no longer competitive. When we start looking at the fact that we've got a carbon tax, we've got personal tax increases, corporate tax increases, we started seeing an education levy that was put on all of our property taxes, all of this stuff is impacting our small-business community, making us less competitive – less competitive – to our neighbours and other jurisdictions within the world.

What's important here is that when we start looking at groups like this one – and I'm not saying that this group necessarily was the answer to all of our problems, but it could have been a place for that minister to be able to hear what average Albertans were saying instead of putting forward a grandiose plan that failed completely. I'll tell you that my constituents of Bonnyville-Cold Lake – and I've repeatedly said this in the House – have been impacted by the failures that come from that minister and within his ministry. We absolutely need to be looking at reinforcing our business community, our small-business community. Why is that minister not up in the House saying that we need to be competitive within Alberta?

Obviously, what happens here is that we've seen lower personal taxes, lower corporate taxes, and it comes down to the fact that when Economic Development and Trade is a ministry that is not doing its job, we end up with a failure to create new growth, and that's shameful. So what I would like to know is: did the government shut this authority down because they're terrified of the reports that are going to show that we're less competitive to our neighbours? And is there an incentive here to hide from Albertans how exactly we are doing in the grand scheme of Canada? I believe that when we start looking at this and we start investigating it, we're actually going to see that we're less transparent, less accountable to Albertans, and that's shameful.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 21?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

[The remaining clauses of Bill 21 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Deputy Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chair: Opposed? The vote has been carried for Bill 21.

Bill 22 Resident and Family Councils Act

The Deputy Chair: The Committee of the Whole now has under consideration Bill 22. Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered in respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: I apologize, Madam Chair. You said Bill 22? Excellent. Well, thank you. I appreciate the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 22, Resident and Family Councils Act.

Madam Chair, I have a number of seniors' residences here in Edmonton-Centre. I can never remember the exact count, but I know that it's at least more than a dozen. I do make an effort every year to visit each of those residences at least twice a year to have the opportunity to meet with residents and to speak with them, to hear their concerns and be able to share with them the good work that we're doing here at the Legislature and some of the events and things that I've been working on here in the community.

I can tell you, Madam Chair, that seniors in Edmonton-Centre are engaged. Out of all these opportunities I always enjoy the opportunity to hold a bit of a town hall, to take questions from the seniors that I'm visiting with, and they always have a number of very prescient questions. They're well informed about a lot of the work we're doing here in the Legislature. Indeed, I'm happy to say that a majority of the seniors that I meet with and speak with are very supportive of the work that our government has been doing and appreciative of many of the steps that we've taken on behalf of seniors.

But one of the things I have often heard from them about while we talk about government policy and other things: they often raise with me concerns about the residences where they live. Seniors, Madam Chair, are very engaged in building their communities. They're very engaged in speaking with each other and with looking at the different issues that happen. In some cases I've heard from residents that they have concerns about how they're able to raise those concerns and being able to have them be heard. They've talked with me about, you know, raising concerns with management about one issue or another or speaking with others and trying to have issues addressed and that they feel that they have been shut out or that they're not able to have their voices heard or that they have difficulty engaging.

That's in a variety of different residences, Madam Chair, whether that's in public hospital facilities in some cases, in some cases other forms of affordable housing that have been provided, and, indeed, in some cases even in facilities like, say, life lease facilities and others, so I was really happy when I saw that the Minister of Health was bringing forward this bill to ensure that all seniors, all residents in these facilities will have the opportunity to engage in a council, to have that opportunity to be a part of the process to ensure that their voice is heard in the consideration of issues that affect them directly.

If passed, this legislation will expect the establishment of a resident and family council in all long-term and licensed supportive living facilities. We recognize, of course, that there are going to be some facilities that may have already set these up. Of course, we recognize that these are important mechanisms for giving them the chance to present their requests, their concerns, and propose solutions. It gives the opportunity for them to work together with the folks that manage these facilities to set up a resident or family council, to have that discussion.

The family part is important as well, Madam Chair, because indeed not only have I heard from residents of these facilities, but indeed we recognize that in some cases residents are not always able to advocate on their own behalf. This provides the opportunity for families to now have that opportunity to engage and to be able to look out for the care of their loved ones and to be able to have a well-established and defined process by which they can raise concerns and participate in discussions that are going to affect the lives of those they love.

You know, one of the reasons, Madam Chair, that I ran to be an MLA is because I saw that many people felt disenfranchised within the political system. I saw that many people felt that there was no point in being involved in politics, that there was no point in even voting in some cases because they felt that government would never hear their concerns. One of the reasons that I ran was because I wanted to improve that, that if I was given the opportunity to serve as an MLA, I would work with my community to help them better understand the way government functions, to inform them when they had opportunities to engage, and, indeed, demonstrate to them that their government representative, in fact, did care, wanted to hear their thoughts, and would fight on their behalf.

I see this much the same way, Madam Chair. This is an opportunity now for residents in these facilities to have a part, I guess, in what in many respects is a bit of a smaller government that looks after the affairs that affect them in their everyday lives.

I, for example, lived for eight years in a condominium that I own here in downtown Edmonton. Having the opportunity to participate on the condo board at that building was very important for me, and indeed that was my first taste of politics and where I sort of cut my teeth and sort of learned about organizing individuals and advocating for ideas and, indeed, having the opportunity to make change. This is an opportunity that we're now having the opportunity to extend – boy, I'm saying opportunity a lot today; word of the day, yes. This is a chance now for individuals who live in these facilities to have more of a connection, to participate in the decisions that are being made that affect their everyday lives.

I'm very happy to see that this bill covers persons with developmental disabilities who live in residences as well. That was something that came forward after we had some initial conversations with advocates who represent the residents and families. They also felt that councils would be a great benefit to their loved ones and to the family members, give them a chance to have a greater voice and opportunity to engage.

Once this legislation comes into place, any facility resident or family member is going to have the opportunity to establish a family or resident council. It's led from the ground up, which I think is a good approach. The act will support self-governing councils, and it's going to be flexible, which is great.

Last night I was at an event, and I had the opportunity to speak with Mr. Greg Christenson, whose company, Christenson Developments, has built many seniors' facilities across the province and around the city. I had a chance to speak with him a bit about this bill, and he expressed general support. It was important for him that there be recognition that not all circumstances in all buildings and all facilities are going to be exactly the same.

This allows some flexibility to enable residents and family members to determine the best processes and procedures for their individual councils, those being what roles members would play, the meeting format and the frequencies, and when and how the facility representatives should be involved in the council meetings. If a facility already has some form of group in place at the time, then the group has the opportunity to consider how the resident and family council would best integrate with the purposes of this legislation. I really appreciate that the minister has taken this into consideration, offering the opportunity for what is really the intent of this bill. This is to help facilitate communication.

In many respects, Madam Chair, my experience as an MLA has been that in a large majority of the cases when people come to me with questions and concerns, having the opportunity to sit down and talk through it, having a conversation to be able to explain clearly what policies and procedures exist often will solve a large majority of the problems. In many cases, when an individual may be angry, it's easily resolved by simply having the chance to sit down and talk it through.

I'm very happy to see this legislation come forward. I look forward to standing and voting in support and being able to go back to my constituents and let them know about this new opportunity. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Chair. I would like to bring forward an amendment if I may.

The Deputy Chair: Oh. Sure. If I could just see the original and five copies, please. Once I have them, you can go ahead.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member. Your amendment will be referred to as A1.

Mrs. Aheer: Sorry. Pardon me, Madam Chair. As . . .

The Deputy Chair: As A1. You can proceed.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to move that Bill 22, Resident and Family Councils Act, be amended as follows: section 2 to be amended (a) in subsection (3) by striking out clause (b) and in clause (d) by striking out "and not less than every 6 months thereafter until a resident and family council is established"; and (b) by striking out subsection (4). Also, section 5 is to be amended in clause (b) by striking out "or (4)(b)" and in clause (k) by adding ", if one has been established by the facility" after "whenever to the best of the operator's knowledge no resident and family council has met within a 6-month period."

I'd like to thank the member for bringing this bill forward. It's always wonderful to be able to open the lines of communication. As you have as well, I have spoken with many, many seniors in different facility groups and with special needs and disabilities. There is definitely a lack of communication at times for facilities that needs to come forward. The only concern that we have is that we want to make sure that the establishment of these councils is actually the choice of the folks that are in the buildings.

Any time you're establishing a board, for those of us who've been on those boards, there really has to be the momentum to be there. So if it becomes onerous to force an owner of a facility to create these councils, we have to make sure that the bill reflects that because within the structure of what's going on in these places, we would love to be able to legislate goodwill. If that was possible, I think all of us would like to be able to do that, but it's not always possible to legislate that. On top of that, we have to make sure, again, that the facility and the folks within that facility are actually asking for this particular thing.

The reason for the amendment to this is that there is a humongous burden that is then put on the facility owner to make sure that these councils are occurring. The question, I suppose, that I have, Madam Chair, is: if the residents do not want a council, then how will the bill facilitate that or support the groups that are coming forward that may of course want to communicate? I don't think it's a matter of questioning whether there's a need for communication. I think that's a very, very good point. My question is actually how you hold the facility operator accountable to create that.

Secondly, what if the people within the facility are actually not in need of a council and actually have something that functions for them? Does what they have already fall under the premise of what's being put in the bill? Can it be altered to manifest for what's already working in a particular building or facility? Those are some of the things that this amendment, I think, probably covers.

The other thing is that the amendment gives an initial set-up period where the owners have to play ball. What is the consequence for not setting up this facilitating group should it not be set up the way that is intended by the bill? Is there a consequence for the property owner? Is that more red tape for them to have to go through? As we know, there's a humongous burden on these folks already to make sure that facilities are operating the way that they should. By creating this group – again, I think it's a bit ambiguous. We're not quite sure how that legislation will impact those groups that are already there and, even more so, the owners of the facilities.

I appreciate the spirit of the bill. I really do. Like I said, if you could legislate goodwill, that would be wonderful. But as we know, in most of these facilities these are, you know, human beings, that function together. I'm not quite sure I understand the rigidity of the space and time in terms of putting that council together, especially if they have one. Then how do they come forward, again, and show that their program is working if it doesn't follow along the lines of what's being legislated here? These are just some questions that I have. If the member is able to answer those, that would be absolutely lovely. I'd appreciate that so much.

Some other concerns that I have. You'd mentioned that it's quite flexible. To the point of what I'm asking, maybe that's part of the legislation that I don't quite understand. I think, again, something that this amendment will help to bring forward is to make sure that whatever intended flexibility is to be there for the property owners, that can probably be laid out in a way that, again, doesn't become quite so onerous for the facility owners.

When you're creating any sort of council, if you're forcing a group to come forward, my only concern, I suppose, in this situation: some of these folks that we're talking about could be considered vulnerable, right? You were mentioning that sometimes families may be stepping in to help out with the councils and have a say. As much as I'd love to believe that 90 per cent of those people are going to have, in good faith, the best interest of their family members that are there, the concern is: what if the intention is not so good, right? Do we have an availability to be able – I wouldn't know how to judge that, right? If there are vulnerable folks involved, which, technically speaking, we could be talking about at this point in time, the desire to create a council in order to communicate is great, but if the communication is being taken over by a really, really, you know, very adamant and animated family member based on their needs in that space, that also could become very onerous to the facility owner, which could cause problems between the folks who actually live there and the facility owner. Just something to consider in the grand scheme and the broad spectrum of what you're trying to create with this legislation.

One of the things I really like that you said is that you're wanting to build communities. I understand, again, what you're trying to do there, and I totally understand the process of wanting to put in a structure that could eventually, you know, potentially have that ability to build community. We just want to make sure always that the folks that are in charge are the folks that are in charge, right? [interjection] Well, if we're talking about a community – right? – and putting in a council to do that, the council obviously would be the communicator to the facility owners, as I understand it.

We want to make sure that that council is actually respecting and understanding what's in the best interest of the people that are there, not necessarily self-interest towards the owner, because, again, we only have a small group of people that are then representing the best interest of the people there. It's hard to oversee that. Again, if you could legislate goodwill and the ability to manifest good government in that space, that would be wonderful, but I don't think we can as a government have that sort of oversight. It has to be a choice, and it has to come from the residents of that building.

I was reading in this legislation that the structure and the procedures – there's a tool kit, as I understand it, that will come as a guide. The government would be making a tool guide to go forward?

Ms Hoffman: Yeah. It's already in Hansard.

Mrs. Aheer: Yeah.

These are some of the things that I'm just asking, within that tool guide, to consider with this amendment, the space in order to make this be a form of choice for these people and not to be legislated into creating something that by all rights – I totally understand where you're coming from. We want to make sure it actually is reflective of the residents that are in there and not of a group of people who, like I said, may have the best interests but might be a little bit, you know, self-involved, too, which happens, right? It happens to all of us. I've been on lots of boards. Sometimes you're in your bubble and you get stuck in the bubble, and as a result of that, you kind of forget why you're there in the first place.

I'm not sure how you'd legislate that, so hopefully within the tool kit that you're bringing forward is the ability also to help with how it is that you're collecting information, surveys, whatever it is, within that building to make sure they have concrete evidence going forward to make a decision on the board to go to a facilitator – right? – those kinds of things. I'm sure you've thought about all those. It just wasn't in the broad spectrum of what I understood in the legislation.

The other thing is that – and I'd mentioned this before. When you give it up to the residents and the families to take the lead, as a mother of a child with special needs – although, believe me, my son is completely capable of taking on his own life. He's got his driver's licence. Just saying: watch out. He's awesome. I know for myself – and, those of you who know me in here, I'm a little Type A, and I have a very vocal voice – I love to participate in my son's life as much as he would like me to. I'm his major advocate in the world, but he would, I think, many, many times appreciate me stepping out of his life even as much as I'd like to be in his life. This was my concern. I'm actually using myself as the person that could oversteer my son's individuality and his right to make decisions because I think I know what's better for him.

I can only base it on self-anecdotal information, so that's where that piece comes from. Hopefully that's helpful because, like I said, I don't think that there's a family member out there that would willingly hurt or go against what their families are wanting. But, you know, things can get carried away with, especially if you see your family member in distress and something going on and the facility owner doesn't seem to be providing or doing what they need or the elevator is broken or whatever. There are lots of different things that we all know happen in these facilities that make it very difficult for the folks that live there. Again, I understand the spirit of this. I really do.

The other thing is, too, that we want to make – my assumption is that this bill is to actually create communication. By creating communication, you want to actually create allies. In the wording of the bill I think that that's very important. Again, the time that it would take in order to create these boards, I think, will create allies versus more of a sort of battleground between the board and the facility owner. If you can look at it from the point of view that by burdening a facility owner with more onerous tasks, we might be actually creating a situation where you're not creating an ally of the folks that we're actually trying to help and protect.

If within the tool kit or however it is that this is going to be presented the owner and the facilitator are part of the well-being of the people that are actually going to be impacted by these decisions, I think you're going to go a long way to creating allies versus a battering ram effect because if you're burdening the business owner with more red tape – you know, there's already a lot for a facility owner to do and take care of. Again, I would really highly recommend that with the time and the space – and I think this amendment does that. It gives that space and also honours whatever councils and facilitators have already been put in place in order to deal with the facility owners.

Again, you just want to make sure that this doesn't breed resentment. Within these facilities and the things that go on and for those of us who rent or own condos and those kinds of things, we know that that can happen. I think that if that line of communication is done with a sense of working together, you will get a lot more bang for your buck, as it were, and a lot more headway with these folks.

So I'm hoping that the government will accept my amendment on this. Like I said, I just feel that in the space of what's trying to be accomplished here, if we can make it less onerous to the owners of the facilities, if we can make sure that if the facility operator has to go and beg and plead to set up a council that legitimately the folks within that space don't necessarily feel that they need, again, we have to honour choice because these are individuals. You know, we're not trying to impose onto a group of individuals that live in a space how it is that we feel they should live. We need to make sure that that choice is there.

More importantly, the amendment gives an initial set-up period, where the owners are able to come in and be able to find out and facilitate and make sure that that's actually going to happen for them. If we can unburden the business owner and actually make them an ally in this particular situation, I think it will go a long way to making sure that these folks actually get what they need.

Thank you so much.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Madam Chair. While I thank the member opposite for the amendment, I am going to speak against it. I want to say first of all that of all the things I put on my Facebook, I have had more positive response to this, thanking the minister for doing this bill. I live in a small rural constituency, and as of just late yesterday afternoon I have 26 likes and several comments thanking the minister on this.

You know, this bill is about empowering seniors and making life better for seniors. It's going to provide a tool kit for their right to have these, and it's not just the seniors but also their families. I'm pleased to see that this also includes lodges. I've had the occasion lately to visit a couple of my lodges, and they are very active people. They come from their homes, they go into lodges, and they want to continue to be on committees, to be part of a community, and they are part of that lodge community. When seniors move in, they don't want to give up their interests, and they want their homes to be meaningful, so this legislation allows them to have a say in their new homes.

I can assure my colleague that in rural Alberta people watch these things and will be very aware. I honestly see this as my job as an MLA, to go around and make sure that all my seniors know that it is going to be their right to have this council available to them. Many of mine already do this kind of thing, but this makes it more formalized, and I'm very pleased to see that this is an important venue to provide concerns. Recently in one of my lodges we had a need for some mental health support that we weren't able to get, but having a group like this would be very much helpful for that.

Madam Chair, our government is committed to ensuring seniors can continue to live with security and dignity. I'm proud to support the bill as is, which empowers seniors as well as others in supportive living to have more involvement and influence on the things that matter to them as their home.

This amendment, actually, I think would weaken the legislation. I think there are lots of ways to ensure that every six months this comes up. Residents come and go, and as new residents come, they will be, you know, notified that this is a right of theirs. I think it's incumbent upon all of us in the House as MLAs to make sure that our seniors do know that when this bill is passed, they do have this right. So I am in support of the bill as is, and I feel that I need to speak against the amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1?

Seeing none, I will call the question on the amendment.

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Deputy Chair: We are now back on the original bill, Bill 22. Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. At this time I'd like to propose another amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, if you could just wait till I have the original and five copies, then you can proceed.

Mr. Yao: Certainly.

The Deputy Chair: If you could, please, provide me with the original and five copies . . .

Mr. Yao: Yes, yes.

The Deputy Chair: . . . and then you can proceed.

Your amendment will be referred to as A2. Please proceed.

Mr. Yao: Madam Chair, with this amendment I would like to move that Bill 22, the Resident and Family Councils Act, be amended in section 5 as follows: (a) in clause (b) by adding "to the extent reasonably practicable," after "attend, or ensure a facility representative attends," and (b) in clause (c) by adding "to the extent reasonably practicable," after "document, or ensure a facility representative documents,".

What does that all mean, in a nutshell? Madam Chair, the legislation does not appear to prevent the formation of multiple councils from residents, and if I might take the copy of the Alberta Continuing Care Resident & Family Council Toolkit, which was created by Alberta Health Services and Covenant Health and other allied services, which will be tabled this afternoon, as an example, this talks about who can set up a council. Residents and families can set up a council on their own initiative or with the care centre staff and administration, who can create the council. But, anyway, this enables people to set up a council at their own will, which is great. We want to encourage that because this bill is a good bill.

I understand what the good Minister of Health is trying to accomplish with this. There are a lot of complaints that come through or a lot of issues. A lot of them can be resolved locally within that facility. Only then, if they can't resolve them internally, would they go to the advocate. Or, better yet, just send letters to the Minister of Health. I receive probably a few per cent of what she receives. I can only imagine. But I guess I've experienced those one-offs, those people that are extremely – I don't know if I want to call it passionate or overbearing, but they do become very extreme.

The clauses I add in here don't discourage these groups from forming, but what it does do is ensure that there's a practical level to the engagement of the agency. Again, when you look at the most extreme, there is the opportunity for people to set up their own groups within just the way a lot of this is drafted.

This toolkit is a practical, step-by-step process to follow for setting up and managing a Resident and Family Council . . .

Are residents and their families interested . . .

How prepared is your care centre?

They even demonstrate different models of administration for a lot of these. So if someone does not like an executive structure for their council, they could go with a leadership team structure, or they could even go with a more round-table structure.

But the point is that even within the definitions they provide more than one structure, and if it is not suitable for a certain individual or group, they may choose to go another path. So there does remain the opportunity or possibility of more than one group, or you have a group that is just simply incessant and very aggressive in their time. Some of these families have the ability to meet every day if they so desired and wanted to, and they would ask that there's a representative from the facility that attends each meeting or even a weekly. Then if you have two or three of these groups, it could become cumbersome.

Again, the bill itself ensures, at the very least, that there will be a venue for these things to occur and for these boards to be created. But we need to ensure on the other end of it that it doesn't become too cumbersome because it does become about bureaucracy. We definitely want to see these people, these families, have their input and discuss these issues to address them at that local level in the facility, but we have to recognize that we just need to show some restraint there and have that ability.

That is what my amendment is, and I do ask the government side and all members of this House to consider this as a reasonable and practical amendment to this very fine bill. Thank you so much.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A2? The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Deputy Chair of Committees. I really want to begin by saying that I appreciate the tone with which the member is proposing his amendment and the collaborative nature that I feel today. Certainly, when we were in second reading yesterday, I was worried it wasn't going to be that kind of a dialogue, but I appreciate the opportunity that committee gives us to put out questions or concerns.

I want to just begin by saying that I think that existing AHS and Covenant tool kits could be a very useful piece in developing the broader tool kit that will flow from this legislation, but those are only for AHS and Covenant facilities, and this legislation will apply to all facilities, whether they're privately funded or publicly funded, no matter who the operator is. I think it's important that we take that into consideration. When I hear some language around, you know, overly cumbersome for the owner or for the company, those types of things, it speaks to why we absolutely need these councils, in my opinion, and why I think this amendment could be damaging to the intent of the original bill.

The language "to the extent reasonably practicable" I think is essentially creating a giant loophole that could allow operators who actually don't want to have these move forward to, in a way, diminish resident voices and family members' voices. It's right that the current structures that are in place in the tool kit – I think that the amendments as proposed could be taken into consideration for the logistics around, actually, how to support these through a tool kit, but most of these councils that currently exist in some form, which is in about 70 per cent of current facilities, are very communal, grassroots, much like school councils, to be frank, where people come together with good intentions to talk about ways they can help make life better for the students in their school, and that's exactly the intent with this.

I have to say that from my own personal experience as a family member, when there is an actual form or structure, sometimes people who are the most vocal have, actually, a structured, formal way to raise their concerns rather than creating a lot of distress for all of the people in a facility or all of the staff in a facility. I actually think this is a good way of finding a win-win in terms of having a structure.

To be completely frank, my intent is to empower the voices of the residents, and that is what I think this legislation in its current form can do. I understand the concerns around logistics, and that can certainly be taken into consideration in the tool kit. It will definitely be posted publicly, and I would welcome feedback. If there are specific pieces as a tool kit for all facilities rather than just one specific tool kit for AHS facilities or another one for Covenant or other allied facilities, I think it would be useful. And I think that acknowledging that there are a whole variety of different private, public, publicly delivered-publicly funded, publicly funded-privately delivered, not-for-profit-delivered lodges, long-term care facilities, assisted living facilities, congregated sites where people have a variety of needs will be very helpful, and I look forward to having opportunities through the tool kit to empower resident voice. Residents, in my opinion, should be the driving force in this legislation.

I'm of the opinion that this amendment sort of creates too large a loophole for opportunities to not empower the residents in having their voices heard. I understand the intent behind it, and I think that there are probably some structures that can be acknowledged through the tool kit that is created. I imagine much of it will be cribbed from other existing resources. I think it's good public policy that when you know something is working, to find ways to take it and amend it moving forward. I do want to say that for the reason that I feel this creates too large a loophole and could diminish resident voice, I am going to be voting in opposition to this amendment.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you so much to the minister for speaking on this. I couldn't agree with you more. The intent of the bill is definitely to empower the voices of these folks, and that's fantastic.

I'm not quite sure I understand the aspect of the loophole. In fact, I think that this amendment may actually close that loophole. If you're having the potentiality of warring boards with any facility, this actually helps to make sure that that doesn't happen. Presumably, if they're being able to establish their own governance structure and procedure, if there are other issues or if they don't feel like they can talk to each other, you could put that into the tool kit every single day, but this actually helps to stop that from happening. So if your structure is intact, I think it would be more efficient and probably function better to actually empower the people to have a voice.

You know how that can be. If you have sort of two warring boards against each other, again, it's not exactly going to be helpful to facilitate on behalf of the people that are there. It becomes more of a war over a particular situation or an issue that's happening within that particular council.

To your point, you were saying as well that 70 per cent of these places already have this, so the thing is that, again, we don't want to impose a structure on a choice that's happening. If you're truly wanting to empower people, they have to want to do that, right? They have to feel empowered to do that. You can put in the structures – and I understand where you're going with that – but 70 per cent already have that. By not putting in that amendment, do you think that you could be counteracting the 70 per cent that are already there and functioning if, by chance, by putting this in, you create the space for another board to go against what's already working and functioning there? I think that's actually the spirit of this amendment, to actually make sure that whatever is actually functioning works within the space of what you're trying to accomplish here.

You had mentioned also that the bill is sort of the driving force behind making sure that the residents have their voice there. I would assume that we have to make sure, for example, depending on how often they meet – and some councils might have a lot more, you know, desire to meet more often or less often. If they're meeting daily, do they always have to meet in a particular facility? Does the facility representative always have to be there? Is that part of the way that this is going to work? I'm not sure. Is that going to come out in the regulations or in the tool kit? I don't know if you can answer that for me, if you have any clue about how that's going to work.

Again, I think that the bill in its essence is very good. I mean, you want to be broad enough to be able to handle all of the different groups. These are all very unique facilities. Like you were saying, there is every type of facility that you can know that's going to be under the auspices of this bill, and I actually think that this amendment closes that loophole a little bit. I would love it if you could look at it from that perspective. I think it actually would be quite helpful in empowering.

Thank you so much.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Hoffman: Just to respond to the points raised, my concern is that this essentially creates a loophole for administration to not attend the meetings, to not document what's happening, and to not follow up on the advice given by the folks who are there. If we do want to empower their voice, somebody needs to listen. Your point is well taken. I think we can consider it, potentially, in the tool kit, but I want to be clear that if folks are gathering to be heard, somebody shows up to listen.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm not sure if I've explained this amendment well enough just by the fact that the good minister might be disagreeing with it. These clauses that we're trying to put in are just to kind of put a bit of a ceiling on these things or enable a facility the ability to provide the service but only within reason.

Again, if I might look towards someone else's tool kit, the one that was created by Alberta Health Services and Covenant Health, which will be tabled later this afternoon, I might add, it does leave things very open if I might say. It talks about the structure of it.

This style has elected, formal positions (chair, vice chair, and secretary) and defined and assigned responsibilities.

Its benefits include:

- clearly defined roles – for some people, it is more comfortable to know exactly what their responsibility is.

As well, familiarity: people understand the formal structures with chairs, vice-chairs, and secretaries, much like the good minister worked on an education board, I believe. I've been on some boards as well.

Again, they also throw out other options here, a leadership team structure. Someone who might not agree with the one structure might say, "I want a leadership team" because they're more of a team player, if you will. That team structure provides more of a shared responsibility, duties that don't really particularly fall on any individual. They emphasize more collaboration and learning and playing on the strengths of the team, certainly.

Then there are other considerations for deciding the council's structure. Again, it's led by residents and family members, but with any of these groups the care centre staff and administration must collaborate, document, and respond to council items. Again, we recognize that with any council that is created, the facility will be bestowed to them and accountable to them.

From some experiences that I've seen, you do get some people who are on the extreme, people who become very, very vocal, who feel that they're being treated unfairly. It might not be the system, but they are insistent and they are incessant. If I might provide an example, someone who is, say, under the care of human services. Maybe people in this room aren't as familiar with the health care aspects, so we'll go to human services. In my constituency, as many of you guys have dealt with, you get the people who fall through the cracks.

We had one. We had this family who has a child who has a lot of developmental disabilities. When they transition to 18, everything changes for them, as I know you guys have encountered as well, and we were helping this person to navigate. I found out through human services that they've had a lot of issues with people, and it wasn't the child. They had concerns about the mother. It was the mother who was actually the impediment to her child's care. She was very vocal, and she was very aggressive towards staff and other people. Then when the child turned 18, she was feeling all sorts of issues.

Our human services actually flew a team up from Edmonton to Fort McMurray to address this, an entire team of human services specialists to help this person get through this, to navigate this process. That's what makes me feel good. As an MLA I felt good that we were doing something good in our constituency and that we had government officials coming in here to assess this individual who required supports. The problem was that they couldn't help this person because it was the mother that was the impediment, and she is to this day, and it makes it very, very difficult when they can't treat it. Anyone here who has any experience in human services and that might have experienced something to that effect.

Certainly, I have also encountered that in the health care facilities. I was only a paramedic or a supervisor at the time, but I guarantee that we've seen those people, who are very aggressive. They become very aggressive at staff. I'm not talking about the patient; I'm talking about the patient's family. They're very rude. For lack of a better term, they're, like, very obnoxious. They would throw things at people, and these weren't even inhabitants in the care facility.

If we could give them another venue – I appreciate that this is more of a formal venue in which they could create that influence and possibly make it a positive influence – it would help things. But, again, like with anything, they can take it to an extreme. That extreme is that they would actually become a very cumbersome weight on a facility when more of the facility's resources are put towards this outlier group, much in the same way that the government has to deal with an opposition who's always in their faces. Surely, you understand that and recognize how much people can really get in your face and be aggravating to you when you're just trying to do good, but you're forced to listen to these guys over here, right?

Mr. Panda: Are they really trying to do any good?

Mr. Yao: Well, we hope they're trying to do good. We're trying to provide them with guidance to do things even better.

I guess, again, I just need to emphasize that that is what this amendment is about, putting in restrictions. You at least can call the time limit and say: "You know what? The House is closed. It's 3 in the morning. We're not listening to the opposition anymore." Some of these facilities might not have that same ability based on this legislation, and we need to ensure that they do have the ability to say: "Enough is enough. We've tried to find a reasonable amount, but we can't deal with multiple issues like this." Again, the words are "to the extent reasonably practicable." I didn't even know that was a word. I thought it was "practical." Me none too smart.

We need these clauses in here. We need to provide limits. Everyone is about limits, and we need to ensure that there are limits to these things. As an example, using the Covenant Health and Alberta Health Services document here – and this is a fantastic document – it explains everything quite well as to what this government side wishes to do with these family councils. It is a good and noble thing. Again, as you stated, there are many facilities that already have this kind of documentation out there. Covenant Health even explained the background, how they've been experimenting with this for seven months in a few facilities. We need to promote it, and I commend this Health minister for identifying this and pushing it forward to ensure that the facilities who do not have it have that guidance to provide that. Again, it is about just tweaking things just ever so slightly so that they don't have to do what the government does and deal with an opposition that's always all over them, right?

Again, you as the government do have the ability to rein us in, to say that enough is enough, to stop, and ultimately you do have the vote. What we don't know with these councils is to what extent they will have that ability to restrain other groups. I have seen these other groups. They are the ones that go to the Health Advocate. The Health Advocate alone can provide you a list of these outlier people and many of these agencies who are actually barred from facilities because they were so aggressive. Those are the very same people that would be trying to start a board. We need to ensure that they do have that venue, but there needs to be some inherent restraint within that.

If it is not in the legislation, if it is not drafted as such, there will be people that will abuse it for their own – I don't want to use the word "malicious" because I think they really want what's best for their family member. But, again, they misinterpret. I truly believe people misinterpret and don't understand the health care field. They don't understand that we have to, like, lift someone up and pull them up so that we can wash their back or clean their buttocks after they've messed themselves. When you watch someone who's a professional and so good at that, someone who's not used to it might think it's rough and aggressive, but what they do is actually very efficient in how they can do it. It shows a certain level of strength and discipline in how they're able to do it and take care of their patients oh so well. The problem is that someone else might not interpret it as that, and they might lay a complaint against that person. I've seen that.

They don't like how a person is feeding their mother or their father when they're really using great care, and you see that they do have a great bond. Then that outsider family member comes in and becomes aggressive towards the caregivers. I've seen that many times. They accuse of withholding drugs or things like that or giving too many medications, and they're simply following doctors' prescriptions. There are a lot of issues that can come out when you give people that venue, which is great, but again it's about enabling a restriction on how much they can impede a facility. That's what it ultimately does sometimes. It could lead to impeding the ability.

Again, what about multiple groups? These facilities are going to have to provide someone to attend each meeting. As it stands now, I hope many of these facilities are demonstrating a lean administration and more front-line workers, but when they have to assign more and more people to these meetings, they could become cumbersome. There are no limitations on these things. We might ultimately become overbureaucratic within these facilities, and they would become immobilized. You guys know all about that, right? Bureaucracy? Immobilization?

With that, I do ask and plead with the government side and the Health minister to please consider the words "to the extent reasonably practicable" with both these clauses. I'm not asking for something extraordinary here. I just want to put a slight limitation in there. It doesn't discourage this legislation. Again, I agree with this legislation. It's great. I would ask you to mull that over and consider it. Please talk to your subject matter experts. I'd love to have access to those guys behind the scenes and pick their brains on stuff, but I'm not the Health minister.

With that, I do ask you to please consider this amendment. Thank you so much.

The Chair: Any other speakers to amendment A2? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Chair. When looking at Bill 22, I think it is an important bill. I think it's important for the residents of these long-term and supportive care facilities to have their voices heard. I know that in our constituencies we quite often get concerns brought forward by family members of these residents and by these residents themselves. Obviously, it is very important that these concerns are heard and dealt with in a proper manner. These councils have the potential to be very constructive and to help and enhance the quality of life for these residents, so those are good things.

I think what this amendment is trying to do is to just try to bring some common sense and some reasonableness to this process, and I think that's a good thing. I think we can have amendments like this come forward and bring some balance to this. You know, we don't know what could happen with these councils. These councils could have daily meetings or even multiple meetings per day, and facility representatives would have to attend each one of these. Of course, we don't know what kinds of documents could be requested or what kind of information could be brought forward at each of these meetings.

Again, if you're having multiple meetings a day, multiple requests for information, then it could become burdensome to the people that are providing the care. We want the people that are providing the care to focus their attention on providing the care and not, you know, attending an overabundance of meetings that may not be necessary. Now, of course, this is not saying that these meetings wouldn't be important. This is important. We agree with that. It is important to have these kinds of groups be able to be set up and represent these residents, but there needs to be, I think, just some sort of reasonableness to this.

For instance, when we look at these meetings and everything, I know in my constituency I've had multiple concerns brought forward about a particular resident from different family members. These family members don't always get along. They're not always talking to each other. They both have the common interest of the resident and the best interest of the resident in mind, but they don't always see eye to eye themselves. They don't see eye to eye in what they think that care should be and what's wrong with the situation.

When you have situations like that, obviously you could have one resident that could have multiple groups set up to represent their care. When you have situations like that, then you have the people that are the facility representatives being drawn into different meetings, talking about the same person with different groups having different interests.

I think that's what this amendment is trying to do. It's trying to bring some reasonableness to this process to make sure that this doesn't become a burden on the people that are being represented by these groups.

Now, when we look at the bill itself, it says in clause 5:

- (b) attend, or ensure a facility representative attends, all meetings of a resident and family council where invited to do so by the council and all meetings convened by the operator under clause (k) or section 2(3)(d) or (4)(b).

This amendment would be adding “to the extent reasonably practicable” after “attend, or ensure a facility representative attends.”

Of course, there’s nothing in this amendment to suggest that these facilitators not attend or avoid attending any of these meetings. They just need to have the opportunity to have that, to be able to make a judgment call and say: “Okay. Is this reasonable or not?” I think we can trust these operators to have that kind of reasonableness and to be able to make that decision themselves.

We go on to where it says:

- (c) document, or ensure a facility representative documents, any requests, concerns and proposed solutions expressed to the operator or a facility representative by a resident, a member of a resident’s family or a resident and family council.

Of course, add to that “to the extent reasonably practicable.”

Again, obviously, these facilities – you know, I think it’s important that they document these requests and concerns. I think that is important. But we need to make sure that if we have multiple people representing the same resident and having an inordinate amount of meetings and document requests and documentation to be kept track of, that we kind of bring some balance and have these operators have that opportunity to make that decision themselves.

I’ve met a lot of these different facility operators and the people that are working in them. I know that these people have a great amount of care for the residents that are there. They’re doing their best. They’re trying to make things as comfortable for the residents as possible. Let’s face it. It’s a job that, you know, takes a lot of love and devotion. It isn’t something that you just would show up and do without having a care for the people that you’re in charge of. These people, I think, can help in this decision process as far as what is reasonable and what isn’t in dealing with the residents and these groups that will be formed to represent the residents’ concerns.

So I think this is a reasonable amendment, and I would encourage all members of this House to accept this amendment. Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A2? The hon. Member for Red Deer-North.

Mrs. Schreiner: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I’d like to thank the member for bringing this amendment forward. First of all, I want to talk about that this should be a safe community for any of the residents and any of their family members and those that are working in any of these facilities, these long-term care facilities or supportive living facilities. If anyone comes into the facility that is violent in any way, I would strongly recommend that they phone the police immediately. This is the residents’ home, and we have to make sure that we take good care of them and that this is a safe place for them.

I want to talk about this bill. I think it’s such an important bill, and I think there’s maybe a little bit of confusion on the other side when it comes to this amendment. I’d just like to say that right now 72 per cent of facilities already have resident and family councils in place, that have been in place for years. Myself, I’ve worked in long-term care for many, many years, and just about every facility – and I’ve worked in many – have had and do have a resident council and a family council already set up, and they’re working great.

It’s a voice for the residents. This is the residents’ home. It’s their voice. It’s a venue for them to bring things forward, even when it comes to cabbage rolls, that we talked about yesterday, how they should be cooked or whether or not we want an aquarium with fish in it for the residents to look at or the cleanliness of the facility – maybe someone has an issue with that – or what they would like to see Christmas look like this year. It’s their voice to be able to bring forward what they would like to see when it comes to their quality of life. That’s what this is about. It’s about a good quality of life for our residents here in Alberta.

The resident councils that are in place right now and the family councils are deciding what that looks like for each individual facility, what the members’ roles would be, what the meeting format would be, how often they meet. I have heard some members on the other side talking about, you know, meeting daily. Well, I’ve worked, like I said, in a lot of long-term care facilities, and I’ve never seen resident councils meeting daily. They probably meet weekly or monthly. It depends on what’s going on, what time of year it is, and what issues are going on, but that could be determined by the people that are attending the committee meetings.

I just want to remind everybody that this is a venue for residents, their loved ones, and the facility operators to come together and make things great for the lives of the residents and their loved ones and the employees and the employer. It’s just making things better for all.

I have to say that I think this is a good bill, and I don’t think we need to look at this amendment because everything that we need to do in the bill is already covered. Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A2?

Seeing none, are you ready for the vote?

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment A2 lost]

[Motion on amendment A2 lost]

The Chair: We’re back on the main bill. Are there any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to Bill 22? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Chair. I have to say that anything that we can do to help our seniors within these facilities is a good move forward. I think everybody in this Chamber would agree with that, that the people that created our province and grew our province to what it is today are the ones that should be respected within these institutions that are dedicated to them.

I would like to say that I believe that the opposition had a part in this bill, in the creation of it. Let me explain. What we had over in Lacombe hospital and health centre was a very tragic situation. I'm going to read some from an article that was put out on May 9, 2017. The article's name is AHS Investigation Discovers Serious Problems at Lacombe Long-term Care Facility, and this was written by Keith Gerein. Now, what's tragic here is that during this time frame we had one of our institutions fail our seniors. This is terrible. Nobody wants to see that. Nobody.

Now, the concern was brought forward by a Wildrose Party FOIP that was released. What happened here was that a report was done when nursing students were doing their practicum, and they found that there were very strong problems within that facility. What we need to be doing is taking that very seriously. In this facility there were 75 residents. Seventy-five people. Now, if there had been a resident and family council at that facility, there may have been a layer of protection for those residents so that we may have been able to identify these things.

What's tragic here – and according to the document that the investigation found, I would argue that any one of the things that I'm about to read are something that would cause alarm for most Albertans. I'm just going to go through this because these are actually very incredibly insulting places that we've put these poor seniors into.

"Inconsistently updated care plans and patient charting." So if there's a problem, this isn't even charted. That is just phenomenal.

"Incomplete fall risk assessments, dietary assessments, vital signs monitoring and wound care interventions." Now, I have to say that I have heard that one of the leading causes – and I can be corrected – is falls for seniors. Once they fall, it becomes very, very hard for them to recover from that injury. So the fact that we're not creating a fall risk assessment on these individuals that are in these care facilities, which is their greatest risk: in my opinion, that is unfortunate.

"Improper security of private client information." Now, we had other instances where FOIP was broken, and this made news across Alberta because we all want our privacy. These are just part of the problems that they were having there. This is crazy.

The "presence of expired aseptic supplies such as wound care products and catheters." I don't know where to go with this, saying that we could have grabbed the wrong medications, and that could have led to one of our seniors going into – well, unfortunately, a fatality. This is the kind of stuff that we need to be watching for.

Now, we've got "dirty products stored with sterile products." I'm sorry, but I've got to assume that doctors or nurses are taught from the very beginning that sterile items need to be kept sterile. That's got to be the first thing they're taught. How is this not, in this long-term care facility, something that priority is put on?

Now, we've got "used client razors left unattended, and tubs found to be dirty." So we've got people taking risks based on the fact that we're taking shortcuts. That's awful.

We've got "soiled linen and garbage found . . . overflowing into hallways." Now, the soiled linen is unacceptable. I think we all can say that maybe the odd overflowing garbage – eh, it's not something that we would panic about, but I will tell you that soiled linens are something that we need to be very angry about.

Then we've got "unsafe medication practices, including a client administering his own insulin when it was unclear if he was competent to do so." Wow. Like, is that not what these facilities are for, these long-term care facilities, to ensure that they get the medications when they need them, to have the food that they need to have to sustain them, to be able to move forward in this and be healthy and be in a place that is respectful for what they have done for our province?

We've got "medication rooms left unlocked." I've got to say that sterile has got to be first. Making sure the medications are always enclosed and watched and under key needs to be the second thing a doctor would learn, you would assume.

We've got "poor documentation around whether clients had received required tooth brushing and bathing." Now, I've heard that a lot of my seniors are actually in a lot of pain because of the fact that there's not enough dental care within these facilities, so the fact that we're not making sure that these individuals – because I will tell you that not having an active brushing regimen leads to cavities, and that leads to more pain that these people need to sustain.

We have "inconsistent practices to ensure safe water temperatures for bathing." This was a big problem that we had earlier in, I believe, 2016 – and I could be corrected – that we actually said that the facilities had to actually watch the temperatures and have temperature gauges and put priority on that because people were getting burned.

"High infection rates and antibiotic use." So we were getting people sick and using antibiotics to cure them when the potential was that they shouldn't have gotten sick in the first place.

We saw the government react to something the opposition did. They created a bill that says: let's bring accountability. This is what the good function of opposition is. I think that we should rename this to the Wildrose Protects Seniors Act.

I've got to say that it's disappointing that we have a long-term care facility within our province that has done this, but I will give credit to the Minister of Health for stepping up and doing the right thing and putting protections in place for our seniors because in the end it always comes down to honouring these people – honouring these people – who have been before us and have taken care of us all. You know what? We all will end up in a facility just like this one day, and we do not want this level of care. We want these councils in place so that we get our input to make sure that we are respected and able to at least have some input into our own care.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Hon. members, pursuant to Standing Order 4(3) the committee will now rise and report progress.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Mr. Hinkley: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 21. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 22. I wish to table copies of the amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? Say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Opposed? So ordered.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like now for all of us after the good work we've done this morning to adjourn until 1:30 this afternoon.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:56 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, November 2, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to introduce to you and through you to the members of this Assembly Calmar elementary school. They are a class that gave me a lot of high fives and a lot of fist pumps and a class that I had a lot of fun with when we had our pictures taken. I have met the teacher, Jeanette Wilson, before, and we have a teacher here that does an amazing job with their kids. If I could have all the kids rise and if we could give them a warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a pleasure to rise this afternoon to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly 40 students and 17 chaperones from the Centre for Learning@Home, which is located in the wonderful community of Edmonton-Meadowlark. I'm so happy that they could join us today for question period and to learn more about democracy in our province. I would now ask that they rise to receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm actually standing today on behalf of my associate from Battle River-Wainwright, who, of course, is not able to be here because of his heart surgery. I would like to introduce Irma school with teacher Mrs. Tara Gwinn and Mr. Darren Grosky, principal, and also some chaperones: Mrs. Jackie MacKay, Mrs. Tausha Erickson – I hope I said that right; it looks right – and Mrs. Diane Prior. If they would please stand and receive the warm welcome of the House. There they are.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Are there any other school groups, hon. members?

Seeing and hearing none, the Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have two sets of introductions. The first is the team I have in my Edmonton-Glenora constituency office. The first is Marcela Lillo, who joined our team in May with a wealth of experience. If she can rise. She's pregnant with a little Dipper and will be a first-time mom in the new year. Next we have Michael MacLean, who helps connect me and my constituents to programs and resources that will help make their lives better. Please rise, Michael. And Hussein Shire, who started in my office as a volunteer. He is always smiling and willing to go that extra mile. Thank you, Hussein. And the newest member is Alex Paikada. He's a social work student, and he's engaged in youth outreach. I ask them all to receive the traditional warm welcome of our Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. minister, you had a second group.

Ms Hoffman: Oh, yes. Thank you for that reminder, Mr. Speaker. I have the great pleasure to introduce to you and through you to fellow members of our Assembly eight dedicated, community-minded volunteers. They are among the 7,500 volunteers at over 100 chapters across Canada for Mothers Against Drunk Driving. Their efforts at public education and advocacy have saved lives and reduced injuries from impaired driving. Today these women are here to mark the 30th anniversary of Project Red Ribbon, in which millions of Canadians every year show their personal commitment to drive safe and sober. These guests are – and please rise as I say your names – Brenda Johnson, Gillian Phillips, Amanda Sawatzky, Rhonda Paterson, Jean Poole, Emily Poole, Lynda McCullough, and Darlene Urquhart. Thank you very much for being here today, ladies, for your ongoing advocacy, and the lives that you are saving every day. Please join me, colleagues, in extending a warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a real pleasure to rise today and introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly the Alberta Sex Positive Education & Community Centre, also known as ASPECC. Here today are Angel Sumka, Mark Dorsey, Nicole Kraft, Eleanor Hamilton, Christine Panther, and Shannon Cavener. ASPECC provides sex-positive educational programs on sexual health, practising safe sex, and the importance of consent with zero tolerance for nonconsensual and discriminatory behaviours. Their services are invaluable in combatting misinformation and damaging views. I would ask that my guests please rise today and receive the traditional warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose.

Mr. Hinkley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly members from the Battle River Watershed Alliance Society, and thank you very much for the saskatoon pies that they had in the rotunda this afternoon. The alliance monitors the water quality and quantity of the Battle River, which flows through the Wetaskiwin-Camrose constituency. They measure the overall health of the watershed, and they do outreach, field trips, tours, educational training. As we all know, water is life. If they would please rise as I introduce their names: Sarah Skinner, who is the watershed planning co-ordinator; David Samm, general manager; Susanna Bruneau, research and stewardship co-ordinator; Barb Bosh, board chair; Nathalie Olson, education and outreach co-ordinator; and Nathalie's parents, who are visiting us from Ontario, Rose Marie and Terry Stanley. Welcome to the House, and if everybody would give them a traditional warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. members, are there any other guests today?

The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to rise and to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly quite a number of guests, actually. I have, first of all: Ace Peace. Ace is a grade 12 honours student, the first openly trans student in his middle school and high school. I have his mom here as well, Lindsay Peace, who is a passionate and active advocate for queer youth and one of the co-founders of Skipping Stone Foundation.

I also have here this afternoon Dr. Kris Wells, an assistant professor and faculty director of the Institute for Sexual Minority Studies and Services at the University of Alberta. I also have Bryan Mortensen, who is the executive director of the altView Foundation. I also have Michael Green, who is the deputy director, again, with altView. I also have Jen Alabiso, and she is the manager of programs and services for the Institute for Sexual Minority Studies and Services at the University of Alberta.

They're here to see the introduction of Bill 24. If everyone could please give them a warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Ministerial Statements

The Speaker: The Minister of Health and Deputy Premier.

Project Red Ribbon

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my great honour to rise and to speak to an issue on which I think all of us in this House can agree, and that is to declare November 2 as Project Red Ribbon Day. Project Red Ribbon is a commitment to every Canadian to drive safe and sober. It's a highly visible community public awareness campaign which depends on volunteer participation to promote the message that death and injuries resulting from impaired driving are needless tragedies that are one hundred per cent preventable.

Mr. Speaker, each year from November 1 to the first Monday after January 1 volunteers across the country with Mothers Against Drunk Driving will distribute red ribbons, asking Canadians to display that ribbon on their vehicle, key chain, or personal item such as a purse, briefcase, or a backpack. The MADD Canada red ribbon is a powerful symbol. Displaying this ribbon is a personal commitment to drive sober and to pay tribute to the thousands of Canadians who have lost their lives or been injured as a result of impaired driving.

Mr. Speaker, I declare this as Project Red Ribbon day and offer my own full support as well as that of our entire government and thereby urge all members to show their support by displaying red ribbons as well from now through the new year.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thirty years ago MADD Canada recognized that impaired driving incidents spiked during the holiday season. In its typically proactive manner it responded by launching Project Red Ribbon. But, in truth, through the long-time efforts of MADD Canada, our society knows that vigilance against impaired driving must occur year-round. This organization, which was born from the unspeakable pain of losing a child, has saved countless lives with public awareness campaigns like Project Red Ribbon, which we are honouring here today.

We know they work because there has been a significant decrease in impaired driving in Canada. MADD Canada, however, continually reminds us that every citizen has to remain vigilant if we are to maintain control over this deadly societal hazard. It is especially top of mind for legislators today as our nation prepares to deal with the legalization of marijuana. We must work with MADD and our police services to ensure our citizens are aware that impaired driving by drugs is as dangerous as drinking and driving, and mixing the two only amplifies the hazards.

This reality has made MADD and Project Red Ribbon just as critical today as ever. In my time as a Calgary police officer I not only dealt with impaired drivers; I saw first-hand the carnage their actions wreak on our streets. Attending these horrific scenes has a long-term emotional impact on everyone involved. As a police officer I can assure you that you never ever forget them, nor do other first responders who also attended these scenes. And the impact is compounded in unimaginable ways for family and friends.

So, personally, on behalf of all Albertans today I thank MADD Canada for the incredible work they perform educating the public in preventing unnecessary deaths and injuries. The value of MADD in today's society, especially with Canada on the cusp of a societal change, cannot be overestimated.

Thank you to MADD for Project Red Ribbon, and thank you for all you have done in the past decades and will continue to perform as our future unfolds.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Acting Deputy Government House Leader.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I would like to seek unanimous consent of the House for a member of the Alberta Party to respond to the ministerial statement.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is my honour to rise to mark Project Red Ribbon day. Driving impaired is never okay. Injuries and deaths from impaired driving aren't accidents; they are totally avoidable tragedies.

Once again this year Mothers Against Drunk Driving will distribute red ribbons and ask Canadians to wear them, display them prominently on their vehicle or anywhere else they can help spread this message. Like my colleagues in the House, I offer my thanks to MADD Canada for your important work on behalf of Albertans and on behalf of those who have been lost to impaired driving.

I encourage all Albertans to wear their red ribbon proudly in memory of those who have lost their lives or have been injured by impaired drivers and as a reminder that as far as we've come, we still have work to do to end impaired driving in our society once and for all.

Thank you.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Persons with Disabilities' Workforce Participation

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In October we recognize Disability Employment Awareness Month. As an employer I had the privilege to employ thousands of people. They, in return, rewarded me and enhanced my professional and personal development. While I had many positive moments and learned a tremendous amount from my employees, it was those I hired with disabilities that gave me the greatest reward in return.

Early in my career I had the opportunity to work with Red Lobster through its Cops and Lobster fundraiser, which raised money for the Special Olympics. During this fundraiser event we had a volunteer athlete named Nelson, who was full of energy and diligently busing our tables. Seeing how hard he was working, my GM, Jason Lane, offered him a job.

I was taken aback when I saw his mom in tears because this was the first job offer he had ever received. The encouragement he gave my staff, his sense of pride, and his great attitude toward teamwork helped with my bottom line by creating a bond within my team.

Mr. Speaker, as an employer I had the opportunity to hire many people with disabilities. While some may see their disabilities as a challenge, the abilities they had for hard work and the pride they carried for a job well done paid off in dividends.

Programs like the transitional vocational program at Mount Royal University provide supports for both employers and employees to ensure they are a perfect match. They also provide ongoing supports, and they even helped me as an employer to recruit and retain several successful employees.

When I go back to my old restaurant and I visit the individuals we hired from the vocational program, it gives me a sense of pride and encouragement. It is amazing to see them thrive in the ongoing success of the business while allowing them to have independence and pride in themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I trust and hope that everyone in this Chamber feels the same way, and I encourage my fellow members to spread the word to businesses in their constituencies. Hiring people for their abilities will pay off in dividends and interest.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Tow Truck Operator Safety

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If you've ever had a vehicle break down and needed assistance, you understand the vital role tow truck operators play when it comes to public safety. These unsung heroes are oftentimes perilously close to traffic and in very vulnerable positions while aiding stranded motorists. More often than not this is done in adverse weather conditions. In the diverse constituency of Drumheller-Stettler, where we have expansive areas, the remoteness and nature of many of these situations add another element of danger while they carry out this vital function of highway safety.

Every day in Alberta selfless tow truck operators and other first responders are called upon to help keep us safe, sometimes under very trying and dangerous conditions. The safety of the people that provide this critical service is something we as legislators should always consider to help keep them safe. The designation of emergency vehicles at times is not comprehensive enough to cover all vehicles used on our roadways in emergency situations.

On October 17 we were reminded of the dangers all of our emergency services face when one of these emergency responders lost his life fighting a fire in Hilda, Alberta. Volunteer firefighter 34-year-old James Hargrave, a husband and father of four young children, all under the age of seven, was killed when the water truck he was driving rolled while carrying out his duties.

Everyone who works in dangerous situations should have our full support. With this in mind, during consultations with members of the tow truck industry they told us that they should be designated as emergency vehicles to help keep them safe. In the 2016 spring session, while debating the Traffic Safety Amendment Act, the Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock expressed everyone's disappointment after being unable to table the necessary amendment to change the status of tow trucks to emergency vehicles. We owe it to those who help selflessly to protect them as much as we can.

The Speaker: Thank you.

The Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Guru Nanak Gurburab

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the MLA for Edmonton-Manning I am fortunate to represent a diverse community, which includes a substantial number of Albertans of the Sikh faith. Sikhs have been making Alberta their home since the early 1900s. Many arrived in Alberta and worked for the Canadian Pacific Railway, in sawmills, and on farms. Today Alberta is home to over 50,000 Sikhs, representing a vibrant and dynamic population of Alberta.

Guru Nanak Dev Ji is the founder of Sikhism and is the first of the 10 Sikh gurus. Today is celebrated world-wide as the Nanak Gurburab. He travelled widely, teaching people the message of human rights and justice. His life and teachings are of profound significance to all Albertans. In fact, his message of community, equality, and love provides inspiration for all humanity. Let us be inspired by his teachings of equality, unity, selflessness, and social justice.

Our government recognized April 2017 as Sikh Heritage Month to celebrate the contributions of Alberta's Sikh community to Alberta's cultural diversity. At a time when people are using cultural and religious differences to divide us, we are using them to make us stronger. That is why we are celebrating the birth of Guru Nanak Dev Ji alongside Sikh Albertans.

Sikh Albertans have contributed to Alberta's academics, health care, skilled trades, science, business, and politics but, more importantly, the values and principles of community, in giving, equality, hard work, and wishing wellness and happiness for all people. These are the core Sikh values, and they are also the core Albertan values.

On behalf of my colleagues I wish all those celebrating a joyous day. Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. Clerk, if you'd hold the clock for a moment.

Statement by the Speaker

Rotation of Questions and Members' Statements

The Speaker: Hon. members, before we proceed to the next item of business in the daily Routine, I'd like to make some remarks on the rotation of oral questions and members' statements. As members may recall, I asked on Monday of this week that House leaders endeavour to come to a new agreement with respect to the rotation of questions and possibly the Members' Statements rotation to reflect the current composition of this Assembly. To date I have not yet received the new agreement, but I remain hopeful that one will be forthcoming and would encourage House leaders to work with members affected by any such agreement.

I'm available tomorrow and indeed over the weekend if necessary to discuss this with House leaders in an attempt to reach an agreement that is fair to all members. I will advise members on Monday about the question period and Members' Statements rotations, which will take effect on Tuesday. For today we will continue with the question period and Members' Statements rotations based on the current House leaders' agreements.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Government Policies

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, on Monday the former Member for Calgary-Lougheed raised the issue of Burnaby illegally obstructing the Trans Mountain pipeline by refusing to issue municipal permits. The member asked the Premier whether the government would join Kinder Morgan in demanding that the NEB intervene. The Premier at the time did not appear to appreciate the suggestion, but today we were glad to read that the government took the former member's suggestion. Will the Premier also take our common-sense suggestion to request that her good friend Justin Trudeau remove downstream and upstream emissions from the pipeline assessment process?

The Speaker: The hon. Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, thank you for the question. The member well knows that we think it's important that upstream emissions be taken into consideration because we are proud of the made-in-Alberta climate leadership plan that was developed that is ensuring that we are being effective climate leaders moving forward. We think that that should be taken into consideration, and it was. That's exactly why this government very successfully, less than a year after they were in, got approvals on two new pipelines, one to tidewater, which the members opposite had failed to do for 44 years.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, it's shocking to watch this government over and over throw Albertans under the bus. Let's talk about what the NDP desperately don't want to talk about: 194,000. That's the number of Albertans currently unemployed, and countless more have completely given up looking for work. The NDP have made a bad situation much, much worse through their numerous tax hikes, increased regulation, and general hostility to job creators. To the Premier: when will you recognize the failure of your plans and finally focus on job creation?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, we are so proud to stand up for Albertans, and we do that every day on this side of this House. We will not back down. We will work to ensure that we're getting shovels in the ground to get to that tidewater, and that's exactly what the Premier said yesterday. We're not going to stop there. We took our made-in-Alberta solution around a climate leadership plan, and we're taking that investment to build things like the green line in Calgary, the river valley line in Edmonton, things that we know the Official Opposition wants to cancel. They don't believe in moving forward with climate leadership. They want to throw it out. With that, they would throw out all these important infrastructure projects and our tidewater access. That's shameful.

Mr. Nixon: Well, let's talk about another number the NDP don't want to talk about: 67,000. That's the number of private-sector jobs destroyed under this NDP regime. Yes, the NDP like to tout all the jobs supposedly created under their watch, but where are those jobs created? The public sector, of course, Mr. Speaker, 21,000 of them. Now, we know on this side of the House that the public sector is important, but we can't have a strong public sector without a vibrant private sector. That's just common sense. When will the NDP focus on the economy and stop their senseless attack on the private sector and the job creators in Alberta?

Ms Hoffman: I really wish, Mr. Speaker, that the Official Opposition would stop cheering for Alberta to lose. Now, let's put facts on the table. Jobs are up in Alberta: 49,000 jobs. And the, you know, alternate facts that the member opposite wants to speak about are completely alternate and untrue. I'd be happy to see him table 21,000 public-sector jobs, but you know what? I'm proud to stand up for nurses and teachers and people who are working to make this province better . . .

Mr. Cooper: Point of order.

Ms Hoffman: . . . instead of laying them off, as members opposite, we know, want to do. I want to see them actually table their alternate facts because I'm proud to stand on ours, which is standing up for Albertans.

The Speaker: Second main question.

Unemployment

Mr. Nixon: While the NDP desperately want to avoid talking about their economic record, we on this side of the House are happy to do it all day: 36 per cent is the increase in unemployment rate since the NDP came into power, and 8.5 per cent is the unemployment rate in Edmonton and Calgary. Today Alberta's unemployment rate is higher than all provinces but Nova Scotia, P.E.I., and Newfoundland. Who would have thought the day would come when we would see that in this great province? When will the NDP stop focusing on their divisive, ideological battles and instead focus on what Albertans are worried about, jobs and the economy? When will you start standing up for Albertans?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, I'm very proud of the work we've done to stand up for Albertans and the results that that is paying. For example, wages in Alberta are up. Albertans are about 2 per cent higher than they were this time last year in terms of their wages. Growth is up. RBC is forecasting the economy will grow by 4.2 per cent this year, faster than any other province in Canada, including those that you're so inspired by that are cutting public-sector jobs like nurses and teachers. Manufacturing is up. Sales have increased by almost 10 per cent over this time last year according to ATB Financial. The future is positive, it's bright, and the only ones cheering for our doomsday are the members opposite.

Mr. Nixon: The only people standing up for Albertans in this House is this side of the House. Forty-seven thousand: that's the number of Albertans that have been unemployed for six months or more. Alberta used to be the land of opportunity, but today dreams are dying. Jobs are coming back to other oil-dependent economies, places like Texas and North Dakota, places that are showing common sense, Mr. Speaker. But here in Alberta the NDP's policies are deterring growth. I ask again: when will the NDP stop playing cynical politics on ideological issues and instead focus on jobs and the economy and bringing investments back to our province?

Ms Hoffman: We have been, and it's working, Mr. Speaker. Retail sales are up. Housing starts are up. Exports are up. Alberta is a caring and compassionate province, and I'm so pleased to see so many Albertans reaching out to Jason Kenney during his time of need, when he's struggling financially. I also want to reach out and say that I have a few suggestions on how he can save more pennies. Maybe he can ask his friend to give him a discount on his Airbnb. Maybe he can take k.d. lang up on her offer for those free concert tickets and sell them, just like we know he'll sell off Alberta's public services. On this side of the House we're here to help. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, I urge you yet again to be cautious about the words that are said and anticipate, please, what constructive consequences may or may not come from them.

Mr. Nixon: Here are some more interesting numbers: 13,000 is the number of jobs lost in mining and oil and gas, 19,000 lost in manufacturing, 18,000 lost in construction, 11,000 lost in agriculture. Shattered lives and dreams under this NDP government's rule, yet the NDP don't want to talk about jobs. They don't want to talk about the economy. In fact, yesterday the NDP laughed in this very House when we brought up people who have lost their jobs in this province. When will the NDP stop pushing their ideological agenda, start focusing on getting people back to work, and stop laughing at unemployed Albertans?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, as I said before – and I'll say it again – things are looking up. The Royal Bank of Canada has declared that Alberta is back in the saddle. The team at RBC has raised Alberta's growth forecast from 2.9 to 4.2 per cent, upgraded that forecast. At the same time, RBC revised its forecast down for Saskatchewan, from 1.8 to 1.4 per cent. We know that that's the playbook you guys are playing from, but on this side of the House we're standing up for all Albertans. Our plan is working. And we're not even going to let Jason Kenney cancel the health care projects that he will rely on one day because we think they're important for all Albertans. It's time you guys did the same.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Government Spending

Mr. McIver: Thank you. Well, the anger machine over there is cranked right up.

Ninety-four billion dollars: that's how big Alberta's debt will be by the end of 2020 according to Standard & Poor's. We've gone from debt free not long ago to drowning in NDP debt today. And what's the NDP solution? Keep digging. Nobody believes that the NDP has a plan to get back to balance. No wonder the NDP does not want to talk about the fiscal train wreck they have created. Premier, when will the NDP stop pushing divisive distractions, use some common sense, focus on the economy, and help Albertans get back to work? It's your job.

Ms Hoffman: I'm absolutely proud of the job we're doing on this side of the House because – guess what, Mr. Speaker? – our plan is working. Under Jason Kenney his plan is extreme and risky, and we know that he'd make life harder for Albertans. We are protecting publicly funded services that Albertans rely on. They would fire thousands of teachers and nurses to pay for the $680 million in tax breaks that they want to give to the top 1 per cent. The Conference Board of Canada is saying that things are so good in Alberta, that Alberta's economy is recovering so much faster. It's the fastest growing province economically this year. I don't know why the opposition are so opposed to reading all the facts from all these economic experts who say that we're on the right track.

Mr. McIver: Only this government would call almost 200,000 people out of work a plan working.

Mr. Speaker, 7.4 per cent: that's how much the NDP increased spending by in the last budget. Our economy is hurting, but they spend like there's no tomorrow. Despite NDP claims, nobody wants to see massive cuts on any side, so why the rapidly increasing spending and crippling the province's ability to carry on with services? We know that they're desperate to change the channel from financial issues. Premier, when will you admit that you have no plan to get this province back on track, and when will you start caring about Albertans?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Our plan is working because we are building those new schools and hospitals and seniors' lodges that Albertans need in the future. Instead, the Official Opposition would put all of these projects on hold. They would cut $9 billion in infrastructure spending. That's shameful.

We're not going to let Jason Kenney and his conservative colleagues cut the very services that one day all of us will need and rely on, so we are carefully adjusting spending to make sure we hit a balanced budget. They would make reckless cuts, extreme cuts, and prolong the recession. That is definitely the wrong path.

Mr. McIver: Well, they've sunk to anger and exaggeration over there.

Mr. Speaker, $2.3 billion: that's another number the NDP doesn't want to talk about. That's how much Alberta will spend in just a few short years for interest payments on all the debt they've piled up. That's $2.3 billion that could be spent on social services, health care, or education here instead of foreign bankers' vacation homes. How is it that common sense says to give billions of dollars to foreign bankers? It's time for the government to stop distracting from the real issues and jobs in Alberta and help Alberta get back on track. Premier, when will you finally listen to the cries of Albertans who are . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, I am proud of the progress that we are making while protecting nurses and teachers. Our economic diversification strategy is working as well as supporting the oil and gas industry, which we know has been a backbone in this province and will continue to be. I understand that things aren't looking up for everybody. While not everyone is feeling the effects of the economic recovery, especially Jason Kenney – we know his struggle is real – we want to help. We're going to stop Jason Kenney from cutting his own health care, we're going to stop Jason Kenney from cutting the future seniors' benefits that he requires, and we're going to stop Jason Kenney from cutting the green line, that he could use to get around Calgary. We are here to help and stand up for all Albertans, including Jason Kenney. [interjections]

The Speaker: Keep it cool, folks. Keep it cool.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Tobacco and Cannabis Reduction Strategies

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The Alberta Liberals recently met with Les Hagen of Action on Smoking and Health to discuss the NDP's inaction on tobacco reduction. This may blow over into another area, cannabis legislation. I want to thank the government for the menthol ban, but the government said at the time: we're just getting started. It seems like the motor has choked. To the minister: will you commit to fully implementing all provisions of the Tobacco and Smoking Reduction Act before July of next year?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very proud of the work that we've been able to do with Smoke-free Alberta and others and the great progress we've taken in moving forward on a number of initiatives, including the menthol ban, that we know the Official Opposition were opposed to. As a result, the organization in question did recognize this government's efforts and presented me with an award last year that I'm very proud of.

There are a number of other pieces that have changed since that legislation was originally passed, including the legalization of cannabis as well as vaping and e-cigarettes, which are what I hear about most when I talk to parents. We want to make sure that when we move forward, we're doing it in consideration of all of today's challenges, Mr. Speaker, and making sure we get it right.

Dr. Swann: Well, precisely, Mr. Speaker, because cannabis will be a similar air emissions problem.

One of the exemptions that government has allowed is shisha smoking in hookah bars, which do not have any age restrictions. If cannabis is allowed here, children's health will be further jeopardized. Tobacco smoking is banned in restaurants, workplaces, and public spaces, so will cannabis smoking be subject to similar prohibitions?

The Speaker: The Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As the member knows, we've recently gone out for a second round of consultation about a number of issues on cannabis. Our proposed plan, moving forward, is something like what we would call the tobacco-plus model. Cannabis smoking will be restricted everywhere that tobacco is restricted. In addition, there will be restrictions on smoking in vehicles and smoking within five metres of structures frequented by children like play structures and splash parks. In addition, as is the case with most tobacco, it will be banned in hospitals and in schoolyards.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Dr. Swann: Well, that's precisely why I'm asking the question. If we move forward on tobacco, then obviously cannabis will be included. If we don't move forward on tobacco, then it's in limbo whether cannabis restrictions will be in place.

With the NDP facing massive structural deficits, there's also a great temptation for you to dump the large amount of funds that's coming from cannabis revenue into general revenue. Will the government pledge today that revenue from cannabis sales will go to our mental health and addictions prevention and treatment?

The Speaker: The Minister of Justice.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to inform the House that, as I've said, we're still sort of moving forward on our plan around cannabis. Finance ministers from the provinces and territories are presently in discussion across the country as well as the federal Finance minister. In terms of what will happen to the excise tax that is proposed to be on cannabis, those decisions are obviously still being finalized, but at this time the projections in terms of what's necessary in terms of health care and public education and enforcement are quite high, so it doesn't look like there will be a huge excess.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Gay-straight Alliances in Schools

Connolly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Every student in Alberta deserves a school that is welcoming, caring, and safe. We know that LGBTQ2S-plus students face discrimination and stigma both inside and outside of school, discrimination which can lead to self-harm and even suicide, so I'm deeply concerned when I hear people, even some public officials, advocating that schools be allowed to out students without their permission. I have visited many GSAs across this province, as has the Minister of Education, so can he please provide more information for the benefit of some members of the House about the nature of GSAs in schools?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, yes, we've had a long journey looking at GSAs across the province, and we've certainly seen a demonstrable decrease in incidents that could be causing problems for kids for learning. We've seen better attendance. We've seen better graduation rates. GSAs in schools are not just beneficial to those who participate in the GSA; they're good for the whole school atmosphere, period. When you start to look after people who are vulnerable, we all benefit from that. I'm very proud to strengthen that with legislation today.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Connolly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given our government's commitment to support Albertans' mental health and help them combat discrimination, can the minister provide any information about the positive impacts that GSAs and QSAs have on our students?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Yes. Thank you very much. You know, part of the reason that we are strengthening GSA legislation here today – we'll introduce that; hopefully, we'll get support from the House – is because people were talking about outing students. The GSA, by nature, is a place for vulnerable students to feel safe, so that talk about outing students was simply compromising that circumstance. If we pass the bill – and I urge everyone to agree – then we will build a safe space, we will make it illegal to out students, and we will all benefit as a result.

2:10

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Connolly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that when crafting policy affecting LGBTQ2S-plus students, it would seem far more important to listen to those students than a career politician who has a history of repeatedly voting against their rights, can the minister tell us what he's heard on this issue from LGBTQ students or members of the Minister's Youth Council?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, as I said before, I had an opportunity to visit many GSAs around the province. I've heard it time and time again. I remember a student from Red Deer that said that the GSA literally saved his life by having that place to be. It's very important that we recognize the value of peer support in our schools generally and the peer support that can happen in a GSA specifically. We're very proud to bring this forward. It's going to be a discussion that I think will help to restore the confidence that students need, to know that they are respected. Once you are respected, you are confident, and once you are confident, you can learn and succeed.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Calgary LRT Green Line

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, residents of northern and southern Calgary are upset that the promised green line to their communities is not coming any time soon. Many of these residents moved to these communities and paid their taxes in good faith on the promise that the green line was coming sooner rather than later. For communities not getting green line service as promised, has the Minister of Transportation offered any short-term fixes such as a Vancouver-style B-Line service?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to answer this question. We're happy to say that the green line is on track. We are hitting the milestones that have been set out for us, and we are working very closely with all of the community members involved. We look forward to the opposition supporting us as we help to improve the environment in this province and make life better for all Calgarians.

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, given that the Minister of Transportation waxed lyrically during the recent municipal election campaign that the province might revoke green line funding if the city of Calgary tinkers with the current arrangements and given that many voters perceive this as the minister interfering in the municipal election campaign, to the Minister of Transportation: did you forget and think you were running for city council again, or was this an attempt to prop up your favoured mayoral candidate?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We're very proud of the fact that we are working with all of Calgary to create over 12,000 direct jobs and over 8,000 supporting jobs on this green line while we take care of this environment. What we want to do is we want to make life better for everybody, not only in Calgary but throughout the whole province, by taking care of our environment. What they want to do is $9 billion worth of cuts on our schools, on our roads, and on our infrastructure. They really don't care about the future. We do, and we're standing up for it. We're putting our money where our mouth is. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. minister, you have an amazing influence.

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, given that Jason Kenney ensured the federal funding was in place for the green line as federal political minister for southern Alberta and given that the city of Calgary has changed the scope of the project by cutting the length of the line and the number of people served, does the Minister of Transportation fear federal Minister Sohi will pull the federal funding because Calgary has changed the scope of this incredible shrinking LRT?

Ms Phillips: What Jason Kenney has said, Mr. Speaker, is that he will cancel the carbon levy and therefore distribute 20,000 pink slips as a result. [interjections]

The Speaker: In 10 seconds or less can you answer that question?

Ms Phillips: What Jason Kenney has said is that he will cancel the carbon levy, Mr. Speaker, put 20,000 Calgarians out of work, and therefore cancel the green line. This green line will be cancelled if Jason Kenney has his way. This government is committed to getting Calgarians to work, to school, and to where they need to be on time and growing the economy . . .

Mr. McIver: Point of order.

The Speaker: Point of order noted.

Ms Phillips: . . . and putting 20,000 people to work.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Minimum Wage Increase and Disability Services

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The government has mandated a minimum wage increase that has put at risk the delivery of services for persons with developmental disabilities and the viability of the agencies that deliver those services. We begged the government to do an economic impact study before going ahead with this risky ideological plan and off-loading responsibility to these agencies. Now we are hearing that some agencies may actually be forced to close their doors. Government policy is effectively dismantling the service agencies. What is the government going to do to ensure their survival?

The Speaker: The Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. What we have done is that we have maintained and improved the supports for persons with developmental disabilities, and we have worked with them on all issues that matter to them. Minimum wage was no exception. Last summer my office and my department worked with the agencies, and we are providing them the supports they need to deliver the service in an efficient manner.

Mr. Orr: The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that many agencies have been forced into crisis mode due to the minimum wage increase and its devastating effects on wage compression and to the reductions in staffing levels that have accompanied it. Given that most agencies have projected the impact of the minimum wage over the next three years, why has this government not listened to their concerns and at least utilized their spreadsheets, that demonstrate the hard numbers of a crisis?

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have met with many agencies personally, and this summer my staff have worked with the agencies impacted by minimum wage. We are providing them with the resources to deliver the supports in the most efficient way possible. We are working with them on all issues that matter to persons with disabilities.

Mr. Orr: That is not what the agencies themselves are saying.

Given that people with disabilities have experienced a decrease in the care and the services that they need because of minimum wage encroachment and given that those in need of assistance are suffering alienation – they are at increased risk, and they don't understand why this government is marginalizing and abandoning them – is this how an Alberta government takes care of its people, or only an NDP government?

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, we have improved the supports for persons with disabilities. It's only folks over there who think that supports for disabilities are giveaways and think that the ministry working with persons with disabilities, 70,000 Albertans, is just half a ministry. What they are concerned about: if a 20 per cent cut is made to the disability budget, $162 million, 2,000 people will be out of the supports who are getting supports today, let alone any new individuals with disabilities.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Value-added Energy Industries

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, the price of oil has fallen dramatically, and though we hope that it continues to recover, we must acknowledge that there's a chance that it will never rise again to $100 a barrel. One way we can adjust to the new reality for oil prices is to focus on getting the most value out of our resources through upgrading such as with the North West upgrader and supporting more petrochemical manufacturing like this government did with its petrochemicals diversification program. To the Minister of Energy. I've spoken with these companies that were supportive of the program but are concerned that it is too limited in scope, making it hard to compete. Are there any plans to expand or begin a second round of funding for this program?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. I had the honour of meeting with a number of people from the manufacturing sector last night, and they definitely expressed their excitement that we are indeed bringing forward a petrochemicals diversification program. The details are forthcoming around the rollout. They are excited, we are excited, and moving forward is very good news for Albertans, for Alberta jobs, and for Alberta employers.

Thank you.

Mr. Fraser: Given that energy companies in Alberta have many advantages such as a low tax environment and a highly skilled local workforce but also have to compete globally with companies that enjoy generous subsidies from their local governments and given that trying to outspend these governments on subsidies and tax breaks could do more harm than good to our provincial treasury, to the same minister: will you commit to identifying the competitive disadvantages that Alberta energy companies face, and will you bring forward policies that help level the playing field without driving the province further into debt?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and again to the member for the important question. Many of these stakeholders last night when we were meeting were talking about how excited they are that we're moving forward in an environmentally responsible way and that, of course, they want an even playing field, which means an even playing field here in Alberta so that they are willing to be environmental leaders. Of course, with there being a national price, it will ensure that that is comparable across Canada as well. So they're proud of the work that they are doing to diversify. They're trying to get as many good consumable products out of waste products right now as possible, and they're making very significant progress in that area. I'm proud of our economic innovation that is in the area of industry and manufacturing and energy as well.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Fraser: Given that the Minister of Energy appointed an advisory committee that had the mandate to look at upgrading and petrochemical manufacturing and given that this committee was given a year to deliver its report and that a year later still hasn't produced anything and given that energy companies in Alberta would benefit from knowing where this government is intending to focus its energy diversification efforts, to the same minister: why hasn't the diversification committee delivered their report yet, and when can we expect it to be delivered?

The Speaker: The Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased that we were able to get a group, EDAC, to get out and consult with many Albertans – industry, environment groups, manufacturers – and they've done thorough consultation. The report will be coming shortly. But I'm pleased to say that they looked at things to move forward like: should we be partially upgrading? Should we do more petrochemical diversification? As the Deputy Premier said, we've had a lot of interest in this area, and it's really going to be good for Alberta to use our resources here in manufacturing in Alberta.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Flat Top Complex Wildfire Review Recommendations

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, in the 2017 annual report the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry states, "As of 2017, all 21 recommendations from the Flat Top Complex Wildfire Review Committee have either been completed or fully incorporated within Agriculture and Forestry's day-to-day wildfire management program." If that is accurate as outlined in recommendation 6 of the Flat Top recommendations, can the minister please tell me where our B.C.- and U.S.A.-style initial attack hotshot crew is based out of, would he please table what their annual budget is, and were they deployed in the Waterton and Crowsnest Pass fires?

The Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the somewhat detailed question that he proposed. I'm very proud of our wildland firefighters right across the province. There are a couple of facts I think we all need to know. Ninety-seven per cent of all wildfires are contained within the next day. Our wildfire fighters are able to support any wildfire-fighting crews, whether it was the Waterton national park this year or in B.C. or in Montana as well. Our wildfire fighters are able, capable, and more than willing to do the job to help our neighbours out as they have helped ours. I'm very proud of our wildfire-fighting crews. I would shudder to think what this crew over here would do with their budget that would jeopardize the health and safety of Albertans.

Mr. Schneider: Recommendation 6, Mr. Minister.

Given that recommendation 8 of the Flat Top Complex deals with preparedness and that the ministry has stated that they place water bombers according to the head fire intensity maps and given that prior to the Horse River fire of May 1 maps showed an extreme head fire intensity in the Fort Mac area since April 15 yet no bombers were staged there, Minister, in the future will your department base plans upon historical fire data or head fire intensity mapping as criteria for how you base water bomber groups prior to fire season?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member again for the question. I feel that he is implying that somehow our wildfire-fighting crews, including our air tanker crews, are not capable of the work they do. They most certainly are capable. Our staff is capable, more than capable, some of the best. I would stand up and defend them any day of the week, that they're some of the best wildfire-fighting crews in the world. They know what they're doing. In no shape or form are any communities, including Fort McMurray, including Waterton park, in any danger at any time. They know what they're doing. I'm proud of the work they do.

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, I'm implying that the minister may not know how to do his job.

Given that the opposition has learned that in the early stages of the Horse River fire the emergency preparedness control centre had locked themselves out of computers and were unable to retrieve emergency codes from the computer files until the passwords were able to be reset by someone returning to their office in Edmonton, Minister, have you, as outlined in recommendation 10 of the Flat Top Complex, enhanced “standards and training for employees involved in liaison and wildfire management information”?”

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. The government of Alberta, you know, through this government and through even past governments – some are sitting over there – has had the opportunity to review wildland fires to be able to see what we can learn from those wildfires. The report of the Horse River fire showed that anything we could have done there couldn't have prevented that tragedy that we've seen. We continue to do what improvements we can do. Whether it's recommendation 6, 7, 8, 10, 12, 15, or whatever he was quoting over there, all recommendations have been approved. We're working forward to make sure that those improvements are implemented.

Amazon Second Headquarters Request for a Proposal

Mrs. Aheer: Mr. Speaker, big cities across North America are going gaga over the prospect of having Amazon.com's second headquarters. With Alberta having two cities in the race, the government of Alberta has seen fit to establish a team of investment attraction experts to help the cities to champion Alberta as the best place in North America to set up shop. Amazon or not, my question for the Minister of Economic Development and Trade is simple. Shouldn't we have already had this team in place as per Bill 1? What was the holdup?

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much for the question and the opportunity to talk about this very promising economic development. Our plan is working, Mr. Speaker. We're making life better for Albertans. That includes having very specific, tailored plans for very massive organizations like this. I'll tell you that one of the things that they're looking at with great interest is the fact that we have a strong public health care system here in the province of Alberta, that as employers they'll be able to have healthy workers, and that they won't have to worry about the impacts of having privatized health care. We know that Jason Kenney and the conservatives that are aligned with him want to make sure that they make that harder, and that would threaten the very types of things that will help companies come here.

The Speaker: Thank you.
First supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, given that the minister's job description in Bill 1 allows the minister to establish programs to attract investment and diversify Alberta's economy and given that the minister may already make regulations to implement such programs, will the minister now shower Amazon with Alberta's hard-earned taxpayer dollars to make up for the fact that this government has in fact not made life better for Albertans and has actually harmed Alberta's economy?

Ms Hoffman: I know that's what Jason Kenney and the members opposite want to believe, but the truth is that our plan is working. Because we have thousands of teachers working in schools providing good public education, Amazon is interested in coming here, Mr. Speaker. They know that families are going to be well supported, workers are going to be well supported, and they're excited at the opportunities that are presented. I am proud that we are putting the right team together to make sure that this is the most attractive place for Amazon to bring thousands of jobs. Nobody should be laughing or cheering for that to fail.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. The failure is actually on the part of the government for not getting this started faster.

Mr. Speaker, given that Calgary's downtown office vacancy rate is around 30 per cent and that the city is an important supply chain and logistics hub within reach of over 50 million people by road in about 24 hours and given the high cost of operating aircraft out of the Calgary International Airport due to high fees charged by Ottawa milking airports like cash cows while American airports get federal subsidies, is the minister going to combat Ottawa's economy-damaging air transport policies and advocate for lower airport rents so Calgary actually stands a chance against a subsidized American competitor?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House we're making great opportunities to make investment opportunities for major corporations from around the world. And it's working. That's why we've got major interest from organizations like Amazon. I know that the member opposite is continually cheering for Alberta to fail, for our pipelines to fail, for our industry to fail, but you know what? Jobs are up. Investment is up. We are growing faster than any other jurisdiction in this country, and that's because of the efforts of this government. We're going to keep working to make sure that Amazon comes here.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Stony Plain.

2:30 Agriculture Financial Services Corporation

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In April of this year the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry appointed a new board of directors to AFSC. This new board replaced the interim board of directors, and they were tasked with strengthening controls over expenses, travel, and procurement. To the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry: given that the AFSC board experienced significant issues under the previous government, what is being done to enhance the services that AFSC offers and improve the fiscal responsibility of this important organization?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. The first step I took to address the culture of entitlement, that same entitlement that these folks want to return to, was to fire the old board and appoint a new one. It is the responsibility of the board to oversee executive expenses with producers in mind, and now that is happening under this government. The current board is very skilled and has worked very hard to clean up the agency and find ways where services can be enhanced. For example, we have recently been discussing business risk management programs with the federal government and have begun a review of those services.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the minister: given that AFSC plays an important role in assisting agricultural communities to access insurance and risk management tools, how is the new board of directors working to expand and improve on all of these programs?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again to the member. As mentioned, we're undergoing the BRM review right now, and the new board is helping to oversee this. We'll be having ongoing conversations with members of the ag industry and the AFSC as this work continues. BRM programs such as crop and livestock insurance we'll have a close look at. An important component of this discussion will be ensuring that it remains within current budgetary considerations.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the minister: how are farmers, ranchers, and other stakeholders, who are so important in these processes, being included in the review of AFSC's programs and internal processes?

Mr. Carlier: Mr. Speaker, as part of this we have been in touch with stakeholders from all levels of the industry through one-on-one meetings, industry round-tables, community hall meetings, correspondence, and an online survey. The review will continue beyond 2018, and to complete the review, an external panel will be formed comprised of producers, academia, and global risk management experts. Consultation will be ongoing, and we welcome feedback.

Southeastern Alberta Concerns

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, over the last few months Cypress-Medicine Hat has been devastated by wildfires in Cypress county in the Bindloss area. It serves as a reminder of more than just financial pains but of the personal risk that these people take. For over 100 years rural Albertans have borne the responsibility of feeding the province and the entire world. The community is strong, and – make no mistake – we will recover better and stronger than before. To the minister: what are you doing to ensure that the communities and individuals affected by the wildfire are supported and restored?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Without a doubt, the wildfires that swept through the grasslands and the southeast corner of the province have been devastating. We fully support those communities and the ranchers and producers there that have lost cattle, have lost crops, have lost fence lines. We're having an opportunity now to look at existing programs to see where we can perhaps expedite the process to be able to give the support to those producers as soon as we can.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, given that the population of 200 elk introduced to CFB Suffield in 1997 quickly ballooned to well over 10,000 despite the government's guarantee that it would not exceed 800 and given that the Bindloss fire in particular saw 100,000 acres of grassland destroyed, putting even more pressure on the existing grasslands to handle grazing for so many elk, the status quo is not an option. To the minister: what is the government doing to bring the elk herd to a sustainable size of 800 head as soon as possible?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, Environment and Parks is working with the Department of National Defence so that we can manage this elk population responsibly. The member is quite right that over a number of years the population did increase, but since 2014 it's dropped from 7,000 to 3,300. The hunts for '17-18 begin in November. They continue into February 2018.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, given that the horrific wildfire imposes significant financial losses layered on top of huge financial losses caused by a federal government-imposed protection order for sage grouse and given that the Alberta government dropped the ball in developing their own made-in-Alberta response to protect the sage grouse, will the minister commit to establishing a provincially led response which emphasizes local decision-making, best practices, protects our oil and gas, ranching, and farming livelihoods and better protects the sage grouse?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the member is quite right that the previous government absolutely did drop the ball on the sage grouse, and that is why that emergency protection order was imposed upon southeast Alberta ranchers and oil and gas operators and others. It was not a great situation. It was a situation where the government failed to protect the environment, and there were consequences that came through the courts. That's why we're investing in MULTISTAR. That's why we're working with ranchers. That's why we're working with the Calgary Zoo on recovery. We've got a sage grouse recovery system in place. You know, what wouldn't help is a whole bunch of cuts to the Environment and Parks budget. That would not help those ranchers at all.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Cold Lake Seniors' Lodge Construction Issues

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In my constituency we are watching the construction of a Cold Lake seniors' lodge and waiting patiently for its opening. However, I have heard concerns from a former worker on the site who has noted serious OH and S violations of sections 4, 9, 14, and 29 regarding work he was expected to complete. This worker called OH and S, warned the government of violations on July 15, and has yet to receive any response. That's nearly four months ago, and that is unacceptable. To the Minister of Labour: why has your department ignored the concerns of this worker and not had the decency to follow up with him?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Occupational health and safety is incredibly important to this government and to our province as it is responsible for making sure that our workers are safe, following codes and guidelines, for making sure that every worker can come home at the end of the day. I would be happy to follow up on this specific inquiry. We always strive to respond to people quickly. We have OH and S officers on call to be able to respond to dangerous situations immediately when that call comes in. I would be happy to receive more information on this specific situation.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that we have unanswered concerns regarding work-site safety and given that I have just received pictures showing a further work-site hazard from a second Albertan who was alarmed by the potential long-term health implications of a mould infiltration on the work site dating back to June, to the Minister of Infrastructure: how much longer must Cold Lake wait for your department to address the work-site hazards that could prove harmful to current workers and future residents of this facility?

The Speaker: The Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the safety of residents of provincially owned buildings is always our top priority. The housing management body did inform me and my office of this issue immediately, and we're working closely with the contractor to make sure that the workplace is safe. Of course, there are no seniors in the facility now. We're certainly, you know, working hard with the contractor to make sure that everything is safe for the workers, too.

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Speaker, given that the city of Cold Lake needs additional seniors' housing and given that the Cold Lake seniors' lodge broke ground months behind schedule, therefore pushing back the estimated completion date, and given the concerns I've heard on work-site safety, to the Minister of Seniors and Housing: when can the citizens of Cold Lake expect this facility to be completed and opened, and will the dates be on schedule?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we're working very closely with the housing management body in Cold Lake to make sure that things continue. We're looking at next year for occupancy for seniors in the Cold Lake area. Certainly, our investment of $1.2 billion in affordable housing across the province is making a big difference for seniors so they can age in their communities. We know that the opposition would be cutting billions from the budget and nothing would be done, but we're investing and supporting Albertans.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

2:40 Farm and Ranch Worker Safety Regulations

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the fall of 2015 the NDP government blindsided farmers with Bill 6. The NDP claimed that the bill was so important that it used its majority to shut down debate and push it through the Legislature. The next step requires the government to draft enabling regulations. To the minister of agriculture: can you please explain the importance of these regulations?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of agriculture.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. It's important for workers in every industry, including farm workers, to have basic human rights. As a government we're very proud that we were able to do that, to implement these basic human rights for these workers, human rights such as having the ability to have the same safety regulations as other industries. I'm extremely concerned that Jason Kenney and folks on the other side would repeal that legislation, take away those basic rights from those workers.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that last week the minister announced that the working group provided its final report seven months ago – and now we learn that this was just the first stage in developing the regulations – and given that it's almost two years since the act was passed, when are you planning to bring in the regulations?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. These are recommendations that were made by the occupational health and safety technical working groups. I'm very proud of the work they have done and the work producers, processors, and import-exporters across the province have done getting those recommendations to us. We've opened it up to all Albertans to have a say on it till January 15, 2018. After that we'll have the opportunity to implement these changes to make lives better for those farm workers.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the Premier made strong comments in the House about how critically important Bill 6 was for farm and ranch workers and given that it's hard to understand why the government would spend two years dragging its feet to create the required enabling regulations, to the minister of agriculture: has the urgency vanished, or was it simply false in the first place?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I and others in this government have made a commitment to fully consult with producers across the province, with Albertans across the province. We have done that. We're continuing, fulfilling that promise for full consultation. The member, I think, is fully aware of that. As the consultation process will wrap up, I'm more than happy to be able to stand in this House, more than happy to be extremely proud of the work we've done to protect these workers, to protect the farms and ranches across the province.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds we will continue with Members' Statements.

Political Action Committees

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for your grace today. Unregulated third-party fundraising and spending are corrupting Alberta's democracy, as they have south of the border. Big and dark money is getting funnelled into leadership contests, municipal and provincial elections, and overtly partisan advertising campaigns, so much so that political action committees, or PACs, now rival mainstream political parties' ability to raise funds, support candidates, and get their message out. Rules governing them are inconsistent with how other political entities are treated. In fact, Elections Alberta has raised serious concerns that PACs are now being used as a way to get around campaign finance laws.

This government has appropriately banned corporate and union donations, but it permits a parallel unregulated system, which the NDP may be benefitting from already themselves and is making a mockery of the new rules the government recently put into place. If there is one system that limits contributions and requires disclosure and another that is largely free of oversight, where do we think the money is going to go? Integrity of our democratic processes, fairness demand that PACs come under more scrutiny and regulation.

That's why the Alberta Liberals are bringing this issue to the forefront and calling on the government to close the loopholes by supporting Bill 214. Alberta has the opportunity to be a national leader in democratic accountability and electoral finance reform by doing something no other jurisdiction has yet done: actually defining what a PAC is and expanding the scope of restrictions to go beyond just political advertising.

Both the NDP and the Conservatives say that clamping down on PACs could violate the Charter right of free speech, but this has nothing to do with limiting speech or preventing third parties from participating legitimately in the democratic process. It's about making sure that the same rules apply equally to all political players and getting money further out of politics.

Allowing this free-for-all to continue means our democracy stays on sale to the highest bidder. Bold, all-party action is needed to get dark money out of Alberta politics. That's exactly what the Liberals...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The Member for Red Deer-North.

Family Violence Prevention Month in Red Deer

Mrs. Schreiner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Since being elected as the Member for Red Deer-North, I've had the pleasure many times to speak about the outstanding organizations, businesses, and people that live in my riding. When things are at their toughest, that's when people demonstrate their true nature, and the people of Red Deer have demonstrated time and again that compassion and community are the true foundations of our province.

November is Family Violence Prevention Month. Families of all kinds are the core of our communities, and they must be supported, protected, and kept safe. If family is the bedrock of our society, family violence shakes that foundation and hurts everyone it touches.

I am very proud that Red Deer was the first city in Alberta to recognize this important month by lighting the city with purple lights. Many groups are involved, including our Red Deer chapter of Soroptimist International, a volunteer group dedicated to improving the lives of women and girls. In conjunction with our domestic and relationship violence initiative committee this group works to make everyone aware of this month and its meaning. Purple lights symbolize the fact that everyone is affected by family violence. It is a dark part of our society that must have light shed on it, and it must be eradicated.

I wear the purple ribbon to remind myself of this and to remind everyone that true compassion shows itself in action, not in words. When the drive to prosperity takes precedence over caring for each other, we fail ourselves and we fail our province.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

United Conservative Party Leader's Personal Income

Connolly: Mr. Speaker, the new leader of the UCP seems to be worried about his own finances lately. He says that he has less net worth than the average Albertan even though he's been collecting a generous six-figure salary as an MP for 19 years. At last count that was three times higher than the average Albertan's paycheque. While he kept that salary for months after launching his leadership campaign, he says that he hasn't had any income since last September. Since then, he says that he's been living off his savings without any paycheques from his leadership campaign or PACs.

Mr. Speaker, Albertans are compassionate, caring people. They don't hesitate to help someone out in a time of need, and that's exactly what Albertans have been doing, offering helpful advice to Jason Kenney on how to make ends meet when finances are tight. Albertans had such generous suggestions that #kenneypennies was trending across Alberta all night. I'll read for members of the Assembly some of the wisdom Albertans have given.

"Stop buying avocado toast." "Save money on policy experts by recycling social policies from the 50's." "Take k.d. lang up on her offer of the free coffee." "Part-time job. I understand we finally pay a decent minimum wage." "Clean out your closet and have a garage sale!" "Recycle your cans and bottles." "Kill two birds with one stone; heat your home by burning books you feel are 'ideologically extreme.'" "Try making coffee at home instead of buying at caf  s." "Invite friends over instead of going out." And a final money-making tip: "Rent out your apartment on Airbnb."

Mr. Speaker, I thank all Albertans for their helpful suggestions to Jason Kenney on how he, too, can find ways to make the most of his finances.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the Government House Leader and pursuant to Standing Order 34(3) I am rising to advise the House that on the next available Monday Written Question 17 will be accepted.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Bill 24

An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today with great privilege and humility to introduce for first reading Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances.

This legislation, if passed, will make life better for all Alberta students. Our government is strengthening legislation that supports students who wish to create or join a gay-straight alliance or a queer-straight alliance, GSAs and QSAs. This legislation will ensure that every school in Alberta that receives public dollars has a policy that clearly allows students to form a gay-straight alliance, and these policies would be made publicly available. School principals would also be expected to help students who wish to create a GSA or a QSA at their school in a timely manner. We will also provide clarity on parental notification for student clubs, including GSAs and QSAs, and how this differs from notification around other programs of study.

In short, Mr. Speaker, no students will be outed if they choose to join a GSA or a QSA. Ensuring safe and caring schools for students is a top priority for our government, and we are continuing to ensure that all students feel welcome in school regardless of their sexual orientation, gender identity, or gender expression. We are following through on that commitment. If passed, this legislation will ensure that students across Alberta will belong, no matter what school they attend.

I'm proud of the work that our government has done to strengthen supports for LGBTQ students, and I'm proud of Albertans for engaging in thoughtful dialogue with me and with each other on how we can move Alberta forward.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I am very truly honoured to move first reading of Bill 24. Thank you very much.

[Motion carried; Bill 24 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to table a quotation on the cost of a pack of cigarettes relative to other provinces in the country. Alberta has among the most affordable cigarettes, and there's lots of evidence that the cost of cigarettes has a direct bearing on the uptake of cigarettes among youth. I'll table the appropriate number of copies.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a couple of tablings. One is a letter from the constituent that I had referred to who was concerned about job-site safety. The gentleman was very clear on all of the infractions that he had witnessed on this site, and this is the letter that had been sent to OH and S and the Ministry of Labour.

In my second question I referenced some pictures that came into my office. They are clearly pictures of mould that is within the facility. This is a new facility, and it is unbelievable that we are dealing with mould in a new facility.

Thank you, sir.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the Clerk. On behalf of the hon. Ms Gray, Minister of Labour and minister responsible for democratic renewal, pursuant to the Chartered Professional Accountants Act the Chartered Professional Accountants of Alberta annual report 2017.

On behalf of the hon. Mr. Feehan, Minister of Indigenous Relations, responses to written questions WQ 1 and WQ 2, both asked for by Mr. Hanson on April 10, 2017.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I believe we had two points of order today. The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Point of Order Insulting Language

Mr. Nixon: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I rise again – and I can't believe we have to keep doing this every day – under 23(j) on the use of abusive or insulting language. You know, we have talked a lot over the first few days back here this sitting about the government continuing to try to find loopholes and unique ways to call people liars in this Assembly, when they can talk about people outside of the Assembly and call them liars and when they can't talk about people outside of the Assembly and call them liars.

What I do know, though, Mr. Speaker, is that we do have a tradition in this Assembly not to call other members liars, and that is not in dispute. At the time that the hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills rose to raise this point of order, it was in reference to the Minister of Health, the Deputy Premier of Alberta, responding to a question from myself in which she said that what I was saying was untrue.

Now, I don't want to have to keep rising to do this over and over as this government continues to try to find new ways to call people liars. Our job, Mr. Speaker, is to come here and ask the government questions. Their job is to answer questions about their agenda, not to call people liars. I would suggest to you that if the government, while they're blinded by their fear of the Hon. Jason Kenney, continues to do this, it's going to continue to cause disorder throughout this sitting on this process.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you would caution and ask all members of this Assembly but particularly the government, who has this new-found love of trying to call people liars with every question, to stop this behaviour and let us get on with the business of the people of Alberta.

The Speaker: The Acting Deputy Government House Leader.

Ms Ganley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do apologize; I missed when this was originally raised. The member is saying that the word "liar" was used. I don't recall that occurring, but it's possible. But then when speaking about the incident, he said that it was a reference to a fact which was untrue.

So I would say that if it was a reference to a fact being untrue, that's a disagreement as to the facts and that's perfectly reasonable. But he's free to raise it. If the word in question was actually used, we're happy to apologize.

The Speaker: Well, if it's of any value, what was said, which I believe was the intended point of order, was: "Jobs are up in Alberta: 49,000 jobs. And the, you know, alternate facts that the member opposite wants to speak about are completely alternate and untrue."

So in this particular instance it was the facts that were being referred to, and I don't think there's a point of order here.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Point of Order Timing in Question Period

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise. During question period today you made a point of awarding somebody an extra 10 seconds. I'm not certain where in the orders you have the authority to do that. But since the person was allowed to go on for much longer than 10 seconds, I was just curious whether you were going to strike everything in Hansard that was after the 35 seconds that the rules allow or give the Official Opposition another question in the next question period.

Fairness is important. You are at a higher level, but I think it's not uncomplimentary to you to say that you are the referee here. I don't mean it in an uncomplimentary way. I think you would even agree that you're the referee here, although I hold you in higher esteem than just a referee. I think it would be a good time for you to strike that fairness that was passed by today during question period.

The Speaker: Do you have a comment, Acting Deputy Government House Leader?

Ms Ganley: Yes, Mr. Speaker, just that I'm not aware necessarily that it is in the rules, but it is my understanding that generally it is your function to maintain order in this House. You know, in this case you were unable to hear the answer because of the cacophony of noise coming from the other side, so I think that it was perfectly reasonable for you to allow additional time in this case.

The Speaker: Thank you.

I, too, have respect for you, hon. member, and all the members in this House. I do in fact have the authority, I believe. As we've talked about many times in this House, it is a freedom of free speech. It's our collective responsibility to defend it, and I intend to continue to do that.

You will also note, hon. member, that there have been very, very few times, in spite of the noise, that I have stopped the clock. In this particular instance I happened to have a minister answering a question who normally, sitting where she is, I would have been able to hear. I could not hear the question in place, and I therefore allocated additional time for the purposes of understanding what the question was. I will continue to be conscious of the treatment, of fairness, and you can count on me to in fact do that.

Third Reading

Bill 20

Beaver River Basin Water Authorization Act

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Today I am very pleased to move third reading of Bill 20, the Beaver River Basin Water Authorization Act.

This is a special act of the Legislature to approve two interbasin transfers from the North Saskatchewan River basin to the Beaver River basin to address drinking water challenges in Mallaig, which is in the county of St. Paul, and the Whitefish Lake First Nation. The act will allow for an extension of existing regional waterlines, which will ensure that these communities have access to a safe, secure supply of drinking water, and that safe, secure supply of drinking water is coming through the investments that the province is making through our capital plan.

The plans to connect the Whitefish Lake First Nation and Mallaig to regional waterlines leverage federal funds and ensure that our capital plan is meeting the needs of both rural Albertans and indigenous Albertans and making good on our commitments, Madam Speaker, under the UN declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples to ensure drinking water is brought up to our reserves that still so desperately do not have access to that constituent part of life. These projects will make life better for the residents of Mallaig in the county of St. Paul and for the members of the Whitefish Lake First Nation.

I'd like to thank everyone for their comments and support for this bill, and with that, I'd like to move third reading of Bill 20.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak in third reading? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise this afternoon to speak in favour of Bill 20, the Beaver River Basin Water Authorization Act. Our UCP caucus has shown strong support for Bill 20 because it truly will enhance the quality of life for the residents of the hamlet of Mallaig and Whitefish Lake First Nation by providing them with a sustainable source of potable water. The decision to transfer water between river basins, which is specifically the purpose of this legislation, is not made lightly, which is why it's before this House.

The North Saskatchewan River, however, is a reliable source of water, and the amount of water that will be channelled to these communities is a small drop in the river's flow. To be specific, according to Alberta WaterPortal annual discharge of the North Saskatchewan River is 7.3 million cubic decametres, and the total amount of water approved to transfer is 605 cubic decametres.

During the last few days of debate on this bill we also heard that the municipalities in the area support the transfer and the proposed pipelines using existing rights-of-way to reduce the effects on the land it will cross.

It is also good to know that Whitefish Lake First Nation will no longer be drawing their water from the lake. Goodfish Lake's water levels are expected to recover.

My colleague the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills spoke passionately about the importance of ensuring our northern communities are not living in substandard conditions. He talked of the Whitefish Lake First Nation and the work the community is doing to encourage its viability into the future. He also spoke of Mallaig and the special attributes of the hamlet and its thriving community. Permitting this water basin transfer and the resulting pipeline will bring fresh, clean drinking water to the residents of both communities. For most of us who take good quality drinking water for granted, it is hard to understand how this project will improve the quality of life for these Albertans.

I would like to note that the government of Alberta introduced its water for life strategy in 2003. This long-term strategy allowed communities to share water treatment, pipeline, and waste-water disposal infrastructure. This project fits nicely into the strategy and displays great value. The pipeline projects that will result from passing Bill 20 will see both the federal and provincial governments invest more than $30 million into infrastructure, with the province picking up the lion's share.

Because Bill 20 is such a vitally important project, it is nice to see all members of the House make a positive effort to approve this legislation as rapidly as possible. In just a few short days and at the very early stage of this fall session we'll have accomplished that goal. I encourage all of my colleagues to support Bill 20.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm very happy to rise and speak on third reading of Bill 20. I'm very thankful that we could get through to third reading here on the fourth day of session in the fall.

I'd like to thank the Minister of Environment and Parks as well as the Government House Leader for addressing this so quickly when I brought it forward this spring, when the county realized that they had to get this passed through before they could take advantage of the federal funding that was available. We tried to get it through in the spring session, but it was just a little bit too late, so I was very happy to see that it was the first order of business when we got back this fall.

I'd also like to thank my fellow members for all the input here in the Chamber. I didn't hear very much negative about this transfer of water from one water basin to another. I did hear some concerns about transferring water from basins. I do understand that it's something that we can't take lightly, but in this case I think it's very important that we get good-quality water to these two communities. I really look forward to seeing these projects completed as soon as possible. I again thank the Chamber for getting this through in a matter of four days.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) comes into effect if there are any questions or comments.

Seeing none, any other speakers to the bill in third reading? The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Rosendahl: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. This is a special act of the Legislature to approve two interbasin transfers from the North Saskatchewan River basin to the Beaver River basin to address drinking water challenges of Mallaig and, of course, the Whitefish Lake First Nation. The act will allow for the extension of existing regional waterlines, which will ensure these communities have access to a safe, secure supply of drinking water. Plans to connect Whitefish Lake First Nation and Mallaig to the regional waterline leverage federal funds, are environmentally sustainable, and enjoy strong support among stakeholders in the area. These projects are very important for those communities.

I'd like to thank everyone for their comments on this bill during the debate. We'll certainly take those comments into consideration as these projects move forward.

With that, I'd like to close debate on third reading of Bill 20. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, you can't close debate.

Standing Order 29(2)(a) comes into effect. Are there any questions or comments?

Are there any other members who wish to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[Motion carried; Bill 20 read a third time]

Bill 19 An Act to Protect Gas and Convenience Store Workers

The Deputy Speaker: I'm looking for someone to move third reading on behalf of the minister. The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Pardon me, Madam Speaker. My apologies there.

Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to speak and close debate on third reading of Bill 19, An Act to Protect Gas and Convenience Store Workers.

I wish to thank and acknowledge my fellow members on both sides of the House for their positive co-operation during the debate on this important bill. Many members shared personal experiences related to this issue of violence in the fuel and convenience store sector, and that tells me the issue touches a lot of people and underscores the importance of Bill 19. Our debate on this bill has been cordial, positive, and there had been near-unanimous agreement on the need to pass this bill. It is a wonderful experience to see this type of unanimity – unanimity – in this place. It's a tough word. I again thank all my fellow members for their support of this bill. I believe we all share a desire to make fuel and convenience stores as safe a place to work as possible.

Madam Speaker, Bill 19 is excellent legislation because it was developed in a thoughtful and effective way. The ministry worked hard to engage with the industry, police, labour groups, worker advocates, and other stakeholders. That engagement helped the ministry craft the thoughtful, effective bill we are debating today. I wish to thank our industry partners for participating in the creation of Bill 19 and for the commitment to worker health and safety. I wish to acknowledge leaders such as Husky and 7-Eleven for being proactive and moving voluntarily to prepayment for fuel ahead of this legislation. I wish to acknowledge labour groups and worker advocates who helped us craft this important bill. Their input and experiences were invaluable in this process. I also thank our law enforcement partners for their contributions to this bill and for being unwavering in their support of mandatory prepayment for fuel and violence prevention plans.

Madam Speaker, I am sure my fellow members are also heartbroken when they see workers injured or killed during a gas-and-dash incident. I'm sure we were all equally saddened and outraged by what happened to Ki Yun Jo last month. He was the hard-working owner of a Thorsby gas station who was taken away from his family and community by a brazen gas-and-dash incident. This is just one of many such incidents during the past three years, incidents that have resulted in five workers' deaths and serious injuries to three others. Bill 19 is a positive step to help ensure that these types of incidents do not happen again. Every worker has a right to come home safely at the end of their workday, from the first shift right through to retirement.

Madam Speaker, I encourage my fellow members to continue the positive, co-operative tone in the House by supporting the final reading of this bill. Together we can help ensure that those who work in gas stations and convenience stores can return safely to their families at the end of the day.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

I cannot adjourn debate, right? Okay.

The Deputy Speaker: Can I clarify, hon. member, that you are moving third reading of Bill 19 on behalf of the Minister of Labour?

Mr. Coolahan: That is correct.

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you.

Any other members wishing to speak to third reading? I will recognize first the hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner, followed by Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 19, an Act to Protect Gas and Convenience Store Workers. As you know, I am a big supporter of making sure that we have less red tape in government. Even though this bill does add red tape to our society, I'm also a big proponent of making sure that we have best practices applied to our society, and I believe that this strikes the right balance in order to be able to provide that safety that Albertans can return home from work, whether they're workers or whether they're employers, to their families and have a safe society.

In my private member's Bill 207, talking about red tape reduction, I want to be clear – and there were some comments made in days past by the Deputy Premier that I was advocating for unsafe conditions. That is never the case. With Bill 207 I am certainly advocating to make sure that we don't have any redundancies in bills and making sure that the government is as efficient and effective as it can be.

Now, back to Bill 19. I think that it's important to say that it's tragic when we see any deaths happen in any sector of our province. It was terrible to hear of so many deaths in, especially, gas-and-dash incidents. So we are supportive of the action of this government, but we're waiting to see what the government is going to do in terms of the implementation of this. That's where the devil can be, in the details. I'm optimistic that this bill will hopefully be reasonable in its measures and also the regulations that it applies. Having a workplace violence prevention plan is sensible, in my opinion. I don't have any concerns about the sensibleness of this bill, but I hope that this does not add any more paperwork or a lot of paperwork onto already taxed business owners.

I heard from stakeholders that were concerned about the potentially debilitating cost of mandatory bulletproof glass or a prohibition on working alone. I'm glad to see that we don't see that in this bill, especially if the worker that is alone is also the owner of the gas station. I think that they need to be able to make that decision for themselves.

From what I see, there is some flexibility for employers made within this bill, which I think was very important, and obviously that would come out during the consultation process. I'm optimistic and hopeful that this bill will not be so stringent in its application, that it will be able to take into consideration small, medium, and large companies. As OH and S will be involved, I hope that this law is – because it is very vague, I am a little nervous about inspectors and bureaucrats being able to rule inconsistently, Madam Speaker, when it comes to the compliance of this law, so I hope that when the regulations are done, we don't have that vagueness still in the law.

I have heard in some cases that employers want a law requiring prepay because then customers are less likely to get irate with the clerks when they're slightly inconvenienced.

We've been hearing many concerns from Albertans lately about an increase in property crimes, and it has been often talked about in this House, so I'm not surprised when this government says that on average there are 12 fuel thefts in Alberta every day. I hope this bill will help deter crime as a best practice that we see in other areas and other jurisdictions. Given the mandatory video surveillance and emergency transmitters that would be asked to be implemented and put into these gas stations, I think that's a very good idea. However, if a gas station or convenience store is already having problems and they could afford it, I would wonder why they are not already taking these measures.

I am very interested and actually very supportive of making sure that this bill is passed, and I will be supporting it in this reading. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's with pleasure that I rise this afternoon to speak in favour of Bill 19, An Act to Protect Gas and Convenience Store Workers. This is a crucial piece of legislation, and I'm reminded of a story a colleague of mine told me probably about 10 years ago. He was a young man and working at a gas station to put himself through university. It was a night shift. It was late at night, and he was the unfortunate recipient of a shotgun shoved in his face. Someone robbed him at gunpoint in a gas station. I just remember feeling so afraid while he was telling me the story. It really shook me. It sticks with me today, as I imagine it does him.

Sadly, over two years ago I attended the funeral of Maryam Rashidi, who died after being hit by a vehicle driven by a man who stole around $100 worth of gas from the gas station where she was an employee. Gas and convenience store workers are vulnerable and a part of Alberta's workforce that need and deserve legislated protections.

I've had the chance to take a look at the bill as it stands before the House, and I'm happy to support it in its current form. As my colleagues and fellow members of the House know, Bill 19 proposes a number of amendments to the Occupational Health and Safety Act, particularly to part 27 of the safety code. This bill would not only mandate prepaying for fuel but will also enact a number of violence prevention plans, including time-lock safes that cannot be opened between 11 p.m. and 5 a.m., which would have prevented the shotgun being presented to my colleague. The bill also requires gas stations and convenience stores to employ video monitoring technology to keep employees safe and ensure that limited quantities of cash, lottery tickets, and tobacco are available during these hours.

In my view and in the view of the Alberta Party this is a sound piece of legislation that has been carefully crafted, and it is timely. As the Alberta Association of Chiefs of Police estimates, several thousand incidents of fuel theft occurred in Alberta in 2015, and last month the Alberta Federation of Labour reported that there were between 80 and 100 incidents of gas and dash per week. While these incidents of theft are unsettling, they are nothing compared to the assaults and other acts of violence suffered by gas station and convenience store workers. Sadly, Ki Yun Jo of Thorsby recently died trying to prevent a gas-and-dash robbery.

Madam Speaker, as far as the Alberta Party is concerned, this bill is a no-brainer, and I encourage my colleagues to support it. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Minister of Justice.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I just wanted to take the opportunity to make a couple of comments on this bill. It's certainly the case that this is a very exciting move forward. I think in a lot of ways a society can be judged on how it treats those among us who don't have a strong position in society, and often the individuals working at convenience stores and gas stations find themselves in just such a position, so I'm very proud that we're able to move forward and to take these steps to protect those individuals.

I'm also pleased by the very collaborative relationship we've had with respect to this bill with the Alberta Association of Chiefs of Police. I know that I had heard from a number of chiefs about this very early on. I think we all have an interest in any crime that can be prevented, especially crimes like this, that have such a senseless and violent outcome at the end of the day.

In addition, this is a method by which we can give police more time back to pursue other avenues of crime. Certainly, these incidents can have incredibly serious and tragic outcomes, and we're very glad to prevent those. We're also very glad to prevent some of the regular, day-to-day instances of theft that we have from convenience stores, from gas stations and things like that and to be able to refocus those officers on the more serious and violent crimes.

As a person who used to work in the area of labour and employment, I'm incredibly glad to see these regulations and protections for workers being put in place. I think that I'm incredibly excited to see that we have support on all sides of the House for moving forward with this.

With that, I will say just thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any further speakers to the bill?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein on behalf of the Minister of Labour to close debate.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would like to, first of all, just say thank you again to all my colleagues for all the collaborative work on this bill. I really appreciate what's happened over the last few days in the different readings of this bill and for all the positive comments that said that people recognize that this bill is absolutely needed, a hundred per cent, and that we are making a difference here and saving lives with this bill.

With that said, Madam Speaker, I would like to move to adjourn debate on third reading of this bill. Sorry. Close debate. I would like to close debate on behalf of the minister on third reading of Bill 19. We got there.

The Deputy Speaker: Got to get those words right.

[Motion carried; Bill 19 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 22 Resident and Family Councils Act

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, and it is a pleasure to rise to speak to the Committee of the Whole on Bill 22, Resident and Family Councils Act. I am particularly pleased to speak to this as this act is something that many of the residents of Edmonton-Whitemud have actually asked me for. I have six seniors' lodges, including one life lease operation, in Edmonton-Whitemud.

The concept of a governance system – I think one of my colleagues referred to it earlier as a way for the individual resident of the facility to basically participate in the management and to have their concerns heard.

I have had a deputation from one of the seniors' facilities in my riding where there is not a resident council, and there were many concerns that were raised. Indeed, on one occasion I had to intervene and actually contact the city of Edmonton. I'm forgetting the department, but this was a repair that had not been done for several months, and it actually resulted in an unsafe condition of the actual unit because of water leakage. The resident had tried to work with the management of the facility, and that had not been very productive. After I contacted the city of Edmonton, the management actually was apprised of that call, and it was not surprising that the repairs were done within a short period of time.

I don't think we need to have the MLAs doing sort of maintenance calls for residents of our seniors' facilities, and I think this act will give the residents some more leverage with the operation of the units. I think that this also applies to the lodges and to some of the other privately run operations.

In any case, I did want to rise because I know that this is something that's very important to the residents of my constituency, and I'm pleased to support this.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thanks very much, Madam Chair. I just wanted to get on the record on this bill because I, too, have had quite a bit of contact with seniors in my community. I probably have over a dozen seniors' residences and long-term care settings in my riding of Calgary-Mountain View, and one of the common themes is concerns about various issues, decisions, management approaches, food, processes of decision-making, lack of accountability – you name it – and when I ask if they have formed an organization, in many cases they're hesitant. They are feeling somewhat intimidated. They don't realize their own capacity to form voluntary committees if they choose, and this will go some distance in that 20 per cent or so that have not received or felt they had permission to go ahead and develop one of these advisory councils.

So there's no question in my mind that this is a good public policy. It's in some ways surprising that we have to legislate something like this, but in a case of, especially, people who don't feel empowered to create these kinds of bodies that hold management accountable, that ensure that there is some kind of dialogue that'll ensure that quality standards are maintained, that they feel they have a voice and can influence processes and decisions, it's important for us to move ahead with this. I fully support it.

I think part of what needs to happen also, quite beyond this – because it is limited power that these folks have. At the end of the day the management still decides what they're going to do, and there is concern that if they push too hard, they may be looking for another place to live or they may have conditions worsen for them in the setting. So beyond this, there certainly needs to be a requirement for all public and private institutions to have independent certification, evaluation that includes consultation with these committees. The certification needs to include some kind of interaction with a representative body of the residents to say that they are listening, they are trying to be responsive to clear needs, whether it's around food quality or maintenance of their residence or attitudes, bullying. We're hearing a lot about bullying in the workplace these days.

Whatever it is, there has to be accountability. That's the part that is a little harder to get to, and this certainly won't necessarily provide that, but it's a step in the right direction. I hope that we can also see the day where we require all centres for seniors and for those with disabilities, whether mental or physical or both, to be certified and that they're required in those certifications to consult with the representative group in that institution.

Thanks, Madam Chair. I'll be fully supportive.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to Bill 22?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[The remaining clauses of Bill 22 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Opposed? That's carried.

The hon. Acting Deputy Government House Leader.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I would now move that the committee rise and report.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Ms Sweet: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports the following bill: Bill 22.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? Say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Opposed? So ordered.

The hon. Acting Deputy Government House Leader.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Seeing the hour and the fact that the roads are a little bit miserable and many of us have to travel this evening, I'm going to move that we adjourn until 1:30 p.m. on Monday and wish everyone safe travels.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 3:38 p.m.]

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Good afternoon.

Let us take a moment to reflect. As today marks the beginning of Veterans' Week, may we take a moment to consider the remarkable service of women and men who so selflessly protect our great country. May we think of their spouses, their children, their families and friends for their own dedication and determination, from saying a difficult "See you soon" to exclaiming a most wonderful "Welcome home." We thank them and remember them.

Hon. members, ladies and gentlemen, it is my pleasure to welcome and be led in the singing of our national anthem by the Edmonton chapter of the Canadian Military Wives Choir.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all thy sons command.
Car ton bras sait porter l'épée,
Il sait porter la croix!
Ton histoire est une épopée
Des plus brillants exploits.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Thank you very much.
Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Merci, M. le Président. C'est avec fierté que je me lève à la Chambre aujourd'hui pour introduire 21 étudiants et étudiantes de l'école Our Lady of the Prairies. Les étudiants et étudiantes sont accompagnés par leurs enseignants M. Raphael Fortin et Mme Diaman Awaleh ainsi que par leur chaperon Mme Chelsi Reed, qui est aussi dans la Chambre. Veuillez vous lever, s'il-vous-plaît, et recevoir la bienvenue chaleureuse de l'Assemblée.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Speaker: Welcome.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Trans Mountain Pipeline Expansion Opposition

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this past weekend was the convention for the B.C. branch of the NDP. I imagine the Premier might have attended a few of those back in the day when she was an NDP staffer in B.C. The Premier's counterpart, John Horgan, was again with glee touting his goal of blocking the Trans Mountain pipeline. Apparently, the NDP in B.C. haven't got the message that Alberta now has so-called social licence. To the Premier: have you raised the spectre of potential consequences with your B.C. counterpart should they illegally block the Trans Mountain pipeline, and if so, what are those consequences?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We have been very clear in our position all along that we believe the position of the B.C. NDP is incorrect, is wrong, is bad for Alberta, is bad for British Columbians, is bad for all Canadians. We have made that position very clear over and over and over again, and we will continue to do it. The fact of the matter is, however, that the work that this government has done on climate change, on working with our energy industry did something that those guys over there were never able to do. We got a pipeline approved by the federal government.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, Albertans don't want words on this. They want the Premier to do something. What consequences will she use? Last week we asked the Premier if she would be travelling to B.C. in the new year to make the case for Trans Mountain and Alberta's ethical oil. Today we learned that the Premier is set to speak in B.C. on November 30 at the Vancouver board of trade. So to the Premier: will you use this opportunity to send a message to John Horgan as well as to the mayors of Vancouver and Burnaby that would include potential consequences if they block the Trans Mountain pipeline?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In fact, the member opposite learned last week that I was going to B.C. because, I believe, I indicated that to him in answer to a question. Nonetheless, what we will continue to do is that we will focus on talking with all interested parties and particularly the people of B.C., talk about how this is a good thing for B.C., for Alberta, and for Canada. Moreover, what we will do is that we will continue to do the work that we can do in the appropriate forums to advocate for Alberta's position, for Kinder Morgan's position. We will do that because we will then support the decision that has been made, which is that the pipeline is approved.

Mr. Nixon: So no consequences. Just words again from this Premier, and no action on behalf of Albertans.

The new federal NDP leader has made his ideological opposition to pipelines crystal clear. The Premier has tried to dismiss her federal counterpart's opposition. However, Mr. Speaker, section 1.02 of the Alberta NDP constitution clearly states: "The Party shall constitute a section of the New Democratic Party of Canada." So they are the same party. Has the Premier spoken to her federal leader and informed him that he is wrong on his position on pipelines?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member opposite for the question. The answer to that question is absolutely yes. I have told Mr. Singh that he is wrong. He is dead wrong. But just as important, he is irrelevant. And the reason he is irrelevant is because the decision has already been taken by the federal government. But you know what? I know that the UCP over there is gleefully predicting that the pipeline will fail. They are cackling, praying that it won't be built. But for Albertans this issue is bigger than partisan politics. I get that, and I think it's about time that they do, too.

The Speaker: Second main question.

Carbon Levy and Fuel Costs

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, winter is here, and I hope everyone is staying warm. Unfortunately, the NDP is making that harder for Albertans. In just under two months' time Albertans will be dealing with a whopping 75 per cent tax on natural gas in the middle of winter when heating is needed the most. Does anyone remember the NDP promising a 75 per cent tax on home heating in the last election? Of course not, because the NDP hid this part of their agenda from Albertans when they were campaigning. Will the NDP reconsider this draconian, cruel tax on home heating and bring in common-sense change?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, what we have been focused on doing in this government is, first of all, moving forward on a responsible climate change plan that ensures that we make progress on this important issue while at the same time being sure that we provide rebates to low- and middle-income families that cover the costs that might increase as a result of the climate change plan. That's what we've done. That is alongside a number of other things that this government has done to make life more affordable.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, it's amazing to see a government defend a 75 per cent tax on an item that is essential for most Albertans just to live, and remember that the Trudeau-NDP carbon tax will only go in one direction, up. Can the Premier tell us what other items the NDP believes should be subject to a massive 75 per cent tax? Clearly, we need to ask today since this secretive NDP government will not voluntarily disclose their ideological agenda to Albertans while they're campaigning.

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, the climate leadership plan is actually working. It's reducing emissions. It's diversifying our economy. It's creating good jobs. I don't know; the member opposite might not have heard this, but it also ensured that we got not one but two pipelines approved, doing all that while tackling – tackling – the serious issue of climate change that, quite frankly, is long overdue for attention by someone that believes in science. I'm proud to be the one that's doing that.

Mr. Nixon: I count only cancelled pipelines under this NDP government.

It's not just the price of natural gas that is going up. Gasoline and diesel are also set for a 50 per cent tax hike as of January 1. When we are already seeing some of the biggest spikes at the pump, another tax hike is definitely not welcome by Albertans. But let's not forget the Premier's advice to Albertans last winter. She told Albertans to walk or to take a bus. Before that, she told Albertans that were already hurting because of her policies just to buy a new car. Will the Premier acknowledge that taking a bus, walking, or other options like that are just not options for all Albertans?

Ms Notley: Well, you know what, Mr. Speaker? Our government is building Alberta, and we're doing it by reinvesting the money from the climate leadership plan in critical projects that not only build Alberta but make life better for Albertans like, for instance, the $1.6 billion investment in the green line in Calgary. I'd like the members opposite to come clean on what they would do on that project if they cancelled the carbon levy because – you know what? – the money isn't there, and the disingenuous statements that their leader has been making over the last two or three days are ridiculous. You either support the green line or you don't. You either support the climate change plan or you don't, and we know where they stand.

The Speaker: Third main question

Provincial By-election

Mr. Nixon: Last week we asked why the government wasn't demanding that the NEB intervene to stop the city of Burnaby's obstruction of the Trans Mountain pipeline, and the government followed our advice. We lead; they follow. We asked when the Premier would head to other provinces to promote Alberta's energy, and today we see an announcement that she is doing exactly that. We lead; they follow. It is clear that the Hon. Jason Kenney is getting results, and he's not even in this House yet. To the Premier: when will she request a by-election so that the Hon. Jason Kenney can join us here as the Leader of the Official Opposition and keep leading so that you can follow?

Ms Notley: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think that it might be of some use to the opposition for them to brush up on their fairy-tale telling because that was quite the revisionist history that I just heard there. Nonetheless, we will move forward in due course with respect to calling a by-election. As the member knows, the legislation gives us six months. I doubt that it will take that long. We will certainly move forward as soon as we can, and we look forward to having those debates subsequently. Let me be clear that our government moved forward on the Burnaby matter well before anyone over there ever raised it, and our plan to go . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Nixon: No, Premier, Jason Kenney is not a fairy tale. He's the real deal. Let's get him here in this House.

Last week the Premier's office told the media that a by-election would be called without undue delay. She just said the same to this House right now, Mr. Speaker. The seat for Calgary-Lougheed sits empty. When will the Premier call a by-election and get the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition here in the House?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, as I said, again, we will call the by-election in due course. I don't believe that the seat has actually been vacant for even a week yet. It's important to ensure that everyone has an opportunity to participate fully in that by-election. We don't actually go by the schedule of the UCP. We go by the schedule that's best for Albertans, and we will do that.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we know the NDP like to talk about the Hon. Jason Kenney over and over. I suspect that actually last week his name was mentioned more in this House in one week than probably any other person in history. They repeatedly talk about him. They clearly are nervous about him. It's clear that they're eager to debate him. So why won't the Premier do the right thing, call a by-election immediately, and get Jason Kenney here in the House? Is she nervous?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Let me be absolutely – absolutely – completely clear on this matter. Not only am I not nervous; I can't wait. That being said, as I've said already twice, it will be called in due course.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South West.

School Construction

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Southwest Edmonton is full of young families and children that are attending the eight new schools our government has built and opened since the last election. However, the old schools built by the former government under their risky and failed P3 model have long lists of deficiencies, including fields that students can't play on. What is the government doing to ensure that schools are equipped for our children to perform their best?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you so much for the question. Certainly, we have learned a lot about building schools because – you know what? – we are in the largest infrastructure build of schools in the history of the province. It's going very well. We learned from the past and from the opposite members that the P3 model was certainly deficient. Certainly, I work with school boards and their lists to make determinations of where they need schools next. I'm happy to be doing that. You know, we've, as it happens, built quite a few schools in Edmonton-South West in the last number of years, and we will continue to do so.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our new schools often open completely full or nearly full, so these schools have a greater enrolment than expected. What is the government doing, what is the minister doing to ensure that we will have enough funding and teachers for every single student?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Since this government took office, we have funded for enrolment in education from kindergarten to grade 12. We know that is important, and we can see that our enrolment continues to grow. It's a sign of a healthy economy. It's a sign of optimism for the future. Certainly, you cannot undercut the dreams of all of those young families by making massive cuts as Jason Kenney and the UCP would do.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now those students and families in my riding that are filling those schools are starting to grow up. When will the minister commit to building a high school in my constituency to support those growing communities?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, we know that with all of the young families in suburban cities around the province, of course, they will end up needing to go to high school as well. You know, after many, many years we are building those schools that are needed to be built. It's a good investment in the future, and it's a good investment in our economy as well because, of course, when you see a healthy education system, then families can settle in, companies can move to Alberta, and we will all continue to prosper here in this fine province.

Thank you.

Pipeline Approval

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, Justin Trudeau and his Liberal government recently declared war on Alberta and our energy sector when he stated during the NEB reviews that upstream emissions linked to the projects under review would be assessed. What this means for Alberta is that the federal government will be in direct contravention of the Canadian Constitution by meddling in provincial jurisdiction. We hear crickets on this issue from this government while hundreds of thousands of Albertans continue to look for work that could be created by the pipeline approval. Will the Premier finally commit to standing up for Albertans and our province, or is she happy to be Ottawa's pawn?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the oil and gas industry wants certainty, and that's what our government is giving them. Jason Kenney's Conservatives are only causing more uncertainty with their reckless and ideological promises. We've had two pipelines approved in two years. On that side of the House you have a couple of former Conservative cabinet ministers who didn't manage to get anything done in 10.

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, given that blocking pipelines through overregulation is a direct contradiction of Canada's goal to achieve emissions reductions at the lowest cost to the economy and given that the Premier's Ottawa Liberal friends continue to control Alberta's environmental policy despite the fact that upstream emissions are clearly under provincial purview, is the Premier afraid to stand up for Albertans, or is she more afraid to admit her theory that staying in the good books of Justin Trudeau has failed to serve Alberta in any way, in any shape, in any form?

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, this government has taken action on oil sands emissions through the implementation of a limit. We're the only energy-producing jurisdiction in the world with such a limit, and we have worked on that with the oil companies themselves. That is the kind of action that we have taken in addition to advising the NEB of our intent to participate fully to support Kinder Morgan in its dispute with Burnaby. On every possible front this government, this side of the House, is defending Alberta's oil and gas interests and putting people back to work while we do it.

Mrs. Pitt: That's not what the rest of Alberta thinks, Mr. Speaker.

Given that the federal government had previously committed to deferring to the provincial governments in its effort to curb emissions and given that it is unlikely that the NEB will be able to approve any pipelines if upstream and downstream emissions are factored into an already overregulated process, how much longer will the Premier allow her NDP government to be a puppet for Justin Trudeau at the expense of everyday Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, reckless rhetoric is not going to get these pipelines built any faster. Neither, too, is conservative cheerleading for those pipelines' demise. Jason Kenney's risky plan will only cause uncertainty. It is our plan that has put in place the certainty, that has taken the environment and the economy seriously and ensured that we can move this province forward, put people back to work, and make life better for all Albertans.

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, the Trans Mountain pipeline expansion project has run into the red tape of Burnaby, where the mayor and bureaucrats complain of being too busy and needing more time for reviews with no end in sight. The delays are costing Kinder Morgan about $35 million a month plus an additional $90 million in lost revenue for every single month of delay. By wasting Kinder Morgan's money, is the NDP trying to kill $7.4 billion in private investment and thousands of jobs?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, it's the conservative side of the House that would like nothing more than for this pipeline to fail. They've got their pompoms out. They are ready to cheer for Alberta's demise. You know what? We are focused on making life better for Albertans, fighting every day for good jobs for our energy industry by ensuring that our voice is heard at the National Energy Board with respect to the Trans Mountain pipeline. We are the ones who are making life better for Albertans.

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, given that I have been to the Westridge marine terminal in Burnaby where the Trans Mountain pipeline terminates and given that the facility is a tiny footprint hidden among the trees and park space with only three tanks and a jetty to load boats, what has the Minister of Energy done to knock some common sense into the mayor of Burnaby to stop delaying permits for a project deemed to be a national interest by the National Energy Board?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. This kind of violent language is completely inappropriate and just completely unnecessary. One jurisdiction does not have the right to obstruct a project of national importance. We've been clear as a government on this matter. The city of Burnaby is overreaching, and we have been very clear at both the National Energy Board level, with the Premier of British Columbia, with the federal leader of the NDP inasmuch as that matters – we have been clear – from the very beginning that this pipeline is in Alberta's interest, it's in Canada's national interest, and it will get built.

The Speaker: Hon. member, I too find that words like “knocking on the head” are not advisable in this House. I heard earlier use of the word “war.” Can we just please use different language than refers to violence?

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, given that Telus has its headquarters in Vancouver and major offices in Burnaby, B.C., and since Burnaby is no longer a business-friendly town and given the ample empty office space in downtown Calgary and given that the Premier is going to be in B.C. soon, will she meet the Telus CEO and entice them to relocate their operations and head office to a business-friendly city like Calgary?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, we are focused on the two pipelines that we have gotten approved while Jason Kenney and the Conservatives are focused on themselves and their political interests. While we've been busy fighting to get two pipelines built, Jason Kenney is making reckless promises that would only mean more blocked pipelines. Our climate leadership plan got this done in two years; Jason Kenney sat in Ottawa for two decades and did nothing to move this matter forward.

Access to Information

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Speaker, this NDP government continues to deny that it is the most secretive government in Alberta's history. The Official Opposition and the Privacy Commissioner have called this government out on many occasions, and now so is a group representing over 800 media sources. A new audit shows that access to information under the NDP has sunk to an all-time new low. To the Minister of Service Alberta: will you stop using recycled talking points and admit that access to information has deteriorated under your watch?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McLean: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. On this side of the House we believe that government should be open and transparent, and that's why when we took office, we got to work. We got to work ensuring that we can improve turnaround times, which we have done, for FOIP requests. We are proactively sharing more information with the Alberta public than any government in the history of Alberta ever has before. We will continue to work on this, we will continue to improve culture, and I think that we are certainly the ones to look to for appreciation of transparency.

The Speaker: Thank you.
First supplemental.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given the fact that access to information has deteriorated under this government and given that this deterioration can be seen in processing and completion time, amount of records disclosed, and fee assessments and given the fact that this government also likes to talk about its supposed successes, to the Minister of Service Alberta: are you and your colleagues proud of being at the bottom of all levels of the government in the country with a D grade? A D grade.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's no secret in this House that when we took government, we adopted 44 years of not caring about transparency and, in fact, a government that enjoyed being secretive. In fact, those attitudes still very much exist on the other side of the floor. When we look at the Leader of the Opposition, we need look no further than Mr. Kenney, who will not even disclose his campaign contributors. His plan for extreme social conservatism he has continued to keep secret, and he will not be forthright with the . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given the fact that the government has brought in new levels of secrecy related to FOIP and given the fact that this government is being investigated for deleting e-mails and given that we have had scandals like this in B.C., Ontario, and the United States resulting in dismissals, criminal charges, and lost elections, to the minister: are you actually going to make positive changes to your department, or will you continue to promote further secrecy by maintaining the status quo? It is shameful.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really wish my friend on the opposition side would actually take knowledge of the fact that we have hired more people to clear the backlog, that we are streamlining FOIP processes, that we are proactively disclosing more information than the government of Alberta ever has. In addition to all of this, we have posted online all sole-source contracts over $10,000, we have opened up the ABC appointment process, and we have posted all salaries and contracts of all the Premier's and ministers' staff. We are working hard. There is more work to do, but the opposition is no one to be stating anything on this issue when they enjoy the secrecy surrounding their leader.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Infertility Treatment Funding

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This past Friday Alberta Health Services confirmed that the province's only publicly operated fertility clinic will stop offering noninsured services such as in vitro fertilization in February. This impacts people across the province who want to grow their families and need support to do so. Services that help to find the cause of infertility are covered by the province, but procedures that attempt to find solutions are not. To the Minister of Health: why are there not more supports for families struggling with infertility in our province?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for this important question. We know how difficult it can be for families who are trying to conceive when they are unable to do so. That's one of the reasons why the space that will be created through the movement will focus on the insured services, just like counselling for families who are struggling with infertility and other publicly funded services that the member mentioned. In terms of the services that aren't under the formulary and aren't publicly funded, they will still be available in the city of Edmonton. We are absolutely working to address the wait time and using the space to make sure that the publicly funded services have less wait.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms McPherson: Thank you. Given that existing patients must complete treatments by February or transition to other clinics and given that many wait-listed clients are still weeks or months away from their appointments and given that average wait times can vary between seven and 18 months depending on the clinic, what is the Minister of Health doing to ensure that those already seeking treatment within the system do not have further delays due to the decision to end these services?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We know it's extremely challenging to recruit for these positions, and I am being assured that the staff who are working with these patients will continue to do so and provide as many opportunities for them to receive the care in a timely fashion, particularly those that have already undertaken the treatments that they are a part of. Again, my heart goes out to anyone who's been impacted by this. I've worked to make sure that there will be a smooth transition for employees because that is also something that we want to ensure, that they continue to have opportunities to provide care and work and that the insured services that are available continue to be provided through Alberta Health Services.

Ms McPherson: Given that in February 2014 the Assisted Reproductive Technologies final report commissioned by the former government suggested that public funding for ARTs could see significant health care and societal cost savings over the long term and given that other provinces have a variety of options available, including unique funding models and tax credits, again to the Minister of Health: why is your government creating barriers for families struggling with infertility rather than supports?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, the member could not be further from the truth if she tried. We are absolutely moving forward to expand access to publicly funded services, we are making sure that we're supporting families, and we are standing up for and protecting public health care in this province, as opposed to what members of the opposition are proposing, which is 20 per cent cuts. Jason Kenney talks about a 20 per cent cut. We know what that would do to public health care, and we know what it would do to these families. Instead, we're supporting them, and the staff are continuing to provide important services under a public model where it's publicly available.

2:20 '60s Scoop in Alberta

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, talk about Team Angry. While many people focus on the hurt and trauma caused by the residential school system, another program known as the '60s scoop resulted in the forced removal of indigenous children from their parents, resulting in the breakdown of the family unit, a loss of indigenous culture and languages, and a lost generation of people. I've asked before, and I'll ask again: Premier, will you issue an official apology on behalf of the government of Alberta for the actions undertaken by that government in what is known as the '60s scoop?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. As the member is well aware, we've been working very carefully with the '60s scoop society on exactly what we promised, and that is a meaningful and sincere apology that incorporates people who had experienced this particular activity helping us to design an apology and a process leading to that apology that actually reflects a deep desire for change.

Thank you.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that many survivors of the '60s scoop have difficulty applying for government documents outlining their removal from their parents on-reserve, have lost their language, their culture, identity, family, and grew a sense of shame towards their race, heritage, and traditional ceremonies, will the Premier admit that the '60s scoop was a poorly implemented, discriminatory policy that should not have been supported by our province? When can we expect an actual apology?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you very much for the question. Our government indeed stands with survivors and their families, and we're working very closely with the members of the '60s scoop society in order to effect an effective apology. The apology is coming forward, but we have agreed that our work with the community would be based on a sincere attempt to understand the experience and to apologize appropriately. Therefore, we've been working on a time schedule that's been not only agreed to by the members of the society, but they've asked for extensions, and we are providing that to them.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the province of Manitoba has been the only jurisdiction to issue an apology for the '60s scoop and given that this past summer the federal government finally officially recognized the '60s scoop survivors, when will the Premier on behalf of the government of Alberta issue an apology for the government's role in wresting so many children away from their parents and loved ones in a botched policy? When?

Mr. Feehan: Mr. Speaker, I'm not quite sure what more I can say. We are working with the very people who are asking for the apology. We are working on their timeline. Perhaps the Official Opposition wants to just toss off an apology, considering that they were in government at the time, of all of these activities so that they can get it over with. We're not rushing it to cover up for your errors and your mistake. We are taking care of an appropriate apology by working carefully with the community involved. I wish you had done the same.

The Speaker: Point of order is noted.

Land-use Framework

Mr. Stier: Mr. Speaker, when the land-use framework that is based on regional planning was first approved as government policy in 2008, a timeline was set for the implementation where seven regional plans were to have been completed by 2012. Now, unfortunately, 10 years after approval, according to the government website only two out of seven regional plans have been completed, and one more is only partway completed. To the Minister of Environment and Parks: why is the Land Use Secretariat division taking so long to get these tasks accomplished, and when will they all be completed, please?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member is quite right that land-use planning does take time. It is a good tool when used appropriately, when resourced appropriately, and that's why we're taking the time to get it right. The member is quite right that, of course, we have the lower Athabasca regional plan in place, the South Saskatchewan regional plan, and we're moving forward with the North Saskatchewan. These things do take time, and they take resources. You know what wouldn't help with that? Several billion dollars' worth of cuts.

Mr. Stier: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that this delay in the regional plans is very problematic and given that the new Municipal Government Act bills that just recently passed now require all municipalities to do municipal development plans and intermunicipal collaboration frameworks and given that those MDPs and ICFs must be in agreement with the regional plans and given that only two out of seven regional plans have been completed, to the Minister of Municipal Affairs: how can municipalities possibly comply when there are no regional plans for their region?

The Speaker: The Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes, the member is quite correct. In places where there's a regional plan in place, the municipal planning is done in accordance with that. The fact of the matter is that we inherited a situation, in particular with the lower Athabasca regional plan, that had a number of problems with it. It was subject to judicial review, and why? Because the Conservatives did not take the concerns of indigenous peoples anything approaching seriously. We have approached this problem in a thoughtful and balanced way, and we're going to move forward with those communities to make sure that they are meaningfully consulted and involved in this process.

Mr. Stier: Mr. Speaker, given that the land-use framework required the entire regional system to be completed in a timely fashion based upon the process that was in place 10 years ago and given that this NDP government has dragged their feet on this very important system and since getting into power has made it even more complicated by injecting dozens of new changes to the Municipal Government Act, to the Minister of Environment and Parks once again: with all of these changes to the system by Municipal Affairs, what now will be the timeline for the completion of the regional plans?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we do have a review of the lower Athabasca regional plan under way right now. We have moved forward with a number of the different aspects of the South Saskatchewan regional plan, which were in fact unfinished business by the previous government, and we're moving forward with the North Saskatchewan regional plan as well. These things do take time. They take even more time if you're going to eviscerate the public service and cut to the bone the operations and the monitoring and the various aspects of the Environment and Parks budget, which is, of course, what the conservatives have put forward as something approaching thoughtful public policy.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Municipal Governance and Finance

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's been quite a busy summer this year outside of the Legislature with both MLAs and ministers spending a lot more time in communities across the province, particularly the Minister of Municipal Affairs, who I understand logged over 10,000 kilometres visiting municipalities, including a few in my constituency. To the Minister of Municipal Affairs: what concerns did you hear this summer about the implementation of the new MGA?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member. Over the summer I did have the opportunity to travel quite a bit to 37 different communities across Alberta, from Bow Island to Hinton to Oyen to High Level. I saw it all, and I heard a lot, too. An overwhelming theme that continuously arose was the intermunicipal collaboration frameworks. There are many examples across the province of collaboration, very good examples, but we don't want to leave it solely to ad hoc programs across the province and local initiatives. We want to have mandatory frameworks in place so that neighbouring municipalities work together and make sure that the dollars that they use, the taxpayer dollars, are . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
First supplemental.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you. Given that municipal officials in Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville expressed great appreciation for the government's crucial investments in critical infrastructure such as the highway 15 bridge twinning and given that previous governments created and ignored these deficits and ignored needs in rural Alberta and now have proposed cuts to both infrastructure and services, what assurance can you give to rural Alberta when it comes to prioritizing crucial infrastructure builds?

Mr. S. Anderson: Good question. Thank you. Our government is working collaboratively with our municipal partners along with our federal counterparts to leverage our capital dollars towards economic growth. We got a preview of the type of pain advertised by the opposition when the former Premier of Saskatchewan made the same cuts as these folks are proposing. Rural Saskatchewan fielded the brunt of the vast majority of these cuts, slashing their funds to transportation, libraries, and classrooms. It's imperative that we maintain these critical economic corridors that create good-paying jobs and grow local economies. We need to build up Alberta, not cut it down. [interjection]

The Speaker: Hon. member.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the opposition continues to tear down the importance of regional co-operation and our municipal stakeholders' efforts and successes, what did you hear this summer from communities about the MGA frameworks and how it helps municipalities work together and plan for growth?

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Member, for the question. Despite the rhetoric coming from the opposition, municipalities, like Albertans, understand that a dollar goes a lot further through partnership. Albertans don't live their lives according to boundary lines on a map, and residents in different communities can often utilize the same services and the same infrastructure. Instead of duplicating these services that are very costly, municipalities need to work together to deliver more effective and efficient services to their communities. That is why we have implemented these mandatory ICFs to ensure that Albertans are getting the best services and the best value for every tax dollar.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Greenway.

2:30 Calgary LRT Green Line Funding

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To many people's surprise, the Member for Calgary-Northern Hills is telling his constituents that funding for the green line is, quote, being made available through the carbon tax, unquote. Why is that a surprise? Because the provincial funding was set aside long before this member was even in Calgary and the NDP was in government. To the Minister of Infrastructure: how do you plan to correct the information your caucus members are providing to Calgarians?

Ms Jansen: Well, I thank the member for the question. Ah, the green line, the plan the opposition loves to hate. [interjections] Jason Kenney doesn't want a green line. Jason Kenney doesn't want . . . [interjections] You know, Mr. Speaker, I know they don't want to hear from me, but to heckle through my entire answer is really exactly what I expect from them over there.

The Speaker: At least you guys are laughing. That's a good sign.
First supplemental.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the NDP members of the Legislature are providing the Calgary constituents with very misleading information and given that this project is such an important one that it is important to provide Albertans with the specific facts, to the Minister of Infrastructure: can you please tell Albertans the exact breakdown of funding for the ever-shrinking green line?

Ms Jansen: Mr. Speaker, Jason Kenney was happy to do a photo op when he wanted to get his picture in the paper, and that is when there was a theoretical plan. With an actual plan in place – the city of Calgary made that plan with residents of Calgary. This is the plan Calgarians want, the plan Calgarians are going to get, and it's because we respect the people of Calgary. Jason Kenney would make sure there would be no green line. That's a fact.

Mr. Gill: Given that out of the total $4.6 billion of funding for the green line one-third is coming from each of the three levels of government and given that the original plan for the line was 46 kilometres and $5.3 billion in funding and that now it's only 26 kilometres for the same price tag, to the Minister of Infrastructure again: if the original project was 46 kilometres without the carbon tax money, then why did it shrink to almost half with the carbon tax money? Can you please explain this math to Calgarians?

Ms Jansen: Mr. Speaker, Jason Kenney was interested in a theoretical plan. What the city of Calgary and Calgarians, through consultation, came up with was an actual plan. So if the member is interested in that, he might want to heed the words of our mayor, who said that it's a bit funny that members of the government who started this project without any studies are now criticizing the final plan, which was a result of consultation and studies. I know you don't like to hear it, but then you don't want to see a green line, and the rest of Calgary does.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Fentanyl Use Prevention and Treatment

Mr. Ellis: Great. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today is a great day in the fight against fentanyl and other illicit opioids. Last week Calgary police laid charges under legislation I introduced which banned possession of pill press machines. This is the first time that anyone has been charged under this legislation. I am proud to know that two pill presses and more than 1,000 fentanyl pills are now off the street. To the Minister of Justice: what tools has your department introduced to help law enforcement keep these deadly drugs off the streets?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Of course, as our policing partners have said and as we have said repeatedly, this is certainly a process that requires the involvement of police but also the recognition that people need to be able to seek treatment. I'm sure that my hon. colleagues from Health can speak to that as well. One of the most important things we did was that we stepped in and funded ALERT after Jason Kenney cut it.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that while my bill addresses one aspect of prevention, much more must be done in terms of intervention and, especially, education to save lives and to start to get a handle on what has certainly become a public health emergency here in Alberta, to the Associate Minister of Health: what are you doing specifically to educate Albertans on the extreme dangers of fentanyl?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. We know that in the past there has definitely been a war-on-drugs mentality and that it hasn't worked. Instead of shaming Albertans, we're proud to work with them in a dignified way to ensure that they see their worth and that we're supporting them on the way. That's why we've distributed over 31,000 naloxone kits, we've brought thousands of new treatment spaces online, and we've brought supervised consumption services to Edmonton, Calgary, and Lethbridge. That's only the beginning.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that to date, as the minister mentioned, the NDP has chosen to focus the vast majority of resources allotted to address the opioid crisis on harm reduction strategies for addicts and given that naloxone kits and safe injection sites are not long-term solutions, to the same minister: when will you expand your scope to include more focus on addictions treatment, where long waits at facilities across the province are preventing so many Albertans from getting the help that they need?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We believe in the principle of harm reduction. We know that past governments have definitely wanted to deny Albertans these rights and these dignities. We think that people who use substances are still people and that they deserve to be protected.

I want to specifically thank the MLA for Calgary-McCall for his advocacy. The commission recommended supporting the Punjabi community health services addiction program expansion. We've accepted this recommendation, and we're working with the community to ensure that their needs are met.

Smart Agrifood Supercluster Application

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the world is moving at an unprecedented pace of growth and innovation. The creation of superclusters fosters collaboration and partnership, with the goal of advancing Canada's role in the world as an innovation leader. Recently Olds College was selected as one of nine potential sites for investment in a supercluster and asked to submit a full application for its smart ag supercluster. The federal government is making $950 million available for superclusters. To the minister: what kind of resources have you directed to Olds College in support of this application?

The Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to member for the very important question. Without a doubt, agriculture is a fundamental part of Alberta's economy. It includes food processing, food service, and beverage industries. We're so pleased to support the smart agrifood supercluster application to the federal government's supercluster initiative. This supercluster initiative includes 50 firms representing industry, academia, growers, and government and includes the new CEO of Alberta Innovates, who's part of the steering committee. We're going to do whatever we can to support the federal government after they announce the short list to get this project where it deserves.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, given the critical role of the ag sector and how it plays in our economy and given the opportunity for this supercluster to potentially make Alberta a world leader in smart agriculture and provide jobs for our province at a time when hundreds of thousands of Albertans are out of work and given that the government of Saskatchewan has already vocally supported their support for a supercluster in Saskatoon, will the minister of agriculture unreservedly offer his support, time, and attention to this very important project?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member. The smart agrifood supercluster is one of nine supercluster proposals across the country. If this particular proposal is shortlisted as one of those nine, that's great news. We'll continue to fully support the funding. The whole pocket of funding is $950 million from the federal government. I, for one, and this government are always fond of taking money from the federal government to support very good initiatives such as this one, and without a doubt I will support this with all my worth.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, given that the goal of the smart ag supercluster is to harness science and technology to enhance environmental and economic sustainability and since the technologies that will be developed will assist the ag sector to continue to lead in the environment, will the minister of environment now commit fully to support this application and work closely with her counterparts to ensure that Olds College is successful in its application?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. I have met with Olds College and with this particular group a couple of times. Certainly, we continue to support their application. I will point out that one of the reasons why

Alberta was shortlisted and this particular initiative was shortlisted is because we are showing leadership on issues related to climate change, climate adaptation, and that the environment and the economy go hand in hand. That's what strengthens this province. It certainly, as the Conservatives would have it, doesn't take that away.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Northern Hills.

2:40 Calgary Regional Partnership Transition

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Calgary Regional Partnership, or the CRP, was formed 13 years ago. It is a collaborative network of 11 municipalities in the Calgary region that work together and ensure that growth occurs in a sustainable manner. At the moment regulations for the new growth board are being drafted, and eventually the new board may replace many of the services currently provided by the CRP. To the Minister of Municipal Affairs: what will happen to the CRP and the geographic information system or broadband initiatives after the funding extension expires on March 31, 2018?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The CRP was a voluntary partnership of municipalities in the Calgary region, that's done really good work. There is now a transition towards a new growth management board – that's for sure – and this mandatory growth management board will be the new regional growth entity in the Calgary region. We are going to support that board going forward, of course, and decisions that they make, and we want to make sure that the initiatives that they've begun are supported as well. In short, it is up to the board itself to make the decisions on what they will do going forward, and I will support those decisions.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On-It transit is another service that was founded and funded by the CRP through their core grant. Given that phase 1 of a two-year commuter pilot currently provides an alternative transportation choice for the residents of Turner Valley, Black Diamond, Okotoks, and High River to the city of Calgary and given that their summer pilot project from Calgary to Cochrane, Canmore, and Banff carried approximately 12,000 passengers from July 17 to September 4, are there currently plans to extend the On-It transit pilot project when the CRP funding ends on October 10, 2018?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, as I said, these decisions will be up to the growth management board, and our ministry will be there to support this. I know that this member is very keen on transit, and I recognize that the On-It transit project has had success and local support. I trust that the board's membership will make the positive decision that will help the region going forward, and we will be there to support them in that.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Finally, Mr. Speaker, given that on September 8 the Member for Calgary-Currie on behalf of the Minister of Transportation announced more than $1.3 million for new transit projects in three Alberta communities, including building a new park-and-ride facility in Turner Valley, what will the purpose of this new transit infrastructure fund investment be if the On-It transit system discontinues service next October?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We do know that regional transit is important not only to the member but to the Minister of Transportation. The On-It program has worked very well. Again, it will be up to the growth management board in the area to make those decisions. We do respect local autonomy and local leaders. I've been working quite closely with a lot of them of late and especially now that we have new municipal leaders out there. I'm getting ready to meet with a lot of them in the upcoming conventions. I'm hoping to hear some really positive things from them. I will be there to support them going forward.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds we'll proceed with Members' Statements.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: Hon. members: if you would, conversations outside.
The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-St. Albert.

Grain Elevators

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to talk about a piece of our history that is quickly vanishing. At one time grain elevators dotted the province. At their height there were over 1,700 wooden grain elevators across Alberta. In 2012 it was estimated that only 130 remained on a railroad right-of-way. Three of those elevators remain in my community, and like many across the prairies, they are preserved by local community organizations.

These structures once served as the centre of their communities. Aside from selling grain, local farmers often met there to enjoy the coffee the elevator agent always had on. Today's visitors tell stories of their past visits, many having accompanied a family member after the harvest, others helping the agent run the elevator. Everyone has a memory of seeing these tall structures dotting the prairies. My favourite story tells of how World War II pilots, having difficulty landmarking over the prairies, would follow the tracks until they could read the name on an elevator and then locate themselves on the map.

Many communities are losing their elevators. Maintenance costs are a continual concern. St. Albert's most recent restoration of the community's twin elevators included extensive foundation work and cost nearly $1.6 million.

I'm proud to be part of a government that is moving Alberta forward and making life better for all Albertans. As we move forward, I ask all members of this House to look around as they travel the province, and when they see a grain elevator, to give it a moment's respect. Many communities would not be here today without them.

Thank you.

AAMDC and AUMA Fall Conventions

Mr. Stier: Mr. Speaker, next week elected officials and administrators from 69 rural municipalities will descend on Edmonton for the Alberta Association of Municipal Districts and Counties fall convention. The following week mayors, councillors, and municipal administrators from over 250 urban municipalities will attend their annual convention in Calgary.

So why is this important and noteworthy? Any Albertan who has travelled our province has municipal governments to thank for managing 75 per cent of Alberta's roads and 60 per cent of our bridges. If you've visited a library lately or taken your children to swimming lessons or hockey practice, those facilities are thanks to your municipal government. Our municipalities guarantee that Albertans have clean drinking water, emergency services, and amenities like parks, local museums, and community halls.

As the level of government that Albertans are most likely to interact with regularly, municipalities are often the first to identify emerging issues. For example, the cities of St. Albert and Spruce Grove have submitted a resolution that calls attention to the difficulties municipal governments have when dealing with disaster response. Another AUMA resolution requests that the provincial government allow nonprofit housing organizations the ability to borrow directly from the Alberta Capital Finance Authority. The AAMD and C have proposed resolutions on such topics as centralized assessment, Alberta's land-use framework, and the code of practice for asphalt paving plants. Lastly, this year's municipal conventions are the first following last month's municipal elections, and it looks like there will be many new faces in attendance.

As a former municipal councillor I strongly encourage all members of the Legislature, especially government members, to attend both of these important municipal conventions as this is a key link to hearing from the grassroots of Alberta through their local elected officials on all matters pertaining to programs and services utilized by Albertans.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

Edmonton-Meadowlark Constituency Update

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Over the summer I had the opportunity to connect with hundreds of constituents in my community to hear directly from them about their priorities. Through the many conversations I had on porches and at kitchen tables, I heard over and over again that Albertans do not want massive cuts to the provincial budget. They want a government that works to diversify the economy while protecting publicly delivered services. They want a government that is ready to build the province up, not tear it down.

Mr. Speaker, the residents of Edmonton-Meadowlark have been waiting decades for investments in new schools and badly needed upgrades to the Misericordia, and under this government those investments are being made. West Edmonton continues to grow year over year, and our community needs a government that takes our public services and transportation needs seriously.

I'm proud to be part of a government that knows its priorities and knows the value of our public sector. They are not simply numbers to be cut, Mr. Speaker; these are real people. They are the first responders on the scene of a crime or collision, they are the doctors performing complex surgeries, they are the teachers creating the next generation of leaders, and they are the nurses who take care of our sick children.

Our government has renegotiated physician salaries, amalgamated agencies, boards, and commissions, and found other practical cost savings. These are the kinds of careful savings decisions that will actually help Albertans. I'm hearing every day about how optimistic Albertans in my community are about the future and how absolutely essential the infrastructure coming in under this government is to our neighbourhoods. The decision to invest in our province for the benefit of all Albertans at a time when costs are low, jobs are needed, and population growth is increasing demand is not ideological, Mr. Speaker; it's simply common sense. Albertans know what our plan is, and they know it is working.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Philippa Madill's Fundraising for Scoliosis

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There's an old saying: when life gives you lemons, you make lemonade. Today I want to bring to your attention a young constituent and philanthropist, Miss Philippa Madill. Life can be hard. All sorts of lemons can come into our lives, but it is how we face these challenges that will often determine whether we fail or whether we succeed and make lemonade out of life's hard choices.

Philippa was diagnosed with scoliosis, a deformity of the spine, at a young age, and she received regular treatment at the Stollery children's hospital. Philippa did not allow this setback to pull her down. Rather than focusing on herself, she is focused on volunteering in the community of Drayton Valley and in raising money for the Stollery children's hospital.

Starting at the age of five, Philippa began a lemonade stand, and over the past 10 years all of the proceeds have gone towards the Stollery children's hospital. For the past two years she has set up outside of the Drayton Valley triathlon and the Drayton Valley 100 bike race, helping to re-energize the athletes, spectators, and, in turn, benefit the programs at the Stollery. She has been appointed as an ambassador of the Stollery and was recognized as the Stollery superstar of the year at the first annual Stollery superstars party.

Philippa has raised funds for the hospice home that took care of her grandfather, and every year she hosts a Christmas party where friends bring presents and food hampers to the local Alberta child and family services organization. This 15-year-old philanthropist is also a volunteer extraordinaire. In her short life she has volunteered for a myriad of local groups like Cause for Critters and the River Valley Players Zombie Run, just to name a few.

It is important in life to recognize when the human spirit overcomes the challenges in life and gives back to the community that they live in. I am very pleased to bring to the attention of Albertans this wonderful young constituent and proud Albertan, Miss Philippa Madill.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

Abortion Rights

Drever: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On April 29, 1970, a travelling caravan passed through Calgary, a caravan of women on their journey to Ottawa to protest the deadly antichoice laws stopping women from accessing safe, legal abortions. A photo in the Calgary Herald from that day shows these women standing strong, shoulder to shoulder, in front of them a coffin that represented the 2,000 women who died every year from illegal abortions.

Eighteen years and 36,000 deaths later the Morgentaler decision came down in 1988. The Supreme Court of Canada overturned our country's criminal abortion law and gave women the right to abortion on request without restrictions.

Mr. Speaker, I have never lived without the right to choose, but generations of women before me have, generations of women who were denied the rights guaranteed to all Canadians under section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the right to individual autonomy and the right to liberty.

The struggle for access is not over. There are still many who work actively to strip away women's rights. Even in this province, Mr. Speaker, there are politicians who began their career as antiabortion activists, and their followers are celebrating what they believe is the beginning of the reduction of choice for women in Alberta.

Right now at the only two abortion clinics in this province staff and clients run a gauntlet of hostile protesters every day. They face assaults and abuse. Clients face trauma and harassment as they try to access their legal rights. Mr. Speaker, it's even more of a barrier for women who live in rural and remote communities.

When we combine easier access to reproductive choices along with strong, evidence-based sexual health education, we create generational change. We will not go back, Mr. Speaker. We will not accept a lesser voice in decisions about our bodies. This government will not let down the future generations of women who need us to fight for their rights, because women's rights are human rights.

Thank you.

Wildfire Control and Compensation

Mr. Schneider: This fall southern Alberta experienced a number of large-scale fires that caused the loss of property, livestock, and the tragic loss of a volunteer fireman. In the case of the Bindloss-Suffield fire, the cause was said to be a controlled ordnance explosion on the base. This fire damaged numerous ranches and killed several hundred head of cattle. It's now been reported that the Department of National Defence has accepted responsibility for the fire. Unfortunately, it is still unknown when the federal government will work out any compensation arrangements with those who were deeply affected by this avoidable tragedy. As we saw with the bovine TB fiasco last year, information from both levels of government is slow to come.

Once more it's Alberta's farmers and ranchers that are left with more questions than answers. Mr. Speaker, given that media reported that during the Bindloss fire the local fire departments could not go into the base and base fire departments expressed that they wouldn't fight the fire off the base, we hope that the minister in charge will ensure that some form of cross-training and reciprocal agreements get into place between these local and federal agencies so that should a situation ever arise again, there will be better co-ordination of effort.

The facts tend to indicate that this government seems ill equipped to deal with time-sensitive matters. We saw it after the Fort Mac fires. We saw it during the bovine TB crisis and the unharvested crops confusion. It could be that after the clumsy handling of the Bill 6 rollout, they seem incapable of dealing with rural Alberta competently. I say this as it was evident that the Premier spoke too quickly on the fires recently in the Waterton and Vulcan areas. When pressed about the effects on area residents, she was quick to claim that the NDP have Albertans' backs. When asked about compensation, she was also quick to promise but is again slow on details. Residents are already calling the local constituency offices looking for answers. This government's history indicates that if not pressured by the opposition, any forthcoming details will be coming very slowly once again.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to stand and ask for unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 7(7) to continue the Routine.

[Unanimous consent denied]

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on behalf of the Minister of Labour to table Bill 25, the Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017, for first reading. [interjections]

The Speaker: He still can go. It's not 3 o'clock.

Mr. Carlier: As the government we are committed to ensuring that our professional regulatory organizations continue to serve and protect the well-being, safety, and public interests of all Albertans. The proposed amendments will merge the College of Alberta Professional Foresters and the College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists to create a single regulatory entity. That entity is the Association of Alberta Forest Management Professionals.

Both organizations have asked for these changes, and their members voted in favour, more than 90 per cent, to ask the government to amend the act. This will mean that there are increased administrative efficiencies and expedited disciplinary processes that will save the organization a lot of time and money. By consolidating these organizations into one governing body, we are ensuring that there will be a strong and unified voice for our forestry professionals, who do amazing work in our province.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 25 read a first time]

The Speaker: I don't believe there are any points of order.

Statement by the Speaker

Rotation of Questions and Members' Statements

The Speaker: Hon. members, before we proceed to the next item of business, I'd like to make some additional remarks on the rotation of oral questions and members' statements. As you'll recall, in my comments on Thursday respecting the rotations, I encouraged the House leaders to come to an agreement on new rotations to reflect the changes to the composition of the Assembly. At 1:03 p.m. today my office received a House leaders' agreement; however, I have not had the chance to review it in any detail. Therefore, for the time being, I've prepared both an Oral Question Period and a Members' Statements rotation for the Assembly which reflects the current composition of the Assembly, and it is fair to all.

Before I delve into the details, I would like to note that I take seriously the first principle of parliamentary law, which is articulated in paragraph 1 of Beauchesne's sixth edition. It is the Speaker's role to protect the minority against the majority. I made several remarks to this effect in June 2015, at the beginning of this Legislature, in light of the House leaders' agreement on the Oral Question Period and Members' Statements rotations.

Additionally, I wish to implement these new rotations starting tomorrow, Tuesday, November 7, on what will be day 1 of the Oral Question Period rotation. As mentioned earlier, the House leaders, in consultation with the other members, provided another agreement. I'm prepared to consider it. Nonetheless, members will be provided copies of this rotation along with the revised projected sitting days calendar, which outlines the Members' Statements rotation.

For those members who may be wondering why it is the Speaker who ultimately determines the rotation of questions, I wish to quote from Speaker Kowalski's ruling from February 8, 2010. Facing a similar situation, Speaker Kowalski explained:

By convention, history, and practice the rotation of questions is not found in the standing orders, nor should it be. This absence is due in part to a recognition that is the Speaker's responsibility to recognize members to participate in debate and the question period. The chair is fully aware that it is the members themselves who make the rules through the standing orders, and this chair has given effect to House leaders' agreements, but it is ultimately up to the chair to recognize members during question period.

His remarks may be found on page 17 of Hansard for that day.

Additionally, Mr. Kowalski on April 11, 2001, said that the practice of caucuses submitting lists to the Speaker's office . . . of those members wishing to ask questions that day will continue. In accordance with traditions of the Assembly, the Speaker will ultimately retain discretion when it comes to recognizing members during question period.

As to that reference please see page 11 of Alberta Hansard for that day.

Before I outline the details of the Oral Question Period rotation, I'd like to alert the Assembly as to the key considerations I examined in arriving at the rotation. The context for this allocation: the current composition of the Assembly is of great importance. First of all, currently the Assembly has the largest Official Opposition since 1993. There are 32 private members from the government caucus, 26 from the Official Opposition, two from the Alberta caucus, and one each from four single-member or independent caucuses, for a total of 64 private members. It is with this context in mind that the Oral Question Period rotation was devised.

Starting with the Alberta Party caucus, I have determined the allocation for this caucus by considering the overall standings of private members in the Assembly. The Alberta Party caucus, which has two members and will be the third-party opposition, is entitled to receive 10 questions per two-week period. The Alberta Party comprises approximately 6 per cent of private members but will be entitled to approximately 10 per cent of opposition questions.

With respect to the single-member caucuses and independent members in this grouping, each member is allocated one question per week, which reflects each group's standing in terms of seats in the Assembly. I would also add that one question per week for this grouping aligns with the well-established practice of the Assembly prior to the 29th Legislature. For instance, starting in February 2011, the then Member for Calgary-Currie, the sole member of the Alberta caucus at the time, received one question per week. In 2004 the Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner, the lone representative in the Assembly for the Alberta Alliance, similarly received one question per week starting in March 2005. This also occurred in October 2009 with the same member when he was the Member for Calgary-Glenmore, at that time the sole member of the Wildrose Alliance caucus.

There are many additional examples of instances in which independent members received one question per week. To name but a few, in March 2014 the members for Calgary-Varsity, Calgary-Foothills, and Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo each received the sixth question once per week.

The specifics of the rotation are as follows. With respect to the details of the Oral Question Period rotation to be implemented starting Tuesday, this rotation is based on an eight-day, 16 questions per day format. The Official Opposition is entitled to the first three questions each day. Additionally, the Official Opposition receives questions 7 through 9 and questions 13, 14, and 16 each day. The Official Opposition receives question 10 on days 1, 3, 5, and 7 as well as question 11 on days 2, 3, 4, 6, and 8. Lastly, the Official Opposition is entitled to question 12 on day 2 and days 4 through 8. This amounts to a total of 87 questions over the eight-day rotation.

The Alberta Party caucus, the third-party opposition, receives question 4 on each day of the eight-day rotation. The Alberta Party caucus is also entitled to question 11 on days 1 and 5, for a total, as noted, of 10 questions over the eight-day rotation.

The Liberal member, Progressive Conservative member, and independent members will each receive one question each four-day period as follows: the Member for Calgary-Mountain View on days 1 and 5, Vermilion-Lloydminster on days 2 and 6, the Member for Strathmore-Brooks on days 3 and 7, the Member for Calgary-South East on days 4 and 8.

Private members of the government caucus are entitled to questions 5 and 15 on each day of the rotation. They also receive question 10 on days 2, 4, 6, and 8 as well as question 11 on day 7 and question 12 on days 1 and 3. As a result, the government caucus receives a total of 23 questions over the eight-day period.

Now I turn to the question of how the questions have been reallocated as compared to the rotation that has been in force since the fall sitting commenced. The increase in the number of questions for the Alberta Party caucus to 10 for the eight-day rotation has resulted in a decrease in three questions to the Official Opposition, one question for the NDP caucus, and one fewer for the Member for Calgary-Mountain View. The reallocation is justified based on the aforementioned allocation of one question per week to single-member caucuses, on the fact that the size of the Official Opposition has been reduced by one member with the departure of the Member for Calgary-Lougheed, and, lastly, because of the reduction in the number of private members in the government caucus by one with the appointment of the Member for Calgary-North West as the Minister of Infrastructure.

I would like to remind members that questions and responses should be succinct, being up to 35 seconds in length, and that preambles to supplementary questions are only allowed for the first four sets of questions each day.

With respect to the Members' Statements rotation the House leaders' agreement for October provided for a three-week allocation. As Standing Order 7(4) sets out, up to six private members may make statements of up to two minutes in length each day. Private members of the government caucus are entitled to three statements each sitting day. The Official Opposition receives three statements every Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday except on week 3, when this caucus receives two statements. They also receive one statement on Thursday. The third-party opposition will receive one statement each week on Thursday.

This allotment accords with past practices whereby a two-member caucus received one member's statement per week. In March 2010 the ND opposition, which was a two-member caucus, received one member's statement each week. The same allocation was applied with respect to the two-member caucus in April 2008.

In this current arrangement the Official Opposition will be entitled to one fewer statement per three-week cycle. The one-member caucuses and independents each receive one statement each three-week period. Please consult the projected sitting dates calendar for further details.

As noted, let me say again that I will review the House leaders' agreement and make further comments at a later date. If there are additional suggestions, I'm prepared to discuss those with the House leaders and others who are impacted by this decision.

Q17. Mr. Ellis:

How many charges have been laid under section 4 of the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act since this section came into force?

Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 206 Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. I'd first like to start out just by reiterating what the bill is about because it's been a little while since we were talking about it. This allows for the publication of advertisements by licensed adoption agencies publicizing the profiles of prospective adoptive parents that meet the requirements prescribed in regulation.

I'd like to start off by first of all thanking all of my colleagues in the Legislature for really wonderful discussions over this, amendments that have been made, and changes. I'm very, very grateful for the collaborative work that's been done on this very important piece of legislation to bring us up to date with the rest of Canada with respect to adoption. Thank you so much. I'm very, very grateful for the opportunity to stand and speak to this. I do have an amendment, but I'll bring that forward in just a little bit.

As most of you know, with respect to adoption in this province folks have not been able to use updates or technology or any other aspects to be able to provide profiles online to expectant parents. One of the interesting things that we find going forward in this process is that, as you can imagine, for anybody who is in the process of adoption, it's very, very stressful for both the adoptive parents and the expectant parents. To be able to have this process put online, to be able to stay at home and look through options that are available to you without having to go into a space where you may feel uncomfortable – given any particular situation there are a myriad of situations that you will be dealing with at any given time – to be able to have the ability to be at home, Madam Chair, and to look through the profiles and have the opportunity to spend some really good time, especially for an expectant parent that is looking into the adoption process, is I think a very, very respectful mechanism to have available to them. There's just so much information that we can put online.

Of course, one of the main things and some of the concerns that have been brought up by my colleagues in this Legislature is making sure that the regulations are there to protect people but also to make sure that that information is available. So far Ontario and Yukon and B.C. have already put their legislation into this century and, as a result, have seen increases in adoptions, which, of course, is what we want to see in these particular situations.

How we communicate has changed. I know I was dragged into technology kicking and screaming. I was probably the last person in my age group to get a cellphone, let alone learn how to text. It was really forced upon me. It was never – I've always been one of those people who loved having phone conversations. But, as we all know, once we get used to the technology and understand how it works, it really does actually help you out with your ability to communicate in a very, very small sense. I used to run a music studio, and for the students that I had in my studio, I could send them e-mails, I could phone them, leave messages with their parents, but they only ever answered their texts. Like, that was it. That was the only opportunity that I ever had to speak with these kids and with their parents, actually, quite often in order to communicate with them about issues much less serious and much less stressful than what we're talking about here.

But in that discussion it inherently describes exactly what we're trying to talk about here, which is access to information for families that are wanting to expand their families and for those expectant parents that are looking to put their child up for adoption and potentially provide a magnificent gift to a family wanting to have a child.

The instant communication is part of it, but we want prospective parents to be able to create profiles for the expectant parent so that the process becomes a much more collaborative process. It's something that is healthy. It reduces stigma, which is hugely important in this particular situation because the ability to communicate at that level changes the entire dialogue and the discussion around this. Again, I can't state how important it is under these situations, I believe, to be able to pursue this in the quiet of your own home, without the eyes of other people looking at you. God only knows how it must feel for some people going into that situation. But I can honestly say that I think that if the research gets done first at home and then continues in the process with the agencies, we all go into this with a much healthier understanding of what it is that we're trying to accomplish.

I would like to also mention that one of the things that was really, really important when we were doing our stakeholder outreach on this, especially to expectant parents, was being able to actually look at the details of prospective parents. I think that having that input and understanding of where the child will go, having a say, being able to look at that not just on a piece of paper in a book somewhere, where you have to sit down and look through it, but actually being able to sit and ponder over what is going to happen to the child in question is very, very important. Again, it just speaks very, very well to the process and how much healthier the process could be.

On the positive side is the fact that adoptions will be a lot easier for parents here in Alberta. As we all know, too, from our outreach, a lot of parents were reaching outside of Alberta to look for adoptions because these options are available in other provinces.

I also want to thank my colleague from Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills for collaborating with me on this bill. As you know, he has some very personal background in adoption. I have to say that after hearing his story and many, many other people's stories, some of the members from the other side as well, the stories of adoption and the families that are created as a result of this are just miraculous, and when you see that family grow and you can participate in that with us in this Legislature – we'll be able to help with that.

Again, I want to thank again all my colleagues in the Legislature for their feedback on this. It's been greatly appreciated, and I really believe that the legislation will be strong, and I think it'll do very well for our families here in Alberta.

The other thing I wanted to mention was that the parties that are involved with regard to adoptions have also spoken very clearly about the need to change the restrictions. Again, we're going to want to be very careful with making sure that families are protected, that their children are protected, but as we know, there are inherent contradictions in that some children are profiled, and it's interesting that that hasn't been able to be transferred to parents. So, again, this is just about updating the legislation. We will end up helping families to connect, and that is so important. The guidelines around being eligible for adoption need to be very, very strong, and that process will happen as families work with adoption agencies, moving this process forward, especially before putting a profile onto the Internet. Again, this is something that will be worked out in the regulations. I would imagine that there are other jurisdictions, like I've mentioned before, that have had very, very huge success with the ability to put profiles online.

One of the things that had been brought to my attention was that we had received some feedback where we hadn't been completely clear, from just reading the text of the bill, as to the intention, so I would like to move an amendment at this point if I can.

The Chair: This will be known as amendment A1.

Go ahead, hon. member.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Chair. I would like to move that Bill 206, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017, be amended by adding the following preamble before the enacting clause:

Preamble

Whereas the Government of Alberta is committed to improving access to adoption;

Whereas the current legislation contains barriers that prevent prospective adoptive parents from publicizing their profiles for the attention of parents who are considering adoption in Alberta; and

Whereas removal of this barrier will enhance information regarding the options available to parents considering adoption that will assist and support them in making a decision appropriate for their individual circumstances.

The preamble, I'm hoping, will help to clarify the very, very simple aspect of what this bill is actually asking to do. Just to reiterate along with the preamble, the bill is very simply to be able to approve . . .

The Chair: Hon. member, I apologize. You only get to speak for 10 minutes, and then somebody else gets a chance to speak, and then you'll have to – so I guess we've just run out of time to explain the amendment.

Mrs. Aheer: Oh, sorry. Thank you so much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: No problem.

The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Yes. I was so interested in the comments from the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View that perhaps she might just be able to conclude some final thoughts there.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills. I promise I'll be quick. As a result of the feedback, this is why this preamble was brought forward. Again, just to reiterate, the bill is to allow prospective adoptive parents to be approved to advertise their profiles online on legitimate websites like, for example, Canada Adopts, which has been shown to show great success.

As I had mentioned earlier, right now Alberta's legislation prohibits this. In other provinces, like B.C., prospective adoptive parents are allowed to post their profiles on Canada Adopts. We would like to change that right here in Alberta and make sure that we bring our legislation in line with this century and certainly be able to make sure that these folks have the ability to be able to seek each other out and make those connections.

The amendment adds the preamble and, hopefully, will reiterate the spirit of the bill. I would ask that the members recognize that the bill is clear that advertising is only to be legal if it's in accordance with strict regulations. The bill is to enable regulations to be created that bring us in line with other provinces.

I would like to again thank all of you and everyone in this Legislature for considering this bill and for the excellent debate and work that's been done to bring this legislation forward.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Madam Chair. It gives me great pleasure to rise today to speak to Bill 206, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017, as proposed by my good friend the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

This bill is truly a compassionate one as it assists adoptive parents, soon-to-be parents who want to ensure that their child is loved and nurtured their whole life. Of course, the bill is compassionate to the children who are needing a home.

There is no question that our adoption system will be better off from the changes Bill 206 introduces. I think our province has fallen behind the other provinces on this front, and I know it wasn't intentional, just an oversight. Thankfully, we have a member in this Assembly who paid attention to the individuals and then moved to action to help them. I think this is why Bill 206 is before us in this House.

While it might not be immediately apparent how it is going to affect our lives, let's be clear. I think it will impact our lives. I would like all my colleagues here today to think about the adoptive families that they know, and they undoubtedly know some families.

Before Bill 206, a motion introduced by the Member for Calgary-East which received unanimous support of the House wanted to know about the restrictions adoptive parents face in seeking to find a child whom they could make their own. Once looked at, the restrictions on posting their profiles are an unnecessary hurdle. It's been a long time, 30 years, since these restrictions have been reviewed and updated. We have seen a lot of changes ever since. We communicate far differently than before, as the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View was saying in her speech, so I think it's about time that we update some of the changes in this department.

Bill 206 will make the common-sense change allowing prospective parents to publicize their interest in adopting a child, which will let pregnant women and expectant parents who are considering adoption find them. What a well-intended change that is, I think. It'll do good for all the families who will be involved in this. Now, let's think for a moment. The bill will change the lives of two sets of parents and a child in a way that we'll never know. I think it's an honour for all of us to play a role in this humane process.

When the bill passes, it won't mean a free-for-all on advertising for prospective parents. The government will create regulations that will provide the controls necessary to ensure that advertising, prospective parents' postings abide by the necessary parameters. The big difference is that they'll be able to broaden their reach in their effort to adopt a child and complete their families. In a province that has seen a steadily dropping adoption rate, this kind of move to facilitate more adoptions is critical, in my opinion. Now, if we look to B.C., which has modernized its adoption processes and allows prospective parents to publicize their interest in adopting, we can gain great hope that we will see a positive upwards shift in Alberta.

I hope that all members of this Assembly support this bill. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise today to speak to the amendment to Bill 206. This is a very worthy bill, worthy of everyone's support in this House. I believe that this amendment will provide some clarity to this bill as we move forward in our debate. I think that clarity is always a good thing. We need to understand: what is the intention of this bill? This amendment provides that kind of clarity.

It starts by pointing out that we need to improve access to adoption: "Whereas the Government of Alberta is committed to improving access to adoption." I believe that is something that all of us can support, and this amendment brings that clearly to the forefront for all of us in the Legislature, that this is the goal of this bill.

We see: "Whereas the current legislation contains barriers that prevent prospective adoptive parents from publicizing their profiles." Again, it brings clarity, Madam Chair, to the idea and to the understanding of this Legislature that there are some barriers that are stopping prospective parents from finding the children that will bring, in many cases, meaning to their lives and to both of them. The second point, about current legislation blocking prospective parents, I believe brings clarity to this piece of legislation.

Thirdly, the idea is that this prospective piece of legislation, Bill 206, is going to enhance information sharing, and it's going to assist and support prospective parents.

Again, these three points that are added to this amendment I believe will help all of us to understand the purpose and the nature of this bill. I believe it deserves our support.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my pleasure to rise and speak in favour of the amendment. As our colleagues in the House have already indicated, it's a great point to clarify some of the questions that were raised when we were initially discussing this in second reading. I'm a supporter of adoptions. I've had family members that have been through the adoption process in Alberta as well as looking at international adoptions. I believe that if we can support adoptive families to be able to work together with biological families and look at open adoptions, that's a benefit to all Albertans.

I will probably say more when we're back on the original bill, but I did want to just let the member know that I do support her amendment. I look forward to the continued debate in Committee of the Whole.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Madam Chair. I, too, am happy to rise and support the amendment, which was given to us earlier today by the member opposite. I really appreciate putting the preamble in the bill because it clarifies, one, that the government is working really hard to find the best solutions for all the children in Alberta. It also pays attention to the prospective needs of adoptive parents and is a reminder that it's not always easy for them to be able to move towards the path of adoption. Also, the reason I really appreciate having the amendment is that it clarifies that adoption comes in many different forms and that prospective adoptive parents are maybe adopting a baby or maybe adopting a child that's a toddler or, in a possible case, sometimes a teenager.

I appreciate that we are including the preamble that bears witness to what the government is trying to do around adoption. I will be supporting this amendment, and I will speak more fully later on about the main bill.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: I knew you'd get it. Thank you very much, Madam Chair, for the opportunity to speak on the amendment to Bill 206. You know, we've received some feedback that shows that it is not immediately clear, simply from reading the text of this bill, what it intends to do. The intention of the bill is rather simple. It's to allow prospective adoptive parents, after being approved, to advertise their profiles online on legitimate websites like Canada Adopts. Right now Alberta's legislation prohibits this. In other provinces like B.C. prospective adoptive parents are allowed to post their profiles on Canada Adopts, and it's a shame that they can't do so here in Alberta.

This amendment adds a preamble explaining the spirit and intent of this legislation, and it will help to guide the crafting of regulations. Anything, I think, that we can do as government and as opposition to streamline the adoption process is going to be an immediate benefit to both the adoptive parents and the children. Lord knows how fast they change, especially when they're babies and toddlers. I would implore the members to recognize that this bill is clear, that the advertising is only legal if it's in accordance with strict regulations. The bill is to enable regulations to be created that bring us in line with other provinces as opposed to keeping a blanket prohibition on the practice. I would encourage all members to support this amendment to this great bill.

Thank you.

The Chair: To the amendment, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Madam Chair. I, too, rise in support of this amendment. But I actually had a question for the mover of the amendment. When I read the second part of the preamble – and I'll read it right now: "Whereas the current legislation contains barriers that prevent prospective adoptive parents from publicizing their profiles for the attention of parents who are considering adoption in Alberta" – I think that there is some redundancy in that statement or at least a lack of clarity.

I had thought that we were trying to make it easier for persons who are wishing to adopt a child to present their profiles and that those profiles would come to the attention of persons who are considering giving up a child for adoption. I think that perhaps you need to change the wording of the statement to clarify that. It's my understanding that we're not going to be allowing the person putting up a child for adoption to be publicizing their situation because that would go against a whole bunch of privacy constraints. I would actually like to know the response to that.

Mrs. Aheer: I'm not quite sure I'm understanding where you're coming from. Basically, what the preamble does is just to elevate the spirit of what's happening in the bill. The bill itself, the meat and potatoes of the bill, is exactly what you had said. It's about making sure that families have access to the ability to put their family's profile online for expectant or biological parents in this situation.

What the preamble does is that it just enhances the legislation by suggesting that we're going to remove those barriers. The language that is being used here has been actually vetted between both sides of this Legislature quite extensively to make sure that we've got the language that both the government and our side can use to make sure that the spirit of making sure that families that are wanting to adopt are able to put their profiles online – and, of course, in this situation it's about choice. You don't have to do this version.

As the other member had mentioned, there are a lot of different types of adoptions, a lot of different ways. We want to make sure that the legislation has the ability to encompass and be inclusive of many, many different varieties of adoption.

Also, we want to make sure that that connectivity is there, right? That's been the biggest issue that we've been talking about this whole time, to connect birth parents and expectant parents with adoptive parents.

I hope that answers the question.

Dr. Turner: Thank you to the member for that.

I mean, if I could just suggest a friendly thing, “adopting” rather than “adoptive,” so “Whereas the current legislation contains barriers that prevent prospective adopting parents.” Actually, “adoptive” I'm not sure is a word.

Mrs. Aheer: To legal counsel it is.

Dr. Turner: What's that?

Mrs. Aheer: That comes from legal counsel.

Dr. Turner: Anyway, it's a comment. I appreciate that it is a preamble that won't have any effect on the actual . . .

The Chair: Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. Just to clarify on the language, “adopting” is the assumption. We can't make that assumption until that actual relationship happens between the parents. “Adoptive” gives the obvious space that it is a possibility, but we don't know. There are no assumptions that should be made in legislation, let alone in a preamble, so we want to make sure that the description of what's going on with that verb actually describes the process, not the end result.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Madam Chair. It gives me great pleasure to rise and support this amendment and, of course, Bill 206, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017, as proposed by my dear friend the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View. You know, when we join opposition caucus, we're provided with what we would call critic areas. It's then, of course, our job to review the work of a minister or ministry and their portfolio, which is assigned, and to work on behalf of the people of Alberta. I've played that role in the past as a critic for Children's Services, and it gave me great pride and fulfillment to perform that work. In fact, it's something that I will continue to do.

I mention this because Bill 206 and an amendment such as the one before us right now offer the kind of positive change that will enhance the lives of children, and for that reason alone it has, of course, my full support. I congratulate my colleague the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View for her foresight to bring this bill, that will change lives. You know, these much-needed amendments to allow prospective adoptive parents to advertise to expectant mothers and parents looking for loving families for their child have likely been a simple oversight over the past many years. But it takes someone to recognize the humane nature of the changes to Bill 206 and that they will bring and put this in a legislative agenda, which the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View has done. We are fortunate in this House to gain these opportunities, and they should never be squandered. You know, I've seen many good bills come before this House, and this, of course, is one of them, and this amendment is one of them.

Private members' bills are interesting pieces of legislation. To ensure success, the sponsoring members need a concept that all members of the House can support in a bill such as this. The member has to be targeted in what she is proposing, and she has to reach out and work with many others to ensure that everyone voting on it appreciates its importance. In this case my colleague seems to have covered all that she, of course, necessarily needs to cover. Bill 206, you know, will have a positive, humane aspect on the lives of Albertans, most especially Alberta's children. Of course, children are the most important thing. That, I think, we can all agree upon in this House. The proposed amendments to the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act are clear, and they are targeted. There is nothing partisan in any way about this bill, and I commend again the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View for that.

Alberta's adoption rate needs improving. That is clear from the concerning drop in recent years, especially when compared to British Columbia, which does allow prospective adoptive parents to post profiles. If we can make a difference, we should make a difference, and we can make that difference through Bill 206. I applaud the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View, and I urge all members to do so as well in supporting this amendment and supporting this bill. The big difference is that, you know, they'll be able to broaden their reach in their effort to adopt children and complete their families. In a province that has seen a steadily dropping adoption rate, this kind of move to facilitate more adoptions is critical. We look to B.C., which has a modernized the adoption process and allows prospective parents to publicize their interest in adopting, and we can gain great hope that we will see a positive upward shift here in Alberta.

Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you, Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

The Chair: Are any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to express some similar concerns regarding the second sentence in the preamble proposed by the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View that were expressed by the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud, in that it didn't seem as clear as it could be. When I was reading it, I thought that the last part, where it says “for the attention of parents who are considering adoption in Alberta,” didn't make it clear that it actually may mean parents who may offer a child for adoption in Alberta. That, I think, should be clarified so that it's really clear that the people who are prospectively publicizing their profiles are doing so to an audience comprised of people who may offer a child for adoption. I think that would help clear things up.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. Sorry. This was in respect to the end of the second line there – right? – where it says, “from publicizing their profiles for the attention of parents who are considering adoption in Alberta.” Is the lack of clarity between prospective parents and biological parents? I’m not quite sure that I understand the question. Would you mind clarifying again? I’ll try better to answer that.

The Chair: Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Chair. I’ll try to be clear in my clarity request. My understanding of the language in the second portion of the second sentence of the preamble is that where it says “for the attention of parents who are considering adoption in Alberta,” that describes people who are seeking to offer a child for adoption, correct? That would be the audience to whom people who are publicizing their profiles will direct that profile. I think it should be clear. Rather than saying “parents who are considering adoption,” it should say “parents who may offer a child for adoption” so that it’s clear exactly what end of the transaction they’re at.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. I’ll answer that if that’s okay. It’s a very fair question. Actually, I think that originally it was worded that way. My understanding is that potential prospective biological parents or couples that are wanting to put their children into adoption preferred this language around considering adoption versus saying words like “put a child up for an adoption” or those kinds of – like, that was my understanding. I think this language is still trying to be very respectful of the biological parents.

Thank you so much.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[Motion on amendment A1 carried]

The Chair: We are back on Bill 206. Are there any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise today to speak to Bill 206, the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017, and to move an amendment. I do have the original and the copies, and I will wait to speak to the amendment until you have received that.

The Chair: This is amendment A2.

Go ahead, hon. member.

Ms Goehring: I move that Bill 206, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017, be amended as follows: section 4 is repealed and the following is substituted.

4 This Act comes into force on Proclamation.

I would like to start by thanking the hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View for bringing this important issue again to our House. I believe that every child in Alberta and every child deserves to grow up in a healthy, loving environment that supports their development and prepares them for a very bright future. I know that all members of this House are committed to ensuring that the adoption process provides the best outcomes for children and meets the needs of all families.

The fact is that adoptive families play an absolutely important role in promoting the health, safety, happiness, and well-being of many of Alberta’s children. That’s why we supported a motion by the Member for Calgary-East on this issue, and that’s why we are supporting the intention of this bill from the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View. Our government is committed to ensuring that children up for adoption are provided with a loving and nurturing home. It’s important that we provide the appropriate tools for adoptive parents to ensure that families are prepared to succeed and support adoptive families and birth families as they move through the adoption process, which we know is difficult. Part of this work includes removing the barriers to adoption when removing these barriers is in the best interests of children and their families.

Madam Chair, we are aware that adoption is an important part of supporting strong families and building resilient communities. That’s why we’re committed to listening to our families and stakeholders as we explore how our policies can best support Alberta children and families.

We’ve heard from some families and licensed adoption agencies who support a change to current legislation which would allow prospective adoptive families to post profiles online; however, we have also heard from other families and agencies who do not support this change. We want to continue to listen to families as well as relevant stakeholders as we explore how our policies can best support families.

Currently section 85(1) of Alberta’s Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act and section 25(2)(d)(iii) of the adoption regulation prohibit prospective adoptive parents and adoptive agencies from publishing any advertisements related to the adoption of a child. While legislation does allow the sharing of information between prospective adoptive families and birth families in order to facilitate an adoption, such information sharing must also preserve confidentiality. This often translates into private communication between parties rather than public dissemination of information; however, because public dissemination is seen as disclosure of information beyond the intent of the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, posting of online profiles with widespread access falls under the category of a publication. As such, it’s not allowed under our current legislation.

Furthermore, the adoption regulation prohibits identifying specific adoptive parents. In other words, the posting of an online profile or a dear birth parent letter would identify a prospective adoptive parent and would therefore be contrary to the current regulation.

Given that the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View’s bill is seeking to do a very similar thing that the Member for Calgary-East called for, we’ve already heard from some families and stakeholders on this issue. Madam Chair, some families feel that Alberta’s current legislation is too restrictive. For example, families and agencies point out that other jurisdictions allow adoptive parents to connect with birth parents through social media postings, and there is merit to this. Currently British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, and the Yukon allow the posting of online adoptive family profiles. The other nine jurisdictions prohibit this practice. Our government shows a deep concern for this issue. We are always looking for ways to improve core supports and programs, including the adoption system in our province, so it’s important to understand what the best practices are for publishing online profiles.

Recent engagement with Alberta’s licensed adoption agencies and ongoing communication with prospective adoptive parents reflects a divided opinion regarding publication. Some reasons as to why there should be a publication ban are very valid. There are concerns relating to privacy. This might also remove the option of birth parent counselling before selection of an adoptive family, which might lead to inappropriate matching, where birth parents are selecting families. Several others have raised concerns, including increased costs for adoptive families as agencies would need to develop the appropriate information technology infrastructure to support online advertising, cybersecurity measures, and a monitoring process to respond to online inquiries.

Insurance providers have quoted additional costs due to risks of fraud against adoptive families. At present Alberta adoption agencies can provide information about approved adoptive families to birth parents through a password-protected portion of their website. As mentioned, while legislation allows the sharing of information between prospective adoptive families and birth families in order to facilitate an adoption, such information sharing must also preserve confidentiality. But as has been discussed many times in this House, the amount of joy that adoption brings children and families is absolutely incredible. It builds strong communities and allows children to grow up in a caring, nurturing home where they can absolutely flourish.

While every adoption case is different, I agree with the intent of this bill. There is insufficient time to consult with the adoption agency community and develop necessary regulations before the current coming-into-force date. Moreover, the ongoing Ministerial Panel on Child Intervention may also be recommending changes to adoptions under the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, and it would be best to consider all changes to the legislation holistically. So I propose this amendment to change the date that this bill comes into force to the date of proclamation.

Once again, I would like to thank the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View and the opposition for their advocacy on this very important issue, and I would ask that all members of this House support this amendment.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to rise to speak to 206. I have, certainly, some vested interest, having now five adopted grandchildren in the family and having learned a little bit about the process. These are all international adoptions, but they have to follow the same prescribed processes, of course, at least in country.

I want to just quote from my daughter's letter to me around this whole bill because she's so familiar with the issues and is herself a director of an adoption agency in Calgary. She's indicated that they're supportive of online profiles, consistent with what the previous member has stated, as long as they're password protected. The concern is that if they aren't password protected, birth parents could go the private route and arrange adoptions outside the protection of an oversight agency, and even though they would still be subject to the regulations under the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act, they would be very much on the move towards that particular relationship, that they'd developed online prior to any counselling or support that might be offered, while they're still in the process of considering who and how or even if to adopt out their child.

Their decision, in fact, to give a child to an adoptive family could be overturned in court if the birth parents can prove that they did not get the proper counselling before making a decision. If an agency protects the majority of the online info, they can just give a birth parent the password to access profiles after they have received the appropriate counselling and are still choosing to move forward.

I think that's an important consideration.

She also indicated that there should be, as early as possible in the process, some kind of assessment or home study. As it is right now, an individual could choose anyone to become the guardian to the child without any assessment or home study. That would be a private arrangement. If the individual had seen, as my daughter has seen, a number of unwell biological parents make decisions they regret afterwards because they didn't have the awareness, didn't have the support, didn't have the time to consider – the lack of oversight or assessment required leads to ongoing challenges, ongoing conflicts, even litigation that could be avoided. So some real cautions here.

She also indicated that there needs to be significantly better collaboration between the private agencies and the department, with better training for front-line workers around adoption. For example, she has seen indications where a woman has repeatedly given up children, and that should have been anticipated in an individual's case. Counselling should have been given throughout the pregnancy instead of suddenly being faced with a birth and an emergency kind of situation where the child may be taken into custody, apprehended, placed in care, but not be eligible for adoption until much older because the preparations hadn't been properly put in place. So calling for more around the areas of regulations, for sure, but I didn't want that to get lost.

She also indicated that there is a lack of postadoption supports for all adoptions, whether government or private agency. Adoption breakdowns can result in an adopted child being placed in foster care if another family is not available for adoption, so they might as well get involved in prevention and further support of the adoptive families. We certainly have seen lots of evidence of this in our children in care review panel, where a number of young people have come forward to talk about the unsatisfactory placement, the difficulty in leaving that placement, and the trauma around multiple different placements after the first one didn't work.

Those are my comments. It doesn't contradict anything that the amendment is suggesting, but, I guess, many of us would want to make sure that the regulations to go along with this bill recognize these serious balancing issues that have to be made between the rights of the birth family to know and understand and be supported and the rights of the adopting family to have their information out there so that they could be considered.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you. I rise today to speak with some cautious reservation in favour of the amendment as I think that this issue is of critical importance in that we arrive at a place where the legislation can in fact be passed. Madam Chair, you'll know that I've risen in this House on numerous occasions to speak to this important issue. I know that in times past my motivation has sometimes been questioned. But I've checked it with the Ethics Commissioner, and I'm okay to proceed.

My reservation today predominantly comes around what will ultimately allow the government's ability to potentially not proclaim the legislation. In changing the coming-into-force date to "on Proclamation," we have seen with numerous pieces of legislation in the past the legislation never be proclaimed. In fact, the government has five years to proclaim the legislation. I'm not suggesting that that is exactly what will happen, but I am suggesting that that could happen. From time to time there are difficult decisions to be made with respect to sensitive issues like adoption, and a government will encourage its members to go ahead and vote in favour of a piece of legislation like this for fear of the optics of voting against adoption. In fact, we just passed the amendment of "whereas the Government . . . is committed to improving access to adoption." There's widespread agreement with respect to that being the goal, but politically speaking there can sometimes be challenges around that. So from time to time I have seen other governments do exactly what we see happening here. There's a change so that, in fact, the government can vote in favour of the legislation, but it provides them with a totally limitless time to proclaim it over the next five-year period. Then, at that point in time they would have to make a decision on what to do with that legislation.

There are numerous examples of legislation that has been passed in this Assembly and never proclaimed: the Forest Reserves Amendment Act; the Wilderness Areas, Ecological Reserves, Natural Areas and Heritage Rangelands Act; the Black Creek Heritage Rangeland Trails Act; the Energy Statutes Amendment Act; Health Professions Act; Health Professions Amendment Act; the Oil and Gas Conservation Amendment Act; the Education Act. There are lots and lots of examples where governments have passed legislation and then chose not to proclaim it.

Listen, I'm going to vote in favour of this amendment, but I do want to put a flag in the ground today that I hope that's not the government's intention and that the government isn't utilizing this as political cover for not wanting to make a tough decision on a very important issue. I know that members of that side of the House are genuine in their comments about the need to improve access to adoption, and I also know that members on that side of the House are genuine in their comments around the desire to improve access to information, and I know that they're genuine in their comments with respect to some of the concerns that have been shared here inside the House around regulations and the privacy concerns and the myriad of issues that come along with adoption. But, Madam Chair, you'll know that any time you involve people, things get complex.

It's our role to make sure that we're doing everything we can to balance the complexities. I appreciate the fact that that takes time. I also want to make sure that we do everything we can to ensure that this continues to be an issue that is at the fore, that doesn't just get passed and then forgotten about. I know that there are members on that side of the House that are passionate advocates for adoption, and I also know that it is very important to members on this side of the House that we do everything that we can.

I'd like to reiterate that this particular piece of legislation is not the be-all and end-all when it comes to some of the challenges that our adoption system faces. I know that I worked extensively with my colleague from Chestermere-Rocky View. It was never her intention that we would solve all challenges but more to raise the profile of adoption in the province of Alberta. I think it is a critical profile that needs to continue to be raised. That's why I was so pleased to support the amendment that put into the preamble: "whereas the Government of Alberta is committed to improving access to adoption."

I can tell you as someone who has been intimately involved in the adoption system that there are lots of barriers to adoption. Some of them are in place with lots of great reasons, and others are in place that provide little value and only make barriers. I'm certainly of the opinion that putting Albertans at a significant disadvantage when it comes to advertising their profiles online is one of those barriers that doesn't promote adoption and, in fact, decreases people's ability to access the system and to be on an equal playing field with many other Canadians across the board. I think that it's very important that as we move forward, we put in the necessary checks and balances but not present barriers to the process. Unfortunately, sometimes the adoption process can also be an instigator of pain. This is certainly one pinch point that I've heard from many, many, many families all across the province, that they feel pain with respect to their inability to have the same sort of access that other Canadians have.

The adoption process, Madam Chair – and I'll close with this. I've said it before in this House. I wish that we lived in a world where adoption wasn't necessary. I wish that these sorts of issues didn't come before the Assembly, but that, unfortunately, isn't the case. It is imperative upon each and every one of us that we do everything that we can to find loving homes for children. To be clear, not every adoption works out perfectly, just like not every parent that has children biologically is perfect. I get some concerns when we see decisions being made upon the fact that some adoptions might not be successful. We need to operate with checks and balances and ensure that we do everything we can to make adoptions as successful as possible but also recognize that we cannot legislate for every eventuality.

So I will reiterate to the government members: when this amendment passes, please don't allow this piece of legislation to go on a shelf somewhere that no one cares about any longer. Don't use this for political cover to be able to vote in favour of an adoption bill that otherwise would be disappointing for many Albertans if you voted against it, that is truly just the tool that is used to ensure that the appropriate checks and balances are put in place.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A2?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[Motion on amendment A2 carried]

The Chair: Are there any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Madam Chair. I really think it's so great that we're talking about this bill today because this month, the month of November, is Adoption Awareness Month. This bill not only provides an opportunity to discuss the challenges of adoption but also to reinforce the fact that in Alberta we really support adoption and that we understand that everyone who's involved in adoption does it with a deep, deep level of pain very often but also that the government is committed to ensuring that all children in care or in guardianship or in other situations do have the best solutions for them as they grow up.

Because November is Adoption Awareness Month and we're talking about adoption, I thought I would start by talking about the importance of adoption in families and why I commend the member opposite from Chestermere-Rocky View to have raised this issue in this setting.

When I last spoke on this bill, I mentioned my youngest son, Isaac, and his adventure in Egypt. His adventure in Egypt really cemented for me the fact that when adoptive parents adopt children, they become your child. It doesn't really matter where they came from or how they become part of your family; they're really your own. What happened to me in Egypt was that my son, who was teaching in Egypt at the time, invited us to go to his classroom when we visited, but he had forgotten to tell his class that he was adopted. When we arrived in his classroom in Cairo, the children were very surprised that we did not look like him, that he looked like them and that we looked white. So for the first half an hour to an hour of the class time the kids were looking at us and looking at Isaac and really wondering about the fact that he was calling us mom and dad.

I like to tell this story because it shows how integrated it is, as other members have said, that when you adopt a child, they become your child and how they came to you is not important. What's really important is the love and care that you have for children in your home. When I think about adoption and the fact that we're talking about this bill, this is what I really think about. I think about providing children who are in need of love and in need of parents, guidance, and support wherever they come from. So I'm glad that we're talking about it, and I'm glad that we're also talking about the challenges that both adoptive parents and birth parents may have.

First of all, I want to talk again about some of the issues that we raised the last time. I think we need to really clarify that this bill is not going to cause the ability for parents to adopt more babies. Adoption is not just the adoption of babies. You can adopt a child that's a baby or a toddler or a young adult. I really wanted to ensure that when we talk about adoption, we don't just mean babies but all children in need of an adoptive home. I know the government has done a wonderful job of trying to find permanent homes, be it in permanent guardianship or an adoption for these children, and I think that it's good for us to remind ourselves how many children in Alberta need a place to call home.

Also, I wanted us to be reminded that part of the challenge around adoption is that we have to protect the children, and we have to be careful of any kind of arrangements where children may be offered more as a commodity than a child that needs a home. I'm so glad that so many overseas countries have really tightened up their adoption services, as the Member for Calgary-Mountain View said, to ensure that none of this happens.

I also think that it's really important that if we are going to start putting out profiles about families, we make sure that prospective adoptive families are not discouraged from adoption because of their status in the community, the money that they've been making, or the job that they have. That was very scary for me. I went to an adoption agency, and my profile was given to birth parents. I always wondered: you know, is it a problem that my husband was a letter carrier at the time, and what are birth parents looking for? I just want us to be very cautious that we don't continue an environment where people are selected as prospective adoptive parents just because of the money they make or their status in life. That's one of the things that makes me a little bit wary about the advertising, but I'm happy to support the bill and the intent. What we're trying to do is make sure that all the children in our communities find a home.

I also really want to talk about the language. I'm really glad to see that today we have changed our language and that we don't use the language "giving up." Really, it's hurtful for me when we talk about adoption as something that a loving birth mother and birth parents do in a negative way. I think we always have to respect the birth parents and the pain that they go through and how they really want the best for their children. It's a gift. It is not "giving up." I wanted to thank all the members today for using really appropriate language.

As we approach Christmas, I would like to urge all members to really make sure that we don't use the words "adopt a child" or "adopt a family" at Christmastime. It's very painful for me and for other people when we use the word "adoption" to mean a one-time event at Christmastime where we adopt a family and give them a basket. I think it really demeans the word "adoption," and it really demeans what happens in an adoption. I'd like to encourage us to view adoption always as a committed, permanent relationship between a child and their adoptive parents, and that very often includes the birth parents or the extended family of the birth parents. It reminds me how often I have talked to grandparents whose grandchild is part of an adoptive family and how they would long also, just like the birth mother, to be part of an open adoption. I'm really hoping that this Christmas we can urge everyone to change the language to honour the people involved in adoption.

Also, in this House many of my colleagues have spoken about their painful stories. I want to commend the MLA for Lethbridge-East, who shared her own story about adoption, and the MLA for Edmonton-Castle Downs for her story, too. I always appreciate when we can relate a bill like this to the fact that we as MLAs are facing the same kind of challenges and decisions that ordinary Albertans do. So I'd like to really commend them for sharing their stories, for sharing the pain that comes with adoption.

I want to talk a little bit about adoptive parents. I understand the pain of waiting year after year, whatever way you go through adoption, either through government, private agency, or international adoption, the time that you wait for a child to be placed in your home, how impossible it looks, the costs of it all, and the documents you have to prepare: the medical exams, the notarized documents, the history of your finances. I remember having to produce a document that told everyone how much money I had in the bank, and I thought to myself: if I was pregnant, nobody would want to know how much money I have in the bank.

Adoptive parents go through a lot in their search to have a child, and I don't think this bill is going to reduce the pain of waiting for a child or even the timing of having a child. I want to make sure that as we support this bill, we understand that it might help but that it's not going to lessen that pain, and especially it's not going to lessen the hardship that comes with the waiting.

You know, I think I spoke about it last time, but I remember wondering every single time that a friend of mine became pregnant or when somebody would talk about their children: when will it be my time to have a child?

I wanted to end by thanking the member. I will be supporting the amendment and the bill.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Chair. I know that I had the opportunity to rise and speak to the amendment and raise some concerns and reservations, but I just wanted to briefly mention a couple of things with respect to adoption, specifically some of the language that we use around adoption, and also just highlight some of the things that I think we all need to keep in mind as we go forward with respect to adoption and how we interact with those who have or haven't adopted and just, hopefully, provide a little bit of context for the House.

One thing, I think, is very, very important – and I mentioned it earlier today even – that this bill certainly isn't the be-all and end-all. I think that we need to make sure as an Assembly and as a government that we are doing all that we can to be supportive of adoptive parents as well as biological or birth parents. I thank the member opposite for her comments around: this isn't about "giving up" but that it is about adding to. There's still a lot of stigma around adoption, and I think that we all need to be responsible for breaking down some of those barriers, not just the legislative barriers but just the way that people speak about adoption, generally speaking.

I know as an adoptive dad that from time to time people will ask some very unique questions. Listen, you know, we have open adoptions, and both of our girls know that they're adopted, and we speak openly to them about adoption and the joys and hardships and pleasures and pain that adoption comes with. Frankly, I am taking a lot of liberties this evening with their story, because while I have a personal adoptive story, they also have an adoptive story that is theirs to share and not necessarily mine to share. But in the context of the larger issue, I am willing to bridge that gap or cross that bridge because I think it's important.

I just wanted to remind the House or have a bit of a chat around the way that we engage with folks who have adopted. I think it's very important that as we engage with family of adopted children, we allow that family to determine how they would like that story to be told, so I encourage folks to be cautious with the words they use. I think a good rule of thumb for people to remember is that if you wouldn't ask a question, say, about plastic surgery, you wouldn't ask the same question with respect to adoption.

An example of that would be, "Are those your real lips?" if you'd had plastic surgery on your lips. I know that I have been part of a lot of adoptive questions like: are those your real kids? Or: do you love those lips as much as you loved your old lips? You get what I'm aiming at here in that sometimes people will differentiate my children because of the way that they arrived in my family. I want to encourage members of the House, as they're engaging in adoptive conversations, that they use caution. As I said, a good rule of thumb is that if you wouldn't ask it about someone who has had plastic surgery, perhaps don't ask the same question on adoption.

The other thing that I just wanted to highlight is around the way that families are built in our province. Families come in so many different shapes, sizes, and ways that I think it's important that we encourage families in all forms and shapes. I never, frankly, thought that I would be an adoptive parent. I had always believed or thought that I was going to have a large tribe of biological children. However, that wasn't going to be the case in our family.

I remember the very first day that I met our second-born. She was in care of the department, and we had provided a storybook for her of our family prior to us meeting her for the very first time. So she had a book of pictures of my wife and I and our first-born, and each day the foster family was going through the book with her and saying, you know, "This is going to be your dad, and this is going to be your mom, and this is going to be your brother, and this is going to be your dog, and this is the house that you're going to live in" and preparing her for what was a very, very significant transition in her life.

I remember the very first day. I had literally just gone to the foster family's home to drop off some clothing and a few things that she required in order to get the transition ready to roll. They happened to be home, and my daughter came around the corner, and we saw each other for the very first time. She looked up at me – and she had seen me in the book on numerous occasions prior – and she said: hi, dad. In whatever way it's possible, that moment was very similar to the moment when our first-born son was born naturally and the doctor said: it's a boy.

Families get knit together in incredible ways, and adoption is one of those things, so I'd just encourage all members of the Assembly to do what they can to celebrate adoptive families, to celebrate birth parents, to support adoptive children as they all go through unique challenges and struggles with things that they will never know. We all have a role to play in that. The language we use around adoption is so critically important.

I thank all members of the House for their input on this very important piece of legislation.

Mr. Smith: Madam Chair, I cannot think of anything that is more important in my life than family. As a teacher of 30 years I know and I saw many families, and I saw many kids. I know that not all families are perfect. I mean, mine wasn't. The family that I grew up in was not perfect. I did not have perfect parents. I was not a perfect parent. But I can think of nothing more important than having a family.

As a kid I was so blessed to grow up in a family where I had two parents that loved each other and still love each other. I grew up in a family where I knew that I was loved, and I am still living in a family where I know that I am loved without reservation. My father just had his 80th birthday. My mother just had her 79th, I think. And to this day I cannot remember a single time in my life, no matter how badly I screwed up, when I knew that I wasn't loved. I believe and I hope that my kids could say the same thing. If there's one thing that I would like to be able to go to my grave with, it would be that my kids would say at my funeral that they knew they were loved.

So when we stand up to speak about Bill 206 and we talk about the chance to help kids have a family, I'm not sure that there is anything more important that we could do in this Legislature than to help that come true. Family is the foundation of everything that we do in this society, and providing that opportunity for a child to know that they are loved and that they will always be loved: nothing is more important than that.

This bill allows us to help connect prospective parents to their prospective children. How could we not support this bill? It's been very gratifying to me to hear, on both sides of the House, people's support for this bill.

Anybody that wants to talk to my middle son will know that I am not, never will be, and do not want to be a technology geek. I am not very conversant with technology. I remember the first day I got my cellphone, which was only about six years ago, five years ago.

An Hon. Member: Seriously?

Mr. Smith: Seriously.

My wife had picked it up, and it was sitting on my plate in my kitchen. I sat down at the kitchen table. My son had been bugging us for a cellphone. He wanted a cellphone for probably three years. He says, "Dad, what's that?" "Well, I think it's my new cellphone." And this look of sheer horror gets on his face, and his jaw drops to the tabletop, and he looks at me, and he goes, "You're getting a cellphone?" I said, "Yeah." He said, "That's like giving a spaceship to a caveman." I couldn't even argue with him. Sometimes your kids are just right.

So I'm not sure that I really understand all of the technology about this, but I can say this, that if it helps to connect prospective parents with kids and if it helps to do so through a medium that is responsible and reasonable, then it has my support.

Many of us have talked about having adoptive kids. I know I've mentioned before in this House that I have got three cousins, two of whom are still alive, that were adopted, and I know that they were adopted into a loving family and that we are together, as an extended family, one unit. They are creative, loving, and caring individuals, that all have their own families with as well-adjusted kids as we ever can have, because of the love that was poured into their lives by my aunt and uncle.

I am quite happy to stand here today and to support this piece of legislation because I believe that it changes people's lives. In the faith that I follow, it says that there's nothing greater than love. Nothing greater than love. Now, sometimes my parents applied that love liberally to my backside, but it was still out of love. Sometimes I didn't understand that love when it was applied, when it said, "No, you've got to do your homework," or "No, you can't go out tonight," but it was all love. So I will support this bill because it helps to promote love and it helps to promote families and it helps to promote lifelong relationships. It's worthy of our support.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'd just like to speak briefly. My colleague from Drayton Valley talked about the importance of family and removing barriers, and I think this bill actually does that. I spoke earlier, when I was talking to one of the amendments, about how fast kids change, especially babies. Some of you may not know, but I became a grandfather on September 5th. Believe me, I saw Lily on Saturday, and I know that when I see her next week, on Friday, she'll have gained a pound, and she'll be changing.

At that time they're also very, very attached to the person that they're with. In some cases, if a child is in foster care, they're getting very attached to that foster parent. Anything that we can do to reduce the wait times and streamline the adoption process, I think, is going to be very, very important for the child, and that's who we're really here for. We talked about that.

Now, I'd also like to speak about – and I'm sure that you all get the e-mails as well from the Child and Youth Advocate. You know, we talk about how important family is and how important love is, and when we look at these young teenagers that are in foster care and getting bounced around from one place to another, it would be so much nicer if we could have a permanent solution for them for the entire time that they're growing up instead of bouncing them around from one foster home to another.

You know, I sat on a panel for the member for Rocky Mountain House, who couldn't make it to a meeting. At one of the meetings they had some of the young adults, 17, 18 years old, that had been through the system. One of the comments that was made was that they survived not because of the system but despite the system. Some of the heart-wrenching stories that they told – I know, Madam Chair, that you were there at those meetings.

One in particular that stuck out to me was a young lady that was 17 years old at the time of our meeting and had been taken away from her foster home that she'd been at. I believe she was there from two years old to 14 years old. When she tried to get an explanation from the caseworkers, they couldn't really give her one because it was freedom of information. She later had to find out, through a FOIP request, that the reason that she'd been taken away from her family – and they were her family; they called her their child; it was quite a story – was because the family had an age allotment for foster care, so they weren't allowed to keep her after she was 14 years old. But nobody had approached the family to offer adoption or approach this girl to say: you know, adoption is a part of the process that could happen.

You know, when you hear stories like that – and then we get these reports from the Child and Youth Advocate – and you consider what some of these kids have gone through in their lives, it is heartbreaking. I think what we should be doing here is working on legislation that's going to make adoption easier, going to make life better for foster kids. Like I said, having that baby get attached to one foster parent and then moved to another foster parent and then moved to another foster parent and then eventually into an adoptive situation just doesn't make sense for the child at all.

I really hope that this legislation goes through and does get proclaimed in short order so that it isn't languishing on the backbenches or on a table in a backroom of the Legislature somewhere. I think we'd be doing a real disservice to children in our province, children in Canada, and adoptive parents like the case of our colleague who adopted two little girls. You know, anything that we can do to help streamline that situation and that process, of course, ensuring that the adoptive parents are the right people but also ensuring that the people that are giving up the child are making the right decisions and making sure that they have the supports they need as well – with that, I believe I will sit down.

Thank you very much. I will be supporting this bill wholeheartedly.

The Chair: Any other questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[The remaining clauses of Bill 206 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Opposed? That's carried.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Ms Woollard: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports the following bill with some amendments: Bill 206. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Opposed? So ordered.

Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 207 Regulatory Burden Reduction Act

Mr. McIver: I will move the bill on behalf of the hon. member and see what the House has to say about that.

Are there not 15 minutes of debate still left on this bill?

The Deputy Speaker: Just for clarity, because we did complete the process and the members voted and passed the bill out of committee, then we automatically go to the next order of business until the time on the clock ends.

Mr. McIver: I appreciate that.

The Deputy Speaker: For clarity, you're moving second reading of Bill 207 on behalf of the hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner?

Mr. McIver: On that we're clear and we agree, yes. But people can still speak to it, correct? Okay.

The Deputy Speaker: Any members wishing to speak to second reading of Bill 207, the Regulatory Burden Reduction Act? The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to Bill 207, the Regulatory Burden Reduction Act. As our government has made clear, Alberta businesses have a bigger economic impact than businesses anywhere in this country. However, this bill will not improve Albertans' ability to do business or help protect the health and safety of Alberta families and workers, so I cannot support this bill.

We know that we have the best businesses in this country, and that's why we're listening to them to make sure that Alberta continues to be the best place to do business. I'm proud of the work that our government has been doing to ensure that we create a more resilient, diversified economy. Our government is committed to working with businesses to make it actually easier for them to create jobs and get Albertans back to work, which is why we have done things like creating a Department of Economic Development and Trade. It acts as a one-stop shop that breaks down barriers and silos that existed under the previous government.

As part of phase 1 of the agencies, boards, and commissions review we have also done an amalgamation of 11 agencies, boards, and commissions and dissolved 15 more, creating efficiencies and saving $33 million over the next three years. Also as part of the review we have created a single, nimble Alberta Innovates to ensure that our research and innovation system is more agile and help ensure that every research dollar is wisely invested. One of those examples is within my constituency of Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville, where we have the Vegreville location of Alberta Innovates, which I'm quite proud to represent.

We understand the role that businesses play in the province's long-term economic outlook while enhancing Albertans' quality of life and making life affordable for Alberta communities and families, which is why our government is committed to working with businesses to actually make it easier for them to create jobs and get Albertans back to work. I'm proud of the work that the government has done to make sure that good jobs also stay in Alberta.

In fact, some of Canada's most respected economic forecasts from our experts have been forecasting that our province will lead the country in economic growth for the next two years. This summer RBC had pegged GDP growth at 4.2 per cent this year, which is far higher than Alberta's average growth rate over the last 10 years, roughly, between 2005 and 2015, of only 2.6 per cent. The reports have also cited our historic infrastructure build as being part of the reason why we have continued to maintain jobs and increase investor confidence. That has also come with the approval of two pipelines as contributing factors to our economic recovery.

Albertans have no control, Madam Speaker, over world oil prices, but strategic investments from government and industry have helped cushion the blow and stimulate growth in our province. We saw 49,000 more jobs in our province this summer than in the summer last year, in 2016, and we continue to have the highest employment rate in the country and the highest weekly earnings.

I am very proud of the work that our Minister of Economic Development and Trade has been doing to ensure that businesses succeed within this province. The CFIB presented our hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade with the golden scissors award. It was to recognize the work that had been done on the Canadian free trade agreement, which also was quoted as helping eradicate red tape on Canada's small businesses. As noted by the CFIB, the Canadian free trade agreement was "a major step towards resolving often conflicting rules and regulations across provinces," so I want to thank the hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade for having the backs of Albertan businesses and ensuring that they have the best landscape to succeed.

We also know that regulations do play an incredibly important role in protecting the health and safety of Alberta families and workers. Regulations help ensure that businesses compete on a level playing field, Madam Speaker, and ensure that clients and customers get a fair deal. One-for-one rules are overly simplistic because the number of individual regulations doesn't correlate with the burden imposed by regulations. One could easily create five new regulations that have minimal administrative costs or one new regulation that is extremely onerous to comply with.

The bill proposed by the hon. member doesn't address the specificity that is needed when we look at each regulation that we have in the province. It doesn't address that need. For example, if the government created a new environmental regulation, would the bill necessitate the removal of another environmental regulation or a regulation from any field? It's important to ask what constitutes a new regulation that needs to be offset. What's most important, Madam Speaker, is that regulations are easily understood by a business, not just that they are at random created or gotten rid of. Some regulations could be needed to include agency guidance and to help clarify earlier regulations or to assist businesses. Other regulations might include enforcement policies, interpretations, directives, memoranda, or a number of other things.

Again, what the bill does is lack the specificity that is needed. One-for-one rules create more work for regulators, and they actually slow down the work that our departments do. It tries to reduce the number of regulations but really only makes things more dense and more complex. As I was mentioning earlier, it's more important to have easily understood regulations than to just look solely at what the numbers are. In addition, having to identify regulations to eliminate and perform comparative CBAs for each existing regulation versus the proposed new regulation is extremely time intensive and is not a good use of the time of those that work in our departments.

Let me reiterate that enforcing a one-for-one rule increases bureaucratic inefficiency and lag time because policy-makers need to spend that time that they could be doing other work identifying regulations to repeal and replace as well as drafting new policy. What they need to do is just to focus on making good policy and reviewing that which is already in place as regulations come up for review as necessitated.

A one-for-one rule would make it more difficult to co-ordinate our regulatory regime with that of other jurisdictions and, therefore, complicates trade for Alberta companies. Now is really a time when Alberta companies are concentrating on how they expand their exports, not to make it more difficult on our companies that are trying to do that work.

For example, if an Alberta small or medium-sized enterprise wants to access another market within Canada or internationally, it needs to comply with foreign regulations before it can export. This is one of the reasons why streamlining Alberta regulations with other jurisdictions simplifies this process for businesses. A one-for-one rule would hamper the ability of public agencies to create regulations.

I want to make it absolutely clear that reducing regulations, whether they're environmental, financial, or otherwise, can expose the public and the environment to risk, and our government remains committed to mitigating public risk and having a strong oversight system in place. While we understand that regulations and bureaucracy might be frustrating at some times, they exist to protect the public, to protect workers, to protect the environment, and really to protect business from unnecessary risk.

Madam Speaker, while I can't support this bill, if the opposition has examples of existing regulations that they believe should be removed, I know that I can work with the Minister of Economic Development and Trade to address those on an ongoing basis, to actually get down to the root causes of what the opposition may identify as some issues, so that we're not just doing so in an arbitrary way but doing so with an actual eye to identifying what could be some real issues to make it easier for Alberta businesses to be able to perform better and be able to support them in their success.

Thank you, Madam Speaker. With that, I will conclude my remarks.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to this bill? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would just like to bring up a couple of points with respect to the member's identifying of the one-for-one. Actually, some of the things that the member had said are why one-for-one would be necessary. When you identify where there are issues with respect to red tape, if we're talking about small business or many other things that you were actually speaking about, the whole point of having one-for-one is to go back and identify what wasn't working and what is going to work in order to create policy that actually is better and is more efficient and actually creates the space for businesses to be able to move forward.

Something that we've seen pretty regularly throughout my life anyway in small business is that you think you understand the regulations, you think you understand the concept, you put together the proposal, you do all of those things, and then the regulations change. But the regulations don't reflect changing anything in the old things that you've already accomplished. It just adds and continues the burden of red tape onto the process that you're already part of.

I believe that if I was to understand correctly what the one-for-one means, that's what it is. It's about not continuing to add a burden to what already exists. It's about being efficient, looking at the process as it stands and fixing it. Actually, the member had mentioned the review process. That's exactly ...

The Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, hon. member, but the time allotted for this portion of business has now concluded.

Motions Other than Government Motions

World Interfaith Harmony Week

508. Ms Kazim moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to recognize the first week of February as World Interfaith Harmony Week in support of the United Nations General Assembly resolution 65/5.

[Debate adjourned October 30: Ms Woollard speaking]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek, you still had some speaking time remaining on this motion. Did you wish to continue to use that time?

Ms Woollard: I have nothing more to say at the moment. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the motion? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

5:00

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to have the opportunity to rise tonight and speak to Motion 508, brought forward by the hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore, the motion being: be it resolved that the Legislature of Alberta urge the government to declare the first week of February beginning in 2018 to be the annual United Nations World Interfaith Harmony Week. Indeed, I am a great believer in interfaith work. I've seen many great examples of this happen here in our city. In my work with EndPoverty Edmonton, sitting on the stewardship round-table on behalf of the Ministry of Community and Social Services – the chair of that committee is Bishop Jane Alexander. She is a woman who is greatly respected here in our community – she was recently honoured at the University of Alberta – one who has made great contributions to the issues of poverty here in our city. I know that she works with many across various faith groups in her work to address this.

In fact, just about a month ago, Madam Speaker, or just over a month ago we had an incident here in my community in Edmonton-Centre where a gentleman took a vehicle, he struck a police officer, and then went on a wild ride through the downtown streets. He struck several individuals. Thankfully, the Edmonton Police Service was incredibly professional and incredibly quick in their response. They prevented any loss of life, and they helped reduce the number of injuries. The next day I had the opportunity to join with many down at Churchill Square in front of city hall, and I stood on stage with the Premier, with members of the opposition, with members of all political parties and all levels of government, and with leaders of all faith communities in our city. We stood together on that day, and we declared that we would not be divided, that we would not let the actions of a single individual change how we choose to live our lives, how we choose to interact in our communities, and that we would not allow that to drive us to hate or prejudice against any others.

That is the spirit, Madam Speaker, of this motion, acknowledging that faith communities all have much in common. They all share core beliefs of human decency, of supporting each other, of being there for each other in our communities, of the principles of working to help those who are not always able to help themselves, looking after the less fortunate, working together to make our communities better places. We have much more in common than we have dividing us.

I know that I have constituents from a multitude of faiths. I've had the opportunity to spend time with the Jewish community here in my constituency. I've had the opportunity to spend time with many of the Muslim communities here in Edmonton. In fact, on Friday night I just had the opportunity to attend the opening of the green room, which is a youth outreach program through Islamic Family and Social Services, IFSSA, here in Edmonton. They do some fantastic work, and the green room is an excellent youth outreach program that they have. Just one block away from my constituency office they've now opened the new location of the green room and, indeed, a new central office for IFSSA. They're doing wonderful work in the community. I know oftentimes when I've been dealing with other issues, with other communities, I can approach the folks at IFSSA and they're willing to reach out and they're willing to help and support and offer whatever resources and goodwill they have to help others.

I know there are many communities across this city that are the same. Indeed, Madam Speaker, the Christian community, which I myself grew up in – it's not a faith that I continue to hold but is one that has deeply, deeply informed how I choose to live my life, what I believe about leadership, and it is the reason I stand on this side of the House today and why I chose to run with the Alberta NDP. These social values that I learned through that faith in my upbringing informed my belief that we need to be supporting people and that we need to be providing the supports and services that people need.

I'm very happy to support this motion to ensure that we take that opportunity every year to recognize and celebrate and support all of our faith communities and look for further opportunities by which we can come together to celebrate what we have in common and the good work that we can do together. It was probably just about a year ago that I was invited to come and bring greetings on behalf of the government of Alberta at an interfaith conference that was put on by several people here in the community. That was a wonderful opportunity as well, Madam Speaker, to sit down and just learn more about some of the other faith practices, to learn about some of their beliefs and, again, some of the things that we have in common, the many things we share, how we can collaborate, and to take apart some of the prejudices that may exist around some beliefs and some faiths.

I think it's very important for us to continue to encourage good dialogue between our faith communities, to look for opportunities on how we can work together, how we can continue to support much of the good work that each of these communities is doing separately in the community, and also then look at how we can work together to multiply that good work through collaboration.

I'd like to thank the Member for Calgary-Glenmore for bringing this motion forward, and I look forward to voting in favour along with my other colleagues here in the House.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate that very much. I'm pleased to rise on the Motion 508, which states: "be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to recognize the first week of February as World Interfaith Harmony Week in support of the United Nations General Assembly resolution 65/5."

Now, this is a motion that is worthy of debate here and one that I am very much in support of. The faith communities contribute a great deal to our society, and there was a time, I suppose not that many decades ago, that the faith communities were largely responsible for delivering what we now call social services. It's not as much the case anymore. They still deliver a lot of social services today, up to and including today, but there was a time when governments didn't provide the level of social services that they do now. It was very much left to and largely embraced by the different faith communities to look after people, and that spirit of social service and looking after each other still exists today and lives on today.

The idea of having harmony between those faith communities is very important, which is another reason to support this bill. I've been blessed during my time in public life to have been involved with social events and even public service events with just about every faith community that I know of in Alberta. I have to tell you, what they have in common is probably bigger and more important than what they hold differently. There's been a pretty consistent belief, in my estimation, or pretty consistent, even though there is difference in their beliefs – what I see as consistent is the belief in helping the weakest and the poorest amongst us. The willingness and the desire to provide support when someone is in a time of stress or they have a mental health issue or a time where perhaps there is a sickness or a death in the family or amongst loved ones – faith communities gather around their own.

But more than that, they gather around those that aren't their own when they can, too, and provide support for them just because then need it. In my view, that's a standard that is important and a standard that makes our society better. I'm cognizant of the fact that . . .

The Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, hon. member, but pursuant to Standing Order 8(3), which provides for up to five minutes for the sponsor of a motion other than a government motion to close debate, I would now invite the hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore to close debate on Motion 508.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to all the members of the House for the debate here today. You know, I'm proud to be part of a government that is making life better for Albertans and that has in its heart to build a community where people feel safe and free to live their faith and culture. The declaration of an annual United Nations World Interfaith Harmony Week would solidify our government's support of diversity in culture and faith. By proposing this motion, my hope is that every community across this province has the opportunity to live without fear when it comes to their faith.

Madam Speaker, I believe that it is our job as elected representatives to make life more inclusive for all Albertans, and this is why I'm standing here today. I'm advocating on behalf of all my constituents and Albertans of various religious backgrounds. I believe that it is our duty as members of this Legislature to support diversity in this province.

As stated on the United Nations website for interfaith, "the World Interfaith Harmony Week provides a platform – one week in a year – when all interfaith groups and other groups of goodwill can show the world what a powerful movement they are." This week would be "a focal point from which all people of goodwill can recognize that the common values they hold far outweigh the differences they have, and thus provide a strong dosage of peace and harmony to their communities."

With that, Madam Speaker, I encourage all members of this Legislature to support this motion and set the goal for ourselves to celebrate interfaith in our communities and across Alberta.

Thank you very much.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my honour to rise today and move second reading of Bill 23, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017.

Bill 23 would add age as a prohibited ground of discrimination to the Alberta Human Rights Act under the areas of tenancy and goods, services, accommodations, or facilities. Earlier this year the government of Alberta agreed to a court order to make these changes.

Age is currently a prohibited ground of discrimination under all other areas of the act except for sections 4 and 5. Section 4 protects against discrimination when any goods, services, accommodations, or facilities normally available to the public are provided. Section 5 prohibits discrimination regarding tenancy, including both commercial and residential rental accommodations.

Madam Speaker, this government supports all Albertans, which is why we're proposing to strengthen our current human rights legislation and further protect Albertans from age discrimination. This is a complex issue that can affect many Albertans. Over the summer we consulted with a range of stakeholders and have heard many perspectives on the issues. We believe that these proposed amendments will strike the right balance between the interests of many different groups.

Madam Speaker, the legislation will protect programs or activities providing a benefit to minors or seniors such as discount movie tickets and ensure that they're allowed to continue without violating the act. Doing this will allow more programs and activities to be in financial reach of more people and will create greater opportunities for social interaction. We're committed to enhancing every Albertan's ability to fully and equally participate in society.

In terms of housing, older Albertans may choose to live together in a community of people of similar age and stage of life. Based on the results from our consultation this summer, many Albertans are in favour of allowing seniors-only housing to continue. Bill 23 would also protect the rights of seniors to live in seniors-only housing. The amendments set a minimum age for seniors-only housing at 55 or any age that's older than that. Seniors-only housing will also be required to accommodate, within their age restrictions, special circumstances that are specified in regulation. This could, for example, address issues such as live-in caregivers.

Madam Speaker, we also recognize that many Albertans have made significant investments on the basis of condo bylaws in place at the time of purchase. We want to ensure that Albertans affected by the amendments have advance notice before the changes impact their condominiums. Existing age restrictions in condominiums will be grandparented for a 15-year transition period so that they do not violate section 4 of the act. Age-restricted condominiums, if they wish to, can transition to being seniors-only during the 15-year transition period.

These amendments will also immediately apply to rental buildings as soon as the bill comes into force. This means existing age restrictions in rental buildings will not be grandparented in. Rental units in condo buildings will be subject to the same rules as condo buildings are subject to. On a go-forward basis the only permitted age restriction for rental accommodations would be 55 or some age older than that.

Bill 23 also enables ameliorative programs or activities. This means that programs that seek to improve the situation of disadvantaged people, including creating more inclusive and diverse workplaces, would be allowed. An example of this would be youth employment programs. This exception comes with the requirement that the program or activity be reasonably likely to achieve the ameliorative objective. Currently Alberta is the only jurisdiction in Canada whose human rights legislation does not provide an exemption for ameliorative activities.

If passed, these amendments will come into force on January 1, 2018.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, our government supports all Albertans, and we believe these changes will make life better for them. This bill is an opportunity to embrace the diversity of Alberta and align our legislation with other jurisdictions across Canada.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today to speak to Bill 23, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017. As we all know, this legislation was brought into the Assembly following a January 2017 ruling of the Court of Queen's Bench. The legislation will read "age" into the Alberta Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination as it applies to goods, services, accommodations, or facilities.

As a representative of this Assembly I feel very strongly that we have a duty to Albertans to ensure that discrimination never has a home in this province and that Albertans are given equal opportunity. As Canadians we've always prided ourselves on creating a country that is welcoming and inclusive of all people, and it is because of that that the spirit of the Alberta Human Rights Act exists.

Previously age discrimination was addressed in the Alberta Human Rights Act as it applies to sections 3, 7, and 8; namely, the areas of publication and notices; employment practices and advertisements; memberships in a trade union, employers' organization, or occupational organization. However, it's important for us to ensure that all Albertans, regardless of their age, are also able to have equal access to goods, services, accommodations, facilities, and tenancy.

Madam Speaker, my legislative office has received a fairly significant amount of input from Albertans – I'm sure many members in this room have received the same – based on the perceived overarching reach that this will have for all ministries and all Albertans. We've particularly heard from seniors, who are concerned about how this might affect their access to seniors-only housing, seniors' discounts, tax benefits as well as mandatory retirement and pension plans.

We've also heard from constituents concerned that, in the past, landlords have been able to discriminate against families wanting to rent their homes if they had children under the age of 18, who feel that the current system poses undue hardship on children, pregnant women, parents, and caregivers in general.

We've also heard – and I'm sure that the government did, too – from representatives of the insurance industry, who had concerns about how changing this legislation may affect their ability to calculate actuarially relevant rates, that age is one of the factors used to determine insurance coverage rates since younger, more inexperienced drivers typically pay more for insurance than older, more experienced drivers, as you would expect.

Given some of these large questions about implications for Albertans I was pleased to see many of these issues addressed by specific exemptions. Our seniors, in particular, quite often had strong feelings that at a certain point in their life they choose to live in communities with those of a similar age group and lifestyle. The exemption outlined in Bill 23 for 55-plus is an important step in ensuring that our seniors are given choice and respect.

I'm also glad to see that special benefits for seniors and youths such as seniors' discounts will continue without violating the act. As a mom I am also grateful for children's discounts remaining with the change in this act. This is an important distinction given that offering a benefit to a certain age group is not the same as withholding a benefit from a certain age group.

I'm also pleased to see that current age-restricted condominiums will be grandfathered into this process over the next 15 years to give both property management and residents the time and space to transition to either a 55-plus seniors' residence or to accept tenants and owners of all age groups.

I am pleased to see that policies and programs designated for disadvantaged Albertans will not be seen as contraventions of this act.

Madam Speaker, the exceptions that are being made for minors or classes of minors in defining age are crucial and cover off a significant loophole in this legislation. I would have serious concerns if, perhaps, police would be seen as discriminating against a 14-year-old for their age if they were trying to buy alcohol or tobacco or drive a vehicle unaccompanied or vote in a general election.

While I am pleased to see many of these key issues regarding age being read into the Alberta Human Rights Act, I also have some questions regarding specific programs that may be affected by this change, and I would like to ask the minister to speak to some of these as far as the regulations phase of this legislation is concerned.

Question 1: how will the issue of mandatory retirement and pension plans be addressed? Will the integrity of the bona fide pension plans that have mandatory retirement provisions be addressed in the regulations phase?

Question 2: how will the right of our seniors to a fair and reasonable evaluation for fitness to operate a vehicle be addressed? Will requiring them to be tested be in contravention of the act?

Question 3: will tax benefits for seniors such as income splitting be excluded in the exemptions of benefits for minors and seniors?

How will rental car agencies be affected?

Will a specific list of benefits currently offered to minors and seniors be created, or will the exemptions be a blanket statement?

How will the concerns expressed by insurance companies in regard to their ability to use age as one of the factors to assess rates and coverage options be addressed? Will they be allowed to use the relevant and actual data regarding age to determine insurance premiums? I would assume so in how I read the act, but clarification would be necessary.

How will this information be communicated to the general public to ensure that both renters, landlords, and building owners are aware of their new rights? Will there be assistance in the changing of bylaws for condo boards? Can it be done via amendments? A 15-year period seems sufficient enough that they can wait until there are a few bylaws to be passed and changed at the same time.

Madam Speaker, I'm more than happy to speak to this today. Every man, woman, and child deserves to have the opportunity, the choice in housing, and not to be limited by their age or family status. Landlords will no longer be able to reject tenants with children based on the label of 18-plus buildings. We know this, that the more inclusive we can be and the more we can protect the rights of every Albertan, the stronger we will be as a province.

That being said, this bill has far-reaching and potentially unforeseen consequences that touch all Albertans in some way, shape, or form, so I would very much appreciate the assurances of the minister on the concerns that I addressed – and Albertans certainly would as well – for the regulation phase of this legislation. It's new. It's not uncommon that the act is being updated this way in Canada. We know it's been done before, and we need to close up any loopholes that this may cause or confusion and just be very clear with Albertans.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker and members of this Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It is indeed a pleasure to rise today to speak strongly in favour of Bill 23, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017. Shortly after my election in 2015 I had a constituent who came to see me – she was here in this House just the other day; I had the opportunity to introduce her – and she came to share with me the challenges she faced when leaving an abusive domestic situation. She was looking for safe accommodations in Edmonton's downtown for herself and her daughter, and she found that she faced many challenges in finding a building where she felt safe that also did not have age-restrictive bylaws.

Shortly after that I received an e-mail from a new professor coming into the University of Alberta who had lived in many countries around the world and many different cities and was surprised to find that when he came to Edmonton and looked for a condominium downtown for him, his wife, and his teenaged son, they faced real challenges in finding a building that would allow children under the age of 18.

I began to research the issue, and I was surprised to find that Alberta was the only jurisdiction in North America that currently does not include age as a protected ground of discrimination in accommodations, housing, or tenancy. In the U.S., for example, the Fair Housing Act states that landlords are not allowed to explicitly or indirectly turn away anyone based on their family status or age. And in every other province and territory in Canada their human rights acts forbid discrimination on the basis of both age and family status.

It was interesting to read up on a bit of the history. I understand that when our provincial legislation was updated as the Individual's Rights Protection Act back in 1972, under the government of Premier Lougheed, there was a single MLA who spoke up and suggested that they should consider adding “age” in sections 4 and 5. But after some debate in the Assembly it was decided that age was an issue that affected relatively few Albertans and therefore it wasn’t necessary.

Then in 1994, when the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel did a review of the act, in their report Equal in Dignity and Rights they, in fact, recommended that age be a protected ground in all areas of the Individual’s Rights Protection Act, as the act was then known. However, in the amendments which followed, by which the act was renamed the Alberta Human Rights Act, the government of the day chose not to implement that recommendation.

So that brings us to where we stand today, with Alberta as an outlier in this area of human rights. As a result, for many years, despite the fact that the Alberta Human Rights Act does protect against discrimination on the basis of family status, families in Alberta have faced discrimination from landlords and others who have argued that they aren’t discriminating on the basis of a family having children but on the basis that those children are below a particular age threshold. Bill 23 proposes to right that wrong and to bring Alberta in line with other jurisdictions on what I believe is a key issue of human rights. I’m pleased to hear that on both sides of this House there is support for this bill and that all agree on this point.

I’m proud to stand in support of this bill because access to family-friendly housing is a key consideration in my constituency of Edmonton-Centre. You see, Edmonton’s downtown is growing. As of the 2016 census there were just about 13,000 people living in the downtown proper, with another 18,000 in the adjoining community of Oliver. Of those, about 92 per cent and 95 per cent respectively are living in apartments or condominiums, yet out of that population only 1 and a half per cent are under the age of 18. Now, this is a concern and one that’s been noted by both community and business leaders. In my conversations with the local community leagues – the Oliver Community League, the Downtown Edmonton Community League – they’ve identified the need for more families to enrich our communities in Edmonton’s downtown and told me of the challenges that some of their members have faced in finding that accommodation or retaining that accommodation once they choose to have children.

I also have the honour of being a member of Edmonton’s downtown revitalization task force, a group composed of representatives from the city of Edmonton, the Edmonton Economic Development Corporation, the Downtown Business Association, and major business partners like Stantec, Clark Builders, and the Katz Group. When we met this spring to identify what our key priorities would be, right at the top of that list was advocating for construction of and access to family-friendly housing in the downtown core. Indeed, in their recent report Mapping Growth: A Comparative Look at Downtown’s Transformation (2010-2017) the Downtown Business Association noted:

Making Downtown more family-friendly is one of the [most] important steps by promoting housing that can cater to the needs of families as well as development of supporting infrastructure such as child care centres, parks, and after school programs.

Madam Speaker, downtown Edmonton is currently about halfway to the kind of density that we need to incent and sustain a truly vibrant ecosystem of businesses and services. We aren’t going to be able to get there without embracing families and a truly multigenerational community. With these changes, there is going to be one less barrier to reaching that goal.

Now I’d like to take a moment to clarify precisely how this bill will impact my constituents because, as the Member for Airdrie noted, I think it’s very important that we have clear communication on this. Indeed, I hope that’s something that we will be moving forward with if the bill passes, to ensure that we are providing clear information to the public so they can understand precisely how these pieces will work. First of all, as noted, housing for seniors will not be affected as the bill allows for age restrictions of 55 and up, keeping us in line with all other jurisdictions across Canada and ensuring that seniors can continue to live in a community together with people at the same point in their lives and also to receive services and supports that are appropriate to their needs.

Condominium buildings that currently have an age-restrictive bylaw will have 15 years to either remove those restrictions or bring them in line with the threshold of 55-plus. Anyone who lives in one of those buildings, if it chooses to transition to a threshold of 55-plus, if that individual or a person in their family is under the age of 55, will be allowed to continue to own and live in that suite.

I also greatly appreciate that the minister went one step further in ensuring that she addressed special circumstances. Indeed, when I was having conversations about this in the community, I did hear from seniors that expressed that, you know, they wanted to be able to, if necessary, take care of their grandchildren for a period – that could be due to an accident or some other thing where they might have to temporarily take custody or perhaps permanently take custody – or indeed to be able to have a live-in caregiver, to be able to have their son or daughter who is under the age of 55 stay with them and help them out for a period if needed. So I greatly appreciate that the minister has included the opportunity to add some special exemptions to provide in those circumstances.

In terms of rental accommodations, these amendments will immediately apply as soon as the bill comes into force on January 1, 2018, meaning that age restrictions in rental accommodations will no longer be permitted unless it is a restriction of 55 or older. I greatly appreciate that the minister has been very clear on this point because, as I mentioned earlier, there has been some lack of clarity in that although the AHRA has prohibited discrimination on the grounds of family status for 20 years, for quite some time, that discrimination has continued to take place.

With the addition now of age as a prohibited ground of discrimination, that reinforces our current human rights protections for families with children. It makes it clear that the only permitted age restriction for rental accommodation will be for seniors only. Family status is of course defined as “the status of being related to another person by blood, marriage or adoption.” So for those constituents and others who have approached me and asked for clarity on this point, I will state here again on the record that discrimination on the basis of age in rental accommodations is not allowed in Alberta, and should this legislation pass, it will be doubly clear that it will not be allowed going forward. If anyone should run into such discrimination, they have the ability to file a complaint with the Alberta Human Rights Commission and have the opportunity to bring that forward to be able to push back against that.

Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for doing some very robust consultation on this issue. I know it’s a challenging one. It’s one that I heard from many constituents on both sides of this issue. But I think the minister has done an incredible job of finding a healthy balance between protecting the rights of Albertans, providing them with the same human rights that are enjoyed by all Canadians, ensuring that we are providing a reasonable and just transition period for those who have made investments, and allowing for some good exceptions, some good clarity, and the opportunity for all stakeholders to benefit should this legislation pass.

Thank you once more to the minister. I know this is a bill that's going to bring great benefit to my community.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to stand up and speak to Bill 23, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017. While much of the focus of Bill 23 is on seniors and 55-plus accommodations, over the weekend it was brought to my attention that Bill 23 may also apply to rental cars. Right now a person has to be between the ages of 21 to 25 to be able to get a rental car. With that age barrier, the type of car is restricted, and often the rate charged is a lot higher. Young men and women cannot rent Ferraris or Maseratis or even Corvettes for the weekend.

Madam Speaker, this is blatantly discriminatory. In Bill 23, section 2 reads:

Section 4 is repealed and the following is substituted:

Discrimination re goods, services, accommodation, facilities

4 No person shall

(a) deny to any person or class of persons any goods, services, accommodation or facilities that are customarily available to the public, or

(b) discriminate against any person or class of persons with respect to any goods, services, accommodation or facilities that are customarily available to the public, because of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, gender identity, gender expression, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry, place of origin, marital status, source of income, family status or sexual orientation of that person or class of persons or of any other person or class of persons.

Madam Speaker, I'm reminded of the story of a young person moving to Alberta to take on a new job but being denied by the rental car company the rental of a light truck at the airport because he was 24. The rental company policy was that you needed to be 25 to rent that truck. Now, come on. This is Alberta, land of the light truck: Ford F-150s, Chevy Silverado, Dodge Ram, Nissan Pathfinder, Toyota Tundra. Mark Connolly on CBC Radio One on Edmonton AM has even been talking about the light truck as being the official vehicle of Alberta.

Speaking of those pickup trucks, it reminds me of a blue Dodge Ram pickup truck matching the colour of the Alberta flag, the same as the flag on your left, Madam Speaker. That big blue Dodge Ram truck brought about the unity of the United Conservative Party. Jason Kenney drove all around the province in that truck building the Progressive Conservative Party back together, winning him the leadership. Then once the unity agreement was struck between the PCs and Wildrose, the truck hit the road again to sell the unity deal. Once unity was achieved, the pickup truck hit the leadership race and drove all over the province, winning him the leadership of the new party and racking up over a 100,000 kilometres in 18 short months.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, I think you're deviating a little bit from policy on the debate. If you could maybe bring your conversation back to the bill, please. [interjections] Okay, everybody. I've got it.

Mr. Panda: Madam Speaker, I'm talking about the pickup truck rental. In this House Jason Kenney's name has been taken every single day. I don't know why that worries them. [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, good morning.

If you could please return back to the debate of the bill. You're deviating a little bit around, maybe, the work that the hon. member was up to this summer. It needs to come back to the policy, please.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Speaking of the truck rentals and how this bill impacts that young person who was looking to rent a truck, that young person needed the truck to buy furniture and move it into his new place, not to mention moving the boxes of his possessions he had couriered to the address of his new employer. So what does this enterprising young person do? He pulled out his pilot's licence and quite matter-of-factly told the rental car representative that they were taking the truck. The clerk dutifully complied and loaned him a Dodge 2500.

Yes, Madam Speaker, you can have a pilot's licence in this country at the age of 17 and legally be allowed to rent an aircraft, fly from point A to B, and upon reaching your final destination, with the aircraft on the ground and safely stored away, that pilot cannot rent a car. A commercial pilot can be 18 years old and fly passengers safely from Edmonton to Calgary and back again and, once on the ground, ask for a rental car and be denied. Because they are not old enough, they are denied. This is how stupid regulatory red tape has gotten, another red tape barrier.

It looks like Bill 23 fixes this, in Alberta at least. It is about time that air and ground transportation rules, regulated separately by federal and provincial governments and split by constitutional responsibilities covering rentals, be they for aircraft or cars, be aligned so there is no age discrimination. With that, Madam Speaker, Bill 23 is going to solve some very unique age discrimination issues happening in Alberta.

In fact, Bill 23 may help reduce barriers to growing the economy. Talk about all those young people out in the oil patch servicing equipment. Suddenly those 18-year-olds are more flexible. They can go to town and rent a truck and bring it back to their drilling site. It's red tape reduction.

Now, on the other major point of this bill, the discrimination against the prearranged 55-plus seniors' accommodation, my constituents in Calgary-Foothills have done an admirable job of reaching out to contact me about this important issue. It's a lifestyle choice to live with a similar category of people and enjoy condominiums' organized activities geared to this age category. In this 55-plus category other categories could be pet-free, smoke-free environments. All you cannabis smokers better watch out.

Senior citizens don't want the noise created by children inside and outside the housing units. Some buildings are wood framed and not designed to muffle the noise between the units. If you have teens and twentysomethings having all-night parties next to people who are senior citizens, it does not make for good neighbours or people getting their proper rest to preserve their health. Sometimes the space and facilities inside and outside the buildings, as in 55-plus condo complexes, are not designed for the active needs of children. Where are the playgrounds in the seniors' home, the space to run around?

Also, residents do not want the loss of financial equity in their unit. They paid a premium to move into 55-plus housing. They fear that a flick of the legislative switch will make this premium investment disappear. I think my constituents can rest assured that many of their fears are alleviated. Bill 23 preserves 55-plus living but simply designates it as adult living and provides a 15-year transition period to conform to adult-only living.

I thank the government for bringing this bill forward, and I look forward to following the debate. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Good. Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to Bill 23, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017, which will read age into the Alberta Human Rights Act, specifically as it pertains to tenancy, goods and services, accommodation, and facilities.

Madam Speaker, I respect that this legislation is about battling discrimination. It is important to note that this legislation brings Alberta into line with the rest of the country. As of 2015 the only jurisdictions in Canada that did not offer age-related discrimination protection in the context of rental accommodations and tenancy were Alberta and Quebec.

I recognize that this is a complicated piece of legislation which may have ripple effects throughout many industries that currently factor age into their calculations of services, services such as rental car companies and insurance providers, so I would ask for assurances from this government that these industries will be extensively consulted during the regulations phase of this legislation. Clear communication and documentation should be provided to these stakeholders so that they can clearly implement this policy or, alternatively, appeal it under section 11 of the act, which states that the act can be contravened if it is found "reasonable and justifiable in the circumstances."

The most vocal opponents of this legislation as it was being drafted were seniors and condo owners who contacted our offices to express their frustrations regarding the fact that they deliberately purchased access to adult-only buildings. Our seniors built this province, and they deserve to retire in buildings that provide them with the peace and quiet they need in order to maintain their health. It is also important to note that Albertans under the age of 55 are more likely to have the financial freedom to move elsewhere should a building not fit their needs whereas our seniors have fewer options in terms of relocating. This is why I was very encouraged to see a 55-plus housing exemption written into this legislation.

Consider a working professional in their 40s who does not have children. They bought a condo in downtown Edmonton because it was 18-plus or adults only. This new legislation would mean that, starting in January 2018, families that have children could now be allowed to buy or rent the condo next door to the aforementioned working professional. This would mean that the working professional has two options. They would have a 15-year grace period to move into 55-plus housing, or alternatively they could stay in their current condo and accept the fact that children might move in as their facility transitions away from 18-plus.

Now, Madam Speaker, I have children and grandchildren, and I think that this problem of condo owners wanting to live in adult-only buildings will somewhat remedy itself. I say this because as a father and grandfather, if I had young children, I would be highly unlikely to choose a building to live in that has a concentrated population of, for example, working professionals in downtown Edmonton. Why would I as a parent choose a building that would cause continual headaches of dealing with noise complaints and possibly crabby neighbours when I could choose a building elsewhere that had a more child-friendly vibe?

My point, Madam Speaker, is that this legislation is not going to cause families with children to flood downtown apartments currently occupied by adults who wish to live in buildings without children, but it will protect Albertans from landlords that have been discriminatory, and it will bring Alberta in line with the national trend in Canada. On top of that, should condo owners have strong feelings about their neighbours being under 18 years old, again, they have 15 years to transition to another building that is defined as 55-plus or in another area, and they can make that choice.

I am also encouraged to see that ameliorative programs, so programs designed to help disadvantaged groups, have also been given an exemption in that senior and child discounts will be exempt from this act.

Madam Speaker, I do want to touch briefly on the escape clause of the Alberta Human Rights Act, section 11, which allows the act to be contravened if there are reasonable and justifiable circumstances. I feel that this is critically important to note given that it is this clause that could allow insurance companies, rental car agencies, pension providers, and other stakeholders that may be indirectly affected by this legislation to appeal for an exemption. I am hoping that the government will work with these stakeholder groups during the regulations phase, but I would like to see clarity now on whether these exemptions will be given on an individual basis or if they could be offered on an overarching basis. For example, will each individual rental car company have to petition the courts in order to receive an exemption, or would this government grant a mass exemption to all car rental agencies?

These are questions that I would like answered. I support the spirit and intent of this bill but do want to ensure that the government has a plan in place to deal with unintended consequences that could result from this legislation.

In terms of car rental agencies as well as insurance companies, rates would be adjusted for all users if actuarial age data was not allowed to be factored into coverage or rental rates. This would ultimately do a disservice to Albertans, especially those who have spent years establishing good driving records. Car insurance providers use algorithms based on decades of supporting data, and thus it may be reasonable for them to have variable insurance premiums because they are at different risks.

Madam Speaker, I would like to hear from this government its targeted plans to address my various concerns about implementation. I am all for an inclusive society that protects the basic human rights of all Albertans, but I also want to be sure that the long-reaching effects of the legislation have been carefully considered.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for his comments. Again, I'm very glad to hear the support from both sides of the House for addressing this area of human rights in Alberta and certainly, again, raising I think some reasonable questions, which I look forward to hearing the minister address later as well.

I did just want to make a few comments on one example that the member brought up. I agree with him that in general I don't think the changes in this legislation are necessarily going to lead to a flood of families suddenly moving into buildings that are currently labelled as restricted on the basis of age or adult only, in part because I think that in many of these buildings there are going to be largely one- and two-bedroom suites. For many families that's simply not going to be an attractive option, so they will be looking for areas where they have access to three-bedroom suites or other amenities.

I did just want to address, though, the comment around buildings of professionals in downtown Edmonton. I'm sure it was not the member's intent to feed into, I think, a stigma that exists, but I thought it was important to address it nonetheless. Many families, actually, are interested in living downtown, and indeed in cities around the world families are raised in downtown communities, in small apartments, in tight spaces, and it is a common way of life.

People adopt an urban lifestyle, and here in Edmonton, even if you are living in a downtown condominium, you have the largest park in the world – well, pardon me, not in the world but the largest park in the city – just a few blocks away in the river valley. The city of Edmonton has been doing some great work as well in opening up local parks. The Oliver Community League and the Downtown Edmonton Community League are making great strides in opening up more park space and advocating for more playgrounds within our downtown communities.

Indeed, the city of Edmonton is making some great steps forward. We're seeing increases in child care and other services being available. There are many things that make it attractive for families to move into downtown Edmonton although, admittedly, it is a choice of a different lifestyle than suburban. But there are many, many millennials now who are moving downtown for school or for work and choosing to adopt that as a lifestyle.

I would just also comment that an important thing in terms of us attracting further jobs in our city is having this ability now for more families to be able to live in our central core. That makes it much more attractive for young professionals who want to live close to work, who may want to live a car-free lifestyle, who may want to engage in more active living by walking or biking to work. These are options that are presented to those as well.

That said, I thank the member for his comments, and I appreciate his support of the bill.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Northern Hills.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm glad to have a moment to rise today to speak to Bill 23, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017. You might recall that the need for discussion stems from a court order that was consented to on January 6, 2017. At that time the Alberta government agreed to expand the Alberta Human Rights Act to include age as a protected ground under sections 4 and 5. This was driven by an application brought by Ruth Maria Adria under section 15 of the Charter nearly a year earlier, in March 2016. Because of this a one-year delay was given by the courts to provide the government with time to consider what, if any, exemptions would be appropriate and to address any unintended consequences. Age is currently prohibited grounds for discrimination in the areas other than sections 4 and 5 of the act. Section 4 protects against discrimination when any goods, services, accommodations, or facilities normally available to the public are provided. Section 5 prohibits discrimination regarding tenancy, including both commercial and residential rental accommodations.

Madam Speaker, earlier this spring I received quite a bit of feedback from concerned residents from Calgary-Northern Hills that are living in age-restricted condominiums. They asked that we consider to continue to allow an exemption for age restrictions in condominiums. Many of the letters spoke to a lifestyle choice that residents had specifically made for a whole variety of reasons. Many residents said that they had raised their children and that they don't want to live in close proximity to other people's children at that stage of their lives. Others spoke to a need for peace and quiet and the need for a solitary place. Others said that they preferred a quiet atmosphere, less rowdy activities, and people with shared interests and accountabilities. Others have bought into these units for the need for calm environments and for health-related reasons.

Madam Speaker, I held some consultations in a few of these condo buildings. Both were limited to ages of 40 and over. I noticed that these structures had been designed specifically for that age demographic. The building was like many in Calgary, wood-framed, but the units were in close proximity to each other, and many units had hardwood floors. Since many of the residents were on fixed incomes, there were also concerns about tidiness, and some mentioned that extra costs could arise from extra maintenance fees and what that would do to the monthly condo fees.

Also, many of the residents had health challenges and noticed neighbours taking care of neighbours in these buildings both in times of illness and in times of health. I've been told that they check on each other if someone hasn't shown up for something or is in need of a meal if they can't cook for themselves. It was a repeated concern about residents needing rest periods and quiet time as well. Another comment I heard a few times was: what about my rights for security, peace and quiet?

Madam Speaker, in addition to the research many MLAs did on our own regarding this issue, I'm aware that over the course of the summer the government also consulted with a range of stakeholders, and they had heard many perspectives on the issue. Based on the results of the consultations many Albertans are in favour of allowing seniors-only housing to continue. The amendments set the minimum age for seniors-only housing at 55 or any age older than that. Seniors-only housing would also be required to accommodate within their age restriction special circumstances that are specified in the regulation. This regulation would, for example, address issues such as live-in caregivers. During my own discussions with residents I heard this is a concern as well, and I'm glad to see that it's included.

Madam Speaker, many Albertans have made a significant investment on the basis of the condo bylaws that were in place at the time of purchase. It is important that we ensure that Albertans affected by the amendments have advance notice before changes impact their condominiums. That's why I believe it's important that the existing age restrictions in condominiums be grandparented in for a period of 15 years, a transition period, so that current owners in the 40-and-over buildings do not need to move and can hold onto their investments until they meet the new age limit of 55. The recommended age of 55 or older provides reasonable flexibility for older Albertans in terms of when an individual may choose to move to a seniors-only residence. This applies to the housing where all units are reserved for one or more persons, at least one of whom is 55 or older. It is also consistent with the approach for rental housing in Newfoundland, Saskatchewan, and B.C.

However, in the case of rental buildings these amendments would apply immediately as soon as the bill comes into force. After the bill comes into force on January 1, 2018, the only permitted age restriction for rental accommodation would be 55 and older.

To quote Luanne Whitmarsh, the president of the Alberta Association of Seniors Centres:

The largest increase in demographics is older adults in Alberta. With this proposed legislation change, older adults can be assured of fairness in the areas of tenancy, goods, services and accommodations or facilities. Typically, older adults are not able to increase their financial resources to have a wider range of housing options available to them plus enjoy a life that is usually quieter. The fairness of government proposing 15 years as a transition period is [greatly] appreciated.

Madam Speaker, to wrap up, I feel this bill strikes a proper balance for the needs of many Albertans, and I think it represents an opportunity to embrace diversity in Alberta. It also aligns with legislation in other jurisdictions across Canada, and like much of what this government has done to date, it's long overdue and should provide the certainty that people have requested.

Thank you, Madam Speaker, for the moment to speak.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Good morning. I rise to speak to Bill 23, Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017. In January 2017 a court ruled that age will be read into the Alberta Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground for discrimination in the sections regarding goods, services, accommodation, facilities, and tenancy. The court order takes effect in January 2018 or sooner if the government enacts appropriate legislation. While society has come a long way in reducing and identifying discrimination, there is more we can do. I want to begin by stating that I respect the court's decision to include age as prohibitive grounds for discrimination.

The bill defines age as 18 years of age or older. This is an important point that I want to emphasize because it means that minors will still be allowed to be discriminated against in situations involving alcohol, driving, smoking, voting, et cetera. While age is no longer prohibited grounds for discrimination, there are important exemptions included in Bill 23 that allow for policies, programs, or activities designed to improve the lives of disadvantaged people. For example, there is an organization in Grande Prairie, Sunrise House, which provides emergency shelter to youth between the ages of 12 and 17. They're doing really great work in our community, and Bill 23 shouldn't result in their organization breaking the law.

Another important exception is that benefits to minors and seniors do not fall under discrimination as benefiting a certain age group is not the same as withholding a benefit from a certain age group. That means there is still going to be the seniors' menu at your local eatery and kids will still be eligible for a discount at the swimming pool or amusement park.

This legislation brings Alberta into line with the rest of the country. While the rest of the country may continue to function, that doesn't detract from the important questions and concerns that Albertans have over the impact of this legislation. One of the major concerns that we heard over the summer and through the fall was concern about seniors-only housing. Would seniors be able to live in a facility that catered to their needs without running afoul of the law? I'm happy to say that, yes, seniors will continue to be allowed to live in facilities designated specifically for those over a specific age. Seniors-only housing is defined as 55-plus. Communities can set the age limit to whatever they like as long as it is older than 55 years of age. This applies to all housing where units are reserved for one person 55-plus or multiple persons as long as one of them is at least 55.

Housing that has current age restrictions in place that are lower than 55 will be grandfathered in for 15 years, and that applies to both rental and owned properties, so at least there's some time for some of these other facilities to get into the process where they have to fall in line with this legislation. Like I say, it allows 15 years for that.

Another notable exemption is that section 11 in the code explains that the act can be contravened if it's found to be "reasonable and justifiable in the circumstances." I guess that does allow for some concerns that may come forward that maybe we've overlooked with this legislation.

I'll leave it at that with Bill 23. Obviously, this is something that we need to do as per the courts and also to protect the rights of individuals from age discrimination in Alberta.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Chair. This is a concern that Bill 23 is addressing that is actually one of the very big drivers for one of my constituents. Just to give some, I guess, protection for this gentleman, I'm just going to refer to him as John going forward. Now, John is a fellow that has concerns when it comes to his rights when it comes to his age. He is a senior within the city of Cold Lake.

Now, I'd like to start with an illustration from my own past, my own youth, actually. Now, as I was growing up, I lived out on an acreage, and our neighbours had large, very rambunctious parties, if you will. They used to a couple times a year bring in these huge, huge speakers. You know, when you're young, they looked like they must've been 10 feet tall, but I'm sure they were five feet tall. These speakers, when they would start them, would shake our windows they were so loud. It was very, very much a noise complaint, a reasonable noise complaint. But as my dad and our neighbours got along and as long as this didn't get out of hand, this is something that we accepted as an annoyance that we could get through.

Now, these parties would have people screaming in the middle of the night. We would have fireworks. This would go on till about 5 in the morning. Now, this party was so loud that people across the lake could hear the music. That tells you how rambunctious this party was. Now, again, it happened twice a year, so in the end this one here was something that, while it was a noise complaint, I would argue that in the end the neighbours worked it out on their own.

Now, what happens, though, when neighbours can't work this out on their own? This comes back to where the bill is. I appreciate everybody giving me some rope here, if you will. Now, John has a neighbour that is a youth, and he was having very loud, rambunctious parties several times a month. I can understand that as a senior John was saying: "You know what? This needs to be addressed." Just because this gentleman that is his neighbour is 25 years old is young, it doesn't mean that it gives him the right to be able to impede his ability to enjoy his own property and be able to sleep at night.

Now, he did say: "I understand that I need to give some allowances here. I need to be able find a compromise with him so that he can enjoy his property as well." Now, in the end what we've got here is that the two neighbours, this senior and this youth, couldn't agree on the number of times a year this should happen, so in the end John made complaints to our local bylaw enforcement.

Now, what we saw here was that after the fourth or fifth time he'd made a complaint in one month, the bylaw enforcement said: "This young man is 25. You have to accept that he's going to have parties, and you're just going to have to move past this because we don't want to continue, more or less, coming out to resolve this."

John filed a human rights complaint, and he said that there were two parts to this that are age related. For one, they're saying that because his neighbour is 25, he is allowed to have loud parties right beside John's home, that law enforcement is using that as justification. The other part of this is saying that just because John is potentially old means that he is more sensitive to loud parties beside him. So John filed this complaint with the Human Rights Commission. This was in July of last year. He goes on to say that it's something that he had tried to work out. He had tried to work with his neighbour, but in the end, this was not being resolved, so the only next step for him was to file a complaint.

Now, the response that John had received back from the Alberta Human Rights Commission in a June letter – and I'd like to quote this – was:

You checked off the Box against "Age" discrimination in Section E of your Complaint Form.

They actually had age on the complaint form, so they recognized at that time that age could be something that would be a human rights complaint.

You stated that your "neighbor (about 25 years old)" had "many very noisy parties" and you had complained about the noise to the . . . Respondent. You "made 4 noise complaints" over the relevant period. You stated that the Respondent's Peace Officer provided you with mediation services to resolve your complaint against your neighbor on August 13, 2015. You stated that "the mediation meeting ended with the neighbor promising to be less noisy." You stated that you again complained on May 15, 2016 about your neighbor's "2 very noisy parties" and the same Peace Officer responded to your complaint by phone, and told you "that young people are allowed to have fun" and that you "needed to be more tolerant." You alleged that the "unwillingness to pursue the sanctions provided by the city bylaws" led you to believe that you were treated differently because you are a senior. You stated that there were "no further noise incidents since 15 May 2016".

In this here, to go on, it says underneath My Assessment:

The information you provide appears to indicate that it is your belief that the Respondent's Peace Officer discriminated against you because of your "age". You stated that you are a senior and your neighbor is about 25 years old.

Even though you may believe that you were discriminated against because of your age, please note that under Section 4 of the Act, which deals with "Goods, services, accommodation or facilities", discrimination on the basis of "age" is not a protected ground. I am however glad that there were "no further noise incidents since 15 May 2016".

Now, here's the thing. This gentleman had a legitimate concern. This gentleman said, "I would like to have this before the Human Rights Commission," and the Alberta Human Rights Commission said: "You know what? We're just going to tell you that because it's age, we can't deal with your complaint at all." That's it. Then what happens is that we've got John going on, and he says: "Well, that isn't okay. I am going to take this to the next level. I'm going to appeal the decision of the Human Rights Commission. I am actually going to see what we can do next."

So then we bring the appeal in, and what happens here is that – this is the letter from the Alberta Human Rights Commission on the appeal.

I have reviewed all the information that you have provided to our office, as well as the Human Rights Officer's June 15, 2016 letter to you.

I have enclosed a copy of section 20 of the Alberta Human Rights Act. The Act requires that a person have reasonable grounds for believing that the Act has been contravened. I have also enclosed a copy of section 4 of the Act. The Act lists the protected grounds that apply to the protected area of goods, services, accommodation, or facilities. Age is not a protected ground under this area.

Again, this seems to be something that seems to have, I guess, lapsed.

Now, I do understand the challenges when it comes to age. At some point we need to say that age is something that is relevant in a certain circumstance. That is obvious. With this one here, whether John was right or wrong on all of this, whether John was right or wrong with his complaint, it can be argued that his complaint should have been heard. But in this case his complaint was not heard because he checked a box that said "age" on his form. I guess that I struggle with that.

You know, I have to say that the Minister of Justice – we did forward this letter up to her office – said: you know, we're waiting on a court case. Fair enough. That seemed to be very reasonable. And you know what? The court case came in January of 2017, so this wasn't a long period after that. The Minister of Justice recognized that this was going through the courts and that this was being decided by our justices.

Now, in the end, what happened here is that the judge decided that age needed to be added to our Human Rights Act, and it is to deal with these kinds of complaints. So whether John was correct with his complaint or not is irrelevant. What's relevant here is that we need to be able to bring people's concerns forward when it comes to age. We need them to say that this is right or wrong, not say that just because it's age related, it shouldn't be included or involved in a human rights complaint.

What we've got here is a change that appears to be very reasonable. It's something that is being asked for by one of my constituents to be addressed, and to see that it's being addressed by this government is a step in the right direction, in my opinion, so that we don't see these kinds of things happen to gentlemen like John in my constituency, who has concerns when it comes to municipal enforcement.

I will tell you, going back to my example of my youth, going back to that, that if that happened four or five times a month, where they brought these big speakers out and they were hammering at us, this probably would be a different discussion. This probably would be a noise complaint that needed to be dealt with.

Again, we have to say that it is important that we always ask neighbours to be working this out between themselves first, then we go to the mediation with the peace officers, and if it doesn't work out that way, then there's always the avenue of saying: "Is this impeding my human rights? Is this impeding my ability to enjoy my own property?" Property rights in this case are very important.

Now, I have to commend my constituent John for actually being an advocate in this area. He needs to be acknowledged for the fact that he saw a problem and didn't just say that, well, this is just the way it is. He actually decided to go to his MLA and say, "What can you do about this?" The answer was, "Well, let's see what the minister has to say about this." The minister had a reasonable response, saying, "Let's wait and see where this case goes." In the end, the process worked – this is good – and the fact that we are addressing my constituent's concern is, again, a step in the right direction.

I have to commend the Minister of Justice for bringing this forward. I do see that there are potentially some concerns when it comes to adding age to the Alberta Human Rights Act that we are going to maybe have to deal with as they come along. In the end, people should be able to have their cases heard. It is important that if you check a box off on a form, you're not already being denied the access, the ability to have your case heard before, in this case, a commission.

Mr. Speaker, this is an incredible opportunity that we can move forward with. I think this is great. I would like to close my debate down.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Hon. members, are there any questions under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Nixon: My thanks to the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake. I enjoyed that presentation. It was very, very detailed. In fact, I really enjoyed listening to the situation around his constituent, who he's named John. My question, Mr. Speaker, through you to him would be – and I don't know; I might have missed it at the beginning of the hon. member's presentation – what age bracket was John in? Maybe he could just elaborate a little bit on how John would be impacted if he was, you know, below 55 versus if he was above 55 with this legislation that we're discussing today.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you. Well, a lot of the below 55 and above 55 stuff has to do around housing, I believe. It is important that we start to allow our seniors the ability to be able to congregate in areas where they can be the most comfortable. I have to say that when it comes to our seniors, they usually want to stay in places that they're comfortable in, somewhere where they know people that are around their same age.

You'll find that a lot of families are like this. You'll have areas within Alberta where you'll find a lot of young families, like the cul-de-sac that I live in right now. If you look around the cul-de-sac, the whole cul-de-sac has children, I would argue, probably between five and 13. In this case you can see that we love living in this cul-de-sac because my children have a lot of their friends in our little area that they can play with and not go very far. We also have a playground that is just half a block away.

In this case what we've got here is seniors saying that they want to be able to have condos or areas where they can congregate and enjoy each others' company, still be able to have their family there but be more or less focused on seniors.

Now, in this case here the exception, I would hope, for noise complaints is that it doesn't matter what age you are, whether you're 10 years old or 95 years old. In the end, you shouldn't be discriminated against because discrimination in every form is wrong. We need to always ensure that if there is discrimination, there's a balance to make sure that whatever it is that is happening, it's always something that is in the best interests of the person.

So I have to say thank you for the question. I have to say that in this case I believe that John is going to be pleased with this legislation. I do believe that it protects his rights as a senior but also gives balance – balance – to the whole system.

We've heard from colleagues already that insurance is going to be a struggle and some of these other things like, well, my colleague talking about commercial licensing, and we're hearing about how a 17-year-old can fly a plane but can't rent a car. There are things like this that, in the end, I do agree seem a little strange.

Overall, I think that, again, we'll find that this legislation may not be perfect in its current form, but it is moving in the right direction. As we continue to move the Alberta Human Rights Act forward, we're going to find that there are some things that we're going to have to tweak to make this right.

Thank you again to my hon. House leader. Thank you very much.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Just a question to the member under 29(2)(a). I know in the legislation there was some reference as well to only one member of a household having to be 55-plus for protection. I wonder if you have any thoughts or comments on the fact that that can be a way around this – in fact, you may have very mixed generational tenants in a building – and whether that's of any concern with this, and whether you think that that's going to be addressed by the legislation, you know, to address the concerns of some of the residents of those protected and grandfathered residences.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for the question. I appreciate that. Now, the way I understand it is that seniors-only housing is defined as 55-plus. Communities can set the age limit to whatever they would like as long as it is older than 55 years of age. This applies to all housing where units are reserved for one person 55-plus or multipersons as long as one of them is at least 55. I do have to say that when it comes to our seniors in this case, we're looking at 55-plus. So at least one of them needs to be 55-plus.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Yes. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I think we've had a robust exchange of ideas on Bill 23 this morning, and with the discussion that's accrued, I'd like to move to adjourn debate on the bill.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 24

An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I ask to move second reading of Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances.

Through Bill 24 our government will make life better for Alberta students by ensuring that they can form a gay-straight alliance at their school without being in fear of being outed. We are doing this because every single student in this province deserves a welcoming, caring, and safe place to learn. Our Premier has been very clear that no student in Alberta will be outed, not by Jason Kenney or anyone else, for that matter.

This bill, through a series of amendments to the School Act, will clarify school authority roles and responsibilities around supporting welcoming, caring, respectful, and safe learning environments for student-led organizations, including gay-straight and queer-straight alliances. I must stress that a lot of positive progress has already been made by school authorities, Mr. Speaker, and we know that teachers, principals, superintendents, and parents share our commitment to providing a welcoming, caring, and safe place for students to learn.

Before I get into the specific details of these amendments to the School Act, let me provide you with some additional context around why this legislation is necessary. The School Act was amended in June 2015 with regard to welcoming, caring, respectful, and safe learning environments. Three new sections – 16.1, 45.1, and 50.1 – were added to the School Act at that time.

Section 16.1 created new requirements for allowing students to create an inclusive student organization, which includes but is not limited to GSAs and QSAs. This was intended to be a school-based responsibility. However, it is our understanding that some principals may have been required to seek approval from their school authority when a student requests a GSA or a QSA.

Section 45.1 places responsibilities on school authorities to create welcoming, caring, respectful, and safe learning environments. School boards must create policies and include a code of conduct to address bullying behaviour. Some gaps that we identified, Mr. Speaker, in this section were that a code of conduct has to be publicly available but the supporting policies do not, and also it only applies to public school authorities and not private school operators that receive public monies.

Section 50.1 of the School Act currently states that parents may be notified of instructional time that focuses on topics related to religion or human sexuality. This is in place so that parents can choose to remove their child from these specific lessons. Again, some school authorities have asked my ministry to clarify whether or not GSAs or QSAs fall within this section of the School Act and that they should notify parents when their child joins one.

As you can see, after new sections of the School Act came into force, we began seeing inconsistencies in the way in which school authorities were interpreting and meeting these requirements. That's why in November 2015 I directed all school authorities to submit policies to Alberta Education. When we reviewed these policies, we did find some inconsistencies. That is why the proposed amendments in this bill are so important, because I believe that they provide the clarity that is required. While the changes made to the School Act in 2015 were a step in the right direction, our government also noticed some inconsistencies, so that's why we're looking to strengthen existing legislation through Bill 24.

Bill 24 will amend section 16.1 of the School Act to clarify the role of school authorities and principals in supporting students who want to create a GSA or a QSA. Typically principals are responsible for supporting student clubs, and they do not have to seek approval from their school authority. The proposed amendments were to clarify that the superintendent and the school authority are not part of the establishment process for a student organization, including a GSA or a QSA. Section 16.1 would also be amended to clarify that when students request a GSA or QSA in their school, their principal must assist them in a timely manner and allow the students to choose a name, which could include "GSA" or "QSA." Amendments to this section will also help to ensure that responsibilities of principals and the rights of students are clear.

Section 45.1 of the School Act will be amended to require all school authorities that receive public funding to develop policies and make them publicly available. This new legislation will ensure that every school in Alberta that receives public dollars has a policy that clearly allows students to form a gay-straight alliance if they choose. Making policies publicly available will help to ensure that school authorities provide transparency and accountability to the students and the communities that they serve. This section would also be amended to give the Minister of Education the authority to deem all or part of a policy onto a school authority. The ability to deem a policy would be in place only if necessary. However, Alberta Education staff will first work with the school authorities as issues might arise.

Bill 24 would also amend section 50.1 of the School Act to clarify that parental notification around courses of study would not apply to student participation in a club, including a GSA or a QSA. We know that Alberta parents love and support their children and that they play a critical role in the children's lives and education, but we also know that some students might feel safer and more comfortable talking about these issues with their peers. This legislation makes it clear that no student will be outed for joining a QSA or a GSA. It does not prevent students from having conversations with their parents.

What it does do is to make clear that no politician or anyone else would be able to out gay students. Jason Kenney suggested earlier this year that schools should be able to out LGBTQ students to their parents, and that, Mr. Speaker, is dangerous. We're trying to create a safe and caring environment and a safe sanctuary for students in a GSA, and we cannot compromise the integrity of that. This will provide clarity to school authorities who are currently unsure and help to protect students who may not have shared their participation in a GSA or a QSA beyond their school community for safety reasons.

If passed, the amendments would come into force immediately. However, the ability for the Minister of Education to deem a policy would come into force on April 1, 2018, and the requirement for school authorities to post their policies publicly would come into force on June 30, 2018. We recognize that if this bill is passed, some school authorities might need some time to ensure that they are meeting these new requirements, and we believe that the bill coming into force on June 30 will provide school authorities with the necessary time to update their policies and practices, if needed, and publish their policies online. Some school authorities may post their policies publicly prior to June 30, which is why the ability to deem a policy would come into effect earlier.

I hope I have provided some useful explanation of the amendments proposed through Bill 24 and highlighted the purpose of this legislation. Every student, Mr. Speaker, deserves a welcoming, caring, and safe place to learn, and these amendments will help to make lives better for students by emphasizing their rights and clarifying school authority rules and responsibilities.

I have visited a number of GSAs throughout my time as Minister of Education and talked to students who have joined these alliances. I have heard time and time again how important these alliances are, and in some cases they can in fact help to save lives. These safe places are places for students to just get together and visit, maybe share lunch, and sometimes have difficult conversations that they feel that they might not be able to share with certain people at a certain time in very sensitive moments in their lives. I have heard stories of students who have become part of a GSA or a QSA to talk to their peers about things that they don't feel comfortable talking about with other people, only to develop the courage to come out to their friends and family after they establish some confidence in themselves and in others.

Mr. Speaker, these can be very powerful and important places. GSAs indeed can help to change a student's life and, I would venture to say, help to improve the overall atmosphere of a school community to ensure that we're looking after everybody in a place that helps to provide the security and the comfort to improve the quality of a sense of community for everybody in a school.

Every single student deserves to feel safe and cared for in all of our schools. This, Mr. Speaker, is a basic human right. As Ace Peace, a grade 12 transgender student from Calgary, so eloquently put it last week, and I quote: I don't understand why this is so scary to some adults; as far as I can tell, it's only scary if you're a kid; it's only scary if you're the kid and an adult wants to out you and you're not ready; that would make you unsafe.

Mr. Speaker, I do have to wonder about the same thing. We should not be doing anything that prevents student safety. In fact, we should be ensuring this for all students, and this bill would do just that. We see demonstrable gains in places where there are GSAs in terms of student safety, in terms of creating a better atmosphere for kids. You know, ultimately, that helps to increase attendance rates and graduation rates, reducing stress in the larger community as well as of those who choose to join a GSA or a QSA.

Ace Peace also said: although this journey has not always been easy, it has been one where I have been surrounded by love, support, and acceptance every step of the way. As time goes on, he's been sad to learn that it's not always this way for kids like him. Some kids, for different reasons, don't feel safe to come out. Some kids aren't as lucky as he was to have such an awesome family. For these kids, sometimes GSAs are the only thing that they have. GSAs are the only safe place that they have. He says that he doesn't want to imagine what it would be like for them if they would be outed for attending, and he's even scared to think about that.

It's important to listen to students, right? They are the ones in our schools living through these things. We should be doing whatever we can to protect them, and I would venture to say that this legislation would do that, Mr. Speaker. I know that across this province there have been thousands of conversations around kitchen tables on ensuring that human rights in Alberta are extended to everyone. We had those conversations. We had students at schools and school boards building policies. You know, I think that we have all been edified as a result. I believe that Bill 24, if proclaimed, will ensure just that.

Mr. Speaker, I'm so proud of the work that everyone has done to help support LGBTQ students from across the province. I'm also very proud of Albertans engaging in a thoughtful and authentic manner around this issue and on how we can move Alberta forward. I believe that this legislation is a big step forward, and I certainly hope that all of our members here feel the same way and support me in moving forward with Bill 24.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for . . .

An Hon. Member: Drayton Valley-Devon.

The Speaker: . . . Drayton Valley-Devon. My apologies.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One of these days we will both remember where we are from.

Mr. Speaker, this Legislature, my constituents, and anyone who has a passing knowledge of me knows that I was a high school teacher for 30 years in the town of Drayton Valley. After 30 years of teaching you have probably faced almost every situation that you can think of. Education always starts with a relationship, and it is always a three-way relationship between the educator, the parents, and the student. It's been my experience that this tripartite relationship was and, I believe, will always be the foundation of a successful educational experience.

Like all relationships, this partnership of educator, parent, and student takes effort to keep it healthy. Like all relationships, it is dependent upon mutual respect, trust, open lines of communication, and a recognition of the separate roles that each part of this educational compact is expected to fulfill. I do not think that I am breaking any trade secrets when I say that each part of this triumvirate are imperfect people.

There were times in my 30 years as a teacher when I blew it. There were times when I had to apologize either to a student or to a parent. But it was equally true over my 30 years that when a student or a parent would cross the line, we would have to address the breakdown in relationship that had occurred before any effective learning was going to occur. I start here because it is vitally important that our schools continue to remain institutions that promote open dialogue and respect between the educator, the parents, and the students. I believe that this is doubly so when a teacher is dealing with a student that is in crisis.

Over the course of my school career I have faced almost every crisis situation that I can think of. I've broken up fights, I've attended students suffering from epileptic grand mal seizures, I've taped ankles, I've rushed kids suffering severe concussions to the hospital, I've attended students hit by vehicles, and responded to incidents where students almost lost their lives. I've assisted students with Bell's palsy, I've provided emergency shelter to students without a place to stay, and I've tried to help mend broken hearts and defend the bullied from bullies. I've intervened to ensure that language in my classroom was respectful, and I've walked through the issue of respectful T-shirts and hats. Maybe most importantly, Mr. Speaker, I've grieved and I've tried to console my students as we've had to live with too many deaths that have occurred in my school, whether those deaths were by cancer or by suicide or by accident.

In all of those 30 years I have come to some very clear conclusions supported by professional expectations. As a teacher I could never walk away from a student that was at risk, nor could I ever wilfully place a student at risk. Every student deserves a safe and caring school environment, and as an educator I had a responsibility to protect the children in my care while recognizing that I was not the parent. That was a balance that always had to be maintained. For all of the fact that I was an educator – and I was an educator that cared for my students – I did have limits. I was not the parent, and I had to respect the fact that even if I did not understand a parent's decision, I would most likely have to respect it. There were many times when I and a student would, for example, want them to play basketball, but a parent would decide that this was not in their child's best interests, and I would have to respect it.

I mention this because I truly believe that one of the important things that help to make education function well is when everyone in this three-part relationship works together and respects the limits of their roles. Education works best when educators are educators, parents are parents, and students are students. When a student begins to believe that they are a teacher, things start to fall apart. When parents begin to believe they are a teacher, then things start to function less smoothly.

Educators are not the parents of the children they teach, and they must respect the unique family units that their students come from, whatever their variety. Educators must respect and must support reasonable parental decisions. Educators must use wise judgment when making decisions about the children under their care. Safety always comes first.

Parents were always part of the equation. My students were always unique and special – of course, some were more special than others – and my job was to hold the three-way relationship together as best that I could, in the most professional manner that I could. My 30-year career reinforced what I learned as a parent: that no one will love my kids more than me.

As a teacher I saw the remarkable lengths that parents will go to ensure that their children have a successful educational experience. I witnessed love in action over and over and over. I witnessed it every day and at every parent-teacher interview, that the parents of the students that I taught loved them even more than life. They loved them enough to discipline them. They loved them enough to make the hard decisions that every parent has to sometimes make.

During parent-teacher interviews there were times when we would laugh and there were times when we actually cried. There were times when I had the opportunity to praise the children and the parents, and there were also times sometimes when we would get so frustrated that we would need to have a time out.

I only rarely met a bad parent. Yes, there were times when I had to intervene to ensure the physical safety of a child from an out-of-control parent. But in spite of those very rare circumstances over 30 years I believe that the vast majority of parents love their children and make good decisions in their children's lives and can be trusted to make the difficult decisions in their children's lives. It is because of these life lessons, it is because of my intimate understanding of the three-part relationship that makes up education that I will not be supporting Bill 24.

I truly hope this bill was brought forward with the best of intentions. I wholeheartedly support a number of the aspects of this bill. For one, this bill mandates the creation and the maintenance of a welcoming, caring, respectful, and safe environment in all schools across Alberta. Mr. Speaker, I truly believe that everyone in this Assembly supports that initiative. Everyone in the education community, I believe, supports that initiative, and I believe that all Albertans support it as well.

As a teacher, instilling a positive environment in the classroom was paramount. Ensuring that every student could come into class and feel secure and respected was a key component of instituting a successful learning environment, and it remains that way for teachers all across this great province of Alberta, which is why I trust these highly trained educators to use their professional judgment, to make decisions which are in the best interests of children that they see five days a week, 10 months a year.

It should be these teachers in conjunction with administrators and school counsellors who decide the best course of action for each student. It should not be up to politicians sitting in this place, far removed from the school, far removed from the community, and far removed from the children themselves, who make those determinations. Those teachers, principals, and counsellors see these kids every single day, and we need to provide these professionals with the ability to use their professional discretion. They already do this every single day in every community and school across Alberta.

This bill treats every situation in every community across this province as the same, and I just can't see the logic in that. Nothing is more important than protecting children, but I just do not see how removing discretion from teachers and principals and counsellors achieves that goal.

I also have serious concerns that this bill makes no distinction for the age of the child. Clearly, there are vast psychological, physiological, and emotional differences between a 17-year-old and a five-year old, yet this bill treats every child and every situation as the same. Many five-year-olds would eat dessert for every meal of the day if they were allowed to make all of their own decisions. How many would choose to do math when they could do social studies – what I taught – or phys ed? It is why parents and teachers in combination and co-operation must step in and offer guidance and support to raise healthy and productive adults.

These are just little kids. Bringing in complex topics which require a great deal of emotional maturity and doing so without the involvement of their parents is not a recipe for success with children, which brings me to my next point. While the Premier and I disagree on a great many things, we do agree, at least, on one thing: parental choice in education is the law, and it needs to be respected by the government. Section 50.1(1) of the School Act clearly states:

A board shall provide notice to a parent of a student where courses of study, educational programs or instructional materials, or instruction or exercises, include subject-matter that deals primarily and explicitly with religion or human sexuality.

On this the Premier and I agree. On October 24 she stated – and I quote – that parents have the right and have had the right for a very, very long time to pull their kids from curriculum and education around sexual health, and they will continue to have that right. As the Premier said, parents have the right to pull their kids from curriculum and education around sexual health. Mr. Speaker, this has been the law in Alberta for a very long time.

Clearly, the Premier agrees with this section of the law, as does the government, because we are two and a half years out from the last election and the law still stands, which is why I was confused when I read through Bill 24. This bill, Mr. Speaker, amends the School Act so that section 50.1(1) does not apply to extracurricular activities. That means that material which would require parental notification if it was taught or addressed before 3:30 p.m. can now be taught in an after-school setting without any parental knowledge whatsoever. This change seems inconsistent with the Premier's public position on the School Act, and I just cannot fathom why this change was made.

Clearly, if there are materials, information, or subject matters which require parental notification before they are addressed in a school-based, school-sanctioned setting, that notification should be required whether it occurs at 9 or at 2 or at 3:45. Parental notification for matters that deal explicitly with human sexuality and religion does not expire at a particular time, and it should not be ignored because the final bell of the day has rung. Involving parents along with teachers and students is an essential part of creating a healthy, successful environment in our schools, balanced with the realization that students need to be safe and that teachers, not politicians, are best able to untie this Gordian knot of informing parents.

As I mentioned earlier, I truly do wish that this bill was brought forward with the best of intentions. However, I am concerned that the NDP introducing this bill at this time is a political ploy by the government to divert attention from their disastrous economic record and ever-decreasing polling numbers. The NDP did not propose these changes in its first two years in government, did not propose these changes during the election, nor did they propose these changes when Bill 10 was being debated. It's no coincidence that the NDP is introducing this bill now. It is very unfortunate that this bill is being used as a partisan political wedge when we should all be striving, Mr. Speaker, to work collectively to improve the lives of our children.

That brings me back to where I began. I have dedicated over 30 years of my life to educating children. I tried to make every child who came into my classroom feel safe and respected, and I have worked in conjunction with my fellow teachers, our administrators, and the school counsellors to deal with each crisis situation in the most responsible, careful, and respectful manner possible. Oftentimes these situations included the involvement of parents. The vast majority of parents in this province are loving individuals who would do anything in their power to support their children in any way possible. I do not think that treating all parents as inherently hostile is positive for teachers, for parents, and definitely not for children.

All educators who come into contact with children at the school are highly trained professionals . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my profound honour to rise in the House this morning to speak in support of Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances. In my view and in the view of the Alberta Party, this is a timely piece of legislation that both strengthens gay-straight alliances in Alberta's schools and reflects the social values of 21st-century Alberta. Most importantly, this is a bill that recognizes the unique needs and experiences of LGBTQ students while protecting and empowering them. Bill 24 demonstrates meticulous consultation with various stakeholders, most especially with those who benefit from the confidentiality, safety, and security of GSAs and QSAs. I congratulate my colleagues across the floor for defending queer youth, a constituency that is forgotten and misunderstood too often in Alberta and in this House.

This morning Hansard and the Alberta Legislature Library confirmed that the first mention of the word "homosexuality" in this House was in 1974, when a Social Credit member from Calgary asked the government if students at the U of C would receive credit for attending lectures on homosexuality and sex work, as if learning about diversity and human sexuality was something to be ashamed of. Moreover, the member asked whether or not the Ministry of Advanced Education would be funding these lectures, thereby implying that these events were undeserving of public funds.

We have come a long way since then, Mr. Speaker, and that is because of the tireless work of intersectional LGBT activists, open-minded politicians, queer theorists and scholars, and Albertans who believe in a progressive future.

When I take a step back and look at the broader picture of this legislation and try to understand its impact, the word that comes to mind is "kindness." While we in the Alberta Party may propose amendments to this legislation to better protect GSAs, the spirit of the legislation is one of kindness, and that is something we can all get behind. In the words of the iconic Lady Gaga, "The really fantastic thing about kindness is that it's free . . . and it can't hurt you or anybody else. It's the thing that brings us all together."

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood under 29(2)(a). Is that correct?

Connolly: No, not 29(2)(a).

The Speaker: Please proceed.

Connolly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today as cosponsor of Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances, to express my support for this bill. This bill ensures that every school that receives public dollars will follow the same rules when it comes to LGBTQ-plus rights.

LGBTQ-plus rights are human rights, Mr. Speaker, no matter what the opposition says. That is why it is important that all schools be required to protect the privacy of students that join a GSA or a QSA. When you're an LGBTQ-plus student, it often feels like you're the only person in the world who feels that way. It can be incredibly lonely. I came out to my school in grade 11, but I wasn't ready to come out to my family. This is actually very common among LGBTQ-plus youth. I came out to one friend in grade 9, then another friend in grade 10, and then at the beginning of grade 11 I was tired of living a lie at school, so I decided to come out to more and more people until I was out to the entire school.

I was very afraid. I was afraid that I was going to lose all of my friends. Many of my friends were religious, and coming from an agnostic and atheist family, I wasn't sure which sects my friends belonged to or even which sects would support me as gay. I was also very afraid that they would look at me differently, that people would spread nasty rumours about me, my sexual orientation, and my nonexistent love life. People asked me if I was sure, if it was a phase, why I hadn't told them sooner, if I wanted to go shopping with them to pick out new shoes. It was interesting, but no one asked me what I needed, because I really needed support.

When LGBTQ-plus youth can't find support at home or at school, they look elsewhere. We look elsewhere. That's why so many LGBTQ-plus youth end up in precarious situations like hooking up with people who prey on LGBTQ-plus youth using apps such as Grindr or Scruff or any other LGBTQ-plus dating or hookup app. When our youth can't find the supports they need, when our youth can't find or see or talk to LGBTQ-plus adults who can help and mentor them, who can answer their questions, who can be there for them and talk to them when they're feeling down, they look anywhere for that mentorship. When we refuse to talk about LGBTQ-plus rights in schools, when we refuse to give kids safe spaces to talk about what's going on in their minds and bodies, they turn to places that no child should have to.

I personally didn't turn to Grindr for help. I turned to depression and thoughts of suicide. I had no LGBTQ-plus people my own age to talk to. I felt so alone in the world that I felt that I'd be better off dead than to continue high school as a gay kid. Frankly, this is why GSAs are important. It provides a safe place for kids to go to talk about who they are and what they're feeling. It stops our youth from jumping into the arms of people who prey on LGBTQ-plus students.

What Jason Kenney in the opposition refuses to understand is that GSAs save lives. I have received e-mails from so many LGBTQ-plus youth, parents, teachers, and faith leaders who have told us why these GSAs and not outing students are important. One student from Jasper wrote me a letter saying:

The GSA is a really safe place for me to be, but it wasn't always. When my parents found out about me, I was grounded and it caused problems within my family. We have worked out our problems since, but I was not ready to be out. [This bill] would improve lives of LGBTQ+ youth, if there was no risk of being outed by our schools.

Ainsley Koebel.

A student from Calgary wrote to me and said:

The discussion of queer rights shouldn't be as complicated as it's made out to be. The fact that we have decided we need to talk about whether or not a group of people deserves rights is just wrong. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights states that you deserve the right to privacy, and that no one has the right to interfere with your reputation by violating your privacy. When a kid joins a GSA, there's a very good chance they're scared out of their skin. The very notion that they'd attend such a club would have them punished way more severely than they should be if their parents were to hear of it. Some parents never really get it. A lot of parents do end up on board and supporting their kid, but it is up to the child to decide when the time is right to tell their parents about their identity. No teacher, school, or government has the right to tell a parent something they should be learning from their own children.

That's from Sean Ruhland, a trumpet enthusiast.

These are just two of the many letters that I've already received from students across the province. Jason Kenney and the UCP don't seem to understand why this bill is important and why not outing kids saves lives. The main reason the LGBTQ-plus community makes up a larger percentage of homeless youth is because people come out to their parents or are outed and are forced to leave.

When we have politicians like the members of that side of the House spewing their hateful, bigoted ideology about LGBTQ-plus kids, it only makes matters worse for our youth. The words of Jason Kenney and the members of that side of the House matter to our youth, and the fact that they are opposing this based on social conservatism and the hatred for the LGBTQ community is disgusting. The members opposite should be ashamed of themselves. They're endangering our youth, they're causing unneeded strife and stress for our youth, and they're showing Alberta that if, God forbid, they are ever back in power, they will do nothing but take our province back to the age where only straight cis white men have power and the rest of us are forced to the back of the bus. Our LGBTQ-plus youth need us, and your dangerous ideology is killing them.

The Speaker: Are there any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I deeply appreciated the words my colleague shared. Actually, now that I do look at the clock, I see that we're coming up on time, and I'll look for another opportunity. I did want to say thank you very much to the Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Mr. Speaker, on this issue, the first place we should be going and the first people we should be hearing from are LGBTQ youth. They are the ones who have this experience. They are the ones who have been there. They are the ones that know what will keep them safe. So I appreciate this member sharing from his experience. I look forward to hearing from all members in this Chamber about the youth they have spoken to and the members of the LGBTQ community they have spoken to in forming their opinions and views on this bill.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Acting Deputy Government House Leader.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. With that, I would move that we adjourn debate and call it 12 o'clock.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:59 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, November 7, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly the ambassador of Ireland to Canada, His Excellency Jim Kelly.

Our province's bond with Ireland is long standing, with nearly 540,000 Albertans of Irish ancestry. His Excellency's visit has allowed us to explore opportunities for Alberta and Ireland to grow our relationships in many areas. With opportunities emerging in fast-growing sectors like clean tech, life sciences, and information and communications technology, there is potential to expand not only trade but to form partnerships in areas like education and research. We look forward to working with His Excellency on expanding and strengthening our relationship with Ireland.

I now ask the ambassador to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Stony Plain.

Ms Babcock: Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing me to stand and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Legislature a group of grade 9 students from SML academy in Stony Plain and their teacher, Mrs. Vanessa Hamilton. I had a chance to meet briefly with them, and they asked what my most important job is in the Legislature. I said that my job is to advocate for our communities and the people that live there. I'm really proud to have them here today, and if they would stand up, we could all give them the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Are there any other school groups, hon. members? The hon. Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park.

Cortes-Vargas: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly Ardrossan elementary school. I think they're all over the two galleries. I'd just ask them to stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly. I welcome also Miss Tara Kammerer, Karson Campbell, Richelle Krys, and all the parents accompanying them. They've been an absolute pleasure to work with and to go visit. Please give them a warm hand.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to introduce to you and through you to all members of the House an executive group with the International Association of Fire Fighters. This group in particular are the best looking and the most charming of them all. These are everyday people with a purpose and passion for the work and the people and community they serve. I'm pleased to introduce through you six such individuals from the Fort McMurray fire department who I'd ask to please rise as I say their names: Robert Van Hecke, Patrick Duggan, David Maki, Ryan Pitchers, Hunter Langpap, and a new guy I don't know, Curtis Robinson. Please stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: You must well appreciate that the Fort McMurray firefighters have a special place in this House. Welcome.

The Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly four guests today on behalf of the Minister of Finance. I ask them to rise as I call their names: Greg Pollock, who is the CEO of Advocis; Rob McCullagh and Kelly Smith, co-chairs of the provincial advisory committee; and Wade Baldwin, past chair of the Advocis board of directors. Advocis counts more than 12,000 members Canada-wide across 40 chapters. They're the oldest and largest membership association of financial advisers and planners in the country. I ask that they now receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce some of Alberta's perioperative nurses. This week we celebrate Perioperative Nurses Week. These nurses specialize in the care of patients immediately before, during, and after surgery, and we know that they are vital members of patient-centred, team-based care. I now ask these guests, who are seated in your gallery, Mr. Speaker – Barbara Mushayandebvu, Rana Sleiman, and Darlene Rikley – to rise and receive our traditional warm welcome and the appreciation of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce a number of bright young people who are seated in your gallery today, the members of the Council of Alberta University Students, one of whom you know very well as she worked in your office for a year. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and to all members of the Assembly these outstanding young leaders.

CAUS represents the interests of more than a hundred thousand university students from the universities of Alberta, Calgary, Mount Royal, MacEwan, and Lethbridge. I've gotten to know these students over the summer, and I'm looking forward to continuing to work with them to make life better for all of Alberta's university students.

I ask them to rise as I introduce them. With us today we have Reed Larsen, Conner Peta, Marina Banister, Hailey Babb, Aria Burrell, Stephanie Nedoshytko, Branden Cave, Puncham Judge as well as Josh McKeown, who is going to be working for the Department of Advanced Education in the very near future. I'm excited to have him onboard. I ask the members of the Assembly to give them all a traditional warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you. It's my absolute pleasure to rise and introduce to you and through you one of the huge champions in my life. You know, Mr. Speaker, that in this arena and this business there are only a few people who continue to stand by us through the ups and downs no matter what circumstances life throws at you. This is one of those people, whether he was protecting me from my little brother or beating me as my big brother. It's my absolute pleasure to introduce to you – I invite him to rise and receive the traditional welcome of the Assembly – my brother Jeremy Cooper.

The Speaker: Welcome, big brother.

The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I don't know if I can compete with our Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo in introducing these fine gentlemen that I'm going to present next. These are firefighters from my constituency of Chestermere-Rocky View. If I could please have Glenn Jefferies, Jeff Salkeld, Bill Wohl, and Chad Peacock stand to receive the warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to introduce to you and through you to all members of the House members of Advocis, the Financial Advisors Association of Canada. A delegation of over 40 small-business financial advisers are holding meetings at the Legislature today. For more than 100 years Advocis members have delivered financial security and peace of mind through high ethical and professional standards. Advocis is also having their reception this evening at the Royal Glenora Club. I look forward to seeing all my colleagues there. My guests are seated in the public gallery. I ask them to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Affordable Child Care

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to speak about one of the most important initiatives launched by this government, affordable, $25-a-day child care. When I meet with parents of Calgary-Currie on their doorsteps, at community events, and at the grocery store, this is the most popular question they ask. In fact, just last week I met a mother in Rosscarrock who told me she paid $65 a day and was forced to decide whether she could afford to go back to work and place her child in care. She could not, and she is not alone.

All across this province child care is one of the single largest expenses families have. According to a 2016 study the average fees in Calgary for infant care are about $50 a day. Parents with toddlers saw their fees go up by 12 per cent between 2014 and 2016. Not only is child care expensive, but 60 per cent of all Calgary child care centres have wait-lists, and this is a program that creates much-needed spaces. To date Alberta's new $25-a-day child care initiative is funding approximately 1,300 licensed child care spaces; 714 of these are new. And for those vulnerable families working shift work or multiple jobs, a portion of these child care centres are available outside the normal hours of 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., Mr. Speaker.

It is also creating jobs, jobs for those MRU students that Minister Larivee and I met last week who are passionate about early learning and child and youth care. Because of this program approximately 120 new child care staff have been hired to support these new spaces and additional enrolment. For families, this program means that an estimated 357 Albertans can re-enter the workforce. There is no question that Alberta's new $25-a-day early learning and child care centres are making life better and more affordable for families across the province every single day, Mr. Speaker, and the people of Calgary-Currie want to see even more of them.

The Speaker: Hon. members, with your permission I would ask for unanimous consent for acknowledgement of guests who are with us today if you would be prepared to consider that.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker, for indulging me. It's my absolute honour and pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly actually the best firefighters in this province – they are from Airdrie – I would like to say a friend of mine, Mr. Matt Elgie, and Trevor Breitenbucher. I want to call you Trevor B. because there's no way I can pronounce this name. I had the honour and pleasure of attending a firefighter training session with the members of the Airdrie fire department and the Calgary fire department, and I got an insight into the dangers that they face and the hard work that they do for each and every one of us so selflessly. We thank them for that. With that, would you please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and democratic renewal.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly members of the Alberta Fire Fighters Association. We have with us today the president of the AFFA, Craig Macdonald, as well as fellow executives Brad Readman, Brent Shelton, and Jason Curry. The Alberta Fire Fighters Association represents thousands of firefighters across the province. They are committed, passionate, principled, and they have advocated for decades to ensure that firefighters have a strong voice in protecting the advancement of fire services in Alberta and ensuring that our firefighters remain safe on and off the job. I would like to thank them for everything that they do and for the work that they do to advocate for their members, their ongoing work for the safety and health of their members. I would like to ask them and all members of the AFFA who are in our House today to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome, and thank you from the House.

Soviet Communism

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, 100 years ago the Bolshevik revolution unleashed a reign of terror that echoes through history. The Soviet communist regime, installed by the Bolsheviks in 1917, went on to oppress hundreds of millions behind the Iron Curtain during seven decades of brutal political violence. From Lenin's famine of 1921 to constant purges and deportations, from the genocidal Holodomor in Ukraine to concentration camps of the gulag, Soviet communism brought death and destruction to some 20 million people. My own family suffered from this communist terror, fleeing from almost certain slaughter and leaving behind all worldly possessions as refugees from Lenin's dictatorship of the proletariat, my father only 10 years old and the eldest of five children at the time.

The communist ideology that came to power on this day in 1917 went on to imprison most of eastern and central Europe. For example, this week we mark the anniversary of the 1956 Hungarian uprising, when the democratic dreams of brave Hungarians were crushed by Soviet tanks; Polish Independence Day, when we celebrate the freedom of a nation that suffered decades of communist oppression; and the anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall, when Germans brought down the Iron Curtain.

Mr. Speaker, these and other crimes are detailed in The Black Book of Communism, in which leading historians estimate that communist regimes are responsible for the deaths of some 94 million people from Katyn to the killing fields of Cambodia, from Mao's great leap forward to the North Korean concentration camps. So today I ask all members and Albertans to pause and reflect on these innocent victims, most of whom lie in forgotten and unmarked graves. In remembering them, we regret that most of their oppressors were never brought to justice and that today some of the symbols of this evil ideology are considered fashionable, with apologists continuing to deny or diminish crimes against humanity.

We are grateful for Canada being a refuge for so many victims of communism like my own family, and we rededicate ourselves to being forever vigilant in the defence of freedom and human dignity.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

New Red Deer College Green Energy Residence

Ms Miller: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to celebrate the announcement that Red Deer College will be making a $19 million investment into a new main campus residence. The five-storey, 145-unit facility will provide increased space for more students to live and study on campus. It will only be footsteps away from the brand new Gary W. Harris Canada Games Centre, giving students access to state-of-the-art recreational and fitness facilities. I'm pleased to note that the first floor of the residence will be barrier free, providing accessible housing to those with mobility issues.

Also, this building will be an impressive example of alternative energy investment. The use of solar panels covering the east, west, and south facades will reduce both utility costs and their carbon footprint. More impressively, the college will use this technology for training and education purposes, linking this to the development of an alternative energy lab. Giving students the opportunity to learn about alternative energy resources in a period of increased energy diversification is a strong investment into the future of RDC, their students, and the energy industry in this province.

This investment into the facilities available to students in Red Deer and central Alberta is a sign that Red Deer College is succeeding in their goal of being a world-class postsecondary institution. I thank RDC for their commitment to this project and environmental stewardship and commend them on their pursuit of making Alberta and Red Deer places that students will more readily call home.

Thank you.

Pipeline Opposition

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, a government running deficits and debt cannot continue to be a compassionate and caring government, but the one with a balanced budget can be. Through developing our God-given natural resources, we can grow prosperity to balance those budgets. As per the Premier's own royalty review expert, Peter Tertzakian, demand for oil is not going anywhere but up. The global market for Alberta's oil does indeed look good. OPEC sees more global demand despite electric cars, rising to 102.3 million barrels per day in 2022 and trillions of dollars of investment in upstream.

Meanwhile the environmentalists who stand in the way of pipelines: someone, somewhere is their sugar daddy, bankrolling these hysterical ideologues against Alberta. But it is the environmentalists who are getting played. The commercial interests of the U.S.A. have played the environmentalists for the fools they are, hiring protestors for peanuts while making off with billions from Alberta's exports. Alberta's oil continues to flow south to the United States at a discounted price. Meanwhile the U.S.A. exports homemade shale oil at market prices at a rapidly expanding rate and no longer needs to buy as much Canadian oil.

The bought-and-paid-for environmentalists have done a real disservice to Canada for a paycheck. Canada had a chance to achieve energy independence, to stop importing oil from brutal dictators. Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce estimates a $50 million a day loss to Canada due to lack of global market access for our oil. Common sense would say to build more pipelines in all directions. But, sadly, environmentalists have chosen more oil by rail rolling through the communities near . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Pipeline Approval and Construction

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we are pleased that the Premier has taken our advice to go outside Alberta's borders and defend our energy industry. The Hon. Jason Kenney has been pitching this idea for well over a year. Again, we lead; they follow. Trans Mountain received paper regulatory approval nearly a year ago, but aside from a very low-profile and nearly silent trip to B.C. last December, the Premier failed to defend pipelines outside of Alberta's borders even as opposition to them continued to grow. Will the Premier admit that she's been too passive on this issue and that it's time to finally stand up all the way for Alberta's pipelines?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the member for the opportunity to talk about what our government has done to promote pipelines and to get pipelines approved. From pretty much the minute we were first elected, we started working with industry not only on the climate leadership plan but also on the royalty review. Almost immediately we started talking to our friends in Ottawa, particularly once we had an election and there was a new group of people in Ottawa, about the need for getting our product to tidewater. That work resulted in the Kinder Morgan pipeline being approved by the federal government, and we're very . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the Premier can't be surprised about the opposition to Trans Mountain in B.C. After all, her government appointed two of the ringleaders against it, Karen Mahon and Tzaporah Berman, to her oil sands advisory group. Last December the Premier had dinner with her old friend, the B.C. opposition leader at the time, John Horgan, who now happens to be the B.C. NDP Premier. About that dinner Horgan said that she, the Premier of Alberta, had no intention of persuading him on pipelines. Shame. Will the Premier admit that it was a mistake not to try to sell the merits of ethical Alberta oil to her old comrade of 10 years?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, what I will admit to is taking every opportunity to speak to people not only in Alberta, of course, but in B.C. and across the country about the importance of getting our product to tidewater and how that is important for building our economy. I am glad that that message is getting through, and I'm also glad that our economy is going to lead the growth in the country this year because of the work that we are doing. I am glad that jobs are coming back to Alberta because of the work that we are doing. I am glad that manufacturing is up in Alberta because of the work that we are doing. I am very proud of our . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Nixon: Jason Kenney got four pipelines built during his time in government. All this Premier has is two cancelled pipelines and a so-called promise from Justin Trudeau. We know that the NDP like to tout their chief ally Trudeau because he granted paper approval to the Trans Mountain pipeline. The strange thing is that Trudeau never promotes the merits of Alberta oil when he's actually in British Columbia, but he will say while in other parts of the country: phasing out our oil sands. Will the Premier tell her good friend Justin Trudeau that it's time to step out and vocally defend Trans Mountain when he's in British Columbia?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, what I can say is that with a Conservative government here in Alberta and a Conservative government in Ottawa, they didn't manage to get one pipeline built to tidewater. They didn't even manage to get one finally approved. We have a different record. We are making progress. We are standing up for the energy industry. We are going to make sure that this job gets done because that's what we committed to, and we are very proud of that.

Mr. McIver: Point of order.

The Speaker: Point of order noted.
Second main question.

Mr. Nixon: Four pipelines by Jason Kenney; none by this government.

Federal Equalization Payments

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, Canada's current equalization formula expires in early 2019. Critical talks should begin as soon as possible given the urgency of the situation and the federal government's and other provincial leaders' sustained attacks on the primary source of Alberta's income and wealth, our energy sector. Will the Premier adopt Jason Kenney's lead and take an aggressive stance on renegotiation and inform this House of what her government's plans are to stand up for Albertans when it comes to equalization?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, given that it was the members opposite, their friends, leaders, and donors who negotiated the current formula that they don't like, I'm really quite perplexed by the fact that they are so keen on fighting it now. [interjection] But, of course, we will continue to stand up for Alberta. We will continue to work with the federal government to get more money to Albertans. [interjection] We got changes to employment insurance on behalf of Albertans. We got money for the orphan wells fund on behalf of Albertans. We have been working to get more infrastructure money on behalf of Albertans. We are continuing . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, I kept hearing your voice. It couldn't be you.

Mr. Nixon: Much of Canada appears to love the fruits of Alberta's resource sector while simultaneously blocking market access to those same resources. The Trudeau Liberals outright killed one pipeline, Northern Gateway, and at the behest of Quebec politicians they changed policy to scuttle Energy East. The Premier has the nerve to stand in this House and continue to say that she has gotten pipelines approved when in reality all she has is cancelled pipelines and a piece of paper from Justin Trudeau. I'll let Albertans decide what they think that is worth. The question, though, Mr. Speaker, to the Premier is: will she support a joint resolution from this House to adopt an aggressive stance to renegotiate equalization?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that the members opposite and their leader had decades to do something on the equalization file, but instead they sat on their hands when they were in Ottawa, absolutely sat on their hands, just like they did when it came to fighting for pipelines. [interjections] In fact, they got no pipelines to tidewater. Pipelines get built every day through this country, but pipelines to tidewater do not, certainly, under the Conservatives, only under us. [interjections] Thank goodness we're the ones in charge now.

The Speaker: Come on, folks. Keep it down.

Mr. Nixon: My leader spent the last 18 months travelling this province defending Albertans on equalization while this Premier has sat at home doing nothing. Again and again this Premier and this NDP government refuse to vocally criticize their federal allies, be it on carbon tax, small-business tax hikes, or changes to the rules for pipeline approvals. Albertans are extremely concerned that the Trudeau Liberals will use equalization to take even more money out of the pockets of hard-working Albertans. Will the Premier stand with us and support a joint resolution calling for an aggressive renegotiation of the equalization formula and stand up for Albertans?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, we might be interested in a resolution to ask an aggressive question about why it was that the Conservatives and Jason Kenney, when he was in cabinet, didn't fix this problem when they had all the time in the world to do it. What's happening now is that the members opposite are engaging in cheap political stunts over an issue that they had years and years and years to fix and couldn't be bothered to deal with. The fact of the matter is that we are working collaboratively with the federal government to get infrastructure money, to get EI money, to get orphan wells money, and we are not done because we are standing up for Alberta.

The Speaker: Third main question. The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Provincial By-election

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, late last week the Premier's office told the media that a by-election would be called, quote, without undue delay, but yesterday the Premier in answer to a question to me would only say that she would call an election "in due course." To the Premier. I sincerely and I politely ask you: will you call an election so that the Hon. Jason Kenney has the opportunity to join us here in this House? Yes or no?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I can tell the member opposite that I absolutely intend to call a by-election.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this is not just a nice favour that we are asking for. There's a long-standing constitutional convention that the Premier should call a by-election at the earliest opportunity so that a new Leader of the Opposition can take his or her seat here in this House. The Member for Calgary-Lougheed resigned a week ago, and his seat sits empty. I ask again: when will the Premier call a by-election so that the Hon. Jason Kenney can join us in this House?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In fact, it is interesting. The last time that the members opposite were in the position of calling a by-election, they waited anywhere from three weeks to six months. Suddenly, when it's our turn to call a by-election, it has to happen three days later. Now, that's not new for them because, of course, there's one set of rules for them and a completely different set of rules for us. The fact of the matter is that people have to have an opportunity to get ready for the by-election and ensure that all parties can participate, and we will make sure that happens.

Mr. Nixon: It's quite clear that the NDP are very eager to debate the Hon. Jason Kenney. I look forward to watching that personally, Mr. Speaker, as I'm sure you do, too. Yesterday the Premier said, "I can't wait," so what is the Premier waiting for? Why doesn't she walk down the hall right now or pick up the phone, call the Lieutenant Governor, and call a by-election so that the Hon. Jason Kenney can come and take his seat in this House?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I've said before, we will call a by-election in due course.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Provincial Response to Pipeline Opponents

Mr. Clark: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Getting Alberta's energy products to tidewater in the most economic and environmentally responsible manner should be the number one priority for this government. It's their job to make the case for pipelines, but despite the supposed social licence that comes from this government's climate policy, we're still facing strong opposition. To the Premier: if you've done all you can to sell pipelines, why does Alberta still face strong opposition in B.C. and beyond?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I've said a number of times before, our government continues to work very hard to support the pipeline to tidewater. First of all, we brought in a climate leadership plan, which the federal government clearly identified as the reason why the pipeline was approved. Since then we have worked on a number of different levels, legal as well as political as well as communications, to promote the pipeline. We will continue to do that. I know that the members opposite wring their hands with glee at the hope that maybe the pipeline will fail, but – you know what? – mark my words; it will be built.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the UCP may cheer against Alberta, but I never will.

Now, I hear a lot about the economic benefits of pipelines, and there is no doubt that there's an airtight case that Alberta, B.C., and all of Canada benefit economically from pipelines. But there's environmental benefit as well, and that is where this NDP government has let us down. Again to the Premier: it is amazing that I have to ask this question, but do you know that there's a significant environmental benefit to building a pipeline to tidewater because it reduces overall global carbon emissions by displacing higher carbon crude from places like Venezuela and Nigeria?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member opposite for the mansplaining opportunity. Let me just say that I am quite familiar with the file and, in fact, have made the case for the file from both an environmental point of view as well as an economic point of view in a number of different forums across the country because I know that it is good for Canadians both from an economic point of view and an environmental point of view and, in particular, with respect to the job creation that we know is important to Albertans, to British Columbians, and to all Canadians.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, Alberta's energy industry is the most innovative and environmentally responsible anywhere in the world. Whether it's paraffinic froth treatment in oil sands mining or microwaves, solvent, or fire flood in SAGD or the many other technologies under development, it's Alberta innovations that will make oil sands' production carbon neutral or better. We are not the UCP; the Alberta Party does not deny man-made climate change. To the Premier: why are you not telling pipeline opponents that Alberta crude will actually reduce global carbon emissions?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I would suggest that the member opposite read the speech that I delivered about an hour and a half ago because the answer is: we do.

Thank you.

Hospital Construction in Edmonton and Calgary

Dr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, yesterday my colleague the MLA for Edmonton-South West detailed the rapid growth in the southwest quadrant of Edmonton in his question about the need for a new high school. Thousands of young families have moved into the area, and along with new schools we desperately need a new hospital. In Edmonton-Whitemud, in addition to a burgeoning population, there are several seniors' facilities. These citizens are very much looking forward to having a hospital close by. To the Minister of Health: could you please update the House on the status of the first new hospital to be built in the city of Edmonton in 30 years?

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much to the member for the very important question. It's true that it's been over a generation since Edmonton got a new hospital under the former government, but guess what, Mr. Speaker? Things are looking up. Alberta is doing better, and under this government we are building a new hospital in southwest Edmonton. Over the coming months we'll be engaging with stakeholders and working with the city of Edmonton to ensure that access roads, public transit, and services are in place, and I look forward to updating this House about this important project.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Dr. Turner: Thank you very much for that, Mr. Speaker. My constituents will be very excited to learn of this. Given that the Misericordia hospital provides urgent care to thousands of my constituents yearly, can the Minister of Health please provide an update on the progress of the expanded ER facility at the Misericordia?

Ms Hoffman: I'm honoured to do so, Mr. Speaker. When massive cuts are made to a health care system, like those proposed by Jason Kenney and the members opposite, critical facilities like the Misericordia hospital suffer. We won't do that. This government was elected to protect the things that matter to Albertans, like health care and education. The new emergency department at the Misericordia will be a part of this new expanded space built on the west side of the building. I'm so proud to be investing in Alberta instead of cutting like Jason Kenney and the opposition.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Dr. Turner: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Given that a new Calgary cancer centre has been asked for by my oncologist colleagues in the Alberta cancer program and by cancer patients across this province for years, can the same minister update the House on progress made in meeting these requests and the anticipated timeline for that project?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I was very proud to stand with the Premier and the Minister of Infrastructure and many other government members on the Calgary cancer centre site. After more than a decade of being told that it was happening, not happening, maybe it would happen somewhere else, oh, maybe it won't happen at all, maybe it'll be $9 billion of cuts, Alberta elected a new government. This government is moving forward with this important project and the 1,500 mortgage-paying jobs that it brings as well. Construction will continue until 2022, and we plan on doing a very public opening in 2023.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Health Care Costs

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. According to a CIHI report Alberta now has the distinction of spending more money than any other province on health care, yet our wait times and outcomes are not better. Dangerous emergency and surgical waits add suffering and cost, and many Albertans continue to languish in hospital beds, up to 25 per cent in one Calgary hospital, instead of in the community. Cuts to injury prevention and early intervention for addictions and mental health have not helped. To the minister: can the Minister of Health tell us where the money is going if not to improving health care?

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much to the member for the important question. Mr. Speaker, there are three main drivers in Alberta and, frankly, across Canada in terms of health care system costs. Those are hospitals, where we're working to move more care into the community, as the member noted, including building 2,000 badly needed long-term care and dementia spaces; drug costs, which have been seeing pressures across this province – and, certainly, a 20 per cent cut to drugs would only hurt the Albertans who indeed need them – as well as physician costs. We're proud that we renegotiated an amending agreement and will continue to work with physicians, with drug companies, and with front-line health care workers to bend the cost curve.

Dr. Swann: Well, Mr. Speaker, after two years of trying, things are no better than they were under the PCs when it comes to reducing wait times. AHS performance data shows that Alberta continues to fail in continuing care placement, emergency lengths of stay, and mental health access. These delays in care are costing billions and result in poorer health. Again to the minister: how long before we see an integrated preventive management primary care system that deals with severe, complex cases, that consume over 50 per cent of the health care budget?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again to the member for the question. I'm very proud of the fact that we've worked with physicians and with the primary care networks to come up with a new governance model, that I do believe will improve outcomes for patients, as well as of doing it in partnership with those who are closest to the patient in driving the system.

In terms of what they refer to as unacceptable wait times, Mr. Speaker, I'm proud that we're working to reduce wait times. For example, our hip fracture repair and radiation therapy and our 17 stroke treatment centres are now among the fastest in the world, and that's not something to diminish.

Dr. Swann: Mr. Speaker, a whopping $5 billion of the $21.5 billion this government spends on health care goes directly to physician services. That's an 8 per cent higher proportion than the rest of the country. Despite claims of holding the line on spending, the government ultimately caves in during contract negotiations with physicians and AHS senior management. Alberta's numbers are clearly out of line with the rest of the country. When will the minister follow the lead of Ontario and try to drive down these costs by freezing and, in some cases, rolling back the highest salaries of physicians and senior managers?

Ms Hoffman: That certainly is an interesting proposal, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud to be working with the front-line care providers, including those who are providing services as physicians. It's true that contracts were signed under the former government that saw what some might say are skyrocketing increases to that line item. When we came into government, we sat down with physicians, and we negotiated an amending agreement that resulted in up to half a billion dollars going back into the pockets of Albertans and the taxpayers of this province. I'm proud of that. That is significant. There is more work to be done. Trust me; it will be done.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Catholic School Sex Education Curriculum

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The minister can't seem to help himself. The Official Opposition and multiple media outlets pointed out that the documents presented by the Catholic school superintendents clearly state, "We support teaching about legal consent" and "consent is always necessary." Even with this information the minister, instead of issuing a long-overdue apology, doubled down yesterday and claimed that Catholic schools were taking exception to teaching consent. To the Minister of Education: do you really believe that Catholic schools intend to teach and promote marital rape? Yes or no?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, neither myself nor the Premier said any such thing, and to suggest it is simply trying to score political points.

We work very closely with the Catholic school boards in all ways. We've never built more Catholic schools than we have under this government, for example. We've never had a closer relationship with Catholic school boards in terms of building curriculum. Certainly, we know that we're working closely together with our Catholic partners to ensure that we build a comprehensive health and wellness program that works for all of our children that we are responsible for.

Mr. McIver: Well, until this week I'd never heard the church complain about a government, which they did this last Sunday across the pulpit.

Given that the Calgary Herald wrote an editorial about Catholic sex ed and that they make it clear that consent is a core part of the curriculum, again to the minister: why do you and the Premier continue to smear all Catholics in Alberta by accusing them of promoting and teaching marital rape?

Mr. Eggen: Well, once again, Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member is just trying to score cheap political points for the sake of I don't know what advantage.

We work closely with Catholic school boards. We work closely with Catholic superintendents and parents and schools to ensure that we build a curriculum that works for all students. We had exception with a single submission, that was FOIPed, from the superintendents. We rejected that submission. But we're working together with Catholic school boards to ensure that we build curriculum, we're building Catholic schools, and we're building trust and goodwill as opposed to that divisive sort of language.

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, a letter signed by all the bishops in Alberta is hardly cheap.

Given that all politicians make mistakes, nonetheless – no one is perfect – and given that when this happens, the right thing to do is apologize and make amends and take advantage of the Catholic tenet of forgiveness, to the minister: will you do the right thing and issue an apology to Alberta's Catholic community, or will you let your repulsive comments stand uncorrected?

Mr. Eggen: Well, once again, you know, Mr. Speaker, for this member to use this situation to score cheap political points, I find it very offensive. What the Catholic bishops did put in the letter was that there were some people that were fighting against Catholic education. Our government stands with strengthening Catholic education across this province. We have done so over the last couple of years, and we will continue to do so to promote school choice between public schools, Catholic schools, charter schools, home-schooling, and francophone schools in the province of Alberta.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Health Care System

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Six months ago the Auditor General released a report on our health care system. Only two months ago the AG said in a Public Accounts meeting that we need people of all backgrounds and at all levels "to act immediately if we are going to make a difference in the lives of Albertans." To the Minister of Health: with needed improvements identified six months ago, what exactly have you done since then?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. I'm very proud of the work that we've done with our primary care network physicians to ensure that we have a new governance model and greater integration between acute care and primary care. We know that that's going to result in better outcomes for Albertans, supporting better care in the community. As well as the amending agreement, which I mentioned earlier, we're continuing to implement that and moving forward with other tenets as we prepare for further negotiations with physicians, and we're investing $400 million to better integrate and share information across the health care system. I'm very proud of our track record, and I know that 20 per cent cuts proposed by the members opposite would do no such thing.

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, during Public Accounts members from the Department of Health, Alberta Health Services, the Alberta Medical Association, and the College of Physicians & Surgeons all indicated their support for the AG's report. Given that they have all identified that improvements do have to be made, to the minister: can you define your plan and give us a timeline?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I share the concerns that were raised specifically around the instability that we've seen under Alberta Health Services in the past, and I have to say that bringing stability has and continues to be one of my guiding principles as we make a shift to community-based care and supporting all patients.

I'll tell you what wouldn't help with that: divisive, two-tier, privatized health care. I won't stand for that, Mr. Speaker. That's why we're moving forward to protect Albertans, not push the Jason Kenney cuts that the members opposite are so gleeful for.

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, our health care system is still failing. Our wait times have increased in many areas. We're still paying 20 per cent more than our neighbours for the same results, and recently the head of AHS wrote a column celebrating our health care system when it is a system that is not working well. When will this government recognize that the Auditor General's report is reasonable and provides guidance to this Health minister? When will you act on this plan, how will you do it, and when will you do it? Give us a timeline.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, I am very proud of our public health care system in this province. I know that, just like with pipelines, the members opposite are cheering for Alberta to fail, but our front-line providers, our communities are standing with us to make sure that we improve health care, not lead to its demise by pushing a 20 per cent reckless agenda, which would result in closing emergency rooms, closing hospitals, probably many in opposition ridings as they so gleefully ask for more money and at the same time 20 per cent cuts. We're working with communities to bring about sustainability and improved health outcomes, and I'm very proud of that.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Caribou Range Plans

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Through the federal progress report on caribou range planning we learned that the Alberta government has indicated they will be providing a draft provincial range plan to the federal government by December of this year. In an effort to provide the transparency this process has been sadly lacking, can the minister provide specifics on what this range plan entails, and will the NDP provide the Legislature as a whole and even the groups most affected an opportunity to review and comment on the document prior to submitting it to the federal government in December?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the member is quite right that the province is putting together a series of range plans to recover the iconic caribou species. We've been doing that for a couple of years now and consulting with communities, particularly the most affected communities, as we try to find a way forward both for the caribou and for the jobs and the economic development that buoys this province. I'll have more to say about that in follow-ups.

Mr. Loewen: Given that this government has been severely negligent in timely consultation with communities and industries, creating enormous strain and worry for those most affected, and given that a socioeconomic impact study is a very wide-ranging study and that it is critical to gather information from many groups, organizations, and governments, can the minister tell us who has been consulted with so far on the socioeconomic impact study, who remains to be consulted with, and how will this information be used to form the caribou range plans?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the member well knows, there are a number of different range plans and a number of different geographic locations in the province. We have talked to First Nations, the forestry sector, small business, oil and gas, municipalities, a number of different stakeholders in addition to environmental groups and scientists as well, and the federal government. I have been around the province to discuss this matter as well. We know that we are going to have a made-in-Alberta solution to this issue. We will not have a protection order imposed on us by doing nothing, which is, of course, what the previous government did in the question of the sage grouse.

Thank you.

Mr. Loewen: Given that in September I attended the Whitecourt panel discussion on caribou planning organized by the community and given the standing-room-only capacity of the event and the grave concerns expressed by the citizens at the event, why did the Minister of Environment and Parks feel it was unnecessary for her to attend this important event and ease the public's concerns, considering that the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry would not commit to no job losses as a result of the caribou planning process?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's nice that the member got to Whitecourt. I was there last January. I was able to tour a number of facilities and consult with a number of folks in the area, including the chambers of commerce, municipalities, and others. The fact of the matter is that the Alberta Forest Products Association's president and CEO, for example, has said that the government of Alberta has engaged with stakeholders and that it's encouraging to hear our ideas and work together to conserve the caribou. We'll have more to say about that when we release the draft plans.

Thank you.

Energy Policies

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, Berman, Mahon, Hudema, Pembina, Tides, Rockefeller, Trudeau, comrades Horgan and Singh, and our own local version of the job-killing, investment-repelling NDP: with friends like these, industry investors and hard-working Albertans don't need enemies. Given that industry leaders say that the common thread here is that Canada generally has displayed an unwelcoming policy environment and uncertain approval process, to the Minister of Energy: will you explain to Albertans how the NDP world view has resulted in the abandonment of over $56 billion in energy sector projects?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to the hon. member for the question. I'm very pleased to be able to talk about the health of Alberta's economy and the fact that we seem to have turned a corner. Jobs are up. Wages are up. Drilling is up. Confidence in Alberta's energy sector is up. We secured two pipelines in two years of government. Just last week we learned that drilling activity is up sharply this year over last, and Suncor reported their best quarterly results since oil was $100 a barrel. That's the record of this side of the House.

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, given that the carbon tax, the minimum wage, corporate and personal tax hikes, irresponsible deficits, and an unwelcoming investment climate have resulted in the flight of over $35 billion in foreign direct investment and given that only one of your climate plan photo op crew even remains in the province with the departure of Murray Edwards, Brian Ferguson, and Lorraine Mitchelmore, to the Minister of Finance. Corporate tax revenue has been consistently down during your tenure. Can you tell us if you're expecting to be a billion dollars short of your forecast for a second year in a row?

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, Amazon, RocketSpace, Swoop, Champion Petfoods, Pinnacle, Google, Cavendish Farms: in the last six months all of these companies have made investments here in Alberta. In the last seven months our retail sales hit $6.8 billion, beating out the prerecession peak of $6.7 billion. Alberta's economy is the fastest growing in Canada, and since the depths of the recession Alberta has created nearly 72,000 jobs.

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, it would be interesting to see what the net new jobs are in terms of public sector versus private sector.

To the Minister of Energy. Given what we're hearing from Greenpeace: victoire; from Pembina: bam, victory; from Bayer Robertson: loud and clear; from NDP Horgan: see you in court; from clean coal technology: adios; from Hanna, Hinton, Forestburg, Keephills, and Grande Cache: nice knowing you; and given the recent cancellation of Energy East and continued uncertainty around Keystone and Trans Mountain, can you tell Albertans when you will stop playing social licence croquet and suit up for a little hardball in defence of Alberta jobs, investment, and national prosperity?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hope the members opposite, with this kind of hardball rhetoric, do realize that you don't get what you want by threatening to hurt people. You do understand that, right?

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have secured approval for two new pipelines that will bring over 20,000 good new jobs to Alberta, 20,000 jobs that the folks on that side of the House could never secure. Our petrochemicals diversification program will add another 3,000 jobs, jobs that those folks over there voted against. We're working to create 7,200 jobs with renewables projects, again opposed by conservatives.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Diabetes Support in Schools

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. November is Diabetes Awareness Month. Last week I was fortunate to meet a diabetes advocate who passionately shared her story of how challenging it is as a single parent to manage her daughter's insulin-dependent diabetes while she's at school and the impact that it has on her daughter. As a working mother she struggles to get her daughter's insulin levels well controlled without appropriate help from the school. To the Minister of Education: why hasn't the government of Alberta created policies to work with schools and parents in order to address all of the needs of children living with diabetes in our province?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am very proud of the relationship we have with our advocates in this province and the work that we've done to reduce the reckless conservative cuts that were proposed just prior to the last election and that are advocated for every day in this House. We know that members opposite are pushing for deep cuts that would hurt Alberta families. Instead, we're working with them and with other agencies across the province to ensure that the services they need are protected and supported, and I am proud of that record.

Ms McPherson: Given that Diabetes Canada has been advocating on this issue for years and support for children with diabetes is something that I'm sure everyone in this House agrees on and given that students living with diabetes have the right to be full and equal participants in school and all school-related activities without the fear of being excluded, stigmatized, or discriminated against, again to the Minister of Education: why is Alberta still one of the only provinces which does not have standards and policies in place for the health and safety of kids with diabetes in school?

The Speaker: The Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, this is an issue that has been brought to my attention both by advocates here across the province and nationally as well. I think that we have made some progress in regard to type 2 diabetes, but certainly with type 1 diabetes there's lots of room for improvement. You know, we want to work closely with our partners every step of the way to ensure the health and the integrity of all students – right? – regardless of who they are. In order to do that, of course, you have to make sure that you make investments in education, which we have done over the last year.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Ms McPherson: Given that diabetes is a complicated and sometimes life-threatening condition that requires close and careful management, not just treatment, and given that type 1 diabetes is a lifelong condition impacting more and more children every year, to the Education minister: has the government analyzed the implications of not having standards of care for students with diabetes in school as it relates to the long-term health and well-being of Albertans?

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, as I had said previously, yes, we certainly have been looking into it. There's been strong advocacy in regard to both type 1 and type 2 diabetes for children here in the province, and yes, we do determine that there are more students that have that very thing. We are ensuring that we will look into it further. It's important to make sure that you keep that level of investment in education every step of the way so that we can achieve these goals. If you make deep cuts in public education, then, of course, all of these things are off the table.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

The Member for Calgary-Bow.

Seniors' Issues

Drever: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta's seniors deserve to live affordably and in comfort. Back in August 2016 my office reached out to stakeholders that work with seniors in Calgary-Bow. We even have a name, the Calgary-Bow seniors constellation. At one of these meetings we heard that there's a shortage of affordable housing for seniors. Can the Minister of Seniors and Housing please address what our government is doing to help seniors access affordable housing?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We're making life better for Albertans by investing in safe and affordable housing. We're building more than 4,100 affordable housing homes through 62 construction projects and planning projects for 3,000 seniors specifically. Not only are we increasing capacity; we're maintaining affordable housing that the previous government left in disrepair. We know that Jason Kenney's Conservatives would be stopping these projects. We as a government are supporting seniors in our province.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Drever: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We also heard that dementia rates continue to be on the rise, and our population continues to age. To the same minister: what is being done to address this increased demand, and specifically what is this government doing to help seniors who face social isolation and lack of supports?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Of course, I'd like to thank the MLA for Calgary-Bow for her advocacy for the seniors in her community. My ministry is supporting seniors to age in their communities, close to their family and friends, with our seniors' home adaptation and repair program. Further, seniors on low income can access various supports such as housekeeping, yard maintenance, and transportation. Health is finalizing the dementia strategy, which will be released this fall. We are making life better for Albertans.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Drever: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Another stakeholder that was present at the meeting addressed an issue regarding the limited support for hearing and sight needs, specifically hearing aids. To the Minister of Health: what is our government doing to support seniors in meeting these basic needs?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. Alberta aids to daily living, which provides funding for medical equipment so that Albertans can live healthy and independent lives, is important to us and our government. These programs are relied on by Albertans, including those well below the so-called middle-class income of Jason Kenney's $200,000. Our government is here to stand up for Albertans who need these services every day, not make drastic cuts like Jason Kenney and his friends opposite are pushing for.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Assured Income for the Severely Handicapped

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Constituents of mine were shocked to have their AISH supports clawed back. One spouse receives AISH while the other partner, a senior citizen, has moved into receiving old age security, guaranteed income support, CPP, and workers' compensation for a permanent disability. The clawback in one partner's AISH is due to the other partner's income from pensions whereas if this senior citizen was still able to work and earning the same amount, his partner's AISH would not be affected. To the Minister of Community and Social Services. Income is income. Where is the common sense in treating income differently?

The Speaker: The Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. AISH is an important program that provides supports to 57,000 Albertans, and it works in conjunction with other support programs available. Over the period of the last two years we have released an AISH action plan and worked to make it more efficient and more transparent, and we will continue to do so.

Mr. Hanson: Mr. Speaker, given that the NDP bills themselves as the party of caring, sharing, and social justice and given that the minister is hurting seniors as they cross the threshold of old age, clawing back their income support programs, and seeing as how divorce by AISH or turn criminal and lie seem to be the only ways to restore needed benefits to make ends meet with couples, is the minister prepared to reform AISH income exemption tables to treat pension income the same as any other income?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. We have released an AISH action plan, which outlines the steps we will take to improve the AISH program. We are doing it by creating a simpler application form, by training staff and providing them better training, and by providing clear standards to ensure the program works in the best interests of Albertans. We have added $70 million to this program just this year. Some over there do think that supports to disabilities are just giveaways.

Mr. Hanson: An absolutely disappointing answer, Mr. Speaker.

Given that the Auditor General has come out swinging that assured income for the severely handicapped applications favour people who are persistent and good at completing forms and given that the Auditor General found inconsistencies with the program, where applicants who are working 30 hours a week have been denied coverage yet people who are already receiving AISH were allowed to work the same number of hours, is the minister going to bring some common sense into his department and fix these problems before Alberta's most vulnerable fall through the cracks?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We respect the work the Auditor General did and accepted all the recommendations, and in response we put together an AISH action plan, which outlines exactly the response, what the Auditor General asked us to do. But let me tell you about common sense. All Albertans across this province think that it's not common sense to cut $209 million, 20 per cent, from the AISH program or to bring it back to B.C. levels by cutting $600 from the supports they are getting. You can't have it both ways.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Workers' Compensation System

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, when Bill 6 was first introduced, many members in this House asked the Minister of Labour whether she and her department had initiated an economic impact study in order to determine how Alberta farmers and ranchers were going to be affected. Her answer: they had not. After over two years I thought surely they would have performed one by now, only to find out this morning: still nothing. To the minister: how do you plan on measuring the adverse effects on farmers and ranchers due to Bill 6?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very proud of the work that our government has done to work with farmers and ranchers on the implementation of Bill 6. As promised, before making any changes, we have been working with farmers and ranchers, giving Albertans the opportunity to review recommendations just recently posted from the occupational health and safety technical working groups. We will continue to work with the farming and ranching community on the implementation steps and those recommendations from our technical working groups.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, given that earlier today the PAC was informed that the reason why WCB is not returning $1.9 billion worth of rebates to struggling Alberta employers is because they are unsure how new legislation and regulations are going to affect their bottom line. To the Minister of Labour: do you think Alberta employers should bear this burden while you figure out which direction you want to go?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very proud to say that our government believes that all workers deserve fair rehabilitation in a sustainable system if they are injured. That is why we initiated the first review of the WCB in 15 years, to make sure that both employers and workers can have confidence in that system. The decision to not return surpluses was made independently by the board of the WCB using their sound financial practices. Surpluses are not being folded into general revenue for the government. Rather, we are making sure we have a sustainable system that provides fair compensation.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, given that Albertans are being saddled with the carbon tax, the minimum wage increases, the new labour laws, to name a few hurdles, and given that the federal government is also increasing taxes, to the same minister: how can the WCB justify holding back on average almost $12,000 of WCB rebates per Alberta employer when businesses are hurting so much in this province?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is absolutely critical that Albertans can feel confident that they have a WCB system that will take care of them and their family when they are injured on the job and that employers know there is a system that is sustainable. That is why we began the first major review in 15 years, and I'm very proud of the work the panel has done and the recommendations that we have received on that. I know that Jason Kenney wants to make life harder for Albertans. We will continue to work through issues like doing the panel review of the WCB to make life better for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

2:40 Downtown Edmonton Health and Social Services

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud of our government's support for essential health and social services like emergency shelters, supportive housing, and supervised consumption sites, and I deeply value our community partners who deliver them. However, in our central communities some have expressed concerns about their concentration in our city core even while police and others have called for a downtown wellness centre to serve those in crisis. To the Minister of Community and Social Services: given that all parties involved will be looking to our government for funding, how are you engaging stakeholders to determine the best way to balance our communities' needs?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. We are absolutely committed to making sure that all Albertans have a safe place to call home, and we all need to work together to combat homelessness and poverty. That is why we are working with the community partners, different orders of government, and all those who are concerned to get this right.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: given that our ultimate objective is to end homelessness and that this will require investing in a range of services and housing across our city and given that invaluable existing partners are seeking funding to improve and expand their services downtown, what factors will you be considering when you make recommendations to the Minister of Infrastructure on these projects?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. I personally have worked in a homeless shelter, and I do know that homelessness is a complex issue, and we need to work across government with our community partners and with other orders of government. Before making any recommendation, I will make sure that we have a well-thought-out, well co-ordinated plan to address the issues in the downtown core and across this province.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: given that Councillor Scott McKeen of the city of Edmonton has called for Edmonton's urban wellness plan to explore supportive housing across our city and given that while communities like Oliver embrace this, others, some unfortunately encouraged by federal Conservative politicians, are instead embracing fear and perpetuating stigma, will you commit to supporting the city of Edmonton in asking all communities to play a part in helping to end homelessness?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I said, we are absolutely committed to working with all partners – community partners and other orders of government – to make sure that we have a well-thought-out and well co-ordinated plan to address this complex issue. That is why we have invested $190 million, and we will continue to make those investments to make sure that Albertans looking for those supports have those supports. But there are folks over there who want to cut 20 per cent from that, which would mean that they will cut somewhere around $35 million from existing supports.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

In 30 seconds we will proceed.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Fiscal Policies and Prosperity

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Just over a week ago the Leader of the Official Opposition said, "We understand that in order to be a compassionate, caring province, we must be prosperous first," to which I responded, "Actually, some of the most compassionate, caring and generous people I've known have been those who personally had very little." Some then suggested that I was financially illiterate and failed to understand the meaning of the original statement. Well, in truth, I think I understood it far too well because that statement doesn't simply stand on its own, devoid of history and content. It's deeply rooted in a failed conservative ideology.

The truth is that Alberta is a prosperous province. We long have been, and we continue to be. Yes, we're coming out of a difficult period, but we still lead Canada in terms of economic power and growth. We have the capacity, even during challenging times, to look after our own.

The record shows that when the price of oil has dropped, conservative governments consistently made life harder for everyday Alberta families with short-sighted, poorly planned cuts to services we all rely on. Albertans lost jobs; hospitals, roads, and schools were left to crumble; and the holes in our social safety net grew. When things improved, they used our increased prosperity not to invest in the long-term sustainable vision to help everyday Albertans but to help their friends with unsustainable tax cuts that left us even more dependent on volatile resource revenue.

Mr. Speaker, our government was elected on a promise not to make Albertans pay for the mistakes of previous governments. Instead we've invested to support and create jobs in growing sectors like agrifood, technology, and green energy, to build long-needed infrastructure, and to address social inequalities that hurt families and drag our economy down. Those aren't luxuries; those are key measures that lay a foundation for increased prosperity as our economy recovers.

Mr. Speaker, what we can't afford are the sorts of empty rhetoric, reckless policies, and social regression promised by our opposition, policies that will undermine prosperity and make Albertans' lives worse. Albertans need a compassionate government committed to prosperity for all Albertans, and that's what we'll continue to be.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Openness and Transparency in Government

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The NDP proclaims itself an open and transparent government, but their actions are murky and contradictory. They communicate in voice mode because they don't want to be held to anything written. They ordered over 800,000 e-mails deleted with prizes for whoever deletes the most. There can be no reason except to cover their own tracks from public record.

Our constituency staff are frustrated with another disconcerting problem. Has the NDP given instructions to all government departments that no information is to be given to constituency staff in opposition ridings without first getting permission from the minister's office? Staff who have served for 20 years under different Premiers and cabinets say that they have never encountered anything like this. Constituency staff are government employees. They are to serve the people of Alberta. When their own government blockades them from doing their job to help Albertans, you have to ask why.

A constituent wanted to mail a letter to a central region Alberta Health Services manager but needed an address. They asked the constit office for a public official's government address. We called the minister's office for the address and were refused. We were told that all correspondence had to go to the minister. Constit staff argued that this is ridiculous and unheard of, to refuse the public address of a public official. Later, after getting permission from higher up, the address was provided. This is a most extreme form of control.

Another constit asked for clarification to an order taped to the door of her residence. It indicated that the suite she maintained was not suitable for rent. Okay. She asked us to find out how long the notice had to remain posted and provided us with the notice contact number that was provided. It was just a clarification question. The government department employee who answered the call was afraid to give an answer and said that her supervisor would have to. Ten days later we finally got a callback. Was the supervisor required to go to the minister's office in order to get permission to do his job? Limiting government staff because the ministers don't trust them...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At the appropriate time I intend to move the following motion pursuant to Standing Order 42: be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to immediately begin aggressive preparations for the 2018-2019 equalization renegotiations and update the Assembly on those preparations.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday in question period I had some questions to the Service Alberta minister wanting an explanation on how we had a D grade for all of Canada for our freedom of information and how dreadful that is. There are five copies of the media release.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. I mentioned an editorial in my question today, so I have the duty to table it. It says: "The NDP's position on sex education is a repudiation of diversity."

2:50

The Speaker: Calgary-Bow.

Drever: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today with two documents related to my member's statement yesterday. I have the necessary five copies here. The first article is from CBC News entitled: Kenney's Unclear Abortion Stance Imperils Reproductive Rights, Analyst Says. It was written July 8, 2016.

The second was an article from PressProgress entitled Anti-abortion Group Tells Supporters to Buy PC Memberships and Help Jason Kenney Take Over Party. It also has a photo of Jason Kenney that says Jason Kenney, Anti-abortion Activist.

The Speaker: Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have three tablings. The first would be the Alberta Health Services performance report, and I'll highlight just three indicators. I'll give them full marks on acute-care discharge rates in Canada but a failing grade in relation to continuing care placements and mental health access.

Also, the letter from the Health minister explaining some of the reasons behind the continuing low performance of the health system relative to spending and an article from the Canadian Institute for Health Information that highlights both Alberta's sky-high health care costs and Alberta doctors' costs, which have gone up 9 per cent over the past year.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to table five copies of a document dated October 4, 2017, from ATB Financial's economics and research team. In the publication it shows that things are looking up in Alberta, including tourism. It states: "This year, tourism will continue that same momentum and may break another record." That's good news to people in Banff-Cochrane and across the province.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I wish to table an Oral Question Period rotation referenced in my statement from yesterday.

I'm also tabling a copy of the House leaders' agreement, which I received at 1:03 on November 6. I will be making a statement with respect to the Members' Statements rotation outlined in this agreement later in today's Routine.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk. On behalf of the hon. Ms Hoffman, Deputy Premier and Minister of Health, responses to questions raised by Dr. Swann, hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View; Dr. Starke, hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster; Mr. Smith, hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon;

Mr. Hinkley, hon. Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose; and Mr. Loewen, hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky, on April 11, 2017, Ministry of Health 2017-18 main estimates debate.

The Speaker: I believe we are at points of order. Is that correct? The Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. Nixon: I'll rise for that point of order, Mr. Speaker, if that's okay.

The Speaker: Yeah.

Point of Order Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Nixon: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays raised a point of order in response to an answer to a question by myself to the Premier. First of all, Mr. Speaker, I'll rise on 23(j), "uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder." In response to the question – we talk, actually, a lot about pipelines of late. It's a pretty important issue before the Assembly, and often there's some back and forth with it, but it's disappointing today to see the Premier misrepresent some significant facts. By misrepresenting those facts before the Assembly, I would argue, too, that she continues to cause disorder in the Assembly. In fact, she said that Mr. Kenney did not get any pipelines built when in fact the Harper government actually got the Trans Canada Keystone, not XL, the Enbridge Alberta Clipper, the Kinder Morgan anchor loop expansion, and the Enbridge line 9 reversal built.

Mr. Speaker, I know you want me to hurry. The point is that the Premier continues to rise in this Assembly when in fact she has no pipelines built, only two cancelled, and the Leader of the Opposition has four . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I think your case is . . . [interjections] Thank you, thank you, thank you.

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, this is obviously a point of debate and not a point of order. The challenge facing our energy industry is getting market access. Really, to do that, what we need is to get a Canadian pipeline to Canadian tidewater, something which we have successfully managed to do and they have not managed to do. I know that they are upset by that, but that doesn't change the facts. Obviously, this is a dispute. It has nothing to do with . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister. I agree. It is not a point of order. It is one of opinion.

Calgary-Elbow, you wanted to what?

Mr. Clark: I called a point of order during my question, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Oh. I'm sorry. I didn't know there was another point of order. I'm sorry; I've not been advised about the point of order, hon. member.

Mr. Clark: In response to the Premier's response to my question.

The Speaker: Okay.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to proceed on this point of order under 23(h), "makes allegations against another Member"; (i), "imputes false or unavowed motives to another Member"; and (j), "uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder." I'd also refer to Beauchesne's sixth edition, section 486(3), discussing unparliamentary language. Subsection (3) just says that there are a few words that are always unparliamentary, and the list updates on a regular basis.

The new word I think that we should declare unparliamentary in this House, Mr. Speaker, is "mansplaining." It is a term that is essentially accusing me of sexism. It is an offensive term. It is not the first time it has been used in this House. It is essential that all members of the opposition and, indeed, all members of this House have the freedom to hold government to account and do so without being accused of sexism or just simply being called names. Mr. Speaker, I do take this accusation very seriously, and I categorically and emphatically reject this characterization. I would like for the Premier to apologize and withdraw that remark.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Acting Deputy Government House Leader.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to rise and speak on this particular matter. The exchange in question occurred between the hon. member and the hon. Premier. The Premier is, honestly, one of the smartest people I have ever met in my life, has been in this House for an incredibly long time, has been a vocal champion of pipelines, and the hon. member asked her if she was aware of the benefits of pipelines. Of course she's aware. Incidentally, so am I.

Just because sexism is polite doesn't make it not sexism. Mr. Speaker, I don't really think that it's appropriate to say, just because the question was asked in a polite but condescending manner, that it's not a condescending statement. I will read, for the record, the definition of mansplaining: "to comment on or explain something to a woman in a condescending, overconfident, and often inaccurate or oversimplified manner." Obviously, the member opposite thought that questioning the Premier on whether she understood the benefits of pipelines was appropriate. Obviously, she didn't feel that it was appropriate, but I don't think that calling a spade a spade should suddenly become unparliamentary language.

I think that this is obviously a case where, you know, just because it's said politely, it doesn't make it okay. We've had, obviously, some vociferous disagreements in this House, and, Mr. Speaker, that's fine. Everyone has the right to disagree and to state their opinion, but I think that saying that in this instance it was just fine for the member to ask the question the way in which he did and it wasn't fine for the hon. Premier to comment on the manner in which the question was asked is – we're just splitting hairs at a certain point. I think it is and shall remain my view that just because discriminatory behaviour is framed in a polite manner, it doesn't make it okay.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, thank you. I rise to address this issue because of my long-held and strongly held feelings for parliamentary decorum. In this particular instance, I'm particularly concerned that we have a relatively new term that is creeping into usage within the House and that it has directly applied with it specific motives and backgrounds that are a problem and, I think, definitely diminish the overall tone within the House.

You will recall that last month I represented the province at the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association seminar in Charlottetown, attended also by the members for St. Albert and Cypress-Medicine Hat. At that meeting we talked a lot about the deterioration of decorum in the Houses of Parliament all across our land. These things happen incrementally. They don't happen all at once. They happen incrementally.

The term "mansplaining" is not in any list in Beauchesne because it's such a new term. It only started to be used in blog posts in about 2008. In 2010 it became the New York Times word of the year. In 2014 it became the word of the year in the Australian dictionary. It's in the Oxford online dictionary, but it's not actually in the Oxford English Dictionary. That's how new it is.

Now, why do I say all these things, Mr. Speaker? It's because mansplaining infers that the person asking the question, generally a man to a woman, is acting in a sexist or condescending manner. It implies that – as hon. members, if we were to call another member sexist, we would be called out of order, and rightly so. To say that there was mansplaining going on – and this is not the first time. Recently, in response to a question from the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat the Minister of Energy accused that member of mansplaining. Now we have the Premier accusing the Member for Calgary-Elbow of mansplaining.

Mr. Speaker, opposition members need to be able to ask questions regardless of the gender of the minister being asked. That is part of the overall equality we have in this House, and it is part of the honourable behaviour that is expected of all members. To immediately, then, suggest that a question is equivalent to mansplaining also suggests that the member asking the question is behaving in a sexist manner. That is not something that would be permitted, and because of that the term "mansplaining" should not be allowed within this Chamber.

There is relatively little parliamentary precedent in the use of this term, but if we borrow from the February 11, 2016, exchange between two Australian Senators, you will find an interesting exchange as to what exactly the term "mansplaining" is.

Mansplaining is most decidedly a damaging activity. It is a damaging thing to do, but to suggest that hon. members within this House are participating in something that is fundamentally sexist is insulting and most certainly imputing false motives, especially, I would say, to the Member for Calgary-Elbow, in whose track record has never been a shred of any form of sexism. To suggest that that's what is going on today by the Premier is parliamentarily out of order, and you, sir, should rule accordingly.

The Speaker: Is there something you'd add, Member for Airdrie?

Mrs. Pitt: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would certainly like to add to the discussion and the debate. Perhaps if the gender of the asker and the gender of the receiver were reversed, I think, if womansplaining were to be used in a direct reverse conversation, that would certainly be ruled out of order. That's something to consider in making your ruling because I absolutely think this should be ruled out of order.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I learn many words in this place, and I think this is one of them that's on the list that I didn't even know existed before.

To the hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster, on the recent example that you cite from Australia: I don't have the opportunity in this short period of time – I will, though, look it up.

I think I need to read my ruling before I make a comment. I think I know the way I'll be going, but I want to make sure that I'm in alignment with the decision I made earlier. With that, I would like to come back tomorrow with a decision, if I might.

Statement by the Speaker

Rotation of Questions and Members' Statements House Leaders' Agreements

The Speaker: Hon. members, as you recall, yesterday I indicated during my statement on the rotation of questions that my office received a House leaders' agreement at 1:03 p.m. that day containing proposed Oral Question Period and Members' Statements rotations. I stated yesterday that I would review the proposals, which I have done.

In my statement yesterday, found at pages 1745 and 1746 of Alberta Hansard, I also spoke about the question period rotation, and I outlined a rotation that would be implemented today. That rotation, which was distributed yesterday and which I have tabled, will continue to apply, barring any new House leaders' agreement that is fairer to all members.

With respect to the proposed Members' Statements rotation, I accept the House leaders' proposal, and it will be implemented in accordance with Standing Order 7(5), which provides:

Members' Statements shall be allocated in proportion to the number of Members other than members of the Executive Council in each party represented in the Assembly or as agreed to by House Leaders or, failing agreement, as determined by the Speaker.

I note that both parts of the agreement are signed by the Government House Leader and the Official Opposition.

There is a notable absence, however, of any signature from the third party. I performed some research and discovered that a third party has been included in signatures to House leaders' agreements dating back to 1997. These include a signature for the time in April 2001, which the Government House Leader was a signatory to.

I would encourage all House leaders to be involved in future agreements, for those that are designated, and such agreements should include the signatures of each of the House leaders or their designates. I would encourage the two House leaders to do that to at least reflect that there has been genuine consultation.

Before I proceed any further, I want to point out that this rotation differs from the rotation described yesterday. The details respecting the agreement on members' statements are as follows. A three-week rotation will continue. Private members of the government caucus are entitled to three statements each sitting day. The Official Opposition receives three statements every Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday. They also receive one statement on Thursdays. The third-party opposition will receive a statement on Thursdays of weeks 1 and 3. The one-member caucuses and the independent members each receive one statement per week on a Thursday.

For additional details on the Members' Statements rotation, please consult the revised projected sitting days calendar, which will replace the one distributed yesterday and which will be distributed to all members.

The House leaders' agreement on rotation of Members' Statements will take effect tomorrow, Wednesday, November 8.

I think the Leader of the Official Opposition had a motion.

3:10

Mr. Mason: I had a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Oh. I'm sorry. Go ahead.

Point of Clarification

Mr. Mason: I want to ask you under section 13(2) to explain the reasons for any decision regarding the lack of a signature by the so-called third-party House leader. Considering that when this agreement was agreed to and signed, there was no third party, much less a third-party House leader, how were we to fulfill your requirement, Mr. Speaker?

The Speaker: You're partially correct. In fact, my office has not been advised that the third group has a House leader, so at this point it's part of the reason why I accepted the statement made by yourselves. I think my intention to the point that you're raising is that there will be at least consultation with the Alberta Party plus, also, the independents on a go-forward basis.

You are correct, though, that I have not been advised that there is a House leader. I'm simply referring to the future, that the chair can be assured that there has been consultation with independents and that the chair is reassured that the interests of the minorities are protected in the House. That's why I've agreed at this time to abide by the agreement that you and the Opposition House Leader signed in the Members' Statement order that you provided to my office.

Mr. Mason: You're abiding by it?

The Speaker: Yes.

Motions under Standing Order 42

The Speaker: Now are we at the Official Opposition with respect to the motion? Please proceed.

Federal Equalization Payment Negotiations

Mr. Nixon:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to immediately begin aggressive preparations for the 2018-2019 equalization renegotiations and update the Assembly on those preparations.

Mr. Nixon: Thanks, Mr. Speaker, for recognizing me today. This is an urgent issue that needs to be discussed by this House. In the past Alberta was able to get our resources and our products to market, and today that is not the case, which is creating a certain amount of urgency, a significant amount of urgency. I think that most Albertans would agree with me on that fact.

We have a federal government currently that is directly responsible for killing two major pipeline projects. That has a dramatic impact on the country as a whole but, more specifically, on this province, creating a level of urgency to have a discussion on how the equalization process would work. Provincial and municipal politicians love the wealth, Mr. Speaker, from our energy sector but are currently working to block the transport of our energy products.

The opposition and the government in recent days are in agreement on that concern and the urgency to act as a province to be able to make sure that something is done about that. We were happy throughout this week and last week to see the Premier following our lead, leaving the province, and beginning to defend pipelines on that issue.

But when it comes to the equalization formula expiring in 2019, the negotiations need to begin immediately for us to be able to undertake negotiations of that magnitude. For the province and for this current NDP government to continue to delay that process and not have a discussion with this House and to report to Albertans on where we are at on that certainly brings me to the point where I'm rising today to try to pass this simple motion to make it clear that we are going to be moving forward to get ready for those important negotiations.

Mr. Speaker, I can think of no matter more important than this. I think that it would send an extremely good message to the federal government and to the provinces if we stand united on this in this House to make it clear that what is happening is not acceptable and that if Albertans continue to be treated this way, we will look to renegotiate the equalization formula or we will start to do that as a result of the actions that are taking place.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all members of this Assembly to give this motion support so that we can stand together to stand for Albertans.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I need to remind you that under Standing Order 42 you're being called upon for unanimous support for an urgent and pressing matter, a necessity, as outlined by the Official Opposition leader.

[Unanimous consent denied]

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 21

Agencies, Boards and Commissions Review Statutes Amendment Act, 2017

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose.

Mr. Hinkley: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to rise today on behalf of the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance to move third reading of Bill 21, the Agencies, Boards and Commissions Review Statutes Amendment Act, 2017.

Provincial government agencies, boards, and commissions, or ABCs, play a pivotal role in delivering important programs and services to Albertans as well as providing oversight and advice on Alberta issues. We remain committed to continuing the review of Alberta's agencies, boards, and commissions to identify what is working and what can be improved and what is no longer providing value to Albertans. The ongoing review of agencies, boards, and commissions ensures that ABCs are transparent, accountable, and using public dollars effectively and efficiently. Make no mistake: we will continue to ensure that Albertans continue to be well served and represented.

Bill 21, the Agencies, Boards and Commissions Review Statutes Amendment Act, 2017, will enable us to implement dissolutions where legislative amendments are required for 14 agencies, boards, and commissions. This bill is one part of numerous key changes that this government has already undertaken for ABCs such as executive compensation reform, enhanced compensation transparency, an improved online board application process, and greater transparency and diversity on Alberta's public agency boards.

I appreciate the excellent discussion we've had with our fellow hon. members on this bill. Thank you for your work and for your commitment to transparency, efficiency, and value in government. The overall review of agencies, boards, and commissions has resulted in numerous important changes to ensure their ongoing relevance, increase transparency, strengthen fiscal accountability and diversity, and to ensure better value for Albertans. I ask all members now to support Bill 21 in third reading.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: I have the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka to speak to the bill.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to speak to third reading of Bill 21, the Agencies, Boards and Commissions Review Statutes Amendment Act, 2017. We are in support of the intent of the bill and will vote in support of third reading because I think the intent is good. I totally feel, like we have said before, that occasionally in life, as in government, there needs to be a little bit of housecleaning, and this is an opportunity to do some of that. It needs to happen on a regular basis. We're always in support of anything that examines the ever-growing collection of things that happen in any agency, including government, from policies to regulations to red tape. All these things always just seem to gather in huge piles until we truly do need housecleaning.

Having said that we're in support of it, though, I do have some comments that I think need to be said for the record, some things that are, I think, important and worth noting. First of all, I do want to say that I'm a little bit concerned that the UCP amendment was voted down with regard to the Agricultural Operation Practices Act Practice Review Committee. This is a committee that is important to Albertans. I realize it wasn't used much by Albertans, but the reality is that it wasn't costing anything either when it was not functioning or when it was not being used a lot. The reality is that with the increases in rural populations, increases in acreages, increases in agricultural densities there will and may be significant conflicts that should be reviewed, and there should be a mechanism by which to do that. We are disappointed that that amendment was not supported. The committee is viewed as being valuable by the farming community and should have been considered.

Secondly, I just want to make the comment that we're still a little bit confused here about the status of phase 3 of this entire ABC review. The phase 3 of this review was to cover postsecondary institutions. It was to talk about the issues of executive compensation, roles and mandates, and governance excellence in postsecondary institutions. What will the government do with that? Where is that review? When will the opportunity to discuss that and the plans be unveiled with regard to postsecondary institutions? This is a part of the conversation that does need to happen.

Thirdly, I would like to say that we really do want to affirm, especially with this government, the principle of at arm's length. This government has a poor track record with ABCs and, as I mentioned earlier, even with government departments and allowing people the permission to function as they should. This is something where it's important to review the governance, but when it comes to the daily operation and the decisions of boards, the government should not be meddling politically in them. They should not be subject to government oversight on a daily kind of basis, as one of the NDP members mentioned during debate. Government oversight of ABCs is directly contradictory to the principle of at arm's length. Accountability is one thing, but interference is a completely different thing. It's a concept that needs to be understood. We've seen that with AIMCo, we've seen that with a number of other departments, and it's concerning because ABCs are to operate at arm's length.

I'd also like to ask, as I asked earlier, the question: where is the evidence? Where is some kind of documentation, some kind of proof, that $33 million in savings have actually been attained? That is the stated goal of this review. The NDP say that they've saved $33 million. How do we know that that's truly happened? Is it really in the accounting, or is it just a nice-sounding estimate? Without some sort of actual numbers it looks to me like it might actually be a political puffball for the public. Where the savings actually come from we have yet to see and yet to hear. Are there really $33 million in savings? I hope so. I will applaud the government if there are, but there's no evidence to that fact so far if it is, in fact, a fact.

Furthermore, I'd like to express some concern about the Alberta Economic Development Authority. One of our members questioned the wisdom of dissolving this particular authority. This is a government that claims that it wants to promote diversification, that it wants to develop other kinds of industries, yet it hasn't used this authority, this Economic Development Authority. They've let it sort of just sit. This is an opportunity for a group, that previously was very active, to do the kinds of real things in terms of economic development and trade that should be an ongoing reality, quite frankly, no matter which government is in power, but especially for this government because this is the one thing they always want to talk about, yet in reality they're dissolving the very authority that was dedicated to accomplishing what they say are their objectives. So I do have some concerns that they weren't using this authority, that they weren't consulting with them.

I guess I would further like to say in that regard that a number of advisory councils across various departments with this government have not been called into action. I asked in estimates last spring about some of them. There has been no expenditure on them. There has been no calling of them. In other words, the government is continuing the practice of not consulting with stakeholders. We see a government that continually doesn't really care to consult with people. What it does continue to do rather than consult is to continue to take everything in-house. They demonstrate a centralizing, controlling DNA, and they really aren't willing to listen to what stakeholders have to say about much of anything. This bill, in a way, does reflect that ongoing tendency and other advisory councils that haven't even been called upon in the last two years. This is a little bit disturbing, and I want to point it out because I think any government should be listening to the people, should be seeking their input and their understanding. Stakeholders do matter. That's a concern that I have.

Lastly, I just want to say that it is important – and I said this earlier – that stability and confidence are the key drivers in many respects of trust for a government and for economic growth and investment, foreign investment to come into our province. We need to make sure that we have a government that's not just willy-nilly closing things down, shutting them down to align with their ideology, but they're actually doing things that are consulted with constituents, stakeholders that are wise and that are actually creating a stable government.

With that, Mr. Speaker, yes, we will support the bill, but I do have some concerns as I've just expressed. Thank you, sir.

The Speaker: Are there any other members who wish to speak to Bill 21?

Seeing and hearing none, closure to the Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose on behalf of the minister.

Mr. Hinkley: Mr. Speaker, thank you to everyone for their comments and insights into Bill 21. It is an honour to cosponsor this bill, which helps our government to curb unnecessary spending while delivering important services which help make life better for Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring the debate to a close. Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 21 read a third time]

Bill 22

Resident and Family Councils Act

The Speaker: The Member for Spruce Grove-St. Albert.

Mr. Horne: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I am very pleased to move third reading of Bill 22, the Resident and Family Councils Act.

I first wish to thank and acknowledge my fellow members on both sides of the House for the constructive debate on this Bill.

The act will support the establishment of resident and family councils in long-term care and supportive living facilities with four or more residents. These councils are an important mechanism for enabling residents and families to present requests, concerns, and proposed solutions to facility operators. They will empower residents to have a say on the issues that affect their facility and the services they receive. Councils will provide an opportunity to strengthen the crucial relationship between facility operators, residents, and their families. In fact, operators have helped to establish councils in over 70 per cent of these facilities already because they are a valuable mechanism for receiving feedback for the residents they serve.

Last week members spoke about the need for this bill after hearing from constituents who felt they did not have the ability to speak to their operators about their concerns and needs. Mr. Speaker, I believe this act will support residents and their families to take an active and engaged role in maintaining and enhancing the quality of life of residents in long-term care and supportive living facilities.

I'd like to once again thank everyone for their comments and support for this bill and to move third reading of Bill 22.

The Speaker: Are there any others wishing to speak to Bill 22? The Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to stand in this House today to support and discuss Bill 22, Resident and Family Councils Act. This bill will be ensuring that residents of long-term and licensed supportive care facilities will have the right to establish self-governing councils.

This legislation would apply to all public, private, and nonprofit long-term care and supportive living facilities. It's going to ensure an avenue for residents and family members to have their voices heard and be able to have a place to discuss their concerns regarding food, services, leisure activities amongst themselves and also with facility operators. Families have long been advocating for a place where they can voice their concerns regarding the care of their loved ones. Seniors and people with disabilities are now going to have a place where they will feel heard and feel more empowered when it comes to their daily lives.

On that note, Mr. Speaker, the very first constituents that I had come and visit me after I was elected were a family regarding this very issue. It was on the very first day I worked. So I'm very glad to see this come forward now.

Every adult person has a right to participate in their own care and should have a place to voice their views. British Columbia, for example, has the similar Community Care and Assisted Living Act. Their motto is that each person should be able "to participate in the development and implementation of his or her care plan." This is not only vital to ensuring accountability, but it also can increase one's awareness and mental alertness.

Families need to feel that they have the right to participate in either a residential or a family council to represent the interests of their family member, especially if they have been feeling alienated or not feeling heard previously. This can give a sense of security in ensuring that their loved one is being supported and cared for properly.

In British Columbia they even allow an advocate other than a family member who would be willing to participate on their behalf if, for example, due to work or other issues they're unable to attend the meetings. There are also situations where seniors or people with disabilities may not have family at all or one that lives nearby. An advocate can then participate on their behalf. Having these types of standards and protections in place is vital for the safety of any senior or person with disabilities and also for the accountability of the facility itself.

This bill will give seniors, people with disabilities, and their loved ones a place where there is access to a fair and effective process to express their concerns. I've heard many sad stories of the alienation that a resident and a family can face when they feel that they have no control over their daily lives or that their concerns are not being validated. Sometimes these stories have ended in tragic situations, where the families were feeling that they weren't heard properly and they end up carrying the guilt of not stepping in and removing their loved one.

When these councils are formed, it's going to give a way for a group of seniors or people with disabilities or family members to hear different complaints and find solutions in a unified manner for how to deal properly with the situation. This gives families much more control over situations that were previously unforeseen that could potentially be mitigated. It also gives the family a sense of security in being able to voice their opinions about the day-to-day care that their loved one is receiving or the dietary needs that each resident may have, the quality of food and services that may or may not be available. Individual needs that can be voiced in a safe environment where staff members, other patients, and the facility are being held accountable is a very good idea.

I've heard of situations where there may be issues between tenants that end up being volatile and hurtful. I had just such a one occur last year in my own riding. This will also give those affected a place to be able to talk with others, to perhaps garner the group for solutions to the issues.

I'm happy to hear that the council will be able to meet whenever they need to and that no restrictions have been put in place about the number of times they meet and that facility operators will be required to work with the councils on quality-of-life concerns. Diet, services, and activities play a very important role in the mental health of seniors and persons with disabilities. This bill will ensure that residents will have more say in their quality of life and how their respective homes are run. This is one place where everyone will be able to discuss the operations of the facility and be able to invite one or more persons that work at the facility to join the council and participate.

I do have a couple of concerns, and I'm going to voice them here. I'm concerned, though, that the meeting may become too onerous and that it gives a place and maybe even a right to those who are contentious to gain control and abuse that situation. There needs to be a balance between the rights of the residents and unreasonable demands put on a facility.

I would like to have seen some sort of protocol in place that states that when meetings with the facility are scheduled, schedules be taken into consideration. If the facility operator is expected to document requests, concerns, and proposed solutions, then there has to be some sort of boundary put in place. Things could get rather chaotic. I do wish that some more thought would have been given to this area.

The other question that I have is: who would have access to these records and meeting documents? If the true intent is to bring transparency and allow the residents to be heard, then the members of the council should also have access – full access – to these records.

The other area of concern that I have is that given that the councils are given the right to determine their own governance structure and procedures, what protocols have been put in place to ensure that this council will be inclusive of all residents? If this is the case, again, in a rare situation, if you have someone dictating order and procedures that wants to control the process and decide who will or will not be on council, there may be more problems. These councils have been legislated to ensure that residents and family members are able to monitor, influence, and improve the care of residents.

Albertans should have a voice in all matters that concern their lives. I'm glad to hear that we are committed to working alongside those with disabilities, seniors, families, and advocates to improve their quality of life, and for these reasons I fully support this bill.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to rise and speak during third reading of Bill 22. I would like to say that I am supportive of this act and the intended purpose of expanding residents' and families' ability to participate in issues related to quality of life. However, I would like to draw attention to some of the language used around people with disabilities.

In my previous life I did manage an organization. Now, I think, they're up to 27 residences or homes in the community for people with disabilities. Although there are many levels of government, whether it's municipal bylaws, provincial legislation, or safety codes, that are intended to keep people safe and increase their quality of life, they sometimes have the opposite effect, and they sometimes create rules and processes that can be onerous for the people living there.

I just want to talk a little bit about why I think it's a little bit dangerous to group people with disabilities living in the community with the other facilities that we're talking about in this legislation. We're talking about social care facilities like nursing homes; we have extended care and things like that. Community living is very different. Community living is about a person with a disability choosing to live in their community in the most normal, average way possible. Very often you see groupings of people with disabilities that are sometimes forced to live together simply because of the cost: the cost of renting a home, the cost of owning a home, but also the cost to the funder of providing staff supports. Often you'll see a little collection of people with disabilities living together, sharing supports so that they can split it sort of 3 to 1 as opposed to 1 to 1.

Community living is a fragile thing. It's as fragile, I believe, as dignity and respect. I think it's important every day to respect the choices of people with disabilities that live in the community, and that means being aware of how many rules and inspections and things we put in their way.

Now, I believe that the intent of this legislation is to create really meaningful, positive processes. As a service provider in my previous life we knew that it was very, very important that the groups of people that live together as well as their families, their guardians, and their staff had a mechanism to come together to meet and to talk about things that were important, things that were important to them, that they identified, and things that were important to us, that we identified.

Of course, I'm sure most of you at some point in your life have lived with roommates. It's not easy. I think sometimes that living with more than one roommate is really quite difficult. Many of the folks we worked with had lived with roommates for many, many years, so sometimes the issues they dealt with were very, very complex.

But we did see changes – really positive changes – when we encouraged and supported those groups to come together and to address things like staffing ratios, roles of staff, the menu, nutrition, outings, activities, what colour the living room would be painted, whether or not the bathroom needed to be renovated, all kinds of things. It was very useful, but it was also a way for us to work with the folks that live there to teach them that, first and foremost, this was their home. Certainly, their parents or their guardians or other loved ones had a role to play, but they were not the primary decision-makers even though they may have been guardians and they may have legally had the right to help with decisions. What we taught people was independence. It was about expressing their needs and expressing their wants, and I think it was a really great vehicle.

So I am really encouraged that institutions like nursing homes, like the other facilities we've talked about will be supported to start these committees or these family groups or councils up. It does require quite a bit of support at the beginning until people start to understand what their role and function is, how the minutes are kept, where they're kept, how they follow up, who gets what information.

It was a little bit discouraging last week to hear that people were more worried about the operators. I think that we should always be focused on the people, on Albertans that are living in these facilities, not the operators. First and foremost, their quality of life is the most important thing. Their happiness, their safety, their security: all of those things are so important.

I was encouraged to hear also about the fact that before the regulations are implemented or developed, there will be consultation with other groups. I think it is absolutely vital that people with disabilities are consulted properly and that the correct groups are consulted. It's important to speak to the people that are impacted by this legislation, and it's not all people with disabilities. It's only those homes that fall under SLALA. That's the acronym that stands for Supportive Living Accommodation Licensing Act. Those are only facilities that are in the community or homes in the community that have four or more people living in them.

Now, ideally, a community residence for people with disabilities should not be that large, I think, for real integration within a community. However, that is the reality of a lot of people. That is the cost of living in Alberta. It is very high.

Again I just wanted to remind people what community living is for people with disabilities. It looks very different from an institution, it looks very different from an auxiliary hospital or a nursing home, and the rules should be different. So when we do go out and consult, we have to go out and consult those very people that will be impacted by it.

Thinking about the operators in this sector, I think, is somewhat different. The rules that they live by and the accreditation processes that they go through actually mandate that they look at creating groups like this – they don't call them councils – that assist and support people that are living in those homes to express their desires on, you know, what the menu is or what colour their living room is or not necessarily their staffing ratios but what their staffing schedules are like. It is really, really important to understand that.

I wanted to give you one more example just to leave you with a picture of what it looks like when there are too many regulations in place for a group of people with disabilities living in the community. A few years ago we had one home – actually, it was a pretty big home – but we had four people living there simply because of the cost of living. So those four people, because there were four living in that one home, were required to meet some legislation or some rules and processes under that SLALA legislation. In addition to the accreditation process, where people will come in and interview them and check that they're doing certain things with their staff – they have a plan in place; they have goals; they have objectives – in addition to the facilitator also doing service audits and staff audits, financial audits, monthly inspections, they were also subjected to other inspections that were triggered with this legislation. That was a health inspection, that was a fire inspection, and often there would be some someone from the city.

They would look at things – because the legislation is very complex and it does apply to facilities like a nursing home, we would get recommendations like: you need to have the menu posted within this many metres of the kitchen; the laundry has to be colour-coded; the people living there can't eat the vegetables that are grown in the garden because of food safety concerns. So you have to understand that to facilitate real community living for people with disabilities, you have to really consult and make sure that they understand what these changes mean to them in real time, in real life.

With that, I wanted to just say that I do support the legislation, but more than anything I support the consultation that will occur before the regulations are ready.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any other members who would wish to speak to Bill 22? The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: One moment. For the record does 29(2)(a) apply to the last speaker?

Seeing none, thank you, hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As Minister of Seniors and Housing I'm proud to stand in support of this bill, which will make a significant difference in the lives of Alberta seniors and their families. When seniors move into a lodge facility, they bring a wide range of backgrounds, life experiences, and interests with them. Citizens want to see those things become a part of their new residences.

You know, we have over 150 lodges across this province in corners all over our province, and one of the favourite parts of my job is to go to these seniors' lodges and visit with seniors all across our great province. I've certainly met so many. I feel very honoured and thankful. In fact, many of these lodges already have active residents' councils where people do come together and make decisions collectively. This bill, however, will ensure that every lodge will have a place for residents and families to feel safe to speak about their needs and desires.

In addition, seniors are vital, contributing members of their communities, and they're active and involved, and they have so much to offer. Not including them in the decision-making about the facility that they live in doesn't make any sense to me, so I'm so pleased that we are making this very explicit. Seniors have great suggestions, really unique perspectives, and we're much less if we don't, you know, support their contributions wholeheartedly.

As a social worker for many years what really excites me about this bill is the first guiding principle emphasizing that councils shall be person and family centred. These councils offer an important space for bringing issues of inclusion, diversity, and reconciliation into discussions about the care and quality of life. The reason that this is so important is that these facilities are people's homes. Everyone deserves to feel accepted and safe in their home.

One important reason for these councils is to support the LGBTQ seniors. Moving to a new residence should never force seniors to return to the closet, and they should never fear that they have to do so in order to be safe. This summer I had the honour of attending a celebration in the Ashbourne assisted living facility here in Edmonton. They are the first seniors' community in Canada, here in Edmonton, Alberta, to be affirmed by the United Church as inclusive of seniors of all sexual orientations and gender identities. Ashbourne is boldly leading the way towards inclusivity, diversity, support, and acceptance for Alberta's LGBTQ seniors. The work they have done is exemplary.

Not every facility has been able to put in the same effort, however, and unfortunately that means that there are LGBTQ seniors who feel they are forced to return to the closet. Resident and family councils will ensure that seniors have a place to meaningfully engage with their concerns. The person- and family-centred guiding principle will ensure that that engagement supports the needs of seniors of all sexual orientations and gender identities. This is only one example of the ways that inclusion, diversity, and reconciliation in resident and family councils will help to make life better for Albertans who reside in facilities like seniors' lodges.

You know, not very long ago I was touring a facility in the Calgary area, and one of the things that the residents brought up to me was their concern about the decisions that were made in public spaces, so these are the lounges, maybe where they're having their meals together. They felt that they didn't have any input into those decisions. The chairs were quite large and cumbersome, and it was very difficult for some of the seniors to move them. Something even like that, you know, being able to influence and have people thinking about some of the challenges that the seniors might have – if the chairs are too big and cumbersome, they want to have more independence and be able to move them. Even things like that, them being able to contribute to these councils with their ideas.

Another thing that they said is that some of the items on display – like, there were display cases sort of in this lounge area. They had no input on what was in those display cases. It can be even as simple as that, but, I mean, still, that's significant. That is where people live.

Certainly, as I've travelled the province, the richness of the local communities is reflected in the lodges, and I would love that to be supported more. Like, you know, I was up in Falher this summer. That's known, of course, as the honey capital of Canada, and they have this very gigantic bee on display in their community, and this is a big part of their culture. There are lots of bee farmers in that area, so that impacts the people in the lodge and the decisions they make, and that's just one sort of local community aspect.

Religious and ethnic communities: they may be eating certain foods, have particular religious practices. The residents do want to be able to have input into that. Right here in Edmonton in my own riding, in Edmonton-Riverview, Canterbury Court serves seniors of all sorts of different backgrounds but through a Christian message of the Anglican Church. People need to have input into those kinds of decisions. It's so important that the seniors who live in these residences feel that they have the input, not only feel but they actually do have the input into making these decisions. You know, when you think of your own home, you have the ability to make decisions about your life there, what you have in your home. You have that freedom, and that shouldn't end when you move into a facility like a lodge.

This bill will give senior residents and their families a voice on those matters and protect their freedom wherever they call home. I have heard this from seniors all over our province, and I'm very thankful to the Minister of Health for hearing Albertans, too. I'm very happy to support Bill 22, and I strongly encourage all members to add their support for the resident and family councils as well.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Any other members who wish to speak to Bill 22? Oh, sorry. Under 29(2)(a) to the minister's presentation? No?

The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-St. Albert to close debate.

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think we've heard from both sides of the House how this bill will really help residents in a wide variety of care situations. We've heard from the Member for St. Albert about what this means for the PDD community. We've heard from the Minister of Seniors and Housing, and, you know, we've heard from very many members on this bill about how this really helps to make life better for all Albertans.

With that, I would like to close debate.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 25

Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Rosendahl: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to introduce Bill 25, the Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017, for second reading.

The Acting Speaker: You're moving it on behalf of the Minister of Labour?

Mr. Rosendahl: Yes.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Rosendahl: Madam Speaker, our forestry professionals do amazing work in our province to ensure the proper management of our forest land. Their work on education, research, conservation, reclamation, protection, renewal, and forest management planning is second to none. I can speak to that personally when we look at the first forest management agreement that was signed between the province and North Western Pulp & Power in 1957. We look at the work that they've done over the years in covering all those things that I just mentioned. It is great. The things that they've done have led the way in the way our forestry is done in the province today, and that's something that we can be very proud of.

Currently there are 1,600 professionals that identify as either a forest technologist or a forester. I'll tell you the difference between the two. A forester has a degree whereas a technologist has a diploma or a certificate. I suppose I might be able to fall into that category, being that I have forestry in my background plus wildlife management on top of that.

Madam Speaker, if passed, Bill 25 will amend the act to merge two regulatory colleges – this is the essence of the act – the College of Alberta Professional Foresters and the College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists, into one regulatory organization called the Association of Alberta Forest Management Professionals. For both organizations these changes are a long time coming. Both colleges asked government to make these changes back in 2014. Membership holders in both organizations voted way in favour, more than 90 per cent, of merging before approaching Alberta Labour to officially request legislative amendments to do so. In fact, both organizations came together in 2015. They have been sharing an office and are already sporting their new name and logo. Put it this way: Bill 25 basically just makes it official.

Alberta Labour has worked closely with both organizations, consulting them regularly on the various proposed changes. In addition, these changes also have the strong support of the Alberta Forest Products Association, the voice for the forest product industry.

You might wonder if the scope of practice for forestry professionals remains the same. What does this merger actually mean? For starters, merging the two organizations into one body would eliminate any confusion around the two organizations that provide the same service, which they do. To make things simpler, the professions' governing regulations would also be consolidated from three to one. This will save both organizations valuable resources in time and money that are being directed at running two organizations, so it's a money-saving issue as well.

The amendment would also improve administrative and disciplinary processes to be more modern and efficient without sacrificing principles of fairness. Complaints that are levied against the member would move to a central governing committee instead of relying upon a single individual. The number of people on the committee would also increase, which would allow for work to be shared among the members, creating administrative efficiencies. The membership would continue to consist of the many industry professionals but now would also include public members who are residents of Alberta. These public members would add a level of oversight and public accountability that was previously not represented. It's important that we look at that idea.

The amendments would also allow the committee to continue an investigation into a complaint even though, say, a complaint had been withdrawn or even settled. Such an action, when warranted, would allow the committee to conduct further investigations if there are repeated offences by one member, better serving the public interest.

Madam Speaker, by consolidating these organizations into one governing body, there will be a strong and unified voice for our forestry professionals, the creation of one regulatory body removing confusion around two organizations offering the same service and the consolidation of the professions' governing legislation to an act supported by a single regulation as opposed to three current regulations, making things easier for government.

The amendments being proposed were requested by both organizations. They have had opportunity to review the changes, they are supportive, and they are excited to see this get done. As such, I ask all members of the Assembly to vote in favour of this bill.

Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to Bill 25, the Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act. Now, this act governs both the College of Alberta Professional Foresters and the College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists. These two organizations act as the professional regulatory organizations for the governance of professional foresters and professional forest technologists. The biggest difference between these two organizations is education. Foresters have a degree, and technologists have a diploma or a certificate.

The bill proposes a number of amendments to the Regulated Forestry Profession Act in order to implement the merger of the two professional bodies and create a single organization called the Association of Alberta Forest Management Professionals. This merger of organizations began with a memorandum of understanding back in 2013. In June 2014 both memberships voted overwhelmingly to proceed with a proposed merger. In fact, more than 80 per cent of foresters and 90 per cent of forest technologists who participated in the vote chose to vote in favour of the merger and changes to the act. This unification has been the culmination of years of dedicated work between these two organizations.

Consultation and approval were sought from both colleges' members prior to them approaching the Department of Labour and asking for the changes. This unity of organizations has already gone past the proposal level, and not only have these two entities reaffirmed this proposal year after year; they've already made inroads in combining several aspects of their organizations. These two organizations have been holding joint annual general meetings for the last several years. Additionally, they have also combined some administrative functions such as shared office space and organizational newsletters.

These groups have been very proactive with proceeding with the merger of the organizations. All that's needed is the change in legislation to allow for the formal merger of their professional organizations. Notification letters have already been sent to partners, which include the professional regulatory organizations and associations, postsecondary institutions, municipal stakeholders, government of Alberta ministries, provincial and territorial governments, and other forestry groups. This kind of notification gave all those parties lots of time to see that there was an intention to amend the act, and the fact is that none have come forward with concerns.

Should this legislation pass, these two entities, with a combined membership of 1,600, will now not only become one professional college and eliminate the confusion that goes with two similar organizations but will save costs associated with running separate organizations as well. Imagine that, Madam Speaker. An organization that finds ways to eliminate duplication services while actually saving money and becoming more efficient, a lesson that all governments could probably perhaps pay more than a casual glance.

But what about services and job losses? According to information we received, as these groups have been operating for one entity for some time, it is clear that no job losses are anticipated. Additionally, there will be no cost to the government as all expenses are incurred by the colleges, a win-win type of situation, for sure.

These proposed amendments would also improve the administrative and disciplinary process, modernizing it into a more efficient body, all the while without sacrificing the goal of fairness. The fact is that complaints levied against the member would now be moved to a central governing committee instead of relying upon a single individual. This can only increase the level of accountability and fairness. By increasing the number of people on the committee, it would therefore increase effectiveness by allowing work to be shared among members, thus creating administrative efficiency. Membership would continue to be made up of many industry professionals but now would also include public members from Alberta. These members would add a level of public oversight and accountability that the separate organizations simply don't have.

In a set-up similar to the Chartered Professional Accountants Act these proposed amendments would allow this new committee to continue an investigation into a complaint even though the complaint has been withdrawn or settled. Should such an action occur, when warranted, the committee could continue to conduct further investigations if there are repeated offences by one member, for example. This is not only in the public's best interests but helps ensure a fair and transparent process.

Madam Speaker, in Canada, of all of the provinces that regulate foresters and forest technologists, only Quebec continues to regulate through two separate organizations. These changes are clearly in line with what the two organizations have asked for and will bring us on par with other jurisdictions in Canada. With approval rates by the vast majority of both parties, a series of yearly reaffirmation votes, and an already high level of organizational interaction and co-operation, passing this act seems to me on the face as a no-brainer. When that many of a membership vote for a merger, who are we to stand in the way of democracy? Why, I haven't seen this level of co-operation among like-minded memberships that voted overwhelmingly in favour of unity since, well, July 22.

For these reasons, Madam Speaker, I plan to support this bill and what it will accomplish and encourage the members of the Assembly to do the same. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Red Deer-North.

Mrs. Schreiner: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am proud to speak to you and through you to all of my fellow members in the House today to Bill 25, the Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017.

Madam Speaker, 2014 saw both the College of Alberta Professional Foresters as well as the College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists come together to consolidate both colleges after members voted in favour of a merger, with an overwhelming 90 per cent support. The consolidation of both colleges would ensure not only support of a strong and unified voice for our province's forestry professionals but as well efficiencies that will save the organizations time and money.

The forestry professionals who ensure the very important work of the proper management of our forest land are absolutely second to none. Some of the important work the forestry professionals provide is in research, conservation, reclamation, protection, renewal, forestry management as well as education. I would like to extend gratitude to all of our forestry professionals for making life better for all Albertans today and into the future.

Madam Speaker, 2015 saw both the College of Alberta Professional Foresters and the College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists merge into one regulatory organization, the Association of Alberta Forest Management Professionals. For the past two years they have been sharing office space under their new name and logo. Both organizations have worked closely with the Ministry of Labour, and Bill 25, Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, would ensure that the very important work of the regulatory organizations continues for the well-being, safety, and public interest of all Albertans.

Madam Speaker, the amendments proposed were requested by both organizations, and by merging these organizations into one, it will remove any marketplace confusion around two organizations offering the same outstanding services. At this time I would like to encourage all in the House to support the amendments, which would create a single regulatory entity for our forest professionals.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Rosendahl: Well, I thank all the members who spoke on this important bill. With that, I move to close debate.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Bill 24

An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances

[Adjourned debate November 7: Ms Ganley]

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak to Bill 24? The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise this afternoon to speak in support of Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances. As I rise to speak about this bill, I want to acknowledge the leadership of my fellow LGBTQ-plus MLAs, members of the LGBTQ-plus community, their parents and allies in ensuring that our schools are a welcoming, caring, and safe place to learn for all students and members of the staff. I also want to acknowledge the pain, exclusion, and vicious comments that members of the LGBTQ-plus community have endured in our schools and communities.

The reason that GSAs in our schools have been successful and have been established is because of the leadership of the students who have advocated, worked for, and ensured that objections to their establishment were overturned. Thank you to the student leaders, their sponsors, teachers, and supportive administration that worked together to create the safe, supportive spaces that GSAs are. Thank you, too, to allies such as altView, la Fédération de la jeunesse albertaine, and ISMSS, who have supported the students and helped in providing materials and education within our schools.

Another group that has made the presence of GSAs in our schools supportive has been parents, parents who have sought information, supported groups, marched in pride parades, walked with their children in their development, and provided love and support throughout that path.

One such parent who has really impressed me is Lindsay Peace, the mother of Ace Peace, who spoke at the press conference announcing Bill 24. Ms Peace said:

As a parent I understand that I want to know what my kids are doing. I want to know who they are hanging out with, what activities they are engaging in. I want to know the decisions they are making. Because it's important to me, I talk to them. I ask them. Over all else, I create and maintain an open dialogue with them and a sense of safety and security. If for some reason one of my children didn't feel that they could come to me with anything, then I believe that is a reflection on me. That's my bad, and I would need to look at doing things differently.

In the meantime I would be grateful if they felt that they could turn to a teacher. The more folks who support my kids and are committed to their health and well-being can only be a positive thing. Also, I think it's important to point out that it's not an either/or situation. Ultimately, I believe that we are working together, parents and educators.

When it comes to GSAs, specifically to the outing of students, I think that there is a misunderstanding that means that parents will never find out, that this will be some sort of dirty little secret between the student and the school forever. I have heard dozens of accounts from families in which it was teachers who helped their students disclose their queer identity to their families. I know a former student whose teacher helped him write a letter to his parents to tell them he was trans. I know many kids who are queer who spent a long time at their GSA until they became confident enough in themselves to have a conversation with their parents.

I also know that GSAs teach allies how to be better allies, how to be better people. I know that kids learn a greater understanding of the adversity faced by their peers and learn compassion. GSAs allow students an opportunity to be a part of creating positive change. Although I do know as a parent how great it is to hear that our kids are wonderful and doing amazing things, I certainly don't believe that anyone needs to be outed for doing so.

I really want to thank Ms Lindsay Peace and other parents who have loved and continue to love their kids unconditionally and have established an open dialogue.

I want to address the whole issue of parental authority and responsibility and decision-making for their children. Children are a gift, and as parents we want all the best for our children. We want to save them from hardships, pain, rejection, and isolation. We as parents demonstrate through our actions and through our words the values and ethics that we hold.

I wanted to tell you a little bit about those values that parents have. I'm sure that as parents we have all been in a situation where we find that our kids take our dinner conversation and repeat that to their friends, right? I think that's how parents influence their children. We instill in our children a sense of their heritage, the community that they are a part of, and our hopes for their future.

Our role as parents is to support and empower our students so that our students, our children make the best choices that they believe are best for them, make the choices that they have explored based on their interests, be it their careers, friends, sexual identity, gender expression. We can help and guide them by supporting and by getting information, talking to other adults. We cannot make the choice for them. Our children are not our possessions. We have to as parents believe in their ability to move towards adulthood and choice-making.

The bill does not lessen parental authority. Bill 24 does not lessen parental authority. Parental authority comes from the dialogue and openness we have with our children, that have been gifted to us. It is our role to provide our children with a safe place, an open conversation, and a supportive home.

Now I want to address my friends in the faith community, particularly in the evangelical spectrum. As a member of that community I understand the difficulty to address social justice issues in our community and the changing values. I still remember when in churches men wore suits and ties and women wore skirts. It is rare now to see men in suits and ties in the churches, and even preachers wear casual clothes.

Not long ago single moms were pariahs in our congregation, shunned, prevented from leadership positions, and impeded within our churches and society. This has changed.

Not long ago divorce was frowned upon, actively discouraged even in abusive situations, and divorcees were prevented from remarriage or leadership roles within our church.

Women have long been prevented from leadership in most church communities as preachers, pastors, and on the board of elders. While this is changing, there are still too many places where gifted women are prevented from exercising their God-given gifts.

I could also mention how churches haven't been very good around accepting the poor and the homeless on Sunday morning.

It was also not too long ago that our churches supported slavery, segregation, and apartheid. It took courageous, prophetic leaders to actively call the Christian community to account for their role in supporting apartheid and segregation. We all know the names of Dr. Martin Luther King, Bishop Tutu, Father Berrigan, among others.

Other courageous, prophetic leaders are now calling for the church to stop the exclusion of the LGBTQ-plus community. One of these leaders is Tony Campolo, well known for his books, preaching ministry, social justice activism, and as a professor at a well-known evangelical seminary. Dr. Campolo said:

One reason I am changing my position on [LGBTQ acceptance in the church is that] . . . as a social scientist, I have concluded that sexual orientation is almost never a choice and I have seen how damaging it can be to try to "cure" someone from being gay. As a Christian, my responsibility is not to condemn or reject gay people, but rather to love and embrace them and to endeavor to draw them into the fellowship of the Church.

And for them to be married, too, he adds.

When we sing the old invitation hymn, Just As I Am, I want us to mean it, and I want my gay and lesbian brothers and sisters to know it is true for them too.

So if Dr. Campolo provides this kind of leadership, I think it's really time here in Alberta that we accept this. There are many others who, like Dr. Campolo, have prayed, read, and engaged in conversations and soul-searching to bring them to the place of full acceptance of the LGBTQ-plus community.

I would like to encourage members of the faith community who are reluctant to explore full acceptance of the LGBTQ-plus community to prayerfully consider their theological perspective on this issue and their reluctance to support this bill. Bill 24 does not negate parental love, acceptance, and the supportive guidance role of a parent. It does not give the government or schools authority over our children, as members opposite have claimed. All it does is to confirm that our young people have the right to attend any club activity under the jurisdiction of their school that they choose to without being outed to their parents. It is also clear that sponsoring teachers, principals will exercise their duties under the teaching profession to ensure the safety of students under their care and, in the case of potential harm to the student or to others, contact parents and the relevant other professionals.

Participating in a GSA is not a discipline issue, where teachers and principals contact parents and guardians and discuss potential consequences of the action. I still remember the time when I was called by one of my son's principals and told that he had lit firecrackers in a garbage can and about the consequences of his expulsion. Participating in a GSA should be viewed as a regular club at school that provides a safe place for students to participate in activities, explore their sexual identity, and get support for how they may possibly disclose their exploration to the significant adults in their lives in their own time and in their own way.

As a parent we often do not agree with or understand the choices our kids make such as what they eat – such as my kid and no veggies – how they spend their money, what they decide to study, whom they choose to date. Some parents might not agree with their child participating in a chess club, a sewing club, or the theatre, but sponsor teachers in these clubs do not phone parents and tell them their child is involved. A club does not teach curriculum. This is why it's called extracurricular. It provides a fun place for students to pursue their passion and share that passion with others, including the adult teachers involved.

I am also pleased that the bill clarifies the role of the principal and his power in authorizing a GSA or a club. Students seeking to start a club need to have clear information as to who can support the establishment of the club, who they can go to to find a room, a sponsor teacher, and administrative support. They don't need to have the runaround in trying to figure out who can give the authority.

I am also pleased that the bill clarifies that the establishment of a GSA, from section 45.1 of the act, applies to all schools who have public funding. This will ensure that every single school in Alberta that receives public dollars has a policy that clearly allows students to form a gay-straight alliance and makes that policy publicly available.

The minister has also clarified that section 50.1 of the School Act, which currently states that parents may be notified of instructional time that focuses on topics related to religion and human sexuality, does not apply to GSAs. Parents can continue to choose that they're pulled from these curriculum lessons but not GSAs.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to urge all members of this House to think of this bill in supporting young people in our schools and communities by providing them a safe place to discuss their sexuality. I know that if GSAs had been in my sons' schools, I would not have been upset if they had participated in GSAs, and I would have encouraged it. This is not a bill that removes parental authority. It is not a bill that is not respectful of persons of faith. It is just a bill that clarifies school authorities' roles and responsibilities and ensures that students are the ones that decide who they tell, in their own time and in their own way, about their sexuality.

As a parent I have been blessed with the gift of two boys who were named to remind me of God's gift. I am so thankful to be part of a government that has done so much to strengthen support for the LGBTQ-plus students in the province.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Minister of Culture and Tourism.

Miranda: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak in favour of Bill 24, and I want to thank my hon. colleague the Minister of Education for bringing this legislation forward.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. minister, are you speaking under 29(2)(a), questions or comments?

Miranda: No. It's not a question. Sorry.

The Acting Speaker: Sorry, Minister.

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Airdrie, followed by the hon. Minister of Culture and Tourism.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances. Before I begin, I think it's absolutely necessary to correct some misinformation that has been circulating with respect to the United Conservatives, our position on this bill, and GSAs in general. To be perfectly clear, we fully support GSAs and believe that they are an important tool to support students who may be going through a difficult time. In other words, we know that GSAs can and have saved lives. In fact, Bill 10, the legislation protecting students' rights to form a GSA, was passed in this House with unanimous support from both of the UCP's legacy caucuses' members. Suggestions that the UCP is not in favour of GSAs are offensive and quite simply false. The buck stops here today.

Secondly, Madam Speaker, the United Conservatives do not support the mandatory notification of parents regarding their children's involvement in GSAs, nor have we ever suggested that gay kids be outed to their parents or to anyone else, for that matter.

It must be said that attempts by the government to equate a vote against this legislation with a vote against GSAs, LGBTQ kids, or the LGBTQ community are particularly shameful. It's shameful because such false equivalencies are just that. They are false. It's also shameful because once again we see that the NDP are using children and youth as pawns in a political game. Not only that, Madam Speaker, many of these kids are vulnerable, and they're at risk. Do you think it benefits them in any way to turn on the TV and the news or open a newspaper and see members of the NDP falsely claim that United Conservatives want to hurt them and would delight in doing so?

I can assure you that this is overblown and completely misleading rhetoric, and it isn't good for anyone, least of all the kids that this legislation is attempting to help. I would encourage the members opposite to raise the bar a little and argue their case based on the merits of the legislation rather than using fearmongering, personal smears, and outright lies.

Madam Speaker, we do not take any piece of proposed legislation lightly.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, I believe the Government House Leader has a point of order.

Point of Order Factual Accuracy

Mr. Mason: I wish to rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. The citation could be any number of things, but 23(h), (i), and (j) will do. The hon. member has just suggested that members of our government and our caucus have lied with respect to the position of the UCP with regard to their position on GSAs. That is a clear violation of the rules. Moreover, it is not true, so I would ask that you rule and that the hon. member withdraw the comment and apologize to the House.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. McIver: Okay. Obviously, none of us have the Blues, but I believe the hon. member was reading off text, so I'll do my best to read it back to you: do you think it any way benefits them to turn on the news or the newspaper "and see members of the NDP falsely claim that United Conservatives want to hurt them and would delight in doing so?"

Well, I think we heard, just before the noon break, a member from the government side actually say those things, and the whole point of this paragraph is to point out that that's incorrect. That's not how we feel about it. We might have a difference of opinion here, but surely we have not only the right but the responsibility to correct the record when we've had false motives applied to us, and that falls under 23(h), (i), and (j), too.

I believe there's no point of order here. I think the Government House Leader might be a little embarrassed by the remarks of his member, but his member's remarks actually require us to correct the record.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Hon. members, it is not unparliamentary to criticize statements as being contrary to the facts, which is what I believe the hon. member was saying.

Mr. Mason: She said "lie."

The Acting Speaker: Hon. Government House Leader, I don't have the Blues in front of me at this time, and I didn't hear that.

At this point I will say that it's a debate around the facts. However, I would like to caution both sides of the House at this time.

Hon. member, would you like to correct your comments?

Mrs. Pitt: Madam Speaker, I do apologize. The word "lie" was used in the sentence that I read. I certainly do apologize, and I will withdraw that comment.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. Please continue.

Debate Continued

Mrs. Pitt: Okay. Thank you, Madam Speaker. As I was saying, the United Conservative caucus does not take any piece of proposed legislation lightly. We carefully review it, we ask questions, and we wonder if it can be improved. We also look at each piece of legislation with an eye to determining if it has forged the right balance for Albertans of differing views.

This, then, is where we find ourselves when we look at Bill 24. When we look at the bill before us, it's interesting to note that the bill that first addressed GSAs was passed by this House in 2015, two years ago, so it is natural to ask why we are looking at updating the provisions today. When Bill 10 was reviewed and debated in the House just a few years ago, the NDP was in opposition at the time, and it did not propose the kinds of amendments that we are seeing come forward here in Bill 24 today. So why introduce them now?

This NDP government has had control over the legislative agenda for two and a half years. It could have brought this bill forward any time during that period, but they never took the opportunity to do so. It is most curious, Madam Speaker. This government first started talking about this bill just a short month ago. Prior to that, not a single word. There was no push from outside of this province either as far as other provinces updating their legislation. No one else is doing this, not even Ontario. In fact, there does not appear to be any similar legislation anywhere in Canada.

It is possible, Madam Speaker, that the NDP has decided to introduce this legislation now for political reasons. It could be. If that is the motive, this is a major concern because, as I mentioned earlier, it means that the NDP government is attempting to use children as political pawns to distract Albertans from the real issues, the NDP's incredibly poor handling of the economy. We know that public support for them is falling, and we know that Albertans continue to suffer from their fiscal policies, fiscal policies that will, by the way, put us $90 billion in debt in just a few short years. Imagine that: Alberta, once the envy of the G-8, in desperate financial mire.

Then, like a magician using a sleight of hand, they bring forward legislation that will divert attention from the main issues that all Albertans are concerned about. What is that issue? It's quite simple. Will I keep my job, or will it disappear? Will my child get a job when they graduate next year? How will I pay the bills if I lose my job? Do you see a common thread here? Albertans are concerned about everyday, real-life issues, and that is why they want their government to focus on them.

But this bill is before us, and like the good legislators that we are, we will do our jobs. We will look at it with an eye to determining if it truly reflects Albertans and if it accomplishes what it seeks to do.

There are some issues in Bill 24 that are worth highlighting. Let me say again that peer supports, antibullying groups such as GSAs can and do play an important role in our province. Our society in just a few short years has come a long way in recognizing that we all have a responsibility to deal with bullying.

As legislators we have a great responsibility to protect our children, all children. We must, however, be careful that we do not use our positions to put up barriers for loving parents who want and need to play important roles in protecting their children. What could be more natural than parents wanting to be involved with their children? What?

Being a parent is not an easy job – I know – and it often gets harder as children grow into teenagers. Schools seek to keep parents involved with their children because they know it is a challenging time for them, and the students need all the support that is available to them. That is why we have professional educators who not only teach; they can act as valued counsellors for children, and they care. They really do. Which one of us can't think back to a teacher who took a special interest in us to help us through a difficult time? These teachers also forge relationships with parents because they know that involvement is important for both the child and the parent.

That brings me to another concern with Bill 24. You see, it prevents teachers, principals, and counsellors from involving parents when their child is experiencing difficulties. This part of the bill is worth a full public discussion. Parents should be aware of it and have the ability to weigh in. Remember when I said that it is the job of legislators to find a balance? This is one of those times.

Another aspect of this bill that is problematic is that it makes no distinction between a five-year-old child and one who is 17. Parents need to understand that this law would treat the decisions of a five-year-old the same as a teenager. Surely this kind of approach is worth full public discussion. We need to understand why it's been included and adjust it if parents disagree with it. Why should we as politicians make decisions that are best left to parents and trusted educators?

The third concern is that the bill proposes that section 50.1(1), which ensures that a school receives parental consent before teaching sexual content, will no longer apply to extracurricular activities. It's a new change. In other words, subjects that cannot be taught during school hours without parental permission could be taught after school and without their knowledge.

As you can see, we are concerned that politicians do not overreach on Bill 24. We need to involve parents and educators and young people in this full public discussion. That is the best way of creating legislation, legislation that works for all Albertans. Please consider my words today.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to – oh, 29(2)(a). My apologies. Comments or questions?

Seeing none, I will now call on the Minister of Culture and Tourism.

Miranda: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak in favour of Bill 24. I want to of course thank my hon. colleague the Minister of Education for bringing this legislation forward. I admit that I am not entirely happy to debate this issue because I had thought that the days where the debate was permeated by misguided opinions about the LGBTQ community were a thing of the past, but here we are.

Now, admittedly, we have come a long way when it comes to treating all Albertans with respect regardless of their gender identity or gender expression. In my Ministry of Culture and Tourism, for example, we have made huge strides. We are growing LGBTQ tourism and promoting the province's destinations and attractions to LGBTQ travellers. I've also had the opportunity to represent Alberta at the LGBTQ-plus Service Providers' Summit in Ottawa. And, of course, we continue to openly and proudly raise the pride and transgender flags every year at government buildings to celebrate LGBTQ rights, inclusion, and acceptance, inviting students to attend as well. We do this because visibility matters, and it is an important part of progress. Our voices help to celebrate our successes, our diversity, and also highlight the continued challenges faced by our community.

Progress is indeed something that we should celebrate; however, we must also recognize that outdated views still exist in our province. You don't have to look very far or too hard to find those who are unable to make up their minds as to whether outing gay kids is okay. To be clear, it is never okay.

Personally, I wish there had been a Minister of Education around when I was in school because I think my school years would have been a lot easier. With the sense of isolation that is created within you when you are struggling with many, many issues that are coming to the forefront, having to suffer in silence and not feeling like you actually have anybody who could understand you, finding somebody who could actually just listen without any judgment is something that I think all of us pray for. Personally, I can attest to many, many days and nights where I struggled and looked for people who would give me that support and allow me to be able to express the many things that were going on in my mind.

Quite frankly, I think that having a GSA when I was growing up would have made my life so much easier, so today I stand here very proudly to see that this government is taking steps to ensure that that happens for students in our province. Every student deserves to have a school that is welcoming and caring and a safe place to learn. Gay-straight alliances help students, and in some cases GSAs can help save lives. This legislation, if passed, will strengthen the supports for students who wish to create or join a gay-straight alliance in their schools.

It is also worth noting that this danger is compounded for kids who are also new immigrants. You can imagine that this is something that I take very close to home for me, because being an immigrant is challenging. Not only do you have to adapt to a new way of life and how to fit into your new home, as an LGBTQ newcomer you also have to deal with the issues of gender identity and gender expression, that compound that experience. Of course, coming to a new country, often with limited grasp of language and having to adjust to a new culture, is emotionally, physically, and spiritually very taxing. It is a trauma that has a lasting impact, especially with somebody who is struggling to come to terms with that sexuality.

Coming out is not an easy experience for many. Most of us struggle for many years because a closet is a very lonely and awful place to be. Madam Speaker, you might be familiar with the online campaign It Gets Better, with videos from members of the LGBTQ community telling teens who are in school who are suffering not to lose hope because things get better after, of course, coming into a community, perhaps graduating and going on to adulthood. The thing is that as much as I like that message and as much as I see the importance of it, my question remains: why should you have to wait until you leave school for things to get better? Why do you have to struggle in silence? Quite frankly, there is no need for that.

Being different should be celebrated, but instead you face constant threats, threats like being outed before you are ready, exposing you to all kinds of pressures, all kinds of issues. There are dangers. As you know, we've talked about the issue of the increased risk for homelessness, things that deal with mental health and self-harm. All of these things are elevated in this community. Of course, it's not exclusive to it, but these are the things that this community has to deal with. All of these threats, including the threat of physical violence, are the things that this community and these kids have to deal with. Why not give them the space to have those discussions? Why not surround them with people who will love and support them and give them the strength to be able to face their days not only with pride but also with a sense of belonging and being part of a community that is there to support them?

GSAs, in fact, offer students a safe place to simply be themselves and be surrounded by those who will care for them on a daily basis. Now, as a parent I would wish nothing less for my kids. Who would not want their kids to have peers around them who will help them to grow up in every possible way and look out for them? What parent wouldn't be proud to see that their kid is the kind of person who stands up for their friends and who would join a GSA to look after their LGBTQ friends and stand up for them? I certainly would be among those people, and I think many people in Alberta would as well.

Now, I remember how things used to be in this province. I have the added right of being the oldest among the three of us LGBTQ MLAs in this Legislature, and I do remember things about this province, growing up as an LGBTQ person, that were not always pleasant. I remember not having experiences but having heard from those who were in the first pride parades, for example, having to wear paper bags over their faces because they knew that if they were out in a photograph and people found out who they were, they could potentially not only face violence but lose their jobs, lose their homes, and perhaps even additional consequences, all of which meant that they just couldn't be themselves.

It's not the kind of province that I want to go back to. That's not the kind of province I want my kids to grow up in. Having this legislation in place will ensure that when we go forward, every single child in this province can feel safe and secure in the knowledge that they can join a GSA in their schools and that they're going to find people in those schools who are going to support them and give them all the tools that they need to be able to not just thrive but succeed in every aspect of their life.

Now, as a member of the LGBTQ community I can tell you and all of the members here that it's simply not enough to show up, or perhaps not, in some cases, at pride parades wearing rainbow T-shirts to get your picture taken and put it out on social media. It's simply, quite frankly, not enough, for example, to go to wonderful places like Grande Prairie Pride and celebrate, and it's not enough to show up at the pride Shabbat dinner at Temple B'nai Tikvah in Calgary to break bread with the community and profess to supporting the community. These gestures are simply not enough if you do not come to this Legislature to stand up and defend those same principles of inclusion and diversity that you seem to profess. Without those actions, those gestures are simply hollow and without any meaning whatsoever.

That is why I'm here today, to say to the LGBTQ community of our province: you matter, you are loved, and your diversity is embraced by this government. I am here to say to the students of our province that you will not be outed before you are ready because every single one of the members of this government is going to ensure that that does not happen to you. That's why I'm here supporting this legislation. It lays out the clear steps that must be taken to provide safe and caring places to learn for all students regardless of their gender identity or gender expression. I am proud to work in a government that is doing that, that is going to strengthen the supports for LGBTQ students in our province, every day making their lives better. I'm here to support legislation that will protect our students and ensure that they have safe, caring, welcoming, and loving places for them to simply learn, grow, and thrive.

I thank you all and ask you all to vote in favour of this legislation.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any comments or questions under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Stony Plain.

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you to the minister for such an impassioned speech. I really appreciate it.

One of the things I wanted to comment on – and I do have a question for the minister – is that my daughter is in grade 11, and my daughter is part of the GSA at her school. The way I found out that my daughter is part of that GSA is the same way that I found out my daughter is part of the Harry Potter club. She told me. She came to me as a parent, and she let me know that she wanted to be there to support her friends and be part of that group because she wants that safe and inclusive environment. So my question to the minister becomes: what would that have meant to you as a child growing up in your school to have friends who could meet you and be part of this environment with you?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Culture and Tourism.

Miranda: Thank you, and thank you, Member, for the question. I think that for me it would have meant having had less time hiding and figuring out ways to avoid facing a schoolyard that wasn't the friendliest of places to be, with people not necessarily being nice to you, and spending more time learning and more time growing as a person. I think it would have given me the opportunity to simply thrive in different ways. I didn't have the opportunity to do that, unfortunately. Quite frankly, there are some of us who have never hidden who we are, and sometimes those kinds of things created situations in which you were, you know, bullied for many, many reasons. I think that having had a club like this would have meant that I would have been in a safe environment where I would have been able to just simply learn, thrive, and grow as a person. I think it would have been a magical experience, similar to the Harry Potter club perhaps, because it simply would have been nothing that would have created any sense of shame. It wouldn't have been anything that would have created any sense of isolation. It would have simply been just like any other club, something that would have allowed me to experience and be with peers that just wanted to hang out with me and be friends with me. So it would have meant a lot.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other comments or questions under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise today to enthusiastically, loudly, and proudly support Bill 24. That shouldn't be all that difficult in 2017, to stand up for a bill that does nothing more than protect fundamental human rights, the fundamental human rights of students in this province to live the lives that they were born to live, to live the lives they choose to live, and to do so in safety.

One of the points of discussion and debate on this bill has been whether we should trust parents to do the right thing, whether we should trust teachers to make the right assessments of safety and danger to children in schools. The vast, vast, vast majority of parents in our province are loving, caring, responsible parents, but this bill protects children who, unfortunately, don't have those parents. That's not a lot, but it's a lot more than zero. How do we know who those parents are? We don't know that, and while I have tremendous, tremendous respect for Alberta's teachers, it is not within their purview to make that determination. They can't always know what's happening at home. I don't think any teacher can say that they always know what's happening at home, so there is tremendous risk to LGBTQ2S-plus students in this province if they are outed without their permission.

This is about fundamental human rights, as I've said. What GSAs do is create a welcoming, caring, respectful, safe, inclusive environment for all students. There's very clear research that shows that LGBTQ students are more likely to feel safe and are more comfortable about being open in their sexual orientation, exploring gender identity and gender expression, in schools with GSAs or QSAs because they provide that place to create a sense of belonging. That, again, shouldn't be a tremendously controversial statement. Like for the Member for Stony Plain, my daughter is a member of a GSA. I know that because she told me in her time, in her way, that that was important to her, to be an ally, to explore who she is in this world. We are able to have that conversation – I'm getting a tiny bit emotional – because that's the relationship we have, and I cherish that more than I can express in words.

I think that's the situation for the vast majority of children, and that's a wonderful, wonderful thing. But that's not the situation for all children. The risks are clear. Between 25 and 40 per cent of homeless youth identify as LGBTQ. That is a shocking and sobering and frightening statistic. GSAs help those students, ensure that they have a chance at a better education because they are focused on their studies, not focused on what might happen at home should someone out them without their permission. It has a tremendous positive impact on their academic performance. They have higher self-esteem, greater school achievement, improved attendance, increased sense of empowerment and hope. They make new friendships. They have improved home and school relationships. They're more comfortable being visible as LGBTQ or allies. They have reduced their stress due to hiding one's identity, increased confidence, and enhanced sense of pride.

Madam Speaker, this is the lived reality of members of this Assembly, and I want to recognize and honour those members of this Assembly who shared that lived experience with us. It takes a tremendous amount of bravery to do that, and I just want them to know that I believe very much that the positive impact they've had on our community hasn't gone unnoticed. Who knows what's going to happen in the next election? Who knows what's going to happen next week? We have no idea. But I know and I want those members to know that the impact that they've had on our community, on LGBTQ youth in particular, is tremendously positive. It's a remarkable, wonderful legacy of their time as members. Long may it continue, but know that you have made a tremendous contribution.

I do want to make some comments about some of the words I've heard in opposition to this bill, which, again, I find mind boggling, that we would actually in 2017 even be debating such a thing, but here we are. There have been mentions by the hon. Education critic for the UCP that in his time as a teacher he would have interesting and challenging discussions about basketball with the students' parents or perhaps appropriate dress, hats and T-shirts and such. It stuns me to think that that's somehow comparable to gender identity and the struggles that a teenager may be having. That's chalk and cheese. Those are completely, utterly different things. There's not much risk that a child is going to be kicked out of the home for their love of basketball. That's a completely, completely different thing.

You know, just earlier today the Member for Airdrie talked about the economic impact that we as legislators ought to be dealing with, the challenging job situation, debt and deficit issues that are facing our province, and those are very important issues. Undeniably, they're very important issues. But surely to goodness this Legislature should be able to walk and chew gum at the same time. These things are not mutually exclusive. It's not that we can't address the human side and the economic side at the same time.

But if we'd like to address the economic side through GSAs, why don't we do that? In British Columbia there's research that found that gay-straight alliance clubs save a school as much as $70,000 a year in health-related costs and prevent as many as seven suicide attempts. That's just remarkable. The human impact of a GSA is well known. We know that. There's also an economic impact. There's absolutely no reason not to support this bill.

Madam Speaker, in conclusion to my brief remarks here at second reading, it is silly to suggest that this bill is only a political wedge, a political ploy. It is a bill that fulfills what the Alberta Party has been calling for. It protects some of the most vulnerable students in our society who need our help and protection. It shouldn't be that difficult in 2017 to say that it's not okay to discriminate against LGBTQ2S-plus children.

By the way, there is such a thing as teenagers who are LGBTQ. That's a fact. That's a fundamental, simple fact, and some of those students are at risk. The job of us in this Assembly as legislators is to protect those who are at risk. That is our job. We have a very simple job in this case before us because the bill, I think, does a very, very good job of it. All people, all students deserve that respect. They deserve that protection. They deserve us to pass Bill 24.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a), comments or questions?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks and minister responsible for the climate change office.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak in favour of Bill 24, and I want to talk a little bit about why I support this bill.

I grew up in rural Alberta. I went to high school a little over 20 years ago. I know that I don't look it, but it's true. Here's the thing, Madam Speaker. The first place I ever met a gay person was through church. The Anglican Church taught me as a teenager that an open-hearted expression of faith recognizes that our human spirit can only be fulfilled by honouring our love for one another. It is a part of our community, but I learned very young that it's also part of our individual liberty and our individual agency to make our own way in this world as we become who we are, through that process, when we're youth and when we're teenagers.

I want to thank the Anglican Church of Canada, who taught me that foundational lesson, and I want to say that explicitly because I did not learn that lesson in school. I think my school environment can only be really described as aggressively homophobic, Madam Speaker. There was fighting. There was partying. There was exclusion. There was bullying. This was, you know, 20 or 25 years ago, and many of my colleagues who are my age identify with that. They remember that that was what school was like for so many kids. Things have changed a lot but not everywhere and not for everyone.

From my high school experience, I remember that anyone who didn't fit in did not have a good time at school, and they did not get to learn like I did. They did not have the same privileges as those of us who were allies to LGBT or queer youth. They just didn't, and you could see it. You could see it every day. Suicide, attempted suicide swirled around us as teenagers. I remember that keeping an eye on our friends was normal, grasping around for help for some of our friends who were at risk, who were vulnerable youth, trying to find counsellors or get a plan.

This was also at the time of the early '90s with a bunch of Education cutbacks, Madam Speaker. I remember as a 16-year-old trying to help my friends. I don't know how much easier that work would have been with a peer-to-peer support group that I and my friends could have joined. I'm going to imagine that it would have been a lot easier. But trying to put together a plan and muddle your way through those difficult questions as a 16-year-old: they are some of my most foundational memories. It's some of the foundational pain of my life that for one of my friends we didn't pull together a plan and we didn't succeed and we didn't have the help that we needed from a peer-to-peer support group, and I think of that often.

I also think often of the first person who ever came out to me, Madam Speaker. I called him the other day. I asked his permission to share this story. I'm not going to share his name. I don't have to. He was 17. We were in grade 12. I was 17 as well. He was one of my closest male friends. I remember using our rotary telephones to make arrangements to hang out, to go for coffee, to laugh until we were giddy. We were friends. I will never forget, after a certain period of time, him averting his eyes when he finally said to me: "You know what? I'm actually gay." Then he turned to me, and he actually looked me in the eye and said: "You cannot tell anyone, Shannon. They will kill me."

That was 25 years ago. When we spoke a couple of weeks ago, this time on a cellphone, Madam Speaker, I asked him if I could tell his story in support of this bill. I said: "You know, it was a long time ago, wasn't it? It was 25 years ago." Then we both said in unison, "Yeah, but it hasn't changed that much for lots of kids."

I've heard people asking: why are we doing this now? Why this bill now? Why Bill 24 right now? I think the first thing is that there's been confusion around parental notification, confusion created by conservatives. We've cleared that up, Madam Speaker. Why now? Because there's been politicization of this issue by conservatives who don't know their minds on this topic, who can't quite figure it out, that this is about protecting kids. We've put a stop to that, too. Why now? Because Jason Kenney has threatened to out gay kids. That's why now.

As a parent I find it helpful that my kids will have access to the kinds of peer-to-peer supports that I wish I had had. As an MLA, Madam Speaker, I am grateful that our teachers, our school board officials will have clear rules on how to deal with these issues.

As an MLA, Madam Speaker, I represent parents of queer youth that are going to want to have those services and those clubs in schools. I represent queer youth themselves. When I tour youth emergency services, there are rainbows and triangles everywhere, denoting that it is a safe and inclusive space. I represent those queer youth who end up in those services because they have been cast out of their homes in southern Alberta. I also as an MLA represent schoolteachers, administrators, assistants, counsellors who appreciate having these clear rules of engagement around gay-straight and queer-straight alliances. That's why now.

Madam Speaker, no young person should ever end their coming out experience with the phrase: don't tell anyone; they will kill me. No kid should scramble for help. No kid should grasp for a safe space. This bill, Bill 24, fixes that gap.

There is no excuse for inaction. There is no excuse of politics or expediency or for fundraising off a hard-right partisan base that needs this kind of dog whistle to rouse it. There is no excuse not to vote for this bill. Those who build their policies on these excuses trade on the fear that I saw in my friend's eyes 25 years ago. They want us to go back to that world. We're not going back, Madam Speaker. We're not going back to rotary telephones. We're not going back to flailing around for support for vulnerable youth. We're not going back to normalizing hate or violence or exclusion or bullying based on gender or sexual orientation.

Madam Speaker, on this side of the House, with this New Democrat government, we are only moving forward with love, with a feeling of great duty of care to one another, with solidarity, with trust, and with nurturing the great diversity of our human family, particularly as that diversity expresses itself in young people. That is what Bill 24 does, and that is why I rise in favour of this bill this afternoon.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any comments or questions under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to speak to Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances. We've heard from many people today on this bill, from teachers, and from LGBTQ caucus members, and I'm going to speak this afternoon from the perspective of a parent of school-aged children, the toughest job we'll ever have, even tougher than an MLA if you can believe that.

Madam Speaker, my wife, Sarah, and I, like all good parents, like to be involved in all aspects of our children's lives inside and outside of school. We know who their friends are; we know their friends' parents; we know what homework they have, what homework they've done, what homework they haven't done; and we participate in deciding what extracurricular activities they participate in and become their designated chauffeurs, of course. As much as we are involved in every aspect of our children's lives, Madam Speaker, and as much as we want them to tell us about all their victories and all their sorrows and all their troubles and disappointments, no matter how much you tell your children, especially teenagers, that they can tell you anything, the anxiety of some topics will not allow them to muster the courage to do so.

Now, here's the thing, Madam Speaker. If my children come to me and they realize they have an understanding that they are LGBTQ in spite of the fact that Sarah and I have created a family dynamic that supports open discourse and support for LGTBQ rights, that still may not be enough for them to feel comfortable coming out to us. I will not see that as a failure in our parenting, but I will be grateful that they will have the support of a GSA in their school, a safe place where they have peer support and understanding. Perhaps most importantly, they will know that neither their teacher nor Mr. Kenney will be calling me to let me know that they joined a GSA.

Madam Speaker, GSAs save lives, and maybe one of those lives will be my Mehna or my Kieran. That just got to me a bit. Sorry. In addition, I don't see GSAs as taking away my right as a parent. I actually see it as giving my children rights. Most importantly, it gives them a safety net in case they are feeling that they're falling.

Now, I'm very concerned about the attitude coming from across the way in regard to their position that teachers are in the best position to understand what's best for all children. As I just explained, Madam Speaker, I know what's best for my children, and what's best is to have an open, supportive household that elicits dialogue. What I also think is best is to allow kids to come out to their parents on their own timeline, not a teacher's and not the leader of an ultra right-wing party.

I get a real sense, Madam Speaker, that my fellow parents on the other side believe that they would have failed as parents if their children joined a GSA and did not tell them, and that is simply not the case. They have failed as parents if they force exposure on joining a GSA upon their children. I believe the opposition's position on GSAs is at the very least demonstrating zero knowledge of LGBTQ issues, and this will not help anyone's children.

Madam Speaker, I grew up in a very ethnically diverse community in Toronto, and for us there race was not an issue, and I can't necessarily say that about the generation before me.

However, I do believe we still had some misunderstanding about LGBTQ issues, but of course that changed as we got older and went to university and we met more people. The fact of the matter is that times change, and we have to keep up with them, and a big part of that change is a move towards a more inclusive society. Unfortunately, we're not there, because if we were, there may not even be a need for GSAs.

I know we want to be the wise ones as parents, Madam Speaker, but the reality is that I have learned so much from the young people in my riding and in my office about LGBTQ and trans issues over the last few years, and I would implore the opposition to do the same. Spend some time talking to millennials, who have an unprecedented acceptance of LGBTQ rights. I am so proud of these kids today. They are creating a better and a more accepting world, and I am proud to be their ally. I refuse to be their enemy.

With that, Madam Speaker, I would like to thank you for everyone's time, and I would like to adjourn debate for tonight. Thank you.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. As we made some good progress and had some good debate this afternoon, I would propose that we adjourn the House until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:20 p.m.]

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Committee of the Whole

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: Good morning. I'd like to call the committee to order.

Bill 23

Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Northern Hills.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm glad to have a moment to rise today to speak in Committee of the Whole to Bill 23, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017. The need for this discussion stems from the court order that was consented to on January 6, 2017. At that time the Alberta government agreed to expand the Alberta Human Rights Act to include age as protected grounds under sections 4 and 5. Because of this a one-year delay was given by the courts to provide the government time to consider what, if any, exemptions would be appropriate and to address any unintended consequences.

Madam Chair, age is currently prohibited grounds of discrimination in all areas other than sections 4 and 5 of the act. Section 4 protects against discrimination when any goods, services, accommodation, or facilities normally available to the public are provided, and then section 5 prohibits discrimination regarding tenancy, including both commercial and residential accommodations.

Madam Chair, over the course of last summer consultations were conducted through July and August of 2017. During this period the government reached out directly to stakeholders and asked them to send us their feedback both in writing and some in person. There was also a discussion guide that was prepared with background information and questions for them to answer. In some cases stakeholders were invited in for face-to-face meetings.

We consulted a variety of stakeholder groups, including seniors' advocacy groups, seniors' housing and public housing groups, civil liberties and legal groups, condominium-related groups, rental accommodation groups, municipalities and related groups, large nonprofit entities, disability community groups, hospitality and accommodation industry groups as well. In addition, they were also asked to share the discussion guide with their own networks to ensure appropriate distribution. In three face-to-face meetings department officials met with representatives from 11 different organizations, and in total written feedback was received from over 70 individuals and organizations.

Madam Chair, we believe these proposed amendments will strike the right balance between the interests of many different groups. Many have asked in the past: how is seniors-only housing going to be affected by these changes? As a government we recognize that older Albertans may choose to live together in a community of people at a similar age in life. Proposed amendments to the act intend to allow seniors-only housing to continue without violating the act, and although the minimum age for seniors-only housing is 55, it's also possible for buildings to choose an age limit higher than 55.

Also, through these consultations many have expressed a need to include live-in caregivers. Those concerns were heard, and the act will include exemptions in the case of live-in caregivers.

Madam Chair, the government recognizes that Albertans have bought condominiums on the basis of the bylaws at the time. The proposed approach is that grandparenting of existing age-restricted condominiums will end 15 years after the coming into force of Bill 23. This provides Albertans affected by these changes plenty of notice before the new rules impact their condos.

Now, just to quote Hugh Willis, the co-chair of the Government Advocacy Committee of the Canadian Condominium Institute, the north Alberta chapter, he said:

The belief that individuals should have a choice in their housing and lifestyle decisions is strongly supported by the condominium owners we consulted with in Alberta. At the same time, we recognize the national trend that restrictions by age can affect communities where there is a critical shortage of housing. As a result, we feel that the 15-year transition period is a reasonable and common sense solution to allow existing condominium owners to make consumer decisions.

Madam Chair, to wrap up, I believe this bill strikes a proper balance of the needs of Albertans, and I think it represents an opportunity to embrace diversity in Alberta. It also aligns our legislation with other jurisdictions across Canada, and like much of what this government has done to date, it is long overdue. It should provide certainty to the people that have requested it.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Madam Chair, and I want to thank my colleague for his comments today. You know, one of the interesting things we do as MLAs is have the opportunity to speak to all sorts of people in our constituency. Certainly, as my colleague has pointed out, we all have folks in our constituency who are concerned about this.

I was visited by a lovely woman in my constituency who had concerns because she lives in a fantastic condo complex. I think we've heard this from a number of people in Calgary-North West. They have a 40-plus condo complex. Her concern was that most of the people in there were, you know, well into their 50s. She said to me: we've actually had our children, we've raised our children, and we're ready right now to be in a place where we certainly love having them come on the weekends, and that is fantastic, but during the week we kind of want the tranquility of what we have, which is a relatively child-free environment. A lot of these folks are grandparents, and they delight in having their grandkids around on the weekend.

Among her concerns, certainly, was a concern about the fact that she would be faced with the spectre of having people move in with multiple children, that young people would be moving in and having parties, and she was concerned that what she and her fellow occupants had worked to achieve was certainly not something that they would end up with at the end of the day. We had a great conversation. I think, you know, one of the things about making sure that we get the communication right on this bill is to talk about the things that ensure folks like this woman who came to visit me are taken care of in all of this.

First of all, as my colleague mentioned, the exemption for live-in caregivers is an important one. It's important because people were worried about that sort of thing. Also, the idea that this is grandfathered for 15 years gives them an opportunity to sit back and take a look at what they want in terms of a structure and make some decisions; also, the fact that you can now convert to a 55-plus facility any point in this time over the next 15 years, and then you have a facility that, of course, is now 55-plus.

So for this lovely woman and a lot of the folks who live in this building, their fears were calmed by this idea. She went on to say to me: you know, we absolutely understand the need for the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017. There was no argument there. In fact, as we know on this side of the aisle, human rights are something we have to look carefully at, especially in this day and age, and we know that we have to look even more closely at this because we are facing an ever-present spectre of groups of people who would rather see us enjoy less in terms of human rights, if I may be so vague.

At the end of the day, I think what we have here in the Human Rights Amendment Act is – first of all, we know that the courts have told us that age is prohibited grounds for discrimination. We also know that we have fantastic facilities for folks who have gotten to that point in their life where they've raised their children and they want to have a tranquil environment, where there's not a lot of noise to worry about and they're not worried about parties happening in their facilities. They love having their grandkids around and younger kids around, but at the end of the day they want to ensure that they have a facility that is what they paid for. When you go out and you buy a piece of real estate, whether it's a condo or anything else, you're making an investment, and you want to be careful that that investment is going to be worth, hopefully, more at the end of the day or when you decide to sell than it was when you bought it.

I think what we have here is a very well-thought-out piece of legislation. It takes into account that we have folks with concerns. We've addressed those concerns. You know, along with the 55-plus group of condos we have the 40-plus groups that have every opportunity now to take their time, to have their meetings of their condo boards, to canvass the folks who live in their buildings, and to say: maybe for a lot of these folks going to a 50-plus or a 55-plus is what they want to do right now. That ensures them the opportunity to do that and not worry about the value of their investment and not have to worry about the spectre of having now the place that they consider their home and their haven be turned into a place that potentially is stressful for them and loses equity. That is obviously a concern as well.

I think this is a fantastic piece of legislation. I think it is a long time coming. Certainly, when we talk in general about the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017, it's one that we in this day and age unfortunately have to pay a lot closer attention to because there are so many elements out there who want to take away those rights from Albertans. I would say that Alberta's NDP is looking to ensure that our Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017, is strong in so many different ways, and we will work at that every day.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Yes. Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Pleased to rise and speak to Bill 23, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017. I'd like to start out by thanking the Minister of Justice for putting this bill forward, especially in response to human rights across the country and having a spotlight put onto this very important issue.

I guess I want to frame my comments this morning by just mentioning that, you know, Canadians are guaranteed certain rights under the Charter. For a long time, before we had the bill that's before us today, there were children that were being discriminated against in terms of their age and families and family status. Housing is a human right. And you know what, Madam Chair? Kids are humans, too, and they deserve not to be discriminated against.

You know, we need to also keep our communities whole. When we isolate communities or deprive communities of having families live in those communities, we're missing a large segment of the population that makes our communities what they are. I want to give a specific example in my constituency in terms of housing in Canmore and in Banff. In those two communities in the beautiful Bow Valley housing is at a premium. There's close to a zero per cent vacancy rate, and there are extremely long waiting lists for people to get accommodations, so much so that the landlords are able to charge almost whatever they want in terms of rent because they know that people are limited in terms of their choices. That presents a real challenge because we're seeing that more and more families have to move away from the Bow Valley because of the cost of living there. Even people like nurses and teachers, who earn a decent salary, aren't able to afford the cost of living and the cost of housing in the Bow Valley.

To address some of those concerns, we have invested in creating an affordable housing project in Banff along with the town of Banff and Parks Canada, who generously donated land to the town so that they can build an expanded affordable housing project.

You know, there's this kind of myth or misperception about people in the Bow Valley, that people there are very wealthy. Certainly, there are people who are very wealthy, but the vast majority of people in the Bow Valley just make a living wage. There's nothing wrong with that. Those are the people that we buy our coffee from at Starbucks. They're the people that look after our kids in daycare facilities. Those people need to be in our communities to keep our communities whole.

I'm really proud of the work that the town of Canmore and the town of Banff have done in trying to improve and increase the inventory of affordable housing projects because they recognize the fact that we can't have communities of people that just live there on weekends or use their homes as kind of a second home. There's nothing wrong with that either. But when those tourists come to places like Canmore and Banff, they want to have services available to them. Like, they want to be able to go to Starbucks. They want to go to restaurants. They want to go shopping at the grocery store. So in order to have those communities whole and have those services available, we need to ensure that there are housing spaces available for all ranges of Albertans, from the low end of the income spectrum to the high end. I think this bill, Bill 23, goes a long way to improving the ability of those communities to ensure that their communities can remain whole and have families living in them.

You know, in places like Canmore and Banff space is at a premium. There are land constraints in terms of the footprint of the towns. That's forced these communities to build higher density units and condo buildings. That's not a bad thing. But when we discriminate against people based on age and the majority of housing stock that's available for families is condominiums, because they're affordable, or rental units, for that same matter, when we look at the stock that's available for them, when we start constraining that stock based on whether you've got a family or you're over 18, it really narrows the range of what's available for people there.

When we take away the ability of rental units to discriminate based on family status, then we expand the housing stock for people. That has a lot of positive effects in terms of affordability because the competition for those spaces – it allows it to be spread out over more people so, you know, people have more chance to access different housing options.

I just want to talk a little bit more in general about why I support this bill, and I just want to maybe go over a couple of the major factors and reasons that the bill was brought before us for consideration today. Bill 23, as most of us know, adds age as a prohibited ground for discrimination to the Alberta Human Rights Act under the areas of tenancy and goods, services, accommodations, or facilities.

Bringing this back to my constituency and the Bow Valley, I think people there really appreciate the 15-year transition period in terms of taking away the adult-only status from buildings because, you know, people put a lot of money into their investments in the Bow Valley. It's a very different real estate market there than the rest of the province because there are a lot of international folks who want to purchase properties there. There's competition both domestically and internationally for those spaces, so when people put a lot of money into their investments – this bill contemplates the 15-year transition period to allow people to get their investments in order and have that time to do what they need to do in terms of the investment that they've made.

Earlier this year the government of Alberta agreed to a court order to make the changes that we're speaking about today. Age is currently a prohibited ground for discrimination in all areas other than sections 4 and 5 of the act. Section 4 protects against discrimination when any goods, services, accommodation, or facilities normally available to the public are provided. Section 5 prohibits discrimination regarding tenancy, including both commercial and residential rental accommodations.

Madam Chair, this government supports all Albertans, which is why we're proposing to strengthen our current human rights legislation and also further protect Albertans from age discrimination. As has been mentioned here in the Chamber previously, this is a very complex issue that affects many Albertans, and it affects them in different ways depending on the kind of communities that they're living in. Like I mentioned, the Bow Valley has a unique housing circumstance, and no doubt every community has their own unique housing challenges. This bill goes a long way in helping to solve those.

People sometimes ask me: how did we arrive at these rules? Like I said, part of it was in response to a court order, but also over the summer we did undertake a wide-ranging consultation with stakeholders, who have given us many perspectives on this issue. We believe that the proposed amendments in Bill 23 are striking the right balance between the interests of many different groups.

Madam Chair, this legislation will protect programs and activities providing a benefit to minors and seniors such as discounted movie tickets to ensure that they are allowed to continue without violating the act. Doing this will allow more programs and activities to be in financial reach for more people and will create greater opportunities for social interaction. That's what I was saying earlier about keeping communities whole and having a wide range of diversity within our communities. We are committed to enhancing every Albertan's ability to fully and equally participate in society.

In terms of housing, older Albertans may choose to live together in a community of people at a similar stage in life. Based on our results from the consultations that we undertook over the course of the summer, many Albertans are in favour of allowing the seniors-only housing to continue, and that is exactly what Bill 23 provides for. It also protects the right of seniors to live in seniors-only housing. The amendments set a minimum age for seniors-only housing at 55 or any age older than that. Seniors-only housing would also be required to accommodate within their age restriction special circumstances that are specified in the regulation. This regulation could, for example, address issues such as live-in caregivers.

We also recognize that many Albertans have made significant investments on the basis of condo bylaws in place at the time of purchase, which is what I spoke about earlier. Age-restricted condominiums, if they would like to, can begin a transition period to being seniors-only during that 15-year transition period, so that is another option that's available to folks.

These amendments will immediately apply to rental buildings as soon as the bill comes into force. I think an important distinction to make is between condominiums versus rental buildings in the 15-year transition period. Just to reiterate, the amendments immediately will apply to rental buildings as soon as the bill comes into force whereas age-restricted condominiums are afforded the 15-year transition period. Rental units in condo buildings will also be subject to the same rules as condo buildings except for that 15-year transition period. On a go-forward basis, the only permitted age restriction for rental accommodation would be 55 or older.

Bill 23 also enables ameliorative programs or activities, and this means programs that seek to improve situations for disadvantaged people, including making more inclusive and diverse workplaces. That would be allowed under the bill. An example of that would be youth employment programs. This exception comes with the requirement that the program or activity be reasonably likely to achieve its ameliorative objective. Currently, as we've heard earlier, Alberta is the only jurisdiction in Canada whose human rights legislation does not provide an exception for ameliorative programs or activities.

If passed, the amendments that we're speaking about today would come into force on January 1, 2018.

Madam Chair, I'd like to conclude my remarks by saying that our government supports all Albertans, and we believe these changes will make life better for them. This bill is an opportunity to embrace the diversity in Alberta and to align our legislation with other jurisdictions across Canada.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 23? The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Madam Chair. I think I want to start by thanking the minister and her staff for the careful consideration, careful consultations, and the work that have been done on this bill to make sure that we got it right, to make sure that we listened to seniors who were concerned about having to make changes in where they live or how they live, to make sure that we listened to the concerns of families that were finding it a challenge to find rentals or to find condos to buy. I think that the work that has gone on in the bill by the minister and her staff is going to, in the long run, remove some of the concerns and fears that a lot of Albertans had when they heard that the decision had been made around the need to amend the age restriction in the Alberta Human Rights Act.

It's kind of interesting to me because I grew up in urban cities. Actually, I often say that I grew up in some of the world's biggest urban cities, and I always lived in an apartment in the core of the urban area. In Europe, in big cities like New York City having families live in apartments or condos is something that is normal. That happens all the time. I was kind of concerned when I heard a member opposite saying that it is not the right place for families to grow up in urban areas, living in apartments or in condos, because actually this is a reality for most people and for most families around the world.

We are very fortunate in Canada in having those wide suburban spreads with single-family houses and having all these extra rooms that we don't really use. I remember reading an article about all these what we used to call monster homes in the municipalities where I lived, how they're going to become boarding houses in the future because, really, people have so many extra rooms in their houses.

We've also had a lot of discussions about the challenges around these single-family houses and the way that they've been developed in some of our cities in terms of their cost and in terms of development of roads and, increasingly, around the environment. Living in an urban core such as Edmonton's or Calgary's is a way of life for families, and it's something that's going to happen more and more as places like Edmonton, Sherwood Park, and Calgary are looking at densification and creating more spaces for people to rent or own houses within the urban core. I think that this is really important for us to know, and we shouldn't be thinking that families only want to live in a single-family house in the suburbs.

The other thing that I think is important to know about this bill is that the kind of housing that is developed for seniors is the kind of housing that's perfect for families because both families and seniors need wide open doorways so they can have strollers. They need apartments where the doorways are wide enough, again, for strollers, or they need places that are easy to clean because, as you all know, families, toddlers can damage a carpet very quickly.

I once worked on universal housing guidelines, and I want to reinforce that what's interesting when you talk about universal housing guidelines and when you talk about the need for housing for people who may require a wheelchair or who may require strollers or who have some kind of mobility disability – the universal housing guidelines really address the needs of families, people with disabilities, and seniors. It is really my hope that as this bill comes into force, a lot of developers and housing providers will really adopt the universal housing guidelines. It will make it easier for both families, people with disabilities, and seniors to live in the condos and apartment buildings that they build. So it is my hope that this is going to be a by-product of this bill.

Now, the other thing that I think we need to know also is that for us to have vibrant communities in our downtown core, the mix of people who live in the downtown core, in the urban areas is very important. It is when you have a mix of seniors, families, and young singles that you create the vibrancy that allows urban cores to survive. Again, I'm really hoping that that bill will really facilitate those vibrant urban cores that we all like, where you have a mix of restaurants, where you have movie theatres, where you have parks, where you can have festivals. The more diversity of people living in an area, the greater the vibrancy is. That's what I hope is also going to be a by-product of this bill.

Now, in Sherwood Park we have a lot of condos. I think that after Edmonton and Calgary the MLA for Strathcona-Sherwood Park and myself probably have the highest number of condo places in Alberta. I heard a lot from residents. The concerns of the residents really focused on that many of them had bought condos which were designed only for an older age group, and they were concerned that we wanted to have young children that were going to disturb the peace that they have as older adults.

I'm very, very happy that the minister and her staff have taken those concerns and that those people who live in existing older adult buildings, age 55-plus, are assured that this is not going to change. Now, I'm not sure that that's how I'm going to want to live, but I really respect the fact that for a lot of older adults living in a community of similar-minded people is something really important. I want to make sure that all Albertans know that seniors' facilities, seniors-only condos, or, I should probably emphasize, 55-plus condos are not going to change under this act.

Madam Chair, the other thing, too, that I think a lot of older adults were really concerned about is that when you start thinking about it, there are a number of things that older adults benefit from that are age restricted. I often think of the day that I first was able to get a discount at Shoppers Drug Mart because of their 55-plus and the availability to buy discounted movie tickets or access to a lot of things. I want to assure Albertans that this is not something that is going to change under this act because I know some of those things are very important to seniors.

What I think this act will do is it's going to guarantee that families who are struggling to find affordable housing in our urban areas will not be discriminated against. Housing is an expensive part of a family's income. If you're desperate to try to find affordable housing within a city like Edmonton and every time you go and try to find an apartment building they say to you, "I'm really sorry, but we don't want any children in there," not only is it discouraging for these families, but it's really creating undue hardships for these families who really would like to live in the urban core.

Madam Chair, one of the things that I also hope will be a by-product of this bill is the consideration that in having a lot of mixed housing, like mixed condo units and so on, there might be some really good benefits to both families and seniors from living in an area if that's what they choose. I could see an apartment building where there are a number of families and a number of older adults, and then the older adults might maybe choose or be interested in helping with child care or may find ways of supporting younger families, and then those families may also be interested in or become friends with some of the older adults in an apartment building and help them with getting groceries and so on. Living in a mixed apartment building may have unforeseen consequences for these seniors and families.

I wanted to conclude by reminding everyone that if you are living under existing age restrictions, you will be grandparented for a 15-year transition period, and I think that's really important. If you're, for example, in an 18-plus condo, the age-restricted condominiums, if they so wish, can transition to being seniors-only during the 15-year transition period. This is not about kicking people out of their existing housing. This is not about not valuing the investment that people have made in their condo building. This is just about ensuring that families are not discriminated against in finding housing, and it's also about ensuring that our older adults or seniors can stay in age-appropriate condos at the age of 55.

Madam Chair, it is my hope that everyone in this House will vote for this bill. I think it's a bill that has been really balanced and well nuanced by the minister, and it should really help reduce the challenges that many families have in finding housing in the urban core.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 23? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Well, thank you very much, Madam Chair, for the opportunity to speak to this very important bill. I can think of no issue that has generated more letters to the MLA for Edmonton-Whitemud than this current situation. Over the last six months I must have received over a hundred letters, all of them very thoughtful and very well crafted, dealing with this issue of establishing a balance between, basically, competing human rights here. I think this bill actually establishes a really nice balance between making sure that seniors who have invested in a particular type of housing can continue to enjoy that lifestyle but also protecting the right of persons with young families to access accommodation that is suitable to them.

I think all members will be familiar with a case that came up six months ago in the city of Edmonton, where a constituent of mine, Michael Janz, became a proud father. He actually at that time was the chair of the Edmonton public school board, and he stepped down from being chair because he wanted to be able to devote the time that's necessary to deal with his new baby. But at the same time he was forced to actually look for different accommodation from where he was living at the time because of an age restriction in that facility, which is actually in my riding.

I think that this current legislation is going to help deal with that sort of situation, and I know that Michael is very appreciative of the work that the minister and her staff have done to establish this very balanced bill. I think we should all remember that the bill came about because the government agreed last January to basically deal with a human rights complaint about age discrimination against young people and that the ministry has been working hard since that time to deal with that.

It's interesting. There are always unintended consequences of these changes, but in fact the demographic that is most concerned about this change is not the young people and families; it's actually our seniors. It's our seniors who I think we need to be thinking about protecting as well. I think that this bill actually provides an excellent compromise – it's not a compromise – an excellent formulation that protects the rights of all. I can't think of another situation where the competing rights have been so well dealt with.

As is my wont in many of my interjections in the House, I want to bring a historical perspective to this. The concept of human rights actually came out of the devastation and the destruction and the genocide of World War II. Basically, the creation of the United Nations after the Second World War led to a number of positive changes: the World Health Organization, the International Labour Organization, UNESCO, dealing with refugees. There was also a universal declaration of human rights, and I think this goes back to 1947. This universal declaration of human rights basically mandated individual governments to make sure that their citizens were protected in all forms of human rights, you know: the right to assembly, the right to freedom of religion, the right to free press, the right to live in a healthy environment. There are several of these things.

It took from 1947 until 1960, actually, for that to be enshrined in Canadian law. I'm actually going to give some praise and some props to a conservative, to a Progressive Conservative, which I don't see many of across the way here, named John George Diefenbaker, renegade in power. John George Diefenbaker was the man from Prince Albert, and it was my distinct honour to actually receive a copy of the Canadian Bill of Rights, a framed copy of the Canadian Bill of Rights, which he actually presented to my junior high school in Neepawa, Manitoba, in 1962. This was the first time I got to shake the hand of a great man or a politician, and I certainly will never forget it.

The Bill of Rights, that John Diefenbaker got passed in 1960, really applied only to the federal statutes. You know, it had some impact, but it wasn't until 1972 when the Constitution of Canada actually had the Charter of Rights and Freedoms incorporated into it. It's actually as a result of that that we're here today talking about making sure that the province of Alberta's human rights legislation complies. It's actually the Supreme Court of Canada, led by a distinguished Albertan, Beverley McLachlin, who has basically transformed the social life of Canada by making sure that the universal declaration of human rights, basically, is applied and enacted in Canada. Now, I know that there are some, perhaps some across the way, that might complain about judicial activism, but in fact this form of judicial review is essential to make sure that we have these human rights.

You know, the gist of this is that we've got to make sure that the province of Alberta's way of dealing with human rights is consistent with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Canadian Bill of Rights as well as the universal declaration of human rights, and I think that we are achieving that in this legislation. I'm particularly pleased with the fact that people that are currently living in 55-plus housing, in condos at least and in rental accommodations, will be able to continue to enjoy that. There are a variety of these kinds of housing arrangements. It's not just multistorey condominiums. There are communities made up of townhomes, and there are life lease organizations. In any guise, these folks are going to be able to continue with this.

Now, if the age limit is less than that, there is an opportunity for that age limit to actually transform over time to 55-plus. But, most importantly, the proscription of folks living in housing that proscribes people as young as under the age of 18 from living in that is done. That's going to be particularly important in rental accommodations.

We're going to basically protect the programs and activities that benefit both young people and seniors and ensure that they're allowed to continue without violating the act. I will still get my free cheques from my bank because I happen to be over 60. The young person can still get a discount at the movies. Those are two perhaps pedestrian examples of the kinds of balances that have been achieved, but again this legislation, I think, is really doing a good job.

Our job in this Legislature is to make sure that the life of all Albertans is better, and I think that this legislation is particularly good at achieving that. You know, we've consulted on this, and the discussions I've had with the seniors that live in my riding have been very positive. This is really what they were asking for. This is not a threat to their property values, in my opinion. This is not a threat to the way of life that they've come to enjoy and planned for and now can continue to plan their retirement on.

I really think that this is an excellent bill, and I would urge all of my colleagues in the House to fully support it. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 23? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek.

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Madam Chair. I am very pleased to hear all the wonderful comments about this bill, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017, which I'm really pleased to see. I mainly would like to speak about some of the examples and some of the instances I've seen in the last while of people taking advantage of maybe greater flexibility in how people look at age.

For a long time it has been – actually, I go way, way back, to when I was a child – that if you wanted to visit someone in a seniors' facility, you'd feel guilty if you were too young because you were seen as disruptive and noisy, so even a visit would be kind of traumatic. That has changed, obviously, and there are a lot of benefits. There's more flexibility, and more and more people are seeing that having the options to choose different ways of housing is helpful. As the member from Sherwood Park said, what we may think is inappropriate housing for families, for instance apartments, is the norm in a lot of the world. This is just a reality, and it works.

I've got a seniors' accommodation not too far from where I live with an interesting story. It's a very nice building. They had a few empty units during the year, and they wanted to find tenants, but they didn't have seniors, you know, lining up to take them. It's a newish building. It's been renovated. After long discussion they made the decision to offer the tenancy in these empty units to university students. It's in a good location for that; it's walking distance. The units are small, but the price is right. They found tenants, but some of their seniors were apprehensive about what this would mean. Would there be partying and, you know, disruptive noise?

The students that moved in with them were so happy to find a building that they could afford where they could study in the evening. Because there were very few seniors that were making a lot of noise at night, they could just do their studying, do their university work in peace, quiet, and comfort. These seniors started to get to know some of the young people and found it very nice to have people in the building who could do things like help with lifting something if it was needed. They became a lot more acclimatized to each other, realizing that there are a lot of benefits to having mixed-age housing.

Now, that didn't go as far as small children in there, but at some point it could. I know a number of families, as many of us who are in our later years do, who are raising grandchildren. It wasn't in their life plan necessarily, but it happens. It seems to me that they should have as much of a right to have a choice in housing as anyone else, and their grandchildren deserve a good range of choices.

I'm thinking, too, and I've thought for years about some of the interesting configurations that are coming around. One is Baba Yaga housing for seniors. It's set up to be a flexible arrangement for seniors to share a space with somebody in their family who is under the age of 55 yet have the advantages of having some common areas and some companionship when they want it.

And just last on the list I was thinking about various places in Edmonton that have co-op housing. One place I saw was about a city block of houses. The backyard was all joined, with no fences in it. The people living in the houses were all different ranges of ages and configurations. In the backyard they had a garden, a common garden, a play area with a playground for children, and just grassy areas. The people that I knew were seniors living there, and it seemed to me that they were very happy to be in an area, you know, with families. They didn't have to have children under their roof if they didn't want to, but to share a space made so much sense. People who might not have the energy or time or strength to be digging up a garden might be really, really helpful in planting and in taking care of it and, obviously, reaping the benefits.

It's just made me think about how something like this, a human rights amendment bill, helps everyone in making sure that we don't stereotype people, that we don't try to pigeonhole people but give lots of choices. Obviously, with this, it's nicely secured that people who are over the age of 55 who would prefer 55-plus accommodation will have that option. But many options for many people.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 23? The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-St. Albert.

Mr. Horne: Thank you. First, I wasn't planning on going in this direction, but since the hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud brought it up, I too have a copy of the Canadian Bill of Rights. Mine was signed by Diefenbaker. I inherited it from my great-grandfather. He, of course, was a Member of Parliament at the time that the bill was passed and a close friend of Diefenbaker. I have mine in my office as well. I would also like to point out that Diefenbaker's was not the first Bill of Rights in this country. It was, in fact, Tommy Douglas's that was the first Bill of Rights in this country, but that's a bit of a digression.

Getting to the bill, Madam Chair, you know, for a lot of my former co-workers and classmates graduating from university, it was common to then evaluate the housing market and the job market in their field. I heard and still hear so often that the biggest challenge for many of my colleagues and former colleagues is that all of the housing that they can afford is age restricted. Even with the ones that are just 18-plus, their concern then becomes: "Well, what if I have kids? I don't want to have to pack up and move just because I decided to start a family." Instead, they end up looking for cheaper options, which usually means paying mom and dad rent. This, of course, factors into a rather harsh stereotype of people in my generation, that nobody is working and that everybody is living at home, neither of which is true, but that is nonetheless the stereotype that my generation ends up with.

This bill helps to address that in ensuring that there is access to housing, not just affordable housing but, really, all levels of housing, and helps to provide those spaces for, particularly, younger people but also, you know, people in their 40s and helps to make sure that they have access to housing that they really need, more often than not in a place that they want to be in. There are many young families in my community, and quite often they would prefer to be in a condo situation because it's a bit cheaper in some parts of the constituency, but they can't move into that space because it's got an age restriction on it, and they can't bring their kids in. That's a very serious concern, you know, not having access to housing because of your children, so I'm very happy to see this bill come forward.

The other side of this, of course, and one that many of my constituents have reached out to me on is that they are concerned that seniors' housing will be impacted. You know, these are often people who have worked their entire life, they've retired, and the last thing they want to have to deal with is somebody else's grandkids running around at who knows what time of day. It's just not the relaxing experience that they're looking for. So they were very concerned that a move in this direction would force them to allow – I actually had some people reach out to me, and they were concerned that there would be age quotas in place. I don't know where they got that idea from.

It's good to see that there's a balance here, that 55-plus residencies are still allowed, and even some of the current facilities that wouldn't match a 55-plus will be grandfathered in over a number of years. I'm assuming that the vast majority of facilities will interpret that as: "Okay. If we have some younger members, they can remain or even move in if they're within the right age range. As those people age, then we'll bring in the age restriction when everybody is 55-plus." That seems to be a fair path in this direction. I'm really happy to see that, and I'm happy to see that there is this balance in making sure that there is access to housing for all Albertans but also that there is the balance between allowing for seniors' housing and 55-plus housing and really helping to support all of those Albertans.

I'd like to thank the minister for the bill. I know there was a lot of feedback leading up to this. Certainly, in my office alone I think we've had something like 50 letters on this topic. It's good to see that all of that was taken into consideration and that there's a good balance in this bill.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 23? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you. It's my pleasure to also rise and chat briefly about this legislation. What sort of struck me, hearing it over and over again, you know, when we're talking about this legislation, is that currently Alberta is the only jurisdiction in Canada whose human rights legislation does not provide an exemption for ameliorative programs or activities. Sadly, I find myself saying this again and again and again. It seems like we've had to address a number of problems, a number of issues that the previous government was not willing to take on. Anyway, we're in cleanup, catch-up mode.

I, too, was visited by many, many, many, many people in St. Albert and probably every day received mail on this subject. There was a particular group in St. Albert that was very active and busy coming to see us, and they're called Seniors United Now. I'm sure other people have heard of them. There is a St. Albert chapter, and they are very, very good about advocating for seniors.

Now, particularly in St. Albert there's sort of a unique issue around housing. Although it is a wealthy community, they certainly have their problems around housing. There's also, believe it or not, a homelessness problem in St. Albert. What I was hearing from the Seniors United Now group was that they wanted to do everything in their power to keep St. Albertans in St. Albert, so that meant addressing some problems or deficits in housing. Certainly, they were concerned about being allowed to have housing units or housing, I guess, communities that were specifically for seniors, and that legislation dealt with that beautifully.

I think it also dealt with the transition period for condo complexes that wish to do that. I think 15 years is very generous and allows for a healthy transition. The Seniors United Now group was really good about linking the need for stable housing and addressing poverty, and poverty among seniors, no matter where they live, sadly, is an issue. They did address that, and, you know, I was appreciative about their comments.

I think this legislation does a great job with live-in caregivers. You know, we talk a lot about aging in place, and it's vital. It's vital for people to be able to stay in their homes as long as possible. When people are in their communities that they're familiar with, that they feel safe in, where their friends are, where their families are, it's a winning situation all around. People are safer. People live healthy lives. I think that making that exception or addressing the need for live-in caregivers was essential.

[Mr. Dach in the chair]

Obviously, you know, it's sad that it's 2017 and we are only just now doing this, but I am thankful that our government has taken the time to address this important legislation because it was put off for a very long time, for far too long. We've seen over and over again what happens in communities where people are excluded.

I'm very thankful that in St. Albert in the last year there were very progressive councillors, and many of them are back. We've elected some new councillors that are also very progressive, that have looked at streamlining processes around licensing for people with disabilities that want to live in communities. Again, it was because there's some old legislation in place or old bylaws that require letters to go out to neighbours so that a person with a disability can move into a community. I'm sure you all know the acronym NIMBY, not in my backyard, but it applies here, too. I'm very, very happy that this legislation is setting a new tone and a new direction that children are welcome – they should not be excluded – that families are welcome. Any time you have diversity in a community, it's just going to add to that community.

You know, I had a single-family home for many years when I was raising my children – they're both out on their own, well, sort of; let's be honest; I still help them out; I think we all probably do – but I downsized and bought a condo. I bought a small condominium, and that was sort of a new way of living for me. I'd always had my own space, but you're forced to share, in an apartment-style condo, with people above you, people you share walls with. I'll tell you that I absolutely love the fact that my condo association is inclusive. There are three buildings in my complex, and we have people that are clearly from all walks of life. There are young families. There are older people. There are people with disabilities. I see an adapted van, actually, that parks just out in front of my condo, and I'm thrilled to see this person. Whether he's going to work, I'm not sure. But I have an accessible complex. I have families; I have children.

I'll tell you that there is a rental unit above me, and I know this because it changes fairly regularly. Most other people, I think, around me have been the same people for the last nine years or so. I can tell when they change, and I'll tell you that when a family rents and moves in, I'm thrilled. No offence to younger people that have roommates that move in – you know, I was young myself once and likely made bad decisions like they do, with their parties and goings-on. I have come to appreciate some of their music because it is loud enough that I can hear it.

Mr. Malkinson: Expanding your horizons.

Ms Renaud: Absolutely.

But I always am very thankful when it's a young family or a family that moves in as opposed to maybe people that meet, you know, a different requirement. I'm thankful to live there because I learn something from the people around me. I love the fact that the people that live in my condominium are not restricted, so I am, again, very thankful.

I'm thankful to the minister for the way that concerns were included in this legislation, I'm thankful for the time that she took to consult with people to address needs that are very real and very current for all Albertans, and I'm thankful that our government has taken a stand and decided to address things that other governments or the previous government chose to let slide for far too long.

Thank you. I look forward to supporting this legislation.

The Acting Chair: Thank you.

Any other speakers to Bill 23? The Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Chair. It's a pleasure to rise today to speak to Bill 23, Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017. Of course, this bill is in response to a court order resulting from a constitutional challenge filed in the courts in March 2016, the challenge being that the exclusion of age as a prohibited ground of discrimination violated the nondiscrimination provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

As a result, Bill 23 will add age as a prohibited ground of discrimination in section 4, regarding goods and services, and section 5, regarding tenancy, in the Alberta Human Rights Act while addressing the complex issue of balancing the interests of all Albertans that put their opinion forward through the large consultation process that was undertaken by our government.

Mr. Chair, over the last several months I've had the opportunity to consult on this issue with the Edmonton-Meadowlark community as there are many people living in the community that are staying in seniors-only housing restricted to those who are 55 years of age or older, and I do want to take a moment to thank all of them for taking the time to share their thoughts and concerns. I do believe that Bill 23, put forward by the Minister of Justice, strikes the right balance between keeping our communities family friendly while addressing the concerns of those who wish to age in place in a home which is adaptable to their needs.

As we age, we may choose to live together in communities of people at a similar stage in life. Bill 23 will protect the rights of seniors to live in seniors-only housing restricted to those 55 years of age or older. Through our consultation we heard that many Albertans are in favour of allowing this seniors-only housing to continue. There will also be opportunities within the regulations to allow special circumstances that will address complexities like live-in caregivers.

From the conversations that I've had, the main concern for those who are advocating for family-friendly communities is the properties that currently exist that restrict rental or ownership to those who are 18 years of age or older and not necessarily our older population, which we especially see within our downtown community. These existing age restrictions will be grandfathered over a 15-year transition period for those condominiums who wish to become seniors-only – this includes those buildings that are 18-plus or 45-plus now – while rental buildings that do not wish to make this transition will be subject to these new amendments as soon as this legislation passes.

I think it's important to note that this legislation will not restrict programs and activities providing a benefit to minors or seniors such as store discounts. Doing this will ensure we aren't negatively impacting the opportunities for social interaction or savings for those in our communities.

Once again I would like to take a moment to thank the Edmonton-Meadowlark community, who took the opportunity to share their thoughts on this legislation at quite a few round-tables, actually, throughout the last few months, as well as the Child-Friendly Housing Coalition and the many other organizations that are working to make our communities more inclusive while recognizing the importance of those who want to age in place with proper accommodations.

I believe that what has been brought forward strikes the right balance and ensures a more vibrant, inclusive community that will offer young families more opportunities in the housing market while ensuring our seniors have the opportunity to adapt their homes to their needs as they age in place.

Through our consultations on the proposed amendments we saw support from the Government Advocacy Committee from the northern chapter of the Canadian Condominium Institute as well as from the Alberta Association of Seniors Centres and the acting director of education and engagement at the Alberta Human Rights Commission, among many others.

With that, I would just once again like to thank the Minister of Justice for her thorough consultation process. I do believe that Bill 23 strikes the right and a fair balance for all Albertans. I'm happy to stand in support of it, and I hope that all of my colleagues will do the same.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Acting Chair: Thank you, Member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 23? The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much. As Minister of Seniors and Housing I'm proud to stand in support of this bill, which will address an important issue facing seniors across Alberta, ageism. Ageism is discrimination based on biases and stereotypes about people because of their age. Amending the Human Rights Act to prohibit age discrimination is vitally important to addressing this problem. Two-thirds of seniors across Canada say that they have been treated unfairly because of their age. I have had the opportunity to travel across this province to meet with seniors and to talk to them about the challenges that they face, and I know that ageism is a barrier for far too many seniors in this province.

Seniors built this province, they sewed the fabric of our society, and they continue to contribute significantly to all of our communities. Seniors in Alberta are active. They contribute more volunteer hours than in any other province in Canada. Seniors continue to be leaders and mentors, employees and employers, our colleagues, our friends, and our family. Their contribution should be valued and celebrated, and they should not face discrimination based on their age.

This summer we held the inaugural minister's Seniors Advisory Forum, where representatives from seniors' groups and senior-serving groups gathered to discuss and share their expertise about how this province can better serve senior Albertans. One of the most important issues they identified was the need to address and prevent ageism. Many noted that we must reduce the stigma around aging. I heard at the Seniors Advisory Forum that Alberta can provide leadership in preventing ageism. The importance of this amendment in that effort cannot be underestimated. Seniors built this province, and it is so important that we challenge negative perceptions about them.

Our government has taken other important steps to ensure that seniors do not face discrimination. Just recently we provided support to an initiative in Calgary, led by the Brenda Strafford Foundation, to educate and train communities and local businesses on how to recognize and serve people with dementia.

We're also investing significantly to expand seniors' affordable housing in our province, and we are building new lodges and new seniors' apartments. We're also investing in maintenance, which previously had been ignored, to make sure that existing facilities are safe and comfortable for residents.

I was also proud to declare October 1, 2017, International Day of Older Persons. It was long overdue for Alberta to join this important United Nations initiative.

These are just some of the ways that we are making Alberta a province that doesn't discriminate against seniors. Amending the Human Rights Act is the next step. I've heard from seniors all across Alberta, and I could not be more proud to stand in support of Bill 23. This bill will make life better for Albertans. It will help build a province where no one faces discrimination or persecution because of their age. I strongly encourage everyone to support this bill as well.

Thank you.

The Acting Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other speakers to Bill 23? The Member for Calgary ...

Mr. Malkinson: Currie.

The Acting Chair: Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'll remind you where I'm from next time you come and sit down here.

You know, I'm happy to come up here and speak to this particular bill. We've had a very fulsome debate on Bill 23. This bill came as a result of a court challenge. The court gave the government until January 6, 2018, to bring forward these regulations which the Minister of Justice has brought forward.

Now, as a result of this court action, I found that in my riding – this is one of those examples where I'm not sure where it came from – there seemed to be initially a lot of misinformation after the court date. After going around in my riding talking to many seniors' groups and constituents, I'm going to give the Coles Notes version of what you need to know about this bill.

Many seniors in my riding thought that they were going to have their building changed so that they couldn't have the 55-plus restriction anymore. That is not true. This bill does not change that.

There was concern that perhaps the building wouldn't be able to put in reasonable restrictions that are allowed under the condo act. That is also, in fact, not true.

There was a concern that this court judgment would prevent discounts that businesses perhaps provide to seniors or children. Again, this bill and this court judgment do not do that.

Lastly, some people thought that this would come into force immediately, so those who owned an 18-plus building but not a 55-plus building would somehow have that taken out of their condo bylaws right away. That is also not the case. This bill provides for a 15-year transition period for those condo buildings that are currently an 18-plus but not a 55-plus building to transition off that or to transition to a 55-plus building.

With that, Mr. Chair, those are my comments. I think that hopefully provides a couple of Coles Notes for concerns that my constituents have brought up to me about this particular bill. I'll be voting in support of it. I think it is excellent that we'll be able to remove some of these restrictions, especially in the rental market, for those with families or those who are young adults who are just getting out into the world to be able to fully access the rental market and housing in all of our cities and towns and villages throughout Alberta.

With that, thank you very much, Mr. Chair.

The Acting Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there other members wishing to speak to Bill 23? The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I continue to be proud to be a member of this government, that when we identify issues around human rights, we move to identify them as promptly as possible, obviously, by working in consultation with Albertans. This move to support all Albertans, to strengthen Alberta's human rights legislation is certainly something I'm very happy to support.

Clearly, it is a very complex issue, and I'm thankful that our minister took great care to find the right balance between the many Albertans that could be affected by this legislation. I feel that that balance was reached through broad consultation to hear a wide variety of perspectives.

My colleagues have spoken quite eloquently about how the minister mitigated the impacts for seniors and how important it is for us to continue to support and value the contributions that seniors have made to this province throughout their lifetimes. I'm very thankful that we found that right balance for them.

However, Mr. Chair, I also wanted to take an opportunity as the Minister of Children's Services to talk about children and the impact that this has for children and families. I've been doing some very broad consultation around early learning and child care and what it takes for us as a society and as a culture to support learning and growth and development and nurturing of our children in order to support them to meet their full potential as individuals. What I heard from Albertans from right across the province is that what they want in order to raise children is to have that broad community involvement in the lives of children. It's certainly a very well-used saying to say that it takes a village to raise a child, but that saying is used often because it is quite true. Clearly, children are the future of this province, and we need to do everything we can to make them feel supported and connected to their communities.

Part of that is ensuring that they are surrounded by a wide variety of people and communities. A sociologist named Matthew Desmond from the United States states: "Home is where children find safety and security, where we find our identities, where citizenship starts. It usually starts with believing you're part of a community, and that is essential to having a stable home." Mr. Chair, we make life better and richer for our children when they have the opportunity to be in communities where they're surrounded by a wide variety and a broad variety of individuals. That diversity supports not only the development of children; it supports the families who are raising those children, it enhances our communities, and in fact I think it makes it a better community.

I'm really thankful that, again, we continue to make life better through the work that we do as a government, and I do think that this bill will do so for all of us. We will continue to protect and value our seniors, but we also will support children and families to do the very best they can to ensure that the future of this province is brighter than it ever has been before.

Thank you, Mr. Chair.

The Acting Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 23? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. It's always a pleasure to stand up in this House and speak to the bills that we have before us. Of course, debate is the most important part of our democratic process. Being able to be in this House and debate the laws that we have in front of us and make sure that everybody has the opportunity to talk to the bills that we have in front of us: well, that's essential. You know, I'm glad that many of my colleagues have risen in this House to speak particularly to this bill because, of course, what else could be more important than the human rights of the citizens of this fine land?

I think that it's really important for us to acknowledge that within the Charter of Rights and Freedoms it specifically states, in section 7, "Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person." It's this phrase, security of the person, which is so important because – I mean, we can look at it and be like: "Okay. Well, what does that mean, security of the person?" Luckily, we've had courts within this country and in this province go into great detail about the security of the person.

Often when we talk about human rights – and I'm so glad that my colleague from Edmonton-Whitemud brought up the universal declaration of human rights – people tend to focus on the freedoms:

well, I have the freedom to do this, and I have the freedom to do that, and I have the freedom over here to do these things. Yes, those are absolutely essential and important. Those freedoms are important. But often we overlook equality rights. We don't focus on them as much or even on the collective rights, for example, to housing, health care, and education. We don't stress those enough. I feel proud to be part of a government that tries to strike the appropriate balance when it comes to all of these types of rights, right?

I'm also proud to be part of a government that has consistently since taking office focused on bringing bills before this House that aid in a poverty reduction strategy. Now, it may seem a stretch but not to me. I think that this particular bill is addressing an important part of that poverty reduction strategy, and that is housing for the citizens of this fine land, again, one of the collective rights that we should be focusing on as a Legislature to make sure that our citizens have those rights. I will repeat them: health care, education, and housing. Now, why is housing so important? Well, if you look at the social determinants of health, it all begins there. If we want to have more healthy, prosperous people within this province, we need to make sure that people are housed appropriately, that we have affordable housing, that we make sure that everybody has access to that housing. That's why this bill is so important.

Part of the poverty reduction strategy that has been so important, that we've brought forward, of course, is An Act to End Predatory Lending. I just wanted to highlight that quickly because that's also associated with this. We found that people who are low-income are living paycheque to paycheque and were severely being taken advantage of by predatory lending practices here in this province. I'm so glad that we brought a bill to put an end to that. That's how it's associated with this particular bill.

I want to thank the minister and her department for taking an enormous amount of time to consult with a wide variety of stakeholders on this particular issue. That consultation process has led to the bill that we have before us.

Of course, I go back to this whole concept that we need to strike a balance. So often you will have individuals on one side of an argument, and they'll be making particular arguments about how something is black, and then you'll have other people on the other side of the argument making great arguments for how something is white. But we realize that there's a whole lot of grey in between. It is how we apply the laws in that grey area and make sure that the rights of all our citizens are respected that is how – we need to focus on how we make legislation here within this House. It's not about going to those extremes; it's about making sure that one citizen's right doesn't overcome someone else's. It's about striking that balance, where we need to be, making sure that everyone has that opportunity.

Now, of course, it's been mentioned by several of my colleagues here that we're responding to the court challenge and that we're trying to do our very best to make sure that there is no age discrimination here in the province of Alberta and particularly when it comes to housing. But I wanted to stress that Bill 23 will protect the rights of seniors to live in seniors-only housing. This is where I go into the balance that we struck. The amendment sets the minimum age for seniors-only housing at 55 or any age older than that, and seniors-only housing would also be required to accommodate within their age restriction special circumstances that are specified in the regulation. This regulation could, for example, address issues such as live-in caregivers, which several of my colleagues have brought up.

Mr. Chair, we also recognize that many Albertans have made significant investments on the basis of their condo bylaws at the place and time of purchase. We want to ensure that Albertans affected by the amendments have advance notice before the changes impact their condominiums. Existing age restrictions in condominiums will be grandparented for a 15-year transition period so that they do not violate section 4 of the act. This is the balance that we're striking within this bill. Age-restricted condominiums, if they wish, can transition to being seniors-only during that 15-year transition period.

Currently Alberta is the only jurisdiction in Canada whose human rights legislation does not provide an exception for ameliorative programs or activities. This is what this bill hopes to address.

Mr. Chair, our government supports all Albertans, and these particular changes will make life better for them as we continue to address poverty-reduction strategies in our province with the legislation that we're presenting in this House, trying to strike that balance. I highly encourage all members of this House to vote in favour of this bill.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chair.

The Acting Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there other hon. members who wish to speak to Bill 23? The hon. Member for Calgary . . .

Hon. Members: Hawkwood.

The Acting Chair: Hawkwood. Thank you.

Connolly: It's just more fun to let you look.

Thank you very much, Chair. I'm pleased to rise today in support of Bill 23. I've had the pleasure of hearing from hundreds of my constituents about this bill in particular, and I'm happy to say that this bill strikes the right balance. They told me that they wanted their seniors' housing and senior-living condos to be protected, so I'm very glad that this bill will permit age restrictions for seniors-only accommodations at 55 years or older. Our government is listening to seniors, and I'm proud to have been able to bring their concerns, the concerns of the seniors in my riding, to the minister and have their concerns met. As their representative it's my honour and duty to bring their comments and ideas to the forefront, and I cannot thank them enough for coming to me with their ideas so I could fight on their behalf.

Age will finally be added as a prohibited ground of discrimination to the Alberta Human Rights Act for all of the Alberta Human Rights Act. As one of the youngest members of this House I'm proud to stand alongside my colleagues to support all Albertans, young and old. Once again, these proposed amendments will strike the right balance between the interests of many different groups, so I am proud to stand in support.

Thank you.

The Acting Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Other members wishing to speak to Bill 23? The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I'm really pleased to hear the debate today and the wide array of support for this legislation. I just do want to point out a couple of inconsistencies that people may want to be aware of. You know, folks across the way have often talked about being free-enterprising Albertans, and I think that when it comes to housing and human rights, we have to tread very carefully in terms of using words like "free enterprising" and the "free market." Sometimes the free market needs a little bit of a helping hand in terms of making sure people have their human rights met. Human rights aren't for sale, and they're nonnegotiable, and sometimes governments need to intervene in strategic and very careful ways in the marketplace in order to ensure that those human rights are met.

Earlier this morning I talked about the housing situation in Banff and Canmore. You know, that housing market was left up to the free market, with some minor government interventions in terms of local bylaws in Canmore about the need to work in the valley. Also, in Banff there's a very special provision in the incorporation agreement for the municipality of Banff, and that is that in order for people to be able to live in Banff, there's what's called a need-to-reside clause. That's to ensure and prevent against people perhaps purchasing a home – of course, any land in Banff is leased land, so you don't actually own the land, but you own the home. The need-to-reside clause in Banff is meant to prevent against people coming in and purchasing properties and taking away that housing stock from people who need those homes to live and work in the town of Banff.

The town of Banff's primary mandate as a municipality is to serve tourists. There was an incorporation agreement signed with Parks Canada. Banff and Jasper are very unique municipalities within Canada and especially within Alberta in that these municipalities are located within national parks, and they've got a very particular mandate in terms of why they are allowed to be municipalities. So when we look at government intervention in terms of ensuring there is adequate housing to keep communities whole, places like Banff, Canmore, and Jasper are perfect examples of why we need to massage the rules in order to ensure that housing stock isn't taken up by people who just want to use those properties as vacation properties.

Certainly, that's a legitimate use, and there's nothing wrong with using a property as that, well, except, of course, in Banff, where you must reside in order to own a property. There's nothing wrong with owning a home as a cottage or a second home or a vacation home, but we can't lose sight of the fact that communities need all sorts of people in them. It's the diversity that makes us stronger. You know, we have much more in common than we have differences, but those differences that we have make us stronger. Having a wide array of families and communities and also all sorts of social spectrums and having a wide variety of people in our communities is what makes them better. This bill goes a long way to ensuring we have the ability to have that diversity. People can still have their vacation homes, but we also have adequate stock of housing for people to enjoy living in a community and something that they can afford.

I'm really proud of our government for proceeding with this bill. It's long overdue. I think it's going to benefit people across the province but especially so in communities where housing is at a premium – it may be difficult to find affordable housing – and where wait-lists are long. Let's face it. Alberta is a great place to live and to raise a family. People want to come here. They see what our lifestyle is and see how great this province is, and they want to move here. Jobs are returning to the province. When people come here, they need a place to live, and they need a place that they can afford. They also need a place where they can raise a family, whether that be in a downtown condo or an apartment building or in the suburbs in a single-family home. People should have the ability to make those choices, and when we remove the restrictions of things like age discrimination, it gives people a lot more choices.

Again, I'd like to encourage everybody to support the bill. Thank you very much, Mr. Chair.

The Acting Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Bill 25

Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017

The Acting Chair: Any members wishing to speak to Bill 25? The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair. I'm happy to speak to Bill 25 this morning, the Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017, in Committee of the Whole. This bill is all about our government listening to Albertans. When forest professionals passed resolutions to merge their various regulatory bodies into one organization in 2014, they knew what was best for their industry and their professions. To honour the vote and the direction that those organizations had taken, we are following through on our commitment to listen and respond to that expertise.

Mr. Chair, there are about 1,600 professionals who identify either as a forester or a technologist. Over 90 per cent of both organizations that currently regulate those professions voted in favour of merging prior to approaching government to officially request legislative changes. In other words, this merger was their idea.

The two organizations came together in 2015 and have been sharing office space and a new name ever since. Passing Bill 25, basically, Mr. Chair, will make it official. Alberta Labour has worked closely with both organizations and has consulted them regularly on the details of those proposed changes. Their request has the strong support of the Alberta Forest Products Association, which is the voice for the forest products industry.

I had the opportunity this past September to join the Alberta Forest Products Association at their annual general meeting in Jasper. I believe that the MLA for West Yellowhead was there as well. The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry, the Minister of Economic Development and Trade, the Minister of Infrastructure and Transportation at the time, and the Member for Edmonton-Manning were also there, and there might have been another one of our MLAs. I know that the MLA for Grande Prairie-Wapiti was there as well because he is a strong supporter of the forestry industry. It was very informative for me to attend the AFPA annual general meeting. The forestry industry is doing the best they can to ensure that they've got a sustainable business model moving forward and are very conscientious about protecting the environment.*

Also, I think one of the highlights, actually, of the AGM, from my perspective, was that the ambassador for the softwood lumber issue for Alberta, Gary Doer, came for the AGM on the final day of the conference. You know, I'm really proud of the work that Gary Doer is doing. He is the right man for the job, and he has an extremely impressive background and pedigree for doing the work that he's done.

You know, he told the audience that one of the most important things about being an ambassador is the relationships that we make. One of his pieces of advice to us was: make relationships first and negotiate later because, especially from his perspective, Americans really like to get to know people on a personal level before they start talking business. That was very important advice. That kind of thing comes naturally to some people, but sometimes it's also nice to explicitly state the tried-and-true techniques on relations and negotiations and how we can be more successful to advance our interests. Gary was saying that we need to relate first and negotiate second. That way people understand where you're coming from and how important this topic is to our various economies.

You know, the housing market in the U.S. is dependent upon having affordable lumber to build their homes, and Canada has a robust forestry stock and a very healthy forestry industry. We can support each other's economies in mutually beneficial ways, so it's so important that we have someone like Gary and also, frankly, the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry and the Minister of Economic Development and Trade, who have done an incredible amount of work on the softwood lumber issue and have made efforts and are making those ties with our trading partners to ensure that when we're having these discussions about NAFTA and softwood lumber, it's so important that we really understand how many jobs are dependent on those trading relationships and that they mutually benefit each economy.

I sit on a committee for the Minister of Economic Development and Trade where we meet with U.S. state legislators, and, you know, we've learned that products cross the border many, many times, and each time it crosses the border between the U.S. and Canada, value is added and jobs are created. Again, it's imperative that we understand what's at stake when we're talking about softwood lumber and NAFTA and those kinds of things.

You know, getting back to the forestry profession, I would like to thank, again, my hon. colleague from West Yellowhead, who spoke in support of the bill yesterday and moved second reading on behalf of the Minister of Labour. There are those who might wonder if the scope of practice for forestry professionals remains the same after the merger, so people sometimes ask: what does this actually mean for foresters and these professionals?

For starters, merging the two organizations into one body would eliminate any confusion around the two organizations, that provide essentially the same services. To make things simpler, the professions governing regulations would also be consolidated from three to one. We talk in the House about reducing red tape and regulatory burdens. Well, this bill is a perfect example of what it means to be reducing red tape, taking regulations away, and giving organizations like these regulatory organizations the tools that they need to function more effectively and more efficiently. This is going to save both organizations valuable resources, time, and money that are otherwise being directed at running two various organizations. The amendment would also improve the administrative and disciplinary processes to be more modern and efficient without sacrificing the principles of fairness.

You know, as a registered nurse I do understand the professional regulatory process fairly well in terms of the disciplinary process and what it means to keep your professional credentials and be proud of the work that you do as a regulated professional, and foresters are no different. One of the things the public likes to know about these regulatory organizations is that their members are held to a high standard, and what it means to be a self-regulating profession is that foresters regulate other foresters, just like nurses regulate other nurses, doctors, the same kind of thing.

Part of that regulation of members in a profession has to deal with the complaint process. Members of the public want to know that if there is a complaint against a member for acting unprofessionally, they are going to be held accountable. That's one of the key parts of regulations of professionals. There's a lot at stake. You know, people invest a lot of money in their education to become a regulated professional like a forester, a nurse, doctor, social worker, that kind of thing. Besides doing what's right, people have another kind of motivation to do what's right because they know that if they make a mistake, they could be taken before a complaints board and they could potentially lose their licence.

So there's a lot at stake for these professionals. That's why the public has a lot of faith in the work that they do. They know that these professionals are held to this high standard. There are consequences if they make a mistake. You know, doing the right thing is reward in and of itself, but doing the right thing to make sure you avoid penalties is another motivation as well.

Speaking of the complaints process, complaints that are levied against a member would move to a central governing committee. Currently they are relying on a single individual. The number of people on the committee would also increase. That would allow for work to be shared among members, creating administrative efficiencies.

The membership would continue to consist of the many industry professionals but now would also include members of the public who are residents of Alberta. That is common, Mr. Chair, amongst other regulatory bodies. There are members of the public so that they can witness and take part and have a voice and a vote in these regulatory bodies. The public members would add a level of oversight and public accountability that previously wasn't represented in these various organizations.

The amendments would also allow the committee to continue an investigation into a complaint even though a complaint has been withdrawn or settled. Such an action, when warranted, would allow the committee to conduct further investigations if there are repeated offences by one member, better serving the public interest.

Mr. Chair, by consolidating these organizations into one governing body, there will be a strong and unified voice for our forestry professionals, the creation of one regulatory body, removing confusion around the two organizations offering the same services, and the consolidation of the professions' governing legislation to an act supported by a single regulation as opposed to the three current regulations, making things easier for government.

The amendments being proposed were requested by both organizations, as I've mentioned, and they've had the opportunity to review the changes. They're supportive, and they're excited to get this done.

I had the opportunity along with my colleague from West Yellowhead, the Minister of Labour, and the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry to meet the members of these various organizations when the bill was given first reading earlier this week, and they are enthusiastically supportive of this. They've been waiting a long time. They've been doing excellent work. They've been working closely ever since they voted back in 2014.

I'd like to thank them for the work that they do. I would like to thank them for the patience that they demonstrated. While it has taken some time to act on the request that they've made of the government, now we're here. We're in Committee of the Whole. We have the opportunity to listen to the voice of these forestry professionals and do what they've been asking for. As such, I would like to ask all members of the Assembly to vote in favour of the bill.

Thank you for listening.

The Acting Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there other hon. members wishing to speak to Bill 25? The hon. Member for West Yellowhead.

Mr. Rosendahl: Well, thank you, Mr. Chair. It's pleasure to rise today in support of the Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017, in the Committee of the Whole today. Like we've already said, what is being amended in the act? The act is being amended to merge the two regulatory colleges, the College of Alberta Professional Foresters and the College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists. It'll make one regulatory organization, and the name Association of Alberta Forest Management Professionals is what they're going to be called.

You can ask the question: why are we doing this? Why are we amending the act? Well, both colleges asked the government to make these changes way back in 2014, and we're doing that with this act. The stakeholders are very supportive of this amendment. They asked for these changes and they were consulted when we put these amendments together and when the amendments were also drafted.

Will the act change the scope of forest management professionals? No, it won't. The scope of practice for forestry professionals will remain as it is now.

I'll just go over some of the things that the forestry professionals cover out in the forest. The forestry professional applies scientific principles, learnings, and practices to forests and forest products and integrated management of forest land itself. Examples of activities include the creation and administration of programs to address inventory, appraisal, evaluation. Of course, they oversee harvesting that goes on out on a land base; renewal, which involves planting of new trees and all those kinds of things; conservation, which also includes looking at issues that affect wildlife.

I mentioned reclamation of the sites. Roads, all those kinds of things fall into that category of reclamation.

Protection and management planning. A large part of that, too, is also including teaching and research. The research is always evolving. Maybe there are things that they could do better out on the land base. The research, like I said, is always related to forest land.

These professionals are either a forest technologist or a forester. Like I said yesterday, there is a difference. Foresters have a degree whereas forest technologists have a diploma or certificate. It's important to understand a little bit of the difference between the two.

The bottom line is that our government is committed to ensuring that professional regulatory organizations continue to serve and protect the well-being, safety, and public interests of all Albertans. That's the important part of this. Like we've all said, the proposed amendments will create a single regulatory entity with increased administrative efficiencies, which is important today, and an expedited disciplinary process that will save the organization time and money, and that's important when we look at that. The colleges of foresters and forest technologists, like we said, have asked for this, and we are acting upon their request.

By consolidating these organizations into one governing body, there will be a strong and unified voice for our forest professionals, which is important when we look at dealing with the forestry issues today. Creating one regulatory body will remove marketplace confusion around two organizations offering the same service, so there will be less repetition and overlap on the services that either organization provides. Consolidating the professions' governing legislation to an act supported by a single regulation as opposed to three regulations, which we have now, would make it easier for government.

I know that we have stated that there were two regulations that were amalgamated into one, but there was one other one that we haven't mentioned today, and I'll do that. The names of the three regulations that will be amalgamated into one regulation: one is the registered professional foresters regulation, the other one is the registered professional forest technologists regulation, and the expenses and review fees regulation. All these will be amalgamated into one. The proposed name of the new regulation has yet to be determined, but it's suggested maybe that it could be registered forest management professional regulation.

As was mentioned by my colleague for Banff-Cochrane, the fact is that now we're going to be appointing the public to oversee some of the processes on the new council. Public appointments will follow a competency-based recruitment process to make sure that the process is fair and transparent. All appointments will be approved by cabinet, and for public appointments a recruitment plan will be developed in the new year. The needs will be identified, how many public members will be needed.

Public members may sit on the tribunal or other subcommittees, but as with other members appointed by the association, there will be restrictions on sitting on multiple committees considering a matter. The whole idea here is about a committee member that hears a matter while at the same time sitting on another committee that could possibly review the decisions of another. They want to prevent overlap and those kinds of issues.

Merging the two organizations into one body would eliminate, like I said, marketplace confusion around the two organizations that provide the same service. They both do that. To make it easier for government, the profession-governing regulations would be consolidated, like I had mentioned, from three to one. This will save both organizations valuable resources in time and money, which is very important today. The amendment would also improve administrative and disciplinary processes to be more modern and efficient without sacrificing principles of fairness.

That being said, I urge all members to support this bill as it's very important and is supported by the two organizations. In view of that, I ask everybody to support this.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 25? The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Mr. Piquette: Yes. Thank you, Madam Chair. You get that right consistently.

Well, it's my pleasure to rise in the House this morning and speak to Bill 25, Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017. I'm going to speak in favour of this legislation. I think this is one of the easier decisions we need to make as an Assembly. I think that because the evidence, on balance, is so much in favour of allowing this bill to go through, this is something that we really ought to expect unanimous consent for. Why is that? Well, I mean, as my hon. colleagues have pointed out, this was supported by a very wide margin of both professional foresters and forest technologists. To get 90 per cent on a merger vote is quite a feat and not something that I've seen . . .

Mr. Yao: We've succeeded at that.

Mr. Piquette: I'm sorry?

Mr. Yao: Over 90 per cent for a merger.

Mr. Piquette: Oh, yeah. Not quite that merger, Member. Of course, you know, a lot of people could make a mistake at the same time, too, right? But not in this situation, definitely.

The Deputy Chair: Just a reminder to all members in the House: if you could please speak through the chair, I would appreciate it.

Mr. Piquette: My apologies, Madam Chair. I will do that.

Now, I know that the hon. Member for West Yellowhead pointed out just how much the scope of practice for the two professions overlaps. I mean, they have so many synergies that it's no surprise they were able to get such a high percentage of support.

This actually speaks also to the code of ethics that both professions are committed to follow. They both speak very clearly to the central importance that both these professions find in managing our forest resources in the public interest and in advocating, you know, for strong forestry management practices. Of course, this is something that their expertise has helped us to do quite successfully and sustainably for many decades now, so it's a credit to them, and I think it's also a real credit to the leadership of these organizations that they found this way forward for these types of savings.

It's often very tempting, when you're in these types of groups, to try to protect your own turf, to build little empires for yourselves. I mean, that tends to be how you can, you know, get more for yourself and not worry so much about the other person. It takes broad-minded individuals to reach beyond their particular silos and to bring people together to the benefit of not only themselves but the public at large, which is what the consolidation of these organizations represents.

You know, I think this is something that actually speaks very closely to a philosophy that our government has used in its approach to other areas, in particular the Municipal Government Act amendments, where the intermunicipal collaborative framework agreements are actively seeking those types of synergies that you get when you get people sitting down who have shared interests, who have shared concerns, and are working together to find a common solution. When you have these types of situations, you can never predict in advance the types of savings, the types of efficiencies that can be brought about because of them.

I mean, some other direct motivations for getting together are streamlining disciplinary processes, you know, workplace issues. Timeliness is, of course, one of the most critical factors in maintaining healthy, nontoxic workplaces. But I think that over time this can go beyond that into other avenues, where they could become more effective, ones we can't predict in advance. I know that it should make them a bit more successful in their advocacy efforts because what they're advocating for is strong, healthy public forests. The increase in that efficacy is of benefit to all of us.

It's for these reasons plus, of course, the reasons that my hon. colleagues have so carefully and . . .

Ms Luff: Eloquently.

Mr. Piquette: . . . eloquently – okay – spoken to that this bill should pass without any amendment and in an expeditious manner.

Thank you for your attention this morning.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 25? The hon. Member for Red Deer-North.

Mrs. Schreiner: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's a pleasure to rise today to speak to you and through you to all members of the House on Bill 25, the Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017. The goal of our government is to ensure that our province's regulatory organizations are able to do their important work, to serve and protect the well-being, safety, and public interests of all Albertans. Bill 25 proposes to consolidate the College of Alberta Professional Foresters and the College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists into one regulatory entity.

Consolidating the colleges is what the members have been asking for since 2013. The consolidation would provide increased efficiencies. Both colleges were in favour of the consolidation, and in 2014 their members voted overwhelmingly in favour of the consolidation, with 90 per cent in support, in favour. The colleges then approached our government asking to amend the act. In 2015 both organizations began sharing an office space, using their new name and logo. This bill would make what is already being done official.

Our government has been consulting with and working closely with both organizations. I would like to add that the Alberta Forest Products Association supports the changes as well.

Having just one regulatory body would also eliminate any confusion as to two organizations providing the same services. A consolidation of the two organizations would save valuable resources and time as well as money. It would also see an increase in efficiencies of administrative and disciplinary processes. The consolidation of these two organizations into one governing body will provide for a strong and unified voice for our forestry professionals.

The proposed amendments we are speaking to today were requested by both the College of Alberta Professional Foresters as well as the College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists, the forestry professionals who are so vitally important to ensuring the proper management of our province's forested land.

Our province's forestry professionals' work is second to none. They provide outstanding work in research, conservation, reclamation, protection, renewal, forest management as well as education. I'd like to thank all of the forestry professionals, the men and women, who make life better for all Albertans today and into the future.

In closing, Madam Chair, with the support of the College of Alberta Professional Foresters as well as College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists and the Alberta Forest Products Association, I too wholeheartedly support this common-sense bill and encourage all in the House today to support it as well.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 25? The hon. Member for Stony Plain.

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm really happy to stand today and speak to Bill 25 as this is something that, of course, the associations involved have been asking for. You know, forestry is, of course, one of the largest industries in Alberta. Approximately two-thirds of our province is forested, and 90 per cent of that is held in public trust. This is a very important industry for our province as a whole.

The College of Alberta Professional Foresters was incorporated in 1985, with voluntary registration and protected titles, and in 2000 the registration provisions became mandatory. The College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists was proclaimed in 2002 although consultation began in 1995. The original Alberta Forest Technologists Association was incorporated in 1992. This new college signalled a change in the forest industry here in Alberta and a commitment to both scientific and sustainable forest management.

In the summer of 2015 the College of Alberta Professional Foresters and the College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists came together to form one stronger voice under the new name Association of Alberta Forest Management Professionals. On the established website for the AAFMP they say:

Together we are becoming the provincial regulatory body for Alberta's Forest Management Professionals. We support the continual development of our membership so that all Albertans can benefit from healthy, sustainable forests.

As we move to the future we are excited to deliver not only a new name, but a fresh unified look.

Madam Chair, as we've stated a number of times, 90 per cent of their membership – their membership is 1,600 members approximately – has voted in favour of this amalgamation of their two associations. I think that removing that marketplace confusion for all Albertans will be vitally important to our professional regulatory organizations, and it helps us move more quickly and easily with a little less red tape, which is always a good thing, apparently. It'll be increased efficiencies and faster processing for all things that relate to the forestry models. Allowing them to come together is just something that – you know, they already provide the education, the research, conservation, reclamation, protection, renewal, and forest management planning, and it's the envy of other jurisdictions here in North America.

Because they've been asking for this change for quite a long time, I just would like to say that I wholly support us moving forward on this bill. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 25? The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you, Madam Chair. I just want to quickly correct the record. In my remarks earlier today about this bill I spoke about the members of our caucus who had attended the Alberta Forest Products AGM in Jasper, and I neglected to mention the Minister of Labour, who was there holding a panel. The Minister of Transportation: I did mention the fact that he was there.

I just wanted to correct the record and thank the Minister of Labour for coming as well.*

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to Bill 25?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question on Bill 25, Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017?

[The clauses of Bill 25 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Deputy Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chair: Opposed? Carried.

The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Well, that's my cue, Madam Chair, so I would move that the committee rise and report.

[Motion carried]

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

Mr. Hinkley: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bills: Bill 23, Bill 25.

The Acting Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? All those in favour, please say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Acting Speaker: Opposed? Please say no. So ordered.

Mr. Mason: Madam Speaker, we've had some wonderful debate today on our two bills in Committee of the Whole, so I will move that we call it 12 o'clock and adjourn till 1:30 this afternoon.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:18 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, November 8, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly grade 6 and grade 9 students from Legal school along with their teachers Mr. Blair Wood and Mr. Jason Paik and parents Mrs. Trina Jones and Mrs. Nicole Gough in attendance with them today. I believe they have been having a pleasant time enjoying learning more about the Legislature, and I would ask that they please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly the descendants of Mr. Alex Decoteau and Mr. Walter Sinclair. Perhaps they could rise as I say their names: Izola Mottershead, great-great-niece of Mr. Decoteau; Stanley Mottershead, husband of Izola; Brad Marshall, great-great-nephew of Mr. Decoteau and who is a government of Alberta employee in the Department of Environment and Parks; and also Mr. Walter Sinclair.

Alex Decoteau was famous for many things, mainly his talent in middle- and long-distance running. He was a Canadian Olympian, the first indigenous police officer in Canada, and a trench runner at the Battle of Passchendaele. He perished on October 30, 1917, over 100 years ago today.

Mr. Sinclair is a member of the Aboriginal Veterans Society of Alberta and served in the Royal Canadian Signal Corps. He has been stationed in Shilo, Manitoba, Soest and Lahr in Germany, and finally CFB Cold Lake.

Thank you to the Decoteau family for attending today's centennial of the Battle of Passchendaele and to Mr. Sinclair for your services. On a personal note, my grandfather fought at Passchendaele, and both my father and I have served in the naval reserves. I'd like to ask the House to give them a traditional warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome and thank you.

The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have two introductions today. First, it's my pleasure to introduce Sithara Fernando and her guests Jennifer Carter and Kanchana Fernando, who are seated in the members' gallery. I met Sithara in her community of Fort McMurray on a recent visit. She is a very strong mental health advocate and a wildlife biologist. She was unable to bring her rescue owl Hedwig here today, but we hear he's doing well, and we send him our best. I ask that the three guests please rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

My second introduction today, Mr. Speaker, is recognizing a group who are also in the members' gallery, and those are folks from the Canadian Lung Association of Alberta & NWT. They are seated, again, in the members' gallery. Today is lung health day. I hope my colleagues were able to take part in the display downstairs, and I encourage Albertans to join me in recognizing lung health month this November and to offer their support to people in our province living with respiratory illnesses. I ask Leigh Allard, president and CEO of the lung association of Alberta, as well as the members who are here today to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly representatives of the Alberta Society of Radiologists. Today is the International Day of Radiology. Radiologists are at the front end of a patient care cycle and are integral, collaborative partners within the health care team. Today they hosted an information session highlighting women's health and wellness. I now invite Dr. Robert Davies and other representatives from the society to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks and minister responsible for climate change.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly 24 members of Team Lethbridge. If I could please ask you to stand as I read your names: Amanda Berg of the Allied Arts Council; Paula Burns, Sandra Dufresne, Kerry Doyle, and Kenny Corscadden from Lethbridge College; Angela Cornforth, Kristen Demone, and Wes Carroll from the Canadian Home Builders' Association, Lethbridge region; Patricia Epp and Trevor Lewington from the Lethbridge economic development authority; Shaun Ward, Lethbridge Sport Council; Kim Gallucci, Lethbridge Lodging Association; Bob Girard, Lethbridge Senior Citizens Organization; Cheryl Gilmore, superintendent of Lethbridge school district No. 51; Andrea Hlady, Lethbridge Family Services; Donna Hunt and Doug James, who are school trustees with Lethbridge school district No. 51; Sacha Johnson from the Lethbridge Lodging Association; Kristie Kruger from Lethbridge & District Association of Realtors; Bev Lanz from Lethbridge exhibition; Suzanne Lint from the Allied Arts Council; Erin Low from the Lethbridge Construction Association; Mike Mahon from the University of Lethbridge; Cathy Maxwell, Lethbridge & District Association of Realtors. I'd ask now that they please receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am honoured to introduce to you and through you to the members of this Assembly the second half of the phenomenon that is Team Lethbridge. I will speak further about the team in my statement later today. Now I ask my guests to rise as I call their names and to remain standing to receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly: Mayor Chris Spearman, Ryan Miller, Sandra Mintz, Rob Miyashiro, Nathan Neudorf, Erasmus Okine, Danny Ponjavic, Karla Pyrch, Keith Sumner, Jessica Robinson, Jenn Schmidt-Rempel, Chris Smeaton, Bridget Mearns, Jeff Carlson, Blaine Hyggen, Bill Spenceley, Shilpa Stocker, Ken Tratch, Richard Westlund, Nikolaus Wyslouzil – I hope I said it correctly – and Sonny Zgurski. Please, our traditional warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased today to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly my parents, Marg and Barrie Luff, who are here visiting from Vancouver Island. They are folks who were stalwart community volunteers for their entire lives. If you played a sport in the Cowichan valley in the '90s, probably one of them coached you, including the Minister of Municipal Affairs, who isn't here today. [interjections] Oh, I apologize. They have been incredibly supportive throughout my life; always told me I could do anything that I wanted to. I don't think that this was what they expected when they said that. They are here visiting today despite the fact that the grandkids are at home in Calgary, so if you could please give them the warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly representatives of the regiments and battalions and squadrons who participated in the Battle of Passchendaele 100 years ago. Please rise as I say your name: Colonel Eppo van Weelderden of 41 Canadian Brigade Group, the King's Own Calgary Regiment, South Alberta Light Horse Regiment, Loyal Edmonton Regiment, 20th Field Artillery Regiment, 41 Signal Regiment, 41 Service Battalion, and 1 Military Police Squadron. Thank you for your service, and please accept the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly. [Standing ovation]

The Speaker: Hon. member, you may have missed the inside story, but you forgot to mention Alberta's regiment, which is South Alberta Light Horse. We claim the province.

The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you an old friend of mine – this didn't start the way that I'd hoped – not that she's old but that she's been a friend of mine for a really long time. Allison Tatham and I had the pleasure of being in high school together, but more important than that is that she is a very strong advocate for Mothers Against Drunk Driving. A couple of years ago, unfortunately, Allison lost her father to a vehicle accident by a drunk driver, and this year she is the spokesperson for the red ribbon campaign, which is taking place this week. I know that she is also here this afternoon with her first-born son. I know that her father would have loved to have been able to be here to experience the joy of a grandchild, but that was so, so horribly taken by a drunk driver. I'd like to introduce Allison and encourage everyone to wear their red ribbons this week.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Carbon Levy and Seniors' Expenses

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have been frustrated. I have been frustrated with this government's reckless, ideological policies and the detrimental toll that these policies continue to take on the lives of my constituents. This government claims that they care and that they want to make life better for everyday Albertans, but time and time again they put their socialist ideology ahead of common-sense policy. Albertans are facing the toughest economic climate that they have in decades. Hundreds of thousands of Albertans are out of a job. Industry is fleeing the province, and this government continues to spend hard-earned tax dollars buying social licence from Ottawa with a carbon tax. It's unforgivable.

I recently sat down to chat with an elderly constituent in my riding, and what she had to say absolutely broke my heart. Edith has been a pillar in the Airdrie community for years. She paid taxes, raised her family, and helped to turn Airdrie into the thriving city that it is today. Like most seniors, she is on a modest fixed income, so she received the maximum carbon tax rebate. That rebate is a tiny drop in an empty bucket.

Mr. Speaker, Edith's favourite tradition is taking her grandchildren on a special outing on their birthdays. She's been doing it since they could walk and looks forward to it all year. Edith told me how her natural gas bill has gone up by 75 per cent, how her groceries are more expensive, and in fact she cannot even afford fresh produce any more. Then she told me that all of these unexpected expenses and her inability to earn any additional money meant that she can no longer take her grandchildren on their special birthday outing.

My heart broke as I watched her eyes well up when she said that she felt like she was failing her grandkids by not being able to provide for them like she had in the past. It was in that moment that I decided that I wasn't going to be frustrated anymore. I was more determined than ever because I know that it is not Edith who has failed here, Mr. Speaker; it is that NDP government.

The Speaker: Thank you.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Battle of Passchendaele Day

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On October 26, 1917, the Canadian Expeditionary Force entered into the Third Battle of Ypres in France, also known as the Battle of Passchendaele. Canada joined in the fight to relieve ANZAC troops who had been fighting at Passchendaele for three long months. Conditions were horrifying. Rain and shellfire, waterlogged craters, and knee-deep mud surrounded our soldiers. The battlefield was so destructive that it swallowed everything, including vehicles, horses, and men. Despite these conditions our soldiers captured the ridge on November 10. Nine soldiers won the Victoria Cross, and five regiments and battalions in Alberta would earn battle honours for Passchendaele. But the cost was great. Sixteen thousand soldiers were wounded or killed.

Today I along with the hon. Minister of Culture and Tourism were proud to declare November 10, 2017, Battle of Passchendaele day here in the province of Alberta. It is important that we honour the victory of Passchendaele and forever remember the sacrifices of the Canadian Corps upon the battlefield, sacrifices made by Albertans such as Private Alex Decoteau. He was a trench runner at the battle and lost his life on October 30 for his country. Today we have family members of Private Decoteau here in the House, and to them I say thank you for continuing to honour his legacy.

Today is also Aboriginal Veterans Day, and as the government of Alberta's liaison to the Canadian Armed Forces I would like to take the time to thank all indigenous members of the Canadian Armed Forces for the dedication and sacrifice made to protect our boundaries both at home and abroad.

As we honour members both past and present this week with Veterans' Week, it has been an honour to spend time with veterans and to hear their stories. To those who are no longer with us, to the veterans across this nation, to current members, both regular force and reserve, and to families who support our forces: thank you. Let us not forget.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Afghan War Monument Unveiling in Grande Prairie

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A few weeks ago I was honoured to attend the unveiling of a war monument in my community of Grande Prairie. A war monument, you may ask? That's unusual in this era. While it might be unusual, perhaps it shouldn't be. The monument that I'm speaking of honours the 158 Canadian soldiers killed in Afghanistan. I fear we sometimes forget about the sacrifice of the 40,000 men and women who served on that mission from 2001 to 2014.

It surprised me how much the local memorial brought the magnitude of their sacrifice in Afghanistan home to our lives in Alberta. It was brought home in another way, too, because four of the soldiers who lost their lives were from Grande Prairie. Plaques denoting their sacrifice mark the four corners of the impressive seven-foot-high granite monument. The soldiers' family members and their military families attended that day.

Their presence provided a sombre reminder that we need to honour those who participated in the Afghanistan mission. As we take part in Remembrance Day services this weekend, we can pay tribute to the veterans of Afghanistan as we pay tribute to the veterans of World War I and II and the Korean War.

During the moving ceremony I felt pride that our community had taken the initiative to create the monument, and it would not have happened without the passion of Renee Charbonneau. One dignitary who visited other memorials in Canada called ours one of the best he's seen. I believe everyone felt a special pride in the moment the monument was unveiled, and we now have a permanent reminder of all the veterans of the Afghanistan mission. We will remember them.

Thank you.

LGBTQ2S Students

Cortes-Vargas: Mr. Speaker, leadership is about standing up for what is right. Here is what I know. Coming out takes an act of bravery. Outing LGBTQ2S is wrong. We must do better.

I look for inspiration in role models like a young woman in Sherwood Park. Recently she got up, took the mike, and spoke in a school speech competition. She talked about being a young gay woman, the discrimination she has faced, and the struggles still faced by the LGBTQ2S students. This takes courage, to speak in front of all of your peers and bring up the difficulties that come just from being who you are. It was a pleasure to meet with her, her very supportive mom, her girlfriend, and even her girlfriend's mom. I know that they are proud of her. She was bold in coming out in such a public sphere. It was her choice, and it should always be her choice.

This is just one of the many positive stories in our communities, a story of what coming out should and can be when a young person isn't pushed out of the closet. Along with my colleagues in this Chamber and Albertans across the province I strive to pave a path for stories like this as being the case for everyone who wants to come out. Jason Kenney and those that support his position on GSAs are going against what Albertans stand for. Albertans are vocal in their support for LGBTQ2S students.

Before I finish, for all of those Albertans who have reached out to me, know that I am proud to represent your voice in this Legislature. Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Federal Equalization Payment Negotiations

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, yesterday we called on the government to begin urgent preparations for the equalization renegotiation and to inform this House of its progress. Sadly, the NDP shot down our common-sense proposal. We know that the government has already taken two pieces of advice from us, intervening before the NEB on Burnaby's obstruction and travelling to B.C. to discuss pipelines. Despite their unwillingness to admit as much, we're glad to see them follow our lead. Perhaps they will do so quietly again. To the Premier: has the government begun planning for equalization renegotiation? Yes or no?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the member opposite's delusions of grandeur with respect to who is following who on those other matters, what I will say is that we will not be following the lead of the UCP on the matter of equalization. Interestingly, one of their friends, the Fraser Institute, outlined what they called the GDP growth-rate rule, which was introduced by the Harper-Kenney government in 2009. Interestingly, it is that rule which is in fact disadvantaging Alberta today in relation to equalization. My question is: why won't they take credit for it?

Mr. Nixon: There was a time in this country when pipelines were not a contentious issue, where pipelines were built as a matter of course, where Alberta could get market access for our resources. Unfortunately, that's no longer the case as certain provincial and municipal politicians across Canada work to block the source of Alberta's wealth, the same wealth they're happy to receive in transfer payments. Albertans are tired of it, and they want this government to take action. Given this, will the government propose a revised equalization formula during next year's negotiations? Yes or no?

Ms Notley: Well, interestingly, Mr. Speaker, you know, as a result of the new rule brought in by the Harper-Kenney government, the province of Ontario will receive $360 million more through equalization than they would have otherwise, and in fact the province of Quebec will receive $215 million more through equalization than they would have otherwise because of the UCP and the Conservatives doing such a great job of standing up for Alberta. What I will do is ensure that the Conservatives and the UCP and their friends are nowhere close to the next round of negotiations.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I can't understand why this government won't take this matter seriously. Albertans do. This should not be a partisan issue. Alberta is under attack. Pipelines are being blocked. The federal government is rigging the deck against us here in Alberta, and this NDP government seems to be choosing to play nice with their Trudeau allies instead of standing up for the very Albertans that elected them. I ask again: will the NDP reconsider their motion and stand with us and stand with Albertans?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, as I've just indicated, what we will do is to continue to stand with Albertans, but we absolutely will not stand with the Conservatives and the Harper-Kenney record on this matter because it hurt Alberta. Why won't the members opposite stop playing politics on this issue and take responsibility for the fact that their plan is making it harder for Alberta?

The Speaker: Second main question.

Trans Mountain Pipeline Construction

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, last week the UCP suggested that the government should join Kinder Morgan's challenge to the NEB about Burnaby's pipeline obstruction. While the government was dismissive at the time, we are happy to see the NDP eventually take our common-sense advice. Again, we lead; they follow. Today we see that the NDP has rejected expedited hearings on this important matter. Can the Premier tell us what, if any, communication her government has had with the federal government or the NEB on the denial of expedited hearings?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, on the matter of talking about pipelines or intervening on the Kinder Morgan hearing, can I just introduce a new word into the Legislature, "hepeat," the definition of which is as follows: when a person, who might be a man, repeats what you say and takes credit for it. Just thought I'd throw that out there.

In any event, let me just say that the reason the matter has been delayed is because those guys over there, their friends in Saskatchewan asked for it to be delayed. We wanted it to not be delayed, but what can you do? Your friends are your friends. We will make every effort to stand up for Alberta when the matter is heard, Mr. Speaker. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nixon: While the Premier may think this is a joke, Albertans don't.

Kinder Morgan has warned that every month of delay costs approximately $90 million. This sends a terrible message to job creators and investors. Trans Mountain received regulatory approval nearly a year ago, but little actual activity is taking place. The company acknowledges that. The Premier has done everything in her power to support her friend Justin Trudeau; unfortunately, to date Albertans have not seen any benefits from that. Has the Premier directly asked the Prime Minister to clear the regulatory red tape?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to ask the Prime Minister to engage in the kind of behaviour that would actually get the whole matter clogged up in the courts for decades to come, because that really would be a delay. Thankfully, we're in charge, and they are not. Nonetheless, our government took a very clear position to the NEB, asking that they not proceed to delay the NEB hearing. Notwithstanding that that wasn't successful, we have filed our own position. We will be standing up to support Kinder Morgan's application with respect to the Burnaby issue because we know that this pipeline is good for all Canadians, and we will not back down from that position.

Mr. Nixon: It's good to see: taking our advice again.

Mr. Speaker, the time for action is now. We know that the Trudeau Liberals have no problem meddling in the NEB process and interfering with Alberta's constitutional rights to manage our own resources. After all, it was them changing the rules in the middle of the game that killed Energy East and the jobs that would have come with it and, worse yet, the dream of energy independence in our country. Can the Premier tell us specifically the last time she raised delays of Trans Mountain with the Prime Minister? A specific date, please.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, in fact, we are constantly working with the federal government to make sure, within legal parameters, that we are able to work together to move forward on that important project. The reason we are doing that is because we are working together, and the reason we are working together is because through the leadership of our government we did what was necessary to ensure that we had that partnership with the federal government. As a result, we will get the pipeline built. I know that the members opposite don't want to see that happen, but it will happen.

The Speaker: Third main question.

Pipeline Approval and Construction

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this NDP government likes to tout its supposed success in receiving paper regulatory approval for the Trans Mountain pipeline, paper approval from Justin Trudeau, and I'll leave it up to Albertans as to what they think that paper is worth. They've been spiking the football in this House for nearly a year now. All members of this House hope that that pipeline is built, but that path seems to be getting more perilous by the day. Can the Premier confirm how many barrels of oil the Trans Mountain expansion has shipped to date?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the member opposite might want to confer with people who are in the business of building pipelines because, in fact, typically once it's approved, it doesn't actually start shipping until it's built. In fact, construction has begun on a number of different elements along the line. I know the members opposite wish that weren't true, but it is. The pipeline will be built. Alberta's energy industry will grow and be even stronger as a result of that, and it will be because of the work that this government has done.

Mr. Nixon: So zero barrels, Mr. Speaker.

Let's correct the record. Four major pipeline projects were completed while the Hon. Jason Kenney was in the federal Conservative government. One, Keystone: 435,000 barrels per day. Two, the Alberta Clipper: 450,000 barrels per day. Three, line 9 reversal: 300,000 barrels per day. Four, anchor loop expansion: 40,000 barrels per day. That's 1.25 million barrels a day of extra capacity for western Canadian oil. To the Premier: how much actual capacity has been added, actual pipelines pumping actual oil, under your watch?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that under Jason Kenney's watch, under the conservative party of Alberta's watch not one pipeline got built to tidewater. We are very close to breaking that landlock. We are very close to making that incredible step forward that our energy industry has been working very hard on. We've done it through diplomacy. We have done it through partnership. We have not done it through grandstanding and through misusing the facts. When it is built, as I've said before, the members opposite are invited to the party.

Mr. Nixon: Bizarrely, the NDP claim that the Conservative government didn't support pipelines. Let's examine the record. One, Trans Mountain was in the NEB approval process when the federal government changed. Two, the Energy East amended application was only filed after the Trudeau Liberals took office. Three, the one pipeline to the coast that actually came before the Harper government for approval was Northern Gateway, and it was approved. It was the Premier's friend Justin Trudeau that killed that pipeline without a peep from your government. Will the Premier acknowledge these facts: that she has zero pipelines, zero barrels of oil under her watch, and that she needs to do something about it?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The fact of the matter is that the Gateway pipeline was killed by the courts because the Conservatives did not follow the rules. It is those kinds of bully tactics that ensure that we don't make progress on this important type of infrastructure. In fact, it is responsible for government to accommodate indigenous interests, to listen to communities, to respond to climate issues in order to ensure that when the decisions are made, they stand up. Yelling and bullying do not succeed. That's why Gateway is not built, and that's why we are adopting a different approach, one that will succeed for all Canadians.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Energy Industry Emission Reduction Initiatives

Mr. Clark: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Climate change: it is real, it is human caused, and it is something we can and must address. Alberta has so much to offer in helping the world innovate our way out of this problem. Some would have us believe the only option is to produce less oil, but yesterday I talked about the work already under way in Alberta to decarbonize oil sands oil. To the Premier: do you agree that Alberta's contribution to tackling climate change shouldn't come from reducing production but should come from increasing production of lower carbon oil?

Ms Notley: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do agree with that. That, indeed, is something that I've said in numerous, numerous speeches in a whole bunch of different places. That's exactly what our climate leadership plan is focused on doing, taking the carbon out of the oil, reducing the emissions while potentially, for sure, increasing the actual production. That's what our plan is modelled on. We've been talking about that for two and a half years, and I'm pleased that the member opposite is aware of that.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A California report showed that Alberta oil sands crude already has lower emissions than the Venezuelan and Nigerian heavy crudes it would displace. Alberta bitumen has three times lower carbon intensity than some Nigerian crude, and that was in 2015, before Alberta innovators started work on decarbonizing oil sands oil. Again to the Premier: why haven't Alberta innovations been the cornerstone of your case for pipelines, and on your upcoming tour will they be?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The fact of the matter is that it is this government that has invested in innovation, particularly in the oil sands. In September we put $50 million through Emissions Reduction Alberta, which is recycling carbon revenues into an oil sands challenge. We had for that $50 million $1.6 billion worth of interest. The fact of the matter is that the energy industry in this province is ready to solve the problems of the future. It's too bad the Conservatives aren't.

Mr. Clark: Well, it's good news that I'm not part of the Conservatives, then, Mr. Speaker.

Alberta has the best environmental track record in the world when it comes to oil and gas development, and this should be something that we are shouting from the rooftops. With respect, while I agree that the economic argument is important, it also sounds like we only care about money. We're Albertans, Mr. Speaker. We also care about the environment. Again to the Premier:

when you go on your pipeline tour, will you emphasize these essential truths about the environmental benefits of pipelines in addition to making the economic case?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, again I would invite the member opposite to read some of the speeches that I've already given on the matter. This has always been a key part of the argument that we have made to people across the country: that, in fact, our energy industry is leading on this and that, in fact, our climate leadership plan will invest in the ability to reduce the amount of emissions per barrel and that the emissions cap is the fundamental cornerstone to that plan. Again, I invite the member opposite to look at what we've already been talking about. This is exactly the point we've been making.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Lethbridge South School Construction Project

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In March 2017 approval of funding was granted to Lethbridge school district No. 51 for the design stages of the south Lethbridge elementary school project. Given the work that I've already seen completed, this project will be ready for tender in early 2018 as projected. Can the Minister of Infrastructure confirm for me that this project will receive approval for its funding on the anticipated shovel-ready timeline of February-March 2018?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the member for the question. You know, one of the things we're always very excited about is school builds. Certainly, in this province we are excited when we have a capital plan that includes almost $30 billion for building in this province, and schools are certainly among that. We are well aware of the importance of making sure that school designs are done well, and that's why the design funds for the south Lethbridge elementary school were approved in Budget 2017. The designs should be of course completed by the end of 2018, and we look forward to seeing those when they're done. I'm sure they will be fantastic.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Mr. Speaker, to the same minister: when will Lethbridge district No. 51 be receiving this formal confirmation?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member. The formal confirmation will be given to the district once Budget 2018 has been approved. I understand that my colleague the Minister of Education has been in touch with the district to provide updates on the project. As I said, you know, we're very proud of the kind of investment we're doing in this province and delighted that we can have some folks from Lethbridge here as we talk about design/builds and how important Lethbridge is to all of us.

The Speaker: The second supplemental.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: will the minister be attending the sod-turning for this project? [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

The hon. minister.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, I will never pass up an opportunity to come to the lovely city of Lethbridge. I thank the member for the invitation and certainly look forward to it when the day arrives.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

2:10 Remand Centre Mental Health Services

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, last week I questioned the Solicitor General on the ongoing issues of rural crime and drugs in our correctional facilities. The minister mentioned a pilot project to install body scanners to hopefully prevent the entry of contraband into remand centres. In the meantime counselling services for persons in remand are woefully inadequate. I spoke with one former prisoner who said that he'd spent weeks in both Calgary and Edmonton remand without ever seeing a counsellor. To the minister. We share your hope that body scanners are successful in keeping drugs out of correctional centres. What are you specifically doing to increase counselling services in those centres?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health and Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much. Given that we're touching on a mental health issue, I'd be happy to begin, and I'm sure that my colleague will have more to say in subsequent answers. When I toured the Edmonton remand recently, I was really proud to have an opportunity to meet with the extensive health care team that was in place, including counselling services as well as nurse practitioners, dental hygienists, a strong nursing team, and health care aides as well. I have to say that it was great to see the opportunities that are in play there. We know that often people who are incarcerated have other underlying social determinants of health, and to be able to address those, including mental health, is certainly a priority.

Dr. Starke: Well, Minister, you need more because the prisoner in question saw a counsellor once in four weeks.

Since those with unresolved mental health and addictions issues are eventually released into society and are at a high risk of reoffending and given that reducing rural crime must include a combination of increased enforcement, prompt prosecution, and robust prisoner rehabilitation, what counselling and drug rehabilitation services are offered to offenders who continue to have unresolved mental health and addictions issues after their release?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I imagine this House is well aware, certainly, campaign 2015 included a significant focus around mental health supports. That has been throughout the broader community. I understand and would be happy to follow up on concerns around transition from incarceration back to community, but certainly our goal is to ensure that all Albertans get the right care in the right place at the right time, and as close to home as possible is certainly that goal.

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that criminal activity in my constituency is reaching epidemic proportions and given that this activity has caused people to feel unsafe both in their homes and in their communities and given that this government only pays lip service to the rehabilitation and counselling services that are critical to breaking the criminal cycle, to the minister. When it comes to rural crime, your government has failed both the perpetrator and the victim. Explain exactly how that is making life better for Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice and Solicitor General.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We couldn't agree more that ultimately, at the end of the day, the best way to address issues of crime in our society is to ensure that people have adequate income, to ensure that they have access to adequate mental health support. That's why we were so happy to see launched a navigator program for people transitioning out of incarceration facilities to help them hook up with the supports that they need. We absolutely know that there is more to do on this front, and we will be moving forward with additional mental health supports. But what certainly won't help with that are 20 per cent cuts in health care budgets.

Energy Industry Emissions Assessments

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, another day, another FOIP showing that the NDP is trying hard to hide information. Alberta Energy hired Jacobs Consultancy to review the oil-climate index, an investment tool that slammed Alberta's oil sands. The document that the UCP received had multiple cover-ups, but the document that private citizens received had no cover-ups. Can the Minister of Energy explain what you are trying to hide?

The Speaker: The Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, we're working every day to make life better for Albertans, and especially in our energy industry things, as I've said, are looking up. Jobs are up. Wages are up. Drilling is up. That's because of confidence in the sector. [interjections] If there's a specific question to a specific issue . . .

The Speaker: Hon. members, please allow the minister to answer the question so that I can hear it as well.

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, given that the hidden contents of the Jacobs report contain information that scientifically debunks the oil-climate index and given that the hidden information showed the oil-climate index was riddled with mathematical conversion logic errors, can the Minister of Energy explain: why are you not defending the energy industry against this pseudoscience slander?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise on behalf of the Minister of Service Alberta. Certainly, while there's more work to do, as a government we have improved turnaround time for FOIP requests and proactively share more information with the public than ever before.

As to the specific contents of the question, we will endeavour to get back to you and update the House.

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, given that the rapid technological changes in heavy oil production in Alberta have decreased the energy used and emissions and given that the oil-climate index ignored those facts and given that the Jacobs Consultancy warned Alberta Energy and other stakeholders not to use the oil-climate index, will the minister admit that Alberta's oil sands are greener and cleaner than the myth conveyed by the oil-climate index and tell us why you are trying to hide it?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of environment.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. While I have not reviewed the document in question, there is no question that Alberta's climate leadership plan embraces the fact that the environment and the economy go hand in hand, and we can in fact grow the economy while reducing our emissions. That was the central proposition of the climate leadership plan, supported by a number of different initiatives, including the oil sands emissions limit, that was broadly supported by industry. We are moving forward with those initiatives to ensure that we can grow the economy while at the same time reducing our emissions.

Thank you.

Provincial Debt

Mr. Barnes: This government has unjustifiably claimed that they are making life better for Albertans. A recent paper coauthored by Janice MacKinnon, a former NDP Finance minister, no less, calls that claim into question. It states: “A course correction is necessary. Otherwise, the burden from this government’s building up of debt will be unfairly shifted to the shoulders of future Albertans.” This government has already piled up $45 billion in debt and is headed to $90 billion. When will this minister admit that his plan is only hurting Albertans and stop piling unsustainable debt on the backs of young Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. That report is limited in capturing what’s really happening in Alberta here today.

While I very much enjoy talking about Alberta’s economic recovery and the jobs that have been created, I was deeply troubled by the member opposite’s recent statements. This member thinks that there can be a good reason to out LGBTQ children. I can think of only one reason: when that child decides to come out.

Mr. Barnes: He’ll do anything to avoid this question.

Given that Alberta currently spends 1 and a half billion dollars each year on interest and given that that’s money taken from the wallets of hard-working Albertans and put into the pockets of Bay Street and given that $1.5 billion could have built 75 schools or a full-size green line LRT or done 83,000 knee replacements – all of this from the party of the proletariat and Occupy Wall Street; it’s foolish and shameful – to the minister: why are you so committed to making the rich richer at the expense of regular Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, as I’ve said over and over, jobs are up in Alberta, drilling is up in Alberta, manufacturing is up, and real estate sales are up in Alberta.

But I continue to be troubled by the member’s extreme ideas. Not only does he refuse to protect LGBTQ kids, but now he says that legislation on gas and dash would be onerous. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, another paper, by the Macdonald-Laurier Institute, found that Alberta has the highest default probability even before this minister of this NDP government’s recklessly increasing spending. The paper also states that Alberta could be headed towards default in as soon as 30 years. Given that MacKinnon’s report warns that the NDP’s plan to balance is based on the assumption that oil prices will rebound – only a fool would make that wish – when will the minister admit that the NDP is what ails Alberta and take corrective action?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Our economy is recovering, and our government is working towards making life better for all Albertans. We’re focused on creating jobs in this province, protecting public services that Albertans rely on and health care and education. Our plan is working. Their plan would cut out 20 per cent from today’s budget. It would make it harder for Albertans, and we would all be worse off.

Restaurant Industry Support

Mr. Orr: Mr. Speaker, this government brags on its tourism website that it wants to diversify the economy and support culinary tourism. However, according to the Raise the Bar report issued yesterday by Restaurants Canada, Alberta’s reputation as a business-friendly place to run a bar or a licensed restaurant is actually slipping. The report indicates that since this government has taken the reins, in 2015, Alberta’s restaurant business friendliness has been downgraded. This government claims things are getting better when, in fact, they are getting worse. Why is this government misleading Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Culture and Tourism.

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. We’re very proud of the fact that Alberta is an incredibly welcoming place, and every single tourist who comes to our province can look forward to the best service, to the best entertainment, to the best activities that they can find in this entire country. We’re very proud of our industry, and we’re going to continue working with our industry to ensure that every single one of our visitors has the best experience possible.

Thank you.

Mr. Orr: Given that one of the main reasons for the downgrade is this government’s increase in taxes such as the increased provincial liquor markup tax, carbon tax on food, utilities, natural gas, and everything else and given that confiscating surplus WCB employer contributions, if it’s not theft, amounts to another tax and given that the average restaurant makes a mere 3 per cent on operational revenues and that they’re mostly local-friendly businesses, will the government stop battering the food and beverage industry with this pile-on of increasing taxes?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Restaurant sales are up. Albertans spent $771 million in restaurants in August, $5 million more than the record set in June. We’re going to continue working with our tourism partners to ensure that every single person who comes to our province can enjoy all the amazing things that we have in this province to offer. I invite the members opposite to join in celebrating all the amazing work that’s being done in this province.

Thank you.

Mr. Orr: The restaurants don’t agree that you’re working with them given that the wages are the second-largest restaurant cost and the cancellation of the server wage, with a replacement of an aggressive one-year 14 per cent minimum wage escalation, is the other reason for Alberta restaurants’ downgrades. Given that the Restaurants Canada VP says, “For the government to hit businesses with these extra costs during a recession adds insult to injury,” will the government delay its job-reducing, bankrupting minimum wage increase?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and democratic renewal.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. On this side of the House we believe everyone who works a full-time job should be able to feed their family when they come home at night and not have to stop at the food bank. I've heard from too many people in the last two years who've shared with me the struggles of having to work a full-time minimum wage job and still have troubles making ends meet. Jason Kenney and the Conservatives don't believe that raising the minimum wage will help people. Instead, they believe in tax cuts for their friends, cutting the tax rate on the richest. Our government believes that every honest, hard-working Albertan should be able to earn and make a living wage.

The Speaker: Thank you.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Investment in Alberta

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My constituents have expressed a lot of excitement over Calgary's recent bid for Amazon's second headquarters. News recently broke that Amazon is breaking ground on a new distribution centre near Calgary, with 750 much-needed full-time jobs. To the Minister of Economic Development and Trade: we have Amazon's distribution centre, but what action has this government taken to attract even more businesses like Amazon and the jobs they bring to Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Well, we actually believe that Alberta is a pretty good place to do business, and so do a lot of other folks. Even though the folks on the other side of the aisle would have us believe it's not, the businesses say otherwise. Alberta has no provincial sales tax, no payroll tax, no health care premiums, and some of the lowest gasoline and diesel taxes in Canada. Folks are actually listening. They like it. So to help attract more businesses to expand in our province, the Minister of Economic Development and Trade has created a branch in his department called Invest Alberta. It is a one-stop government connection to doing business in our province.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

First supplemental.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This Amazon distribution centre represents a significant investment for my region. Is this investment part of a broader trend of business investment in the Calgary area?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, in fact, it is. Folks are listening. They look at Alberta, and they really like what they see. The Invest Alberta branch has quarterbacked the expansion of Amazon, RocketSpace, and Swoop in Calgary, Champion Petfoods and Pinnacle in Parkland county, Google in Edmonton, and Cavendish Farms in Lethbridge. I think they're actually pretty happy about that. There are many more expansions to come. In addition to these, we've implemented our small-business tax cut. More than 29,000 new companies have incorporated in this province. That says everything.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: can you comment on any lesser known investments or projects that have perhaps been overshadowed by Amazon or Cavendish Farms or other projects that are helping to grow Alberta's tech sector?

Ms Jansen: Well, Mr. Speaker, as we mentioned, of course, in addition to Amazon, RocketSpace, and Swoop, we've got companies coming in and saying: this is the place to invest in this province. You know, as you mentioned, the Amazon project is pretty amazing: 600,000 square feet, this facility, expected to be done next fall; 150 people are actually going to be working on it and 750 people working in it when the project is done. We are on the world map. People are noticing Alberta. They're coming here. They want to invest and do business with us.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Justice System Delays

Mr. Ellis: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Every day more criminal cases are being thrown out of our courts because of this government's triaging policy. The senior Crown prosecutor, who shed light on hundreds of halted prosecutions, criticized the practice as, quote: the political mentality of putting your finger in a dike to hold the water back. Unquote. Minister, how many prosecutions have been stayed since the introduction of triaging?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Justice.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As the member is very much aware, all jurisdictions have been struggling with the Jordan decision as a result of historic court backlogs that have built up over years. That's why our government has taken the step to implement the triage policy to try to find efficiencies to ensure that we are using courts for serious things and not for mental health conditions. In addition, we've also added additional resources to ensure that we have additional Crown prosecutors, additional court clerks. We've maintained funding to front-line police officers, something the opposition would have cut.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that triaging has created another problem in that it's hard for police who have spent time and effort investigating crimes to then watch criminals walk free and given that Alberta's practice of triaging cases can create a lack of faith in the justice system for police officers, Minister, when are you going to provide me and Albertans with the information I requested in Public Accounts outlining the criteria for staying charges?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Ganley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In fact, the hon. member across the way is absolutely wrong. No one is more supportive of moving to a more advanced justice system than our police partners. They are fans of restorative justice. They are fans of ensuring that we have mental health supports. They are fans of all of the things we are doing to try and improve the justice system and move it forward for a new century so that we can spend an appropriate amount of money and that money is going to ensure that the safety of Albertans is increased rather than simply going to churning people through the system over and over again.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, thank you. Given that even judges are wondering why Alberta is so far behind other jurisdictions in addressing the Jordan decision and given that this NDP government is famous for its unintended consequences and that triaging is driving a wedge between police and Crown prosecutors, to the same minister: are you aware that your triaging policy has turned police and prosecutors into unintentional adversaries?

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member could not be further from the truth. In fact, we've managed to convene police officers, the defence bar, judges, Crown prosecutors, all under one rubric, and you know what? They are very hopeful about the changes we are making to move forward to ensure that we have a modern justice system, a justice system that focuses on those things which are dangerous to Albertans and not simply on churning people with mental health problems through the system over and over again.

The Speaker: The Member for Fort McMurray-Conklin.

Home Insurance Policies

Mr. Jean: Mr. Speaker, thank you. In the last four years Alberta has suffered its two worst natural disasters ever. One common thread in both the High River flood and the Fort McMurray fire is, in fact, that Albertans found themselves dealing with a confusing mess when it came to home insurance, next-door neighbours being treated very differently by different insurance companies because of different policies. Will this government change the Insurance Act to provide for standard language on home policies in the same way we have standard language on auto policies for all Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government committed to standing with the people of the Fort McMurray region after this disaster, and that's what we continue to do. Consumers are encouraged to review their policy coverage with their insurance representative to confirm their coverage and understand how it responds. The government of Alberta, through the office of the superintendent of insurance, has provided important insurance complaint resolution information online and to Albertans contacting the superintendent's office. As of the end of June of this year 85 per cent of the 25,000 residential insurance claims from the Fort McMurray forest fire had been settled, with $1.3 billion paid out. We will continue to stand with the people of Fort McMurray as they ...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Jean: The minister simply doesn't understand the question.

You see, across the street from where my house burned down was a fourplex that was saved by the amazing work of our firefighters. However, each of the four homeowners was treated very differently by their insurers. One had their unit demolished while another was allowed to move in after a minor cleaning. The third received a buyout and proceeded to sell their home as is, and the fourth was offered a full, down-to-the-studs remediation from the rooftop to the basement, including replacement of insulation and drywall. Given that they all had insurance and they had much different experiences, doesn't the minister agree that the time has come for standardized home policies here in Alberta for Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We know that some Fort McMurray families are still struggling, and we're working hard to continue supporting them. The government of Alberta, again, through the office of the superintendent of insurance, has encouraged the Insurance Bureau of Canada to actively promote and provide information to Albertans about resolving insurance complaints as well as to maintain statistics on how well insurers are doing on settling claims. We'll continue to stand with the people of Fort McMurray as they recover, and we'll do what needs to be done to ensure that Alberta is as resilient as possible in the face of natural disasters.

Mr. Jean: This works in the auto insurance sector here in Alberta, and it should work in home insurance. My constituency office in Fort McMurray has spent the last year and a half hearing from Albertans who feel they have not been treated fairly by their insurers. They see their neighbours getting full coverage while they are denied on technicalities or put through the wringer as part of an insurance negotiation process. Given that not every fire victim has the resources for a prolonged dispute with an insurer who has unlimited resources, will the minister sit down with insurers and mandate a standard home policy so that Albertans clearly know what they're purchasing when it comes time to buy home insurance in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The road ahead for Fort McMurray is a long one, and our work continues. We've announced funding for $7 million in tax relief for residents whose homes were affected by the wildfire. We announced $1 million to support a program that accelerates training for plumbing apprentices; $5 million towards a study of alternate access routes to the community; $148.7 million in disaster recovery funding to help the municipality with the cost of the fire. We ensured that there are no obstacles to restrict rebuilding in waterways so the municipality can move forward with consultation. Over 50,000 evacuated households got $99 million in disaster relief benefits. Right across the board we promised to stand ...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Fisheries Management

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This past April the Official Opposition released its 12-point fish plan. Inspired originally by the minister's disastrous aeration program, it covered multiple opportunities to enhance our fisheries and increase fishing opportunities for Alberta anglers. This plan was created by taking common-sense ideas from anglers and fishery experts instead of using the NDP government's failed approach to fisheries management. Minister, can you tell Albertan anglers what your government is doing to both improve our fisheries and increase opportunities for anglers other than, of course, making sure that fish don't die of oxygen deprivation during this winter?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes, the member is quite right that there were some initiatives undertaken by the Alberta Conservation Association that did not succeed. Environment and Parks has fixed that problem, and those fish stocks have recovered. Our government is also taking swift action to protect our fish population from whirling disease – we've invested $9.3 million to prevent the further spread of that disease in Alberta waters – which, of course, has the potential to wipe out our trout populations. That is a very serious matter, and that's why we took action.

Mr. Loewen: Given that our 12-point fish plan covers issues like harvest management of species that are presently not being managed and predation control that is not being done and stocking opportunities that are not being taken advantage of and given that the expanded use of slot limits could provide increased angling opportunities that this government is failing to take advantage of, Minister, can you please tell Albertans why these concepts are not being fully implemented to restore our fisheries back to sustainable levels so Albertans can continue to enjoy this renewable resource?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the opinions expressed by the members opposite about Alberta's front-line workers, our wildlife biologists, our fisheries experts are just that, opinions. I hold different opinions. I hold the folks who work for Environment and Parks every day and who protect the environment in this province in higher esteem than the Conservatives across the way, who, by the way, with their devastating cuts to the civil service, would be relieving them of a job anyway, and we wouldn't have anyone to look out for our fishery.

Mr. Loewen: Given that I was clearly talking about this NDP government and that minister and given that the 12-point fish plan covers environmental issues like reclamation and the use of weirs and their maintenance to further protect our water sources and the use of stocking, which the government has failed to use to its full potential, and given that I attended a packed town hall near St. Paul where multiple issues regarding this government's failed fishery management strategy were discussed, can the minister tell us here today: what new initiatives have you instituted to receive meaningful input from stakeholders and anglers on fisheries management beyond online surveys?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the fisheries and wildlife regulations are updated annually, and they are done so as a result of consultation with a number of different groups, and they are guided by science. I know that that's something that's tough for the folks across the way to understand, but the fact of the matter is that we make these decisions based on the best evidence. The other piece of evidence that we have in place is that when you protect the headwaters, as we have done in southwest Alberta, you start to recover your fish populations. That's why we made the decisions we did around the Castle parks, and that's why we've restored environmental monitoring within the department.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

AISH and CPP Disability Benefits

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Like the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills, I have constituents in Chestermere-Rocky View who, upon receiving cost-of-living increases on their CPP disability benefit, have had it clawed back by the AISH program. These people with disabilities have the federal government increase this benefit to help keep them going and then have the provincial government take it away to keep them in poverty. Can the Minister of Community and Social Services explain why the NDP government is running a social program that perpetuates poverty, dependence by clawing back income instead of lifting up a person?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. The way the AISH program works is that it makes sure that individual income from all sources doesn't fall below $1,588. Any other source of income that is there to provide income support to that individual is deducted from the AISH program. Having said that, the AISH program also provides other benefits, and we have taken a number of steps that benefit people who are receiving AISH as well. I will talk about that in my next answer.

2:40

The Speaker: Thank you.

First supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, given that AISH defines "severe handicap" as an adult Albertan with a permanent disability that impairs their ability to earn a living and given that the medical criteria for that disability are likely to remain permanent, limiting the ability to earn a living, and that AISH considers whether training, rehabilitation, medical treatment will help you to work enough to earn a living, why does the Minister of Community and Social Services want to perpetuate cruelty, poverty, and dependency by clawing back income from the federal CPP, income my constituent actually earned already when they could work, by reducing his AISH payments?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. What we have done is that we have taken steps to fix AISH. The AISH action plan is available on the Community and Social Services' website. We have added $70 million to provide support for people who are receiving AISH. What will be really cruel is if you claw it back by 20 per cent and strip 13,000 people from that benefit. That would be really cruel, and that's what we will not let happen on our watch.

Mrs. Aheer: You know what, Mr. Speaker? What's really interesting is that this minister has the power to actually already do this. Given that there are no advocates for AISH clients except MLAs when problems arise with the AISH program and given that AISH also prevents clients from seeking adequate and fair due process during the appeals and that the clients are accountable for all and any errors that the AISH person may make, can the minister explain: if all things are equal, why are AISH administrators more equal than others? You can fix it in one moment.

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, AISH is an important program that provides support to 55,000 Albertans. On our watch we have increased funding to make sure that people are receiving those important supports, and we have put together an AISH action plan. That is there to make the AISH process better, efficient and to make public reporting better. What will not work for people with disabilities will be a 20 per cent cut that that side is promoting, that that side stands for.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds we'll continue with Members' Statements.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Government Policies

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Hope. Hope is not a plan, and hope does not pay the bills. I recognize that. However, hope is what Albertans have right now.

They have hope that we will soon have a government which will respect all people of all backgrounds.

They have hope that every day we move closer to a government which respects the hard work it takes for people to earn a dollar before taxing that dollar away from them.

They have hope that we are moving closer to a government which respects the dignity of work and recognizes the pride, the dignity that give an Albertan who's employed purpose every day.

They have hope that Alberta is moving towards electing a government which can be a key player in Canada without being a doormat for those who would like to see nothing better than Alberta suffer. Alberta has never been afraid to contribute our fair share and then a little bit more to the world. Albertans work hard every day and give back to those around us. However, that kindness cannot be confused with weakness.

There is hope that soon we will have a government which recognizes our place in the world and fights tooth and nail to improve that standing while selling Alberta to the world. Our international relationships, Mr. Speaker, need to be nurtured and supported. Sectors like energy, agriculture, and forestry produce far more than Albertans could ever consume themselves. We hope to sell these industries to the world to ensure that our producers get prices that enable them to grow their businesses while providing much-needed jobs to deserving Albertans.

Our tourism sector must be supported in selling our world-class beauty to the world and inviting them here to enjoy it.

Most of all, Albertans have hope that we will soon have a Premier who will proudly stand up for our province, for our people, for our history, and for our future on the national and international stage.

Until the next general election enables the realization of those dreams, Mr. Speaker, hope is what Albertans have right now.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Team Lethbridge

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will begin by saying yet again that I love Lethbridge, and I hope that when you come to visit, you're going to love it, too. I think today is Lethbridge day in the Leg.

Lethbridge is full of wonderful, forward-thinking people who want to share what they know about the city and area. Some of these people formed a coalition representing 19 different organizations in our city and called themselves Team Lethbridge. I first spoke about Team Lethbridge two years ago. They continue to grow and have just welcomed the city of Lethbridge and Lethbridge Indigenous Sharing Network reconciliation implementation plan and will incorporate this into the work they do.

Team Lethbridge works tirelessly to offer support to the government of Alberta in building solutions for the future and in showcasing how our city can contribute to provincial priorities. The city and the province benefit through these interactions. Team Lethbridge consists of representatives from cultural organizations, economic development groups, tourism associations, local government, school divisions, and postsecondary and seniors' organizations.

Team Lethbridge are here for the next couple of days to meet with ministers and MLAs to exchange information and discuss how they can contribute to the province's success. If you meet with Team Lethbridge, they'll be happy to tell you about the diversified economy, the rich arts and cultural heritage, the strong public sector, the great leadership, and the strong industries around Lethbridge.

Thank you, Team Lethbridge, for everything that you do to make our city, our region, and our province better. Thank you from the bottom of my heart.

Notices of Motions

Ms Luff: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to give oral notice of a bill to be introduced tomorrow, that being Bill 209, the Radon Awareness and Testing Act.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Bill 27

Conflicts of Interest Amendment Act, 2017

Mr. Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to introduce first reading of Bill 27, the Conflicts of Interest Amendment Act, 2017.

In 2015 we said that we would strengthen Alberta's Conflicts of Interest Act and expand it to the senior staff of our province's agencies, boards, and commissions. With Bill 27 we are fulfilling this commitment, ensuring that public agencies are more accountable, are protecting Albertans' tax dollars, and are being governed transparently. Public agencies are a significant part of Alberta's public sector and account for half of the government's total yearly budget. Quite rightly, then, Albertans have the same high expectations of their public agencies that they have of government and expect all to be held to a high ethical standard.

Our public agencies provide valuable services that make life better for Albertans, such as higher education, protecting vulnerable people, and delivering quality health services. Bill 27 is part of numerous key changes that have already taken place for provincial government agencies, boards, and commissions, including the ongoing review of all agencies, boards, and commissions; the executive compensation reform we've brought in; enhanced compensation transparency; improved online board application processes; and greater transparency and diversity on Alberta's public agency boards.

Mr. Speaker, thank you very much.

[Motion carried; Bill 27 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have three tablings today. The first two are in reference to a commitment I made when we were closing debate on Bill 203. The first tabling is a briefing document that I provided for the Pacific NorthWest Economic Region in Victoria a couple of days ago.

The second one is the presentation that I provided to the Pacific NorthWest Economic Region. For those who are unfamiliar, it includes all of the Pacific Northwest provinces and states. I want to thank my assistant, Katy Snut, who helped me with the preparation of that document.

The third is an update that we received from PNWER, specifically from Alaska. The document here is entitled Alaska Governor Announces a Plan for the State to Meet Paris Accord Climate Goals on Its Own.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to table five copies of a document containing five pages of quotations from letters I received supporting GSAs. If anybody in this Chamber doubts that GSAs save lives and help schools and communities flourish, all they have to do is listen to these youth and the people who support them. To quote briefly from one of the letters from a teacher in Calgary, she said: "It is paramount that no one out members of a safe space. Coming out is the story of that specific individual. There is a time and place that is appropriate for them to tell their friends and family."

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have three tablings. The first two tablings are in reference to the speech that I gave yesterday on Bill 24. One of them is a speech from Lindsay Peace, who spoke at the press conference of the minister about what it's like to be the mother of a young person who came out as transgendered.

The other tabling is in reference to Dr. Tony Campolo, a leading evangelical pastor and theologian, about his view around LGBTQ and gay marriages.

The third tabling that I have is the October 2017 labour force survey by Statistics Canada. The survey shows that things are looking up in Alberta. It shows that 12,000 net new jobs were created in Alberta, and we are second in job growth in this country.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose.

Mr. Hinkley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to table five copies of ATB Financial's Alberta Economic Outlook, August 2017. In the report it shows that housing starts are up in Alberta, jobs are up in Alberta, GDP growth is up in Alberta. The report also says, "Nearly 35,000 net new jobs have been added over the last 12-months." It forecasts Alberta's GDP to grow by 3.2 per cent this year.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you. I get to table five copies of the StatsCan labour force survey documenting the number of full-time jobs created in Alberta. It shows that things are looking up in Alberta. It shows that since the depths of the recession Alberta created 72,000 full-time jobs, Mr. Speaker, and the 12,000 jobs referenced were in the last month alone.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have five copies of the report I referred to in QP, the Jacobs Consultancy report, commissioned by Alberta Energy, about the oil-climate index review. Five of them are clean copies; five of them are redacted.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I referred in question period to Restaurants Canada's report entitled Raise the Bar, a Report Card on Provincial Liquor Policies for Bars and Restaurants, 2017. It does in fact show that they have downgraded Alberta's business-friendly climate in the last two years.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the hon. Premier I rise to table a report, which she referred to in question period today, by the Fraser Institute entitled Should Equalization Keep On Growing in an Era of Converging Fiscal Capacity? The report focuses on a rule change brought in by the Harper-Kenney government in 2009. This rule change ensures that equalization keeps growing every year in perpetuity and results in an extra $1.3 billion for Ontario over two years while Alberta gets nothing.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: Well, thanks, Mr. Speaker. I have the appropriate number of copies of a tabling from the Privy Council Office of Her Majesty's Privy Council of Canada confirming that members of the Privy Council carry the title "Honourable" for life – there was some confusion from the members opposite as to Mr. Kenney's title – and confirming that on January 4, 2007, he did in fact become a member of the Privy Council and is therefore the Hon. Jason Kenney.

Point of Order Parliamentary Language

The Speaker: Hon. members, I deferred a decision yesterday on a point of order. I would like to address that now.

The Member for Calgary-Elbow raised a point of order during Oral Question Period following the Premier's response to his first supplementary question. I did not hear the point of order called at the time, and therefore I deferred my ruling on it.

As to the facts of the matter, the Member for Calgary-Elbow asked a question about the use of pipelines to transport oil. In reply the hon. Premier responded: "Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member opposite for the mansplaining opportunity." The full exchange can be found on page 1779 of Alberta Hansard for yesterday, November 7, 2017.

In their arguments concerning this point of order, both the Member for Calgary-Elbow and the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster referenced Beauchesne's sixth edition. You can find those comments on pages 1787 and 1788 of yesterday's issue of Alberta Hansard.

Paragraph 486(3) of Beauchesne's references a list of words that have been judged to be unparliamentary and to have caused disorder in the House. I would point out that paragraph 486(2) of Beauchesne's states: "An expression which is deemed to be unparliamentary today does not necessarily have to be deemed unparliamentary next week."

As I and my predecessors who have occupied this chair have indicated on a number of occasions, the use of a list of prohibited, unparliamentary terms is no longer the practice of this Assembly. Rather, it is the context in which a particular word is used that should be considered in determining whether a term is unparliamentary or not. A word that is parliamentary in one particular context may be considered unparliamentary on another day in a different context.

As an example, I refer members to the comments I made on the issue on April 11, 2017, when I ruled that the context always comes into play. When considering this matter, see page 607 of Alberta Hansard for that day. [interjections] Hon. members, could you listen?

Speaker Zwodzesky on a similar matter on October 28, 2013, indicated that "the words uttered one day in a particular context may or may not be parliamentary. They may or may not be unparliamentary." These remarks may be found on page 2498 of Alberta Hansard for that day.

Additionally, on March 16, 2017, I ruled on the use of the term at issue when it was expressed by the Minister of Energy during question period. At that time I ruled that the use of the term was not unparliamentary, and therefore there was no point of order. However, I did strongly caution the hon. minister to be cautious with the words that are used in this Assembly when they are apt to cause disorder and to avoid the use of such terms. You may read my remarks on page 353 of Alberta Hansard for that day.

Likewise, in this instance, in this particular context I cannot find that there is a point of order. I would, however, caution all members about characterizing language in their responses such as saying “mansplain.”

I also caution members on the tone of their questions. Like our society has changed, so has this House. Tone can be as disrespectful as are certain singular words.

I want to assure members that if there is sexist or otherwise offensive language, the chair will intervene. Having said that, I find that in general members do not resort to sexist or otherwise offensive terms. Members likely share the pride about having a number of women elected in this Assembly that more closely represents the percentage of women in Alberta and also the diversity that is represented in the Assembly.

Statement by the Speaker

Interrupting a Member

The Speaker: On another related matter, I would like to remind members to give respect to all members by not just allowing questions to be asked but also to be responded to without interruption. Earlier this week there was an inordinate amount of heckling directed towards the Minister of Infrastructure. I reviewed the incident, and while I did not intervene at the time, I certainly will intervene in the future if that kind of behaviour persists and is continued.

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 24

An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances

[Adjourned debate November 7: Mr. Coolahan]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Any other hon. members wishing to speak to this bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today and speak to Bill 24, an Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances. You know, I have a bachelor of arts in professional communications. I worked in that field for about five years. As part of those studies, I took a particular interest in political communications, how ideas and policies are communicated, critiqued, presented, and, indeed, misrepresented. It's a fascinating study of human psychology, cognition, and behaviour.

On entering into the realm of politics, having studied that, I came in with my eyes wide open regarding the use of spin, framing, insinuation, all of the tools of the trade. Indeed, I don't take offence in general at criticisms of our government's policies on taxes, on climate change, or on labour legislation. Madam Speaker, those are fair game. I'm happy to shrug off hyperbole that suggests that I or any of my colleagues hate Alberta or the energy industry or even everyday working Albertans. I can let that go. But where I draw the line is when that misrepresentation, even if it is simply intended to undermine our government or to advance another member's or party's political ambitions, threatens to undermine the safety of marginalized and stigmatized communities, particularly when that is aimed at vulnerable youth who are already the regular target of bullying, oppression, and shaming.

Now, in a press conference this week the Leader of the Official Opposition, in grasping for a justification to oppose this legislation, made the claim that some GSAs teach curriculum in political activism. He chose to double down on that position this morning through one of his social media mouthpieces and Twitter attack dogs, who tweeted a carefully selected and context-free snippet from a guide created by the Alberta Teachers' Association, GSAs and QSAs in Alberta Schools: A Guide for Teachers.

Now, I understand that there is a need at times to throw a bit of red meat to one's base. Sometimes it's sirloin. Sometimes it's roadkill that's been scraped off the back alley. On this particular issue, Madam Speaker, Albertans and indeed marginalized LGBTQ2 youth deserve to have their safety and protection discussed on the basis of honest facts. So let's take a look at what this guide actually says.

On page 30 this guide lists four types of GSAs and explains the sorts of opportunities that each provides for youth. It's important, Madam Speaker, that we look at the paragraph that prefaces these descriptions because it makes a very important statement, and that is: “Students should guide the purpose of the GSA or QSA and its activities.” That's the guiding principle, that students decide, not teachers, not principals, not a fictional moustache-twirling villain pushing a gay agenda. Students.

With that context in place, the guide lays out four main roles that GSAs can play. First of all, a GSA or QSA that exists for counselling and support. This particular type of GSA, Madam Speaker, is intended for schools where students feel they are in a bit of a hostile environment, where there may be very little school-based support for LGBTQ2 students, so it's focused largely on individual students, led by counsellors – again, trained counsellors – who are there to work with and help support these youth and provide them with a safe drop-in space.

The second type of GSA, Madam Speaker, are ones that are there to provide safe spaces. These are officially sanctioned student groups, which, thankfully, under Bill 10, that was passed in this Legislature, are now required to be upheld, and this legislation will ensure that all schools follow the letter of that law as well as its spirit. They may have a limited visible presence, because, again, they're not there for the purpose of advertising; they're there for the purpose of supporting students in need. They focus on individual support and social activities for their members. They include straight allies, and the focus is on helping LGBTQ2 students to feel normal and feel like they are supported and can simply fit in in their school environment.

The third type of GSA or QSA, Madam Speaker, are those that exist to raise visibility and awareness. Once again, as is the case with all of these situations, they are student led. They are focused on student safety and take an additional interest in human rights. They have a visible, school-wide presence. They're characterized by social, educational, and, yes, political activities. They initiate school-wide educational activities and programs such as guest speakers, assemblies, Pride Week activities, and they focus on building tolerance and understanding.

Madam Speaker, the words that have been seized on here are “political activities.” Now, let me remind this House that there has been no advancement of human rights in the history of our country or any other in this world that did not involve political activity. These are not dirty words. They're not scary words. They're not nefarious. They are simply a reality. LGBTQ students and their allies actively working to raise the profile of those students and of their community and working to build visibility and awareness: yes, that is a political activity, but it is not one that anyone in this province needs to be afraid of unless they have for some reason some concern with the LGBTQ community being visible and accepted in this province.

Again, these are student-led groups. I remember back in high school the Amnesty International club. We shared space with them when I was on the school newspaper. They advocated for human rights around the world. That, Madam Speaker, was a political activity.

I myself as a young man, having grown up in the church and at that point very zealous in my faith, would regularly wear my Mylon & Broken Heart concert T-shirt, and on the back it was proudly emblazoned: love God; hate sin. To some extent, Madam Speaker, that was a political statement. I was not trying to bring any agenda to that school. I was, as a student, simply being visible about my beliefs and who I was at that time.

That is all these students are doing. Again, student led. This is not some secret agenda being smuggled in. This is not teachers attempting to influence students against their parents' wishes. These are students who are working to raise visibility and awareness and stand up for their own human rights.

Lastly, Madam Speaker, they mention QSAs or GSAs that are there to "effect educational and social change." This is simply taking the last example and taking it one step further. They're not now at this point just working to raise visibility. They're not just working to raise awareness. They are actually working to effect change. In this situation the GSA may be used to "build networks and coalitions with other school and community-based groups." They may "focus on school climate and organizational change through outreach." So they're looking, then, at trying to actually transform the school environment, not just make people aware of LGBTQ students but ensure that their school is an accepting and open place for those students. They also organize activities, so things like diversity days, opportunities for staff training, and, indeed, discussion of inclusive curriculum.

Now, again, Madam Speaker, this is being used to try to paint these as something they are not. Again, this is a student-led organization, where students may, if they have reached the point where they are comfortable enough in their identity, in being who they are, and in their school environment, be able to advocate for that school environment, even for its curriculum to be more inclusive of their presence.

Again, the Leader of the Official Opposition wishes to use this to try to paint GSAs as some sort of nefarious thing that parents need to be afraid of or that if for some reason parents aren't told about it, students are going to somehow be misled. Madam Speaker, I believe that students have the ability to engage in critical thinking skills to be able to engage in standing up for their own human rights and indeed in commenting on and offering thoughts on the curriculum by which they are taught. These are not things to be afraid of, and there is nothing in this bill that undermines parental authority in that respect.

I've often wondered, Madam Speaker, as I've heard some members of this House speak on their position on this bill and their concerns about this bill, how many individuals from the LGBTQ2 community they have actually spoken to about this bill and asked their opinions on it.

Madam Speaker, I'm very proud to have probably one of the largest communities of LGBTQ individuals in our city right here in my constituency, in Oliver, and just a couple of weeks ago I had the opportunity to join many of them at a Halloween night dance they had, a haunted hotel dance over at Denizen Hall, a great little venue here in my constituency, an event organized by Fruit Loop, a fantastic organization that holds social activities for the LGBTQ2 community and uses them to fund raise for important causes that support that community. Unfortunately, that organization has been besmirched by some in the community who have made accusations about the type of work they do, but I am proud to support them.

I attended that evening because they had been awarded a CIP, community initiatives program, cheque through the Canada 150 stream through the Minister of Culture and Tourism, and I deeply appreciate him putting forward that program. I went there that evening to present that cheque. I was brought up on stage in front of at least a couple of hundred members of the LGBTQ community, and indeed when I presented that cheque, I got a very loud cheer. But I'll tell you, Madam Speaker, that that cheer was nowhere near as loud as the cheer I heard when I told them about this bill.

This is a change. This is a step forward in this province that has been asked for by members of this community, individuals who know from their personal experience what it is like to be an LGBTQ student in our high schools across our province in all communities, who know what the experience is of struggling with one's own identity, of trying to understand who you are and, indeed, of how safe you feel at each stage of that journey. That is why they support this legislation. They recognize that the only person who should be making that decision, Madam Speaker, is the child themselves. The only person. They are the best judge of when they are safe. They are the best judge of who they wish to tell and when.

Indeed, as we've heard, I think the majority of students reach a place where they are comfortable talking to their parents, and indeed the majority of parents love and accept that child for who they are. That is a great thing, and I am so glad that we have come to that place in our society where that is the majority of the cases. But it is not all. It isn't all. I think back to my own youth, Madam Speaker. Growing up in a very strict fundamentalist evangelical home, there were many things that I had struggles with with my parents, you know, simple things like listening to Christian rock music or having a cross shaved in the back of my hair – a cross shaved in the back of my hair – back when the flat-top and fade were the big thing. Those were challenging times.

Madam Speaker, I love my parents. I love them dearly, and we have a wonderful relationship. We've had the chance to talk through a lot of these things, and we all grow and change. But I know there are things I would not have been comfortable sharing with my parents at that age, and I think I had reasonable and good judgment in myself to determine that. That does not say that my parents were bad people. Indeed, I hesitated to speak of this on the record because I do not want anybody to think that is the case.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. The member was about to continue on a story that he was about to share. I would ask him to continue if he'd like.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you to the Member for Calgary-Hawkwood. I mention it only to say that for students in these positions, who are already so vulnerable, to be placed in a position, whether they reach out to a teacher or someone in their school, if they join that GSA or QSA to find the support they need, if they don't know one hundred per cent for certain that that will be a secure space and that their privacy will not be breached, then that student remains in uncertainty, in anxiety, and, indeed, at risk.

This bill provides careful provisions that in an emergency situation school counsellors or teachers or anyone else involved in this process have the ability to contact a parent. At no point under this legislation would a student be at risk. This puts the needs, the concerns of the student first. In doing that, it does not in any way disrespect parents or contravene their authority. At any point in this process the students can choose to tell their parents. There is nothing in this bill that forbids this. There is nothing in this bill that insists a parent can never be told. It only insists that the choice to do so comes from the students themselves. That, Madam Speaker, is what my constituents have told me. That is what they have asked for, and that is the guarantee this legislation will provide so that GSAs and QSAs in this province can continue to do the good work they are intended to do; that is, to save lives and to build better lives for LGBTQ2 Albertans.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any further questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to thank the Member for Edmonton-Centre for his speech. I do have a question for him as the representative for downtown Edmonton. I wonder if he has experience that he might be able to share with the Chamber in terms of homelessness and LGBTQ youth. We know that when students have their identity disclosed to their parents before they're ready, unfortunately, sometimes there are parent abandonment issues, which lead to youth homelessness. I just wonder if the Member for Edmonton-Centre, representing the constituency that he does, might be able to share some of his experiences and the stories from some of his constituents there.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you to the Member for Banff-Cochrane. Indeed, shortly after my election in 2015 I was approached by a group called SAFQEY. They exist for the purpose of dealing with the issue of homelessness with LGBTQ and, in particular, trans youth. In speaking with them and watching a documentary that they put together, which features the stories of trans youth in our province, that, unfortunately, was a common theme. A large percentage of youth that are homeless come from the LGBTQ community, and the majority of those students are homeless because when their parents found out, they could no longer feel that they had a safe home environment.

Madam Speaker, this bill, this legislation can help to change that by ensuring that those students would have a safe place where they can talk about these concerns; where they can talk to others who've navigated this process; where they can work with others who are working for the same goal, that being the human rights and acceptance of the LGBTQ community in our province; or that may be able to give them the confidence and the safety to perhaps then be able to broach that conversation with their parents with the needed support. They can feel confident in going to that GSA or QSA, knowing that nobody without their permission will share that information, also knowing that should they be in a situation where they are at risk, the school has the ability to ensure that all parties necessary can be involved to ensure they're protected and supported.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances. Let me start by saying that we all need to strive to do our very best in this House to be respectful of each other and set a tone so that outside of this House, when we're discussing highly charged topics like this, we set the tone for our constituents to be respectful to one another.

As the minister of environment said yesterday in question period, yelling at people is not an effective way to create change, and I would agree. To accuse parents who are concerned that they're being cut off from their child in such crucial formative years and the MLAs who represent those parents of being bigots is unjust. To accuse the government of trying to use children as a political tool when it's clear from the passion that this bill is intended to protect children is also not fair.

All of us in this Chamber, all of us who are parents or who represent parents, who have children and who represent children are here with the best intentions. We should give each other the benefit of the doubt on this particular score.

With that said, I will be voting in support of this bill.

As a parent myself I like to believe that my children can tell me anything and that they know I'll support them no matter what. Just to interject a little bit of my life and if my dad is watching now: Dad, I didn't tell you everything. But it's not like the member just mentioned. My dad was the most caring, loving, gentle, kind person. I never felt that if I was truly in crisis, I could not go to him. That's a wonderful blessing, but I know a lot of parents aren't there yet. For that matter, there are a lot of children that aren't there yet either. It's not always a question of violence or abuse or the lack of acceptance. Students and teenagers aren't always the best at having big conversations like this, and I know that there are a lot of parents out there that struggle with having this sort of talk with their children around sexual health and other important topics.

I think we need to do away with the notion that if your child doesn't tell you about joining a GSA, it's because you haven't made your home a welcoming one. We also need to acknowledge that no matter how accepting you are with your children, there's no guarantee that they would tell you about joining a GSA. I think that this is where parents have concerns, that they could be left out of such a huge part of their child's life no matter what they do. The online comments to the effect of "If your kid doesn't tell you, then you're the problem" aren't helping the situation. Kids are always going to keep secrets from their parents, and that's a part of growing up. Parents worry that the secrets their children are keeping could be dangerous for the child, and that's a part of being a parent.

The bottom line, though, is that this is one case where it could be more dangerous for the child to have their secrets revealed. This legislation will ensure that students have the sole judgment and the sole responsibility to tell who they want when they want. I think that's a good thing. What I'd like to see, though, is for GSAs to take a more active role in preparing and encouraging students to have those important discussions with their parents. Parents are important partners in teaching their children about respectful intimate relationships, promoting safe sexual practice, and setting reasonable boundaries for their children. For all those students who are avoiding having this talk because they're worried about this safety – it can be a hard conversation to have – we need to support them, full stop.

While GSAs are wonderful peer-to-peer support groups, we should be encouraging students to find the support within their family where it is safe to do so. We should also be giving those parents that just aren't there yet the benefit of the doubt, recognizing that for any parent the safety and well-being of their child is the most important thing in the world. I know that other members in this House – we talk about how we acted when we were younger. I thank God that He has given me the understanding to come a lot further from where I was because it has made me a better man and a better human being.

We should make resources available to parents to enable them to ask their children about these subjects in a noninvasive, nonconfrontational way. So I will vote for this bill as another step to protecting vulnerable LGBTQ2S children, but I hope this is the start of another conversation, a conversation about how, now that we have protected children from dangerous family situations, we move to engage more parents to be an active part of their children's journey.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), the hon. Minister of Culture.

Miranda: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I want to take the opportunity to thank the member for his words and for his support of this bill. I have had the opportunity to discuss with the member at an event that we were both attending, Camp fYrefly. I saw how he was open to having discussion with young people who were perhaps needing to have support to talk to adults and to be in an environment that was very welcoming and loving. For my part, I have to say thank you very much for doing that because it is important to see that these kinds of issues can cross party lines. It's really about these kids and their safety.

It has not always been the case that my parents were open, and my parents were welcoming and loving. I know that not every child has that. It was only when I was ready to have those discussions that I was able to actually have them with my parents. My mother initially had a hard time, but she came around. I know that it is because of adults who are creating those spaces and allowing for those conversations to take place that we have children who feel safe enough to do so.

I thank the member for his support, and I invite everybody else to follow his example. Thank you.

3:30

The Deputy Speaker: Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you very much to the member. What he was saying is very true. It's very personal coming out. When people decide to come out to a parent or decide not to come out to a parent, it's not necessarily because they think that the parent is bad or they don't have a very open relationship with their parent. A lot of the time it's just because the child isn't ready or the youth isn't ready or even the adult isn't ready. There are people who are still in the closet in their early 20s, 30s, 40s, and it can go all the way up even until they die, unfortunately, without coming out.

I really want to thank the member. We have to remember that this bill is to protect children. It's to protect their privacy, to protect their safety. Really, like the minister was saying, it's a nonpartisan issue. We should all be able to come together and say that we should protect our youth, we should protect their privacy, and we're going to stand together and make sure that the mistakes that have happened in the past do not continue to go forward.

I again want to thank the member for his very impassioned speech. I know he is very passionate about this issue and that he's worked very hard with himself, with his family, with legislation in this House, with LGBTQ issues, so I want to thank you again.

That's pretty much it. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Further questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased today to rise in the House to speak to this bill, Bill 24. It's something that is important to me. It's important to many of my friends who are teachers. It's important to a lot of students that I used to teach. I'm just going to try to speak a little bit to what my experience around this issue is.

I do want to state first off that in speaking about this, I come from a position of privilege. You know, I'm a white, cis, middle-class woman, and really I've had the privilege of a great amount of education. This isn't something that I had to struggle with in my life, so I take it very seriously when I speak for others who have had to struggle with it in their life.

I grew up in a small town on Vancouver Island, Duncan. It seemed very far away from sort of any major cities at the time, and being gay wasn't something that we talked about. I don't remember anyone talking about it growing up. I don't remember any characters on television. I don't remember that it was an issue. It was sort of something that was swept under the rug and not talked about, and I imagine that if you were someone who was struggling with their sexuality at that time in that small town before the Internet was everywhere, you would have had a real struggle in terms of figuring out what your identity was and how you were going to get by.

My best friend growing up came out as gay when she was, I think, 30 or 31, after she'd been married and after she had kids. We spent hours playing together when I was a kid, and it wasn't something that she ever felt comfortable talking to me about at all until maybe she had left for university because the environment that we grew up in was just so stifling. Not on purpose, you know? It just wasn't something that people talked about.

When I think about what the opportunity would have been to have a GSA at our high school in Duncan in 1995, I think it would have made a huge difference to a lot of people, to a lot of people's lives. There were a lot of people I knew who had issues, who had depression or who had problems with alcoholism, because they didn't feel that they were able to talk about this. They didn't feel that there was anyone that they could go to talk to. So having a GSA in our high school would have been hugely beneficial, I think, for everybody, for everybody to understand that there are different options and different ways how to be, that you don't have to be a certain way to be recognized and to be valued in society.

You know, I contrast that experience with my experience now being a parent. I have small children. I have a five-year-old and I have a three-year-old, and I talk to them about these kinds of things. I talk to them about how sometimes men marry men and sometimes women marry women and that it's okay for my daughter to want to play with cars and that it's okay for my son to want to wear pink if that's what he wants to do. It always prides me when I hear him stand up and say something in public. If he's in public and someone says, "Oh, you can't have that; pink is not a boy's colour," he'll come out and say: "Of course it is. Pink is for everybody. Colours aren't for boys or girls. They're just for everyone."

It speaks to the fact that gender stereotypes are still such a huge factor in our society right now. There are ways that women are expected to behave, and there are ways that men are expected to behave, and I think it really limits what we can do and where we can go as a society when we have to fit into boxes that have been put on us for such a long time. GSAs are part of a movement to unbox people, if you will, to let people really, truly be who they are in any given circumstance.

What I'm hoping is that as my children grow up, this isn't something – like, it wasn't something I thought about as I grew up, but that was because no one talked about it. I want it to be something that my kids don't really have to think about as they grow up because everybody is talking about it and it just becomes part of our natural conversation about ways that people can be.

You know, I've been a teacher at a school. I taught grade 8, junior high. We didn't have a GSA at my school when I was there. But I have stayed in touch with a lot of my students on social media, and some of them have come out as trans, as gay in the intervening years. I am so proud of each and every one of them who took that on when they were ready and how they wanted to do it. I've seen them in pride parades, when we were marching in pride parades, and they're happy to be there. It's just generally really wonderful that they feel that they are safe to be able to do that.

That said, you have to make decisions every day as a teacher when it comes to when you're going to inform parents about something. While we didn't have a GSA at my school, there were times that I had to inform parents about mental health issues that children were having or, you know, learning disabilities and things like that. By and large, parents are usually supportive. Like has been said multiple times in this House, all parents want what's best for their kids.

Unfortunately, I've also seen situations where when you bring up an issue with a parent, they neglect to see it as a thing. I've talked to parents who didn't believe that it was possible for a teenager to have a mental health issue, and by actively ignoring it, it devalued that child's experience. I've seen where damage can happen when parents get notified of things before kids are ready. This piece of legislation, that really emphasizes that the decision lies only with the child and only when they're ready, is really important.

I talked to one of my friends who is a GSA sponsor at a school where she teaches, and she told me that one thing she's come to realize is how mysterious GSAs can be to people who aren't in them. So, you know, she wanted to tell everyone here a little bit about what people in her GSA do. She says that they like to eat. They like to have lunch and share snacks. They like music. They're not afraid to sing. They have a library of age-appropriate books, and they sometimes even read picture books. They discuss issues, and they take turns and ask questions and offer opinions. They post a flag of the month on their bulletin board, and they particularly love making buttons and handing out stickers. So you can see, really, that it's far from the sort of nefarious thing that is sometimes talked about in the media.

Let's face facts. Not every student who attends a GSA is at risk at home, but some are. Some LGBTQ kids come from homes that make aggressively homophobic comments and associate hideous shame with noncis identities. Some come from homes that would rather see them out on the street than accept them as who they are. Some come from homes that would beat them as a punishment or deterrent.

For myself as a teacher and many others who I've spoken to, if we were told that we had no choice but to potentially put a student in that position, I don't know what I would do. I don't think that you could ever tell a teacher that they had to put a child in danger. It's so counter to our every instinct, emotion, and training. These kids in our schools need a safe space. It's not something that's nice to have; it's something that they have to have. At a time in their lives when it's essential to the development of their identity, their self-esteem, and their mental health, it's crucial that schools accept, support, and protect their students. It's even more crucial to a kid who isn't getting this support at home.

Sometimes, you know, when kids are at home, they hear the terms "gay" or "fag" as a slur, and they're being told that who they are is an aberration or a waste of life. If that strikes you as a bit extreme, imagine how it strikes them. It strikes them down. Statistics for depression and suicide among LGBTQ youth far outpace those of cis and hetero youth. I'll say it again: every kid needs a safe space; not deserves, needs. GSAs provide that space.

On the surface much of a GSA is eating lunch, listening to music, and discussing relevant issues, including the decisions that we make here at the Legislature. Underneath, though, a GSA is about visibly showing and telling kids that you matter and you're okay like you are, that you're accepted and supported and valued, and that we as a society are invested and interested in keeping them safe. The gesture is simple, but it can be and has been life saving.

On a final note, no amount of attending a GSA can possibly erase the influence of the home. The student won't forget their parents' opinions or their family values, and no extracurricular club is going to usurp parenting or erase who a student is. We just ask that this one club be allowed to tell students that who they are is okay without having to endanger the child to do so.

Picture your ideal school. It's a place where true learning happens, where students are supported, accepted, and cared for. Now picture a student, a student growing up and navigating their world. They're starting to figure out who they are, and they're terrified. That student's school should have the right to support that student and keep him or her or them safe. Isn't it our government's job to do that same thing?

The crux of the argument with this for me is that a GSA is really no different than any other club. It's something that helps students feel secure and safe at school. So if you wouldn't call a parent to tell them that their kid has joined a chess club or that their kid has joined – I don't know – an environmental club, but you would call them to tell them that they're involved in a GSA, then what you're inherently saying is that there's something about being in a GSA that deserves notification. By saying that, you're saying it's different and you're saying that there's something wrong with it. That's the line for me. There's nothing wrong with being in a GSA. There is all sorts of proof that they support and keep kids safe, and kids are the ones who are asking for them. They're the ones who are making these decisions. I think we've more than heard that it's every individual's own decision as to when to come out.

I support this legislation because I've heard from teachers how important these are. I've heard that they wouldn't want to out kids, and I've heard from kids who don't want to be outed, who want to come out to their parents when they feel that it's in their best interest to do so. So I support this legislation, and I hope everybody else does the same.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Yes. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'd like to thank the Member for Calgary-East for her comments. I think she can offer even more of a unique perspective to the Legislature this afternoon because as a former teacher and as a parent, you know, she can see both perspectives on that. What we've heard from the opposition: one of the reasons that they don't support the legislation is because they want to put the teachers in the position to make the decision whether or not parents should be notified. The Member for Calgary-East as a former teacher: I just wonder if she might share with the Assembly if she would feel comfortable in the role of a teacher making that decision. Would she want to be put in the position of making a decision for a child, and how would it make her feel as a professional?

Ms Luff: Yeah. For sure. As I've outlined before, there are certain parts of being a teacher. As a teacher you have a required duty of care. If a student reveals to me something that means that they are in danger at home, I am required to report that to Children's Services. It's always one of the hardest decisions that a teacher can make when you have to make that call because it means that you're intervening in someone's life, but under my duty of care and under the law I'm required to.

There are lots of times, as I've outlined before, when a teacher has to make a call about when to call a parent: if a kid's behaviour is not good and they're acting up in class or if a kid hasn't done their assignment, if a kid has revealed something to me about their personal life that I think their parents should know about. There are a lot of issues where I would have had to have made a choice that I don't really want to make, you know? There are so many things you have to do every day as a teacher. You have to mark papers. You have to make sure every kid is learning. You have to make sure every kid is safe in your class. There are so many decisions that you have to make.

I don't want to be responsible for this one decision that can make a huge difference in a kid's life. The only person who should be making that decision is the kid themselves, especially when you don't know how a parent might react. I taught a lot of kids whose parents probably had, I would say, conservative views on LGBTQ issues, and kids growing up today in Calgary with access to the Internet had really different views from their parents. I want to leave it up to that kid to have that discussion with their parents. They're going to be way better at it than I am. Given that opportunity, no, I absolutely don't want that pressure put on me as a professional.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am so honoured to be able to speak to Bill 24, and it is with deep respect and humility that I'd like to speak about some very, very important points that the Minister of Education made yesterday with respect to the bill and what it's actually about. Before I go into that, though, there's one thing that I would like to make very clear, that no government knows better than the community, the educators, the parents, and, most of all, the child. That's the most important thing that we have to understand here in government. Oversight in any aspect of that undermines the way that a child has the ability to be able to function, especially in such important situations as GSAs.

These are statements that the minister made yesterday, statements that I align with and that I believe are conducive to strengthening safe and caring spaces, GSAs, QSAs for our students, so I'd like to quote the minister. On amendment 2(d), which adds subsection (6), regarding informing parents and that it should be up to the student organization, that is a very, very good step forward, in my opinion, in advancing the safety and the rights of all students. I was happy to see that amendment, and I just wanted to say thank you for that.

Secondly,

[we all] make life better for Alberta students by ensuring that they can form a gay-straight alliance at their school without fear of being outed.

This was a statement by the minister. I completely agree.

Every single student in this province deserves a welcoming, caring, and safe place to learn.

That was the minister's statement. I completely agree.

It is not the school's place to dictate how children interact with parents, nor is it the government's. This is something that is up to the child, something that we can all agree on. Another statement that was made by the minister: he wanted to "clarify school authority roles and responsibilities around supporting welcoming, caring, respectful, and safe learning environments for student-led organizations, including gay-straight and queer-straight alliances." Again, clarity is good. I completely agree. "Section 45.1 places responsibilities on school authorities to create [these] welcoming, caring, respectful, and safe learning environments." I completely agree. The question of whether to notify a parent with respect to a GSA has already been clarified in that mandatory notification is not necessary. I completely agree.

Joining a GSA is, of course, student led, not government led. Student led. It is an antibullying group with real numbers behind the strength of having a GSA and how it enhances the school experience for those who have had access to one. There is so much research out there to show how important GSAs are. They're not a class. They are a place for kids to sit and talk, have a meal together, and learn about each other. GSAs reduce suicide rates amongst youth of all backgrounds and orientations. I completely agree. Students must be allowed to form gay-straight alliances. Again, I completely agree. Some students might feel safer and more comfortable talking about these issues with their peers. Again, the minister said this. I completely agree. No child should be outed. I completely agree. GSAs can "change a student's life," improving the "overall atmosphere of a school community to ensure that we're looking after everybody." I completely agree. Being safe and cared for is a basic human right. I completely agree.

One of the things that I resonated with most yesterday in the discussion was that the minister had mentioned one of the young men that was here during the introduction of the bill. I can't remember what his name was.

An Hon. Member: Ace Peace.

Mrs. Aheer: Yeah. I think so. Thank you.

This person said: how scary it must feel to be alone. I actually understand that. I think most of us do at some point in our lives. We can all relate to how that feels. The minister of environment gave one of the best speeches I've ever heard her do in the Legislature. One of the things that really spoke to me and hit the nail on the head was when she spoke about how when we were all in school – I'm a little older than her – exclusion was cool, right? To leave somebody out was cool. I don't think anybody ever had the intention of doing that, but if we can, you know, be participatory in something that ends that or at least works toward ending that, I completely agree.

I think about my children, some whom I have birthed and others who are my kids because I'm just fortunate to have them in my life. We have lots of discussions around this, and truly they are my measuring stick and truly represent the population of inclusive individuals, no matter their faith, culture, background, ability, or sexual orientation. My children expect me to make decisions that are based on fact and supported by my gut. I spoke with them about this along with one of my dearest friends, a true ally, Natasha Kornak. All of you are familiar with her. Natasha worked with and supported her GSA at school, and a very successful GSA actually, I might add. My oldest was also part of a GSA in school although I think it had a different name at the time. It is with their permission that I mention those facts. I actually didn't even know my son was in a GSA. I only learned about it recently because we happened to be having this discussion. The truth is that my children have been part of alliances their entire lives.

The only thing I can hope for is that – you know, we’re beyond blessed to have friends and family that are LGBTQ, other backgrounds, cultural backgrounds, and these people have enhanced my life in ways that I can’t even begin to explain. Hopefully – hopefully – I’ve enhanced theirs. I’ve travelled with these friends. Some of them are my kids’ teachers. I’ve cried and laughed with my family and friends. I would take a bullet to protect their rights, just to be clear. I also do not agree with everything that my friends say at any given time, and I consider people in this Legislature to be my friends.

The one thing is that once I’ve had a discussion with any of my friends – and it doesn’t matter what their background is – I don’t think any of them have ever felt that I was at odds with their rights or that of their children. I ask questions because, well, first of all, I’m inquisitive and I ask a lot of questions, but also it’s my responsibility to seek clarification. I would expect the same from you. So here are my questions.

Like I said, so much of this bill certainly resonates with me, so I’d like to ask some clarification around section 50.1(1). This section of the School Act states that parents must be notified of instructional time that focuses on topics related to “religion or human sexuality.” But GSAs are not instructional time – right? – as I understand it, so it’s a little confusing, as you can imagine. I’m not certain why that has to change, that section, or if I’m misinterpreting what’s happening in the bill. As I understand it, a GSA is a club. It is a group meeting. It’s an antibullying group. It does not require the legislation of 50.1(1). I’m not quite sure why this is a necessary change.

Youth that are over a certain age anyway – I mean, this is a voluntary group. Let’s be realistic, folks. If they’re over a certain age, they’re going to run this group as they see fit. No amount of parents, government, or any other intervention is going to stop a kid from talking about what they want to talk about, right? If it doesn’t fall under the rules of instructional time, why do we have to change that? I don’t understand.

The other thing is that if that’s going to be legislated, is it the government’s intent, then, to legislate what kids are allowed to talk about in GSAs and who they can bring to a GSA? That seems like a huge imposition on the rights of students who are in a voluntary group. They’re not there because they’re always vulnerable. It’s silly to assume that kids are just in a GSA because they’re vulnerable. Yes, there may be vulnerable students in there, but there are also kids there that are getting together because they want to start this group. They want to be together. Vulnerable situations that occur, like the member said earlier, are covered under other pieces of legislation completely different and separate from the GSA. One does not have to do with the other and should not be confused.

The question I have, then, is: do GSAs and QSAs even fall within this section of the School Act? Again, I need some serious clarification on this position. There may be a very good reason for doing this, but I’m truly confused. If the government can provide a hypothetical as to why this needs to be changed and how it enhances discussions on orientation, I would appreciate that.

The other thing – and maybe I’m asking the question, again, because I’m inquisitive, so please take this with the intention with which it’s being brought forward. With a GSA what are the qualifications of that person that’s overseeing the GSA? Has that teacher undergone sexual and gender diversity and inclusion training – right? – in order to lead that GSA? That’s very, very important because these are student-led groups, but they have to have a person to oversee this. I would want to make sure that a person that’s in a group where vulnerable situations may occur is qualified and capable to help move that person into whatever the next logical step would be there.

What are the protocols – actually, I think the member may have potentially answered this, but I’ll ask it anyway, and you can correct me if I’m wrong – for the kids who are showing signs of any sort of mental health needs that may present during discussions in a GSA, regardless of orientation, that have nothing directly to do with participating in the GSA? Are there teachers who recognize the need for help? Is there a specific directive as to: does the student go to counselling, do they contact a parent without notifying them about the GSA, or does the bill override that? I think I need to understand that as well. If the student has given permission to the educator to mediate, I’m assuming that that’s fine, but does the bill override that? Again, I would like to seek some clarification on that, and I think that in the broader spectrum of the bill that needs to be specific.

Another question that I have is: are parents considered allies and advocates at any point with respect to how the child feels? I mean, obviously, the child has to direct that, right? I’m just curious at what point a parent or a caregiver could become an ally or if that is dictated in the bill or if that’s just something that happens organically. Like, I don’t understand how government oversight is going to help with that situation.

How does the support, then, extend beyond the safety of the GSA? This is actually a really big one for me, having been involved in many GSAs. One of the things that has been very concerning for me is that the support is there at the GSA level at the school, which is fantastic, but outside of the GSA – I think that the other member had mentioned this with respect to incorporating families and other supports at some point, respecting the child’s choice at this point – what is happening to make sure that that support isn’t just for that half an hour or hour once a week for that child to be truly who they are? How are we continuing that process outside of school? What supports are available? How do we incorporate the other people and their families if that is what the child wants, or does the bill override that?

How does the support extend beyond the safety of the GSA, and will the supports, then, help the child to learn to cope if they are potentially thinking about bringing their parents into the discussion? As has been stated very eloquently in here and by everyone whom I’ve spoken to who has been a member of a GSA or who has come out on their own time, it doesn’t matter how much support you have. That is a deeply personal moment, and it comes with so much. So much. Is there the potential to bring parents into the discussion with the child’s permission? Are the GSA leaders part of that, or would that be considered going against the bill? This should be up to the kids, obviously, but we want to make sure that those kids and youth are supported outside of the GSA. Will it be clear in the GSA that if students would like to have discussions about sex, which, of course, they’re going to have anyway, there are specific things that are directed about that? Is there a need for parental consent? Does the bill override this? That’s section 50.1(1).

This is different from sexual orientation, obviously, but I think I should state it so that people are not misinformed by what I’m trying to say in here. No consent should be required from parents to have GSAs: we’ve already said that, and I’ll state it again to be clear. This is a completely different subject matter. My decision on how I will vote for this bill will be determined in some respects by these answers. I think that they are very logical questions, and I’m quite certain that the government will have very logical responses.

One of the things that I just want the government to consider is that we could end up going years backwards, forcing GSAs into the shadows and losing real advocacy on behalf of the youth. I think that one of the things we need to think about when we're considering advocacy is that there are a lot of advocates in places where you don't expect it. I think that the prevalence of the ability for people to be able to see that is a real gift. Having been a teacher for over 23 years, and I'm . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), the hon. Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park.

Cortes-Vargas: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today under 29(2)(a). Of course, some of those questions will be answered in the course of this debate, but I did want to talk about some of the elements because I feel that the bill, if it was to pass in this Legislature, would not cause undue harm. None of the things that she has stated that she's worried about would be detrimental if this bill was to pass.

I do want to talk a little bit about parental involvement, something that is deeply important to me. I was an educational assistant before this, and I worked with parents all across the board, and I continue to work with parents as an MLA. The member's statement I made today was about me talking to not just the students but to their parents and talking about what their involvement looks like. A lot of that involvement isn't confined to a GSA. Not having to release the information of a student to a parent doesn't preclude their involvement. It means that the student can come out to their parents. As many kids that are involved in GSAs will tell you, their parents know that they're a part of it. How did they find out? Because they told them, because they needed to be driven to the meeting, because they were setting up for a bake sale, because they were setting up for whatever activity they're doing. Usually they'll share that with their parents.

So when I talk about this, I think of the many parents that I've sat down with that have driven their kids to countless GSA meetings, that know that their kids are going to these clubs. I think what is confusing to us and especially to the LGBTQ community, that I know the member opposite was with when she went to the pride brunch at Camp fYrefly, when she met with different LGBTQ students, when the opposition party said that it was unfair to not let them march in the Calgary Pride Parade – all of these things were things discussed, but the reason for it, Madam Speaker, comes down to the basis of this bill, which, yes, is protecting that no person can out a student because of their sexual orientation or gender identity because they're joining a GSA, and it clearly defines that.

It doesn't mean that if a student comes to talk to a parent, they're not involved. They absolutely can be, and so many cases have shown that they can be involved. There are so many places. The story I told today about the student: it ended up happening that the student that came out told her parents beforehand and then delivered this amazing speech in her class about what it's like being a gay young woman, and then after that, they met with different teachers and parents and different parents of other people because she wanted to talk about it. Nothing in this bill precludes that because what this bill is doing is making sure that it is clear that teachers aren't going to be picking up the phone and saying: "Your child has just joined a GSA. Did you know that?" No. That's unnecessary in the instance that no other club has this.

I think the distinction is this. As an educational assistant I always had this complex debate with myself as to: what do I do if a child asks me about my partner? Under specific laws put forward by the previous government, it precluded us from talking about sexual orientation and gender identity while every other person that is not queer can talk about their families, their kids, anything like that. When someone asks me that question, which could be, "What did you do on the weekend?" well, that would involve my girlfriend, so I don't know if I can say that. It becomes very clear that it's a conversation that is frozen out in schools and that it is not okay to have.

I say this understanding why it exists, too. I have grown up with a very religious family. Being a Colombian-Canadian immigrant, we're Catholic. We've always looked at the teachings of the church in order to understand and interpret the way to interact with other people, but it's something that became very complicated to manage. I think this is the point, that we're reaching an impasse of understanding how to amalgamate, that they don't have to be at odds with each other. When I grew up and because of this whole context that we're talking about . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The time has expired for 29(2)(a).

Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Madam Speaker. In the last couple of days it's been interesting to watch the attention that this bill has garnered. While I was away on business, one of the first things that I saw, one of the first feeds that I saw was a tweet from my predecessor, the Member for Calgary-Shaw, Jeff Wilson, who said: "I hope that . . . members don't blindly follow their leader on Bill 24. Use your voice and your vote to strike a balance. Follow your gut and stand up for these kids."

I think, you know, that sometimes we get very polarized, and we don't acknowledge those people who came before us and show the appreciation for the advocacy that they had. Mr. Wilson was very good at advocating for people with disabilities, and he was very good at standing up for LGBTQ members of the community. I remember I was taken aback when I saw him in the Pride Parade early on in his tenure. While there are many things that I disagreed with that previous hon. member on, I do have a lot of respect for him taking a stance on this and taking a stance on this in the past. His record was very clear on Bill 10 when it first came into the House, when he supported Ms Blakeman on the bill that was proposed, and I really respect him for that.

I also want to thank the Member for Calgary-Hawkwood as I had a chance to see him make his passionate speech and speak to the issues on this. It's great to have a young individual who has grown up dealing with coming out and who is now in a leadership role and who really stands with the other members from the LGBTQ community who sit here as hon. members as well.

It was interesting. This last Pride Parade I proudly walked with my three kids. My son who's nine is starting to understand what it is to be gay and what it is to be part of the LGBTQ community, so he asked me why I was walking in the Pride Parade and why I was walking with them. I said that for a time our governments and the Legislative Assembly have done many great things, but unfortunately there is a lot of shame that does exist in this building. It's things like how the Legislative Assembly supported residential schools in the past and how in the past compulsory sterilization was also supported in this Chamber, and for a time – and, unfortunately, it wasn't that long ago – not supporting LGBTQ individuals was supported in this Chamber. As a Member of this Legislative Assembly it is important for us to recognize the faults of the previous members and our history – we all own that – and it's important for us to stand up for the rights of all Albertans, and that was why we marched in that Pride Parade at that time and will continue to support it.

I also wanted to make sure that my kids knew that this was something that we supported, so ever since my son Alex was two years old, we would always go and watch the Pride Parade together. The one thing I've always said that's the biggest shame about being an MLA is that I don't get to watch the Pride Parade because I have to be in the Pride Parade. I always enjoyed watching the Pride Parade. Maybe that day will come. Who knows when it will be?

Nevertheless, I want to reflect on my parents. I remember when I was a kid and we just started to find out what someone being gay was. It was a very contentious time, and people were shamed for coming out. But my mom, who is very progressive, who is a woman who refused to change her name when she got married in the '70s, which was another bone of contention, said: "I do have gay friends, Graham, but I am not going to tell you who they are because it is not my business to out them. I also don't want you to treat them any differently. Until you're old enough, I want you to recognize that they are individuals and that they have the rights that everyone else has." That is something that really resonated for a long time.

We're now entering this world where my son can see a man who loves another man or a woman who loves another woman and treats them no differently. Unfortunately, when I was growing up, that was not the case. We've made many strides, but we also have to recognize that the work is not done and that there are people who are young who are feeling marginalized and who are concerned about this.

I reflect back on when I was a student in high school in 2004. One of the main reasons why I remember getting polarized about this was, I would say, an ad hoc GSA that existed. And you know what? This is almost going to sound like a flashback to a Glee episode, but it was my drama society. My drama society at school was basically an ad hoc GSA, and my drama teacher was almost that teacher facilitator. While we made performances and we built sets and we did the drama festivals, it was an environment in which individuals felt comfortable enough to say who they were, and it was an environment in which we all felt comfortable enough to be allies. It didn't matter if you were gay or lesbian or bi or straight; everyone felt included in this environment.

But I can also tell you that there were many students who were in that drama society who came out to us but could not come out at home. One was an exchange student from Mexico. He could not come out until he came to Canada. It was funny; we were talking, I think, about Svend Robinson because we also were very politically engaged. He said, "Who's that?" and I said, "He was the first openly gay MP." That was when he came out. When he found out that we had a politician who was openly gay, he said: well, yeah; I'm gay. It was remarkable to see that, that we created this environment where he felt comfortable. You know, I was taken aback to see that.

There were individuals I knew who, if they told their parents, would be kicked out on the streets. It was an environment in which that teacher, had he told the parents, would have put that student in a very vulnerable position. But in any other normal circumstance or any other normal environment those parents love that child. I can't make any assumptions as to why, if they were informed of this one nuance, this one little thing about their child, if they found out, they would kick their child out on the street. But it was a situation in which we created an environment to help people feel informed. It was a situation in which our teacher could have that conversation, so there were individuals who came out to us first and then found a way to come out to their families. You know, I want to thank the late Mr. Rick Jobb. I was taken aback when he passed away in 2007. The number of lives that he positively impacted by creating an environment in which it was safe to be who you were and creating an environment in which we were all allies was tremendous.

The funny thing was that, like in many other GSAs that are forming, political advocacy came up because we were on this cusp of a time in which we were discussing same-sex marriage and whether we should move forward with it. It was at that same time that this Legislative Assembly in majority was not in support. It was at that time when I challenged our political leaders, and the only leader who took a firm stance on that issue and said, "We support same-sex marriage, and we view discrimination of LGBTQ members the same as any other type of discrimination" was our hon. House leader. After that moment I went out and I bought my first political party membership. I am proud to still be a member of that political party.

It's interesting as well because as an employer who hires many youth, I've had many situations in which someone has come to me with a personal issue where they cannot come to their parents – they are seeking guidance – and on which, if they did not seek guidance from someone in an adult position or authority role, they could be in some serious danger. These things impact many things, whether it's alcohol, substance, or sexuality. The majority of the times I was able to guide these individuals to make good decisions and to feel safe. I hope to God that if my kids are in a situation where they don't feel comfortable coming to me, they can find that safe person to have those conversations with, because we all want what's best for our kids.

Last year I had an opportunity to go to a middle school. It was right after we had released our transgender guidelines. One person within the PTA had heard a lot of misinformation that had come from our Rebel media friend's sources. I and the principal talked about the policies, and, credit to the principal, he was very honest. We talked about what it meant for that middle school. I reflected back to when I was in junior high. I knew of one individual who you could tell was not happy because they couldn't be who they were. Fast-forward five years later: it was remarkable because this individual joined this drama society that I was part of and eventually came out and then eventually came out to their family. It was exciting two years later to have this opportunity to actually see them perform in a drag show at Twisted Element. This was about 10 years ago. I'm not sure if they still do the drag shows. I need for someone to tell me that because I don't go to the bars as much. Nonetheless, it was remarkable to see him feel comfortable with who he is.

But I digress. As I was at this middle school, after the meeting I talked with the principal about the transgender guidelines and the feedback that he'd been receiving, and we talked about GSAs. I asked him if they had a GSA, and he said: no, but one will be here soon because there are individuals already coming to us identifying as LGBTQ. It was remarkable to see that because at no point was there ever a situation when I was in junior high where someone felt comfortable enough to be honest with who they were and to start having these conversations.

We were also in a situation when I was in junior high where someone could not be comfortable by exposing that they were an ally. You know, I had an opportunity when I was in grade 9 to go to the Pride Parade when Joe Clark was the parade marshal. I remember putting up a bunch of banners in my locker after that. I also remember the significant amount of discrimination that I got for doing so, but – you know what? – it was remarkable because it was that leadership from Joe Clark which was why I didn't take those down and why I kept them up.

At the end of the day, Madam Speaker, as we look to bringing forth legislation that protects individual rights and keeps them safe, I think it's important that members within this House speak about why they are moving forward on these legislations, why they are taking a certain stance on them because, unfortunately, there has been a history in this House of not necessarily taking the proper stances. It's moments like these where we're going to be judged by the history books by what we do, just like in 2014, when we saw Bill 10 come forward.

With that being said, I want to thank the members for their indulgence. I will be supporting Bill 24.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for your speech and for your explanation. I agree with you on so many levels. I wanted just to point out, too, that I know it might seem, because of our political realm and where we are in the world, that the only time that we participate is when we're having our picture taken when we're at places like Camp fYrefly or like the tremendous honour I had in speaking at the pride Shabbat. I just wanted to be clear and to add to your story and to comment that for me, anyway, my family experience, my friendship experience with all different communities but more specifically the LGBTQ community goes a long, long, long time before I was ever a politician.

I just want to be clear about that because the fact that we have an absolutely beautiful ability to be able to reach out to communities that we may not have been entrenched in before is one of the most wonderful things about the positions that we all hold here, Madam Speaker. It's one of my favourite things, actually. There are a lot of times where it's wonderful to be in here and have robust debate about those kinds of things, but really, for me – and I'm sure I can speak on behalf of many people – the best part of what we get to do is to be involved in communities we wouldn't normally be in and to be educated by those communities because they're the experts. I'm certainly no expert. I don't pretend to be. I would never profess to be, and the insinuation that I might try to or use it for political gain is quite wrong.

I just want to be clear about that. I wanted to say it because when you were talking about your story that you mentioned, you were speaking about all these wonderful experiences that you had had, and nobody would ever say to you that that's not legitimate, that what you've experienced is not true. Well, I'm standing here telling you that I agree with you and that the experiences that I've had are legitimate, they're real, and they're honest, and so are my questions. Maybe you'll be able to answer some of the questions that I put forward, which I think are logical.

I'd like to end with one comment, which actually talks directly about what you were saying. Actually, this comment comes from Kris Wells, the study's lead Alberta researcher and director at the Institute for Sexual Minorities Studies and Services at the University of Alberta. What he said and what I completely agree with is that if passed, the Minister of Education's bill will be the most comprehensive GSA legislation in the country. GSAs literally can save young lives, he said. They invite parents and families into a conversation. They don't exclude them from a conversation. This is from the expert. I draw my conclusions from this expert. This quote is incredibly important to how it is that we're looking at this.

Like I said and to be clear, because it was brought up again, I fully support GSAs. I fully support enhancing them, and I fully support the notion that it is mandated that we should not at any time out a gay child or any child that is a member of a GSA, just to be absolutely, perfectly, and unequivocally clear.

To the member, I would like to ask you about this statement that I said right now, based on a member that has been extremely vocal about how it is that we're supposed to move forward, what our responsibilities are as legislators towards the LGBTQ community. Is that a concept that you agree with?

Mr. Sucha: On this conversation, I apologize if I misconstrued it. It was in relation to speaking to starting this conversation between multiple parties, including parents. I think it's vitally important that, yes, those conversations happen, but when we're in a situation when a child is trying to find themselves, we need to make sure that it's on the child's terms and that the child is in the safest situation possible. That is why I support that it is for the child to find that decision and make that decision to ensure that they are most safe. I think I outlined that within my previous statements as well.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and speak on Bill 24 this afternoon. I'd like to start out by saying that what politicians say and do matter. You know, we can say one thing but do another, or we can say things that are congruent with our actions, and people are watching us. People in general have a mistrust of politicians. Unfortunately, that's a label that we all wear. It's on all of us to work against that perception of an incongruence between what we say and what we do and people's perception of politicians and how they carry themselves.

I'd like to point out a bit of a paradox that we're dealing with, especially in relation to this bill, in that in this Chamber we often hear about the importance of consultation and how important it is to go out and speak to Albertans to inform our opinions as their representatives, that when we come to this place and have discussions about important matters that are going to affect their lives, how important consultation is for us to inform our view. The paradox that I'd like to point out is that the Leader of the Official Opposition has based his assumptions and the opposition caucus's position towards this bill, perhaps, on a fallacy. I think it's important to point that out.

One of the groups that we turn to when we're making decisions like this on whether parents should be notified and on the disposition of information that teachers may find out in the course of their work and what teachers should do with that information – we're trying to deal with that question and wrestle with that very question on this bill – and I think some of the most important people to speak to, amongst many, of course, including children and parents, are teachers. Fortunately, we have a public statement by the Alberta Teachers' Association that I would like to read into the record. I will plan to table the document in its entirety at my next opportunity. I think it's really important to bring the voice of the teachers to this debate, particularly because the Leader of the Official Opposition has placed the burden of whether or not to inform parents on the teachers. That's a burden that we heard about from the Member for Calgary-East in her former role as a teacher, that she wouldn't want that burden placed on her as a professional.

I know there are other teaching professionals in here as well. The Member for Drayton Valley-Devon spoke about his experience as a teacher, and I have no doubt that he had the best intentions for his students in mind and always did. I have no doubt about that at all. I do question – and perhaps he didn't have a chance to answer this – whether, if he was in the position, he would want to be the one making that decision. That's an awful burden to bear.

What the teachers have said – and I'll get to the quote in just a minute here – is that there's a bit of a grey area right now, and they don't want to be put in that position. I'll read the bit of the statement here. First of all, it starts off with a quote from the ATA president, Greg Jeffery, and it says:

Some students who are even nervous that their participation in GSA activities might be disclosed simply will not go – and the support that they need disappears. Making it clear that the support is confidential removes some [of the] big barriers to access.

The statement goes on to say:

The Association has expressed concerns in the past about how the student privacy issue could place teachers in a difficult position. The ATA's Code of Conduct and provincial privacy law would likely preclude disclosure of GSA participation without student consent, but recent public attention and political discussion has raised questions about those obligations.

It ends with another quote from President Jeffery. He says:

Students and teachers will benefit from [the] legal clarity [that this bill provides]. The issue of GSA attendance and student privacy has become unfortunately politicised and unnecessarily divisive. If this bill is passed, teachers will no longer have to worry about managing competing pressures on such a sensitive topic.

Teachers will be able to point to the law and tell students and parents clearly [that] student privacy, safety and security comes first.

The statement concludes in saying that President Jeffery is calling for all-party support of this bill.

When we speak to our experts and teachers who would potentially carry the burden of this bill, if this bill weren't to be passed, the burden potentially goes back to teachers. They're clearly telling us that they don't want to be put in that position. The kids want their own privacy, and the teachers don't want to be put in the position of potentially being the ones faced to make that decision. To me, the fact that the opposition hasn't listened to the very people that they want to bear the burden of this incredibly difficult decision is disingenuous at best. They talk about the importance of consultation, and here they have failed to pay attention to what Alberta's teachers are talking about.

This kind of disparity between what they say and what they do, what I was saying earlier in my speech: the disparity of what the opposition is doing here is dangerous. It seeks to undermine what it means to be a politician, and I think politics can be and should be an honourable profession. We're elected by our peers and our neighbours to represent them, and they watch very carefully what we say and what we do. It's up to us to carry ourselves with dignity.

Getting back to what we say and what we do and inconsistencies, over the course of the summer, around the Calgary Pride Parade, there was intense debate and interest about participation in the parade. Leading up to the parade, I know that several members of the Official Opposition were in attendance at the Camp fYrefly brunch, and also the opposition was intending to march in the Calgary parade. At the time I honestly thought it was genuine, their interest. Maybe they had turned a page and turned over a new leaf and said: we get it now.

The Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, when some not-too-glamorous statements that he had made in his younger years came to light about his feelings towards that community, said to the media: I've changed my views. I've come to realize, being a legislator and learning from the NDP, that he's come a long way, and I took him at his word for that. I know that there are other members of the opposition that I believe felt the same way. Now we come to a point where we're debating the very bill that that community, the LGBTQ community, is saying, "Please pass this. This is what we want. It makes sense for us. It makes us feel safe, and it makes it feel like you're listening." They want to know that the politicians are listening. It's not a partisan issue. It's about making safe places for kids, and it really just comes down to that.

I think that when we examine the entirety of the issue, it's really baffling to me. I'm coming from a genuine place when I say this. I thought this was going to be something that we can celebrate together as a nonpartisan issue, so I'm sorry to see that that's not the case. But I do have faith that some members over there will have their conscience bring them to a place where they can't support the caucus agenda and the direction of their leader. The Member for Rimbe- Rocky Mountain House-Sundre did promise to the members over there that they would have a free vote. It's important for all the members of this Legislature to consider very carefully their position and how they're going to vote on this. As the Member for Calgary-Shaw said, history will judge you by your actions. People are paying attention to this. People want to know that they're being heard, and people want to know that what's at the element of this bill is keeping kids safe. If that's what's most important, they can demonstrate that by their actions.

I know that my father was a teacher. He taught high school English for quite a number of years. It was great to go visit him from time to time at school. When he walked the halls, everybody knew who he was and he was very well respected. I had the opportunity to speak with him and ask him: as a former teacher – he's now retired – would he want to be put in a position of telling parents about their kids? You know, he said: "I couldn't bear that. I couldn't bear that responsibility. It's not something that I would want to have done." What we're doing here with this bill makes a lot of sense.

You know, thinking about my parents and my own experience as a kid in school, I got bullied a lot in school. I was even afraid to tell my parents that I got bullied. I couldn't imagine, I couldn't put myself in the place of being an LGBTQ youth and having to tell my parents something like that when I could barely tell them that I was being bullied. I think the only way that they found out is that I might have gotten beaten up at school that day, and when I came home, they said: what happened to you? So I finally told them. They went and fixed it right away. I had a great relationship with my parents, and I felt like I could tell them anything, but sometimes as a kid you just don't see it that way.

When I think about my own experience and how difficult that was and put myself in the shoes of LGBTQ kids, you know, the courage that they express and also the courage that's been expressed by members of the Assembly who are openly LGBTQ in the community, it's remarkable. I think we owe them a debt of gratitude for their courage and for sharing their lived experience with us so that we can have a better understanding and appreciation of what they've gone through.

I do want to touch a little bit on language and how language matters to what we say and what we do, coming back to language. Sometimes things as simple as asking, "Do you have a girlfriend or a boyfriend?" or "Do you have a husband or a wife?" – when you ask someone that, if you don't know what their sexual orientation or gender identity is, that can put them off. So I've tried to make a conscious approach to trying to use nonbinary language. It's difficult, but it's something that I'm trying to be better at. Some people will say: oh, you're being too politically correct, that that's political correctness and political correctness has no place in our language anymore. Well, you know what? I don't think being politically correct is the wrong thing to do. I think it's about using inclusive language. It's about respecting the way people want to be addressed. If someone says, "I want to be called a he," well, who am I to say that they don't want to be called that way? That's the way that they prefer to be addressed, and that's the way I would address them.

One other thing, too, Madam Speaker, is in regard to LGBTQ tourism. Alberta is having a discussion in 2017 about whether to make safe places for gay kids. You know, the entire country and perhaps the world is watching Alberta have a debate about this sensitive issue but also wondering: “Hey, it’s 2017. Why are you guys still stuck on this kind of stuff?” Unfortunately, we do need to have this debate because we do need to protect and save kids. But the debate we’re having also reflects Alberta’s position in the world. People look at us and go: “Hey, I’m a part of the LGBTQ community. I want to go travel and spend my travel dollars in places that support this community.”

If we can send a message to the world and make sure Alberta’s reputation is one where people feel safe no matter what their gender identity is or what their sexual orientation is, people from around the world will say: “I want to travel to Alberta. This is a place where I can feel safe, I can spend my money, and I know that the people that I meet on the streets are going to welcome me.” I think that’s incredibly important to understand and something that we want the world to take notice of.

I do want to just briefly mention two organizations in my constituency, Banff Pride and Your Life Out, which is a gay support group in Cochrane. They do fantastic work. I really appreciate the fact that they’re supporting the community and that they’ve also welcomed me. I’ve gone to a drag show a number of times in Banff and, wow, Madam Speaker. I invite all of you to come because it is a fantastic show. Their entertainment there is second to none. You’ll have a lot of fun. I’d really like to thank them for the work that they do supporting the community and making sure that we can have these kinds of conversations and make people feel supported.

I thank you very much for your attention. I’m a hundred per cent in support of this bill, and I encourage all members to do the same.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. minister.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would just like to ask the previous speaker to talk a little bit more about the fact that sometimes as a child he wasn’t able to speak to his parents, and it didn’t necessarily reflect on a negative relationship with his parents but had to do with his own development and his own choices and how that played out. I’d just like to hear a little bit more about how his experiences maybe enlightened his decision to support this bill.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Yeah. Thank you very much for the question. In reflecting back to my experiences as a kid, I suppose I was embarrassed that I was bullied. I didn’t want to tell my parents that kids picked on me in school. I didn’t have any impression that my parents would laugh at me or anything like that, but I guess it was just a matter of personal pride. You know, kids get bullied all the time, so I knew that my situation wasn’t unique. But when I reflect upon kids who are trying to decide whether or not to come out to their parents, if I struggled with telling my parents that I was bullied, I couldn’t imagine the difficult decision and the difficult position those young kids are in. I want to make sure that they have a safe space where they can feel the support of their peers and teachers and get advice and make sure that they’re ready. When the time is right, it’s a choice for them to make.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other questions or comment under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, speakers to the bill? The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, for allowing me to rise and to speak in favour of Bill 24. I want to begin by stating one point very, very clearly, and I’d like the members opposite who are still deliberating on what to do with respect to this bill to think about this and to also pass it on to their leader. Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances, is about one thing and one thing only: it is about protecting some of the most vulnerable kids in our province.

Madam Speaker, the new leader of the UCP has offered a number of rather self-justifying, almost conspiracy theories to excuse his decision or his direction to have his caucus oppose this bill. But despite those protests, which I will address in a moment, at the end of the day, the passage of Bill 24 will be an absolutely enormous step forward for LGBTQ youth in Alberta, and on that day, Madam Speaker, we will celebrate with them.

Before I speak about the substance of the bill, I do want to take the opportunity to clear up a few misconceptions that have been propagated in the public conversation about this bill and about what it means, and I hope that in so doing, perhaps I can persuade some members opposite to consider supporting this landmark piece of legislation.

First of all, Madam Speaker, the claim has been made that this bill is somehow all about wedge politics or creating a political distraction. I cannot think of a more cynical claim. It is insulting and, quite frankly, is hurtful to the hundreds of thousands of Albertans who need this bill to go forward. It’s also a well-worn red herring that is used throughout history to halt progress on fundamental issues of human rights.

So let me tell members a little bit about how and why this bill is coming forward to the floor of this Chamber. When our government was elected, we quickly became aware that schools and in some cases school boards, but mostly schools, were still able, under the regime of Bill 10, to actively discourage kids from requesting GSAs. The old approach or the approach that was put forward under Bill 10 simply wasn’t working. It asked those kids to be the heroes, to push against a culture and a set of rules and daily directions that still existed in schools throughout this province, to push against them in order to make that courageous choice to request that a GSA be formed. The fact of the matter is that the rights of young people were being actively frustrated, with little recourse.

Madam Speaker, what we are doing here is that in many cases we are talking about the most vulnerable children inside that school. We are not talking about Norma Rae. To expect those kids to be Norma Rae, to fight against all those subtle and not so subtle pressures against them, discouraging them to stand up and speak about who they are, is to expect too much from the most vulnerable. Quite frankly, when the rights of the few are denied, it is, in fact, the obligation of government to step in to protect those rights. That is what this bill is about.

Another objection to this bill is the allegation that gay-straight alliances teach curriculum and somehow they need to be managed through that regime. Now, quite honestly, that’s simply not true. That is a ridiculous suggestion. GSAs are clubs formed by young people as a safe place to go to find support, to find camaraderie, and friendship, often, as I’ve already said, at an extremely vulnerable time in their lives. GSAs are no more about curriculum than debate club or model UN club or basketball. But, strangely, the members opposite or, in particular, their leader are not suddenly bursting forward with an outcry that parents be informed when their kids join UN model parliament. They don’t. So why, then, must they be required to be informed when they form a GSA?

Well, I don’t think there is a good reason unless you dig a little bit further underneath the objections from the members opposite or their leader, and that reason, frankly, is not very satisfying or one about which anyone should be very proud. The fact of the matter is that these clubs are not about curriculum. They are after school clubs that are about camaraderie and support for kids who are vulnerable.

The third reason that the members opposite or their leader, Mr. Kenney, have suggested that we shouldn't be going ahead with this is that Bill 10 was good enough and that we should just leave the issue alone and move on. Well, Madam Speaker, again, as I've said, we know that's not true. Bill 10 was a step forward, but it just wasn't good enough. In allowing adults to out gay kids, it was, quite frankly, fundamentally flawed. We know that it would allow adults to out gay kids because the new UCP leader pointed to it himself when he said that schools should be able to inform parents if their kids join GSAs. More importantly, we know that because gay kids and their friends have also told us so, and they've told us that Bill 10 was not good enough. Those are the people that we spoke with and listened to when we sat down to get to work on this legislation.

It's a bit self-serving and, frankly, a bit self-absorbed of Mr. Kenney to say that somehow he is the target of this bill, because – let me assure you – he is not. What this bill targets are adults who want to out gay kids before they are ready, and it targets policies, practices, and procedures in schools that are designed to discourage kids from asking for GSAs under the law as it existed under Bill 10. That is what we need to fix, Madam Speaker.

The fourth objection that was brought forward, Madam Speaker, by the new leader of the party of the members opposite was that somehow this bill will mean that children as young as five will form GSAs. Now, it's hard to know where to begin with that claim. We know already that Mr. Kenney did not consult with young adults and teenagers who are members of the LGBTQ community. It is clear as well, apparently, that he's never actually spoken to a five-year-old. For the record, kindergartners aren't thinking about forming UN clubs, chess clubs, debate clubs, gaming clubs, basketball teams. No, they are typically learning the alphabet and focusing on learning how to tie their shoes . . .

Ms Hoffman: And recess.

Ms Notley: . . . and also recess and wondering if their Elmo will be around during recess.

To suggest otherwise is patently ridiculous. Again, I think the level of ridiculousness of that assertion actually shows the desperation to which the leader of the members opposite, Mr. Kenney, will go in order to avoid having an open, honest discussion of the underlying prejudices which stand between him and his ability to support this bill.

Another issue that was raised was that the governing party, we, the NDP, did not put this issue in our platform; therefore, we can't talk about it. Well, I have to tell you, Madam Speaker, that's an interesting take on the work that we do here. Let me explain something to Mr. Kenney. Sometimes in life unanticipated things happen. In this case, as I've said already, after we were elected, we learned that there were some serious flaws with Bill 10 and in our ability to enforce the very provisions that were designed to protect the health and safety of these vulnerable kids, and we knew that those flaws needed to be fixed. So we listened, and the Minister of Education worked very hard with school boards over quite some time to find ways to improve the situation in these schools. In some cases it worked but not in all.

If the only reason that you have for not supporting this bill is because it didn't appear in the 2015 NDP platform, then you know as well as I do that your leader is reaching for excuses, and you certainly, quite frankly, haven't been listening to what I as the leader of the NDP have been saying and fighting for throughout my whole public life. If anyone for a moment would have thought that I or anyone in this government caucus would hear about the kind of injustices, that we heard about after getting elected, being suffered by kids in these schools and if they for one moment would have thought that we would have ignored them and not moved forward on them, well, first of all, you've underestimated every single one of us, and secondly, you are the only person in this province who will be surprised.

Another argument that Mr. Kenney offers up for why the Official Opposition should not be supporting this bill is that it doesn't mean you want to out gay kids if you give adults the right to out gay kids. Now, Madam Speaker, I think that's a bit of Orwellian doublespeak, but that, in effect, is what Mr. Kenney is now trying to claim. It's a fundamentally dishonest position, and it belies Mr. Kenney's own words when he discussed this issue with the Calgary Herald editorial board just a few months ago. The quote is: "I do, however, believe parents have a right to know what's going on with their kids in the schools unless the parents are abusive." And another quote: "I don't think it's right to keep secrets from parents about challenges their kids are going through."

Madam Speaker, I ask the UCP members opposite to consider those words and what they mean because those words mean exactly what they say: adults should have the right to out gay kids at school. So if you're going to vote against this bill, own why it is you are voting against this bill: you believe that adults should have the right to out gay kids against their will. At least own the position if you're going to vote against this bill.

Meanwhile, as Mr. Kenney tries to skate around this issue and hide from the pressures he appears to be feeling over it, he suggests that the answer to this problem is that we should trust teachers to make the decision on the basis of their professional judgment about whether to out gay kids. Just generally. Not on the basis of health and safety, which, of course, there's already provision for in this act, but just generally. Well, I do have a lot of faith in the professional judgment of teachers, Madam Speaker, but I also know that on matters like this it should be up to the kids; it should not be up to a teacher.

I also find this particular line of defence particularly disingenuous from Mr. Kenney given that he spent the last six months or so travelling around the province of Alberta trying to tell Albertans that teachers were part of some kind of strange conspiracy to impose socialist values in our classrooms. That was the case up until about four days ago, and now they are the arbiters of whether a kid should be outed or not outed. So I will just say that the obvious illogical and contradictory positions that are inherent in that, I think, again, really serve only to demonstrate the discomfort and the overall disingenuous nature of the arguments put forward by Mr. Kenney for why he's actually opposed to this bill, and I think that he should come clean about those.

Now, as well, Mr. Kenney has suggested that this bill is somehow a distraction from the other issues that Albertans want to talk about. And I do agree that we do need to talk about the economy. We do need to talk about our fiscal plan. We do need to talk about job creation. We do need to talk about economic growth. If that's what Mr. Kenney wants to do, then obviously what you should do is simply to vote for this bill and move on. That is the answer to the problem that it's distraction. That is the only answer.

At the end of the day, there have been a number of red herrings thrown into this debate. None of them stand up to any form of scrutiny. I think, quite frankly, that many people see that, not only outside of this building and not only on this side of the House and that corner of the House, but many of you on that side of the House can see through much of the irrationality or the absence of logic in the arguments that have been made by the leader of the UCP.

I suspect there are some members over on the other side of this room who are struggling with their conscience, and to those members I would suggest that what you should do is to stand on the right side of this issue because you know as well as I do that only one person and one person only has the right to out a gay kid – and you should not pretend otherwise – and that, of course, is the kid.

So stand with us and support this bill. Your grandchildren and their children will be proud that you did. This is what we are talking about in this debate, Madam Speaker. This bill actually is not about partisan politics. This bill transcends partisan politics. When we did Bill 10, that's what it was meant to do, and that's what it's meant to do now. It's about fundamental issues of human rights and the kind of society we are all striving for. It's a bill where we will be remembered for where we stood and what stand we took.

We deal with many issues in this House, and we have honest and profound disagreements about important matters, but sometimes – and this is one of those times – an issue comes before us where we have to ask ourselves: really, whose side are we on, and how will history remember our work? Did we advance the cause of human rights and justice, or did we thwart it? This bill asks that question, and it demands an answer from each and every one of us in this House.

I say, with respect and with humility, that I know that the leader of the UCP has told the public that his caucus is united in its opposition to this bill. I also know that that truly cannot be true. The reasons Mr. Kenney has put forward are undermined by the facts and by the logic. They just don't stand up. They don't hold together. They are an attempt to excuse the inexcusable, opposing a bill that protects some of the most vulnerable among us.

I've had so many conversations just even over the last few days that bring that simple point home, not only with young people who this bill protects but, interestingly, with Albertans in their 20s, their 30s, their 50s, and their 60s, Madam Speaker, who described to me the painful experiences that they had, these painful experiences of being excluded in their communities, in their towns, in their families and having no one to talk about it with, you know, many, many years ago and yesterday. This is happening right now. These Albertans know that this is not a trivial issue. They know this isn't wedge politics. They know this is not about loopholes. They know, in fact, that this is about life and death.

Yesterday we all sat in here, and we introduced and applauded 50 or more first responders who were here, firefighters. I had the pleasure of meeting with some of them last night, and I had several of them come to me and talk to me about how important this bill was. I had one fellow come to me and talk about attending suicide attempts, suicide attempts that he knew were absolutely about the fact that the person who was attempting the suicide could not get the support they needed to deal with these issues and felt excluded and felt rejected and felt unloved. This is what we are trying to stop. They know well, those folks, the difference that Bill 24 will make in people's lives.

I know where people in my caucus stand, but I ask every other member of this House to know that when you cut through all of the excuses, there is simply one fundamental truth. The bill will protect the lives of some of our most vulnerable citizens, too young to vote, many of them, but not without a voice in these halls, in this room.

So join us. Support this bill, support gay kids, support GSAs, and be proud saying that you did so.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

Prayers

The Acting Speaker: Let us each pray and reflect in our way. As we near the end of another week, may we maintain perspective and come together to remember those who fought and died for our way of life. By doing so, we have been afforded this incredible opportunity to stand in this very House each day. May we remember them today and every day. Amen.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Committee of the Whole

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: Good morning. I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 24

An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered in respect to this bill? The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Madam Chair. You know, I think that one of the things that's important to talk about as we continue this discussion on Bill 24 is the precursor to Bill 24, which was Bill 10. Bill 10 is a lived experience that profoundly changed me as a legislator. I want to say that as part of this discussion it's important to go over some of the details of Bill 10 because they were a learning experience for me. They were for my former caucus in the Progressive Conservative government. The lessons that we took away from Bill 10 really should create a framework for how our discussion goes forward on any issue surrounding the LGBTQ2-plus community.

Before I say that, I want to say that, you know, in 2013 I received the honour of being the first minister directly responsible for LGBTQ2-plus issues. It was an incredibly important moment. I want to give a nod to our former Premier Alison Redford, who was very progressive on social issues. She felt these were important enough to make sure that we paid special attention to them.

I had an opportunity to speak at Alberta's first gay-straight alliance conference at the University of Calgary, where students from around the province and especially ones from small towns told me and my colleagues in the government how important it was for them to have that one area of support, that one safe place in their day, in their community where they could be open and be themselves and not have to worry that someone was going to take that information forward.

Some of these kids told me that they had a guidance counsellor who would talk about that in the staff room, and the next day when they walked into a coffee shop, people would be discussing their sexuality in the coffee shop. That's the level of privacy some of these kids actually had. They were scared to talk to anyone about issues surrounding their lives, and a gay-straight alliance offered them the opportunity to do just that, a safe haven. That was critical.

We're talking about kids whose only option was sometimes having access to a phone line where they could have that conversation but never a face-to-face conversation with anyone, and that's really sad.

We released the province's first homophobic and transphobic bullying fact sheet – it's a very important piece of what we were doing – to start to layer in information for the public on how important it was to begin to have this conversation, to use the language, to start to feel comfortable with the idea that we had kids we needed to protect and we weren't protecting them.

We got the pride flag raised at the Legislature for the first time. That was during the Sochi games, if anyone remembers those Olympics in Russia and the conversation around gay athletes and the dangers they faced, the life-and-death dangers they faced. When we got that pride flag raised at the Legislature for the first time, people, gay and straight, said that when they walked by and saw that flag, they knew that the government had their backs. They knew that the government had the backs of their kids, their nieces, their nephews, anyone that was affected by these issues.

We went on to get, through much struggle, the relationship statutes and the Vital Statistics Act, through which became a statutes amendment act. The relationship statutes was removing the preamble to the Marriage Act, that states that marriage is between a man and woman. It was a struggle. It was a struggle because I had colleagues in the Progressive Conservatives who, frankly, even though gay marriage became the law in 2005, were still struggling with it in 2013. We remember then the Vital Statistics Act, removing the need to be 50 per cent of the way through gender reassignment surgery in order to get the gender changed on your birth certificate. That was another piece. These were all struggles. You know, by the time we got to the first conversation in this House on GSAs, we were still struggling with a lot of issues in our PC caucus.

Then came my colleague Kent Hehr's Motion 503. Motion 503 was the first discussion in this House, and our Minister of Education will remember very clearly that conversation; our minister of economic development will as well. And I want to give a shout-out to my colleague across the aisle the Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti because he is a good man who is supportive of these issues, who walked with me in the pride parade, and who honestly has a good heart. So in any conversation I have, I want to make sure that I have honoured the fact that he is a good man. Motion 503 was definitely a fight in our caucus about whether we supported it or not, and some of us did.

Fast forward, then, to Laurie Blakeman's Bill 202. Bill 202 was one that a number of us had said that we were going to support, and it was a very contentious issue within our caucus. So what our former Premier at the time decided to do was come up with Bill 10, which, once it was on the table, you couldn't discuss Bill 202 anymore because you can't have two bills on the table that are too similar in nature. The reason for the original Bill 10 was a political decision to thwart Bill 202. Let's be very clear. When people are throwing around the accusation that someone put something forward with a political intent to embarrass or to change the conversation, that started in my former caucus, so I find the finger pointing a little bit ironic.

I talked about Bill 10 in terms of my flawed advocacy. I was handed this bill at the last moment because of the work that I had done. I was told to take it forward even though it didn't make gay-straight alliances mandatory in schools. It was flawed, it was discriminatory, it was harmful to kids, and it said to every child in Alberta who is LGBTQ-plus: you're a second-class citizen, and we are putting that in legislation.

I took that bill forward because I was told that I had to be part of a team and that as a team player I was responsible for making sure that I did my part, and I did. I apologized to the LGBTQ community later because I profoundly disappointed them and many of my mentors, who then told me that they didn't know who I was anymore. It was a moment in my life where I decided that I could either quit politics and be who I was or be a team player and suck it up and take forward this horrifying, homophobic bill that hurt people.

At the end of the day, the bill was pulled because our Premier decided it hurt his brand. Ultimately, it came back – I had no part of the discussion – with mandatory GSAs.

The lessons I learned in all of this were painful but important ones, and they really were about making decisions not based on your electability but based on your moral and ethical framework. They were painful, but they were important, and they framed how I made my decisions going forward.

Fast-forward to the policy conference where I decided as a progressive politician to run for leader of the Progressive Conservative Party. I thought at the time that I would be able to bring progressive ideas forward, so I went to that policy conference. What happened at that policy conference was that I came to talk about natural gas cogen and a lot of good environment policy and a lot of good energy policy, and the very first thing that happened – and I will table this later – was that Jason Kenney's people, his supporters, came forward in a breakout room of hundreds of people, and they put forward a policy to out gay kids in school. So when Jason Kenney talks about the fact that he doesn't want to legislate on social issues, he doesn't have to because his people put the policy forward for him. The proof is right here.

Jason Kenney's people flooded that policy conference, more than 80 per cent of the people. You can tell by the final vote. You can tell that Jason Kenney's people wanted to talk about outing gay kids in school, and they wanted to talk about abortion. They did not want to talk about anything else. So when he talks about the NDP making social issues divisive, his people made them divisive. His people chose to have that conversation.

They didn't want to talk about making Alberta better. They didn't want to talk about energy policy. They didn't want to talk about anything on the education front but how to make sure that schools had the ability to out gay kids to their parents. That's what they wanted to talk about. And when they chased me up and down the halls and they called me a baby killer, they wanted to talk about abortion. They made it very clear that social issues were exactly what they wanted to talk about. So when Jason talks about members making grassroots policy, I think we can be very clear what that grassroots policy is going to be.

Jason released a statement on Bill 24. It is a dog-whistle document designed to invoke the worst prejudices about the LGBTQ community and about gay-straight alliances. In it he claims to "strongly support efforts to make schools free from bullying," which is an interesting comment to make since he didn't refrain from making the policy conference filled with his supporters free from bullying; the bullying was so intense that I dropped out of the Progressive Conservative leadership race. Is there anyone in this Chamber who thinks for a moment that he is interested in making any space in this province free from bullying? I don't think so.

He said, "Neither I nor anyone in our caucus has proposed 'outing' gay kids" in schools. Well, we know that's not true. Certainly, all you have to do is look on Twitter to see some of the folks across the aisle talk about how they think that's a good idea, so maybe he should have checked with his caucus.

He said, "We believe that highly trained educators are in a much better position than politicians to exercise their discretion." Well, it was only a month ago that he was excoriating Alberta teachers for indoctrinating their ideology in schools all the way from kindergarten through university, and now all of a sudden those same teachers he trusts enough to decide when a child should be outed in school.

He talks about Bill 24 applying to five-year-olds in kindergarten. You know, this is the equivalent of saying that gay people are child molesters. Because you know what? You put out this vicious, negative kind of messaging, and you ask your followers to get riled up about it. That's what this is designed to do. It is a dog whistle of the most disgusting kind.

You know, I knew from that policy conference that Jason Kenney's base were homophobes – there is no other way to say it – and the best way to get that base riled up, to come out and to vote for you is to signal to them that their thinking is under attack. How do you do that? By making sure that you tell them that – and I quote from Jason's release on the UCP website – "the NDP is trying to do indirectly what it cannot do directly: that is teaching sensitive subjects."

Cortes-Vargas: Like being gay.

Ms Jansen: Like being gay.

You know, Bill 10 was a learning moment for us. Clearly, a lot of people didn't learn from it. But I'll tell you what I learned from it. I decided that I wouldn't at any point in the future after that moment allow a time in this House where I allowed myself to be shut out of a discussion about what's fair and what's right and what is truly Albertan. That's what Bill 24 is.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak on Bill 24? The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Madam Chair. I do have an amendment I'd like to present to you.

The Deputy Chair: If you could just wait till I have the original, please.

Mr. Ellis: Absolutely.

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, your amendment will be referred to as A1. Please proceed.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to rise in Committee of the Whole to move an amendment to Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances. Before I continue with my comments, it bears repeating that the United Conservatives unequivocally support GSAs. Members of our legacy caucuses unanimously supported the legislation that gave students the right to form GSAs in their schools.

I stood in this Chamber along with a few people that are here today and, of course, supported Bill 10. I was new to the Chamber at that time, but I can tell you that – and I do agree with the Member for Calgary-North West – it certainly was a learning opportunity, and I, too, believe that I have learned from it as well.

Nobody on our side of the House wants to take that right away. We know the GSAs are an important tool to help support students who may be having difficulties dealing with sexual orientation or gender identity issues and that the peer support provided through a GSA can mean the difference between life and death for these children. We also do not support mandatory notification of GSAs, GSA participation for parents.

In other words, we are certainly not in favour of outing gay kids. This has to be said, Madam Chair, because the members opposite continue to insist that these are our positions on this issue. Time and time again we have corrected the record, yet they persist in mischaracterizing our beliefs.

Now, it must also be said that opposition to the bill we have before us today does not equal opposition to GSAs. Another piece of misinformation perpetuated by this NDP. While we support elements of the bill, our caucus has identified a number of areas of concern. In particular, I am concerned that section 9 of this bill deliberately or unwittingly erodes parental rights when it comes to the education of their children, which is why I'm proposing to strike section 9 from it in its entirety. Section 9, as it currently stands, provides an exemption from section 50.1(1) of the School Act.

Section 50.1(1) states:

A board shall provide notice to a parent of a student where courses of study, educational programs or instructional materials, or instruction or exercises, include subject-matter that deals primarily and explicitly with religion or human sexuality.

Madam Chair, it has been a long-standing legal right of parents in Alberta to withdraw their children from religious or sexual health instruction should they see fit to do so. Section 50.1(1) of the School Act guarantees that. Now, the members opposite have spoken at length in this House about how GSAs are simply extracurricular, peer-support, antibullying clubs where students go to eat pizza, hang out, and talk to one another and that nothing even resembling instruction happens there ever. To quote the Premier just yesterday: "GSAs are no more about curriculum than debate club or model UN club or basketball." Some members opposite have spoken passionately about how upsetting it is that we would dare raise it as a possibility. The Premier herself said that the suggestion was "ridiculous."

Fine. I will take the government at its word, but then I can't help but wonder why the government finds it necessary to provide an exemption to section 50.1(1). As far as I can tell, there is no earthly reason for the NDP to legislate an exemption for something that isn't happening in GSAs anyways. Its presence in the bill raises serious questions about the government's intent, and many Albertans are questioning the government's support for the parental rights as outlined in section 50.1(1) of the School Act. I sincerely hope that section 9 is not a way for the government to do after hours what it could not do in the classroom during school hours. [interjections]

The Deputy Chair: Hon. members, let the member speak.

Mr. Ellis: Madam Chair, the presence of section 9 in this bill has caused considerable confusion and anxiety for parents across this province. We have heard from many parents who are wondering what this means for their ability to know when their children are learning about sexuality at schools, which is their right under the law. In fact, the NDP appears to acknowledge this right since they are not repealing section 50.1(1) outright. If GSAs aren't instructing children in any way, there is simply no need to exempt them from this provision. It just doesn't make sense.

Thankfully, there is a simple, common-sense solution to this problem, which is to strike out section 9 from this bill. That would eliminate any doubt or confusion about the government's motivations or intentions when it comes to the parental rights enshrined in section 50.1 of the School Act. It would be a significant improvement to this legislation, and I would urge the government to support it. I would also caution the government to seriously consider the implications of defeating this amendment. Exempting GSAs from being subject to section 50.1(1) of the School Act while at the same time claiming that nothing that would require parents to be notified under existing law occurs within GSAs is a contradiction so obvious that it invites suspicion.

Did the government seriously think that nobody would notice when they try to legislate something that they say isn't a problem in the first place? What are parents supposed to think when your actions are so out of step with your words? Now is the time for the government to reassure Albertans that they have no intention of coming after their rights as parents. Now is the time for the government to prove that it doesn't have anything up its sleeve.

Once again – and thank you, Madam Chair – I urge the government and all my hon. colleagues in this House to accept our common-sense amendment to Bill 24. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you for this opportunity, Madam Chair, and thanks for the amendment. I think it's important to clarify why this section is in Bill 24 and the intention of this section as well. I think clarity is important, and what we are ensuring is that there is a differentiation between, first of all, instructional and then clubs, right? The health lessons, for example, are taught in health class – right? – but GSAs are peer-support groups, so there is a clear differentiation there.

You know, part of this provision is because of what we have seen over the last couple of years. It's part of the evolution of building this legislation in order to support kids and to strengthen the situation for GSAs. Some schools have suggested that there's an interpretation of section 50.1 that could be used as a justification to violate student privacy and to notify parents of participation in a GSA. We have seen some of this before, so this is a matter of clarity, right? We've seen some confusion in the past around school boards about whether section 50.1 should apply to voluntary student organizations like GSAs, so with the new proposal that we have before us here, we hope to bring clarity to this matter.

If we do pass this amendment, it's very important that it makes clear that section 50.1, which is intended to apply to instructional time, does not apply to voluntary organizations such as GSAs. Respectfully, that is the intention of this. It's a very important part of Bill 24, so I respectfully reject this amendment and would suggest that all members do consider that.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Thank you, Madam Chair. I have to say that it's deeply disappointing that the members opposite continue to peddle dangerous conspiracy theories instead of accepting the simple fact that this is about protecting kids. Rather than standing up for the students who need these groups, the opposition would stand up for the rights – rights teachers do not want – to out gay kids.

Madam Chair, I completely agree with the Minister of Education, and I ask all members of this Assembly to vote against this amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Deputy Premier and Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'm going to take an opportunity to sort of share some of my experiences through my time on the Edmonton public school board. I'm so proud of the fact that while we were on the board, we were able to move forward in ensuring that all schools would be safe, caring, respectful environments for students, staff, and their families. A big piece of that was ensuring that students had the right to form GSAs, and another big piece was ensuring that staff knew what their roles and responsibilities were around protecting those children, ensuring that they were well supported and providing opportunities for them to grow.

But the learning experience I want to share was one that actually happened when we were at the Alberta School Boards Association's conference. It was in debate. We brought forward a resolution to expand tenets of the policy that we had on our board to province-wide, and there was a lot of learning that happened on the floor. There were a lot of folks that said things like: "Oh, what's next? A support group for kids who are fat?" or "What's next? A support group for kids who have red hair?" I want to tell you that it is not the same to be struggling with your weight as to be feeling rejected and depleted for who you are and what your life is.

But the person who helped me learn the most at that moment when we were on the floor debating this was a gentleman I have great respect for. His name is Terry Riley. He's from the fantastic city of Medicine Hat. He came forward to the microphone. Terry is very well spoken and outspoken, and you never truly knew where he was going to stand on an issue until he started going.

To tell you the truth, it was a pretty hot room. Terry came up, and I was, like: oh, I wonder which way he's going to go on this. Terry started speaking from his experience as a teacher, how there were kids in his class that were absolutely bullied for being who they were, who were bullied, called gay, called queer, called everything that could hurt them. He didn't know what their orientation was, and he did not stop that bullying, and sometimes he even participated in it. He said that he did that because he didn't know any better, and he lived with that regret every day of his life since. He said that it was important for us to bring these policies forward because he didn't want any other teacher to live with the guilt of not standing up for a kid who deserved to have them on their side.

This amendment not only puts kids in a really awful position, Again, it puts teachers in a really awful position, puts teachers in a position where they don't know how to move forward, where they don't know how to best act in that role in loco parentis, which is part of their obligations as a teacher.

I have to say that bringing this forward is very, I'd say, disingenuous, but I think it is actually very genuine. I think it speaks exactly to the values of the folks on the other side who are bringing forward this amendment. I don't think they want to protect kids. I don't think they want to stand up for the kids who are most marginalized and vulnerable in our society, students who are statistically far more likely to be living on the streets, far more likely to engage in self-harm. These are some of the kids that are pushed to the margins by a variety of different systems, including sometimes their own schools and their own families, and this is why kids have told us that these groups matter and that they need to be protected and that they need to be supported.

I also want to tell you about one day, walking down the hall of a school in my ward at that time, when I was on the Edmonton public school board. I was walking down the halls of Vimy Ridge academy. It's a fantastic school. They had at that time cadets as well as hockey and dance and all sorts of different programs, outdoor pursuits. I think there are hon. members of this House that have their children going to that school at this very moment.

I want to say that it isn't often that you walk the halls of a school and kids come up and say thank you for a policy you passed, you know, work that you did around assessment, work that you did around junk food. Not exactly things students come up and say thank you for. But for this policy, in that school, kids came up to me in the hallway and said thank you. They said: "You're making our lives better and safer because you're ensuring that we have the right to be who we are. We can actually show up to school, hang up our coats, go to class, and know that nobody will hold who we are against us."

I think that this amendment and its intent to do the exact opposite, to make kids feel fearful, to make kids have mistrust for the systems that are supposed to be there to support them, speak to the genuine distrust, hatred, disrespect that we've heard from so many members of the other side when it comes to protecting children who are marginalized. And that makes me not just sad. It's not actually shocking, but it is very disappointing. It's not just disappointing for me. It's disappointing for these teachers that are going to be impacted, it's disappointing for the kids who are going to be impacted, and I wonder how many people on that side of the House will not themselves be disappointed when they are in a position where they need to say where they stand on this issue. It will happen over and over again.

Again, the Premier said yesterday: you know, we're really keen to get back to discussing the items of the economy, jobs, petrochemical diversification in this province. There are lots of opportunities for us to engage on this, and bringing forward amendments like this, I think, says that there is an intent on the other side of the House for us to spend more time talking about what our social values are. I'm fine to do that. You brought forward the amendment; we'll rise and speak to it. I will encourage my colleagues to vote in opposition to this because this is absolutely doing the opposite of what, in question period, members opposite said they want to do, which is to talk about those other issues. Instead, they're bringing forward something that is absolutely detrimental to the people of this province. We're going to stand up and we're not going to allow this kind of very direct attack on children to continue.

Again I want to say thank you to Terry Riley for his courageous comments, for working to make Alberta a safer place for teachers and for students. That day will stand out in my mind for many years to come.

There was also another speaker at the mike. I'll keep his name in confidence. He said: you know, if kids didn't want to get bullied for being gay, they should act less gay. It definitely made the news, and there was mixed reaction in the room.

That, to me, is what this amendment says: if kids don't want to be outed, they shouldn't come to GSAs. In my opinion, in our caucus's opinion, in our government's opinion, we are creating these structures so that kids can come, so they can be themselves, so they can be supported, and they can get on with learning math and science and English and all of the other important components in their day knowing that they are respected, that they are protected, and that they will be supported in their schools and their learning environments.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Madam Chair. I just wanted to talk a little bit about some of the news that I was listening to on the radio last night. It was around clarity of rules and why this legislation is important and what it seeks to make more clear.

I know that my experience as an MLA since being elected, as I'm sure with a lot of experiences around the Chamber, is that sometimes you don't know, when there is an issue, who the first person is that the phone call that you make should be to. When parents contact my office and they have questions and concerns on what's going on in their kids' school, often when they come to me, they're frustrated because they didn't know if they should go to the teacher, they didn't know if they should go to the principal, they didn't know if they should go to the superintendent, or they didn't know if they should go to the school board. Sometimes they don't even know who all those avenues are. Any time that we can make more clear the roles, where responsibility lies for what, I think it's something that acts in the best interest of families, of parents, of students.

Rob Breakenridge, who I was listening to on I think it was 630 CHED last night, was very clear about what the point of the legislation is, that it is to make clear that the responsibility to inform parents is not put on a teacher that is the one that is engaged to make sure that they facilitate these clubs. Like, we're talking about all clubs. That's what this section 9 does. It makes clear that there is curriculum in school and that then there are extracurricular activities outside of school, which are not curriculum, hence extracurricular. The idea that this is somehow to create a wall between parents and their kids: it actually does the opposite. It makes clear what the role of the teacher is and what the role of the parent is.

I know that, growing up, whenever I had issues in my life, if I was starting to date or if I was doing any of those sorts of things that kids learn about themselves and explore as they grow up, I told my dad as I was ready to tell him, because we didn't always agree. I grew up in a really religious household, that often disagreed with how things were in my generation.

I think it's important for parents to know what their role is, that it's the responsibility of the parent to know if they are a member of the Harry Potter club, if they are a member of the mathletes' club, if they are a member of these things that their kids are taking an interest in. The responsibility lies with the parents. It is important to have safe spaces for students that are vulnerable, that have all sorts of really shocking statistics on how hard it is still to navigate this world that has not been built for them to be a truly included part.

The fact that this section makes clear that it is a parent's responsibility to be involved with their child's life, to be close with them, to be having clear lines of communication is, I think, really important. You know, as an adult talking with my dad, I've made very clear with him – and he understands. He understands that if he didn't know something that was going on in my life, it was his responsibility. He knew that if he was not the first person to know, it was indicative of our lines of communication and not something that was someone else's responsibility.

I think that is why this section is so incredibly important. I would really like to know why the opposition would want to maintain the current way, where that clarity is not there, why the opposition would actually choose a system that puts other bodies in between a parent-child relationship and actually moves that responsibility where it really should not be. That's, I think, what I would like to know from the opposition, Madam Chair.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Chair. My colleague the Member for Calgary-North West spoke at length this morning about the legacy of Conservative governments on LGBTQ rights here in this province. This amendment and indeed all of the statements we have been hearing from the opposition on this bill do not stand in isolation. They stand in the context of all of these actions of all of these previous Conservative governments in this province, who have consistently worked to provide loopholes, to continue to allow the promotion of intolerance and bigotry against the LGBTQ community in this province.

The opposition would like to frame this as a question where they'd like to try to put us in a little catch-22. They want to frame this in a way where they can try to say: oh, here's the NDP government again trying to sneak through an ideological agenda. We've seen this disingenuous argument from the Leader of the Opposition, in which he tried to insinuate that GSAs currently are implementing curriculum and trying to circumvent parental rights.

Madam Chair, this is a sideshow. It is a distraction, because they do not want to speak about the truth of this issue, which is, as my colleague from Calgary-North West outlined, that they have investment in individuals who are choosing to take a fearful view of the world, who want to believe that members of the LGBTQ community are trying to circumvent parental rights, who continue to spread misinformation that individuals from this community are actively trying to recruit children or in some way convince them to cross some putative line. This is paranoia. It is not reality, and it is beneath the members opposite and the Leader of the Official Opposition to in any way continue to feed into this false mythology about the LGBTQ community.

This amendment is seeking, once again, to insinuate that this legislation in some way is trying to push through a secret agenda, that we are trying to circumvent parents, that we are trying to work around people's rights. The fact is, Madam Chair, that this needed to be brought into this bill because individuals in different aspects of the school system in this province were actively trying to get around the provisions that were put forward in Bill 10 and the intention of that bill to guarantee that all students in this province have the opportunity to form or join a GSA without question and with privacy. It doesn't matter what nice language they try to dress it up in. They are trying to ensure that those sorts of loopholes and opportunities exist.

Our government will not stand for that, so we are providing in this bill a reasonable step, which makes it one hundred per cent, perfectly clear that GSAs are not curriculum. They are not a political activity. They are not something that has to be reported to parents because parents have some reason to be afraid of them. They are peer support groups that are student led, that provide youth with the opportunity to receive the support they need during a difficult time of their lives and, when they are ready to make the decision, to then come out.

For that reason, Madam Chair, I will not be voting in favour of this amendment.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1?

Connolly: Before we vote on this amendment, I just have one more thing to say. If the members opposite vote for this amendment, I don't want to see a single one of them at pride next year. If you don't support our community now in this House – in this House now – don't you dare pay us lip service in June.

The Deputy Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1?

Seeing none, I'll call the question.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment A1 lost]

[Motion on amendment A1 lost]

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments or questions in regard to Bill 24? The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-St. Albert.

Mr. Horne: Yes. Thank you, Chair. You know, this bill falls in line with what is, to me, one of the most moving bills we've passed so far. I had a few friends from high school who had moved here from Nova Scotia. They'd been here for about six years when I first met them, and they still refused to identify as Albertans. Now, I didn't know this at the time, but these friends of mine had an older sibling, and when he came out to their parents, they threw him out. One of those friends later transitioned, and that friend was thrown out as well. This family has been torn apart because their parents are not accepting of this.

If they had joined a GSA and if the previous amendment that was just defeated had passed or if teachers decided that it was within the parents' best interests to inform the parents that their children were joining a GSA, that would have destroyed their household in high school. That is why there are so many homeless LGBTQ2-plus youth not just in this province but across the world, and that is something that I think we have to work to end. This bill is one step in that direction.

I believe it was back in 2015, with the first Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act bill we brought forward, that added protection for gender identity and gender expression, that I got some texts from these friends, and what they said to me is: this is the moment I am now proud to call myself an Albertan. These are people who have lived here for a decade, who until 2015 could not call themselves Albertans and live with that. I am so happy that we are finally moving forward in this direction.

I also was reflecting back on the speeches from my colleagues from Calgary-East and Strathcona-Sherwood Park about their experiences inside of schools and what many policies meant for them, and I was reflecting back again to my own high school experiences, which, as I'm sure most members here are aware, are not nearly as far back as some. I graduated in 2009. One of my favourite teachers was a social studies teacher. I was fortunate to have advanced placement in my school, and I had this teacher for, I think, four classes when you include European history and world religion, which, surprisingly, under section 50.1(1), my parents didn't need to okay. I'm still unsure how that worked, but it did. My parents were more than happy to talk to me about that class every day, so I don't think they would have been concerned about it if they had been asked for permission.

This teacher would often share stories about his personal life, but it was never "my partner and I"; it was always "we." If he told stories of an individual in his family, it was always his nephew, and the only pictures he had in his classroom were Prime Ministers, the Queen, and his nephew. I clued in fairly early on why that was. Many of my classmates still dispute why that was, but the reason is that section 50.1(1) would not let him talk about his husband. In any other workplace that would be a human rights violation, but the fact that in a classroom we can't talk about the family structure of our teachers, about what they did on the weekend because they might accidentally out themselves is so baffling to me. Now, I realize this bill doesn't address section 50.1(1), and I hope that in the future we look at fixing that.

But at this moment we're talking about things where there isn't even any curriculum involved. A GSA is something that somebody wants to join. We're not talking about sex ed. We're not talking about a controversial book that an English class wants to read. We're talking about some kids looking for some support from other kids because they are often terrified to talk to anybody else.

You know, there's a group in my constituency – well, they recently moved out of my constituency but only by a block or two – called inQueeries. This is a group that was founded when a constituent of mine, likely a distant cousin – I haven't dug too deep into that; branches of her family married my family – came out to her family and looked around the community and saw that there was no support. The only option for this family to talk to other people her age about their experiences and the challenges they faced was to come into downtown Edmonton on a Tuesday night. It just totally disrupted the entire week. So this family said: okay; we're going to go out and create our own group.

I've met with this group several times. Shortly after their founding, they organized the first St. Albert Pride. I'll give credit where credit is due. Doug Schweitzer actually showed up last year, and so did my Member of Parliament, Michael Cooper, although he wasn't there long. My colleague from St. Albert, the Member of Parliament for Edmonton Centre, and I, the three of us, were there the entire day, as was most of St. Albert council.

The stories that I have heard from youth at events like this are in many cases very touching, in many cases very tragic, and a lot of it comes down to whether or not they feel they have support and whether or not they feel the support that is available is a safe space. People like my friends from high school, who were thrown out of their house when they came out to their parents, would not be able to join a GSA if their parents were informed of it.

This bill is not about curriculum. It's not about trying to keep a secret from parents. It's about trying to protect kids. Not all of the members opposite, to be sure, but the conservatives opposite, anyway, have made it very clear that they don't intend to support this bill. Now, for some of them I think that that's based on a mistaken interpretation of the bill. That's one thing. I sincerely hope that they reach out to youth in their community or even around Edmonton. There are plenty of groups that I'm sure would be more than happy to talk to them, even if it's just to reach out to Dr. Wells, who lives in St. Albert. I'm sure that somebody will be able to sit down with you and walk you through why this bill is so important.

I seriously hope that everybody in this Chamber supports this bill. I seriously hope that everybody takes a moment to reflect on why it is so important that we provide not just LGBTQ youth but all youth with a safe space to talk about the challenges that they are facing.

You know, Chair, on the other side of my constituency, in Spruce Grove, I'm told that there used to be a GSA and that the students felt that it was no longer necessary, so it just kind of pattered out and died, which is fine. If students feel that they have all of the support they need at the school, that's great to hear. But there was a constituent of mine who had recently transitioned, and they went to Spruce Grove council and said: "Why aren't we flying the pride flag? Why is there no pride celebration here in Spruce Grove? Every other capital region community is doing it. What's happening?" The answer they got wasn't: "Oh. Sorry. This was an oversight." That would have been understandable. Even if they had said, "Sorry; we don't have time this year; it's just not viable; we'll look at it for next year," that would have been fine. The response that they got from the Spruce Grove council was that it was too time consuming for them to raise the flag, to make an official statement, or to tweet about it.

So this constituent decided to organize their own pride, and about 20 people, including the Member for Stony Plain and myself, all joined this individual to throw the first Spruce Grove Pride. There were many people in attendance who had stories much like the member from Lethbridge – I don't recall which one is which – and the minister of environment, who grew up in my community, where not that long ago in the same community that was now saying that they didn't need a GSA, people were terrified to talk about it, were terrified to tell their best friends about their identity or their expression, their orientation.

It is for that reason that even in communities where we've made a lot of progress, we cannot forget that there's still a lot of work to do. We still have teachers who can't talk about their own personal relationships in classrooms, but right now my biggest concern is whether or not we can have youth talk to other youth about the challenges they face and give them a safe space to talk. That can't and won't happen if teachers or the administration choose to or are required to inform parents as soon as youth join a GSA.

In that spirit, I urge all members to support this bill. I urge all members that are on the fence to reach out to community groups in their community and across the province, to consult with the people that this impacts on the ground, with the youth that this impacts on the ground. I hope everybody reflects on that, I hope everybody does that consultation, and I hope that everybody, when it comes to third reading, chooses to support this bill.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Ms Fitzpatrick: Madam Chair, I am honoured to stand in support of Bill 24. Now, my comments will be fairly brief because my colleagues have done a fantastic job of NDP-splaining why all aspects of this legislation must be supported. Every student of every school in my constituency and throughout the province has my full respect and support. I absolutely believe that any of those students who join GSAs not be outed. Students who join GSAs are Albertans and citizens who deserve to be and to feel safe, just like every other student. GSAs provide that safe place.

I've spoken to members of several different school boards over the last year, not specifically about GSAs but, rather, things in general. I asked them, offhand, if the school normally reported to parents if their children were interested in or participated in the music club. The answer from all was that they did not.

When I went to school, a few years ago, I didn't share lots of things with my parents. I took music lessons – singing, piano, and violin – which my parents paid for and for which I did some extra chores, but I didn't bother to share that I joined both the glee club and the orchestra until I had to stay late at school as we were preparing for the Kiwanis Music Festival or a concert.

I also played sports: basketball, volleyball, and track, or, in fact, any other sport which offered me an opportunity to participate and possibly get out of the class. My parents didn't know until I was participating in an event which required permission. Even then I was hesitant to tell my mom, who often expressed that these were not activities in which girls needed to be participating. I was sure my father would support my participation because he was the one who taught me to play baseball. That was his sport. However, I did need permission to participate in a tournament, so a conversation with both my parents had to occur. I had to present my case.

Eventually my mother recognized the benefits of my being involved. For instance, I became more focused on my academics because I had to have good grades if I was going to continue on the team. Sports also grew my self-confidence. Her opposition ended, and her support was gained. She attended every game or track meet which she could attend. She also attended every concert that I or my siblings participated in. I always felt supported by my parents, but I certainly didn't share everything with them. I certainly didn't talk about the crush I had on so-and-so or other things that I felt were personal. Did you?

I am a mom. I always felt that I had an incredible relationship with my daughters. In fact, they agree that we did and still do have a very great and very supportive relationship. As young children I taught them, in an evolving way, how to make decisions: orange juice or apple juice, Star Wars or skating. As they grew, they made more and more decisions for themselves. They made choices, some good, some bad. I supported their decisions no matter what they were. When they were little, they would confirm with me or ask about decisions. As they got older, they needed to confirm less and less with me. However, they still, on occasion, ask my opinion about a decision. I trust my kids to make their own decisions. They are individuals who have learned how to make decisions, and I respect them.

Had there been GSAs when they were in school, I expect they both would have been members to support their friends, because that is the kind of person they are. I would have supported as well.

I stand in support of Bill 24. Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's been quite an experience listening to people talk about this over the last few days, talk about their lived experience and share stories from constituents, from families, and, most importantly, from children, because I think they are the experts here. They're absolutely the experts.

You know, I was thinking last night that if you had the opportunity to save one child's life, just one, by giving blood or giving money or giving them a place to live or anything like that, I don't think any one person in this Chamber would hesitate. They would not hesitate to do whatever it took to save even just one child's life. Yet we're being told by children and their families that this GSA, the way that it's presented in this legislation, has the potential to save children's lives. This is based on real experience.

This isn't a world view of any kind, like you all like to talk about. This is real. This happens every day.

I'm actually confused as to why people would have a problem with this. You know, I like to kid that it's interesting watching members on the other side because it seems like they conduct themselves some days like they're auditioning for Kenney. I cannot imagine that all of the people on that side that are voting against this, that has the potential to save children's lives, actually believe it. Sometimes you need to do the right thing, and there is no job that is worth sacrificing what you believe or sacrificing the health, safety, or life of a child.

You know, it was horrible to read yesterday online that the Member for Strathmore-Brooks was again pushing this ridiculous narrative that this was about five-year-olds joining GSAs so that they could be part of sex or religion clubs. It's ridiculous. I've come to expect some ridiculous things from that side like the goofy things they say about equalization, whatever – it's a conservative wedge issue, apparently – or their concerns about ranch and farm workers' safety, but this really takes the cake. This is ridiculous, and I wish that Albertans could see what I'm seeing right now, the people across the bench that are just not listening. They're not listening to people who are telling them that GSAs save children's lives.

You know, a couple of weeks ago I attended a ceremony at the University of Alberta where they honoured distinguished alumni, and one of the people who was honoured was Dr. Lorne Warneke. I'm sure some people have heard of him. He is a psychiatrist who specializes in the area of transgenderism. It was amazing – amazing – to listen to his story, not just his personal story of the life and the journey that he's had personally but the ways in which he's been forced to support children and their families that have come to see him. What was really, really neat was sitting in that auditorium and listening to him say that for once he felt hope because he saw a government that was listening, that they were making decisions based on what was right, not based on ridiculous ideology that belongs to another – who knows? – generation, era.

Your children are not your property. They're not. They're their own people, and I think that as parents we work really, really hard to make sure that they find themselves. I find it so offensive that the biggest rationale for not supporting this that you hear from the other side is that it's parental rights first. It's not. It's about the children first. It's always about the children first. Always.

You know, I raised my children – they're adults now – and I think I worked pretty hard to be sure that I didn't just say that they could tell me anything, but I tried to support when they did tell me something so that, you know, my reaction encouraged them to tell me other things. Now, that wasn't always pleasant. There were times they told me things I sort of wished they weren't telling me, but that's the reality. If you're going to be an open parent, you have to walk the talk.

But as open a relationship as we had, there were times when I was not the first person that they spoke to. They spoke to their friends and their peers, and all of us have done that, every single one of us. We've told our friends things that we couldn't yet tell our parents. We've relied on them for support when we felt we couldn't tell our parents for whatever reason. That's how we live and grow. We look at ourselves through the lens of our peers, peers that we see are like us. Why on earth would you jeopardize that relationship by insisting that parental rights trump all? They don't. It's about children first.

You know, at about grade 6 I couldn't even help my kids with math. I mean, think about that. We're a little bit out of touch as parents. I know that's hard to hear sometimes, but we are. I make Flintstones references, and my kids go, like: what? It sort of puts you in your place a little bit.

There's a woman that I work with. Her name is Dr. Carol. I won't say her last name. Carol is a gay woman, and I know that she has struggled. As a young person her friends – and I asked her, you know, because I think we are a voice and she is one of my constituents: if you had an opportunity to say anything, what would you say? I just want to read what she said.

Being gay can be a deep fear unlike many others . . . there are so many pressures and messages telling us to be a certain way . . . we all have absorbed these, so much so that kids feel that they're not only different but will be a disappointment to their parents . . . putting ourselves in THEIR position rather than that of parents helps . . . imagine what it would be like to have a safe place to just be . . . without judgement, [without fear] or pressure.

The other point [nobody is] mentioning it's a gay STRAIGHT alliance . . . how wonderful for straight kids to be able to learn to support others as they struggle . . . my gay cousin's straight friend accompanied him through his journey . . . and to his prom . . . and I have heard Nate say that it was a privilege and honour and taught him so much about the good and bad in people . . . Nate is happily married to a woman. And has a child.

That's just a simple message from one person, but I know that if you asked and if you listened, you would hear from your constituents. You would hear from the children. You would hear from families. You know, we cannot begin to address our children's safety and the problem with youth homelessness without dealing with this. When experts are telling you and children are telling you – and they are the experts – that this legislation helps and it helps the way it's written, you need to listen. You need to stand up for what's right.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm pleased to rise today to speak to Bill 24. I wanted to make certain it was known that I grew up in the era of 1972-75, in a high school here in Edmonton, where I'm ashamed now to admit that I did nothing as well as all my other classmates did nothing to come to the defence of an individual and his partner in that high school, who either were outed or they actually lived themselves as a couple and did not have any protections that this Bill 24 proposes and that they would have enjoyed under this bill.

It baffles me why the UCP opposition to Bill 24 is so strong right now. They are obviously serving a constituency they believe is worthy of defence, and I find it indefensible. It seems to me they want to return to a different era. They're stuck in the past. It's unfortunate that they respond to this particular constituency rather than showing leadership and saying: look, we're not going to delve into the past; we're going to show leadership on this and really protect the rights of children for their safety and protection.

Perhaps it's telling to look at possibly the motivation or why the UCP is following this direction. I find some of that evidence in an article in the Sunday Sun of August 28, 2016. There's a page there where prominent people are asked 20 questions about what they're doing on a Sunday morning. There's a profile there where individuals are asked what they're having for breakfast or what their pet peeve is or if they could have one superpower, what would it be, if they could choose any superpower, out of any in the world, what would it be?

Well, I'll tell you what. On that particular day Mr. Kenney was profiled, and the Sunday Sun's questions that he answered went like this. As far as his biggest pet peeve is concerned, he said it was “people going slow in the passing lane.” Well, I’ll tell you what. We’ve got a party that’s going slow in the passing lane on this issue if I can say so myself.

The question that’s most important and most telling that Mr. Kenney was asked is: “If you could have one super power, what would it be?” Out of all the superpowers Mr. Kenney could have chosen, guess what he chose? He chose “to be able to go back in time.” Well, guess what? He’s leading his party in that direction. That’s probably one of the reasons that we see him taking this stance and leading his party back in time, getting stuck in time, taking positions which don’t reflect the direction that we are taking forward on this side of the House.

I’ll tell you what. If his pet peeve is having people going slow in the passing lane, what he should do is get the heck out of the way on this issue, vote with the bill, and make sure that he’s not stuck in time so that the majority of the province can move ahead and discuss the pressing issues of the day once we, hopefully, find the passage of this bill completed in this House.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Cortes-Vargas: Madam Chair, I’m just wondering if I can get unanimous consent to revert to introductions. My little brother is here, and I would love to ask for unanimous consent.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Introduction of Guests

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, please continue.

Cortes-Vargas: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I’d just like to take this moment to acknowledge that my little brother today woke up early with me – he’s been staying with me all week – and I was explaining to him why I’ve been so late coming home every day, and he decided to spend his PD day visiting the Legislature with his older sister. I’m extremely proud of this kid. He is an incredibly wise soul. He has two very older siblings that have lived paths that are very, I guess, ambitious, and sometimes he gets put in the shadows, and I don’t think he should be. He’s an incredible person. I would just like to ask Camilo Cortes-Vargas to rise and receive the welcome of the Assembly.

What’s up, bro?

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Bill 24

An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances

The Deputy Chair: We are now on the bill. Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park.

Cortes-Vargas: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise today to speak to Bill 24. You know, I’m proud to have family here. I think family has a lot to do with why we’re here, why this process is so important. In fact, it’s been working with families around what it takes to create safe and caring schools and what it takes to create safe and caring environments for kids that has brought me to this Legislature and what continues to motivate me to do this very work. I believe that the bill today that we’re debating has an incredible path in enabling those supportive spaces and making sure that it’s not vague in any way that parental notification is not to go out, effectively outing children if they join GSAs.

I think part of that comes into also understanding that there’s a lot of misrepresentation of what GSAs have been that has been put out there. I know this because people have come to me in my constituency from parent councils, all over the place to ask me, you know, “What would happen in this circumstance?” or “What would happen in this circumstance?” or “It seems to me that this is happening.” And when I explain to them the actual process, they always sit back in their chairs and say: “Oh, that never made it to me. Like, that didn’t come across.” I think that is because of the dog whistling that happens from the opposition and the fact that they continue to elevate conversations that promote discriminatory actions towards LGBTQ, to us individuals. I think it fundamentally is rooted in that.

But I think as we progress as a society . . .

10:40

The Deputy Chair: Hon. member, I hesitate to interrupt, but pursuant to Standing Order 4(3) the committee shall now rise and report progress.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 24. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Does the Assembly concur in the report?

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Acting Speaker: Opposed? So ordered.

The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would like to move now that we adjourn for the morning and reconvene at 1:30 this afternoon.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 10:41 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, November 9, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Yes. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you students from Cochrane high school in the beautiful, charming, and historic town of Cochrane in my constituency. They are accompanied today by their teachers Mrs. Stretch and Miss Gill. The students from Cochrane have enjoyed their trip to the Legislative Assembly. I'd ask for the students to rise and to have the members give them the warm traditional welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you today three groups of guests. First, I'm pleased to introduce Niobe Thompson, Bonnie Thompson, and Rosvita Dransfeld, who last year teamed up with Alberta Health Services to make two groundbreaking documentary films. Memento Mori and Vital Bonds bring viewers into intimate contact with the stories of transplant patients, the families of organ donors, and the medical staff who make our incredible organ transplant system work. These films are receiving international recognition and send a strong message on the value of our screen production grant program.

It's my pleasure to also introduce four staff members from the University of Alberta hospital: Dr. James Shapiro, liver surgeon, CIHR/Wyeth clinical research chair in transplantation; Kim Worton, unit manager with organ and tissue donation; Dr. Jim Kutsogiannis, neurocritical intensivist and medical director in the human organ procurement and exchange program; and Margaret Lidstone, former human organ procurement and exchange coordinator. These are some of the outstanding staff who are pivotal in bringing transplant patients and donors into contact with the filmmakers in an ethical and sensitive manner.

Lastly, I'd like to introduce Leslie Keith and Carl Babchishin, who lost their son Matthew two years ago. They made the courageous decision to share their story, resulting in the first-ever real-time account of a family making the gift of life. The bravery of the Babchishin family means that people all over the world are learning more about the crucial need for organ donation and choosing to become organ donors.

I ask all of my guests to now rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to all members of the Assembly the winner of the Royal Canadian Legion's dominion poem contest, Ryan Kosa. Ryan is joined in the Speaker's gallery by his family: Annette and James, his mother and father, and Sarah, his sister. Ryan and his family are from just north of Sexsmith, a town in my constituency, where Ryan attends grade 12 at St. Mary's Catholic school. I'm sure that many members will recognize Ryan, who read his profound poem, Deafening Silence, at the Remembrance Day ceremony earlier today. I'm sure that I speak for all members when I say that we are truly moved by the thoughtful words of the poem. Personally, I'm proud to have such a smart young man as a constituent. I did want to take just a moment to read just a couple of lines from this poem, and I know other members will be quoting some parts from this poem, too. Just a couple of lines:

From Brussels to Baghdad,
Vimy to Vietnam, the memory lives on.

I would ask Ryan and his family to all rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. A great honour for me to stand and introduce to you and through you to the Assembly Mr. Umair Ahad. Umair is a social worker in addition to having degrees in environmental science and political science. He's also the owner of a small business in Calgary. Umair is a committed Liberal and the regional chair for the federal Liberal Party of Canada. I'll ask him to rise, and we'll give him the usual welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to introduce to you and through you to the members of this Assembly two people who were helpful in assisting me with the bill that I will be introducing this afternoon. Kim Savard is part of a steering committee that organized a community conversation in Calgary with key stakeholders to gauge the interest and the capacity to develop a missing-seniors response in Calgary. A cross-section of stakeholders from all sectors agreed to move forward, and an action committee was formed as part of Calgary's age-friendly strategy. I had the pleasure of learning from Kim and others about their community pilot project, and I am pleased to have been able to use what they have learned about keeping seniors safe in drafting my private member's bill.

With them is my former legislative assistant, Maureen Gough, who brought the idea of the silver alert bill to me when she was caring for her mother, Anne McIntosh, who had advanced dementia and has since passed. This bill is in her memory.

May I ask Kim and Maureen to please stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly representatives of the Canadian Primary Biliary Cholangitis Society, Alberta region. PBC is an autoimmune disorder that attacks the liver, and the Canadian PBC Society works towards education, awareness, research, and support to help improve the lives of those living with the disorder. I had the pleasure of meeting with these representatives earlier today, and we discussed ways to work together to improve quality of life for those living with PBC. I now invite Dr. Swain, Shauna Vander Well, and Kristy Peterson to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two sets of introductions. It is my pleasure to introduce to you and through you Caleb Sorenson. Caleb is in the process of completing his political science degree at King's University and recently joined our team in Sherwood Park as a part-time constituency assistant. I would like Caleb to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to introduce to you and through you two members of the Alberta Thai Association, Councillor Ngamta Tekauyporn and Vice-president Katia da Silva Vissers. The Alberta Thai Association has been serving the Thai and multi-cultural communities in the greater Edmonton area and throughout Canada and throughout Alberta for over 30 years. I would like to ask my guests to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome from the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have two introductions today. First, I rise in recognition of some of Alberta's medical radiation technologists who are seated today in our members' gallery. I am honoured to have these health care professionals join us this week, during MRT Week, to celebrate the outstanding contributions of MRTs to the well-being of Alberta patients. Whether it's active or palliative treatment during cancer, these professionals are at the side of our patients almost every day. I invite Fiona Mitchell and her colleagues Karen, Susan, Jackie, Cynthia, Laura, and Mona to please rise and accept our recognition and welcome to this Assembly.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. For my second introduction today it's a pleasure to introduce two visitors in the members' gallery from the constituency of Edmonton-Glenora. I invite them to rise as I introduce them. They are Aidan Wharton and his father, Kevin Wharton. Aidan is an air cadet with 395 Edmonton Royal Canadian Air Cadet Squadron and attends Britannia junior high. He aspires to be a fighter pilot with the Royal Canadian Air Force and certainly makes his dad and all of his classmates very proud. Please rise, Aidan, and your father, Kevin, and receive our welcome to this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. members, are there any other guests today? The Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

1:40

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly guests of mine, the Reiter family. There's David Reiter, David Reiter Jr., and Zoe Bungay. The Reiter family are joining us from the Beverly neighbourhood in my riding of Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview. David Reiter Jr. attends Beacon Heights elementary, where he is currently learning about the provincial government. He's very excited to see question period first-hand, and I have a feeling he's going to be in for a very eventful day. I invite them to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome. I hope that they are good teachers.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you Blair McCormick. Blair is the executive director of the Southern Alberta Institute of Technology Students' Association. Blair is a SAIT alumnus who has worked with the students' union for more than 14 years now before coming into his current role last year. He is a graduate of SAIT, a fan of hockey and craft beer, and as we all know in this House, we are fans of both students and craft beer. We're proud to work with individuals like Blair and SAIT students to make life better for Albertans. If you could please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Are there any other guests? The Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Deb Teed and Arnold Hanson. They're also joined by Deb's daughter Elizabeth and her friend Gabby. Arnold Hanson is president of the board of the FCSS Association of Alberta, and Deb Teed is the association's executive director.

The association provides crucial support to over 200 FCSS programs across our province, including advocacy, training, and professional development, and a variety of tools and resources to the programs. At the annual FCSS Association MLA breakfast this morning I spoke about the critical work that Alberta FCSS does in their communities. They make an incredible difference to children, youth, families, and seniors, and that's why our government was proud to increase our financial support to enable them to address issues like poverty, isolation, and family violence. We are proud to continue our partnership and collaboration with all of the association members to make life better for all Albertans.

I ask my guests to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Ministerial Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health and Deputy Premier.

Remembrance Day

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Earlier today we gathered for a solemn and moving ceremony in remembrance of all those who sacrificed greatly so that we might live in peace and enjoy our democratic rights and freedoms. Thousands upon thousands of Albertans and Canadians and indigenous peoples left everything behind to go into the unknown and fight for everything we hold dear. So many of them did not come back, and the ones who did return were changed forever by what they had to endure.

Mr. Speaker, 2017 is a particularly poignant year to mark these sacrifices. This year is the 75th anniversary of Dieppe and the 100th anniversary of the Battle of Vimy Ridge, and tomorrow is the 100th anniversary of the Battle of Passchendaele. We know several Alberta regiments were among the Canadians who captured that Belgian village and its ridge. British, Australian, and New Zealand troops had tried in vain to take back the village since July. We accomplished that victory in two weeks. Nine Canadians won the Victoria Cross for valour, but the cost in human life was unimaginable: 4,000 soldiers killed and 12,000 wounded. Those who died at Passchendaele were among the 66,000 Canadians who gave their lives in the Great War and among the more than 172,000 who were wounded. It would be another year after that battle before the Great War finally ended.

We remember all of those who served and sacrificed in the Great War, but we also remember those who have served in almost 100 years of war and peacekeeping duties since then, and we remember those who are still serving today. They are standing guard, they are keeping the peace, and they are bringing relief and comfort to those who have lost everything to disasters.

Mr. Speaker, many of us, on all sides of this House, have had the honour of meeting some of the incredibly brave and resolute women and men who've served in the last 100 years and who are still serving today. They are Albertans' parents, grandparents, and great-grandparents. They are Albertans' brothers and sisters. They are Albertans' children and grandchildren. Every single one of them has the heart of a lion, and we say to them: thank you.

On behalf of the Premier and our entire government we remember them, and we give them our most heartfelt thanks. This debt of thanks we owe to those defenders, living and dead, is expressed best through our actions. So I respectfully encourage all of us to act on this great debt even in small ways, even in acts of kindness, to fight for freedoms everywhere and to make life for Albertans better, for Canadians better, and for those beyond our borders better.

Thank you.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, today we stop to reflect, honour, and remember the brave, our ancestors and the soldiers who were willing to sacrifice their lives in order to protect our way of life. They fought and died for this great nation and for this great province, but more importantly they fought for the right to live free. Our veterans recognize the incredible importance of freedom from tyranny and oppression. In fact, they were willing to give the ultimate sacrifice, even their lives, in its defence. It is right that we pause and consider the hopes and the dreams of the soldiers who courageously and selflessly gave their lives so that we could be free.

Freedom is not an end; instead, it is a continual pursuit. Mr. Speaker, we must be ever vigilant in our quest to remain free. Freedom allows us and allows individuals and communities to flourish and live happily. When all people are equal before the law and can interact peacefully one with another, great things can happen and often do happen. Freedom, peace, and democracy should never be taken for granted. We must remain alert as there are still people in this world today that seek to eliminate our democratic rights, our religious freedoms, our right to free speech, and much, much more that our society has to offer that makes life so beautiful and so rewarding.

It is my hope that our children and our grandchildren continue to cherish this day and recognize the sacrifices that were made by those who came before. Let us teach them to be selfless and to use the freedom fought for and won by their ancestors to pursue what is noble, what is good, and what helps their neighbours and fellow citizens.

Mr. Speaker, this morning we heard a poem written by a young man named Ryan Kosa entitled Deafening Silence. I was moved by his words as I could tell that even though Ryan had not experienced war, he was able to empathize with those who had. I share with you a few lines from his poem that stand as a reminder that we must never forget.

Two minutes,

A small price to pay.

One minute for those who returned

The other for the souls we've lost.

A two minute suspension of daily duties,

In respect to those who paid their duties.

Lest we forget, Mr. Speaker. Lest we forget.

Mr. Mason: Mr. Speaker, I would seek unanimous consent that we extend Orders of the Day to the completion of the Routine in order to allow for such members who are not members of the two main parties who may wish to respond to the ministerial statement.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Today we remember the men and women who have made the ultimate sacrifice in defending our province and our country and also those who are currently serving our country with honour at home and abroad. Each year on November 11 we take time to show our gratitude and respect to those who have fought so bravely for our rights and for our freedom.

Through our history conflict has touched the lives of Canadians of all ages, all races, all religions, and all regions. Fathers, mothers, sons, and daughters: they were killed in action, they were wounded, and thousands who returned home lived their lives with the physical and mental scars. We must remember and help those who served and continue to suffer.

This year we mark the 100th anniversary of the Battle of Passchendaele. It was another in the long list of battles that Canadians won where others had failed, but this victory came at a terrible cost, with thousands of Canadians losing their lives over the two-week battle.

We must also remember indigenous veterans. It is estimated that more than 12,000 indigenous people served in world wars I and II and the Korean War. Of those, more than 500 made the ultimate sacrifice, and none were treated with the equality at home that they enjoyed on the battlefield.

Each year it is my great honour to attend the Remembrance Day ceremony at the Military Museums in my constituency of Calgary-Elbow. Thousands of Albertans, young and old, come to pay tribute to veterans who have served overseas, veterans who have served their country at home and those who continue to serve.

To all of Canada's military men and women, thank you for your service. Lest we forget.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: Hon. members, before we start the clock, I would just make a request of the Leader of the Official Opposition. I could use your assistance. I continue to receive notes indicating that someone in the Official Opposition continues to say: tell the truth. I would ask for your assistance to find out if, in fact, that's true, and if it is, if you would ask that member to no longer do that.

Mr. Nixon: Happily, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: I recognize you for the first main question.

Provincial Fiscal Policies

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I know that the NDP want to avoid talking about their record, but here are some disturbing facts. According to Stats Canada Albertans' disposable income dropped a staggering 7.4 per cent in 2016, the NDP's first full year in office. Yes, we know that the drop in global energy prices hit our province hard, but this NDP government appears to have done everything in its power to make matters worse. When Albertans were already hurting, the NDP's response was to hike taxes. Given these devastating stats will the NDP admit their devastating mistakes and reverse their damaging tax hikes?

The Speaker: The hon. Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to talk about our plan and how it is working. We are working effectively to make sure that we get better value for our oil. We actually care about Albertans, and that's why we're working to make sure we get our pipelines built. You know what? Our plan is working. Just yesterday we learned that Chevron is investing up to a billion dollars more in the oil patch. Cenovus has more than doubled production this year, and the best one yet is to come. We will break the landlock, and we will get full value for our oil. Things are looking up.

Mr. Nixon: The NDP can try to shrug this off, but our neighbours in Saskatchewan, who were also hit by the drop in energy prices, only saw a disposable income drop of .8 per cent. This is not a coincidence, Mr. Speaker. The NDP have taxed our job creators, taxed income and property, and have also implemented the largest tax hike in Alberta's history, the job-killing carbon tax, which they never campaigned on and hid from Albertans. A simple question: do the NDP think that their ridiculous tax hikes increased or decreased Alberta's disposable income?

The Speaker: The hon. Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Let's talk about some facts. Most recent numbers show that Saskatchewan lost 4,000 jobs; Alberta gained 12,000 jobs. Projections keep showing that Alberta is the fastest growing economy anywhere in Canada, and I'm not going to apologize for that. I'm going to work hard to keep bringing those opportunities for growth and development to the province of Alberta. Members opposite keep cheering for its demise, but we stand up for Alberta, and we are getting results.

Mr. Nixon: Since the NDP took office, sadly over 52,000 private-sector jobs have been lost, but at the same time the public sector has increased by tens of thousands. While Albertans were taking massive pay cuts or losing their jobs entirely, the NDP increased government spending. We can't have a strong public sector, Mr. Speaker, without a vibrant private sector. That is just common sense. Will the NDP admit that its policies suppress private-sector activities, which in turn decrease government tax revenues, making the NDP debt crisis even worse? It's obvious.

Ms Hoffman: You know what I'll proudly admit, Mr. Speaker? That we moved forward to make sure that education and health care were funded so that when kids showed up to school, they had teachers, and when nurses went to work, they didn't get layoff slips in the mail. We're working hard to protect good jobs, not doing what the members opposite are calling for, which is 20 per cent cuts. That is not responsible or fair to anybody in the province of Alberta. We're working with the private sector. Investment is up, jobs are up, and we're protecting the public sector at the same time, something the members opposite want to gut.

The Speaker: The second main question.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this government has broken records on layoffs since they've been in government.

Carbon Levy and Fuel Costs

Mr. Nixon: Last week I drew attention to the fact that Albertans will soon face a 75 per cent tax on natural gas. In the middle of the winter the NDP are slapping Albertans with a massive, cruel tax on home heating. I've since heard from a number of Albertans that were shocked by this number. They weren't aware of how bad the NDP's tax on home heating actually will be. Does the NDP acknowledge the damage that their tax will have on Albertans and their families?

Ms Hoffman: I'm very happy to acknowledge that we brought in a cap on electricity rates, Mr. Speaker. The members opposite want to keep them skyrocketing; we want to make life more affordable. The members opposite want school fees to go up; we rolled them back 30 per cent. The members opposite want to lay off teachers and nurses; we're protecting those jobs and the services that they provide to the people of Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, I'd like to see some evidence actually tabled in this House from the member opposite, but I'll tell you that the real evidence is that things are looking up in Alberta. We're on the right track. The recovery hasn't hit everyone, but it certainly is looking up in the province of Alberta, and I'm so glad to be able to deliver as part of this government.

Mr. Nixon: The cap is actually double the original price, so thanks for nothing, Madam Minister.

The NDP are clearly trying to hide the reality of their tax hikes from Albertans' eyes. Albertans know that GST is 5 per cent. They see it on their receipts every day. Why not apply the same standard to natural gas? If the NDP is so proud of their carbon tax on natural gas, why not let Albertans know? Will the NDP require that the tax appear as a percentage of the retail price on Albertans' bills and stop hiding this tax increase from the good people of Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. On this side of the House we are proud. We're proud of Alberta, we're proud of our jobs, we're proud of the markets that we're accessing. After decades in Ottawa and decades with Conservatives here in Alberta, we weren't able to break the landlock. But we've got approvals under the NDP government to be able to break that landlock, bringing great economic opportunities to the people of Alberta and also helping them with their costs. This is really good news for the people of Alberta, and I wish the members opposite would get onboard.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the landlock was broken until under their leadership, and it got cancelled.

But let me repeat it again: a 75 per cent tax on home heating. Not a 75 per cent increase of the tax; a 75 per cent tax, period. Shame. When you buy $2 worth of natural gas, the NDP slap you with $1.50 worth of tax. I'm happy to table it. It's appalling, Mr. Speaker. I ask again: if the NDP are so proud of their carbon tax on home heating, why not make it clear on the bills, tell Albertans the truth, and stop hiding this from them?

Ms Hoffman: We're really proud of the fact that Albertans came up with a plan to protect and support Albertans. I know the members opposite love spending their time in Ottawa and focusing on Ottawa's policies, but here we're focused on Albertans, making sure that we get jobs for Albertans. That's why we got two pipelines approved, Mr. Speaker. We know the members opposite want them jeopardized. They think that these pipeline approvals shouldn't go through. They're cheering every day for them to fail. But on this side of the House we're standing up for Albertans, we're standing up for our plan, and we're going to get those pipelines built. You mark my words.

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky, you have guests here. I hope you won't disappoint them. I keep hearing your voice too loudly. I'm sure that won't happen again though, will it?

The third main question, I believe.

Carbon Levy Economic Impact

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This NDP government just doesn't get it when it comes to real-world impacts of their policies. Yesterday I told this House about a woman in my constituency whose life has been significantly impacted by the NDP carbon tax. Groceries and other household necessities are more expensive. Natural gas has skyrocketed, and the rebates just don't cover it. As a result, her modest fixed income doesn't go nearly as far as it used to and her quality of life has suffered. To the Premier: what do you have to say to this woman and to other seniors across the province whose lives have been made much worse by your policies?

The Speaker: The hon. Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, but I beg to differ. Even with the levy increase in January natural gas prices are still the lowest they've been in the last 10 years, less than half the rate they spiked to in the winter of 2014 and less than a third of the rate they reached in 2006 and again in 2008. We've got a system in place that we're working hard to provide stability to all Albertans, including seniors. I'm proud of that record, and I stand up for it. I wish the members opposite would stand with us.

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, the seniors in my riding are not liars. In less than two months the carbon tax is set to increase to 50 per cent, which means that the burden it places on Alberta families will also increase by 50 per cent. With so many struggling under the weight of this carbon tax, that the NDP didn't campaign on, Premier, your advice in the past to lessen the impacts of your carbon tax have been for Albertans to buy a new car or take the bus. What out-of-touch advice do you have for us this time?

Ms Hoffman: I've got a reality check for the members opposite, Mr. Speaker. Their leader, Jason Kenney, is arguing that we should be moving forward to a model more like B.C. or Saskatchewan. You know what happens to seniors in B.C.? They'd lose $230 a month because Jason Kenney's Conservatives would cut the Alberta seniors' benefit to match comparable rates. Two hundred and thirty dollars a month: that is not appropriate. Albertans receive more supports in this province than they do in our neighbouring provinces. We're proud to stand up for Albertans, protect their investments, and I'm really proud of the fact that about half of Alberta seniors are receiving the carbon levy rebate. That's going a long way to helping them make ends meet, and we're happy to do that.

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, it's so unfortunate that this government just doesn't get it while millions of Alberta families have been hit so hard by this carbon tax. Virtually everything that we spend money on, from electricity to fresh produce to our kids' hockey fees, has gone up as a result of this tax. On top of this Alberta families also have to contend with job loss and unemployment as an unintended consequence of this NDP tax. Again to the Premier: will you apologize for what your policies have put Albertans through and immediately suspend the upcoming carbon tax increase? And don't tell me it's gotten us any social licence.

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am very proud of the fact that on this side of the House we stand up for Albertans. We make sure that the 2,000 desperately needed long-term care and dementia care beds are getting built in this province. We protect health care. We protect education. We protect seniors' drug programs. Members opposite are calling for 20 per cent cuts to the very services that are designed to protect the people of this province, and I will not stand for that. I will stand up for the people of this province. They gave us that as our job. It's a promise we made to them during the election. Promise made, promise kept.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

School Transportation and Bell Times in Calgary

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In September I hosted a round-table in my constituency, talking with parents who are concerned about bus scheduling and bell time changes in Calgary. The Education ministry promised to follow up on a number of issues. We have not received the answers that were promised at the round-table. These parents went out of their way to give their advice and ask questions of the ministry and trusted the ministry's word when they said that they would hear back from them in a timely fashion. To the Minister of Education: where are the answers to their questions, and why is it taking so long to address their concerns?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, from September we've been working closely with the Calgary board of education – I have them under an operational review – where we were looking at, generally, their expenses but also specifically in regard to transportation. So, you know, we have made some advances, certainly, in regard to the congregated stops with them and putting more yellow buses on the road as well. We will continue to work closely with some of the new trustees and so forth and the Calgary board of education. I'd be happy to follow up on the information that the hon. member is specifically asking about.

Thank you.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's clear that the new busing system isn't working for kids or for parents. Both the CBE and the Minister of Education need to take responsibility for the untenable situation that's been created and start over. We haven't heard anything since the preliminary audit information was released on September 14, which needs to be complete in order to provide some answers to parents who are concerned over the chaos caused by busing and staggered bell times in Calgary. Why haven't we seen this report? Does the Education minister plan to release more information any time soon?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, it's very important that we work with the Calgary board of education closely. We have been doing so. Certainly, the operational review will continue on through this year so that we are looking for ways not just to build a better transportation system but looking at other operational issues. The Calgary board of education is our largest school board in the province and certainly does a great job in educating our kids, but there's always room for improvement. I'm looking forward to working with some of the new board members and so forth to make improvements and to ensure that kids are safe and getting the best education they can.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Second supplemental.

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Bill 1 had some serious unintended consequences, and the responsibility must be shared between both the ministry and the CBE. Earlier this fall the Alberta Party asked the minister to reset, complete the ministry audit, and try again next year. On September 14, when the preliminary audit results were released, the minister said that he hoped the CBE would have concrete solutions by Thanksgiving. Once more for the Minister of Education: has the CBE submitted solutions, and when can parents expect a resolution to these disruptive changes?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Bill 1, An Act to Reduce School Fees, did just that, more than $54 million going back into families' pockets. We're very proud of that. It's an act to reduce school fees, to make life more affordable for Alberta's families. Certainly, it had the two different things, between transportation and so forth and other decisions that the Calgary board of education made, that were separated from what we did in Bill 1, which was very, very successful. Again, we work closely in collaboration with the Calgary board of education, and the number one thing that we did was to make sure we put money in for funding. If you take away 20 per cent from education, all bets are off.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Calgary-Shaw.

Craft Breweries

Mr. Sucha: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Summer has officially ended and with it the ability to enjoy a delicious beverage outdoors at the establishment of your choosing. Many small businesses across the province prosper in part with the ability to sell liquor on patios and outdoor spaces. To the Ministry of Treasury Board and Finance: what previous barriers prevented small craft breweries from thriving in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Small businesses are the engine of our economy, and everybody knows that that engine is starting to fire on all cylinders as a result of our GDP growth this year in this province being 4 per cent. Our government has supported small businesses in this province with a one-third tax cut to the small-business tax rate. More restaurants can open their patio spaces without onerous reservations or red tape. Brewers in this province can sell their great products at farmers' markets and involve themselves in the community more often. While the opposition would keep onerous prohibition era laws, we are open...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. [interjections] Thank you, hon. minister.

First supplemental.

Mr. Sucha: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that I could barely hear the response because of the heckling about our small craft brewery industry and given that there are now three times as many craft breweries in Alberta than before our government took power, to the same minister: what are you doing to remove regulatory barriers to help encourage the industry?

The Speaker: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'll start with: beer is good. Our government has consistently stood up for small brewers in Alberta. It's undeniable that the craft sector has enjoyed tremendous growth. In the last year alone 18 new breweries have opened their doors, the largest year-over-year increase ever in this province. I hear constantly from brewers that our grant program is the reason they opened their doors, hired staff, and expanded production. Troubled Monk Brewery in Red Deer says that the grant is the government sending a message that we'd rather support our local businesses and brewers and employ Albertans than...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that we all know it takes more than just water to make good-quality beer – it takes hops, wheat, barley, and other agricultural products that Alberta already excels in producing – to the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry: in what ways does our craft brewing industry collaboratively work with our local producers?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and the member for the question. Here in Alberta we grow the best hops, wheat, and barley in the world. Our rural communities are benefiting from new local markets thanks to this government. The Village Brewery in Calgary, for example, has developed a direct relationship with the Alberta producers they buy from. That same kind of partnership exists and has been developed by Northern Girl Hops, who operates right in my constituency. This month the Alberta Hop Producers' Association will form because of the increased number of hop producers. I look forward to seeing this local industry continue to grow and create opportunities for Alberta's fine agriculture products.

2:10 Opioid Addiction Treatment for Youth

Mr. Fildebrandt: Mr. Speaker, the emergency opioid commission has determined that treating those currently addicted is beyond their scope. While preserving preventative measures that the commission put forward is a step in the right direction, we still need to help those who are in desperate need once they're addicted, just like the 17-year-old kid from my constituency that I spoke about last week. Excluding treatment is running off thousands of people who could still be saved. Could the minister please tell us why the commission believes that its mandate does not cover youth addictions treatment?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. When the commission reviewed the recommendations around expanding subsidized access for treatment, one of the key things that was found was that we were lacking enough treatment spaces and having enough prescribers across the province. As a result, the commission decided that we should first prioritize expanding the number of treatment spaces. We have done that. We've doubled the capacity in the Calgary region as well as expanded access with thousands of new spaces across the province.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Mr. Speaker, this year over 450 Albertans have died from opioid drug overdoses. Luckily, the 17-year-old from my constituency was saved in time. He was a good student who got addicted to prescription opioids after he was thrown from his horse and ended up on street drugs. Given that it cost his mother and father $18,000 out of pocket to get him the treatment that he needed because it simply wasn't available here in Alberta, will the minister please tell us: if not the commission, who is responsible for addressing youth opioid addictions treatment in Alberta?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are working with doctors across the province to increase access to prescription treatment for people suffering from an opioid-use disorder. We've also been working very closely around prescription guidelines for opioids so that patients such as the member opposite's constituent have the support that they need from their family doctor before their opioid prescription becomes a problem. There is more work to be done, and we are continuing to move forward.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that, but none of these measures are new.

This family came to me and told me that they don't want a penny of that $18,000 reimbursed to them by Alberta taxpayers. They told me instead to ensure that the next kid who finds themselves in this situation will have the resources that their son did not. Given that I made her a promise that I would do everything I could to honour her request, will the minister and government honour this mother's request by expanding the scope of the commission to find a remedy to this growing addictions treatment problem and make sure that this doesn't happen to another Alberta family?

The Speaker: The hon. associate minister.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. One of the key areas that the opioid commission is working on is how we can offer better supports for families who have a loved one who is struggling with opioid-use disorder. The commission is also looking at ways that we can continue to expand treatment across the province. We know that this is a very serious concern. This is an emergency unlike one we've ever faced before, and it is not going to be solved by pretending that this is not a medical condition. This is a serious issue that has many deep roots in inequality as well as concerns about how we treat people with . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Workers' Compensation Board Surplus Funds

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The WCB has chosen not to return $350 million of 2016 premium surpluses to employers, as per its long-term practice. Employers who pay the premiums knew that the accident fund was in surplus, so they were naturally expecting their rebates to arrive early in 2017, and it is now almost 2018. Minister, as the WCB has more than $10.5 billion in reserve, why does it need employer surplus money, too?

The Speaker: The Minister of Labour and democratic renewal.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Our government is working to make sure that all workers have the right to a safe, fair, and healthy work environment and as part of that has engaged in a review of the WCB, the first in 15 years, to make sure that there was a sustainable system that offered fair rehabilitation to all injured workers.

The WCB is governed by a board, and that board has made a decision to not return the surplus to employers at this time. We will work with the WCB and with employers as we review the panel report that has been submitted to us and make recommendations.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Gill: The board reports to you, Minister.

Given that this government claims that it has cut the business tax by 1 per cent, but it fails to confess that it has added far more in burdens such as the carbon tax, Bill 6, and increases to corporate taxes, and given that the carbon tax is clearly remaining in place for now and that it's going up again in a few months, which means we will have to liberate Albertans from it now, Minister, if you won't help businesses with your policies, will you at least return $350 million to business owners?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The member opposite is confused about the system. It is not a decision made by me or this government. We continue to work through the process that we've set out with the WCB. We are very interested in making sure that workers have access to fair rehabilitation when they need it. A system that, unfortunately, hadn't been reviewed in 15 years is shameful. We need to make sure that that system is sustainable. We need to make sure that it is there to protect workers. I think Jason Kenney and the conservatives want to make life harder for injured workers. We will be working with them.

The Speaker: Calgary-Greenway, you've got a second supplemental coming, but I want you to concentrate on listening because you were talking when the minister was giving her answer. Please proceed.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that $350 million is a lot of money and given that we know this government likes to buy Albertans with their own funds and that another thing we also know is that this NDP government is frightened about the Hon. Jason Kenney winning in Calgary-Lougheed and sitting in this very Chamber, Minister, is your government holding businesses' money so that it can release it during the by-election campaign?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I and all members on this side of the House look forward to talking to Jason Kenney directly about jobs being up, wages being up, manufacturing being up, retail sales being up. Our plan is working. We will continue to work for Albertans and with Albertans to make sure that all of the systems that they need are there to support them.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Calgary Southwest Ring Road Completion

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Construction on the $1.4 billion southwest Calgary ring road is well under way, but an environmental appeal has threatened its completion. The case has been before the Environmental Appeals Board since August, and a decision is still weeks away. To the Minister of Transportation: how much of the project has been completed to date? Please answer in terms of a percentage.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I can tell the hon. member that the schedule is well under way, that we are slightly ahead of schedule on the completion of this road. We have looked very carefully at the stay that was brought in, that he mentions. It will not delay construction. We are working to complete that project well ahead of schedule, and we will do that.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that I do not have to remind the minister that if the road is not completed by May of 2022 the land reverts to the Tsuut'ina Nation and given that the province lost valuable construction time this summer due to a court delay and that we cannot afford any further delay if it is to be finished before the deadline, to the Transportation minister: how will you ensure, one way or the other, that the southwest Calgary ring road is built on time?

2:20

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The member acknowledges the deal that was signed by the Transportation minister who is now the whip for his party and that if the road is not completed within seven years, the land reverts back to the Tsuut'ina and they get to keep the $360 million and all the land at Bragg Creek. That was a deal that I inherited when I became the minister, and I have been working diligently to make sure that we get this project completed ahead of time. On time isn't good enough; we need to make it go really fast.

The Speaker: Thank you.
First supplemental.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you. Given that when you became Transportation minister, the project was ready to roll and now it hangs in the balance and given that there is great urgency for this government to act decisively, to the minister: will you promise us today that this ring road will be finished on time?

Mr. Mason: Not only will I promise that it will be finished on time, Mr. Speaker; I promise that we will finish it ahead of schedule.

Government Announcements and Advertising during Election Periods

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the United Conservative caucus has pressed this government repeatedly on when they'd be calling a by-election to provide Jason Kenney the opportunity to fight for a seat in this House. While they've yet to give us a straight answer, we also have some very serious concerns about underhanded, cheap political tricks that the NDP may use during the upcoming by-election, including government funding announcements. This is the exact type of policy that the government used to fight against while they were in opposition, but they've neglected to make any changes to the law. Will the Premier commit today that this government will not make any funding announcements in the upcoming by-election in due course?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As the minister responsible for democratic renewal talking about changes to our Election Act and election financing is my responsibility. I'm very proud that our government has done such important things like banning corporate and union donations, making sure we have spending caps. We will be discussing banning government advertising or rules around government advertising that make sense during elections and by-elections. Making sure that we have a fair, democratic system is very important, not trying to find loopholes and get money in the back door.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, given that last year this government used hard-earned tax dollars to subsidize their own political advertising and given that the NDP was found in contempt of Parliament for illegal advertising, we all know that they have an unquenchable thirst for government advertising even if it breaks the rules. Will the Premier commit today to stopping all government announcements and advertising during the upcoming by-election, and when can we expect some transparency, including laws, that would prevent government advertising? [interjections]

The Speaker: Government House Leader, your side of the House as well.

Mr. Mason: Sorry, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. When talking about important issues like this, protecting our democracy, it's very important that we understand the issues at play. What the member opposite seems to be asking for is for the government to stop communicating with Albertans at all during any by-election or election. I think that that is a step too far. [interjections] We need to take a measured approach, and we need to do that as we have done with all things, like banning corporate and union donations, making sure that there are reasonable spending limits, and giving democracy back to Albertans.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, there is no bigger money than government money in politics, and we just heard that the minister wants to use it in the upcoming by-election to advertise government programs. [interjections] Will the minister commit to stopping all government announcements and government advertising during the upcoming by-election, that will clearly favour the government?

Speaker's Ruling Decorum

The Speaker: Hon. members, you may remember – I believe it was yesterday – that I reminded you that in any event where one single member in this House was victimized by a group and not treated with respect, I'm going to call and name some people. So please respect each other and just don't as a massive group in any way detract them from their job to serve not only in this House but also in this government. Please.

Government Announcements and Advertising during Election Periods (continued)

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, it was pretty interesting to hear the other side talk about cheap political tricks. Why, I remember in – where was it? – Calgary-Elbow, where a school announcement went out, and that school announcement happened to coincide with the former . . .

Mrs. Pitt: You were in government.

Ms Jansen: Exactly. And why do you think I'm over here now?

You know, Mr. Speaker, I can honestly tell you that anything they're complaining about on the other side should be done with a bit of sheepishness because they wrote the book on that kind of behaviour.

Mrs. Pitt: You did. You did.

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Airdrie.

Ms Jansen: I can honestly say that when they talk about dark money, PAC money in this . . .

The Speaker: Thank you.

Carbon Levy and Forest Industry Costs

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, I reference a FOIPed document from Ag and Forestry titled Advice to Premier: Summary of Carbon Levy Impacts to Forest Products Industry. Within it is expressed concern that the carbon tax affects all major stages of the supply chain of forestry, which consumes fossil fuels of all types. Premier, despite attempts by this side to provide amendments that would have seen exemptions for forestry operations in which those fuels are used, you ignored our suggestions and advice from your own department. Why did you do that?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. I'm very proud of our forestry industry right across Alberta. It supports close to 20,000 jobs. It continues to be very prosperous, very sustainable. It continues to be so. As a matter of fact, they have near-record profits this year. You know, the member is questioning that they're somehow burdened by the carbon levy. When I talk to the forest industry, what I hear is: what can they do; what can they do to do their part to help with the greenhouse gas emissions reductions?

Mr. Schneider: Given that it takes fuels such as gasoline and diesel and propane and natural gas in order to harvest, log, and transport trees to the mill and given that trees need to enter the manufacturing process and then the finished product can be shipped to market and given that Alberta's forest product manufacturing is an export-oriented business competing in a global commodity market, Premier, what has your government done to help this situation of increased cost to the forestry business as a result of your carbon tax?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Again, the forestry industry has had a very good year, even with the challenges around international markets. On those international markets both the Minister of Economic Development and Trade and I have been going on trade missions to promote all our products in Alberta, agriculture and forestry. I can tell you that those products are respected around the world. We're continuing that good work to make sure that all world markets can appreciate the good products we grow right here in Alberta.

Mr. Schneider: Given that this industry, like so many that are struggling through the economic devastation caused by this government's ideological agenda, cannot continue to pass on costs to their customers that the increase forces upon them and given that this is confirmed by the internal document, which, unfortunately, is mostly made up of an industry analysis that has been redacted, Premier, will you admit that your government didn't think before it acted and postpone your reckless pursuit of a $30-per-tonne carbon tax until a proper economic assessment is completed, or are you already sitting on one?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

2:30

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. We had some very good news earlier this year that there is an OSB plant that's going to reopen. They're reopening because the markets are good. They're reopening because the policies of this government have allowed them to continue to be sustainable, continue to pursue those markets. I'm proud of the work we do. I'm proud of the work our department does, our professional foresters do. I'm proud of our industry, and I'm very proud to continue to support it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Provincial Fiscal Sustainability

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Canada's Parliamentary Budget Officer took an extraordinary step recently of sending a strong warning to Alberta that its current fiscal policies are unsustainable. This NDP government was told that it must provide corrective action to avoid creating a fiscal hole so deep that it will force higher taxes and drastic spending cuts on future Albertans. The minister's response: a dismissive shrug. To the Finance minister. The Premier won't give a responsible answer. Will you?

Mr. Ceci: You know, when we look at the plan this government has brought in, Mr. Speaker, that plan is working. We will lead the country in economic growth this year and next year. We are firing on all cylinders after the deepest recession in two years. We've inherited a big hole from the previous government. They did not save money. They had deficits, deficits, deficits. We're turning the corner in this province. We're getting us back to balance in 2023.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the Parliamentary Budget Officer's forecasts are not science fiction and given that the minister's are, since he actually had no net debt when he came into government, so he's not giving us the facts – in fact, the forecast from the Parliamentary Budget Officer looked at 2022, 2028, and lots of short-term increments – and given that this government will have a $60 billion debt by the time the next election comes around and that, in fact, by 2041 it will be $10 billion a year in interest payments alone, to the minister: will you actually deal with the facts instead of ignoring them? You're even being warned by Ottawa . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Mr. Ceci: Mr. Speaker, the facts are clear. This province is going to grow fastest in the country. We are addressing the short-term problems. We're investing in this province. People are getting back to work in the thousands. We led western provinces with 12,000 net new jobs last month. People are coming back. They're working. Investment is occurring. We're going to get back in the saddle.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, given that it all looks good when you're spending as fast as you can until the money runs out – I'm sure it feels good right now to the minister – and given that the former Saskatchewan NDP Finance minister has warned the minister and given that, judging by the Premier's popularity ratings, Albertans are also severely concerned about the damaging effect of this NDP government's ideological fiscal policies, to the minister: do you and the Premier honestly believe that you're right and everybody else in the world is wrong?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much. You know, the Conservatives seem to have the same answer for everything, but it doesn't work, Mr. Speaker. You can't cut your way to prosperity. We're seeing that in Saskatchewan right now. You have to invest in the future. We're doing that, and it's working. Retail sales are up. Manufacturing is up. Drilling is up. Car sales are up. I know Jason Kenney doesn't like it, but Alberta is looking up.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Premier's Council on the Status of Persons with Disabilities

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In 2017, for the first time in a very long time, the Premier's Council on the Status of Persons with Disabilities has 15 members from across Alberta representing diverse communities and disabilities of all kinds. We have service providers, advocates, and a government MLA. The primary function of this council is to provide advice to the Ministry of Community and Social Services and the government in order to create legislation, policy, and regulations that are inclusive of all abilities as much as possible. To the Minister of Community and Social Services: please share with Albertans a working example of this council's advice on how it will enhance inclusivity for people with disabilities.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. We are proud to have appointed a very talented, incredible group of people to this council. We have appointed Sheila Serup, Cam Tait, Darby Lee Young, Cheryl Cunningham-Burns, Alison Cutknife, Stephanie Myrick, Shino Nakane, Ann Nicol, Neil Pierce, Nabeel Ramji, Inara Samoylove, Cathy Smith, John te Linde, and Regan Treewater-Lipes. We look forward to working with them to make sure that we get the disabilities file right.

The Speaker: Thank you, Minister.
First supplemental.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of the many new members appointed to the Premier's Council on the Status of Persons with Disabilities, there are four people who are also members of the consultation team for the PDD safety standards review. Would the minister please explain why those appointments were made?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Just to add another name, a very credible name: the hon. member who's asking me the question, the Member for St. Albert.

The reason, Mr. Speaker, we appointed those four people is because the review the consultation team did was exemplary and, in fact, groundbreaking in terms of how we reached out to the communities. That's why we have appointed them. Through their expertise, by working with them, we will make sure that persons with all abilities have the opportunities to be successful and meaningfully included . . .

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On December 3 we will celebrate the International Day of Persons with Disabilities with people from around the world. In Alberta the council will lead the celebrations by supporting community events and awards recognizing individual and community efforts. To the same minister: why is it vital that we continue to recommit to the UN declaration on the rights of persons with disabilities?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As government we believe in a province that is inclusive of Albertans of all abilities. That is why we are absolutely committed to protecting and advocating for the rights of persons with disabilities. That is why we have increased the supports for persons with disabilities instead of decreasing them. On that side of the House their plan is to cut 20 per cent from those supports. Some of them – for instance, the Member for Calgary-Hays – call these supports giveaways.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Tourism Destination Marketing Funds

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Hotels all over this province are concerned that changes to the Municipal Government Act and city charters will strip their ability to work together to grow tourism through voluntary destination marketing funds. Hotels are rightly concerned that if cities are allowed to administer destination marketing funds, local governments could redirect funds from their intended purpose of growing tourism to general revenues, as now occurs with the provincial tourism levy. Will the tourism minister assure industry that destination marketing funds will not be co-opted as a source of municipal revenue?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Culture and Tourism.

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. I'm very proud of the work that we're doing within the tourism industry because we know that it creates the kinds of jobs that put food on the table and pay mortgages. We know that it's a resilient sector of the economy. We're going to continue working with our industry partners to ensure that we can promote tourism in this province, continue the visitation in our province, including promoting LGBTQ travellers to this province as well. I understand the concerns that are being raised. It's something that we will continue to work on with our partners.

Thank you.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the industry fears that if control of destination marketing funds is given over to municipalities, voluntary fees will become a mandatory tax, bureaucracy and administration costs will increase, and accountability and transparency to the industry will disappear, why is the Minister of Municipal Affairs writing ministry of tourism bills, and who is going to ensure that destination marketing funds remain effective, nimble, and efficient for tourism and for attracting visitors to Alberta?

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. DMFs are actually a municipal jurisdiction. We're going to continue working with our partners to ensure that we have the best products in this province to offer to attract more travellers and ensure that this resilient part of the economy continues to grow.

Thank you.

2:40

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Hotels are very concerned that any talks about destination marketing funds are not being led by the Minister of Culture and Tourism. Given that this government claims that they want to champion tourism as an engine of economic growth and diversification, why has the Minister of Culture and Tourism not been a part of this conversation directly, and how will he stand up for the tourism industry he represents, or is the DMF just a sacrificial lamb for the MGA?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Miranda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very proud of the work that we do with the DMFs around the province. They know their regions best. They are able to promote their regions by collecting the voluntary fees that are being given through the DMF levy. We're going to continue working with them to ensure that we have the best tourism products in this province, that we can promote this province, that we have continued air service to our province. We will have ongoing dialogue with our partners, including the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Thank you.

Teck Resources Frontier Oil Sands Project

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, yesterday I tabled an Alberta Energy report from Jacobs Consultancy that laid bare the Carnegie oil-climate index as junk science slandering future investment in the oil sands. Now the federal government has granted an eight-month delay to the joint panel reviewing the $20 billion Frontier oil sands mine proposed by Teck Resources. To the Minister of Energy: did you stand up for the industry and object to Ottawa holding up the investment?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. First of all, I'd like the opportunity to clarify that the report that was referred to in that question yesterday was a report that was ordered by our previous government at a time when oil was very high.

You know, we work every day for the oil industry, and we will continue to do so. In addition to new projects, we have many projects that are onboard right now. Suncor just announced one recently. Cenovus, CNRL, Chevron: they're all coming onboard.

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, given that we have eight mines already producing safely in the Athabasca oil sands and in compliance with the Alberta Energy Regulator for decades and given that the joint panel reviewing Teck's project has seen all this before and will see this all again, to the Minister of Energy. The joint panel was already given a three-month extension, now another eight months. Jobs and the business reputation of the province are at risk. Isn't it time to cut the red tape and get on with it?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, we've said time and time again that things are looking up here in Alberta. Jobs are up in the oil industry, wages are up in the oil industry, drilling is up, and so is production. That's because there's confidence in Alberta energy, and we're continuing. The work doesn't end. What I can say is that the reckless rhetoric coming from that side and the risky plan that they propose are only going to hold Alberta energy back. We're not going to let that happen. We're standing up for our Alberta energy folks.

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, given the number of cancelled projects in Alberta since the NDP came to power and given that the NDP's risky ideological policies have chased investors to Saskatchewan, North Dakota, and Texas, has the government learned any lessons, or will you stand on the sidelines and quietly watch the potential cancellation of this $20 billion project, as you watched Energy East and Northern Gateway?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know what? I'm not going to talk about potential cancellations of things. I'm going to talk about what's going on right now. Line 3 is currently under construction. If you go out to Hardisty, you can go see that. Make no mistake; we're working hard for Trans Mountain. Make no mistake; that pipeline will be built.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds we'll start with Members' Statements.

Members' Statements

Cochrane Cenotaph

Mr. Westhead: Mr. Speaker, on Saturday Albertans will gather at cenotaphs across the province to honour the courage and sacrifice of our veterans and those who continue to serve our country. This year's Remembrance Day in Cochrane will be made even more significant thanks to the efforts of the Cochrane Legion and the entire community, that made significant contributions to the town's cenotaph enhancement project.

Just in time for Canada's sesquicentennial and the Legion's 90th year, in late October Her Honour the Honourable Lois Mitchell and His Honour Doug Mitchell visited Cochrane to witness the unveiling of a life-sized bronze statue of a Canadian First World War soldier at the current Cochrane cenotaph to stand guard over the memorial. The bronze statue, unveiled by Her Honour and Cochrane Mayor Jeff Genung, is from the foundry of local artists Don Begg and Shirley Stephens-Begg of Studio West bronze foundry and is truly remarkable and impressive in every sense.

Thanks also to Todd Puzey for conceiving this vision to create a more welcoming space for visitors to the cenotaph park. The park is intended to be used and enjoyed as a place of reflection and as a landmark in the community.

Last week I was pleased to present a cheque for $25,000 to Legion First Vice-president Mr. David Usherwood from the community facility enhancement program towards the cenotaph revitalization project. These enhancements to Cochrane's cenotaph are a significant milestone in the town's already rich history. They also help us renew our gratitude towards those who stand guard for our country, the injured, and those who made the ultimate sacrifice.

In Flanders fields we will remember them. Lest we forget.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Silver Alert Program for Persons with Dementia

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In 2016 over 500,000 Albertans were aged 65 and older, accounting for about 12 per cent of the total population. This number is expected to almost double by 2035, with further growth expected beyond that. By 2041 it is expected that almost 1 in every 5 Albertans will be 65 years or older. A decline in cognitive functioning is associated with aging, and the risk of dementia doubles every five years after the age of 65.

In Calgary the Alzheimer Society estimates that more than 13,000 individuals are living with Alzheimer's disease or related dementias and that for every person diagnosed, 10 to 12 people are directly impacted. A significant concern associated with cognitive decline and dementia is wandering. The Alzheimer's Association indicates that 6 out of 10 people with dementia will wander.

I would like to highlight a community-based response in Calgary that holds much promise for the rest of the province. A steering committee was organized to host conversations with key stakeholders to gauge the interest and capacity to develop a missing-seniors response for the city. This group is developing a framework for the community area's silver alert program. Dr. Liu and her team from the U of A and the Seniors Advocate, Dr. Sheree Kwong See, have been involved to pilot the program in Calgary. This strategy addresses both prevention and education to ensure that we learn more about the needs of seniors. I would like to commend all those involved in developing this made-in-Alberta approach.

The bill that I will be introducing this afternoon will provide a provincial framework that will support community efforts to protect our vulnerable seniors.

Thank you.

Remembrance Day

Mrs. Littlewood: Mr. Speaker, this Saturday, November 11, at 11 a.m. Alberta will join countries across our Commonwealth to remember those that fought and still fight and those that made the ultimate sacrifice defending our rights and our freedoms.

At Tofield school yesterday, under the guidance of Tofield Legion branch president Barbara Ferguson, I was reminded how important education is in telling the stories of those that have fought and died defending us. Students wrote poetry and created art as a means to tap into our past and connect with the present.

We were joined by Master Corporal Wilkins. She was asked by some: how do we show gratitude? And she said: just say thank you. Simple thanks is the least we can show for those who choose to enlist not for pride or glory but because they love their country.

Sombre milestones are being remembered this year, Canada's 150th: 100 years since the Battle of Vimy Ridge and the Battle of Passchendaele, 75 years since the Dieppe Raid. These battles earned Canada a lasting place in the memory of grateful nations. In more recent history we remember combat in places like Kapyong in North Korea and Kabul and Kandahar in Afghanistan.

Today I'd like to also thank the Royal Canadian Legion and its members for their leadership in Remembrance Day ceremonies everywhere and for their service year-round: raising money through the poppy campaign for those not properly provided for with federal government benefits and, on lighter days, fundraising through meat draws, hosting steak suppers and dart tournaments, and supporting our cadet programs. Their presence is felt throughout our communities.

So I want to thank all our veterans and all those serving in our military and all of our Legions for their service, past, present, and future. No government will ever be truly worthy of our military and their sacrifice. Let us forget.

King Bhumibol Adulyadej of Thailand

Ms McKittrick: Mr. Speaker, I am wearing black today in memory of a great king and father of the Thai nation. His Majesty King Bhumibol Adulyadej, the ninth king of the Chakri dynasty, passed away peacefully in Bangkok on October 13, 2016, at the age of 89 in the 70th year of His Majesty's reign. He was the longest reigning monarch in the world. Following Buddhist rites, His Majesty's cremation was performed on October 26, 2017, in an elaborate ceremony at Sanam Luang in Bangkok. Albertans with roots in Thailand can be found in all parts of the province, and members of the Thai community in Alberta have been in mourning since the death of His Majesty.

In 1964, when I first lived in Thailand, I heard about the work of His Majesty. It was when I returned twice again to work in community development that I truly came to understand his legacy, for this was no ordinary king and certainly not the kind you find in fairy tales living a regal life of pleasure and luxury. This was a king who was dedicated to serving his people from the very first day that he ascended the throne till the very last days of his existence.

His Majesty travelled widely throughout Thailand, meeting with his people in order to understand their problems and seek solutions. I remember nearly daily seeing pictures of His Majesty sitting with Thai farmers, labourers, and office workers, listening and taking notes. His Majesty the king worked hard to ensure that all Thais had enough to support themselves. His Majesty also sponsored numerous economic and community development projects using his own funds. In his long reign the king witnessed many changes in his beloved country, but through it all he maintained a stabilizing, moral leadership.

The passing of His Majesty comes as an immense loss to the Thai nation. My condolences to the Alberta Thai community and to the people of Thailand. [Remarks in Thai]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Reconciliation between Indigenous and Nonindigenous Peoples

Dr. Swann: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. For nine months I've been part of the Ministerial Panel on Child Intervention, which seeks to understand how government action and inaction may have contributed to harm or death of children taken from their birth families and what we can do to improve it. Indigenous children make up over two-thirds of those brought into child intervention, consistent with the family disruptions that we heard about two years ago in the mental health review. Likewise, indigenous people are overrepresented in the criminal justice system, the homeless population, and the health system.

The final report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada revealed the terrible genocidal policies, intergenerational trauma, and residential schools, with the inescapable cycles of family breakup, poverty, violence, and mental illness. Indigenous people have a better chance of breaking these cycles when they have adequate, culturally appropriate services, are involved in decisions affecting them and their families, and when they recover their own cultural identity. This requires real collaboration between the federal and provincial governments and ministries.

The mental health review also heard that our mainstream Canadian culture is also producing more and more mental distress and addictive behaviour in our own children and families. Some experts point to our individualistic, competitive, and money-focused society as contributing. Indigenous communities acknowledge that they need healing. It is now time that our western culture, in humility, acknowledge the same. Indigenous people value community, sharing, and Earth care. More of these values are clearly needed in our western culture.

Reconciliation means the exchange of positive values in the spirit of humility to replace and repair the negative stereotypes that continue to damage both our cultures. Our western indigenous cultures got to where we are in the 21st century together, and we must find a way to move forward and heal together. After all, we are all treaty people.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Fall of the Berlin Wall 28th Anniversary

Mr. Fildebrandt: On November 11 we will mark Remembrance Day. Remembrance Day this year hits particularly close to home for many in Strathmore after the passing of George Freeman on November 6. George was a community leader, a war hero, and, like my maternal great-grandfather, a D-Day veteran.

But today, November 9, is also an important day for us to mark. Today marks the 28th anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall. The Berlin Wall stood as the greatest symbol of oppression and tyranny for the latter half of the 20th century. Most walls are meant to keep an enemy out, but like a prison, the Berlin Wall was built to keep a people in, from escaping to a better life in the free and democratic and capitalist west. It stood as a visible and daily reminder that communism is slavery.

While many, including my family, risked their lives to flee the communist east, the Berlin Wall fell without firing a shot 28 years ago today. The will of free men and free women to live in unity, justice, and freedom – “Einigkeit und Recht und Freiheit” – proved more powerful than the will of the Red Army and the Socialist Unity Party to cling to power. The peaceful fall of the wall was part of a chain reaction that saw communist dictatorships across the world fall. Never in world history have so many people gone from slavery to freedom in such a short period of time.

Nations that do not have to fight for their liberty become complacent and too easily bargain it away for small comforts. Benjamin Franklin is often misquoted as saying: any society that would give up a little liberty to gain a little security will deserve neither and lose both.

Let us be grateful that our generation has not been called upon to defend freedom as those of our fathers, but let us not forget the sacrifice that they made for our freedoms and be ever watchful against trading it away for small comforts piece by piece.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’m rising to give notice that pursuant to Standing Order 34(3) Written Question 18 will be dealt with on the next available Monday.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Bill 210

Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I beg leave of the House to introduce Bill 210, the Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017.

This bill is patterned on the Amber Alert system already in place in Alberta, creating a silver alert system, which enables a notice to be issued when a senior citizen or other adult with cognitive impairment, a mental disorder, or a medical condition which may result in them being particularly vulnerable goes missing. The idea behind this is to ensure that when an individual goes missing, if this situation is deemed to be critical and they are in medical danger, the relevant authorities would have more tools to return that individual to safety.

I would not have been able to bring this bill forward without the fantastic individuals seated in the public gallery who I introduced earlier – Dr. Liu from the University of Alberta and Dr. Kwong See, the Alberta Seniors Advocate – along with Raymond Swonek and Irene Martin-Lindsay from the Alberta Seniors Communities and Housing Association. All of these individuals were integral to making this bill a reality, and I extend my most sincere thanks to all of them.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 210 read a first time]

The Speaker: The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to request unanimous consent to waive section 7(7) and continue with the Routine past 3 p.m. today.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Tabling Returns and Reports

Mr. Dach: Mr. Speaker, I’m pleased to table five copies of an article from the Edmonton Sun dated August 28, 2016, which I referenced this morning during debate on Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances. Specifically, I referenced Mr. Kenney’s answer to the question, “If you could have one super power, what would it be?” to which Mr. Kenney answered, “To be able to go back in time.” I believe that trip back in time will be in a little blue truck with the transmission firmly welded into reverse gear, eyes firmly glued on the rear-view mirror, careening into the ditch . . .

The Speaker: Okay, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’m pleased to table five copies of ATB Financial’s economics and research team’s publication the Owl entitled Wage Increases Show Momentum. It shows that things are looking up in Alberta with wages up, and it states that the weekly take-home pay of employed Albertans grew to $1,134, with wages up in mining, quarrying, oil and gas, finance, and insurance.

I have a second tabling.

The Speaker: Go ahead.

Mrs. Littlewood: My second tabling is five copies of the policy resolution, referred to this morning by the Minister of Infrastructure, from the PC convention last November that pledges to out gay kids in schools, supported by Team Kenney.

The Speaker: The President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table a number of tablings today. The first is five copies of the Horse Racing Alberta 2016 annual report. The horse-racing industry is thriving thanks to our government’s long-term commitment to the industry, and I’m pleased to report that thoroughbred racing has returned to Calgary. I was pleased to see it this past weekend live and win a bet.

Next, Mr. Speaker, I’m pleased to table five copies of the Alberta Securities Commission annual report 2017. I’m pleased to continue to support the local Alberta-led regulator that meets the unique needs of Alberta’s capital markets.

Next, I’m pleased to table five copies of the Alberta Capital Finance Authority annual reports for 2014, ’15, and ’16, Mr.

Speaker. As members will see, our government is pleased to continue supporting municipalities, school boards, and local entities like our airports with flexible funding for capital projects at a very reasonable cost.

Mr. Speaker, I'm very pleased to table five copies of the judges and masters in chambers pension plans reports for 2013-14, '14-15, and '15-16.

I'm very pleased to table my last report, five copies of the Alberta Gaming and Liquor Commission 2016-17 annual report and 2016-17 Year at a Glance, Mr. Speaker. As this Chamber knows well, our local brewing industry is thriving. Since the changes our government has brought forward, we've added 18 new breweries this year alone. This is the single largest year-over-year increase in Alberta's history, and I'm very proud of the grain-to-glass culture we're building in Alberta. As I said before, beer is good.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Stony Plain.

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to table five copies of ATB Financial's economics and research team's Owl publication entitled Drilling Activity to Provide Lift to Economic Growth. This shows that things are looking up here in Alberta. In the report it states that "the latest drilling data . . . shows that Alberta's energy sector will be central to . . . the province's return to growth" and that "as of August, the total number of developmental wells drilled in the province was up 129 per cent."

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

Mr. Carson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to table five copies of BMO's provincial monitor entitled Sunny Skies. It shows that things are looking up in Alberta. In the report it states: "Alberta's economy has returned to growth, and could potentially lead the country this year at 4.1%." In the same report it downgrades Saskatchewan's GDP forecast to just 1.7 per cent.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to rise also to table five copies of a memorandum to the minister from January 17, 2017. This is a federal memorandum discussing the potential impacts of carbon pricing on the primary agricultural sector. Its purpose is "to provide a preliminary assessment of the financial impacts on the primary agricultural sector from the implementation of the announced pan-Canadian pricing on carbon emissions." I think it's absolutely relevant to the carbon-taxing regime here in Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the requisite number of copies of a document to which I referred yesterday in my speech on Bill 24. It's dated November 2 and entitled GSA Bill Provides Important Clarity. This is from the Alberta Teachers' Association, and just a short quote from President Jeffery who says, "Teachers will be able to point to the law and tell students and parents clearly [that] student privacy, safety and security comes first," and President Jeffery is "calling for all-party support for the bill."

The Speaker: Hon. members, I am tabling a memorandum I received yesterday from the Government House Leader advising of a printing error in connection with Bill 27, the Conflicts of Interest Amendment Act, 2017, which incorrectly named the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General as the sponsor but should have named the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance. He further confirms that printed copies of the corrected bill are to be distributed prior to this afternoon's proceedings and that the content of the bill has not changed apart from the correction of the name of the sponsor.

I would also like to table five copies of the 2016-17 Public Interest Commissioner fourth annual report, which was received in my office on November 8, 2017.

Finally, I would like to table five copies of the 2016-17 Alberta Ombudsman's 50th anniversary annual report and five copies of the office of the Ethics Commissioner of Alberta 2016-17 annual report, received in my office also on November 8.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of the hon. Ms Phillips, Minister of Environment and Parks and minister responsible for the climate change office, the Ministry of Environment and Parks environmental protection security fund annual report, April 1, 2016, to March 31, 2017.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I would like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 24

An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. I did want to get on the record, as I missed the opportunity in second reading. Our caucus will enthusiastically support the bill with some reservations and some comments about how we would like to have seen things roll out in a more constructive way.

Historically, we're extremely proud of our pivotal role as a Liberal caucus in forcing the hand of the former PC government on GSAs. That's why we support this legislation, which supplements and builds on the Alberta Liberal's original vision for GSAs under former MLA Laurie Blakeman, entitled Bill 202, Safe and Inclusive Schools Statutes Amendment Act, 2014. We might not be here today had we passed that original bill because it addressed this issue in the original bill. Unfortunately, this was taken over by the PCs and watered down in order to be more palatable to their members and their constituents, I presume.

GSAs became mandatory in schools where students request them, and those steadfastly opposed have used a variety of means to skirt the law. The issues now relative to some schools not complying with the GSA legislation would have been avoided through the passage of the Alberta Liberal original GSA bill. The government is right to ensure that school boards follow both the spirit and the letter of the law by closing loopholes and giving the minister more tools to enforce the law.

GSAs unquestionably save lives and have been shown to reduce bullying for the entire school population where they have been implemented. It is therefore imperative that students wanting a GSA at their school are not denied the opportunity to create one.

We know that outing kids before they're ready, even if well intentioned, puts them at risk of family ostracism, self-harm, homelessness, and even suicide. If those aren't reason enough to legislate a student's right to privacy in regard to sexuality and gender identity, then I don't know what is. If there's a risk of students being outed by school officials on account of their membership in a GSA, it could very well mean the end of these groups because kids won't feel safe.

It's been suggested that Bill 24 is little more than a pre-emptive public relations strike by the current government, aimed at highlighting how extreme Jason Kenney is on this issue. From the perspective of the Alberta Liberals, the measures proposed in Bill 24 are warranted, notwithstanding the NDP-Jason Kenney political circus.

Jason Kenney has repeatedly raised the spectre of children as young as five years old participating in GSAs and school officials not being permitted to engage their parents. This is a red herring and detracts from the real issue here, which is protecting LGBTQ youth.

For its part, this current government would do well to tone down its hyperpartisan attacks on Mr. Kenney and start doing a better job of explaining why this legislation is necessary. Saying "Jason Kenney is the reason" is hardly good public policy and only reaffirms in the minds of many that this bill is more about politics than substance.

The NDP is also being heavy handed in their approach and dismissive of parents, school boards, and faith communities who are struggling to come to terms with this new reality. It is a little bit reminiscent of the poor rollout of Bill 6.

Having said all that, Madam Chair, I'm certainly prepared to support the bill, as I know many are in this House and across Alberta. It's part of our new age. It's part of a new reality and a new awareness of evidence and a new acceptance that the LGBTQ community has been marginalized, vilified, and in some ways damaged because of past policies and the lack of sensitivity across our society, including schools. So this is progress. It's not easy, but let's get on with it and help schools and communities and faith groups come to grips with what is an essential part of moving into the 21st century.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park.

Cortes-Vargas: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's an honour to rise and to speak to Bill 24 in Committee of the Whole. I was making a few comments beforehand, but I think it's important to clear up and to clarify the importance of Bill 24 and the specific sections of it that really do make a difference and have been a part of addressing and seeing the implementation of Bill 10.

Of course, that starts with ensuring that the policies under section 45.1 of the School Act affirm the rights of the students and staff provided in the Alberta Human Rights Act and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I think that that in itself is an important step that was there, and it provides clarification both for the students and the staff. I think that is an important part of this discussion.

I have some comments that I'll do later, but they're in regard to all of these, so I'll read these out. I think another section that is extremely important is to protect the students that join the GSA. I think this is a big part of the conversation. Of course, we had an amendment that was brought forward. One of the reasons that that section in Bill 24 exists is to clarify that the voluntary student associations, including GSAs, are not subject to the notification requirements. I think that that fundamentally is part of what we're doing here today and why it's so important. I think it's also part of the overall, broader societal conversation as to: how do we bring forward this conversation about protecting LGBTQ students? What does it look like for parental involvement and making sure that everyone is part of this process?

I think the last part that I wanted to just point out is protecting the establishment of the GSAs from political interference. I think one of those comes in the amending of section 16.1 of the School Act. I think that what it does is to clarify the role of school authorities and the principals. I think this is really important because when a student is asking for a GSA, it shouldn't be on them to go through the burden of figuring out what it takes to get this GSA started. I think the professionals involved need to have a clear understanding of what their role is in that process and make sure that they make it as easy as possible for that GSA to begin and that it doesn't get stuck in the processes back and forth, in having to discuss with the broader board if this GSA is going to be possible. It's very clearly articulated in Bill 10 that if a student asks for a GSA, they should be able to start one up. I think that what we've seen in some examples are delays for various reasons, for lack of clarity, and I think it is important to move forward on a bill that really identifies who's in charge of what and what they need to do.

It brings me to the section where we talk about the timelines that principals are expected to work around when creating GSAs. The last one confirming – and this is, again, something that the member previous to me had mentioned. The previous Bill 202 actually already had this, which is making sure that the students have the right to name the organization a GSA and a QSA.

I think that a personal pet peeve of mine and, I know, of many members of the LGBTQ community is that we can exist as long as we don't talk about it. I think it underlines this conversation that it is hard to have this discussion, that it is a new, in fact, conversation, and that, yeah, we're making progress, but still there's this sense of discomfort or trying to tell us how to frame the conversation so it's palatable. I think that when we do that, we also underline the reasons why it's difficult to come out in the first place because it's hard to have that discussion. I think that's the fundamental reason. When you clear up those roles, responsibilities at the different levels of the people that are part of this process, it makes it easier on the student. Fundamentally, that's what this bill is about.

I go on to that because it's about the student, but it's a broad process of getting to that point. Madam Chair, I'm going to discuss these sections in a letter written to me by a constituent of mine that went through this process with their child. I think that that perspective really helps to explain that the GSA is part of the process and that it's part of a supportive role but that receiving support from their parents and all of that stuff can happen in its own way as well. You can come out to your parents, they can be supportive, they can meet with your teacher, and if those are all the parts that the student is looking for, that all happens. I think the story that he tells is very articulate on that.

I think that what GSAs really provide is a support group, and that's what they're meant to, right? It provides an additional support for these students. If that support isn't there at home, if that situation does occur, they have this to go to. That's why, when they ask for the GSA, it should be done in a timely fashion.

Madam Chair, I'm happy to table this on Tuesday to make sure that I follow the procedures, but I want to read some of this.

My name is Karson... and I am an advocate for LGBTQ2S+ individuals, issues and rights. From birth to age 12 I grew up and was raised in the small rural communities [all across Alberta]... Wembley... the City of Grande Prairie [and a few others]. I mention these places because of the isolation, ignorance and [like-minded people] who lived in these places and nurtured me as I grew up. I'm sad to say that as a youth I was 100% a product of my environment. I cannot recall knowing anyone who was openly gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgendered or otherwise a sexual or gender variant person . . . The extent of my knowledge of the LGBTQ2S+ community was the phrase, "That's so gay" which meant lame or dumb and was thrown around way too often. I learned quickly that "That's so gay" was a negative thing. As I grew up and started to express myself through clothing, hairstyles and piercings I would . . . regularly be labeled as gay. Because my . . . knowledge of the word gay was centered around being lame or dumb I took offence to this and I believe this eventually developed into a form of homophobia.

I'm going to just interject there. I know that the language being used here in many ways can impact a lot of different people in different communities, and I just want to recognize that, that definitely the intent is to tell this narrative from a very authentic place, where he's coming from. I decided not to edit this.

To continue:

Around Grade 10, my uncle that I idolized growing up, in a tragic series of events came out as gay. Because of the pain, and fear he had, and the magnitude of how he revealed to us his family that he was gay was so heavy, it really opened my mind to how ignorant my thinking was about anyone who is a sexual or gender variant person. Once he came out, and found the love of his life it really hit me. Happiness [is about truth] and truth is achieved when we allow ourselves to be who we really are, not what boxy and prescribed social norms say we have to be.

As I got older and went to university I was exposed to people that I never had before. The type of person who was the "norm" in the small towns I grew up in were few and far between in the big city of Edmonton. Around this time my wife and I had our first child. Like every parent, I will say the birth of my child is the best thing that ever happened to me. My child fills my heart with love . . . and has forced me to expand and challenge my rigid thinking in . . . many ways. For the first two years of our child's life we believed we actually had a son as male was the gender assigned at birth. However, as soon as expression would allow we quickly realized we couldn't have been more wrong. We most definitely had a daughter. At first we were confused and uneducated. Until the age of six, she didn't care what clothes she wore or what her haircut was so to anyone who looked at her, they would have seen a little boy. However, if you talked to her or watched her play it was evident that she was a little girl. Our daughter [had always led] the way and just last year, while in grade 1, at the age of 6 she [bravely and courageously transitioned to] align her outer expression of clothing, and hairstyle to match who she is on the inside. We didn't know how unhappy and unconfident she was until we saw the overwhelmingly confident and happy little lady that emerged when she finally let the world know [who she was, who the real her was]. Our daughter is currently in grade 2 and still attending the very same school she attended when she transitioned her physical expression from male to female last year. My wife and I decided to keep her at the school where she transitioned because she has a great group of friends who really support her in many different ways. However, there are many friends, and students who are not friends, that are compelled to share her story with people who do not and would never know that she at some point appeared as a he. We do not blame the children for their curiosities and internal desire to fill . . . unassuming people in with our daughter's story. We have come to terms that no matter how great [or close our] circle of friends are, there is a great possibility that our daughter will continue getting outed as transgender as long as she stays at her current school. That is extremely troubling as we look and plan ahead for adolescence. For those reasons we are actively searching for [a new school] to enrol her in the new year that have strong GSAs and policies that are put into action that will protect our child's privacy from being outed and otherwise.

Where my wife and I feel . . . incredibly lucky to have such a strong and confident daughter we also know that she is very lucky to have supportive parents and family members who support her in all aspects of her life. We are well aware that . . . many LGBTQ2S+ individuals . . . do not have supportive families. We have met many of these individuals and our hearts break for what they have and are currently still going through. Many of these individuals who have unsupportive families hide and suppress who they are, causing emotional, psychological and physical harm to themselves. These people who either confide in their families or who are outed in any capacity are often met with neglect, abuse [and] abandonment; just for being who they are.

In a province where many individuals still hold onto their . . . narrow perspectives of anything that varies from the "norm" we need to protect the large population of vulnerable individuals . . . who do not fit into these . . . boxes.

It's crucial that all LGBTQ2S+ students in Alberta be given safe and healthy environments [and] anonymity and privacy that School GSAs provide for them so they can receive support [when they need it], because if their families do not support them the outcome could be catastrophic.

As a parent with a . . . mindset [of a] decent human being who believes in equity and fair treatment for all, I fully back the NDP's proposed legislation of protecting our children by making it illegal to notify parents if their child [is attending] a gay straight alliance.

Madam Chair, he signs:

Sincerely and extremely hopeful.

I know that the many parents I have met with that have a child, that are part of GSAs are just that. They are very sincere and extremely helpful. They might not know what it looks like to be a parent of that child, but they're willing to learn, and they're willing to talk to other parents as well. I think what disheartens me most about some of the rhetoric that happens here is that there is an amplification of these ideas of what GSAs are that is fundamentally untrue, and that causes harm to the people that are just trying to create a supportive environment, that are trying to support their children.

I believe that in having this conversation, it forces people to actually reiterate their positions. I think that's important, Madam Chair, because in this world of politics, people can say all the nice things, but their policy doesn't have to look that way.

I think that in many ways Bill 10 needed to be fixed, and that's what we're doing here today. It's something that is important because I have seen that if a GSA isn't done in a timely manner – you're talking about children – if they don't receive a GSA within that school year, they might be going to another school next time, and by the time they get a GSA there, it will be another process. I think that the whole point of this is to make sure that kids have a supportive, safe space, and I can't emphasize that enough. I can tell you that, from high school students to parents that have kids in GSAs at younger ages, all of them at some point get involved, or if not, it's because the student doesn't feel comfortable and needs some extra support. Where do they find that? In the GSAs. I think there's absolutely nothing wrong with that, and in fact it doesn't cause any harm.

I completely disagree with the opposition's narrative that they are not in agreement with that very principle but can agree with this bill. I think that's completely disingenuous, Madam Chair. I think the opposition really does need to come clean as to the reasons they oppose these bills. I think it's part of having healthy debate to actually be able to debate the positions you stand on.

I think that when we're unable to produce those reasons, we muddy the waters with concepts that are untrue. Some of the things that have been thrown out there like that the GSAs have a curriculum embedded in them, a curriculum that is student led, a curriculum that is talking about the things that are hard to talk about in every other room – it's not a world view being embedded in there. It's a safe space, and I think the opposition causes harm when they put things like that into the public sphere and doesn't clarify those points.

I'm so, so proud of the many Albertans that have come out and explained why this is so important. From reporters to parents to concerned citizens they have all taken time to explain again and again that GSAs can be as simple as throwing a bake sale. It can be as simple as meeting in a classroom and talking about what it's like to be you. It doesn't have to be these complicated things that they're making it out to be.

Furthermore, I think this is the place that they go to also get that support that they need in order to come out to their parents. I think it's one of the things that you don't talk about in normal society, how to come out. You know, I never knew the words of how to do that, and many other people that go through that process don't know. Where do we talk about it? So being able to have a space where you're able to hear the stories of other people that have done that gives you the words that you might need to articulate it, and I think that's what we do in other classes, because we need role models to see how to express ourselves, how to explain something that we've never known how to express.

I didn't know to use the word "gay" for these things, and many other students feel that way. That's what a GSA provides, and it's a really powerful thing. All they're really asking for in these situations are role models that understand their process, that can provide guidance, that can provide language to tie to the experience that they have, and that empowers them to reach out to their parents. That empowers them and emboldens them to do that work that we want to see, to engage the parents in this conversation.

I've met with many constituents that have asked me questions about this very fact. I completely reject that parents are not involved in this process. I think that they're an incredibly important part of this process, and nothing can take away from that. GSAs are a supportive role, and they will continue to be. They're an incredibly important one, one that I will never stop fighting for because I know that kids are also our future right now, and they're defining this role. I know that the next generation that's coming forward is not going to accept these kinds of backward-facing ideologies to govern our policies. That's the reality that the opposition has to look at, that they're trying to turn back the clock on progress that we've made on human rights in this province. They're trying to turn it back because that's what it would take to take this away, because it would be challenged, and it should be challenged that you are not recognizing that under human rights we have the ability to express ourselves, our sexual orientation and gender expression, and not to face discrimination on that basis. These are the concepts that we look at when we have a Bill 24, when we have these discussions in this House.

It's incredibly powerful to hear the number of parents that will say: what they're saying is completely untrue. It's something that needs to be said. The amendment that was brought forward was brought forward under reasons that were based on their own rhetoric. They built that platform and then presented the amendment. It wasn't based on the experience of the people that are going through this process, which is interesting to me because in every other thing they would say to the government: did you consult the people that are impacted? In this setting I would say: did they consult before they put that amendment forward to the people that would be impacted? If you do not clarify the role of the schools' ability to not notify parents in the case of a GSA and QSA – who did you notify? I would love to know that. If you had talked to those folks, they would tell you that it's because we are making sure that privacy is of top concern.

I think that's where we need to continue this discussion, and I look forward to talking to other folks about the importance of supporting this bill. We've heard support across the province, and we must continue this conversation. I believe that we can do so in such a way that is constructive. I believe that we need to do it in such a way that it is moving this issue forward and that we're moving into a generation that will not accept those kinds of backwards ideals, where discrimination is something that we accept in our society.

Madam Chair, thank you very much.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek.

Ms Woollard: Thank you. I'm really pleased to be able to speak in support of Bill 24. I'd like to start off with a little event I just read about that I hadn't even remembered till now. November 9, 1938, was the occasion when Jewish-owned stores, buildings, and synagogues were targeted in Germany and Austria. They were under attack, and authorities stood by and did nothing. This event was called Kristallnacht, night of broken glass, referring to the pieces of broken glass that covered the streets and a reminder of how lives can be shattered by such atrocities. Of course, as we know now, the events of that night were just a hint of greater harm to come.

The point of writing about it, the point of speaking about it is that they were saying that all of us know or should know that we have a responsibility to respond promptly and loudly when any group is attacked for their religious or political beliefs, ethnicity, or sexual orientation. When we all stand together, that is the strongest message we can send, whether it's something as horrific as that or something, like you said, like standing for people for their sexual orientation and making sure that they have the right to be able to be themselves.

As a parent and a teacher and a psychologist I think I've thought a lot about this, child development. One of the things we learn: not everyone is perfect at it. But we do know that as the child grows and they become more of an individual and less just an offshoot of the family, they have things where not every part of their life is shared with everyone. They begin to have different thoughts, ideas, beliefs as they become an adult. One of the things we learn to do is to trust them to tell us what's important, to communicate as they're ready and when they see the need.

As a teacher we try to encourage – definitely, we encourage – children and students to talk to their parents about important things and try to help them, as the previous speaker was saying, to prepare to share important information. But to do it on behalf of a person is very disrespectful. This is their personal issue, their personal decision to make, and for someone else to make it is invasive. It's a violation of trust. We have to help them make themselves known to others around them.

Giving people a GSA gives them a place where they can have unquestioning support. They can be free to speak about who they are. A lot of times things like that will give them the confidence they need to be able to express themselves in other situations such as to their parents if they're feeling a little uncertain about telling their parents what's going on with them.

One more story that was going through my head a lot as I was thinking about the various things that people were saying was about a young man who I had taught. This was in a small rural community where I taught. He was the youngest of three children. He committed suicide at about age 19. Nobody had any idea what was going on with him. There was no obvious outside cause. The family was stable. His brother and sister were flourishing. He was intelligent. He had friends. He had capabilities. It always made me wonder: was there something that he wasn't able to share, and he just couldn't live with not telling people who he was? We'll never know, of course. But, you know, the devastation in the community from that death was really terrible to see.

Really, the whole idea of GSAs is in support of students. The more we can do to help them learn confidence in themselves, learn to speak up for themselves, learn to be secure in who they are, the better off they will be and the better off everyone will be.

Thank you.

3:40

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Madam Chair. It's my great honour and privilege to rise today in the House to put myself on the record as being strongly in support of Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances. I hesitate to lend my voice to that of my colleagues in the sense that I don't think I could possibly match the level of eloquence, the level of sagacity that we've all had the privilege of hearing. However, particularly with my own roles as a rural person, as someone who grew up in a small rural community, as someone who's been involved in this issue since the mid-80s, and as a teacher of law and ethics in education, I think that maybe those roles might have maybe a bit of relevance to this discussion. It's in that spirit that I present my remarks.

Just to echo comments of other members that talked about what it's like in our smaller communities, where I grew up, the only discussion about these types of issues was as a way to discipline groups. It was a way to set the boundaries of what you belonged to. I mean, if you were gay, you were outside the group. You weren't worthy of any sort of recognition, and all of us lived in terror of being branded that way, you know? Whether there were gay or lesbian or questioning classmates that I grew up with – in fact, there were. I didn't find out about this until many years afterwards, and I know that I had a couple of classmates that never gave a hint. Years later they came out. How many years did they lose because of that? I mean, I suppose they were fortunate in that they had that opportunity. As the hon. member who just spoke, Edmonton-Mill Creek, we also, unfortunately, had out-of-the-blue suicides in our community that later on could be traced to just this total lack of communication and acceptance.

I could say that I'm proud to be part of a government that is putting this bill forward. You know, it's a sign of progress, but it's also a sign of how much progress we still need to make, that something like this is necessary. I do want to take a bit of issue with the comments that the Member for Calgary-Mountain View made when talking about us politicizing this issue. This is not something that you can divorce from politics, and this is because the opposition to this bill is motivated by a political agenda. I think that it's really important that we do understand that, and I think the hon. members across the aisle do understand that. I think there's probably a growing discomfort in, you know, the Faustian pact that they've made.

The talking points that came out in opposition to Bill 24, the statement that was released by Mr. Kenney, are word for word from Parents for Choice in Education, which has a particular agenda, and also very similar to the types of information put out by the Association for Reformed Political Action. When you understand those connections is when you understand just how disingenuous the line is that we don't want to out gay children in opposing this bill. The reason I say that is that if you look to the information that these groups put out, they do not accept any other form of sexuality besides that between a man and a woman for the purposes of procreation. That's where they're at. The reason that there's opposition to this – this is not an issue of parental rights so much as a very particular right that they're claiming, and that would be a right to be able to determine for their child what their sexuality is and how they express it.

As a former instructor in law and ethics in education I've had the opportunity to look at the evolving role of the understanding of parental rights over history, and you have to go back a long way to find similar types of claims to that level of parental authority. Really, you don't go within religious traditions. You have to go into Roman legal tradition and Roman political tradition, and that would be the concept of paterfamilias.

Paterfamilias was an old Roman concept that the father basically owned his family. He owned his wife, he owned his children, and he owned his grandchildren. He had the power of life and death over them. He had the power to sell them into slavery if he so chose. There were some reforms later on where he only had that right three times, but that's where that came from. It was radical past the early republic, and in fact, you know, into the later Roman Empire you had that moderated. Why is that? Because with the growing understanding of what it means to be ethical, there was an understanding that you cannot claim your child. You cannot claim your spouse. You cannot claim your grandchildren. You cannot claim another human being, period, as your property to be able to decide to do with what you will.

It's that evolving concept that's also influenced what the role is of the parent in education, and it's not an unlimited role. Even the United Nations declaration of, you know, parental choice in education that the opposition is referring to is not unlimited. It's justified based on ethical principles, and, basically, when that parental authority exceeds the ethical backing of that principle, it's no longer valid. I think that parents – and there are only a few of them out there. I mean, the vast majority of parents, I think, are okay with legislation, and I think that this is true in rural areas as well.

I mean, we've evolved a lot since the Delwin Vriend case back in the mid-90s, I think 1998 to be precise, when that came through. We've evolved a lot since when I was on campus back in the late '80s, when we would have blue jeans day to try to raise awareness of gay rights. Then we were talking about the right for gay people not to be fired for their sexual orientation, not to be evicted for their sexual orientation, where you had basically the entire business faculty make a point of not showing up in jeans. What I'm making a point of is that it hasn't been too many years ago that it was totally socially acceptable to totally deny these rights.

But we've evolved. The majority of us have evolved, but unfortunately there is still a minority that needs further education, and I think that it's really unfortunate that you have people out there that are spreading misinformation and, you know, just crazy notions about what this means. I mean, I've been looking at blog postings, some by prominent former publishers, saying that these GSAs are, in fact, sex clubs and that we have to oppose them because they're going to be spreading venereal diseases. They're talking about that this is what's going to happen to 10- and 11-year-olds. That's really going quite a few steps back in the past, and it's unacceptable.

The thing is that I know that the members across the House – there are people that do have some real principles, and I just don't understand how they can feel comfortable in supporting this type of a tactic. We do need to speak to what's underlying this. We need to speak to the politics of it, and it's because of this that we need to have legislation like this.

That said, I think that this is a good bill. Teachers support it. I think that the majority is on our side. I think that we have this moral obligation to put this through. There have been far too many children and youth that have suffered horribly and unnecessarily because – why? Actually, it's a good question. Because of what exactly? Something that has been erroneous from the start.

With that, I'd like to rest my remarks, and I do hope that, in the end, we can get unanimous support for this bill. Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak? Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Well, thank you, Madam Chair. Indeed, like my colleague that just spoke, I'm very pleased to rise and actually register my firm support for this legislation. Indeed, about three years ago today I was outside this Legislature demonstrating against Bill 10. There was a multiparty demonstration that included the Alberta Liberal Party and the Alberta New Democrats as well as a whole raft of other supporters that decried what was going on with Bill 10. That was an important event in my political learnings.

I'm pleased to see that this bill is actually going to finish the work that was started by the then MLA for Edmonton-Centre, which our government has proceeded with and is now going to make sure that students, whether they're gay or straight or whatever, can join a club, just like the chess club or a United Nations club, and actually find support and encouragement in participating in that without concerns about being outed to their parents.

I find that to be a reprehensible position by the opposition, that there would be a forced outing of children because there was some concern about their sexual orientation. That's an abomination – I'm sorry; I have to use very strong language in this – and I entirely reject that assertion. I find the new leader of the United Conservative Party and his position to be equally reprehensible, and I'm hoping that all Albertans recognize this and act upon it in the next election.

I do want to bring up a few other points. As all members of this Legislature know, I've spent 40 years in the practice of medicine in the province of Alberta, and I over that time have learned a lot. There's a lot to learn about consent and ethics and professionalism that isn't being demonstrated by the other side on this particular issue.

I was particularly impressed with the presentation yesterday by the Member for Calgary-South East, who is a professional first responder and who has personal experience in this field. I also have been in conversation with and I was impressed with the presentation by the MLA for Vermilion-Lloydminster. We actually had a discussion about how in our work as a physician or a first responder or a veterinarian on a daily basis, if you're in full-time practice, you would gain the knowledge of personal situations that literally cannot be divulged, and if they were divulged, in fact, I would be in threat of losing my licence. If I learned of a sexual orientation concern or a mental health concern or – I think the worst thing I could learn is that a young person actually thought that they might vote Conservative when they got to be of age. In fact, that's the one that I might want to divulge to their parents because I think that that child might actually need some education. But if I were to divulge something that was given to me in confidence by a child – and that includes to the parents – then I would be in threat of losing my licence. I should lose my licence for that.

Now, these guys over there want to force teachers into that invidious situation of being told that they have to divulge to the parents something that the student certainly would have told them in confidence. In fact, the teachers are supposed to make some judgment about whether or not the parents are capable of actually taking this information in and acting on it or not and whether the acting on it might be detrimental. How silly, how deranged almost in its logic. This just blows my mind.

I can tell you that the Alberta Teachers' Association agrees with me. Just this week 40,000 teachers came out and said: "This is impossible. Please don't do this to us." I can tell you that those 40,000 teachers are going to be voting for the New Democrats in the next election because of this.

I guess that's really where I want to leave this. Basically, what the UCP is asking us to do is something that is unethical, it puts a tremendous stress on teachers, and we should stop it.

Thank you.

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 27

Conflicts of Interest Amendment Act, 2017

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you, Madam Speaker. On behalf of the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance I am pleased to rise today to move second reading of Bill 27, the Conflicts of Interest Amendment Act, 2017.

Madam Speaker, today we are fulfilling a commitment we made in 2015. At the time we said that we would strengthen Alberta's Conflicts of Interest Act and expand it to apply to senior staff of our province's agencies, boards, and commissions. That's what we are proposing to do with this particular legislation.

Alberta's public agencies play a pivotal role in regulating, managing, and delivering important programs and services to Albertans on behalf of government as well as providing oversight and advice on provincial issues. Public agencies are a significant part of Alberta's public sector, and together they account for about half of the government's total yearly budget. Quite rightly, then, Albertans have high expectations that public agencies are relevant, effective, transparent, well governed, and accountable to both government and to them.

Bringing in a consistent set of rules for conflicts of interest is critical in increasing the accountability of public agencies, protecting Albertans' tax dollars, and ensuring that public agencies are governed transparently. With the changes proposed in Bill 27, Albertans can be confident that clear rules and expectations will be put in place to ensure that public agency staff and board members are acting in the public interest.

Our public agencies provide valuable services that make life better for Albertans such as higher education, protecting vulnerable people, and delivering health services. It's vitally important that our public agencies are held to the same high standards that we expect of our elected officials and senior public servants. Bill 27 addresses several key provisions, which I would like to outline at this time.

The bill proposes that public agencies that are already subject to APAGA, the Alberta Public Agencies Governance Act, would also be subject to the Conflicts of Interest Act. Currently, as of November 1, there are 136 such agencies. Also included in this list would be the three Alberta Health Services subsidiaries and Covenant Health.

Bill 27 proposes a number of prescribed elements that would apply to employees and board members of all applicable public agencies. Changes to the Conflicts of Interest Act would require all public agencies to have codes of conduct including these prescribed elements: a requirement to conduct themselves impartially; restrictions on acting in self-interest or furthering private interest by virtue of one's position; disclosure of real and apparent conflicts of interest; restrictions on gifts, including monetary limits; limitations on concurrent employment and holding other offices, including processes of seeking approval.

All APAGA agencies would be required to submit updated codes of conduct reflecting these prescribed elements to the Ethics Commissioner within four months of the act being proclaimed. The Ethics Commissioner will review all revised codes to ensure that they meet the requirements of the act and sign off by March 31, 2019. Agencies would then have to publish their new codes of conduct no later than April 30, 2019.

The legislation also proposes a set of core statutory requirements for CEOs and board chairs. For all agency board members and employees the core requirement would be a baseline standard enforced through codes of conduct that public agencies would be required to implement. Public agencies could have additional restrictions, but these are the ones that all agencies would be required to implement.

The legislation also proposes a set of core statutory requirements for CEOs and board chairs. These requirements include restrictions on private interest, restrictions on using influence, restrictions on using insider information, and disclosure of real and apparent conflicts of interest. There is an additional core statutory requirement that would apply to CEOs and equivalents, restrictions on concurrent employment and holding other offices. This additional core statutory requirement would take effect immediately for new hires, upon reappointment, or following a two-year notice period.

CEOs and equivalents of significant agencies would also be subject to additional statutory requirements upon designation, including restrictions on holding stocks and other public securities; disclosure to the Ethics Commissioner, including financial disclosure; postemployment restrictions, specifically a 12-month cooling-off period following employment with a public agency. These additional statutory requirements would be set out in the act, where the position would be designated in a separate order in council and come into effect on contract renewals and new appointments.

Where concurrent contracts are longer term, a two-year transition period would apply so that within two years all CEOs and board chairs would be subject to these enhanced requirements. Through order in council cabinet would have the ability to add or to exempt agencies and positions from any of the conflict-of-interest requirements. We propose a statutory requirement for all public agencies to have codes of conduct within the required elements.

To enhance oversight and enforcement, we also propose applying restrictions on furthering private interests using influence and using insider information as statutory requirements within the Conflicts of Interest Act. These restrictions would be carried out through order in council and would apply to board chairs and CEOs of public agencies on contract renewals and new appointments.

There would be a two-year transition period to ensure that CEOs with longer term contracts would also come under the new requirements within the two-year time frame rather than on expiration of their contract.

I would also like to note that in Bill 27 it is proposed that cabinet would have the ability to add or exempt agencies and positions from any conflict-of-interest requirement.

4:20

The Ethics Commissioner would have the authority to receive and review disclosures from designated CEOs and their equivalents; reduce requirements for restrictions on public securities and restrictions on postemployment; investigate alleged breaches of the act by board chairs, CEOs, and other designated senior positions; issue reports and make recommendations to the responsible minister and/or board; review public agency codes of conduct to ensure that they meet the statutory requirements set out in this particular bill. As well, disclosure information submitted to the Ethics Commissioner will remain confidential.

Today I'm proud to say that our government has been doing great work to maximize the value of agencies, boards, and commissions. We have seen numerous important changes to increase transparency, fiscal accountability, and diversity and significant progress government-wide in several different areas, including fair and appropriate executive compensation; effective use of public dollars; transparency and accountability, including salary disclosure; revitalization of board appointment diversity and a diligent appointment process; a compensation framework for 23 designated ABCs, cutting salaries and eliminating bonuses for the highest paid top executives of agencies, boards, and commissions; more transparency for Albertans with the launch of the ABC recruitment website for recruitment of board members, appointments, and to ensure that all Albertans have the opportunity to apply on vacancies; and the public agency sunshine list, with public agencies required to publicly post employment and severance contracts of high-level executives and all board members.

I look forward to discussion on Bill 27 and would ask that all members of this House support this bill.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is my privilege to rise in the House today to speak in support of Bill 27, an act to expand conflict-of-interest rules to agencies, boards, and commissions. Agencies play a very important role in making life better for Albertans, and their executive and board members should be held to the same high ethical standards expected of ourselves as MLAs and of senior public servants. Our government is strongly committed to strengthening conflict-of-interest legislation and extending it to senior staff of public agencies, boards, and commissions.

Now, the reason for that is that conflict-of-interest requirements are not consistent across agencies, and a comprehensive, well-elaborated set of rules is simply good governance. Alberta's public agencies are a critical part of how we deliver services. They, in fact, account for about half of government's total budgetary spending. With these changes we can be confident that public agency staff and board members are indeed acting in the public interest.

Now, my hon. colleague from Edmonton-Ellerslie gave some background to the bill. What I'd like to do is just kind of explore some of the questions that this new legislation might bring up in the minds of other hon. members and, of course, the public. The first question would be: why are we changing the Conflicts of Interest Act, and how in particular will those changes benefit Albertans? Of course, as I just mentioned, we are committed to strengthening the conflict-of-interest legislation, and that's what we're proposing to do. While some public agencies indeed do have conflict-of-interest requirements in place through their codes of conduct or their employment contracts, there is not a consistent or comprehensive set of rules being applied to public agencies. This speaks to why we need to do that.

Now, what are the teeth in this? What are the penalties for breaches of the act? Currently there is an administrative penalty for not disclosing to the Ethics Commissioner on time or for failing to fully disclose conflicts as outlined in the Conflicts of Interest Act. This penalty applies to those currently covered under the act, including MLAs and senior ministerial staff, and cannot exceed $500. It is currently an offence for a designated senior official to violate the postemployment restriction, subject to a fine of up to $50,000. With amendments to this act, these penalties will become applicable to designated senior officials, and this will put this in alignment with current provisions for ministers and deputy ministers.

Another question, kind of following that, is: has any consideration been given to increasing the penalties for breaching the act? Now, this is not something that we are proposing to do through these amendments.

How will the requirements be enforced? Well, chairs and CEOs and their equivalents would be subject to oversight by the Ethics Commissioner for the statutory requirements that apply to them. In addition, all agency employees, including CEOs and equivalents, and all board members, including chairs, will be subject to conflict-of-interest requirements through a code of conduct which will be required for each public agency. The requirements for codes of conduct align with the approach used for the Alberta public service. Once again, these will, then, align it more closely with those in place for us as elected officials, including ministers, as well as requirements in place for deputy ministers.

Another question people might have in mind is: how do we decide that? How do we decide which agencies should be subject to the additional conflict-of-interest requirements? Now, this is still a work-in-progress, but there are indeed several considerations, including whether the agency is involved in the following activities. One would be performing a regulatory function, a second one would be making autonomous decisions and/or binding decisions, a third one would be managing and allocating substantial amounts of public funding, and finally, extensive interaction with the private sector. I think that with the reasons being stated, you can see that these are situations where a conflict of interest might arise on a more frequent basis and where there might be a greater temptation to end up in such a situation.

Another question that people might ask about this legislation that we're proposing is: why do some requirements apply to CEOs and chairs while others apply to board members and agency staff? Just how was it decided which staff would be affected by the changes? Now, chairs, CEOs, and equivalents will be subject to higher levels of requirements than agency staff and board members due to their heightened responsibilities and accountability, so a fairly obvious connection there. Chairs, CEOs, and equivalents of significant agencies would also be subject to additional statutory requirements as well as codes of conduct and core statutory requirements. Now, since these agencies are providing such an important and significant service and function on behalf of the government, it is indeed highly appropriate that there be more oversight in place for chairs, CEOs, and equivalents.

Now, another question that might be posed is: why will some requirements be in legislation while others will be administered through codes of conduct? There's a good reason for this difference. The use of statutory requirements for board chairs and CEOs and their equivalents creates the ability for the Ethics Commissioner to provide oversight, including the investigation of potential breaches. This approach recognizes the responsibilities and accountabilities associated with these positions. That's why that would have to go through the Ethics Commissioner.

Another question might be: how does this apply to postsecondary institutions? What are the requirements for them? The requirements for postsecondary institutions would be the same, essentially, as those for other public agencies. However, as with other public agencies, the use of codes of conduct will provide postsecondary institutions with some greater flexibility in order to address their unique needs such as those that are unique to postsecondary institutions having to protect academic freedom.

Now, are there additional requirements to this legislation? Like I said previously, they are the same requirements that ministers and deputy ministers are subject to, and they would include the following: the requirement to disclose financial information, information on direct associates; restrictions on holding public securities unless placed in a blind trust or otherwise approved by the Ethics Commissioner; and a 12-month restriction on taking certain positions after leaving a CEO or other equivalent position.

When would these core statutory requirements take effect? That would be . . .

The Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but pursuant to Standing Order 4(2) the House stands adjourned until Tuesday, November 14, at 10 a.m.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Deputy Speaker: Good morning.

As we gather today in this Chamber, let us reflect on the great privilege that we all share in serving the people of Alberta, and let our deliberations be guided by the knowledge that we are here to serve all Albertans to make their lives better today than they were in the past.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 206

Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to move third reading of Bill 206.

I want to stress again what a privilege it's been to be able to bring this bill forward and to be able to work with the government and the various caucuses going through this bill. It's absolutely time to update the law in Alberta and to keep with the times, and we sure need to know that we're doing this the right way. The feedback that we've received from stakeholders, the ability to be able to go back and forth with the government over language and the way that this bill should sit: I'm very, very grateful for all of the input that has come forward. I'm very happy and hope that the entire Legislature will be able to support this bill going forward.

As we all know, if this bill is passed, it will be able to bring all of our parents that are hoping to adopt a child into a space where they're able to show who they are to parents that are looking to put their child into the system for adoption. There are so many things that are positive about this, but the most important positive step forward is that it gives prospective parents a chance to be able to advertise who they are. But it also gives the parents that are putting their children into the system, that are potentially looking at going into the system that ability to be able to look at prospective parents, take the time in their own home, with the ability to have whatever supports they need around them to be able to make this decision.

One thing I think I need to make clear is that when expectant parents are bringing their children into the system, this is a gift to the parents that are thinking about adopting, a massive gift, and we have to make sure that the expecting parents understand and that they are acknowledged for this beautiful gift that they're bringing forward. For anybody who has been in the system or has been adopted or who has adopted, we all know how important that is.

I actually can't even speak from experience, but I have quite a few friends that have had the privilege of being able to adopt. The look on the face of a parent who is receiving a child that another person has found it in their heart to bring forward and put into the system so that another family can complete their family or start to build their family and extend their family: there's nothing quite like seeing that moment. I can honestly say that I've been there for a couple of those moments, not at the very first unification between this family and this expansion of the family but, certainly, shortly thereafter.

In my own family my cousin in India adopted a little boy, and I remember the letters and the videos and everything that came forward when that day happened for this couple. It's very, very difficult to put into words what that looked like and, certainly, how it felt for those of us who are his family and for other friends who have been through that as well. This is nothing short of a miracle for these families and is a tremendous gift.

For a long time now there have been some inconsistencies in the legislation. This is one of the things that will be fixed by being able to move forward with this legislation, that we actually give potential adoptive parents the ability to be able to put themselves forward and have a little bit more access for the parents that are the expectant parents to be able to look at parents going forward. It's important to restate that it's as important as possible, with, of course, regulations and all the other important things that go along with this, that we make it as easy as possible for people who need support and information to be able to access it and to be able to use the methodologies that are comfortable for them. This will be a huge shift in making sure that parents in Alberta have more access and are able to expand their families as soon as possible. We want to make sure that for the adoptions that are possible, those restrictions change, that we're actually able to make sure and open that up.

There's also been the talk – and this is one of the other things that we need to consider, too, that there have been signs and numbers that show us that adoptive parents in Alberta are looking outside of the province, and we really want to make sure that we can look within our province as well. It's hard to know whether there are fewer or more expectant parents that are putting their children into the system for adoption or it's simply that parents within this system have had to reach outside of the province to look elsewhere. It's hard to know for sure. Those metrics are not necessarily clear. But I think it's very important to make sure that we make as many options as possible for our parents here in this province and that they can post their profiles online and be connected as easily as possible.

One of the other interesting things – and we've brought this up a couple of times. Other provinces – Ontario, Yukon, and British Columbia – have already moved forward on this, and we've seen a tremendous, tremendous change in this and the ability of families to adopt there. Again, I think that we can look at that crossjurisdictional information to make some very good changes within our own system. I believe that the language that we've all used together and that we've come forward with together really provides the ability for families to be able to do that.

We want to make sure that we are able to make this as comfortable and that that learning and the research online are as easy as possible. Because of this, adoption agencies and governments both provide in-depth information on the adoption process on websites, and many agencies also provide a text line. The interesting thing about being able to use that technology is that, should an expectant parent want to actually contact a family that is a prospective adoptive parent, if they want to, they can leave a text line, or they can leave information, which is a really wonderful option. It just opens up the door to even more families being able to be in that space.

As we know, adoption can be extremely stressful not only on the adoptive parents but, obviously, on the expectant parents. We want to make sure that those supports are there and that they're adequate and that we're taking care of everybody who's in the system. Because we know this, if it's easier for the expectant parents to look online, why would we not want to make that available to them, with the obvious restrictions to make sure that there is no access to the children or to the expectant parents, that the expectant parents are the ones that are leading the charge on this but that the adoptive parents make themselves as available as possible to anybody who is looking to put their child into the system?

I would like to thank the member opposite, too, who brought the motion forward in the last session. That motion was so important to starting this conversation about how to move forward and certainly inspired a lot of the language within this bill. Thank you for that.

We wanted to make sure, too, that as we went forward with this bill, we had changed the language in the preamble to make sure that we were very, very clear on the intention. The actual intention of this bill is really simple. It is simply to allow prospective adoptive parents to be approved to advertise their profiles. The reason for not having this come forward in the past was simply that we just hadn't caught up. There are no reasons for not having it, that we weren't able or that we don't have the technology; it's just never been brought forward. It is time. It is time to make those changes.

Again, I want to be extremely clear on how grateful I am for having been able to work with the government to be able to work on the language in this, being able to work with the hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, who is truly the inspiration for me behind this bill, and for being able to work with all members of our caucus and the government caucus and the other caucuses to make sure that this legislation is able to be brought forward. Thank you so much for your contributions.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today and speak just briefly to Bill 206. As many in this House will know, I have had the opportunity to rise on a number of occasions to speak to this particular piece of legislation, that has been carefully and diligently proposed and shepherded through the Assembly by my fantastic colleague the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

I'll just keep my remarks brief this morning as I know that there's lots of other great work to be done today. As well, I anticipate, from a lot of the comments that have been made in the Assembly from members both on this side and that, that we will see, in fact, this particular piece of legislation become law. It's my hope, as I mentioned in committee, that it, in due course, will also be proclaimed. You know, Madam Speaker, from time to time inside the Chamber, issues get quite politicized, and politics sometimes breaks out, and that sometimes means that the best idea doesn't necessarily win. But in Bill 206 what we've seen is that we have the ability to work together for a common cause and common goal. One of the reasons why I'm excited about the rest of the morning today is that we will in fact, I believe, see this piece of legislation passed.

Not only is it important that it's passed because it actually does good things for prospective adoptive families and it does good things for prospective biological parents in terms of adding to the process, but it's a good thing because, for a number of weeks now, we've had the opportunity to speak about such an important issue, an issue that is really at the heart for many in this Chamber, and an issue that is at the heart of making Alberta a better and stronger place. Madam Speaker, you'll know that in this House I have said on numerous occasions that strong families build strong communities, and strong communities build a strong province. Really, that's what adoption is about. It's about trying, wherever possible, to strengthen families. Sometimes that means working to strengthen biological families. It means working to strengthen prospective adoptive families and, wherever possible, doing what's best for everyone in the process.

You'll also know, Madam Speaker, that I've said numerous times in this House that I wished we lived in a world where there was no need for adoption. Unfortunately, we don't live in that world, so we need to do everything that we can to be supportive of the process. We need to be supportive of all of the individuals involved in the adoption process, and I mean doing more to support biologicals, more to support adoptive families, more to support the children involved in this process and, wherever possible, lifting all of those folks up. All too often someone in the process is left behind.

I think that one of the great things about Bill 206 is that we've had this important opportunity to speak about this issue, to discuss some of the challenges, some of the stigmas, some of the successes, and some of the opportunities around adoption, all while doing a very small piece of the legislative portion of this to make this process just a little bit better, to make the process more equal across our country, to not put Albertan families at a disadvantage but to recognize that so much about our culture has changed over the last 15 or 30 years and, in many respects, the adoption process was left behind in that.

Now, as I've highlighted, obviously, there are some sensitive issues around this particular piece of legislation. I think it's important that we do allow the government to put the balances, the safeguards in place as they move forward. But, as I highlighted in the Committee of the Whole stage, I really hope that this isn't a delay tactic to not actually proclaim what is a good piece of legislation. So I encourage them to have the courage of their convictions, to have the courage that the House has placed on this piece of legislation in the form of Bill 206, and to ensure that the bill is proclaimed in an expedited way.

Certainly, on behalf of my family and my girls and all of us I want to say thank you to the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View and to the members of the government side of the House for their positive contribution to the adoptive process, the positive contribution around this particular piece of legislation today. I hope that we will continue as an Assembly to discuss together ways that we can help families grow, flourish, and thrive in our province and highlight the very important work that we all can do together.

It is exciting for me to say for one last time that I look forward to supporting Bill 206.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is indeed a pleasure – and I'm going to echo the words of the previous speaker – to stand and comment in third reading on Bill 206, the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Adoption Advertising) Amendment Act, 2017. I have spoken to this in several phases of this bill, but I really think that there are some key messages here that we need to get across. I want to assure all Albertans that our government is committed to providing a loving, nurturing home to children who need one because every child deserves to grow up in a healthy, loving environment that supports their development and prepares them for a bright future.

Adoption is an important part of supporting strong families and building resilient communities. We want to make sure that the adoption process gives children and parents the best possible outcomes, and we need to ensure that changes to adoption are made in consultation with the adoption agencies as well as adoptive families and that all changes to adoption, including those that may be recommended by the Ministerial Panel on Child Intervention, are made holistically.

The Member for Chestermere-Rocky View is to be congratulated for bringing this forward, and I echo her positive comments about the MLA for Calgary-East, who had a motion previously on this topic. It's something that all of us in this House agree with. I'm sure that everyone in this House has been touched in some way in their past experience by the adoption process.

I personally do not have direct experience with the adoption process, but I can tell you that one of the first constituents to visit my office after the election two and a half years ago was a family that was in a very comparable situation to the one that we're describing today. That family had been trying to arrange an adoption for about 10 years. They actually brought to my attention the fact that they couldn't advertise in the province of Alberta as they could advertise in other provinces their desire to adopt a baby and to tell adoptive parents what their family environment could provide. So I'm very happy for that family and the multitude of other families that are in this situation that we are moving ahead.

As was said by the previous speaker, there's a lot of regulatory activity that needs to be undertaken here to make sure that we preserve confidentiality. In my opinion, one of the most important things is that we make sure that these services are available to all Albertans, not just to those that have access to the Internet or have the technical skills to utilize social media but to all Albertans. I think this is probably the most important issue here. It isn't just the prospective adopting parents, but it's also the parents that are on the other side of that ledger that we need to reassure that all of these folks are getting all of the support that we possibly can give them.

I am very conscious of the social determinants of health, and you can actually translate the social determinants of health into this situation very well. The adoptive parents that are considering the adopting process need a lot of support. They need the support before this process, and in my opinion they need the support afterwards. At the present time we need to do more work in that regard.

I'm also concerned about some special situations. I've got constituents who have adopted children with Down syndrome. That's been a very positive experience for those families, but there's a lot of misinformation out there about what the struggle might be in adopting a child with Down syndrome. I think we need to maybe provide some better information in social media, perhaps, or in other ways as to what the rewards are for making those kinds of adoptions. That's just one example. There are many other examples of children with special needs that we need to make sure are accessing the loving care of adopting families as readily as possible.

You know, the social determinants of health basically relate to poverty. If a person is in a situation where they don't have the financial resources to support a child, I think it's sometimes too easy to say: well, we should make them think about being in the adoptive process. Let's make sure that they make that decision without the coercion of poverty. I think that's very important in all of this.

Basically, what we're talking about here are families. We're talking about enhancing families. In my introduction I talked about how having a resilient family leads to resilient communities. Having an adoption process that gives support to all components of that is very important, and I think that this private member's bill is going to lead to that in part. That's why I'm very pleased to provide my support and my urging to all my colleagues to support this bill in third reading.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'll be really brief because I've spoken at length about this both in my motion and in second reading of Bill 206. I just wanted to take the time to thank the member for her work in bringing this forward and for the collaborative nature that we've been through in this process. I want to thank the Ministry of Children's Services for addressing concerns within our caucus and caucus members who have come to me with concerns they have with this. I think we've sort of landed in a place that most of us can agree on.

I know that this will bring a huge amount of hope to a great number of people, and I think that's really the primary thing that we are trying to do with this. This is an issue that was brought to me by my constituents very early on after I was elected, just the struggles that they've experienced trying to adopt children: that it can be very expensive, that there are different things that can be barriers, whether that's age of prospective adoptive parents or financial status. This is just something that seems so obvious in this day and age that we live in. It's something that's already in place in B.C. and Ontario.

I'm just grateful that we've come to this spot and that this is where we are, and I know that so many families out there will be thankful for this opportunity. So I just hope everyone supports this bill moving forward.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today to speak to Bill 206. I do remember when the Member for Calgary-East brought forward a motion earlier in this Legislature and the conversations that we were fortunate to have around this particular topic and that we see brought forward here in a piece of legislation that will make this collaborative effort actual law. This is a great change brought forward by my hon. colleague from Chestermere-Rocky View.

I think that I certainly have heard from constituents that have experienced difficulties when adopting a child about the direct impact that this change in legislation would mean for them in their access, not only for them but for others who want to share their love with children that need a forever home. I'm so honoured to be a part of this discussion in this Legislature and the passing of this fantastic private member's bill.

I can see support from all sides in this House, and I know that there are many, many families that certainly appreciate this because whatever we can do to remove barriers and encourage it, make it easier to put people together in a forever home is exactly what we should be doing in this Legislature and especially here today. I'm very, very proud of my colleague for bringing this forward and doing a lot of the background work with all members in this House to pass through this legislation.

I certainly speak in support of this bill, and I urge all members that haven't already decided to also vote in favour. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View to close debate.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. Well, I wanted to say again, one more time, how grateful I am that the bill we have before us, if it is passed – and I'm hoping that everybody in the Legislature will support this bill – will ultimately bring families together, will ultimately bring the gift of family to families that have struggled in being able to put families together for whatever reasons, whatever backgrounds, however we all come together with this.

The honest thing that happens as a result of this legislation is that many people become connected, and they're connected through this precious little person that comes into the world through parents that are willing to put their child into adoption and through the prospective adoptive parents that are able to grow their families. Just the thought of being able to make that easier, to be able to streamline that and to bring families together, is something that I think every single person in this Legislature can be very, very proud of. As I've said earlier, the inspiration for this bill comes from so many spaces and, I'm so proud to say, right across this Legislature.

Again, I'd like to say thank you from the bottom of my heart on behalf of the families that will benefit from this legislation. All of us are extremely grateful and look forward to seeing this legislation passed.

Thank you.

10:30 Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders
Second Reading

Bill 207
Regulatory Burden Reduction Act

[Debate adjourned November 6: Mrs. Aheer speaking]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Sorry. Pardon me. I didn't realize I was on the speakers list.

The Deputy Speaker: Just for clarification, you have nine minutes left of your speaking time.

Mrs. Aheer: Nine minutes. Okay. Oh, my goodness gracious. Thank you so much. Madam Speaker, I rise in support of Bill 207, the Regulatory Burden Reduction Act.

The constituency of Chestermere-Rocky View is home to so many nonprofits. You know, nonprofits are actually what make lives better for Albertans. We have all sorts of youth sports leagues, social service providers. There are quite a few, actually, throughout the area. Some of those are Synergy, seniors' organizations such as the Whitecappers, Lions Club, Women in Need Society.

These not-for-profit societies do absolutely amazing work, and I don't need to explain that to this Legislature. All of us, having been in these positions for as long as we have, know how much the not-for-profits do for our areas. Sometimes it's as simple as helping out with getting baskets to families that are in need all the way to helping build arenas, funding for hockey teams coming in, making sure that the food bank is stuffed full over the holidays to make sure that we can take care of families in need. Of course, behind all of these organizations, Madam Speaker, are these incredible volunteers.

The constituency of Chestermere-Rocky View, that I represent, like so many constituencies across Alberta would have far less access to services and programs that are built by and for local communities and so much of our public funds would have to go towards these services that the not-for-profits actually provide, which is the point that I'm getting to. These not-for-profits not only supplement what's already there, but they actually add to it. There is usually quite a motivation behind a not-for-profit, their reason for advocacy, so they're able to raise the funds that are needed which provide services that Albertans rely on.

The purpose of the organizations and the groups they support, Madam Speaker, is wide, and they vary. One thing all of these not-for-profits have in common is the requirement to spend donated funds on volunteer hours, and this is where it gets a little bit confusing and frustrating. They're spending it on volunteer hours to discover and understand complete mountains – mountains – of government paperwork. I don't know how many people in this Legislature have worked for not-for-profits. I know what it feels like to be under a pile, a mountain, of that paperwork, and so much of the money that is raised by these not-for-profits is going to dealing with these mountains of paperwork.

For instance, the CIP project grants consist of an 18-page application guide, eight pages of application forms of which two pages require around 10 long-answer responses each, 12 pages of more mandatory attachments, three pages of facts, and a four-page accountability report with two pages of instructions. Now, as you go through that, Madam Speaker, obviously, there are reasons for all of these things to be there, and this is in no way to disrespect the process by any stretch. But it took myself and my constituency staff at least two minutes per page just to read and understand each of those 47 pages of paperwork the first time.

You know, we're actually paid to do that job, right? So it's absolutely my privilege to be able to help with those forms and to go through the process, Madam Speaker, but that's an hour and a half of time to even begin to understand the paperwork, right? That's not even processing, that's not going through it, and that's not preparing the paperwork, and we're experienced at dealing with bureaucracy and paperwork from the bureaucracies.

The point that I'm trying to get to is that when constituents come into our office looking for help with their first CIP application and they have invested dozens, maybe hundreds, of volunteer hours into working with CIP programs, the officers are trying to understand what the program is actually looking for so that they can actually help to write the grant proposal so that it has a chance of being approved, which, of course, is why we have those grants available. We want these communities, these not-for-profits, these associations to have access to this very important money that actually helps families, makes life better for Albertans throughout every single one of our constituencies here.

Similarly, a larger application package exists for four other CIP streams, two of the CFEP streams, and one for ECAP. Again, I don't know how many people in this Legislature have sat down and gone through those mountains of paperwork, but they're massive. And then there's paperwork to maintain the status of the societies and the not-for-profit corporations, including an annual report to Service Alberta and audited financial statements that take weeks and months to prepare, sometimes costing these not-for-profits up to $10,000 in hard-earned donations.

There are mounds of paperwork to file with the AGLC, including regular applications. And if we're even thinking – there are other groups, too. There are First Nations groups. There are other not-for-profit groups. A lot of these groups haven't even got access to somebody to help them fill out this paperwork. So there's a discrepancy amongst even the people that are applying for these applications as to whether they'll get their applications across the finish line because they may not have somebody in their area that is actually able to fill out that paperwork for them. It actually can be quite discriminatory.

We want to make sure that these applications and reapplications to be able to use charitable funds – the requirements on the applications should be the same programming the organization has done for years, and I don't think that that's too much to ask. This is part of the red tape that we're talking about. If an organization has already filled out its paperwork, gone through the expertise, the work, the money, everything else that they've done to fund raise in order to get this grant, why is the programming for that organization not staying the same?

More concerning, though, is that the red tape makes it more difficult – more difficult – for nonprofits to change their programs to meet new and emerging needs in communities. I don't think I need to really clarify. All of us live in communities that are changing at the drop of a hat. I mean, the technology changes faster than we can blink, the families, the growth. I can just speak for Chestermere-Rocky View. Our growth is massive, absolutely massive, and to try and keep up with that and the different groups of families and the needs that are coming in and who needs what, I mean, that changes at the blink of an eye. So developing new programs or collaboration between organizations such as seniors' organizations, developing grant work for youth organizations is very difficult, very different mounds of paperwork.

A large part of the roadblocks, actually, to preparing the application package is that the AGLC uses the Charitable Gaming Policies Handbook, 151 pages – 151 pages – thick with pseudoregulations that are literally impossible to understand or negotiate. If you're lucky enough to have an MLA to help you go through it with you – it's absolutely unbelievable and mind-boggling. I hope all of you get a chance to do that.

That handbook is, by the way, updated a few times a year. It's not the same book that was there last year. It's not even the same handbook that was there a few months ago. It's updated on a regular basis, but nonprofit organizations don't always receive notice when the AGLC changes the red tape in ways that affect the nonprofits. Again, we're attacking the very people that help our areas, our constituencies, the people that we represent, to do great work and to actually make life better for the citizens in all of our constituencies.

Just to give a quick recap, because that was a mouthful, the average CIP application requires 80 volunteer or contractor hours to complete each. So depending on how much your contractor is charging or what your volunteer is available for, it's a good chunk of money and time. And that has to be completed for every single funding cycle. That's two weeks of time that is not used – not used – to provide services and programs to Albertans. The average CIP application requires 40 volunteer, contractor, or bookkeeper hours to complete each grant.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure today to rise and speak to Bill 207. You know, all across the country provinces are moving to find ways that their regulatory burden can be reduced and government can be streamlined, but unfortunately here in Alberta we have a government that wants to do the exact opposite of that. Left, right, and centre we see additional regulations and added burden being placed upon all sorts of different sectors. So my hon. colleague the Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner has made a pretty simple suggestion in Bill 207 that when the government has that unquenchable thirst to regulate, that we all know they have, they then take a pause, be a little bit introspective, and find other areas where they could reduce regulatory burden.

Now, Madam Speaker, let me tell you that at the start of this process it's really easy because there is a lot of unnecessary regulation that continues to remain on the books – and my hon. colleague from Chestermere-Rocky View made some illustrations of those – that really just needs to go away. They don't solve any problems. They solved a problem that used to exist, or it's possible that they were implemented and actually created problems. The point remains the same. What my colleague from Cardston-Taber-Warner suggests is that when one new regulation is implemented, one old or no longer needed regulation is removed. It's a one-for-one process – and we've seen in other provinces, including the province of British Columbia, where they've reduced 36 per cent of regulations in just three years – and this is reported annually, and it provides certainty that there is positive work in red tape reduction taking place.

I actually don't understand when I've heard members opposite say, "Well, give an example of one" or "There's no problem." The government in the province of Alberta is absolutely massive, with significant – significant – regulation. For members opposite to say, "Oh; there's no problem; there are no regulations that need be removed," is also like saying that every single dollar that the government spends is a dollar well spent. Well, that's outrageous. The government wastes lots of money, and there's also lots and lots of regulatory burden that could be reduced so that we can make a path for the economy, so that we can create certainty in business, so that we can minimize regulation on small and medium-sized business. As we all know, those are the drivers of our economy. This is a small step that essentially costs very little but really has the opportunity to make a significant impact on our province.

I've heard members opposite speak last week about how they don't think that there's a problem or that there's no real need for this particular piece of legislation. I know that there are a lot of people who disagree with that position, not just members of the opposition caucus but also business groups, members of the nonprofit sector. So I think what we ought to do is before the government goes ahead and votes this bill down without giving it proper time consideration and thought and hearing from a lot of experts – I know that Bill 203 had that same sort of opportunity, to hear from experts and get testimony from industry. I think that it worked out quite well. That's often what happens at committee, Madam Speaker, that the best idea has the best opportunity of winning. Not only that, but we can make a much better decision as a collective by hearing from experts. We can get testimony from bureaucrats who will be able to provide examples of this. We can hear from – I know municipalities.

In my previous life I was a councillor in the community of Carstairs, as you'll know, and I know that regularly we heard frustration from administration on the significant burden that the provincial government imposed upon municipalities. Now, listen, there need to be checks and balances – I'm not saying that there doesn't – but many of the regulations that existed actually didn't provide any value for the municipality or, in fact, for the Department of Municipal Affairs. Often the municipality was filling out reports and paperwork that were never actually reviewed by the government, so it would be great to be able to invite some of those municipalities to come and speak to the importance of reducing regulatory burden.

I'd like to provide the government members that opportunity by proposing an amendment. I have an original for you and the table as well as for all of the members in the Chamber, who, I'm sure, are waiting with bated breath. I'll just wait until you have a copy of the original.

The Deputy Speaker: Go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you. Just double-checking: will we refer to this amendment as A1?

The Deputy Speaker: No. It's a referral motion, so it would be REF1.

Mr. Cooper: A notice of amendment to Bill 207, Regulatory Burden Reduction Act. I move that the motion for second reading of Bill 207, Regulatory Burden Reduction Act, be amended by deleting the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 207, Regulatory Burden Reduction Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

Madam Speaker, before the Chamber now we have an incredible opportunity to refer this bill to committee. I know that I had a chance to speak with my colleague from Cardston-Taber-Warner, and I look forward to his comments with respect to both the bill as well as the amendment. I know that he is in favour of this amendment. Now, I'm sure that he would have appreciated a more expedited process, but I think that he even sees the value in hearing from experts on an important issue. What we're doing today is giving the government and the government members the opportunity to really be thoughtful about this process, to consider the consequences of not doing it, and also to get very valuable feedback from those that would like to provide feedback on this issue.

All across the country and in many states they have a plan in place to reduce the regulatory burden. The federal Conservative government saved Canadian businesses over $32 million in administrative burden as well as 750,000 hours in time spent dealing with red tape each year. Regulatory compliance costs are disproportionately borne by small business and small and medium-sized firms, and those firms constitute the largest segment of the Canadian economy.

These are the types of discussions that committee would allow to happen. It would really provide an opportunity for all of us to be able to ensure that we're doing the right thing for the right reasons at the right time. I would strongly, strongly encourage all members of the Assembly to support this motion so that Bill 207 can get the important study that it deserves.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the referral motion? The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Madam Speaker. First, I want to thank the member for referring this to the Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future. I think it really shows some of the productiveness that the committee has had over time. If I can just kind of allude to some of the good work that this committee has done and why it would be important for a bill of this magnitude to actually come to this committee, it would be very prudent. Obviously, I sit on and serve on this committee with the Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock, who is my deputy chair, and I've actually really enjoyed my time with him on this committee because it's been very collaborative in the last little while.

We recently tabled the report, as all members would recall, on the review of daylight savings. To be frank, one of the things I was most taken aback by during that review process was that someone thought the committee was entirely made up of New Democrat members because of how nonpartisan the committee operated. I think it spoke volumes on the ability that we could actually work collaboratively together on this issue, and it was really great to see.

Now, prior to that, we did the review of the agrifood and agribusiness act. I know that the Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater is nodding his head because he was very enthralled with this one. We unanimously voted in favour of 13 recommendations, which the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry is starting to review, to really try to diversify our agrifood and agribusiness sector. During my work with PNWER and travelling abroad with them, I've had the opportunity to really talk about some of the great work that we've been doing within Alberta from that committee's process. Then, prior to that, we've had some other legislative reviews as well, a review of PIPA, which looked at some of our privacy legislation.

This one really intrigues me because, you know, I don't see red tape as a very partisan issue. Red tape impacts everyone. I always refer back to a challenge that my mother had, actually, when my grandmother was admitted to hospital a few years back. It was her trying to get her unadmitted from the hospital and having to get her walker certified. It was the exact same walker that she had while she was in hospital. My mom went out and bought it to make sure it was the exact same one. The doctor had given it to her in the hospital, but we had to wait for that doctor to come back to approve this walker that had already been approved even though the RNs who are in the hospital had seen this walker, had seen the doctor approve it. Everything was, you know, filed appropriately. That was regulatory burden that prevented her from being unadmitted from hospital for about three to five hours if I recall. I remember my mom speaking to me – and this was in 2014, so this was before I had this position – about the frustration that she had, and I recall that the words "red tape" came up in relation to that.

I'm also very cautious of the one-to-one rule. A prime example that I say as to why I'm cautious about this is that we're about to enact a lot of regulations soon, and that's going around the legalization of marijuana. To be frank, if anything is going to create more bureaucracy and more cumbersomeness, it would be trying to find thousands and thousands of regulations to eliminate just because we're enacting a bunch of new regulations through the legalization of marijuana. Regulations play a key point in helping with public safety and helping with public trust. You know, I came from an industry specifically that dealt with a lot of regulations. Some would refer to them as barriers; I think that they were great opportunities to make sure that we had good safeguards in place.

In the restaurant industry – I'm not sure if the Member for Calgary-Klein is aware that I was a restaurant manager by trade – I dealt with many different governing bodies that were managed by regulations. The Member for Chestermere-Rocky View talked about the AGLC. Not only did they facilitate casino revenues, but they also regulated and managed the way my business operated because we served liquor. We also were overseen by Alberta Health Services and specifically within the food safety portion of it. Then we were also regulated on the business aspect, but that was more on the city scope. However, there were elements of the MGA that we also had to abide by being a business that was managed by the city of Calgary. Then we also had to be regulated by the fire codes that were coming into place. All of these things that regulated us were all around public safety, you know, barring any of the taxation side of regulations that came from owning a property with property tax. Many of them applied to safety, and when you're dealing with them applying to safety, it was important that the ability to enact regulation on the fly ad hoc was available.

We've had many scares in the food service industry in relation to E coli outbreaks or outbreaks of food-borne illnesses or outbreaks of pathogens, where regulations have had to be enacted really quickly by Alberta Health Services to help prevent a lot of people from getting sick. Specifically, I recall there was one for a McDonald's, and it was a hepatitis outbreak. When that occurred, regulations had to be enacted very quickly to ensure that people could be immunized for hepatitis, so it was streamlining all of the employees and all of the people who had eaten at that place to prevent them from contracting hepatitis. So one of the fears that I would have in having a one-to-one ratio of removing regulations is the fact that, you know, you do have a risk to public health. We shouldn't be overburdening bureaucrats to eliminate this.

However, on the other hand, I do recognize that there have been many regulations that have been cumbersome. I saw that, actually, specifically dealing with the AGLC, and that was specifically in relation to just some of the drink service regulations. It was something that I actually advocated for, from having first-hand knowledge of the act and having first-hand knowledge of how the AGLC operated, to really try to provide some recommendations to the Ministry of Finance and Treasury Board, that oversaw the AGLC, and allow the board to independently make some decisions from some feedback that I received. I actually had an opportunity to play a part in an announcement to remove the time limits on happy hour. This was an example of some red tape that was created within the AGLC that basically prevented restaurants from being competitive because they put time limits on when you could define that happy hour could end.

The thing that was always frustrating was that it was 9 p.m. when it ended. I worked at a mall restaurant that had a bar, and 9 p.m. was when the mall closed. We wanted all the employees from the mall to come into our restaurant and receive a benefit or a perk from coming in. We weren't going to allow them to overconsume. They weren't drinking at work. We were only open for an additional hour, hour and a half if the business volume warranted it, so we wanted to have a drink special. We wanted to have maybe a $3 highball for a mall employee or a mall closing happy hour to bring people in because it was actually a time when we started seeing a decline in business volume, in fact, to a point where we actually considered closing our doors a bit earlier because we weren't getting the guest counts and revenues. It was because of this burden that we had from the AGLC – it prevented us, actually, from being able to try to set a deal or a perk for an individual to come into our restaurant to be a patron of our establishment. I was very thrilled when we removed that regulatory barrier about happy hour.

It was very cumbersome, and it was actually a very – in my opinion, it was useless because there is actually an overarching regulation that exists within the AGLC and liquor service in general, which is: you don't allow people to overconsume. That is actually one of the biggest safeguards that exists within the AGLC. When I was being scrummed by the media, they said, "Well, aren't you worried about people getting drunk because you're doing later happy hours?" My answer was, "Well, no, because there's the golden rule within liquor service: don't allow people to overconsume." It doesn't matter when you're serving, how much you're selling the liquor for at that time; if you follow the golden rule about liquor service, you're not going to run into any troubles, and people are going to be very, very safe in relation to that.

One of the things that I have a focus on – and I'm sure all members do – is that none of us like overcumbersome red tape. None of us like, you know, work-creating methods. I know that the Member for Calgary-Hays and I sit on the Ministerial Panel on Child Intervention, just as you do, Madam Speaker, and we've already started seeing the overcumbersome work that many of our social workers have to do when it comes to filing paperwork and the challenge that comes from that. To be frank, as we look to making recommendations and trying to reform that system, we also run into a situation where one to one sometimes isn't even enough, and we actually may have to look at removing more barriers than just one individual one.

I'm always very cautious about being very prescriptive on this because I always view some vantage points where you want to wipe regulation that exists. I also worry that if you create something like this, we're just basically going to put regulations in the queue and wait for us to enact another regulation before we remove one. That's the last thing I ever want to see anyone do, basically, trying to set ourselves up to queue regulations being removed just because we might have future regulations coming into place, which is bound to happen because technology changes, things change. How many regulations have we had to enact because of Uber?

I'm really excited to hear many members speak to this because I want to hear many vantage points before I really decide in what direction I want to vote on this.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak in support of this amendment so that we can take the time needed to address the issue of red tape reduction. I'd like to remind my fellow lawmakers that Bill 207 was designed to be simple. It states that for every regulation created or amended – and this is important – that adds a "burden on a business," one or more regulations need to be eliminated. I hope that they remember the wording of this. It is specific: that adds a "burden on a business." They talk often about the need to be able to bring Albertans back to work, and this is one of the best ways that I can think of for them to be able to do it at no cost to them.

I'd like to start off by quoting the Member for Edmonton-Glenora. She said:

I can't help but beg the question: how is tying up legal counsel in drafting a bill, how is tying up departments in drafting regulations, how is creating new red tape to reduce red tape actually an effective use of resources? Talking about how they want us to bring forward a bill to reduce red tape but that the bill is red tape and therefore would create red tape, to me, just doesn't actually – I can't square that circle.

She then went on to say that this bill is just grandstanding.

I hope to illuminate over the next few minutes for the Deputy Premier how this bill is certainly not grandstanding and how this bill can help everyday Albertans get back to work. Susana Martinez stated: the big corporations have a team of lawyers and accountants to help them; it's the small businesses, the ma-and-pa shops, that get lost in the layers of red tape. Madam Speaker, I think this government needs to remember that point because it's those ma-and-pa businesses that are the lifeblood of a thriving economy.

Germain Belzile wrote a great article on how red tape is affecting our oil and gas sector. It is entitled Canada's Oil and Gas Sector at Risk?: How Excessive Taxes and Regulations Undermine Our Competitiveness. In it she states, quote: new regulations in Canada, including things like carbon pricing, coupled with the reduction in the regulatory burden under President Trump in the U.S. have seen investments leaving Canada and flowing to the U.S. instead. Alberta, in particular, is experiencing a dizzying downturn . . .

The regulatory burden seems to be primarily at fault, since it is estimated that its cost will rise by between 12% and 21% in the near future, and even more after 2023, when the carbon tax will be applied [in the oil and gas] sector.

If I finish my speech right there, members of this Chamber should have heard enough to motivate them to address the red tape issue, but I will continue. Let's get into the meat of this issue, the why of reducing red tape. I think the Minister of Health needs to ask herself: if her government doesn't even know how many regulations they have on the books, then how could she, as she stated, already be dealing with red tape? If her government hasn't even figured out what Alberta's regulation baseline is, then she has no idea how big the problem is. How does Alberta compare with other provinces? Does the NDP even know?

The Alberta government is the only province in Canada that does not have a red tape reduction strategy. This is the reason why they receive year after year a failing grade of F from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, who tracks regulatory burden across Canada.

As an example of a province that did it right, I want to tell you about B.C.'s red tape reduction journey. In 2001 the B.C. government undertook a comprehensive red tape reduction strategy. Their goal was to count all of the regulations, which would allow them to know how big the problem was. The count allowed them to create a baseline, which, in turn, allowed them to monitor their progress by simplifying legislation, regulations, policies, and forms. Within three years they were able to decrease red tape by 36 per cent. Seeing the success in terms of GDP and business growth, they continued streamlining government regulations. At the end of the project they were able to decrease red tape by 43 per cent, Madam Speaker.

British Columbia is clearly a model to follow. Every year the B.C. government undertakes a streamlining initiative, one, to reduce the length of processes and the time waiting for decisions; two, to eliminate duplication; three, to improve access and increase online services; four, to reduce the time and cost for public business in government. British Columbia even has a web portal for citizens to share their ideas in regard to red tape reduction. It even allows citizens to track the status of their ideas. This is an incredible way to tap into society's wealth of knowledge. This is the kind of entrepreneurship that Albertans want to see in their government.

Madam Speaker, British Columbia has created a comparative advantage over Alberta, and it's found in their lower regulatory burden. Alberta needs to catch up to regain that comparative advantage, and by coupling it with lower taxes, we can spur on economic growth in Alberta. The NDP government has been adamant that they intend on growing and diversifying the economy. Well, what better way to grow and diversify than to get government out of the way of business and let businesses do what they do best, create jobs?

Former federal NDP MP Glenn Thibeault said that looking at ways to eliminate unnecessary paperwork and save small companies time and money that they should devote to their business is a good idea. I hope this government will take the advice of their colleague and take action on red tape reduction and send this bill to committee. Making entrepreneurs devote time and resources to meeting regulations without a clear benefit to society is not only counterproductive, but it also acts to kill their spirit. Regulatory compliance costs are disproportionately borne by small and medium-sized businesses, and it's important to remember that small and medium-sized firms constitute the largest segment of job creators in the Alberta economy.

Across Canada the Canadian Federation of Independent Business estimates that business owners spend over $30 billion a year on regulatory burden. Madam Speaker, that is money taken out of the economy. If each job was making, on average, $50,000 a year, that would be 600,000 private-sector jobs lost due to regulatory burden and red tape. Former Prime Minister Stephen Harper called outdated regulation, which hobbles business, silent job killers. I've often heard business owners say that sometimes they wonder if regulation is more about keeping public employees working than safety. When job creators start to say that, we need to listen.

Five years ago the federal government launched the red tape reduction action plan. At the end of 2014 the government had completed the administrative burden baseline, which calculated a total of 129,860 federal requirements and regulations and related forms that can impact Canadian business across different sectors and industries. As the opposition we do not have the resources of the government, but we can estimate. Our research team took a sample of regulations and found that in Alberta there were about 492 statutes as of last count. With an average of 230 regulatory pages per act, they estimate that there were approximately a little over 113,000 pages of regulations. Now, that is a lot of potential barriers, Madam Speaker. I'm not saying that every one is a barrier, but I'm saying that they are potential barriers that we need to take a look at.

Over the years other provinces have enacted red tape reduction task forces in order to reduce the number of regulations holding up small businesses. Alberta made a token effort to address red tape in 2011. A task force found that cumulative effects of regulations are detrimental to small businesses. The task force came back with four recommendations.

- Develop a small business strategy that acknowledges and responds to the needs of Alberta's small businesses.
- Strengthen Alberta government processes for making, amending and reviewing regulations.
- Work with other governments and related bodies to streamline business regulations.
- Encourage a service delivery culture in government that is collaborative, user-focused and ensures greater accountability.

Unfortunately, the report never called for reduction or elimination of regulations, and that, in my opinion, was its fatal flaw.

Reducing red tape doesn't have to cost the government anything, nor does it require the government to hire more public servants. All the work can be done in-house at the present staffing levels, as seen by the federal and B.C. models. The NDP government has said many times that they want to bring Alberta up to the same level as other provinces on a whole host of matters. Well, here's their chance to do it here. With red tape regulations out of the way, not-for-profits and businesses will be able to spend their time growing, not filling out government paperwork.

Jurisdictions across Canada and the United States have recognized the need to take action on this problem. If I had more time, I would tell you more about the excellent work done by Germain Belzile. I would also tell you about Laura Jones's work with Mercatus research and the red tape reduction work going on down in the United States. But due to time constraints I will just call your attention to these articles and hope that you and especially the Deputy Premier will read them.

I hope that now that I have explained how red tape reduction can support Alberta's business growth, especially small ma-and-pa businesses, all members will enthusiastically send this bill to committee and that we study it properly.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I speak to this referral amendment, and I don't share the intrigue that my colleague for Calgary-Shaw does on sending this to committee. I think that when you send something to committee, there should be a very strong, compelling argument to do so, and I think we haven't heard that, to be honest with you. Of course, there are probably instances where, you know, there is room for improvement in terms of paperwork and reducing burdens on businesses, but I think this is better done being brought forward on a case-by-case basis rather than as a blanket policy that could help some businesses and hurt others.

Now, I know that when we introduce these amendments and bills, we all do so believing that it's in the best interests of Albertans and in this case Alberta's businesses. But sometimes, Madam Speaker, our friends on the other side of the Assembly get blinded by their ideology and deafened by the echo chamber that they reside in. Calls to reduce red tape: it's one of those dog-whistle phrases that the UCP base responds to, very well apparently. This bill and the amendment seem to be no different, light on examples and charged with rhetoric.

As you may or may not know, Madam Speaker, the Canadian Taxpayers Federation was once headed by the UCP leader and the former Wildrose critic, now an independent member. Neither seemed to be very good at practising what they preached at the CTF when they turned to politics. That's for sure. I say this simply because I feel that this is going down the same path. Most of the current regulations were put in place by the member's ideological counterparts. But they're now a part of the same group, so where is the problem now? There's a real sense that the opposition wants to have things both ways. They want accountability, but they don't want the paperwork that helps keep accountability.

Now, this government recognizes the importance of strengthening a business's ability to be competitive and have a business environment that encourages start-ups, which is why we cut the small-business tax by a third and why we have increased access to funding for businesses of all kinds. Taking advice from leaders, our jobs plan has unlocked over $3 billion of capital for small businesses, Madam Speaker, through the ATB, through Alberta Enterprise Corporation, through AIMCo and Alberta Innovates. We're ensuring that Alberta continues to be the best place to launch and grow a business.

In the first quarter of 2017-2018 ATB Financial authorized almost 3,500 loans to small and medium-sized Alberta businesses worth a total of $875 million. Also, Alberta businesses with incubator support average a 25 per cent growth rate, much higher than the national average. So why are small businesses starting and loans being granted when there's too much red tape? That wouldn't happen if it were true.

I had the pleasure of meeting recently with the Rainforest incubator in Calgary as well as the honour of speaking at the launch of the Queen's University venture network in Calgary. When meeting with these groups and other entrepreneurs in my riding and across Calgary, you know, I hear of lots of things that are challenges, but the words "red tape" have never come up. What they actually want is more capital, and that's exactly what we're doing, more access to capital. It's something that for some reason has eluded previous governments, that access to capital.

You know, it's working, Madam Speaker. Some of Canada's most respected experts are forecasting Alberta's growth to be the highest in the country right now. The RBC pegged GDP growth at 4.2 per cent this year, far higher than the last few years. There were nearly 49,000 more jobs in Alberta this summer. In October the Alberta government helped bring 750 new full- and part-time jobs to the province as Amazon announced a new fulfillment centre near Calgary. I'm just not seeing the evidence supporting what's being said over there, so I'm not going to support this going to committee.

Beyond the lack of perceived need for this bill is the clarity on how the bill would actually work and how we could possibly remove regulations that are specifically there for the protection of both businesses and consumers. I mean, Bill 19, for example, An Act to Protect Gas and Convenience Store Workers: would that be considered a regulatory burden, red tape? It's just too simplistic, Madam Speaker, and it really lacks specificity, particularly the one-for-one rules, which are just far too simplistic.

Quoting the Canadian Chamber of Commerce report, it says that contrary to popular belief, enforcing a one-for-one rule actually increases bureaucratic inefficiency or lag time because policy-makers must spend time identifying regulations to repeal and replace as well as drafting new policies. Doug Fraser of the Cape Cod Times wrote that the obvious argument is that stripping away regulations, be they environmental, financial, or otherwise, exposes the public and the environment to substantial risks; i.e., mitigating public risk through oversight of private activity is the fundamental job of government. These one-for-one rules that are being proposed in this bill and now want to be sent to committee just don't cut it, Madam Speaker.

Again, of course, we, this government, recognize the need to make life better for all Albertans and our businesses, and this government is committed to working with businesses to make it easier for them to create jobs and get Albertans back to work. Alberta businesses have a bigger economic impact than businesses anywhere in the country. Between January and August 2017 over 29,000 new businesses were incorporated in Alberta, a level that is 10 and a half per cent higher than the same period in 2016. We've created tax credits that other provinces have enjoyed for decades. As Albertans we still pay the lowest taxes in Canada, billions less than Saskatchewan. Of course, I will repeat that we cut the small-business tax. With all this investment, Madam Speaker, where is the burden? I'm not seeing it, so I will not support this going to committee.

Also, a couple of other things that we've done to help improve businesses that kind of negate this red tape argument include that the Minister of Economic Development and Trade has done many things to ensure that businesses succeed in Alberta. In fact, the CFIB, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, presented that hon. minister, Minister Bilous, and other trade ministers involved in the Canada free trade agreement with the golden scissors award, which is presented to those involved in helping eradicate red tape on Canada's small businesses. Congratulations, Minister. I would say that that's probably, again, another argument against moving this to committee.

Also noted by the CFIB – I'm starting to like these guys – is that the Canadian free trade agreement was "a major step towards resolving often conflicting rules and regulations across provinces."

In closing, Madam Speaker, I won't be supporting the amendment or the bill thereafter. You know, we know that regulations have an important role in protecting the health and safety of Alberta's families and workers. Regulations also help ensure that businesses are competing on a level playing field and ensure that clients and customers are getting a fair deal. One-for-one rules are overly simplistic because the number of individual regulations doesn't correlate with the burden imposed by regulations.

With that said, I do find this referral motion – I would not agree with sending this to committee at this time. Beyond that, I will not be supporting the motion nor the bill.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak to Bill 207, Regulatory Burden Reduction Act, to support referring it to the Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future. This bill speaks to me because it has a strong single focus in that it will reduce red tape for all Albertans.

As we've heard during previous debates on this bill, red tape includes any regulation, policy, procedure, guideline, and/or order put in place by government that creates unnecessary administrative burden. It affects businesses, not-for-profits, and individuals by adding on paperwork and making them run around simply to satisfy some bureaucrat or politician. The problem with red tape is that it costs time and money, and that's why it needs to go to committee for a thorough review. It does not generate wealth or create private-sector employment. It only results in frustration and takes time away from our businesses and leisure activities.

Bill 207 mandates that for each regulation created that adds administrative burden on a business, one or more regulation be eliminated. The concept is simple: if you create one bureaucratic rule, you also eliminate one or more. It is important to note that we're talking about eliminating administrative burdens that do not compromise the health and safety of Albertans. That's the only caveat.

Why is it so important that this bill go to committee? Because in 2014 the CFIB tallied the cost of red tape at more than $4.6 billion. That's a bureaucratic mire that hampers Alberta's economy and the equivalent of 15,000 lost jobs. The problem with red tape to our economy is that regulatory compliance costs are disproportionately borne by the small businesses, and small and medium-sized firms constitute the largest segment of the Canadian economy. Quite simply, outdated regulations are latent job killers.

With our economy desperately needing jobs for tens of thousands of unemployed Albertans, one of the best ways to encourage job creation is by reducing the regulatory burden on businesses, but it goes beyond just cutting regulations and administrative burdens, which is another reason it needs to go to committee for review. Bill 207 requires a change in government culture to come up with solutions that don't involve more rules. As soon as we come up with a new rule, the government must monitor and enforce that rule. Even the Minister of Labour agrees. Last month she announced changes to the Alberta immigrant nominee program that make it simpler and streamlined. Those are code words for reduced red tape.

Madam Speaker, these are just some of the reasons why it is important to refer Bill 207 to committee. Reducing regulations and thus the red tape on the books creates a business-friendly environment where entrepreneurs can be productive, creating jobs and wealth.

You know, the member opposite asked for an example. I talked to CAPP when I was there about a month ago, and they told me of an oil company out of Lloydminster that has a large oil reserve that crosses the borders of both provinces. It's the same pool on both sides. They're drilling lots on the Saskatchewan side right now and nothing in Alberta. I asked them why that would be. He said that on the Saskatchewan side it takes about six weeks to get permits to drill; on the Alberta side it's 12 to 18 months. So that's a good example of how reducing regulations and red tape would help to bring businesses and activity to Alberta.

You know, small businesses don't need a handout. They just need government to get out of their way sometimes. With Alberta's economy continuing to flounder, we can really consider this a way of removing burdens and letting it fly on its own. In the end, we all benefit.

I hope that for the good of Alberta all members are ready to support this referral motion. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the referral motion? The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gottfried: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner for bringing this bill forward for referral to committee, where I think it can receive the attention it deserves.

Madam Speaker, it seems like the NDP seems to like red tape, and I'm a little bit concerned about that. What we're hearing from small businesses is that they want government to support them, but they also would like them to get out of the way and let them create jobs and create wealth in our economy. Maybe some of the members that have spoken across the floor here are not talking to businesses as maybe they don't want to hear what they have to say. Maybe they don't want to hear about carbon tax, they don't want to hear about minimum wage, and most certainly, as we're hearing on this bill, they don't want to hear about the burden of unnecessary regulatory rules and compliance.

Madam Speaker, the regulatory burden negatively impacts things like competitiveness, investment, time sensitivity, business viability, affordability, innovation, and, yes, the result of all those things, jobs. The Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner mentioned the deregulation initiatives in British Columbia of the past during the Liberal regime there. They actually had a minister of deregulation, when they took power, whose sole job was to address the overburden of regulations. That member, Kevin Falcon: in fact, my sister-in-law worked for him for about four years as his constituency manager. I intend to speak with him to give us greater insights on the opportunity, and I encourage the members from the other side to read that report about the achievement there. This should not be a partisan issue. This should be about doing what's best for Alberta businesses to generate the wealth we need to support the services that Albertans demand and desire.

Reducing the regulatory burden placed on business by the government is an important step in allowing our job creators to flourish, as I've said before. Regulatory compliance costs disproportionately affect small and medium-sized businesses, who do not have teams and departments and staff to address them. These businesses are the economic drivers of the province, and they must be treated with respect. Again, these are struggling small businesses who are trying to keep their businesses alive and thriving under the burden of a tough economy, a carbon tax, and minimum wages. They don't have time to address the overburden of regulation.

Now, this doesn't mean that there should be a free-for-all and that every single regulation in place is unnecessary and should be removed. Far from that. However, there are instances where a regulation has become outdated, no longer reflects the realities of a particular industry, or simply is not producing the outcome which was expected upon its introduction.

During my time working in the home building industry in Calgary, I saw first-hand the detrimental effect that overzealous regulation can have on a particular industry. Oftentimes the company I worked with and many of our competitors would internally develop innovative and creative new options in terms of building form, lot sizes, building style, or neighbourhood design, indeed to take a risk, to break away from the proverbial cookie-cutter community and do something different: create more options, create more choice, and create greater affordability.

Now, anyone who has ever worked in home building or the development industry or the planning sector knows that receiving all the necessary approvals from various levels of government is a long and painstaking process, taking in some cases multiple years and millions of dollars of upfront investment with no guarantee of a return, the vagaries of an economy turning down in the middle of it certainly being one of them.

These insightful and unorthodox new approaches did not fit into the standard form that the various approval bodies had seen before. They addressed issues of affordability, density, creative design, the not-so-big house movement that we've seen emerge across North America, and various other risk-taking initiatives with respect to lot size, building form, as I've mentioned before, doing something different, doing something creative, and doing something that's not currently necessarily on the books.

Instead of recognizing industry for attempting to create something new or different and working with them to ensure that proper regulatory compliance was in place, these new ideas often languished, waiting for approvals for months and months beyond the already drawn-out process in place for standard builds. In fact, there was no reward for innovation or creativity. That drives innovation and creativity out of an industry – in this case, the building and development industry – and can be the same in many other sectors.

Time is money, and in an often low-margin industry time will drive innovation out and make it an unprofitable venture. Then it ceases, and the consumer, particularly the first-time homebuyer in this case, loses out on the opportunity to actually take advantage of that creativity and innovation. At the end of the day, businesses have to make money to stay alive, and in fact they create wealth for our society – they're taxed on that; that's provided; that is where the first-stage wealth is created in our society – which then allows us to hire people to deliver the public services that we have. Without that first-stage wealth, Madam Speaker, we have nothing. Having your project sitting through never-ending approval delays means that you aren't making money, and neither are we as a province. We are not generating wealth.

This ends up forcing risk avoidance upon the industry because the companies are afraid that the reward for being innovative and creative will be months and months of delays resulting in reduced or even eliminated profits and greater risk as it stretches out over greater time and economies change. What the consumer ends up with is a lower number of companies who are willing to step outside the box and to try new things, in fact, in many cases deciding not to build the product which they are seeking to offer to the marketplace. As I said, it results in the same old same old cookie-cutter approach being the only way to do business because it's the only way to ensure timely approval of projects and getting to market without undue costs or costly delays, which can kill business. Madam Speaker, innovation often involves risk and risk dollars.

This results in reduced choice for the consumer and builders who do not want to try anything new because basic compliance becomes the end goal to ensure timely processing and approvals. Why try something new when you can just go to the approvals, fill out the form the way it's supposed to be filled out, and never say: "Can we try something different? Can we add something new here? Is there a write-in area here for us to do something a little bit different?"

Madam Speaker, recent legislation has only added to this burden, I dare say, and shame on all of us for having layered that on top of these striving and thriving businesses, striving businesses who are trying to thrive and trying to survive. Recent changes to the MGA and city charters have allowed the province to completely abandon any responsibility for timely and efficient approvals of building projects. These changes have essentially removed any repercussions for municipalities who decide not to make a decision on an application for a subdivision or development application.

Now, oftentimes this has nothing to do with a municipality. These staff may be overworked or inundated with development and subdivision applications, depending on the location. That regulatory burden is not just a regulatory burden borne by those that have to apply for it; it's actually borne by the civil servants and the bureaucrats that have to administer it. However, it also gives these staff the ability to refuse a decision on a project they don't like for arbitrary reasons, even if that project meets all the planning requirements.

Changes like this are exactly the type of thing that industry does not need and we as a province do not need. The province needs to be demonstrating leadership, Madam Speaker, in reducing the regulatory compliance burden on industry, allowing those businesses to survive and then, hopefully, thrive, and in many cases this responsibility is being shirked. As my colleagues have stated previously, these issues extend far beyond the building and development industry.

I would like to once again thank my colleague from Cardston-Taber-Warner for bringing this bill forward, and I hope that everyone in this Assembly will support these needed changes to ensure that we support the concept and the reality of a functioning and efficient administration and bureaucratic process across all levels of government and leave that partisan ideology behind.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. W. Anderson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Today I rise to speak in favour of Bill 207, Regulatory Burden Reduction Act, and the amendment referring it to committee. This private member's bill has been introduced to reduce regulations that have previously been created and may be outdated and that also add administrative burden on small to medium businesses by mandating that for each regulation one or more regulations be eliminated.

Many other provinces already have implemented red tape reduction panels, task forces, and legislation, with good results. Some provinces, like B.C., mandate that a report be delivered every year on red tape reduction to help update information for better streamlining, to simplify process, and to make it easier and quicker for everyday businesses to deal with government.

Each year government should undertake and streamline initiatives, just as the B.C. government has, to reduce lengthy processing and added time for waiting and for decision-making, perhaps look into eliminating the duplication, and not only reduce the cost to the public but reduce the cost to businesses and to government. The question is: how do we modernize regulations and also maintain net zero increase?

Outdated regulations and overregulation has burdened business with so much red tape that costs to the business are sometimes costed in upward of thousands of dollars and many hours of unnecessary paperwork. Our economy has already been stifled in so many different ways through unnecessary taxes on small businesses and continual increases to the minimum wage that we need to always find ways to help small-business owners in this province succeed.

We need to streamline this process and perhaps begin by eliminating one or more of the outdated regulations that are already existing out there. Each and every time a new regulation is created, outdate an old one. Canadian-owned businesses spend over $30 billion a year on regulatory compliance. For our businesses to succeed, we need to do everything in our power to help them achieve that.

The federal Conservative government saved Canadian businesses over $32 million in administrative burden and also saved them 750,000 hours in time spent dealing with red tape each year. How did they do that? In 2012 they launched their red tape reduction action plan, which allowed them to complete the administrative burden baselines on businesses, which calculated a total of 129,860 federal requirements and regulations and related forms that could impact Canadian businesses across various sectors and industries all across this country.

The previous government in 2011 enacted a red tape task force. Their report concluded with four recommendations. One was to develop a small-business strategy that acknowledges and responds to the needs of Alberta small businesses. As we can see, the needs of all of Alberta's small businesses have not been considered. This needs to change if we want Alberta to flourish.

Secondly, they recommended that we need to strengthen the Alberta government's process for making, amending, and reviewing all regulations. I believe that part of this equation would be dealt with if we enacted this bill.

Thirdly, they said that we need to work with other provinces, governments, and related bodies to streamline business regulations. This would also help to decrease the burden.

Fourthly, encourage a service delivery culture in government that is collaborative, user focused, and ensures greater accountability.

Unfortunately, at the time, the report never called for reduction or elimination of outdated or overlapping regulatory burdens. However, the conclusion was that the cumulative effects of regulations are detrimental to small business. If this was considered detrimental to small businesses, then it's no wonder our small-business industry is struggling under the current tax and wage conditions.

I do believe that as legislators we need to and can do better. This bill is a great way to start eliminating regulatory burden. I hope that all of us in this House will be able to agree on that today. You see, Madam Speaker, these regulations and the compliance costs are carried mostly by small business. A large segment of contributors in the Canadian economy is the small businesses and medium-sized firms and businesses here in Alberta. We need to do more to help them succeed. When they succeed, all Albertans will benefit.

A previous Prime Minister once said that outdated regulations hobble business and are the silent killer of jobs. This is only one piece of the pie of things that need to be fixed so that our businesses in Alberta can grow and flourish again and again and maintain and retain staff, employees, and growth factors. It is vitally important that government do all they can and work for the citizens of this province. Optimizing and minimizing regulations will only help to create an environment where regulations and policies are easy for everyday businesses to understand. It will create simplicity and a straightforward environment, and not only that; it lowers the regulatory burden on the women and men who work hard in this province every day. This needs to be the focus of our provincial government.

Canada has always been recognized as one of the best places in the world to do business. We had a solid fiscal standing, and when other countries were experiencing rising debt and increasing tax burden, Canada had a competitive tax regime and a robust regulatory system. We need to restore this confidence here in Alberta and in Canada. We need to maintain a competitive edge, increase small and medium businesses, and help them increase their productivity. We need to be constantly looking at innovative ways to improve the conditions for businesses so they can thrive here in Alberta. Businesses need predictability, transparency, and accountability, and that starts here with us in this House. We need to make red tape reduction a priority. We can help start and launch this by supporting this Regulatory Burden Reduction Act. It is vitally important for this province.

Of course, we cannot be overly cautious when it comes to health and safety. We recognize that in health and safety cases it may not be appropriate to strike through regulations.

Albertans are fully aware of the burden of too many regulations. Many businesses and families in my constituency face such burdens in bureaucracy and are burdened by bureaucracy on a daily basis. They've suffered due to tax increases and minimum wage increases. They are all too aware of the many hoops they are constantly having to jump through. Whether it be time away from their families spent on paperwork or extra financial demands, these regulations imposed on their businesses are taxing on their time and on their efforts and on their personal lives. Having to continually process the same paperwork over and over and over again is frustrating, and it's a lot of money and a lot of time wasted.

We need to demand and require strong evidence of the need before regulating something. All existing regulations that remain should be relevant. Albertans need to have clear and consistent regulations simply and properly communicated. They also should be able to access and locate information on all provincial regulations relatively pain free. We need departments to verify the impacts of the regulations on stakeholders, whether they're developing a new regulation or reviewing an old one. This really needs to be the key when deciding which ones to update and which ones to discard. Albertans are often tired of being bounced around. We need to offer them more stability and some incentive to stay and bring back the Alberta advantage.

This is why I'm going to support the Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner on Bill 207, Regulatory Burden Reduction Act, and its amendment. This bill will ensure that each and every regulation created that adds administrative burden on a business, and no more, should be deducted. Across the House let's fully and finally all support something that will benefit business owners in this province.

Thank you.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, November 14, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon.

Hon. members, please join me in the singing of O Canada, our national anthem, led by Mr. Robert Clark, in the language of your choice.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all thy sons command.
Car ton bras sait porter l'épée,
Il sait porter la croix!
Ton histoire est une épopée
Des plus brillants exploits.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Ms Jabbour: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today on your behalf to introduce to all members of the Assembly your daughter Nicoelle Wanner; her husband, Tyler Wiens; and their three children – Zachary, Marinn, and Gibson – who are visiting us today from Medicine Hat. Zachary Wanner Wiens is 11 years old and in grade 5 at l'école St. Thomas Aquin. Zachary enjoys playing hockey, is an avid follower of all sports, and is a big fan of the Beatles. Me, too. Marinn Wanner Wiens is nine years old and in grade 3 at l'école St. Thomas Aquin. Marinn is an avid follower of fashion, has a talent for sewing, and enjoys swimming. Gibson Cole Wanner Wiens is five years old and in kindergarten. Gibson's favourite pastimes include breakdancing and building with Lego. He recently lost his first tooth. Grandpa, you've got to come through on that one. Tyler Wiens works as an agricultural lender for Farm Credit Canada. He coaches kids' baseball and hockey and plays rec hockey. Nicoelle Wanner is a family physician with an interest in mental health advocacy, pediatrics, and lifestyle. The family and your wife, Mrs. Joan Emard-Wanner, are all seated in your gallery. I would ask them now to all please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Thank you. Nice to have you here.

The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all Members of the Legislative Assembly a local, passionate United Conservative Party supporter and director of the interim joint board, Miss Natalie Pon. Some of you may recognize Natalie. She was the driver for updating the Conservative Party of Canada's policy declaration to be LGBTQ-plus inclusive and cospearheaded the change for the federal Conservatives to recognize marriage equality. I would ask Natalie to rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Transportation and Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have two introductions today. First, it's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to the Assembly six volunteers from Mothers Against Drunk Driving. Their efforts at public education and advocacy have saved lives and reduced injuries from impaired driving. They are Brenda Johnson, chair of the National Board of Directors; Denise Dubyk; Amanda Sawatzky; Susan Semotiuk; Gillian Phillips; and Darlene Urquhart. I would ask them to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Mason: As I said, Mr. Speaker, I have two introductions today.

The Speaker: I'm sorry.

Mr. Mason: I have two guests from the Alberta Motor Transport Association. The AMTA represents all sectors of the highway transportation industry. They are valuable partners in promoting high standards of safety and compliance for safety of the public in the transportation industry. It's my pleasure to introduce Dan Duckering, the past chair of the AMTA board of directors, and Chris Nash, the vice-chair. I would ask them to also please rise to receive the traditional warm welcome of our Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Now Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's an honour and a privilege to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Executive Director Donna Oberik and members of the Canadian Injured Workers Association of Alberta. The association provides a voice for injured workers and works tirelessly representing the needs and interests of injured workers. I would now ask all my guests to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Mr. Carlier: Mr. Speaker, it's my sincere pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly a family from the great district of Whitecourt-St. Anne. Two weeks ago I was pleased to announce on behalf of the hon. Brian Mason, Minister of Transportation, much-needed safety improvements, including traffic lights, better lighting, improved highway signage, and widened turn lanes, at the intersection of highways 43 and 22. The Walsh family of Mayerthorpe lost their loving father, Patrick, to an accident that took place at that dangerous intersection in 2013. They have been advocating for improved safety at that intersection, and our government took action. I would like to ask Ann Walsh, her daughter Kate, and son Mike Walsh to now rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Kristine Ritchie. Kristine is a bachelor of social work student from the University of Calgary, central and northern Alberta region, the faculty that I used to be an instructor of just before I was elected, and she is currently doing her field placement in my office. She's a certified crisis worker at the Canadian Mental Health Association and is a passionate advocate for helping vulnerable Albertans. She's also one of my constituents, so I'm very pleased about that, too. I'd ask Kristine to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Health and Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to introduce three long-time residents of the beautiful constituency of Edmonton-Glenora. These three tenacious women are founding members and directors of the Old Glenora Conservation Association. The association is committed to maintaining the integrity of the community by keeping its history of over 100 years alive and its built heritage intact for the benefit of present and future generations. I'd invite Margaret Robinson, Barbara Finlay, and Lynn Odynski, seated in the members' gallery, to please rise and receive the traditional welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Are there any other introductions today?

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Jeff Nesbitt of the Canadian Men's Health Foundation and Michael Solberg of Global Public Affairs. Jeff is in town holding meetings to talk about the importance of men leading healthier lives. I look forward to speaking with both of them this afternoon. I'd ask them both to please rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

1:40

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise today and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly my good friend Arundee Singh Sandhu, a small-business owner in southeast Edmonton, a long-time PC Party volunteer who campaigned for Conservative MLAs in Alberta, believe me, for almost 20 years – I'm sure that he must have started when he was two or three – past PC Youth and PC Alberta executive, and my friend. I have literally known him since he was almost this height. I'll ask him to rise and get the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

Ministerial Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Bullying Awareness Week

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to speak in honour of Bullying Awareness Week. I spent this morning with a wonderful and engaged group of grade 6 students at Richard Secord school. I was fortunate to be able to listen in as they talked about what they think bullying is and how we can work together to make schools safer and more inclusive.

No parent wants to see their child witness or experience bullying, but when I asked how many students had witnessed bullying and how many know what to do to stop it, most of them raised their hands. It was heartbreaking to see so many young people who have seen or experienced bullying first-hand, but it was also inspiring to know that young people are aware and are working together to stand up to bullies.

As we all know, bullying can take place anywhere: in schools, at work, or at home. Bullying hurts everyone. It makes people feel isolated and alone and can have a significant and lasting impact on someone's life. So this week and indeed all year round we are asking Albertans to stand up for those who are bullied and to watch out for each other to ensure that our homes, schools, workplaces, and communities are safe and healthy.

Our government is taking action by providing resources to enable Albertans to help someone else and support those who are suffering. Our family and community safety program has supported healthy relationships and antibullying projects across this province. Our $25 million increase to family and community support services programs is helping build strong and resilient communities, and our 24-hour bullying helpline is available to those who need someone to talk to. We also have resources available across our partnering ministries and through the Alberta Human Rights Commission, and we are working with our community partners to promote respect and inclusion and to help everyone in our communities know what they can do.

We must do all we can to ensure that all Albertans but especially those who are at risk of greater marginalization and discrimination have safe, caring, and welcoming environments. We know that bullying can come in many different forms. When I listened to students today, it reaffirmed my belief about why GSAs are so important. Our young people must feel proud of who they are, and they deserve a safe and respectful environment to be who they are. Our fight to ensure that students can form or join a GSA without fear of retribution from peers, teachers, or parents is about reassuring them that they are free to be themselves on their own terms and in their own time.

We know that there is much more work to be done to realize our vision of a bully-free Alberta, an Alberta where everyone feels safe and welcome in their schools, communities, and workplaces. This week is an important reminder that it takes all of us to build safe and healthy communities. For those of us here in the Legislature, it means setting an example of what it means to differ in opinions and beliefs but to do so in a respectful manner. We are all no strangers to lively debate, but I call on all of us to ensure that we speak to each other in a way that sets an example for all Albertans.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am very grateful to rise and speak about Bullying Awareness Week. I applaud the minister of human services for having events throughout the year to promote awareness about bullying. Our schools and workplaces need to be healthy and respectful places for all to allow us to grow. How can our children learn to trust and build healthy relationships if bullies break those trusts? It is critical to have healthy and respectful relationships. All of us and all of our children deserve that.

Bullying causes poor mental health outcomes, which can manifest into physical health issues. This causes school and workplace productivity issues, absenteeism, a drain on the health care system, and for matters that are one hundred per cent preventable.

This year's stand up is a call to stand up against bullying. If you are bullied, resources are available at Alberta human services, and the number for that is 1.888.456.2323. It is open 24/7. There is also an online chat at the human services website for children and teens facing bullying. That number: 1.800.668.6868. No one – no one – should have to go to work or school and face bullying.

In the Legislature we can disagree without being disagreeable. Bullying, threats, and intimidation do not work in the Legislature, and they should not work in schools or in the workplace. Let us all stand up and stop it now.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was not informed that others wanted to respond today, but I will still ask for unanimous consent of the House to allow the leader of the Alberta Party to respond to the ministerial statement.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm really pleased to rise this afternoon to speak in honour of Bullying Awareness Week, an initiative that aspires to promote awareness about bullying. Across the province many young people are intimidated and ostracized at school and in their communities. On the playground, after school, in the hallways, and in the home bullying is endemic to our society and can cause depression and anxiety, sadness, and loneliness. We all can do more to build resilience to bullying and to make sure that no young person experiences the hardship and isolation that can come from it.

Something many kids today have to deal with is online bullying. The statistics and the numbers are concerning, with 2 in 5 parents reporting that their child has been involved in a cyberbullying incident. Social media is becoming an increasing presence in our lives and in the lives of our young people. Bullying Awareness Week should not only be about physical or verbal intimidation but digital aggression as well. If we want to make a real difference in ending bullying, we can call bullies on their behaviour, support those who've been bullied, and model what healthy relationships can look like. I ask all members of this House to be aware of all forms of bullying and to take action when you can.

Thank you.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition.

Keystone XL Pipeline Project

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we learned yesterday that the Nebraska Public Service Commission will decide on Monday whether to approve the proposed route for the Keystone XL pipeline. Sadly, we know that many of the NDP's friends, including current NDP caucus members, have been diligently working for years to kill off Keystone XL, working to kill off any and all other export opportunities for Alberta's oil. Can the Premier inform this House what the NDP government has done to argue the merits of Keystone XL before the Nebraska regulatory body?

1:50

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Of course, our government is glad to see progress on the Keystone XL pipeline project, which we know will help create jobs here in Alberta by allowing for our product to be shipped with less expense. At the same time, what we do all have to remember is that the U.S., while our biggest customer, has now also become our biggest competitor. What we need to do in Alberta is focus on getting our product to tidewater. That's a fundamentally important thing, and that's why our government continues to work so hard on achieving that outcome.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Nixon: We know that the NDP's current support for Keystone XL is half hearted at best. In fact, when in opposition, the Premier herself directly stated in regard to Keystone XL, and I quote: we're against it. Perhaps the NDP have warmed to Keystone XL slightly since their friend Justin Trudeau has sunk two other major pipeline projects. Thankfully, Keystone XL received NEB approval in 2010 under the leadership of Prime Minister Stephen Harper, well before Justin Trudeau had a chance to meddle in the process. Can the Premier tell us what, if anything, the NDP government is doing to ensure the success of Keystone XL?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I've said before, our government is absolutely focused on diversifying the markets for our important product and, particularly, getting our product to tidewater, which is why we continue to work very hard on ensuring that the pipeline, which has been approved as a result of our advocacy, actually gets built. So we will be travelling across the country to talk about that. We will be advocating at every possible level in terms of the adjudicative procedure, where we actually have standing, unlike in the States, where we don't actually have standing. We will continue to work very hard because we know that, at the end of the day, getting that pipeline built is . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Nixon: We're against it: that's a direct quote from the NDP Premier of Alberta. On this side of the House we are in favour of pipelines in every possible direction.

Given that the same forces that successfully managed to kill Northern Gateway and Energy East now have Trans Mountain in their crosshairs and given that we have a Prime Minister that seemingly won't lift a finger to actually advocate for Trans Mountain, Premier, are you leaving this issue of critical importance to our province in the hands of Justin Trudeau, who has publicly mused about phasing out Alberta's oil sands? Do you actually trust Justin Trudeau with this process? I can tell you that Albertans don't.

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In fact, not only has our minister of environment and our minister of economic development and myself been down to the States to talk about the importance of enhancing energy trade and the pipelines associated with that over the course of the last several months, but in the areas over which we have control and agency, which is in Canada, we continue to work very hard and to represent all Albertans' interests and ultimately all Canadians' interests on the need to get the Trans Mountain pipeline built, and we'll be successful.

The Speaker: Second main question.

Federal Tax and Energy Policies

Mr. Nixon: We've been pushing this government for some time to actually stand up to the Trudeau Liberal attacks on Alberta, and on Friday I was happy to see that the government kind of, sort of took our advice. The Finance minister criticized Ottawa's revenue-sharing plan on the upcoming cannabis tax, and we agree. The provinces, which bear the majority of the costs, do deserve more than 50 per cent of the revenue, but why is it that the NDP are only willing to criticize Ottawa when it involves the state's bank account, not when it hits the pocketbooks of Albertans? When will the NDP stand up to their friend Justin Trudeau's attack on small businesses and his 67 per cent increase on the carbon tax?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, what our government will do is work with the federal government, which has made a decision to take climate change seriously on behalf of today's generations and generations and generations to come. We will work with them on matters of increasing renewable energy, on investing in green infrastructure, and on moving forward on things that will reduce overall greenhouse gas emissions because that is the way of the future. Pretending that the problem doesn't exist is a strategy of the past, and it is one that Albertans have abandoned.

Mr. Nixon: For months we urged the government to vocally object to the Trudeau Liberals' attack on small businesses. The NDP's response: they told Albertans to go weigh in on Liberal sham consultations. This NDP government stayed in hiding while people like Premier Brad Wall, Jason Kenney, the Official Opposition of Alberta, and others have been speaking out about this important issue. Now that the NDP, like the Cowardly Lion in The Wizard of Oz, has found some courage to stand up to Ottawa, will they vocally denounce the Trudeau Liberals' attacks on small business?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Rather than relitigating Mr. Kenney's loss to the Trudeau Liberals, what our government will do is stand up for Alberta small business. That is why we cut the small-business tax by a third. That is why we introduced two new tax credits. That's why we're restoring training programs for entrepreneurs. That's why we're working to expand small businesses into new markets. That's why we are the fastest growing economy in the country, and we will continue to be.

Mr. Nixon: The Trudeau Liberals meddle in the pipeline approval process and kill a pipeline critical to Alberta. They invade Alberta's constitutionally guaranteed right to control our resources, and the NDP barely make a noise, not even a peep. But on cannabis taxes the Finance minister is sent out to hold an emergency press conference. When will the NDP respond to the Trudeau Liberals' attacks on everyday Albertans with the same enthusiasm they use to defend their own bank accounts? If the NDP is now in the business of standing up to Ottawa, will they now vocally denounce the NEB changes, including the constitutional intrusion on upstream emissions?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, as the member opposite ought to know, in fact, our government has made our position with respect to the changes on the NEB very clear on behalf of the energy industry here in Alberta. But, you know, all that the members opposite want to do is fight with Ottawa. It's as if they see this Legislature as the personal plaything of their new leader... [interjections]

The Speaker: Order, please.

Ms Notley: ... who's trying to work out his issues from the last federal election. You know what? Our job is actually to govern and to work for and with Albertans to make Albertans' lives better, and that's what we will ... [interjections]

The Speaker: Okay. Four more days, and then we can all have a break.

The third main question. The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Provincial Response to Opioid Trafficking and Use

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We all have been working so hard to find ways to stem the tide of fentanyl deaths. My pill press law, more addictions counselling, money to help police uncover drug labs: the list of recommendations goes on. But this past weekend the associate minister responsible for the fentanyl file opened the door to – wait for it – decriminalizing all illicit drugs. This is a grossly irresponsible message. Will the associate minister, fully and without excuses or equivocation, withdraw her comments?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There are no plans to decriminalize possession of any drugs at this time. The designation of drugs as ... [interjections]

The Speaker: Order, please.

Ms Payne: ... legal or illegal is a federal responsibility. Our focus is on addressing the opioid crisis, protecting public safety, and ensuring adequate treatment spaces are available to Albertans.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, this is outrageous. At a time when Albertans are dying at the hands of illicit narcotics, the government is sending a message that perhaps those very narcotics shouldn't be illegal. What message does that send to the drug dealers pushing this poison? Will the Premier clearly denounce her own minister's irresponsible and dangerous musings?

Ms Payne: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, our focus is on addressing the opioid crisis. In this House we've spoken repeatedly about how this is a public health emergency unlike any that we've ever seen before, and it requires a response that's different than the ones we've seen before. That is why our government is focusing on addressing the harms of opioid use and providing treatment spaces. Substance use is a medical condition that requires a health care response, unlike the war on drugs, that has failed, that this side keeps pushing.

Mr. Ellis: Heroin, crystal meth, fentanyl, crack cocaine: I could go on and on. As a police officer I've seen first-hand the human devastation that these hard drugs cause. Now is not the time to speculate about making these poisons legal. I ask again. Will the NDP firmly and without hesitation denounce speculation about decriminalizing hard narcotics?

Ms Payne: Mr. Speaker, I will say it again. There are no plans to decriminalize possession of other drugs at this time.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow. [interjections] Order.

2:00 Auditor General Report on Health Care

Mr. Clark: Why, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last spring the Auditor General released a comprehensive look into Alberta's health care system. Instead of making new recommendations, he simply took the 41 recommendations he'd already made and summarized them. His conclusion: Alberta's $21 billion health care system is an orchestra without a conductor, which led to poor co-ordination, ineffective information sharing, and fragmented hospital-focused care. To the Premier: what specific actions have you taken to break down barriers in our health care system and build a preventative, integrated model of care?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm incredibly proud of the work that we've done with health care professionals. There certainly have been musings about transformation in the past, but they were done in a way that was doing something to the profession rather than with the profession. What we've been able to do very effectively is bring about a new government framework with primary care networks. That is something I'm incredibly proud of. Physicians stepped up to the table with us as well as other members of the primary care network team, and we're being able to move forward in a way that's collaborative, working to make sure that the patient health home is the model we all have moving forward.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Auditor General found that much of the care Albertans currently receive is one-off and focused on acute care either in a doctor's office or in a hospital, but there is a big gap when it comes to managing chronic conditions, including mental health, over the long term. Instead of measuring quality, the system focuses on funding parameters, on union negotiations, and it puts bureaucratic rules ahead of patient needs. Equally troubling is his comment that politics continue to play a big role in our system. Again to the Premier: what specific, measurable actions are you taking to address these problems once and for all?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, I'm very glad to have an opportunity to respond. I took the time to sit down with the Auditor General as well and talk through his report and his recommendations, and he did have a lot to say about inflammatory opposition questions that certainly cause great disruption to the system. I hope they also took time to sit down and talk to him about that same evolution of the health care system. I'm incredibly proud of the fact that for the first time in probably since AHS was created, we are moving forward in a collaborative way with the health care providers, with primary care networks, with the government to ensure that we have the right care in the right place. A big part of that is the evolution of the PCN model and working with Alberta Health Services.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Clark: Well, that's interesting, Mr. Speaker. The Auditor General called this government's actions piecemeal at best. You'd think that after two and a half years they would at least have started on a plan. And speaking of plans, the AG said that the government should urgently address the overlapping roles of AHS and Alberta Health. Simply put, Alberta Health should hand over a lot of responsibility, but I suspect this ties into his comment about politics. Again to the Premier: when will we finally see a plan to implement the Auditor General's recommendations? And when we do, will it include clear, measurable goals so Albertans can track your progress?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I was very happy to meet with the Auditor General. Again, this specific report doesn't actually have recommendations in it. It has a number of different findings, and we're happy to move forward in collaboration with the Auditor General to do that while making public health care publicly accessible to all Albertans.

We know that the opposition wants to privatize health care. We believe health care should be based on medical need, not based on the size of your wallet. We know that Jason Kenney and the opposition plan to give his wealthy donors priority access to health care, Mr. Speaker. That's been made clear. We are building new hospitals, protecting Albertans throughout this province. I know who I trust with public health care, and it sure isn't the guys opposite.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Consumer Protection

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans have some of the highest consumer spending of any province in Canada. Consumer spending across the province rose by 8 per cent over the last year, and Albertans are now spending more than they did before the drop in oil prices. I was personally involved in the public consultation process to provide better protections to consumers. To the Minister of Service Alberta: how is the government working to make sure that Albertans are treated fairly, whether they spend their hard-earned dollars at the car dealership, the grocery store, or a local small business?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Service Alberta.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. We're working to make life better by protecting families from scams, misleading information, unfair tactics, aggressive sales pitches, and price gouging. We're taking action to help businesses compete on a level playing field. This summer we heard from Albertans through an online survey and open houses on ways that we can create a level playing field for both buyers and sellers. That creates consumer confidence, and it's good for business.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: what is the government hearing from its consultations with the public and stakeholders regarding consumer protection?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We consulted with over 3,000 people this summer about consumer protection. So far the survey is very clear on two aspects. Albertans want strong consumer protections, as the paradise papers, for example, showed, and many fans, for example, feel that buying a concert ticket is a rigged game. Albertans want confidence that their consumer rights are protected. The details about the actual changes will come after we analyze all of the feedback received through the survey, open houses as well as the meetings that we had with business and community groups. The priority that we have will be ensuring that Albertans realize the changes that reflect their desire for strong protections and confidence that their consumer rights are respected.

The Speaker: The second supplemental.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again, to the same minister: what is the government doing to consult with businesses on the issue of consumer protection?

The Speaker: The hon. minister. [interjections]
Order.

An Hon. Member: Incoming. Incoming.

An Hon. Member: Tough one.

The Speaker: Order.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is about finding good solutions to getting bad actors out of the way that harm good businesses. Strong consumer laws are good for businesses. We know the majority of businesses are honest and that with strong rules that protect buyers, shoppers will be more confident doing business with them. We want a marketplace that's good for buyers and sellers, and that's why we've been consulting with a variety of stakeholders from the business community to ensure that their perspective is reflected. This includes over 30 stakeholder meetings that we've had, including two round-tables held directly with members of the Edmonton and Calgary chambers of commerce.

Resources for LGBTQ2S Students and Their Parents

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, the introduction of Bill 24 is an important step in affirming the privacy rights of children in GSAs. We know that GSAs promote the mental health and well-being of our LGBTQ2S students. One thing is being missed, and that is the involvement of supportive parents, that also contribute to the health and well-being of our LGBTQ2S students. Parents are the most important partners in discussing and promoting safe-sex practices, building respectful relationships with a partner, and setting reasonable boundaries for underage children. To the Premier: in situations where the student consents and where it won't compromise the privacy of other students, what's being done to bring supportive parents into the conversation?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health and Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the very important question. As a former public school board trustee, I definitely spent a great deal of time engaging with students, and this was one topic that they frequently brought up. One of the things they talked about is that when you have time with your peers to talk about your coming-out experience, it can empower other kids on how to have those conversations with their parents. There certainly is a great deal of conversation to empower youth themselves to be able to be strong advocates and welcome their parents to a loving conversation which includes how they can live their lives as they are in a safe way.

Mr. Fraser: Given that in many cases LGBTQ students don't want their parents notified, not because there's any danger or lack of acceptance but simply that it can be a daunting conversation to have with their family, and given that many LGBTQ students may be negatively affected by wanting to tell their parents but don't know how and given that these students may come to their GSAs for advice on this issue, to the Premier: what resources are being made available to GSAs to support students that want to tell their family about their sexuality but aren't sure how?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member, again, for the important question. There are definitely support groups out there for GSAs and GSA facilitators. I know that when I was with Edmonton public, there was one staff identified at the school as a safe contact. They received professional development training. The ATA has extensive supports for teachers on how to run these organizations as well or support the youth in running these organizations, rather. Definitely, empowering youth to be confident in speaking and in engaging in these important conversations with the people who love them is a big part of what GSAs provide support on.

Mr. Fraser: Given that to a parent the health, safety, and well-being of their child is the most important thing in the world and given that in cases where their child is in immediate danger of harming themselves or others, the parent needs to be informed and given that one concern that I've heard from parents is that the increased privacy protection in Bill 24 will interfere with the school's ability to communicate with them in crisis situations, to the same minister: can you assure this House that nothing in this legislation will interfere with the ability of schools to notify parents when their child is in immediate danger or crisis?

2:10

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and again to the member. Let me be definitively clear. If a child is at risk of self-harm or harm from another, there is a legal responsibility for individuals to be informed, that includes the parents if it's a self-harm concern. Teachers are well aware of their teaching quality standard requirements in that regard, and they will continue to provide their diligence in terms of acting in the role of a parent and providing information to the parent if their child is ever at risk.

Thank you again, Mr. Speaker.

Access to Information

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, this is a government that is constantly under investigation for its rule breaking and secretive ways. Whether it's offering gift cards to delete e-mails or escalating delays for FOIP requests, this secretive government has a crisis of its own making. What's needed is political leadership to clean up this mess. Will the Premier agree that political staff interfering with access to information requests is not only unethical but is illegal?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Service Alberta and Status of Women.

Ms McLean: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Our government very much values the values of transparency, honesty, and protection of the public. We are confident that our actions are very much in line with the law. The results that the member across the way talks about – it's important that we put this in context. The e-mails he's referring to amount to less than .1 per cent of all GOA e-mails. It's important that we delete transitory documents so that they don't clog up the system and so that we have good, accurate accounting of documentation.

Thank you.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, given that today the UCP Official Opposition unearthed a FOIP document showing that this government is breaking the law and given that we released e-mails that show that one day before a freedom of information request was due to be released to the opposition, the Premier's former chief of staff put a full stop to the release and directly interfered and given that this was against all of the advice of the experts in the department, why, Premier, are your staff politically interfering with access to information requests? [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

The hon. minister.

An Hon. Member: It's still illegal.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I'm not sure exactly who said that it was illegal. That's not the kind of word we want to hear in this House. Allegations such as that are very, very serious.

Hon. minister, please proceed.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In fact, my comments were going to be along the same line. I would encourage the member opposite that if he feels a particular way, he ought to bring up his issues with the correct channels.

But at this time I will reiterate, certainly, that we are confident our actions are in line with the law, Mr. Speaker. Again, we take access to information very seriously. Certainly, there is more work to do, but we have improved turnaround times for FOIP requests by hiring more staff. We're also proactively sharing more information than the government of Alberta ever has.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, given that the Premier's former chief of staff directly interfered with an access to information request from the Official Opposition, will the Premier denounce this sort of behaviour, or is this the type of unethical law-breaking behaviour we can expect from this government?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McLean: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm taking it that the member opposite would like to apply for the position of the OIPC, given that he feels fit to determine matters of interest. They would know best what constitutes ethical and unethical disclosure, given that the leader of their party certainly does not see fit to disclose his campaign contributions or be particularly open with the public after having promised to do exactly that.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I was wrong. We only have three days left, not four.

Coal Community Transition Funding

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, this government has finally gotten around to releasing long overdue plans to help Albertans currently working in thermal coal mines and coal-fired power plants after a summer where mayors of the affected towns referred to the government's communications with them as being pathetic and long on words, short on action. But two years late and a million short is better than never, I guess. To the minister of economic development. Royalty collection from coal last year alone was $21 million. Do you think that your $40 million Band-Aid is adequate compensation for the economic devastation your climate leadership plan has wrought on the affected towns?

Mr. Mason: Mr. Speaker, you know, coal workers have had a proud history in helping to power our prosperous and industrious province. We want to tell all coal workers: we're there for you. We're supporting workers by establishing a $40 million coal workforce transition fund to provide income support for impacted workers. We're supporting them with tuition vouchers, third-party retraining, and a variety of professional certification courses, and we're supporting their communities. We have those communities' backs. We stand up for them and their workers.

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, given that today almost 2,000 people work in coal-generated power and associated mining operations across Alberta and given that towns such as Wabamun, Hanna, and Forestburg rely on the economic activity generated by these high-paying jobs and will struggle to survive without this industry and its workers and given serious concerns that there will be no local jobs to replace good, mortgage-paying jobs in the coal industry, again to the minister: what specific industries with similar pay and benefits do you expect these workers in these affected towns to transition into, or do they all go on to . . .

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and democratic renewal.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We have the backs of these coal workers and these coal communities, who will get help from retraining and income supports. I must say that the Harper-Kenney governments did absolutely nothing for coal workers when Stephen Harper decided to phase out coal. We are supporting the communities through the transition with the coal community transition fund. Intake for that fund is open now and will run until November 30, 2017. We encourage all communities impacted to apply, and we will have people on the ground, talking to these workers directly, helping them.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Gotfried: I think that's on their backs, Mr. Speaker.

Given that over the next 13 years more than half the people employed in thermal coal will lose their jobs and, again, given that the Finance Minister is constantly saying that the government will not balance the budget by putting more people out of work unless they work in coal, I guess, and given that your government has spent over $9 million advertising your climate leadership plan, again to the minister. Almost $10 million to advertise and only $40 million to help: how many more Albertans could have been helped in their stressful transition away from thermal coal if you hadn't wasted all that money advertising your unpopular, unmeasurable plan?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We are helping workers with tuition vouchers, with professional certification, with retraining. A lot of people have said positive things about this new plan. The mayor of Hanna, Chris Warwick, has said that these supports will go a long way for workers in the community. The Coal Association of Canada has said, "The release of the panel's recommendations and the announcement of the Coal Workforce Transition Fund is a step in the right direction." We have their backs, and we will be there.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Methane Emission Reduction

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our federal and provincial governments are committed to reducing methane emissions. Tim McMillan, president of CAPP, is quoted as saying, "We have a solution that positions Alberta as a global leader on methane emissions reductions, while maintaining a strong economy at home." This solution would help us remain competitive and retain jobs. To the Minister of Energy: have you listened to the concerns of industry, or are you taking into account the fact that Alberta already has world-class regulations on methane reduction?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, we're proud that we have been working alongside industry on a made-in-Alberta plan to reduce methane emissions by 45 per cent. We'll soon be announcing the next steps in a balanced plan that's going to protect jobs while also reducing pollution. We know what's at stake, Mr. Speaker, including jobs and the health of our province, and we want to leave behind a province that's better for our children and our grandchildren.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Albertans have seen that this government's idea of consultation is to act first and tell later and given that municipalities in northeastern Alberta such as in my constituency of Bonnyville-Cold Lake have already expressed disappointment that they were not consulted by the federal government prior to the regulation changes, to the Minister: will you promise here today to protect 7,000 good-paying Alberta-wide jobs by not forcing the methane reduction plan on our oil sands without proper consultation?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the 45 per cent reduction target off 2013 levels came about as a result of consultation, in particular with industry who came to us with a plan saying that we can do better in Alberta, that we've got the know-how, we've got the workforce, we've got the clean tech capability just waiting on the sidelines. One of the things we did was fund $40 million worth of the Emissions Reduction Alberta clean tech call. We developed an offset protocol to incent that early action. We are committed to solving the problems of the future and putting Albertans to work.

The Speaker: Thank you.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that you've just stated you're not going to protect 7,000 jobs and given that new regulations may be detrimental to the economic growth of the Bonnyville-Lloydminster region and given that this area of the province cannot afford another round of mass layoffs that are anticipated to affect at least a thousand local workers in my constituency due to this methane reduction plan, to the minister: what assurances can you give the worried oil and gas workers in my constituency of Bonnyville-Cold Lake that this government will work with industry to save local jobs in my constituency?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I mentioned, we're working with industry for a made-in-Alberta plan. We do not want a plan forced on us by Ottawa, so we're working very hard with industry for this. We're taking steps to reduce pollution and tackle climate change and preserve jobs. We are very proud of the collaboration we've had. When these regulations are introduced, there will be a period of time for anybody in Alberta to reflect back on it and give us the feedback. This is about Alberta jobs, this is about our energy industry, and it's about standing up for Alberta.

Postsecondary Institution Infrastructure Projects

Mr. Horne: Mr. Speaker, there's an infrastructure deficit on Alberta's college, university, and technical school campuses. As a student I know the value of having a quality space for all aspects of my education. Students simply learn better when they have a great lecture hall, a world-class library, and even somewhere to socialize with their peers. To the Minister of Advanced Education: given that there are over 264,000 full-time and part-time students in Alberta, how is this government working to reduce the infrastructure deficit on campuses to give students the world-class facilities that they need?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. We know that students learn best in modern learning environments. That's why our government has invested more than a billion dollars over four years in improving infrastructure on campuses all across the province, including projects like the Northern Lakes campus expansion in High Prairie and the University of Calgary's MacKimmie complex redevelopment. Our government is supporting the important campus infrastructure projects that were left by the wayside under the previous government. Alberta students deserve better than the huge infrastructure deficit that was left by the Conservatives, and I'm happy to say that they are getting better from our government.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Building a multilevel library or lecture hall is surely no easy feat. It involves architects, engineers, skilled trades workers, and many others to build something like MacEwan University's recently opened Allard Hall. To the same minister: how many good-paying jobs is this government supporting by investing in campus infrastructure?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government knows that Alberta is home to the most talented workforce in the country, and we're proud to support good-paying jobs all across the province. Recent infrastructure projects on campuses have created thousands of good-paying construction jobs and will provide additional hundreds of ongoing jobs at campuses. Our government is going to continue to make needed investments in campus infrastructure because it's the right thing to do for our students, it's the right thing to do for our higher education system, and it's the right thing to do for the province of Alberta. Our government's plan is working, and it's creating good jobs. Jason Kenney's plan . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I know that a 20 per cent cut to Alberta's postsecondary institutions would be nothing short of devastating. Given the number of projects and significant investment in campus infrastructure by this government can the minister offer examples of projects that might not be built if his ministry had to cut its budget by 20 per cent?

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, I'd be happy to. I've been hearing concerns from students all across the province about Jason Kenney's proposed reckless and extreme cuts on campuses. Students remember the last round of Conservative cuts that hit higher education, and they don't want to see that again. A 20 per cent cut not only would see all of the infrastructure projects grind to a halt but would see campuses with leaking roofs and crumbling buildings stay that way. It would mean Northern Lakes College doesn't get its new campus and that the U of A's Dentistry/Pharmacy building would stay in disrepair. Our government is not going to let that happen. We're going to keep making life better.

Supportive Living Facility Food Preparation

Mr. Stier: Well, Mr. Speaker, just like back in 2012 here we are five years later, and AHS is back to its old tricks again, where it is reported that in a supportive living facility in Claresholm residents receive little to no fresh food. Instead, despite an order by the Health minister back in 2012 the administration there has returned to substituting low-quality frozen then reheated preprocessed substandard food products. To the Health minister: why has AHS returned to this appalling practice of not supplying and preparing fresh food to the residents of this supportive living facility?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. I'd be happy to follow up with regard to this very specific facility. But I'll tell you that's why I was so proud to bring forward legislation earlier this month that would make sure that we have resident family councils, and that would apply to all of these facilities. I really wish that members opposite would take time to reflect on what's being said around the importance of honouring our seniors and others who are living in care facilities instead of arguing with me while I'm answering their question and advocating for 20 per cent cuts. You want to think about what that would do to the people living in these facilities.

Mr. Stier: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that in 2012 the CBC and the Alberta Union of Provincial Employees did a video documentary on this terrible situation, titled Tough to Swallow, that provided clear evidence of this disgusting practice and given that the minister responded and gave an order to discontinue the practice of preparing meals off site and reheating and to bring back on-site food preparation, to the Health minister: what order was given by your office that reversed that decision of 2012 and caused the return of this appalling practice of not serving fresh food?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. No such order was issued by my office under my time in office. I can't say what happened when their dance partners were also in government between 2012 and May 2015, but under our government we're working to protect and strengthen long-term care and other types of supportive living. That's why we brought forward legislation that will ensure that we have resident and family councils. That's why we've protected their funding instead of advocating for deep, brutal cuts like the members opposite. We're working with and for the people who are in these care facilities.

Mr. Stier: Given that these facilities are home to the people who live there and that they deserve to enjoy fresh, nutritious food that looks and tastes home cooked and that satisfies cultural differences and given that the requirement to serve fresh food is reportedly not being followed by the administration in Claresholm and possibly in other similar facilities, will the minister order today to immediately require that these types of facilities discontinue the practice of preparing meals elsewhere and reheating them and instead serve fresh, nutritious food prepared on-site?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Let me create an opportunity here to invite the member to meet with me and discuss this matter in more detail. I certainly welcome any information he has. But I've learned not to take these kinds of accusations at face value in the House because regularly when members opposite say these kinds of things, they're proven to not be founded. So I welcome the member to sit down with me, have a conversation, and we'll certainly look into it. But I have to say it's important that we honour the staff and the residents in these facilities, protect their funding, and stop Jason Kenney's abusive cuts, that would certainly make life far worse.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie.

2:30 Gravel Mining in Rocky View County

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I've heard numerous concerns from my constituents regarding a growing number of concentrated gravel pits in the Rocky View county in the Bearspaw area. Residents are struggling with constant noise, health concerns, and increasingly overloaded roads as gravel trucks add to the already congested highways, which is causing an increasing number of accidents. In speaking with constituents and my municipal officials, they say that their concerns have fallen on deaf ears when it comes to this government. Can the Minister of Infrastructure please provide clarity on why such a large number of gravel pits were built so close together and what this government's plans are to address this?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Actually, the question probably should come to the Minister of Transportation. We've been in contact with the municipality. We're very aware of the situation. We know that gravel pits have an impact on surrounding neighbours and traffic and so on, and it's important that we take steps to mitigate this. We are working with the community in order to do just that.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Minister.

The STAR gravel pit, which is provincially owned, has and continues to operate 24 hours a day at noise levels of 85 decibels, which is well above the legal limit. Given that the southwest ring road gravel pit was required to put mitigation measures in place such as a 10- to 30-metre buffer between the neighbourhood and excavation and a prohibition on rock crushing beginning at 9 p.m. and all construction ending at 10 p.m., can the minister please explain to me why their provincially owned STAR gravel pit is operating differently?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, I'm certainly prepared to undertake to provide those answers to the member. I'm happy to meet with her to discuss this. It's a little bit complicated. There's been some correspondence back and forth, and the department is engaged with the municipality with respect to these issues.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Minister. The municipal officials and constituents in my constituency haven't heard back from this government, so I'm hoping we can open up doors of communication. I will just ask: Minister, will you commit to engaging with the residents in the community and the municipal officials in fixing this problem?

Mr. Mason: Mr. Speaker, as always, we're very open to having conversations with municipal officials and MLAs representing the constituents. We know that gravel pits do have an impact, but I can assure the hon. member that we're working to make sure that whatever impacts there are as a result of the necessary work of these gravel pits are mitigated.

Agricultural Operation Practice Review Committee

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago in this House my hon. colleague from Drumheller-Stettler tried to pass a common-sense amendment to Bill 21, the Agencies, Boards and Commissions

Review Statutes Amendment Act, 2017. We now have producer groups such as the Alberta Federation of Agriculture expressing similar concerns over the dissolution of the agriculture operation practice committee. Minister, did your ministry take time to consult Alberta farmers and ranchers before you decided to use your majority to pass this piece of legislation, that ultimately could prove harmful to our ag producers?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. The fact is that the review committee that the member is referring to hasn't had members on it since 2011. There have been reviews of agriculture practices, obviously, since then that have worked quite well and will continue to do so as we pick members of the review committee from the larger agriculture community itself.

Thank you.

Mr. Schneider: Given that a recent Western Producer article quoted the minister as stating that, quote, he will always use farmers and ranchers on this committee should the need arise to activate it again, unquote, and given that the minister also stated that he would try to use farmers and ranchers from the same general area to serve on this committee should it be necessary, Minister, what about the next minister who serves in your capacity? What assurances do Albertans have that they, too, will abide by your decision and not use government staff to fill this committee?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. The truth is that this very small amendment will have no effect on the work that the department already does, the ministry already does in making sure that farmers' voices are heard, in making sure that any issues that might arise from what might be an intensive livestock operation, those concerns, will still be reviewed as they always have been and always will be.

Mr. Schneider: Given that in this same article it confirms that there are two cases currently in front of the AOPA committee and given that we warned this government that this was the case and given that the minister repeatedly stated that the AOPA committee isn't necessary, that "facts are facts" and "the effectiveness of this committee doesn't exist because for the past six years there was nobody sitting on it," Minister, considering all of these facts, could your lack of awareness have unintended consequences for these matters currently being heard by the AOPA?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The practice review committees: there are actually two cases in process right now. They're going through the process. The rights of Albertans continue to be known. You know, we felt that on these review committees – the committees are made up of people from the larger agriculture community, will continue to be so. I'll restate yet again that there have been no members on this disbanded committee, there haven't been since 2011, and everything in the review process is still going forward.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Farm and Ranch Worker Regulation Consultation

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have grave concerns regarding the recommendations that have recently been issued by the technical working groups with respect to the occupational health and safety regulations for farms and farm workers. I've been receiving feedback from stakeholders and agricultural service boards with respect to the OHS recommendations as well as the timeline for comments. Seeing as how this Minister of Labour has a poor track record on actually consulting with Albertans on her policies, can the minister explain why she has once again introduced an inadequate consultation period prior to important changes in legislation?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very proud of the work that our government has done to make sure that farm and ranch workers and owners and operators have been involved in the technical working groups, and I thank the technical working groups and their chairs for the important work that they have done. We have posted their recommendations, along with plain-language summaries to make those recommendations accessible to all Albertans, on our website for a review period that will cross into January. We wanted to give farm and ranch workers, operators, and owners significant time to be able to review these recommendations when they aren't during a busy season. I look forward to their feedback.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, given that producers across the province are completing harvest, bringing feed in, moving cattle, weaning and marketing cows and given that the timelines placed on the comment period do not allow for ample enough time for farmers and ranchers and farm workers to review the recommendations and to clearly understand their impacts and to comment on them and given that this minister has received correspondence asking to extend the comment cut-off date to April 2018, is this minister prepared to extend the cut-off date and ensure that farmers have the input they need to ensure that these recommendations truly reflect what is in their best interests?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We've spoken clearly to Albertans about making sure that they are fully engaged in the reviews that we are doing, and the work of the technical working groups was a very important step in that process. We've given 11 weeks for comment on these recommendations as well as plain-language summaries of the recommendations so that Albertans can take the time to review what is happening and provide their feedback to our government. I look forward to receiving any correspondence that the member opposite is referring to. We want to make sure that farmers and ranchers are engaged and that workers are safe.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Second supplemental.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Bill 6 was passed by this Legislature despite the concerns of Alberta farmers and given that this government promised that it would fix the problems through regulations that would respect the concerns of Alberta farmers and given that you've been asked to hold at least two town hall meetings in each region regarding the impacts of the OH and S recommendations, is this minister prepared to hold these town hall meetings to ensure that the impacts of the OH and S recommendations will actually benefit Alberta farmers, or is introducing some NDP, ideologically driven agenda more important?

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Working with the farm and ranch community, working with stakeholder groups like the AgCoalition: these are important to me. We have given 11 weeks for Albertans to be able to review a plain-language summary or the detailed technical recommendations of the technical working group. I look forward to hearing feedback from Albertans over the next several months about the work that the technical working group has done. It is a priority for our government to make sure that workers are safe and that the farm and ranch way of life is protected. We are working to do both of those things in collaboration with the community.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, in 30 seconds we'll begin with Members' Statements.

Métis Week

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Métis Nation of Alberta has declared this week Métis Week, a time to celebrate the history, culture, traditions, and contributions that Métis people make to Alberta. As a Métis person I am exceptionally proud to stand in our Legislature and to speak to the contributions of Métis people in Alberta and across the country.

Alberta is home to the largest Métis population in Canada, with over 114,000 Métis people living here. We are proud to be the only province with a recognized Métis land base in the forms of eight Métis settlements. We are appreciative of the important role Métis people have played in Alberta's history, society, and economy.

November 16 is Louis Riel Day, which honours the legacy of Louis Riel and commemorates the anniversary of his death. Louis Riel devoted and sacrificed his life defending the rights of Métis people. His legacy continues to resonate across Alberta and the country.

Many Louis Riel Day and Métis Week events are happening in our province this week. Tomorrow the Métis Nation of Alberta and the city of Edmonton will host a Métis Week proclamation and Métis flag-raising ceremony. A ceremony commemorating the hon. Louis Riel will occur here at the Legislature on Thursday morning. The Métis Nation of Alberta region 5 is hosting a number of events on Thursday in Slave Lake, including an open house and community dance. The Métis Nation of Alberta region 3 is hosting several events in Calgary this week, including dinners and family fun days. These are just some of the many events going on this week.

I encourage everyone to take this opportunity to learn more about the dynamic culture and traditions of Métis people and the significant role Métis people have played and continue to play in Alberta.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Government Policies

Mr. Loewen: This government is selling so much bull that you'd think they were auctioneers, but Albertans aren't buying.

Let's start with Bill 6, that was sold as farm safety. The facts: we know it had little to do with safety and much more to do with organized labour.

How about the revenue-neutral carbon tax they never campaigned on? The facts: it didn't take long for the truth to be revealed, and then they called it revenue recycled.

Next was the claim that the climate leadership plan would buy social licence. The facts: two cancelled pipelines, zero pipelines built, and the protesters protesting pipelines are still protesting pipelines. Go figure. Billions of dollars for nothing.

The environment minister was warned repeatedly about the impending disaster regarding lake aeration but insisted that everything was under control. The facts: dead fish.

Every time the NDP have announced a budget and foolish spending, we warned of credit downgrades. They laughed. The facts: since 2015 five credit downgrades.

When the government passed legislation to cap the debt-to-GDP ratio at 15 per cent, we warned the government that unless they tackled spending, it would be meaningless. They shouted that we were wrong. The facts: they repealed their own bill just three months later.

When this government decided to mess with the electrical system, this side of the House warned the NDP over and over again to at least read the contracts. We were told that they knew better. The facts: the government has been scrambling to pass bills to counteract consequences, even suing power companies for legal provisions clearly articulated.

Now, this is one of my favourites. When I stood in this House and called out the Health minister for not being forthright with the people of Grande Prairie on their hospital completion date and other pertinent information, she suggested that I didn't remember what was discussed at a meeting. The facts: I do remember; I was there. There are documents proving that the information was available to the Health minister and the Minister of Infrastructure months before the meeting, but they did not share it. When responding to my question on the delays, the minister said: "I wasn't aware of any deadlines. That's absolutely fact." Sorry. Not fact.

So when we hear the government say that they are making life better for Albertans, the fact is that we know that it's absolutely not true.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

World Diabetes Day

Ms Miller: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I rise to acknowledge World Diabetes Day. November 14 is recognized around the world as World Diabetes Day thanks to a UN resolution passed in 2006. Diabetes, although very common, is not a chronic illness that gets a lot of attention, and it is important to raise awareness of the hardships diabetes sufferers encounter every day.

I know how difficult dealing with diabetes can be because I myself suffer from the chronic illness. It also pains me to say that my husband's mother passed away as a result of complications from diabetes. Diabetes has affected my family, and chances are it has affected yours. More than 20 per cent of Canadians over the age of 20 deal with this disease.

This illness puts people in a position that necessitates serious lifestyle and dietary changes in order to avoid complications and live the best life they can. The Alberta government also recognizes the challenges of diabetes and is continuing to invest in supports such as providing coverage for supplies, medication, and insulin pumps. We recognize the challenge individuals living with diabetes face every day and the strength and courage needed to manage your illness.

Lastly, as a show of solidarity with those dealing with diabetes, the Alberta Legislature will be embracing the colour of national diabetes month by being lit up blue.

Thank you to Diabetes Canada for its efforts to support those with diabetes and to help others understand how to minimize their risks and to all of the charitable organizations who support research and those who are affected by diabetes. Together we can continue to educate about the risks of diabetes and work towards making life better for those that suffer from this condition.

Thank you.

Access to Information

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, this NDP government is running its operations with an unprecedented, CIA black ops level of secrecy. As we know, last spring the office of the Privacy Commissioner tabled two reports in this Legislature highlighting the systematic secrecy deployed by this government when it comes to the FOIP Act.

The Privacy Commissioner's report read more like a 1920s mob story, with lawyers speaking on behalf of FOIP witnesses, political interference at the highest levels, and findings that led the Privacy Commissioner to state:

What should have been a relatively straightforward investigation has concluded under a shadow that brings the very notion of independent oversight of the executive branch . . . into question and has the potential to erode public confidence in an open and accountable government.

This in conjunction with massive delays and backlogs in the FOIP system, direction for political staffers in government departments to delete over 800,000 e-mails, and the fact that the Premier's chief of staff had one e-mail in his sent box, 78 in his inbox, and an empty deleted mail folder for the entire time in his role in the Premier's office. It is very clear that the government has something to hide from Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, on top of all of the insurmountable evidence that the government has exhibited a pattern of secrecy and manipulation, the UCP has now released evidence that shows that the Premier's then chief of staff, Mr. Heaney, politically interfered with a FOIP request from the Official Opposition at the last minute, when it had already been cleared by the department's FOIP officials, which is a clear contravention of the FOIP Act and is against the law.

Mr. Speaker, political interference like this is unacceptable. The fact that this government feels it's above the law, independent oversight bodies, and Albertans' access to information speaks of a new level of arrogance. I call on the Premier to immediately make changes, take some accountability.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Workers' Compensation Review

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, our government believes that all workers have a right to a fair, safe, and healthy work environment, and if any of them happen to get hurt on the job, they should be supported.

Albertans are often interacting with the workers' compensation system at one of the most difficult times for themselves and their families. That's why it's absolutely crucial that Albertans feel confident that the WCB provides fair compensation and meaningful rehabilitation for their workers. At the same time, the employers that fund the system also need to be protected from potential lawsuits.

Today in the House I will be tabling a document produced by the Canadian Injured Workers Association of Alberta that contains the names of hundreds of Albertans who want to see changes to the WCB.

Mr. Speaker, the last comprehensive review of the WCB was done more than 15 years ago. The Conservatives had years to act on this, but instead they chose to ignore this. I'm very proud that, unlike the Conservatives, our government has taken action and is working to make life better for all Albertans through the WCB review. I know that the Minister of Labour has received recommendations from the WCB Review Panel, and whatever changes result, I am incredibly proud that the review was an open and inclusive process.

But today I want to focus on the people who are personally affected by the WCB and its policies. No matter what changes are made to the system, it is not the system that feels the pain but the workers who suffer from physical disability, that cannot support their families because they can no longer work. These workers and their families deserve our compassion and our support.

I would like to recognize and thank the Canadian Injured Workers Association of Alberta for their tireless work in representing the interests of injured workers in this province. I know that both they and all Albertans look forward to hearing from the Minister of Labour and the WCB very soon about these important changes that will make life better for workers and families across the province.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Red Tape

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, this morning compelling arguments were presented that there is a need for government to implement a red tape reduction strategy. The point of reducing red tape is to stimulate economic growth, which in turn leads to more jobs. The Minister of Economic Development and Trade has repeatedly claimed that his number one priority and the number one priority of this government is job creation. So it is baffling to stakeholders as to why the NDP members would speak against this common-sense bill this morning. Small and mid-sized businesses are the engine of economic growth in any economy, and they are disproportionately affected by red tape.

Governor Susana Martinez said, quote: The big corporations have a team of lawyers and accountants to help them. It's the small businesses, the ma-and-pa shops that get lost in the layers of red tape. End quote.

Germain Belzile states, quote: New regulations in Canada, including things like carbon pricing, coupled with the regulatory burden under President Trump in the United States have seen investments leaving Canada and flowing to the U.S. instead. Alberta in particular is experiencing a dizzying downturn. The regulatory burden seems to be particularly at fault since it is estimated that its cost will rise by between 12 per cent and 21 per cent in the near future and even more after 2023, when the carbon tax will be applied to the oil and gas sector. End quote. If there ever was a time when the Alberta government needed to help entrepreneurs succeed, the time is now, Mr. Speaker.

Brad Wenstrup states:

Politicians think that government can make better decisions than you and me. But we know better. We know it's smaller, less intrusive government that will lead to real economic prosperity. We know it's business-friendly policies, not more red tape, that will create real growth.

Small ma-and-pa business owners and not-for-profits are drowning in red tape, Mr. Speaker. They wear multiple hats, and that wears them out. Wouldn't it be nice if the government recognized their contribution by recognizing their regulatory burden?

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Bill 29

An Act to Reduce Cannabis and Alcohol Impaired Driving

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I would request leave to introduce a bill being Bill 29, An Act to Reduce Cannabis and Alcohol Impaired Driving.

Mr. Speaker, impaired driving is the leading cause of criminal death and injury in Canada. If this bill passes, it will support our government's goal of zero impairment-related collisions and fatalities on Alberta roads.

I look forward to good discussion on the bill with my colleagues, Mr. Speaker. Thank you very much.

[Motion carried; Bill 29 read a first time]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Bill 209

Radon Awareness and Testing Act

Ms Luff: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to request leave to introduce a bill, Bill 209, the Radon Awareness and Testing Act.

Mr. Speaker, it's important that we protect the health of Albertans against the very real dangers of radon. Radon is a colourless, odourless, and tasteless gas which is responsible for an estimated 16 per cent of lung cancer deaths every year. In 2006 alone an estimated 1,900 lung cancer deaths in Canada were due to radon exposure. Radon is the second leading cause of lung cancer after smoking. Bill 209 will support greater education about radon and will ensure that child care spaces are tested for radon to help safeguard the well-being of our youngest and most vulnerable citizens.

I look forward to discussion and deliberation with my colleagues in the House.

[Motion carried; Bill 209 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This being Bullying Awareness Week, I rise to table five copies of a story from the Edmonton Journal about toxic workplace culture inside the city of Edmonton that is causing employees to quit.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today and table the requisite five copies of a document produced by the Canadian Injured Workers Association of Alberta that contains the names of hundreds of Albertans who want to see changes to the Workers' Compensation Board. I would like to recognize the Canadian Injured Workers Association of Alberta for their work in representing the interests of injured workers all over Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have three tablings today. The first will provide context as to why the Member for Edmonton-Decore was wearing a University of Calgary Dinos jersey. The first one is entitled Dinos Stop Bears, Advance to 10th Straight Hardy Cup with a 39-22 victory.

The second one is DiFonte Good from 59 as Dinos Win Epic Hardy Cup Title. As you may be well aware, Niko DiFonte scored a 59-yard field goal to bring the University of Calgary Dinos to the Mitchell Bowl next weekend.

The third tabling, for context or for anyone who's interested, is the lineup for the Calgary edition of Dancing with the Stars, in which I'll be participating on Wednesday, November 29.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a press release done by CAPP, Methane Plan Can Cut Emissions by 45%, Protect 7,000 Jobs: CAPP. I will say that it is distressing to see that we're going down a road that could cost my constituency a thousand jobs.

I have four other letters here. One is from an individual, but most of these letters are just explaining to the Minister of Energy how, if not implemented correctly, the 45 per cent reduction in our emissions cap will actually cause immense amounts of grief within Alberta, and that's not just my constituency.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gottfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table a copy of a report from the climate leadership plan on the Alberta climate change website, which indicates that there are six to 31 years of lost economic activity, royalties, and power production over and above those legislated by federal regulation. I have the five requisite copies here.

I also rise to table a media report from the Parkland county news, a news release saying Parkland County Responds to Advisory Panel on Coal Communities Recommendations in which Mayor Rod Shaigec says, "The power companies have been paid through the off-coal agreements, yet the government continues to forget about the communities that built this province."

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the Minister of Finance I rise to table five copies of the November 2017 results-based budgeting report to Albertans.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the Clerk. On behalf of the hon. Mr. Bilous, Minister of Economic Development and Trade, return to order of the Assembly MR 14, asked for by Mr. Cooper on May 1, 2017.

On behalf of the hon. Ms Ganley, Minister of Justice and Solicitor General, pursuant to the Legal Profession Act the Alberta Law Foundation financial statements for the year ended March 31, 2017.

On behalf of the hon. Ms Hoffman, Deputy Premier and Minister of Health, return to order of the Assembly MR 20, asked for by Mrs. Pitt on May 1, 2017.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I believe there was a point of order, but it was withdrawn.

3:00

31. Mr. Carlier moved on behalf of Mr. Mason:
Be it resolved that, notwithstanding Standing Order 3(1) and Government Motion 30, which was passed on October 31, 2017, the morning sitting of the Assembly on Thursday, November 16, 2017, be cancelled.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This change is made to accommodate greater participation in AAMDC events that morning. As members are also aware, Louis Riel Day ceremonies are also scheduled to take place in the rotunda that day at 11 a.m.

The Speaker: Does anyone wish to speak to the matter?

[Government Motion 31 carried]

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 27

Conflicts of Interest Amendment Act, 2017

[Debate adjourned November 9: Mr. Piquette speaking]

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater, please proceed.

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to rise in the House this afternoon to continue discussion on what I think is a very good, very timely bill that is living up to our promise to Albertans to make life better.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

I think, definitely, that this is a bill that, in particular, will make life better for board members and staff of the agencies, boards, and commissions who, as I mentioned previously, are in charge of almost half of our government's total budgetary spending. With that type of resource in play, obviously, the public has a very keen concern that the money and the decisions around the money that these agencies, boards, and commissions make are above reproach. I think that that's a very reasonable expectation for them to have. Unfortunately, in the present situation it is not always clear just what that means in practice. Of course, that's because these requirements are not consistent across agencies, boards, and commissions, leaving perhaps sometimes board members or staff with unclear guidelines on what constitutes a conflict of interest.

As we as elected officials know in our own public lives, it's not always clear-cut what would be considered to be a violation of conflict of interest. I can give you examples where members in the past have gotten into difficulties with accepting tickets to events or plane rides to particular locations, and the list goes on. I mean, these are things that are sometimes taken without really thinking through the consequences and thinking through the impact that they might have on the independence of mind when making decisions about those groups.

Why is this a concern? Well, it's simple human nature. It's human nature for people to return good for good, you know, to behave towards people that they consider friendly in a friendly fashion. Although that might work well in our personal lives, when you're making decisions based on the overall public good, sometimes that can lead to decisions being made that otherwise would not have been made.

I think that, you know, this type of culture or perception of this culture indeed speaks to what happened just two years and a bit ago when first we had a new government put in place by the people of Alberta. I know that when I was out door-knocking during that election campaign, that was one of the concerns that was brought up, that the previous government had been in power for so long and had appointed basically all the members of the agencies, boards, and commissions, and there was a perception in some quarters that it had become kind of an old boys' network situation, where if you scratch my back, I'll scratch your back.

Now, fairly or unfairly, I think that that perception is something that we needed to address. Indeed, it was something that our Finance minister had promised to address, and I think that Bill 27 goes a long way toward doing just that by making sure that these conflict-of-interest requirements are consistent across agencies, boards, and commissions. I think that it would help restore confidence for Albertans that agency, board, and commission members and staff are indeed acting in the public interest.

That being said, I don't want to impugn, you know, members of agencies, boards, and commissions as it stands now. Sometimes it just takes a few bad apples. Sometimes it just takes the perception of a few bad apples to erode public goodwill and trust. So it's very, very critical that when our citizens go before these agencies and boards and commissions, there is an understanding that, yes, they are indeed not in anybody's pocket, that they are indeed really making impartial decisions which reflect the best possible decision for the public trust. Once again, I think that this is an excellent bill to bring that forward.

When I left off last Thursday, I was just going through, you know, some of the questions on the details of this conflict-of-interest legislation. Now, one question would be regarding timing. Once this bill is passed, when would the core statutory requirements take effect? This would happen immediately on proclamation of the amendments to the Conflicts of Interest Act; however, there will be a two-year transition period in some situations, simply because it's recognized that restrictions particularly on concurrent employment offices and appointments and these additional requirements may not be consistent with current employment contracts. To allow for a two-year transition period will help mitigate these types of issues and would be utilized prior to requirements taking effect or upon a new contract or a contract renewal for impacted staff or members, whichever comes first.

Now, I did draw the comparison between elected officials and the conflict-of-interest legislation that applies to us. Are there any differences in how this act would apply to public agencies as opposed to what we and our political staff, you know, currently have to follow? Well, in fact, it's going to have many of the same requirements for chairs, CEOs, and equivalents in public agencies as what we currently are working under. However, there are going to be some requirements for public agencies that are going to be a bit different, of course, because there are some requirements of the existing act that are specific to elected officials and their senior staff. So that's there.

Another question might be: what's been the public response so far to this legislation? Well, I mean, this hasn't been on the top of the news cycle; however, it has been attracting some interest. You know, from the constituents that I've had the opportunity to talk to about this, the response has been not just generally but completely positive. I think this is a bill that reflects the wishes and interests of the Alberta public and definitely, like I said, is upholding real commitments that we made, and that's always appreciated. Albertans, I think, do appreciate to see a government that is sincerely working to make life better and sincerely working hard to make its commitments real.

It's for all of these reasons that I think this bill is an excellent one and one that I would strongly encourage all members of the House to support unanimously. With that, I think I can conclude my remarks.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to Bill 27, the Conflicts of Interest Amendment Act, 2017. Bill 27 proposes to create a consistent set of rules for the province's agencies, boards, and commissions that fall under the jurisdiction of the Alberta Public Agencies Governance Act. The agencies included in Bill 27 include Alberta Health Services, postsecondary institutions, the Alberta Securities Commission, and the Alberta Gaming and Liquor Commission. In addition to the ones I've just listed and the other 136 agencies, boards, and commissions that fall under APAGA, Covenant Health and three Alberta Health Services subsidiaries – Calgary Laboratory Services, the CapitalCare group, and Carewest – are also being included under these new conflict-of-interest rules.

Something that I have discovered during my time as an elected official is that often the perception of a conflict is as concerning as the actual conflict of interest. Bill 27 addresses that issue by closing loopholes that appeared to allow executives and board members of Alberta's many agencies, boards, and commissions to conduct themselves in ways that simply didn't stand up to the public's demand for accountable and transparent governance. I believe that Bill 27 will improve the public's confidence in Alberta's agencies, boards, and commissions, something that has sometimes lacked in the past.

A few highlights of the legislation, Madam Speaker, include a requirement that all agencies, boards, and commissions submit their codes of conduct to the Alberta Ethics Commissioner for review within four months of proclamation. I hope that most of these organizations would already have codes of conduct in place, but Bill 27 will bring greater clarity to Alberta's agencies, boards, and commissions.

Another requirement in Bill 27 is for the Ethics Commissioner to review the codes of conduct by March 31 and report their findings a month later. In addition, Bill 27 will require board members and employees, first of all, to conduct themselves impartially; second, to disclose real and apparent conflicts of interest; then, to place restrictions or limitations on acting in self-interest or furthering private interests, the acceptance of gifts, and, finally, to holding concurrent employment or other offices.

Due to their executive position within the organization, CEOs and their equivalents would be subject to additional restrictions on other employment and business undertakings, appointments to other organizations that constitute a real or apparent conflict of interest, a requirement to disclose financial information to the Ethics Commissioner, restrictions on holding stocks and other securities, and additional restrictions for a 12-month cooling-off period following employment with a public agency to prevent CEOs from benefiting from any decisions they have made. This provision will take effect after a two-year notice period or immediately after a reappointment or a new appointment.

Now, some may claim that the provisions of Bill 27 are not needed and unfairly cast aspersions on many people who work, sometimes voluntarily, Madam Speaker, without pay, on Alberta's many agencies, boards, and commissions, and I agree. Most of the people that this legislation will affect are good, morally upstanding, and good-hearted people. They conduct themselves with the utmost respect for the taxpayers, that ultimately fund all these organizations.

However, there have been a number of high-profile cases where individuals have failed to conduct themselves in a manner that befitted the office they held. One example was widely reported in 2014, when Alberta's Public Interest Commissioner investigated and ultimately confirmed that an AHS staff member had a conflict of interest when they awarded a $75,000 contract to a consulting company in which they held shares. If this bill can eliminate that type of blatant disregard for basic good governance policies, I support Bill 27 at second reading.

But, Madam Speaker, while I am supportive of Bill 27, I have a number of questions that I look forward to getting answers to as the debate continues. One of my questions is: how will the employment restrictions affect those people that represent their industry? These are people that are appointed or elected to their position largely based on their work experience in their specific industry. An example would be a realtor serving on the Real Estate Council of Alberta. As debate moves to Committee of the Whole, I may have amendments to move that reflect some of the feedback I have received since this bill was tabled.

However, at second reading members are asked to consider the intent and context of the legislation being debated, and I believe fully that the intent of Bill 27 is one that I can support. Therefore, I will be supporting Bill 27 at second reading, and I urge all members to do likewise.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, I will now recognize the Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The public trust. Who does the public trust? What does a mandate to govern give you other than the public trust? I think that's what we're fundamentally debating here today, and I'm pleased to rise today to express my support for Bill 27, an act to expand conflict-of-interest rules to agencies, boards, and commissions.

Madam Speaker, that public trust is something we all seek on both sides of this House, and we obtain, gain, and maintain the trust of the Alberta public every day that we operate in this House. It was determined in May of 2015 that when that public trust is lost, even in Alberta, politics 101 applies, and a government will change.

That's what we're talking about today, maintaining that public trust by strengthening rules around conflict of interest as they apply to agencies, boards, and commissions. [interjections] I'm not sure what members opposite are laughing about. I thought I was being pretty serious about some fundamental principles that we operate under in this House and that I take extremely seriously and seek to find agreement in this House about.

The fundamental foundation of what we really seek to do here is to maintain that public trust, which is a sacred trust between us and the people we serve. In order to do that, the transparency of our interests must be very, very open and clear. I think Bill 27 does that. It makes sure that we strengthen the Alberta Conflicts of Interest Act and expand it to apply to senior staff of our province's agencies, boards, and commissions. That's what our government is proposing to do with this legislation.

Alberta's public agencies play a pivotal role in regulating, managing, and delivering important programs and services to

Albertans on behalf of government as well as in providing oversight and advice on provincial issues. Public agencies are a significant part of Alberta's public sector, and together they account for about half of the government's total yearly budget. That's a significant amount of the public trust that is entrusted to agencies, boards, and commissions. Albertans have high expectations that publicly governed agencies are relevant, effective, transparent, well governed, and accountable to government and to Albertans. A consistent set of rules for conflicts of interest is critical in increasing the accountability of public agencies, protecting Alberta's tax dollars, and ensuring that public agencies are governed transparently.

The public trust is a sacred trust which must always be protected and never be taken lightly or with, I would say, a lack of seriousness at any point. Every day that we are in this House, we must always keep that public trust and the sacredness of it paramount in our minds when we deliberate and talk on any bill, no matter what the bill happens to be. So in second reading I'm pleased to express my support once again for Bill 27. The changes proposed in this bill make clear the roles and expectations that would be put in place to ensure that the public agencies' staff and board members are acting in the public interest.

Once again, if indeed the public determines that their interests are not being served, they will exercise their right to change governments. We are ever more cognizant of that on this side of the House than any government ever has been in this province, and we aim to keep the public trust uppermost in mind in every bill that we bring forward, including this one, Madam Speaker. Once again, our agencies provide valuable services that make life better for Albertans such as higher education, protecting vulnerable people, and delivering health services. It's vitally important that our public agencies are held to the same standards that we expect of our elected officials and senior public servants.

The Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat across the way mentioned the real estate industry not too long ago in his comments, and one of the things that I wanted to talk about as well is the fact that no matter whether it's business or government, the public trust is something that must be fundamentally top of mind in how we operate with the members of the public. Business has the same responsibility. Most every industry, including the real estate industry, has conflict-of-interest guidelines and rules of ethics and codes of conduct. That public support, that public trust, on an individual basis, on an industry basis, and also on a government basis, has to be maintained and held as sacrosanct on an ongoing basis and never be forgotten because the public will remind us of it, whether we're in business or in government, of the responsibility to make sure that their interests are served in this democracy we so dearly love.

It's vitally important that our public agencies are held to the same high standards. As I mentioned, the bill proposes that public agencies that are already subject to APAGA, the Alberta Public Agencies Governance Act, would also be subject to the Conflicts of Interest Act. As of November 1 there are 136 of these agencies. Also included in this list would be three Alberta Health Services subsidiaries and Covenant Health.

Bill 27 proposes a number of prescribed elements that would apply to employees and board members of all applicable public agencies. Changes to the Conflicts of Interest Act would require all public agencies to have codes of conduct that include these prescribed elements. They are a requirement to conduct themselves impartially; restrictions on acting in self-interest or furthering a private interest by virtue of one's position; disclosure of real and apparent conflicts of interest; restrictions on gifts, including monetary limits; limitations on concurrent employment or other offices, including processes for seeking approval.

Now, these principles really seem to be something that many industries follow. I know that in the real estate industry, where I worked for 30 years as a real estate agent, they are very reminiscent of the rules that we were expected to follow. Our industry guidelines reflected similar principles.

Whether in government or business, the public expectation is high that their interests will be served beyond the interests of those who are in place to serve the public. I think that Bill 27 just goes to continue that demand of government that the interest of the public is sacrosanct and continues to be considered as a paramount and fundamental necessity in maintaining the public interest and that trust that our democracy is built upon.

All APAGA agencies would be required to submit updated codes of conduct reflecting these prescribed elements to the Ethics Commissioner within four months of the act being proclaimed. The Ethics Commissioner will review all revised codes to ensure that they meet the requirements of the act and sign off by March 31, 2019. Agencies would then have to publish their new codes of conduct no later than April 30, 2019.

Now, the legislation also proposes a set of core statutory requirements for CEOs and board chairs. For all agency board members and employees the core requirements would be a baseline standard, enforced through codes of conduct that public agencies would be required to implement. Public agencies could have additional restrictions, but these are the ones that all agencies would be required to implement.

The legislation also proposes a set of core statutory requirements for CEOs and board chairs. These requirements include restrictions on private interest, restrictions on using influence, restrictions on using insider information, disclosure of real and apparent conflicts of interest, once again principles that, whether in business or government, those serving the public are expected to hold dear and adhere to without exception. They're fundamental to maintaining the public trust, which, as we know so well in this province, actually will be taken from a government that disregards it.

There's an additional core statutory requirement that would apply to CEOs and equivalents, restrictions on concurrent employment and holding other offices. This additional core statutory requirement would take effect immediately for new hires, upon reappointment, or following a two-year notice period.

CEOs and equivalents of significant agencies would also be subject to additional statutory requirements upon designation, including restrictions on holding stocks and other public securities; disclosure to the Ethics Commissioner, including financial disclosure; postemployment restrictions, specifically a 12-month cooling-off period following employment with a public agency. These additional statutory requirements would be set out in the act, but the positions that they would apply to would be designated in a separate order in council and come into effect on contract renewals and new appointments, once again measures that, no matter whether you're in business or in government, the public expects to be enforced to hold government and business to a high standard.

In this case Bill 27 looks at holding these executives, CEOs of the agencies, boards, and commissions to that high standard of public trust that the public in this province insists that they deserve and demands that they have. The consequences of May 2015 showed that in a most excellent way.

Where current contracts are longer term, a two-year transition period would apply so that within two years all CEOs and board chairs would be subject to these enhanced requirements. Through orders in council, cabinet would have the ability to add or exempt agencies and positions from any of the conflict-of-interest requirements.

We propose a statutory requirement for all public agencies to have codes of conduct with the required elements. Now, to enhance oversight and enforcement, we also propose to apply the restrictions on furthering private interest, using influence, and using insider information as statutory requirements within the Conflicts of Interest Act.

Madam Speaker, these elements of this legislation, this bill, really just simply make sense and are an extension of our respect for the fundamental principle of maintaining the public trust, that we think the public in Alberta deserves and governments right throughout this country and any democratic country should be applying and maintaining. These restrictions would be carried out through orders in council and would apply to board chairs and CEOs of public agencies on contract renewals and new appointments.

There would be also a two-year transition period to ensure that CEOs with longer term contracts would also come under the new requirements within the two-year time frame rather than on expiration of the contract.

In Bill 27 it is proposed that cabinet would have the ability to add or exempt agencies and positions from any of the conflict-of-interest requirements. The Ethics Commissioner would have the authority to receive and review disclosures from designated CEOs and their equivalents. It would reduce requirements for restrictions on public securities and restrictions on postemployment. Alleged breaches of the act by the board would be investigated, and other designated senior positions issue reports and make recommendations to the responsible minister and/or the board.

3:30

In closing, I'm really proud to say that our government has been doing great work to maximize the value of agencies, boards, and commissions. We see numerous important changes to increase transparency, fiscal accountability, and diversity and a significant progress government-wide in several different areas, including in fair and appropriate executive compensation, effective use of public dollars, transparency and accountability, including salary disclosure and revitalization of board appointment diversity, and a diligent appointment process.

Madam Speaker, I wish to encourage all members in the Legislature here to support this important piece of legislation. We all seek, as I said before, on both sides of this House, to obtain and maintain the trust of the Alberta public. That sacred trust is something that they will remove if indeed it is breached, and May 2015 proved that beyond a shadow of a doubt. Whether we're in business, whether we're in government, our practices and behaviours must be governed by and founded on the fundamental principle of the sacredness of the public trust. That public trust is something that we on this side of the House and, I believe, all members of this Legislature take seriously every day as we sit here to serve our constituents in the best way that is within our abilities. I believe that this piece of legislation will continue to maintain that principle and observe the responsibility that we all have to serve the public interest and keep the public trust uppermost in our minds.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, I will now recognize the hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I want to congratulate the government. This is probably the third time that we've addressed issues of conflict of interest and the act in this Legislature since I got in 12 years ago. I don't think we've done it in as comprehensive a way as has been happening. In fact, along with the review of ABCs I think there's every reason to think that we're going to be developing more confidence in the public around our activities, our credibility around gifts and exchanges of favours, and issues of perceived conflict of interest.

All of these, while they kind of fly by in the busyness of our lives as we attend meetings and events and make connections with people from the business community, the NGO community – we're being evaluated constantly on the little things that they see happening. To have this much more explicit and consistent in the ABCs I think is a critically important part of our job here, and I think it will serve all of us well. I don't think there's any question that it needs to be done. This systematic review has helped us to think through some of the inconsistencies that currently exist, that I've certainly been aware of and raised as recently as last week with the minister because of concerns in my constituency about senior members of educational institutions and what's happening there.

I commend the government. This Bill 27 proposes to create a consistent set of conflict-of-interest rules for the agencies, boards, commissions, and all of the positions associated with that. The new rules will apply to board members and employees in 136 public agencies that fall under the Alberta Public Agencies Governance Act, including Covenant Health and three subsidiaries of Alberta Health Services; that is, Calgary Lab Services, which is an anomaly, as far as I'm concerned, and persists; CapitalCare Group; and Carewest. How these ever escaped the consistent rules for so long is beyond me. The proposed rules are similar to those that already exist for elected officials, political staff, and senior officials in the public service but clearly have been neglected.

ABCs, then, will be required to prepare and submit to the Ethics Commissioner, within four months of it coming into force, one or more codes of conduct, which the Ethics Commissioner must approve. These codes will require board members and employees of ABCs to conduct themselves impartially; to disclose real and apparent conflicts of interest; and to place restrictions or limitations on acting in self-interest, on furthering private interests, on acceptance of gifts, and on concurrent employment and other offices.

The chief executive officers or their equivalents such as board chairs and university and college presidents will be subject to restrictions on other employment. This came up very strongly in the last five years at the University of Calgary when the energy environment commission was set up there with the help of Enbridge and some of the issues that that raised around conflicts of interest. Indeed, it came up with the Calgary School of Public Policy when Jack Mintz, who continued to receive hundreds of thousands of dollars from Imperial Oil, was the director of the policy school, supposed to be independently looking at policies relating to the oil and gas industry.

It's a long-standing issue. If we take in any seriousness the notion that public trust is critical in this business and that anything we can do to improve that is to the good of democracy and to the good of our democratic health, then we have to recognize that these have been oversights, that these have been areas of neglect that are, sadly, needing remedy.

Additional requirements are applied to CEOs of significant agencies, including disclosure of financial information to the Ethics Commissioner, restrictions on the type of stocks and financial securities they can hold, and a 12-month cooling-off period following employment with a public agency to prevent CEOs from benefiting from decisions they made while in a position of influence. We all remember from June of last year the Agriculture Financial Services Corporation scandal around gifts of alcohol, theatre tickets, and unnecessary travel and the suspension of three AFSC executives.

An Alberta Health Services staffer was also accused of having a conflict of interest in 2014 after giving a $75,000 contract to a consulting company where he had worked and still held shares. I don't think we can take this seriously enough.

Clearly, we'll be supporting this. The new rules will bring Alberta in line with jurisdictions such as Ontario, Manitoba, and the federal government, that have comprehensive codes of conduct governing agencies, boards, and commissions. The rules are part of a broader effort to standardize compensation and conflict-of-interest rules across the public sector, something that we very much support.

It makes little sense to have a consistent set of conflict-of-interest rules for part of the public sector and a patchwork of rules for agencies, boards, and commissions. Inconsistency in how conflict-of-interest rules are applied creates confusion and increases the likelihood of abuse. Agencies, boards, and commissions account for almost half of all provincial spending, so we cannot simply assume that because they are outside of the regular governance, they are following any standards without creating those, monitoring them, and holding people accountable.

Madam Speaker, I won't belabour it. It's been said by many others that this is progress, and we'll certainly be supporting this bill.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, I will now call on the Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to get up and speak to Bill 27, Conflicts of Interest Amendment Act, 2017. We've heard a lot on this bill already from many colleagues in the House, particularly about the importance of public trust, that a previous member, Edmonton-McClung, had talked about, and I think it's important that we think about that.

3:40

In the Conflicts of Interest Act itself, I mean, right in the preamble it says:

Senior officials, members and employees of public agencies are expected to act with integrity and impartiality and must avoid conduct that violates the public trust or creates a conflict of interest or apparent conflict of interest.

If we want the public to continue to have trust in our agencies, I think that this is indeed very important.

Now, some questions came up about this bill and why I'm supporting it. You know, one of the questions is: why are we changing the Conflicts of Interest Act, and how will these changes benefit Albertans? Well, of course, we are committed to strengthening conflict-of-interest legislation and extending it to senior staff at public agencies, boards, and commissions, and that is what we are proposing to do with this legislation. While some public agencies have conflict-of-interest requirements in place due to their codes of conduct or their employment contract, there is not a consistent and comprehensive set of rules being applied to public agencies. I think it is important that we correct this, Madam Speaker.

Alberta's public agencies, as a whole, account for about half of the government's total budgetary spending, which is why they need to be held to a high ethical standard and, of course, governed with the integrity that Albertans expect. With these changes, I feel that Albertans can be confident that clear rules and expectations will be put into place to ensure that public agencies' staff and board members are acting in the public interest.

Of course, these rules are all good until somebody breaks them, so it's important that there are penalties for those who breach the act. Currently there is just an administrative penalty for not disclosing to the Ethics Commissioner on time or for failing to disclose conflicts as outlined in the Conflicts of Interest Act. This penalty applies to those currently covered in the act, including MLAs and senior officials, and, as we know in this House, cannot exceed $500.

It is also currently an offence for designated senior officials to violate postemployment restrictions subject to a fine of up to $50,000. With amendments to this act, those penalties will become applicable to designated senior officials. This is in alignment with current provisions for ministers and deputy ministers who currently serve the people of Alberta.

Now, a question that has come up as well is: how will these requirements be enforced? Chairs and CEOs and equivalents would be subject to the oversight of the Ethics Commissioner for the statutory requirements that apply to them. As the deputy chair of Legislative Offices I see first-hand the hard work that our Ethics Commissioner does in enforcing the Conflicts of Interest Act as it relates to us as MLAs as well as to other agencies, and I look forward to her taking her duty seriously in enforcing the new provisions that are in this bill.

Also, the requirement for codes of conduct aligns with the approach used in the Alberta public service. The conflict-of-interest requirements for board chairs, CEOs, and equivalents align closely with those already in place for elected officials, including deputy ministers.

Lastly, after this bill passes and it comes into force, agencies will be required to send their codes of conduct to the Ethics Commissioner for review by the Ethics Commissioner within six months of this act's proclamation.

Also, Madam Speaker, there were some questions about the statutory requirements and what this means. Currently there is a two-year transition period. It is recognized that restrictions on concurrent employment, on offices and appointments, and on additional requirements may not be consistent with current employment contracts. We, of course, want to allow individuals who are in that particular position to transition out. To mitigate this, the two-year transition period will of course be utilized prior to those new requirements taking effect or, of course, upon a new contract or a new contract renewal, whichever one comes first.

To end off my comments, I believe that Bill 27 is a good bill that does much to restore public confidence and trust in our agencies, boards, and commissions, and I, of course, encourage all members of the House to vote for this bill.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing – oh, 29(2)(a) first, please.

Seeing none, I will now call on the hon. member for Edmonton-Mill Creek.

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Not to be repetitive, seeing as how so many people had such good things to say already, but I stand to support the Conflicts of Interest Amendment Act, 2017, Bill 27. I take it very seriously, the trust that the public has in both their elected officials and the agencies, boards, and commissions that the government has. They're so important to and such an important part of the lives of Albertans.

The executives and board members need to be held to the same ethical standards expected of MLAs and senior public servants. Ethical standards is an interesting topic because we can assume that we all know what is the right thing to do in all the various situations, but it's easy to, you know, change assumptions as time goes on or as the situation changes. Having the rules and having the codes of conduct laid out not in prescriptive detail but general enough so everyone knows what the expectations are of their behaviour makes it a lot more likely that everyone will behave accordingly. Any time we have a situation where we are working for the public, we do need to make sure that we are expecting everybody to behave responsibly in that position.

Trust is essential, and that's been emphasized at different times, but I'm also in favour of consistency, making sure that we can presume that the people that we trust in these positions will behave appropriately. Having the oversights and codes of conduct in place, too, is really helpful for our new appointees. We're always having people that are asking about it, especially if they want to get involved in public service, and we talk about openings on various agencies, boards, and commissions. If people know what the expectations are, then they know what is expected of them, and they walk in with their eyes wide open. Again, it's the transparency thing. They know what is expected of them. Knowing that, for instance, there's a cooling-off period in certain positions. CEOs and equivalents are expected to abide by a 12-month cooling-off period following employment with a public agency. That's really important information to have, knowing that they have to disclose to the Ethics Commissioner on a regular basis.

Having timelines for instituting the codes of conduct makes sure that people aren't procrastinating or just putting it to one side as not being very important. It makes sure that everybody is treating the codes of conduct and the conflict-of-interest rules as serious and important to the operation of the various ABCs.

I really am proud of this bill. I'm very in favour of it. It is transparent. It will aid in transparency. As one validator said here, a large part of agency governance is setting a level playing field and clear expectations as to what practices are and are not acceptable. This legislation does just that by setting clear parameters and expectations for executives and board members of agencies, so I support this bill and certainly hope that everyone else will.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

3:50

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, I will now call on the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie to close debate on behalf of the hon. President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance.

Loyola: Thank you, Madam Speaker. As always, it's a pleasure to get up in this House and speak on behalf of the Minister of Finance and Treasury Board, a good friend of mine. We see eye to eye on many things. Of course, I want to applaud the incredible work that this government has done in the review of the agencies, boards, and commissions. Now, you may say, "Okay; yes, you've done a considerable amount of work here," but of course I want to highlight specifically the major change that we've been able to implement with the review of the agencies, boards, and commissions and, specifically, with Bill 27 and how we're expanding the conflict-of-interest rules to the ABCs.

One of the things I'd like to state before is that all this work is focused around four major themes: transparency; fiscal accountability of the agencies, boards, and commissions; fair and appropriate executive compensation; and perhaps the most important, to me at least, diversity.

You know, earlier today, Madam Speaker, you gave an excellent member's statement regarding the Métis Nation of Alberta and the culture that it's going to be celebrating over the next few days here in the province of Alberta. I want to share a small story with you, actually.

One of the things that I was very honoured and proud to do with one of the new schools that opened up in the wonderful constituency of Edmonton-Ellerslie was to go to the school opening and gift them three things. One of them, of course, was the flag of our province, the Alberta flag. The second was the Treaty 6 flag so that they could hoist it up when necessary, when they thought it was important to do so. Then, of course, the last one was the Métis Nation flag. I want to say thank you very much to one of their executive directors, a good friend of mine who actually lives in my constituency, Mr. Aaron Barner. I got a wonderful text from Aaron, one that really just filled my heart with so much happiness.

First of all, he sent me a picture. They had hoisted the Métis Nation flag along with the Alberta flag in front of the school, and guess who was standing in front of those flags? His children. His children were standing in front of those flagpoles with that Métis Nation flag up there. He wrote me, and he said: Rod, I'm so happy because I spoke to the principal at the school, and he told me that you were the one that gave them the Métis Nation flag, and you made two young children very proud of their culture.

Why is this important and, specifically, how does it relate to the Métis Nation? Well, guess what? Years and years and years ago there was a man named Louis Riel, who we'll be celebrating right here in this Legislature on Thursday morning. Now, Louis Riel was the leader of the provisional government at that time, and do you know one of the main reasons why they had a provisional government? They did not feel that they were being represented.

Now, you may say: okay; well, how does this apply to conflicts of interest, to Alberta agencies, boards, and commissions? Well, it has to do with this issue of diversity. It has to do with this very important issue of diversity and the culture that was created within the agencies, boards, and commissions up to the date when we started to review the ABCs.

My hon. colleague here from Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater got up and said: oh, well, you know, it's an old boys' club that used to exist; they would just appoint each other to these different agencies, boards, and commissions. You know, I think he was being really kind when he just kind of tapped the surface by saying old boys' club. We can say that it was . . .

Mr. Rosendahl: More than that.

Loyola: Indeed. It was indeed more than just an old boys' club, but I will reserve my comments because, you know, I don't want to create discord here in the House, unlike some of the other colleagues with statements that they make.

But I will say this. The time has come for agencies, boards, and commissions in this province to start a new culture, a new culture where there is more transparency, there is more fiscal accountability, there is fair and appropriate executive compensation, and, yes, also increased diversity amongst all these agencies, boards, and commissions as we continue to move forward.

You know, one of the other things that I'd like to say is that usually government is supposed to be setting the example by creating codes of conduct. Those codes of conduct that are implemented at this level are then followed by other organizations within our society: nonprofit organizations, unions, you name it. They can see the example that the government of Alberta is setting and make the changes as they continue to grow and strengthen their institutions.

But I've got to say that after 44 years of Conservative government in this province that was not the case. In fact, it was going the other way around. Nonprofits and other institutions within our society were creating codes of conduct, making sure that there was no conflict of interest among their boards, and they were setting the example so that finally we could catch up and make the changes at this level, here in the government of Alberta. After 44 years of Conservative government here in this province I'm glad that it took an NDP government to come into power and start making these changes. This is the kind of leadership that Albertans want to see. This is the kind of leadership that requires vision.

As you are, Madam Speaker, I'm also of mixed blood. Not of this country, but I self-identify as an indigenous person as well, and I'm proud of that indigenous heritage. It's not only here in North America, or what Anglos call North America, that indigenous people look seven generations down the road. You know, that's a practice of many, many, many indigenous groups throughout the entire world. You're looking at seven generations. When you make a decision, you're asking: how is this going to impact the children, the grandchildren, the great-grandchildren and so on and so on? Well, I'm glad that this government has come into power here and is finally working on getting this correct.

You know, I look forward to the day when we can be proud to see not 10 per cent – it's not even that yet – or 20 per cent or 30 per cent but when we see that 50 per cent of the people who are making up agencies, boards, and commissions are people who are racialized people in this province, when the people of Alberta look at not only their government but also their democratic institutions within their society and can see themselves reflected in those institutions. But for that, Madam Speaker, we require more transparency, and we require more diversity because the culture has to change.

Now, I'm not going to say that it's going to change overnight just by the passing of this one bill because it takes more than that. You and I both know that, Madam Speaker. You and I both know that it takes, yes, implementing legislation but then also going out there and having the conversations with people so that they can see and so that, as I was saying before, through the work that they do through nonprofit organizations in this province, they can tell us how we can improve and strengthen these institutions.

Many hon. members have spoken to this bill already, but I feel that it's absolutely necessary to highlight just a few aspects of this bill before we end today. Of course, Alberta's public agencies account for about half of the government's total budgetary spending. With these changes Alberta can be confident that public agency staff, board members are acting in the public interest.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung spoke at length about the importance of the public trust. I would say – and I go back to that whole issue of diversity – that in order to have that public trust, Albertans have to see themselves reflected in our institutions.

It's vitally important that our public agencies are held to the same high standards that we expect of our elected officials and senior public servants. This bill proposes that public agencies that are already subject to the Alberta Public Agencies Governance Act would also be subject to the Conflicts of Interest Act. Again, this goes back to the issue of transforming the culture that we currently have in this province, one where people didn't feel represented by the institutions.

The changes to the Conflicts of Interest Act would require all public agencies to have a code of conduct that includes the following prescribed elements. These are a requirement to conduct themselves impartially; restrictions on acting in self-interest or furthering private interest by virtue of one's position; disclosure of real and apparent conflicts of interest; restrictions on gifts, including monetary limits; and limitations on concurrent employment with other offices, including processes for seeking approval.

All APAGA agencies would be required to submit updated codes of conduct reflecting these prescribed elements to the Ethics Commissioner within four months of the act being proclaimed. The Ethics Commissioner will review all revised codes to ensure that they meet the requirements of the act and sign off by March 31, 2019. Agencies would then have to publish their new codes of conduct no later than April 30, 2019. As you can see, Madam Speaker, this is a process, a process by which we are engaging in this path towards transforming the culture that was long established by Conservatives here in this province. It's going to take a while, but we'll get there. We'll change that culture.

The legislation also proposes a set of core statutory requirements for CEOs and board chairs. These requirements include restrictions on private interest, restrictions on using influence, restrictions on using insider information, and disclosure of real and apparent conflicts of interest.

CEOs and equivalents of significant agencies would also be subject to additional statutory requirements upon designation, including restrictions on holding stocks and other public securities; disclosure to the Ethics Commissioner, including financial disclosure; and postemployment restrictions, specifically a 12-month cooling-off period following employment with a public agency. These additional statutory requirements would be set out in the act, but the positions that they would apply to would be designated in a separate order in council and come into effect on contract renewals and new appointments.

Where current contracts are longer term, a two-year transition period would apply, so within two years all CEOs and board chairs will be subject to these enhanced requirements.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

[Motion carried; Bill 27 read a second time]

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 23 Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's an honour to rise today and move third reading of Bill 23, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017, on behalf of my colleague the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General, Kathleen Ganley.

As we've discussed . . .

Hon. Members: Name.

Mr. Shepherd: Oh, I apologize. I withdraw that name and will attempt to read a little further ahead in my notes before speaking.

Bill 23, as we've discussed here in the House, would add age as a prohibited ground of discrimination to the Alberta Human Rights Act under sections 4 and 5 of the act. These sections, as we've discussed, include the areas of tenancy, goods, services, accommodation, and facilities. Now, Madam Speaker, this government supports all Albertans, which is why we're proposing to strengthen our current human rights legislation and further protect Albertans from age discrimination.

Earlier this year the government of Alberta agreed to a court order to make these changes. During the one-year period provided by the courts, our government took the time to ensure that we had a comprehensive understanding of the different perspectives surrounding this issue. Based upon what we heard, we're working to ensure that the specific types of age distinctions can continue without violating the Alberta Human Rights Act.

In regard to seniors' exemptions, first, it's important to note that this legislation will allow programs that provide benefits to minors and seniors, such as discounted movie tickets or reduced bus fares, to continue.

Second, we recognize that older Albertans may choose to live together in a community of people who are at a similar stage in life and may require similar supports. Therefore, Bill 23 would protect the ability of seniors to live in seniors-only housing, with the minimum age cut-off set at age 55.

We were pleased to hear support from members of the House, especially on the exceptions for seniors-only housing and for programs and activities that provide a benefit to seniors and minors. Many Albertans also expressed their support for these exceptions during our consultations.

Bill 23 also grants existing age-restricted condominiums a 15-year transition period. We recognize that many Albertans have made significant investments based on condo bylaws that were in place at the time that they made their purchase. The 15-year transition period is meant to provide notice so that Albertans who are affected by these changes have the opportunity to make informed decisions about where they wish to live.

In addition to the age-related amendments, we also want to allow for ameliorative programs and activities. These programs such as those that support inclusive and diverse workplaces improve situations for disadvantaged people. An example of this would be an employment program for indigenous youth.

We recognize the need to ensure that Albertans are made aware of these changes. Certainly, that's something that's been discussed here in the House and that's been brought up during the debate. If Bill 23 is passed, our government will be actively reaching out to Albertans who shared their views about this issue. We will also work with the Alberta Human Rights Commission to ensure that this information is publicly available through their many programs and services. They promote much of this information online, which they use to educate and engage with Albertans and organizations, and we have already posted information about this legislation on the government of Alberta website. Indeed, Madam Speaker, I've had the opportunity to make use of that in responding to my own constituents who have written in looking for clarification and looking for opportunities to be able to link to that information to share with others in their condominiums.

If passed, Madam Speaker, this bill will come into force on January 1, 2018.

Madam Speaker, we are committed to enhancing every Albertan's ability to fully and equally participate in our society, and our government supports all Albertans. We believe that these changes will indeed make life better for them. We believe that the proposed amendments strike the right balance between the interests of many different groups while enhancing human rights protection and embracing diversity in Alberta. I ask that all members support me in moving third reading.

Continuing, I'd like to take the opportunity while I'm here and while I've had the opportunity to rise to discuss a few questions that have arisen during the debate and, indeed, that I've heard about from my constituents to ensure that we have a full understanding of the steps this legislation would take. There has been some discussion around the issue of mandatory retirement and pension plans, how that would be addressed under this legislation and whether the integrity of the bona fide pension plans that have mandatory retirement provisions would be addressed in the regulations phase. To this I can note that age is already a prohibited ground of discrimination under the act in the context of employment. Bill 23 does not change anything in that regard, so that protection remains in place.

In terms of questions around whether we're protecting the rights of seniors to a fair and reasonable evaluation for fitness in operating a motor vehicle, indeed I was just speaking with the Member for Calgary-Currie this morning, and he was telling me of his grandfather's journey with that and sort of working through that process. We certainly recognize that it's an issue that comes to light for many seniors as they age and still want to be able to get around their community, get to the places they need to go. Well, all drivers regardless of age are legally required to report any medical conditions that may affect their ability to drive safely. Currently there is required a medical report to be signed by a physician at the age of 75 years, at the age of 80 years, and every two years after the age of 80. Their doctor may also recommend that they take a road test or further testing before they approve that medical form.

Once age is added to section 4 of the act, anyone who feels that the existing regime discriminates on the basis of age would have the option to reach out to the commission to discuss bringing a complaint. Now, section 11 of the act does permit practices that are reasonable and justifiable in circumstances to continue without violating the act. We believe that the existing practices fall under that defence and that no further amendments, therefore, to the act are needed at this time.

In regard to tax benefits for seniors, speaking of things such as income splitting and asking whether those would be excluded in the exemptions of benefits for minors and seniors, sections 4 and 5 of the act currently are specific to the areas of tenancy, goods, services, accommodation, and facilities. Therefore, Bill 23 does not impact tax benefits since those are not addressed in those sections, so things such as income splitting and other aspects of the tax regime will not be affected in any way by this bill.

There have been some discussion and some questions around rental car agencies and how some of the concerns that have been brought forward by insurance companies in regard to their ability to use age as one of their factors in assessing rates and coverage options would be addressed and whether they can use the relevant and actual data regarding age to help determine insurance premiums. Well, in that regard, Madam Speaker, I can say once again, as I noted earlier, that section 11 of the act does permit practices that are considered to be reasonable and justifiable in the circumstances to continue without being considered to violate the act.

That's the approach that's been taken to date in Alberta for discrimination in the insurance industry on the basis of gender and physical disability, for example, because we do know that young men, for example, are often charged higher insurance rates than young women because they're statistically found to have more incidents. Once age is added to section 4, this type of analysis could also be applied in the context of age discrimination for car rental agencies. That means that age distinctions are permitted where legally justifiable. That would be something, then, that would be up to the commission and the courts to determine.

In regard to specific lists of benefits currently offered to minors and seniors, whether those will be created or whether the exemptions are going to be more of a blanket statement, at this point on the exception for programs and activities that offer benefits to seniors and minors, the intention is to go with more of a blanket exemption as opposed to trying to cover all of the ifs, ands, whats, and possibilities.

As I mentioned, there have been some questions about how this information will be communicated to Albertans, and certainly,

Madam Speaker, I recognize that this is a significant change and one that impacts many stakeholders across our province, including renters, landlords, building owners, property managers, so it's essential that we make sure this information is clearly communicated and made available to the public so that they understand both what their rights are and what their responsibilities are.

When we first proposed this legislation, Minister Ganley did hold a news conference to explain how the legislation would work if passed.

An Hon. Member: Names.

Mr. Shepherd: Oh, pardon me. I apologize.

The Minister of Justice – I'm withdrawing the name – held a news conference to explain how the legislation would work if passed. We've also listed the proposed legislation and the impacts on the government website, and indeed, Madam Speaker, as I mentioned earlier, I can say that it is a fairly robust and clear explanation that I've found very useful in reaching out to my own constituents. We will also, then, be reaching out to Albertans who contacted us, so everybody who wrote in to provide their thoughts to the minister and through the survey will be hearing back from the government as to the changes that would be in place if this bill should pass.

Again, we will work with the Alberta Human Rights Commission, who does some excellent work around education in the province and does a great job of posting this information on their website, to ensure that we're utilizing that resource in every way possible to make sure all Albertans are aware of the changes.

Now, another issue that has come up and that indeed I've heard raised, I think, by some of my other colleagues from Calgary and here in Edmonton is in regard to the changing of bylaws on condo boards.

[Mr. Sucha in the chair]

Certainly, we recognize that in order for condominium corporations to decide whether they're going to move to 55-plus or indeed whether they may choose instead to simply remove age restrictions, that may require a change in their bylaws. The question has been asked whether that could be just simply done via amendments to those bylaws. As in regard to all areas covered by the act, it is up to those who are subject to the act to conduct themselves in compliance, but we are giving that transition period of 15 years, which allows condominiums to amend their bylaws so they're in compliance with the law. It's a reasonable process. It's something I know we're going through with in the condominium building where I own a suite and rent that out. We're working with lawyers here in the city to update our bylaws. It's not too onerous a process, but if condominium associations and condo residents do have questions, they can of course contact Service Alberta's consumer contact centre, and that phone number is available online at servicealberta.ca. There are also some condo tipsheets there, which may provide some further information on how they could go about that process.

Now, there were also some questions, as I understand, in regard to provisions for 55-plus, in regard to only one member of a household having to be 55-plus in order to be grandparenting or being able to remain in an age-restricted building. There have been some questions, I guess, asking about the fact that that could then mean that you have very mixed-generational tenants in a building if only one individual, say, is over the age of 55 and then you have, you know, their son and his partner and their children all living there in an age-restricted building because one person is 55 years old. On that, I would just note that the lowest age restriction, as we've said, that would meet the seniors-only housing exception is that one person needs to be 55. That's the rule that's set out through the legislation. However, landlords and condominium complexes are free to choose a higher age restriction if they wish. They could choose to set it at 60 or 65. They could set it at any age above 55.

For example, the age limitation could be set at 60, or the age restriction could specify that only spouses or adult interdependent partners younger than 55 would be allowed. Condominium corporations retain the right to have a bit of flexibility there, to define things for what would best suit their building. We've tried to build that in and accommodate that in any way that we can within this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that I do fully support. I think it's important that we offer Albertans the same human rights protections that all other Canadians enjoy. And as I've been clear about in my previous statements, this is a bill that I feel is beneficial for my constituency. I have heard from some constituents who have some concerns about losing access to age-restricted facilities, but I think the provisions that we've provided here, the fact that we are offering that grandparenting for 15 years, recognize that some buildings are simply not going to prove attractive to families simply because they only have one- and two-bedroom suites, perhaps because of their location, because of their lack of other amenities that are attractive to families.

Mr. Speaker, this is going to open up all sorts of new possibilities for downtown Edmonton. As I said earlier, in downtown Edmonton right now we're just on the cusp. We're about 50 per cent of the way to the sort of population density we need to have a truly vibrant and thriving downtown economy that really supports the kinds of services that people are looking for like grocery stores, child care centres, active schools. Grandin elementary school, just a couple of blocks from here, is undersubscribed by over 100 students. This opportunity for us to have more families living in our urban communities, something that many millennials are very interested in, is a great benefit for our community.

As we're working also to attract new businesses to our city and new young professionals, many of them are interested in that urban lifestyle. We want to bring these businesses to downtown Edmonton and downtown Calgary, too, to help fill that vacancy rate. Many of these young professionals want to live nearer to their work, to take advantage of our new downtown bike grid here in Edmonton or the bike grid in Calgary. I have to shamefully admit that you beat us to that one, but we appreciated the example, the ground that you broke for us so that we could move forward on that, too. These steps help make Alberta a more family-friendly and indeed, as a result, business-friendly place.

I'm very happy to stand in support of this bill. I deeply appreciate the work that the Minister of Justice, whose name I will not mention, did in consulting on this bill and talking with stakeholders and really, I think, finding a good balance that's going to allow all of us to move forward to protect those rights that we need to have for Albertans and allow them to enjoy the same rights as all other Canadians while having as minimal an impact as we can on those who bought their homes and were operating under the previous regulations.

Thank you again to the minister. Thank you to everyone who's spoken in support of this bill. I look forward to voting in support at the end of third reading.

The Acting Speaker: The chair will recognize the Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure and honour to rise and speak in favour of Bill 23. Speaking immediately after the Member for Edmonton-Centre I think is a good place to pick up.

One of the things that one of my hon. colleagues here and I were talking about earlier is that this bill has managed to do a very good job of finding the right balance on what is a very complex issue. As I'm sure a lot of my hon. colleagues have found, our constituency offices, especially those of us in inner-city, urban constituencies, although it's certainly not limited to that, have received a lot of feedback on this legislation, at least certainly initially. There was a lot of concern that there was going to be an overreach in reaction to a bill that is ostensibly to respond to a court ruling. In this case I think the government has got it right. They found the balance, and it is just remarkable, Mr. Speaker, that in this Assembly there actually are some issues that aren't purely black and white, where, actually, we can find some middle ground and some thoughtful nuance.

Having heard from many of my constituents, I'm certainly very happy to be able to respond to them that, in fact, the bill does meet the court-mandated changes without overreaching and does provide protections, especially to older Albertans, so I'm very happy to support the bill.

Given that the court order came down back in January 2017, of course, we knew that these changes needed to be made, and it brings Alberta into line with the rest of the country. I always have a red flag go up every time I hear that Alberta is the only province or one of the only provinces that does or doesn't do a certain thing. That's always an area for further investigation, and this is another one of those areas where we were, in fact, one of only two provinces that did not have age read into our provincial human rights code. Now, with the courts having done that for us, this legislation makes that change official.

I do want to thank everyone who has reached out both to my constituency office and, I know, to many other members to provide feedback. There was a very comprehensive and thoughtful consultation process on what is a very complex issue, and I'm happy to know that this bill will pass. It does recognize that Albertans over the age of 55 may opt out or opt to live together in a community of people with the same interests and the same age demographic, and that 15-year grace period does give Albertans an opportunity to transition into the new rules.

Condo owners consulted along the process strongly indicated that individuals should have a choice in their housing and lifestyle decisions, and this legislation, including exemptions for seniors-only housing, does mean that buildings can cater exclusively to those over 55, and that phase-in period allows people who are now currently in their 40s to move into that senior age bracket. Condo owners now, then, therefore have more than a decade to phase in the new rules, but renters, of course, will notice the changes as of the 1st of January of next year.

The point I wanted to make on that is that this does seem to, again, strike the right balance between allowing Albertans choice in their housing but also recognizing that there are families who will choose to live in condos and apartments. It does expand the housing options for those families. While I certainly have heard from some landlords who are concerned about that, I believe that any issues or challenges that may be faced by landlords are far outweighed by the benefits to Albertans, who now have more housing options. In striking that balance, where we cannot meet the needs or the requests of both sides of an issue, I think that in this case we've come down on the right side of this issue by allowing more housing options in a way that I don't believe greatly impairs the ability of a landlord to make a living or to rent out their buildings.

Other exemptions in the bill, the ameliorative programs – for example, buildings set aside to help members of a vulnerable population – of course, are necessary and welcome, programs such as employment or internship programs for youth. Prior to the introduction of this legislation, again, we were the only province whose human rights legislation did not provide an exemption for ameliorative programs or activities, and again I'm very happy to see that. We ensure in this legislation that the proposed amendments ensure that programs providing a benefit to minors and seniors such as discounted movie tickets, those sorts of things, are in fact allowed to continue.

Given all of that, Mr. Speaker, the Alberta Party caucus is very proud to support this bill, and I look forward to voting in favour in third reading. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: The chair recognizes the hon. Member for Edmonton-McClung.

Mr. Dach: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to stand today in support of Bill 23, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017. I'm not going to comment on the bill in its entirety. I'm going to focus more on the real estate elements of it, that I've had a fair bit of experience in and also that I've had the opportunity to speak with constituents about at length during the course of the deliberations over the bill.

Bill 23, as we have heard other speakers say, would add age as a prohibited ground for discrimination to the Alberta Human Rights Act under the areas of tenancy, goods and services, and accommodations or facilities. Now, earlier this year the government of Alberta agreed to a court order to make these changes, and it's important to note that it was a court order that required that these changes be made. In accommodating and reacting to this court order and accepting the court order, one wants to be careful as a government that one doesn't open oneself up to further court challenges, and that's why it's very important to respond in a way that where you're implementing reasonable exemptions to the court order, you choose those exemptions in a way that is going to pass the test of the courts. Now, of course, somebody could challenge down the road, but you do your best at this point in creating the legislation to ensure that to the best extent possible you avoid court challenges that might be successful.

What I wanted to speak about in particular, as you, Mr. Speaker, may be guessing by now, would be with respect to the age limits in seniors' condominiums, in particular in owned condominiums. As the House knows, I've sold real estate for over 30 years, and I sold many, many condominiums with various different age restrictions. The common age points that one would find in Alberta in these condominiums which would have age restrictions on them would be 18-plus, 45-plus, 50-plus, and then 55-plus. These were the most common age points that condominium associations or developers/builders would place on their buildings when they sold. Then forevermore, unless the condominium association decided to change them, those would be the age restrictions that would govern the sale of those units to prospective successive buyers.

In choosing 55 as the age limit at which we would consider it to be a reasonable exemption, I think, in my personal view, that the considerations that were made were well considered. If you add 40 plus 15, you get 55. I mentioned the different age breaks that were there. Many of the units you'll see are 45-plus. Indeed, we've grandfathered the condominiums which have age restrictions right now to a 15-year period, so beyond the 15-year period they will have to adopt 55 or higher as an age limit for the condominium association, giving plenty of time to transition to the new restriction, which satisfies the court order. It will allow people who are living in these condominiums the ability to age in place up to and beyond the 55-plus age limit.

I think that in setting the age limit to 55, what we're doing – and this is my interpretation of things – is protecting the quiet enjoyment in retirement years for those individuals who wish to be among those of 55-plus in age versus prohibiting younger people from becoming residents. I think that's probably the choice or the decision point that courts may make if there are subsequent challenges, Mr. Speaker. The subsequent challenges may actually be based upon that determination, whether indeed the intent of the legislation was to protect quiet enjoyment in retirement years or whether the intent was to prohibit younger people or ban them from becoming residents.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

That's a critical point, in my view, in suggesting that the 55 age limit was the right age limit to fall upon, where I think it can be argued effectively in any subsequent court challenge that 55-plus is meant to protect the quiet enjoyment of people in retirement years who wish to live together with folks of similar age or older versus a desire to prohibit little feet or young adults or partygoing 18-pluses from being residents in their condominiums. Once again, the reasonable exemptions must potentially avoid court challenges. This 15-year phase-out, I think, was a proper number to arrive at because it allows people to age in place even if they are starting at a 40-plus age limit in a building they're in.

Certainly, not everybody is going to be happy. I did have a town hall in one of my very large 55-plus condominium complexes in my constituency, and during that town hall there were, I believe, 90 people who attended, and 82 was the average age. I think they gave up precious time coming from their suites down to the lobby, forgoing their afternoon session of watching the Legislative Assembly, to come to that town hall and discuss their concerns about the protection they thought they might be losing from the 55-plus age limit. I know that they were very, very pleased to know that that 55-plus age limit will be preserved as a result of this legislation and, I believe, preserved in a way which would survive a potential court challenge in the future.

It's a complex issue, and it affects a lot of Albertans. I know this is probably the most contentious issue in the legislation. It was from my perspective. I know the Alberta Real Estate Association seriously consulted with its members and made representations on the issue. I know that there are still some individuals attempting to lobby to reduce the age restriction to a lower number. But I think the 55-plus number is the right number, and I believe that it will survive a court challenge. A lower number, I think, would be at risk of not being successfully defended in the courts. I'm glad that we did land on this 15-year grandfathering time frame and the 55-plus age limit or age ceiling.

I wanted to mention that the number of individuals in my constituency who are in 55-plus residences number in the hundreds. They can be in adult bungalows, they could be in high rises, or they could be in more of a seniors' assisted living situation. But there are lots and lots of people in not only the downtown area but also in the suburbs, where my constituency is located, who really appreciate the fact that this 55-plus age limit will be protected in this legislation and that it will, in my view, survive a court challenge that might be deemed to be inevitable by some parties who still feel that they want a lower limit in place, especially in owner-occupied condominiums.

However, one thing I wanted to comment on as well is the fact that we've actually grandfathered this in. I think it's a really good idea to do it. Some have argued that the age limit should have been protected in perpetuity for existing buildings which had an age limit, whether it had been 18-plus or 45-plus, 50-plus, or 55-plus, whatever the case may be. Some have argued that we should maybe keep that in perpetuity, but in fact what it would have done, if you really think this through, is that it would have created a class of properties, whether it be in Calgary, Edmonton, Red Deer, wherever they happen to be, which would have been unique in their nature and probably escalate in market value because of their rareness and make them an unusual and rare bird, which would create a bit of an anomaly in the market.

I don't think it would have survived a court challenge either. It really wouldn't have been a great idea to not grandfather these in and to have a final date where the 55-plus was the minimum age limit at which you could restrict residency. Then you don't have the complication in the future of court cases which would end up having one forced to revisit the whole issue all over again. Once again, you don't know for sure. Somebody could file a court challenge about anything, but I believe we are safe at age 55-plus in terms of being able to survive a court challenge, this reasonable exemption to the court order.

Once again, I believe that over time people will get used to this. There will be some objections to it. There will be a little bit of an adjustment period. But it was a court-ordered demand that Alberta responded to, and it's something that we have the most respect for in this province and, I think, in all provinces: human rights legislation. When a court order insisted that we comply, we didn't challenge it. We chose to respect the Human Rights Act and the courts and make accommodations with reasonable exceptions so that people who are over 55 can reasonably enjoy their retirement in housing with other people of similar age. At the same time, we're not prohibiting younger people from accommodating themselves in buildings that they would like to live in that might suit their purposes and which otherwise would be unavailable to them.

For those and many other reasons I support this piece of legislation, and I ensure that I'll do my very best to explain to my constituents who still might have some reservations about it the reasons why it's necessary to follow the court's demands and ensure that this balance between the different age groups is struck and that we move forward to continue looking to accommodate each other in this society we so dearly love.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

4:40

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to the third reading of Bill 23, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017. Our caucus, the United Conservative Party, does support the spirit of this bill and the fact that we do recognize that it will bring Alberta in line with the rest of the country.

Canada: we are known as a world leader in progressive, nondiscriminatory policy in human rights, and I am proud to support any legislation that reflects that. But that said, I just wanted to say briefly with Bill 23 that I do not believe that the people who built these buildings had discriminatory thoughts in their heads when they were doing this. I will challenge that when they were using age as a definition of who can live in their buildings, it was more to address a lifestyle, and they're using age to identify a certain lifestyle of people that wanted to live in a certain building that was perhaps quieter or whatnot or that fit their lifestyles.

I would also argue that . . .

Mr. Dach: Age is not a choice.

Mr. Yao: Tell me about it.

I'd argue that, again, these apartment buildings and these developments: it wasn't their intent to discriminate. Their intent was that they've identified a market, a group of individuals who were willing to invest in a home that suited their lifestyles, and I think everyone in this room can appreciate that we are all slightly different and that birds of a feather stick together.

I mean, I had a fellow who came straight from East India who came up to Fort McMurray. I was talking to him, a lovely man, and he asked me, "Tany, where should I live in town here?" I asked, "What are you talking about?" "Well, where do the brown people live?" That's what he asked me. I told him, "I honestly don't know, but maybe we can ask some others." But that's what he was looking for. He wanted his kids surrounded by other kids who spoke his mother tongue, and I respect and appreciate that.

Again, with this bill, though, we do recognize that there is a discriminatory angle to this and that we need to keep that door open because I myself would feel very discriminated against if a building chose to have some sort of a basis on colour, or maybe they didn't want politicians in there. I don't know, but the point is that there are many lines in the sand that we can cross that hint on discriminatory practices. That's why we fight discrimination, and that's why we need to allow this bill, because it is the foot in the door for discriminatory practices.

Certainly, in our buildings here we have all sorts of discriminatory practices. All along this Federal building here that we have our offices in, they have "no dog" signs everywhere. You know, it is sad, and it is unfortunate. I can only assume that it was the government side that put these signs up because they hate dogs so much. I would bring my dog in because he actually does give me comfort and helps me deal with certain stresses even though he is not official. That is one example of where I felt discriminated against because of what happened at the Federal building and what the government's objectives are with that.

With that said, in conclusion, I guess, we do have to be worried about discrimination. We do have to ensure that it's fought at every angle and in every possible way, and we need to ensure that we maintain a country that does have nondiscriminatory policies throughout.

I thank you for the opportunity to speak. Again, we do support this bill and recognize the aspects of it, but we also have to recognize the nuances in which these developers were building these buildings, and I appreciate that there is a grandfathering clause of sorts that allows 15 years for these buildings to convert over. In the end, yes, I support this bill.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I was so enthralled by what you had to say, especially about dogs. You spoke about the UCP perspective on the bill itself and how you support the bill, but I'm interested in knowing a little bit more about how the UCP supports access to housing for all people and what you would like to see as we continue to move forward. Of course, the bill specifically is addressing the fact that we need to create more spaces and more access for, I would even argue, young families, those people who are in their thirtysomethings, you know. Maybe you already have one child, perhaps even two. They need more spaces to live. Of course, accompanying that is also the fact that we need to create affordable housing here in the province of Alberta. So I'm interested in knowing a little bit more about what the UCP stance is on both these aspects that the bill is really trying to create.

Now, of course, at the end of the day, you've heard me get up and speak to this bill before, specifically around the collective human right of housing. Like that of education and health care, housing is also very important, so on this side of the House we're really focused on trying to make sure to address all these issues, and we understand that the best way that you can address poverty or, better stated, poverty reduction is by first making sure that people are housed within our society. I'm very eager to hear what the hon. member has to say, what the stance of the UCP is on access to housing specifically for young families and, of course, those for whom housing is out of reach and who require affordable housing.

The Acting Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-St. Albert.

Mr. Horne: Yes. Thank you, Madam Speaker. You know, this is a bill that I was very happy to see come forward. Shortly after the election this was something that I looked into myself as the potential for a private member's bill. [interjections] Hon. member, through the chair, please. Thank you. Apparently, that's hilarious. Anyway, I was very concerned about this myself.

There are, as the Member for Edmonton-Centre was talking about, many people my age who have a hard time finding housing that they can afford, and a lot of that comes down to a lot of the affordable housing being either already full or designated often as 45-plus or in many cases 18-plus. Now, the challenge with that is that when you have somebody fresh out of university looking for a job and also trying to find a house, often they're moving cities, and they're trying to find work in their field. They are trying to get established, but they can't find a house, or they can't find long-term housing. In some cases they're lucky and they can find a six-month rental, but then, you know, six months down the road they're back looking. They're looking for housing, and they don't have the stability to really focus on their career. This is something that they're very concerned about, this access to housing based on their age. So I was happy to see that this bill was coming forward, but there was also some concern about what this will look like.

You know, there are a lot of great facilities that are fairly called seniors' facilities, seniors' housing. They're not supportive, but they are built with seniors in mind. They are usually at grade, have an accessible washroom. Some but not all will have things like a walk-in shower, all of the typical things you would think of in a facility specifically built for seniors. Many of these communities were concerned that with age discrimination being added into the Human Rights Act, they wouldn't be allowed to continue as they currently exist.

One example of these facilities is the Grove Seniors Village in my constituency. They're a 55-plus co-op. The Member for Sherwood Park visited I think it was last year and was very impressed with their model. I've been there a few times myself, and they do a lot of great work for the community. Their primary focus is creating housing and community for residents over the age of 55, and they do that very well. All of their facilities are at grade, no stairs. In my times there I haven't found a single flight of stairs except down to the storage room at one of the facilities. I think maybe some of the furnaces are downstairs, but, you know, the residents aren't often going down there anyway. This is good to see, that they are allowed to continue. I keep wanting to say that they're grandfathered in, but when we're talking about seniors' villages, that seems a bit punny.

I'm very happy to see that this is coming forward. I'm happy to see that there's the compromise there between, you know, allowing for the 55-plus facilities and for programs. Like the hon. member was saying earlier with movie tickets and such, I'm glad to see that there's that compromise between making sure that seniors' facilities and programs are still functional but that younger residents in particular and residents with families can still find housing and have access to many of those programs and housing that they really need, especially when they're first getting established in a new city or a new industry.

I wanted to thank the Minister of Justice for bringing this bill forward. I look forward to everybody voting in support in third reading and passing this bill.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to 29(2)(a)?

Are there any members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Dr. Swann: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Pleased to have the first opportunity to speak to Bill 23, a fine balance, I think, based on some of the concerns expressed in my constituency and beyond, where people feel a legitimate concern around, especially, over 55s and needing to have a certain cultural and environmental ambience that they are comfortable with and at the same time recognizing that other restrictions on young families with children shouldn't be a basis for discrimination.

I think the government has found a nice balance here with respect to the Human Rights Act historically protecting against age discrimination in the areas of applications and notices; employment practices and advertisements; membership in trade unions, employers' organizations, or occupational associations. Age was not a protected ground in relation to the provision of goods, services, accommodation, or facilities customarily available to the public in relation to tenancies.

The court ruling stems from a constitutional challenge to the Human Rights Act initiated by Ruth Adria, who is a well-known seniors' advocate here, motivated by concerns about discrimination against the elderly in the areas of services and tenancies. I haven't heard from her since, but certainly she's been a very strong advocate here for a number of years. I think this addresses many of the concerns that she's had.

With respect to the Human Rights Act, though, I've repeatedly over the years raised other issues that need to be addressed under the Human Rights Act and discrimination based on some other common characteristics, I guess I would say. The minister, I would say, two years ago indicated that they were going to look at those issues as well, and I fear that it's now too late in this to again address some of these issues that have to do with constraints such as indigenous heritage; social condition, which can still be used as a means of discrimination because it's not explicitly identified in the Human Rights Act; language in this case; and pregnancy.

There are a few provinces that have tried to address some of these issues in their legislation. Pregnancy, for example, is an explicitly protected ground in Quebec and Nunavut, and variants are found in Manitoba and the Yukon, but it has not been explicitly identified beyond that. I think there's opportunity here, if we do indeed address some of these issues through the Human Rights Act in future, that we consider that.

Social condition is another explicitly protected ground in Quebec, New Brunswick, and the Northwest Territories but, again, not here in Alberta. Social condition is a broader descriptor. Rather than being someone on public assistance, it includes anyone who is low income or living in poverty. I think there are many people who have felt that their social condition was a basis for discrimination in their accommodation.

Aboriginal origin is explicitly protected only in Nova Scotia. Again, an opportunity for us to move from implicit protection to explicit protection because, in the main, very few people who feel that discrimination as an aboriginal person will take it to the human rights tribunal, which is unfortunate. The Sheldon M. Chumir Foundation for Ethics in Leadership pointed out in its 2007 report that it's the indigenous people that desperately need to have this become a more explicit part of our Human Rights Act.

Political belief is another, that has been protected in British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, and Northwest Territories, with some variants to this found in Manitoba, Quebec, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia. But we haven't to date decided within this province to explicitly protect people from discrimination on the basis of political belief.

Finally, language is explicitly protected only in Quebec. Again, the question, I guess, for us is to think about why we wouldn't want to be explicit about some of these basic rights that people have, that should not be in any way discriminated against.

While I fully support this bill and the intent – and it will make progress, I think, in finding that balance in terms of young families, including children's accommodation – I hope that the government will take it under advisement with the next review and we will indeed look at some of these other characteristics that are eminently suitable to protect under the Human Rights Act.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-Northern Hills.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise this afternoon to speak at third reading to Bill 23, the Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017. In January 2017 the government of Alberta agreed to expand the Alberta Human Rights Act to include age as protected grounds under sections 4 and 5. Before this the Alberta Human Rights Act only protected age against discrimination in section 3, publications and notices; sections 7 and 8, employment practices and advertisements; and section 9, membership in a trade union, employers' organization, or occupational association.

Madam Speaker, this bill, Bill 23, will add age as a prohibited ground of discrimination under the areas of tenancy, goods, services, accommodations, or facilities. This government supports all Albertans, which is why we are proposing to strengthen our current human rights legislation and further protect Albertans from age discrimination.

Madam Speaker, my office, like many others here, received plenty of feedback regarding this issue. In one condo residence in Calgary-Northern Hills there is a condominium unit that has 252 suites. It was built in 2002. The building was designed for an older, mature population to age in place, with wheelchair-accommodating bathrooms, doorways, and open floor plans. The residence also has many amenities, including a pool with ramp access, a fitness room, a movie theatre, and daily social activities to encourage residents to remain active, both physically and mentally, due to the age of the residents in this community. Ninety per cent or more of the population is 55 or older, with most being 70 and older.

5:00

The owners and tenants in this building have purposely purchased or rented units in this community because of the age restriction. I've been told repeatedly that children are welcome as visitors, but the residents are happy to live without the constant noise of young people. Their common areas include coffee shop areas, libraries, and games areas with pool tables and shuffleboard, and they strongly believe that these spaces would suffer with children living there permanently.

The condominium unit also relies on volunteers for their condo boards and to maintain their beautiful flower beds and gardens.

Finally, during one of my consultations I was told that living in a community like theirs saves the government from having to provide assisted living and long-term care facilities to these older residents. It is generally recognized that people live better and longer when they live in their own homes with the support of their neighbours and friends.

Madam Speaker, it is because of feedback like this and the consultations the government conducted last summer that many Albertans are in favour of allowing seniors-only housing to continue. The bill sets the minimum age for seniors-only housing at 55 or any age older than that. Seniors-only housing would also be required to accommodate, within their age restriction, special circumstances that are specified in regulation such as live-in caregivers.

Madam Speaker, we also know that many Albertans have made significant investments on the basis of condo bylaws in place at the time of purchase. This is why we have grandparented existing age restrictions for a 15-year transition period so that they will not violate section 4 of the act. Also, during this 15-year period age-restricted condominiums can transition to being seniors-only.

If passed, these amendments will come into force January 1, 2018. Madam Speaker, after hearing and reading all of the feedback I have received from residents in Calgary-Northern Hills, I believe this bill will strike an adequate compromise for all Albertans. This bill provides an opportunity to embrace diversity in Alberta and to align our legislation with other jurisdictions in Canada.

I will be supporting this bill in third reading, and I encourage all of the others in the room here to do the same. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none for 29(2)(a), are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, I will now call on the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre to close debate.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's an honour to get to be part of this change in the Alberta Human Rights Act, to have been part of some similar changes that were made earlier to include gender orientation and transgender identity in the act as well. It's always good to see this kind of progress happen and see society move forward, and it's an honour to be a legislator that gets to be part of it.

I thank all of the members for their comments, I thank the minister for her work in putting this bill together, and I encourage everyone to vote in support. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

[Motion carried; Bill 23 read a third time]

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Deputy Chair: I would like to call the committee to order.

Bill 24

An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances

The Deputy Chair: Are there any comments, questions, or amendments to be offered with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Chair. It is my pleasure to finally be up to speak on the record in support of Bill 24. Throughout this debate it's hard not to be moved by the many personal stories shared by my MLA colleagues. I have to say that I am proud to be an MLA and ally. I am proud to support my colleagues on this particular issue and proud to support this bill without reservation. This bill provides clarification to school boards about how GSAs work in schools.

One of the things I found very interesting about the debate is that in my office I've been getting some letters, and I think it's interesting to sort of go through what one of those letters looks like and just sort of talk about those concerns and how, for this particular bill, perhaps those concerns are unfounded.

I'm going to quote a little bit from one of the letters I got recently from a constituent. It starts off by saying:

My criticism relates to the lack of nuance in the bill. There may be situations where parents ought to be notified about their children's involvements at school as these matters are serious: high rates of self-harm in trans kids, suicide risks, et cetera.

I will note that this particular point in the letter was actually addressed by the Health minister, in fact, in QP today, when she stated that all teachers, if they feel that there's a child that is about to put themselves in danger, will take the appropriate steps to make sure that that doesn't happen, which may of course include informing that particular child's parents.

The letter goes on to say:

Some kids are just not mature enough to work through their issues without the help of their parents, especially if they have other issues such as autism, et cetera.

Then it goes on to say:

I don't believe professionals can be trusted to have our children's best interests at heart.

Of course, I disagree with that. I believe that teachers who work in our school system are well trained and, you know, are able to work to the best of their ability to support students in whatever needs they may have. Also, I think that if there's a child that believes that they need to go to a GSA to talk about what they're feeling, then I believe that students are indeed mature enough to do that. But they are still kids in school, and that is why the GSAs exist, to allow them to talk that through with their peers or perhaps with the support of a teacher. So I disagree with that point.

The letter goes on to say:

Tragically, some parents can be hurtful to their LGBTQ kids, but it is a serious error in logic to say that most parents are hurtful.

I agree with this. It is, in fact, unfortunate that, you know, there are some parents that might for whatever reason perhaps not be as open or accepting if their kids came out to them as LGBTQ-plus. I always have faith that parents, upon learning this, would eventually come to learn to accept their children, but that might not be the initial response.

The same letter goes on to say:

This bill makes that problematic assumption.

That, like I said, parents could be hurtful to an LGBTQ kid.

It also assumes that the “system” is more equipped to support kids than their parents, which has historically been a disastrous assumption.

Now, I disagree with some of the assertions in there. We’ve heard from many people in this House and from the GSA rally that I attended at McDougall Centre this weekend about how disastrous it is when children and LGBTQ individuals are outed before they are ready. At the end of the day, that is what this bill is preventing.

Yeah, in some ways the system is actually able and equipped to be able to deal with this because, just like any other club in school, it provides a place for LGBTQ or otherwise supportive individuals to talk with their peer groups. At the end of the day, this is essentially just like another club, any other club in school. You know, if I had a child and he or she joined a club at school, say a chess club, for example, I’m pretty sure that schools don’t send a note home that your child has joined the chess club.

With that, the letter goes on, of course, to talk more about that assumption that, like I said, schools aren’t able to deal with it. I think they are.

This legislation, you know, makes sure that students are the ones who decide when and how they will have this deeply personal, important conversation with their parents and their loved ones and friends around them. This legislation does not force students to keep secrets from their parents. Students who are comfortable talking to their parents about their sexuality will do so. This bill does not prevent that. This bill saves lives by providing students with a safe place where they can support one another and find camaraderie and friendship. This legislation strengthens supports for students who wish to form or join a GSA and protects students who need these spaces.

Others have seemed to have been on the record that, you know, they believe that parents have a right to know what’s going on with their kids at school unless the parents are abusive. I feel like that may be a position to take. However, it puts teachers and school administrators in the very awkward position of having to determine if that is the case. I think that this bill provides the right balance of being able to protect our LGBTQ youth while, of course, not preventing those children from having that important conversation with their parents. At the end of the day, this bill is about the kids. It’s about the importance of protecting students who are questioning, who want to be supportive of their friends or talk to their peers about their various experiences.

I hope that we can get this bill passed because of what I heard at the GSA rally that I attended on the weekend. There was an individual who got up and spoke about her experiences in Catholic school, about the troubles in trying to form a GSA and what happens when individuals who were in a position of administration were not being as helpful as perhaps they otherwise could be. She said: I am not a court case. When there is a student who is in school and is questioning and is ready to come out, they should be able to do so, and this bill protects that.

I’d like to finish off by saying that I’m in a very privileged position in that I identify and am a straight white male, and that puts me in a position of privilege. But I’ve heard so much from those in the LGBTQ community when I was growing up, from those who are now adults in their 50s or 60s who had to hide their sexuality when perhaps we were at a much different place of acceptance, and I know from them that this bill is right. I know in my heart that it is right, and I am so happy to be on the record to unequivocally support Bill 24.

Thank you.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Madam Chair. It is a real honour to be able to rise today and speak in support of Bill 24. You know, a great number of members have already risen in this House and talked about the impact and the benefit of this bill and of ensuring that all students across Alberta, no matter where they go to school, no matter which city or town or village they live in, have a safe, welcoming, and caring place to learn. Ultimately, we want to make sure that all students across the province have that same right and that same ability, and I think that this act does a really great job of making sure that that consistency is there across the province.

Early in my tenure in this role I met a young woman, a young lesbian, actually. She came out to me at the end of a forum. I and a couple of other hon. members from across the way were at a youth forum that was held here. At the time the students had an opportunity to ask us all questions, and we had an opportunity to talk a little bit about what was important to us and our parties and what we believed in. One of the questions that we got asked, like, four times, I think, by four separate students was around the right to access the bathroom that a child identified with, that matched their gender identity. Members opposite dithered a little bit on it, but I was pretty clear with the students that human rights apply no matter where you are, no matter who you are, and that that was something that was really important to us and to our government.

This young woman came up to me after the forum, and she came out to me. She said thank you for the fact that we were so clearly in support of young queer youth. She talked about some of the fears and concerns that she had as a young queer woman and about some of the experiences that she had had at school. We chatted a little bit about the club that she was part of at school and how helpful it had been to her. You know, I think of her story a lot. I think of our conversation a lot. I think that every student across our fine province, wherever they live, should have that same access to a loving, supporting, and caring group who identify with them.

I wanted to also take a moment to speak to the mental health side of this legislation and to the mental health and other impacts of this healthwise. Last month, in October, a survey came out. It was called Being Safe, Being Me in Alberta: Results of the Canadian Trans Youth Health Survey. Now, it was a comprehensive survey of transgender and gender-diverse youth from across Canada that included a selection of youth from Alberta specifically. It included a lot of information and results that, in my opinion, really point to the importance and value of this legislation. It also underscored a lot of the things that, you know, we hear a lot from LGBTQ-plus youth and some of the issues that they face.

I just wanted to highlight a couple of points. To me, the one that stood out the most was that of the youth surveyed, 91 per cent of Albertan trans youth don’t seek help for their mental health because they’re scared that their parents will find out – 91 per cent – and that is under a situation where counsellors, therapists, and mental health professionals are obligated to protect their privacy. Can you imagine how few would come forward to seek help for their mental health concerns if they thought that they ran the risk of their teacher calling their parents to tell them that they joined a GSA?

Additionally, nearly three-quarters of the youth surveyed reported self-harm, and about two-thirds reported serious thoughts of suicide. More startling, more stark is that more than 2 in 5 had attempted to end their lives – 2 in 5 – and only 1 in 3 said that they had an adult in their family whom they could talk to about their problems.

Madam Chair, I think that, really, when you look at those numbers, we see that there's a real need for that peer-to-peer support for young LGBTQ-plus youth to have someone whom they can talk to who's been on the same path that they've been on, who's maybe further on in the journey or maybe in a similar place and still really exploring their identity and questioning who they are. Having someone that they can talk to about their fears and their worries is critically important for their well-being.

Another thing that was noted in this study was that high levels of parental support and family connectedness correlated to better health outcomes, not just mental health outcomes but also physical health outcomes. I would also say that, you know, in the absence of family support, peer support is incredibly valuable. It's one of those things that throughout the mental health field we are seeing more and more, that having the opportunity to talk to someone who has had a similar experience to you and who can talk about their own personal and lived experience is incredibly valuable for people to be able to see the way through any concerns or worries that they're having, and it's something that's being recognized throughout the mental health care system.

The Canadian Mental Health Association has recently graduated their first group of peer-to-peer volunteers in the Calgary branch, and those folks are out now working with people in all fields, supporting through similar experiences, whether it's someone who has a family member who is living with a mental health concern or whether it's someone who's struggling with substance use or maybe someone who's struggling with issues around homelessness. Having that support available in the school, where children are, is just so critical.

Ultimately, you know, we've seen that GSAs have been existing in a number of schools for some time, but this allows those to be at every school and ensures that that equality is there for students across the province. I really can't speak more highly in favour of this.

I would also note, just kind of in closing, one of the recommendations that was in this report, this report that has some concerning information about the mental health of transgender children. It was the recommendation to improve the safety and the welcoming nature of schools, whether that be through changes to the curriculum or through the establishment of support for GSAs and QSAs.

Madam Chair, I have to say that I am just so proud to be part of a government that not only takes this issue seriously but is working to address it and make sure that those supports are there for vulnerable youth when and where they need them. I'm really proud to be able to vote in support of this bill, and I would urge all members of the Chamber to do likewise.

The Deputy Chair: Thank you, hon. minister.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Good morning.

Let us bow and reflect or pray, each in our own way. Let us be mindful of the special and unique opportunity we have to work for our constituents, for our province, and for each other. I hope that this work gives all members the strength and the wisdom that we all need during our deliberations, supporting each other and building relationships every day.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 24

An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased to rise today to move third and final reading of Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances.

Mr. Speaker, in this time that this bill has been in front of the Assembly, I have heard from many Albertans about how important this legislation is to them. I heard from students who shared their stories about how their GSAs have helped them become comfortable with their own lives and in their own skin and teens who have written passionately about their own stories coming out and how GSAs gave them the community of support that they needed to make that brave journey. I've heard from parents who have seen how GSAs have helped their children, and I'm grateful for the positive impact that these clubs have had on the health and the well-being of their children. I want to thank those Albertans for reaching out and sharing those stories of support.

I have also heard from some Albertans with questions and concerns about the legislation. Our government knows that parents love and support their children, and this legislation will simply make sure that students are the ones who decide when and how to have those deeply personal and important conversations with their parents and their loved ones.

If a student's safety is at risk, parents will be notified. GSAs are not covert sexual education classes, as some people have very wrongly suggested. Health lessons are taught in health class. GSAs are peer-support groups. They are safe havens for young people who need that safe place.

What this legislation does is make it clear that all schools that receive public dollars must provide a welcoming, caring, safe, and respectful learning environment and that no student will be outed for joining a GSA. Students will still be able to ask their teachers and other school personnel for help if they're in trouble, of course, and/or want support when they have these conversations with their parents. One of our government's top priorities is ensuring students' safety, and that's why GSAs are so important. For some students GSAs are the only place where they feel safe and appreciated. I want to maintain the integrity of that position.

I'm extremely disappointed to see unanimous opposition from the members of the Official Opposition who were present for our votes on this bill at each stage of passing. We all know that this bill will protect the lives of some of the most vulnerable citizens we have, children and youth. We need to stand up for them and not out them. I hope that today's debate convinces the members opposite to look past their partisan allegiances and take a stand in supporting LGBTQ youth.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I look forward to third reading.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have a responsibility to listen to our children. Gay-straight alliances or queer-straight alliances are student-led and staff-supported organizations that promote the creation of peer-support networks and foster welcoming and caring and respectful, safe environments for LGBTQ2-plus students and their allies. Having a GSA in a school reduces suicidal ideation for both LGBTQ2-plus identified youth and those who are straight.

The question we have to ask ourselves is: what is truly important? Well, GSAs are important, and they're necessary. We have, in fact, on our entire side of this caucus said that. The entire Legislature agrees with ensuring that there are no mandatory notifications as to whether a child is in a GSA. We all completely agree. To create the environment where bullying is not accepted – we honour antibullying week this week for those exact reasons.

I'd like to speak about bullying a little bit, actually, and I'd like to share some correspondence with the House. One of the quotes is: I watched, and then I watched her walk out and not vote; how much homophobia are you going to excuse until you, too, wear the label? The second one: she is paid to vote, not to hide. These are the people that you are exposing our vulnerable children to, people who are offended because we ask legitimate questions, Mr. Speaker, about the safety of our children, all of our children. You know what is important? Standing up for our children and for our youth and asking questions even if they're difficult questions.

I have never in my life had to prove that I'm an ally. I don't have to tell people that I'm an ally, and I certainly do not need to prove in this House that I'm an ally. If the government wants to attack me or anybody else just for the sake of attacking, by all means that is your right. Attacking one's character has been the overwhelming method of this government and using every single methodology to do that. Honestly, if you want to admonish me or my caucus for our votes, that is your right, Mr. Speaker, but it does nothing to help move us forward. Nothing.

You can call me whatever you want. You can certainly try. You can even say that if I come near any pride events, you will out me. I would love to actually know what that means, Mr. Speaker. Maybe somebody can clarify that for me.

These are the people you want influencing our youth, the people who are saying those things? That's not bullying at all, is it, Mr. Speaker? Not at all. These are the friends that you want to have coming in to help the youth work together? These are common bullies, the kinds of people that we want to protect our children from. The government, just because they call themselves allies, that makes their attacks okay? In what world is that okay? Literally I have to ask myself – I mean, this is ridiculous: the behaviour, the mistruths, the lack of common sense. You may not tell me whether or not I can attend pride, or did you forget that we live in a free society? Maybe you've forgotten that. You may not tell me whether or not I can go. In fact, I've been there for years, long before I was a politician.

I stand here in front of all of you now. Let me be clear. I will never vote for any government, mine or yours, to influence a student-led organization ever, any GSAs. GSAs are supposed to be student led, not government led. I will actually stand up for these kids, for their rights and their ability to have a club that is created by them for the reasons that they needed one, not for what politicians want. Neither you nor me come in and set a standard as to how a GSA is going to work. They already have this autonomy, Mr. Speaker. They're already above the School Act. They're outside of it. Why would you even consider bringing the School Act into something that is already autonomous and has the ability to run on its own, run by the students? These kids need the space to do this themselves. They already have a GSA director to help them with their club, and that is their person. That's their go to.

Instructional time, indicated in section 50.1(1) of the School Act, is not presently part of the GSAs, and that's a good thing. I can't for the life of me figure out why the government is opening this club up to instructional time. That has nothing to do with the GSA. How can you ensure students' safety by doing that? That is what the minister just said: to ensure student safety. How is that possible if the GSA is no longer run just by the students, for the students, on behalf of the students?

A GSA is a peer-support antibullying club, and it's already out of the scope of the School Act. It is a club. If the government wants to change that, then it should state those intentions clearly. State them clearly. Create a new bill, Mr. Speaker. Create a new bill to amend the School Act with the appropriate consultation, outreach, and debate that a change of this magnitude would require. If you did that, I could respect that. But to do it under this bill that states for the record that for some reason if we don't vote for it, we're voting against GSAs? That is not true.

We already believe in GSAs. We already support the present legislation, and I actually would have voted for this legislation if that would have been amended, happily, and I've stated that for the record. No government or other organizations of any stripe should be able to walk into a student-led organization, Mr. Speaker, and begin to influence students as it sees fit. You know what? I know the government is going to think that that's just pointed at them. I don't want my government going in there either. No government should ever have the ability to do that. There is no good reason to exempt GSAs from something that they're not part of in the first place.

I've spoken to so many constituents and teachers and principals and students and GSA directors and parents, and the one thing that we can all agree on is that we want safe and caring spaces for our students in their schools.

The issue around Bill 24, in that section, is that that section deals with the rights of parents to be informed. If the government wants to deal with that section, bring it out separately. Let's debate it here in the Legislature and look at the School Act separately. If that's the way the government wants to go, Mr. Speaker, that's what you do. You don't hide it in another piece of legislation.

Voluntary student organizations referred to as GSAs could allow any government via this section – any government – to be able to go in and influence a student-led organization. Why does the government want to seek that? Why would they want, if for some reason they're not in government in the future, that some other government could do that for any of their own purposes? This is so wrong, Mr. Speaker. It's completely contradictory to what this legislation is supposed to do in the first place.

These are peer-led support clubs, and the whole point is to have a space where kids can become friends and allies. They're supposed to be outside of the scope of the School Act, Mr. Speaker, outside of the scope, independent, and safely away from the influence of anybody else other than the students that lead them. That was the point. That's who this is for. These groups give a child who is questioning their sexuality or has friends who are or wants to talk about things a chance to be able to do that without the influence of anybody else. Isn't that the point?

They also allow other students to gain a better appreciation of problems facing peers. They talk about any number of things. Anybody who has attended a GSA, who has had the privilege of talking to these kids, knows that they talk about absolutely everything. I can't imagine if I had the ability to influence that the wrong way. If they invite me in, that's one thing. I'm there to listen, not to direct.

I mean, the fact that 40 per cent of our homeless are LGBTQ youth that are turned out by their parents: why would you give any opportunity to come in through an opposing place when they are able to do this on their own right now? I mean, I cannot understand. Again – I have to state this again, Mr. Speaker – if the government wants to change the School Act, then do that. Bring that legislation forward with integrity and research and background and stakeholder outreach and inclusive of everybody who's involved in that. Yes. Let's debate that. Happily. That's what we were asking for. The fact that there is a loophole now that could open that door to anybody – anybody – to be able to come and influence a student-led organization is completely wrong.

I would like to state for the record that most of this bill is extremely logical to me, and I felt I could support it. But I dug deeper, and I talked to so many people, and I felt it was necessary to amend the bill and strike this section that brings the potential for this instruction in. Unfortunately, that amendment was defeated. I can't understand why because it does nothing – that amendment has nothing to do with GSAs. Nothing. Section 50.1(1) has nothing to do with GSAs. Nothing. It's outside of the scope of GSAs, so take it out. Take it out, and I'll vote for it. Take it out. It has nothing to do with GSAs. Nothing. [interjections]

The Speaker: Minister of Infrastructure.

Mrs. Aheer: If the government wants to call us disgusting, go ahead. By all means, call us all disgusting. Say it for the record, though, and have the guts to say it loud and proud.

An Hon. Member: I have.

Mrs. Aheer: I know you have. Thank you for pointing that out. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, because – guess what? – that's what's been directed at me, and that's what's going to get directed at our children. Honestly, if this is how leadership is going to lead, what are they going to do on the back side? Not just that government, any government, and I include myself in that. [interjection]

The Speaker: Calgary-Hawkwood.

Mrs. Aheer: Mr. Speaker, if the word “disgusting” is allowed to be used in this, then let me use it. It's absolutely disgusting that the government would not look at this part of the bill separately, bring it in front of people, bring it forward, debate it legitimately in this Legislature so we can all have an opinion. Instead it's hidden in smoke and mirrors. You wear that. You wear that. [interjections]

Mr. Mason: Point of order.

The Speaker: A point of order?

Point of Order
Addressing Questions through the Chair

Mr. Mason: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hate to interrupt the hon. member in full dudgeon, but the remarks ought to be directed through the chair, and pointing and saying, “You, you” in the speech is clearly out of order. You know, perhaps the hon. member might remember that.

The Speaker: Thank you. I’m sure she will.

Mrs. Aheer: I will. Thank you for pointing that out.

Debate Continued

Mrs. Aheer: The interesting thing, Mr. Speaker, is that there’s a double standard here. Just so you know, abstaining from a vote is a legitimate vote. I will be abstaining from this vote because I agree with 90 per cent, well, even probably 80 per cent of this bill. Abstaining is done only by leaving the room. If I could, if there was a change made where I could sit with my body physically in this House and abstain, I would. Unless that change is made by this afternoon or before this vote is done, there is no chance for me to be able to do that. But I will not vote against this bill. I will not vote against this bill, and there’s nothing that the government can say to me that has not already been said that hasn’t made me understand the consequences of what I’m saying right now. The difference is that I’m willing to say it here.

The government has argued, Mr. Speaker: GSAs are not instructional, so there is no need for it to be part of 50.1(1), (2), (3), or (4). Remove that section, and you’ve got me. The government is overstepping its authority with this change and has absolutely no right to interfere with a student-led organization, not this government, not any future governments, not any government that I should be a part of in the future. I would want no part of influencing a GSA ever. Let’s bring that section forward and debate it appropriately. That’s all I’m asking for.

You know, you can call all Conservative MLAs homophobic, Mr. Speaker. You can fearmonger that we’re the enemy, which is really not a logical answer to any of the questions that I’ve put forward.

Mr. Carson: You’re voting against LGBTQ rights every time.

The Speaker: Edmonton-Meadowlark, tone it down.

Mrs. Aheer: And if that’s what you want to see, you can.

Mr. Speaker, this is what I’m talking about. This is exactly what I’m talking about. Every single person that I talk to, including all of my friends that are LGBTQ2-plus youth, adults, everybody who is in my life, the people I love most in life from here in Canada all the way across the world, every single one of them that I explained this legislation to couldn’t understand why something that is already beautiful and protected would need to go through the situation of what this government is putting it through. There’s absolutely no logical reason to include 50.1(1), (2), (3), or (4). The only reason to be able to do it is to try and change and exempt and amend something within the School Act without actually bringing that act forward. It’s the only logical answer.

The comments that will come are that, you know, I’m voting against this bill because I’m being forced to. I’m not voting against the bill; I’m abstaining. I will physically not be here – I’m telling you that – because I don’t want to vote against the bill. It was never my intention. I’m saying that in front of my caucus. They’re all right here right now. We’ve had this discussion. You can suggest that I don’t have my own voice. Well, you don’t know me very well.

The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that this government can say that a vote against this bill makes us whatever it is that they’d like to present in the rest of the world, but the rest of the world doesn’t believe them. Do they think that they can change people’s opinion about me or anybody in my caucus or these wonderful people, anybody in the House who has an outreach of people that they love, that all of us are impacted by in how we vote on this bill? Don’t you think that anybody on this side of the House has had people that have come to them and said, “Can you explain to me why you would vote against this bill?” and that they haven’t had to do that? Do you think that they’re just not aware that this vote could have an impact even on their own constituencies, the people that they love . . .

Connolly: Yeah. They’re sitting as independents now.

The Speaker: Calgary-Hawkwood, keep it down.

Mrs. Aheer: Again, Mr. Speaker, this is what we’re dealing with. I am bringing forward a legitimate question, asking about why 50.1(1), (2), (3), and (4) are in this legislation and why it can’t be pulled out and debated separately under the School Act, where it should be. That is a separate piece.

If the government keeps saying that this is not instructional, then why does it need to be exempted from instructional? Please. It’s a really simple question. Oh, I know. I know what it is. It’s to protect kids from me. That’s right. I forgot. It’s to protect kids from my caucus. Right. How silly of me. I didn’t realize that. Thank you for protecting me from myself. Boy, I’m absolutely blown away. And thank you for protecting all of the people that I love in the world from me because you suggest that my intentions could possibly be anything other than asking about section 50.1(4).

Honestly, by all means – and bully away. None of us are in this House because we’re afraid of bullying, but those kids outside are. For anybody in the government to assume that a teacher would purposefully go out of their way to do that is wrong. If the legislation needed to be strengthened for that, I’m a hundred per cent behind it. All the GSA teachers, instructors, and everybody that I spoke to, Mr. Speaker, thought that that was a good idea. It’s a great idea. I’m a hundred per cent behind it.

That has nothing to do with 50.1(1), (2), (3), and (4). Nothing. Completely separate. But if you want to strengthen the legislation to make sure that teachers understand their role within this, you have my vote, a hundred per cent. That was fairly much a consensus amongst the people that I talked to as well, that 50.1(1), (2), (3), and (4) have nothing to do with whether or not a teacher can notify a parent outside of the scope of – I mean, let’s separate GSAs and the regular scope. The government, thank goodness, was finally clear yesterday when one of the opposition members asked about parental involvement. These were my questions from the beginning, so thank you for clearing that up.

GSAs are completely separate from whether or not teachers have the authority to describe what’s going on in a child’s life, completely separate, so 50.1(1), (2), (3), and (4) do not apply. The legislation is clear that if a teacher needs to tell a parent something, for reasons of distress or anything else, it has nothing to do with the GSA, nor should it. I completely agree.

All I’m asking – and call me what you want. Nobody will believe this government if they want to throw accusations this way at me. By all means, go right ahead. In fact, I challenge you to try and find it. But my point and what I will continue to say is that if the government is willing to take out this section and debate it legitimately outside of the scope of this bill, especially because GSAs presently sit outside of the scope of this bill, I will stand here and vote in favour with you. I will.

An Hon. Member: No, you won’t.

Mrs. Aheer: Yeah, I will. [interjection] Thank you, Minister.

See, this is the thing, this is the funny thing about being in here: everybody on that side thinks they know better. They just told me what I'm going to do. Welcome to what that looks like. Obviously, I don't know my own mind, and I'm being directed by somebody else. That's hysterical. I could have just as easily been directed by the bullying coming from that side, which, I might add, was profound – I only shared a minuscule amount with you – massive amounts. I actually thought that one of those guys was going to show up in my bedroom and yell and scream at me. It was unbelievable. You know what? This face-to-face and this kind of discussion: I'm okay with that because you can tell me to my face what you think. I dare you.

One thing I'm going to say, Mr. Speaker, about the word "disgusting." You know what? There is an interesting thing that what you put out is what you get back. Well, people who say things like that better be looking at their own reflections. Quite frankly, I would assume that that sort of language is unparliamentary.

Thank you.

Cortes-Vargas: You know, Mr. Speaker, it is an absolute pleasure to stand today on Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances, and it's a pleasure because this bill is about students. As much as we can go on as to the personal interpretations of what it takes to come to this place, this bill is about that. And it isn't about our own personal experiences. I can tell you that I'm self-identified and have talked many times about being part of the LGBTQ community, and it is not about me. It is about a community that I'm a part of.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

I don't get to call myself an ally because I am part of this community, but I do want to talk about allyship because I think it's important to talk about the elements that make up allyship. I'm not going to argue who is or who isn't. I'm just going to say for the record that it's important to reflect on those things because an allyship is not an identity. It is a lifelong process of building relationships between trust, consistency, accountability with marginalized individuals or groups. Allyship is not self-identified. Our work and our efforts must be recognized by the people we seek to ally ourselves with.

Now, I'm not going to continue this debate of whether she is or she isn't. I want to say that if the members that are in this House today have the very privilege of being here by being elected by over 40 million Albertans . . .

An Hon. Member: Four million.

Cortes-Vargas: Four million. Sorry. I grew Alberta.

We're here to represent them, and that's our greatest privilege, to come into this Legislature and have 87 votes to determine the laws that govern our society. The law that we're talking about today is a law that protects children.

Again and again the example is taken of subsection 50.1, which is section 9 of this bill. That one has been explained. The reason it exists, the reason it is necessary is because there have been interpretations saying, "Because in GSAs you talk about sexual identity and children choose to talk about that, that is a reason why you need to notify parents," essentially the reason that we're here. Understand that this circumstance has occurred and that these cases have happened, and the reality is that this bill supports the belief, the understanding that gay students, LGBTQ students should be determinant of how they come out and that that is a fundamental principle for the resiliency in our communities.

I've continuously rejected the notion that GSAs and refusing to force children out prevents the ability for parents to be involved, and I continue to reject that premise, presented mainly by the majority of the opposition. I think that it should be done, that it should be rejected, because it fundamentally undermines the importance of the conversations that we're having right now. Parents, in fact, are involved when their child is supported through the coping mechanisms that GSAs provide in that they are able to come out to them, able to acquire the language that is necessary to be able to come out to their parents and have that difficult conversation.

When those parents want to be involved in those areas, there are many examples. I've read them into the record; I've put it into a member's statement. There are many examples of how parents are involved in this process, and – let me repeat – GSAs do not preclude that, and this bill does not prevent that. It, in fact, enhances the clarity of the roles of the people involved within GSAs, which is the fact that the principal needs to acknowledge the request for a GSA and make sure that it comes forward, make sure that if people are saying – and understand this: we come to the process of LGBTQ protections from the fact that talking about it has been criminal at some points.

That is why it's such a charged conversation. That is why generations and generations of LGBTQ people before us have had a hard time discussing this, because it, in fact, has been and continues to be in parts of the world a criminal act to be someone that loves a person in a same-sex relationship. Let us not forget that, because it creates a society where it is very, very difficult.

So, no, I disagree that this is anything about you, that this has anything to do with anything other than the students that need to be a part of this conversation. I think that making sure that it's clear that parental notification is not mandatory for these GSAs, which is a concept that actually is promoted by parents for choice, a group that was introduced by the member that spoke previous to me – one of the fundamental things that they support is mandatory notification for parents. [interjections] I think we need to take responsibility for the moments that we are endorsing and supporting certain groups to come out and . . . [interjections]

9:30

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, Strathcona-Sherwood Park has the floor.

Cortes-Vargas: Madam Speaker, I think that this is an important conversation, and we need to continue to have it.

I think the reality exists for LGBTQ students that they need a safe space. That reality exists because it is very difficult. I can speak to that from a personal lens. I can speak to that from the many hundreds and hundreds of stories that I have heard. I think the reality continues to exist that people don't understand that it's not just an antibullying club. We couldn't name it that because it doesn't completely encompass the elements of a GSA that are important to it.

The realities are – and I'll use female same-sex relationships as an example – that you will face crude questions about who you are, and people will ask for explanations of why you decide to exhibit your identity or not to hide it. Whether it comes to your – people continuously ask: "Well, how do you know? How do you know that you are that?" You're continuously asked to validate those elements.

A place like a GSA becomes somewhere that you can talk to other people that have gone through similar experiences and are able to come up with the language to reiterate to, frankly, a society that is still adjusting to this idea. I can say as a person from the LGBTQ community that experiencing harassment on the basis of my sexual identity or gender identity is something that I have experienced within the past week, so I don't doubt that young students, vulnerable groups need to be supported in this process. It is a real, real existence.

I think that we have a privilege today, and the privilege is to come here and make a choice that there are other ways to – I frankly think it's disingenuous to say that the reason we're here is to vote and to say that we're going to abstain as a way of doing that, because there are other measures, too. The fact remains that Committee of the Whole is the main place where you address those things. It's decided by the majority of the House, but it also has an element in it that talks about voting on each part of the clauses. You can vote on each clause separately, Madam Speaker, and that opportunity was missed.

I still believe, though, Madam Speaker, that in the discussion of allyship – and it is determined by your accountability to that very community, and it is not self-assigned. I think that is important because that is part of how the community creates an identity, creates circumstances that are truly safe for them and expectations that they want their advocates to uphold. I think that that is a critical element in this process.

I believe that we must remember that we're here for the students, that it isn't about us as individuals, and that protecting those very students, protecting the students that are experiencing this harm, is incredibly important. The reason that we're here today discussing this very bill is because there have been circumstances where accountability was not put in place for GSAs to be formed, and that needs to change today.

I hope that every member of this Legislature will support this bill and will continue to support the progress that we have made in Alberta and not promote this concept of taking away rights from groups of vulnerable students. That's a very selfish way to propel your political movement. I think that it has to be articulated that it is based on that political gain, that that represents why their position is where they are.

I think that throughout my speeches – throughout my speeches – I have communicated how GSAs are supportive to students in coming out to their parents. I've also communicated how section 50.1 is an important section of this bill and, in fact, is a main element of making sure that parents' mandatory notification is not acceptable, because it forces gay students out of the closet.

I think, Madam Speaker, that there's a lot of rhetoric around all of this. I want to assure my constituents, Albertans that at the end of the day, what we need to focus on is making sure that we're putting a system in place that protects those students, that creates safe and welcoming, inclusive spaces that are student-led, that provides them with groups of people, of peers that can talk to the realities of their lives, and that that isn't limited by what the opposition tries to create as a narrative of a sex group that exists within GSAs. I mean, that's so harmful in so many ways.

I think of the history of the LGBTQ community and think of the many times that in regard to not giving us rights, we were compared to predators, we were compared to communists – actually, that was a comment on one of my member's statements – we were compared to any number of name-calling things, things that could have us thrown in jail. Why? Because people interpret my living my life not in the closet as a promotion of homosexual lifestyles. I think that's a very real concept that we need to discuss because the ability for me to exist without discrimination is just that, me existing without discrimination. It's not a promotion. It is me existing and every person in the LGBTQ community existing without being discriminated against, Madam Speaker.

I am proud that this government and that the members opposite and the independents have spoken to this because it is incredibly important not to get lost in rhetoric that is actively engaging their political allies. I think that at the end of the day, if the politicians in this House lose sight of the fact that this must remain about the students, about our school system, about a society that is free of discrimination – we must look for ways to support this form of legislation now and continuing in the future. I think that it's absolutely imperative, Madam Speaker, that we all come together and we have conversations that are constructive and that, in fact, don't promote a concept that for many years has said that GSAs or the gathering of LGBTQ people are in some way something that should be hidden in the corner.

I think this is a time that we reject this very notion, that it should be censored, because that is the other element about this, that if we want to restrict what these students are talking about even if it's student-led, which, frankly, is, like, just a fleeting sense – I mean, they're meeting at lunchtime. They could meet at lunchtime anyways. They're going to talk about this because it's student-led. I believe, Madam Speaker, that if we don't put things like this in place, we cause harm whereas, I believe, if we put something like this, we don't.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I believe that the Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park had a few more things to say, so I'd ask her if she'd like to continue saying a couple of words.

Cortes-Vargas: Madam Speaker, one of the last things I want to say is the fact that I do believe that when we don't create safe spaces, we also create a sense that those children that need those support groups will look to alternative spaces for belonging. I think that that's what we should evaluate.

The reality is that we live in a society filled with social media, with Internet, that no amount of filters, blocking can really censor and that transgender youth especially are at risk of getting involved in sex trade industries. I think we need to talk about the reality of what happens when we continue to marginalize these very students because that is the foundation of where they continue after that. They look for a place of belonging, and they look – and you see the numbers – to drug use and alcohol use in order to cope with the realities that they're facing. If we don't allow for a space like this to exist without forcing them to be outed, then the reality is that we are causing harm. We are causing harm.

And the folks that are still, you know, on the fence on whether these GSAs should exist or not have used again – and I need to repeat this multiple times: have used – this section on the fact that GSAs talk about sexual identity and gender expression to demand parental notification beforehand. This part of this bill needs to be here, and there's absolutely no way I would ever have supported that section being removed from this bill.

Madam Speaker, I am proud of the discussions we've had, the conversations that we continue to have, and the progress that we make for every Albertan, because it is every Albertan. GSAs provide a really caring space for everyone in that school. Whether one member attends that GSA or not, you see a decrease in substance dependence in that school. Why? Because there's a sense of acceptance and belonging regardless of who you are and where you come from. I think that's important to recognize.

Madam Speaker, I truly appreciate the opportunity to stand and speak to Bill 24 and to continue to debate this bill and to support it. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. As you know, the United Conservative Party's leader, the Hon. Jason Kenney, does not hold a seat in the House, and while we hope that the Premier will call a by-election soon so that he can join us, he's not able to speak on the record.

As such, I'd like to briefly read into the record some of the key elements of the United Conservative Party's leader's remarks on this bill from last week. Madam Speaker:

We strongly support efforts to make schools free from bullying, and to provide peer support, counselling, and safe [places and] spaces for kids who might be subject to bullying.

We believe that is especially true for students who are subject to bullying or prejudice because of their sexual identity.

We support Gay Straight Alliances, which became law with the unanimous support of MLAs from both of our legacy parties. We believe that these, and other anti-bullying peer groups, can be a useful way of supporting students going through difficult times.

We do not support, I repeat we do not support mandatory notification of parents regarding the involvement of students in GSAs.

And neither I nor anyone in our caucus has proposed "outing" gay kids. To suggest otherwise is offensive and dishonest. It is the opposite of what [we] have actually said.

We believe that the vast majority of parents have unconditional love for their kids, and we acknowledge the research underscoring that parental [involvement and parental] support . . . is one of the most important factors in supporting youth at risk, including sexual minority youth. This research has been recognized by some of the strongest GSA advocates themselves.

We also support the longstanding principles – enshrined in law – that parents are the primary educators of [their] children, and that schools operate under legal authority delegated by parents.

We affirm the Universal Declaration of Human Rights' recognition that "Parents have a prior right to choose the kind of education that shall be given to their children," and [we support] the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights' defence of "the liberty of parents . . . to ensure the moral education of their children in conformity with their own convictions," rights which were recently affirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada.

We believe that every child is unique, and that every circumstance faced by kids at risk is different.

We believe that highly trained educators are in a much better position than politicians to exercise their discretion on whether it is in the best interests of a child to engage parents . . .

Teachers, not politicians, should decide when it makes sense to engage parents.

The unique circumstances of [every] child should be the key factor, not the blunt instrument of law.

This is especially true given that Bill 24 applies to five year olds in kindergarten, treating them the same way as it treats seventeen year olds in grade twelve.

That makes no sense.

Bill 24 would make it illegal to engage parents about certain school activities for children beginning in kindergarten, regardless of their individual circumstances.

What about children with developmental disabilities, or those who have suffered abuse or trauma, or have mental or emotional health challenges? Schools are to be legally barred from engaging parents, even if teachers, counsellors or principals deem it prudent to do so.

We are also concerned that the Bill undermines the longstanding legal obligation of schools to inform parents, and I quote here from Section 50 of the School Act:

"where courses of study, educational programs or instructional materials, or instruction or exercises, include subject-matter that deals primarily and explicitly with religion or human sexuality." (Section 50.1(1) of the School Act)

Bill 24 says this will no longer be the case with respect to educational activities associated with GSAs.

According to the Alberta Teachers' Association Guide on GSAs, GSAs are not merely peer support groups, but also include "curriculum," "schoolwide educational activities," "political activities," etc.

In other words, the NDP is trying to do indirectly what it cannot do directly: that is teaching sensitive subjects that would normally require parental notification. Parents would be barred from knowing anything about the guest speakers, programs, or content being taught, a clear violation of the spirit of the School Act.

Bill 24 also concentrates enormous new powers in the hands of the Minister, undermining local decision making by principals, school boards, and independent schools. By doing the latter, the government is very likely setting itself up for costly Charter litigation by violating the 2015 decision of this Supreme Court of Canada in the Loyola High School case.

These powers are without precedent anywhere in Canada. Not even Ontario's Liberal government, which has taken a very aggressive approach to these issues, has proposed anything like the powers in Bill 24.

The NDP has never proposed powers like this before.

They did not do so prior to the adoption of Bill 10.

They did not propose these powers as amendments to Bill 10.

They did not raise any of this in their election platform.

And they have governed for the past two and a half years without concern about teachers being able to engage parents when appropriate.

The only rationale they have offered is transparently cynical: as a political instrument to attack their partisan opponents, part of their desperate effort to talk about anything but their failed economic record. We aren't going to let them get away with that.

So to recap:

- The United Conservative Caucus supports Gay Straight Alliances and other peer support groups to help provide safe environments for youth at risk, including sexual minority youth.
- We support Bill 10.
- We oppose mandatory notification of parents of membership in GSAs.
- We absolutely oppose the notion of schools outing gay students.
- We believe every child is unique, and that educators should be left with the discretion they currently have to engage parents when it is in the best interests of the child to do so.
- We believe that parents should continue to have the right to be informed of educational programs or materials that deal with human sexuality.
- We believe that it is wrong to treat young elementary school children the same . . . as teenagers in high school on sensitive matters.
- [And] we believe in local decision making by principals and school boards, rather than constantly amassing new powers in the hands of one politician.

So, in other words, we support neither extreme of mandatory notification nor of a legal prohibition to parental engagement. We support the common-sense status quo, the same status quo the NDP has supported until this [past] week [or so].

9:50

Madam Speaker, these are the words of the United Conservative leader, Jason Kenney.

I would like to thank you for this time. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), the hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I just have some quotations that I'd like to read into the record. This one is from March 29, 2017, from Global News. The title is Jason Kenney Slammed for Comments about Gay-straight Alliances. Mr. Kenney said:

"I have said that I would not repeal Bill 10, if that's what you're asking me. And I do, however, think that parents have a right to know what's going on with their kids in the schools unless the parents are abusive.

I think generally speaking, parents have a right to know what their kids are doing in school," Kenney continued. "If there's evidence that the parents are abusive, then they shouldn't be involved."

That sounds like outing kids. I don't know about you guys.

From September 28, 2017, the Edmonton Journal: Education Minister Vows to Tighten Privacy Rules around Gay-straight Alliances in Schools. The quote from the article is: "Kenney has said it should be up to school staff to decide whether to tell a child's parents or guardians whether they're in a gay-straight alliance." That again sounds like outing students. I don't know if the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon had talked to his leader before he made those statements.

Again, from the Red Deer newspaper. What's the Red Deer newspaper?

An Hon. Member: Red Deer Advocate.

Connolly: Red Deer Advocate.

Province to Introduce Law Preventing GSA Students from Being Outed. The quote from the article is: "Kenney says in some cases it's best to tell parents their kids have joined a gay-straight alliance and that school officials are in the best position to make [that] decision." That also sounds like outing gay students. I don't know if that's wrong or if the paper is wrong or if they misquoted or what, but I'm pretty sure the paper wasn't wrong.

Again, from a CBC News article on September 28, 2017: Alberta to Outlaw Outing of GSA students, Education Minister Says. That article states that "Kenney said the NDP government was too aggressive in making religious schools follow the law, which compels all schools to allow gay-straight alliances if students ask for them."

I would like to ask the member why he thinks that religious schools shouldn't follow the law, why he thinks that Jason Kenney believes that he should out gay kids, if he believes that these quotes are true, and whether or not he agrees with his leader, Jason Kenney.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, I will recognize the hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

Drever: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm happy to rise in support of Bill 24. I've been thinking a lot about this bill. This bill will have a direct impact on people's lives. GSAs and QSAs save lives, period, and every student deserves a school that is welcoming, caring, and a safe place to learn. For those who are listening and maybe are not familiar with the bill, I'll just give a really quick Coles Notes version of what the bill is.

This piece of legislation will strengthen supports for students wishing to create or join a gay-straight alliance or queer-straight alliance at their schools by requiring publicly funded schools to create and publicly disclose their policies in regard to GSAs, protecting the privacy of students who choose to join a GSA or QSA and preventing their identity from being outed, ensuring that principals have a responsibility to help students create a GSA or QSA in a timely manner, and providing clarity about roles and responsibilities among school authorities for the establishment of welcoming, caring, respectful, and safe learning environments.

I was interested to hear my colleagues speak about the context for this bill and why this piece of legislation is so necessary. I would like to talk a little bit about my high school experience and then talk about other people's experiences that I've met because I think it's important to have their voices heard in this Chamber. I went to a Catholic school, not necessarily because I'm a religious person but because they had an excellent theatre arts IB program. I knew many people in that program who were LGBTQ2S, people that I am still friends with today. I only knew they were LGBTQ because they told me. But I remember them saying to me to not tell anyone because our school wasn't exactly LGBTQ friendly.

The only mention of sexuality was a brief conversation in our CALM class about how abstinence is the only true form of birth control, with no mention of sexual orientation or gender identity nor consent. I also don't ever remember seeing advertisements for a GSA or QSA in my school, and, to be honest, I doubt there was one. So my friends didn't have a safe space to go to to talk to other LGBTQ-plus students or their straight allies. They just had our small circle of friends to confide in.

I remember one of those friends that came out. He came out to our peer group and asked if he should tell his parents. My response to him was to only do so if you feel comfortable and safe. So he decided to do it but was kicked out of his house shortly after. He became homeless just because he wanted to be himself and not stay in the closet. A friend of mine took him in for a few months, and finally his family took him back. But I remember how hard that was for him.

This, unfortunately, is not uncommon. According to the LGBTQ2S Youth Housing and Shelter Guidelines from the Ministry of Community and Social Services

- Nearly one in three homeless youth in Canada identify as LGBTQ2S.
- LGBTQ2S youth identify the primary reason for homelessness as family rejection due to gender identity or sexual orientation.
- LGBTQ2S homeless youth face higher rates of discrimination, violence and abuse in the shelter system than their non-LGBTQ2S counterparts.
- LGBTQ2S youth are at higher risk of mental health concerns and self-harm and exhibit higher rates of [suicide] than the general [public].

I can only imagine, if that friend decided to join a GSA and then became outed by his parents when he wasn't ready, the anxiety that he would have felt, the fear of abuse, the fear of rejection. It could have been a lot worse for him.

Last Sunday I attended a GSA rally in Calgary, and I would like to say that not a single member from the UCP was there – not a single one – and that's shameful. I saw some familiar faces and some new faces. I ran into a dear friend of mine, Amelia Newbert. She wanted to share her story with you all today and wanted to share what Bill 24 meant to her. She also mentioned that she had barely told anyone these details, but she felt compelled to show how important this bill is.

I'm going to quote her here.

From the age of 5, I've always known I was transgender. However, it wasn't until my 30th birthday I started living as who I was. This was in large part due to repeated, ongoing physical abuse I suffered as a child every time I tried to express my gender identity. It left me feeling worthless, less than human, and most of all alone. As a result [I] attempted to take my life numerous times. All I ever wanted or needed was to know I wasn't alone. That someone understood.

This is what GSAs [and QSAs] are providing. They aren't pushing an agenda, they aren't violating rights. They are ensuring that our children don't have to suffer through what I've gone through. They are creating support and connection. They are saving lives.

This is also why under no circumstance can children be outed to anyone for attending GSA[s], it literally isn't safe. Period.

And I can tell you that, heartbreakingly, stories like mine aren't a thing of the past. I hear them over and over again from youth I work with.

It is not [a] complicated matter. Kids are dying without access to the safe spaces GSAs create and we need to do everything possible to ensure they have them.

I don't understand the debate or posturing or amendments, Bill 24 is essential. We owe it to our kids. They deserve better than this.

Another person I met at the rally was Leigh. They wanted to tell their story and express the importance of GSAs and how Bill 24 is essential. These are their words.

I hate using public bathrooms. They are just so uncomfortable to me because I don't feel right in them. I don't use the men's room because I'm not a man, and I don't use the women's room because I'm not a woman. I use the men's room purely because that's what I look like.

Whenever I go to see a doctor, I'm always referred to by my old name. Even if the nurse puts a note on my chart, most doctors ignore it. At work, they can't change my name in their computer, but everyone knows me as Leigh. Last time I went to an office to get information, I told them my name was Leigh and they got confused because my legal name was different. And I'm used to showing multiple IDs to get my mail.

This is the difficulty I face as an adult. There is something so exhausting and discouraging about having to say again and again that my name is Leigh, and I want they and them pronouns to be used. I'm tired of explaining why my name is different on my ID. I'm tired of being referred to by he by people that know I prefer [otherwise]. And I'm an adult. I am comfortable with my gender. I've already gone through my discovery phase.

Now imagine this. You're in grade nine. You're beginning to feel a little [bit] weird. Puberty is starting, and all your classmates are talking about crushes and stuff. The conversation turns to you. They ask you which girl you have a crush on. The truth is, you don't. You don't feel the same way that your friends are describing. You don't know what to call it because you have only been taught about human reproduction in sex ed. You have no idea what's going on. You think that you are weird. Or broken. Or gay. Not gay as in a boy who likes a boy, or a girl who likes a girl. Gay as in weird, broken, stupid, wrong. Alone at night in your room, you turn to Google. There you find half-truths and no reliable resources. So you struggle. You feel alone. You feel like no one understands you. And you feel wrong.

That's the kid that never got a GSA. That's the kid that never felt comfortable going to a teacher or parent or anyone to talk to. That's the kid who could turn to self-harm, substance abuse, and could end their life.

[The Member for Calgary-Hawwood] stood in front of the legislature and said that GSAs save lives. That kid that felt alone, and clueless, and hurt needed that GSA. They needed some sort of support and education to understand that not being what everyone else was, was not wrong.

GSAs absolutely save lives. I know this first hand. With the help of a teacher, I founded the Pride Club at WG Murdoch School in Crossfield Alberta. I had a solid group of kids that regularly came, and we made a name for ourselves when we organized Spirit Day in our school.

I found myself the main person to talk to about Pride Club. One night, near midnight I got a message from someone. They told me that they thought they were trans and asked me for help. They were so afraid of their parents finding out, and they only felt comfortable with who they were in the Pride Club space. She could be herself and really explore who she was.

We laughed in our meetings because we were sharing memes, and funny videos. We ate pizza and shared snacks and made jokes. We got serious and talked about what we struggled with. And we became a close family. I could look at one in the hallways of the school and see the light in their eyes when they saw me. I could watch them become so much more comfortable with themselves, and with their friends and classmates.

GSAs not only save lives, they enhance them. They take a kid that is struggling to find themselves and gives them a place to be who they want with people that get them.

Bill 24 does not give schools or the state any power to indoctrinate young queer kids in GSAs. Bill 24 does not create small political cells in schools that are protected. Bill 24 does not make GSAs a tool of an authoritative state that Mr. Kenney seems to be so scared of.

Every GSA in this province is run completely by students, for students. Teachers do support, mainly as an adult mentor figure that the kids can trust implicitly. Bill 24 protects the privacy of those kids. Bill 24 makes sure that the students can keep this space safe for themselves. And Bill 24 makes sure that the prying eyes of potentially abusive parents stay away from at-risk kids.

Bill 24 solidifies the existence of GSAs in schools, saves kids lives, and helps them become the best version of themselves possible. Bill 24 makes sure that GSAs can exist without opposition so that kid I described earlier can be comfortable and safe. Bill 24 is so important because that kid was me. First having a group of like minded people helped. And then getting exposed to the wider community I didn't know was out there created who I am today.

Bill 24 guarantees this for kids in the future. They need to know that the government has their back. And they need to know that people like us are out here willing to fight tooth and nail for this.

Madam Speaker, it is so important that this bill is passed, and I encourage all members to support it. Looking across the way with the UCP, I know that every MLA sitting over there has LGBTQ2S people in their ridings. In fact, the person I was just describing lives in Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, and I hope that he votes for this bill. I hope that he stands in this Chamber on behalf of Leigh and says yes to Bill 24.

We speak about the importance of consultations in this Chamber. I'd like to know if they consulted with the LGBTQ2S community in their constituencies, because they are not supporting a bill that literally saves lives, a bill that is meant to make a community feel safe and supported by their schools. It is truly a shame that they won't listen to them.

Good news, though. Here is their chance to be on the right side of history. They still have a chance to vote for this bill, and I strongly encourage them to vote for it and stand with the LGBTQ2S community and not against it.

To conclude, I will be supporting Bill 24. I really hope that the opposition listened to what I had to say, listened to Leigh's story, listened to Amelia's story.

Thank you.

10:10

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), any questions or comments?

Seeing none, I will recognize the hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. This morning I rise to speak to Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances. Members from all sides of the House have spoken to this bill with both passion and concern for Alberta, our schools, our parents, and our youth. I've listened to all sides of the House and have reviewed the bill carefully. I have also had the opportunity to consult with constituents, staff, and members opposite and have paid close attention to amendments proposed by opposition members.

Ultimately, little has changed for the Alberta Party with respect to Bill 24. Since the very beginning the Member for Calgary-Elbow and I have supported this legislation because it's progressive, necessary, and it can save lives. Madam Speaker, I'm proud to rise in the House today to support this bill on behalf of the Alberta Party caucus, and I implore my colleagues down the aisle to do the same.

Bill 24 has generated impassioned debate that has been at times eye-opening and at times humbling. On other occasions it's been downright sad. While the Alberta Party, the Liberals, and the NDP recognize that this bill is about the safety of kids and teens, the UCP's position centres on the preference and desires of parents as if they are the ones who have to show up at school as gay teenagers and deal with mockery and belittling from their peers. This has been a consistent hole in the UCP's case. Madam Speaker, why does the life of a gay kid matter less than the beliefs of a homophobic parent?

The research on GSAs and QSAs is vast and growing. Overwhelmingly, it points to the success of these organizations, their ability to provide kids and teens with a safe space in which they can share, learn, and grow without the disapproving eye of homophobic or transphobic classmates, certain religious groups, and/or society at large.

Dr. Kristopher Wells and Dr. André Grace, professors at the University of Alberta, have long been the go-to scholars on the issue of gay-straight alliances. While their research is invaluable, other scholars take a different yet equally affirming approach to this issue.

In her article published in the Journal of Homosexuality in 2014 Meredith G.F. Worthen argues that GSAs aren't just beneficial for LGBTQ students but transformative for other students who merely attended a school where one was present. Students need not even join the GSA at their school in order to display higher rates of acceptance of LGBTQ people once they reach postsecondary, a fact that speaks directly to the ability of GSAs to educate, enlighten, and transform.

Madam Speaker, to rise in the House today to speak in support of Bill 24 is a proud moment for me, and it is one that I'm sure many Albertans cherish inside and outside the LGBTQ community. In fact, it's rare that we stand up for LGBTQ people in Alberta. Historically the provincial government has actually stood in the way of progress. In 1991, when Delwin Vriend was fired from King's college in Edmonton for being gay, the Alberta Human Rights Commission refused to recognize sexual orientation as protected grounds for discrimination. Vriend took the government to court, and after he won, the provincial government appealed. Vriend took his case all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada and ultimately won in a landmark case known as Vriend versus Alberta, or simply the Vriend decision.

While we salute courageous figures like Delwin Vriend in the House today, we must also acknowledge the rarity of passing legislation in support of LGBTQ people. In years past we have left them to fight for themselves in the courtroom, afraid to offend social conservatives who would sooner see gay people back in the closet. No more, Madam Speaker. No more will Alberta put human rights on the back burner, and no more will we allow pernicious stereotypes about the social values of Albertans to perpetuate.

The last time I rose to speak about Bill 24, I spoke about kindness, and just to reiterate, this is ultimately what Bill 24 is about. However, it's about something else, too: progress, not just progress for queer people but for their friends, families, allies, and classmates. When a GSA is present in a school, Madam Speaker, compassion, love, and kindness win, and without these things we cannot progress. GSAs and the autonomy and confidentiality they provide are a huge step forward for Alberta youth and the cornerstone of a happy and healthy school. It's time we acknowledge GSAs for what they are, crucial networks of support that deserve respect, autonomy, and the ability to blossom.

Back to the issue of parents. They've come up a lot during these debates, and rightfully so. They are the people that love and care for our students in ways that we cannot describe. However, Madam Speaker, I do not agree with the narrative of parenthood that the UCP caucus has constructed for us. In their view, parents are omniscient and universally kind figures who are being denied access to their kids' lives and information because of GSAs.

As we approach voting on this legislation, I ask that we not think of the homophobic parents who disagree with GSAs and their message but the parents of gay kids and teens who sleep a little bit better knowing that their kids go to school with a safe space that respects their lives, their sexualities, and their privacy. Let us not get hung up on the parents who would see GSAs crumble. Let us instead celebrate the parents who support their kids no matter who or what they are and the parents who want a safe space for their kids.

Most of all, Madam Speaker, this legislation calls on us to celebrate children, kids, and their interests. It calls on us to recognize them as needing decency, privacy, and respect and as being diverse beings who just want to be safe. That's why I'm supporting this bill and why I believe my colleagues should as well.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments for the hon. member under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, I will recognize Strathmore-Brooks.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I've been disappointed by the tone of debate on this bill. I'm proud to be a member of Alberta's gay and lesbian community. I know that some members across, very soon after we were elected, joined me in Canada's only gay rodeo hosted right in Strathmore. That was a great time. Unfortunately, that event is no longer with us as it ran into some financial troubles, but we've been doing what we can to try and restart it. I know that they're working with the Calgary Stampede. But there is more to being an ally than showing up at a fun rodeo.

I vote based on reasoned analysis of this bill, not its name. The name of the bill would certainly make it easy to vote for it, but we have to vote on its contents, not its name. Bill 24 is an attempt, I believe, to use the desire of most Albertans to protect vulnerable youth in order to divide Albertans for partisan gain. This issue is far more complicated and sensitive than the usual partisan banter between parties.

We can normally have some pretty strong words in this House and differences on tax policy and spending and any number of issues. The divide between our parties is very great on those issues, but on this topic I actually don't think the differences are all that great. They're rhetorical differences in so many cases. They are partisan differences. But the actual substance of these differences is relatively small. That difference has been exacerbated by the political tone in the province. That tone is something I think that all of us in this Chamber carry at least some responsibility for, myself included.

Gay and lesbian youth are at significantly higher risk than their peers for suicide, substance abuse, and homelessness. Being a teenager is tough enough already, so I can only begin to imagine how much more difficult it would be for kids who feel that out of place. This is compounded if they don't have loving and caring friends, family, and communities.

I think back to my experience in high school. I grew up in mostly small army and air force towns across the country, but I went to at least three years of high school in Trenton, an air force base. We had, as far as I know, only one kid, one of my peers, out as gay. It was not easy for him. There were certainly more than just him who were not out: some who were thought to be, some who probably would have surprised us, but only one kid who felt he could come out. Frankly, I don't know how the heck he did it because he was not treated well. He had some friends, but the majority of his peers, while maybe not hateful, were at least snickering and unsupportive.

I think times have changed. If I think back to, you know, just 10 years ago, I think that all of our views on these issues have changed in one direction, some more than others, but I think the vast majority of people's views – Canadian views, Albertans' views, and people in this House – have changed over the last 10 and 20 years on these issues. I like to think that if that kid who I went to high school with was around today, he would have a very different experience than he did when I was in high school, but I imagine that it would still be greatly difficult in any circumstance.

Bill 10 was passed, I think, in 2014, and since then there has been some debate if parents should be notified if their children join a GSA. Bill 24 will make it illegal in virtually all circumstances for teachers to notify their parents if their child is involved in a GSA, and the ostensible reasoning behind this is that any parental notification would out a gay or lesbian kid before they're ready and put them at risk. If I believed for one minute that that was the case, I would vote for Bill 24, but I don't believe it is.

I know the NDP sent out a press release last week. I keep a ticker in my office about how many days I can go without being mentioned in NDP news releases, and that number gets pretty small. They mentioned in a news release that at the Wildrose Party convention in 2016 I spoke against a resolution that would have made notification to parents for GSAs mandatory. Someone had put forward at the policy convention a resolution there that would have made it mandatory that if their kid joins a GSA or is involved in anything involving sexuality, period, the parents would be notified. I was proud to speak against that at the last Wildrose convention that we held, and members voted between 95 and 98 per cent against it, decisively opposing it.

What I said there was that a blanket law requiring parental notification, which would out some gay and lesbian kids before they're ready, was foolhardy. But just as equally, I believe that a blanket law banning parental notification in any case whatsoever is also foolhardy. I've been on the record speaking against mandatory parental notification because that would out gay and lesbian kids before they're ready, and that is wrong.

The overwhelming majority of parents love their children unconditionally and care more about their children than any government, bureaucrat, or politician possibly could. This is not to say that some parents would not be loving or accepting and supportive of their children coming out. In some circumstances that could even put youth at risk, and that is where the government has a legitimate role to play in intervening to protect children, but government should not create a blanket law entirely forbidding any and all notification. A blanket ban on notifying parents is as irresponsible as automatically notifying parents regardless of the circumstances. Teachers and other education professionals are better suited to make such a sensitive decision on the ground, not politicians, myself included.

Bill 24 makes no distinction whatsoever between a five-year-old and a 17-year-old. Blanket laws like this, that are meant to achieve political objectives, are overly blunt and do not account for nuance.

Bill 24 also overrides the principle that schools have authority delegated to them by parents, not by government. We should remember that parents, not the government, are the primary authority over children. The government should only ever intervene in that special relationship when there is abuse or neglect, not differences over politics. This is a legislated wedge being driven between parents and their children, not intended to protect those children but to change the political channel, and this is doing so using the most vulnerable youth in our society.

I've spoken with my constituents, I've spoken with parents, I've spoken with kids, and I've spoken with members of our gay and lesbian community. The vast – vast – majority of them want us to act to protect sexual minority youth, but this is a blunt instrument, and it is overreach.

Most members of this House know where I stand on issues of personal liberty involving sexual matters. I don't believe that it is any business of the government what consenting adults do in private, but matters involving our children, especially young children, are more complicated. When we as legislators are making laws concerning the most vulnerable children in our society, sexual minority youth, we should take care to put them first and remember that in the vast majority of cases their greatest ally is mom and dad.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park.

Cortes-Vargas: I just have a really brief question, Madam Speaker. The lead point made by the member opposite started off by saying that he's part of the gay and lesbian community, I think, was the quote. I just want him to clarify what that means.

The Deputy Speaker: Strathmore-Brooks, did you wish to respond?

Any other questions under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, I'll recognize the hon. Member for Edmonton-Meadowlark.

Mr. Carson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I have to say that I'm so proud to stand here today in support of Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances. I'm going to be as brief as I can today because I think that throughout this debate we've heard many incredibly moving speeches that have been made from some of the members on this side as well as some of our independent members.

I mean, when we look at the people on this side, people who actually understand this bill and the effect that it will have on our school system, I think it's important to listen to their thoughts. I think it's important for me to stand and show my support for this piece of legislation for the many people in my life who have helped me understand why it is so important to protect these rights, the rights of my friends and the larger community, for the people who go through every single day of their life being attacked for how they identify or for who they love.

This bill, of course, will require publicly funded schools to disclose their policies in regard to GSAs and QSAs. It will ensure that principals have a responsibility to help create these in places where they have not already been established, and it will clarify some of the roles among school authorities for establishing a welcoming, caring, respectful, and safe learning environment. But, most importantly, as has come up several times throughout this debate, it will ensure that the privacy of a student that chooses to join a GSA or QSA will be protected.

Madam Speaker, every single student in this province deserves a welcoming, caring, and safe place to learn and a place where they are respected. We need to understand the value of protecting GSAs in our schools.

The choice of a student to not disclose to their family that they identify as LGBTQ does not necessarily have any reflection on the quality of a parent or guardian. I was a student not that long ago, surprising or not, and I have the most incredibly accepting parents. I am so blessed with the respect that they have given me, but that does not mean that I told them everything. I identify as a straight, cis male and never had to struggle with the incredibly complex decision to come out to the wider community, but if I did have that, I can imagine that it would have taken me quite a long time before I was willing to tell my parents, even with the acceptance and the love that they showed me. It's a deeply personal matter, and no one has the right to decide when a student should come out besides the student themselves.

From the discussions that I've had with teachers and from the articles that I've seen coming from the teaching community, they do not want the responsibility to have to inform a parent when their child joins a GSA, so I am not sure why the Conservative opposition continues down this line of messaging. I really don't understand it. Once again, it is the child's decision, not a teacher's decision.

I want to share a story with you that was shared with me by a close friend in response to this legislation. When they were in school, they were coming to the realization that they identified as part of the LGBTQ community and went to a teacher. The teacher had no understanding of this issue and asked if the student was gay. Worried that the teacher might out this student, they told the teacher no and continued to have to hide their own identity.

Without a support group at that time this friend of mine was bullied, harassed, and even assaulted in the washrooms. They were told at home that it was wrong to be gay. They were told at school that it was wrong to be gay. Hence, they believed that they themselves were wrong to identify how they did. Imagine the impact that that has on a child. This scenario is obviously not the only way this conversation can play out, but it often has played out that way, and it's damaging to our community.

Of course, we've heard the numbers around how our LGBTQ community can so easily end up and do end up marginalized, numbers like: 40 per cent of those who find themselves homeless identifying as LGBTQ; 33 per cent of LGBTQ youth have attempted suicide in comparison to 7 per cent of youth in general; 49 per cent of trans students, 33 per cent of lesbian students, and 40 per cent of gay students may have experienced sexual harassment in school in the last year. I wonder how the opposition can stand in this House with all of the facts in front them and still vote against the rights of our students. At what age do our human rights start to be recognized? Once they're voting age? I really don't understand. When they can vote for them?

Madam Speaker, the opposition say that they are allies, yet their newly elected leader in his long history of politics has never supported the LGBTQ community, not even once, as far as I know, over the many, many human rights bills that he has had to make decisions over. I really think that that says something. Whether the opposition would like to admit it or not, that is their leader. We just heard a member of the opposition read into the record that Kenney has concerns about a child with a disability considering joining a GSA, that their parent should be notified because, God forbid, a child with a disability joins a GSA. It's truly shameful. I cannot even fathom how that member was willing to read that on behalf of their new leader. It's just shameful.

I just have to say that, well, over the last week or so of this debate I have never been more disappointed in this opposition party, yet I have never been more proud of this government side of the Legislature as well as some of our independents, I think most of them, who have stood up, showing their support. And I have never been more proud of the people in our communities who identify as or are allies to the LGBTQ community, who continue to fight for their own rights to be respected.

There is still so much more that we need to do to support this community, Madam Speaker, to ensure that they are heard, respected, and protected, but I am happy that through Bill 24 we will take one more step towards that goal. I do thank the Minister of Education for bringing it forward. I have seen the positive impact that GSAs can make in our schools.

One of the first things that I had the opportunity to do after being elected was join our Minister of Education and the Premier of Alberta at my high school, Jasper Place high school, which I not only attended but now represent. It was an incredible day for me and all of those high school students. Today we take another step in protecting their inalienable rights as human beings to love who they want, identify as what they want, or be an ally to who they want without being outed.

I just want to wrap up by saying that the Member for Strathmore-Brooks said that over the last 10 years a lot of people's views on this issue have changed. I don't know about you, Madam Speaker, but my belief in the equal rights of all people has never changed. I'd ask all of you – if you came to the conclusion that being a member of the LGBTQ community is wrong at one point or another throughout your life because of something that you were taught, I think you should take a second look at what you're learning from.

Madam Speaker, there is still a lot for me to learn about supporting those in the LGBTQ community, but it starts with listening to those in the community. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, I will recognize Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. This debate should be really simple. In 2017 it is okay to be gay. In 2017 it is okay to be an ally, it's okay to be in a GSA, and it is never, ever, ever okay to out gay kids without their consent. That's pretty straightforward. That's what this bill is about, and the opposition we see to that shows that the UCP is on the wrong side of history. They are trying to somehow play both sides by on one hand saying: well, we support GSAs, but – nudge, nudge, whisper, whisper – actually, we're with you if you're homophobic, if you somehow question the legitimacy of LGBTQ peoples to simply be who they are. That's what this is. There's really no more to it than that.

In 2017 in Alberta there should absolutely be no question that it should be up to students and students alone to disclose to whom they wish, when they wish their own sexual identity. Period. Any discussion or debate about whether this undermines the rights of parents completely misses the mark. This bill allows for teachers to disclose in the rare but serious cases where a student may display a risk of self-harm or harm to others. That accounts for any concerns that may exist over the best interests of the children who are in our school system.

Now, the vast, vast, vast majority of parents in our province and our country care deeply about their children. They want nothing but the best for their kids. They can have open and honest conversations with their children about who those children are, who they think they are, who they're becoming. As a parent of a teenager I can tell you that these are trying and challenging times. We've all gone through that. We know how difficult that is, discovering who you are. But I can also tell you that as a parent of a teenager that your teens don't always necessarily want to talk to you. They want to talk to their friends. They want to explore those challenging questions and discussions with one another, and they want to do that in a safe and supportive environment. That's what a GSA is.

What this bill does is protects those kids, the small but still substantial number of kids whose parents would do them harm, whose parents would kick them out of the house, whose parents would abuse those children. The UCP and no one else can tell me who those parents are. We don't know. That risk is real. Upwards of 40 per cent of homeless youth are LGBTQ. That's all we need to know to tell us that there is a risk to these kids. This bill does nothing more than protect the simple fundamental human right for these kids to be who they are.

It's not about whether or not we have GSAs. I take the UCP at their word that they don't mind there being GSAs. That's fair. That would be a truly remarkable statement if they didn't like that. But they're somehow trying to equivocate, somehow trying to find some middle ground that just doesn't exist, nor should it. This bill is only about who discloses to whom and when. It puts control in the hands of students, where it absolutely should be.

So I am calling out the UCP on their rather interesting and I think disingenuous strategy of conflating and confusing people using technical sections of a bill that really have nothing to do with whether or not the bill is acceptable. It's just simply the way the bill is written for all the correct technical reasons that enables students to have control over their own lives. That's all this bill is about. It's no more complicated than that, so to evoke section 50.1 and try to confuse, as if this is some sort of nefarious plot by the dastardly NDP to undermine the family unit – that's not what this is. That's absolutely not what this is, and it is disingenuous to suggest otherwise.

In the end, without hesitation, the Alberta Party and the Alberta Party caucus enthusiastically, unapologetically, unequivocally support Bill 24. We support LGBTQ kids, we support gay-straight alliances, we support fundamental human rights, and I encourage every single member of this Assembly to do the same.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

10:40

Connolly: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'll try to be brief as I've spoken a fair amount to this bill, but I want to iterate one thing. This bill is about one thing and one thing only, protecting our LGBTQ-plus youth.

I'm very tired of these misrepresentations of the truth. These aren't even alternative facts, Madam Speaker. These are outright mistruths. I've spoken to hundreds of adults who have said that this bill would have helped them in school, and I have spoken to many, many students who have said to me that this bill will help them and their friends.

Now, for the benefit of the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View I'd be happy to read section 50.1 as it presently reads:

50.1(1) A board shall provide notice to a parent of a student where courses of study, educational programs or instructional materials, or instruction or exercises, include subject-matter that deals primarily and explicitly with religion or human sexuality.

That's (1). The section that we're adding is (4), so I'll skip (2) and (3).

(4) For greater certainty, this section does not apply with respect to the establishment or operation of a voluntary student organization referred to in section 16.1 or the organizing or holding of an activity referred to in section 16.1.

The words I really want to highlight are "for greater certainty." The leader of the UCP is constantly saying that these student-led clubs are a way for the ATA to covertly teach sexual education. That is why this section is needed, because there is misinformation that is being spread by Jason Kenney. This is to ensure that our youth are not being outed, that schools are not finding ways to get around asking parents for permission.

The Member for Calgary-South East brought up an interesting point yesterday. He asked if schools would still be allowed to notify parents if a child is at risk of harming themselves or others, and the answer is yes. Now, I have experience with this. When I told my drama teacher, who knew I was gay, that I wanted to kill myself, he had to tell the guidance counsellor, so he did. He didn't tell her why I wanted to kill myself as he didn't know and, quite honestly, neither did I. The guidance counsellor then told my mother and didn't mention my sexual orientation because it really didn't matter. This bill will not change that. Let me repeat: this bill will not change that.

This bill will help protect our youth. This bill will make sure that our LGBTQ-plus youth don't have to worry about being outed if they need to tell someone that they're thinking of harming themselves. From experience I can tell you that that is liberating. At the time my mother knew of my sexual orientation, so I didn't have to worry about being outed, but not everyone has the same history that I do. No one's coming out is the same, and no one should be rushed into coming out.

It's our job as legislators to ensure our youth are safe. It's our job to legislate. That's what we're doing with this bill. That's why I'm proud to come to work every day. Our youth need us. Our youth deserve to have their legislators on their side. That's what they have with this government, but I am so disappointed with the Official Opposition, Madam Speaker. When I first spoke to this bill, I was angry. I was incredibly angry. I did not think that the Official Opposition was going to vote against this bill. I thought we had moved along from this. I thought that the UCP, the Wildrose, and the PCs had learned.

When Bill 10 came out, I was also very upset. I remember viciously tweeting at the now current Minister of Infrastructure about how upset I was. The bill led me to call my MLA, who at the time was Heather Forsyth. I called her office and told her staff that I wanted her to vote against the original Bill 10. I remember crying on the phone, telling her staff why this bill was important to me, why this bill was needed, and how it would have helped me when I was in school. After that call her staff assured me that she was going to vote against the bill. Now the UCP seems to easily forget that Bill 10 did not have unanimous consent of both legacy parties and all of its members, as has been stated. There were two former Wildrosers who crossed to the PCs who could not support the bill and so abstained from the vote.

I point this out not to shame the two members but to, one, correct the record and, two, show that the UCP are not moving forward when it comes to LGBTQ-plus rights but backwards. We had two members who decided to abstain from the last vote, and now we have an entire caucus who thinks that voting against LGBTQ rights is perfectly fine. We have a whole caucus, we have 26 members of this House who believe that voting against LGBTQ rights, who believe that voting against our youth is perfectly fine, who think that homophobia has a place in this House, and I can tell you that you're wrong. There are two sides to this. There's the right side of history, and there's Jason Kenney's Alberta. We here on this side of the House and even on part of that side of the House are happy to state that homophobia does not have a place in this province.

On a nonpartisan level I'm just so disappointed. This is a nonpartisan issue, and I wish it would get unanimous consent from this House.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other speakers to the bill? The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I just wanted to take an opportunity to speak to a particular aspect of this debate that has disconcerted me over the time that I've been listening to it over the last week or so. The points that have been brought up by the opposition have been refuted quite well and eloquently by many members on our side of the House, so I won't repeat all of those.

The piece that is upsetting to me is the use of misdirection that has been happening in this debate. The fact that we bring together a bill that simply is protecting the rights of young people to be able to attend a club without danger of being outed before their time – and as a parent I know that very often even if I do know something about my children, I don't necessarily go to them and confront them with it because as a parent I know they need the time to get the courage up or to think their way through it, to settle on their words in order to come forward and tell me things. I think it's just a natural part of parenting to understand that children need their time and their place and their rhythm and their process in order to move forward.

The basic intent of this bill is not inconsistent with good parenting. It's not inconsistent with the laws in this land. What the opposition has done instead, because there's nothing intrinsically wrong with where we're going, is that they've employed a bunch of misdirection. They've brought up ideas that are simply not in the bill and then refuted those ideas as if they were in the bill.

For example, they've talked about GSAs including curriculum. Nowhere in the bill does it suggest that there be a curriculum for GSAs. They misdirect with that. They brought up the idea that GSAs are sex clubs. Ridiculous on its face, but also nowhere in the bill does it prescribe them to be sex clubs, but they misdirect in order to be able to have something to refute. They talk about GSAs including five-year-olds. Nowhere in the bill does it talk about including five-year-olds, but they misdirect. It's this point of misdirection that I think is very concerning here. Even this morning we heard a little bit more about section 50.1(4), talking about it as if it's somehow an amendment of the School Act, but nowhere in the bill does it suggest that we amend the School Act. Again a misdirection.

That brings me to the point that I want to speak about today, and that is the fact that there are many things that are different between me and the Hon. Jason Kenney, but I can tell you that one of the things that's different is that I actually finished my theology degree.

So I'd just like to take a moment to speak to the theology a little bit behind this.

Thank you for the gift of the Holy Bible I received in my office just this week, in fact, perhaps a message from God.

I know, in having read through both my New Testament and Old Testament classes, that Jesus himself never once spoke against homosexuality. At no point did he say that homosexuality was bad or wrong. Now, Jesus was not a fragile man. He didn't avoid topics because they were scary to him. He did speak out against the accumulation of wealth. He did speak out about issues of poverty, the very things that we bring up in this House all the time. He associated with tax collectors and prostitutes. He was not fragile, and as God I suspect that he didn't just forget to talk about homosexuality. I suspect his memory is pretty good.

Here I am, then, left wondering: what is the basis for this kind of anger toward homosexuality? I realize that it has nothing to do with the New Testament. Take us back to the Old Testament, and take us back to Leviticus, where it is suggested in Leviticus 18:22: "Do not have sexual relations with a man as one does with a woman."

If that is the basis for the argument here as to why someone would be against LGBTQ rights, then using the principle of misdirection that I've witnessed across the floor all the time, I can also assume that if you're accepting that line from Leviticus, you're also accepting other lines from Leviticus. I'd just like to take an opportunity to read into the record some of the other things that Leviticus suggests. Now I know that the members opposite in the House are in favour of these things as well because they are in Leviticus. For example, "When you reap the harvest of your land, you shall not reap your field right up to its edge." I assume none of the farmers on the other side have actually cleared their fields in the time that they've been farmers.

I also understand that in Leviticus it indicates that you should not plant two different crops in the same field. So I gather that nobody on the other side in the farm community is into crop rotation at all. I do appreciate that.

Continuing the misdirection that I've been educated in by the members opposite in the House, I'd like to point out that Leviticus 19 says that "If a man lies sexually with a woman who is a slave, assigned to another man and not yet ransomed or given her freedom, a distinction shall be made." You'll notice that it doesn't say that slavery is bad; it just says simply that if you have sex with your slave, you shouldn't kill the slave. It seems to me that in continuing this misdirection, the opposition is clearly in favour of slavery, something I didn't realize until this particular event, something that I find a bit confining.

One last little piece I might add in here, Leviticus 19:27, in case you're following along in your own Bibles: "You shall not round off the hair on your temples or mar the edges of your beard." I'm a little disconcerted to find so many beardless people across the floor here since they seem to have defied the Bible itself.

"You shall not make any cuts in your body for the dead" or tattoo yourself. I'm very interested in hearing the opposition's complaints and concerns about allowing tattoos in society and their speeches asking us to shut down tattoo parlours to be consistent with their belief system.

Now, Madam Speaker, of course I'm being absurd in my commentary here because I want to say that I have found the discussion from the other side to be completely absurd. We have put together a simple bill, a simple bill that recognizes that human beings have rights. Human beings include human beings of every age. The right to be able to engage in a process of coming out that is consistent with your personal emotional needs is a right that I think we need to protect. That is all this bill is about. It's about protecting children so that they can make the choices that they need to make.

I'm very happy to stand on the side of the House that protects human rights, that is concerned about people and how they express themselves. I use "misdirection" to point out the absurdity of the misdirection on the other side. Very discouraged to hear comments about sex clubs, about five-year-olds, about curriculum, all of which are patently false, and I stand here to accuse the other side of that.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? No questions or comments.

Any further speakers to the bill?

Seeing none, the hon. Minister of Education to close debate.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you for the debate on Bill 24. It's been edifying and illuminating. Certainly, not just members of this House have learned a lot; I think that all Albertans have as well.

Our government has made it clear that we are committed to ensuring that all students, no matter what school they attend, have welcoming, caring, respectful, and safe learning environments. We do this by strengthening legislation that supports students that wish to create or join a gay-straight or queer-straight alliance. Bill 24, An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances, is about one thing and one thing only. It's about protecting some of the most vulnerable kids in our province.

Madam Speaker, this bill would ensure that no student would be outed. We know that parents, of course, love and support their children and that they play a critical role in their children's lives and education, but we also know that some students feel safer and more comfortable talking about these issues with their peers.

The UCP claims that this bill somehow is all about wedge politics or creating a political distraction. Madam Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth, and that itself, that assertion, is very illuminating about how they feel about these very vulnerable students.

This bill, Bill 24, emphasizes that students have the right to create and choose the name of their clubs, GSA or QSA, and that school principals must help students create these clubs in a timely manner and appoint a staff supervisor so that students can have access to peer support when they need it in a timely manner. This bill also makes it clear that every school in Alberta that receives public dollars will follow the law.

Madam Speaker, our government knows the positive difference student organizations can have for youth, and I know very well that these alliances can in fact save lives. I visited a number of GSAs throughout my time as Education minister. I was in Fort Saskatchewan just yesterday visiting a club, and it was fantastic.

In April 2016 I had the honour of hosting here at the Legislature several students from GSAs across Alberta. Some of my colleagues from both sides of the aisle joined me in speaking to these youths. We heard first-hand from students about their work and the work of GSAs. Across the province these alliances provide safe havens for students to be themselves and to talk about things that matter to them.

Madam Speaker, let me be clear. What those students want to talk about is about homework, about school, about combatting bullying, and looking after each other. It's a safe sanctuary for these kids, and we all know just how important that is.

Students who join GSAs just want to be regular kids. They know that they need a safe space for themselves and for others. They look after each other, and they stick together. Let's not forget about allies that join these clubs as well, creating an alliance with students, with their friends, creating a whole school community, Madam Speaker, that is a safer and more just place for all kids. We know it creates a better atmosphere for every student in the school where there's a GSA.

We are talking about basic student rights here and that you must provide a safe space where every student can feel safe. Why would we not do this? Madam Speaker, this is reason enough to ensure that each and every school create a GSA or QSA should a student ask for one.

They have also told me that GSAs gave them the courage to come out to their friends and family.

I urge every single member of the Assembly to do the correct thing this morning and vote to pass Bill 24 without prejudice. Like we've heard from my colleagues, you'll be on the correct side of history. It will be something that you can be of clear conscience and certainly with the best of intentions for all students.

Madam Speaker, this legislation is making waves not just across the province but right across the entire country of Canada. I just watched the Rick Mercer show on my device here, and it was great. It was great support and great comments.

Why would we let students suffer in silence when we can ensure a safe place for them to share their feelings with their peers? Yesterday I spoke to some students, like I said, from Fort Saskatchewan, who had typical issues around junior high, doing their homework, but they also talked about the importance and the safe sanctuary of their GSA, very important for them. It's very important for them to be able to look after each other and to reach out not just in their school but to reach across the whole city to other students in the same situation.

When we are talking about notification, I mean, so many of these provisions within Bill 24 are as a direct result of opposition that we saw to GSAs across the province over the last couple of years. We had to make sure that we put in the provision that students would be in a safe space in a GSA because schools were sending out notifications. If they heard word that there was a GSA, they would send out letters to the whole school, saying: "Warning. Warning. There's a GSA in your neighbourhood." You know, that was hurtful, and it was against not just the spirit but the actual intention of a safe sanctuary of a GSA, so we had to make sure that that was a safe place. It's not an instructional place; it's a support place for students. If anybody tries to spin it in any other way, they're simply going down the road of, as many people have mentioned, misinformation, and that misinformation leads to hurtful and hateful consequences for students.

You pull that thread a little bit, Madam Speaker, and you will find that talk about notification is because – again, it's that same thing – they're having secret sex clubs, right? I've seen this in very hateful letters and journalism. Ted Byfield put out a horrible, horrible article about this that I found very offensive. Again, you pull that thread, and that's what is being talked about here.

Yeah, of course, we are creating a safe space, a safe sanctuary, with GSAs. No, there will not be a letter going out for students who join that. If they want to be confidential, if they want to have that safe sanctuary for themselves, then we will provide it. That's the law. Anybody who does anything different will be breaking the law, Madam Speaker.

All schools that receive public money must follow the same law, too. There's no exception, right? If you take public money from the province of Alberta for your school, you make sure that you follow the same safe and caring policies as anybody else. We don't make special exceptions to the law for different people in different circumstances. I think that's a very big step forward, too, and provides the protections that we need.

I ask everybody to please consider supporting this bill. It's a very, very solid bill. We've been working hard on this process over the last number of years. We started with Bill 10, and it was a good step forward, but over the last number of months we have found places where we can make it stronger to make sure that kids are protected, to make sure that we're creating a better Alberta for all students and creating a more equal and socially just place as well. When you provide equality and social justice, Madam Speaker, everybody benefits. All Albertans benefit from that as a result. You know that this government has your back.

Based on that, I will close debate on third reading of Bill 24.

Bill 25

Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Now for something completely different. I am honoured to rise to introduce third reading and speak to Bill 25, the Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017.

Madam Speaker, Bill 25 responds to a request from Alberta's forestry professionals to merge their two organizations into one. Together Alberta's foresters and forest technologists ensure the proper management of our forested lands. Our government is committed to working closely with both professions to ensure they continue to provide the highest level of forestry services in the country. There are currently 1,600 Albertans who identify either as a forester or a forest technologist. If passed, Bill 25 will amend the act to merge two regulatory bodies, the College of Alberta Professional Foresters and the College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists, into one regulatory organization, the Association of Alberta Forest Management Professionals.

Both organizations have been asking this government as well as the previous government to make these changes since 2014, Madam Speaker, and I'm very proud to be able to respond to their call with this bill. Over 90 per cent of members of both organizations approved merging prior to approaching government to request legislative changes. Since 2015 the organizations have been sharing office space and a new name. Alberta Labour has worked closely with both organizations and has consulted with them regularly on the details of these proposed changes. Their request also has the strong support of the Alberta Forest Products Association, the voice for the forest products industry.

Merging the two organizations into one body would eliminate any confusion around the two organizations that provide the same service. The professions' governing regulations would also be consolidated from three into one. This will save valuable resources in time and money. The merger would also improve administrative and disciplinary processes to be more modern and efficient without sacrificing the principles of fairness. Complaints against a member would move to a central governing committee rather than to a single individual. Work would be shared among members, creating administrative efficiencies.

The membership would continue to consist of the many industry professionals but would now also include public members who are residents of Alberta. These public members would add a level of oversight and public accountability that is standard practice for professional associations.

The amendments would also allow investigations into complaints even after a complaint had been withdrawn or settled. Such action, when warranted, would better serve the public interest.

Madam Speaker, by consolidating these organizations into one governing body, there will be an even stronger and more unified voice for our forestry professionals. Creating one regulatory body and removing confusion around the two organizations offering the same services and the consolidation of the professions' governing legislation to an act supported by a single regulation as opposed to the current three regulations will make things easier for government and for our vibrant forestry industry.

Madam Speaker, as previously mentioned, they have been calling for these changes since 2014. They are supportive, and they are excited to move forward together. I ask all members of the Assembly to vote in favour of third reading of this bill.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm happy to rise today and speak to Bill 25, the Regulated Forestry Profession Amendment Act, 2017. I spoke to this bill in second reading. I supported it then, and I'll be supporting it in third reading today. As we by now, I'm sure, are all aware, the proposed amendments in Bill 25 will merge the College of Alberta Professional Foresters and the College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists in order to create a single regulatory entity. That entity will be named the Association of Alberta Forest Management Professionals under the Regulated Forestry Profession Act.

There are about 1,600 professionals that represent the forestry profession in Alberta which identify as either forest technologists or foresters. The fact is that the biggest difference between these folks that are members of either college is education. Foresters have a degree whereas technologists have a diploma or a certificate.

Now, Bill 25 proposes a number of amendments to the Regulated Forestry Profession Act, which are being brought forward to implement the merger of the two professional bodies. It seems that this proposed merger of the two colleges began with a memorandum of understanding, an MOU, back in 2013, and in June of the following year the memberships voted overwhelmingly to advance with the projected fusion of these two colleges. The fact is that more than 80 per cent of foresters and 90 per cent of forest technologists who actually took part in the vote determined that moving forward was the right thing to do.

Actually, this unification has been the result of hard work over several years between these two organizations. Consultations and approval were sought from both colleges' memberships prior to them approaching the Department of Labour and asking for the changes.

Both of these colleges since that vote in 2014 have once again approached the government to officially request that the Legislative Assembly allow the merger of these two organizations. Once again, it's important to reiterate that the two organizations have reaffirmed their interest in merging since 2014. They've also been holding AGMs together for some time and have combined some administrative functions, things such as sharing office space and also putting together organizational newsletters.

Generally speaking, when we talk about a merger between two professional bodies, we begin to think of what the costs may be in order to accomplish such an action, and we think about the costs that will be incurred by the government of Alberta in order to complete such a task. As it turns out, there will be no cost to the province at all in order to see these two organizations merge. The foresters and forest technologists have been basically operating as one entity for some time, and all expenses that are incurred in this union will be borne by the two colleges. No taxpayer is on the hook on this one.

They certainly have done their due diligence here, Madam Speaker. The kind of consultation these organizations gave their stakeholders would provide a high benchmark for some governments, for sure. Not only was there lots of time to show that there was an overwhelming desire to amend the act, but as I stated in my previous speech, they gave ample notification, and the fact is that, to our knowledge, no groups have come forward with concerns.

Madam Speaker, I said it before, that amending this legislation is a no-brainer. It's what the colleges and their membership want, and it is incumbent upon us to respect that. I'll be voting for this bill and encourage my colleagues on both sides of the House to do the same.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's an honour for me to rise and speak in favour of this bill. You know, just a personal story. When I grew up, of course, the terminology for forestry professionals was a little bit different. A little bit. We used to call them lumberjacks when I was a kid. Of course, as a child I long dreamed of being a lumberjack, rushing down the wild rivers of British Columbia with my best girlie by my side. Unfortunately, life has taken a different turn, and I find myself as a member of the Alberta Legislature. But I'm proud to stand with the government, who is saying to the lumberjacks of this province that they are lumberjacks and they are okay. Whether they're cutting down trees, whether they're eating their lunch, whether they're going to the lavatory, whether they're going shopping on Wednesdays and having buttered scones for tea, they are lumberjacks and they are okay. Our government has their backs, and I'm proud to support this bill.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Any other speakers to the bill?

Seeing none, the hon. Minister of Labour to close debate.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, and thank you to all speakers to this bill. I very much appreciate the support that this bill has received, and I move to close debate.

[Motion carried; Bill 25 read a third time]

11:30 Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 27 Conflicts of Interest Amendment Act, 2017

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I would like to propose an amendment on behalf of the government to this piece of legislation, and I have the requisite number of copies here. Would you like me to read out the amendment in detail?

The Chair: As soon as I get a copy, then you can proceed.

This will be known as amendment A1.

Go ahead, hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I move that the bill be amended as follows: In clause A section 1(4) is amended (a) in the proposed section 23.97 (i) by striking out subsection 23.97(1)(a) and substituting the following:

- (a) the person holds
 - (i) a senior official position, section 23.925 applies, or
 - (ii) a senior official position referred to in section 23.926(1), sections 23.925 and 23.926 apply, or

(ii) by striking out subsection 23.97(2)(a) and substituting the following:

- (a) the person holds a senior official position, sections 23.925 and 23.926 apply, according to their terms, to the person, or
- (b) in the proposed section 23.971(2) by striking out "the code of conduct referred to in the terms of employment of the official in effect immediately before the relevant date" and substituting "the code of conduct, if any, in effect immediately before the relevant date."

Now, Madam Chair, I'm sure that it's all perfectly clear to everyone exactly what's happening, but for those at home I would just like to make a few comments with respect to this amendment.

The bill proposes that public agencies that are already subject to APAGA, the Alberta Public Agencies Governance Act, would be subject to the Conflicts of Interest Act. Currently, as of November 1 there are 136 such agencies. Also included in this list would be three Alberta Health Services subsidiaries and Covenant Health.

Bill 27 proposes a number of prescribed elements that would apply to employees and board members of all applicable public agencies. Changes to the Conflicts of Interest Act would require all public agencies to have codes of conduct that include these prescribed elements.

At this time I'd like to mention that it is important to note that this amendment is focused on the transitional provisions and does not impact the broader policy, intent, or effect of the bill. This amendment deals primarily with the application of the transitional provisions to board chairs.

The proposed amendment is composed of two changes, clause A(a) and clause A(b). First, it amends the transitional provisions under section 23.97 to make clear that the concurrent employment provisions are limited to CEOs and other designated positions. As currently worded, it would have applied to all chairs as well.

Second, it amends section 23.97(2) to ensure that chairs who are not subject to an employment contract are also covered by this transitional provision. Unless amended, the transitional provisions will misapply certain provisions to board chairs, undermining the intention of some of the legislated requirements.

Madam Chair, I'm sure that that elucidates fully and completely the nature of the amendment, but just for the further interest of hon. members, I know that my colleague from Edmonton-Ellerslie has a more fulsome description of the amendment.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you, Madam Chair. Thank you very much. We've introduced these amendments just for the sake of clarity, but before I go on to specifically speak about the amendment, I want to recap, just to make sure that we have everything that we're trying to address here in Bill 27, which has several key sets of provisions, which I'd just like to outline at this time.

The bill proposes that public agencies that are already subject to the Alberta Public Agencies Governance Act would also be subject to the Conflicts of Interest Act. Currently, as of November 1, there are 136 such agencies, and also included in this list would be three Alberta Health Services subsidiaries and Covenant Health.

Bill 27 proposes a number of prescribed elements that would apply to employees and board members of all applicable public agencies. Changes to the Conflicts of Interest Act would require all public agencies to have codes of conduct that include these prescribed elements. All APAGA agencies would be required to submit updated codes of conduct reflecting these prescribed elements to the Ethics Commissioner within four months of the act being proclaimed. The Ethics Commissioner will review all revised codes to ensure that they meet the requirements of the act and sign off by March 31, 2019. Agencies would have to publish their new codes of conduct no later than April 30, 2019.

The legislation also proposes a set of core statutory requirements for CEOs and board chairs. For all agency board members and employees, the core requirements would be a baseline standard, enforced through codes of conduct that public agencies would be required to implement. Public agencies could have additional restrictions, but these are the ones that all agencies would be required to implement.

The legislation also proposes a set of core statutory requirements for CEOs and board chairs which include restrictions on private interests, restrictions on using influence, restrictions on using insider information, and disclosure of real and apparent conflicts of interest.

There is an additional core statutory requirement that would apply to CEOs and equivalents: restrictions on concurrent employment and holding other offices. This additional core statutory requirement would take effect immediately for new hires, upon reappointment, or following a two-year notice period.

CEOs and equivalents of significant agencies would also be subject to additional statutory requirements upon designation, including restrictions on holding stocks and other public securities; disclosure to the Ethics Commissioner, including financial disclosure; postemployment restrictions, specifically a 12-month cooling-off period following employment with a public agency. These additional statutory requirements would be set out in the act, but the positions that they would apply to would be designated in a separate order in council and come into effect on contract renewals and new appointments.

Where current contracts are longer term, a two-year transition period would apply so that within two years all CEOs and board chairs would be subject to these enhanced requirements. Through orders in council cabinet would have the ability to add or exempt agencies and positions from any of the conflict-of-interest requirements.

We propose a statutory requirement for all public agencies to have codes of conduct with the required elements.

To enhance oversight and enforcement, we also propose to apply the restrictions on furthering private interests, using influence, and using insider information as statutory requirements within the Conflicts of Interest Act. These restrictions would be carried out through orders in council and would apply to board chairs and CEOs of public agencies on contract renewals and new appointments. There would be a two-year transition period to ensure that CEOs with longer term contracts would also come under the new requirements within the two-year time frame rather than on expiration of their contract.

The Ethics Commissioner would have the authority to receive and review disclosures from designated CEOs and their equivalents; reduce requirements for restrictions on public securities and restrictions on postemployment; investigate alleged breaches of the act by board chairs, CEOs, and other designated senior positions; issue reports; make recommendations to the responsible minister and/or board; and review public agency codes of conduct to ensure they meet the statutory requirements set out in this bill. As well, disclosure information submitted to the Ethics Commissioner will remain confidential.

The amendment we have introduced is focused on the transitional provisions and does not impact the broader policy, intent, or effect of the bill. This amendment deals primarily with the application of the transitional provisions to board chairs.

The proposed amendment is composed of two changes, clause A(a) and clause A(b). First, it amends the transitional provision under 23.97 to make clear that the concurrent employment provision is limited to CEOs and other designated positions. As currently worded, it would have applied to all the chairs as well.

Second, it amends 23.97(2) to ensure that chairs who are not subject to an employment contract are also covered by this transitional provision. Unless amended, the transitional provision will misapply certain provisions to board chairs, undermining the intention of some of the legislated requirements.

I look forward to questions and ask for full support of the bill. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any questions or comments on amendment A1? The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Madam Chair, and thanks to the speakers. I just have some questions and some concerns and some comments that, hopefully, can be addressed. Obviously, we're having an amendment in case some chairs of ABCs or Covenant Health or Alberta Health Services' boards that are being added, I guess, can't comply with the concurrent employment conditions that the new Bill 27, Conflicts of Interest Amendment Act, 2017, is going to have.

I'm wondering if anybody on the government side can state some specifics. Is there somebody specifically that's a chair of one of the 36 agencies, boards, and commissions or Covenant Health or one of the I believe it is three new Alberta Health Services' commissions that will be included in this that will have a conflict in the four-month period where they have to submit their conflict rules to the Ethics Commissioner, which the Ethics Commissioner has, give or take, a year to review and approve? Are we doing this for somebody specifically?

It opens up, Madam Chair, the concern that I've had with this Bill 27 from the start. Absolutely, Albertans have told me everywhere, every day to reduce conflicts of interest, eliminate them, to make it so that we have the best people working for Albertans in our agencies, boards, and commissions. That's not going to be hard because everywhere I go, Albertans are willing to selflessly give their time, their effort, their advice, to work hard to make sure that that happens, and to give the opportunity for all Albertans to share in our prosperity, to share in our freedoms, to have the chance to control their lives and make an impact on our communities and our families.

One of the concerns that we had around Bill 27 was: does this do this? I see that there's a lot relying on the regulations that this government is going to come forward with. There's a lot relying on how the Ethics Commissioner and her people interpret things and come up with things, and those are the unintended consequences of what the future of Bill 27 may bring. Again, the strength is that this side of the House and I and every Albertan I talk to were concerned about conflict of interest in the past but know that Albertans all have the best interests of the future generation in mind and are willing to sacrifice for that.

I am kind of wondering, though. I see on today's Order Paper a government motion that the Conflicts of Interest Act be referred to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship. We're scrambling on this side to find out if that is a once-every-five-years happening that has to happen or if this government truly wants more input from Albertans as to how to make Bill 27, Conflicts of Interest Amendment Act, 2017, as strong as it possibly could be.

I have concerns. It can be done because everybody's heart and head are in the right place, but we're having some situations where the Ethics Commissioner is going to have to rule on concurrent employment disclosure and a year's cooling-off rights, where certain types of work aren't being allowed. Yes, those all are good tools to make things happen.

But does Bill 27, Conflicts of Interest Amendment Act, 2017, fully protect Albertans so we make sure that the people who are totally willing to serve and sacrifice – say, somebody in the real estate industry or the agriculture industry or the financial industry who just by their nature acquires the expertise that Albertans have to rely on – are going to be able to serve? Are they going to be able to ensure that good knowledge, good advice fully impacts for all Albertans? With Bill 27, in the short, short time we've had that, it's almost impossible to see that that will be protected, and we'll have to rely on the Ethics Commissioner and her people, and we'll have to rely on the government's rules and regulations.

What I'd like to ask the government at this point is: what's up? What's going on? If we're referring the Conflicts of Interest Act to the Standing Committee on Resource Stewardship and it shall be a special committee, can we review even the amendment part? Can we make sure that we get this bill exactly right or as close to right as any government can for Albertans? What's up? Why are we doing this?

Let's take advantage of consulting with Albertans. I've long thought and I've stood up many, many times in this House, Madam Chair, and said that way, way more of our bills if not all of our bills should go to special committees so that the public can have input, so that second thought can happen, more reflection and input.

At this point in time, again I'm wondering: are there any specific chairs of these 136 ABCs or the new ones being added that will have a conflict for consecutive or I guess it's called concurrent employment provisions during the transition period? Should that be disclosed to fully ensure that, you know, there's not a conflict that may affect Albertans, of course honouring the private citizen's rights to privacy and protection?

Hey, what's going on, government? Why don't we just send all of Bill 27 with this conflict-of-interest amendment to the Resource Stewardship Committee? Let's hear from more Albertans.

Thank you.

The Chair: Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Yes. Thank you, Madam Chair, and thank you to the member for the questions. First, I would just like to say that there's no specific individual that we're thinking about. What the amendments are really focused on here is making sure that – as you and I both know, we want Albertans that are in specific industries, in nonprofit organizations, people who have a little bit of experience and who want to volunteer for the government – they can have the ability to have that space. I mean, that's what our government is completely focused on and what I'm really proud of.

As I spoke about in the House yesterday, one of the things that we're really focused on is trying to create more diversity on these boards, agencies, and commissions. I'm very proud to say that I know of two constituents of my own that I referred and to whom I said, "Please apply," because, of course, now the application process is much more transparent, right? They're applying directly as opposed to where, you know, perhaps in the past – I wouldn't want to judge every appointment – it was kind of done internally. The Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater said yesterday that it was like an old boys' club. We've created more transparency so that people, when interested in a particular agency, board, or commission, could apply directly. Of course, one of the most important things is making sure that we're addressing diversity and inclusion, which, as you know, are really important to me.

Now, we don't want to stop these people from participating in making important decisions within, you know, our democratic institutions, so what the first amendment is specifically focused on is making sure that chairs are not subject to restrictions on concurrent employment, because oftentimes these positions are either part-time or they're volunteer positions, right? We're making sure that we're getting it right so that individuals from our communities can come and participate in a role that they should be given every right to, and we're making sure to select the best candidates so that we can make sure that those people are giving us insightful information based on the industry that they may be a part of or the experiences that they have had living their lives and participating in both our economy and society.

I'd love to entertain any other questions that members may have.

I will say that the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat did bring up the Conflicts of Interest Act. Of course, I want to remind everybody in the House that the Conflicts of Interest Act was originally sent to the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee, which I had the honour and pleasure of serving on. Of course, I remember that there were quite a few things that we had in common when we were addressing the Conflicts of Interest Act. I think that we got a lot of input from Albertans on the Conflicts of Interest Act. There was a lot of agreement on ways that we could strengthen the Conflicts of Interest Act. Being the chair of Resource Stewardship, I welcome the opportunity to look at that act once again along with colleagues on both sides of the House so that we can make sure that we're strengthening this as we move forward, especially now as it applies to agencies, boards, and commissions.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Yeah. Thank you, Madam Chair. Well, currently we're on the amendment, and I have a question, actually, regarding the transition nature of this amendment as it applies to the act. Well, I will back up a bit. I'm very happy that this bill is going to go to committee and that we are going to have an opportunity to discuss it at great length and to get stakeholders in the room and hear what they've got to say. I would hope, given that the chair is with us, that there will be a process that is lengthy enough and detailed enough that we can hear from if not all then certainly most of these people involved in ABCs, because my concern is that we could end up with a one-size-fits-all, and the ABCs are simply not that way. They are very unique in their makeup, each and every one of them.

I realize that this amendment that we have before us right now, as was explained, is more or less a transition document to get some changes made to the bill during the transition time for employees and senior officials within the various ABCs, and I don't find anything wrong with it at all. I think it clarifies some things that we were wondering about. From my point of view, this amendment to Bill 27 is fine, and I will be supporting it as it stands. It's all right.

The Chair: I hesitate to interrupt, hon. member, but pursuant to Standing Order 4(3) the committee will now rise and report progress.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Ms Woollard: Madam Speaker, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration a certain bill. The committee reports progress on the following bill: Bill 27. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report?

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Opposed, say no. So ordered.
The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Having completed the work of the morning, I would move that we call it 12 o'clock and adjourn until 1:30 this afternoon.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, November 15, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to introduce to you and through you to all Members of the Legislative Assembly students from St. Jerome Catholic school who are here to visit the Legislature today. They're here with their teachers Alicia Centis and Julie King as well as chaperones Dianne Wozniuk, Curtis Morrison, and Nadine Estrada. I'd like them all to stand up, please, and get a warm welcome from the Legislature.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Dr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, I'd like to introduce to you and through you 31 students from Monsignor William Irwin school in Terwillegar Towne in Edmonton-Whitemud. I've had the pleasure of meeting with this class and doing a Read In Week. They're accompanied by their teacher, Michael Leskow, and student teachers Sydney McLeod and Jessica Tannahill as well as some parents: Joanne Mitchell, Deanna Morrison, Sandra Smith, and Deborah Merriam. They're behind me, and I'd ask them to stand and receive the usual welcome of this Legislature.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. members, are there any other school groups?

Seeing and hearing none, the Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly some of Alberta's paramedics from the north and south areas of our province. These caring professionals work every day to keep Albertans safe, healthy, and well, and I'd like to thank them for their dedicated service. I'd invite them now to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

Ms Miller: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly some of Alberta's committed paramedics serving in the central Alberta area. Paramedics are often the first on the scene, providing urgent care in traumatic situations. We are making sure that the staff have the mental health supports they need to deal with the emotional stress caused by this type of work. Thank you for your service. I'd invite the paramedics from central Alberta to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Thanks, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly two constituents and friends of mine from the great town of Rocky Mountain House. The first is Stuart Burke, who works for Husky in our community as a safety co-ordinator, and around our community we affectionately refer to him as Safety Stu. He keeps us in line.

With him today is Her Worship Tammy Burke, who is the new mayor of Rocky Mountain House, the second female mayor that our community of Rocky Mountain House has had. The reason I bring that up is because, of course, our first female mayor was Helen Hunley, who would go on to be the first female Lieutenant Governor of our great province and the first female many things for our community and this province. Tammy has some big shoes to fill, but I can tell you that our community believes that she can, and we're looking forward to seeing what she does with her term.

I'd ask if both of them would stand up and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of our Assembly some of Alberta's dedicated paramedics serving in the Edmonton area. I'm proud to call them my colleagues. We're proud of the contributions paramedics make to the health and well-being of Albertans in communities all across Alberta. I particularly want to mention the excellent and professional care that was provided by these paramedics to one of our colleagues yesterday. Thank you for your service. I invite you to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs.

Ms Goehring: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you Jessica Lamer, a senior captain with Edmonton fire rescue services; Amy Benson, a paramedic with Alberta Health Services; and Constable Sylvie Boy, who is with the Edmonton Police Service and also a former sergeant in the French army. Together they recently ran in the Servus Edmonton half marathon wearing their uniforms and full gear to raise money and awareness for PTSD. Thank you for your service and your dedication to this cause. I'd ask you now to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

Drever: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all the members of this Assembly nine fantastic paramedics from Calgary. Our paramedics work extremely hard and provide great service to Albertans, ensuring emergency medical services are there when we need them. Thank you for your caring, compassionate, and professional service. I invite you all to now rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Ms Jabbour: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on your behalf today to introduce to you and through you to all Members of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta Rick Massini, the chair of the board of trustees of the Medicine Hat public school division; Mark Davidson, superintendent of the Medicine Hat public school division; and Arlene Hrynyk, president of the Public School Boards' Association of Alberta and trustee for the Northern Lights school division. These three individuals are deeply committed to our province's public education system, and I know that we are all proud to call such dedicated people our fellow Albertans. I would ask that they all stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome. Thank you for coming.
The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to introduce to you and through you members of the Public School Boards' Association of Alberta. I think Arlene was already announced, but she's worth two introductions since she's so awesome, and the same with Rick Massini from Medicine Hat, certainly deserving of the same. We also have Cathy Hogg, who's the executive vice-president of the PSBAA. I also have Lanie Parr, who's the director of the PSBAA, and Cheryl Johner. She's an Edmonton public school trustee and at PSBAA as well. I think Nathan Ip is here. He is with Edmonton public schools, of course, and must have something to do with the Public School Boards' Association because he's sitting so close to them.

If you don't mind, Mr. Speaker, I can just give my other introductions as well. I have the president of the Alberta School Boards Association, Mary Martin. I have the executive director of the College of Alberta School Superintendents, Barry Litun. I have Michael Hauptman, who is the vice-president of the College of Alberta School Superintendents.

So lots of people here today as part of the introduction of Bill 28, and I would be very proud if everyone could give them a big round from the floor.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Health and Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Not to be left out, I too want to recognize some of the members of the Health Sciences Association and the Alberta executive board seated in the members' gallery. They represent approximately 3,300 EMS practitioners across Alberta. We are committed to assisting EMS with resources issues through a greater emphasis on paramedic integration and community-based care by reducing wait times for EMS crews and emergency departments. Thank you for the advocacy and partnership in making life better for Albertans. I ask that Mike, Trudy, Travis, Evan, and Cameron please rise and receive the warm welcome of our Assembly.

I have a second introduction as well, if you would indulge me, and that is to recognize the province's nurse practitioners who are here today and the high quality of care they provide for Albertans every day. This week we celebrate the dynamic contributions of nurse practitioners to the wellness of Albertans by recognizing nurse practitioner week. Nurse practitioners in Alberta are a valuable part of patient-centred care, and we are proud to partner with them to ensure the best care for Alberta families. I invite Jared, Teddie, Lesley, Margaret, Tara, Marcie, and Lisette, who are seated in the members' gallery, to also rise and receive the warm welcome and our gratitude.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Kyler Chittick, a new comms assistant for the Alberta Party caucus. Kyler is very well qualified, with a master's degree in political science from York University. He's a recent graduate – and quite young as well – of the honours program in political science at the University of Alberta and a debate champ, which I'm looking forward to some training from him on. He's also published a review in the ESC: English Studies in Canada publication as well as helped me a great deal with the speeches that I made in support of Bill 24 this and last week. If he could please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise today and in the most neutral way possible – because I know that from time to time this particular individual, who's been introduced in the House before, is a little bit sensitive about being introduced by anyone inside the Chamber. On behalf of the Government House Leader and myself, so that it is as neutral as possible, I would like to welcome to the gallery the newest Canadian that is here. She's a wonderful part of the press gallery, plays things right down the middle, doesn't pick favourites ever. As an important part of the process to all of us, I think we can say: congratulations and welcome to your new Canadianness, Emma Graney.

The Speaker: For her and for you, hon. members, it wouldn't be the first time that you folks saw everything and I saw nothing.

The Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very happy to introduce some very amazing kids to you and through you to all members of the Assembly. Here today we have two Great Kids award winners. For the past 17 years the province has hosted the awards to recognize children and youth across Alberta from ages five to 18, and these great kids receive the award for helping, inspiring, and changing the lives of others. Today I was pleased to meet with these two young leaders to celebrate their successes and thank them for their continued contributions to our province.

I also want to take a moment to encourage Albertans to nominate great kids for the 2018 awards. This year the awards will recognize great kids who've made a positive difference while overcoming difficult life circumstances. Nominations are open until November 24, and more information is available at greatkids.alberta.ca.

Mr. Speaker, I will ask the following individuals to rise and accept the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly: great kid Tyra Cardinal and her mother, Melody, and great kid Aisha Symington and her father, Gerry.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Government Policies

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I moved here with only dreams, willing to work hard, and for a decent shot at the opportunity this land had to offer, and this land did not disappoint me because it is built on Alberta values. Under the NDP the very values which made this province the greatest place to live in the world are under serious threat. The NDP is hiding from Albertans the severe damage that's being done with their policies such as the carbon tax, the departure of almost $40 billion in investment out of this province, the almost 200,000 people who have lost their jobs, and now it's showing disrespect to religious minorities and their beliefs. Albertans, as we know, voted for the NDP not knowing that they were going to get an anti-Albertan, anti free enterprise, anti family values, and antireligious government.

Mr. Speaker, this Premier and members of this NDP caucus have openly protested against oil and gas pipelines, and now, all of a sudden, they claim to be champions of Alberta's resources. Please. If that is the case, why can't the Premier stand up against the Leap Manifesto and denounce it? But that would be considered doing the right thing for Alberta, the complete opposite of this NDP ideology.

A lot of this NDP caucus moved to Alberta from other provinces, looking for jobs before they became accidental MLAs, and now they want to change the fundamental values of this province. Mr. Speaker, Albertans will not let that happen.

Before I was a Conservative, I was an Albertan, and I will always stay that way. I am willing to put every single thing on the line to protect these values so that we can pass them on to future generations so that once again this land becomes a beacon of hope for hard-working people around the world.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Stony Plain.

Coal Worker Transition Supports

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We in Stony Plain know that the coal industry plays a crucial role. Families and generations have been built around it. I know the transition, driven by a combination of federal and provincial regulations and other global circumstances, has had its toll on families in my region. Coal workers are asking questions like: what's next, and will I still be able to support my family?

I want all of you, the coal workers, to know that I have your back and this government has your back. That's why we recently announced new transition supports for coal workers, supports that will help bridge your income, whether you're retiring or finding a new job; supports that will help with retraining, employment placement, and job matching; supports like tuition vouchers to help cover costs related to postsecondary education. And we will have facilitators meeting directly with you, your union, and your employer to figure out the supports that work best for you. Please know that I will fight as hard as I can to make sure that the federal government steps up on this issue as well. You have my full support every step of the way.

Stony Plain is a strong, resilient, and compassionate community, and to all of those coal workers I want to say this. You should be proud of your hard work, powering our province and building our communities, because we are. We want that good work to continue, so we stand ready to support you.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we have a request for unanimous consent to introduce a guest who arrived late.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly one of the newest team members in the Edmonton-Decore office, who has come into the position hitting the ground absolutely running. I don't think my team could survive without her now. She's made an incredible impact coming into our office. I would now ask Janelle Venne to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Programs for Persons with Disabilities

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This September I received a visit from a very distraught constituent in my St. Paul office. She along with others had received a letter from a local not-for-profit that funding from Alberta Health Services to the St. Paul Abilities Network, or SPAN, would not be continued and that the STRIDES program would be cancelled as of October 2017. This program directly affects the daily lives of people in our area suffering from brain injuries. The STRIDES program assists these individuals, expanding their independence through volunteering and socializing.

I immediately contacted the management at SPAN to get the facts. I was shocked to hear that we were talking about a program that costs AHS $24,000, all of this while our government went out and toured the province over Bill 203. How much did that cost? I then contacted AHS to find out why this front-line funding was being cut. Frustrated, I was told the funding was not being cut.

On November 3 I met with SPAN board members as well as an AHS representative by phone. Finally, I found out that this front-line program would be shutting down in order to divert funds to another program – and get this – because the other program could not afford to continue due to the increases in minimum wage.

In this House we warned this government about the consequences of their ideological policies like the carbon tax and minimum wage increases on not-for-profits and food banks. Now brain-injured individuals in my constituency can't gain the skills and reassert their independence.

Mr. Speaker, policy matters. This government's policy has lost common sense, and now the results are showing up. Those that need help and support the most are hardest hit. This government that vows to protect the front lines in Alberta is doing anything but. The unintended consequences of the increases to minimum wage and the carbon tax are hitting Albertans on fixed incomes and negatively impacting organizations that try to make life better for Albertans in need.

This government claims to be making life better. Go and tell that to the folks that depend on the STRIDES program.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Provincial Response to Federal Policies

Mr. Nixon: Yesterday I pointed out that the NDP had been unwilling to challenge their Trudeau Liberal allies on their constant attacks on Alberta, whether it be the taxes on small businesses, the carbon tax hike, or attacks on Alberta's constitutional right when it comes to upstream emissions. But now they will speak out when it comes to taxes on marijuana sales. The NDP have barely made a noise over two years of constant attacks from the Trudeau Liberals until now. Perhaps the NDP are seeing the errors of their way, Mr. Speaker. Here's hoping that this is the beginning of a new era, but I will say that I'm not holding my breath. Will the NDP now vocally object to the Trudeau Liberals' unacceptable tax hikes on Alberta small businesses, and will they stand up for Alberta?

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I said yesterday in answer to essentially the exact same question, our minister at the time had conversations with the federal Minister of Finance around some of the concerning elements of their plan, and we have seen that some of those elements have in fact been changed as a result. In addition, what our government has been doing with respect to small businesses is supporting them here, from the government of Alberta here in Edmonton. For instance, what we did was we brought in a 33 per cent cut in the small-business tax. That's the actual record that we are taking to Alberta small businesses, and that's why the number and the prosperity of them . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Nixon: Nearly 200,000 Albertans are currently unemployed, and many more, sadly, have quit looking for work altogether. Thousands of businesses have gone under. Tens of billions of dollars of capital have fled Alberta. The Trudeau Liberals' attacks on our province certainly aren't helping matters. They're making it worse, Mr. Speaker. But only when it might affect their bottom line does the NDP government decide to speak up. It's shameful, and Albertans deserve better. Now that the NDP have crossed the Rubicon and dared to challenge their close allies in Ottawa, will they object to the Trudeau Liberals' attack on our energy sector?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I've indicated before, our government has been standing up for Albertans with respect to the federal government and on behalf of Albertans since the moment we got elected. That's why, for instance, we have a pipeline to tidewater approved, because we've been working with the federal government. On top of that, we got them to change their position with respect to EI as a result of the job losses that we were suffering from, you know, 12 and 18 months ago. We're pursuing their support with respect to our coal transition program, that the Member for Stony Plain just talked about, and we'll . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Nixon: Two cancelled pipelines, Mr. Speaker.

Alberta does need to get a fair deal from Ottawa on the upcoming marijuana tax since it's the provinces that will bear most of the costs. But what about a fair deal for Alberta workers? What about a fair deal for Alberta's industries? Or does only the government income matter to the NDP? Why is the NDP only willing to fight the Trudeau Liberals when it's about who gets the profits taken from hard-working Albertans? When will the NDP get their priorities straight and start standing up and fighting for Alberta, start standing up and fighting for small businesses, for families, for the unemployed, for the energy sector, and for this great province? [interjections]

The Speaker: Do you want to chat, or do you want to have another question?

The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. What we will not do is grandstand in order to relitigate the fact that their leader lost the election to the Trudeau Liberals a year and a half ago. I'm sorry that they can't get over it, but they clearly are having trouble with it. What we are doing is focusing on supporting Albertans. You know what? It's working. Over 70,000 jobs have been created since last June, housing starts are up, manufacturing is up, growth is up. We are leading the country now because of the work that we are doing focused on Albertans, not focused on yelling at Ottawa.

The Speaker: Second main question.

Provincial Policy on Illicit Drugs

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, on to another apparent priority of this government. Yesterday my colleague from Calgary-West asked about the Associate Minister of Health's public musing regarding decriminalization of hard drugs, drugs like fentanyl, heroin, and crystal meth. The Member for Calgary-West clearly asked whether the minister would back away from her reckless speculation. The minister responded with this: "no plans . . . at this time." At this time. Will the Premier denounce her minister's irresponsible and dangerous comments?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, what I will do is denounce the member opposite's reckless characterization of what the associate minister said. What I will further say, as the minister yesterday said, is that there is absolutely no plan of any type, not now, not in the past, not in the future, to legalize hard drugs. The member opposite spreading misinformation as though that were a true thing is profoundly irresponsible. We have real problems to address in this province, and it's about time they start focusing on them.

Mr. Nixon: When hundreds of Albertans are dying at the hands of hard drugs, this is what the NDP are talking about, Mr. Speaker. It's outrageous. And this from the minister that is supposedly responsible for handling the fentanyl crisis. I've personally seen the toll these hard drugs take, and I can tell you that making these drugs more available will not help. Will the government clearly state that it is against the decriminalization of hard drugs, including in the future, none of this "at this time" hedging and that type of stuff, make it extremely clear, and apologize for the minister's comments?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health and Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the member expected a different answer, but the thing is that you actually have to listen to the answer that the Premier gives. She made it very clear that we have no interest in working to decriminalize possession of illegal drugs. The designation of legal or illegal drugs is a federal responsibility. Again, they're spending all of their time wanting to argue with Ottawa. We're spending our time focused on Albertans. We're making life better. We're increasing access to services. It's about time that the members opposite started focusing on Alberta, too.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, let's be clear. What we just watched the Premier do in this question was deny what her associate minister said in the press. It is a clear quote from her associate minister that the Premier is dodging. This is the question on behalf of Albertans: will the Premier step back from her associate minister's comments, apologize for what her associate minister is saying, and make it clear to Albertans that the NDP do not support decriminalization of hard drugs?

Ms Hoffman: We do not support the decriminalization of hard drugs, Mr. Speaker. We've made that clear. The members opposite keep trying to whip up things and create discord, but on this side of the House we treat . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Please continue.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On this side of the House we look at the public health crisis, and we are finding ways to address it instead of trying to stigmatize and scare people about what may or may not happen. We're working with patients. We're working with their families. We respect them, and we are fighting to save their lives.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Provincial Fiscal Policies and Disposable Income

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, we recently learned some very troubling data from Statistics Canada. Last year Albertans saw their disposable income drop by an astounding 7.4 per cent. Alberta was last in Canada by far. Saskatchewan only saw a drop of .8 per cent. When Albertans were already down, the NDP's only solution was to hike taxes, killing business and taking more money from Albertans. The NDP doesn't want to talk about their track record of devastation; they want to talk about anything else. Will the NDP take any responsibility at all for the drop in Albertans' disposable income?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, as I just outlined, in fact, we know that Alberta families were suffering as a result of the price drop for oil. We know that that caused a lot of hardship. What our government did was we made a choice. We made a choice to stand with Albertans, to stand behind them, to not take a bad situation and make it worse. That's why we invested in Alberta, and now we're seeing results: over 70,000 new jobs since last June, when those statistics were calculated, housing starts up, housing sales up, manufacturing sales up, retail sales up, small-business confidence up, and it . . .

2:00

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, their choices drove $40 billion worth of investment out of Alberta.

Just six weeks from now the NDP has another big tax hike planned for Albertans. That's right. Albertans can look forward to a 50 per cent hike to its carbon tax. From fuelling your car to putting food on the table, the carbon tax hits them all. The NDP has even planned a massive 75 per cent tax on home heating in the middle of winter, no less. Given the documented disastrous effects of the NDP policy and the StatsCan report will the NDP give Albertans an early Christmas present and put a hold on the massive 50 per cent tax hike?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, what I can say we will do is that we will continue after January to be overall the lowest taxed province in the country. In addition to that, we will also be the province that for the second year in a row leads the country in economic growth. On top of that, we will continue our record of building and creating more jobs, 70,000 since June of last year. We will continue to have Albertans' backs. We will protect their important public services. We will make life more affordable. We will make life better for them. Thank goodness we were in charge when the recession hit because it wouldn't look that way if these guys had had their way.

Mr. McIver: You're right. It wouldn't look that way, Mr. Speaker. The tax advantage has shrunk dramatically, and we've got to get rid of them before it's zero.

Albertans are hurting, and the NDP is only making a bad situation worse. It's sadly ironic that when Ottawa threatens to take a cut out of the government's income, the Finance minister goes to the mat, but when the NDP or the federal government takes money out of Albertans' wallets, crickets from this government. Will the NDP get its priorities straight, stop allowing Albertans to get attacked without defence, and stand up for them instead of just for your own treasury? Families matter, too, Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, I think I've just answered that question – I don't know – about five or six times this week already. Nonetheless, the members opposite talk about what they think we're doing wrong, but they won't come clean on what they're talking about. Their leader is talking about a 20 per cent cut to the budget. Do you know what that would do to our schools? Do you know how many thousands of teachers would be laid off? Do you know how big class sizes would get? Do you know how many people, how much longer the wait-lists would be in our hospitals and for surgeries? [interjections]

The Speaker: Please.

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, that kind of reckless, irresponsible approach to managing our budget would hurt Albertans and hurt Alberta families, and it will not happen on our watch. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. minister.
Calgary-Elbow.

Dementia Care

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Last spring I asked the Minister of Health why Alberta lags the country on dementia care. I asked when we would see a provincial dementia strategy and the funding that goes along with it. In June she promised that we would see a strategy in the next couple of weeks. In September she said that it's coming soon. Albertans are still waiting. To the Minister of Health: where is the dementia strategy, when will we see it, and why is it taking so long?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. We know how difficult it can be for families when they themselves or somebody they care about is struggling with dementia or other types of mental conditions that impact their ability to recall. We know how heartbreaking that is. That's why we're working with our front-line providers as well as with community partners to increase resources. The dementia strategy is definitely a work-in-progress. I want to make sure that we get it right, and I will be happy to table it in this House when we do.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, more long-term care beds, we know, are desperately needed, but that is only one aspect of dementia care. Seventy-one per cent of people with mild or moderate dementia live at home. There are remarkable people working in the community to improve the lives of everyone impacted by dementia, and while this work has tremendous meaning, without a provincial strategy they can only do so much. These are the people who spent so much of their time providing input into a draft strategy, that already exists. Again to the Minister of Health. You were handed that draft strategy back in the summer of 2015. Why haven't you implemented it, will you, and when?

The Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and again to the member for the question. Like him, I want to make sure that we have all of the right supports in our communities and that we're protecting and strengthening public health care. I hope that's what he believes, anyway. Time will tell. It's important that we make sure that we have those resources and that when we have the strategy, it's the right strategy. The department did receive it. They've done some work with the contributors, and they're working to make sure that it has the fulsomeness that we all expect. I look forward to that being the case and being able to share it in this House in, hopefully, short order.

Mr. Clark: But with respect, Mr. Speaker, how does the government know what they're doing or why they're doing it if there is no strategy? Albertans are struggling, and the cost of doing nothing is high. People living with dementia can't get the supports they need at home, they have difficulty navigating the system, and their families and caregivers are struggling to support loved ones. Ontario committed $100 million to their dementia strategy and an additional $20 million to improve respite care for unpaid care partners. Again to the Minister of Health I will ask one more time: will we ever see a provincial dementia strategy, and if we do, will it come with the funding necessary to have an impact?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member again for the question. We definitely have tabled many pieces of finance bills in this House. You know, it's been interesting to see what the opposition's record is when it comes to funding public health care properly. We continue to work with our partners. We continue to make sure that we're protecting health care. We've done a number of initiatives. Alberta Health Services last year launched 811, the Health Link number. You can speak to a certified nurse who can help you with accessing these specific resources and so forth. We're supporting the community agencies. We'll continue to do so. When it comes to budget time, I really hope that members opposite put their money where their mouth is because, absolutely, we plan on protecting and strengthening public . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Emergency Medical Worker Supports

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Emergency medical services workers provide an incredibly important service to Albertans, often when they need it most. EMS personnel respond to dangerous, often life-threatening situations in order to literally save lives. Given the dangerous conditions that EMS staff work in every day, to the Minister of Health: how is the government ensuring that EMS workers receive health and occupational health and safety protections?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. I was fortunate to meet with some incredible paramedics earlier today. EMS personnel work tirelessly to protect and save the lives of others, often at the greatest risk themselves. One of the issues raised today was the high injury rate for paramedics. That's why I'm proud that we're working with paramedics to invest $20 million to equip more than 350 ambulances with power stretchers to help EMS workers lift people safely without injury to themselves.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. EMS workers are also exposed to significant trauma and work in stressful conditions. To the same minister: how is the government caring for EMS workers who are suffering from posttraumatic stress disorder, or PTSD?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Without a doubt, EMS workers deal with some of the most horrific and difficult trauma scenes imaginable. I want them to know that we recognize their hardships. We have worked to ensure that paramedics have access to trauma counsellors and training supports, and we recently announced Canada's first accredited facility dog program, giving EMS personnel therapy dogs to help after traumatic events. We know that there's more to do, and we thank them for coming to the call and being there with ideas as well.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. EMS workers are part of an integrated response to an emergency. Doctors, nurses, and other health professionals are part of a co-ordinated response to an individual in crisis. To the same minister: is the government supporting the role of EMS workers as an integral part of the health system's response to an emergency?

Ms Hoffman: Absolutely, Mr. Speaker. EMS crews are a vital link in our health care system both as first responders and as medical practitioners in the community. We changed the scope and practice of paramedics so that they can treat patients directly on the scene, giving better care to Albertans closer to home and sometimes in their home. You know what won't help? EMS will not be helped if Jason Kenney moves forward. His 20 per cent proposed cut to health care would lead to skyrocketing wait times, trauma to those workers, and trauma to the Albertans who rely on them. Instead, we believe in giving our health care workers the tools, support, and resources so they can do more, not less.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mountain View.

Methane Gas Monitoring

Dr. Swann: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This province is full of hot air when it comes to the NDP pledge of a 45 per cent reduction in methane gas emissions by 2025. The Alberta Energy Regulator fails to reliably monitor the amount of leakage from Alberta's 400,000 oil and gas sites, and industry is underreporting by between 60 and 360 per cent, according to independent studies. To the environment minister: how can Albertans trust that your government will meet the target when it has no credible measures?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy.

2:10

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, when we discuss methane regulations, we're proud to work alongside industry for a made-in-Alberta solution to plan to cut methane pollution by 45 per cent. We'll soon be announcing next steps in our balanced plan, that will protect jobs while reducing pollution. We do know what's at stake. It's jobs, but it's also the health of our children and our grandchildren, and we take that job very seriously.

Dr. Swann: It requires independent science, Mr. Speaker.

Methane also leaks into groundwater. For example, Encana's coal-bed methane exploration in Rosebud in 2006 was alleged to have contaminated drinking water, forcing expensive studies. It's still before the courts. The NDP has missed another opportunity to prevent similar disasters with shale gas activity by failing to require baseline groundwater testing before industrial activity. To the Energy minister: when will you hold industry accountable by requiring baseline groundwater testing for all shale gas wells?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, we're using facts, science, and innovation to develop a balanced plan, the approach that will create the best conditions for the oil and gas sector using innovation and implementing new technologies. These draft regulations that I mentioned will be available soon. There's going to be plenty of time for feedback, and I invite all members opposite to be part of that feedback loop.

Dr. Swann: Without baseline testing, Mr. Speaker, nobody knows what's going on under there.

As if the lack of monitoring of methane gas leakage in the atmosphere and groundwater is not enough, the NDP also eliminated the independent monitoring agency and relies solely on the Alberta Energy Regulator, which is entirely funded by industry. All of this makes NDP promises of better environmental stewardship ring a bit hollow. What is the government doing differently to ensure credible, independent monitoring of methane in our air and water?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I mentioned earlier, we're working alongside not just industry but environment groups and all kinds of groups involved with the oil and gas industry to develop a plan. But when our hon. colleague there mentions hot air, what we hear from the opposite side is not to get a made-in-Alberta plan. They want an Ottawa-imposed plan. They don't want us to use science or innovation to tackle that. They want us to create uncertainty about Alberta's industry so that we will get an imposed plan. On this side of the House we're standing up for an Alberta-made plan, and we're going to get that plan done.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

FOIP Request Process

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, Albertans want to know what this government is hiding. While this secretive government pays lip service to openness and transparency, they offer gift cards to mass-delete e-mails, and their key advisers are interfering with access to information. Yesterday this government refused to condemn political interference by the Premier's former chief of staff in the FOIP system. In fact, the minister casually dismissed our questions. Now that the minister has had a chance to review the documents, does the minister wish to change her answer?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We've reviewed the matter in question and continue to be confident that Mr. Heaney's actions were in line with the law and best practices on handling FOIP requests. We take Albertans' right to access information very seriously. We continue to improve turnarounds for FOIP requests and are proactively sharing more information with the public than ever before.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, given that in April 2014 the Government House Leader, while in opposition, felt that simply a political staffer reviewing a FOIP request was enough to make accusations of political interference in the process and given that the Premier's former chief of staff intervened to outright stop the release of information that was deemed legitimate by trained FOIP officers, would the Government House Leader agree that Mr. Heaney's action, without a doubt, constitutes political interference in the FOIP system, or has a seat in government changed his mind?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Since day one we have been working to make this government more open, transparent, and accountable to Albertans. In fact, we're the first government in Alberta's history to post the salaries and contracts of all the Premier's and ministerial offices' staff. Again, we take Albertans' right to access information very seriously, and we'll continue to do so as we go forward.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, given that this government takes access to information so seriously that they continue to allow the former chief of staff's action that directly interfered with the release of information that was deemed appropriate by FOIP officers, will the minister commit to a full investigation of what is clearly a breach in the law?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We very much believe that Albertans deserve honesty and transparency, which is why we're working to make government open and transparent. We're proactively sharing more information than ever before. We're hiring more employees to clear up the FOIP backlog. In contrast, Mr. Kenney won't disclose his campaign contributions. He's keeping his plan a secret and would make reckless cuts and fire front-line staff. We absolutely will continue to ensure Albertans get the honesty and transparency they deserve from the government sitting on this side of the House.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Children's Services Concerns

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. An employee of Alberta Children's Services who was operating an unlicensed day care is facing child pornography charges. This employee of the province works in a department tasked with looking after our most vulnerable children and is being charged with multiple child pornography charges. To the Minister of Children's Services: have you initiated an internal investigation to the alleged activities within your department, and is the department fully co-operating with the police?

The Speaker: Proceed.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If concerns are ever raised about the conduct of our employees, we take every concern extremely seriously and act quickly so that Albertans know we are doing whatever we can to support their safety and well-being. We are committed to co-operating fully with police as they continue their investigation and providing whatever assistance is required to ensure that all young people are safe.

The Speaker: Could I seek an opinion from the Justice minister? The line of questioning: is it sub judice with respect to the criminal charges that may be pending?

Ms Ganley: Mr. Speaker, I think I'd say for now that that first question related to an internal investigation.

The Speaker: Thank you.
First supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister for the answer. Given that all the employees of the province receive a criminal record check before being hired and given that youth workers in the not-for-profit sector have to have a vulnerable-sector screening, to the Minister of Children's Services: does every single employee in your department also have a vulnerable-sector screening, and if not, why not?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. All new Children's Services hires are subject to pre-employment checks, including a criminal record, vulnerable-sector check, and a check in our internal case information system. Employees are also subject to background checks again when they change jobs or are promoted. Once again, we are doing whatever we can to support the safety and well-being of Alberta's children.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hope that that is grandfathered to existing workers as well.

Given that the 2016 corporate employee survey showed that in the former superministry of human services only 45 per cent of employees felt that essential information flows effectively from senior leadership to staff and given that many of the people in this House have spent almost a year now attending meetings of the child intervention panel and recommendations should be coming forward soon, does the minister have confidence that her department has the ability to communicate critical information and protect the children that they are tasked with protecting?

The Speaker: Thank you.
The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Absolutely. Since becoming the Minister of Children's Services, I've made tremendous efforts to reach out to front-line staff from right across this province, recognizing how important it is to learn from them about what their front-line experience is. I continue to work with senior leadership within the ministry at all levels to ensure that we work together to ensure that information flows as easily as possible and to recognize that that's beneficial to the commitment that every single one of us shares to making sure that the children of this province are safe.

The Speaker: Thank you.

NAFTA Negotiations

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, in 2016 Alberta industries exported $68 billion in goods and services to the United States. Maintaining a strong trade position with the U.S. is vital to the success of Alberta's economy, which is why we must ensure that Alberta's voice is strong and steadfast at the table where NAFTA is renegotiated. To the minister of economic development: what assurances have you obtained from the federal government that Alberta's trade-exposed industries will be protected during the NAFTA renegotiations?

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, on behalf of the minister of economic development I can assure the member that this government is very active in promoting Alberta's interests both as a government on its own but also by representations to the federal government. In terms of the specifics that he would like to know with regard to these negotiations, I will take it under advisement and provide him with the information at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, given that roughly 86 per cent of Alberta's exports go to the United States, making the NAFTA negotiations imperative for the success and viability of Alberta's economy, and given that the federal Liberals have already demonstrated wilful negligence with respect to Alberta's economy by killing two pipelines and given that there are far more seats and votes for the federal Liberals in Ontario and Quebec than there ever will be in Alberta, again to the minister: what are you doing to ensure Alberta is not sold down the river in exchange for favourable concessions for Quebec and Ontario?

Mr. Mason: Well, Mr. Speaker, once again, the Official Opposition is trying to pit Alberta against everybody else in the world and in the country. It's not helpful, because we've taken a very strong position with the federal government, and they know that we've advocated very strongly for pipelines, for protection of Alberta's industries, including softwood lumber. All of those things have been top priorities for our minister of economic development and for the government as a whole. Unlike the opposition, we want to work constructively with our partners in the United States and the Canadian government and right across the country in order to further Alberta's interests. They could learn from that.

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, just take your social licence with you.

Given that the United States is a key export for Alberta markets and given that organizations such as the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers and the Alberta Wheat Commission have indicated that they are in favour of the status quo and given that the federal government seems more interested in image politics and virtue signalling, not unlike our government, than actually getting a deal which is good for Alberta and Canada, again to the minister: how are you ensuring that Alberta's best interests and not the Liberal's style-over-substance machine are being represented at the NAFTA negotiation table?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I think if the hon. member had a social licence it might be taken away for reckless driving. We're working very closely with the federal government on the negotiations. The American position has been very, very tough, and the Canadian position I think has been equally tough. We believe that by working with the federal government, we can protect Alberta's interests. By attacking everybody that doesn't live in this province as the opposition does, all we do is isolate Alberta and set our interests back. That's not what this government does. We stand up for Alberta and for Alberta jobs and for Alberta exports.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Carbon Levy Increase

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Merry Christmas, Alberta. January 1, 2018, will mark a 50 per cent increase in the carbon tax, that means nearly 30 cents in excise taxes on every litre of gasoline, 25 cents in excise taxes on every litre of diesel, and a 50-cent tax increase on every single gigajoule of natural gas to heat our homes. Can the Minister of Energy describe how increasing the cost of fuel for vehicles and heating our homes is making life better for Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we are moving forward in this province with building Alberta and with a climate leadership plan that has secured us two pipelines. We are recycling those revenues back into things like, for example, cutting the small-business tax by a third. We're also doing things like investing in the Calgary green line and making sure that we lower our greenhouse gas emissions, create 20,000 jobs while we do so, and grow the economy in Calgary. That's the way we're going to move this province forward, and we're going to make sure that we have a made-in-Alberta plan, not made in Ottawa, to do it.

Mr. MacIntyre: Given that over 70 per cent of homes in Alberta are heated by natural gas, meaning a significant increase in cost for families right across the board, and given that estimates of increased direct and indirect costs due to this upcoming carbon tax hike range anywhere from $500 to $1,000 per family, knowing this, why is the NDP still pursuing a policy that hurts families and makes Alberta much less competitive?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, two-thirds of Albertans do receive a rebate for their average use of CO₂ in a year, CO₂ that causes climate change. I will bring us back to the news conference that I did on January 2 . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Stop the clock.
Keep going.

Ms Phillips: . . . of this year, where that hon. member stood in his place and denied the science of climate change. He did it over and over again. You know what? On this side of the House we embrace reality. We're going to move this province forward.

Mr. MacIntyre: Given that this government clearly expects Alberta tradesmen to lug their tools around in Smart cars and scooters or face punitive costs at the pump and given that just a few short years ago Alberta had some of the lowest fuel excise taxes in the country but now, under the NDP, citizens in the heartland of agriculture, oil, and gas will be paying the third-highest fuel tax in the country, will this government be considerate to Alberta families and small businesses and delay implementing this unreasonable carbon tax increase?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member asked the question about affordability, which is why we are providing two-thirds of Albertans with a carbon levy rebate. We are also eliminating a number of school fees, making life more affordable for thousands of families, in particular in Calgary. We have frozen tuition. We have invested in child care. We have capped electricity rates. We have introduced a new child benefit. You know what else we've done? We've made life more affordable by raising the minimum wage for our most vulnerable workers, including women. On this side of the House we believe that sustainability means taking care of our neighbours, and we will get it done.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Workers' Compensation for First Responders with PTSD

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Every day Albertans rely on first responders such as firefighters to stay calm and use their training to make life-saving decisions for us in life-threatening situations. Not surprisingly, they experience high levels of posttraumatic stress disorder as a result of the situations they attend to. To the Minister of Labour. It's been brought to my attention that the current Workers' Compensation Board claim process for PTSD is causing more harm than good. Why isn't a more modern and thoughtful approach being taken when evaluating these claims?

The Speaker: The Minister of Labour and democratic renewal.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The member opposite is asking about the processes at the Workers' Compensation Board. I'm very proud to be able to say that we initiated the first review of the Workers' Compensation Board in 15 years to make sure that we have a system that is sustainable, that is providing rehabilitation services for workers. Part of the recommendations that the panel we created provided were around presumptive coverages for PTSD as well as the processes at the Workers' Compensation Board. We continue to review the report received by the panel and work to make a better Workers' Compensation Board system for all Albertans.

Ms McPherson: Given that the 2012 change to WCB legislation was designed to make it easier for first responders to seek treatment for PTSD, can the minister please explain why firefighters who are seeking treatment for PTSD are being required to get a second and a third opinion as to whether or not they meet the diagnostic requirement?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. When someone is insured at work or someone suffers from PTSD that has been caused because of their work, we need to know that they are getting fair compensation, that they're getting help to get back onto the job and to be able to return to work safely. That is the purpose of our Workers' Compensation Board system. Initiating the first review in 15 years was an important part of our government's commitment to making sure that we have a Workers' Compensation Board system that fits all Albertans, is sustainable, and offers fair rehabilitation. Making sure that workers are receiving the care that they deserve is a priority . . .

2:30

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Ms McPherson: Given that having to repeatedly relate the experiences that lead to PTSD without the benefit of a therapeutic relationship actually further traumatizes a person and given that the WCB published a fact sheet in February of this year detailing that PTSD is a presumptive disorder for first responders, again to the Minister of Labour: when can we expect that the WCB will stop the practice of compelling first responders to seek multiple assessments for PTSD, further damaging their mental health and discouraging their colleagues from coming forward?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Making sure that firefighters and first responders are able to access the presumptive coverage that they are entitled to is very important. I am concerned to hear that there are firefighters who feel that they are not able to access presumptive coverage for PTSD. Making sure that we have a strong WCB system is why I did do something, why I enacted the first review of the WCB in 15 years. The previous government let the system languish. I'm very proud to be taking action to make sure that all Alberta workers can receive rehabilitation, to make sure that we have a sustainable system going . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Kenow Wildfire Response

Mr. Stier: Mr. Speaker, the Kenow fire that occurred in Waterton Park and areas of the MD of Pincher Creek has raised many questions about the emergency response by a coalition of area landowners. These residents have grave concerns regarding communication difficulties, fire preparedness, and the lack of proper notification. Therefore, this group is requesting a formal inquiry into the events surrounding this fire as it relates to all of the government agencies involved. To the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry. Previous wildfire events have led to such inquiries. Will your ministry be conducting a formal inquiry that covers all aspects of the Kenow fire, and if not, why not?

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the important question. While it is true that we've had, you know, some wildfires in the southeast corner of the province, overall we've had a very good fire season, with only 15 per cent of the 10-year average of fires, so only 15 per cent of that. Our firefighters have been doing a fantastic job. Their presuppression efforts have been, bar none, some of the best in the world. I'm very proud of our firefighters and the excellent work that they have done.

Mr. Stier: Mr. Speaker, I'm not sure if he answered the question about my formal inquiry.

Given that there were several different government entities involved in this event, including the forestry ministry, Environment and Parks, Parks Canada, the MD of Pincher Creek, and the Alberta Emergency Management Agency, and given that landowner questions remain mostly unanswered by the various agencies, to the Minister of Municipal Affairs: will your ministry, which includes the Alberta Emergency Management Agency, have a key role to play in an inquiry into the Kenow fire, and to what extent does it have any responsibility to see that this results in a report being completed?

The Speaker: The Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Wildfires are always scary, and we empathize with anyone who lost property or livestock as a result. I'm immensely proud of the first responders who fought these fires, both their own wildland firefighters and the many municipal firefighters who helped protect homes and businesses. Officials from the AEMA are in constant contact with affected municipalities and local leaders, and always after an incident such as this they work together to analyze what happened after the experience in order to continue to make the services that we deliver better after every single event. We will learn from this experience. We'll continue to move forward. But in the meantime an incredibly . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Stier: Well, Mr. Speaker, we're still not getting an answer to the request for a formal inquiry.

Given that the various local government agencies directly involved in your emergency response to the Kenow fire have not yet been able to provide any clear details on a formal inquiry and given that the affected residents have some very serious concerns and questions on this incident and given that the ministries involved will hopefully conduct an inquiry at some point, to the forestry minister again: are you prepared to meet with these local concerned landowners and also provide an opportunity for public input into the questions at public meetings yet to be held, and if so, when and where might they be?

The Speaker: The Minister of Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question and the suggestion. I think it's a worthwhile suggestion, and I'll most certainly look into it, talk to my officials to see what we can learn from this. In every experience in wildfire season we do learn something. I am proud of the co-operation between the various government departments, between the municipal departments that does take place. In every emergency situation, wildfires or not, there will be something to learn, and I will most certainly take his suggestions into consideration.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Farm and Ranch Worker Regulation Consultation

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A few weeks ago the government announced that it was going to begin public consultations on the OHS recommendations from the technical working groups as part of the farm and ranch workplace legislation. These online and other consultations will take 11 weeks, ending mid-January. It's also been reported that the government has sat on these recommendations for seven months and are just now releasing all the technical information, which means they were completed about the same time as the labour and employment standards working groups. Minister, why the delay?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm very proud of the work that our government has done to ensure the rights of farm workers in Alberta and that they have the same protections that farm workers across the country have had for years. We've received, with gratitude, the work of the technical working groups. The OHS groups spent significant time because it is technical information. We needed to take time to review the recommendations of the technical working groups as well as translating that into plain-language summaries so that when we went out to talk to farmers and ranchers during a time when they would have time to be able to respond, they would be able to respond to all the recommendations.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Given that the hon. Minister of Labour stated that the delay was due to harvest but the report was completed in March or April, long before the normal harvest, which is when these OHS working groups' recommendations were completed, Minister, what is the real reason your government delayed the release of almost 200 pages of technical details seven months after completion but are only giving farmers and the public less than three months to consult on these recommendations?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We promised Albertans that prior to making any changes to the regulations, they would have an opportunity to review those recommendations and provide their feedback, and we have followed through on that promise. All of the technical working group reports are now posted online. As well, we've taken the time to do a plain-language summary to be able to assist farmers and ranchers when reviewing this information. Making sure that we are having safe workplaces and that we are making life better for farm and ranch workers is a priority for this government. Jason Kenney and the Conservatives would not be supportive of this work and . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Given that it's a given that the government is desperately trying to give the impression that it believes in proper consultation and given that we have seen time and time again that the approach is all sizzle and no steak, Minister, given that you will be introducing the OHS bill later in this session, wasn't the seven-month delay nothing more than to give your department time to work on your bill in such a way as to make passing farm and ranch safety regulations easier in 2018?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, that question had a lot to chew on, but I wouldn't have called it steak in that case. I'm very proud of the work that our government has been doing to ensure that farm workers in Alberta have the same rights and protections that farm workers across the country have had for years. So thank you to the technical working groups and all who participated, and I'd like to thank the farmers and ranchers, the owners and operators, who are right now giving us their very valuable feedback into the draft regulations and the technical working group recommendations. Their work is appreciated. I will continue to do everything I can to keep Alberta's workers safe and to engage with Albertans about these important changes.

Advanced Placement Courses for Rural Students

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, I am proud to represent many gifted, ambitious students. Recently one of those students came to me, concerned that she was not able to take any advanced placement classes as a student based in a rural area because there was no online programming offered. Advanced placement is an internationally recognized program that prepares students to experience college- or university-level courses while enrolled in high school. Given that AP programming is offered through Edmonton and Calgary schools, can the Minister of Education please provide clarity on why equal opportunity is not being granted to children that live in rural areas?

2:40

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you very much for the question. Certainly, it's important to look for equity in programming and so forth in all of our schools around the province. I was just up in the hon. member's constituency last week, with very engaged parent groups and teachers as well. Certainly, it's important to look for choices that people can have for their students in all corners of the province, so I'd be very interested in pursuing this further. I think it's a very important thing to point out, and I thank him for that.

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of Education released a statement touting that dual-credit programs are available to every corner of the province. Given that specialized programming such as advanced placement is offered in urban centres and given that all Alberta students should have access to programs that allow them educational enrichment opportunities and the ability to get a head start in postsecondary education, can the minister please tell me if there is currently programming in place to empower ambitious students in rural areas to participate in high school programs such as advanced placement, and if not, why not?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again, thank you for pointing this out to me. I mean, it's interesting that, in fact, the school board in the hon. member's area also is providing the distance learning programming here in the province, so certainly we can work together with Pembina Hills to perhaps pursue this further. I certainly know the advanced placement programming very well. I used to teach it before I was elected here. It's very worth while, and it would be worth while to look for ways by which we could provide it to all students in the province.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Giving our rural high school students a head start on their postsecondary education is crucially important. Given that we live in a technologically advanced world and given the growing prevalence of educational platforms that are now being offered through online or distance learning and since advanced placement programming is not offered in rural communities directly, when will the Minister of Education commit to rural communities to provide equal access to programming?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, we've been working to achieve equity in programming across the province. Like the hon. member mentioned, I'm putting in a long-term, stable way by which to provide dual-credit funding for everybody in all corners of the province. You know, I was just up a few months ago in the hon. member's area at Neerlandia school, a very nice new school. We took a very bumpy road down to Westlock. Neerlandia school would not have been built and that bumpy road would stay bumpy if you took 20 per cent out of the GOA budget as the UCP would be doing if they ever got elected. I don't think that's going to happen. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order.

Hon. members, in 30 seconds we will continue with Members' Statements.

Statement by the Speaker

Interrupting Members' Statements

The Speaker: Hon. members, just to remind you, it's been a long-standing practice in the House that when members' statements are made, comments and observations or thoughts are not to be expressed at that time. There were one or two earlier in the session today where that was not the case, so I continue to ask you to respect each other for the two-minute period.

Residential School Intergenerational Impacts

Mr. Hinkley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Between 1880 and the 1990s in Canada some 150,000 indigenous children between the ages of four and 16 were placed in residential schools, where they would be away from their families for 10 months a year. Living conditions were often poor, and many suffered from physical and sexual abuse. In fact, some 6,000 children died at these schools, and more died of exposure trying to escape. There were 25 such schools in Alberta.

In 2015 the Truth and Reconciliation Commission presented 94 calls to action for Canadians to help rectify this dark chapter in our history. Alberta is committed to using the United Nations declaration on the rights of indigenous peoples as a framework for reconciliation. The government of Alberta's approach to implementing the principles of the UN declaration, inclusive of the TRC's calls to action, directly includes indigenous participation. We are implementing a number of the truth and reconciliation calls to action.

Government has supported the National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls. Government has also directed the development of an indigenous cultural awareness program, which will focus on learning about treaties, residential schools, and the historical and contemporary experiences of indigenous Albertans. Alberta Education is enhancing curriculum to provide additional opportunities for students to learn about indigenous histories, perspectives, cultures, and contributions.

Budget 2017 included $120 million for off-reserve housing, $100 million to ensure that more First Nation communities have access to clean and safe drinking water, and millions to help indigenous peoples participate in Alberta's climate leadership plan.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that the harmful effects of the residential school system on indigenous communities will last generations, but I am proud to be part of a government that is finally moving forward in the right direction.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Government Policies

Mr. Gottfried: Mr. Speaker, I try to live by the principle of disagreeing without being disagreeable, but frankly I'm struggling under the weight, record, and actions of the Alberta NDP. Nothing personal, but in the style of a great Canadian hero, Rex Murphy: never waste a good rant.

I committed myself to public service with many goals and objectives for a better Alberta. I believe it is the responsibility of my generation to hand the baton of the future of our great province to the next generation better than we found it, full of hope, optimism, prosperity, and a compassionate society that allows each and every Albertan to reach their full potential, free from the shackles of paternalistic, self-righteous ideology and what I have come to view as business-decimating, investment-repelling, job-killing policies and what I once characterized as anti-Albertan, but I'll now reframe that as antiprosperity in the name of political correctness, which I'm not universally recognized for.

How did I come to such conclusions? Let me count the ways: an overreaching, anticompetitive, environmentally immeasurable carbon tax; a punitive minimum wage that hurts those it purports to help; irresponsible coal shutdown, decimating an industry, towns, people, and short-circuiting a technology play and export opportunity; turning the Balancing Pool into a borrowing pool, where we may drown in yet more red ink; social licence that acts like a learner's permit, unlikely to make it past the graduated licence phase with a limited number of passengers, home before midnight, and still zero tolerance from the authorities who issued it; playing croquet with federal Liberals, Lotus Land NDP, and envirocrusaders like Berman, Mahon, and Hudema, when Albertans truly need us to play a little hardball; supersonic flight of $35 billion in foreign investment; a debt burden that will take generations of austerity to repay.

Mr. Speaker, I rest my case. Is this the baton we wish to hand to future generations? I think not and encourage all of us in this House and, indeed, all Albertans to reject this reckless and irresponsible path and demand a return to the Alberta advantage.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Technology and Economic Development

Ms Luff: Thank you. Everywhere I've been over the last four months, whether it be the Pacific NorthWest Economic Region summit or Calgary Economic Development outlook 2018, I've heard variations on one theme, disruption. Alberta experienced a profound disruption in its economy with the global collapse in the price of oil and is currently adapting to a new normal, where oil is hovering at half of what it once was. We are living in a time of unprecedented speed of technological improvements, and we need to be adaptive enough in our economy that we take advantage of these technologies rather than being left behind.

Whether it's self-driving cars, artificial intelligence, or decentralization of electricity production, the world 10 years from now is going to look a whole lot different than it does right now, and it's going to affect the way that we work. Recent reports suggest that more than 40 per cent of jobs are likely to be affected by automation and advanced technologies over the next 20 years. Todd Hirsch, the chief economist for ATB, noted that in times of economic crisis humans have a tendency to want to just go back, go back to a time when things were okay. However, most of us know that this isn't possible. We must embrace the talents and skills of our people and look to the future.

Calgary and Alberta are full of entrepreneurs who are shaking things up and embracing the new economy. Prefabricated self-designed interiors like those that DIRT produces are revolutionizing the way that we build things. Cask canning solutions invented and produces the first canning system for small breweries right in Calgary. Benevity is a global leader in workplace giving technology, and our recent bid for Amazon HQ2 showed off Calgary's creative talent at its best.

When I speak with Calgarians about the future of business in Alberta, many of them tell me that they could never vote for a party that would repeal the carbon levy, which is making their businesses more sustainable and more efficient, that the investor tax credits are making a difference in helping to attract investment, and that they appreciate our small-brewing grants.

When we look to the future, it's high tech, it's low carbon, and it's local. We're doing it in Alberta now, and we can do more of it. We have to because going back isn't an option.

Notices of Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to give oral notice of a motion for tomorrow's Order Paper, that motion being:

Be it resolved that pursuant to Standing Order 4(1) commencing November 27, 2017, the Assembly shall meet on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday evenings for consideration of government business for the duration of the Third Session of the 29th Legislature 2017 fall sitting unless the Government House Leader notifies the Assembly that there shall be no evening sitting that day by providing notice under Notices of Motions in the daily Routine or at any time prior to 6 p.m.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At the appropriate time I intend to move the following motion pursuant to Standing Order 42:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to immediately develop a co-ordinated strategy responding to the government of Canada's recent policies that are detrimentally affecting Alberta including but not limited to the proposed amendments to the income tax legislation that impacts small businesses and its position regarding the assessment of upstream emissions that encroaches on Alberta's constitutional jurisdiction with respect to the development of Alberta's natural resources.

The Speaker: Hon. members, at the end of the Routine, Motions under Standing Order 42, we will discuss it at that point.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Bill 28 School Amendment Act, 2017

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today with great privilege to introduce the first reading of Bill 28, the School Amendment Act, 2017. This is legislation that through a series of amendments will make life better for Alberta students to strengthen our province's education system. After thorough review I've decided to propose amendments to the School Act to better reflect what needs to be done to strengthen our education system. The School Act has served Alberta students well for almost three decades, and we're confident that as a result of these amendments it will continue to do so. This legislation builds on positive existing practices and paves the way for future work that will also help students, schools, and communities.

If passed, the School Amendment Act, 2017, would pave the way for new professional standards for principals and superintendents, which would ensure that they are equipped to lead modern, inclusive schools that are prudently administered and prepare each and every student for success.

Other proposed amendments include establishing a common age of entry for students entering kindergarten, improving the process for the creation of separate school jurisdictions, authorizing the Minister of Education – that's me – to establish standards of education service agreements between First Nations and school boards in order to help close the achievement gap for indigenous students.

This bill is comprehensive and will ensure that the School Act continues to form a solid foundation for success of Alberta's kindergarten to grade 12 education system. I'm very proud and truly honoured to move first reading of Bill 28, the School Amendment Act.

[Motion carried; Bill 28 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to table five copies of Statistics Canada's job vacancy and wage survey. It shows that things are improving in Alberta, that jobs are up in the province. From the first quarter in 2016 to present job vacancies are up 11,725, meaning that more Albertans are getting back to work.

I have a second tabling. My second tabling is a letter from the town of Vegreville. It is to the Minister of Labour and minister responsible for democratic renewal and the Minister of Economic Development and Trade. It is a letter that is thanking the government for its ongoing support during its fight against the federal government over the closure of the case processing centre, and it speaks to the importance of the CARES program, the community and regional economic support program, for rural Alberta. It says that "these actions reinforce that rural Alberta remains a priority for our leaders and that our community has not been forgotten."

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the requisite five copies of two newspaper articles, one entitled Alberta Dementia Strategy Coming Soon, Health Minister Promises. That is from June 5, 2017.

A second is five copies of an article entitled Alberta Dementia Strategy Promised for This Fall, from September 18, 2017.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms Renaud: St. Albert.

The Speaker: St. Albert. Sorry.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two tablings today. The first is an article from PressProgress entitled Alberta's New Interim United Conservative Leader Was Spokesman for Group Opposed to 'Homosexual Agenda'.

The second is a copy of an open letter to Mr. Brian Jean, former leader of the Wildrose Party, entitled Wildrose Misrepresents Albertans on Official Legislature Documents – Why?

Thank you.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I rise to table three documents that I referenced in my speech earlier on Tuesday. The first document is entitled Cutting Red Tape in Canada: A Regulatory Reform Model for the United States? by Laura Jones of the Mercatus Center, George Mason University.

The second document, Mr. Speaker, is entitled Canada's Oil and Gas Sector at Risk? How Excessive Taxes and Regulations Undermine Our Competitiveness by Germain Belzile, Montreal Economic Institute.

The third document is an executive order by the President of the United States of America from February 2017 ordering the cut of two regulations for each one regulation proposed.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Yes. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to table five copies of ATB Financial's economics and research team publication titled Employment Insurance Numbers
