The right to know is added to this bill. It clarifies what type of health and safety information must be made available and how. I mean, I don't know how many members on the other side have actually attended these kinds of meetings. Every time I had gone on a site in my previous role, the first thing was that all these changes were already discussed in these safety meetings. Every organization would have a different name. We used to call them tool kit meetings. All the potential risks...

Mr. Nixon: Hazard assessments.

Mr. Gill: Yes. Hazard assessments would be done, identified, and, you know, brought to every single employee's attention. I mean, we already have all these regulations, and the employers are taking very serious steps towards these things. Now we're asking our small and medium-sized businesses to enforce these without their consultation. If the government thinks that this bill is such a godsend, why don't we hear from them? Why are we not involving them in discussions with us? Why aren't we holding town hall meetings?

My request is simple. Let's call a time out and send this bill to a committee. Let's bring in all the stakeholders so that we can get a decision which is the right decision for the people we're trying to help. The claim is that this government is working well for Alberta families. Apparently, it's not. I haven't seen one thing that this government has done except – well, I've got to give them credit. They united the conservatives, so that's a good thing. Other than that, I haven't seen that they have done one good thing for this province.

I mean, why don't we send this bill to committee?

Mr. Nixon: Nothing unites conservatives like an NDP government.

Mr. Gill: Nothing. Nothing.

You know, Madam Speaker, this guy campaigned against me, this hon. member, but now we're together. The credit goes to the NDP government, right? This is the only thing that they have probably done, united the conservative family together. But that's a separate topic. Thank you very much. Other than that, this government has not done anything good to make this province a better place to work, to raise a family, right?

When the foundation is not there – I remember that somebody sent me a tweet from a Twitter account, you know: don't let them tell you that you can't have quality health care and education and infrastructure and can't balance the budget. What happened to that now? We have, like, 75-plus billion – I don't even know; the number might be going up by tomorrow – maybe a hundred billion dollars by the time the term is done.

Going back to the same thing, this government is not listening to Albertans. This government is not listening to the stakeholders, and I don't know why. [interjections] I mean, the government members are, you know, heckling now, but when the hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster was talking to the veterinarian folks over there, we didn't hear anything. Nobody said anything against that, right? The whole request on this one is to send the bill to the committee. Send this bill to committee. Engage the stakeholders so that we can hear everything from everybody. If we need to make some changes to the OHS Act . . .

Mr. Nixon: Some would say: refer it to committee.

Mr. Gill: Refer it to committee. Sure.

With the OHS Act, the WCB Act, whatever those things are, let the stakeholders decide. I don't understand. Like, why are we not sending this to committee?

An Hon. Member: One more time.

Mr. Gill: One more time? Okay. Hold on one second. Let me find something good. Madam Speaker, just give me one second.

You know, this bill is bringing major changes and costly changes to the Workers' Compensation Act. In my opinion, that is going to make the system unsustainable. It's going to jeopardize the employment environment because it's not going to be sustained by the small and medium-sized employers.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Olds – no. That's not right. Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: That's okay, Madam Speaker. That is close to Olds. I appreciate the confusion though I do have to say that there is a considerable size difference between the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills and the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre. But he is a good guy, a good hon. member, and I don't mind being confused with him. There he is, actually, speaking of the hon. member.

Madam Speaker, I very much enjoyed the presentation by the hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway. I think that he was speaking extremely passionately about this referral motion and the need to take this bill to committee. The hon. member talked a little bit about daylight savings time and the way that this government approached that legislation and that issue compared to how this government is approaching Bill 30 and compared to how the government has approached other legislation in the past in this House.

The reason that's important – and I think he did a good job of pointing this out – is that there's a considerable difference in the way that the government proceeded with daylight savings time in the consultation. You know, they spent a considerable amount of time on that. They brought it to committee, an all-party committee that discussed that issue. They reached out to Albertans at length, had surveys, consulted, and in the end actually decided to do the opposite of what they intended to do in the first place based on that consultation, which shows that the government in that case appears to have wanted to go in a different direction.

You know, Madam Speaker, the hon. member brought up several other excellent examples. Bill 6, I think, is probably the most serious example that has faced this Legislature, an outright attack on rural communities and the family farm and, you know, not any consultation with those individuals or family farms and ranches and the people that were impacted by that legislation. We know the consequences of that.

One, you know, the NDP politically had some significant consequences in rural Alberta and probably can't come back as a result of that in rural Alberta. But the consequences to the family farms in those communities that had to go through that process – and they're still having uncertainty as a result of that process. We're concerned because these have similarities, Bill 30 and Bill 6, on the health and safety side and the occupational health and safety side.

Madam Speaker, you may not know, but the committees that are associated with or that were put together by this government as a result of Bill 6 and their attempt to quickly consult with people after they really got caught with their hands in the cookie jar, so to speak, still have not reported. There is still a tremendous amount of uncertainty on the family farms and with the agriculture community as a result of that. How is one to know that that's not what's going to happen again now as we see another occupational health and safety bill and WCB bill being forced or rammed through this House at a rapid speed?

I think the hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway did an excellent job of pointing out why we need to make sure that this bill is referred to committee. I did enjoy his comments. I hope that he will rise and elaborate a little bit on the need for consultation.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you, hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House . . .

Mr. Cooper: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Gill: The Leader of the Official Opposition. You know what? The consultation is important, and we saw that when we did it with daylight saving time. I attended a few of those town hall meetings along with members from the other side and my colleagues on this side, and people brought their concerns from the different sides, right? It was important to hear from the general public. It was important to hear from NHL teams. It was important to hear from, like, the Calgary and Edmonton airport authorities. It was important for how that bill is going to impact later on our relationships with the other jurisdictions. That's why I think it is important that if we do the same consultation procedure for this bill, maybe something good will come out of this thing. Maybe this, whatever the government is claiming, is the right thing, but we wouldn't know because we have seen the government's track record on consultation on the different bills. Albertans have seen it in the last two and a half years.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you. I didn't realize my mom was in the gallery today, clapping like that.

It's a pleasure to be here this evening and rise to speak to Bill 30 in particular, a very, very, very important motion that's before the Assembly this evening. I know, Madam Speaker, that you will know that from time to time over the past couple of years I've had the pleasure of rising to speak to motions in this place, in particular referral motions and the importance of committee. I know that the minister of economic development also from time to time has spoken on referral motions just like this. I think there was certainly a time and a space where the hon. member, the minister of economic development, believed strongly in the importance of referral motions and just the things that committee can provide in terms of adding to the democratic process. And I know that the minister of economic development rose on numerous occasions to speak for motions referring to committee.

I remember a particular time during his service in opposition when there were a couple of bills before the Assembly, and in fact they were both labour bills, bills 9 and 10. I think, Madam Speaker, you might even remember some of those pieces of legislation because they had a significant impact on public-sector employees and their pensions and otherwise. I know that you have been a diligent servant of the people over a long period of time in the public service, so it's quite likely that bills 9 and 10 would have had a direct impact upon you.

I know that the member opposite rose in this very Assembly to speak about the importance of referring those bills to committee. You'll never believe what happened. Madam Speaker, I know it's hard to believe, because rarely in this place does a piece of legislation actually get referred to committee, but on that particular occasion, the occasion of bills 9 and 10, both of those pieces of legislation, the government of the day heeded the wisdom of the Assembly and then, in fact, referred those bills to committee. Some would say that a lot of very positive things happened as a result of that decision, in particular on these important issues of labour, of employment safety, of OH and S, and of WCB.

At those committees members from all across this great province of ours had the opportunity to come and engage on an important piece of legislation that had a significant long-term impact upon the labour market, upon small and medium-sized businesses, and in that case, certainly, amongst the public service. I know that not only did the minister of economic development but the Minister of Transportation, the Minister of Education as well as the Premier all believed fully in the impact that that committee could have. Madam Speaker, I'm sure that you know what happened to bills 9 and 10 after they arrived in committee because there was significant input from the public. As it turned out, the government realized: "You know what? Maybe this isn't the best path forward." Now, there still could be some debate on whether or not it was or it wasn't, but the government of the day made that decision. One of the reasons why they made that decision is because they heard from experts from all across the province.

I know that the Minister of Labour will quite likely rise in the Assembly and say: but we've already done that; we've already consulted. The fact of the matter is, Madam Speaker, that this government spent about six weeks, if I remember correctly – or maybe it was less – speaking to their friends and colleagues about what should happen with respect to Bill 30. On numerous occasions in this House we asked as to whether or not we would see the piece of legislation tabled before the Assembly. In the early days of the session the Minister of Labour played a little bit fast and loose with whether or not we would or we wouldn't, that they were busy consulting and reassuring us that the legislation hadn't yet been written although a case probably could be made that a bill of this size would have taken more than just a couple of weeks to throw together.

Now what we see is this significant piece of legislation . . .

Mr. Gill: A hundred and forty-seven pages.

Mr. Cooper: . . . 147 pages, placed in front of the Assembly with the expectation that in just the few short days that are left in the session, barring, of course, the motion of the government to extend the session, this would quite likely be accepted.

Or perhaps even better than that and perhaps better than even sending it to committee, they could heed the advice from the Minister of Municipal Affairs, who, I believe, tabled a very significant-sized piece of legislation in one session, let it sit on the Order Paper through an entire break, then came back in the following session and, in fact, turned that legislation into law. I think that that's the sort of thing that provides for good government because it allows for feedback. It allows for input from Albertans. It allows experts – and I know that the government believes they've got all the expertise they need, and I know that the government believes they're smarter than Albertans. But the fact of the matter is, Madam Speaker, that good governance takes time, and that's one thing that committee can provide: time, a pause, if you will, a dramatic pause in the legislative process that provides an opportunity for impact and good legislation to be created. Unfortunately, I have the sense that the government actually doesn't want that. They only want what is currently in this legislation.

Madam Speaker, I'm certainly no expert – I've only been here a couple of years – but my guess is that before the end of this Legislature we'll actually come back to Bill 30 and make some adjustments to it. A good case in point for that is the fact that now for the second time we're seeing electoral legislation before the Chamber. If we had just taken time the first time to get it right, perhaps we wouldn't need to come back to this same piece of legislation.

A perfect example of that, Madam Speaker, and another good use of committee, I might add, is a piece of legislation that was put before the House – I believe it was Bill 203 – by my hon. colleague from Drumheller-Stettler, who proposed an idea around government advertising and government advertising during a by-election. Interestingly enough, we're going to see a piece of that in the legislation now. We're going to see the government actually implement some of the things from that Bill 203, that was sent to committee, and I think that there are actually going to be some positives in Bill 32 because of the work that was done at committee.

I firmly believe that that's exactly what we need to do with Bill 30: take the time, send it to committee, which is exactly what this referral motion does, and then we will have the opportunity to call in experts. Madam Speaker, I know that you will know that there are a lot of labour experts that are more than willing to share their opinion when it comes to legislation like Bill 30. I happen to also know that there are some labour lawyers here in the province of Alberta that would love to share their opinion. Not only would they like to share their opinion with members of the Assembly, but they would like to do that in a public forum. Why? So that the best legislation can be passed for the people of Alberta. While our opinions differ significantly from one side of the House to the other, I firmly believe that all members of the Assembly are efforting to do what's best for Albertans, and I believe that of the government.

Now, they take us down some pretty unique trails on their path to trying to do that. I think that they should listen to Albertans much more widely and from a wider range of Albertans, which, again, is exactly why we should go to committee with Bill 30. It allows the government not just to hear from their friends and allies but to also hear from other Albertans who may not have the same, to quote the Health minister, NDP world view. I believe that we have seen many, many, many pieces of legislation – that was a lot of "manys" – that are specifically driven by that NDP world view, and I think that a committee, in this case for Bill 30, would allow for individuals who don't subscribe so wholeheartedly to the NDP world view to be able to provide feedback to the government. In fact, we would wind up with a piece of legislation that was much more fair, that was much better – much, much better – than what we currently have. You know, Madam Speaker, I will take that phrase, "much, much better," back. It's possible that the government has this right. Not likely, but it is possible.

A committee would then allow the opportunity for us to really break down the ins and the outs of this piece of legislation, this massive piece of legislation that provides offences and penalties, that provides additional powers to the court to make directions, that talks about the boards of inquiry, the funding of organizations, and that provides in the second section amendments to the Workers' Compensation Act. I think, Madam Speaker, that going to committee is so critically important to allow workers to have a voice here within the process. I mean, we're talking about some important matters, including the right to refuse dangerous work. We've heard members of that side speak specifically about that.

You know, let me be very clear that there are good, positive pieces of legislative work inside Bill 30. Now, on the long portion of the bill there are enough significant challenges in here that I think that I personally – I would never speak on behalf of my colleagues – am quite likely to have a challenge supporting the legislation at the end of the day, but I think that there are some good things inside Bill 30, so it would give the government an opportunity, if in fact they voted in favour of the referral motion, to also speak about those things.

Albertans who have been impacted by some of the things that they're going to be correcting inside Bill 30 would have the opportunity to come and speak about those very specific issues. I often find that that is a net benefit for us all, Madam Speaker. As we look at the broad range of individuals that Bill 30 affects, both on the WCB side and on the OH and S side, we look to small and medium-sized businesses, who this bill presents a significant risk to. There will be many changes within some of the premiums that they will face. There will be some changes around how they may engage with employees.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?
The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. You got the riding right and everything tonight. That's just excellent. I do appreciate the hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills' comments. I know that earlier in the day you thought I was him, but clearly he looks nothing like me. I just want to point that out.

Anyways, I appreciate him bringing up the importance of this referral amendment that has been moved, the need for consultation in particular, bringing up his concerns with the things that he's seen in his time in this place with the government bringing forward legislation that they had not taken time to consult with people in Alberta about, the pattern of behaviour that we have seen from this NDP government and the consequences that have happened to Albertans as a whole as a result of that. I do appreciate him pointing things out like Bill 6 and the difference between how bills like Bill 6 or this bill have been treated before this place compared to daylight saving time and the fact that there seems to be a double standard.

I also do appreciate him pointing out that the government has a really bad habit, Madam Speaker, of bringing forward legislation in the final days of a sitting instead of bringing it forward at the beginning so that people could take some time to actually debate it. It's disappointing. I know his constituents. We share a county. Both the hon. member and I come from the same county that we call home. I know that we hear concerns about that often, about the government's lack of consultation, which is why this referral amendment is important. I hope the hon. member would spend some time elaborating on that.

Mr. Cooper: Yes, and what a fine county it is in the constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills. Of course, Mountain View county is the county that the hon. member refers to. Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills is where the folks from Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre come to vacation because it's just a little bit more outstanding than Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

You know, Madam Speaker, to make sure that we are very specifically speaking to the very important referral motion that's before us, I spoke briefly about Bill 203 and by-election and government announcements and that being referred to committee. I spoke about the passion that the Education minister used to have, when he was in opposition, about the use of committees and how we can really produce high-quality legislation that is better for all Albertans. I know that from time to time the government likes to talk about what the opposition would or wouldn't do, but I can assure you that the opposition takes its job very seriously when it comes to ensuring that we get the best pieces of legislation possible. I think that it's very important that we do that work, that we do our due diligence and ensure that the legislation receives the due diligence that it deserves.

I don't know what's going to happen tomorrow, but I can only speculate that we'll be having more conversations quite like this with respect to other pieces of legislation that we've seen this government ramming through at the end of a session, morning, noon, and night, you know, introducing pieces of legislation that are 146 pages and then another one that's 200 pages long, all introduced in the dying days of a session, all with the singular purpose of not providing the opposition with the best opportunity to do their jobs. Oftentimes governments will do this. We see it happen not just here but in other places as well. Governments will do this while they're trying to pass legislation that has a significant benefit to them or to their stakeholders but may or may not have a significant benefit, a much more widespread benefit, or certainly a benefit to the opposition and our role, that is very important.

Madam Speaker, I know that there are members of the other side that will know what it's like to be in opposition, that will have experienced exactly what is happening tonight and will quite likely happen tomorrow night and the rest of the week, and that is a government that . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Madam Speaker. With that, I'd like to move that we adjourn debate on Bill 30.

Thank you.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I believe we have made significant progress this evening. I thank my colleagues for their stimulating conversation across the floor and would like to move that we adjourn until 10 tomorrow morning.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 11:55 p.m.]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Deputy Speaker: Good morning.

Let us reflect. As we begin our work this week, let us proceed with the respect and honour our institution deserves, filling hearts and minds with wisdom and a determination to always do what's right for our constituents, for our province, and for our country.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 30

An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans

Mr. Gotfried moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment December 4: Ms Larivee]

The Deputy Speaker: Any hon. members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak in the House today in support of the motion for referral of Bill 30. It would benefit the bill and the people of Alberta as well as, actually, the work of the members of this House if we were to refer the bill to committee, as has been proposed by the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

As all members of the House know, this is a bill that would make substantial and sweeping changes to the legislation surrounding, actually, two major pieces of legislation in our province, the Workers' Compensation Act and also the Occupational Health and Safety Act. Both are very large bills that are substantial in their sweep and in their impact.

The changes we have before us in these bills would have a long-lasting and potentially a very significant impact on every worker in Alberta. They have the potential to redefine the workplace for all those Albertans who will not only be working now but coming into the workforce in the years ahead. To put it a bit in perspective, there are more than 2 million people actually currently employed in our province and, of course, also at any time lots of people looking for work. Especially in this time of downturn and retrograde legislation against our industries in Alberta there are a lot more people looking for work than there used to be. The legislation we make in this House regarding labour laws will in some way affect all those 2 million plus people. It'll affect whether or not their jobs continue to exist or whether or not new jobs are created for Albertans who are struggling to find work, and yes, this may have an impact on the work that is available for them in the future.

With all of the people who are therefore counting on us to make sure we get things like this right and with all those whose lives we may affect through our work here, we need to do everything we can to get this straight. And it impacts not just workers, quite honestly, but families and whole communities, our society at large. So it's much more than just the immediate impact. There's also the secondary impact, that impacts our children, that impacts whole extended families, all of the rest of that.

This means that we need to put a stop to this practice of a government that spends very little time on the consultation process, the practice of introducing omnibus bills just days before the end of session, the practice of trying to ram through legislation while ignoring the legitimate concerns of many members in this Assembly. Truthfully, I think we should all be here to try and find the best legislation, to create the best context, the best environment possible for employees and for families and for communities here in Alberta.

The people of Alberta deserve better than just having major pieces of legislation rammed through without the time for consultation, without the opportunity for the key stakeholders to be involved, to participate, to express their thoughts and their concerns. By referring this bill to committee, we would have the opportunity to invite some key people in, to hear what their thoughts are.

You know, the reality is that we're always better together than we are individually. When we put things through from one perspective only, there are all kinds of things that we overlook, that we're blind to, that we don't get. By listening to others, we actually benefit the people of Alberta. We actually improve the quality of the bill. This government could be producing work that would last for many generations if they would take the time to do it well. The people of Alberta deserve that. They deserve a legislative process that will make sure that we do more than just pass bills as fast as we possibly can. They deserve a process that ensures that we simply take some time to get the bills right in the first place. If we don't get it right on these kinds of issues, we aren't serving Albertans well, and if we don't get them right, we aren't doing our jobs, which may mean that they're not getting their jobs.

What can we do to make sure that we get this bill and others right? We can use the tools that have been available to us in this place and send the bill to committee for further review and consultation. Is that really too much to ask from a government? I would have thought the proper legislative review and careful scrutiny would be a given for a government that has such a poor track record with unintended consequences and problems with their past legislation. Too often we've seen legislation shoved forward in a hurry. Then even the government has to amend their own bills halfway through the process.

I know the government will say that they've done their consultation; they've had so many submissions and so many round-table meetings. I know that they'll say that there isn't time to review the bill. I know they'll say that it's fine without amendments. But the reality is that time will prove that, and the reality is that when the process is pressured and rushed, the end result is rarely the best that it could be. The fact is that these are just their tactics, their talking points to avoid being asked hard questions, to avoid facing the reality that so many Albertans are actually not onboard with their legislation and their ideological agenda. Just because they accidentally got elected doesn't give them an authority to push these kinds of things through. The reality is that trying to push the legislation through with an unwillingness to even consult with people, with the intent to try to shove it through so quickly that people don't have the opportunity to even understand it, let alone respond, is not good legislative practice.

Madam Speaker, governing for Albertans isn't supposed to be easy. It means listening to opposing opinions. It means facing evidence that doesn't fit with your narrative. It means putting our province and its people ahead of all else. NDP members don't come first; Albertans do. Union bosses don't come first; the Albertans that actually have to work for them do. Ideological dogma doesn't come first; Albertans do. While I know it will mean facing up to a reality and while I know it will mean a little more work for all of us, let's send the bill to committee for further review, for further consultation. Let's actually just do our job in this House, listen to the people of this great province, and make sure we get this legislation right.

I want to spend a little bit more time now addressing a couple of the potential problems that may arise with this bill. I know that it can be difficult to be one's own critic, so hopefully I can do something to lift the fog and help the government see some of the sections of this legislation that need work. I trust that I can impress the practical importance of spending more time on this particular piece of legislation.

First, I want to speak about the introduction of mandatory joint health and safety committees and health and safety representatives. This bill would universally mandate, depending on the number of employees in a workplace, a health and safety committee or representative. In the existing legislation the minister already has the power to mandate these situations where it makes sense. Why is this individual approach not sufficient? Do we really need to impose the hassle and cost of these committees and representatives on businesses who have good track records on health and safety and where no problem is apparent? Are we creating an environment of conflict where before there was an environment of co-operation, of support, of working together, and of team effort to create a safe workplace with people?

The government needs to be cognizant of the fact that while their intentions with this measure may be good, the costs may needlessly put an excessive burden on businesses or, worse, may actually distract from other health and safety programs that have been proven to be effective. This seems like more of a political move than anything else.

To try to put such a large bill through and push it through right at the end of session, hoping that the opposition members will just cave in because they want to go home for Christmas: that's not a good idea. We're not going to do that. We intend to stay here. We intend to speak up for Albertans. We would like to go to committee. We would like to work on this.

You have to question: is the government doing this deliberately, or is it through incompetence? I really am not sure. I mean, either they're deliberately trying to push a snow job over on Albertans because it's winter, push this stuff through, try to get it through before the media, before the people can even understand it, or they're just not ready. They haven't had time to get their act together. They hadn't finished writing the bill until the very last minute. They haven't allowed themselves time to take it to committee. Why wouldn't they allow time to actually take it to committee? I think that there are serious ways that this bill is being handled in trying to ram it through at the very end of session, a very large bill. It's not a good way to develop legislation.

There are a number of options that the government could have used. They could have delayed or postponed the start of the fall session until they were actually ready. They could have chosen to adjourn debate on the bill and then reconvene it in the spring, which would give opportunity for the people and stakeholders to have a good look at it, to make valuable contributions. They did this once already with Bill 21, Modernized Municipal Government Act. That was probably a good practice. I commend them on that. Why don't they do the same thing again here and invite stakeholders to contribute to this in healthy and positive ways? Or they could just simply embrace the referral motion that we have before us now and allow the bill to go to committee. That would be the next best option. It would actually benefit the bill and the province, and it's something that I think needs to be supported by all members of this House. It's too late for some of the other options, but it's not too late to refer this bill to committee and to make sure that it gets the best treatment possible in this House.

I'd like to refer to another suggested change that I think would be valuable. I question the intent of replacing the Occupational Health and Safety Council with the Labour Relations Board. This is interesting. What it's doing is essentially trying to suggest that all employees in this province are labour representatives. They're not. In fact, less than 1 in 4 employees actually belong to a labour union, but here we have the Labour Relations Board being set up to resolve issues and to deal with this for employees who are not even labour employees.

The point is that the Alberta Labour Relations Board administers the Labour Relations Code, dealing with disputes between employers and trade unions, not with all the other employees in this province. I'm not belittling trade unions. I think that they actually have a value. I belonged to two of them in the past. There is a place for trade unions. But I don't quite understand why they're being tasked with a job that isn't within the definition of their mandate. This isn't what they're supposed to be doing, so why is the government turning it into something that it isn't? It's something that we need to look at and take serious consideration of.

There are a lot of issues with this bill. I will stick with the referral motion at the moment. The other details we'll address later, but I think there are serious concerns that need to be addressed. That's why this bill should go to committee, and I encourage all members to support the referral motion and please move forward with it.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a) the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have to agree with my colleague. He has brought up some very, very good points, that referring this to committee is something that we need to actually consider.

One of the points that he brought up specifically was the fact that maybe the government has not thought this through. One of my questions here revolves around a quote that has come out with the press release that was done by the Alberta government, Bill Would Improve Safety, Well-being of Albertans, on November 27, 2017. So on the day the bill was read in first reading, this press release came out. Now, one of the points here – and this is a good reason why we need to consider the referral motion. My question to my colleague is – the quote here says:

The Workers' Compensation Board (WCB) provides no-fault benefits and supports a safe return to work for injured workers. The proposed changes would mean an improved WCB system that [would provide] greater benefits to [employees] to support their return to work, with premiums that remain sustainable and affordable for employers.

One of the points that our caucus has brought up is that there's been really no economic impact study that's been done on the impacts on the WCB. We've had a government say that this is only going to cost something like $94 million – I could be corrected if I'm wrong there – but we really don't know what this is going to cost because of the fact that we're open-ending a lot of things to the point where the actuaries will not be able to give us a very clear indication of where this is sitting, the true cost of this.

Now, workers' compensation, in this quote, is very clear that they're all okay with making sure that our people that work in Alberta, who get injured in Alberta, who are covered under WCB have the ability to get better and get back to work. I don't think any one of my caucus would disagree with that. I don't believe one person would say: we don't want one of our injured workers to get the help that they desire. But the WCB board, after the quotes from the minister and two stakeholders, has stated that "premiums that remain sustainable and affordable for employers" are just as important to the WCB. They're saying: we need to get people the help that they need. We also are saying that this needs to be something that our employers have the ability to maintain the payments for or that does not become a serious hardship that will actually put them out of business.

My question to my colleague is: do you think that the consultation has been done well enough so that we have the understanding to be able to see that this WCB is sustainable and will remain sustainable and affordable for employers into the future? This is an important, important question because if we put WCB off the rails, this is something that we cannot get back on the rails when it comes to sustainability. If we end up trying to help people but harm them because the WCB fund is no longer sustainable, this is not okay. This is not okay.

To the member, that I respect: do you feel that a committee would help to flesh this out even further and, I guess, give more balance to what the WCB is saying within the quote that they have provided to our government, that this is such an important topic? To the gentleman, if he could please answer why it's so important to have a good referral motion move forward.

The Deputy Speaker: Lacombe-Ponoka, do you wish to respond?

Mr. Orr: Well, I think that the whole point of committees is that there's an opportunity for the stakeholders and the people of our province to express their thoughts and their concerns and to add to the value of the discussion that takes place. Without a fulsome discussion, quite frankly, we don't have answers to many, many of the questions, even the actuarial kinds of questions, sustainability questions . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the referral motion? The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. W. Anderson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise this morning to speak to the referral amendment to Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, to ask that this bill be referred to committee. There are many reasons why this bill needs to be referred, one being the size of the bill. For the government to bring forward a bill of this size with little debate time – it just makes sense to forward it to an all-party committee where issues with the bill can be hashed out properly. If the government's intent is that this piece of legislation be passed in this session and that we not delay, why didn't they introduce this bill sooner? It's not prudent to push through such a huge piece of legislation when there are so many disruptive implications for small and medium-sized businesses.

This bill makes sweeping changes to Alberta's workmen's compensation system, and these costly changes will make the system, I believe, unsustainable. We can't continue down this road, at every turn jeopardizing a positive employment environment. That is certainly not going to help all Albertans. We need to see evidence from the government that they are indeed planning to fix what they think is a broken system. We do not need to take an unstable environment and make it more unstable with the flick of a switch. Something of this magnitude needs to be thoroughly discussed and understood before just throwing it out here at random, if only for an excuse to ram as much legislation out there as possible in this sitting.

I do want to say that there are many pieces in this legislation that have been needed for a while. Frankly, a lot of it was well thought out, I think. I'm positive that there has been a lot of consultation around many of those great pieces.

But there's also too much at stake here for the employment environment that could affect many small and medium-sized businesses. Small and medium-sized businesses will not be able to absorb the increased administrative burden resulting from supporting joint committees, added administrative training, and alternative work placements. It's just not feasible. Can the Minister of Labour please just think about that for a while?

Unfortunately, this bill makes some changes that I am very concerned about. These changes will make for some additional cost changes to the Workers' Compensation Act and, if enacted, will make the WC system potentially unsustainable. For this reason, I wholly support an amendment to refer this bill to committee. While, like I've stated before, I do believe there are some very good pieces of this legislation that are good and well-deserving, could they not be possibly crafted on their own?

But I would like to discuss some reasons why I think this bill should be referred to an all-party committee. For one, new reporting of serious injuries and incidents would require an excessive amount of administrative work. Reporting of near misses: a huge bureaucratic burden, I think, on small to medium-sized businesses. This adds significant red tape, something that may be needed, but if thought out and thought out well in an all-party committee, we could come up with options to help mitigate these costs for already struggling businesses here in Alberta. I'm not saying, "Hand out money," but all I am suggesting that we do is that we talk about some of the options.

Another serious issue affecting small to medium-sized businesses is the worry about higher premiums, the costs of maintaining and managing your small business. This could have significant financial repercussions, so why the rush? Let's refer this to committee and let the details be worked out there. A piece of legislation of this size and magnitude needs to be mulled over with all members.

Another problem is that while there may be good in this legislation, there is little trust in what legislation this government produces. I and many Albertans whom I have talked with on a regular basis do not trust that this government won't introduce legislation that will have serious economic repercussions in their daily lives. Take, for instance, the carbon tax. This NDP government did not campaign on the carbon tax in the last election. They didn't even bring it up. Now here we are, almost three years later, getting ready to absorb this massive tax that once again will be increased, by 50 per cent, this January.

There's no credibility with this government. They've destroyed all that. They've destroyed it with their risky and ideological pieces of legislation that they forced through this House. They've created morning sittings just for that purpose. They have hurt Albertans in so many ways and have hit them in all directions. There's absolutely no trust when it comes to any promises this government has to say. This is why we need a huge omnibus bill to be referred to committee. This bill is just another piece of legislation that has the potential to do just that.

Think about what just happened the week before last. The Minister of Finance stated that the economy is looking up, up, up, up. He talked about what great fiscal management they have. He talked about how they're reducing spending. He talked about how great the economy is under their reign, and then the day after this fantastic promise Alberta gets hit for the sixth time in a row with a serious credit downgrade. Not the government but the S&P Global Ratings report said that unless this government undertakes "material fiscal reforms . . . to address budgetary shortfalls and . . . [stimulate] the economy . . . Alberta will continue to post, on average, significant after-capital deficits in excess of 23% of total adjusted revenues." This was right after the Minister of Finance's boasts of how great he and his government were handling the financial situation of this province.

I suggest that those on the other side of the House think for themselves and look at the facts. Don't just blindly follow what you're told. It is very obvious somewhere between this government's intent and what actually happens seems to get lost – we've continued to warn this government about reckless ideologies and have repeatedly warned that even though they sound all warm and fuzzy, they just do not work in the practical world.

If you haven't listened to us before, do so today. Refer this bill to an all-party committee, where we can discuss each issue and work together for the common sense and the common good of all Albertans. History has shown that this government has done minimum consultation with the workforce and with Albertans. Follow through on that. Refer this back to committee. Let's redo this in the springtime. Let's think this legislation through. I think it's extremely important that we spend time with Albertans, go through all the details so all Albertans will understand the impact of this bill.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise under 29(2)(a) on the Bill 30 referral to committee. Now, I was listening to the hon. member. He made a lot of points that make sense to me, but I thought I would ask him to reflect on a few things.

Certainly, Bill 30: I tried to talk to people about this, because it popped out just late last week, while I was home on the weekend. I was curious about the hon. member's experience and whether it was similar to mine because what I really found and really noticed was that a lot of people that I talked to, in fact, just about everybody, had no idea what was in the bill. Of course, that matters because, as has been pointed out here, there are more than 2 million people who work in Alberta, and the WCB changes will affect virtually every one of them. So when you think about putting something into place right away that 2 million people have to be brought up to speed on, surely – I just wonder whether the hon. member heard anything similar or whether the people that he talked to in his riding and where he was on the weekend had a same or similar experience.

Of course, you know, Albertans are good people, Madam Speaker. They want to be law abiding, and they want to live within the rules of the land, but of course they can't do that unless they actually know what the rules are and understand them and have time to adjust. Of course, for those people in particular need in my riding and in the hon. member's riding and who may be in the middle of a WCB claim, one of the things that I'm sure they're unclear on – at least, I believe they're unclear on it now, and I'd be interested in the hon. member talking about any that he had talked to in his riding – is whether their claims will be under the new rules or the old rules.

That matters because a lot of claims before the WCB now could have been for an injury on the job six months ago, a year ago, two years ago, or it could have happened yesterday or tomorrow but before the legislation is proclaimed. That can make a big difference, so that's one of the reasons I wouldn't mind if the hon. member could expand on that.

The other piece that I would be interested in him addressing, of course, is on the employer side, if he's had a chance to talk to employers in his riding. Under the OHS rules, now you've got somewhere in the neighbourhood of 160,000 different employers in Alberta, and all the rules that they have and live under on occupational health and safety have to change all at once, too. Of course, I'm curious about anything that he might have said or heard between himself and the employers in his riding. Alberta's employers want to be law abiding, too. They want to be good citizens. They already try to keep their employees safe and do a great job, but there's a new set of rules and guidelines now, potentially, with this legislation, that they'll have to live under, including, of course, requirements for – I'll make sure I get the wording right here – prime contractors and service providers. A lot of businesses now probably don't have something that they call a prime contractor.

Certainly, employers from my riding were unaware of what's in the legislation and what their obligations are. Of course, it makes me curious about whether the hon. member who just spoke, the hon. Member for Highwood, had similar concerns or whether he had an opportunity to talk to employers in his riding. Again, Madam Speaker, this is important because this is a big chunk of legislation, 147 pages. It's a lot to consume for Albertans. It's a lot to consume at any time but particularly if this happens to be a busy time of their year. Indeed, if it's a slow time for businesses, it's tough, too. It's getting more expensive for them, if it's a slow time, to bring in extra staff to look at the ramifications in the bill, to perhaps put new accounting practices in, to perhaps . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Any other hon. members wishing to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Stier: Good morning, Madam Speaker, and good morning, all. Thanks for having the moments today for folks in the House to listen to what we have to say regarding this amendment. I think it's important to start out with a few comments with respect to what has gone on in my past experience here in the House with respect to the amount of time that has been spent in my constituency office regarding the subject of workmen's compensation. There have been probably hundreds of calls to my office regarding this subject, and it's one of the most sensitive issues that small-business owners and employees will probably have to deal with. It's also one of the most common subjects, I've heard, for every constituency office. Workmen's compensation has been problematic, to say the least.

But this morning I'd like to speak in favour of this referral amendment, which my hon. colleague has moved, and I would like to submit that the process for Bill 30 has not provided Albertans with adequate time to be consulted on the numerous and significant changes to the Workers' Compensation Board and the Occupational Health and Safety Act.

I know that not enough time was spent consulting with Albertans, and I know that not enough due diligence was done by the government before they introduced this bill. I know that because that is what this government tends to do on all of these bills. Bill 6 was a classic example of that. [interjections] Whether or not the government agrees is beside the point because the people out there are talking to us about this, and they have not had the opportunity.

They do not know about it. They didn't even know it was being dropped until last week, and it's 147 pages long.

They only held, apparently, I've been told – and I could stand to be corrected – eight consultation meetings prior to the drafting of this bill. They're relying on an online survey that did nothing more than confirm this government's radical biases, that we've known them to have before when they've introduced bills.

An Hon. Member: Radical biases?

Mr. Stier: Radical biases, yes.

Every time this government has brought in huge bills, it's common knowledge, Madam Speaker, that the government tends to load up a bunch of questions at some of these open houses, suggests things that aren't necessarily the case to try to persuade people to agree with what's being presented.

I am supporting this amendment in part because the government has not shown it has taken the proper steps; specifically, to consult after they've introduced the bill in the Legislature. That's where all this comes out. Let's face it. The information that we get about these bills comes out after they introduce it. It's one thing to consult on ideas. I think the phrase that's often used when referring to this type of consultation is that it takes a 30,000-foot view, so let's take a 30,000-foot view of this.

What I mean is that stakeholders are asked to provide feedback and suggestions on broad statements that describe the intent behind the proposed changes. The consultation will also ask for people's ideas or suggestions on things that they would like the legislation to cover but, again, nothing specific. The important thing to note is that no one outside of the government really knows what the specific changes are going to be. That will probably come down in regulations or some other form of double whammy that always takes place when legislation goes through.

I don't profess even to have been at these consultations. I didn't know that they were going on. But if I was to wager a guess as to how they went, I think they probably went something like this. The meetings were probably held at a community hall, a union hall, or another public place like a library. I don't know, but I bet they could have been there, some place with a lot of room for people to get up and walk around. Before the formal consultation process began, the minister or the deputy minister probably opened up the meeting by welcoming everyone and telling them how great it was that everyone could be there. Of course, they undoubtedly thanked them for taking the time out of their busy schedule to do the really important work of improving the occupational health and safety and WCB acts. That would be the normal process.

Following that, everyone was probably given instructions on how the session would proceed and how the participants' input would be collected. I wouldn't be surprised if the participants were told to keep an open mind and that the process was really about the government gathering ideas that it can take back to the drawing-room table when they begin the job of crafting the legislation.

I'm going to guess that there were probably stations set up around the room and that government representatives whose expertise was in a specific area that the government wanted to gather feedback on were there. These representatives were there to answer, possibly, any specific questions that a participant had and to encourage an open dialogue. I'm sure that did take place, but I'm going to go out on a limb here and bet that each station level probably already had a really high-level, biased concept of what they were trying to achieve, that the participants were to consider and then provide their feedback on by writing their ideas or suggestions on sticky notes or flash cards that the government would collect at the end.

As to the specific questions or aspirational statements the government asked, the participants possibly would consider a lot of questions, but I submit that they probably sounded in many ways like the following list that I'm going to provide.

What areas of the current legislation work well? What areas of the current legislation don't work well?

Another would perhaps be: would you support changes in improved access to the medical and financial supports injured workers need to get healthy, to care for their families, and to ultimately return to work? Would you support changes to legislation that would modernize Alberta's health and safety system to reflect the modern workplaces of the 21st century? I bet they would all answer in a preconceived way to that.

Another would be: would you support an improved Workers' Compensation Board system that provides greater benefits to workers to support their return to work, with premiums that remain sustainable and affordable for employers? I'm sure they would have said something like that.

Another: do you support changes that better protect workers to ensure that they have the same rights and protections as other Canadians? Well, that makes sense. I'm sure they might have asked that.

Another one: do you think that Alberta's current occupational health and safety and workers' compensation legislation effectively empowers Alberta workers to take a participatory role in promoting healthy and safe workplaces? I'm sure they would ask that.

Another one: did you know Alberta currently does not have an independent office tasked with assisting Alberta workers injured at work to help them navigate the complex WCB system? I'm betting they would have thought of that, I hope. If Alberta were to adopt an independent office, what do you think their responsibilities should be? Perhaps that was asked then, too.

Another. Currently Alberta workers have a duty to refuse unsafe work. This has caused some Alberta workers to be confused as to whether they have a right to refuse unsafe work. Do you support clarifying what Alberta workers' rights are? I'm sure that that question, too, was probably asked at one of those meetings.

Yet another. Currently Alberta workers injured at work are only able to collect wage benefits up to $98,700. However, many Alberta tradespeople earn significantly higher annual incomes. Do you think Alberta workers should be eligible to receive more of their wages if they suffer a workplace injury? Likely that was asked, I suspect.

Another. Under the current legislation workplaces with 19 or fewer employees are not required to form health and safety committees. I know that I spent many years downtown working in offices in the oil and gas sector, and this came up at that time, 15, 20 years ago, as well, to some extent. I know we were always scratching our heads downtown. Were we really scared of that photocopier? Was it going to hit us in the head one day? I know that we used to try to kick it a lot of times and make it work a little better, but what were we to be scared of in our offices downtown when they tried to raise that issue before? What are we going to do about that now? That is what I'm worried about. Are we going to figure out some way to put a safety cage around our photocopiers? I don't know.

Maybe, perhaps, they might have asked about that: do you support expanding the mandate of the health and safety committee to include all Alberta workers? That's the point here, folks. We know that those photocopiers can be animals from time to time. I know the ones in our offices certainly are. They're in fixing it again this morning.

Yet another question. Under the current legislation, when an employee is injured at work, their employer's obligations to accommodate their return to work are not clearly articulated. Perhaps they might have asked: would you support changes that clarify what an employer's obligations are when an employee is injured in the workplace? I'm sure they would have asked that. That should have been in there for many years. That's usually part of any regular office operations, any workplace operations. That's normally the case.

I won't belabour my point with any further examples, folks, this morning because I think I've made my point, and I thank you for your attention and interest in what I've had to say. None of the questions the government probably asked nor the feedback they received from stakeholders prior to the introduction of this bill in the Legislature probably dealt with specifics that we're now having to deal with. They probably skipped over some of the sensitive things. They probably didn't include some of the stuff that's in this bill. Oh, by the way, as the previous members have said this morning, it's a fairly large bill. It's got 147 pages.

An Hon. Member: A hundred and forty-seven pages is scary.

Mr. Stier: Scary 147 pages: I agree, hon. member. Really scary.

It couldn't have dealt with all the specifics in those open houses because we're going to have to do that. We're not going to be able to deal with all of the specifics here today either nor in the next few days, I would suggest, because it's too important and it's too difficult. Why this is brought to us in this manner at this time, at the end of the session, is beyond me. It's again, obviously, another attempt at trying to slide something through without giving it proper attention.

The examples that I provided illustrate that very fact. There's a fundamental difference between consultations held prior to a bill being introduced versus consultations held after the legislation has been tabled in the Legislature. There's a difference between asking a stakeholder if they support expanding the mandate of health and safety committees to include all Alberta workers versus asking a stakeholder for actual feedback on whether they support something specific, including:

If there are 5 to 19 workers in total from 2 or more employers or employers and self-employed persons or one or more employers and one or more self-employed persons at a work site and the work is expected to last 90 days or more, the prime contractor or, if there is no prime contractor, all employers and self-employed persons shall coordinate the designation of a health and safety representative for that work site.

Now, that bunch of gibberish is part of this bill's section 17(3). I bet that wasn't asked in one of those meetings.

I'm not claiming that stakeholders or particular employers are against it, including the proposed section 17, that was quoted. What I am saying, though, is that asking someone to provide feedback on the ideas of expanding the mandate of the health and safety committees versus asking that same person for feedback on the very specific language that legislates the expansion of health and safety are two entirely different things. Claiming, as this government has, that they are the same is not just incorrect. It's wrong, and it's misleading.

If the government truly doesn't understand the difference between consulting on an idea versus consulting on a written piece of legislation, then they shouldn't be introducing this legislation in the first place. We need a long discussion on this bill. It is one of the most sensitive things to every person that works in Alberta and across this country, and it has been the most controversial issue for decades. Why, then, should we be faced with having to just smash this through the House at the end of session? We should not.

That's why I'm supporting this proposed amendment to refer this bill to committee, Madam Speaker. Despite the partisanship that goes on in this room, I would encourage all members to consider all of their constituents, all of the workers in Alberta, all of those people that don't normally deal with legislation, all of the people that may be affected by this, take this into account, and support us in moving this to committee.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have to say that my colleague for Livingstone-Macleod brings up some very good points. You know, to reinforce some of the points that he brought forward, I just want to read a business alert that was put out by the Alberta Chambers of Commerce to get a better understanding of where the business community is sitting in this regard and why it is so important that this needs to go to committee.

The ACC...

That is the Alberta Chambers of Commerce.

... has recommended that the Alberta Government send Bill 30 to a committee for further review and analysis following First and Second Reading. Taking this step will help identify how employers and employees can best adjust to changes introduced with the new legislation, which are intended to prevent illness and injury in the workplace.

That's pretty clear. I can't think of anything more clear.

They're putting out a business alert saying that businesses across Alberta should be talking with their local MLAs to make sure they understand that we need to have more fulsome, more thorough discussions when it comes to this legislation. I really feel that, in the end, when we see the Alberta Chambers of Commerce putting forward letters like this, they don't do it lightly. They don't say: gee, are we here just to make the government's life more difficult? I believe that they truly want to be included in the process.

Now, as I stated before, what we've got here in the Alberta government's technical briefing is that there was not a fulsome consultation. I do not mean to belittle the people that did participate because – you know what? – their points of view are important. The question is: was it sufficient for the gravity that this legislation will bring forward for all Albertans who work?

Like, the fact that over 1,300 online survey responses were done seems like a lot, but then you look at the fact that when we sent the daylight savings time act to the committee, we had over 14,000 people do responses. Nearly 90 written submissions sounds like a lot, but the bill itself has such a large number of pages that it's hard for us to be able to see if those submissions – those 90 submissions, those 1,300 responses, those eight in-person, facilitated round-table discussions – and the points that they brought up are actually reflected in this legislation.

But we're not going to find out because we're going to rush through this so fast. This referral is saying: let's slow the process down just a little bit, make sure that we get it right, make sure that we have a sustainable WCB that moves forward so that we protect Albertans who are workers that get hurt on the job site into the future. That is what we are asking for. This is important to Albertans.

Now, to move on in that same business alert, there's another concern that was brought up.

WCB premium surpluses collected from employers in 2016 are approximately 350 Million, with similar surpluses expected for 2017. Past practice of the WCB has been to rebate surpluses back to employers because the WCB is fully employer funded. The ACC is pleased that the Alberta Government rejected the WCB Review Panel's recommendation to not rebate . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Just a reminder, hon. member, that you should table those documents you were quoting from later, please. Thank you.

Any other speaker to the amendment motion? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to speak to the referral motion, which I will be voting in favour of. There are so many things that I want to talk about with respect to this bill and with respect to the referral motion. In order to be able to make my point clearly, I think I'm going to have to go back to a few other bills that we've wanted to refer and the reasons for that.

But before I do that, Madam Speaker, one of the things that I wanted to talk about – and I think that a lot of the members on this side have spoken to this – is just the size of this bill. It's just a massive bill. It's a complicated bill. There's a lot in there that needs to be discussed. I cannot imagine, again, the amount of work that goes into something like this. There's just so much information in here, but there are a couple of key points that I'd like to speak about. One of the things is that when a piece of legislation like this makes it to us, especially in the opposition, we are obviously tasked with making sure that we speak to the people, that we reach out, that we have the opportunity to explain what's behind the legislation, what we think and what we understand is going on.

The biggest thing that's actually come across my desk in the few days that we've had this bill is: where was the consultation? Now, I'm not saying that there wasn't consultation but obviously not adequate consultation, Madam Speaker. Honestly, people are questioning where the government was on consultation with this. I'll bring up some specific areas that I've been asked about, and I'd love to hear some answers from the government. Specifically, the reason for needing to go to referral on this is due to the nature of bringing in stakeholders, bringing in folks that are experts in this.

I mean, I can only speak for myself, but the privilege of being in here has taught me many things. One of those things is that I don't know a whole lot about a whole lot of things, but I also know a whole lot about a lot of little things. The only reason why I know those things is because I've had the privilege of speaking to a lot of people who have educated me. This province is full of savvy, intelligent, incredible people that are really experts in so many fields. You know, I'm a person who loves people. I love speaking with people. I love hearing what they have to say. I've learned so much. The biggest thing that I've learned is that when people aren't consulted properly, you're told about it right away. I'm sure I'm not the only one. I'm sure the government side has had people asking them questions about this legislation, too, because it's so humongous.

One of the things that I think needs to happen is, potentially, to pull the bill into two pieces. We ask about this all the time. There are pieces of this bill where there are some really good things that are happening that needed to happen, but there are also chunks of this bill that I really, really believe would do so much better for us if we took the time to have adequate consultations.

If I may, Madam Speaker, I just want to delve into the past a little bit. You know, when I was reading this bill and going back to some of the issues, I was reminded of when we were in here discussing bills 25, 27, and 34, so that's the Oil Sands Emissions Limit Act, the Renewable Electricity Act, and the Electric Utilities Amendment Act, 2016. We'll start with Bill 25, the Oil Sands Emissions Limit Act. I mean, this was such a huge gamble with industry – such a huge gamble – and we spoke on and on about the industry's place, about how that was going to impact industry wanting to be here, especially because the other countries that we're dealing with with respect to oil sands and oil production do not have the same kinds of restrictions that were being put on by this oil sands cap.

One of the things that we had said over and over again was that the industry itself – and we're not even talking about the larger industries but the smaller businesses, the fabric of what makes up this province, Madam Speaker, especially when it comes to oil and gas, and how so many of these smaller businesses that were involved in the oil sands were not going to be able to see those leases go to fruition. This was a huge, huge impactful piece of legislation, and there was absolutely zero consultation with these smaller groups that are going to eventually be eaten up by these larger groups, which ultimately reduces competition. Then, on top of that, we who produce the greenest product in the world and should be the most proud of our resource development are going to lose out to other countries because of carbon leakage and many, many other things, which we've gone into over and over again.

There was so much less public discussion on the oil sands emissions than there was even on the climate leadership plan. If you look at the consultation – I was at all of the consultations for the climate leadership plan, and I saw all of the sticky notes. I actually have pictures still, after going to all of those meetings, of all the sticky notes of everything that people said about phasing out coal and all those kinds of things. We've talked about this at length.

However, one of the things that we realized during this, going through that whole process, was that the industry had not been adequately consulted, and even aside from the industry, the public wasn't. As Albertans and Canadians we own the resources. It is something that Albertans, in particular, are savvy about. There's not a single person in this House or anywhere in this province that is not touched by our resources or some offshoot of business that is impacted by how well or how poor we do in this industry and a policy that impacts it. I mean, we sent, I think, several amendments asking for referrals, all sorts of things on that.

Another one is Bill 27, the renewables act. Here's an interesting one, Madam Speaker. Just to speak about consultation again, because that's why we're doing this referral, coal phase-out wasn't even adequately defined in Bill 27. There was no definition for what coal phase-out was actually going to look like.

More interesting than that, did you know that the AESO didn't even make its recommendations public until the day that the bill was delivered to our desks on November 3? I remember personally scrambling to try and figure out how we were going to understand what the AESO's recommendations were, some of which the government took. A good chunk of things were actually not taken into consideration; for example, what was going to happen with respect to the PPAs? How were the taxpayer and the ratepayer, who are the same person, I might add, going to be impacted by that?

The recommendations were made public exactly at the same time that the bill came out. Interestingly enough, this is very similar to that. We have three or four humongous pieces of legislation being rammed through right before the end of session.

Now, as an opposition member my responsibility is to ask questions. So I'm looking at this, and I'm wondering a lot of different things. The whole point of doing a referral is because there are good things in this legislation, but there is a lot that really, really need some serious time, Madam Speaker, and I don't think that there's enough. I don't have enough energy to express how important it is that a piece of legislation this large go to committee and that we have an opportunity to speak about it.

Bill 34, the electric utilities act, is my favourite. What was it? The minister defined it as her receiving a volatile electricity system. Well, “volatile” is a good word that I would use for the decisions that the government made, based specifically around the fact that it rendered the PPAs unable to be able to – being that the Balancing Pool would have no money, $65 million, to be exact, that goes to making sure that the Balancing Pool can do its job.

Under the previous act we would’ve already had the responsibility to do that. The taxpayer is on the hook for the Balancing Pool as it runs out of cash, and the government, who is responsible for making the PPAs unprofitable, did not want to go to referral and talk about the issues therein. Instead, we had another massive piece of legislation which also gave the minister the ability to bring on renewables without bringing it in front of this Legislature. She had the complete capacity to make those decisions without anybody else knowing what was going on.

This is another reason that we wanted to go to referral on this. Lookit, if there is a reason and a capacity for these things to change, and as you speak with industry, there’s a lot of desire to go forward, it is the responsibility of government to be transparent with the people of this province about how that’s going to impact their livelihood. There needs to be buy-in, Madam Speaker; hence, the reason why going to referral is so important and going back into committee is so important.

They can ram through as much legislation as they want on any given day, Madam Speaker. The government has the majority. They certainly have the ability to do that with or without our blessing. However, we represent a humongous chunk of people on this side as well. It would behoove the government to actually listen and understand that the reason for going to committee is to actually justify some of the legislation and potentially strengthen legislation that’s going to go through with the help of the opposition. Ideally, that would be the way that things go. This is a collaborative approach. This is the way that we get things done. We can make some very, very good tweaks and bring in the people.

I want to go to the bill, just for a second, Madam Speaker. The one I found most interesting – and there are a lot of interesting things, but this is my particular piece for today – is the creative sentencing options. Doesn’t that sound like fun? Creative sentencing options. What is this relating to? Well, this is relating to the fact that the levies and the fines in the previous act are – the way that the levies and fines were in the previous act are still being held over. However, the court has now the ability to use creative sentencing options for employers found in contravention of the act. What does that mean?

I would love to understand the definition of that. I can’t even fathom what that’s going to look like in regulations, and the best part about that, Madam Speaker, is that we’re not going to know. We are not going to have the ability to say: “Wow. Creative sentencing options. What does that mean? What does that look like?” It seems like an awful lot of oversight for a body in the sense that the regulations are going to be made by cabinet and the government and the minister, which will have absolutely no space in here for us to talk about it, and then it’s going to go out into the world in some capacity with people not understanding not only the contravention of the act, because they have to learn and understand how they’re contravening the act, but more importantly how they are going to deal with that.

My goodness, as far as I understand, a court is an interpretive body. They’re going to interpret the law. So you will have interpretation and creative in the same sentence. It’s great for a song, musical theatre. I’m sure even Beethoven would approve. But I don’t think that this is something that we should be putting into law without actually discussing what creative sentencing options actually means. I would really, really appreciate the government at any point being able to point out for me exactly what that means. That’s just one of them, and that one made me really, really nervous.

The other thing that I wanted to talk about, too, is that when we were talking about Bill 17 in the past, the FOIP documents showed that the consultation workplace laws last spring had a predetermined outcome. So what do we mean by that? Well, if you look at the way the consultation went, Madam Speaker, the questions are designed in such a way that a certain answer will come. There are only a couple of options. This has the exact same feel. It harkens back to that space of: wow. This was: “I’ll lead, and you follow. I’m going to set this in stone. I’m going to say that I consulted with you, but I’m going to lead the discussion, and you’re going to say okay.” That’s how this feels, and this is a humongous piece of legislation.

The other interesting thing is that if we’re looking at small and medium-sized businesses, if we’re talking about the costs that need to be absorbed as a result of what’s going to happen with the Workers’ Compensation Act, it is completely unsustainable. I would love to know the amount of consultation that was done with small and medium-sized businesses. Or are they just not important? Again, it reminds me Bill 25, the Oil Sands Emissions Limit Act, where the smaller companies and smaller leaseholders were not consulted and were not brought into the discussion. Ultimately, they’re the ones that will pay the price for the billions of dollars they’ve already sunk into the leases that will not come to fruition as a result of the cap.

I’m curious: how is it that the government expects small and medium-sized businesses that are at risk, because they’re not able to support those administrative costs, to support the joint committees that have been added to the ministry of training and alternative work placements? Wouldn’t it be better, Madam Speaker, to be able to bring in some of the associations, the chambers, anything, to be able to discuss this so this legislation is as strong as it needs to be? Obviously, there are changes that needed to be made.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you. Having listened to my hon. colleague go through such an important thing like a referral motion, I truly want to hear the rest of her thoughts on this because I believe that she’s passionately encouraging this government to really look at the direction they’re going in, especially when the fact is that we seem to be running if not galloping towards a result that was predetermined by a very select few within this government. So if the member wouldn’t mind talking a little further on the fact that there doesn’t appear to be enough consultation, and how it would affect her constituents.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to continue to speak. Consultation is an interesting concept, isn’t it? Again, with all the humility that I could possibly muster, in my experience in the last, you know, two and a half or so years the consultation aspect for me has been more just sitting and listening and trying to understand and then trying to figure out how that would fit into a piece of legislation. I’ve really tried with all my heart to not lead a person into a way of thinking. It's been more that they direct, and I take notes.

I think I can speak for most of us. I mean, I've been in consultations with a lot of my friends on this side of the House. I haven't been in a lot with my friends on the other side. But my assumption is that when we have people coming into our offices, as MLAs, you know, a good chunk of our job is to listen, to take notes, and then for us on this side we'll usually go to the minister that's responsible for that and try and bring forward suggestions and ideas or at least give some heads-up about a particular situation.

That can only happen, Madam Speaker, if you actually have the ability to sit and listen, not come and be told, not be directed. It's actually sitting down and listening to the people. As I've said on many occasions and I will continue to say, the people of this province are highly intelligent, thoughtful, common-sense, resilient human beings, and it just makes me beyond proud to be able to work in this beautiful place and to be able to represent them.

Consultation is actually for me a word of respect. It's a word of collaboration. It is a word that means that more than one idea can come to the table and that the conversation will be respectful and thoughtful and kind even if you're on completely opposing sides of an ideology or a thought process or anything. It's a very, very respectful dialogue that takes into consideration the feelings of the people that are going to be mostly impacted.

Over the course of the privilege of being in this House, the most consistent thing that I hear over and over and over again is: "Where was the consultation? We didn't know this was coming. They didn't reach out to us." These are, like, actual stakeholders that have a real, real stake in this game, that have the ability to actually direct government, which my understanding was, at least to some degree, how that's going to go.

Obviously, government is not going to make everybody happy. That's okay. I think all of us can live with that if there's common sense behind this. But you bring in this level of legislation that has two completely different components and smoosh it together in, well, what should have been the last week of the Legislature. Obviously, we're going to go on, smoosh it into this little-bitty time, expect us to consult, and then everything that we bring forward with amendments is not respected even though we're not making this stuff up. This is coming from consultation, Madam Speaker.

This is about referring it to committee so that we have the ability to actually talk to these people. I would think that the government would love to get that extra buy-in. This would be good for the government to do this. This is about gaining approval from the people that we represent, not getting approval for your own ideas. That's a completely different thing. This is actually about respectful discourse, actually having a discussion come out of that and coming to a conclusion. Like I said, you're not going to make everybody happy – I wish that was the case, but that's not going to happen – but listen to the public with an open mind.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I know we are proud to see the response from Albertans on this review. We (a) received more than 1,300 online responses, (b) received nearly 90 written submissions, and (c) conducted eight in-person round-table discussions with more than 200 stakeholders across Alberta. On top of that, we had the independent WCB panel's recommendations for a workercentric system that were posted online on July 6, 2017, and Albertans had until September 30, 2017, to provide feedback. The panel received more than 1,700 questionnaires, 200 written submissions, and 67 workbook responses, and over 60 responses were submitted in response to the panel's report.

However, I would like to thank the opposition for wildly speculating, and I look forward to more wild speculations coming in the future. But at this moment I would like to adjourn debate on the amendment.

Bill 31

A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act

[Debate adjourned December 4]

The Deputy Speaker: Any hon. members wishing to speak to Bill 31? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to rise today to speak to Bill 31, and I would like to actually start off by bringing forward an amendment.

The Deputy Speaker: This amendment is REF1. Go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I move that the motion for second reading of Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

Madam Speaker, I would like to speak to this amendment, in support of it, of course. This bill is an ambitiously titled bill whose accuracy is yet to be determined. I say that because this bill is flawed in so many ways that you have to wonder if this bill is even salvageable in its present form. This bill is a piecemeal legislation attempting to fix problems where none existed. It will attempt to fix perceived shortcomings in areas such as lender credit rates, motor vehicle repair and sales, concert and event ticket sales and resale, and even veterinarian medicine. I think we can tell by the diversity of the things covered in this bill that it's trying to cover a lot more than what any one bill should be trying to cover.

On top of this, we see a policy proposal that doesn't contain any enforceable items but seemingly exists only as a type of consumer information brochure, which is why my fellow MLAs and I believe that if there is to be any hope of making all parts of this bill work, it needs to go to committee so additional consultation and fulsome examination of its merits and shortcomings can be discussed properly.

Madam Speaker, to be honest, this bill as it's presented is a Frankenstein of sorts, parts of previous failed bills jammed together with changes to other pieces of legislation. We have elements of both Bill 203, Fair Trading (Motor Vehicle Repair Pricing Protection for Consumers) Amendment Act, 2016, and Bill 207, Veterinary Profession (Clear and Timely Price Disclosure) Amendment Act, 2016, with a smattering of the agencies, boards, and commissions review thrown in for good measure. This bill is then fleshed out with a concert and entertainment ticket reform section, that attempts to enforce an almost assuredly unenforceable problem.

Let's start there, Madam Speaker. What the government is trying to do is deal with, among other issues, software programs, or bots, that companies use for online ticket sales to concerts and events. This legislation would prohibit the use of any software which circumvents security measures designed to control and regulate ticket sales, the use of which tries to establish measures meant to reduce mass purchases which restrict access while also inflating resale prices.

This section causes us to question the enforceability of these provisions. The legislation would prohibit the resale of tickets that one knows were acquired using such software. Unfortunately, this places legal onus on primary sellers such as Ticketmaster, et cetera, to exercise reasonable diligence to prevent tickets from being purchased this way and cancel any that are believed to be bought in violation of this with this new bill. How are they going to enforce what someone may or may not believe? How is this government going to enforce bots that are out of province or out of country?

In fact, our neighbours to the south under the Obama administration passed an antibots-style of legislation as well. It didn't work. Bots keep operating, and legislation is unenforceable. Let's face it. As we bring any kind of legislation forward, when it comes to operating anything like this with these bots and that sort of thing, as long as there's somebody willing to come up with a system to stop it, there's somebody willing to come up with a system to bypass it. That's what hackers do. That's what they do all the time.

The government hasn't got any answers to these important questions. That's the problem, Madam Speaker. We have these issues with this bill, and there are no answers to these issues. Of course, the government that wants to bring forward legislation like this has to be willing to think of all these things and plan for these things and come up with answers. If there are no answers, then obviously the legislation is flawed.

Let's make sure that this section will actually achieve what it's trying to accomplish. I mean, the goal is a worthy goal, but if it can't be accomplished by this legislation, then it's a waste of time. It needs to go to a committee to make sure that every opportunity to enforce these goals is made. That's where we can have those kinds of discussions. We can bring in experts. We can have all of these things going on. But, obviously, this government can't answer those questions on how to solve these problems, and committee would give a great opportunity to have that discussion and have the experts come in and, hopefully, work out a solution to make this work.

Now, as to the portion dealing with veterinary medicine, I can tell you that the vets I've heard from and we've heard from over here – and I'm sure that side has heard from them as well though maybe they won't admit it, but they have – are not impressed to see their profession tacked on to a consumer protection bill. They believe that this does a disservice to their professional image by being lumped in with high-cost lenders, scalpers, and the dubious reputation of the auto industry. Of course, probably only one group of people that's got a worse reputation than the auto industry is possibly politicians. When we're dealing with legislation like this, there's no wonder, I guess.

Now, they are highly disappointed that they weren't consulted on these changes. Well, that can be remedied simply by inviting the ABVMA to appear before the designated committee. It'd give them the perfect opportunity to have a say in this legislation because, obviously, they've never seen this. They weren't consulted, and they haven't seen this legislation till now. But now they've seen it, now they've reacted to it, and in a committee they could have a chance to explain themselves to us as legislators what their problems are with this.

After all, you are now taking a self-regulating industry, such as the veterinarians enjoy, and putting it under ministerial control. That will give other self-regulating industries reason to be concerned. Who will be next? Again, it seems like in this Legislature we spend a lot of time trying to solve problems that don't exist. If the problem does exist, we go about it the wrong way. We don't consult with the people that are most affected by it.

In regard to the legislation itself they would have a chance to share their concerns about the powers given to cabinet in the regulations. They haven't had that opportunity yet. This bill along with a couple other of the biggest bills we've seen this session have been dropped on us at the very end of the session. They're big bills, they're very comprehensive, they're far encompassing, and they're dropped on us at the end of the legislative session. It's not just dropped on us as opposition; it's dropped on all Albertans. It's dropped on veterinarians, so they have minimal opportunity to respond and contact the people that represent them to have a say in this. That's why it's so important that we have this opportunity to send this to committee.

The Alberta Veterinary Medical Association has recently updated policy regarding advertising fees, and they offered to put this into bylaws as opposed to doing so by changing legislation. So some of these concerns they've already brought forward themselves and are willing to solve themselves. Of course, now the know-all government decides: "Okay; this is the way we have to do this. We're going to legislate it. We're going to ram it down their throats." Where do the concerns the government seems to have with the ABVMA stem from? Where do they come from? Where have these concerns come from? Why didn't this government take a more fulsome, collaborative approach to this? Why not work together via committee and do exactly that?

Since the consultation wasn't done beforehand, by sending it to committee, we at least have the opportunity to have the consultation afterwards. That's not the best way to do legislation, but when we're dealt this kind of deal and the people of Alberta are dealt this kind of deal, then this is an opportunity we have to fix this. Again, it's not the best option, but it's the only option we have right now.

Finally, I want to touch on the operations of AMVIC, the Alberta Motor Vehicle Industry Council, which is Alberta's automotive industry regulator. AMVIC is an independent delegated authority and is accountable to the Alberta government through a delegation agreement with the Minister of Service Alberta. This was done under

I support this bill, and I'd urge my colleagues in the House to do the same. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak in support of Bill 210, the silver alert act. I think it's an important piece of legislation. I will take my brief time here speaking to this bill to just speak broadly about the challenges that dementia and dementia care present for our province and, of course, most especially for the people who face dementia and their family, loved ones, and caregivers.

You know, as I talk to my constituents and Albertans around the province, I hear repeatedly about the magnitude of the gaps in dementia care in this province and the lack of knowledge and understanding about dementia and what it actually means. The hon. member speaking immediately before me talked about some of the impacts. For every 1 person who is diagnosed with dementia, it has an impact on 10 to 12 people on average, and in many cases that's even more than that.

I find it curious that this province does not have a provincial dementia strategy, something I've been pushing for for some time now, dating back to the spring, when I asked the Minister of Health about that. At that time she indicated that we would see a provincial dementia strategy coming, quote, unquote, within a couple of weeks. That was back in the spring. We saw no action on that. Again in the fall I was told that we would see a provincial dementia strategy with the funding associated with that sometime this fall. Well, we're still waiting, Madam Speaker.

A provincial dementia strategy is something that other provinces have taken on. Ontario has committed $100 million over three years to a provincial dementia strategy, and that is in addition to $20 million that they have allocated to respite care. Those sorts of funding commitments and an overall strategic framework are entirely missing from this province, so while we talk about Bill 210 and the importance of that, it is important that we understand the context in which we're debating this, and that is that there is no provincial dementia strategy.

The government has said in the past that more long-term care beds are coming. That's good. That is one important piece of dementia care, but it is by no means the sum total of what the provincial government ought to be doing. Yes, it's an important piece, but not every person in a long-term bed has dementia, and certainly long-term care would not be an appropriate setting for every single person with dementia, particularly true of those with early onset dementia who are in the early stages of this progressive illness. It's certainly not something that should be considered a replacement for a provincial dementia strategy.

As I think of the silver alert legislation, one of the reasons I'm so strongly in favour of it is the story of our neighbour Ken. Ken was in his early 80s and, unfortunately, had progressively worse Alzheimer's and would wander. He was still able to live at home. He's lived in the neighbourhood for almost all of his life and was born and lived in Calgary and moved to that neighbourhood when he was a small boy. Our house was his friend Graham's house, and he would come and knock on our door on a regular basis. He would wander through the neighbourhood, but those of us in the neighbourhood were able to look out for Ken and make sure that he was able to always find his way home. When I think of the importance of legislation like this, I think of Ken, and I would say: may Ken rest in peace. I had a nice opportunity to speak with Ken's wife last night at a community holiday event.

Dementia does touch all of us in this province, Madam Speaker. It's incredibly important that we support this legislation, and I do urge all of my hon. colleagues to do so.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today to speak to Bill 210, Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017, put forward by my hon. colleague from Drayton Valley-Devon. I'd like to commend my colleague for putting his time and his efforts and a lot of research into this piece of legislation that we see here before us today.

I think that many Albertans, in fact I might even be so bold as to say that most Albertans would certainly agree that having the ability to issue a silver alert is an important signal in our society. Anything that we can do in this Legislature that protects vulnerable persons and aids in finding missing persons is certainly a good step forward that we can all take here together today, Madam Speaker, in second reading.

I won't say much. I won't take up much time. I do support this piece of legislation. I think it is an excellent step forward in assisting in protecting and having the backs of our vulnerable seniors in this province, where dementia and other deteriorating diseases like that are a reality and where wandering off happens. It's no one's fault, and it is what it is, but having the systems in place that can help these people find a safe way home is a good step forward.

I will certainly be voting for this piece of legislation, and I urge all members in this House to do the same. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon to close debate.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just want to have a couple of comments here. Again, thank you to all of the people that helped put this bill together. I think we all have been touched by people that we love who have wandered off and who need assistance, and if this bill can move us forward in that direction and towards safeguarding the lives of some of our Albertan citizens, then I think it's an important bill that we should all support.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 210 read a second time]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm rising to seek unanimous consent that notwithstanding Standing Order 8 the Assembly will move into immediate consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill 209, the Radon Awareness and Testing Act.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to request the unanimous consent of this Assembly to waive Standing Order 8(7) to allow the Assembly to proceed to Committee of the Whole on Bill 210, Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017.

Now, if we look at Bill 31, it's a pretty good-sized document. I don't know what it is, maybe 50 pages or something like that. Of course, it's thrown in at the same time as Bill 30 and Bill 32, which are both probably about 200 pages and brought in in the last week of the legislative sitting.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the referral motion? The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I speak to the amendment to refer Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, to committee. I speak in favour of the amendment. I believe that this Bill 31 makes several changes to the Fair Trading Act and includes the changing of the name of the act to the consumer protection act. A number of the changes may include regulatory powers granted to the minister. That does concern me with a number of these cases where we have more government overreach into the marketplace. I believe that there is potential, especially with the Veterinary Profession Act, for interference in a professional agency, quantifying it as essentially commodity protection under consumer protection. These types of things need to be discussed in committee, with individuals and professionals brought forward to ensure that what's being proposed is going to actually help and not hinder, is actually going to strengthen and not harm the people that are being affected by this.

The one thing that I will recognize is that Alberta is a car and truck driving and owning province, and now the NDP wants to change the Alberta Motor Vehicle Industry Council. This is a body that makes sure that people are protected when they're purchasing automobiles, used automobiles primarily. This bill, Bill 31, aims to change AMVIC from being incorporated as a society to a corporation and a delegated regulatory body. AMVIC will be the only such body to exist, and the government claims not to have designs on creating any others, but I am not necessarily convinced that the government is being completely transparent with their claims. I do have concerns that we're setting a precedent here that is concerning. We know that the Canada free trade agreement is allowing the government to set up a Crown corporation to administer all government procurement, so the statement that AMVIC is the only corporation the NDP are going to set up may possibly not be accurate.

Changing AMVIC to a government agency creates uncertainty for the industry that they will have adequate representation on the new board of the government agency. I believe that all individuals that are within this industry have the right to have their say in a transparent manner, and I believe that doing this through committee is a very necessary part of bringing forward clear legislation, transparent legislation so that all Albertans can be confident that the right legislation has come forward.

When we have uncertainty in the industry on adequate representation on the new board of the government agency, this creates concern about the ability to educate the public members about AMVIC's role and responsibilities. I witnessed that the minister neglected to fill empty board seats for up to two and a half years, and this is concerning, including seats she added after the independent review came out. This includes a time period of six months when there were no public appointees on the board at all.

Now, Service Alberta is also known for red tape and the red tape that it administers, and Bill 31 requires disclosure, creation, and use of a standard bill of sale for all automobiles. But disclosure is meant to be worked out in the regulations, and a standard bill of sale still represents a concern to industry as it would need to take into account both large and small vendors. We won't get to see what the NDP is proposing for regulations for some time. This is a lot of stuff for the automobile industry to digest, and as such, I believe the referral amendment to be quite in order.

When it comes to veterinary medicine under Bill 31, Bill 31 would require estimates and customer authorization for all veterinary medicine requests and seeks to legislate advertising and, on top of that, more regulatory powers. I have received communication from local veterinarians in my constituency that have significant concerns over this. I received a letter this morning where the individual, a doctor in veterinary medicine, says that veterinary medicine has many pillars to it but two very important pillars, the first being a valid client-patient relationship and the second being responsible stewardship of the antibiotics. Why I bring that up is that I believe that we can't necessarily legislate veterinary medicine in the same way that we would legislate other commodities that are being offered for sale and offered for consumer use.

Not all aspects of the commercial world apply to the medical world, and I think we have to be careful in how we move forward with this type of legislation and how we see that it can have significant damage, can present significant ...

The Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, hon. member, but pursuant to Standing Order 4(2.1) the House stands adjourned until 1:30 this afternoon.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, December 5, 2017

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Good afternoon. Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Dr. Starke: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my very great honour to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly a gentleman who is no stranger to this Assembly or to these halls. He served as the MLA for Wetaskiwin-Camrose from 2008 through 2015 and also served in cabinet as Minister of Justice and minister of agriculture and rural development, and he's someone that I'm very privileged to call a great friend, Mr. Verlyn Olson. He is here with his grandson Josh, who is visiting the Legislature not for the first time, I've learned, and it was really great to see Verlyn and Josh once again. I'd ask everyone to please give them the warm welcome of the Assembly.

Introduction of Guests

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you the students from one of the finest schools in central Alberta, Delburne school. They are accompanied today by teachers Tricia Simpson and Derk Unterschultz along with chaperones Jacquie Myers, Jacquie Svederus, Heather Davidson, James and Christina Guynup, Mandy Marek, and Lance Neilson. I would ask them all to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: My guests aren't here.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you the students of Provost public school with their teacher Mrs. Sherrilyn Spencer along with some chaperones: Mr. Robin Folkins, Mr. Jim Fanning, Mrs. Roxane Murray, and Mrs. Cindy Hill. I ask that they all rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's an honour and a privilege to introduce to you and through you to all the members of the Assembly 60 incredibly intelligent students who are the pride of the riding of Edmonton-Ellerslie and are here from Daly Grove school. They're accompanied by their teachers, Lisa Bruce and Andrea Sloat, as well as by one of the parent chaperones, Jit Chaudhary. I ask them to please stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Are there any other school groups to be introduced?

The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my honour to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Mr. Jonathan Jacobs. Jonathan is an entrepreneur. He is an oil sands electrician, and he's also part of the Alberta Party's energy policy team in Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville. I would ask Jonathan to please now rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to introduce to you and through you to all members in the Assembly Mark Taylor, who is a long-time Alberta Party member. He was a candidate for the party in the 2015 by-election in Calgary-Foothills. His background is in engineering, business coaching. He's a long-time online fan of question period, and this is his first time to visit us in person. He's also been recently appointed as the executive director of the Alberta Party. I ask Mark to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Today I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly Sherry and Matt Sartorelli, who are seated in your gallery. Last week the government introduced presumptive legislation in Bill 30 that would further protect paramedics who suffer from a myocardial event within 24 hours of their shift. I spoke to the clause in the bill, referencing my good friend and teacher David Sartorelli. Dave suffered a heart attack just hours after his shift on medic 8 in Calgary, only to have the same unit and the crew that he relieved respond to his emergency. To our sadness, Dave passed away. Dave served this province for over 32 years but not just him; his family served, too. With the four-on and four-off schedule – and I speak from experience – you give up half. You miss half of every experience, and so does your family. To honour Dave and his family, I ask that Sherry and Matt stand to receive the warm welcome of this Assembly. [Standing ovation]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm honoured to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly some of the guests seated in your gallery and the members' gallery, paramedics who worked with Dave Sartorelli. As the MLA for Calgary-South East has just spoken beautifully about, Dave was a 32-year-old paramedic in Calgary, but more than that, he was a beloved leader and mentor. Today we have with us: from Calgary, David Van Bakel, Donna Zarecki, Raj Dattani, Stuart Brideaux, and Greg Undershute; and from Edmonton, Mike Webb, Dave Hansen, Julian Power, Amy-Jean Easton, Hayley Ballantyne, Angela Lussoso, and Alex Campbell.

Madam Speaker, I'm very pleased that some of his colleagues are here today as we continue to debate Bill 30, which will ensure myocardial coverage for first responders. They will tell you that if Dave were here today, his message would be: "Love your job. Love the fact that you get to make a difference. Love the fact that you can and will make a difference." I'd now like to ask these dedicated men and women to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of our Assembly.

Madam Speaker, I'm also honoured to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly senior leadership from the Health Sciences Association of Alberta. Today we have the HSAA president, Mike Parker, and board member Donna

Farquharson. The HSAA represents over 24,000 paramedical, technical, professional, and general support employees in the public and private health care sectors of Alberta, and on behalf of all of their members they're here to help us honour Dave Sartorelli. They will tell you that there are many people Dave touched and influenced through his passion for advanced cardiac life support and EMS education. I would like to ask Mike and Donna to receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Today I'm very excited to introduce three residents of Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview: Jennifer, Joel, and Sapphira Lewin. These are community leaders and strong advocates for people with special needs. I hope that we can give them a warm traditional reception from the Assembly now, please.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-St. Albert.

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a privilege to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly my constituency assistant, Teresa Sutherland. Teresa brings over 25 years of experience as a social worker and works hard every day to make life better for the people of Spruce Grove-St. Albert. She is here today for the introduction of my colleague's Henson trust private member's bill. If passed, the bill would make a real difference in the lives of a number of my constituents. I would ask her to now rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Service Alberta.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am truly pleased to rise today and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly some fantastic employees from Service Alberta, one of the two best departments in the GOA. This past summer this team led Service Alberta across the province to engage with consumers on improvements to our consumer protection legislation, which I had the honour of tabling just yesterday. As a result of their hard work, we have tabled significant updates to our consumer protection laws. I'm so proud of them, and they will better protect consumers' pocketbooks, help Alberta businesses succeed and consumers have more confidence. I wish that I had the time to introduce all of them individually. They all mean a great deal to me. I'd like them all to rise together as a group and receive the warm welcome of our Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce some very special guests who are seated in the public gallery. I invite them to rise as I introduce them, please: Sam; his parents, Kirstin and Mathias; as well as his grandparents Marianne and Kelly. Sam walked 100 kilometres over 100 days for the Kidney Foundation. Several members of his family have been donors and recipients, including his grandmother, who is here today, who donated her kidney several years ago. I had the pleasure of joining Sam for a portion of his journey this September, when we walked around the Legislature fountain. Sam has raised awareness about organ donation, and it's great to see three generations committed to this project. Please join me in welcoming them to our Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It is my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to members of this Assembly a number of guests who are here today in support of my proposed bill on Henson trusts: Erin Waite, agency director at Connections Counselling; Andrea Hesse, who is the CEO of the Alberta Council of Disability Services and also serves on the board of the Edmonton Chamber of Voluntary Organizations; Gordon VanderLeek, founder of VanderLeek Law, a firm specializing in disability issues; Leonard Lozowy, the president of the Gateway association in Edmonton; Julie Boucher, family support liaison at the Edmonton Down Syndrome Society; Robin Slater, a strong AISH advocate who came all the way from the beautiful town of Canmore. I'd also like to introduce several people who took part in the bill consultation process: Dr. Frances Harley-Urtasun, Shirley Bruha, Gino Ferri, Denise Layton, Dr. Robert Pearcey, and, last but certainly not least, the coexecutive directors of the Medicine Hat and District Food Bank, Celina Symmonds and Tammy Vanderloh. If I could ask all my guests to now rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this House.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thanks, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly the CEO of Inclusion Alberta, Mr. Bruce Uditsky. Inclusion Alberta advocates for and supports individuals with developmental disabilities. Mr. Uditsky is here today to show support for Bill 211, the Assured Income for the Severely Handicapped (Discretionary Trust) Amendment Act, 2017. I would ask Mr. Uditsky to now rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the House again the two codirectors of the Medicine Hat food bank. These two ladies are excellent directors, but they are also tremendous community builders, leaders in a brown bag lunch program for over 30 schools in Medicine Hat, leaders in community garden enhancement for providing food and opportunities for family members, and are great at making solutions to help use and harvest the elk population for those that are in need. If I could ask Tammy Vanderloh and Celina Symmonds to again please rise and accept the traditional warm welcome of the House.

Members' Statements

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Henson Trusts for Persons with Disabilities

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Today is an exciting day because I'll be tabling my first piece of legislation, which, if passed, would enable families to set up Henson trusts for their loved ones living with disabilities. The process of drafting this bill has taught me a lot about community-led consultations and the importance of Nothing about Us without Us. With the help of my staff and members of the community, that's what we set out to do, to learn what the community needed and to put forward proposed legislation that they had a hand in crafting.

The problem that my proposed private member's bill would fix came to my attention when a constituent in Calgary-Currie came into my office to ask why a family member with a disability who inherited assets after a loved one passed away could have their AISH supports clawed back. This didn't seem right to me, Madam Speaker, so we began province-wide consultations. We heard from Albertans in Calgary and Peace River, from Edmonton, Chestermere, and Taber. Over 3,400 names are on a petition begun by Inclusion Alberta, asking the government to allow Henson trusts. The result of those consultations and outreach is my proposed private member's Bill 211.

For Richard, who lives in Calgary-Shaw, it is, to quote him, an absurd situation that Henson trusts are not allowed. Supporting them, quote, would only be logical. And as Tannis, who reached out to my Lethbridge-East colleague, explained, it is, quote, unfair that I, with a speaking voice and earning potential, am not limited in saving for the future but my brother, with neither, is.

This proposed legislation never would have been possible without the hundreds of Albertans who worked together to help me form this proposed legislation, and to them I say a very sincere thank you.

Forest Industry Concerns

Mr. Schneider: Madam Speaker, as the year winds to a close, I wonder what lessons this government will take away in regard to how they deal with forestry issues. We had another year of devastating fires in Alberta and B.C. The southern Alberta fires in the Suffield, Waterton, and Crowsnest regions, while not nearly on the scale of destruction of the Horse River fire of 2016, indeed were devastating and emotional to those affected, as much as those in Fort McMurray. We have the unresolved issue of Alberta's caribou strategy already several months overdue, which continues to cause worry to a forest industry just recently smacked with duties imposed by the U.S. softwood trade issue. We have an ever-increasing problem with the mountain pine beetle, and while Alberta has been doing a decent job in the past dealing with its effects, different solutions need to be found to win this battle.

Madam Speaker, this industry is already reeling from the issues of the past few years, and now January 1 is looming, and the NDP's tax on everything is set to go up to $30 a tonne. That means increases on fuels such as gasoline, diesel, propane, and natural gas in order to harvest, log, and transport these trees to the mill. Then these trees need to enter the phase of processing, and the finished product must be shipped to market. Basically, this government will increase costs on practically every stage of the manufacturing process on a global commodity that simply cannot pass the increased costs on to consumers and remain competitive.

We already find ourselves in a situation where this government's complete mismanagement of numerous departments has seen investors flee the province. The province's credit rating dropped six times. Unemployment skyrocketed to the tune of 12,400 jobs lost in November alone.

Madam Speaker, this government needs to shelve the ideology, step back, and start doing what they can to stop the bleeding so that we have something to salvage in 2019.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South West.

Member for Lacombe-Ponoka's Remarks

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Last week the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka made comments here in the House about the Chinese community. The members' words were more than just absurd; they were troubling, unhelpful, and offensive.

The member should know that Chinese-Canadians are not defined by what he said in those comments. We are more than that. We contribute significantly to this country economically and culturally. We don't need people perpetuating old school prejudices from the 1890s.

I believed that these stereotypes had subsided with time, but apparently they're still alive and well in the UCP. The fact that the member would use the Chinese community and these stereotypes in this Legislature to conjure up a narrative to score cheap political points is tasteless.

And it's not just me, Madam Speaker. I've spoken with leaders from the community, and they are not impressed. When I spoke with William Lau, a member of the Edmonton Chinese Young Leaders Council, I heard from him that the comments were inappropriate regardless of the context. They crossed a line. The Member for Lacombe-Ponoka never should have used those stereotypes. He never should have used those stereotypes in this House, and he should apologize to the Chinese-Canadian community.

I spoke with other prominent leaders in the Chinese community who stated that the member's words simply were not grounded in facts. She told me that his speech would do more harm than good and was an unsupported opinion.

This member needs to do the right thing. This member needs to apologize in this House for his comments about the Chinese-Canadian community and recognize that stereotypes do not contribute to political discussion.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Mason: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Point of order noted.

Oral Question Period

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Trans Mountain Pipeline Construction

Mr. Nixon: Just over one year ago right here this Premier's Energy minister said in regard to Trans Mountain that shovels will be in the ground within the year. Here we are a year later, and Kinder Morgan says that, unfortunately, the scope and pace of permits and approvals received does not allow for significant additional construction to begin at this time. It's clear that when it comes to getting Trans Mountain approved, this government is just not getting the job done. To the Premier: when was the last time that you bothered even reaching out to the federal and B.C. governments in regard to these important permit issues on Trans Mountain?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. You know, the Conservatives couldn't get a pipeline built for 20 years, and now they want to act like tough guys, threatening a trade war with B.C. It would be amusing if it wasn't just so sad. I'll tell you something. I am not going to take any advice from the ready, fire, aim crowd over there. I'm going to continue to do what I've been doing since day one: fighting for good schools and hospitals and our kids and our loved ones, fighting for good jobs, and, of course, fighting to get this pipeline built.

Mr. Nixon: Madam Speaker, again, we do this every day. The Premier stands up. She will not answer simple questions. She goes on and on with fearmongering. All she can do is read her speaking notes with her talking points. It is ridiculous. It was a simple question. So I'll ask another simple question. How many permits have been approved for Trans Mountain, and how many more need to be approved? That's it. Just a simple question.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. You know, I will say that talk is cheap because, of course, the member opposite is reading from his press release of a mere two hours ago. Anyway, you know, I will say that, notwithstanding the price of talk, the members over there certainly can talk, but they just can't get anything done. Conservative government in B.C., Conservative government in Ottawa, Conservative government in Alberta, and still – still – they couldn't get a pipeline built. You know, you just have to really work hard to be that ineffective, but we aren't going to repeat those failures. We're going to get this pipeline built.

Mr. Nixon: Madam Speaker, I have listed many pipelines that have been approved under the federal Conservatives, but we're here today to talk about the provincial NDP, who have two cancelled pipelines and another pipeline upgrade that looks like it's about to be prevented from being built despite this Premier saying that she would get it built.

Here's why the Premier doesn't want to talk about permits. The project requires 1,200 permits. Sixty-six of them have been approved. That is a long way from this Energy minister saying that shovels would be in the ground at this time this year. So the question to the Premier is: what is she doing to get those permits approved? Is she putting forward serious consequences to B.C. if they continue to block our pipelines, or is she just going to continue to stand up in this House and . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you, Madam Speaker. You know, I do admit that we're not going to convince absolutely everyone, but what we are doing is working very hard to convince the moderate, progressive majority of Canadians. Indeed, I've set out across the country to do just that, and just last week I was in B.C. Now, I get that the members opposite might not be aware of that because, you know, they've been yelling and screaming so long, they're not part of the progressive, moderate majority of Canadians any longer. But I will tell you that, in fact, that's who we're talking about, and that's who we're talking to. We will not build walls. We will build pipelines, and we're going to get the job done.

The Deputy Speaker: Second main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: Madam Speaker, all this Premier has left is personal shots. Here are the facts. Paper approval from the Trudeau Liberals is not a project that is completed. That is not shovels in the ground. We were promised, we were told in this House that there would be shovels in the ground at this time. There are not. The Premier doesn't want to stand up and acknowledge that serious issue. She continues going forward with a carbon tax that is killing jobs in our province. In fact, the NDP are going to increase that carbon tax in less than a month. The question is this: if you can't get B.C. to work with you on those and you've proved that social licence is not working, will you cancel your carbon tax increase?

Ms Notley: Well, Madam Speaker, as you know, we are continuing our hard work to get the pipeline built. In addition, the federal government is also continuing that work as a result of not screaming at them but actually talking to them on a regular basis, as we do, like adults. They have now joined our application at the NEB to ensure and to request that this matter move forward on a more timely basis. That's the kind of work that you do when you want to get outcomes, and that's why we will in fact deliver outcomes.

Mr. Nixon: Outcomes? Two cancelled pipelines and another one that's on the ropes.

The Premier says that she's talking to people about the pipelines. Well, I've pointed out that she's not even taking any action, but let's talk about talking. The last time that she met with B.C.'s NDP leader, precisely one year ago, to discuss this project, he said that she had no intention of persuading him on pipelines. My question, Madam Speaker, to the Premier is very, very simple. Do you have the intention of persuading them on pipelines now, or are you going to continue to allow this project to be blocked?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. As the member opposite probably knows, the reality is that the decision has already been taken, and the delay in having this matter go forward is actually in relation to the decisions with respect to the city of Burnaby. That is why the matter is before the NEB, and that is why the government of Alberta is there alongside Kinder Morgan asking the NEB to move the matter along and to ensure that Burnaby doesn't overstep its authority. That is a reasonable thing to do. Having temper tantrums, grandstanding, and doing what they do pretty much from the minute they get up in the morning and look in the mirror does not help. It really doesn't. What we are doing does.

Mr. Nixon: Just over one year ago, when Ottawa gave paper approval to this project, the Premier said: we are showing here today that's how to get actual results. Well, one year later this project has only 66 of 1,200 permits needed. There are delays and no expected date for actual shovels to be in the ground. But Albertans in my constituency and your constituency are stuck with the job-killing carbon tax that will increase by 50 per cent. Given the failure of the NDP's plan on social licence, will they stand up, acknowledge it, and cancel the carbon tax increase?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Madam Speaker, let's talk a little bit about cost, and let's talk a little bit about affordability. Our government has capped electricity rates; the members opposite would jack them up. Our government extended the tuition freeze; the members opposite would make parents pay more. Our government banned door-to-door sales; the members opposite would lift the ban. We cut school fees; the members opposite would increase them. What we are doing is actually not increasing costs but increasing affordability, and I am very proud of that record.

The Deputy Speaker: Third main question. The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: They capped electricity rates at double today's price, so thanks for nothing, Madam Premier.

Carbon Levy Increase

Mr. Nixon: In less than a month the job-killing carbon tax will be hiked by 50 per cent. This is a massive tax that the NDP did not campaign on in 2015. In fact, they hid it from Albertans. Despite their vague talk of social licence at least $34.8 billion in investment has fled our oil sands sector alone since the NDP announced the job-killing carbon tax. The economy is still suffering, and we have no new pipelines. Will the Premier admit that her social licence carbon tax scheme is a failure and cancel the increase?

Ms Notley: Well, what I will do is continue talking about the things that we have done to support Albertans and to reduce costs. For instance, we brought in a child benefit helping 380,000 children in the province of Alberta. The members opposite voted against it. We lowered the small-business tax. The members opposite certainly wouldn't do that because that's part of the climate leadership plan. Madam Speaker, 60 per cent of Alberta families get a carbon levy rebate to help them bring down their emissions to reduce their costs for years and years going forward. The members opposite think that's awful. The fact is that our plan is working, and those folks don't like it.

Mr. Nixon: Madam Speaker, the NDP brought in the largest tax increase in the history of our province, a tax increase that they did not campaign on and that they misled Albertans on.

Yesterday the government of Saskatchewan announced their climate change strategy, but Saskatchewan's plan aims to reduce greenhouse gas emissions without any sort of a carbon tax. So the question, Madam Speaker, is this. When the NDP were designing their climate change plan, did they even consider not having a carbon tax, or is this always just about the tax grab for this NDP government?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm so glad that the members opposite brought up the province of Saskatchewan. Let's compare. In Saskatchewan their growth rate is stuck at 1.4 per cent, and in Alberta our growth rate is 4.1 per cent. In Saskatchewan the government just brought in a made-in-Ottawa carbon tax, and what we have here is a made-in-Alberta carbon levy that industry got to be part of. That's what happens when you do your homework instead of sitting in the corner having a temper tantrum.

Mr. Nixon: The government of Saskatchewan did not bring in a made-in-Ottawa carbon tax. They actually stood up for the citizens, something this government should look at.

The Alberta economy has a long way to go until it recovers. Last month Alberta lost over 12,000 full-time jobs under this NDP government's watch. Alberta reports show that 13,000 insolvencies in our province happened last year alone, and this government is bringing in a 50 per cent increase to their job-killing carbon tax. The Premier can't defend it. That's why she talks about everything else. Will she stand up and admit that she's got it wrong and announce that she's going to cancel this increase on Albertans?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. What I'll stand up and admit is that since June of last year our province has created tens of thousands of new jobs. In addition, manufacturing is up. Retail sales are up. Housing starts are up. Small-business confidence is up.

Mr. Mason: Drilling is up.

Ms Notley: Drilling is up, Madam Speaker. Investment is up. Things are looking up. I know that makes the guys over there seem very sad, but thankfully it's making life better for Albertans.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Nonprofit Organizations

Mr. Clark: Why, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Alberta's not-for-profit sector has a long history of delivering high-quality, efficient services to Albertans, but there's a lot of worry that the government's so-called compassionate cuts will have a big impact on not-for-profits. There's evidence that they're attempting to take over rather than partner with certain programs that are delivered far more efficiently by the not-for-profit sector. Funding Alberta's not-for-profits is the most efficient way to deliver many services because it matches volunteers and donors with the comprehensiveness of government. To the Premier: will you commit to working with not-for-profits rather than taking a government-first approach?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Of course, I will commit to that. In fact, I can also point to a record of exactly that ever since we were elected. One of the first things that our government did when we were elected was, through the urgings of our Minister of Finance, to make a significant increase in FCSS funding, which, of course, as the member opposite knows, is critical to many nonprofits across the province. We've done that on that matter. There's a raft of other ways in which we work closely with nonprofits, and we are pleased to do that because, of course, they contribute so much to the quality of life in our province.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Now, with respect, I think that many food banks and school nutrition programs would disagree that it's not a government-first approach.

One of Alberta's strengths is our ability to innovate, and innovation often means government working with partners to find new ways to deliver programs, but surprisingly this government has continued the Conservatives' inflexible funding approach through the AGLC, CIP, and CFEP, this to the detriment of not-for-profits that want to innovate, collaborate, and build capacity. Again to the Premier: will you commit to modernizing funding models to support innovation and collaboration in the not-for-profit sector?

Ms Notley: Well, Madam Speaker, we of course will always commit to work with nonprofits and to hear any concerns they have with respect to the efficacy of those programs for them, and we do work very, very closely with them. Last fiscal year alone over 17,000 charities were licensed to carry out charitable gaming, for instance, in support of their communities, and they were able to raise in excess of $330 million. A lot of this is working. In addition, we've increased our partnership with many of these organizations. We've increased funding to them in a number of different ways because we value the important work that they provide to Albertans across this province, and we want to continue to build on those relationships.

The Deputy Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's not just the amount of money; it's how those organizations are restricted in how they can use the money.

More and more Albertans are turning to the not-for-profit sector to simply survive the largest economic downturn in a generation, yet our constituency offices hear repeatedly that innovative project funding and funding applications continue to be denied. Now, I happen to know that this Finance minister knows a lot about this sector, so my last question will be to you. To the Minister of Finance: as you consider your compassionate cuts, how can the not-for-profit sector trust that future funding will support the most innovative, creative, and effective programing?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. You know, we have a dedicated team at AGLC. Just today I announced the hiring and appointment of Alain Maissoneuve, a 30-year employee of AGLC and the board before that. He is dedicated to making sure that charities in this province get what they need as a result of their gaming activities, 'racinos,' and other kinds of things. We're going to continue to work with all of our partners to make sure they have what they need going forward to serve the citizens of this province.

Seniors and Housing Minister's Activities

Ms Fitzpatrick: Madam Speaker, during our fall session we have heard about the many ministerial visits this summer. I know that the Minister of Seniors and Housing, who represents a wide diversity of Albertans, attended many of these visits. To the Minister of Seniors and Housing. Connecting with Albertans is essential in creating inclusive social policy. What connections have you made?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. This summer I travelled all over this province and had the opportunity to listen to Albertans from Peace River to Medicine Hat. I visited 23 Albertan communities between June and August. I met John and Mable Baxter in Whitecourt. They contributed 3,500 volunteer hours serving their community – this included sharing their gift of music – which inspired their receipt of the minister's seniors service award.

Ms Fitzpatrick: To the same minister. I know that the constituents of Lethbridge-East certainly appreciated your visit. During your tour what did you hear from citizens?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister of seniors.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Communities like Lethbridge-East are seeing the economy recover, and they want to know how our government is making life better for them. I met seniors at Green Acres lodges receiving excellent housing and social supports as respected and valued members of Lethbridge. I heard from seniors and Albertans on low income that they want our government to carefully find savings while protecting the public services that families count on. Albertans are looking for inclusive, caring, and steady leadership, and our government is providing it.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Madam Speaker, I have also heard from my constituents that they want government to focus on a steady economic recovery while helping vulnerable Albertans. What actions have you taken to address this issue?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister of seniors.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. We've protected more than $800 million in seniors' benefits over the last two years. We're building 4,100 homes for Albertans through our $1.2 billion investment in affordable housing. We have 62 construction and planning projects currently under way. We know that Jason Kenney's Conservatives' reckless plan to cut 20 per cent of the province's budget would hit Albertans hard. Our government is investing in safe and affordable housing to make life better for Albertans.

Alberta Health Services

Mr. Fraser: Our health system is very large and increasingly complex. The Alberta Health Services organizational chart shows hundreds of positions, with responsibilities ranging from patient care to IT services, and it can be hard to keep track of just who is responsible for what. While many of these positions are filled by passionate people delivering quality work for our health system, our financial reality means that we need to ensure that the maximum number of dollars is focused on the front line and not on management. To the Minister of Health: when was the last time the organizational structure of AHS was reviewed with the intent of eliminating obsolete or underperforming positions?

The Deputy Speaker: The Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker and to the member for the important question. Let me assure the member that it is a constant effort and that every time there is a budget done or every time there is a position that is vacated, it is certainly taken into consideration as well. I also want to assure the member that every year the Canadian Institute for Health Information, also known as CIHI, does an annual review, and he should be assured knowing that AHS's total administrative expenses are 30 per cent lower than the national average. Any time there's an opportunity to be even more efficient, we definitely take that into consideration, but in terms of comparisons to other jurisdictions, we are certainly far ahead, in a better position than others.

Mr. Fraser: Given that AHS is responsible for a number of projects to improve health care and given that it's important to note performance measures that indicate a clear end date and given that we can save money by wrapping up projects that have either achieved the objective or gone several years without significant progress and reinvesting that money in supporting front-line services and effective management, to the same minister: will you direct AHS to conduct a review of all ongoing projects to determine whether these projects are still delivering value for tax dollars and to ensure that staff positions associated with these projects are phased out if they're no longer needed?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker and to the member for the question. Again, this is something that we've been working on with AHS, to review the grant cycle. Of course, every time that those are up, we think it's important that we consider whether or not we're getting full return on those investments. We do that both with AHS as well as with Alberta Health. For example, when the RPAP contract was up, we looked at whether or not it was being done most effectively, and we determined that there were opportunities to expand RPAP from specifically looking at physicians to looking at all health professionals in rural and remote communities. I'm really pleased to see that that's been expanded and that we're moving forward in a very thoughtful way to get better results for rural communities.

Mr. Fraser: Given that organizations like AHS and Alberta Health look to their leadership for guidance and given that reforming our health system is going to take an enormous effort and good ideas from all across the health system and given that workers in our health system will be more willing to bring forward their cost-saving and innovation ideas if they see the heads of their respective departments doing the same, to the same minister: what are you doing along with AHS leadership to demonstrate to employees of AHS and Alberta Health that you're committed to fostering innovation and implementing cost-saving measures in our health system?

Ms Hoffman: Thank you again, Madam Speaker and to the member for the thoughtful question. I want to reiterate that it's one of the leaner management structures across Canada at a ratio of 1 to 29 per staff leader, but that doesn't mean there aren't opportunities to do more. I certainly welcome the member opposite to continue these conversations if he has specific initiatives he'd like to bring forward. Just yesterday I spoke to the president and CEO of AHS. I meet with the board regularly. We continue to push for innovation, efficiency, and getting the most resources possible to the front lines instead of moving for rash, ideological cuts, like the Official Opposition's, of 20 per cent. That's not going to happen as . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Reporting of Child Abuse and Neglect

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Today I once again raise the name of Serenity. I do so for her mother, who does not want to see other parents suffer the pain that comes from losing a child. Last spring I promised her that I would do my best to convince my colleagues to implement a simple legislative change that will save the lives of Alberta's children. Premier, I made this proposal a year ago. Why has your government failed to adopt this common-sense, life-saving change on its own?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I want to start by thanking Serenity's mother for being here today, for your bravery, for your steadfastness in advocating for your daughter even in the face of such a great loss. I want you to know that we all stand behind you in your continued advocacy for Serenity. Let me be clear. Reporting suspected abuse and neglect is the law. Our whole Legislature is committed to honouring the memory of Serenity by taking action to prevent child abuse.

The Deputy Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Ellis: But you're not taking action, Minister.

Madam Speaker, thank you. Given that Serenity's law would make it the responsibility of every adult in Alberta to contact a police officer if they know a child is in need of intervention, Premier, will you commit to support passing Serenity's law today?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I want to thank the member for his proposal and his commitment to preventing child abuse, a commitment that we both share. Our law enforcement partners, including the Alberta Association of Chiefs of Police, have suggested to us that they have some concerns with this proposal, and we continue to have concerns about unintended consequences and confusion with this proposal. But I certainly made the commitment to Serenity's mother that I will work with the member and I will work with the police force and all that I need to do to advance the cause of preventing child abuse and preventing a tragedy such as happened to Serenity from happening again.

Mr. Ellis: Those are not the same law enforcement officers I've spoken to.

Given that on December 12, 2016, the Premier told me that Serenity's law is exactly the kind of practical idea her government was looking for to improve the child intervention system and given that despite their request for solutions and despite me handing them a solution that can be passed today – Premier, what is your excuse going to be now? And don't tell me. Tell Serenity's mother. She's here. She's behind me. Tell her to her face.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I did sit down with Serenity's mother earlier today to hear from her about her suggestions and to offer my continued condolences. I want to thank the member for this proposal and acknowledge again his commitment to the issue. I have all intentions of having a meeting with the member opposite immediately to discuss our shared objective, which is preventing child abuse. I truly believe that by working together, we can ensure that other children are safe and supported.

Workers' Compensation Board Surplus Funds

Mr. Hunter: Madam Speaker, far too often in this House we find ourselves at odds with each other. However, today I have a good-news story that I'd like to share with you and especially with Alberta businesses. The other day I learned that the WCB will be returning over $350 million of surplus premiums to Albertans. As the Official Opposition we've worked hard and put a lot of pressure on the government to do the right thing and give back the money to Alberta's struggling businesses. To the minister: when will this money go back to the Alberta employers, and how will it be distributed, through a rebate or through offsets to the 2018 premiums?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I'm very proud of the work that our government has been doing to review the Workers' Compensation Board and to bring in Bill 30. As part of Bill 30 we chose not to direct the WCB on what to do with surpluses in their accident fund. That leaves the decision with distributing or using the accident fund surpluses to a purpose that benefits the entire system in the hands of the WCB. This is not a government decision. This is one that WCB makes. I understand, having read the announcement from the WCB, that there will be credits issued to employers.

Mr. Hunter: Madam Speaker, given that it is always best practice to do an economic impact study and that surely the Minister of Labour performed such a study prior to engaging in a WCB review of this magnitude, to the minister: when did the actuarial firm Eckler complete their costing analysis, which indicated an increase of $94 million due to your proposed changes, and why would the WCB withhold the full $350 million? Did you expeditiously share Eckler's findings with the WCB?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Our government believes that comprehensively reviewing critical workplace legislation like the Workers' Compensation Act, like the Occupational Health and Safety Act, pieces of legislation that had not been reviewed in decades, is a priority, and that is why we turned our attention to performing in-depth reviews and have brought forward results from those reviews through Bill 30. Making sure that we are making sound decisions that create a sustainable workers' compensation system, that gives employees fair rehabilitation is a priority.

Mr. Hunter: Madam Speaker, given that the Official Opposition has been insistent that this government return the surplus and given that the WCB felt compelled to hold back the $350 million until they knew what the cost of these changes would be, is the minister willing to admit that she caused Alberta businesses undue hardship because of her year-long musings about how to change the WCB? In fact, even better, is she willing to apologize to our job-creating business owners who had to do without this much-needed money during one of the worst recessions in Alberta history?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a little rich to hear the accusations coming from the members opposite when we know that their plan of billions of dollars of reckless cuts would hurt Albertans, would hurt business, would hurt business confidence. We engaged in a comprehensive, robust investigation into the workers' compensation system. We worked with businesses. We worked with users of the system. We worked with representatives. We brought forward through Bill 30 a package of responsible changes to make sure there is a sustainable system that delivers fair rehabilitation.

Renewable Energy Land Leases

Mr. Stier: Well, Madam Speaker, just like a year ago, my constituency office continues to receive questions from landowners regarding leasing of their agricultural lands for solar and wind farm proposals. Despite what was promised in the climate tax plan propaganda, this government has obviously failed again to provide information or local consultation sessions to potentially affected landowners about locations, unsightly transmission lines, substations, nor anything on subsidies and compensation. To the Premier: why hasn't your climate tax plan included local information and consultation sessions?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for the very important question. On my trips across the province – I made many of them, putting on many miles, talking to farmers and ranchers across the province, farmers and ranchers that, when I talked to them, they let me know: what can they do? They want to be able to do their part for the green economy. They want to do their part to reduce emissions. They want to do their part to gain those energy efficiencies and those economic benefits, and they're more than willing. We'll continue working with them to find those efficiencies to make them more profitable in the evergreening economy.

Mr. Stier: Well, Madam Speaker, despite what the forestry minister has just said, given that a landowner who called just yesterday has to date received no information about those infrastructure and compensation concerns and given that agreeing to such a contract would cause loss of use of his prime agricultural land, where hundreds of acres will be taken out of production, and doing so would violate the primary goals and objectives regarding agriculture of a regional plan, to the minister: with all the rhetoric that has accompanied your climate tax plan, again, why has your government, obviously, not informed Albertans of this vital information?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Madam Speaker and Member for the question. To reiterate, farmers and ranchers do want to do their part. They're looking forward to be able to take part in the climate leadership plan. They do their part to generate electricity on their properties. They do so willingly. The member is trying to allude that somehow they're being forced into taking part in the green economy. They're not. They're more than willing, and we're working as a government, making sure that they have those opportunities available to them and that they take advantage of them.

Mr. Stier: Well, Madam Speaker, just like landowners, I have no trust with this faulty climate tax plan.

Given that the particular landowner involved is also concerned about how these projects will be funded and how much subsidy has been given to those companies that are inquiring about his property and given that he has legitimate concerns about what might happen to his agricultural land if one of these companies goes insolvent, will the minister confirm today that all participating landowners who risk their property and join negatively impacted neighbours will be fully compensated in the event of a project failure?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Carlier: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you again to the member for the question. Important to note that there are many advocacies out there that are able to help landowners in negotiating a lease with companies. That includes the Farmers' Advocate and Alberta Utilities Commission. You know, the government is routinely working with the Farmers' Advocate to ensure that landowners' rights continue to be paramount, that they continue to have those rights. They will continue to do so. This government, my ministry, the Ministry of Environment and Parks will continue working with farmers and ranchers across the province to ensure that they have the opportunity to take advantage of the green economy and that they are protected in their landowners' rights.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Spruce Grove-St. Albert.

New-home Owner Consumer Protection

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Buying a home is one of the most important purchases that a person can make. With more and more young families moving into and raising their families in my riding, many constituents I speak to are thinking about making the jump to home ownership but are apprehensive about potential consumer risks after reading stories about Reid Built Homes. To the Minister of Municipal Affairs: what is the government doing to protect Albertans that invest their savings in a new home?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I don't know how you could miss me.

Buying a new home is the largest investment an Albertan can make. It's an investment in their family and their kids and their future, and when Albertans make that investment, they deserve to be protected. We've been working with our GOA partners in Service Alberta and Treasury Board and Finance along with the Alberta New Home Warranty Program to ensure we are offering consumers comprehensive protections on both the front end and the back end of buying their homes. Our government will continue to engage with Albertans and stakeholders while we make practical changes to put consumers first.

The Deputy Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Horne: Thank you, Madam Speaker, you need a licence to go fishing in this province, and now you need a licence to construct a home. To the same minister: how is this government protecting homebuyers from builders that have a history of fraud or negligence?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. One of our government's top priorities is putting people first and protecting consumers. After hearing from Albertans, we took action to implement a better licensing framework that will protect consumers and help them distinguish the few bad builders from the many, many good builders. Builders must provide information about their track record with related consumer protection and safety legislation, disclose any history of fraud or building-related court proceedings, and provide information about their corporate structure. As I said, our government is protecting and improving things that will make a difference in the lives of all Albertans.

The Deputy Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Horne: Thank you. There were over 22,000 housing starts in Alberta in 2016. Given the large number of Albertans that purchased a new home, can the same minister inform the House about what he heard from the public and from new-home builders on this issue?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member. What we heard was that while mandatory warranty for new homes in Alberta was a positive step, additional measures had to be taken to strengthen the program in order to meet the program outcomes, so as of December 1 all residential builders will require a licence to obtain building permits for new homes and to build new homes. This licensing program was a collaborative solution created by our government, industry leaders, and everyday Albertans to protect consumers and make life easier when buying a home. I am proud of this new program.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Blue Quills University Funding

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Almost everyone I talk to agrees that postsecondary education is a gateway to prosperity and self-sufficiency, but it appears not to this government. To the Minister of Advanced Education: does the minister believe that Albertans, regardless of their location or ethnicity, should have the same support and access to postsecondary education?

The Deputy Speaker: The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to talk about all of the good things that our government has done to support the students of Alberta through the Ministry of Advanced Education. Just last week I was proud to announce the continuation of our government's freeze on tuition. That means that more than 250,000 students in Alberta will pay the same price for tuition that they did last year and the year before and the year before that. Under those guys we had the highest tuition in the entire country. Under our government we're among the lowest in the whole country.

Mr. Hanson: Madam Speaker, given that the minister wouldn't even say yes about equivalent support and given that graduates with various degrees from Blue Quills First Nations university, a university only recently given accredited status, are being hired to run programs at major universities because of the superior and unique training they've received, does the minister support the idea that provincial support should be relatively equal for equivalent degree programs and that a degree is a degree is a degree?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm pleased that our government is supporting university and college education all across the province. We've done a number of things in addition to freezing tuition. We've increased operating grants by 2 per cent every year to every university and college in the province. In addition to that, we're increasing foundational learning opportunities through adult learning providers and English as a second language programs. We're doing a number of things to support adult learners in this province, and our government is very proud of our track record in supporting the students of Alberta.

The Deputy Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Given that operating support for postsecondary institutions is a $2.3 billion line item while Blue Quills struggles to afford a load of gravel for their parking lot and given that a degree program at a major university can be subsidized by Advanced Education upwards of $9,000 per student while a degree-granting program at Blue Quills First Nations university only receives in the area of $2,400, to the minister: if a degree is a degree, why does Advanced Education discriminate against Blue Quills degrees? What inherent bias is your department practising?

Mr. Schmidt: Well, Madam Speaker, we're proud of our continued support of the First Nations colleges in the province of Alberta, but let's talk about what their plan would do to the offering of degrees in the province of Alberta. They're proposing cuts so large that they would be the equivalent of shutting down the University of Alberta, the fifth-highest ranked university in the country of Canada. Those guys want to close it down or the equivalent thereof. Under their plan tuition would skyrocket and very few students would have the opportunity to pursue higher education. We're standing against that. We're in favour of . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Long-term and Continuing Care Beds

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Wait-lists continue to grow for people waiting to enter into a continuing care, long-term bed, with an increase of 32 per cent to our wait-list reported in Alberta Health Services' latest annual report. Our seniors population is growing exponentially, expected to hit a quarter of our population by 2032. Recognizing that we need to plan for the future with forethought into the planning, how does this government identify, plan, and promote the development of facilities that cater to seniors?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker and to the member for the important question. Certainly, we did inherit a significant infrastructure deficit, predicated by the deep cuts that we all bore in Alberta during the '90s. As a result, when our government was elected, we were elected on a platform to provide 2,000 new long-term care and dementia care spaces for the people of Alberta. That's why we're moving forward to make sure that those happen as quickly as possible in the areas where they're most needed, including in the hon. member's riding, in the community of Fort McMurray. We're really proud to move forward on a project that his colleagues promised for decades, didn't move on, and this government is doing so.

Mr. Yao: Madam Speaker, this government has promised 2,000 long-term, extended care beds since 2015. According to Alberta Health Services our need for continuing care placements has gone up from 1,411 to 1,873 people just last year. The facilities required to meet this need will alleviate many of the pressures on our hospitals that are housing these patients. How is this government planning, designing, and budgeting for continuing care and long-term beds that serve Albertans?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much again, Madam Speaker. Just in the first three months of this year, for example, we opened 388 new continuing care spaces for the people of this province. We're helping them transition from a hospital back into community, which we know is a better opportunity for them to age in. We're also working to make sure that we can keep them in their homes longer by ensuring that we have adequate supply of home-care funds, something that we know has been neglected for many years. We're moving forward on increasing investment in those areas instead of moving for deep ideological cuts like the members opposite. I'm happy to work with this specific member, who seems to be asking for a very reasonable line of questioning around investment, instead of all of his colleagues who are calling for deep cuts, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Yao: Madam Speaker, there are six acres of prime land in downtown Fort McMurray which are ideal for the aging-in-community concept, and the design that's being pushed forward by the government is a sprawling four-storey complex that fills the majority of the site for only 144 beds. It's common knowledge that it's cheaper to build up. Does this government understand that this site could potentially house thousands of residents at a reduced cost with a different design so that as demand increases, land is readily available. Or do you enjoy spending money studying communities and purchasing more ideal parcels of land for future growth?

Ms Jansen: Madam Speaker, one of the things that has been a real pleasure for me is to be able to work with the folks of Fort McMurray. I met with my good friend the new mayor of the Wood Buffalo region, Don Scott, and with his new council and just had a fantastic conversation about the continuing care centre at Willow Square, well under way and on track to start construction in the spring of 2018. One of the conversations, one of the things that we talked about, and one of the great things about the folks in Fort McMurray and our excellent relationship is that they are an incredibly collaborative new council and looking forward to working on...

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Wildfire Response Reviews

Mr. Schneider: Madam Speaker, as Forestry critic it is important that I ask these questions. Despite assurances by this minister that his department has learned valuable lessons from the Flat Top Complex and Horse River fire reports, it's plain to see that only lip service is being paid to several glaring issues. A debrief of the Kenow wildfire paints a bleak picture of fire communications in complete disarray, similar to what was experienced in the early stages of the Horse River fire. Minister, there was nearly an 18-month gap between those two incidents. Why are the same communication issues popping up?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you very much. You know, Madam Speaker, the Kenow fires were very wild and unpredictable, and we know that we empathize with all the folks that have lost livestock or buildings. We have been working closely with people on the ground. My folks and AEMA are always in contact with them and throughout those fires. It was a pretty hairy situation, I know, with the different jurisdictions that were involved. The municipalities that were there: we are working with them to educate them on, you know, what they need and what we can do better to help them, as we do after every disaster.

Mr. Schneider: Given that the municipality of Wood Buffalo only learned of the city's evacuation order from Twitter, of all places, and given that during the recent fire that we all know as Kenow, it's alleged that the Premier commented on loss of buildings and the status of the wildfire within the MD of Pincher Creek, information that was never shared with either municipal staff or elected officials, Minister, when will your department fix the glaring lack of information sharing between local, provincial, and federal entities during disasters that happen in this province?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. You know, we had field officers on the ground during this fire. They communicated directly with local officials, and it is completely inaccurate to say that provincial officials had the information before they did. We had the POC in contact with them day by day, minute by minute. Every time something was happening, they were informed. We will continue to work with them, and I don't appreciate the opposite member's inaccurate information that he's trying to portray about the hard-working people in those municipalities and the first responders.

Mr. Schneider: Madam Speaker, I expect that I will have to FOIP that to try and get an answer.

Given that it has been over five years since the Flat Top recommendations came out and given that the minister stated, "As of March 17, all 21 recommendations from the Flat Top Complex Wildfire Review Committee have either been completed or fully incorporated within Agriculture and Forestry's day-to-day wildfire management program," Minister, will it take another tragedy before your department fixes these dangerous shortfalls in emergency situations?

Mr. S. Anderson: Madam Speaker, as I said, we continuously work with the municipalities on what they're doing during a disaster. This is an extreme event. Whenever there is a disaster, we do lessons learned after the fact, we discuss with officials on the ground, and we try to do things better. [interjections] Thanks, guys. I appreciate that if you'd listen to my answer, you'd hear me. We continue to work with everybody on the ground. We have resources available for municipal officials, CAOs, for the fire departments in those areas. We are always working with them, and we will continue to do so.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton-Valley-Devon.

Half-day Kindergarten School Transportation Fees

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Having access to high-quality education at an early age is important for the healthy development of any child, and many parents choose different educational routes depending on their backgrounds and their circumstances. One choice that many parents make is to enrol their children in either a half-day kindergarten program or an alternating full-day program. Many experienced educators and parents believe that their children are best served by having the half-day option. Does the Minister of Education support half-day kindergarten and this educational option for all Albertans who choose it?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Certainly, it's up to the school boards on how they choose to disseminate kindergarten education across the province. I mean, certainly, different places make different choices according to their resources and their population of kindergarten children. That being said, the recent example of the member, I think, is pertaining to Elk Island for their kindergarten. That school board made that choice, and that's the path that they chose to take.

The Deputy Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Given that many educators and parents believe that a half-day kindergarten option is best for their children and given that the Elk Island public school board has stated that changes to the fees they are able to charge as a result of Bill 1 mean they are no longer able to offer the noon-hour busing service and given that this is yet another transportation issue dumped on school boards, schools, and parents by Bill 1, again to the minister: how is Bill 1 improving the lives of parents and their children when it continues to have a negative impact across Alberta?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm glad that this is brought up because, of course, what we have done is to make sure that we put in more than $54 million to school boards in order for them to reduce school fees. If they choose to have school fees or increase those fees, we have a mechanism by which they can do that. I've yet to hear from Elk Island kindergarten as to why they chose to put these two things together. I believe it was about $34,000 that was the reason that they were choosing to go down this route. Certainly, they should be careful to listen to the parents in Sherwood Park to make sure they're providing the services that they need for their children.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Given that Bill 1 has now been directly cited by multiple school boards in both rural and urban Alberta as a reason that they are no longer able to offer transportation services, which parents previously relied upon, and given that the upcoming 50 per cent increase to the carbon tax will significantly increase transportation costs for school boards across Alberta, again to the minister: what is your plan to address the increased cost that your 50 per cent increase in the carbon tax is placing on school boards?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Certainly, all of the reductions to school fees were backstopped by the government of Alberta giving to those school boards. If any school board is suggesting that they are short of those funds, they, in fact, did receive that money from the provincial government. You know what? We fund public education on this side of the House. If you made 20 per cent cuts, as you from the UCP would suggest, you wouldn't be seeing any of these things. You would end up with very large class sizes and very inadequate education courtesy of Jason Kenney and the UCP.

The Deputy Speaker: Before we proceed with Members' Statements, I've had a number of requests here to revert to Introduction of Guests.

The Deputy Speaker: We can go ahead, but I would remind members to please keep it brief.

The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Legislature my fantastic constituency staff from the beautiful constituency of Calgary-Fort. Maxine Parris and Lisa Hari do an excellent job through outreach and casework to help constituents in Calgary-Fort. They do an excellent job in my office. They are my right and left hand when they're there, thunder and lightning. I would ask that they stand up and take the wishes.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to the members of the Assembly representatives from the Resilient Youth in Stressed Environments research project in Drayton Valley. In attendance today are some of the kids that I used to teach: Chaise Combs, Lacey Sicinsky, and Sarah Jane Peltier, who make up the youth advisory committee, and Lola Strand of our district FCSS, who is part of the local advisory committee. Laura Wright is the site research co-ordinator. Unfortunate for us but fortunate for her, she is currently in China for work and was unable to make it here today. RYSE is a five-year multinational research project that will explore patterns of resilience among young people in changing environments. I would ask that the individuals please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of our Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly some of the most fantastic students in all of the province from Balwin school. Unfortunately, they had to run to go catch their bus, but it's still a pleasure to be able to introduce them today. They were joined by two of their teachers, Ms Christine Allarie and Ms Alanna Wolgien, and also joined by one of the parents, Bridgett McAllister. Like I said, they had to run for their bus, but if we could still provide them with the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

Trans Mountain Pipeline Construction

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Being a first-generation immigrant, I have learned a lot comparing and contrasting how we do business in Canada and elsewhere in the world. The world is mocking Canada. In India, when I worked for Reliance Industries, we built the world's largest refinery and petrochemical complex in three years. Three years, Madam Speaker. Last night word broke that the Trans Mountain expansion project is going to be held up for permitting. This pipeline is a lifeline for Alberta energy exports, expanding the existing right-of-way where a pipeline has operated since the 1950s without significant incident. Kinder Morgan's president told the audience in Calgary last month: in the presence of our Premier it's been six years and counting now that we've commenced this journey and almost a year to the day when we heard that we had federal approval for the project; there are no shovels in the ground yet and nothing until at least September 2020. The company is concerned that it could cost them about $35 million in expenses while they also stand to lose more than $90 million in revenue for every month of delay.

We all want to see the Trans Mountain project succeed. Unfortunately, the NDP was naive and flat footed. The NDP sold Albertans a false bill of goods when it said that its job-killing carbon tax would buy social licence for much-needed pipelines. No social licence was ever achieved, just a wink and nudge between the Premier and the Prime Minister that the one's actions have given cover to the other's.

Madam Speaker, we need to fix this problem and fix it fast, or else the Trans Mountain expansion will meet the same fate as the Energy East pipeline, and the world is watching.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Athabasca-Sturgeon-Redwater.

Athabasca Coalition 4 Success

Mr. Piquette: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Recently I had the opportunity to attend a presentation by the Athabasca Coalition 4 Success, and I was so impressed with what they've accomplished that I want to share it with members of the Assembly here today.

Madam Speaker, as a parent of a child with special needs I know from direct experience how difficult it can be to find appropriate summer care, especially in rural areas. The partners who make up the Athabasca Coalition 4 Success recognize this and have created a unique summer program in Athabasca to help youth grow. This initiative allows community partners to work together to help children and youth attend events and activities in their community on a regular and consistent basis, to interact with their peers, develop social skills, and have the opportunity to successfully participate in community events. What's more, they do this by leveraging existing funding streams and capacities.

Over the course of the summer children who participate have shown amazing progress in achieving developmental goals. As just one example, at the start of the program almost none of the children were able to stay with activities until they were finished, but at the end almost the entire group was able to do so.

I want to thank the many partners who made this initiative happen, including AHS, ACS, ACSS, Aspen View public schools, Athabasca county FCSS, Whispering Hills Day Care Society, and Aspen Collaborative Services.

Although we often speak of the challenges of providing services in rural areas, there are also great advantages, one of the greatest being just how interconnected everyone in smaller communities is. The groups that form the Coalition 4 Success are a perfect example of local organizations working in partnership to answer a local need, and it is a model that other communities might want to look closely at.

Thank you for your time.

The Deputy Speaker: Drayton Valley-Devon.

Resilient Youth Study in Drayton Valley

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Oil and gas production and climate change have significant impacts on social, economic, and environmental systems that often affect young people's mental health and overall well-being. To better understand these complex relationships, the Resilient Youth in Stressed Environments, or RYSE, research project has been studying the resilience of the young people in Drayton Valley; Secunda, South Africa; and Cambridge Bay, Nunavut.

This project is led by the Resilience research centre and Dalhousie University in partnership with other institutions and organizations such as the University of Pretoria in South Africa, the Resilience by Design lab, and Royal Roads University. Researchers have worked with partners from the oil and gas industry, government, school boards, and key organizations to better understand how to support the health and well-being of young people in changing environments.

This research is critically important in Drayton Valley as educators and mental health professionals report rates of anxiety and depression higher than the national average and a threefold increase in the caseloads of family support workers. The town of Drayton Valley has made efforts to support young people's resilience in a variety of ways, including developing social policies and family supports and addressing social problems like substance abuse. Our town was well positioned to participate in this international research project.

Among other things, RYSE participants in Drayton Valley have prepared digital stories that outline their concerns, perspectives, and ideas for community and social change. They also have participated in the resilience innovation skills certificate program. These youth are developing a vision of community and engaging in conversations that will help shape our future, and I would like to commend them for their participation. I would call on all members of this Legislature to work in partnership with children and youth from their constituencies. We need to recognize our youth.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Presenting Reports by Standing and Special Committees

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. As chair of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices I am pleased to table five copies of the committee's report recommending the reappointment of Mr. Del Graff as Child and Youth Advocate for a term to expire on March 31, 2020. Copies of this report are available online and through the committees branch.

Notices of Motions

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I stand to give oral notice to the Assembly that I will be raising later today a question of privilege against the MLA for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Introduction of Bills

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Assured Income for the Severely Handicapped (Discretionary Trust) Amendment Act, 2017

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It is with great pride that I rise to request leave to introduce Bill 211, the Assured Income for the Severely Handicapped (Discretionary Trust) Amendment Act, 2017.

This bill is intended to make life better for Albertans with disabilities by defining a Henson trust, also known as a discretionary trust, in the AISH Act and then specifically exempting the Henson trust from the consideration of assets. Madam Speaker, the love and care that parents and guardians have for their children with disabilities extends throughout their life and beyond. By exempting Henson trusts from the AISH Act, we are standing behind both the people with disabilities and their parents and guardians just like so many other jurisdictions in Canada already do.

This bill is the result of extensive consultation with the AISH community, and I believe this bill will honour the work of all those Albertans who helped me with this. I look forward to the discussions and deliberations with my colleagues in the House.

[Motion carried; Bill 211 read a first time]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2017

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I request leave to introduce Bill 216, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2017.

Bill 216 amends the Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act to ensure that all adults in Alberta know they are responsible for contacting authorities if they know of a child in need of intervention. Currently the legislation requires adults to contact a director of child intervention. This bill will direct them to contact a director or a police officer. Adding the term "police officer" clarifies that all adults are responsible for helping children in need of intervention and that there is an easy way to do it. Far too many times in Alberta children have died in horrible circumstances that could have been prevented if an adult had spoken up.

I would like to thank Professor Juliet Guichon, who is a law professor at the University of Calgary, for pointing out this ambiguity in Alberta's law, which Bill 216 is addressing, as well as a friend, Mr. Brendan Miller, who is a prominent lawyer as well in Calgary, who called attention to the same issue and assisted me in addressing this bill, Madam Speaker.

It is with the sincerest honour that I pay special tribute to the mother of little Serenity, whose little girl inspired this bill, and her family. I'd like to thank you for being here today, and I sincerely hope and believe that this Legislature will do the right thing in order to help protect children in this province.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 216 read a first time]

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to rise today to table five copies of a document containing hundreds of pages of signatures of Albertans who signed to show their support for Henson trusts. It's time for Alberta to get in line with the rest of the country and to allow the use of the Henson trust to support people with disabilities without having their government payments clawed back. This document represents the names of over 3,400 concerned Albertans, and we need to listen to their voices.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Yes, Madam Speaker. I have four tablings I'd like to do. I referenced an article in my speech last night: The War on Ticket Bots Is Unlikely to Be Won. This is an $8 billion, world-wide problem, where ticket bots cannot be simply eradicated with one piece of legislation saying that we shouldn't do it.

I also referenced the ABVMA annual reports for 2014, 2015, and 2016. The ABVMA is the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association. In this one, the 2014, I have 25 complaints for the entire year, for 2015 I have 36 complaints on veterinarians for the entire year, and for 2016 I have 26 complaints on veterinarians. It's unbelievable, Madam Speaker, that we are taking the governance away from the veterinarian society.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to table the requisite number of copies of an article out of the Edmonton Journal dated June 2013 that's titled B.C. Rejects Northern Gateway; Says Environmental Concerns Were Not Adequately Addressed.

The Deputy Speaker: Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have a number of letters that continue to pour in regarding rural crime, this one from Sandra in Spruce View. They are in fear for the safety of their homes, their farms, their small businesses, and now their own lives. They've had violent offenders on their property.

Another one is from Gary in Markerville, Alberta, on a similar situation. He's happy that the UCP is setting up a rural crime task force. They've had a number of violent offences in their area.

Here's another one. Madam Speaker – they just keep coming in – from Vince and Wanda from Red Deer County: “We cannot do anything to protect ourselves without being criminally charged,” it seems.

Finally, the last item I have to table, Madam Speaker, is a newspaper article from Andrew Coyne of the Vancouver Sun: Kenney Channels Albertan Angst: Province Entitled to Feel Alienated. He says that “there is every reason to think he reflects the public mood in Alberta.”

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Vermilion-Lloydminster, very quickly.

Dr. Starke: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have a number of documents to table that I referenced in my speech last night on Bill 31. The first is a letter dated August 14, 2017, from the president of the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association to the Minister of Labour.

The second is another letter, dated August 14, 2017, from the president of the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association to the Minister of Service Alberta.

The third is a letter dated November 2, 2017, a response from the Minister of Service Alberta to the president of the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association.

The fourth is an e-mail from Kim Blomme, a registered veterinary technologist who made comment with regard to informed consent and fee disclosure.

The fifth is from Penny Radostits, an e-mail in which she discusses the importance of not allowing advertising of veterinary fees and the degradation of the veterinary practice it creates.

The sixth is from Dr. Skylar Bieleny, which I quoted at the conclusion of my speech last night.

The final item is an article which I quoted from, a poll from Insights West, that indicates that according to a 2016 survey, the veterinary profession is the third most trusted profession in Canada and, interestingly, politicians are the least trusted.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. Government House Leader, do you wish to make a motion? We have a number of tablings still remaining, but we're out of time.

Mr. Mason: Oh. I would move that we continue with the Routine, please.

The Deputy Speaker: I will recognize the hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Stier: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Just a short tabling today. This one is an article from a well-known journalist, Mr. Rex Murphy, regarding the little bit of a tiff that's going on between the Alberta and B.C. governments and social licence. I have the requisite number of copies.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Thanks, Madam Speaker. I have a tabling to do. This is an article in the Toronto Star by Chantal Hébert: Nation-building Pitch Not Working for Pipeline. It's about a tweet by the Saskatchewan Premier, Brad Wall, and some people also say the best Premier Alberta has right now. He tweeted that “Montreal should hand back the equalization money it has been receiving, part of which comes from wealth generated by Western Canada's oil and gas industries.” It also says in this article, you know, that “in the face of mounting Quebec opposition to the Energy East pipeline, the TransCanada plan to link the oilfields of Western Canada to the refineries of the Atlantic region . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Just do the tabling, hon. member. Continue, please.

Mr. Gill: . . . is not officially dead but it is, at best, on life support.” Here are the copies.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to table the requisite copies of an article by Don Braid from the Calgary Herald on February 23, 2017: Numbers Spell Trouble for NDP Government. This is with respect to an article that we used about how more money is being paid out from the carbon tax than is being received over the course of the year, and that it's not doing anything to win social licence.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw – sorry. Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: I didn't want to talk until I was recognized, Madam Clerk – Madam Speaker. Now I definitely apologize, with no disrespect to the Clerk. There. That was awkward.

I have a tabling. It's entitled NEB Cancels Pipeline Hearings in Montreal; Quebec City a Go, from August 2016. It deals with the track record of pipeline hearings leading to negative results.

The Deputy Speaker: Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm tabling an article from the Edmonton Journal by James Wood. He was talking about the Saskatchewan Premier warning that the oil patch was under siege by activists. Premier Brad Wall visited Calgary at that time, and he mentioned: “We're in the middle of a battle and, frankly, we haven't been winning too many battles. By we, I mean this sector and the resource importance of Western Canada.” As you know, Brad Wall has been the champion for western Canada in defending the industry. They indicated that . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Just table the document, please, hon. member.

Any other tablings? The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to table the requisite number of copies of an article by James Wood of the Calgary Herald: Activists a Threat to Oilpatch, Wall Warns; Slams National Carbon Tax Idea, Obstacles to Major Energy Projects. He warns that “the energy industry is under ‘existential threat’ from environmental activists.”

The Deputy Speaker: Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have two articles to table. One is from the Globe and Mail – A Search for Social Licence in a Deep Well of Distrust – in which the author searches for the bureau of social licence, discovers a lot of disinformation, misinformation, and deep distrust.

The second one is from our national spokesman Mr. Rex Murphy. The article is Will it Be Paris or Calgary? Quite frankly, it says that the two agendas are not compatible, and he concludes by saying that “killing the pipelines under any guise – safety, social licence, upstream emissions – is the sly path to killing the oilsands.” That’s what this government is up to, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other tablings? The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today with the requisite number of copies of an article from the National Post. The headline reads Notley Learns Hard Truth About Social Licence. I’ll just read one line. “Notley would have had more success chasing a moonbeam than satisfying social licence.”

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I table the copies necessary. It’s an article by Chantal Hébert, that “so-called social licence for such projects is a pipe dream” and that “advocates are urging the prime minister to use the declaratory power . . . to declare a work to be for ‘the general advantage of Canada.’”

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Strankman: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I have the requisite copies of a Vancouver Sun article quoting former federal minister David Emerson where he talks about expressing cynicism over the concept of social licence.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Grande Prairie-Smoky, you have a tabling?

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I’d like to table an article here by Chris Varcoe in the Calgary Herald on the 12th of May, 2017, entitled Alberta Must Devise a Plan to Handle Pipeline Politics. In it he quotes Mark Scholz who says, “It was incredibly naive . . . we have to go back to the drawing board, because obviously the strategy didn’t work.” And that’s in reference to the carbon tax and social licence.

I have one other article here to table, too. This is by Chris Nelson in the Calgary Herald on May 20, 2017. The title is Taking the High Road Will Get Alberta Nowhere; Preventing Power from Shifting West Is Part of the DNA of Federal Liberals. And he says, “It’s time Alberta’s . . . light bulb switcheroo crew made a quick stop at the Rachel Notley household. Because, for someone who seems so smart, our premier . . .”

The Deputy Speaker: Just table the document, please, hon. member.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of the hon. Ms Gray, Minister of Labour and minister responsible for democratic renewable, pursuant to the Regulated Forestry Profession Act the College of Alberta Professional Foresters annual report 2016-17 and the College of Alberta Professional Forest Technologists annual report 2016-17.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, we had two points of order. I believe, hon. Government House Leader, that you are doing a point of privilege rather than a point of order?

Mr. Mason: Yes.

The Deputy Speaker: Okay.

Point of order, then. Hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, did you wish to proceed?

Point of Order Members’ Statements

Mr. Nixon: Yes. Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise on 23(h), (i), and (j), particularly (j), language of an abusive nature or likely to create disorder. During a member’s statement today – I should have the sheet in front of me. I don’t know the hon. member’s constituency.

An Hon. Member: Edmonton-South West, I think.

Mr. Nixon: Edmonton-South West.

The member’s statement was in regard to some comments or the interpretation of those comments in regard to the hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

I rise because, Madam Speaker, members’ statements – I’m going to refer to a couple of things here – should not be used as a personal attack, and clearly in those statements it was a direct personal attack against the member. Now, the hon. member in his member’s statement, I believe, was very mistaken and has taken the hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka’s comments in debate earlier in this House completely out of context and has chosen to cherry-pick one portion of a full speech. That aside, it’s fine to have a discussion within this place about policy or different concerns with party policy or government policy, but to take a direct attack at a member in a member’s statement I would argue is inappropriate.

I would refer you to rulings and comments made by Speaker Zwozdesky in the past. One ruling I would like to draw your attention to can be found in Alberta Hansard on November 29, 2012, page 1171, in which the Speaker says:

I just want to remind you again that members’ statements are not to be used for personal attacks, nor are they to [use] language that might cause disruption or disorder.

I mean, how far we’ve come, Madam Speaker. I agree.

In addition to that, on May 31, 2012, on page 140, the Speaker goes on to say:

I would ask you to review in your good conscience what the purpose of Members’ Statements really is. It is not an opportunity to stand up and deride or throw derogatory comments at another member. That is not what it’s all about.

Clearly, that is what the member did with his member’s statement today, and I think he should apologize for that and withdraw his comments.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. With respect to this matter I would first draw the member’s attention to rules that suggest that members’ statements are not subject to interruption or to points of order.

Nevertheless, I will deal as well with the allegation that this was a personal attack. Madam Speaker, what took place – and I have the member’s statement here from the hon. member. He clearly deals with the content of some comments made by the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka during debate on the bill that would deal with the regulation of legalized cannabis here in the House, and he was making comments with respect to those particular words.

To suggest, I think, that we are not permitted in this House in members' statements, in question period, or in debate to question and challenge the authority of comments that are made by other members, to challenge their logic, or to suggest that they in some way were inappropriate or, in fact, insulting to other individuals would be to rule out the use of freedom of speech in this Assembly almost entirely. Quite frankly, on all sides of the House that is a fundamental aspect of the debate that takes place here. This is a debate about ideas, about words, about the positions of other members and of other parties, and that is in the very nature of the work we do here.

I would just caution that to suggest that a member's statement that simply deals with objecting to another member's comments, to their tone, and to whether or not they were appropriate or may have been hurtful to some individual or group is, I think, hardly worth considering as a point of order.

The Deputy Speaker: Do any other members wish to speak to the point of order?

If not, I am prepared to make a ruling. Certainly, the precedent is that members' statements are not used to levy personal attacks. You referenced a couple of rulings from Speaker Zwozdesky. I have another one from Speaker Kowalski in 2010, found on page 1755 of Hansard, where he makes the comment that although giving a wide latitude, members needed to "discipline themselves" with regard to members' statements and "deal with policy matters and not personalities." That's quite clear there. He also reinforces that "civility, decorum, respect are very important" and that members' statements are "not an opportunity for someone to personally attack someone else." Certainly, these are serious matters, and members' statements should not be ever used for that.

Then the question is if this particular member's statement was a personal attack. I did listen to it quite closely, and I weighed whether it was directed at the individual. But I also heard the member referring to constituents and how they had felt about some of the comments, so it felt to me that he was reflecting a viewpoint that he had heard from other members of that community and was not himself engaging in a personal attack against that member. However, the line was very, very close, and the language used and the topic was, as I say, coming very close to the line.

While I'm not going to find it as a point of order this time, I think all members really have to be careful about how members' statements are used. In fact, Speaker Kowalski in his ruling back in 2010 made the point that there could be a case to have members' statements completely removed from the routine if members were not being respectful of each other in the ways they're presented. I would caution all members to really be aware of this in the members' statements that they are giving.

Thank you.

I'm prepared to hear the point of privilege at this point.

Privilege

Obstructing a Member in Performance of Duty

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. At 2:50 p.m. today, just at the start of question period and just at the conclusion of Members' Statements, the MLA for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo looked across at the Member for Edmonton-South West, who had just completed the member's statement that was referred to in the previous point of order, and at that time he made a threatening gesture to the Member for Edmonton-South West, which I can only interpret as a deliberate attempt to intimidate him. This was not just seen by me; it was seen by a number of members as well.

With respect to privileges I rise under Standing Order 15(5), that says that "a Member may always raise a question of privilege in the Assembly immediately after the words are uttered or the events occur that give rise to the question, in which case the written notice required under suborder (2) is not required." This being the first opportunity on the Order Paper to raise this matter, I do so now.

In Parliamentary Privilege in Canada by Maingot it is stated that Members are entitled to go about their parliamentary business undisturbed. The assaulting, menacing, or insulting of any Member on the floor of the House or while he is coming or going to or from the House, or on account of his behaviour during a proceeding in Parliament, is a violation of the rights of Parliament.

That's at page 230.

It goes on to say:

Any attempt by improper means to influence or obstruct a Member in his parliamentary work may constitute contempt. What constitutes an improper means of interfering with Members' parliamentary work is always a question depending on the facts of each case. Finally, there must be some connection between the material alleged to contain the interference and the parliamentary proceeding.

Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice discusses intimidation on page 146 and states:

To attempt to intimidate a Member in his parliamentary conduct by threats is also a contempt, cognate to those mentioned above. Actions of this character which have been proceeded against include impugning the conduct of Members and threatening them with further exposure if they took part in debates; threatening to communicate with Members' constituents to the effect that, if they did not reply to a questionnaire, they should be considered as not objecting to certain sports; publishing posters containing a threat regarding the voting of Members in a forthcoming debate; informing Members that to vote for a particular bill would be regarded as treasonable by a future administration; summoning a Member to a disciplinary hearing of his trade union in consequence of a vote given in the House; and threatening to end investment by a public corporation in a Member's constituency, if the Member persisted in making speeches along the lines of those in a preceding debate.

House of Commons Procedure and Practice by O'Brien and Bosc goes into the most detail, beginning on page 108 in chapter 3.

Over the years, Members have regularly brought to the attention of the House instances which they believed were attempts to obstruct, impede, interfere, intimidate or molest them, their staffs or individuals who had some business with them or the House. In a technical sense, such actions are considered to be contempts of the House and not breaches of privilege.

It goes on to quote Speaker Bosley from a 1986 ruling.

If an Hon. Member is impeded or obstructed in the performance of his or her parliamentary duties through threats, intimidation, bribery attempts or other improper behaviour, such a case would fall within the limits of parliamentary privilege. Should an Hon. Member be able to say that something has happened which prevented him or her from performing functions, that he or she has been threatened, intimidated, or in any way unduly influenced, there would be a case for the Chair to consider.

Further, he says:

In order to find a prima facie breach of privilege, the Speaker must be satisfied that there is evidence to support the Member's claim that he or she has been impeded in the performance of his or her parliamentary functions and that the matter is directly related to a proceeding in Parliament. In some cases where prima facie privilege has not been found, the rulings have focused on whether or not the parliamentary functions of the Member were directly involved. While frequently noting that Members raising such matters have legitimate grievances, Speakers have consistently concluded that Members have not been prevented from carrying out their parliamentary duties.

In circumstances where Members claim to be physically obstructed, impeded, interfered with or intimidated in the performance of their parliamentary functions, the Speaker is apt to find that a prima facie breach of privilege has occurred.

Incidents involving physical obstruction – such as traffic barriers, security cordons and union picket lines either impeding Members' access to the Parliamentary Precinct or blocking their free movement . . . as well as occurrences of physical assault or molestation . . .

Madam Speaker, there are certainly more precedents, but I do want to just indicate that there is no question, in my view, that the gesture made by the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo was meant to intimidate the Member for Edmonton-South West as a result of the member's statement which he had just delivered, where he expressed the unhappiness of the Chinese community with respect to some of the debate that had taken place earlier by the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

As such, Madam Speaker, I would ask that you find that there has been a prima facie breach of privilege by the hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo and that we would then prepare a motion to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, Standing Orders and Printing.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Leader for the Official Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I mean, I'm in a bit of a position where I did not see what was taking place at that time because it was behind me and I was also, if the time is right, rising to ask a question.

I think a point of privilege is a serious thing to bring before this House and as such would ask that we will present my response to that tomorrow if possible.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the matter? Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: The citation under 15(4) is that "if the Member whose conduct is called into question is not present," which is the case today, "the matter shall be deferred to the next day that the Member is present unless the Speaker rules that" it must be dealt with right now.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, it appears that under the circumstances it would be appropriate, then, to defer the matter to allow time to discuss it with the member and deal with it tomorrow.

Orders of the Day

Mr. Nixon: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask for unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 8(2) to allow the Assembly to move immediately to consideration of second reading of Bill 216, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2017.

I'd further like to ask unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 77(1) to allow us to debate second reading of Bill 216, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2017.

The Deputy Speaker: All right. We have to separate that into two questions. Could you just repeat the first one that you're seeking unanimous consent for?

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would like to ask for unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 8(2) to allow the Assembly to move immediately to consideration of second reading of Bill 216, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2017.

The Deputy Speaker: The second matter, please.

Mr. Nixon: I further would like to ask unanimous consent to waive Standing Order 77(1) to allow us to debate second reading of Bill 216, Child, Youth and Family Enhancement (Protecting Alberta's Children) Amendment Act, 2017.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I've been advised that that is not relevant now that unanimous consent was denied for the first one. It's just a process matter, but thank you for going with that. We'll move on.

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act

Mr. Loewen moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Debate adjourned on the amendment December 5: Mr. van Dijken speaking]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to continue to speak towards a referral amendment prepared for Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities. I had spoken earlier in the day with regard to concerns about Bill 31 and some of the changes happening with respect to AMVIC.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

I was speaking with regard to some communication that I had received from a constituent of mine, Dr. Collin Lawrence, a doctor of veterinarian medicine, and the concerns that he had with regard to that the government was going down a dangerous road, where not all aspects of the commercial world need to be interpreted and applied to the medical world. His concerns are that where the veterinary medicine has many pillars to it, two very important pillars are a valid client-patient relationship and also the responsible stewardship of antibiotics. His letter goes on to talk at length with regard to some of the concerns. He points out many aspects of why the changes to the Veterinary Profession Act contained in Bill 31 would be not in the best interests of the practice of veterinary medicine in Alberta. He points out that the highest standards of veterinary medicine are developed by veterinarians and veterinary technologists and that these standards help to safeguard the public interest but not only the public interest but animal health and welfare.

It's very important that we recognize that this is a medical profession and that we recognize the intricacies in performing that profession and how it is critical that animal health and welfare be considered as more than just a consumer product and that it's not brought in where we just consider it a commodification of the practice.

He talks about the degradation of veterinary care resulting possibly from aggressive marketing and pricing, and that's part of the concerns within other letters that I have received, where veterinarians are more than just selling services; they are an integral part to the animal well-being throughout Alberta, in the urban centres and in the rural centres. The changes to the veterinary act that are being proposed have the potential to degrade the quality of veterinary care in some commercial livestock operations, which could create potential risks to food safety. Having raised livestock myself, the relationship that the producer and the veterinary share in ensuring that the livestock are maintained with proper usage of medical practice and proper usage and application of medicines and antibiotics and such is critical to food safety within Alberta and throughout Canada.

I would also like to point out that based on some of the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association's documents for their annual report for 2016, they received a total of 30 complaints. Thirty complaints. They have over 3,200 registered veterinarians practising in Alberta. Thirty complaints would be less than 1 per cent of registered members, but more importantly these registered members are possibly performing hundreds of procedures throughout the year. It's a very small number of complaints: 30 in an entire year for 3,200 registered doctors. Of those 30 complaints there was only a need to forward three complaint letters to their Complaint Review Committee.

I do believe that this is trying to identify a problem that does not necessarily exist, and the risk that we have to the high standards that are being implemented within the veterinarian medical profession in Alberta – it's not worth it to make these amendments to the Veterinary Profession Act, the amendments that are contained in Bill 31. That's why it's incredibly important to have open and transparent discussions and bring that to committee so that those that are involved in the practice and the veterinary association have the ability to bring forward in an open and transparent way the concerns that they have with these amendments to the act.

Putting veterinarians under ministerial control instead of keeping them self-regulated could be a bad precedent, and I would hope that this government does not see it as possibly being used for other self-regulating bodies. Veterinarians are concerned about the damage that this could do to their professional reputation and their image since there have been no scandals or concerns that would warrant the profession being put on the same level – as we see in Bill 31, they're being lumped in even with the high-credit lenders.

Bill 31 also includes event tickets. Bill 31 seeks to establish a legal requirement for secondary sellers to refund consumers in instances where tickets are unable to be used due to refusal. However, the minister is empowered to exempt certain sellers from this provision.

It's interesting. This morning I was reading in the Globe and Mail an article with regard to the province of Ontario and some of the policies they're hoping to move forward with. In that article it did talk some on how refunding consumers the price of a ticket does not necessarily bring it to a place of satisfaction for the individual that has been victimized. The experience is lost and also, possibly, the effort that it takes to go to the event and to make the effort to bring others to an event. This is not going to be able to be refunded to the consumers.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any hon. members wishing to speak to 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have a concern, too, with the direction that the minister is taking with the veterinary profession. I'd like to reference the press release that the minister put out on November 29, 2017, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses, and I'm going to quote from it because I think that this is important.

A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act would support a level playing field for businesses and improve protections for Albertans making big purchases like buying or repairing a car, buying concert tickets, taking out a loan or getting medical care for their pets.

That seems out of place in this press release. The items that she's describing here really don't seem to be in sync with the health of animals.

But let's go a little further here.

If passed, the bill would also empower shoppers with more information and put bad actors on notice, with strong recourse for consumers if a transaction goes wrong.

You could only assume that "bad actors" applies to making big purchases, buying or repairing a car, buying concert tickets, taking out a loan, and getting medical care for your pet. That means that we can actually more or less say that the minister, like what she did with AMVIC, stating that it's a gong show, is more or less saying that there are significant problems with veterinarians as bad actors, if you will, and that the profession isn't doing a good enough job in regulating itself. I think that we can jump to that conclusion.

We got a quote from her. I'll be quick because I do want to get to my question here to the hon. member.

Albertans deserve a government that looks out for their [best] interests. That's why we are strengthening consumer protections to make life more affordable. And we are bringing in smart rules to support businesses, because they should not be undermined by bad actors [who] don't play by the rules. Bottom line, stronger protections boost consumer confidence, and that's [what's] good for business.

Let's be clear. They're talking about our veterinarians.

I also take offence here that it also is mentioning people that I have a great deal of respect for. You know, car dealerships: the salespeople have been nothing but respectful to me. My local mechanics have been nothing but respectful to me. Even though I will tell you that I have never had to use a high-interest loan, I am certain that those individuals stay within the rules that are given to them. There are some examples that show that there is always a point in every profession when somebody does, maybe, something that is questionable, but that is why you let the industry deal with them because – you know what? – the last thing you want is the industry to be tarnished because of a bad apple, if you will.

To the member: do you feel that veterinarians should be lumped in as bad actors that need to be put on notice?

The Acting Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. van Dijken: Yes. Thank you, and thank you for the question. You know, I alluded to the relationship that as a livestock producer for over 20 years we had with our veterinarian. It becomes a relationship that is in the best interests of our operation but also in the best interests of our livestock and the best interests of all Albertans or those that are going to be consuming the food product that we produce. It's important to recognize the professionalism that is brought forward by these individuals. I, from the time that I started in the production of livestock, found it extremely helpful that I was able to develop a relationship with my veterinarian on regular visits. The veterinarian didn't just necessarily come to our farm when we had an incident, whether that was a sick animal or others; they came for regular checks to help us with our health protocols, to ensure that we were able to . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Just a reminder to the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake. If you could table tomorrow what you've read to the House today, that would be appreciated.

Mr. Cyr: Sorry. Which one?

The Acting Speaker: The press release.

Mr. Cyr: I can.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Minister of Status of Women and Service Alberta.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to speak to the referral amendment. There seems to be a lot of misinformation being communicated throughout this House as well as outside of this House, so I would like to take another opportunity, in addition to the comments that I made upon introduction of second reading, to provide further clarification.

First of all, the bill makes very clear upon the face of it that the legislation only applies to household pets. Livestock is not included. It seems that I need to reiterate this a number of times because despite the clarity in the legislation, on the very face of it, which specifically says household pets, there may be confusion of individuals as to whether or not a horse constitutes a household pet. I assure you, Madam Speaker, that that is not the case. Animals that are raised for the use of food in our food chain are also not contemplated, again, as household pets would not constitute part of livestock or our food chain.

This piece of legislation, in respect of veterinarians, which seems to be the turning point for the referral amendment, from the comments that I've heard, is quite simple, Madam Speaker. It does two things. One, it requires veterinarians to disclose all fees and obtain a client's consent prior to treating their household pets. And it seems to me that the association agrees with us. They have said that this is something that is a best practice of their profession, that this is something that they want veterinarians to do. So it seems to me that it would be very simple for vets who are acting with the highest of integrity and in good practices, as – I agree with members opposite – they are, to do this. No problem. Okay.

Then the next piece is with respect to giving permission to veterinarians to advertise or post their fees. Now, this is a simple matter of transparency. I think that the value of transparency is something that we can all get behind. Madam Speaker, the assertion that somehow the ability to post or advertise fees would degrade a profession, I think, is a comment that is unsettling to a number of professionals, lawyers included, as lawyers, in fact, are permitted to advertise and post their fees, yet there's no suggestion and it would be inappropriate to suggest that that would somehow suggest a degradation.

Furthermore, I completely agree. The vets that I've dealt with: many if not most, you know, the vast majority are very honest, upstanding. They take the highest standard of ethics to heart, they put their patients first, and they want good outcomes. I certainly don't buy the suggestion that by allowing them to advertise, they would somehow put their ethics aside and they would put the quality of care aside simply because they're not allowed to post their fees. Certainly, if somebody were to suggest to me as a lawyer that in my practice I would put aside my ethics simply because I am allowed to post my fees, I would be offended, Madam Speaker.

Certainly, this is a good thing for consumers. Madam Speaker, I've heard from Albertans, I've heard from individuals who are afraid to take their pet to a vet because they have zero clue of what costs they could incur if they walk in the door. This kind of concern can lead to negligence on the part of a pet owner in not taking their loved pet in for good care because they're so paralyzed by the fees.

This is just good information, arming individuals with more information so that they can make the best, most informed decision. I wouldn't suggest that anyone would put aside the quality of care of their loved one and just engage in a race to the bottom, Madam Speaker. I don't think that that does justice to the conscience of most Albertans and most pet owners, who want the best for their loved ones. I am speaking against this referral. The comments made by the members on the other side of the House just don't hold water in this regard.

You know, another consideration is that we talk about the medical profession in the United States, which is entirely privatized. Doctors operating on humans advertise their fees. Again, I think that they would likely take umbrage at the assertion that their advertising of fees causes their services to be degraded in some way. This really just gives the owners of their loved pets more tools to be able to make a well-educated decision so that they can find quality of care – all vets are going to give that quality of care; I believe the member opposite when he says that – but also be able to find that quality of care within their budget and not have surprises.

There are many good protections in this legislation, Madam Speaker. We've heard from a number of our stakeholders, and they have told us that they are in support of this. You know, just briefly I will quote Janet Riopel, the president and CEO of the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce. She said:

Consumer confidence and fair competition are essential for a vibrant and healthy economy. Businesspeople understand this, and the vast majority treat their customers fairly. The Chamber hosted sessions . . .

They were lovely.

. . . to ensure our members' voices were heard through these consultations.

She says:

This legislation shows that government was listening, and we're confident it will foster even greater trust between consumers and the business community.

They know that's good for business. The people who are at the front lines of this know and appreciate that.

There were some comments, too, about automotive repair. Our legislation is supported by a small-business owner, for example, the owner of Sandy Lane auto. It's supported by the Alberta Motor Association, which is very trusted in Alberta. They've said, "We believe all Albertans should have confidence in the service they're receiving." You know, they've got a long history of standards that make them the experts, really, on the voice of this. I would encourage the members opposite to listen to the experts.

Bill Burnett, the chair of the AMVIC Board of Directors, has said:

I am very excited about the announcement of Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act. It is a very important step to support AMVIC's mandate of consumer protection in Alberta. Thank you to the Government of Alberta for their leadership and commitment to consumer protection in Alberta.

You know, the opposition speaks of listening to the experts. The evidence on this, the support that we have for this legislation from the experts, shows just that. I would suggest that they should take their own advice on this matter, Madam Speaker, and that they should support this bill.

There are certainly protections with respect to ticket sales, Madam Speaker, the issue of bots. Yes, this is a very complicated issue, software buying up tickets. It's said time and time again in every bit of ink spilled on this issue that it's a complicated issue, that there is no simple solution. But we are in the forefront of this issue here in Alberta; this has not been done in Canada previously. Certainly, we will be watching the situation. But these are first steps. We have support from the music industry on this, from artists. We have support from their promoters. We have support from primary sellers. This is truly a team effort. We are taking different enforcement steps than have been tried in the United States. We are taking different enforcement steps than are being proposed in Ontario. We feel that this is a made-in-Alberta solution. We have a different market here in Alberta. It's smaller than what you see in Ontario, so it requires a unique approach.

I just want to touch again on the veterinary piece of this legislation. We consulted. We had two in-person meetings with the association. We had an additional phone call with the association. I'm told that this is, in fact, more consultation than what was done when there was the amalgamation of the technologists and the vets. You know, there was good and substantial consultation. We're very clear on the position. We've also spoken to individual vets, Madam Speaker, and we've heard support from individuals vets. We also have spoken to pet owners, and pet owners are very pleased with these changes.

Madam Speaker, there have also been some comments from the members opposite suggesting that putting vets into this legislation somehow by association is insulting. I don't think that that's a fair comment to make with respect to those who regulate auto sales and repairs. I don't think it's a fair thing to say to those who sell new or used vehicles. I think that those comments really bring down the level of discourse when we're talking about Alberta's businesses and Alberta's small businesses, the contributors to our very economy. They drive so much of our economy. They're quite pleased that we are taking action on those grey areas where there are those who bring down the reputation of various industries.

Some of these pieces in this legislation, Madam Speaker, touch on a wide range of industries, touch almost every industry. There are provisions in here with respect to contract terms. Now, there are so many industries that engage in contracts as part of their business operations. To suggest that they're bad company for vets, that, you know, 99 per cent of Alberta's businesses would be bad company for vets to keep, is, in my view and my colleagues' here, not something that we would ever say. We support Alberta's businesses. We support Alberta's small businesses. They're pleased with the action that's being taken here because, overall, this legislation will increase consumer confidence, which is good for the bottom line. It brings up the overall level of discourse.

Madam Speaker, we've heard from the opposition about wanting to remove, quote, red tape. There is red tape on the veterinary profession. Not being able to advertise or post your fees is red tape. Those businesses are not able to operate their business in the fashion that they see fit. Now, I understand that there has been, you know, some discussion through the association from a number of their members on this issue, but I have heard from vets that they would like the opportunity to be able to be more open and transparent with their consumers, that this would be good for consumers, being able to post their fees, which they're prohibited from doing at the moment. We're removing that prohibition and giving more flexibility. Obviously, they're not required. It's very clear on the face of the legislation that they won't be required to advertise their fees, that they won't be required to post them. These are additional freedoms.

Much of this legislation, frankly, deals with improving freedom of speech for Albertans. There are pieces in here that have to do with the ability to post an online review, Madam Speaker, without being able to be threatened with intimidation by a business because they simply do not like an honest but good-faith review. These are principles that we hold dear: principles of free speech, principles of access to information, principles of being able to make good, informed choices.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)? Under 29(2)(a), hon. member?

Dr. Starke: No, not under 29(2)(a).

The Acting Speaker: Okay. The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just wanted to ask if it would be acceptable to the other members of the Legislature if we would temporarily revert to introductions to introduce some members in the gallery.

Introduction of Guests (reversion)

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Stony Plain.

Ms Babcock: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my honour today to introduce some of the members of one of our largest and strongest unions here in Alberta and a union I was very proud to be part of as an LPN. Vice-president Mike Dempsey and the political action committee, if you could please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Dr. Starke: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Of course, you had to expect that after the minister's rambling diatribe there was a going to be a response. You know, it's interesting because this is a debate on referral, and the purpose of the referral in this case is to allow for the consultation that did not happen. It would allow for the minister to actually meet with the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association, which she refused to do. It would allow for multiple dialogues on a number of different things that are located within this bill, but I'm going to confine myself to some of the comments made by the minister and by others with regard to the bill.

Now, the minister stood up. She stood up last night, and she said it again just now, that this bill would only deal with household pets. Well, if it only deals with household pets, why doesn't it say that in the bill? Nowhere in the bill is the phrase "household pet." The phrase in the bill is "in respect of a domestic cat or dog or other specified type of domestic animal." Cows are domestic animals. Pigs are domestic animals. Horses, sheep, goats, elk are domestic animals. The minister says "household pets." If that's what she means, "household pets" should appear in the bill, not a wide-open domestic animal definition. If that's what you're talking about, that's what needs to be in the bill.

That is part of the reason why it's important that referral be done, so that we can take another look at this bill to get the proper language. [interjections] Right now, the minister's . . .

The Acting Speaker: My apologies, hon. member. There's a lot of talking back and forth. If we could please just allow the member to speak to this referral amendment.

Thank you.

Dr. Starke: Thank you, Madam Speaker. If the intention is to talk about household pets, then let's have that language in the bill. Right now the bill allows cabinet to designate which domestic animals are included, and you can understand the members of the Veterinary Medical Association – I'm sorry; I will respectfully disagree with the Minister of Service Alberta – who were not properly consulted. The consultation was a shadow of the consultation that was consulted with the Minister of Labour on the bringing together of the associations. To suggest that there's confidence within the veterinary profession for cabinet taking over the definition of what constitutes a domestic animal under this bill – that confidence has been shattered by the actions of this minister.

Now, the next little thing that I found interesting was: rely on your experts. Remember that we heard that phrase: rely on your experts. Who exactly are the experts when we're talking about veterinary medicine? Is it cabinet? Is it the Minister of Service Alberta?

I would suggest, Madam Speaker, that the experts in this field are, in fact, veterinarians. Veterinarians have come out in large numbers and have written to this minister, have written to me, have written to most of the members, I would suggest, here in the Chamber and have indicated their displeasure with this bill. They've been very clear on that. This bill takes a direct attack at the self-regulating nature of our profession, and it takes a direct attack on our ability to govern ourselves and to decide not only what is best for our profession but what is best for the welfare and health of animals in Alberta. That is a responsibility that we have had since Alberta became a province, and it is a responsibility we take very, very seriously.

Now, the minister mentioned a concern about transparency on costs and that there were some people who were scared to go through the door of a veterinary clinic for fear of what it might cost. What a ridiculous statement. What a ridiculous statement. Unlike some businesses – lawyers, I would point out – we don't start charging people the minute they walk through the door. We provide lots of free advice, whether it be on the phone or over the counter, and if somebody wants to know what a veterinary procedure will cost, we provide that information willingly over the phone. Every veterinary hospital that I've ever been associated with has dealt with what we call price shoppers. There are price shoppers that are there every day, people that ask for the price of a service. But whenever we got a call from a price shopper, what we did was engage in a conversation with that person to let them know what was included in the price, what sort of procedures we took, what protocols were included so that they understood exactly what it was that they were purchasing.

You know, Madam Speaker, I started a veterinary practice in 1983. In 1983 performing general, routine surgery, things like spays and neuters of dogs and cats, was very different from what it was when I retired in 2011. In some ways I am so very glad that our profession moved forward over that period of time, and it has moved forward since. I would never do a spay or a neuter today the way I did it in 1983 – never – because it would be not the best care for the patient.

Now, have those changes resulted in additional costs? Yes, they have. Those changes to the way we do things in the operating theatre, in the examination room: those things cost money, and they have increased the cost of veterinary care. There's no question; there has been an increase in the cost of veterinary care. But there has been a commensurate increase in the quality of veterinary care, and when the price gets driven down, so does the quality. Price competition, whether it's in veterinary medicine or in other fields, results in a decrease in quality. That has been the experience in every other jurisdiction that has allowed the advertising of veterinary fees. That is what has happened in British Columbia, that is happening in Ontario, and it has happened in multiple jurisdictions in the United States where that has been done.

Now, you can call it a better practice because of transparency, you can call it a number of different things, but in reality it results in the degradation of practice. It results in the degradation of procedures. It is not in the best interests of, certainly, veterinary medicine, it is not in the best interests of the client, but most importantly it's not in the best interests of the patient. The patient cannot speak. Who speaks for the patient? Who is the patient's advocate? In most cases that is the owner, but in many cases the owner does not have the knowledge or the information to know what is best for the patient. That knowledge, that information comes from the veterinarian through his or her training and experience.

Clients come to us asking for our recommendation based on what is called Aesculapian authority. Aesculapian authority is a term used in the medical profession and also the veterinary medical profession, and it indicates the authority we hold because of our knowledge, because of our experience. Just like a lawyer or an accountant or another professional has authority and knowledge in their field that we rely on, veterinarians have knowledge that we apply in our situation. That knowledge, Madam Speaker, is gained over time, it is gained at a great personal cost, and that knowledge has value.

Over the years that I was in practice, yes, things became more expensive, but those fees were to cover better quality veterinary medicine. Those fees were to do better sedation, better anaesthesia, better intra- and postoperative pain control, for better materials that were less reactive for the patient. They allowed for intravenous monitoring and intravenous support of the patient.

When I first graduated, in 1983, we didn't put dogs on IVs for spays. Unbelievable. Today I would never pay a dog without an IV line, but in 1983 that was okay. That meant that the procedure was cheaper in 1983. If you want to make a procedure significantly cheaper, you have to cut corners. There is no other way to do it.

Now, the concern over costs is not one that is foreign to veterinarians. We deal with the need to balance the owner's ability to pay with the cost of providing the service every day, Madam

Speaker. In our situation we've come up with a lot of different ways to help owners with that. We encourage owners to take pet health insurance, which is widely available, to shield them against the shock of a large veterinary bill. We have started four different charities in Alberta that provide financial assistance to clients who require assistance for veterinary care. Four different charities exist in Alberta. They all have significant veterinary involvement. We want to be able to help our clients treat their animals. We provide tens of thousands of dollars every year in pro bono work, stuff that we do for free or at severe discounts just because we care about our patients, we care about our clients, and we want to do what's best for them.

While this minister says that this isn't an attack on veterinarians, maybe you should ask the veterinarians how they feel about it. I will tell you that from the hundreds of letters I have received, we feel under attack. We feel that we've been targeted. We're the only self-regulating profession that's in this bill. Are doctors here? No. Are lawyers here? No. Are dentists or pharmacists or chiropractors or physiotherapists or geophysicists in this bill? No, none of them, but veterinarians are. Veterinarians are. Madam Speaker, you know, that is a problem.

Consultation is something that we value and we would like to see this minister undertake with us. That's why I'm in favour of referral. Referral will allow for a more robust discussion that lasts longer than a week. When I told my colleagues that this bill received first reading last Wednesday and that then it was to be passed by Thursday, their reaction uniformly was shock. "How can the government do this? How can the government, in the space of a week, turn around the way a profession has been operating in this province for 111 years?" When I told my colleagues that it can be done and that that's what is under way, they were shocked.

That is why I'm saying that if this bill is referred to committee, we at the very least have the opportunity to hear properly from veterinarians and, yes, hear from clients who feel that they would be better served by having fees advertised, and it would be an opportunity to have that dialogue and, in fact, discuss: why fee advertising? Where it has been tried in other jurisdictions, it has always been an unmitigated disaster. I'll say that again: an unmitigated disaster. Talk to veterinarians who practised in British Columbia through the '80s and the '90s and ask them what fee advertising did to their profession. Alberta veterinarians don't want that.

My colleagues have already stated what the level of complaints that we have to our association is. It's astronomically low. When one considers the number of veterinary transactions, the number of interactions that we have with clients and patients on an annual basis, the percentage involved is so minuscule.

Now, could we do better? Yes, and we strive to do better all the time. Our association has staff, has volunteer council members, has many, many members, myself included, who volunteer for discipline tribunals and practice review and practice inspection to try to always improve, to continuously improve veterinary practice in Alberta. That's what we try to do.

That's why we find this bill, brought in on such short notice, brought in for no explainable reason even though we asked – we asked the Minister of Labour and we asked the Minister of Service Alberta back in August: "What is the driving force behind this bill? Why does it feel that this is necessary?" We didn't get an answer from either one. Then the one answer we did get from the Minister of Service Alberta was that there would be extensive discussion, consultation, and engagement. Well, that hasn't happened. Also, we would much prefer, frankly, to deal with the Minister of Labour, who is responsible for the Veterinary Profession Act, not the Minister of Service Alberta.

Mr. Cooper: Why?

Dr. Starke: Well, that's a good question, one that has not been answered by either minister.

Madam Speaker, that is the reason I'm pushing for referral. That is the reason I speak in favour of referral, specifically with regard to the provisions within the Veterinary Profession Act. We are a proud profession. We work hard, and we have done nothing to earn the ire of this minister or to be targeted by this government in this way, but if they do want to proceed and steamroll the veterinary profession, I guess that's their prerogative. But I didn't think it would and I certainly had hoped it would not, Madam Speaker, come to that.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I think we all can learn from that member, seeing his passion for his profession. I think that anybody that has taken the time and put a lot of years into dedicating it to an industry – in my case, it would be accounting; for him, it's the veterinarian practice. I can tell you that when it comes to a government moving on a professional body that regulates a profession, that is an attack on an entire profession, and it is an attack on exactly what it is we are trying to prevent, which is creating red tape so that they can no longer do their job. To hear the minister say that we are reducing red tape by bringing in this legislation is preposterous.

I would like to hear a little bit more from the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster about how he feels that the minister can really justify this lack of consultation when it comes to such an important topic and say that 1,300 online surveys really will improve the ability for him to help the pets that are within his care.

Dr. Starke: Well, Madam Speaker, I'm happy to say that. I mean, my responsiveness within my practice was always to talk directly to my clients, and I encouraged that.

You know, it's interesting. One of the provisions in this bill is with regard to negative reviews online, and I actually support those provisions. I think those are a good idea. But just out of interest's sake, I went to the Facebook page of my practice, now my former practice, to see how they're doing. Of the 27 reviews they've received, 26 reviews are five star, and one is three star, averaging 4.9. I was proud of my colleagues. They are doing a good job, and they continue to do a good job.

You know, they don't need the provisions within here, but don't take it from me. For years the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association has had a public member on the board, and that is to protect the public interest. I received this quote from a public member.

As a 7 year Public Member of the . . . ABVMA – I can state without any bias – the current Act is working for Alberta's public. Veterinarians receive specific training about client relations/fees/records and other critical areas of professional communication/practice when they get their provisional licence. I note Public Member input for amendments was not sought in any form by the Minister of Service [Alberta]. Public Members are the eyes/ears for Alberta's self-regulated professions.

Minister, why didn't you pick up the phone and ask the public members that you've got sitting on the ABVMA board whether they have input into this? Why have we been singled out for this treatment? Why have we been attacked? You can't tell me that accountants don't have big bills. You certainly can't tell me that lawyers don't have big bills. That seems to be the only criteria. The reason we have big bills is because of the quality of practice and the demands of the public.

The public want orthopaedic surgery. You know what? If you need your dog's hip replaced, you don't have to wait 10 months; you can get it done within the week. If you need nuclear scintigraphy on your dog, you can get it done within days. If you need to go see a specialist, you can have that done within days as well. That does cost money. I recognize that. But to suggest that there is price inflation and that somehow that is unfair to the general public – the general public are the people that are demanding these enhanced services.

I myself have been the consumer of these enhanced services in the past year, and, yes, they are expensive. You know what? They're worth every penny. They're worth every penny because my colleagues are professional, my colleagues provide value, my colleagues are in touch with clients, and they know what they're doing. They deserve it. They have earned that right, and they have the knowledge, the expertise, the dedication, and the experience to be able to provide that service, and I think they provide it not just for me but for all Albertans, and I would like them to be able to continue doing that in the future.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, we are back on the referral. Are there any other members wishing to speak to the referral? The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am honoured to be able to rise in the House today to speak to the referral motion to Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act.

I don't think I'm going to be able to speak as eloquently about veterinarians as my colleague from Vermilion-Lloydminster. However, what I can say is that one thing that we don't do very often in this House is refer a piece of legislation to committee. It does seem a little odd that we don't do as much of that as we could be doing. Certainly, I think the committees have time for this kind of thing. I sit on one, and we haven't done anything together since, I think, the Alberta Standard Time Act, so I guess I would say that they're overrun with work. It really would prove to Albertans that the Legislature was very interested in getting to the bottom of the piece of legislation that was being sent on to committee, very interested in having folks that are affected by that particular bill be able to come and make submissions to the committee, make their points of what may be good about the legislation or bad about the legislation.

Don't get me wrong. At times the government has certainly spent time wording some questions that are available to those that wish to make submissions online. I am not sure if there was an online questionnaire about this bill or not, and it doesn't matter. The complaint, at least sometimes here on this side, about online consultation is that the outcome seems to be predetermined on some of the bills that actually do have online questions for consultation. We sometimes hear that the questions tend to lead the person submitting exactly where the government wants that person to end up. Far be it for me now to be accusatory. Those are just comments that I tend to hear. I would not be accusatory.

Back to the referral amendment. In this particular instance I believe that sending Bill 31 to committee for scrutiny by those that will be affected by the bill is the right thing to do. Considering the vastness of this bill – ticket resale, automotive sales and repair, high-cost credit, AMVIC, and lastly but certainly not the least of the things that this bill covers, veterinary advertisement – there's definitely a lot of stuff to stick into one piece of legislation.

The bill actually makes several changes to the Fair Trading Act, including changing the name of the act to the consumer protection act. Speaking of the Fair Trading Act, let's just reflect for a moment. Bill 203, Fair Trading (Motor Vehicle Repair Pricing Protection for Consumers) Amendment Act, 2016, was introduced on March 17, 2016. Just over three weeks later this private member's bill was referred to committee. At the end of the day, the Standing Committee on Families and Communities heard from numerous stakeholders about Bill 203 and the effect that it would have and then recommended to the House that Bill 203 not proceed.

Now, that's what happens when a bill is referred to committee. I'm not being political here. I'm just suggesting that what should have happened to the bill in committee, one way or the other – I'm merely giving an example of what one of the potentialities of a bill going to the committee is. It's true that there is actually a chance that the bill will be found to be flawed in some way that affects the people that will be forced to adhere to it. Bill 203 was such an example. To be perfectly honest, when a bill is referred to committee and the public gets a chance to voice their opinions about that bill instead of answering a one-answer-only question on the Internet about the same bill and when the public has had their say, everyone in this House can be proud that they did the right thing.

My colleague from Livingstone-Macleod this morning gave a lengthy description of what leading questions may sound like. I don't believe that I can remember all of them. There was quite an eloquent little display. His point was that the questions asked probably didn't pertain to anything like what is in front of us, the people in the Legislature, in this bill. Average Albertans that are affected by this bill would not have been given the ability in any online survey to comment on portions of the bill that we see before us.

When I go back to Bill 203, the people of the province and the people that were to be directly affected got to come in and face the committee to give their opinions, and because of what was heard in the case of Bill 203, the committee did the only thing it could. It recommended to the House that the bill not proceed any further. It didn't make it past second reading. Now, that appears to me to be democracy in action. Like I said, those of us in this Legislature can be proud of that particular action because it allowed Albertans to have a voice. It actually allowed Albertans to say, "No, this proposed legislation doesn't fit the bill," so to speak.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I sit on the committee that had Bill 203, the Alberta Standard Time Act, sent to it for input from Albertans. We had two or three sessions of Albertans that came before the committee – you were the chair of that – to express their concerns with the bill. Not only were everyday Albertans part of those meetings; we indeed had professional sports representatives in front of that committee as well giving their humble opinions as to what the time change could do to those professional sports in Alberta if the time were indeed changed. Now, there was a lot of discussion about that as we moved through committee. Those guys swung a pretty big bat. We certainly had letter after letter written to the committee, some in favour, some not.

That committee also went on the road to get input from Albertans from all over the province. Travelling around the province, taking a group of committee members along so that people could be heard on an issue is a pretty big deal. There is a team that actually takes care of audio. You know, I hadn't thought about it too much, but of course Hansard has to be along on a trip like that in order to record all the input from Albertans when a committee is taken on the road like that.

Anyway, I sat in on one of the meetings when it was in the south. There were banks of audio equipment and microphones and on and on and certainly people in order to run all that equipment. It was done right. Don't get me wrong. Upon walking into that room in Lethbridge, I was impressed at the equipment and the operators of the equipment and the security officers that we see around here every day that were there to protect – I see my friend in the gallery – those of us that were listening and those that were participating, giving their opinions, and of course those who were running the equipment. I think that the travelling show went across Alberta and met in five areas. I could be wrong there. I think it was Calgary, Red Deer, Grande Prairie, here in Edmonton, and then Lethbridge. Five? [interjection] Oh, four. Okay. Was it not in Edmonton? I'm asking the Speaker. I shouldn't be doing that.

Anyway, Mr. Speaker, there were four, and you know that. Thank you for correcting me. You know, as much as I didn't completely understand why we were travelling from one end of the province to the other to hear the opinions of everyday Albertans, it could certainly never be said that the committee didn't bend over backwards to get all possible input in order to make a decision for presentation to the Legislature. Of course, we all know what the outcome of the committee work resulted in, but, once again, Albertans got to voice their opinions. They got the chance to be part of a decision of this Legislature, and that really is what this is all about. Everyday Albertans or small businesses or corporations or businessmen, whatever bill it may be, whatever those folks feel about portions of whatever that bill may be, are in fact given the opportunity to give their opinions and, from what I found, actually facts about the bill in question.

Now, Bill 31, which covers all of those things that I mentioned earlier, also covers a consumer bill of rights portion. It's clear that a plain-language bill of rights would be created and publicized by the minister. As far as I can see, this will basically be a policy piece that does not contain any enforceable items but, rather, exists for consumers' use. Bottom line: it will turn out, I think, being an information piece, for lack of a better term. If indeed that is not the case, I would be happy to hear from the minister to explain the reasoning for this document. It appears to me that the minister already has the ability to draft a consumer bill of rights at any time that she wishes. I'm just not sure why it needs to be an act of the Legislature. So here we go once again. The government appears like it's trying to legislate a part of its job description. I've never understood why the minister just doesn't go ahead and move forward using the powers already granted.

Now, I've already mentioned that this is a vast bill with multiple sections in it. In all honesty, it's somewhat convoluted, I would say, a little bit of a convolution of different issues, some of which will likely not be fixed by this bill. Others such as aspects of the veterinary advertising: well, judging from the blowback from the industry and their concern over the lack of consultation on this bill, considering that we've heard probably 40 minutes of discussion about it from one of those very professionals that shares this House with us, it just seems to me that this is exactly why this bill should be sent off to committee and given the due discussion, something as broad reaching as this bill is.

While certain aspects of this bill have some merit, others seem to lack purpose. While I'm at the veterinary portion of this speech, I should say that I received an e-mail from a veterinarian in my riding yesterday. Now, upon speaking with her, this lady suggested that the reason, she believed, to remove the section on advertising in Bill 31 is that it is unethical for veterinarians to be advertising professional medical fees. She continued and said that this would be considered unprofessional activity by their profession. They are professional medical doctors, and advertising service fees to the general public is not considered an activity appropriate for professional medical doctors to do. This is what the veterinarian from my riding said to me. It undermines their profession, she said, the professional requirements and code of conduct, and is considered by veterinarians to damage their professional reputation and credibility with the public as professionals.

Now, she did suggest, in regard to the sections on consumer awareness of costs of service prior to those services being conducted, that removing that now is probably a mistake because, in her opinion, the provincial government did not discuss this matter with the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association, who is responsible for the licensing and oversight of veterinarians in regard to the veterinary act. The Alberta Veterinary Medical Association already has requirements in place for veterinarians, and veterinarians such as the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster, that shares this room with us, have the responsibility to inform clients of the costs of services and to get agreement from the client prior to providing those services.

Therefore, in this veterinarian's opinion, there is no need for that legislation. She said to me that if there is an individual in the government that had a specific issue with a specific veterinarian, then they can lodge a formal complaint with the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association, who will investigate that issue and ensure that that veterinarian is dealt with appropriately, as per their existing requirements on that matter.

Now, this is the kind of stuff that I think we'd be hearing a lot of if we did determine to send this bill to committee. We've heard from a veterinarian that shares the room with us. I'm in the middle of telling you what a veterinarian said to me. I think every member on this side has probably received an e-mail from a veterinarian. Every situation, of course, has to be evaluated on a case-by-case basis, and . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any other members who wish to speak under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Yeah. Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise on . . .

Mr. Schneider: Madam Speaker?

Mr. Cooper: Oh. Mr. Speaker, sir, the great Speaker that you are.

It's still a pleasure to rise and speak under 29(2)(a). I was listening diligently to my hon. colleague from the incredible constituency of Little Bow. The lovely constituency of Little Bow, I think, is probably appropriate in this case. He was speaking about consulting with veterinarians and why that might be important.

I know that earlier today we heard from members of the government speaking in question period about how ministers had the opportunity to travel all across the province and speak to Albertans from all different areas of the province. The Minister of Seniors and Housing spoke very interestingly about hearing from seniors and how important that was to her ability to deliver on the important initiatives of the government. Mr. Speaker, that sort of makes me pause a little bit. Clearly, the minister felt that it was important to listen to Albertans when it came to issues of housing. The Member for Lethbridge-East asked a question about just how glorious and magnificent the trip to Lethbridge was and the opportunity to hear from Albertans in southern Alberta.

I know that my colleague from Little Bow has received at least one contact from an Albertan that doesn't believe this government has done their job of listening with respect to veterinarians. I'm curious to know if the Member for Little Bow has had multiple folks contact him and just exactly what his opinion might be of the government coming to question period today and bragging about how good a job they're doing of listening to Albertans when, in fact, there are all sorts of piles of evidence that are coming into our offices that speak to the exact opposite of the government doing a good job of listening, that they're not consulting, certainly, with veterinarians in this case, that they're not listening to the important feedback about the good work that's being done by veterinarians in this province, and, in fact, lumping them in – I think we've heard the minister in this House talk about unscrupulous industry and service providers and then, in the next breath, talk about veterinarians. I know that veterinarians do a fantastic job because I hear that from constituents, and I also hear from veterinarians who are concerned about this very issue with respect to the government not listening.

I was so appreciative of the minister of seniors' comments when she spoke about listening to Albertans. I'm just curious to know if the Member for Little Bow thinks that this government ought to listen to all Albertans and not just the ones that they like to hear from.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: Well, that's a tough one to follow there, Mr. Speaker, but I've got to say that it's a great question. I guess I would have to say that I agree one hundred per cent with the Minister of Seniors and Housing travelling around the province, trying to get some information so that she can make a decision in her ministry as to how she should proceed. I would say that that's exactly what we should be doing, and we should continue to be doing it.

We're talking about veterinarians at the moment, veterinarians that have had something slammed on top of them that they didn't exactly know was coming, I don't think, especially when the veterinary profession was asking the ministry to include them in all discussions, and that would have been with the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association. Certainly, I've received more than one letter. There are likely going to be several speeches on this matter as we continue forward.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak in support of this referral amendment. Given that we're hearing from stakeholders, I think that the only recourse is to send this to committee so that we can get proper consultation, so that we can actually reach out to Albertans and hear their thoughts. I understand that the government spent a whole nine weeks to go out and consult, and they feel that that's appropriate. Sorry, I'm thinking about Bill 30. I'm confusing the bills. Well, they're all eight inches thick, it looks like.

But to get back to consulting, the actual answer here is that they didn't do nine weeks of consulting on this. From what I understand, what they did do was that they asked people to come in to consult, and then they told them what was in the bill. That sounds very clearly like the no-consultation bill called Bill 6, way back when we had farmers and ranchers across Alberta very upset with our current government. So you'd think that this government would learn to allow for consultation, but it appears that when it comes to consultation, they always come up lacking.

Now, I do want to say that I am going through the press release that the minister brought forward, and again I'm quoting from the same press release as before, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses, the one where the minister pretty much had said that "bad actors" were all in this bill, more or less. I started to look to the people that she actually consulted and quoted inside of her press release because these are important. Now, the reason this is important is that these individuals that were clearly consulted on this bill got to see the bill and comment on the bill, but this press release was let out at exactly 4 o'clock on November 29. The bill was tabled for first reading at 3 o'clock on November 29. So they've had extensive time to get through Bill 31, this whole thing, in an hour, to be able to come up with an opinion for themselves and the industry that they represent. That seems to be a little loaded.

They're very excited about this bill. You know, like, we've got several examples of individuals that are showing that this is actually something that they feel will move their industry forward. I certainly would say that these appear to be, "We want your support for something even though you haven't seen it yet," that kind of support for this bill. That is not the same thing that I am getting from my constituents and the Member for Little Bow and the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster are getting from their constituents. So we've got some Albertans that have given endorsements to this that have had an hour to see the bill – and I think that is shameful – but we're getting actual people that are in the industries affected by this saying: we want more consultation. I don't think that's unfair. And that is why a referral motion is so important.

Certainly, the government put forward a survey in the summer to solicit opinions from Albertans. However, if you've read those questions, Mr. Speaker, you would see that they're incredibly slanted and leaning. That's not proper consultation. When you ask a loaded question, you expect a loaded answer. This government continues to talk about how they consulted with Albertans in order to put forth the best legislation they can. Well, it appears our veterinarians are very unhappy with this legislation. It doesn't appear that this is the best legislation they can put forward.

But you know what? Albertans continue to talk about how they're not actually consulted. They're told what will happen, and they're not listened to. This is just another example. What's the point of consultation if it's only one sided? "We put out an online survey. We put loaded questions in there, and then we get the answers we're looking for, and then that's our consultation." That's shameful. There is no point to it. It's simply something that sounds good for the government to say.

But when it comes to actually moving forward with legislation, we end up with Albertans frustrated with this government. My colleagues and I are speaking with the stakeholders, we're speaking with regular Albertans, and we're speaking with the veterinarians. They're all saying the same thing, that there's a lack of consultation. Furthermore, people and boards are absolutely blindsided when they finally get to see a copy of the legislation. That's not consultation; that's clear disrespect. That's clear disrespect, Mr. Speaker.

Take, for example, stakeholders in the automobile sale and repair industry. They came forward with a submission when Bill 203 was before the standing committee. As a result, the committee recommended that the bill not proceed. Imagine their surprise to find the legislation retabled less than two years later. I find it very interesting that the government has had an about-face on the topic, and I wonder if they tossed out the input from stakeholders in its entirety or if they chose others who are just in line with the government's intent on these issues. It seems to me that it's quite disrespectful behaviour by this government.

There is so much more in this legislation that can be arbitrarily decided by the minister, and that is the true concern that stakeholders have. We actually do not know where the government is going because a lot of this is done in regulations. She is giving herself the power to more or less create something after this legislation has been completed. No consultation. The industry is not being able to show that they have been and will be an active participant when it comes to their industry. Who knows this industry best? It is the people that live and breathe and work and make taxable income. This is how we afford to move Albertans forward. And you know what? This government has failed.

There is so much more in this legislation, but I can tell you that when it comes to our stakeholders, I will reiterate, they just are concerned where this government is going because they just don't know what to expect. Industry, regardless of the type, deserves to have certainty so they can continue on in their businesses in a professional way that seeks to provide customers with best practices and services. If you keep changing the model, how will they be able to create an environment that is competitive like what the government wants in Alberta?

Or take, for example, the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association and veterinarians as a whole. They offered to work with the government. I believe that. AMVIC offered to work with the government. I believe that. The automobile repair industry would have offered to work with the government. We have all these people saying: let's work together to make this happen. But what we get in the end is a government that ceases to bring forward what we actually want to see, and that is a diversified economy in Alberta that is sustainable and is something that we can all be proud of.

Now, we'll move on to the fact that they've recently updated the bylaws and policies of the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association. They offered to strengthen them, and even though it was what the government wanted, this was ignored. They're willing to be a partner at the table. They approached it with the best intentions and willingness. They were ignored. Instead, the government has completely ignored the work they've done, the co-operation they've shown, and they've hurriedly pieced together some piece of legislation that makes no sense for the profession that operates well and sees a very, very small number of formal complaints each year.

This government is rushing in, Madam Speaker, and we've seen this happen before. This government talks about partnerships and collaboration, but the truth is that they don't know how to approach the table in good faith. They inform Albertans and stakeholders what they're going to do after the fact that this bill was already in motion. It was already written. And sometimes after it's done, they're surprised with the result. You know what? When you don't do consultation right, you end up with an industry that is angry and a consumer that is not serviced. Alberta is holding its services to the highest standard. That's not good faith. That has nothing to do with inspiring confidence, and it sure doesn't build trust. It's a shame that this NDP government thinks that this is the way to do business, an absolute, complete shame.

Let's talk about AMVIC. AMVIC started acting on the recommendations from the George Cuff report, and they were fully accepted by the minister. They started making progress. They started correcting mistakes that should have been corrected a long time ago. Then, out of nowhere the minister and her government step in and shake everything up yet again, creating more skepticism, mistrust when it started to be slowly rebuilt. That's not a way to run a board, a business, a government, or a province. Again, this is shameful, Madam Speaker, utterly shameful.

What about if we're going to look at ticket sales? We're trying to legislate things that are unenforceable like offshore ticket-buying bots. The intent for this at least is admirable, but it doesn't change the fact that it's unenforceable. Legislation should not be made for legislation's sake, nor should it be made to create a false sense of comfort or security.

Ontario has recently brought in similar legislation, and after it was introduced, CBC published an article from which I'd like to quote briefly. It reads in part:

Off-shore ticket bot operators are famous for being almost impossible to hunt down. The law sounds tough, but [it doesn't] prevent another debacle like the Hip's tour tickets if the responsible parties are seaward.

The goal of the legislation should not be to make symbolic statements that comfort people but do nothing or even worse, not address the problems at hand.

The goal of legislation should be to actively (and practically) protect people from force and fraud. In the case of ticket selling, that means keeping transactions transparent and safe. Not simply decreeing fairness and hoping everyone listens.

We need to have legislation that makes sense and is about problem solving, not problem seeking. Madam Speaker, this government just hasn't done its homework, and it needs to send this to committee to rectify the mistakes contained within it. This government has shown time and again that it rushes legislation through the House without fully considering the impact, without actually conducting proper consultation. This bill needs to go to committee in order to ensure that no time is wasted in getting it right the first time. It's better to get it done once the right way than have to come back and edit and fix it and amend it like we've had to do with other legislation this government has put forward.

If this is truly a bill about consumer protection, let's ensure that everyone has a seat at the table and this government is not blindly pushing forward on some ideological bent that is at the risk of honest, hard-working Albertans, who are doing their best and doing their jobs correctly. Please stop referring to Albertans as criminals, Minister.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I wanted to thank the member for such great work on this bill and for everything that you're bringing forward.

There were a couple of things that you were talking about with respect to respecting Albertans and their choices and how we move legislation like this forward. I mean, obviously, there are changes that need to be made, but when we're talking about groups of people that have been self-regulated up until this point and understanding what that means to them and how that impacts their businesses and who they are and how they work with the people that they service – you were mentioning something along the lines of how it makes Albertans feel when their ability to provide services that they've provided over this length of time is all of sudden coming under ministerial overreach. Could you please go on further to explain a little bit more about that?

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Well, you know, I hope that the members opposite are actually listening to what we're saying over here and what our stakeholders are saying. I hope that they're not being blinded by the side of the Chamber they sit on, and I hope that they're asking questions to this minister. I can't be the only one in this Chamber that has concerns with this. I do hear my colleagues having a lot of the same ones, but my colleagues across the aisle, the NDP colleagues, have to be hearing from their constituents as well, from veterinarians, from automobile salespeople. What is it that they're doing? Are they ignoring their constituents? I hope – I really hope – that they do ask this minister some questions.

This bill needs to be sent to a committee. There are some valid reasons. Albertans are reaching out to us because they are concerned, and they're very frustrated, Madam Speaker. I encourage all the members in the Assembly to support this amendment that my colleague has put forward. Let's look at every part of this bill, get it right before it goes too far and down the wrong path. Let's listen to our constituents because the constituents normally bring forward valid concerns. And you know what? A loaded online survey does not represent all of Alberta.

I understand that this government really feels that it's done its consultation because after Bill 6 I wouldn't want to go out and consult with Albertans either, but – you know what? – you're government. It is your responsibility, it is your due diligence to actually go out and talk with the people that you are governing right now. You don't just tell them the way this is and hope it works out because that rarely works.

I know that for myself I've got several e-mails from veterinarians within my e-mail. I do not have the same number as Vermilion-Lloydminster, but I will tell you that each and every one of the vets that have written to my constituency have valid concerns. They want to be heard. They need to be heard. You know what? Giving us about a week to get this legislation right is not giving those veterinarians the ability to be able to get the message to the government to make sure that this legislation gets it done right.

I still don't understand what this minister has against veterinarians. The fact that she is completely taking the governance away from a board that has worked tirelessly for Albertans – if I saw in the papers that we had problems across Alberta with veterinarians, then maybe this is a justifiable action that the minister is bringing forward, but I have not heard that. I will tell you that when I did google – and I know Google knows all. When I googled veterinarian problems, I couldn't find a whole lot of issues with this profession because – you know what? – these are good people. These people are highly respected in every rural community, and I can only assume that's in urban communities like Edmonton and Calgary. We trust these people with an animal that is close to us. I trust my dog Lexa to the local veterinarian. I know that when I bring my beautiful dog to that veterinarian, at that point it is the sole focus of that veterinarian to take care of it.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure tonight to be able to speak to this referral motion to Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act. I would like to first of all say that this an issue of, you know, whether or not the government has been able to achieve fulsome consultation with stakeholders that would be affected by this bill, and I have to say that my concern is that I am starting to see, from the letters and from the information I received and telephone calls, that in reality they have not.

My office has been inundated by calls from veterinarians in my riding. In fact, it makes me question whether or not the government was successful at being able to get to the southern part of Alberta and speak to the people and the veterinarians from my riding. I can tell you full well that the vets in my area do not feel that they have been consulted and that they would be very much in favour of me voting in favour of the referral motion to bring this to committee so that their voices can be heard.

Now, I am very interested to know whether the minister can table reports and table the support that she's received from vets specifically, who this is going to be affecting, so that we can take a look at this evidence that she says is so fulsome. I also have to ask the question, you know, in terms of saying: well, this needs to be done. What was the real, burning need? My question is: did the vets complain? Did they complain about their own self-regulation?

Really, we're talking about three groups here. We're talking about veterinarians, animals, and their owners. Now, I'm pretty sure that the animals didn't complain, and from what we understand, the vets didn't complain about being self-regulated. In fact, it's interesting to note that one of the other members from Vermilion-Lloydminster earlier tabled an article saying that vets are the third most respected profession in the professions. It begs the question of whether or not the clients would be complaining or saying that there's such a need for this regulation.

Now, I also want to point out, Madam Speaker, that in that same article it said that politicians were at the bottom of the list of those people respected. Based upon that information, the fact that we have this government wanting to regulate the third most respected profession that we have, I am scared to think about the regulation that they're going to be bringing forward for politicians, to regulate politicians, being the lowest and most disrespected of all professions. It's interesting that they're planning on, based upon their logic, regulating their own selves.

Now, the Minister of Service Alberta said that she knew of people who wouldn't take their pets in because they were paralyzed with fear – I believe those are the words that she used – of the cost. Now, as a pet owner who does live on a farm, I can tell you that pets are part of the family. I don't believe that there's anybody in here that, when your pet needs the help and the support, would be paralyzed because of the cost. This is like saying that you wouldn't take your children in to get the support that they need. I can't imagine anybody would do that to their children or to their pets. It didn't make sense when she said it, and I'm not sure whether or not she thought about that comment.

Now, we talk about the process of consultation that they went through. They said that there were two in-person meetings with vet associations, and this almost seemed like this was the main reason why this should go forward, because there were two consultations. Well, I would, first of all, be very interested in knowing what these associations said. What best practices did they say needed to be presented in this bill? Did these two veterinary associations say that we actually even need a bill? That information should be presented to the House so that we can take a look at it because if these associations really, again, felt such a burning need to have their own self-regulated organization become a regulated organization, then we'd like to be able to see that evidence. I would like to be able to see that evidence.

Now, it was stated that, you know, in the bill it specifically – and I'm going to use this as context, Madam Speaker, so that I can help you and my fellow members understand the reasons why I believe that this needs to be referred to committee. On page 23, in part 5.1, it says:

- 48.1(1) A registered veterinarian shall, in accordance with regulations,
 (a) disclose to a client . . . all fees for the prescribed type of veterinary medicine services proposed for the client's animal.

Now, I've taken my pets to a vet. I don't know. Maybe in small communities it's different than in larger communities, but I can tell you my experience. My experience was that when I took them in, first of all, it was a very caring environment. I didn't know the vet at the time, but I thought: here is someone who is professional; this person actually cares about who I considered a family member, my pet. And I thought: I feel safe bringing them to their care.

The first thing that I received from this vet was a description of what the problem was and what it would cost to fix it. In fact, I wasn't just given, you know, what the problem was and how to fix it, but I was actually given options. I had options about how I could do certain procedures which would cost a little bit more, but this would be the outcome. It was actually really nice that this vet was so willing to provide that kind of care to myself.

Now, I can tell you that there are other professions where I don't feel the same kind of care, I don't get the same kind of care when I go in and I speak to different organizations and professions. Again, the reason why I say this, Madam Speaker, is because I'm trying to understand how the minister could say that there was such a burning need for regulation on an association of vets.

The other point that I think is substantial in this is on regulations, section 48.3(1). It says: "The Lieutenant Governor in Council, after consultation with the Council" – now, it's good to hear that it's after consultation with the council – "may make regulations respecting fees and authorization for veterinary medicine, including, without limitation, regulations." Then it goes from (a) through (h) on different ways that they can be able to regulate this industry.

Now, I have to ask: why is it such a big appetite of this government to micromanage every single aspect of our society? Again, in context, the question here is: was there actually a reason, a burning reason, to be able to regulate this? Was there a public outcry that said: we need to regulate vets because they are doing X, Y, and Z. I haven't heard any reasons other than the minister, again, saying that she had heard of people who were paralyzed with fear of the cost of going in and having probably what they would consider a family member treated. Why do we need to take an organization that is self-regulated – and obviously the self-regulation seems to be working because they are the third most respected of all professions in Alberta – and put them under one of the least respected of professions, which is politicians? How does that make sense? Third most to the lowest, and this makes sense.

An Hon. Member: Just certain politicians.

Mr. Hunter: Just certain politicians, I absolutely agree. One of the members opposite said that, and I couldn't agree more.

Now, the interesting thing is that this cabinet is allowed to prescribe types of veterinary medicine services. They are allowed to describe respecting the disclosure to a client of fees on prescribed types of veterinary medicine services, respecting the advertisement. I mean, we're not talking about just saying: we're going to inject into what we consider is the problem, which might be the fees. We're saying: we're going to tell you how you can advertise; we can tell you what kind of suite of products you're going to be allowed to provide. This is all of a sudden becoming a big problem for veterinarians. Again, I have to say that if there was no problem, why would they inject themselves into this? Why would they inject themselves into an industry that was the third highest of all professions, the third most respected profession? I don't understand why they would inject themselves into this situation, other than that they must have a monumental appetite for micromanaging every aspect of society.

Maybe what needs to be done here is that we need to be able to tell everybody by talking about this that if you are a self-regulating body, you have a big target on your back with this government, that from now on don't tell everybody that you're a self-regulating body in Alberta because heaven forbid that you actually are successful at that and that you actually have an industry that is very good at what they do and that the client support is very high and that everybody thinks you're a great organization, because you're going to get regulated by this government. Again, going from an organization that is the third most respected to being regulated by the profession that is the least respected: it makes absolutely no sense.

Now, obviously, a concern here is that we've got five pages in this bill that talk about how they would like to change this veterinary practice in Alberta. Here's the problem. The problem is that the cabinet has the right to be able to write regulations, and the devil is always in the details, Madam Speaker. What kind of regulations are they going to be bringing forward? Do we have an opportunity to be able to know what the government's thoughts are on how they need to regulate this? And if these are regulations, then we need to make sure that those regulations are something that the veterinarians would want.

With that, Madam Speaker, I would like to adjourn debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

Bill 30 An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans

Mr. Gotfried moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Alberta's Economic Future in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment December 5: Connolly]

The Acting Speaker: Are there any members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for allowing me time to add my voice to the debate around my colleague's amendment that would refer Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, to committee. Part of the strength of this Legislature is that we not only have the diverse backgrounds and perspectives of many members but that that diversity allows us to collaborate to make sure legislation is as good as it gets before it's passed. Included in that process is the ability to send a piece of legislation back for additional information because I'm sure we all know it would be better not to pass something than to pass a flawed bill.

Madam Speaker, this bill is one such that needs to be sent to committee for a more fulsome look and a more substantive consultation. This is a large and complex bill that deserves to be treated slowly and methodically. We have seen this government push through large, complex bills before, and it is a disservice to Albertans everywhere to do that.

There are some good pieces in this legislation, and that is part of what makes it so frustrating. Had this bill been pared down into several pieces, we might not be having this conversation now. Instead, the government is forcing us to deal with the entirety of it, and that's one reason we need to push this to the committee before proceeding.

Take, for example, the fact that we could be putting small and medium-sized businesses at stake because the administrative charges associated with enacting this bill are too cumbersome and costly for them to absorb. We saw another 12,000 full-time jobs lost by Albertans last month, and we don't need to add to that number or create more uncertainty around the job market that exists currently.

What I and my colleagues would like to see and hear from the government is evidence that the changes proposed in this bill will actually be helpful. The government members like to talk about the evidence all the time when it's convenient for them. Well, we're asking them to provide some hard-and-fast evidence that this legislation will be helpful in moving things forward. You heard me talk about concerns with the employment market and workforce. Again, we'd like to see some facts associated with whether or not this is truly in the best interest of working Albertans at this time.

I'll be frank with you, Madam Speaker. If the government had done its job, we wouldn't need this referral motion. If the government was not so keen on pushing through a huge bill shortly before we're supposed to rise for Christmas, we wouldn't need this referral. If the government had run comprehensive consultation, we wouldn't need to talk about the need to refer this bill to committee.

Now, the government will of course say that they have done a lot of consultation in regard to this bill, but one can hardly count a public opinion survey with heavily slanted and leading questions as consultation. That is much more a case of the government knowing which answers they want to hear and doing what they could to ensure they received those answers.

Another example is that this bill goes even farther than what is suggested by the WCB Review Panel's recommendation. Yet again we see government doing a semblance of consultation but actually just using it to cover for the fact that they are going to do whatever they want to regardless of the input they receive.

You see, Madam Speaker, the evidence is clear that it is best for government and Albertans that this bill be sent to committee for further research, consultation, and discussion. This is the one reason why legislative committees exist, to provide an outlet for all members here to ensure that due diligence is practised by the government. We need to ensure that due diligence is practised now.

You know, Madam Speaker, I've never been one for filibustering. When I was in government, I used to be frustrated sitting over there, listening to the opposition filibuster. Now that I am in opposition, earlier this fall I had to sit here and listen to the government filibuster their own bills. It's just frustrating. I mean, we adjourned early. We adjourned at 4 o'clock, and the government was filibustering some simple, minor bills that we all agreed on and supported. I wish they'd have brought them at the end and brought these complicated ones first, when we had time to consult. Like, yesterday we got a bill dropped like this, still hot, a book, and you want us to pass it tomorrow.

We were able to filibuster this bill to the weekend, which I was glad of because when I went home to my constituency on the weekend, I met with the chamber of commerce. What they had to say was nothing like what the minister was saying. Yeah, they consulted with them. They told them what they were going to do, and the chamber didn't support it and told them that. The consultation doesn't mean that you tell them what you're going to do and just do what you want; you should actually listen to the people. The chamber of commerce represents the businesspeople and the small business of this province, which drives it, and the chamber of commerce is not supportive of this bill, believe me. I talked to mine on the weekend and to lots of businesspeople that are not supportive of this.

I have no choice but to support referring this bill to committee so we can have a better conversation with the real people of Alberta. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak under 29(2)(a) with respect to just some of the comments from my hon. colleague from Grande Prairie-Wapiti. You know, the Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti has been a member of this Assembly for quite an extended period of time, and he is a very well-respected legislator on both sides of the Chamber, certainly on this side and, I'd expect, on that as well.

I know that the Minister of Education, the Premier, the Minister of Transportation, the Minister of Economic Development and Trade would have had the opportunity to work with the member when he was, in fact, some of those same ministers on the other side of the House. You know, I think they quite likely would tell you – and I know, Madam Speaker, because I happened to work in the precincts here supporting members at that time and had the opportunity to work with the minister of the day. I'm sure that the Minister of Education and others would tell you about the good work that he did and how open and accessible he was. I know as a member of the opposition that we quite appreciated the transfer of information and his general knowledge about what was happening around the precincts.

I think it's so interesting to hear him now speak about some of his frustrations, when it comes to the legislative process and how we see this government operating, as a member who's had lots of experience with preparing legislation to ensure that we can allow for the appropriate amount of debate possible with respect to the sessional calendar.

As he highlighted, the very fact that at the start of this session and, certainly, at the start of the spring session we saw the government speaking at length about their own legislation, that they had introduced in the Chamber, while seemingly they scrambled to get other pieces of legislation introduced – a good example of that is what we saw yesterday with Bill 32. It's important, Madam Speaker, because it's exactly why we should be sending pieces like Bill 30 to committee, to ensure that we have the appropriate time to study it. If we look at Bill 32, this is what a bill that's been rushed through the printers and sent to the Chamber looks like. As you can see, it's on this paper, eight and a half by 11, stapled together at the back of the Assembly somewhere and did not actually come from the Queen's Printer, who has the opportunity to have it bound appropriately. I'll just show you exactly what it should look like. If the government wasn't rushing legislation into the Chamber, they would have had it already bound like we have come to know and expect legislation to be.

But what we've seen this session is the government rushing legislation in the dying days leading up to Christmas, intending to run the opposition morning, noon, and night, and rush legislation through the Chamber. That's exactly what we've seen with Bill 32.

It's what we're seeing with Bill 30. Listen, there are a number of different sections of this legislation that we agree with, that are a very positive step in the right direction. What we don't want is to have to come back in the spring to fix the errors of this government. We know that it's happened regularly.

I'm just curious to know if the member would like to provide any additional commentary on the significant challenge that's before the Assembly with respect to not being as respectful of the Chamber and respectful of the process as perhaps would be beneficial for all Albertans so that we can get the best piece of legislation.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Madam Speaker. As I referred to it, you know, it was Bill 32, but we were speaking to Bill 30. I'm embarrassed that I have to get up and filibuster because I've never done it in almost 10 years. I'm doing it now because there are some big pieces of legislation. There's one left to be supposedly introduced yet. It looks like, I think, Bill 34 is yet to be introduced. We were actually supposed to rise on Thursday. Are they going to introduce the bill the day we rise?

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the referral? The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. McIver: He hasn't spoken to it already?

The Acting Speaker: I'm just double-checking. One minute.

Hon. member, you've already spoken to second reading, and you've also spoken to the referral, so unfortunately you can't speak.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is my real privilege to be able to speak, particularly when you're in the chair, and I wish to discuss referring Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, to a legislative standing committee. I really like this referral motion brought up by my colleague. There are so many valid reasons to do that. Both my benchmarks here, sitting on my left and right, spoke very eloquently of this need to refer this bill because this bill makes sweeping changes to the Workers' Compensation Board system.

That's why it's really important to refer bills like this, because the government has a pattern here. At the end of every legislative session suddenly, you know, they wake up and bring thousands of pages of bills which are really important for Albertans, and then we, being the Official Opposition, are expected to respond to those last-minute, important bills, voluminous bills. With that, actually, the quality of the debate in the House will suffer because of lack of time. It's not a laughing matter. It impacts every Albertan and their livelihoods.

Madam Speaker, I find that the work in committees is incredibly important in order to shape the future policy direction of the province. I like committees so much that I keep asking my party's leadership to add me to more committees.

Some Hon. Members: That's true.

Mr. Panda: But I don't get any more pay. Let me be clear. I'm not getting any more pay by asking to be included in more committees. [interjection] Yeah, but I get the opportunity to learn about what's happening out there and also the rest of the province. That's the reason I want to be involved in standing committees.

The legislative standing committees are the best venues for conducting public consultations on any legislation, yet the NDP government fails to see the value in this exercise, Madam Speaker. If the government missed public consultation in creating a law, the legislative standing committees are the last line of defence. These committees sometimes do a real good job. We have seen with the time change legislation, brought forward by one of our young friends from Edmonton, that there was a lot of interest throughout the province. It generated lots of engagement across the province, and the subcommittee went around the province and gathered information. Finally, in consultation with Albertans we made the right decision. Similarly, we should be trying to refer this bill, as suggested by my hon. colleague here, to the standing committee so we can debate it thoroughly.

You know, if we had been sending more bills to the committees, we could have avoided many legislation amendments down the road, because that's our job. We are here to make the bills better, the government's bills better. That's what the previous speaker also mentioned, that, you know, we should be doing real consultations, not, like, telling Albertans: "Oh, okay. This is how I want to do it. You just rubber-stamp what we are saying." That's not the job of the Official Opposition. That's not what we're sent here for.

Now, Madam Speaker, as Forrest Gump used to say, "Stupid is as stupid does." As much as we want to legislate stupid away, stupid is as stupid does, and accidents will happen on work sites when workers are not paying attention or are not careful and not thinking things through. This Bill 30: the core principle of this bill is that all work-site parties have a responsibility for the health and safety of all workers. I completely agree with that. However, Bill 30 puts significantly more responsibility on employers.

As you may know, Madam Speaker, I worked in the oil sands industry for a long time and also in the oil and gas industry for a long time. We all know that workers already have a right to refuse dangerous work. If the work is deemed to be dangerous, then they have the right to refuse. We all have a responsibility to ensure that stupid things don't create a Swiss cheese scenario, where the holes will line up, allowing bad things to happen on the job site.

Bill 30 includes a number of provisions that are absent in the current Occupational Health and Safety Act, the OHS Act, either in part or in whole. Just like this government rammed through changes to the Labour Relations Code and the Employment Standards Code all at once, they're doing it again by changing the Workers' Compensation Act and the OHS Act at the same time.

This large, complex bill could easily be split into separate pieces of more manageable legislation. I'm not the first one to suggest this, Madam Speaker. Previous speakers also talked about the merits of splitting this bill into biteable pieces of manageable legislation. This is where sending the bill to the committee would come in handy. Small and medium-sized businesses are especially at risk because they're not as able to absorb increased administrative costs to support the joint committees, added administrative training, and alternate work placements.

There are administrative tasks like mandatory joint work-site health and safety committees. Previously they were only mandated at the discretion of the minister. The money spent on supporting the new administrative costs can actually take away from a small or medium-sized business's ability to invest in new safety measures and equipment.

Madam Speaker, now, I suspect that the NDP are trying to legislate a cultural change into the workplace. The NDP are trying to be noble here, but then they're trying to rush this legislation. Cultural changes happen from the leadership in charge. One cannot wave a magic wand and expect things to be fixed. As we speak, the people, Albertans, are wising up, and they're able to see through, and the opposition to Bill 30 is growing every day.

The Alberta Chambers of Commerce came out swinging against Bill 30, Madam Speaker. Wouldn't you like to hear their arguments in detail? If you do want to hear their arguments, then send it to the committee. I would love to see Mr. Kobly from the Alberta Chambers of Commerce provide his argument against Bill 30 in contrast to Mr. McGowan and the Alberta Federation of Labour's supporting Bill 30. You should entertain their counterviews. You know, if you just take the input from Mr. McGowan and ignore other valuable input, it's not helpful to Albertans.

The NDP government has claimed to have conducted consultations on Bill 30 before it was tabled. However, the stakeholders found that the questions on the consultations were leading and are a sign the government was looking to confirm and gain approval for their own ideas rather than actually listening to stakeholders and the public with an open mind. The previous speaker, the Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti, mentioned that on the weekend he went and talked to the stakeholders in Grande Prairie, and that's what they told him, that they were not adequately consulted and that consultations were just leading in a particular direction rather than hearing out the real concerns of the stakeholders.

Madam Speaker, this is a déjà vu of Bill 17. FOIPed documents showed that the government's consultation on workplace laws last spring had a predetermined outcome, so there is a pattern there. The NDP has learned well from the progressives to make that square peg fit that round hole and use those boilerplate and leading questions to confirm the bias you want and lead people down the garden path to their answer. You just wanted to hear what you want to hear, but you're not seeking the input.

We see that the court's ability to use creative sentencing options for employers found in contravention of the act is now contained in Bill 30. The Member for Chestermere-Rocky View talked about . . .

Mr. Cooper: A good member.

Mr. Panda: Yeah. She talked about the creative sentencing options, and I can use some examples, Madam Speaker. If the owner of a KFC sells a bad batch of chicken, the judge could conceivably make the owner dress up in a chicken suit and have him hold a sign shaming him. It potentially could happen. I think this is where the NDP is taking us. [interjection] I'm not in that suit, but it could be so creative because you're giving that option in this bill. I think this is where the NDP is taking us with this bill, and this is why we need to go to the committee.

Madam Speaker, I have done what I can here to demonstrate the concerns with Bill 30. I have only barely scratched the surface. There are even more important things going on in here with Bill 30 that are reason enough to send this bill to committee for study and consultation. We have the time before the next election for a study and consultation unless the Premier and the cabinet are planning to prorogue or call an early election. I don't see why there is a rush for this. We can still refer it to the committee.

By not sending this bill to the committee, the NDP are signalling to the province that something is up. We don't know what that something is. People are just speculating. They are planning something: maybe a cabinet shuffle, maybe an early election, maybe a prorogation and new throne speech. We don't know what it is. We don't know why they are rushing this bill. Or are the NDP just selfish and want to avoid any real work in the month of January because that will mess up all our holiday plans, vacation plans?

I just came back from the Westminster seminar.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak to 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I've got a few comments for my colleague for Calgary-Foothills. A lot of the talk around why they want refer it to committee: a few large areas, I guess. Consultation. As we've explained, you know, we received 1,300 surveys, 90 written submissions, eight in-person round-table discussions, and the government consulted with a number of Albertans, including employers, workers, and trades groups. Also, a big part of that was the WCB independent panel in which they completed a review, and they themselves received 1,700 questionnaires and 200 written submissions, and 60 responses were submitted. What they determined as well is that what we are putting in place here is sustainable and affordable.

You know, I think what's being missed here – I don't want to delay this legislation by sending it to committee. Part of the reason is that I've seen, I guess, the behaviour of the opposition in committee, and I don't think it would get us anywhere. That's one reason. The other reason is that, I mean, if you don't want to take this consultation seriously, then how's 40 years? Forty years is a pretty long consultation, 40 years ignored.

Mr. McIver: Forty years of success.

Mr. Coolahan: Okay. Yes. Forty years. Forty years.

I guess my greatest concern is that the opposition is always harping on consultation, and of course we take consultation seriously. We take it seriously; however, consultation should not supersede workplace safety. That is the key. So that's why we need to move on and discuss this through second reading and third reading right here in the House. That's what we're doing. That's exactly what we're doing.

Another of the issues that the opposition has and why they want to refer this to the committee has to do with the fact that this is a large bill. That's fine. It is a large bill, but it's a large bill because we've combined OH and S and WCB, which are intrinsically connected, and it's quite logical to do so. Again, the other reason is that we're playing catch-up after 40 years, so there's a lot to fill in that other provinces already have.

You know, I don't think we should be referring this to committee just simply because the opposition can't manage their budget and they don't have enough staff to get through the bill successfully in enough time to put forth reasonable arguments, reasonable amendments. That's not my problem. That's not Albertans' problem. Albertans' problem is workplace safety. That's their issue. They have said that they do like some of this, but they want to refer it for other pieces. I wasn't quite clear on what those pieces were, actually, but . . .

An Hon. Member: The bad ones.

Mr. Coolahan: What are the bad ones? I'm not sure.

Why I think we need to move forward on this bill and not refer it at this time is the joint work-site health and safety committee. [interjection] Yeah. I think this is a fantastic idea. Most other provinces have this in place. They're very successful.

You know, I was actually pretty disappointed with what the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka said earlier today on this. It was a very cynical view of a joint health and safety committee. He said something to the effect, you know, that it would create more conflict at work. I don't believe that at all. Did the member actually read what is done in a joint health and safety committee?

- (a) the receipt, consideration and disposition of concerns and complaints respecting the health and safety of workers.

An Hon. Member: Sounds scary.

Mr. Coolahan: Frightening.

- (e) the development and promotion of programs for education and information concerning health and safety.

Why should we delay this?

- (b) participation in the identification of hazards to workers . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members that wish to speak to the referral?

Seeing none, I will call the question.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment REF1 lost]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 5:46 p.m.]

[Fifteen minutes having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Tuesday, December 5, 2017

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Acting Speaker: Please be seated.

Government Motions

Adjournment of Fall Session

35. Mr. Mason moved:

Be it resolved that pursuant to Standing Order 3(9) the Third Session of the 29th Legislature 2017 fall sitting of the Assembly be extended beyond the first Thursday in December until such time as or when the Government House Leader advises the Assembly that the business for the sitting is concluded, and at such time the Assembly stands adjourned.

[Government Motion 35 carried]

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 33

Electoral Divisions Act

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: I move second reading of Bill 33, the Electoral Divisions Act.

Madam Speaker, Bill 33 comes about as the result of an independent commission which conducted an extensive review of Alberta's electoral map, received a great many written and oral submissions from Albertans, and ultimately put forward its recommendations. As members are no doubt aware, the commission recommended the creation of three new electoral divisions and the consolidation of three areas that have seen below-average population growth over the last eight years.

Certainly, many people on both sides of the House believe that the Electoral Boundaries Commission could have found a less disruptive way to make the changes that it ultimately recommended. I know there will be many resulting challenges, especially with respect to rural representation. However, we believe that the alternative of having politicians set their own boundaries rather than having an independent panel doing it would not be productive or appropriate.

While we may not agree with everything in the report, ultimately it's important to remember that the seats in the Assembly belong to Albertans and not to any one MLA or any one political party. It is for that reason that last week the government presented a motion to concur in the report. That motion was approved on the evening of November 28 with some amendments to boundary names, and it is for that reason that the government is now introducing Bill 33.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It is a pleasure to rise on this glorious evening.

An Hon. Member: Glorious.

Mr. Cooper: Glorious. Simply marvellous.

In the long, time-honoured tradition of my colleague from Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre, I'd just like to say good night to Porter and Paxton and Peyton. I hope you have a great sleep. Dad will be home soon, and by soon I mean sometime next week, by the looks of things.

You know, Madam Speaker, Bill 33, the Electoral Divisions Act, is a very important piece of legislation, as many things that we discuss here in the Assembly are, but there are some significant challenges. The Government House Leader just rose and identified how we arrived here. I want to begin by thanking the members of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for their hard work and their service to Albertans. Those five individuals gave up a lot of their time, talent, and energy to produce the final report as well as the draft report and to do some real public consultation. That work was important and diligent work.

Having said that, just because important and diligent work has been done, it doesn't mean that we arrived at the right conclusion. I think there are a number of factors at play that should provide enough reason to not accept Bill 33. It was one of the reasons why I voted against the government motion that was before us last week or the week before, because I am of the opinion that we haven't struck the right balance, particularly in respect to rural Alberta and the negative impacts that it will have on rural Alberta.

I might just add that Commissioner Gwen Day, who provided a minority report, highlights some of those concerns. Particularly in the constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, that I have the absolute honour and pleasure of representing, as you know, Madam Speaker, I have heard from numerous individuals who have expressed this significant concern. I'd like to walk through some of those concerns this evening and encourage members of the Assembly to carefully consider the ramifications of making the decision to accept the legislation.

I want to remind members that we each have a responsibility and a duty to Albertans, and I want to remind particular members of the government caucus that represent rural Alberta of the negative consequences that this particular piece of legislation will have over a long period of time for not just rural Alberta but all of Alberta. All voices around this mosaic that we call Alberta are critically important, and that includes those voices in rural Alberta. You'll know, Madam Speaker, that as a result of the report and, I would submit to you, the inaccurate decision that the commission made to weigh the variance of population as more important than effective representation, this decision that the justice and the majority on the commission made to not accurately reflect these very important Supreme Court guided parameters around effective representation, I would encourage members of the Assembly to not accept Bill 33 and to vote against it.

Too often, unfortunately, the right to effective representation is confused with the concept of equality of voting power. They are two very separate things, Madam Speaker. Inside the legislation that provides the boundary commission with the guidance they are to base their decisions upon, there is this allowance for a variance of electoral divisions, that of 25 per cent more or less than the average of the proposed electoral division. What we wound up with are some very, very challenging impacts of this decision and, certainly, Justice Bielby's commitment to get to what she referred to as voter parity, which is this concept of one person, one vote.

I think that Commissioner Day made a very compelling case in the minority report that this parameter of one person, one vote isn't a Canadian concept. It's not outlined in any overarching piece of legislation. In fact, you can go as far back as the founding fathers of our country, when they spoke to the fact that variance was reasonable and acceptable. We all have different roles here in the Chamber, Madam Speaker, and when we make a decision based solely on population, we could have just done that in a spreadsheet. We could have just made a very cold, calculated decision based upon straight-up numbers.

I think you'll find that in the urban areas the commission did quite a good job of getting as close to that number of zero as possible. It's unfortunate that in Calgary and Edmonton we see the vast majority of the variances and certainly, in Edmonton's case, the vast majority of them being under 6 per cent variance and in many cases under the average population of the electoral districts. Yet we see in constituencies like Bonnyville-Cold Lake a 15 per cent population variance above. So not only do you have challenges with the representation of the size of the constituency, the number of schools, school boards, municipalities . . . [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon members, just a reminder that we are in second reading, not Committee of the Whole. If we could please respect the member who is speaking.

Mr. Cooper: I will, Madam Speaker, do my very best to be exponentially more engaging in the remainder of my remarks.

When I think about how I may better engage the members opposite, one thing I do know for certain is that there are a number of members opposite that share some of my concerns. I have had conversations on the highways and byways of the legislative precincts – for the record that was good for engaging, the highways and byways – about this very issue, that many members on that side of the Chamber feel like rural Alberta perhaps didn't get a fair shake because of this commitment to population parity. So we see all across rural Alberta negative impacts from just that.

I think that it's important that we consider the report in its entirety and, as such, the legislation in its entirety. Madam Speaker, there are other options available to the Assembly than just accepting it because the report has been placed before us. We could strike a new commission. We could delay the commission past the next general election, as, I might add, was the recommendation of the Official Opposition from the beginning of this process. We all know that the commissions were compressed together because of the closeness of time between general elections. We actually had some opportunity to delay it. If we were to say no now, we could push past and either have a new commission after the next general election or potentially accept these results after the next general election, including sending the commission back out.

One thing I think you will find is that the draft report and the final report were extremely different reports. A case could be made that the final report was so different from the draft that we ought to have consulted on the effectiveness of the draft report as well. Now, unfortunately, there aren't the parameters within the conditions which the commission had to operate under for that to happen. As you know, Madam Speaker, the Legislative Assembly is the master of its own domain, and we have the opportunity to provide guidance, if we want, to the commission, and we could have provided them the tools and the resources to ensure that they could go back and take the draft and find out exactly what Albertans were expecting.

You know, Madam Speaker, when it comes to effective representation, it's important, particularly in rural Alberta, that Albertans have equal access to their member as well. You know that I represent the outstanding constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, and under the new report that outstanding constituency will grow in size by approximately a third and will be close to 300 kilometres from one corner to the next.

Let me be very clear. I'm more than happy to do that work, to drive the kilometres, to see the people, but when you compare that to an urban riding, the amount of travel time, the amount of engagement that's possible are significantly reduced. As such, some people in Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills may feel that they don't have the same sort of access or effective representation as they would with an urban MLA, which has been my long-held opinion as well as the opinion of Commissioner Day. We should, in fact, be using the 25 per cent population variances in the cities so that we can have more opportunity in the rural areas to disperse those rural MLAs so that rural Albertans have equal and effective representation in their constituencies as well. I think that it is very critical to the success of our province that rural Alberta continues to be strong and vibrant and successful.

The large physical demographics of rural ridings: it is nearly impossible for rural MLAs, particularly in some of the constituencies – one I know the Deputy Speaker represents – to effectively represent those areas. I know that my colleague from Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre from time to time will ask this question of individuals, particularly out in the rural areas – sometimes we'll even do events together in the city, and I hear him ask this question, Madam Speaker: what is the difference between a rural MLA and an urban MLA? Some would say better looking. I'm not sure that that is . . .

Mrs. Aheer: Miles. Distance.

Mr. Cooper: Miles. Distance. That's another good guess.

Madam Speaker, the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre will tell you that the difference between a rural MLA and an urban MLA is that a rural MLA has to have toilet paper in their truck because there are significant distances and you never know. You always need to be prepared. If you're an urban MLA, that's never a problem. You are always very close to your next stop.

I think that these are the sorts of – well, that's a humorous example of some of the differences, but there are some very real challenges that exist in rural Alberta. The commission, in my opinion, certainly hasn't taken into consideration those challenges and those concerns. In fact, in the draft report the majority on the commission actually recommended or said that it might be possible that rural MLAs would be able to hire a driver so that they could do more work while travelling the great distances that they travel. Now, I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that the good folks of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills would not look too keenly on their member having a driver. I know that the government is into job creation and growing government jobs, but I don't think that this is the best path forward for that. We need to consider these very unique differences between urban and rural Alberta and ensure that rural MLAs are able to effectively represent their constituents and keep that voice strong.

One of the other things that you'll find, Madam Speaker, is that in urban areas it's quite possible to have MLAs that are more interchangeable than in rural Alberta. While each MLA brings their own unique personality and perspective to their role, if the chamber of commerce in Calgary is holding an event that may or may not actually even be in their constituency, an urban MLA may attend on behalf of elected officials whereas in rural Alberta that presents more of a significant challenge because members of the constituency really have a personal connection to their MLA and would like to see them, whether it's at a graduation or a chamber lunch or otherwise. As much as the good people of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills might love to see the Member for Livingstone-Macleod at an event, it is certainly not the same type of personal connection that rural Alberta appreciates or would like to see.

It's been well documented that despite variances in larger populations, those urban MLAs are often in a better position to represent their constituents because of their collective, shared responsibility with other MLAs and the lack of distance from their actual constituency.

As we move forward, you know, I think there is a responsibility of all members of the Assembly to ensure that we are doing our very best to protect the interests of all Albertans, and that means ensuring that we have effective representation all across the province. This is a concept, as I mentioned, that is enshrined by case law in the Supreme Court. I think that Commissioner Day did a great job in the minority report of laying out a lot of those facts.

I would encourage members on the other side to think carefully about what options we may have as an Assembly to ensure that we respect both urban and rural Albertans. I know that there are members of the other side that voted with the opposition against the motion because they have some real reservations, and that's a great thing. I think that in a free and open Legislature we should look at what's best, not just for our constituency but for Alberta as a whole. A strong rural Alberta means a strong Alberta. We need strength in both urban and rural, and having that sort of representation in rural Alberta is critical to the success of our province.

I think you'll agree, Madam Speaker, that at AAMD and C just a few weeks ago they passed a motion at their biannual conference to enshrine some of – or calling upon the government to not accept the boundaries commission report, to not proceed with the weakening of democracy in rural Alberta but to stand strong and represent the very unique and important needs of rural Alberta.

I think that we should also be having a large conversation around: how are we going to ensure that Alberta remains strong and robust? Over a long period of time we can expect that in rural Alberta some areas – well, certainly we have declining populations, and in the cities those populations will quite likely continue to increase. If we don't stop this shift of the urbanization of our Assembly, we run the risk long term of presenting some real challenges to the strength of our democracy. I think that that's an important conversation that we as an Assembly should have at some point in time.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Don't forget Taber. Okay.

Madam Speaker, it's my pleasure to be able to rise to speak to this bill and talk about this Electoral Boundaries Commission report and some of the concerns that I have with it. I'd just like to, first of all, start out by telling you about a situation that I encountered last week with an MLA from the NDP side. We were at a mayors and reeves meeting, and presented to the mayors and reeves was that this NDP MLA felt that she needed to vote in favour of this because the report was done and she had no choice but to vote for this.

Now, I just want to speak to this issue. From what I understand, the commission's responsibility or mandate was to write the report. It's not their responsibility to make sure that it gets passed or that it doesn't get passed. So it's our responsibility to take a look at that report and find out whether or not it works for us individually in our ridings and for the people who we represent.

Now, I know that there are many members on the opposite side who are rural MLAs and try to represent their constituents to the best of their ability. Here's the problem. The problem is that from listening to this MLA, it sounded like she was either told or under the belief that they must vote for this bill. They must vote in favour of this bill. So I was looking forward to the opportunity to be able to say to all of the members opposite that the mandate of the commission has been fulfilled in the writing of this report. The mandate that is on your shoulders as MLAs is to find out whether or not this works for you in your individual ridings and whether or not you should be voting for this.

I believe that if we take it on that merit, we will be in a situation where we have the opportunity to really see this for what it is, which is a disenfranchising of rural Alberta. At the AAMD and C conference, if you were there – and I know that a lot of members opposite were there, which I'm grateful that they actually went to these stakeholder outreaches and talked with the people. I heard it over and over again there that if these MLAs were to vote for this bill, they would see it as a slap on rural Alberta's face and that they would see this as disenfranchising rural Alberta and that they would not take kindly to this.

You know, we saw the same thing happen with Bill 6. With Bill 6 the government side of the House was new, and I think that had they had the kind of experience that they have now, I do not believe that especially a lot of the rural MLAs would have voted in favour of that bill. When they saw how upset rural Alberta was about Bill 6, I think that what would happen is that with the experience that they have now, they would have voted against Bill 6.

Getting back to this bill ...

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, a reminder: second reading, not Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just want to point out that in my opinion you've got the strengths and the weaknesses of this, and I think that each MLA needs to ask themselves: what are the strengths of this, and what are the weaknesses of this?

We've got three new ridings that are going to be introduced. We have one in Edmonton, one in Calgary, and one in Airdrie. Now, if polls are maintained at the same levels that they are right now, I would have to say that the NDP have the chance of getting one of those three.

An Hon. Member: How about three?

Mr. Hunter: I'm glad you're so, you know, enthusiastic at this late hour, but the polls have been fairly consistent. So I would say that 1 out of those 3 they have a chance, a possible chance, of being able to win.

What is the cost that they are trading, you know, that kind of potential gain? The cost is that I also know that a lot of the MLAs on that side have been working really hard in their ridings. I've actually heard of people who actually get out there. They knock on doors. They try to engage with the stakeholders. Now, here's what they give up. What they give up, especially in Calgary and Edmonton – Calgary is obviously going to be where the battle lines are drawn. They've been working in their specific areas, and now all of Calgary is redrawn. So the MLAs that have been working hard there now have to go into the next election without having the ability to work. They have maybe a year, year and a half to be able to work on the new boundaries. Now, everybody is going to have to deal with that, obviously, but if I was an MLA from the NDP side, I would have to ask myself: am I giving up way too much cost for a very minute and small gain? Taking a look at it, I can't see how they would see this as a benefit to them.

I will say this much. If you take a look at a heat map and the heat map represents where people voted in the 2015 general election, you know, I can see why they drew the boundaries the way they did. But, once again, based upon the polling information that we have, I don't think that those heat maps can actually be taken seriously. So I would have to say that once again I don't think that this government or the members opposite have been taking a serious look at what they are giving up for a small gain.

You know, once again, I want to go back to the original point, and that is that the mandate of the commission was to write the report. They did that. The mandate of each individual MLA in here is to be able to just vote yes or no on that report. They are not mandated to vote yes for that report, if I understand it correctly. However, listening to one of the MLAs on the other side, it would seem that that was what was presented to the MLAs, especially the backbench MLAs, on the NDP side. I wanted to make sure that it was on Hansard and it was publicly stated that in no uncertain terms is it ever mandated for any of the NDP MLAs to vote in favour of this, other than maybe you're being whipped to do it. Now, if that's the case, that's one thing, but it didn't seem like they were being whipped to be able to do this. What it seemed like was that they felt that they had no choice because of the way the report was written. They had to vote for it. They had no other choice. I wanted to make that point very clear.

Now, taking a look at some of the good points that were made in the minority report, it talks about the mandate of the commission. They had to take into consideration, obviously, population. There's no doubt that that was supposed to be taken into consideration. But, as some of my other colleagues have already pointed out, when you take a look at the way that they distributed the population, it seemed like they took into consideration Calgary and Edmonton, really trying to make sure that it was close and there was no deviation from the norm. They tried to go as close to that as possible. In fact, a lot of the Edmonton seats that I saw were plus or minus one or two.

Now, as a rural MLA I will say this much. From one end of my riding to another end of my riding it takes me almost three hours to drive. In the first iteration, the first draft, they had split my riding up into two ridings. There was an eastern part and a western part to the riding. In the first iteration the riding was called Taber-Vulcan, and it was interesting because this riding's boundaries went from about 20 minutes east of Calgary down to the southeast corner of Alberta.

Now, we took a look at this first iteration, and we thought: how in heaven's name can any MLA represent that many communities? Now, I understand that in northern Alberta there aren't as many communities, so I understand how they can be a lot bigger, but in southern Alberta that would have represented, I believe, four MDs and about 40 different communities of varying sizes. I can tell you that it would be impossible. So we wrote and talked to the commission and told them that this was unacceptable.

In the second iteration, the final report, that we received, all they did is that they took Taber-Vulcan and they made that into Taber-Warner. Now, that riding is actually a lot easier to be able to circumnavigate and get around, but what they did is that they then made it into the Cardston-Kainai riding, which takes it again from about 20 minutes outside of Calgary right down to the south border, just south of Cardston. Once again, this riding, with the way that the boundaries were developed, looks like an hourglass, and the reality is that once again I believe there's over 36 communities in this riding.

Each of these communities wants to have their own events that they would like to see their MLA come to, to be able to hear and talk with them, hear what their concerns are. Each of them has a council. Each of them has a mayor or a reeve, and they want their MLA to be able to come on a regular basis to be able to represent them. How do you represent that many communities properly? I have no doubt that it's going to be virtually impossible to do it effectively.

The mandate of this commission was very specific: to write the report. They did that. Many people in rural Alberta believe that they did that based upon the heat map that they took a look at to be able to find out how they could actually gerrymander this process for the NDP. [interjections] I'm just telling you that this is what they said.

Mr. Mason: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, a point of order has been called.

Point of Order Reflections on Nonmembers

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise under Standing Order 23(h), (i), and (j), particularly (j). There are a number of rulings that have been made from the chair in the past about reflections on people who are outside the House. The suggestion, whether it's a second-hand suggestion or a direct accusation, that in some way members of the commission were involved in gerrymandering is offensive, and it is a very bad reflection on the work that they did. We may not agree, and I think the hon. member is quite right that many members on both sides of the House disagree with some of the decisions in the report, but to suggest that it was done deliberately and with malice, in my view, is unacceptable. We ought not to show such serious disrespect for people who have undertaken a job on behalf of this Assembly and the people of Alberta.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. Government House Leader. The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. What I just heard from the Government House Leader was pretty rich based on his argument earlier today about the statement in the House today from the Member for Edmonton-South West, combined with the number of times the members of the government use the name Jason Kenney in a disparaging way in this House. If you just consider that alone, his sudden sensitivity to talking about comments that other people have made is astounding. It's so astounding as to be incredulous, and if the Government House Leader was to consider his earlier... [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members. [interjections] Hon. members, we're speaking to a point of order, so if you could please wait. Thank you. We're lively this evening, I see. If we could please listen. We have a point of order on the floor right now, and the hon. Member for Calgary-Hays is trying to declare his argument. If I could please hear his argument, I would appreciate it.

Thank you.

The hon. member.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Government House Leader, if he actually heard what he said earlier today and then heard what he just said five minutes ago, would probably have a very red face and probably be ashamed of himself. On that basis alone – you know what? I think that we all need to be a little bit sensitive of each other's feelings here, but really what the hon. member was saying was certainly far less offensive than what the Leader of the Opposition defended vehemently not very many hours ago, on this very day, from that very seat.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, at this point, I'm going to say that it's a dispute of the facts. Part of the struggle that we're having this evening is that I can't actually hear what the speakers are saying because there's too much noise on both sides of the House. I would recommend that all members respect the fact that we're in second reading, respect the fact that as the Speaker I need to hear what our members are saying, and stick to the bill, please.

Hon. member, please continue.

Debate Continued

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I will restate my point, and that is that the perception – the perception – that rural Alberta has of this slight is obviously not well received, so the NDP might want to consider the optics of what they're trying to gain from this. Once again, the issue is . . .

The Acting Speaker: Member, can you speak to the content of the bill, please, and not make any assumptions around perception?

Mr. Hunter: Let me finish what my point is. My point is this: we have three . . . [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members.
Please continue.

Mr. Hunter: . . . seats that will be brought from rural Alberta into the urban setting, and of those three, according to polls, the NDP at this point have the chance of being able to win one of them. So the cost of the optics for the NDP is high versus what they're actually going to gain. That was the only point that I was trying to make with this. If I offended anybody on the other side, it was not my intention.

But let's carry on with the minority report and the concerns that were brought forward. Under the rights that we have in this democratic society, we have the right to . . . [Mr. Hunter's speaking time expired]

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing – oh. My apologies. We're on 29(2)(a).

Mr. McIver: We are on 29(2)(a)?

The Acting Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Nixon: He is on 29(2)(a)?

The Acting Speaker: Would anybody like to speak to 29(2)(a)? Oh. Okay.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Madam Speaker. That's what I thought you were originally offering, but I do appreciate the clarification.

Thank you to the hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner for his excellent presentation, particularly his attempt to explain, I think, in a very good way how rural Alberta feels about parts of this report. I think the facts are pretty clear, when you look at the report and have talked to people across the province, that this is impacting constituencies on all sides of the aisle and all parties that are currently inside this Legislature, particularly on the rural side. I suspect that my rural colleagues across the way, like myself, are hearing the same concerns from their constituents in rural Alberta. There are a lot of concerns, particularly around how communities have been impacted, communities that have traditionally been together, that have common economic corridors and relationships and situations like that.

The Government House Leader, actually, when introducing this bill just about an hour ago, articulated that. He actually made it very, very clear that there were problems with this report and that he did not want to see this House gerrymandering ridings, which I agree with. I don't think that it is within our mandate as MLAs to try to redraw individual constituencies because of the conflict, which is why we use a committee to do that. But the Government House Leader was clear that there are problems with the report, and if there are problems with the report and the committee did get it wrong and has caused tremendous impact – I see the Minister of Service Alberta smiling about that, but she doesn't have a rural riding. She may not understand what is taking place in rural communities and what is upsetting them as a result of that.

I would like it if the hon. member could just expand a little bit on the frustration that is happening in rural Alberta.

Ms McLean: It was a grimace, not a smile.

Mr. Nixon: Okay. A grimace, then. Same thing.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, Minister.
The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Look, there is obviously frustration. I know the members opposite have heard it when they've gone to the AAMD and C. I'm not telling them something that they don't already know. The real question that we face here tonight is: will there be a win or a loss for rural Alberta? I don't think that the government gains anything from slighting rural Alberta, but this is a decision that they have to make.

In this situation I actually just wanted to make one other point here, Madam Speaker, and that is that in 1991 the Supreme Court in Saskatchewan stated that there can be a deviation up to 25 per cent and that that will not undermine section 3 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and that even in cities that deviation can happen.

Now, I've seen the maps. I saw certain iterations where they drew just Calgary and Edmonton, and they could make Calgary and Edmonton work within those deviations of 25 per cent higher or lower. Again, the way that the report was drafted seemed to take into consideration just Calgary and Edmonton when it came to those deviations. I think that whether it was intended or not, when rural Alberta takes a look at losing three seats out of rural Alberta, then they have to see this as a slight to them.

I've tried to speak to especially the member that was talking before when we were with the mayors and reeves, the NDP member, because she did seem like she felt that they had to vote for this. I do know that there were a couple that voted against but at great duress, from what I understand, to what they were told. Yet I think that there should be at least a majority of the rural MLAs that would say absolutely no to this report because it does slight rural Alberta.

There's lots more that I could talk about on this issue. Those people on the commission: I appreciate their efforts. This was a lot of work, and I think that we need to applaud them for the work that they did.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. Good evening, everyone. Thank you very much, hon. colleagues. I'm rising to speak to Bill 33. I just want to start by reflecting on the process that got us to this point, the process that the Electoral Boundaries Commission went through, the two-stage process. There was a series of public hearings, at the very least eight if I'm not mistaken, an online submission process where Albertans could weigh in, and a draft set of boundaries that were distributed. Albertans then had an opportunity to weigh in on that with another series of hearings and a tour around the province, rural and urban, another opportunity to provide input in person and online, and ultimately the report was finalized.

I just want to remind the House – I'm sure you all know this – that the commission was made up of two members appointed by the government, two members appointed by the Official Opposition, chaired by a Provincial Court judge. The process itself, I think, should be respected, and we need to understand that the process, at least ostensibly, ought to be a nonpartisan process. I will say that, yes, we have two members appointed by the government, but two members appointed by the Official Opposition.

Now, it's worth noting that one of the members appointed by the Official Opposition did write a minority report differing from the perspective of the majority, and she was certainly within her rights to do so. I think she made some very, very important points in that minority report, points that I think rural Alberta reflected in their submissions.

Members here in this House on both the government and opposition sides have made some points through their voting on Government Motion 34 and also what we've heard in debate about the feelings of rural Alberta as they relate to electoral boundaries. What it comes down to is: how do we balance the need to have representation by population in dense urban areas and areas that are not densely populated but have a large, large geographic area, and then how do we ensure that the Assembly represents a reasonable balance of what our province looks like?

In the end, given that it was such a thorough process – and I acknowledge the very legitimate concerns that rural Albertans have with the new electoral boundaries – I will support Bill 33, primarily because of the process that the commission went through.

But I will say, though – and I know this is not an issue specific to what we can address in the House with this particular bill; however, it is something perhaps that Members' Services could address, and that is: are there other ways of ensuring that rural Alberta has the representation that they need through constituency offices? Is there an opportunity – and I suggest that there certainly is an opportunity, and it's something we should look very closely at in Members' Services – to adjust the formula to ensure that rural Alberta, especially the new larger constituencies, have more resources available to them to have more constituency offices or offices open longer. Perhaps we could have a formula that any municipality above a certain size would be allocated a constituency office or a partial constituency office.

That doesn't change the fact that it's very difficult for MLAs that represent large rural constituencies to actually physically get around that constituency, to be in the communities when and where their constituents want them to be. It is a different situation than the situation I face in an inner-city, urban constituency. It just is. It is tremendously challenging. I have great empathy for MLAs who have to cover such tremendous geographic distances.

However, in the 21st century we have new communication technologies that allow for us to be engaged with our constituents in a different way than we were able to even a decade ago. I know that doesn't replace face to face – it's not as good – but it is an opportunity to at least stay engaged with what your constituents are talking about.

The other way, that's a bit of a halfway between a straight online interaction and a face to face with the MLA, is by having a constituency office available to those residents and expanding those out. I would absolutely be supportive of two or three constituency offices for some of the larger rural constituencies. It doesn't replace that one-on-one that you would get with the MLA, but it's a halfway point. It's a start.

In the end, I think that notwithstanding the fact that I understand the concerns of rural Alberta, I would encourage all members in this House to support this bill – the process was thorough – and we can move forward and address other legislation here in the brief time that we have remaining together before the festive season.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Excellent. Any questions under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing and hearing none, I'll recognize the Member for Lethbridge-East.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm going to begin by saying that I've said to my caucus and I've said to many people that I thought the report was a very difficult report in that my constituency wasn't touched; however, I looked at the whole report, and I saw that there were many constituencies that were affected.

The other thing is that I was absolutely not told what way to vote. I make up my own mind even though, as I said last week with the mayors and reeves, I felt that I was mandated to do so. I did that because, in fact, if I interfered in what was presented by an independent commission, I would be gerrymandering because I'd be doing it for our advantage. I will not do that. I will not do it for anybody.

I know that the member across is greatly affected by this report, and I know that it is difficult when you have a large constituency. He, in fact, is very fortunate because he has the opportunity at least once a month to meet with all of the mayors or reeves that are in his constituency. I know because I go to those meetings whenever I can, and I get to meet those mayors and reeves as well. But I will not gerrymander by voting against the commission's report.

As the previous speaker said, there were five members on that commission: two were appointed by the opposition, two appointed by the government, and the judge. I suspect that if somebody is a judge, I suspect that if people were appointed to that commission from both the opposition and the government side, they were there to do a job. They spent the time. They met with constituents across this province, and they came back with a report.

I certainly don't think that it's the best report that could have come across, but in fact it is their report. It is what they were mandated to do, and I will support their report.

Thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker: Excellent. Questions under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Under 29(2)(a). Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Listen, I have tremendous respect for the hon. member that just spoke. I actually hold her in very high regard even if we don't agree on everything. I've seen that she works hard and tries her best to look after her constituents. But I have to say that this is one of those times when I disagree with her fairly strenuously when she said that to vote against this bill is, by definition, gerrymandering. She couldn't be any farther from being accurate by saying so if she tried. I'm sure she means well.

There are a lot of things that she said that I agree with. She said that the people had a job to do a report, and they did it. I think whether we agree with the report or not, we should thank all five members of that committee for the work they did because I'm sure it wasn't pleasant every minute travelling around this province and listening to a variety of opinions which did not all match up and then trying to sew them all together into a report that makes sense for Albertans.

But the fact that they did the report to the best of their ability does not automatically guarantee that it's a good report. By voting against it, it doesn't even guarantee that that means you think it's a bad report. It could mean that you don't think it's as good as it ought to be. That's quite a difference from a bad report. By voting no and calling that gerrymandering, that's just wrong, absolutely wrong. If that was the case, why would we even be talking about it here? Why would we even be having this debate? Why would we even be having this discussion, Mr. Speaker?

In fact, as the hon. member herself pointed out – and, again, I respect her opinion on everything, and I agree with her on this – there was a minority report, and the minority report needs to be considered carefully as well. If members of this Legislature agree with the main report, great. If they agree with the minority report, great. If indeed they disagree with both reports for whatever legitimate reasons that we have here, that's also great. That is us doing our job. So I really felt obligated to get on my feet to point out that making the massive leap from disagreeing with the report to gerrymandering is just not accurate.

Now, if any member of the House, me included, stands up and starts redrawing all the lines to our personal preferences, that's actually the definition of gerrymandering, and I hope that doesn't happen. I hope that doesn't happen by any of us. But to talk in general terms about the report and what's right and what's wrong and particularly talking in broader terms about whether it's better for rural Alberta or better for urban Alberta is not gerrymandering. It's actually legitimate. It's legitimate debate, legitimate comment on this report.

Mr. Speaker, I felt it necessary and ever so slightly painful, because I respect the member so much, to stand up and disagree with her so strongly on some of what she said, but I just felt it was that important that I had to do it. If the hon. member has further comments, I'd be happy to hear them, but I've surely laid out how I feel about it, and I feel quite strongly.

Ms Fitzpatrick: I thank the member for standing up and exercising his democratic right to disagree with me, but I stand my ground. I do believe that gerrymandering is manipulating the boundaries in any way. I think that if I vote and say no to this report, then I'm saying: no, they've got to be rejigged.

Four out of the five members on that commission presented a report. I believe that all of them did the best that they could. I did look at the report from the dissenting vote. I agree that they presented a report, and if I were not to support this, then I am essentially gerrymandering.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Excellent.

The Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just wanted to ask one question to the member. Look, I said: an NDP MLA. I was not trying to single the member out. It is important for her to know that. I have the greatest respect for her as well. She makes fantastic sweet tarts, that I enjoy. It's been a pleasure being able to work with her.

The Acting Speaker: Excellent.

The chair will recognize the Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Stier: Thank you. Good evening, everyone, and thanks for being here tonight to pay attention to some of us who wish to speak to this very important matter. [interjections] Mr. Speaker, perhaps once they're done, we could carry on.

Mr. Speaker, this is probably one of the most important decisions that we will possibly be involved with during this term that we in this House have been elected to serve. I can recall back in 2010 – I was not in the House at the time but was involved with municipal politics – when this matter came up and how controversial it was then. Some members that are here tonight, including the Minister of Transportation, will recall those events and some of the discussions perhaps that came up.

Nonetheless, this is important. We have to get this right. I want people to know right from the outset that I'm not in favour of passing this bill as it reads today. I don't think it is anything except a huge mistake that we will have to endure and put up with in the rural areas as far as effective representation. It's going to be a major problem for a lot of the people that will serve not only in the near future in these new ridings but for some time afterwards.

A lot of reference has been made to the report itself that came through with the decision on the boundaries. Of course, the most important report that we got I believe came through from the minority commissioner, who did the marvelous job of submitting her own report, called the Alberta Electoral Boundaries Commission Minority Report, by Commissioner Gwen Day. I know that during the discussions on the motion earlier in the week and also in the conversations tonight we have talked a little bit about this minority report. It is focused on effective representation or, perhaps better said, the lack of effective representation with the decision that was rendered.

A lot of information was supplied by the commissioner. She talked about how the majority of the commission began the work with the priority of population carrying the most weight, which, of course, led to the desire to have a minimal deviation from the average number of people per constituency. But Gwen Day decided that effective representation should be the priority, in her mind. She has written several pages that have come to the conclusion that this report did not pay enough attention to that subject.

I'm going to be bringing forward a motion now, Mr. Speaker. I'll ask the pages to come to take that, and then we'll discuss what my motion is about.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. Stier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. While the pages distribute the motion, I'll just read it for the benefit of those that are waiting in such excitement to hear what I have to say. I move that the motion for second reading of Bill 33, Electoral Divisions Act, be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 33, Electoral Divisions Act, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the descriptions of electoral divisions referenced in the bill and described in the DVD tabled as Sessional Paper 624/2017 do not adequately provide for the effective representation of rural Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, to carry on, I'd like to present some of the information that was contained in the minority report and discuss some of the conclusions that were drawn by this commissioner because this person was right there throughout these discussions throughout Alberta. In that report she raised a number of very, very concerning observations that I think are worthy of review. I know that just a couple of evenings ago this was discussed in some detail. I think it is worth while to go over it once again because the facts are, according to this report, that the board may have overlooked some other factors in drawing up these boundaries and therefore may not have necessarily made the best decision they could have in trying to do their work.

Mrs. Day goes on to say:

The Majority . . .

The majority of the commission, that is.

. . . began its work by using population to justify a new riding in both Calgary and Edmonton. I do not believe that this was necessary given the discretion allowed for variances and additional considerations besides population in the Act . . . I am convinced the correct response to growth in urban population should have been an increase in variances within the cities and not an increase in the number of ridings in the two major cities.

She concluded:

This would best provide effective representation for Albertans as a whole.

She describes what effective representation is, and I think that's a key argument in this situation. She quoted section 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It states that every citizen "has the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein." The Charter does not guarantee that we have equal weight to our vote to achieve democracy but [only] the right to vote.

. . . Factors like geography, community history, community interest and minority representation may need to [also] be taken into account to ensure that our legislative assemblies effectively represent the diversity of our social mosaic. These are but [a few] examples of considerations which may justify departure from absolute voter parity in the pursuit of more effective representation.

In other words, other factors should have been considered, yet the commission seemed to be focused solely on population and primarily on population in rendering their final decision.

I'd just like to talk now a little bit about what she also went on to describe as the mandate that was in the Electoral Boundaries Commission Act. Section 14 is appropriate here, and it mandates the commission to consider the following factors. The first item there is:

- (a) the requirement for effective representation as guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

If you recall, I just quoted that very portion from the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms where it talks about how every person has the right to vote but that it does not guarantee that we have equal weight to our vote to achieve democracy, just the right to vote.

The second part of section 14 says that the commission should consider

- (b) sparsity and density of population.

The third item:

- (c) common community interests and community organizations, including those of Indian reserves and Metis settlements.

The next one says:

- (d) wherever possible, the existing community boundaries within the cities of Calgary and Edmonton, as they should.

The next items:

- (e) wherever possible, the existing municipal boundaries,
- (f) the number of municipalities and other local authorities,
- (g) geographical features, including existing road systems, and
- (h) the desirability of understandable and clear boundaries, natural boundaries, in other words – rivers, gullies, ravines – major kinds of natural boundaries that exist.

It is important to note that the act is consistent with our historical foundation and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and relevant case law in mandating the commission to consider all of these factors to ensure that voters have the right to effective representation. Once again, that is the key to this entire discussion, effective representation. It is our position here on this side of the House that having these huge, huge ridings in the rurals pretty well prevents having effective representation.

I heard one of the members talk tonight about: well, I guess, supposedly, maybe you could increase the number of offices in one of these larger ridings. I can tell you right now, having one of the largest ridings in Alberta, it doesn't matter how many offices I have, hon. member. I'd need to clone myself about five times if I was to have effective representation.

Mr. Cooper: The world needs more Pats.

Mr. Stier: Exactly. Thank you, hon. member.

There's an important factor to consider about the rurals. Rural Albertans, again according to the minority report, control the land, access to the land and provide a significant portion of the labor force that most of our primary industries depend on. Because the rural population is small compared to the cities, in order to be "effectively represented" the rural population must be granted more than a "one person, one vote" voice in order to ensure that good stewardship is exercised over the resources that the primary industries of Alberta depend on.

That is an important point. One person, one vote may be fine, but with the situation in the rurals, we have to consider other matters.

We need to consider variances.

The critical provision in the Act to ensure that effective representation is granted to Albertans is the use of variances.

The act states in section 15(1) that the population of a proposed electoral division must not be more than 25% above nor more than 25% below the average population of all the proposed electoral divisions.

In this case, though, in spite of the provisions for up to 25 per cent plus or minus variances, a priority by the majority was set by them to achieve the lowest possible variance. They set that as their mandate. They decided that they wanted to not consider variances, and I think that is a crucial problem in the situation that we're having to deal with now because this is what justified additional ridings in the cities, and this is what has justified removing some ridings from the rurals. They had the ability to consider that.

If you look at one riding against another, that would mean that one riding could be as much as 25 per cent less than the average, that the next riding adjacent could be 25 per cent more than the average. Therefore, between those two there could be almost 50 per cent difference all told, and that would still meet the mandate. But for some reason the majority of the commission decided to ignore the variance factor and ignore all of the other main considerations that should have been given more emphasis. As the final maps show, there are several detrimental effects to our divisions resulting from that focus on population. The eroding number of MLAs representing rural Albertans is one of the key ones.

I would like to conclude my portion of this submission, Mr. Speaker, with this. The member that did this minority report from the commission, Gwen Day, said:

In conclusion, I believe it would have been in the best interest of . . . Albertans to adequately consider all mandated factors and, where justifiable, preserve existing ridings using allowable variances. Adding ridings [therefore] to the cities of Calgary and Edmonton could have been avoided, which would have resulted in much less reconfiguration throughout [all of] Alberta while still providing effective representation, that we all sought. I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that this lady has outlined what should have happened. She has given us the reason for supporting the amendment that I have put together for us to go back to the drawing board, for us to not make a serious mistake.

I would also like to add that the AAMD and C has concurred in the resolution they just passed at their last convention. I'd just like to read their resolution here that they had made because I think that it's important to understand what all the rural association members thought. It said:

Further be it resolved that the Alberta Association of Municipal Districts and Counties (AAMDC) urge the Government of Alberta to prioritize effective representation for rural Alberta by not approving a reduction in the number of constituencies in rural Alberta.

Secondly, they said:

Further be it resolved that the AAMDC request the Government of Alberta . . .

That's you folks there.

. . . to not implement the Alberta Electoral Boundary Commission's final recommendations until the following principles are prioritized:

- That geographic size limitations, local variations in population density, and accessibility of [all] MLAs be prioritized as a determining factor in developing [these] boundaries; and
- Constituencies structure should be maintained to combine urban and rural areas to include a balance of urban and rural populations to reflect the urban-rural connectedness and dependency that exists on the ground for Alberta's regions; and
- To the extent possible, no ridings fracture rural municipalities into multiple constituencies.

I would submit, then, Mr. Speaker, given what the AAMD and C has said and all the arguments, that we pass this motion. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre. This is under 29(2)(a).

Mr. Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Under 29(2)(a), absolutely. I'll be brief. I think that other members would like to ask the hon. member a question.

I did appreciate his comments describing some of the uniqueness of some large rural constituencies. I certainly have one. My current one stretches from north of Rimbey in an area called Bluffton to south of Sundre, from B.C. to Gull Lake in an area roughly the size of some European countries. My new constituency in my area will go from the south shore of Pigeon Lake to Water Valley, just almost outside of Cochrane.

I love it. I love driving around that area. It's my home. It's where I will hopefully remain the rest of my life, and it's full of some of the best people, including some that are watching right now. To my kids back home near Sundre, Austin and Chyanne, I'd like to say goodnight to them through you, Mr. Speaker. I know that they are getting ready for bed, and they're probably the only ones watching us tonight.

I do appreciate the hon. member expressing that he may want to elaborate a little bit more on the uniqueness of rural constituencies.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Stier: Well, thank you, hon. member. I appreciate your kind thoughts. I would only like to finish my conclusion, and that is that I'd like to state again that, ladies and gentlemen of the House, we have an opportunity to correct a wrong. We have an opportunity to eliminate what could be, according to the commissioner Gwen Day in her minority report, a serious flaw in the decisions that were made on these boundaries. We could correct a mistake that may be passed here if we do not take another look at this.

The motion that I have put forward would give us a chance to take another look at this thing in a very serious way and make sure that we get it right the next time. I would urge all members over there, if you're in a rural riding, if you have any considerations that are questions in your mind about these boundaries, to please give this motion a thought and consider it for the vote tonight.

Thank you.

8:50

The Acting Speaker: Excellent.

Under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills under 29(2)(a).

Mr. Cooper: Please. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd just like to briefly ask the member. The member's constituency of Livingstone-Macleod prior to redistribution – I don't know the specific number given the new maps, and frankly I don't know all of the nuances of the changes in the constituency of Livingstone-Macleod – was 15,174 square kilometres. That is in comparison to the constituency of Calgary-Shaw, which I believe you're quite familiar with, that is 20 square kilometres. I might add, just for comparison's sake, that the constituency of Calgary-Bow, the smallest constituency in Alberta, is a whopping six square kilometres, and you compare that to the constituency of Peace River, which is 99,144 square kilometres.

I'm just wondering if the member might provide some commentary on how the massive difference in size, from six square kilometres to 99,000 square kilometres, might impact the ability of a member to effectively represent the constituency in which they are duly elected.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Stier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills for his question. I think it's important for people to realize that, not unlike many members of the government side, my riding is large, as he has pointed out. In fact, in the submissions that I made to the commission earlier this year along with my friend and colleague from Highwood, I made note of the fact that you could put approximately 16 cities of Calgary into my riding and, in comparison, you could put 12 to 13 Highwoods in my riding. In the Calgary area you have, I believe, 20 some-odds MLAs, yet in mine there's just me divided by 22 communities. So I'm divided by 22 from time to time.

How can we possibly pass such an important bill that is so inconsistent in how they decided the sizes of these boundaries? How can we possibly pass it after we've received a report from one of the members on the commission, where there are such critical factors that obviously were overlooked? This does not make sense.

I know there are a lot of members on that side that feel the same. I would urge you to support the amendment.

The Acting Speaker: Just for the record this will be amendment RA1.

The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod for his comments and for the amendment that he's offered tonight. I want to, you know, just indicate that I have some considerable sympathy for the position that the hon. member is in and has taken. I know that on all sides of the House there are members who are concerned about the boundaries that have been recommended to us by the commission.

You know, there are a number of factors that have to be balanced, as the hon. member has said. I remember when I was on Edmonton city council and we prepared a submission for the boundaries commission. At that time there was a huge disparity in terms of population in ridings such that the courts actually made a ruling, which the member has referred to. I remember – these are very rough numbers as it was a number of years ago – that the riding that had the smallest population was the Cardston riding at that time, which had around 8,000. I'm doing this from memory, so, people, forgive me if it's a little bit off. The constituency that had the greatest population was Edmonton-Whitemud, which had a population well over 24,000. I think it was after Premier Getty was defeated by Percy Wickman, so it briefly was a Liberal riding. Of course, the Premier of the day took refuge in Stettler, where he was easily elected in the by-election at that time. Let me just say that the disparity between the populations of rural ridings and urban ridings was so striking that it absolutely was determined that this was in part a disenfranchisement of people. That's the basis of the 25 plus or minus ruling, which was a very, very wide range, I will admit. That was the outside boundary set by the court at that time.

Now, there are many difficult choices that we have to make and that the commission had to make in balancing things. To say that we're coming down in favour of this particular approach doesn't necessarily negate the importance of some of the ideas that have been put forward. Certainly, the size of constituencies makes a difference in terms of how easy they are to represent. On our side we have some of the very largest ridings in the province by a wide margin, so we are indeed familiar with that challenge.

Then, of course, there's the question of population, which was the subject of the court challenge way back when. The argument was made that, roughly, people's votes needed to be of equal effect in terms of selecting governments. The court took a very wide view of what that acceptable range was, but that's an important consideration. I hope people on the other side recognize that. In order to maintain rural ridings at their current size and not to let them get much larger, there's a trade-off. These are all trade-offs. The trade-off for that is that the growth in Edmonton and Calgary is not reflected in the makeup.

There are other options. I know that the previous government, not the last time but in the past, would take the easy way out and simply add more ridings. So this place grew, and we had more politicians and more politicians. I know that for hon. members on the other side their natural conservatism leads them to, you know, reject too many politicians in the public's lives. That's a solution the previous government found that satisfied rural and urban people, but it didn't satisfy people in general. The Chamber was getting a little bit crowded, so we've taken a strong position in opposition that 83 is enough and that we shouldn't be expanding those.

I was also on city council on another redistribution where Edmonton lost a seat because of relative growth in the province. Like the hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod, I did my best to represent the people of Edmonton in my constituency. I'll save people the trouble of looking up in Hansard what I said at the time. I strongly argued, as I think a good representative should, that we shouldn't be losing seats. In fact, in the end, Mr. Speaker, all of those things have to be balanced in one way or another.

What I think tipped the balance with respect to our position is that we did not wish to be seen to be making political decisions when we had appointed an independent commission to do the work and that it was important, I think, for democracy and certainly for the people of Alberta to see that we weren't trying to arrange things to our own benefit. I think that that is the risk. I'm not suggesting that people on the other side are doing that by any stretch of the imagination, but it was actually that particular issue that tipped the scales from our point of view. We wished to make that very clear, that we appointed an independent commission, and we're going to respect their recommendations with regard to this.

The House made its determination when it debated the motion, which was then passed in the House and a number of amendments were made. Some were accepted. That sets the tone, that sets the ground rules for the drafting of this particular act, and that's where the debate, in my view, should have remained. Nevertheless, the hon. member is well within his rights to introduce this amendment, and I respect what he is doing. I respect what the opposition is saying with respect to this because they have a point, but there are other points as well. To deprive Edmonton and Calgary from having the same representation that reflects their growth and their population is also a problem. These things all have to be taken into account and balanced.

With respect, Mr. Speaker, I will encourage members of the House to defeat this amendment because I believe that the Assembly has made its decision in principle. I see no reason to change the direction that we have set, so I would hope that we would pass the bill that has been put forward by the government.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Questions under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Yes. Thanks. Thanks to the Government House Leader for his well-thought-out comments. I do agree with some of what the hon. Government House Leader has said. The first thing, Mr. Speaker, though, through you to him, that I would like to offer is that I'm very sure – I'm almost positive – that the hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler would be happy right now to resign if the Premier would like to come and run in Drumheller. I don't think that's going to happen, though, and history probably won't repeat itself with that constituency.

In addition to that, the hon. Government House Leader is talking a lot about population and variances in the population. He took us down a long history lesson of some of the history around that. It was very interesting. He's been around a little longer than I have, Mr. Speaker, so he probably remembers a lot more of that.

Mr. Cooper: Or less.

Mr. Nixon: Or he remembers a lot less than I do. I don't know which one it is. That's a good point.

The problem with that, Mr. Speaker, is that when you look at the constituencies that have been put forward in this report, the rural constituencies often have higher populations than the urban ones in this current report. It is a little better in the second draft. In the first draft my constituency, for example, would have had 17 per cent more than any other urban constituency in the entire province. It was larger than the country of Belgium. The argument that this is about . . .

Mr. Ceci: In population?

Mr. Nixon: Yeah, 17 per cent more in population than any of the urban ridings. That's what it was. It would have been the highest populated constituency in the entire province and bigger than the European countries. [interjections] Yes, but it also had the highest population . . .

The Acting Speaker: Through the chair, hon. member.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, through you to the Finance minister, who is struggling with the numbers, it would have been 17 per cent higher in population than any other constituency in Alberta, and the land mass would have been bigger than Belgium. Now the Finance minister is with us, and we're ready to continue.

The point that I am making to the Government House Leader, through you, Mr. Speaker, is that I sympathize with his argument. I agree with his argument. I do not believe that it is this place's responsibility to draw the lines, and I think that if we went down that road, we would certainly be gerrymandering, which you will not see the opposition attempt to do.

We are talking about this report. The report has been brought forward to this place for us to determine whether or not that committee met the requirements. The committee worked hard. I know two people that were on it. I know how hard they worked, but the reality is this. This is not just about adjusting populations for Edmonton and Calgary, which is important and is certainly a factor that had to be addressed. But what we have ended up with is populations in rural Alberta that are actually higher than in many of the city ridings and at the very least on par.

As the hon. member pointed out, we have stuff within the act to make sure that that doesn't necessarily happen so we can have variances for rural Alberta to be able to recognize the uniqueness of representing large constituencies like that, a constituency, again, like mine, where my southernmost populated place to my northernmost populated place is over two hours one way or stretches from the B.C. border and goes almost all the way to highway 2. [interjections] Again the Finance minister wants to heckle, but I've been to his constituency. It's a great place. I was born and raised in Calgary, near his constituency. Even I can walk across it in about 10 or 15 minutes. But I've got two national parks in my constituency, 12 provincial parks, three hospitals, over 160-some elected people. It's just different. It doesn't mean that it's better or not. It is different.

The law allowed for some variance associated with that, and this panel that went in there, except for Mrs. Day, who rejected that, went ahead and ignored that variance and tried to bring everything to par, which is not within the law or their mandate and, in addition to that, went further than that and tried to predict our communities that would be declining in population over the next 10 years in order to accommodate the cities, which certainly was not in their mandate.

Again, I appreciate the hon. Government House Leader's comments, but I think he's wrong on this one, particularly when you look at the fact that many rural ridings have now higher populations than urban constituencies.

The Acting Speaker: Any other questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm just curious to know if the member opposite would like to comment on situations like Calgary-North being minus 16, Calgary-North East ... [Mr. Cooper's speaking time expired]

The Acting Speaker: Excellent.

Any speakers to amendment RA1? The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. W. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to speak on behalf of my colleague from Livingstone-Macleod and in favour of his reasoned amendment to Bill 33. But before I do that, you know, I appreciate the Government House Leader's history lesson somewhat, but, with all due respect, we are losing three rural MLAs. That's a fact. Whether you consider it or not, I think that shows that the report specifically states that based on the population numbers – as my colleague from Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills pointed out, the numbers are rather exorbitant and rather large.

I want to speak in favour of this because, you know, I kind of have a feeling that in the long haul I think rural constituencies are getting a bit of a short stick. It's kind of frustrating to see the rural-urban interchange. A lot of people don't understand, living in the rural constituencies, the amount of effort it takes to maintain the relationships with different councils, different towns, and different areas. I don't have the same size constituency as my friends from Livingstone-Macleod or Little Bow although they border mine. I can guarantee you that in two and a half years I've got well over 120,000 kilometres on my truck, and he's already gone through one.

I just want to point that out that, you know, the mandate of the Electoral Boundaries Commission was to update the electoral districts while respecting certain conditions, but I want to say that there are significant issues with some of the data used. In the minority report it was suggested that in my constituency – it completely ignored all natural boundaries, which was part of the original mandate, as I understood it, and ignored the natural boundaries of the Bow River to the north and the Highwood River to the east.

For some strange reason it was mentioned in the minority report that several various submissions were put in place to have highway 2A as the eastern boundary of Highwood and extend it west all the way to the Rocky Mountains. It's interesting. When the commission said, "Well, the Rocky Mountains: that allows for growth and expansion." And I said: "Who lives there? Sasquatch?" I mean, there's no population growth in the Rocky Mountains. I found that rather interesting. Moreover, after we did a comprehensive data search of all oral and written submissions, we found that actually there were no submissions made to include highway 2 as the eastern boundary. There was no way they should have ignored the true natural boundaries of the Bow River and Highwood River. So I question some of the data sources of the commission. Fortunately enough, in the second report I think they saw justice there to include the Highwood River now and the Bow River as the eastern and northern boundaries and part of the Davisburg community, where I currently reside.

Again, as I pointed out, we're going to lose three rural MLAs, and it just doesn't make sense to me. It kind of boils down, they said, to the rapid growth of the urban centres of Edmonton and Calgary, but I don't think the commission really took the opportunity – maybe they didn't Google map – to drive through some of our rural constituencies. There are a lot of great distances that we have to drive and travel just to get to a couple of meetings a day. I maintain two offices. I keep a fairly tight budget in High River and Okotoks. They're not open eight hours a day – I can guarantee you that – but we manage to get by to meet with all the MD of Foothills folks and the commissioners as well as the two town councillors.

I understand that the mandated consideration of the Electoral Boundaries Commission was to take into consideration the requirement for effective representation guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Doing a little research, I found that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not guarantee that we have equal voice to our vote to achieve democracy or the right to vote. Hmm. The concept of one person, one vote is not a Canadian construct and is not in the Charter, actually. It suggests to me that maybe they revisit the ridings. Maybe it's just done in the wrong way. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, rather, was set in place to guarantee that Canadians deserve fair representation.

It's not clearly the case in rural ridings. Again, we're losing three rural MLAs. How can one constituent who lives hours away from a constituency office drop in to pay a visit? Calgary-Shaw, it's fairly close. For my friend in Livingstone-Macleod, Little Bow, and myself, it usually takes two or three days of setting up appointments and people taking time from their day to spend a half an hour or so on the road just to get to our office to have a personal meeting or vice versa in our case. I don't think it's fair and equal, and I'm not sure that the commission defined the Charter correctly.

In the urban ridings, in spite of the fact that the act allows for plus or minus 25 per cent variances, the commission chose to create two new ridings in Edmonton and Calgary, and ironically they're only plus or minus 5 per cent. I don't think, in my opinion, that it's quite fair. It's obvious that the desire, however, came to be to prioritize populations as a primary factor to achieve minimal deviation from the average number of residents per constituency. Does that make sense in Drumheller-Stettler? I think the country of Belgium is smaller. I mean, it's going to take a horrendous effort just to transport yourself across that one constituency.

I mean, when the commission talked in the initial minority report about excluding the Highwood River and the Bow River from my constituency and talked about submissions for highway 2A, I had to kindly remind the commission that the Highwood River has only been a part of the Highwood constituency for 115 years. It's been there forever. I mean, it's part of the constituency. The natural economic corridor between Okotoks, High River, and Aldersyde has been present there since 1905. Moreover, John A. Macdonald actually founded the first school in my constituency in my neighbourhood, and, no, I'm not a graduate of the first graduating class. But there's a lot of history there.

Just around the corner from my place is the South Calgary Airport, and that airport provided facilities for up to 2,500 Allied pilots to train during the Second World War. We just put a plaque there. That's part of my constituency. The history there is quite phenomenal. The town of High River was part of the infrastructure and the people who supported those pilots and, obviously, the support staff that went along with providing services for those individuals who actually learned and trained to fly aircraft and fight in the Second World War. You know, there's a lot of history in my neighbourhood.

Thankfully, I think the commission on the second go-around found the right perspective to bring that back into my constituency, but they completely eliminated the town of High River. The town of High River is the natural economic corridor. Especially after the flood in 2013 Okotoks and High River were in a natural symbiotic economic relationship. Plus, you know, the MD of Foothills and the Foothills school board commission run both of those areas. It was a trade-off between High River and Livingstone-Macleod's area of Turner Valley and Black Diamond, an identical population that was completely ignored. There was no understanding of the rural symbiotic economic relationship between those two towns. It's like separating a brother and a sister. We still don't understand why. We're hopeful that if this amendment goes forward, we'll be able to add some reason and relevance to that decision.

You know, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, no matter where you're from, you can see that this commission, regardless of how it was set up, is supporting the urban population of the province at a higher value, those living in cities versus those living in the country. There's no regard for those living in large constituencies in rural areas, where people are forced to travel great distances to meet with their MLAs. It's not equal representation, in my mind. I still find it unfortunate that this government has decided just not to listen to the erosion of the rural ridings. It doesn't allow for effective representation of all Albertans. I mean, when the Government House Leader spoke of redistribution based on population, he completely ignored the fact that we are losing three rural MLAs. I spoke to many MLAs and many Albertans who feel this way, and I haven't met one MLA that I know of in the rural areas that doesn't focus on how hard it is and how they understand what it takes to run a large rural constituency. They worry about the furthest away from the offices. They just don't think it's fair.

After hearing the stories from those in rural ridings and urban ridings talk about the lack of consultation and complete disregard for those affected by the changes, I can only oppose this bill, and I hope that members on the other side of the House and, obviously, members on my side of the House want to support this reasoned amendment. Let's just do something that is right. Let's bring common sense back to this boundaries commission.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Any questions under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing and hearing none, the hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to rise to speak to my colleague's reasoned amendment of Bill 33, Electoral Divisions Act, which essentially says that it should not be read now because it, in fact, does not adequately provide for effective representation for rural Alberta.

Let me begin by saying that I don't actually have any issues with the motives of the commission. I think that they probably went about their work in good faith. But I do have issues with the end result. I speak of this mostly on general principle because, quite frankly, in my own riding I really don't have any concerns at all. There were very minimal changes to a couple of my border regions. The population is just about right in the middle of where it should be for the average ridings, and in fact to their credit I think that they did the right thing in consolidating some of the Maskwacis reserve properties all into one riding instead of having them split between three ridings. So I think they did the right thing in those regards.

But I still think that there are significant concerns with the Electoral Boundaries Commission report, and I'd like to approach them from a slightly different angle than has been spoken about so far. As I've said, I don't feel that they properly represent rural portions of Alberta. The mandate was in fact to create a representation that's fair and equal. It's the very issue of equality that I think I struggle with. The reality is that I think the boundaries commission in setting a priority on population only, or at least stating that, has both made a mistake and also maybe even exposed their own bias. I'd like to go into the details of what I mean by that. The boundaries commission, as I've said, sets a dangerous precedent by reducing the count of rural ridings by two and increasing the already large proportion of representation of Edmonton and Calgary.

Quite frankly, there's a balance of power here that is shifting toward an urban-centric bias in our province. I say that, I guess, for a couple of reasons. Even just simply looking at the raw numbers, what we have here are 46 seats now for the two urban areas of Edmonton and Calgary and the remaining 41 seats for all the rest of the province. That works out to about 53 per cent for the two urban areas and 47 per cent for the rural areas, or all the rest of the province, quite frankly. But that doesn't fairly represent the population. The population figures are that the two urban areas are about 51.1 or roughly 51 per cent of the total population of the province, but somehow they ended up with 2 per cent more of the seats and the exact opposite in the two rural areas: we end up with about 49 per cent of the province, but we only get 47 per cent of the seats.

So I think that there is, in fact, an imbalance of the actual population numbers. The priority of using population wasn't even used fairly. It in fact betrays, I think, an urbancentric bias that has been for too long prevalent in our province. It's an issue that I've raised a number of times in this House in the fact that I think there is a distinct negative bias to the rural areas of our province from the government that we have in our province. There is a centralization bias, and I think it comes about primarily because the majority of the people who often make decisions in government and the two urban areas, of course, only see their own immediate circle. They're completely unaware of what the rural areas are really about. The decision-makers are too often entirely urban individuals; therefore, there is a bias in decision-making that's made there.

I'd like to cite a few specific examples of that.

I can carry on? Okay. Thank you.

A couple of specific examples. We have heard endlessly in this House about the inequitable and unfair health care funding that goes to the central and rural regions of Alberta. On a per capita basis the two urban areas get a substantially higher amount of funding to their areas, and the health care provided to central and rural Albertans is substantially substandard, substantially subgrade, and the money that's spent on those areas is substantially less than they actually contribute in their fair portion of taxes. So there is, in fact, a real and a serious imbalance here, an injustice in that regard.

We have the same thing with policing. We heard about this just last week. The police forces are inadequate. They're spread across vast areas. They're unable to adequately provide policing services, so rural people live in terror and fear, have their stuff constantly stolen, their houses broken into, guns pointed at their heads. There is an injustice and an inequity here that does not represent in any way, shape, or form a fair and an equitable representation in this House of the people that have to struggle with these kinds of things.

We have the same issue with lottery funding, where there is an unfair bias. The groups that participate in lottery funding, the nonprofits, in the urban areas get a higher percentage than those in northern and rural areas.

So you add all these things up, and the reality is that we have an unjust representation of people from rural areas versus those in urban areas. I really do believe that there is in fact a continuing bias toward urbancentric government and Legislature in our province, and it's something that I don't think rural people should be willing to stand for any longer.

You can't use logic to justify these imbalances and these injustices, so we have to reassess the report that the Electoral Boundaries Commission has provided and make sure that this House is balanced. The people who are being unjustly treated need the opportunity to have full and fair representation in this House, not a decreased representation.

The fact that there is one commissioner of the five members who stated a dissenting opinion tells me that in reality there was some tension within the boundaries commission. There is not full agreement there. There are considerations that need to be taken into place, and in fact it is a flawed report. I'm not saying that they didn't do their best job. I'm not questioning their motives, but I am saying that the facts of the matter are that in terms of fair and equal representation it's not happening, and this makes it even worse.

The argument is that the ongoing erosion of rural representation for Albertans does not allow for effective representation of all Albertans, and, Madam Speaker, I think this is something that we should correct. I quote the minority dissent. She stated that, "if Alberta continues to grow at such a rate, a critical part of our history, culture and primary economic voice will be lost, [and] if at every boundary review we collapse two or three rural ridings," she wrote, we will simply end up in a place where it is not sustainable, and this is "not a sustainable approach" to the challenge that we have of trying to find fair and equitable ridings. Then she mentioned that giving both Calgary and Edmonton an additional riding was unjustified, which is another way to simply say that it is in fact unjust. That's my biggest point. I think it truly is unjust.

There need to be solutions found to it. I think that there could be solutions. I don't necessarily personally think, as the Government House Leader has said, that adding more seats is a good idea either, but I do think that we need to have a more just and a more balanced approach to truly fair and equitable representation for all Albertans, and in this particular case the unjust cousins are the rural ones over and over again.

The main complaint of rural Albertans is about the decreasing reality of representation, and all of these other things that have been said are reasons that contribute to that. I won't rehearse them. We've already heard them. But I do believe that this in some way is a betrayal of democratic representation for rural people. Even though in my riding I don't have those particular issues, when I look at the overall direction of the report, I don't think that it's reasonable. I think that we really do need to make sure that one region or group of voters is not dramatically underrepresented in an unacceptable kind of way.

I just think that there's a dangerous precedent set here. I'm not the first one to say this. It's dangerous in the sense that if future constituency assessments pattern themselves after this, the plan will almost guarantee that rural Alberta will be in line for further reductions in the future, rendering the area virtually unrepresentable. This is a problem for many reasons as have already been said. Part of it, of course, is the land access, the size of it, all of these things.

One part that hasn't been mentioned is that the constituents themselves have complained to us about the difficulty of them even getting the opportunity to come to see us, to come into our office. They can't make the trip. It's too far. The elderly are most concerned. It's difficult for them to travel long distances. Making these trips during the wintertime on bad roads is not only an inconvenience; quite frankly, in many cases it's flat-out dangerous.

The key here is effective representation, and that, quite frankly, is just not happening now. While I commend the commission for the work that it's done – and I think in many ways they probably did the best that they could – the reality is that the government does need to make the right decision. I recognize the Government House Leader's concern about appearing to try to control or manipulate it politically. None of us want to go there. I commend him truly for having taken that position. I do agree with him. But I think sending this back for further study to an unbiased group would be the right thing to do because truly it does not in fact represent fair and equal representation for rural Albertans.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise, and I'd just like to thank my colleague from Lacombe-Ponoka for his remarks this evening. I'm just curious to know what his thoughts are with respect to population size and constituency. I know that I've had the opportunity to rise and ask a couple of members. Unfortunately, I missed the opportunity to ask the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood about this particular concern of mine.

I often hear members from the government talking about how there are more people in urban ridings than there are in rural ridings and that somehow it makes it better, if you will, or it makes the representation more equal, even though we've laid out all the other factors around what is effective representation or not. If you look at a constituency like Lacombe-Ponoka, that's approximately 4,000 square kilometres, we see that the population is very close to parity, you know, which is, obviously, the target. But there are other significant challenges. If we look at Edmonton, we see the vast majority of constituencies being less than 5 per cent of variance: minus 1, minus 1, 2, 5, 3, 3, minus 3, minus 3 all across Edmonton.

Then we look at some constituencies in rural Alberta. Particularly, as I've mentioned this evening, Cold Lake-St. Paul is the most glaring at a plus 15, with a population of almost 54,000. We only have to look to Calgary. Calgary-Lougheed is a minus 8. The swing between those two constituencies is over 14,000 voters, yet the members from the government side seem to want to lead people to believe this evening that constituencies inside the cities have more population in almost all cases. Calgary-South East is a perfect example, with only 40,000 constituents. Calgary-North East, a minus 14. Calgary-North, the largest of all, is minus 16, which is 39,000 people and less than 30 square kilometres.

I'm just curious to know if the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka has any comments on the government members trying to lead us to believe that, in fact, the city ridings have way more of a population base, so it is essentially equal, when the numbers in the report tell a very different story than that.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Yeah. Well, you know, to be honest, doesn't everybody think that they're the centre of the universe? Of course, we all think that we're the centre of everything. But the reality is that the numbers tell us the actual case here, as has just been pointed out a few moments ago, and I refer again to the general population numbers of the entire province. The reality is that the two urban areas barely represent, by about 1 per cent, any more than half of the population. The other half of the population actually lives spread all around the rest of the province, but about 99 per cent of the actual territory geographically is also spread out there.

As I said, I think it's truly not equal representation when the big geographic areas also have the big population numbers. In spite of the illusion of those who may feel like their riding is the biggest just because they live in a city, when it's carved up in so many little pieces, their numbers aren't bigger. In fact, in many cases, according to the report, they are actually smaller numbers. For the commission to have made the assumption that... [Mr. Orr's speaking time expired]

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the reasoned amendment? The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm rising this evening to speak to Bill 33, the Electoral Divisions Act, and more specifically to the amendment that my colleague from Livingstone-Macleod moved just a little while ago. In our work as MLAs we debate a lot of legislation on a number of different topics, but perhaps none of them so closely affects us and the work that we do in the way that this bill does. Every member here was duly elected by the people living within a specified set of boundaries. Over the past two and a half years or for some of us four, 12 or more years, whatever, we've spent time cultivating relationships with the people and the businesses in those areas.

It is more than that, however. The boundaries currently in place do a good job of grouping areas together that fit well together. Of course, I'm talking more about the rural areas here, Madam Speaker. Fortunately, the United Conservative Party caucus is well equipped to address these rural issues. The government has a much simpler job when it comes to representing their constituents. That's said as a practical fact and not as an excuse or an off-putting comment. The truth is that when you're representing a rural riding, you face challenges that urban MLAs just cannot understand.

For example, it's not outside the realm of possibility to have the MLA for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview take the spot of the MLA for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood when a scheduling conflict occurs, and I'm sure that the member is happy to do so. All that involves is a quick drive across the boundary line at 50th Street or Yellowhead Trail, and you're likely already halfway to where you need to be. That's just not the way it works in the rural ridings. I mean, even if the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview was in Kernohan, it's still not a huge undertaking to go to the Alberta Avenue area, for example.

Now, let's transport that into rural Alberta. Say, for example, the Member for Drumheller-Stettler is asked to step in and help the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, outstanding, I might add. The first member is busy in Oyen when his neighbouring MLA asks for someone to help in Didsbury. That's nearly a three-hour drive in the summer with good road conditions. On winter tires it's just not as practical.

Let's face it. Rural MLAs are already hard pressed to cover the entire territory of their constituency due to the large geographical area involved. Even if you take out trying to help out a neighbouring MLA, the new boundaries in this proposed legislation are even more cumbersome. I think we can all appreciate that the job of an MLA is not one where you can sit back and relax and wait a couple of years before you need to put in that effort again. The increased difficulty with a rural riding is that a very substantial portion of our time is spent on the road, which means it's more difficult to have as much quality face-to-face interaction and conversation as our urban counterparts, which leads me to talk about representation.

I've hinted at the lengthy distances that rural MLAs need to traverse in order to meet those constituents across their ridings, but those are about to increase further since rural Alberta is about to lose three seats. This is devastating to rural Albertans. Nobody would deny that urban centres are growing. To do so would be ridiculous, but equally ridiculous is the idea that due to urban growth rural areas should be passed over, lumped together, and receive less representation. What it all comes down to is that single word, "representation."

Perhaps our education system needs a bit more work in this area because it seems that people think that our Canadian parliamentary system allows for the notion of one person, one vote. While it may sound nice and that's a facet of the American electoral system, I'm sure that all of us here this evening have come up with our own opinions on how that electoral system works south of the border. Regardless of what it looks like, it's not the way things are done up here. Rather, we work with a system of variances that ensure that, generally speaking, every MLA represents roughly the same number of people. The variance is actually pretty generous when used properly, which allows for some maneuvering. Unfortunately, what happened here is that the commission attributed undue weight to population, which means that Alberta's ridings see a very low variance but risk ineffective representation in our rural areas, which contravenes the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Madam Speaker, what we just need to remember is that MLAs do not just represent the people within the ridings but the businesses and industries, too. As the representative for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo oil and gas are huge stakeholders. I need to represent them as much as I represent every individual person who lives in the area. Oil and gas in this situation own and control great swaths of land. They are job creators, and their business, all sides of it, impacts the secondary businesses, that further employ people and provide the goods and services we all need.

You know, Madam Speaker, my constituency has increased substantially, which I'm fine with, but it is a good descriptor for the government side as to what I have to do to travel across my constituency. I have the communities of Fort Chipewyan and Fort Smith in my constituency. Anyone over there know where those are? No? I didn't think so. Four and a half hours just to get to Fort Chip.

Now, Madam Speaker, I have three routes to go with. I can travel by road, air, or water. But the thing about driving by ground is that I can only do it in the winter on an ice road, and I have had the pleasure of doing that. It is a very interesting road. I had the pleasure of driving next to a buffalo that was running on that road, and it was truly a cool experience.

An Hon. Member: Did you pass?

Mr. Yao: I passed the buffalo.

I almost got hit by a semi truck coming over a rise because those hills are pretty dramatic, and they're very narrow, so you make sure you hug on the right side when you're going over a hill because there are large fuel trucks coming the other way with empty loads, and they're trying to hustle back to Fort McMurray.

Just to get to Fort Chip, it is four and half hours on that ice road. Literally there are moose and all sorts of good stuff. In the summer, though, it is a beautiful area because, despite the myth, not all the sand up there is mixed with oil, and there are some beautiful, beautiful sand dunes up there. I would highly encourage the government side to do their next retreat up there. I will guide you up there. I won't necessarily guide you out, but I'll guide you into that area. You will recognize the beauty of the Canadian Shield as well because that is also my area, a lovely, lovely, fantastic piece of property up there with beautiful lakes that are pristine and clear. That's just to get to Fort Chip. I do encourage you to go visit Fort Chipewyan because it is beautiful.

The other ways to get to Fort Chipewyan, by the way, are to hire a small plane or go by boat. I did go by riverboat once, a jet boat. That was quite the adventure because Lake Athabasca is actually a very, very dangerous lake to go on. It is very large. The winds are harsh, so it is very turbulent out there, and there are tons of patches of weeds through there. Let me tell you what. My friend did not have a proper cleanout on his jet boat. So we drive through some weeds. We're in the middle of this huge lake. It is like an ocean. We are stuck, and we are scared. We did rock, scissors, paper to see who had to do the deed, and it was me that lost. I take a knife, have to kind of peel off some clothes there, and my buddy is going to hold me by my ankles as I go underneath that boat and I'm trying clear the intake of weeds. Boy, is that water cold, and that was in the middle of summer. It was a very dramatic thing. I'm still scarred from it, actually, but we got out. I got all those weeds out.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, I really appreciate your story, but I'd like us to get back to the reasoned amendment, if we could, and why this is important.

Mr. Yao: Ah, yes. This is a good reasoned amendment, and I highly recommend that we support this amendment.

Certainly, I was just trying to teach the city mice across the way about the challenges we do have in the rural areas. I did not even get to speak about Fort Smith because Fort Smith is another four and a half hours' drive – and that is going 100 kilometres an hour, by the way – north of Fort Chip. So I have to drive nine hours. But I'll tell you what.

An Hon. Member: One way?

Mr. Yao: That's one way.

I do guarantee you that Fort Smith is a treasure. It is a gem. If you ever get the chance to go up there, that is the neatest community that you will ever see. The people are amazing and wonderful. They're very friendly, and it is phenomenal. But they're very concerned that my representative skills are going to be so thinned out. They have very many concerns there. That is very much an area that is concerned, where they are very independent and very able to survive on their own. But nine hours just to get to Fort Smith, and it is a very interesting drive.

To sum up, I am going vote in support of this reasoned amendment because the legislation as it is denies Albertans equal access to our elected officials, which is what Canadians have a right to do. So I ask that when you think of these people up in Fort Chipewyan and Fort Smith and you think about me on that road, that ice road with big buffalo on there – I tell you that I need to bring one of my co-workers here who has a gun so that we can eat some buffalo meat. Madam Speaker, have you ever eaten buffalo meat? It is fantastic. It is good. I guarantee that should you ever experience a rural riding, you would very much enjoy such cuisine. [interjections] Buffalo. No. Don't get me wrong. I recognize that in socialist countries dogs are your cuisine.

An Hon. Member: What?

Mr. Yao: Nothing.

Anyways, Madam Speaker, in a nutshell, though, I do agree with my friend's reasoned amendment. I think it's a good amendment. I think we have to reconsider these lines, and I hope the government side truly considers this.

Thank you so much.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I've actually been to Fort Chip, so there you go.

Are there any other members that wish to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the reasoned amendment? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I wanted to rise in the House tonight to support the reasoned amendment to Bill 33, Electoral Divisions Act, on the grounds that this bill did not have adequate consultation with stakeholders from rural Alberta. In fact, in the consultation that they did have with rural Alberta, they didn't always listen to them. There are several instances where we can see that the stakeholders in Alberta said what they would like but the commission did something different. Now, the Electoral Boundaries Commission was given a mandate to provide government with new electoral districts that respected a number of factors, including the needs of community organizations, population density, and most importantly, effective representation.

I want to focus the majority of my time on effective representation and why this bill should not proceed to second reading. It threatens our ability to remain just that, effective. The mantle we bear as legislators can be difficult given the number of hats we wear on a daily basis. As we travel through our constituencies, we have different duties to perform in each community, and these different duties that we perform are duties that our constituents want us to do, things that they want us to attend, things that they want us to consult with them on, and to listen to their concerns. Though titles range from Premier to minister to critic or simply member, we all represent a constituency that elected us here in the first place, but those constituents don't always get the attention they deserve.

The most important resource we have is our time, but it is always in short supply. Of course, our time becomes a lot shorter when we're spending so many hours travelling to and from different events within our constituency. Madam Speaker, it takes time to visit with these constituents and stakeholders. It takes time to host town hall meetings. It takes time to travel back and forth to the Legislature, and it takes time to travel throughout the constituency and canvass the neighbourhoods, some more than others.

So, Madam Speaker, it's important that we consider not only the populations within our constituencies but also the amount of area that we cover. We strive to be as efficient as possible with our time, but it is not always an option, and if this bill proceeds to second reading, it will jeopardize the already limited time we have with our constituents. Again, we spend so much time travelling in our rural constituencies, travelling back and forth and going to different events and different meetings. That travelling time isn't time that helps our constituents. It's basically wasted time. It's the steering wheel time is all it is. It's not time that benefits us, our families, or our constituents.

One area of concern that is of a particular interest to me is the geographic size of our rural ridings. The Electoral Boundaries Commission neglected this key consideration. According to this report the makeup of this House after the next election will be several rural constituencies fewer. How is it possible that this decision can be in the best interest of Albertans?

On one hand, there is the optical side of the argument. Constituents that rarely or never see their elected representatives make the assumption that their member is just lazy or doesn't care. In very few cases this may be the result of a member just not making an effort, but for the most part it's a matter of time, time that it takes to travel and to go back and forth between the communities within the constituency.

Rural constituencies are littered with small towns that have many of the same needs as urban centres, but what takes an urban MLA minutes to travel from one community to the next may take a rural MLA hours. How can anyone think that this kind of travel requirement leads to effective representation? It doesn't, and that's why I support this reasoned amendment.

Madam Speaker, with the new constituency boundaries that they're proposing right now, I've done some calculations. Coming to the Legislature takes me about three and a half hours to drive. Driving to the furthest community in this new constituency would take three and a half hours, and I'm not even on the furthest south portion of the constituency; that's actually another hour south. So it's a four-and-a-half-hour drive from the furthest communities within the same constituency. And that's not even the borders of the constituency; that's the communities within the constituency.

Now, in the constituency that I represent right now, Grande Prairie-Smoky, one of the furthest northwest points is a small community called Webster. It's about 40 kilometres north of Grande Prairie, and it was established in 1916 as part of the Edmonton-British Columbia railway. To the southeast in the constituency is the town of Fox Creek, an oil and gas town with gas processing plants that employ much of the town's population.

Now, I mention these places because each of them has similar needs as urban centres. They have small and medium-sized businesses that employ other workers. They have children that need to go to school. They have sick and elderly people that need medical attention, and they have concerns about the safety of their communities. The problem is that these two towns are over two hours apart but need their concerns addressed equally by their provincial representative. Again, Madam Speaker, those two towns in the existing constituency are two hours apart, well over two hours apart, actually, but the new constituency will be over four hours apart.

Now, at the risk of sounding overly confident, I work tirelessly to ensure that the communities in the Grande Prairie-Smoky constituency get the proper attention that they need. I do everything I can to hit as many events as I can and cover as many meetings as I can and get to everything that I possibly can within the constituency. But there are countless other communities just like Fox Creek and Webster that are similar in distances apart but have equal needs to the rest of this great province, and I can't get to them all as often as I would like. I'm not making excuses. I'm just simply stating facts. I'm not complaining either. That's my job. I love my job. I enjoy going to these communities. I enjoy hearing the people's concerns. I enjoy going to the events.

It's incredible, the amount of work and the number of community-minded people that are out there in my constituency that are doing good work in their community. They're volunteering. They belong to organizations to help their communities grow and thrive. It's incredible to see that. In fact, that's probably one of the greatest things that I've learned by being elected to this position, the amount of community involvement there is out there and all the different organizations doing such great work. But these organizations want to see their elected representative at times. They want him to show up to an event once in a while. They want to know that their elected representative cares and is concerned about what they're doing. The only way to do that is to be there. By making these constituencies so large, it doesn't benefit these communities. In fact, it hurts.

I know that in some of the urban constituencies there are concerns about population. We understand that. We have rules in place for when the constituencies are drawn out, you know, the variances of population, what's allowed and what isn't. But, Madam Speaker, the redraw that we've seen in this commission's report was huge in the number of changes that they made, drastic changes. In fact, probably one of the most frustrating things, I think, in our communities up there was the difference between the interim report and the final report and how drastic the change was between the two. I mean, in the interim report we lost Grande Prairie-Wapiti. It disappeared. In the final report we lost Grande Prairie-Smoky, and Grande Prairie-Wapiti was still there. Now, that's a pretty drastic change, which the people never had an opportunity to influence. The final report comes out, and there it is. It's done. It shows up here, in this Legislature, and then it's here in front of us to vote on. But those communities that had such a drastic change done to their constituency never had a chance to have input.

When there's such a drastic change between the interim report and the final report, the commission couldn't have had input on that because nobody had any clue that it would even have happened. If there had been some slight adjustments to boundaries here and there, just a little bit of cleaning up, I mean, that's one thing. But when you totally take out a constituency and put back in a constituency, that's pretty drastic. When you change the size of a riding from probably 20,000 square kilometres to about 60,000 square kilometres, that's a big difference. When you lump communities that are totally unrelated, where there's no travel or trading corridor between them, and you put them together and those communities never had a chance to have input on that or share their feelings with the commission on that, those are drastic things. Those are things that just aren't right.

Now, my constituency isn't even the largest constituency by geography. It's huge, yeah. I think I counted that there are about 71 different communities in this new constituency – 71 – and eight different MDs and counties. Now, I know that one of the things they were supposed to do in this report was to take in natural boundaries of MDs and counties, but they didn't even do that with this. I mean, of those eight MDs and counties, there are parts of three or four of them and all of some of them. It's just a mishmash of everything there.

This committee's report only wants to make these rural Alberta constituencies bigger. I can't fathom it, which is why we must refrain from reading this bill a second time. Effective representation also implies that the local issues require local solutions. Who is better suited to address them than someone that's local? The minority report from Commissioner Gwen Day of the Alberta Electoral Boundaries Commission states that the new constituencies need to account for "common community interests and community organizations." As I just mentioned, there's no relativity to these communities that are now lumped together. How can a member be expected to understand the needs of his or her entire constituency when it's so big that these interests conflict?

Urban centres don't struggle with this problem as much as rural constituencies do. To some degree representatives in cities like Calgary and Edmonton are interchangeable because they are close enough to each other where matters under provincial jurisdiction are similar. But what about outside these centres? How big is too big when it comes to these constituencies?

Grande Prairie-Smoky, the existing constituency, is a district that includes both an urban and a rural component, and it's peppered with amazing little communities in between. But it also includes the northern half of one of Alberta's largest cities. The population was a good-sized population in that constituency. The thing is that with that constituency there was a natural trading corridor from the rural area around Grande Prairie to Grande Prairie. People outside of Grande Prairie, if they want to go to a Walmart or a Costco or one of those big box stores or if there are some specialty stores in Grande Prairie that don't exist in smaller communities, then they would go to Grande Prairie. There was a relativity. The people in Grande Prairie, a lot of them worked outside of Grande Prairie in a rural area, in the oil and gas sector or the forestry or farming industry.

There was a lot of relativity in that area, but the way the constituencies are now, they've taken away that, that opportunity that these communities – before, in the existing constituency, there was some sort of relativity. There was some sort of common interest. There was some sort of common bond there. But that's been taken away when you take communities that are four and a half hours apart.

On one hand, you have a strong energy component in Grande Prairie upon which our provincial economy depends. On the other hand, there is an agricultural component, also vital to our success as a province. What do the needs of my constituents in Grande Prairie have in common with the people of New Fish Creek, a rural community an hour and a half to the east? They're in a similar trading corridor. The people from New Fish Creek go to Grande Prairie and shop. The people in Grande Prairie, some of them, might work in the New Fish Creek area or some of the other communities around in the oil and gas sector or whatever. But they both deserve equal representation in this House. That's why we must not read this bill a second time.

At this time I'd like to move to adjourn debate.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Madam Speaker, I believe that we have made progress, however incremental, this evening. As we had a late night last night, I'm pleased to move that we adjourn the House until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Thank you.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Deputy Speaker: Good morning.

Today is the National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence against Women. Let us reflect not only on the 14 young women who lost their lives 28 years ago in Montreal but on the powerful movement of women world-wide who are standing against acts of misogyny, violence, and hatred. Together we can create a province and a nation where love, acceptance, and tolerance are stronger than hatred.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 32

An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and minister responsible for democratic renewal.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a privilege to move second reading of Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta.

With this bill we are continuing our work to renew democracy to Albertans. We started this work soon after being elected by banning political donations from unions and corporations, and we followed up on that work with the Fair Elections Financing Act to help ensure that good ideas are valued above campaign budgets and that the interests of everyday Albertans are put first.

Earlier this year the Legislative Assembly passed the Public Interest Disclosure (Whistleblower Protection) Amendment Act to further the principles of open government in Alberta by increasing accountability, ethics, and transparency, and now we are proposing amendments to the Election Act and the Election Finances and Contributions Disclosure Act.

Bill 32 would strengthen the existing third-party advertising rules by extending spending limits to three months before the election period. Starting December 1, prior to an election year individuals, corporations, unions, employee groups, or other third parties would not be permitted to spend more than $150,000 on political advertising prior to the election being called. Of that $150,000, no more than $3,000 could be used to promote or oppose the election of one or more candidates in any one electoral division. Money spent on canvassing and organizing events to promote or oppose a party, nominee, candidate would be considered advertising expenses. Political parties, nominees, and candidates would also be prohibited from colluding with third parties such as political action committees to circumvent spending rules.

Corporations, unions, employee groups, and similar third parties that are not individuals would be banned from incurring expenses to sell memberships, fund raise, or collect information about voters in support of a party, nominee, or candidate. By doing more to keep corporate and union money out of politics, these proposed changes would help ensure that everyone has an equal opportunity to share their views and meaningfully participate in an election.

Our government has also previously committed to prohibiting MLAs from using government resources during an election. Bill 32 includes restrictions on advertising or publishing any information about government programs or activities after the writ has been issued for a general election. At the same time, it is imperative that the public service be able to provide Albertans with the information they need about ongoing programs and services. Our proposed amendments are aimed at prohibiting taxpayer money from being used to influence elections but also avoiding a total shutdown of all government communications to the public. Advertising or announcements required by law would still proceed, as would those needed for procurement or employment purposes. Health or public safety messages would also be permitted.

For by-elections there would be restrictions on advertising or publishing information that disproportionately involves or affects the electoral division in which the by-election is taking place. That way, the scale and scope of the advertising rules will concur with the scope of the election taking place.

To help ensure these rules are followed and that complaints are thoroughly investigated, a new election commissioner would be responsible for fully investigating complaints, taking enforcement action, and recommending prosecutions. The election commissioner's annual report would include information on the number and types of complaints received, investigations conducted, and the disposition of each complaint or investigation, and we propose that that new election commissioner be an officer of the Legislature and report to this Assembly.

On another note, we are also proposing to make voting in a provincial election easier and more convenient than ever before. Up to this point for both advance polls and for regular polls Albertans needed to be close to home to vote. In all provincial elections so far people have had to cast their vote at a polling station in their electoral division. We are proposing that on any advance voting day Albertans should be able to vote at the polling station closest to them no matter where they are in the province. Voters would still choose a candidate running in the electoral division where they live, but they would have more freedom in terms of where to vote and how to plan their day. This means that if you live in the suburbs and work downtown, you'd be able to potentially vote during your lunch break on an advance voting day without driving all the way back to your neighbourhood.

We're also giving Albertans more opportunities to fit voting into their schedules by allowing for one more advance voting day and putting that advance voting day on a Saturday, where we know we have the highest turnout and people find it easiest to come out and vote.

In addition to opening up more advance voting opportunities, the bill is also going to allow Elections Alberta to hold more mobile polls. Currently they can only be held in supportive living facilities and treatment centres on election day. We are proposing that mobile polls must also be held in emergency shelters and support centres for those experiencing homelessness or poverty as long as there are at least 10 eligible voters who are getting support there.

Voting is a fundamental right in our society, and we want to make sure that voting is accessible in Alberta. Our legislation will also enable Elections Alberta to establish special mobile polls elsewhere, maybe a postsecondary institution, work camp, correctional institution, or other public buildings. Elections Alberta would be required to determine in consultation with an official from each postsecondary institution, work camp, or other facility if a special mobile poll makes sense for that facility and if there are the supports that are needed: power, space, et cetera.

We also believe that everyone is entitled to vote with privacy and dignity, and that is why Bill 32 would enable Elections Alberta to use voter assist terminals in general elections. Currently if someone needs help voting due to a disability, a friend or an elections official would help them, but voter assist terminals let voters mark their ballot using a Braille-coded keypad, audio cues, or breath-operated devices. Voter assist terminals have been successfully tested in advance polls in by-elections. It would be an offence to tamper with or interfere with this equipment, and they would not be connected to the Internet. They will create a paper ballot.

Not only do we want to make it easier and more straightforward for people to vote; we also want to encourage more people to vote. Voting is one of the best ways for Albertans to voice their opinion on government and democracy, but Alberta has rarely seen voter turnout above even 60 per cent. To help change this, we want to ensure Albertans are aware of their right to vote and how to exercise it. Our proposed legislation will make it mandatory for Elections Alberta to provide information to the public about the elections process and their right to vote. There would be a specific requirement to implement public education and information programs to make the electoral process better known to the public, particularly to those persons or groups most likely to experience difficulties in exercising their democratic rights.

Elections Alberta will be required to prepare educational materials for students who have reached voting age or who will reach voting age soon, including information about how to have their information added or removed from the register of electors. Albertans who are in the 18- to 24-year-old range are the least likely to vote, and only approximately a third of them are registered to vote, which is by far the lowest of all age groups. To help address this, we are proposing that Elections Alberta be allowed to collect information about 16- and 17-year-olds without their express consent so that they can be automatically registered to vote when they turn 18. Elections Alberta would be required to inform young people added to the register in this manner that they may object to and request to be removed from the register. This provision would not come into force until proclamation.

We also believe that when Canadian citizens move to our province, they should be eligible to vote in a provincial election right away provided they are of voting age. Currently even if they are otherwise eligible to vote, new Albertans have to wait six months before they're able to vote in a provincial election. Many Albertans start contributing to their local communities and economy the day they move here. Therefore, we are proposing to remove the minimum residency requirement. Voters would still need to be ordinarily resident in Alberta in order to vote. They would still need to be a Canadian citizen and 18 years of age or older. By removing this barrier for Canadian citizens, we hope to engage new Albertans in the democratic process sooner and encourage them to continue voting into the future. I would note that this mirrors how our federal government allows voting.

On another note, it's currently the case that a person who is unable to go to an advance poll or regular poll due to a specified criterion such as a physical incapacity, absence from electoral division may request a special ballot. Unfortunately, given our short writ period there's often not enough time for applications to be processed, for ballots to go out, for someone to complete that ballot and return it by mail. To address this, we are proposing that we allow people to apply for special ballots as early as January 1 of that election year. Special ballots would then be mailed out to electors as soon as the writ is issued.

While making voting easier, we are also proposing to enhance the efficiency of elections and ensure they can run more smoothly. The Election Act currently does not allow Elections Alberta to change polling place hours even in the event of a disruption or emergency. We're proposing that in the event of a local emergency, a blackout or a burst pipe, the Chief Electoral Officer should have the authority to adjourn voting at that polling place to later in the same day or perhaps change the polling place location. According to our proposed amendments if the emergency is more serious and voting cannot take place on the same day, the CEO can then apply to the court to discontinue the election in one or more electoral divisions and hold the election at another time and place. The election would have to be held within six months, and ultimately the timing would depend on the seriousness of the emergency at hand.

In closing, Madam Speaker, the pillars of our plan are: encouraging more people to vote, making it easier to vote, ensuring elections run smoothly, and protecting the fairness and integrity of elections. If Bill 32 passes, this would be the most significant update to the Election Act since 1980. This is a very comprehensive bill, and while I've covered all of our major proposals, I encourage all of my colleagues to read through the bill to see the full suite of proposed amendments. I look forward to hearing what my colleagues in the Legislature have to say.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you. Good morning, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to see you this morning. It's a pleasure to be here on this fine December morning, just a couple of days before the House was intended to rise, and here to debate a very, very significant piece of legislation. As the minister has just said, it is wide ranging, covering significant portions of how our democracy runs here in the province of Alberta, and let me just say that there are a number of things in this big piece of legislation that I think are steps in the right direction. I think there are a number of things that the government has done to move the needle on access to voting, and I look forward to being able to speak positively about some of those things.

Having said that, there are some significant challenges within Bill 32 that I also hope to be able to address over the next number of days as we debate it here in the Assembly and then speak about this piece of legislation as we move through the legislative process and provide some what I believe will be positive alternatives to in fact further strengthen Bill 32.

You know, Madam Speaker, you have heard me in this House before rise about some concerns that I often have with the way that the government chooses to run the legislative session, and here we have another perfect example of that, of the government not being ready or prepared for the legislative session and then, as such, rushing through what I would consider to be very important pieces of legislation towards the dying days of that legislative session.

I think Bill 32 is a great example of that. Here's a piece of legislation that two days ago was introduced in the House, and the government was rushing to do that, rushing so much that they didn't yet have the actual piece of legislation back from the printers. They provided all members of the Assembly this photocopied version of the legislation. Then, like the good environmental stewards they are, the following day, Tuesday, they provided the actual copy to the House.

While I appreciate their desire to ensure that all members of the Assembly have the appropriate version, it's unfortunate to me that they went through the process of rushing this legislation into the Chamber and not doing the due diligence in terms of having this ready at the beginning of the session so that we could have studied it, so that we could have taken it to Albertans and actually got feedback from them. Instead, on Monday they rushed this copy into the House, stapled together in the backrooms or the gallows, if you will, of the Legislative Assembly building, and then on Tuesday provided another copy, that's actually returned from Queen's Printer and is the way that we would expect legislation to be introduced into the House.

It continues to be frustrating that the government doesn't seem to quite get how this place works. They continue to rush legislation. They continue to not provide the sort of respect and time that this type of legislation deserves. You would think, Madam Speaker, that after a couple of years they would catch on that this is what happens, that every spring we come, we debate legislation, and that every fall we do it again. They could be prepared for that.

I remain frustrated that this is what happens at the end of each session. I know that the good people of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills would like to be able to provide some feedback on Bill 32 as this particular legislation has a direct impact on many of them. It's disappointing that three days prior to the scheduled end of the session this sort of piece of legislation would be introduced. Now, at best, if I was speculating, we'll have one weekend in the constituency prior to the passing of this legislation, making the assumption that that's what the government continues to choose to do.

I find that the irony is significant. We're talking about a piece of legislation that has the title An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, yet we're virtually going to have no time to ask any Albertans if they support it or think that the government has gotten it right. It seems a bit rich to me that the minister of democratic reform and renewal – apologies if I haven't gotten the name exactly correct – isn't actually going to do anything to take this piece of legislation to Albertans and get some feedback and comments from them.

Having said all that, there are some positives in Bill 32 that I think, overall, will be net positive to the process, but any time that we are making changes to these very important acts, these changes shouldn't be taken lightly. The government is certainly taking steps to modernize the election process, and for that I am thankful. I support that. In particular, the use of voter assist terminals, the use of mobile polling stations as well as expanding the advance polls: I think that these can be a real net positive. Now, that's not to say that those things don't come with some unique challenges, and frankly I don't think that the government has considered all of those unique challenges and what their decisions are going to mean for Elections Alberta.

I had the opportunity to speak briefly with the Chief Electoral Officer yesterday, and in fact I wrote him a letter because I am hoping that we can receive some feedback from the Chief Electoral Officer directly. I don't mean through the minister, but I mean directly from the Chief Electoral Officer. He has a very important role to play in this process, as you know. In some of my conversations with him he identified right off the hop some challenges around the vote anywhere advance polls. That's not to say that these challenges can't be overcome, but I want to make sure that the government has done everything that they can do to make sure that those challenges are mitigated, and at this point in time I don't believe that that is the case.

When it comes to advance polls, even if we look at something as small as the how and where to vote card, it will not be possible for Elections Alberta to issue how and where to vote cards prior to the opening of advance polls. That does present a unique challenge and is certainly a significant departure from how our democracy has worked in the past, so we should be asking ourselves: is that okay?

How important is getting the information to Albertans about where actually to vote in advance polls? I understand that they're going to be able to vote in any electoral district in any spot in the province, but, you know, the electoral district of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, for example, will be at the time of this next election approximately 10,000 square kilometres and may have one, two, possibly three places to vote in the advance polls.

It would be important for the people of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills to be able to identify where those locations would be, but it's not going to be possible for Elections Alberta to inform Albertans prior to the start of advance polls. There are some challenges that need to be addressed, and I hope that the minister will be able to do that. You know, I think one way that we could ensure that we have feedback from the Chief Electoral Officer, of course, would be to send this bill to committee and have him be able to come and speak about some of these very specific challenges.

You know, Madam Speaker, there are a number of real challenges inside this legislation. I appreciate that the government is trying to make this bill and our democracy stronger, but we need to ask ourselves some questions about what's important to us as Albertans with respect to voters. I for one have some concerns around the total elimination of a six-month residency period. I appreciate that six months is way too long and that when people arrive in Alberta, they should be able to take part in the democratic process, but going from a residency requirement of six months to zero I don't believe is a step in the right direction. I know that just in the last couple of days I've spoken to a bunch of folks around the precinct as well as a number of constituents. I have a number of constituents across the constituency of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills that I would say act, if you will, as the chair of the coffee senate.

The coffee senate, Madam Speaker – I know that you'll know, being from a rural riding – takes place in a lot of small communities all across rural Alberta. For example, in the community of Linden it's at Country Cousins at 10 a.m., with the best peanut butter pie money can buy every day of the week. I encourage you, if you're ever in the area, to stop by and join the coffee senate in Linden. At Three Hills it's at 3 o'clock at the Get 'n Go every day of the week. In the community of Olds the coffee senate is at the A&W between 7 and 8.

My point is that I've reached out to some of these folks at the coffee senate and spoke to them specifically about Bill 32, and they also share a significant concern around reducing the residency requirement from six months to zero. I look forward to being able to try and represent those folks with some amendments at committee that will still encourage new Albertans to be a part of the process but also with some reasonable requirements around residency, perhaps 30 or 60 days.

You know, I'd like to thank the government for taking some proactive steps on the prohibition around government advertising. I'd also like to thank my hon. colleague from Drumheller-Stettler, who has been working on this project over a number of years. Unfortunately, the government didn't listen to him and to many members of this Assembly when they recommended this change in the form of Bill 203, private member's business, that was introduced here in the House and then killed by the government and then revived by the government and then sent to committee and then killed again. Now it seems that Bill 203 is like a cat with nine lives and has found its way into this piece of legislation, so I would like to say thank you for that.

Having said that thank you, there are enough loopholes in the proposed direction that you could drive a giant government advertisement through it, and I don't think that that is a step in the right direction. I certainly appreciate the fact that the government needs to continue to be able to advertise, even during an election, on issues of important public health or safety, on issues required by law like employment and procurement, but there's no reason to be making government announcements in a by-election in the same city, at the very least. I'm of the opinion that a school in Edmonton can wait to be introduced 28 days while there's a by-election in Calgary. So I look forward to proposing some amendments around this very important issue with respect to government advertising as well.

The minister spoke about the establishment of an independent officer of the Legislature with the election commissioner. While it is important that we ensure that we have the appropriate checks and balances within our electoral system, adding an independent office of the Legislature I do not believe is the right path forward with respect to the independent election commission. If, in fact, the government would like to have an independent election commissioner, there is no reason why this commissioner cannot function within the confines of the chief electoral office.

This happens in other places across the country, and I'm sure that we're going to hear from the minister touting the benefits of an independent election commissioner within the province of Manitoba, a province where good portions of the NDP world view have come from, and as such, they like to point to it as a real pinnacle of NDP thought, so they like to do some of the things that they've done there. One significant difference between Manitoba and what they're proposing here is that the independent election commissioner in Manitoba actually reports to the Chief Electoral Officer and works inside the confines of that office, not as an independent office of the Legislature.

There are some significant challenges with making it an independent office of the Legislature. I know that the Member for Edmonton-Centre has expressed some concerns about the additional costs that come along with independent officers of the Legislature, particularly when there were individuals advocating on behalf of people with disabilities. He said that he also would like to observe that there are other costs that also come with appointing an independent officer of the Legislature. For example, in appointing a new independent officer of the Legislature, we've had to go through a significant search process, which has involved a number of meetings with committee members... involved having to take time and go off-site and book rooms off-site.

He continued and said:

It involves extra time where the legislative office's staff has to be involved [with] that process, hiring an external HR firm.

He identified a lot of additional costs that come along with an independent office of the Legislature.

Also, with respect to seniors there was some desire of folks in the Assembly to have an independent seniors' advocate, and many people spoke out against that because of the additional costs. Now, having an independent election commissioner is not necessarily a bad thing, but there's no reason why it needs to function outside of the Chief Electoral Officer, and I look forward to discussing that further later on.

One of the other surprising things – and I think it's important, worth noting – is that this piece of legislation, Bill 32, does a lot of administrative tasks with respect to the abolition of the Senatorial Selection Act. That was the act that Albertans used to vote for Senators. Albertans were very proud to be able to elect Senators, and Albertans from all across the province engaged in a process of electing Senators. Those individuals were then later appointed by the Prime Minister, but he appointed those folks because he respected Albertans' choice with respect to the Senate election. So

I was surprised to see in Bill 32 that all of the references to the Senatorial Selection Act were being removed.

So I started doing some looking around, and as it turns out, Madam Speaker, under the cover of darkness last December this government let the Senatorial Selection Act lapse. It had a sunset clause in it. [interjections] The government might be clapping, but I can assure you that Albertans appreciated the fact of electing senators because the vast majority – the vast majority – of Albertans don't hold the NDP world view and believe that senators should be elected. Well, this government might like to clap that under the cover of darkness they allowed a piece of legislation that Albertans believed in to lapse. That is not what Albertans are hoping for. I can assure you of that. The purpose of a sunset clause in legislation is to bring it back to the Assembly to decide if this is the best path forward for Albertans. But the NDP knew that Albertans would be disappointed with the decision of letting Senator elections lapse, so they didn't bring it back to the House.

They say they respect democracy, but they don't. This government, Madam Speaker, has a long track record of saying one thing and doing another. They say they want to strengthen democracy, but they don't. They have weakened democracy by removing the ability to elect Senators in the province of Alberta, and I can tell you that the vast majority of Albertans will agree with me and not with that government.

Madam Speaker, there is going to be extensive discussion on this particular piece of legislation. While there may be some upsides, there is a lot – a lot – of work to do, and I know that colleagues on this side of the House who believe in respecting and strengthening democracy are excited about doing that work, and we will be here as long as it takes.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today to speak to Bill 32 in second reading. I hold Bill 32 in my hand right now. It's a fairly large piece of legislation that was put on my desk, this second copy yesterday, the original rushed paper copy only just a few days prior to that. You know, there's a lot in this piece of legislation to go through and to sift through. Unfortunately, I have had very little time to consult on this piece of legislation whereas I imagine that there are many involved, interested parties that are also still sifting through this very large, extensive piece of legislation.

Madam Speaker, at first glance there are some really good points, pieces in this legislation that I do believe will strengthen democracy here in Alberta, and there are also some really concerning pieces. You know, one just off the top of my head that I was initially quite shocked at was the creation of an election commissioner. I believe it was maybe just a little over a year ago when members in this Legislature asked for an independent office for the Seniors Advocate and an independent office for a disabilities advocate. Both of those ideas were actively shot down by the government on the other side of this House, citing that it was too expensive. So I find it interesting, now that we talk about elections here, that we have another independent office being created from this piece of legislation, yet very little thought or consideration was given to our seniors and persons with disabilities in this province. I find it quite shocking, to be honest.

It's also shocking that this is the NDP government's third attempt yet to change election laws in this province.

Mr. Gill: How many?

Mrs. Pitt: Three times we've been here with large pieces of legislation where this government claims that they are trying to strengthen democracy in this province. I think they've failed on many accounts.

Madam Speaker, there have been some successes, I believe, in strengthening democracy and accountability in this province.

On three separate occasions the government puts forward massive pieces of legislation with sweeping changes, allows very little time for consultation, and forces through legislation in the dying days of the fall session, so close to Christmas, with very little time to consult. This isn't very democratic, yet we have An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta. I have some major concerns with what we're doing here in this House. I think Albertans have major concerns with what is happening here in this House.

Madam Speaker, there was an emergency committee meeting called just a few weeks ago where the government called in the Chief Electoral Officer and pretty much only asked questions around the investigation of the Chief Electoral Officer. Some members actually didn't understand the questions that they were asking when further clarification was needed, yet they read the questions they were given all around the investigating powers of the Chief Electoral Officer, and that was the meeting. It was very, very strange, very, very odd.

I now know why. The government knew, obviously, I would say, pieces of what is in this bill. It's very clear that they weren't ready with the legislation, but they certainly had a focus in that meeting to be – I don't know if they got the answers in this committee meeting that would argue the case for making some of these changes in the legislation. I don't think they did. Every investigation that's been reported to the Chief Electoral Officer has been investigated. Every complaint that has been reported has been investigated by the Chief Electoral Officer, yet the NDP feels that it's important to create a whole other department.

When we asked for independent officers for the seniors and for persons with disabilities, it was cited that this would cost at least $1 million. So it would be safe to assume, from the information that the government has cited in previous sessions in this Legislature, that the election commissioner would also cost Albertans at least $1 million if not more.

Madam Speaker, one of the other things that happened in the Legislative Offices Committee with the Chief Electoral Officer, in the presentation that he gave to us, was around the door-to-door enumeration. He fairly clearly stated that the door-to-door enumeration is a thing of the past. It's expensive. It's dangerous – multiple injuries were reported by the door-to-door people doing the enumeration, insults – yet the government is choosing to go down this route. They're choosing to put people in danger even though it's very clearly stated that this is not the way to go, choosing to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars more . . .

Mr. Cooper: Millions.

Mrs. Pitt: . . . millions of dollars more on something that has already been identified as just not working.

Madam Speaker, this government is choosing to continue to do the things that have proven to not work in the past, and the evidence is there – it's very, very clear – from the Chief Electoral Officer.

An Hon. Member: Show me the evidence.

Mrs. Pitt: The government says: "Show me the evidence." Well, ask the Chief Electoral Officer. I would hope that at least the government did that before they tabled this legislation. I imagine they did. And if you were in the committee meeting for Legislative Offices, he very clearly stated the facts around door-to-door enumeration. I suggest you get a copy of the committee meeting.

Madam Speaker, given the government's third attempt at trying to get democracy right in this province – unsuccessfully, I might add, because this is the third time in just two and a half years – and given the enormity of this legislation and the lack of consultation time that this government has provided to us, I propose to move an amendment.

Mr. Cooper: Oh. A surprise.

Mrs. Pitt: Madam Speaker, I'll wait till you tell me to proceed. It's a shocker.

Mr. Cooper: Spoiler alert.

Mrs. Pitt: Spoiler alert.

Mr. Cooper: It's a committee referral.

Mrs. Pitt: Hey, you just took away the surprise element.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, this will be known as amendment REF1.

Go ahead, hon. member.

Mrs. Pitt: Okay. Thank you, Madam Speaker. I will read this into the record. I move that the motion for second reading on Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

Madam Speaker, I along with members of my caucus and the United Conservative Party have expressed many times on many different pieces of legislation that they be referred to a committee, where committee work can be done, where witnesses can be brought in, and where, especially in this case, the government can hear yet again from the Chief Electoral Officer that, specifically, door-to-door enumeration is expensive and dangerous, which I think is something they very clearly need to hear.

Not only that; the age limit has changed, so we're going to be hiring younger people to do more dangerous work. Unbelievable. I would think that the first rule of government is to do no harm, but in fact this will do quite the opposite, especially to those quite young who are just trying to make a buck, $15 an hour.

It's important, Madam Speaker, that the government hears of the effects of its changes, especially in regard to a $15-an-hour minimum wage. It's a massive increase to the budget of the Chief Electoral Officer. Now it's going to be even more because they're going to have to hire even more people to do the door-to-door enumeration, which also means that we will now go back to committee to approve a new budget for the Chief Electoral Officer and the new election commissioner, plus there will be a hiring process and those types of things. I'm not sure they have enough time.

An Hon. Member: Appoint.

Mrs. Pitt: Oh, wait. Oh, wait. They will appoint. This government doesn't believe in elections anymore.

Madam Speaker, I also believe, because, as I've stated before, this is the third time that we are here changing legislation that is to protect and strengthen democracy here in Alberta, that the government could probably get something right in committee and then come back with only one more piece of legislation to strengthen and protect democracy here in Alberta instead of continually coming back here, in the dying days of session, with a very large piece of legislation, asking us to rubber-stamp it, pass it through: "Don't worry. We know what's best. Trust us. We're the government." It's unbelievable. The third time.

Perhaps if the first piece of legislation that this government put forward to strengthen and protect democracy went to committee, the government at that time might have realized that they were missing a whole bunch of stuff or that they were putting too much stuff in. That's the kind of work that gets done in committee. That's why committee is important. That's why I am moving a motion to put this bill in committee, the Legislative Offices Committee, where it can be properly debated, where perhaps we can help this government finally get something right.

Albertans expect us to do important things in this Legislature, but after the government's third attempt to try and strengthen democracy, I think some Albertans would be a little bit concerned about what we're doing here in this Legislature. I certainly am, but I'll have very little time to actually talk to Albertans because of the length of time that this government actually gives to debate and democracy in this Legislature. It's frustrating.

Our stakeholders are frustrated, Madam Speaker. I can imagine that the Chief Electoral Officer is going to be extremely frustrated. I imagine he was when he read this bill and said: "Wait a minute. I already told you that door-to-door enumeration is a thing of the past. It's too expensive, and it's dangerous. I already told you that. Not only that, but I'm going to need some more money to do this should this be the way that the government is choosing to go."

I imagine it will be because, as history has taught me just in the short time that I have been an MLA, this government is not willing to work with opposition members. I would also infer that this government is not willing to work with Albertans. Their history on consultation is atrocious. They act more like dictators to the people of this province. "Here's what I have, and I'm going to tell you this is what's good for you."

This government, Madam Speaker, refuses to listen to reasoned debate. They refuse to actually debate themselves most of the time. This is a come-and-be-told type of government. They accept very few recommendations, the government, very few. I'm waiting for an amendment to be accepted by this government, certainly a reasonable amendment, like the one I'm suggesting here today, that would refer this piece of legislation to the Legislative Offices Committee. It's important that we protect democracy here in this Chamber. It's important that we debate.

It's important that we take the time to bring this back to Albertans, ask them what they think. They might say that this is great. Wouldn't this government want the seal of approval on their legislation from the majority of Albertans? That would be what I would effort to do if I were in government, Madam Speaker. That is what I will do when I'm in government in 2019. I will make sure that I bring forward the voice of the majority of the people here in Alberta because that's responsible – it's absolutely responsible – and I wish that this government would feel the same way when it comes to democracy here in this Chamber and in this province.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) allows for five minutes of questions and answers to the previous speaker should any member wish to take advantage of that. Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise. I'd just like to thank my colleague for her comments with respect to some of the recommendations that the Chief Electoral Officer made with respect to door-to-door enumeration and how ineffective it is yet how committed the government is to spending approximately $11 million on that very project. It seems to me that the government is intent on spending significant amounts of money on tasks that don't have very good returns.

Another one of those tasks is the independent election commissioner, as I remarked in my comments earlier, this discussion around the independent office of the Legislature and how the independent election commissioner would add significant cost. Of course, in this particular piece of legislation it doesn't lay out what those costs would be, but we know that independent legislative offices – for example, the youth advocate is about $14 million. The Member for Calgary-North West mentioned on Bill 205, the Advocate for Persons with Disabilities Act:

Now, with a price tag like the Child and Youth Advocate's of about $14 million – that's a pretty big price tag for an advocate, so I thought to myself: well, in this current economic climate how do we move these issues forward when the resources don't seem to be there to put an independent office into place?

You know, Madam Speaker, I appreciate the fact that democracy costs and we need to have checks and balances, but the government seems intent on spending money on door-to-door enumeration, which doesn't actually make things better, and on creating an independent legislative office. When it came to an independent leg. office for seniors and an independent leg. office for persons with disabilities, they didn't see value in that, or they felt that the current structure of government could suffice. Yet with the independent election commissioner they have a very different opinion.

I'm curious to know if my colleague from Airdrie shares my opinion that having an independent election commissioner might be a good idea but inside the confines of what already exists. The Chief Electoral Officer, Madam Speaker, as you'll know, already has all of the abilities that the independent office would, but we're just going to do it for twice as much money. This does sound like the type of project that this government likes.

I'll just conclude my thoughts with some remarks from the Member for Edmonton-Shepherd – sorry. The Member for Edmonton-Centre. They're kind of interchangeable there. He does such a great job, so maybe it should be named after him someday.

I think, Madam Chair, we have many resources that are already available and in existence within the Legislature, within the mechanisms of government. Indeed, some of those are independent officers of the Legislature. A disability advocate will have the opportunity to establish their office, to draw on the resources that are available, and to collaborate with some of the other individuals that serve the people of Alberta to begin to lay the foundation and the groundwork to truly be able to support those who are in need in our province.

My question to my colleague is: are you also confused by how the government wants to do some things in some circumstances but not in others like they're trying to do with an independent election commissioner, remove them from the chief electoral office and cost...

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise on the referral amendment. I just want to iterate that this bill is about accountability. Now, the opposition is obviously just stalling because they want to keep Jason Kenney's dark money in politics and continue to use the funds from their PACs in order to fund their elections, but members on this side of the House are making sure that our democracy is accountable to our electors and accountable to all Albertans.

Now, the members opposite may have a short memory, but we have already had a committee about this bill filled with consultation. During the elections and accountability committee we had hundreds of Albertans come forward to tell us what they wanted to see changed in the Election Act, and that's exactly what we're doing with this bill. We're following the recommendations that were given to us by Albertans during that committee and are moving forward, unlike the opposition who are constantly wanting to go backwards. We spent months talking about the Election Act and consulting with Albertans, and beyond that the minister has also spent a ton of time consulting on this bill.

We will not be accepting this amendment because we are determined to take dark money out of politics. While the opposition can filibuster all they want, this side of the House is determined to make life better for all Albertans, and that includes making our democracy more accessible and more just. That's why we're moving forward with this bill, that's why we tabled it, that's why we're debating it, and that's why we will not be voting for this amendment.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), the hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise, with some level of disappointment, I might add, and shock and surprise that the Member for Calgary-Hawkwood wouldn't want to support an amendment that would actually strengthen democracy, that would allow the Chief Electoral Officer to report on some of his concerns with this piece of legislation.

Let me just say, Madam Speaker, that we will be happy to speak about third-party advertisers, but there is so much work to be done in this legislation that we haven't even got there yet this morning. While we have been on the record on numerous occasions about the importance of ensuring fairness in our process . . .

Mrs. Littlewood: Except for dark money.

Mr. Cooper: There's nothing that makes me smile more than the government talking about dark money, because if there is darker money in politics than union dollars supporting the NDP, I don't know what it is.

Let's talk about third-party advertisers, then. Let's talk about third-party advertisers that all have a requirement to disclose. [interjections]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills has the floor, please.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I actually had an important question to ask the Member for Calgary-Hawkwood. In particular, I'd be curious to know some of his thoughts on some of the other questions that we've raised and why it wouldn't be important to send this piece of legislation to committee so that we could hear from Albertans on whether or not they think removing a residency requirement is a good idea. I'd be curious to know from this member what his thoughts are on why it's a good idea to not send this to committee so that we can discuss some of the big loopholes, big enough to drive a government advertisement through, when it comes to government advertising. And I'd be curious to know why we wouldn't want to send this to committee so that individuals could come and speak to the committee about whether or not it's a good idea to provide the private information of 16- and 17-year-olds without their consent to an independent leg. officer.

I think these are reasonable questions to ask, and I think committee is the best place, and I'm curious to know why he doesn't agree with that.

The Deputy Speaker: Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Well, thank you very much, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member opposite for the question. I just want to reiterate that we are opposing this amendment. We are strengthening and protecting democracy. We are making elections more accessible.

There are a lot of concerns raised by the opposition on money and financing, but let us be clear. This bill will end Jason Kenney's money from PACs. We are making sure that this Assembly and all of its members and all the members of other political parties are accountable to Albertans, and we are making sure that that side of the House isn't using their dark money. We still don't know who Jason Kenney's donors are, Madam Speaker. I don't know if you realize this. He promised us those donors, and we still don't have a single one. Not a single one. He promised Albertans those donors. He's breaking his promises to Albertans already, and he's not even in this Assembly. What can Albertans expect from Jason Kenney?

Mr. Cooper: Point of order.

The Deputy Speaker: We have a point of order. The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Point of Order Reflections on Nonmembers

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you. It's a pleasure to rise on a point of order today. My reference today will be on 23(h), (i), and (j), language likely to create a disorder. I'm just wanting to reference some comments that were made by the Government House Leader yesterday with respect to the way that we speak about individuals who aren't inside the Chamber.

I know that the Member for Calgary-Hawkwood's favourite pastime is choosing ways in which he can speak disparagingly against the leader of the United Conservative Party, against an Albertan who very soon will be in this Chamber, and then he can speak to that.

But I think that there has been a tradition, and unfortunately I don't have it here in the Hansard from yesterday, but the Government House Leader spoke at length about how we ought to be careful with the language that we use with those who are unable to defend themselves, and I would encourage the Member for Calgary-Hawkwood to heed the advice of his House leader when it comes to speaking about those who are not inside this Chamber and the disparaging remarks that he might continue to make.

The Deputy Speaker: The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this. I want to point out that the concerns that were brought up here or brought up about speaking disparagingly about someone outside of the House—I don't believe, although we can check the Blues tomorrow, that any comment about the personality of the person indicated in the comments was made but rather a quite defensible position that no names have been provided after having promised those names. As such, it's simply a statement of fact, one that would be agreed upon outside of the House. As such, there is no point of order here.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the point of order?

Seeing none, I'm prepared to rule on the matter. As members are well aware, there is a long-standing tradition that we don't speak disparagingly regarding persons who are outside of the House and cannot defend themselves. In this particular instance, however, I'm inclined to agree with the argument that the comments were not directed personally, and we have had a discussion yesterday about comments directed personally against a member's integrity, that sort of thing. I don't believe that occurred in this case, so I won't find a point of order on that. However, that said, I think it's more important that we stay with the relevance of the topic at hand and the discussion. So I would encourage members to please keep that in mind.

Let's continue.

Debate Continued

Connolly: Well, thank you very much for that ruling, Madam Speaker. I am sorry, and I am discouraged that there is a leader of one of the political parties in this room, namely the UCP, who has not disclosed his donors, and that's why we're bringing this bill forward, because we are tired of dark money in our politics. We are tired of dark money in this House. It is completely, completely the opposition who are constantly berating me, berating this side of the House, and who are being backed by people not even in this province. So I am very disappointed by the opposition, and I am . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's not 29(2)(a), right?

Mr. Cooper: No. You're on.

Mr. Gill: Okay. Thank you. Sorry; I couldn't hear in the commotion. Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak to and support my colleague's motion to refer this bill, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, to committee. I mean, I do have my speaking notes, but I really don't think that we need it. This is the track record of this government, not consulting Albertans for the past two and a half years, and this government is at it again. A few days from today this House is scheduled to rise, and this NDP government – I don't know – sent their staffer to Staples to print this, like, photocopy this bill and bring and introduce it and then send it to Queen's Printer and then brought it again and introduced it as an omnibus legislation that demands thorough review and a broad consultation from all the stakeholders in this province.

I guess, going back to the track record of this government, consultation is not one of their fortes. We have seen Bill 6. We have seen Bill 30, Bill 31, and – oh, I forgot – the carbon tax, which wasn't even on the campaign of this government. I mean, we can still hope that this government would listen and respect Albertans because that's why we're all here, to respect and represent them. This government does not miss an opportunity every single day to disrespect Albertans by not involving them in any consultation, especially when we're talking about, you know, strengthening democracy, and those Albertans who voted for us, who sent us here: they're not even involved in it, and this government is, like, bragging about it, how great of work they're doing, right?

Let me explain, Madam Speaker, the massive undertaking of Bill 32. Many of the concepts and proposals in this bill were previously discussed in committee. It ran out of time, and the government refused to extend its mandate, so we have a clear idea of the complexity of the discussion that needs to occur for this bill. As my colleague from Airdrie said, we cannot do this in the dying days of this session.

Madam Speaker, the fundamental reason for Bill 32 to go to the committee is that – what does committee allow us to do? Let's focus on that. It consults Albertans. It consults all stakeholders. We have seen the consultation that took place on daylight saving time. I know it looks like déjà vu because I gave the exact same speech here, it seems, on Bill 30 on Monday night at 11:30. We had stakeholders, NHL teams. We had the airport authorities. We had Air Canada, WestJet, Calgary Airport Authority, Edmonton airport authority, who brought their concerns that the changing of daylight saving time is going to impact their business. It's going to impact the economic activity these stakeholders bring to this province. And all of a sudden the government realized: okay; we should put a stop to that. Why can't we do that on this bill? What is this government trying to hide – that's the real question – from Albertans?

These accidentally elected officials sitting on the other side are not giving their respect to Albertans, right? To begin, we must ensure that we're reflecting the views of Albertans when we come to this House, to review, amend, and pass legislation that will benefit all Albertans, not ideology, not their own interest groups but that will benefit all Albertans, which is the reason that we're all here. Clearly, that is a challenging job for this government because they don't want to listen to Albertans. As I said, we can go at it again. They haven't listened to Albertans on the carbon tax. They haven't listened to Albertans on Bill 6, Bill 30. You know, we can talk about this till, like, midnight tonight, about all those things this government has disrespected to Albertans.

Veterinarians, one of the most reputed professions . . .

Mr. Cooper: Respected, not reputed.

Mr. Gill: Respected. Same thing.

Mr. Cooper: No. Very different.

Mr. Gill: I know.

But respected professions, and this government is disrespecting them and not even getting them involved in the consultation. But, again, that's a separate bill, and we'll stick to this bill.

I was just giving a reference, a track record of this government claiming that they have the backs of Alberta families and Albertans, but clearly they don't because they will not entertain them, they will not listen to them, they will not get them engaged in the consultation process. So this amendment sends this bill to committee. Get all the stakeholders involved and decide this bill. Maybe this bill is a great thing. Well, let Albertans give us their input. I don't know why the government is trying to hide this thing. But let's get back to this thing.

As a Legislature we need to look at each piece of legislation with an eye to determining if it has forged the right balance for Albertans. The purpose of why we're here is to strike a right balance with every legislation. That's why we send bills to committee. Some bills are simple, but Bill 32 is not. This bill needs study, and the place to do that, in my opinion, is in the committee. We need to thoroughly understand the proposals in every bill for none of us want to pass a flawed bill, so let's send this bill to the committee and let the committee members look into that. I think the government side does not even trust their own committee chairs. That's why they don't want to send this bill to committee. I don't know what their reason is to not send this bill to committee.

I mean, this government wants to create an independent office of the Legislature. We don't know why, but we know that this independent office will cost millions of dollars, and as the member from Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, an outstanding constituency, said, this government did not want to appoint a seniors' advocate. This government opposed other important appointments, but they want to create an independent office for this reason. Sending this bill, again, would allow the committee to explore the concept of what works and what doesn't work so we can do it correctly the first time.

Bill 32 proposes to allow Elections Alberta to launch a door-to-door enumeration before every election. We have heard from the office that this is not the most effective way to do things, but again this government does not understand the meaning of efficiency, obviously. They don't respect Albertans' money. That might be a great idea, but again the cost is too much, and it's massive. There are other ways to do it, but this government doesn't want the committee to explore and listen and hear from stakeholders. Sending Bill 32 would allow us to look at the justification and determine if that expense can be justified every election. Perhaps it can, but right now we don't know if it is, yet we'll have to vote on this in a few days without having proper knowledge and consultation from those stakeholders, again, going back to the same point.

Then there are seemingly minor amendments such as the length of time a voter needs to live in Alberta before being eligible to vote in an election. Is that a minor amendment? I don't know. Let's hear from people who are going to be impacted, Madam Speaker. Sending this bill to a committee will allow us to ask Albertans what they think of that change, the very Albertans who have built this province, the pioneers, the people who work hard every day. Like, somebody can come here and change the fabric. Some people may like it. Some people may not. I don't know. We don't know. So why can't we involve people in this discussion? Perhaps people would want longer residency requirements. We don't know.

Here's another good one. Bill 32 eliminates a portion of the Senatorial Selection Act, which the NDP government let fall by the wayside, by the way. Those elections were a big step for Alberta. They sent an important message to the federal government of the time, and Albertans may well want to keep those sections.

Madam Speaker, the NDP may not realize it, but Albertans do care about elections and voting processes. They care very much, and pushing this bill through this House in these last days of session, as the NDP clearly intend to do, is wrong. I mean, like we haven't even scratched the surface of this bill. Let's remind everybody that it's, like, what, over a hundred pages long, and these are not just technical amendments. These are going to change the nature of voting in elections in this province.

Some of the amendments in Bill 32 are good, and I applaud the government for the modernization aspect of this bill, easing up the rules for advance polling and allowing for the use of new technology. That's good work, and we must acknowledge that on the government side. But on the other side there are other things that need to be discussed, and, you know, the stakeholders' input is important. I'm sure, in typical fashion, the NDP will only market these positive aspects of the bill to Albertans, but they will never ever mention the contentious side, the technical side to Albertans. They will only, like, show those positive sides to people. They'll never show the full picture.

So, Madam Speaker, sending this bill to committee will allow the public to engage in this process. We rely on them, we are here to serve them, and I think it's our responsibility to engage them. That's why – let's do the right thing. Send this bill to committee, and let's hear from Albertans.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Well, that was interesting. The Member for Calgary-Greenway made a couple of comments. What I find really quite interesting is that he's probably the third person to speak now and they seem to be avoiding a topic, that topic being political action committees. To quote a local journalist Mr. Graham Thomson: "PACs... are becoming [a somewhat] invasive species in Canada." That was December 4 of this year. CBC: just a little reminder that "Jason Kenney spent 7 times as much as other candidates in [the] race to lead Alberta PCs." He filed $1.46 million on campaign expenses. It seems to me that he and his comms staff made a promise to Albertans before he was elected that he would disclose, but he didn't. Interesting.

The Member for Calgary-Greenway asked us: what are you trying to hide? What are you trying to hide? Why won't you speak up? Your leader, your dear leader, has chosen not to disclose who backs him. Again, this is not the Wild West. That's why the first piece of legislation this government brought in was to change financing in Alberta because Albertans were sick and tired of it.

So I turn it around to you. What are you trying to hide? Why are you avoiding talking about PACs?

Mr. Gill: Thank you. An important question. The political action committee: I think it's important for – we do care about those political action committees.

Ms Jansen: Answer the question.

Mr. Gill: I am answering the question.

You know what I'm not trying to hide? The Hon. Jason Kenney actually did raise probably, they're saying, ever since we have elected him as a leader, more money than the NDP government has. We're not trying to hide that. We're not trying to hide that 75 per cent of Albertans do not like the carbon tax. We're not trying to hide that. We're not trying to hide that it's, like, over 55 per cent after the unity that will support if the election were held today in this province. We're not trying to hide that.

What we're trying to ask the government is: why are they not involving Albertans in a committee? Maybe when the Albertans get involved in the committee...

Mrs. Littlewood: Answer the question.

Mr. Gill: I am answering the question. Can you please stop heckling and let me answer the question?

Maybe if we involve all the stakeholders in the committee work, we will tell people what they think about PACs, political action committees. We're not trying to hide anything. I think the government side is trying to hide. That's why they're not willing to send this bill to committee. That's why.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I very much thank the hon. member for his comments with regard to this motion to refer to committee. We know that referrals to committee are an important part of our democratic system, and they help us to strengthen the legislation that comes before this House. Referring to committee allows the stakeholders to get involved, and you begin to have more robust discussion on these kinds of issues. I want to know, to a degree, how the hon. member sees that these committees can enhance that kind of discussion and that kind of debate. What kind of stakeholder? What kind of stakeholders would we like to see come before this committee to be able to strengthen this piece of legislation?

I really appreciate the member's comments there when he brings up the fact that on this side of the Legislature, when we look at this bill, we do see that there are parts of this bill that will strengthen democracy. For those parts of the bill we would thank the government for bringing those forward because I think it's in all Albertans' interests to strengthen democracy. We would point out that in this bill there are things like the mobile polling stations or the voter assist terminals that we can support because it does bring democracy to the people and strengthens our democracy. But that doesn't mean that the entirety of this bill is worthy of support. That's why we would suggest that this would go to a committee for discussion.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the referral motion? The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and speak on the referral motion for Bill 32. Now, there's been a lot of talk on the other side about PACs, and they say that we're afraid to talk about them. Well, I'm going to talk about them right now.

They also talk about dark money. I'm going to talk about that, too.

But I'm also going to talk about another acronym. It's called AFL, the Alberta Federation of Labour. [interjections] See? Now they're excited. Now they're excited.

Madam Speaker, I've been a union member. I've paid my dues. I paid my dues for 10 years, and I had no problem with that because we had a very strong organization that fought for its membership and fought for our rights. I was very proud to be part of that group. What bothered me was that a portion of my union dues every month, without my consent, would go to the Alberta Federation of Labour to pay for advertising for the New Democratic Party, to pay union members to go out and door-knock for the New Democratic Party, and I had no choice. I had no choice. I couldn't say: I want my portion of my union dues that's going to the AFL to support the Conservative Party or the Liberal Party or the Green Party or whatever party.

There are a lot of union members. I know that. I actually know some members of the Alberta Teachers' Association that don't support this party, but a portion of their union dues, without their consent, goes to support the AFL: $1.25 a month per union member that is affiliated with the Alberta Federation of Labour. That's a lot of money. You take every union member in Alberta that's a member of that organization, $1.25 a month, that's a lot of dark money. That's very dark money. You know what the difference is, Madam Speaker? The difference is that the people that are donating to PAC organizations are doing it with their own money of their own free will. That's the difference.

Mr. Carson: In Ontario.

Mr. Hanson: Of their own free will.

Mr. Carson: In Ontario.

Mr. Hanson: Of their own free will, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker, the point is that people are donating their own personal funds of their own free will. Now, if that comes to an end, that's fine. But let's really end it. Let's end that mandatory donation from your union dues that has to go to the Alberta Federation of Labour.

Maybe this is why they don't want to send this to committee. Maybe they'll find that a lot of people will come forward and say: "You know what? I didn't realize that was happening, and I would like to get that changed." Maybe that's going to end the dark money that's been funding this party for years. Nationally, it's one party.

You know, they've tried to separate themselves from the federal NDP Party because they know that that the Leap Manifesto is widely supported across this country by the NDP Party. But now they're trying to pretend that they support pipelines and the oil and gas industry, and, boy, they got this monkey on their back that's the Leap Manifesto. They want to hide away from that, yet their friends in British Columbia are substantially banning pipelines, and they're supporting the Leap Manifesto. The federal NDP supports the Leap Manifesto. Maybe this is the stuff that they don't want brought out in a committee. Maybe this is why they don't want to refer this to a committee.

Now, there are some good things. One of the things I saw is that it establishes that organizations such as shelters, community support centres, and work camps, Madam Speaker – work camps that are full of thousands, literally thousands of oil and gas workers that do not support this government, and I'm glad they're going to have a chance to vote in the next election. I can't wait. This enables Albertans that are far away from their normal residences – construction workers are very, very concerned at the way their wages have dropped, at their ability to work and make their mortgage payments because their wages have dropped. The work has dried up under this government.

We have seen a resurgence just lately.

Mr. Feehan: Under this government.

Mr. Hanson: Under this government.

But it seems to be very coincidental that we're starting to get reinvestment right after the United Conservative Party joined forces. [interjections] You can laugh, but it's quite a coincidence that people are seeing that there's going to be a change in government in 2019, and they know that that government will have the backs of the agriculture and forestry industry and the oil and gas industry.

Is that what they're afraid of? Are you afraid to bring this to committee so that people can actually come and present to you? You're afraid that people are going to come and maybe union members are going to come and say: "You know what? I don't want you to use my union donations to support this party that I don't support."

An Hon. Member: No answer.

Mr. Hanson: Yeah, pretty quiet. They don't like that.

One of the things that I don't like – and it doesn't surprise me from this government because they like to build the bureaucracy – is that it proposes the establishment of another independent office of the Legislature. Now, everybody knows that we're supposed to be, at this point in our finances, with a looming, ever-increasing budget deficit, ever-increasing debt that we're going to hand to our children and grandchildren and probably great-grandchildren. I think they said that it would take 127 years to pay off this debt after they're done.

So it doesn't surprise me that they're trying to increase the bureaucracy. That's what they've done ever since they got into power, but what we should be doing is looking at fiscal responsibility. We already have an existing office in the Legislature to govern elections, Elections Alberta. They've been doing a fine job.

Mr. Carson: Forcing a by-election is really fiscally responsible.

Mr. Hanson: Well, there's a difference, you know. You can force a by-election or you can just walk across the floor, but I don't know which is better, right? [interjections]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members.
Please continue.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's really nice to be supported by your chair that we can actually speak freely in the House. [interjections]

The Deputy Speaker: Please continue, hon. member.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. My main point is, you know, that we did talk about PACs, and they have brought up dark money, and they say that we refuse to talk about it. Well, let's talk about it. I'd like somebody from that side to stand up and defend the fact that people's money is used against their will to support a party that they don't believe in. I know that there are a lot of union people out there, and I think that maybe if you did a poll at all the union meetings or sent it out to membership – maybe that's something you should do, send it out to memberships and say: "Which party do you support? Are you actually happy that a portion of your money every month goes to support an organization you don't believe in?"

Mr. Yao: Oh, they'd probably take the opportunity to out all those guys that didn't support them.

Mr. Hanson: Would they take that opportunity to out those guys? I bet they probably would. It probably wouldn't go over very well.

Again, like I say, I know that there are a lot of union and non-union workers that are up in camps that have had enough of this government. They've watched what happened. You know, the most disappointed people that I've talked to are people that actually supported the NDP government all their lives. They were ecstatic on May 5, 2015, when their government finally got a chance to get into power, and now after two and a half years they are so bitterly disappointed in the way they've acted, the way they've increased the debt of this province, the way they can't seem to manage a budget, the way they've got six downgrades.

You know, they talk about democracy. It's a big word they like to play with, "democracy." Yet giving Albertans the opportunity to come and talk to them at committee, giving organizations an opportunity to come and talk to them at committee: isn't that what democracy is, giving the voters an actual voice, letting them come and present their ideas on this topic? We continually, Madam Speaker, try to promote putting important legislation to committee. We have the bill on occupational health and safety. We've got industry experts that would love to come and talk to get it right.

I talked about my experience in the oil and gas industry, over 35 years in construction in total and many, many years of that as a supervisor or as a consultant, where we dealt with safety on a daily basis. I know that there are people, there are actually companies in Alberta that specialize in occupational health and safety. They know that book inside and out, I guarantee a lot better than any of the members across the aisle. Why wouldn't you want those kinds of people coming and talking to you about this?

There are a lot of people that would probably love to come and talk to us about Bill 32. Why don't we give them that opportunity? We've got time. The election is not until 2019. There's nothing wrong with that. The frustrating part in some of the committees that I've been on is that we don't allow Albertans to approach us. They've asked, but every time we get an opportunity to bring them in, there's some legislative matter that we have to deal with, that we're not allowed to deal with anything else.

Last summer we sat for a four-month period, didn't have any meetings, waiting for a report from the Ethics Commissioner. Meanwhile there were three groups of Albertans that had been dying to come and talk to the Resource Stewardship Committee but not allowed. We suggested that we put a motion forward to change the standing orders so that we would have that opportunity while we were sitting in limbo waiting for a major report – sometimes these reports can take six months to a year – when that committee can't do anything else.

We actually put motions forward to this government to change the standing orders to give us that opportunity, that while we're waiting, instead of being a do-nothing committee, let's bring in these people. There's nothing wrong with having them. It's not going to interfere with the Ethics Commissioner's work or anybody else's work. It's not going to influence their work. So why wouldn't you allow Albertans to come to committee? What are we so afraid of, that they might have a good idea? There are a lot of very smart Albertans out there, a lot of corporations, a lot of organizations that have done a lot of work, and I'll tell you what: they're a lot more efficient with their money than this government is. A lot more.

I talked yesterday about the Blue Quills University out in St. Paul and the budget that they have. Madam Speaker, you know the fine work that they're doing out there on a shoestring budget. They can't afford a load of gravel to put in their parking lot because they spend it in the classrooms and supporting their students. These are the kinds of things. You know, there are specialists there, and I've mentioned to the Minister of Indigenous Relations on a number of occasions that there are some great people out there that potentially, if he had them as advisers or on staff, might help him with his job, might make it a lot easier.

There's nothing wrong with talking to Albertans. Why wouldn't we do that? We're going to continue on with pieces of legislation such as Bill 32, pieces of legislation like Bill 30. We will continue to put in referral motions to have this stuff sent to committee. There's no reason at all why we couldn't deal with this over a six-month period and allow Albertans and organizations and even union organizations to come forward and give us their thoughts.

I fail to understand why a party that continually talks about democracy refuses to listen or allow dialogue with the people we're supposed to be representing. Very, very frustrating. We have groups that have been waiting to meet with the Resource Stewardship Committee for two and a half years, and they get roadblocked. Literally, they've been waiting, they've applied, and they've called but can't get a meeting, yet we sit, like I said, for four months doing nothing.

Mr. Gill: Why?

Mr. Hanson: I don't know. Why wouldn't you want to talk to Albertans?

You know, one of the groups that wants to come and talk to us are the recycling organizations of Alberta. That's a really big thing. Why wouldn't you want them to come and speak to the Resource Stewardship Committee? I mean, I think our job is to protect resources in Alberta, to protect the environment in Alberta.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), the hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's always such a pleasure to get up in this House and correct the misguided information that's coming across from the opposition. You know, the opposition likes to light its hair on fire so much, and I think that might be the problem with the member over there. I want to thank the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills. He's a good man. He's a good man. I love working with him on committee, on the many things that we do together.

Of course, you know, for all the lovely people following us at home, this House has specific rules. We are sent here on behalf of Albertans to create those rules, the laws of this land. It's a wonderful thing to do. It's a wonderful thing to be a part of, especially for me, someone who came from a country where there was a dictatorial regime that took away the human rights of individuals.

Mr. Strankman: That's a success story.

Loyola: Yeah, and it's an important story, and it's an important one for you to hear, sir.

Madam Speaker, through you to the members on the other side, protecting democracy is absolutely essential. I can tell you how passionate I am. I've stood in this House several times to talk about how passionate I am about this.

Now, one thing I want to comment on regarding the speech from the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills. One of the first things that we did, one of the absolutely first things that we did was that we put a stop to corporate and union donations and the influence of that money over our democracy. But you know what? Let me tell you this. Having been a union member for a long time and even having been a union vice-president and president and having worked my way up in the union, when I wanted to see a change in my union, I started participating in that union, because that's the way that democratic institutions work. If you want to see a change, then start participating, right?

Now, the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills says, "Okay; well, there are some union members that don't want their money going to particular campaigns, programs," whatever the case may be. Well, guess what? They have an opportunity to go to their union's annual general meeting, where the treasurer of the union has the responsibility to disclose everything that the union is going to do, and much like in this House, the people vote on exactly what the union is going to be spending their money on. It's a democratic process.

Now, I understand there are always going to be a minority of individuals that perhaps have different ways of seeing the world. You know, they have different ways of even communicating what their thoughts are, and we need to respect them. One of the fundamental rights that people can expect, not only in this province but in democratic institutions all over this province, is that they will be listened to, and that's what we are doing.

Now, one of the most important pieces of information that I need to correct the member on is because he's saying: oh, we don't want to listen to Albertans. I'll remind the member that one of the first things that we did is that we struck the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee, and the responsibility of this committee was to listen to Albertans regarding the Election Act. Here we have in front of us this referral motion to send this bill back to committee so that we can listen to Albertans. But guess what, Madam Speaker? We've already been through the process of listening to Albertans. We listened to Albertans on the issues of not only the Election Act but the Election Finances and Contributions Disclosure Act as well, and we brought those changes forward to this House. That was more than two years ago. So to all those people who are following along at home . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the referral motion? The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Again, I mean, I'm not surprised that the motion is to again refer to committee. But just to expand on what my colleague just said, we spent a lot of months on a special select committee reviewing four pieces of legislation, actually. I'm trying to think about the time members of the opposition walked out of that committee because they didn't like something. Hard to remember, but it's okay. They got a little bit uptight, but that's understandable.

I wanted to go back and talk a little bit about some of the things. We already know that the speakers on the other side are choosing to not really talk about PACs – and I get that because it's a little bit embarrassing for them – where they once stood for their constituents to say: "You know what? Let's make this a level playing field. No more of the Wild West. We want to know. We don't want people able to buy elections anymore. We want fair and democratic elections." Now they don't say too much because their new boss plays a different game.

I want to go back and talk about some of the things that are essential in this bill and why it is so important that we get this done now. Obviously, one of the things that I think is truly important and why I don't think this should go back to a committee is that for far too long people that have been marginalized, people with disabilities, maybe people that live in communities that are not very accessible have been excluded for a number of reasons. That sometimes is just accessibility. What this bill does is that it just takes it a step further, and it includes in the language of the bill the importance and the need to make it not just accessible but barrier free. There is a big difference between accessibility and barrier free.

There's a reason that particularly people with disabilities in large numbers don't consider themselves or count themselves as electors. Because not only do they face barriers in regular, everyday life, but the barriers to this process are very real. They're architectural, they're physical, they're attitudinal, they're cultural, they're informal, they're in terms of communication, and they're legal. This bill does a lot to correct some of the problems. I know that people with disabilities and their thousands and thousands of supporters right across this province want to be heard. They're tired of having legislation created for them and not with them. This is a way for people with disabilities and their supporters to get involved, to be assured that the places where they go to vote are accessible and barrier free.

The other thing I really liked about this bill is that it talked about providing information, educational materials to our young people that are still in school. Now, I think we've all probably at some point as teenagers received information, if not in class, specific information about elections, how that works, how to get involved in the process. We've perhaps had debates at our schools and things like that. But this puts another emphasis on the importance of informing our young people, and that is so important because they are our future. They really are our future. When we are no longer in this House, we are perhaps no longer working, and we are relying on our young people, they will be there to take care of us, and they will be informed. They'll believe in science. They'll believe in the need to address climate change and so many other things.

I'm really quite hopeful that they'll also recognize the dangers of allowing Canada, particularly Alberta, to engage in the kinds of activities that we see going on in the United States and that political action committees have truly become a problem. Just look, read the news any day of the week, and you will see that.

Mr. Cooper: Like a third-party advertiser like the ATA.

Ms Renaud: Third-party advertising: funny that the member should mention that.

You know, I did a really quick scan earlier today to look at the website just to see – I'm trying to think. It was the third-party advertiser. I think it was the period from January to September of 2017. I just picked three of the political action groups that are known supporters of Mr. Kenney or the UCP or one and the same or whatever, and the amount of money that they raise to take out ads, to do billboards, to do endless reams of memes on Twitter or Facebook . . . [interjection] Sorry. I'm just teasing. We know that those are PACs. We know it.

I did a quick scan just for one, let's say the first one I picked, the Alberta Fund. We have a numbered Alberta company donating $15,000 in that particular quarter. I don't know. I think Albertans want to know: who is that? Who is that that is buying votes? Who is that that is supporting that party? Another one: Balanced Alberta Fund. There were a number of – I'm not saying that it's wrong for energy companies or developers or special-interest groups to donate, but, you know, in just two lines it was over $50,000 in one quarter. I don't know. Wouldn't you like to know who makes up these groups, who are buying elections, who are supporting and financing and bankrolling politicians? The Alberta Advantage Fund. Any day of the week, if you frequent social media platforms, just go and have a look at the memes, go and have a look at the messages and what they are saying and who they are supporting, and you will get a very, very clear picture of who's doing what in this province.

I will say it again. I find it – you know, when we sat on that select special committee, we heard extreme disappointment from the then Wildrose Party about the inability in the time that we were allotted to address PACs. We agreed, and we continued to do the work. Yet now that they've become the UCP, with a brand new leader, we're not hearing much. When a member stands up to talk about PACs, all we hear are some incorrect comments about the Alberta Federation of Labour, which is a democratic organization, by the way. I've never personally belonged to a union or participated in one, but I've certainly learned a great deal from my colleagues. I have huge respect for them.

Those are some of the things that I think are very, very important.

I want to talk about enumeration. I think I heard somebody earlier today talking about, you know, "This needs to go back to committee" or "We don't see the use in this." I'm sorry, but we heard people last night talking very passionately about the differences between rural and urban ridings and why it's so important to pay particular attention, to understand the differences. I think that's what this bill also does. It provides the time and the effort to ensure that we get to communities that are often not counted, in the most respectful and inclusive way possible, whether those are Métis settlements or in First Nations. So I think the bill very eloquently sets out how to communicate with those communities and how to get that work done.

I want to go on a little bit more about PACs, and the reason that I guess I'm focusing on that is because it was – very quickly we saw, at the very beginning, in 2015, when we brought in Bill 1 to address corporate and union donations, that the Wildrose Party was very proud to support that. I remember that. I think most people in the House remember that.

Suddenly they're not saying too much, which, to me, is really quite disturbing. They now have a leader that did promise Albertans, looked right at them and said: "I will disclose. Transparency. I will disclose." And then didn't. Now we're not hearing anything about it. We're not hearing the members stand up and talk about the need to make elections democratic and fair, and that's essential. It is essential. Your man spent $1.47 million, seven times more than competitors, to buy that election. Or to get elected. I'm sorry. I'll correct myself. That should be concerning to you because that's what we saw for decades in this province – decades, decades – and the minute that the new legislation came in to make it a more level playing field, to make it more transparent, to make it more democratic, suddenly you're so quiet. Why is that? Why is that? It's like you're auditioning for a new boss. I don't know. Could be.

Madam Speaker, I am happy to say proudly that I will not support this. I will not support a referral to committee because we did the committee work, and we heard loud and clear – and you all should have heard loud and clear in 2015 – that Albertans were tired, tired of the old way of doing business. Here we are. We have Mr. Kenney from Ottawa. We know his track record. We know his voting record. We know his promises. How many broken promises do we have? He's not even elected to this Chamber, to this House. We're hearing crickets about the dangers of PACs and the need to level the playing field, to make it fair, to make it accessible, to make it barrier free, so what are you afraid of? Back to the Member for Calgary-Greenway, who asked us repeatedly: what are you afraid of? What are you afraid of?

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), the hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It was a pleasure to hear the comments from my seatmate here. You know, she mentioned, right at the end, the importance of having barrier-free elections. I also do a lot of work with persons with disabilities in my riding, and I know that those particular amendments are something that would be much appreciated.

Now, of course, we've sat here and heard a lot of debate this morning on this bill. You know, I find it very interesting that the opposition talks continuously – and you talked about it in your speech as well – about PACs, political action committees. I find it interesting that they were talking about problems that we've already fixed. Instead of talking about those political action committees, we had several members that went on very enthusiastic interpretations of the truth of, perhaps, how unions function when it comes to the approvals that they need from their members in order to, at least before we solved the problem, donate to organizations and parties that they felt would be helpful for their members.

Now, they bring that up over and over again, and, I think, why that is – and I would like the member's thoughts on this – is because it changes the conversation to something that we have already solved. One of the first bills we brought in, as was mentioned by the hon. member, was to ban corporate and union donations, yet they talk about it in this House over and over and over again in order to change the conversation and not talk about the political action committees that the hon. member mentioned, that are actually associated with the members over there.

It's not just them. I mean, I don't mean to, you know, pick on one particular party. The party to the right of you in the House, the Alberta Party, has also mentioned that they have a political action committee as well. There was, in fact, a news article that said that that political action committee was going to help pay for that particular party's leadership race. Now with this bill we are trying to correct some of those problems.

I would be curious what the member thinks about the opposition and these political action committees, where the opposition keeps talking about something we've already solved. I was wondering if you had any thoughts about why that is and how our bill actually solves the problems that the opposition seems to have problems with.

The Deputy Speaker: St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you. Well, you know, I'm not entirely sure, but I would guess that they don't want to talk about PACs, so what they say is: bad unions, bad NDP, bad unions. I think that's been the shtick that they've been flinging for the last couple of years, so I don't see them stopping any time soon. But I do want to say that if I were sitting on the other side and I looked at this legislation and I truly wanted to include as many people as possible in an election, in a fair and democratic election, I would support this.

Here are some other reasons that I did not mention. In one of the sections it talks about accessible voting equipment, and it goes into quite a bit of detail about allowing people who require some adaptations to be able to do that. It allows them to vote privately. It allows them to do so independently. For those of you that have loved ones or friends or family that have disabilities or you are a supporter of people with disabilities, you'll know how important that is and how essential that is and how easy it is to prevent somebody from participating with something as simple as a curb cut or one stair. To have this legislation lay out the accessibility and barrier-free nature of voting in Alberta is fantastic to me.

Again, I don't entirely know why the opposition does the things that they do, but again I want to quote a reporter, a local reporter, Mr. Graham Thomson. I keep going back to this because I think it is so important and insightful. He said on December 4, "PACs ... are becoming [a somewhat] invasive species in Canada." They certainly are, and we see that all the time. We see the damage that it has done in other jurisdictions, and we see what's happening here. The moment that legislation was brought in to take care of the problem of levelling the playing field and banning corporate and union donations ...

The Deputy Speaker: Any other speakers to the amendment? The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you for letting me rise to speak to the referral amendment on Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta. I want to start by saying that in this House the opposition takes seriously its job to be able to take a look at legislation, to identify those parts that it can support, those parts that it has problems with, and then to make a decision on whether or not we believe this bill should move forward into the public realm.

There are parts of this bill that we do support, Madam Speaker. There are parts that we believe will strengthen voter engagement.

There are parts of this bill that we believe will strengthen and will protect our democracy. Modern election practices like mobile polling stations and voter assist terminals and electronic polling books, we believe, take us a step forward in being able to protect and strengthen our democracy. Automatic registration for 16- and 17-year-olds, to try and engage younger voters, is a positive step.

We believe that there are parts of this bill, Madam Speaker, that would be deserving of respect, but we do also note that there are portions of this bill that, we believe, rather than strengthening democracy, will actually weaken it. So parts of this bill, we believe, would benefit from a referral motion to committee.

A referral motion, Madam Speaker, as I'm sure you well know, is designed to try to help legislation, to try to make legislation stronger, to help the people of Alberta have a stronger legislative underpinning to the actions that they partake in every day. We believe that robust discussion in a democracy, alternative points of view, and the discussion of those points of view are very, very positive things. We believe that bringing in stakeholder input is a positive thing. So a referral to committee is a wise thing when you can identify areas in a bill that need work. We believe that there are some significant portions of this bill that rather than strengthening democracy actually have the opposite effect.

There are questions that this committee should ask and try to answer. For instance, does door-to-door enumeration actually make our democracy more effective and therefore make it stronger? Does eliminating the six-month residency requirement actually make our democracy stronger? Does striking out portions of the Senatorial Selection Act actually strengthen our system of democracy? Does putting spending limits on third-party advertisers strengthen or weaken our democracy? Will a six-month window strengthen democracy if the Chief Electoral Officer has to discontinue an election? These are questions that we would like to refer to committee, that we believe need to be discussed, need to have stakeholder input, need to have Albertans' input in order for us to determine if this bill is the best bill that it can be.

From our position as the opposition, Madam Speaker, we believe that this bill does need improvement. Are there parts that are worthy of support? Absolutely. But there are significant portions that we believe need further clarification and discussion by Albertans. The door-to-door enumeration, we've already heard from other hon. members, will cost somewhere around $11 million, and Elections Alberta and the Chief Electoral Officer are not convinced that it's actually an effective way of strengthening our democracy. Elections Alberta and the Chief Electoral Officer recommend that target enumerations be put forward, that a full mail-out accompany it, and that this would actually save Albertans money, that it would actually only cost about $5 million.

Mr. Gill: How much?

Mr. Smith: About $5 million. A savings of $6 million.

In the last election 60 per cent of the returning officers said that they had a hard time finding enumerators and that those enumerators believed that at times their safety was being compromised. That's why we send them out in pairs. If the government actually believes that this is going to strengthen our democracy yet the Chief Electoral Officer and Elections Alberta question that, then maybe it's time to bring in more people to be able to have a reasonable discussion and debate on this particular issue.

Madam Speaker, the hon. Member for Calgary-Currie just spoke in this Legislature and said that he wanted to bring in – and it's a goal that we would support – barrier-free elections. We can support that. However, we also understand that there are at least a couple of hurdles and a couple of barriers that would be seen as reasonable in a free and democratic society. We've placed some of these barriers in there for very, very good reasons, because they actually help to strengthen democracy. That Canadian citizens should be the ones that participate is actually a barrier, but it strengthens our democracy. That you should be 18 years old, the age of majority, and have the capacity and the maturity to be able to function and to make choices in a reasonable fashion is a barrier, but it's seen as a reasonable barrier in our free and democratic society.

Traditionally we have said that having a six-month residency requirement is a reasonable barrier and that it actually strengthens our system of democracy. Why? Well, I know that when I was in my social studies classes and we talked about a residency requirement, we talked about things like making sure that when people vote, as much as possible it's an informed vote, Madam Speaker. Living in the area, living in the province, living in the community and understanding the issues of the day, having a history with the issues of the day, understanding the people that are bringing forward the issues, the organizations that are bringing forward the debate is important. When you live it, when you are a part of it, that brings an informed participation. We know that a democracy is only strong if the people that are involved in it are informed.

So it's concerning to this opposition, and perhaps it's a really good idea – I would argue that it's a very good idea – to take this to committee and let Albertans have some say on whether or not it should be a six-month residency requirement. This is a significant change. This is a very significant change, and it's one, Madam Speaker, that I believe should be referred to Albertans, to give them an opportunity to voice any concerns that they may have about this particular requirement being removed from the Election Act.

Madam Speaker, I want to spend a couple of minutes here talking about the checks and balances that are necessary in order to have a strong democracy and how I believe that referring this to committee would allow us to have the discussion on whether or not we are getting rid of one of the important checks and balances in our democracy, in this country, and in this province.

I want to agree with the Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie. I want to agree with that hon. member when he says, "If you want to see a change, then start participating." Participation and active engaged citizenry is critical to a functioning, healthy strong democracy. And when I look at this legislation and I see what some might call housekeeping, that some people would say that taking out and eliminating portions of the Senatorial Selection Act from the Alberta Election Act is just a piece of housekeeping, Madam Speaker, it is anything but a piece of housekeeping. If we want engaged participating citizens, I don't know how you do that and how you strengthen democracy by removing our right to vote.

We have a Senate at the federal level for some very significant and important reasons. When we created this country in 1867, it was determined by the provinces of this great country that it was imperative that we have a Senate. It was important to have that Senate because it would provide not only a body of second sober thought, but it would provide protection for the less populous provinces of this nation. Madam Speaker, if we're going to take the right to vote away from Albertans, I would suggest that there should be a conversation about that, and referring this to committee allows Albertans to have that conversation. This should not be eliminated through a back door: let's just not explain anything to anybody and let a sunset clause happen. This is an important democratic right that is being taken away from me and every other one of the 4 and a half million Albertans that are in this province.

Madam Speaker, the reason that a Senate is so important in this federal institution, this federal government that we have, is that there is a thing in democracy called a tyranny of the majority, where the majority in a democracy – we understand that rules and that acts and that legislation should be determined by the will of the majority, but that majority, when it acts, must respect the rights of the minority. When we started this nation, this great nation of ours, we said that it would not be okay for provinces like Ontario and Quebec, that had a significant population base, to be able to pass whatever legislation they wanted without the support of the less populous provinces. So we included a Senate where the less populous provinces would have a considerable say even to the point of being able to deny legislation coming from the House of Commons if they believed that it was important to defend the rights of other parts of this country.

For this government, as a piece of housekeeping, to eliminate the senatorial elections rather than having the discussion, reviewing that piece of legislation, rather than allowing us to go to committee to have those conversations, in the height of my mind is one of the most antidemocratic things that I have heard of any government at any time in the history of this country. It is a very serious, serious thing that we are doing when we do this, Madam Speaker.

I had the privilege of running and working with the first elected Senator in this province, a man by the name of Mr. Stan Waters. I helped work on his campaign. I campaigned with him. I voted for him because he was an amazing individual who was worthy of becoming our first elected Senator in the history of this nation. We should never stand quietly by when our rights to be able to vote are being taken away from us. That, at least, should be able to refer this to committee and to allow Albertans the opportunity to speak on this.

Madam Speaker, it is a sad day when this Legislature will not support a referral amendment that will allow us to defend the democratic rights of our citizens. I believe that it's important to let Albertans have a voice, and I believe that referring this to committee will allow us to allow those Albertans to have that voice.

You know, in this piece of legislation there's a six-month window that is set aside should the Chief Electoral Officer have to in an emergency discontinue an election. Now, there are some reasonable reasons for why a Chief Electoral Officer may need to discontinue an election. That is not our concern, Madam Speaker. Our concern revolves around the six-month window. That's a significant portion of time that members of a constituency . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), the hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, for this opportunity. I'd like to ask the member a couple of questions, without making disparaging remarks about anybody's hairstyle or choice of hairstyle.

Mr. Coolahan: Friendly.

Mr. Hanson: Anyway, friendly. Friendly.

The members opposite talk about full disclosure and dark money. I'm just wondering if he could possibly comment on whether he thought that, in the idea of fair play, if we're going to talk about full disclosure, that possibly the Alberta Federation of Labour should disclose how much money it spent in the last two elections, federal elections or provincial elections, how much money it spent on advertising, how much money it spent on paying members to door-knock or campaign for the NDP. At the same time, do you think it's reasonable to ask all unions in the province or across Canada to inform their members, make it mandatory to inform their members, that a portion of their union dues are going to a PAC that supports a government or a party that they may not necessarily support? Just wondering if you would comment on how democratic you feel that is.

Mr. Smith: I thank the hon. member for his questions. You know, when I became a teacher, Madam Speaker, I was in the public school system and very proud to be in the public school system. I spent three years of my life in the public school system. I absolutely support the public school system, and I absolutely support all of the choices that we have in education.

But one of the realities when I became a member and a teacher within the public school system was that I had to become a member of my professional association, and I was proud to be a member of that professional association. It's called the Alberta Teachers' Association, and it does some excellent work, Madam Speaker. But I also understood that there were times when I was a little frustrated with my professional association because there were times when I believed that monies were being spent on issues that I know I didn't support and on things that I was not willing to see my money personally being spent on. Yet because I did not have a choice – I had to be a part of the professional association – I also then did not really have a choice into how that money was going to be spent.

I think that's the distinction that I would make in my own personal life. I understand and I support the concept that professional associations like the ATA will be run on a democratic basis, where I had the opportunity to go to the ARA, I had the opportunity to speak, and I had the opportunity to vote. But I did not have the choice as to whether I was going to join or not. I could not, in any capacity, if they began to spend money on issues and things that I truly, really did not support and really found personally, on my conscience, objectionable, I could not even refuse to be a part of that association, the ultimate choice that we should have.

There is that reality that there are times when life puts us into that grey area. I guess that from our perspective over on this side of the House the problem that we have with this piece of legislation and how it deals with PACs isn't so much that we are afraid of talking about PACs or that we don't even want to see some restrictions on PACs. What we are concerned about is that there doesn't seem to be a balance for how this piece of legislation will also address the problems of big money being spent by unions, when they pay for people to knock door to door, when they advertise for a particular political party. Those are equally egregious. We would expect that this government would be willing to send something to committee that would be able to address this and perhaps bring forward some amendments and some ideas for the government to be able to amend this legislation, to also deal with their dark money. That's the reality of where we're at, Madam Speaker.

You know, referring to committee is just . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the referral motion? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I have the pleasure to speak on this referral. I've been a big part of the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee that had been put forward. The opposition and the government celebrated the creation of this committee – celebrated this committee – saying that this was huge.

You know, I think that it's disingenuous for this government to start saying that sending legislation to committees is a direction that is offensive and they feel that they've got it right and nobody can really improve on the legislation that they're putting forward, and the fact, too, that they have more or less stated: we got it right. Well, this is the third time now that we are getting it right.

I would say that if the NDP were committed to actually showing that they wanted to see that this legislation is right, then what's going to end up happening is that we're going to see them wanting to move this back to a committee.

Now, I want to do a quick quote that was done here. Bear with me here. I apologize.

What we've got is a committee that, in my opinion, was functioning very well, the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee. The problem with that committee – and this was identified to the government – is that we ended up moving four pieces of legislation into the committee to review. Now we can't even seem to get one piece of legislation to the committee from this government, but they decided that the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee was going to review four pieces of legislation within one year.

Now, I have to say that I took on that daunting task because I believe that all four pieces were that important to Alberta. I more or less used my summer along with the members from the NDP and along with the other opposition members because we saw the need that these four pieces needed to go through and be done right.

However, when we had this researched, this was the first time four pieces of legislation had ever gone to a special committee. What happened was that we went to the government and said: we need a little bit more time to finish our job to make sure we get this right so that we can get the recommendations from the committee. We went to the committee, and the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee unanimously put forward a motion, and I will read from that motion that went before the House:

that the Assembly appoint a . . . special [ethics accountability] committee during the fall 2016 sitting for the purposes of reviewing the Election Finances and Contributions Disclosure Act, Election Act and the Conflicts of Interest Act, that these reviews be completed by March 31, 2017, and that this committee comprise membership similar to the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee and have complete access to and use of the submissions, research documents, and other information collected by the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee.

So what we did was we said: "Give us six months more. We can get this done. We're so close. We're so close. Just give us the opportunity, and we can get this done, even though this is unprecedented." We sacrificed our summer to get this done. We literally spent meeting after meeting to try to get this done. But you know what is offensive here? At the end the NDP's House leader said that the committee was being filibustered by the opposition and that in the end we couldn't get our work done because of that. That's the first time I heard of it. I didn't hear that being stated within the committee, that we were being disruptive in any way. I can tell you that when there were issues brought forward, obviously, we wanted to make sure our constituents were heard, but in the end the government stated that this was a failure and that we needed to stop, which is why we stopped seeing committees moving forward with legislation, I believe.

This referral motion is just saying: let the committee finish its good work that we had started because we had already talked about a lot of the stuff that we're addressing today. Specifically, we spent a lot of time on related parties, especially debate on their interactions. Now, in this committee we warned the government that PACs were going to become prevalent if they weren't addressed with the legislation. We warned the government that this was a reality. And you know what we hear today? The government is saying: we don't want to discuss this because we are suddenly huge PAC fans.

Now I'd like to quote a debate from our current House leader, who brought some good points forward during a December 8, 2016, debate on Bill 35. Now, what he's saying here is that he's bringing forward an amendment regarding related parties, specifically trying to address PACs. So the government saying that we suddenly aren't wanting to talk about this: that's absurd.

Madam Chair, we recently discovered that the NDP has at some point in the past created what I would refer to as a shadow party. It appears, in our mind, when we look at this shadow party that it's being built to get around the rules that are regulating political parties or certainly is set up in a way that could get around the rules of political parties or at least skirt the spirit of the laws that this current government is bringing forward.

They, they being the NDP, have created an unregulated and unaudited, secret version of their party which can do things that the NDP as a party is not allowed to do. Now, I call it a secret shadow party because I believe most of the members sitting on the government side don't know about it, or at least what it truly is. I [believe] Albertans have never been told about it, and I certainly suspect that the bulk of members of the NDP Party are not aware of the secret shadow party that they are automatic members of.

Now, what's important here is that we warned the NDP during the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee, which we're looking to refer this legislation to to make sure that we get it right, that this is exactly what was going to happen. Then what we saw was that as soon as the NDP had an opportunity, they created their own secret shadow party.

They talk about dark money. But what we've got here is that the opposition has warned repeatedly this government that this was going to happen, and – surprise, surprise – it is happening. This is definitely something that we want to talk about. The only ones that don't want to talk about this is the NDP government.

I'm just going to go on because there are some important parts here.

Now, this leads to some weird issues that I think we need to discuss in Committee of the Whole. Two days ago the MLA from Edmonton-Whitemud rightly recused himself . . .

[interjections]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake has the floor. The volume is starting to get quite loud from this side. If you have conversations, please take them outside.

Thank you. Go ahead.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I was raising my voice to get over, and I apologize.

. . . from the debate on Bill 35 [because] he . . . signed loan guarantees for the NDP. Now, that member participated in the committee associated with those loans, but specifically for us here on Bill 35, he did recuse himself from the process, rightfully so. I commend him for recognizing the potential conflict and working with the Ethics and Accountability Committee and declaring that a conflict and taking the appropriate steps. I think we all should recognize that, and we recognize [that] the Speaker properly at that point asked him to leave the Chamber while we were debating this bill, so he [would not be] in conflict. Again, I commend the member for doing the appropriate process.

So we actually have government members who recognize that the direction we were going actually gave them conflicts of interest and took themselves out of the Chamber. This was the start of our government moving towards this, again, shadow party, and it's shameful.

To go on:

But the fact is that every single member of the NDP, whether they know it or not, is a member of the shadow party. This shadow party exists to guarantee the debts of the NDP that are in its official registered bylaws. Now, this organization is doing exactly what the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud is doing, and he honourably recused himself from this debate, rightly so. But every single member of the NDP is automatically a member of this secret organization that I'm referring to.

Now, this is within Hansard.

I'm going to go on to a response that the current Minister of Labour provided to our current House leader. The minister said:

Thank you very much, Madam Chair. There is no shadow party. The way that the member opposite is describing something that Elections Alberta and the Chief Electoral Officer are completely aware of and have been working with the . . . NDP [government] on is dramatic but incorrect.

So we have a matter of debate here. We're saying that this is incorrect, but the minister is saying that, more or less, she disagrees that this is happening, that this shadow party isn't happening.

To go on, I would like to go further down in her comments.

We will be working with the Chief Electoral Officer to make sure that our party complies fully with the acts that we have brought forward to get big money out of politics and to make sure that there is transparency and accountability in all [the] things that we do.

I certainly would like to thank the member for his concern, but I do . . . stress that there is no issue here. Unless he can explain how this exclusion from the definition of third party does what he is talking about, I [do] not [support] this amendment because, again, I think it shows that the member does not fully understand or have the details on this issue.

What we've got is that we warned the government. We warned them that, in the end, we would have parties using shadow parties to do their advertising because it is a loophole that the government left in their legislation that we repeatedly told them about. They chose to ignore this. Now we're seeing some of those results. These individuals that they are saying are working within dark money are within the rules the NDP themselves have set, and I believe they purposely set this because, in the end, it gave their NDP union brothers and sisters the ability to funnel money inappropriately.

Now we're seeing that this is working both ways. They're getting upset with the corporations who work diligently within Alberta making sure their voices are heard through the regulations that the NDP set for third-party advertising, and they're calling them, more or less, criminals. That's what this dark money is insinuating. Either their union friends and these corporations who are working within the guidelines that the NDP set are criminals, or they're actually just utilizing what loopholes this government left that the opposition has completely and thoroughly tried to explain to them as being a problem but that they ignored.

Well, this is just another example of why we need a committee. This is another example why we need to refer this to another committee, to ensure that we get this right.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other speakers to the amendment? The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to the referral motion for Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta. This is a bill that brings forward some very important changes related to our electoral system. It's hard to argue against changes to advance voting like adding an extra day for people to make it out to their polling station or like enabling people to vote wherever they are. Let us face it. Voter turnout is not typically all that great. When you read comment sections of news media or on social media or you look at platforms such as Reddit, you can see that people are quite happy to engage in conversation and debate around politics, but somehow that doesn't necessarily translate into election polling numbers.

If you look at the Elections Alberta site and seek out information on the past few general elections, you will see what I'm talking about. A full 53 per cent of people voted in May 2015, just over half. The election of 2012 also saw the same percentage of voters cast a ballot, and in 2008 only 38 per cent of Albertans turned up to vote. I think it's a good idea to try to find more ways of making voting easy and accessible for Albertans in the hopes that more of them will have their voices heard when it comes to choosing the new government.

I can reflect on my own constituency, Madam Speaker. The regional municipality of Wood Buffalo has traditionally the lowest turnouts for municipal, provincial, and federal elections nationally. That's because we work for a living, and we don't have time to necessarily consider those things even though you hope that our citizens do recognize the need to vote. Of course, with our next election just over a year away, this is an important time to be speaking about these election items and issues. I'm sure there are a large number of Albertans who are counting down the days until there is a new election and they can choose a new direction for our province.

Today, though, we're debating whether or not this bill should be sent to committee. Now, so far I've only touched on one aspect of the bill, and there's a lot more information contained in those pages that I've yet to talk about. But when I first stood up to speak, I said that I was speaking to the referral. Let me be perfectly clear that I don't think we need to send this legislation to committee to talk about advance voting opportunities. Like I said, I think there are some good pieces about portions of this bill. [interjections] Man, I'm getting it from all sides here.

I do think that there are a few things in the section that could somewhat complicate the matter, and I won't dwell on those for now. The reason I think this bill should be sent to committee is because of some of the other matters this legislation introduces. I think we need to have a longer conversation about the residency requirements. I think it is important that we hear from stakeholders and the Alberta public about what they think about what is being proposed here. And, quite honestly, there's nothing being sent to committee. At the federal level every bill gets sent to committee, where it allows an open debate with the contributions of the opposition. As well, it's mandated that they do consulting and that they do a proper consult and that they do hear from all the interested parties.

Again, your bill on daylight savings time was the model for consultation, and it's a shame that you don't consider that for the rest of your bills. I'm just not convinced that that's the way to go for some of these proposals here.

You move into a province on a Wednesday, and on Thursday you head into the polls? At that time you likely don't have proof of address, which makes it extremely difficult for elections staff to ascertain whether or not someone is able to vote. That's one reason why I think that this should be referred to committee. I'd like to see us have the opportunity to have some further discussion on this. Let's be sure that we know how this will work before we move forward with this legislation so that we can have a seamless process after the fact.

Committee is so important to our legislative process. Nowhere else do we have the ability to call forward experts, subject matter experts, people who are directly influenced by the legislation that we propose. It's a privilege to be able to call on these experts and hear their information and insight and be able to ask them questions, and it's a privilege that, unfortunately, we don't take advantage of enough here in this Assembly. When there are still countries where democracy is fragile at best, it seems a shame that we don't use all the avenues available to us to practise democracy to its fullest.

I should clarify that I think this government thinks that sending a bill to committee is somehow a slight against the minister or the legislation, and that is not true. You heard me talk about some of the advantages of this bill a bit earlier, Madam Speaker, so I think it's clear that taking this step would be to ensure that we're giving the bill proper due process and consideration.

Another thing that I think needs to be discussed more fully is the introduction of another new independent office of the Legislature. These are not steps to be taken lightly and, in fact, would be accompanied by what could be a substantial cost. Perhaps not everyone is aware right now, but our budget is not exactly what you would call balanced, and the government is still investing in more red ink.

I think it bears repeating that previously this government denied the legacy caucuses of the United Conservative Party when they put forward suggestions about creating independent offices for seniors or for the disabled. Actually, that is true. I was one of those people that did propose that the seniors' office be independent and appointed, for that matter, because we went over a year without one.

Why were these requests denied, Madam Speaker? I'm glad you asked. They were denied due to the costs involved with setting up such offices. It's a double standard being employed here. I think that it's also worth noting that the independent office being proposed here already has an office out of which they could work whereas the offices previously put forward by our legacy caucuses were unique offices. But the thing is: why does a proposed office of an elections commissioner need to be an office unto itself? It seems perfectly reasonable for me to operate the roles they're suggesting within the current Elections Alberta office. I see no conflict of interest between the Chief Electoral Officer and the elections commissioner. If there is such, I would be happy to hear about it from the minister responsible for democratic renewal.

Again, this is where the committee is so useful. We can hear from Elections Alberta, and we can hear from other electoral process experts. We could see what Albertans and stakeholders think. Albertans are counting on us to get things right, and I think that part of the process here involves sending this to committee to be able to flesh things out, to listen to those subject matter experts, to have that discussion, to engage the public.

There's nothing to be lost by sending Bill 32 to committee but possibly everything to be gained. For the benefit of all Albertans and to demonstrate a true transparent and accountable system, I ask that we do send this to committee, and I hope all members of this House will agree with this.

I thank you for your time.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), the hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Strankman: Good morning, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to be recognized in the Chamber this morning. I'd like to compliment the member from the Fort McMurray region on his comments, and

I was wondering if he could expound on his comments there in regard to the idea of democratic renewal.

Mr. Yao: Madam Speaker, we should be quite proud of the democracy we have here. It is important that we need to encourage and emphasize for our citizens to be engaged more.

The flip side to this is that the number one country in the world where they are discouraging any oil investment – they're considered the lowest ideal place for investment in oil – is south of us, far south. It is a country where they currently and have for the last several years repeatedly jailed the opposition. Believe it or not, they'll put members of the opposition in jail. They will take the licences away from media groups like radio and television, from anyone who criticizes that government. There are persons who have been vocal against that government that have gone missing or have been discovered dead, and there is a lot of literature on this. Venezuela is a very tough country right now. The hope is that maybe they can get some democratic reforms in. Unfortunately, they are under the rule of a dictatorship, and it is very, very disconcerting to me that there would be members of this House that would support such a regime.

An Hon. Member: Really?

Mr. Yao: Absolutely. [interjections] You should check Hansard some time.

We need to recognize that we do have a beautiful country with amazing people and a system that has evolved and developed to the point where we do have the right to speak without fear of reprisal and that we have the right to influence who gets elected with our vote and that we have the ability to do other influences like freely go door to door without repercussions.

That said, in Fort McMurray I do have a hard time going door to door. It is a unique community because there are people that work long shifts, night shifts. You need to be careful about knocking on doors where they've been sleeping after working a night shift. But beyond little issues like that we're emboldened, we're empowered to communicate with our citizens. That is key, and that is important.

This bill, though, just requires some additional love, quite honestly, and that is why we do need to send this to committee. The committee is an opportunity for all groups to have their say in this. It has the ability for people to get more involved. This is a very large bill, and it was a very short time period that this government was asking for input. I've talked to some groups up in Fort McMurray, and they weren't even aware of – quite honestly, they're probably reflective of the general population – this bill. They weren't aware of many of these bills. But that said, no one reached out to them, and these are labour groups as well that have not been able to participate in this.

So to answer my good friend's question, democratic renewal: certainly, we need to demonstrate that we do have some transparency and accountability, that we need to move forward, and that we do need the input of all our citizens. I certainly hope that this government will consider that and support sending this bill to committee and support this referral motion on Bill 32.

Thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you. I'd like to thank the hon. member for his comments. He certainly said many things, and I believe I learned quite a bit. I was wondering, though: I don't recall him touching on the elimination portion of the Senatorial Selection Act, and I wonder if he had any comments about what he thought maybe Albertans might have to say, of course, as it pertains to the importance of sending this for referral to committee.

The Deputy Speaker: The time has expired for that particular portion.

Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, and good morning again, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and talk about democracy in the Chamber. It's interesting that for some members, many of us, that's why we are in this place, to make our opinions known, and it's interesting that other members have different experiences in regard to democracy and the presentation of it.

This government's Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, is important, and it's important to all Albertans, particularly my colleague from Airdrie. Moving this to committee, I believe, is a well-reasoned referral, and it's important that we be allowed to have the democratic process, Madam Speaker. That's part of the reason why we have the galleries, both the members' gallery and the government's gallery behind me, so that participants can come and at least watch the work that we do in this place. It's important.

Madam Speaker, I've been in this Chamber for some time, and it's interesting to note that the first presentation of this approximately 150-page document was presented in somewhat of a loose-leaf fashion, and the final, I would say more legal, presentation of it is presented in a proper bound fashion. This one, I guess I would say, is from the Queen's Printer. It's unfortunate that the government, even though they talk about environmental awareness and environmental consciousness in slang, you know – not many would appreciate the loss of this much paper and the desecration of wood products to create all this legislation. With some foresight and foreplanning, we have modern electronic ways of presenting this multifaceted omnibus style of bill.

To be presenting it late in the session with a great deal of urgency is somewhat of a go-to motive possibly, Madam Speaker, that the government has in their playbook and are doing their very level best to lever their actions with this 150-page document. Quite frankly, it could easily have been separated into two bills in the Legislature, one for election reform and one for election finance reform. I think that would be more definitive. But that could be sorted out in open committee discussion, and that's what our opposition members are trying to present to the Legislature here, that when it comes to open democracy, it's important. It's a significant part of democracy and democratic reform. Coming from a party that's named the New Democratic Party, I think it's somewhat ironic, but it's worth noting.

I would quote from my notes, Madam Speaker, that this legislation touches on many different areas, so I wonder exactly how much particular care and attention was given to ensuring that many if not all Albertans were consulted and that various stakeholders such as even Elections Alberta were fully engaged, including in the development of the bill. My colleague from Airdrie's motion for referral would ensure open and robust public discussion about that. We could bring all sorts of people to committee to present in many different fashions. And I have to think it's important to point out that there are portions of this bill that may actually enhance voter engagement, but unfortunately there are equally as many portions that, Madam Speaker, miss the mark.

It's great that the government has taken steps to prohibit government announcements during elections so as not to use taxpayer dollars to promote their obviously partisan interests. It's too bad that the exemptions for this portion of the bill are so numerous and extensive and leave too much wiggle room for the government to use their so-called discretion. The potential for abuse under the guise of keeping the public informed is still available. The list of exemptions needs to be shortened or restricted to ones dealing with public safety or any announcements that are required under law.

This government has already shown in the past that it can't resist making announcements while there is an active election going on, and with this long list of exceptions I have my doubts whether this will restrict them in any way. That's why hashing this out, Madam Speaker, in committee is so vital. It gives the opportunity to take that long list of exceptions and distill it down to those that will help make this more nonpartisan.

While on the topic, Madam Speaker, of fair elections I would really like to know where the idea for removing the six-month Alberta residency requirement came from, just as an example. We're here today to discuss this in an open public forum, a public place, so possibly the government members could talk about that. I'm fully in endorsement and receptive to new Albertans wanting to become politically engaged while in their new home. I've worked with many new Albertans coming from Europe in different fashions and who are so happy to be here in a freer and open and democratic environment. But I'm wondering if this isn't making too great of an allowance. Possibly another length like 30 or 60 days for the residency factor would be more reasonable. Some might say that the stipulations that we have in this proposed new legislation would allow some sort of a frivolous holiday excursion, and somebody would enter and think that they could vote.

That's why, Madam Speaker, an all-party committee is important, with proper engagement from interested stakeholders and public members, to give it absolute open and free time and proper due diligence. Surely the government wouldn't have an issue with that. Maybe the government will find out that it had it right this time and the committee will find that a complete removal of some portions is the thing to do. I would doubt that that would be the case, but why not allow a public and open discussion for that to take place?

You have noted how consultation always seems to miss the mark with this government. Either they did it incredibly poorly, as we found out and many members learned, I think, from political experience about the Bill 6 fiasco – Madam Speaker, I can remember that day standing up in this Chamber and asking why we as opposition and government members can't communicate, why the government members weren't communicating with the over 1,800 Albertans who were out on the steps of this Chamber. I think that there may be the possibility that there were leading questions and that you can't help but arrive at a predetermined outcome, or they simply didn't engage with affected professional bodies like a certain group of nonhuman-practising medical professionals that weren't included in some more recent bill preparation.

Another point that needs to be brought to light is around the expense of a mandatory full door-to-door enumeration in every riding in the province prior to the next election. After all, Elections Alberta has priced out this option to cost approximately $11 million. Given that the CEO has clearly stated that door-to-door enumeration is no longer an effective way to engage with the electorate, what we want to know is: why is this government not willing to take the advice of the CEO and allow for targeted enumeration combined with a full mail-out, which has been proven to yield more accurate results? That would cost, Madam Speaker, less than half, estimated at approximately $5 million. Judging from our ballooning debt, this seems a much more reasonable alternative. As the debt rises, we need to tighten our economic belts, and sometimes the government misses that mark as well.

It was found out that in the last election 60 per cent of returning officers had difficulty recruiting enumerators. Enumerators also expressed safety concerns and are now required to travel in pairs, leading to skyrocketing costs for door-to-door enumeration given the doubling up of their staff. We also see that increasingly Albertans are not willing to answer their doors to strangers. That was one complaint that I heard from folks when we discussed legislation around the merits of getting rid of door-to-door energy sales in the last election. The government was very adamant in coming forward with that legislation. Madam Speaker, this is the kind of insight we would get into deeper if only we engaged with Albertans through the use of a legislative committee.

Madam Speaker, I see members opposite looking at the clock, wondering why we're continuing to be involved in this democratic process. It's the reason that we're here. I know you're listening intently, Madam Speaker. It's an important part of what we're doing.

If I could continue speaking about fiscal belt-tightening, I wonder why when we asked that the government advocate for the creation of an independent office of the Legislature for seniors or the disabled, it was denied based on the expense, but now we see that the government is interested in establishing an independent officer of the Legislature for the investigation and prosecution of . . .

The Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, hon. member, but pursuant to Standing Order 4(2.1) the House stands adjourned until 1:30 this afternoon.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Wednesday, December 6, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon.

Statement by the Speaker

National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence against Women

The Speaker: On this day 28 years ago 14 Montreal students were killed for being women. I'm the proud father of four daughters, who I encouraged to grow up and to ignore artificial boundaries which others may place on them because of their gender. I now share the same message with my granddaughters. This event, more than a quarter century ago, was a hate-filled attempt to prove to myself and other proud fathers and mothers that we were wrong to encourage our daughters to be whatever they wanted to be, whomever they wanted to be, and to love whoever they wanted to love.

That man failed in his objective, and that is proven to me on a daily basis when I come into this Chamber of the Legislature each and every day. This man's failure is not only proven to me by the number of women in the Assembly but by the millions of Albertans who voted in 28 female MLAs and by those who voted for hundreds of other candidates who were not as successful. Our citizens do not look at gender but ability in casting their ballot.

Please be seated.

Introduction of Visitors

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly the ambassador for the State of Kuwait to Canada, His Excellency Abdulhamid Alfaiakawi. Kuwait and Alberta have much in common, especially the strength of our energy sectors and the common goal of increasing renewable energy production by 2030. We were happy to lead a delegation of Alberta companies to Kuwait last month, in November 2017, to explore opportunities in the region. In fact, there are many opportunities to collaborate and innovate in the energy sector, but there are also many opportunities in agriculture, agri-food, advanced manufacturing, education, and health services, to name a few. We look forward to continuing to explore these avenues with His Excellency, to expand relations between our province and Kuwait. I'd now invite all members of the Assembly to join me in giving the ambassador a warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Labour and minister responsible for democratic renewal.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is my absolute pleasure to be able to introduce some friends and students from l'école Greenview school in the wonderful constituency of Edmonton-Mill Woods. The students are accompanied by their teachers, Mrs. Cheri Krywko and Ms Amanda Kates. They also are joined by chaperones Mrs. Miranda Macauley, Mrs. Renae Dyck, Jill Cahoon, and Leonard De Guzman. I hope that they've enjoyed their time here at the Legislature. It is such a pleasure to be able to see them here. I will be by to read stories soon. Please rise to receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Health and Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of the minister of seniors it's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you a school group from the riding she represents, Edmonton-Riverview. There are 30 grade 6 students who are here from Crestwood junior high. We're confident that they'll enjoy their time here at the Legislature and have many good, probing questions to follow up with their teacher and others. They are here with their teacher, Trina Ludwig, and the adult chaperones Mr. Lane Monteith and Dianne Kirwin. We thank them very much for being here. I'd ask them to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two introductions this afternoon. First, I would like to introduce 11 members of the home-school field trip group who reside in Edmonton-Rutherford along with their chaperones, Mrs. Joanne MacDonald, Mrs. Karen Roth, and Mrs. Heather Reich. I would ask them all to stand and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

Now my second introduction. We have some friends in the gallery from the South West Edmonton Collaborative. It's a group of service providers who get together in my riding of Edmonton-Rutherford every month to discuss how they can provide services for our neighbours and families who call Edmonton-Rutherford, Edmonton-Whitemud, and Edmonton-South West home. My staff have the pleasure of attending these meetings as I am often unable to do so. I will read through their names and ask them to stand as I do so. We have Ev Simpson, Karen Lee, Wendy Melnyk, Rhea Bowman, Connie Marciniuk, Jennie McLester, Andrea Seeger, and Thomas Bonifacio. Would they please rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and introduce to you and through you a group of grade 6 students from the beautiful city of St. Albert, from the Wild Rose elementary school. I believe they are behind me. I'll get them to stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased to rise today in the House to introduce to you and through you my constituency assistants Sabeen Vasti and Mohammad Alam. They are very dedicated and very devoted CAs, such as I could possibly imagine having, so I would like to thank them for their efforts and for being with us today. Thank you so much. Please give them a round of applause.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you a constituent, dear friend, community volunteer, and mentor, Mr. Jack Redekop. I met Jack when he was volunteer president of a community-managed family leisure centre, and through a long process of trust and collaboration we were able to establish the Trico Centre for Family Wellness as a corporate, public, and community partnership with Trico Homes, who I was employed with at the time. Jack is a graduate of the U of A, a chartered accountant, a successful business owner, employer, entrepreneur through his company Computer Upgrading Specialists. As an aside, another pinnacle of Jack's life is having summited Mount Kilimanjaro with his two sons.

Mr. Cooper: Twice?

Mr. Gottfried: No. Just once.

Jack is an inspirational community volunteer, having coached hockey for many years, served as president of the Trico Centre, and has served in senior leadership roles on various provincial and federal constituency associations, including his current role on my newly formed Calgary-Fish Creek UCP association. Jack is also a giving and passionate member of his church and brings his commitment and spirituality to all he does for Alberta and in the community. Mr. Speaker, I would ask Jack to rise and remain standing to receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Energy.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise today and introduce to you and through you to this Assembly seven people who contribute greatly to agriculture and forestry research in the communities I'm proud to represent in Dunvegan-Central Peace-Notley. As I introduce their names, I'd ask them to rise. Audrey Gall and Vance Yaremko are from the Smoky Applied Research and Demonstration Association, better known up our way as SARDA, which is based in Falher. It was established in 1986 to bring research institutions, industry, and ag producers together to share information, and their vision is to one day own an advanced ag resource centre of excellence.

We also have Liisa Vihvelin from the Peace Country Beef & Forage Association, which is a hub of innovation and research that benefits beef, forage, and crop producers in the Peace region. Also, I would like to welcome Tom McMillan from the Agricultural Research and Extension Council of Alberta, Melissa Freeman from the West-Central Forage Association, Roger Harbord from the Lakeland Agricultural Research Association, and Sean LaBrie from the Foothills Forage and Grazing Association.

Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to say that these groups receive and work together under a fund from the Alberta opportunities fund. I wanted to recognize each of them for their contribution to both ag and forestry. My personal thanks to them. Please join me to welcome them here in the Assembly today.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To you and through you to all members of the Assembly, it's my pleasure to introduce and congratulate a long-time Edmontonian who was recently inducted into the Hershey Bears' hall of fame. Roger DeJordy was a prolific goal scorer for the Calder Cup winning AHL Bears, including 52 goals scored in the 1966-67 season, and Roger also played many years for the Edmonton Flyers and the Edmonton Monarchs seniors. He's accompanied today in the gallery by his wife, Mary Paraszczak, and I would ask my guests to now rise and all my friends in the Legislature to extend the customary welcome to this hall of famer.

1:40

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise today and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly a long-time friend of mine, Mr. Al Browne. Al has been a businessman in Alberta and British Columbia for over 45 years. He's past president of the Alberta hotel association, past board member of the Canadian Restaurant and Foodservices Association and of the SAIT Board of Governors, and a proud UCP volunteer. I would ask Al to stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, I'd also like to introduce to you today a pair of people, starting with Zoe Szeremet. Zoe is with us all the way from Australia to witness a legendary Alberta Legislature question period. Zoe is accompanied today by Tyler van Vliet, a long-time friend. Tyler has been door-knocking with me since he was 15 years old. He currently works in my office in Calgary. I would ask both of them to stand and receive the traditional warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a privilege to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly 19 students from Londonderry junior high school in my constituency of Edmonton-Manning. They are accompanied by Annette Zielinski, assistant principal at Londonderry junior high, and Peggy Wright, a teacher at John Barnett school. Last year I held a consultation with all the grade 6 classes across the constituency on how an idea can become a bill, and I'm honoured to have some of those students here today for the introduction of my private member's bill. I would like them to now rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two sets of introductions. I'm pleased to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly some amazing individuals from the Paralympic Sports Association. Joining us today are Amy MacKinnon and Gary Marcellus. The PSA offers supports and recreation programs for children, youth, adults, and seniors with physical and/or developmental disabilities and has been the launch pad for many national and Paralympic-level athletes. Also, I will add that they have offered to organize sledge hockey tryouts for the members if they so choose. I will ask my guests to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

You have another introduction.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly three distinct guests who have returned from volunteering at the Rohingya refugee camp in Bangladesh. As you are aware, there is extreme persecution of Rohingya Muslims in Myanmar, and while the conflict and crisis seem to be a world away, let's be clear that racism, discrimination, and prosecution, regardless of where in the world they're occurring, are unacceptable. Our guests are family physicians who travelled to help by volunteering at a medical camp and continue to do important work here in Canada to assist those who are so desperately in need.

Joining us today are Dr. Fozia Alvi, Dr. Sameena Bajwa, and Dr. Fizza Rafiq, with husbands Dr. Zahid Rafiq and Dr. Abdul Kamran. They are showing us the importance of standing together to put an end to persecution and racial violence, both here at home and abroad. In light of the heartbreaking racial vandalism in Calgary yesterday, their visit to our House seems even more timely. I'd ask my guests to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On a day when we remember 14 women whose lives were taken from them because they dared to enrol in an engineering program at l'école Polytechnique, it is my pleasure to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly two amazing women from the Women Building Futures organization, which calls Edmonton-Centre home. Women Building Futures prepares women for careers in skilled trade industries, where women have historically been underrepresented. These career paths are transformational for women, their families, their communities, and Alberta's workplaces. WBF has graduated over 2,000 women and has an employment rate of over 90 per cent.

Here today are Kathy Kimpton, CEO and president, and Jacqueline Andersen, director of stakeholder relations. I would ask them to rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Health and Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my privilege to introduce to you and through you Jana Tondou, who is a constituent of Edmonton-Glenora. She's seated in the members' gallery today, and I ask her to rise. Jana is an energetic, passionate, and community-minded volunteer. She is a hard-working limnologist, our water quality expert, with Alberta Environment and Parks and ensures that Albertans have safe drinking water. Jana was born in Wainwright and now resides in the community of Woodcroft. I'm very fortunate to know her, proud to work with her and for her, and proud of the work that she does to support our government. Please join me in extending the traditional warm welcome.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure today to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly my fabulous and hard-working constituency office staff, Kathryn Casement and Michael Mooney, who do everything they can every day to make sure the constituents of Calgary-East are connected to the government and also make sure that I look good, whether I'm in need of coffee or speaking notes or, you know, sometimes lipstick. If they could rise and please receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Northern Hills.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Legislature two guests who are founding members of the building safer communities block watch program in the northern hills of Calgary. Tavis Settles lives with his family in Covewood Green in Country Hills. He's a lifelong resident of Alberta and works with Secure Energy Services in their IT department. Shane McEwen lives in Coville Circle with his family. He grew up in Quill Lake, Saskatchewan, and is a project marketing manager for the life safety division of Honeywell. I'd like to thank them both for joining us here today. If they'd please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Mr. Kleinsteuber: If I may, Mr. Speaker, I have a second introduction here. I'd like to introduce to you and through you to all members Dylan Liley, who is originally from Davidson, Saskatchewan, and now lives in the Mill Creek Ravine area of Edmonton with his family. He proudly raises his children Marigold and Fredrik, who are in grade 1 and preschool and attend the Escuela Mill Creek immersion program. Dylan has had numerous businesses on Whyte Ave., including Vespa Edmonton, and now works in business development in oil and gas and in industrial capital and maintenance projects internationally. I'd ask Dylan and his daughter Marigold to rise, please, and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Legislature.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

Greenhouse Gas Large Emitter Regulations

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, today the minister of environment announced the replacement of the specified gas emitters regulation with something called the carbon competitiveness incentives regulation. Alberta has had a price on emissions for a decade now, and since the NDP imposed the 100-megatonne cap on those emissions, now the NDP are tightening the belt, squeezing this same industry for more money.

A confidential leaked government analysis of the NDP's own plans reveals the devastating cost of the NDP policy. The Alberta climate change office estimates the total cost to the energy industry at around $1.3 billion per year, starting in 2018. The Alberta climate change office estimates that six oil sands projects may be at risk under the proposed output-based allocation structure. An Alberta Energy analysis, on the other hand, identified up to 15 oil sands projects that may be at risk, which could result in reduction in production and investments in Alberta.

Alberta Energy anticipates that the potential impact from output-based allocation combined with the pending methane regulations could have a greater employment loss than the estimated impacts associated with the coal phase-out. Yesterday's announcement of $1.4 billion over seven years for innovation projects, of which only $440 million is innovation to increase production while lowering emissions, is nothing but trying to close the barn door after the horse has left.

The facts remain. The NDP is siphoning billions of dollars from our productive oil and gas sector and handing the money to their special-interest friends for risky schemes. NDP policies, Mr. Speaker, are killing the economy and jobs, and they'd better stop it.

Thank you.

1:50

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Greenhouse Gas Large Emitter Regulations

Mr. Nixon: A confidential government analysis of the NDP's own plans reveal the devastating costs of the latest NDP policy. The government's own analysis says that the output-based allocation requirements will have material impacts on the competitiveness of the oil and gas facilities in Alberta. It goes on to say that the total costs of the OBA requirements to the energy industry in Alberta will cost approximately $1.3 billion a year. The question, Mr. Speaker, is to the Premier. Why are the NDP once again knowingly attacking the oil and gas industry and the Albertans that they employ?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, the opposition is living in the past and wants to beat Alberta right into the ground. The material in this particular case that they are referring to over there is months old, and they know it. It's based on decisions that were never taken. Here in the present, however, we are investing $1.4 billion in innovation, and people like CAPP are saying: it is good to see innovation being recognized as part of the carbon plan; it's something that our industry is obviously very committed to. We are proud to work with Albertans. That other side just wants to keep yelling at them.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the internal analysis makes reference to the sale of oil sands assets by international companies, events that occurred just this last spring, but if the government wants to insist that this analysis is outdated, all they need to do is release their latest updated impact analysis. To the Premier: will you release your government's latest analysis of how many Albertans will lose their jobs over your heavy-handed, ideological decisions? Yes or no?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In fact, the minister of environment was in Calgary today releasing the actual decisions that this government has made. But, you know, when it comes to the members opposite, keep in mind that these are the same folks who have denied climate change again and again. In contrast to that, what our government is going to do is responsibly reduce emissions, and we are going to work with and support industry as we do it. For instance, the president and CEO of the Cement Association of Canada said that our work on carbon competitiveness included – and I quote – the most collaborative stakeholder consultation exercise I have ever seen.

Mr. Panda: Point of order.

The Speaker: Point of order.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, again, the Premier is calling people names when we're talking about something as serious as thousands of people losing their jobs.

This internal memo says that $1.5 billion will be lost. That's a significant amount. It says that thousands of jobs will be lost, another significant amount at a time when we've already seen 12,000 jobs lost last month alone, 1,000 jobs alone just as a result of the methane decisions that this government is making, more jobs lost than we've seen because of the coal phase-out that this government brought in. That is serious. The Premier wants to say that this is outdated. Will she at least stand up, then, and guarantee that nobody will lose a job as a result of her latest ideological decision?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to do that, you know, because, as I've said, the memo that the member refers to is completely out of date and is based on decisions that we never took. In fact, what we did instead was that we spent months meeting with and consulting with industry to find a way to work with them collaboratively. That's exactly what we did, and that is why yesterday we announced a $1.4 billion innovation fund to work with industry to help them reduce their emissions while repositioning ourselves as the progressive energy producer in the world. That's what we are building in this province, and I'm very proud of that.

The Speaker: Second main question.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are concerned about the sustained attack by the NDP government on their jobs, on their energy industry, and on things like that because of ideological agendas that are being put forward by this government. The Premier wants to say that the analysis has changed since the analysis that I am referring to, so I will ask her: what has changed that will now result in us not losing thousands of jobs?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, for instance, the document that the member referred to refers to a methane plan which we haven't actually introduced or acted on yet. In fact, that work is going on with industry right now. It refers to an OBA plan, which we also didn't introduce. Instead what we introduced is the one that we introduced today, which is significantly different. So there are a number of ways in which that document is completely false, completely inaccurate. I would suggest that the member opposite do a little bit more research before he comes into the House and asks these questions over and over and over again. We're working with the industry. We're proud . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the document that I referred to also says that six oil sands projects will be cancelled as a result of these decisions. Many, many more will see reduced investments as a result of the NDP's decision. The Premier wants to stand up and question the analysis that is from her own government and say that it's outdated. But the question I have asked already and will ask again, despite the Deputy Premier heckling while I speak, is: will you stand up and will you make sure to release the new analysis? Yes or no? If not, there probably, really, is not one.

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, as I said, the new analysis and the work that we have done was actually released today by our minister of environment in Calgary. I urge the member opposite to read the newspaper tomorrow, and hopefully he'll find the answers to the questions that he's asking. Of course, that announcement is part of our larger plan of working with industry to reduce our emissions and reposition our energy industry, again, as I said, as the most sustainable and responsible energy industry in the world, something that will actually grow jobs and ensure the sustainability of the industry for years and years.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the Premier is dodging this issue again. Yes, the minister announced something this morning. That is what I am referring to. Because she says that the analysis that we have from her government is now out of date, what I asked the Premier was: is there a new economic analysis associated with the minister's announcement this morning? Yes or no? If there is, will the Premier release it?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The member opposite is referring to a memo that is not an economic analysis. The member opposite is referring to a memo that talks about a couple of policies that may or may not have been introduced, which weren't, and that includes a bunch of general statements that are not an economic analysis. What is true is what we announced today as a result of working with industry. Part of what we've done is that we've announced a $1.4 billion innovation fund, which we know will create jobs, will create diversification, will reduce emissions, and will help Alberta's economy.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.
Third main question.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we lost 12,000 jobs last month alone under this Premier's watch. We have an economic analysis, a document from her own government that says that we'll lose thousands more as a result of her decisions. I asked a simple question to the Premier. She says that this analysis is now out of date. Fair enough. If it is, have they done a new one? If they have, will they release it? If they haven't, that's even more alarming, that they would move forward with these policies without doing a true economic analysis of the impacts of their ideological decisions.

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, one person's ideology is another person's acceptance of science. Now, I understand that for the members opposite, their ideology struggles with the notion of climate change. Their ideology struggles with the notion of dealing with the environment, respecting the environment, supporting people who are concerned about the environment. Their ideology struggles, frankly, with planning for the future at all. Thankfully, they are not in charge; we are. We've been working with industry. We are so proud of the relationship and the partnership that we've been able to establish, and we know that together we are going to move Alberta forward.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are getting really tired of the Premier doing this. When she can't answer a question, she stands up and calls this side of the House names. She calls me names. That's what she does. She yells; she screams; she fearmongers. I asked a simple question: do you have another economic analysis of the decisions that you have made and announced today? Yes or no? If you do, will you release it, and if you don't, can you explain why you have not done one? [interjection]

The Speaker: Caution.
The hon. Premier.

2:00

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I've said before, the minister released the OBA decisions today. Those are the product of significant conversations with significant players in industry, conversations about where we would be able to move forward in terms of investing in emissions reduction, in diversification, and in jobs, ultimately. We are going to go forward with that. We know that in the long haul the climate leadership plan was critical to getting the approval of the Trans Mountain pipeline, and of course we know that that is a critical element in . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the NDP have lost all credibility on this file. They have two cancelled pipelines, another pipeline that is being blocked and is looking more and more unlikely to be built, unfortunately, because the NDP won't take clear action. The question is so simple that we have repeatedly asked this Premier. She will not answer. She is obviously dodging it because she clearly does not have an economic analysis. The most recent one that we have in our possession clearly shows that thousands of jobs will be lost. Billions of dollars of investment will be gone. Albertans will be punished as a result of this Premier and this NDP's ideological decision. Do you have an economic impact analysis? Do you have any analysis that you could provide, or if not, why not?

Ms Notley: Well you know, Mr. Speaker, again I would suggest that if the member opposite is looking for the updated version of the document that they refer to, I suggest that they go to the front page of the Edmonton Journal. It's there for them. I know it's a bit of a challenge in terms of their research budget. Nonetheless, by all means, go ahead. Read the paper. I'm hopeful that that will answer their many questions. We're very proud to work with industry, and we are proud to continue to move Alberta forward.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

PDD Service Delivery

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Supports for persons with disabilities are needed now more than ever. Recently I learned that the turnover rate of PDD staff is 40 per cent every six months, meaning many families have a new caseworker at least twice a year, and caseworkers are already stretched with 200-plus cases. This is not sustainable. To the Minister of Community and Social Services: after two and a half years of your mandate why is the caseload still so high for PDD caseworkers?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Community and Social Services.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. Our government is protecting and improving the supports Albertans with disabilities depend on. That is why despite the tough economic time we have added funds so that people can get the support they need in a timely fashion.

Ms McPherson: Mr. Speaker, the Alberta Party has learned that new intakes into PDD are funded at 2013 rates, and people who rely on PDD services are in dire need of predictable service. Further, advocates report that when asked, the government has been unclear regarding how many dollars are allocated for certain services and how much can be spent to provide them. To the Premier: when can the government guarantee that PDD funding will directly reach people who need it most?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The PDD program has two different streams: the family-managed stream and through agencies. Eighty five per cent of the funding reaches Albertans directly through service providers, and 15 per cent is family managed, where the family gets the funding, and they get to hire the staff and services. That's how this funding gets to Albertans.

Ms McPherson: Recently I learned that PDD staff are required to submit personal outcome index reports on a quarterly basis but do not receive feedback in return. I also learned that there is not a clear line of communication between Alberta Health Services and PDD despite the fact that a liaison between the two was announced. To the Premier. These are only two examples of communication breakdowns that negatively impact PDD clients. How will you fix this?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm proud of our record when it comes to working with PDD. We have worked with the community on all issues that matter to them, and we are taking a crossministry approach. We are working with our partners within government and within the community to make sure that the community gets what they need, and we are involving them in all decision-making.

With respect to communication the Premier's council on persons with disabilities is one example, that it got 15 members for the first time in a long time under our watch. We are also moving forward with hiring a new disability advocate, which will make sure that their voices are reflected . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Education Concerns

Loyola: Mr. Speaker, parents in the constituency of Edmonton-Ellerslie have contacted me directly to specifically request why the government has struck the word "specialized" from the School Act in section 16.2. To the Minister of Education: can you please explain the rationale for this change and what the end objective of this change means for parents in the province of Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. The term "specialized" was only appearing in one section in the School Act, 16.2, and this change will make the legislation clearer. Removing the term does not in any way reduce or alter the supports that students receive. Of course, all students in our fine schools have a welcoming, caring, and safe place to learn, and our investment in education and our progressive policies aim to keep it that way.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Loyola: Thank you. Again to the minister: to ensure that parents in school communities have clarity on this important issue, what is the expectation of parents regarding their role in their children's education as defined in the School Act?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the critical role that parents play in our children's education has been reinforced throughout the School Act and in all of our policies that we move forward on. Our government understands that helping through homework and parent-teacher interviews and any other countless ways that parents help to have their children have a fine education – we reinforce that both in policy and in investment and in action.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that parents play a critical role in the education of their children and that it's important that their role be understood, respected, and valued, again to the minister: how are school staff expected to involve parents in decisions about the kinds of supports and services provided to help their children succeed?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I mean, that's a very good question. The school boards are obligated, in fact, to respect the rights of parents when it comes to decisions around education and for programming and so forth. That includes the ability for parents to choose school programming that they think best ensures their child's success and to advocate for that programming or special means that their child might need in order to get the best education possible in our schools.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Veterinary Education

Dr. Starke: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In October it was announced that the University of Calgary's school of veterinary medicine would increase enrolment from 130 to 200 students. Now, that move is widely supported, but what's not so popular was the very quiet announcement that Alberta was pulling out of a 54-year-old agreement with the other western provinces to fund the Western College of Veterinary Medicine in Saskatoon, a move that has disappointed both that college and our provincial partners in the agreement. To the minister: at a time when our province is trying to work with our western neighbours, why are you deliberately snubbing them by tearing up a deal that has served Albertans so well for over a half century?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, it's important for us to invest in postsecondary education, which our government has done. The focus of the veterinarian money for the University of Calgary, I think, is a good one because we're of course investing in the University of Calgary, so students are being able to go from the province of Alberta and focus on a school. We're supporting that postsecondary institution and thus helping to grow this form of postsecondary education here in the province of Alberta.

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that the Saskatoon and Calgary veterinary colleges use very different approaches for teaching clinical skills to their students and given that some students thrive in a more closely supervised teaching hospital environment while others thrive in an externship in a practice in the field and given that having a choice in learning style has been a huge advantage for Alberta students training for their veterinary careers, to the minister: why are you eliminating choice in veterinary education for Alberta's veterinary students?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, I think that investing in an Alberta school and investing in the capacity of an Alberta school to actually perform and to deliver veterinary services is not such a bad idea. As they grow along the way, they can certainly continue those long-standing partnerships that we've had with the University of Saskatchewan, thus building a relationship that will strengthen veterinary services right across this province.

2:10

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, that's weak.

Each year over 400 Alberta students apply for the 50 available spaces at the Saskatoon and Calgary veterinary schools, and given that the shift to the University of Calgary adds exactly zero new spaces for Alberta students wishing to pursue veterinary education and since the forecasted need for additional veterinarians in Alberta in the next 10 years exceeds that number by nearly 500, to the minister: given the high demand for veterinary education from Alberta students and the need for hundreds more veterinarians, why not keep the 20 spaces at Saskatoon and add 20 to the University of Calgary?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hardly think that investing in an Alberta university to build support and build veterinary services – it's not weak. It's quite the opposite. It's foresight. It's a strong decision. It's looking ahead to build that capacity right here in the province of Alberta. We can work with the University of Saskatchewan as well, but what better place to invest Alberta money than in an Alberta university?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Carbon Policy Economic Impact Analysis

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are used to seeing the NDP rob Peter to pay Paul, but yesterday they put a new spin on it: Peter goes bankrupt. Out marched three smiley ministers to tell the energy industry not to fret because the NDP is going to return, well, a sliver toward innovation from the billions they're taking. This Minister of Environment claims that output-based allocations are to lower emissions by forcing innovation, but how on earth does giving back a fraction of what you're costing the industry keep our job creators thriving, and what are you doing with the rest of that money?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'll thank the member for the question. I mean, I'm going to try to introduce the members opposite to the fact that the world is changing. The world is moving toward more ethical, sustainable ways of extracting and producing our resources. That is something that our government is supporting through innovation. I think it's a little offensive that the member opposite refers to $1.4 billion being invested in innovation across our energy sector but also food processing and agricultural space – I can tell the members opposite that industry is very, very pleased with this announcement.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. MacIntyre: I think it's shameful that this minister would call our industry historically unethical, Mr. Speaker.

It is clear that this government's own bureaucrats know that the NDP's denial of facts is sending our province into an irreconcilable tailspin. Given that the minister of environment said that she had not seen the leaked report yet still somehow knew the data was, quote, quite outdated and contains inaccurate information, how can Albertans trust this government's quick dismissal of this report when the minister decided to cast it as inaccurate before she even saw it?

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, once again the members are citing a document that is old and outdated and that put forward a number of different options that our government did not choose to pursue. What we did pursue: the environment minister announced today in Calgary that we are not only going to reduce our emissions, but we also have a best-in-class approach. What we are doing is incenting a race to the top to ensure that we can get our high-quality products to the international markets.

Mr. MacIntyre: The hon. Leader of the Opposition asked the Premier sincere questions about Albertans' futures that are on the line. These are not just numbers. These OBAs are more than just numbers. They are jobs. They are livelihoods. They are the well-being of Alberta's families. Given the Premier's comment moments ago to watch for the front page of a newspaper, are we to understand that this Premier refuses to answer direct questions in this Chamber and instead communicates to this Legislature via news releases?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are investing in a low-carbon economy of tomorrow while Jason Kenney and the UCP are picking fights and putting up walls. Our industry gets it. In fact, this week Suncor took its first step to set up two cogen units at its oil sands base plant. Steve Williams, the Suncor president and CEO, said, "We believe that bold, ambitious action is required by all of us to effectively tackle the climate change challenge," something where we're still trying to convince the members of the opposition that it exists.

Greenhouse Gas Large Emitter Regulations (continued)

Mr. Panda: So much for news releases, Mr. Speaker. Today's announcement of the carbon competitiveness incentives sees another blow to Alberta industry. A hundred and ten companies across 13 industrial sectors will pay for their output-based allocations based on industry-specific benchmarks, costing $1.3 billion per year and every year. To the Minister of Energy: whose benchmark are you using for the oil sands industry? It better not be the Carnegie oil-climate index. Is it?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The new carbon competitiveness incentives will support large industrial emitters to be more competitive while reducing emissions and encouraging investment in renewables. Rather than paying lip service to reducing emissions, something members over there, former members, when they were in government did, our approach rewards a best in class for large emitters. This is going to encourage a race to the top. The members opposite have no clue what that is. They would rather see a race to the bottom, stick their heads in the ground, pretend that climate change isn't real, and beat our Alberta oil and gas . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, given that the leaked memo says that the Alberta climate change office puts six oil sands projects at risk and given that Alberta Energy believes that 15 oil sands projects are at risk of negative gross profit margins from these output-based allocations and since the Energy and Environment departments are at odds and cannot agree, to the Premier: how many oil sands projects are at risk, six or 15? Who is telling the truth?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll remind the member and the House and Albertans that, once again, the information the opposition is using is completely dated and does not reflect the substantial work that our government has done with industry. Now, I appreciate that the opposition loves to jump up and down and scream and run down Alberta businesses, run down Alberta industry. What I can tell you is that our government for over two years has been working collaboratively with industry to come up with a plan that ensures that they are not only going to remain viable but that we are going to increase their competitiveness to be able to compete on the global scale. We have the support of industry. I wish the opposition . . .

The Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Panda: Given, Mr. Speaker, that the NDP plan to spend $1.4 billion on innovation over seven years to cut emissions and given the analysis on the output-based allocation shows that royalty revenue is projected to drop by at least $140 million by 2021, to the Premier: how do you expect to balance the budget when the NDP succeeds to shut down the oil sands, lay off workers, and lose royalties?

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, the premise of that message or question couldn't be further from the truth. I'll remind the members of all of the investments that have been occurring within our oil and gas sector, including JACOS, the Japan oil and gas company, that invested $2 billion to expand their facilities. We see Suncor is investing. We see other companies expanding their assets and looking at making investments. Thank goodness the opposition isn't government because they truly would kill our oil and gas sector.

Mrs. Pitt: Point of order.

Mr. Bilous: We are working collaboratively with them. We are coming up with programs that are going to incent innovation.

Speaker's Ruling Parliamentary Language

The Speaker: I'll just make this observation to both sides of the House. You've heard me speak to this before. Nonetheless, I just want to remind you that words that are of violence are not well received by me. However, please note that I drew that to your attention on a couple of occasions but have chosen to pass thus far.

2:20 Trans Mountain Pipeline Construction Carbon Policy Economic Impact Analysis

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, on November 30 last year in this House I asked the Minister of Energy about the Trans Mountain pipeline, and she stated, "I understood that shovels will be in the ground within the year." Well, a year later and only 66 of 1,200 permits have been issued, never mind any shovels in the ground. So let's try this again. To the Minister of Energy: today, so Albertans will know, within which year do you understand that real shovels will be in the ground for Trans Mountain?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McCuaig-Boyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, our government is not backing down on our fight for Alberta jobs and the Alberta energy sector. We're closer than ever to breaking landlock, and we're working with the energy companies, in particular Kinder Morgan, on the permitting issues. We're working hand in hand, and that pipeline will be built.

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, I might have to go to my Chinese zodiac to figure out which year.

Given that Trans Mountain shovels will create good, mortgage-paying jobs in Alberta and B.C. and given that a leaked internal memo indicates that a combination of output-based allocations and methane requirements will lead to significant job losses – we will need those Trans Mountain shovel jobs just to combat NDP driven job loss – to the Minister of Energy. The minister of the environment called this information inaccurate and outdated. Surely, you have completed a thorough economic analysis. When can Albertans see this economic analysis, or are you flying blind with no regard for the impact your policies are having on Alberta job retention and creation?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I can tell you, again, that today in Calgary the Minister of Environment and Parks announced our new output-based allocations. The documents the opposition continues to refer to are outdated. It's information that our government did not act on. What they can see if they want to go online is what our government is doing when it comes to output-based allocations. I can tell you that yesterday we made an announcement about investing $1.4 billion in innovation that is going to enhance and improve the processes and practices. We are collaboratively working with . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One job. Outdated and inaccurate.

Given that the NDP has never released an economic impact assessment of the carbon tax despite holding that information internally and given that the NDP will not release an economic impact assessment for the upcoming changes to the output-based allocations and methane requirements, which the leaked internal memo indicates will cost more jobs than the coal phase-out, again to the minister: why does your open and transparent government continue to wilfully withhold important economic impact information from Albertans?

Ms Hoffman: Jason Kenney and the members opposite are more interested in putting their own political interests before the economic interests of our companies and the employment of Albertans, Mr. Speaker, and that is shameful. On this side of the House we take thoughtful information received by the public service and use it to inform good public policy. We're working with employers, and we're investing in an industry and in jobs to support all Albertans. It's about time you guys stopped playing politics and started standing up for Alberta jobs.

Caribou Range Plans

Mr. Loewen: The government's response to the caribou situation in Alberta has been fraught with a lack of transparency, consultation, and, frankly, a lack of common-sense solutions. Many citizens, industries, and local governments across Alberta are nervously waiting as protection plans are being developed. Albertans were promised that the plans would be shared by the fall, but the leaves have fallen, the snow has arrived, yet we still have not seen any caribou range plans. I'm concerned that these delays will limit the time the government has to consult with impacted communities. Time is running out. Will the minister of environment commit to properly engage with industries and the residents around them before the plans are finalized?

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. What I can tell the member and the House is that the Minister of Environment and Parks and the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry have been working very collaboratively to ensure that we're doing two things. One, we know that we need to protect our caribou. We know that if we don't come up with a robust plan, the federal government can impose one on Alberta. But what I can tell you is that we have also been working very closely with the forestry sector and will ensure that we are protecting forestry jobs. What we are doing is finding a balance to ensure that we're protecting caribou and also protecting the jobs of hard-working men and women in the forestry sector.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Loewen: Given that the collaboration the minister talks about is nonexistent according to the people involved and given that the caribou range planning process could profoundly reshape our communities which have natural resource dependent economies, what is the NDP doing to ensure that the 13.4 million hectares of Alberta's working forest that are claimed to be caribou ranges remain available for proper development by our forest and energy sectors, which the communities and families of the region rely on to provide employment and economic development in the area? Will these opportunities be hampered in any way?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you very much, and thank you to the member for the question. I will tell him that we have been working closely with First Nations communities, with municipalities, with the forestry sector. I come from forestry, Mr. Speaker, and my family, so I understand what good forestry jobs are like. I had the opportunity to go up to High Level this summer. I know that previous to that the minister of environment was up there to explain about the plan. This is a good plan that we're trying to put forward and work collaboratively on with people in this province so that the feds don't impose their plan on us, which would harm our sectors of forestry and energy and the municipalities and the First Nations. We're sticking up for Albertans.

Mr. Loewen: Given that the people affected would like to see these plans before they're finalized with the federal government and given that this government seems to be missing deadlines with the federal government and given that there is still an enormous amount of consultation to be done and given that section 11 within the Species at Risk Act allows for a conservation agreement and discussion to continue, to the minister. At the federal level I've heard that you and this government are refusing to invoke section 11 to continue discussion on caribou range plans with the federal government to avoid a protection order and plan to go straight to final approval. Is this true, minister?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. S. Anderson: Thank you, and thank you very much to the member for the question. As I said, we've been working closely with groups that are affected and with the federal government. I'll tell you this. We're working with industry and environmental groups, and the previous government had 20 years to fix the problem and did nothing. We're taking action to develop a balanced strategy, to balance caribou and jobs. They'd rather we sit on our hands, which would lead to more job losses.

An Hon. Member: Be honest, minister. Be honest.

Mr. S. Anderson: We're working to provide economic certainty for industry and people in these communities. They would leave industry and workers in limbo. That's not how we do work on this side of the House. We have Albertans' backs, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Hon. members, the use of phrases such as "be honest" do not help the tenor of this place. I want to remind you in a friendly way again to avoid those kinds of comments. They do not show the respect that is warranted.

The Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans continue to face long wait-lists for PDD services, especially for FMS, or family-managed services. With a centralized and overwhelmed intake department and slow assessment process, many people end up stuck on a wait-list, which compounds health crises for people with developmental disabilities and burdens families and caregivers. To the Minister of Community and Social Services: what have you done to shrink wait-lists and red tape for people who depend on FMS?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I guess it's a spend day on that side today.

What we have done, Mr. Speaker, is that we have increased funding to PDD programs, which include programs for families with children with disabilities so that they can get the supports they need in a timely fashion. We have also appointed a new council, a parent advisory council, to advise us on issues that matter to families.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Clark: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the wait-list for PDD and FMS is growing and given that no system is in place to co-ordinate services between AHS and PDD, again to the Minister of Community and Social Services. Albertans are caught in a bureaucratic nightmare, and in the two and a half years you've been in power you've done nothing to fix it. When will we see a one-stop shop for PDD services, no matter which government department is responsible?

2:30

Mr. Sabir: Mr. Speaker, there is a one-stop shop, and Community and Social Services is responsible for administering this program. In two and a half years our track record is clear. We have worked with the PDD community to repeal safety standards, which were imposed by the previous government. We've worked with them to repeal the supports intensity scale. We worked with them for a new contracting template. And we are continuously in touch with all of our service providers, stakeholders, advocates to make sure that this program remains relevant to the needs of the community.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that government policies have increased costs across all sectors and given that the PDD sector is hurt most by these cost increases and given that this has led to a significant reduction in service hours, again to the Minister of Community and Social Services: will you commit here and now to restoring lost service hours, and can Albertans expect proper funding in the future to ensure that service hours aren't cut again?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Sabir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you, Member, for the question. PDD is not a defined benefit. How this program works is that the department works with service providers and families and comes up with a plan, which is customized to each individual, and whatever is determined in that outcome plan: that's what the department provides funding for. So we haven't got any services; we have increased funding. On that side we hear that they will cut 20 per cent, which will eliminate services for . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Highway 3 Twinning

Mr. Stier: Mr. Speaker, in southern Alberta the most important key transportation project that is now in the advanced planning stage is the twinning of highway 3, which stretches from Medicine Hat to the B.C. border. For several years now an association of key municipalities known as the highway 3 twinning association has been working with community stakeholders and Alberta Transportation officials, who just recently held several open houses on project refinements. However, what is not known now is the timing for the next steps to this process. To the Minister of Transportation: what is the next project phase, and how soon will it begin?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, we recognize very much the importance of highway 3 to the economy of southern Alberta. The hon. member knows that some time ago I met with almost every mayor from every rural and urban municipality, and we did provide funding for them in order to do some studies with respect to that. We are fixing crumbling and inadequate infrastructure. We're investing over $3 billion overall, and we're going to continue to make sure that highway 3 is as safe as possible and does its job of supporting the economy.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Stier: Well, Mr. Speaker, that's all well and fine, but the highway 3 transportation corridor project is an extremely important project that must continue moving forward as soon as possible. Given that last May the report conducted by an economics professor from the University of Lethbridge and partially funded by the province showed very positive economic returns for this project and given that these recent open houses are now completed, to the minister: when will the next expected phase, known as the functional planning studies, be completed?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to assure the hon. member that our department is working on planning forward for that particular road, and he's quite correct that that would be the next stage. I can just tell the hon. member that in due course we will be moving ahead with those studies because we recognize the importance of highway 3 to southern Alberta.

Mr. Stier: Mr. Speaker, the sooner the highway 3 project moves forward, the sooner Albertans will reap the economic benefits. Given that several landowners and developers have contacted my office regarding land acquisition issues and early negotiation difficulties with the department and given that no clear public information has been released regarding this aspect of the project, to the minister: has the land acquisition phase actually begun? If not, when will negotiations with affected landowners, including the Piikani Nation, begin?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to assure the hon. member and all members of the House that as we progress with the planning for this road, we will also be seeking to acquire land in a timely fashion in order to accomplish the construction schedule that we have set out.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Coal-fired Electric Power Plant Retirement

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Earlier this week we talked about how coal used to be an effective, cost-efficient alternative to natural gas in remote areas. We talked about the fictitious coal social licence the accelerated coal phase-out is supposed to be buying. I'll tell you what isn't fictitious: the devastation that this ideological policy is doing to communities like Hanna, Forestburg, and Grande Cache. Minister, do you propose to replace these mortgage-paying jobs that the coal industry provided in all these communities with stopgap programs?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to take a little trip down memory lane when Stephen Harper was the Prime Minister of Canada, back in 2012. Jason Kenney was one of his cabinet ministers when they put forward regulations that would see the end of coal-fired electricity after 50 years of a plant operation, including not allowing them to convert to natural gas. That government put a nail in the coffin of coal in Alberta. They turned their backs on the workers, they turned their backs on the communities, and they had no plan to help them transition. I look forward to telling you all about it.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this government's accelerated coal phase-out far exceeded the federal mandate and given that these communities' property values are now half of what they used to be, Minister, when are you and your caucus going to face the residents of these towns, look them in the eye, and tell them that your accelerated phasing-out plan is worth them losing everything they've worked for?

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, what we did do was that we immediately worked with the current federal government to change those regulations to ensure that coal-fired plants can convert to natural gas. That's something that the Minister of Environment and Parks spearheaded. What I can tell you is that over the summer I visited most of the coal-affected communities and had very productive conversations with mayors, including Chris Warwick, the mayor of Hanna, who, when we announced our supports for workers and our supports for communities, said that this is going to go a long way to help the community and their constituents to transition. Again, I'll remind the members opposite that it was not only the Alberta government's regulations . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Strankman: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member opposite. Given that this government has no long game to help these communities and given that places like Hanna and Grande Cache are on the brink of becoming ghost towns under this government, to the minister: what industry, manufacturing, or processing business has your government approached about locating to one of these areas so that generations of Albertans do not become historical footnotes?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish the member opposite would talk to the municipal leadership in the communities that he represents. They would tell him that we introduced the coal community transition fund, which is a fund that is designated to support affected coal communities to look at opportunities to diversify their local and regional economies. We not only have the backs of workers in the coal-affected communities; we are working collaboratively with the municipalities. The members opposite would turn their backs, turn out the lights on these communities, and do nothing to support them. I can tell you this much. When is Jason Kenney going to apologize to the workers and communities?

Rural Emergency Medical Services

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, we have asked numerous questions over the years about the situation with rural ambulance service. Recently a number of my constituents have let me know that an ambulance responded to a call at a residence in Alcomdale where a woman was having what appeared to be a heart attack. Upon arriving at the scene, the EMT asked if there was an automated external defibrillator in the hamlet because the ambulance did not have one on board. CPR was performed until a second ambulance with an AED showed up. To the Minister of Health: are AEDs considered standard equipment on all ambulances, or is this the NDP's idea of kind, compassionate cuts?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health and Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, any time an Albertan calls 911, they want to know that EMS is on their way and that they'll have the tools that they need to respond as quickly and safely as possible. I'll be happy to look into the very specific situation. I wonder if maybe it was a nonemergency transport vehicle or something. I'll be happy to look into the very specific details.

Of course, we want to make sure that we have the right tools in the communities so that Albertans get safe transport. That's one of the reasons why we moved forward with stable, predictable funding to support our front lines instead of moving for the deep cuts that the Official Opposition have been lobbying for and that their leader continues to lobby for.

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, given that the residents of Alcomdale are now in discussions to purchase an automated external defibrillator for their community and given that St. John Ambulance has AEDs for sale ranging from $143 to $1,980, does AHS have any idea how many ambulances are serving rural Alberta without this life-saving piece of equipment, and is the minister prepared to stock all ambulances with this very low-cost kit, or do the MLAs have to take up a collection?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for his offer. Certainly, any time resources are available, we put them to good use in supporting communities throughout our province. I know that when I was on the school board, we put AEDs in a number of different high schools as well because we knew that there was an important opportunity to have that immediate life-saving technique and technology available. But certainly any funds that the hon. member is willing to pass the hat for and use to support the cuts that he and his party are lobbying for – this government will actually put those funds to good use in making sure we're improving health care.

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, given that in the town of Legal the seniors' lodge has 12 out of 42 rooms vacant, partly because seniors are nervous over inadequate rural ambulance service, and given that the town of Legal has had difficulty attracting a doctor because there is no pharmacist and given that they now have a pharmacist coming but still no doctor, can the minister help solve this situation in Legal, which lies within the Edmonton health region, and help seniors to feel confident that they will be taken care of in their community?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Our family farm is just east of Legal, and my grandmother had the honour of living there independently until she was well into her 80s. Just like her and her neighbours, we want to make sure that all parts of the province have access to good quality health care. We certainly are enabling the tools through organizations like RPAP to support the acquisition of good health professionals across our province, and we look forward to continuing to do that important work. We'll be happy to look into this specific question around this one community. Thanks again for the question and for standing up today for the investment that this government has been putting in. I look forward to seeing how you'll be voting on our budget come the new year.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we'll continue with Members' Statements in 30 seconds.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Grade 6 Student Engagement and Bill 212

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our government is committed to making life better for all Albertans, and today I will be introducing a private member's bill that does exactly that for our children.

Mr. Speaker, here in Alberta students learn about democracy and governance in grade 6. The social studies curriculum encourages students to ask the question: what is democracy, and how does it work in Alberta? Last year I talked to students in Edmonton-Manning about these questions and found out what issues mattered most to them. I wanted to demonstrate to the youth in my constituency that regardless of their age, they too could affect change in their community. I had great conversations with students about legislative processes and how ideas become law. I also encouraged students to brainstorm with myself, their teachers, and their parents how to make this province a better place for Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to say that the students of Edmonton-Manning demonstrated leadership and eagerness to engage in the democratic process that surpassed expectations and shattered preconceived notions. People said to me: they're grade 6s; what ideas are they going to get? But these young and brilliant minds are very aware of what is happening in their communities. In fact, the idea for my private member's bill came about as a result of these consultations, where every class talked about wanting to see tougher smoking laws. I am honoured to have many of those students here with us in the House today.

As a former social worker it is important to me to continue to work to make life better for all children in Alberta. It is my belief that the leaders of tomorrow need to be encouraged today and every day, and I am proud to show that in our province Albertans of any age can enact change.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Blackfalds

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today I celebrate the wonderful town of Blackfalds, originally known as Waghorn after the first postmaster. In 1904 Waghorn was incorporated as a village and renamed Blackfalds. In 1980 they became a town and a community of choice, being Canada's fastest growing municipality in the 2016 federal census.

Since 2007 its average annual growth rate of 8.6 more than doubled the population to today's 9,916. Blackfalds is young, vibrant, and active. Its growing families have an average resident age of only 29 years. People choose Blackfalds because of its safe environment, affordable living, and award-winning recreational amenities like the recently developed Abbey Centre. Other new facilities include the Optimists' all-wheels park, the bike skills park, and the bark park for those who speak woof.

On the 1st of July, 2017, in celebration of Canada 150 the Wadey Centre opened. This Eaton's package house was purchased by the Wadey family over 100 years ago and was their residence, but it remained vacant for many years. In November 2016 the town, the historical society, and others, with Canada 150 funding, moved and restored the structure to a new, prominent location. Now it is a premier visitor information centre, with offices for the chamber of commerce and the historical society. For this project of regional collaboration and historical preservation the town received the municipal sustainability and action award at the recent AUMA convention.

Regional collaboration and partnerships create successes, whether it be in the regional water and waste-water commissions, the regional alliance in protective and emergency services, or the partnership with the cities of Red Deer and Lacombe in the BOLT transit system. The successful bus service between the three communities offers expanded routes within Blackfalds.

With growth come challenges for a high school, improvements to highway 2A, and a second highway 2 access, but Blackfalds is amazing, and amazing things will continue to happen there. You just watch and see.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Neighbourhood Watch in Calgary-Northern Hills

Mr. Kleinsteuber: "Get to know the neighbours around you. This is key as the group is stronger than the individual. If neighbours are on the lookout for criminal activity and if we as a group continue to secure our valuables, thieves will move on, and we will be safer." Mr. Speaker, these words come from Tavis Settles, a leader in the Northern Hills Community Association Building Safer Communities Block Watch.

Just over two years ago crime levels were up. To raise awareness of practical action people could take to secure their property and to watch out for one another, Coventry Hills neighbours began to report property crimes on social media. As neighbours connected on various community pages, Coventry resident Brian Wells created the Facebook group called the Watchdogs. Three months later the Watchdogs group joined the NHCA building safer communities program. With help from a resource officer for advice and support they focused on a cleaner, stronger message of what is acceptable and what is not.

Interest and participation from residents only continued to grow. "In the beginning nobody knew anybody," said Settles. "Now neighbours are meeting neighbours and connecting." Mr. Speaker, sightings of kids playing ball hockey, climbing in trees, and playing in yards are up while crime in Coventry is trending down and now among the lowest in Calgary. Today over 2,000 Northern Hills residents participate in Facebook groups that are divided into 11 smaller neighbourhood-based groups, each with a moderator.

They have some noteworthy successes. In one case a car prowler was noticed. Word went out through the Facebook group with calls made to Calgary Police Service to confirm sightings. When police picked up the prowler, his comment was: "How did they find me? I only started this 15 minutes ago."

In April 2017 the Federation of Calgary Communities formally recognized Tavis Settles, Shane McEwen, and Jesse Sinclair for their leadership within the Northern Hills communities.

Mr. Speaker, this is how a community association can take a program that costs them nothing, engage their community, reduce crime, and can inspire community stewardship.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Pipeline Approvals

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The NDP likes to brag about pipelines, but they ignore the facts completely. During the Harper government Alberta had four pipelines approved. Three of these were built, adding one and a quarter million barrels a day and many jobs with it. When the accidental NDP government arrived on the scene in 2015, the fourth pipeline, Northern Gateway, was also approved, and Energy East had a conditional approval. This would have given us access to tidewater on the east and increased access on the west coast. Under the NDP's watch Northern Gateway, cancelled; Energy East, cancelled. The Keystone XL pipeline was approved with zero help from the NDP government, and in fact when asked to champion KXL, the Premier would not agree to help at all, so when she tries to take a victory lap on KXL, which still may or may not be constructed, it truly is laughable.

Now that Jason Kenney has entered the picture, the Premier has suddenly changed her mind and decided to aggressively sell pipelines to the rest of the country. We hope Trans Mountain gets built, and I wish the Premier nothing but success with that plan. But here's the problem, Mr. Speaker. If Trans Mountain gets built and expands the shipping of oil that's already there to the west coast, it will still not be enough to undo the damage already done to Alberta by the NDP.

So, Mr. Speaker, here's what we should conclude. When the NDP points to pipeline success, they had little to do with it. When the NDP points to pipeline cancellation, most of it happened on their watch. If they do take a small part of Trans Mountain's hopeful success, their spendthrift ways have dug such a hole that one Trans Mountain pipeline will not be enough to bail them out. They will need two or three Trans Mountains to keep up with their spending and debt. So the next time the NDP talk about social licence, someone should pull them over and take that licence away because it was never real in the first place. Alberta cannot put Jason Kenney in charge of Alberta soon enough.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence against Women

Drever: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Today we recognize December 6 as the National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence against Women. We remember December 6 as an example of extreme, planned violence against women. It is a national tragedy, and we can join Canadians in mourning the loss of 14 women at the école Polytechnique in 1989. This horrific massacre was a crime against women and against feminism itself, against the struggle for gender equality.

Almost 30 years have gone by, and we still face a horrific reality. Women are disproportionately affected by violence in Canada, and the numbers are worse in Alberta. Ten women have died in Alberta in the last few months at the hands of current and former partners. Violence tears lives apart, yet it remains hidden, quiet in society. We must talk about violence against women, and we must take action to eliminate it.

My colleague from Lethbridge-East shared her personal story of living with violence, shaking the Legislature to silence before we stood to support her. With that act of courage and many acts of courage she's made through her life, my colleague demonstrated why the truth about violence must be heard and recognized.

Under the Premier's leadership the Ministry of Status of Women was established to improve gender equality in Alberta and to work on the elimination of violence against women. The more we support Alberta women to thrive and not just survive, the stronger our province and everyone in it will be. We all know that this will not be easy. The barriers we need to remove have been entrenched for a very long time. We must speak out. We must do better for the women murdered in the Montreal massacre, for the women alive today, for our daughters, granddaughters, and generations to come.

Thank you.

Introduction of Bills

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Transportation.

Miscellaneous Statutes Amendment Act, 2017

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Well, I'm deeply honoured by introducing a wonderful piece of legislation to the House known as the Miscellaneous Statutes Amendment Act, 2017. I would request leave to introduce this wonderful bill, and I commend it to all members of the House.

[Motion carried; Bill 34 read a first time]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Tobacco and Smoking Reduction (Protecting Children's Health) Amendment Act, 2017

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to request leave to introduce Bill 212, the Tobacco and Smoking Reduction (Protecting Children's Health) Amendment Act, 2017.

Mr. Speaker, our government is committed to making life better for Albertans, and Bill 212 does exactly that for our children. The idea of this bill came about as a result of consultation I did last year with grade 6 students in Edmonton-Manning. Bill 212 will amend the Tobacco and Smoking Reduction Act to prohibit smoking on all school grounds, playgrounds, sports fields, and public outdoor recreational activities, and smokers will be required to smoke 15 or more metres away from these areas.

[Motion carried; Bill 212 read a first time]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Bill 215

Tow Truck Safety Act

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I request leave to introduce the Tow Truck Safety Act.

Bill 215 amends the Traffic Safety Act to allow tow trucks to use optional blue and white lights on their vehicles when they are performing their duties. This is in addition to the mandatory amber light provision. The purpose of Bill 215 is to improve road safety for all motorists, tow truck operators, other responders at a scene as well as all users of Alberta's busy and often hazardous highways. I would like to thank Jeff Kasbrick and Ryan Lemont of the Alberta Motor Association and J.F. Gagnon, Keith Stebner, and Devon Poole of the Towing and Recovery Association of Alberta, who are here today, for their assistance in developing this bill, Mr. Speaker.

Thank you.

[Motion carried; Bill 215 read a first time]

The Speaker: Hon. Government House Leader, we may need to move past 3 o'clock.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much for that reminder, Mr. Speaker. I would ask for unanimous consent of the House to extend the Routine past 3 o'clock.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Manning.

Ms Sweet: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise today to table five copies of documents which support Bill 212, the Tobacco and Smoking Reduction (Protecting Children's Health) Amendment Act, 2017. These documents are copies of letters and e-mails from the town of Redwater, the town of Pincher Creek, the town of Raymond, the mayor of the city of Wetaskiwin, the mayor of the city of Grande Prairie, the town of Calmar, the Oyen and District Chamber of Commerce, and the city of St. Albert. All of these municipalities in Alberta support the idea that our school grounds should be smoke free and that our schoolchildren should be able to play in smoke-free environments.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have five copies of a Financial Post article authored by Kevin Libin, and the title of the article is Beware of Fake News Reporting that Liberals Are Better than Tories on Pipelines.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-South West.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have one tabling for you today. I'm tabling an article from the Calgary Herald, titled Alberta Takes Serious Steps to Battle Bots and Scammers, which outlines how the chambers of commerce, the BBB, and Ticketmaster are all cited as supporters of this bill.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table four documents with the requisite number of copies. The first is from a constituent that has written here saying, "I am writing to you to ask for more assistance for rural Alberta in the form of RCMP. Crime in the rural area is at a high and it seems that there are break ins daily in our area."

3:00

The second is another one. It says, "Almost every week, we hear of another person we know being robbed."

The third is from a constituent that asks the government to please help stop rural crime.

Rural crime is going rampant! We're sure it is the same few that are causing this in part because they know that they can get away with it in the country.

Our home was broken into in June of this year.

As a government please help stop this.

The last is an e-mail received that says, "We now say 'when you get robbed' as opposed to 'if you get robbed'."

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have an article and a press release that I'd like to table. The first one is titled Legislation Banning Scalper Bots Will Cause More Problems than the One It's Trying to Solve. It was in one of my speeches yesterday.

The second one is a press release from the government of Alberta, Improving Consumer Protections in Auto Industry. I quoted that on several occasions yesterday in my speech.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Dr. Starke: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have four tablings today. I'm tabling the requisite number of copies of, first, a letter from Donna von Hauff that I referenced yesterday in debate on Bill 31, in which she as a former public member of the ABVMA council noted that she had not been consulted, nor had any other public members.

The next three documents are all copies of news articles by members of the Legislature press gallery – Michelle Bellefontaine of the CBC, Emma Graney of the Edmonton Journal, and Julia Parrish of CTV – in which, when reporting on the release of Bill 31, they reported that disclosure and consent were new things in veterinary medicine. Obviously, they were given a very erroneous interpretation of current legislation by the Minister of Service Alberta in her press conference.

The Speaker: I have one tabling this afternoon. I rise to table five copies of the 2016 Legislative Assembly Office annual report.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following document was deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of the hon. Mr. Bilous, Minister of Economic Development and Trade, pursuant to the Northern Alberta Development Council Act the Northern Alberta Development Council annual report 2016-17.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I believe that there is at least one point of order. Is that correct? The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Point of Order

Language Creating Disorder

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm referring to Standing Order 23(i), (j) and specifically to what the Premier said today. Right out of the gate today when I made the first member's statement, followed by the question period questions by our House leader, the Premier in her answer accused this side of the House, including me, that we're climate change deniers.

Mr. Speaker, we've had lots of discussion on this subject. I just looked at the Hansard, and last year on June 1 and June 2 we had discussed the same subject. That time it was the minister of environment who called me a climate change denier, and I took pains in clarifying that I was a science student and I studied science and I believe that climate change is real. In my defence at that time the hon. Government House Leader also stood up, and he said he heard me saying that in the House a few times. He was on record defending me, saying that I believe in climate change.

Mr. Mason: We're lucky to have you.

Mr. Panda: Now he says he's lucky to have me in the House. Thank you for that. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

Mr. Panda: Through you, Mr. Speaker, the same Premier in her further answers insulted this House again. Unrelated to the point of order, but when members are asking questions, telling us to go and read the newspapers is very undemocratic.

Mr. Speaker, you sent me to the Westminster seminar recently, and there I learned that these kinds of insult and abusive language directed at the Official Opposition are not acceptable in the Westminster system. The Premier has the authority, but she can't just misuse the floor and call Official Opposition members who are on record saying that we believe in climate change – she can't label us like that for her electoral benefit. There is a by-election going on, so she is trying to address this to gain votes there. I don't know what she's trying to do, but the intention seems to be very clear, and it's repetitive. They keep calling us climate change deniers even after you ruled on June 1 and 2 last year. The Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster also spoke on that occasion, as I'm seeing on the Blues here.

Mr. Speaker, I'm bringing it to you to rule on this once and for all so we don't suffer this pain every time persons in authority call us climate change deniers. Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you.

The Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this point of order because it has indeed been spoken of many times before. This situation is no different than in the past, so we anticipate the result will be the same as in the past. In this particular case the MLA from Calgary-Foothills is suggesting that the Premier made a comment about him personally, which did not in fact happen. The Premier made a comment generally about the opposite side of the House.

This same notion has been brought up previously in the House on a number of occasions, and it's simply a dispute over facts as opposed to a point of order. The facts are fairly clear that on a number of occasions members of the opposite side of the House have indeed been on the record, made statements that show their ambivalence toward the science of climate change. I can provide a series of examples when that happened. For example, when a journalist challenged the MLA for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake by noting that the majority of scientists say that humans are the main cause, he replied: you can't say that anymore; the science isn't settled. That was on CBC, January 3, 2017, this very year.

The same member circulated a cartoon attacking scientists and suggested the science underpinning climate change is a socialist conspiracy. He responded: "Is the scientific community on the degree of man's contribution harmonious? Are they all together on that? I haven't seen it. I haven't seen that anywhere." That's PressProgress, January 8, 2017.

The Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat actually funded a climate change denying film. The American Energy News, March 28, 2017.

The Member for Drumheller-Stettler has in this House called on the minister of environment to, quote, table the scientific research upon which these specific policies are made. End quote. Hansard, March 10, 2016.

As members know, the term "climate change denier" or "climate change denial" has been used several times in this House in describing the members opposite: on May 2, 2017; May 11, 2017; April 5, 2017; November 29, 2016; May 2, 2016; April 11, 2016; November 23, 2015; June 1, 2016; June 2, 2016. In fact, they repeatedly have reinforced the notion that that is exactly the issue at hand.

On a number of occasions you yourself have been asked to make a ruling on these terms, and you have chosen not to do so. You have urged members to be cautious in our turn, and we have indeed been cautious but respond to the facts of the behaviour of the members opposite.

I don't believe, Mr. Speaker, that there is anything new in this particular situation over the previous rulings, and I can't see that there's any reason why we should be continually returning to this in spite of clear rulings on it in the past.

Thank you.

3:10

The Speaker: Are there any other members who wish to speak to this point of order?

Hon. member, I want to make sure that I've got it. You referred to a ruling that I made in June. Is that right?

Mr. Panda: Yep. I can give you copies of that, June 1 and June 2.

Mr. Nixon: Give him the page numbers.

Mr. Panda: Yeah. Page 1384 to 1385 and then 1454 on June 2. Therein, Mr. Speaker, you clearly asked them to refrain from using that language. The government members ignore your suggestion and then keep making those false accusations. It is creating disorder in this House.

The Speaker: It's okay, hon. member. I just wanted to know the date because I didn't have the benefit of the point you were making. Was it in fact at that time that I made a ruling, or was it a comment that you yourself made?

Mr. Panda: Yeah. I'm sending these pages. You clearly advised them not to use that language again and cautioned them. It's really causing disorder in the House with that approach.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I don't have the specific issue that you're speaking to. With permission, Pages, could you bring that to me, please? Is that agreeable? Thank you, hon. member.

The exact statement that was made by the Premier today was as follows. "Keep in mind that these are the same folks who have denied climate change again and again."

To the Deputy Government House Leader: your evidence that you submit was considerable; however, we need to all be reminded of 23(j). The matter that's requiring a ruling is whether or not certain words cause disruption in the House.

Hon. member, I think that at the time I did not rule it, if I have the correct one, as a point of order. In fact, I also did the same in November 2015. At this time I think the references you may have made, or at least the references you made in your verbal comments, were that it was directed to yourself. That's my recollection of what you said. Nonetheless, today I will stick by my ruling.

However, I want to remind the government that there was an earlier ruling that is causing me to go back and reread this again. I quote Speaker Zwozdesky. In 2013 he said, "It's had its mileage, and it's been used on this side to some effect . . . [it may be] time to move on."

In this particular instance I don't believe there was a point of order made. Nonetheless, I did caution on several occasions, and I would hope that the government is conscious of that and urges all the members to – the issue is not the particular word but: will it cause disruption to the House?

In that regard, hon. members, I know there is a point of privilege that arose yesterday. Since the Deputy Speaker was in the chair, I would ask that she take the chair.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Privilege

Obstructing a Member in Performance of Duty

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, yesterday we had a point of privilege raised by the hon. Government House Leader, and the Official Opposition had requested at that time that we defer hearing their commentary and a decision until today.

I would invite the Official Opposition to speak to that, please.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Before the House deals with government business, I would like to rise and make this brief statement. Yesterday, during a particularly emotional moment in this Assembly I made a gesture towards another member, a gesture that I would like to apologize for. While I certainly meant no harm or offence, it's clear that this was the interpretation regardless of intention. My actions were not befitting of this Chamber, and I humbly ask for the Assembly's forgiveness.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Pursuant to custom and the rules of the House the matter is now considered closed.

Did you wish to add anything further to that, Government House Leader?

Mr. Mason: Well, Madam Speaker, I don't agree that it is closed until I withdraw the point of privilege, which I now do, with thanks to the hon. member for his sincere apology.

The Deputy Speaker: Thank you.

We'll now move on.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 30

An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans

[Debate adjourned December 5]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to rise and speak to Bill 30 in second reading, where we get an opportunity to discuss the principle of the bill. I have spoken, of course, to Bill 30 on the referral motion previous and did support that referral motion because of the scale of the bill, as we look at the 147 pages of it, having heard from stakeholders that they felt they needed more time to digest what is a substantial bill and the substantive changes.

However, I want to talk today about the principles that are enshrined in Bill 30. I do support the vast majority of what we've seen in Bill 30. I do have a number of questions, but, you know, unlike the Official Opposition, I will not just reflexively oppose legislation because the NDP government has proposed it. What I really care about is making sure that we're in fact improving the lives of Albertans, in fact making lives of working Albertans safer, in fact making sure that the Workers' Compensation Board system is functional and actually serving Albertans. So that's what my comments will focus on here today.

It is of course challenging to evaluate a bill of such size in such a relatively short period of time, again, which is why I supported the referral motion. But I do believe that this bill has the potential to offer much-needed protection and to update occupational health and safety laws in this province, that have not been updated in many years, and to ensure that there is stronger and better support for employees and families and employers and especially for the workers themselves and for the families in the unfortunate case where a worker may be injured or, even worse, tragically, killed on the job.

Prevention and taking better care of families and workers could in fact reduce anguish. Ultimately, a safer workplace is a more cost-effective workplace. Keeping people at work and employed and not off the job injured is, in fact, the best occupational health and safety system that there could possibly be. We would obviously strive to ensure that we make sure that workplaces are, in fact, safe.

I will hasten to add, Madam Speaker, that in my time, having worked directly, in particular, in the oil and gas industry from about the mid-2000s – well, earlier than that, I guess; I'm older than I think – the late 1990s up until about three, four years ago, the evolution of the safety culture within oil and gas in particular was remarkable. I think a lot of credit should go to companies, the vast majority of whom are tremendously responsible. They recognize that keeping their workers safe is just simply good business practice. More than that; it's the morally right thing to do, ensuring that people are safe. The safety culture has become a huge part of not just oil and gas but companies increasingly realizing the importance of a safe workplace.

Unfortunately, the reason we need to make rules and laws is that not every employer is, in fact, that responsible. Although the vast majority – vast majority – are, there will be cases where that is not, unfortunately, true.

This bill signals major changes in philosophy and perspective about worker and workplace safety, which reflect those changes that I think we've seen in our society here over the last number of years. The idea that we empower employees and employers to be more safe, if it's implemented well, is what I'm most interested in. That's why I'm hoping that the government, through the course of debate, will be able to answer some questions for me about implementation.

First is the question of capacity, the capacity of employees to learn about this legislation, to truly understand their rights and the supports that are available to them; also, the capacity of employers to develop and implement those new policies and practices to conform to this legislation. That includes the capacity, of course, of Alberta's public service to effectively identify and address safety issues both inside and outside the clauses of this legislation.

Employees, in this province in particular, come from a variety of backgrounds, a variety of different parts of the country and different parts of the world. That includes newcomers to this province who are working in Alberta, who have English as a second language or are English language learners. There are lifelong Albertans who may have had to work in multiple precarious jobs in the past or even to this day to make ends meet. The vast majority of their experiences are uneventful and are safe. But there are those employees as well who are well represented by collective bargaining agreements that keep up with modern workplace concerns. It's important, of course, that every one of those employee groups can enjoy the protections envisioned in this bill.

Given the wide variety of employees that face barriers accessing protections in the current workplace legislation, including basics such as being paid for all hours worked or even knowing that employees' rights exist, the question I have and, I think, the question all Albertans should be asking is: how will the government ensure that the increased protections will be meaningfully accessible by Alberta's most vulnerable employees? I've had many constituents interact with my office who had challenges accessing services through Alberta Labour not because those services don't exist but because the capacity doesn't exist to deal with them in a timely manner. So while they're filing complaints or they're trying to reach out and access those services or a resolution to workplace issues, they have a difficult time doing so because the system is quite backed up.

I'm curious, then, if the fair practices office on the WCB side – I'd like to know how the government will ensure that the fair practices office will be there to guide injured workers through the WCB system and make sure that that is, in fact, more accessible to all workers, not just those who understand how to work within a bureaucratic system and not just those who have English as a first language.

Like employees, employers come from many backgrounds like charitable groups, not-for-profit groups, and small businesses, who may not necessarily have the resources to implement new HR policies required under the bill. I recognize that there are some delineations – 20 and above, five to 19, and then below – but, still, that is something I think the government ought to think about in terms of providing those resources. One might suggest that a competitive market would remove the businesses, through the process of creative destruction, if you will, that can't comply with safety requirements, but at the same time, it's important that we recognize that companies who do strive responsibly to follow the rules ought to be given the resources they need to ensure that they can successfully implement and follow those new rules.

Charitable organizations providing essential services to communities already have very limited resources and very limited support. In particular, granted dollars from government very often do not cover administrative expenses. This bill may in fact increase their administrative expenses. So a question I have is: how will the government work with charitable organizations to ensure that they are not unduly impacted by this change and instead work with them to build capacity, perhaps work on some changes to granting formulas?

How will government help workplaces in general to build capacities to identify and report near misses that could have killed or seriously injured someone? What additional risks might employers be exposed to should they identify or misidentify near misses in good faith?

Like employees and employers, public servants will also need to be familiar with a variety of different backgrounds. How will this government develop capacity to understand practices at the wide variety of workplaces and locations of work? Training and work environments are fraught with scenarios with employer language and behaviour that outsiders may view as unsafe or abusive. Within rural communities throughout Alberta many industries and workplaces may be unfamiliar with safety and workplace inspectors based in large cities. Are there some challenges there? How will government officials be able to effectively learn about diverse workplaces, both their cultures and the workplace activities?

How will employment officials develop the respect and trust of workers needed so workers are able to fully disclose abuse and unsafe work conditions? How will government inspectors develop trust to work constructively with skeptical employers, and how will the government show the value that employees, employers, and Albertans are getting for that $94 million a year the government estimates is the additional cost we'll face?

While we're on that particular point, Mr. Speaker, I want to be very clear that I do absolutely support the principle of improving WCB as a whole. I think that's long overdue, and I'm certain workers in this province would agree with that. I think employers would also agree with that. We know that WCB has had challenges for far too long, and there are many injured Albertans that WCB has really not met the needs of. So Bill 30 does represent a significant update and a major, largely welcome, and overdue change. However, I do worry that the increased costs of these changes will ultimately lead to increased premiums down the road. It is clear that this government has a lot of work to do to make sure that the substantial changes that are going to be implemented by this bill are, in fact, as effective as they hope.

So I would really encourage the government to identify metrics and measures of success to make sure we're gathering good data and to recognize that measuring that progress is going to help build faith in the system by all Albertans, both workers and employers. Again, I just want to make sure that – I emphasize yet again that every credible company that I know places a high priority on safety. That goes for oil and gas companies, it goes for construction companies, and it goes for IT companies. Any organization that I've worked with that I would consider credible is very focused on health and safety. But measures really do matter. It's also important that those measures are understood by stakeholders and that they can be used to hold employers and government to account for implementing the measures contemplated in this bill and to quantifiably – quantifiably – improve safety.

Albertans want to learn more about what government estimates to be the size of the safety, bullying, and harassment problems that it seeks to address through this legislation. We'd like to know. Let's quantify the problem that we're facing in this province. Is the goal to prevent tens or hundreds or thousands of these deaths, injuries, or bullying? How do we know we're going to be successful?

Now, I know there likely are some metrics in the Department of Labour, perhaps in the budget and their annual report and the business plan, but these are the sorts of questions, I think, that should be asked, and the data should be readily available. How much reduction in which measures of unsafe workplaces does this government expect as a result of Bill 30? What are the outcomes we anticipate from such a large piece of legislation? How can the effects and benefits of improved worker safety be used to motivate other stakeholders to do better? How can we recognize the long-standing good work of employers and employees who develop a culture of safety, whose worker protection may not be practicably further improved?

There is, of course, always an opportunity to be better, but how do we ensure that the companies that are already doing great work are recognized and, in fact, are not disadvantaged by these changes? We also have to ask how the government plans to support workers and their families outside the direct OH and S and WCB systems. For example, what is in place to strengthen professional services and support for mental health for workers who feel the long-term effects of harassment and bullying? How will we know when that system is effective? How much responsibility will employers need to take in order to strengthen mental health beyond simply disallowing bullying and harassment? How will Albertans know we have sufficiently improved benefits for surviving spouses and children when a worker is killed on the job?

Now, I want to focus on the maximum insurable earnings cap at this point. This is the piece of the legislation, frankly, that I'm most curious about. Is it sufficient simply to remove the insurable cap at $98,700 a year? It certainly would allow injured workers to receive benefits in line with their expected annual earnings, but that may end up focusing a disproportionate amount of total benefits towards a small number of high-income workers. Certainly, I think we would agree that in a province that does employ people who have higher earnings, a higher cap is needed, although at $98,700 I understand Alberta has the second highest cap in the country to Manitoba, which I believe is around $125,000 or $127,000, but it's a cap all the same.

So what I'd be curious about is – perhaps we need to simply still have a cap but raise it up to a higher number and then index it so it continues to increase in the future. Simply removing it entirely: I wonder what the cost implications of that are. I would hope perhaps the government has some actual data that can show us how many workers are at a higher earnings level and then what the impact of that is going to be on the costs of WCB, which ultimately are borne by employers. Again, I'd like to see the numbers. I'm not questioning the need to raise the cap. I do wonder, though, why it is that we in this province would be the only province in the country that has no cap at all. I asked my staff jokingly: well, if the CEO trips down the stairs, can they claim a million dollars of WCB? I actually ask that quite sincerely and legitimately. I don't know if the companies are . . .

The Speaker: Are there any questions under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Calgary-Elbow? The Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you to the member for his comments. There certainly were a lot of questions in there, and only having five minutes, unfortunately, to answer is not quite a whole lot. I'll try to provide a couple of comments on a couple of items that he had brought up, firstly, I guess, around potential capacity for employers to adjust. I think what we're really talking about here a little bit are some of the coming into force dates. We've already heard in the House that one of the dates, of course, is January 1, 2018. That is surrounding the WCB. When it comes to the occupational health and safety, that date is June 1, 2018, and the Ministry of Labour and staff are very ready to help employers to move along that journey in terms of help for what they can do to make sure that they're going to be compliant with those rules coming in.

I guess around the WCB and some of the things that employers can do to navigate that system, that was part of the reason why we had the office coming in for this. You know, we've heard concerns that WCB can be quite complex sometimes to navigate, very difficult, and this office will be available not only for the workers to help navigate the system but for the employers as well. There's going to be help there in terms of them being able to access that when trying to navigate that system.

Of course, the one I'm always interested in is the health and safety. It's always exciting to hear about, you know, the success of an industry that has gone very, very far to really raise that bar for workers' safety. One of the things that I heard very clearly from organizations is that joint health and safety committees work. There's absolutely no doubt about that. As a matter of fact, we've had organizations such as the Alberta Roadbuilders & Heavy Construction Association that have said that health and safety committees work. They're there in a joint capacity between the workers and management to be able to create a work site that is absolutely safe because when your workers are safe, they're at work; they're productive. Lost-time accidents: there are always costs to that. When you don't have them, there's not the cost to that. There's not potentially the cost of having to retrain somebody who's filling in for those individuals.

We've also had the Construction Owners Association of Alberta that have also said that joint health and safety committees work, and we should be having them. We happen to be the only jurisdiction that doesn't have those things mandated. We've also seen that the Building Trades of Alberta have also said that joint health and safety committees work.

You know, it was very exciting to hear the member send out the kudos to the organizations that work very, very hard to take that bar and raise it up. If we can keep our workers at work, we're reducing those costs that are associated with an injured worker, including the WCB premiums that are taken on by employers. I know from personal experience that the company I worked for was very, very proud of the fact of the work that they did on the joint health and safety committee, which I co-chaired, in terms of reducing those costs. They were incredibly excited about those kinds of things.

Again, I know there were a lot of questions from the member, and with the short time given here, I'm not able to completely answer them all. But I'm hoping that at least a few of those comments that I've been able to make might help address some of the questions that the member might have had.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Clark: Yeah. Thank you very much. I appreciate that. Again, it does answer, certainly, some of the questions that I've had.

I'll just, you know, finish off here in the brief couple of moments I have left here just to say that in general I believe this bill does go a long way to genuinely resolving the concerns that I've heard from my constituents. I know that there are some questions out there from the business community about whether some of the things that are represented in the bill do in fact represent an overreach. I look forward to hearing from more of those stakeholders, but in general the principles of improving safety and improving the efficacy of the WCB are really, really important.

We will be offering at committee stage some amendments, some of which we've shared with the minister, which we hope genuinely, truly seek to improve the bill, and I can hardly wait to talk more about this later.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, I have to say that it is yet another great honour to be able to rise in this Chamber today and speak to a bill that is moving to protect hard-working Albertans, and of course this time that bill would be Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans. Now, you're probably asking yourself why I'm so excited about this bill. Well, because we are going to update legislation and the Workers' Compensation Act. That has not seen a comprehensive review in over 15 years. I've been asking around, and some people don't even have vehicles that are 15 years old, so it's probably a bit of time, you know, that we now get to that.

You know what, Mr. Speaker? If that wasn't enough to excite you, we're also going to be updating the Occupational Health and Safety Act. That has not been significantly renewed since it first came into effect in 1976.

Loyola: When?

Mr. Nielsen: Nineteen seventy-six. Now, Mr. Speaker, I know I was only nine years old at the time, but one of the things I guess I should point out is that back then not only was I nine years old; I was starting to enjoy eating Timbits for the very first time. Yeah. They came back in 1976. I got to enjoy a really cool new program that was on TV at the time while I was eating those Timbits at nine years old called Family Feud.

I think it's high time that we tell hard-working Albertans that we have their backs and to give our full support to the proposed changes to both WCB and occupational health and safety because, frankly, Mr. Speaker, Albertans deserve to have the same rights and protections that Canadians already have.

Let's talk about some of those changes by starting with occupational health and safety. Mr. Speaker, last year we saw that more than 44,000 workers were injured while on the job, and, even worse, 144 of those workers did not return to their families. I hate to say that that number positioned Alberta as the second largest in the country for the number of workplace fatalities per million working population. I think we need to do better. We can't continue to do that. We have to ensure that hard-working Albertans get to go home to their families every single day after work. What's even more tragic is that most of those injuries and fatalities are preventable, okay? With proper precautions, with public awareness, and with diligent ongoing training and the effective enforcement of legislation, I think we can strive to reduce those numbers to zero.

Bill 30 creates a responsive system to better prevent illness and injuries by adapting to changing hazards while also supporting an injured worker's return to work. I was mentioning that a little bit earlier. You know, when you have an injured worker, the faster you can get them back to work in a productive manner – that means we need to provide them the supports they need to get one hundred per cent back to work being fully productive for their employers because in the end that's what helps not only them but their employers to be successful.

Bill 30 will also qualify the roles and responsibilities of both employer and worker to ensure everybody's health and safety, and Bill 30 will also enshrine the worker's right to know about workplace hazards. I know I experienced some of this in my early days in my former role at my employer. You know, times were a little different, so we weren't quite necessarily as diligent at informing workers of some of the hazards that we should have been watching out for.

There's also the right to participate in health and safety throughout the workplace through the health and safety committees. I had, again, mentioned this. My experience at my former employer: I co-chaired the health and safety committee for probably at least 15 years of the almost 20 that I spent on that committee in that workplace. I can totally get into more of that story in Committee of the Whole, but I think for now maybe I'll just give a little bit of a teaser for later on. [interjection] Exactly. A teaser. You know, get you built up, waiting for the story later on. Let's remember the number: 1,650 days. Maybe just remember that. Of course, the one very crucial thing: I know there's been a lot of people over the years that have been striving to get this changed. It's the right, not the duty, to refuse unsafe work, okay?

This bill will also ensure that workers can exercise their rights and fulfill their duties under the law and do it without fear of reprisal or the threat of reprisal. I have heard multiple times where individuals were afraid to report something because they thought that they might get terminated at their place of employment. That should never happen.

We also need to ensure that workplaces are free from violence and harassment, and I think that those are going to be addressed here through Bill 30.

Finally, Bill 30 requires that occupational health and safety laws be reviewed every five years, not every 41 years. I think we need to do a little bit better than that.

Mr. Speaker, a strong system of workplace health and safety programs saves lives. It saves lives. It prevents injuries, and it helps businesses save money. Again, I can get back into my story later on about that. I know that a mandatory health and safety committee: when there is that buy-in to that from not only the worker but the employer as well, incredible things start to happen. Incredible things start to happen, and there becomes a culture – the member that was speaking before me had mentioned how, you know, the oil and gas industry had really set that bar high. At some point in time in their past, in their history they had made that decision to make that a priority.

Bill 30 will also address some of the long overdue changes to the Workers' Compensation Board. Now, Mr. Speaker, you might be asking: why are we dealing with both occupational health and safety and WCB at the same time? I know I've certainly heard that from the other side. It's because the two are closely linked and related. You can't have one without the other. When you're talking about an injured worker, they usually end up filling out a WCB form, and if it turns out to be a lost-time accident, you now have a claim. So when you're talking about how you can deal with that, the two are interrelated, and you must do them the same. I know we saw some discussions before about splitting bills up and stuff like that, and it's just not the way that kind of thing works. The two are very, very interdependent.

An injured worker often results in the filing of a WCB claim, and in 2016 WCB had accepted more than 44,500 claims. In 2015 Alberta had the fourth-highest total number of claims for injuries that resulted in lost time. I think we need to do a little bit better, and I think that with the changes to OH and S, we are definitely expecting to see those numbers go down, which, again, is very much more healthy for the workers, and it's a lot better in terms of money for the businesses that employ those hard-working Albertans.

When we're talking about a worker when they are injured or develop a work-related illness, then WCB is supposed to provide medical and financial support so that that person can get well and can get back to work and be productive for their employer. And while they're accessing the WCB system, it should be in a compassionate and a fair and accessible and easy-to-navigate way, which doesn't really happen a lot right now with the legislation. Again, it's more than 15 years old. We need to get to modernizing that. We need to make it better for people to be able to access in a very compassionate – you know, treating people like people. As I mentioned, again, I don't think most of us have vehicles that are 15 years old.

Changes to the WCB act. Bill 30 will now bring workers' compensation firmly into the 21st century and, of course, join the rest of Canada. There are also changes that will improve existing benefits for surviving spouses and children, changes for injured workers' retirement, and changes that will provide injured workers more choice in selecting health professionals.

Employers will continue providing existing health benefit programs for injured workers for one year after the date of injury. Employers and workers can also apply for interim relief while compensation decisions are under review and appeal.

There are also some new provisions that Bill 30 proposes to introduce. Presumptive coverage for first responders will not be changing, but the coverage for psychological injuries, including PTSD, are now extended to all occupations. Employers will have an obligation to return workers to the job after they have suffered a work-related injury and illness.

The bottom line, Mr. Speaker, is that we need to get people healthy when they do have an injury. We need to get them back to their employers so they can be productive for their employers because they know how to do the job and they know how to make sure that their employer is successful in the marketplace.

Another exciting new addition, of course, will be an independent fair practices office, that both the employer and worker can access for help to navigate through the WCB, and we had quickly discussed that a little bit earlier. This office can also be available to let people raise concerns as well as monitor trends that are occurring within the workers' compensation system. So if we see some things that are going on that maybe aren't so positive or aren't working so well, they'll be able to identify these things and help guide us to make the system even that much better.

Bill 30 proposes to remove the insurable earnings cap of $98,700 per year so workers can be compensated at 90 per cent of their actual earnings. I know, Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of friends that work up in the oil and gas. They're very, very successful electricians, and I can tell you that they happen to make more than $98,700. The reality is that if they were to get injured and only get 90 per cent – I mean, they happen to have built their lives around that basic income that they worked very hard to get, and I think they have a bit of a right to ensure that they're able to take care of their families, should they be injured, until we can help them get back to being productive for their employer again.

Mr. Speaker, with Bill 30, workers will see a WCB system that doesn't treat them as a number but as a person, helping them get back to work while still caring for their families. Employers will see an effective and sustainable system while still having among the lowest premiums in Canada. As I said, as I alluded to earlier, when you have a safe workforce, when you have a healthy workforce, you don't have any lost time in accidents. You don't even have high premiums; again, my example from where I'd worked before.

Mr. Speaker, the changes proposed in Bill 30 are based on extensive input through the public and through reviews. Again, we've had organizations that have been working a very, very long time to see some of these changes come through.

Hard-working Albertans will be better protected from injury and illness while receiving better support if they do happen to get hurt on the job. Employers will have an effective and sustainable system that they can count on to be there for them as well. I think Albertans deserve these changes, Mr. Speaker, and these changes deserve our full support.

So I am going to recommend to all my colleagues in the House that we support Bill 30 through second reading and then, of course, on through Committee of the Whole and third reading and get the changes that hard-working Albertans have been looking for for a very, very long time. They deserve it. We owe it to them, and we now have the chance to get that work done so that they are protected to the best they can be.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Any questions or comments to the Member for Edmonton-Decore under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for your speech, hon. colleague. I just want to ask about – you were telling me a story earlier today. The Member for Calgary-Elbow was talking about how the vast majority of employers do a great job trying to protect people at work. There's no question. However, sometimes in their enthusiasm to protect workers, they do things that are somewhat misguided in their, you know, approach to helping. You were telling me a story about that. I thought that was pretty interesting in how the new legislation with the joint health and safety committees might be helpful.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yeah. I remember telling him that story. Essentially, again, as I kind of alluded to a little bit earlier, once that decision is made to really buy into that – how can we make our work sites as safe as possible? – quite honestly, some magic almost starts to happen between the workers and management. They start, you know, watching each other's back very, very diligently.

We were in one health and safety meeting talking about how there was a potential risk of some stuff that was going to fall off a conveyor in the plant. Management, in their excitement, said, "Well, you know what? We'll just put up these guards, and we'll get this done, and that'll just absolutely, you know, solve the problem," which it absolutely would have. There were a few of us on the committee on the workers' side that kind of had to say: "Whoa, whoa, whoa. Slow down. Do you have any idea how much that might cost?" We thought that there might be some other ways that we could have worked with that, maybe reduced some of the costs to try to make that safe. The good news, of course, is that we did manage to do that. It was significantly less, and as far as I know, it still protects those workers from any items falling down to this day.

Again, when you start talking about some of the buy-in, not only from the employers' side but from the workers' as well, to come together, the best vehicle to do that is through a joint health and safety committee: you know, work towards making that workplace safe, make sure that everybody is going home at the end of the day, and thereby make sure that the employer is profitable and competitive so that they're able to continue to pay their workers and not have to worry about all the other associated costs when a worker does get injured.

I thank the member for that question, and I'm sure there's still more of the story that I can tell later on.

The Speaker: Any other questions or comments to the Member for Edmonton-Decore under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Cyr: Yes, sir.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have, I guess, a general question for the member. The member across is making this sound like we're breaking ground here and going into new areas.

I have a Hansard, October 22, 1973, speech by Dr. Hohol. Unfortunately, we just had this gentleman pass on, but I will tell you that his words live on for generations now because he's in Hansard. His quote is:

I should now wish to outline some of the new provisions for compensation. I suppose the most important one is compensation for death. Presently, provision is made for burial expenses, including the plot, transportation and other related costs. New legislation would provide future pensions to the surviving spouse and equal the pension the worker would have received, if living and 100 per cent disabled. The allowances for children would be included within this pension and expenses in connection with the funerals would be consolidated and adjusted. An important principle of the recognition of loss, whether it is by complete inability to work or by cause of death, is [important] in this new approach to this particular disability benefit.

Then he goes on to say how WCB has broken ground in this area.

Now, if we look at the legislation, it seems to mirror a lot of what they had said when they first set up WCB in 1973. I guess what we need to reinforce here is that these aren't new ideas. So if they're not new ideas, how come this government voted down a referral motion to a committee? They came up with the same ideas that we're coming up with now. Wouldn't it be ... [Mr. Cyr's speaking time expired]

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Klein. Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Right riding, wrong city. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Just quickly before I start, to the member that just spoke, yes, we were implementing these things in the WCB back in '73; however, we haven't updated them. That was the issue, but I'll talk more about that.

I am pleased to rise to speak to Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, today. I know that it's been a long week for all of us, so I'm going to give you a break today. I'm not going to dwell on the inaction of the previous government for 40 years on WCB and 15 years on OH and S.

But I will say, though, to sort of set this up, that what it does demonstrate is a government's priorities. That's okay because Albertans are smart people, and they recognize which parties are looking out for their interests and those parties who are kind of stuck in antiquity, if you will, and complacent, with outdated labour legislation and economic ideas. Those ideas are ideas that leave Albertans and Alberta's economy vulnerable and on the wrong end of history, in a place where we don't want to be.

With all that said, you know, these changes to OH and S and WCB are long overdue. These changes will better protect workers so they can stay healthy and safe and also better support workers if they get injured or sick on the job. Alberta's workplaces and the way we work have changed over the years. A lot has changed since these acts were introduced, and we need to ensure that our standards and practices meet the needs of modern workplaces. These changes, quite simply, bring us up to par with the rest of Canada. That's a very reasonable approach to legislation.

Every year hard-working Albertans are killed or injured on the job. These incidents don't just affect the workers, Mr. Speaker; they have a devastating impact on families and friends and co-workers and employers, too. It's devastating to the employers. Workplace illnesses and injuries and fatalities are not an inevitable part of life, and we can't approach it like that because many of these are preventable, and that's what this legislation is about. It's about being preventative and not reactionary.

You know, this legislation will ensure that Alberta's health and safety system is continually improving to better prevent illnesses and injuries from happening, to respond to changing hazards, and to support injured workers and their return to work.

Now, we've talked quite a bit about consultation. I'll just reiterate that there were more than 1,300 online survey responses, 90 written submissions, and eight in-person round-table discussions with over 200 stakeholders. The big piece of this was, of course, that in June 2017 the independent panel reviewed the WCB to ensure that the system continues to support Albertans and maintain its sustainability and affordability.

I'll touch a bit on – it is a large bill, and we've talked about that, but I'm going to focus a bit on kind of the OH and S piece first. With OH and S, the changes up front on this, the foundation is on three tenets, and they are the worker's right to know, the worker's right to participate, and the right to refuse unsafe work. Those are rights that all Albertans should have.

A big piece of this for me – and my colleague spoke to this a bit, too – is the introduction of a mandated joint work-site health and safety committee. I think that's really one of the best examples that demonstrates the three tenets that I just mentioned. I kind of alluded to this yesterday as well in a 29(2)(a), but, you know, the Member for Lacombe-Ponoka had a very cynical view about joint health safety committees, and he actually expressed the fact that he thought that they would create more conflict on the job site. I really do think that that is absurd. [interjection] Well, it is, and I'll tell you why.

This is what joint health – I'll just name a few. There are a few really fantastic ones in here. What the joint work-site health and safety committees will do is that they will develop and promote programs for education and information concerning health and safety. They develop and promote measures to protect the health and safety of persons at the work site and check the effectiveness of such measures, and they participate together in identifying hazards to workers or other persons arising out of connection with activities at the work site. You know, when you work together, that's how you make people safe, and that's how you have an understanding of what is dangerous at work.

I absolutely agree with the Member for Calgary-Elbow, who earlier said that the evolution of safety has occurred over time. Absolutely. It's become better and better over time. I can't tell you the things that I've done on job sites when I was younger. If I ever told my parents what I did, my father would pass away again, and my mother would have a heart attack, I'm telling you. Some of those things were just outrageous. But you know what? I didn't know any better at the time. I was getting paid. I'm lucky to be here, and I'm sure there are many of us in here that have these same stories, absolutely.

The other piece I'm very pleased with under OH and S is the right to refuse dangerous work, which, of course, as I'm talking about things I did when I was a teenager and in my late 20s at work – I mean, we would have never done that. I would never have refused it. That was just the way it was. My colleague alluded to this, to the change being the right to refuse dangerous work. That is the big difference. That is a nuanced difference, but it makes a very big difference from a duty to refuse work. Actually, what it does is that it commits the employers to ensuring that we have a safe workplace as well, and it commits the employees as well. Through the joint work-site health and safety committees, together: that's how we're going to make our workplaces much more safe.

There was some mention yesterday, I believe, too, about having to report near misses. We've never had to report near misses in Alberta before, but in most other provinces they have to. I think this is a great addition to the OH and S Act, and the opposition should really like this, too, because they really like to talk about empirical data and having data to make decisions. This is what's going to help us make decisions about what's dangerous at a workplace and how to make it safer, and through that, you can also develop training programs that help to make it safer.

Now, in my previous life, before being elected, some of the companies that I would negotiate with – we actually had it in our contracts, and smart companies get this. They had set aside $30,000 a year just for training and for very specific training, which isn't much, but they understand, you know, that a trained employee is a smart employee, is a safe employee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased – I'd like to talk about this – with the fact that this bill does address psychological hazards and harassment in the workplace. As you may know, last fall I introduced a private member's bill to address psychological harassment and bullying in the workplace. Unfortunately, as is the fate of many private members' bills, it did not run the course of debate, and it died on the Order Paper. You know, the idea for that bill walked right in the front door of my office. A constituent came in and told me this horrific story about three years of harassment at the workplace and about her struggle to get any sort of resolution at the workplace, which then turned into this quest to get legislation. Again, Alberta is one of the few places that didn't have this type of legislation until now. So I'm very proud of that. I also tabled a petition for her that had over 1,300 signatures on it.

You know, what I did find funny when I introduced that private member's bill last fall, Mr. Speaker, was that although it didn't make it out of first reading, it sure got a lot of attention. It got a lot of attention in the media, and I did four or five speaking events through different organizations. Clearly, it got so much attention because it hit a nerve, a nerve that there's a need for this type of legislation in the province. I would like to sincerely thank the Minister of Labour and the ministry for incorporating these types of protections into this legislation and, specifically, for clearly defining what workplace violence and harassment are and defining the roles and responsibilities of employers to prevent violence and harassment in the workplace.

It also requires workers, your colleagues, to not participate in or initiate harassment or violence in the workplace. I've told many stories about things that I've seen as well in the workplace when I did speak at these events, and they're pretty horrific, some of the things that I've seen over the years. Although in doing my research – there were about 70 per cent of employers that already had harassment policies in place – Mr. Speaker, the issue with it was that it wasn't mandated. They were all written, or they were all kind of piecemeal, or, you know, what they said was quite a bit different in each facility. The big issue was that without the legislation, it just simply had no teeth, and sometimes employees didn't take it very seriously.

I had one business in my riding that I went to when I was consulting on that bill. He said: oh, I'm so happy to have this type of legislation in place. He was experiencing people harassing their colleagues at work, and he really didn't know how to stop it. I think a lot of people don't take it seriously if it's not the law. In fact, Mr. Speaker, some of the other numbers I discovered on that were that 60 per cent of Albertans have experienced bullying or harassment in the workplace in their lives. That's 6 out of 10.

Again, thank you so much, Minister, for recognizing the need to include this language on harassment in the workplace.

I'd like to talk a bit about the important changes to the WCB as well, Mr. Speaker. Of course, as we heard, it's been about 15 years since a WCB review. An independent WCB Review Panel, in delivering its report and recommendations, recommended that the legislative changes be designed to entrench a worker-centred system. I believe that this bill does a very good job in doing this. The first big step is to actually just simply clarify the purpose of the act, which is done in the preamble of the act. Actually, it's really odd that it was never there before, if you think about it. How did we know what it was all about? It's kind of funny that way. At least, it defines what workers' compensation is supposed to do. It's "founded on the principles of no-fault compensation, security of benefits, collective liability, independent administration and exclusive jurisdiction." That's just one part of the preamble, but at least we have that set straight for all of our employers and all of our employees.

Of course, a big piece of this and something that many people are very happy is being introduced in this piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, is new provisions for presumptive coverage and PTSD coverage. This will now be made more available to other occupations, and that's a very important piece here. You know, first responders: nothing will change for them in a sense. There's likely going to be more presumptive coverage there, but now it will include paramedics and presumptive coverage for myocardial events.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Nielsen: Under 29(2)(a), yeah, Mr. Speaker. Thank you very much. You know, I think the member was getting to some rather crucial information there with regard to presumptive coverage. I was wondering: during his consultations around violence and harassment what kinds of thoughts had he received with regard to how Alberta was lagging behind? He had made a quick mention that people just didn't know that Alberta didn't have these kinds of things, and I was wondering if you might be able to touch on that at the same time.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Coolahan: Sure. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you for that. Perhaps I'll save the presumptive coverage for a different point. We'll have more time to talk about this in Committee of the Whole.

In terms of talking to many different companies, many different organizations, it was quite humorous sometimes to walk into a very large oil and gas company in downtown Calgary and ask them to consult on this bill and ask them for an endorsement. Almost unanimously the first thing out of their mouths would be: "What? We don't have that?" It's quite shocking to people, right? In fact, I'm not sure I knew it either until I had that constituent come into my office to tell me about her story. Again, even when these large companies would say to me, "What do you mean we don't have that? We have a very solid culture of nonharassment and a harassment policy in place," I'd say: "But there's no legislation, so how do you back up that harassment policy? How do you enforce what you're doing?"

That would spark their interest, and I had unanimous support in consultation on this. There was not one company or one organization that said to me: I disagree with the notion of putting harassment and bullying in the workplace into legislation. Absolutely not. Again, that hearkens back to the fact that the vast majority of employers are fantastic employers, and they want to make their employees safe and happy and healthy. You know, this legislation, that type of legislation, is not meant to vilify employers, and it's not meant to be punitive either. It's meant to be preventative, which is what all of this legislation is. I think that when there's any doubt from the opposition on this type of legislation, we have to always think that this is about being preventative. The more we understand what's happening at a workplace, the easier it is to prevent it, and that's a very important aspect of this.

What was kind of funny, too: when I tabled that petition with 1,300 signatures on it for my constituent, I got another one in my office shortly after, another petition from a different person. You know, unbeknownst to either of them, they were doing the same thing. Through that, I got to know quite well Linda Crockett from Alberta Bullying. What was also humorous about that was that it's a nonprofit organization where they train employers on how to prevent bullying and harassment in the workplace, so as soon as the private member's bill hit the Order Paper, her phone rang off the hook because companies were concerned. This is going to be legislation. Her business skyrocketed, of course, because every employer was calling her up saying: you have to train us; you have to train us.

I had other companies, not just nonprofits but other companies who focus on safety and harassment in the workplace, come to me after it as well and say: "How can I work with the government? I want to make sure that everyone is trained properly on this." Again, this really hit a nerve with a lot of people because, as I said, 60 per cent of Albertans . . . [Mr. Coolahan's speaking time expired]

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise today to talk about Bill 30. I actually have a little bit of experience with occupational health and safety and the Workers' Compensation Board. I have the privilege of being a national construction safety officer in this country. I owned and operated an occupational health and safety consulting company in western Canada for several years before I went back to work in nonprofits, with the family business, if you will. I specialized primarily in large high-rise type projects, massive construction projects of that nature, and you learn a lot about the technical side of occupational health and safety. You learn a lot about the importance of it as well, making sure that moms and dads can go home to their families after they've been working, which I think all of us certainly believe in.

I've also certainly seen the ins and outs of workers' compensation from that side, working with employees of clients of mine as they've navigated the workers' compensation system in our province, and I've seen first-hand a lot of the problems that we have with the WCB in our province. The government is trying to address some of those issues with this legislation.

There's a lot to talk about in this bill, Mr. Speaker, and fortunately I have lots of time to talk about it. It is a very large bill, a very technical bill that deals with some very technical aspects of legislation that we already have. The occupational health and safety side, which is extremely technical and should be, is a piece of legislation and then regulations that govern many varieties of industries in our province that have to deal with very technical things to be able to keep people safe but at the same time be able to construct projects or produce energy or the things that we do in our province. And then the WCB has been an ongoing source of conflict in our province for a very long time, longer than any of us have been in this Assembly. I don't think the concerns that many of us have with WCB are any secret.

I think, though, that the reason I start there, Mr. Speaker, with the size of the bill, the complexity of the bill – and the fact that it has been brought here late in the session raises a lot of concerns for me, and I think we'll talk about that a little bit, with an amendment that I will move later on in our time together.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Klein talked about one aspect of this legislation that I would like to start with, and that is, first, around the concept of an employee's right to refuse unsafe work. An employee's responsibility, Mr. Speaker, to refuse unsafe work is already in legislation in our province. It's already a current practice in our province. It's already a responsibility of employers to allow employees to refuse unsafe work. Employees are expected to refuse unsafe work as a result of that legislation. It's certainly part of safety programs associated with the Alberta Construction Safety Association, the manufacturing safety association, the petroleum safety association. It is a common practice.

In fact, I unfortunately was involved in the investigation of an employee that lost his life in a construction accident, that worked for a client of mine. I worked for the client during that investigative process. Mr. Speaker, you may not know that when an employer loses an employee or has a significant accident, including, obviously, the death of an employee, the employer is responsible for also producing an investigation report that will go in. That is one of the responsibilities that they do, and consultants like myself would often be hired to do that task for them in those circumstances. Occupational health and safety officers would be doing the same process on their end, and those investigations would go together. Sometimes they would end up in court. Sometimes certain things would be settled outside of court, depending on the circumstances.

This one situation comes to mind when I think of refusing unsafe work: a site inside Ponoka. In the town of Ponoka there was a condo, about a three-storey building, if I recall, Mr. Speaker, but it may have been a two-storey building. There were two young gentlemen who were probably in their first year in construction, definitely, as we would call them, greenhorns. They had been assigned by their foreman, who was in charge of the job site and worked for my client, to operate a scissor lift. They would go up and down the scissor lift. They were removing stucco from this building.

Along the way their foreman positioned them with another gentleman, a man who had been in the trade a lot longer. He was operating the scissor lift, and he was supervising them. They went to the other side of the building. They would go up, and the gentleman asked them to go out and move the bottom power line, which is the neutral line of these 14,400-volt power lines that were above their heads, so that the scissor lift could get above it. Then they would proceed to work with those power lines just above their heads. First of all, it's a good thing they weren't as tall as I am – it was extremely tight by that point – or there would have been something that happened to those two young gentlemen.

They then had a coffee break. The two of them began to talk to each other and said: this doesn't feel right, what we're being asked to do; this feels wrong. They actually said to the foreman: we refuse to do that. They knew their rights. They had been taught that during their safety orientation with the company. They knew that they had the right to refuse unsafe work, in fact that they had an obligation to refuse unsafe work and to bring it to the attention of the rest of the crew. They exercised that right. A very tough thing for 18-, 19-year-old young men on a job site, their first real job, to do, but they did, and good on them.

The foreman made fun of them and then chose to get on that scissor lift himself and then proceeded the rest of the day to go up and down, moving that neutral line, with 14,400 volts above his head running through a line, he and the other gentleman that was in the scissor lift. On the last trip down of the day the foreman was operating the lift, and he asked that man, a father of several children, to go and move that neutral line. That father stood up a few seconds too early as the scissor lift went down, and his head connected with the back of that power line, killing him instantly.

I tell you that story, Mr. Speaker, to point out two things. The first is that the right to refuse unsafe work already exists. I'm not really sure why the NDP is acting like it does not. It makes us as opposition and people in the industry start to ask more questions about what may be going on with this lengthy bill that was handed to us. Either they don't know what's going on with their legislation, or they don't know that you can refuse unsafe work already, or they're trying to do smoke and mirrors, and to what effect I don't know. It makes me question what's going on with the legislation.

The second thing, though, Mr. Speaker, that I point out is that these issues, these technical aspects, these important pieces of legislation have life-and-death implications. They have significant consequences. We have to make sure that we get it right. Safety has evolved, and many members have pointed that out.

My grandfather, who was a coal miner, Mr. Speaker, is still with us. He's about 98 years old. He's been, actually, in this House with you, and I've had the pleasure of introducing him before. When he first started, they still had birds down there in the mines. The stories he will tell you would make my hair as white as yours if I had to go through that. But the culture was different. In fact, when he first started, it was superstitious to allow a female to participate in a coal mine. Ridiculous, of course. So things have evolved, which is the point.

We have learned from safety as we go on. We learn lessons, which is why regulations and practices within the industry evolve, but what's important is that the people that are in the industry need to be the people that drive that forward.

I know a little bit about commercial construction. I participate in commercial construction. I certainly should not be the guy that moves a neighbour's drilling rig south of Sundre tomorrow. I most definitely in this House would not have the ability to write regulations or procedures or laws associated with something as complicated as that. I see the minister nodding with me in agreement. I think she would agree with me, Mr. Speaker, through you to her, that our capacity as politicians to write that level of detail would be inappropriate.

But if you acknowledge that fact, you also acknowledge that the industry needs to participate in the process. The industry needs to drive the process. For safety to be successful, it needs to be driven by the industry. The reason that we have accelerated in safety along the way, whether it be from mining, like my grandfather, Mr. Speaker, or manufacturing or petroleum or construction, is because we've put the responsibility on the industry to drive that forward. But when we come forward to this House and we have to change a significant piece of legislation, some of it good – and I'm going to talk about some of the good points in a minute – some of it troubling, without having adequate consultation with the industry, it's concerning because I don't think that we are qualified in this place to do that. We haven't even started talking about the WCB, which is a whole other mess.

That brings me to another concern that I have with this. If the government was seriously concerned about doing a good legislative process on important issues like this, important issues that involve people's lives and livelihoods, if the government was seriously wanting to work on that in a serious legislative way in this place, they would not bring legislation that was combined like this on these two important issues just before the end of a sitting.

Nobody can say with a straight face, Mr. Speaker, though I'm sure they will maybe try, that the government seriously wants to work with the opposition, wants to work with the people of Alberta, wants to work with experts involved in this situation, involved in the industry, people that will be impacted by this legislation that's before us. Nobody could say with a serious face that this government is actually wanting to work with them, because they would not want to bring forward this level of legislation – complex legislation, a large piece of legislation – with very few days left in the sitting and without providing enough time to deal with that.

The second thing is that if you broke the legislation apart, it would be easier to manage. You could focus on the occupational health and safety side of it, which is very complicated, Mr. Speaker. Then you could focus on the WCB side of it, which is significantly different than the occupational health and safety side of it. There is some overlap, I will acknowledge to the minister, but they are significantly different issues.

In British Columbia the WCB does the occupational health and safety part in their province for the government. The WCB itself would be the investigative body. They would implement fines if somebody lost their life on a job site. If those types of things were going on, the WCB comes in like our occupational health and safety officers, but here they are two different things. One is primarily on the insurance and compensation end of the safety spectrum and another on the actual regulations, the rules, and the enforcement of occupational health and safety.

Now, I heard some of the members across the way, Mr. Speaker, heckling, but just quietly and politely, which is a change, that they did consult. Now, I've been talking to people in the industry for the last several days, since this government tabled this large piece of legislation, and they certainly do not feel like they've been consulted. [interjection] The indigenous affairs minister is asking me how many people I talked to. I'll get to it in a minute.

Mr. Feehan: No, I didn't.

Mr. Nixon: Oh, he's not. Sorry, Mr. Speaker. I misheard what he said. I've talked to occupational health and safety officers that work for the government that I know from my time in the industry that have called with concerns that there has not been proper consultation on this legislation and that there could be consequences as a result of the speed of this legislation going through this House.

I have talked to former colleagues of mine that run large health and safety programs for massive, large companies in our province, significant construction companies and energy companies, that say that they have not been consulted about this. Clearly, Mr. Speaker, the fact that I articulated the story that I told you and the fact that workers already have a right – they already have a right – to refuse unsafe work and that this is the government's biggest talking point of this legislation so far today make me really wonder even more now if they consulted people, because that is a very simple thing to know.

In fact, if you were to go, Mr. Speaker, to a large commercial construction project in Edmonton or Calgary right now, it would be fenced off. You see it when you walk around downtown. I'm sure you've seen it before. They'll be fenced off. There'll be safety signs. There'll be those type of things. You would enter the work site, and the first thing that would happen is that you would be brought to a trailer or an office of some sort, and you would receive a safety orientation. That is the very first thing that would happen. I know I've done many of them. You'd have to fill it out, and you'd have to sign that you'd received that safety orientation. They would go over some standard things. They would also go over some unique things for that job site specifically that were there.

When the company has their safety audit in order to get their COR requirement, whether they're with the Alberta Construction Safety Association or some other type of safety association, that is one of the first things the auditors will check. I know this, Mr. Speaker, because I'm a COR auditor. That is one of the very first things that I would check when I was doing audits, whether those safety orientations happen. And on those safety orientations, which would include all sorts of stuff, some of it very specific to that job site – where to go, the muster points if there was a fire, those types of things, what the alarm systems are for that job site, what would be required of them, where certain fall protection things have been put in place, unique things for that job site – before you got to the unique things for that job site, there would be a bunch of lines of standard process. In them that company would remind you of the legislated right of an employee to refuse unsafe work.

The incident that I talked about of those two young men who exercised that right – and good on them. I really think it's a great story of why it's important that that rule is in place. When I did the investigation that was associated with that and I interviewed those two young men, I asked them how they knew they had that right. It was like their first or second construction site, just out of high school. It's because they were told by the safety officer for the company in that orientation that that was their right under the legislation.

So it already is a right. It's important that we acknowledge that. That is not something that is new. We support it. You want to change the wording around it. That's fine, but to try to say that employees do not have a right to refuse unsafe work is troubling. It shows, in my mind, there has not been enough work done on this legislation, Mr. Speaker, and brings me to the amendment that I would like to move at this time. I have enough copies for the page. I'll just wait till the table receives it.

The Speaker: We will refer to this amendment as REA1.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The amendment that I'm moving says the following. I move that the motion for second reading of Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the government has not provided Albertans enough time to be consulted on the specific changes being proposed and, further, has not provided assurances that a full economic impact analysis has been completed detailing any potential negative impacts on the economic well-being of Albertans.

Now, I move this amendment, Mr. Speaker, for several reasons. Some I have already talked about, one in particular that is an example of the government coming to this place, clearly, and not talking to anybody from the industry because anybody who has been in the industry would already have told them that the right to refuse unsafe work has been taking place on construction sites and petroleum sites for a very, very long time.

I see some of the members across the way shaking their heads. I would challenge them to stand up and tell me how many safety orientations they've been involved in on construction sites – clearly, it's not very many – because that is how it goes.

There are parts of this legislation that are good. There are parts of this legislation that are important, that we consider before this House, particularly, right off the bat, on the WCB side but also on the occupational health and safety side. There are lots of aspects of this bill that I think are important. There are more protection and benefits for injured workers. From my time working for clients with workers that have been hurt or on job sites that I have participated in, I know what a challenge workers' compensation and getting benefits when you've been hurt can be. I know what a challenge it is for people, particularly, that have had injuries that last a very, very long time or that they will never overcome again in their lifetime. They have been through, I think, in their view – I think the minister would agree with me – the wringer as they've tried to deal with workers' compensation on that and the catastrophic consequences to them and their family.

It gives employers access to assistance during appeals. It used to be, Mr. Speaker, just for workers. Speaking as somebody who represented, during my time in occupational health and safety, many employers, I can tell you that this was actually a big issue. It's very complicated for the employer as well as they're interacting with workers' compensation. I think this is a good idea, so I commend the minister for bringing that forward.

It protects workers from getting in trouble or having something done to them by their employer for not complying with the act. I think that's a great idea.

It protects workers from being penalized for their employer's lack of compliance. Another good idea.

It protects crossjurisdictional renegotiation of OH and S and WCB regulations if standards are equal or better. Mr. Speaker, I'm happy again. I pointed out another thing last night in this House that the NDP was doing that was very conservative, and this is another great conservative idea, so I have some faith that some of our conservatism is rubbing off on the other side. I know I'm standing right now beside the hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat, one of the most conservative individuals I know, and I think, through you to him, that maybe it's starting to go over there a little bit. I think they've got a long way to go, but keep it up there, hon. member.

But there are other parts of this legislation that are deeply concerning, particularly if the government has not taken time to consult, if the government has not taken time to work with the industry to make sure that what they are bringing forward will work, will not have other consequences.

One of the ones is – and the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein talked a little bit about this – the job-site safety committees. Job-site safety committees have been going on a long time as well. I understand that this legislation would change that to make some of that more mandatory. It already is a standard part of all safety audit programs in the province. I can't think of one audit protocol for COR in any of the industries that does not make this already a mandatory requirement of their audits. If you're with the Alberta Construction Safety Association, manufacturers' safety association, petroleum safety association – you name it; the list goes on and on – this would be a standard practice for their audits. So I guess the question would be, one, Mr. Speaker, why we would need to bring that into legislation when it is already happening within the industry.

Second, if we take it too far, we actually could end up having another problem. Safety committees have an extremely valuable role to play in occupational health and safety on job sites, but if you make it too restrictive or prescriptive and do not allow flexibility on certain job-site applications for what that looks like, you ultimately end up really forcing companies to spend a tremendous amount of money, that will actually end up being diverted from their actual safety training programs. That's maybe an unintended consequence that the minister did not think about with this legislation, but there will be a point, if you force all that money into just being spent on tool box meetings or those types of meetings – some of us would be more familiar with that language – when you will see companies end up having to just divert a tremendous amount of their safety training into that.

Occupational health and safety committees are not enough training for many of the safety applications that companies have to deal with. When you work on high-rises – I spent a lot of time building multiple-storey buildings. Fall protection training, in particular, on some very complicated issues: you know, working on forms that are coming up, structures that actually did not exist that morning that are being brought up; ironworkers who are walking steel in certain applications, literally now walking in a place where a few minutes ago there was no structure because they are the first ones there, that had to build the structure. That costs people their lives. We would all agree on it. But if you don't train people on how to properly use that equipment because you end up diverting so much of your time and safety resources into just the tool box meetings or the health and safety committee side of it, you could have unintended consequences as a result of that.

Unintended consequences in health and safety are scary. I can think of a time when eye protection became a real big deal in the industry, Mr. Speaker. Workers' compensation rates were going up as a result of lots of eye injuries. There was a lot of pressure from WCB on employers to deal with that issue, and rightly so. So almost a blanket policy came in. Everybody had to wear eye protection at all times. Young safety officers would be on job sites. I ended up on a large project in southeast Calgary where the ironworkers were working. They were my clients. They were walking out of hoarding, a heated area that was being heated in the middle of the winter behind tarps, and they had to walk out on steel, on steel beams. This is before you had to tie off on steel beams. At that time ironworkers were exempt when they were walking the iron, a very dangerous job. They were putting Q-deck down as they would come in and out.

There was a young safety officer there who kept insisting that they wear their safety glasses, and the old veteran ironworkers kept explaining to him: "When we're coming in and out of this hoarding, we're freezing up. We're carrying these pieces of steel. We're coming out." I have glasses, Mr. Speaker. Every morning when I come to the Federal building on the way to work – I like to walk here from my condo – as soon as I walk into the Legislature, I freeze up. It gets all foggy. These guys are going in and out of a heated place like that; it's getting fogged up. The young safety officers are: "That doesn't matter. You have to wear that. That's what this says."

The veterans were smart enough to put it in their pocket and just ignore the guy. A 22-, 23-year-old young man who was working with that crew listened to the safety officer and, later that day, walked off the beam and was paralyzed. That's an unintended consequence. The person was trying to do the right thing, was trying to follow the rules, but nobody had taken the time to talk with the people that are in that industry to find out how that rule would impact them. Things impact people, and it's complicated.

So when we come to this Legislature and we see the government bring forward a bill of this magnitude, a bill of this size, and then some of the stuff that's in it – and I'm going to go back to the refusing unsafe work thing because I can't get over it, Mr. Speaker – that tells me that they have not seriously consulted people. The fact that I have had phone calls from people that I trust in the industry saying, "No, we haven't been consulted, and we see problems with this legislation; we see problems and unintended consequences with this legislation," tells me that they have not consulted people, which is why I bring forward this amendment.

I bring forward this amendment because not enough time has been put into this bill, and we need to get it right. We need to make sure that we've dealt with the unintended consequences. We need to make sure that we end up with a piece of legislation that will actually make sure that we don't create more problems within the industry, that we give the tools to the people that are on the front line to do our goal, to make sure that we have a piece of legislation that allows them to increase safety, to keep evolving safety within the industry.

You know, one of the things, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein talked about in his presentation – and I did enjoy listening to his presentation; I agreed with some of it, disagreed with some – was on the harassment side of this. His argument was that there was a bunch of companies – I hope I'm not mischaracterizing this because I'm not trying to – within different industries that had mishmashed up harassment, different policies. One place would maybe be dealing with harassment this way. Another place may be dealing with harassment this way. Some places may not be dealing with harassment at all, but in the member's experience most places were already having some sort of a policy in place.

Companies or other people associated with the government were now calling him to say: "Oh, thank you. We didn't know how to do this. Now the government is here. It's legislated. Now that it's written down in legislation, we can do this."

In my mind, what I hear when I heard that, Mr. Speaker, is that companies can't do this without the government's help. We've got industries that take concrete and turn it into skyscrapers. We've got people in our province that take sand and turn it into gas in our cars. We have people that are 10 times smarter, many times smarter, than most of us politicians in the room. I have never been and I don't think any of my hon. colleagues on this side of the House have ever been in a meeting with anybody in the industry or in any capacity that said: "Oh, whew. Now that government wrote this in, we can finally write this all down properly in our safety books." It's a silly thing to say, in my mind.

It also shows in my mind, again, that the government did not consult with industry. If you spent any serious time within all the industries that this would apply to, you would see that harassment policies have been strongly in place for a very long time in most companies, and the right way to deal with it is to get the industry to address it, to work through their safety associations, to understand the uniqueness of each organization, and they will do it. They've already proven it. There was a time in the 1980s, before we started bringing in the Alberta Construction Safety Association and those types of organizations to focus on stuff like core audits, that our safety record in this province was dismal. It's not perfect now. I would not submit that as an argument to you, Mr. Speaker. But it was really bad. It was front-page news all over the country. It was having significant negative effects on the stability of the oil and gas industry in our province, and the industry started to make local or industry-specific safety associations, and they would begin to address it.

Are we bringing forward legislation to help people write things that they're already writing, or is this a real situation that the minister has come across in her consulting with people in the industry? Maybe it is. It's a fair question. But certainly the people that we're talking to are already dealing with that. It's already a policy that's in place, and it's the government's responsibility to come here and say: the reason we're changing this law, the reason we're making this part of the law, is because this is the problem we're trying to fix, not because we don't trust experts already in the industry to write up their own policies. With due respect to the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein – and I would include myself in this. I can think of many people that are probably better at drawing up policies than I am.

The question with this amendment, the purpose of this amendment is to say that the government has not done their job. This is another example of the government not doing their job. They have not done their job to consult properly with the industry before they bring this forward. I believe their intentions in most of this legislation are well thought out. I support most of their intentions in a lot of this legislation, but I do not believe that they have done their job adequately to get this right. I do not trust the government that they got this right. I don't. My constituents certainly don't trust the government. My colleagues that work in occupational health and safety don't trust the government. My friends that own and operate construction companies or those other things don't trust the government to get this right.

Do you know why, Mr. Speaker? Because this government has a track record of not consulting people before they bring the legislation here. They have a track record of bringing legislation to this House that has not even been discussed outside of the inner circle of the NDP or, as the Deputy Premier once said in this House, outside of the people that have the NDP world view. That is a problem when you're bringing forward legislation of this magnitude that impacts so many things.

It is the government's responsibility to make sure that the legislation that they bring before this House has been adequately addressed. If not, it should go to a committee. It's one of the problems, I think, with the Alberta political process. Unlike Ottawa, legislation of this magnitude can just come here and be forced through this House, the government using their supermajority to force it through and get beyond that consultation whereas in Ottawa this would have an opportunity to be able to have a proper discussion. We could bring in experts. We could talk to occupational health and safety officers. We could talk to industry representatives, safety experts, people from the Canadian Society of Safety Engineering. We could talk to people who have been impacted by WCB. We could talk to WCB co-ordinators. We could talk to WCB. We could bring them in, and we could have a real conversation.

Then the government would probably have learned that employees have a right to refuse unsafe work. They probably would have learned many other problems that I don't even know about that are happening because technology is moving on. We would have been able to get this legislation right. Instead, what the government did with this was took two significant issues, workers' compensation and OH and S, lumped them into one big bill, put it in this House near the end of a session after they had adjourned debate for days and adjourned the House for days because they didn't have legislation ready, and jammed it all in at the end.

Mr. Speaker, what was interesting to me at the time was that this legislation didn't even come from the Queen's Printer when it was given to the opposition here in the House. It was photocopied on a photocopier here.

An Hon. Member: No, it wasn't.

Mr. Nixon: I would assume. It definitely wasn't from the Queen's Printer. It was a package . . . [interjection] It was not from the Queen's Printer when we got it, Mr. Speaker.

An Hon. Member: Yes, it was.

Mr. Nixon: Well, not when we got it in this House.

That is not consultation. If you're preparing a bill the night before on the fly, it is not consultation, Mr. Speaker. You cannot look at the opposition with any seriousness when you continue to bring legislation over and over to this House that you have just prepared hours before you table it.

An Hon. Member: How much longer do you have?

Mr. Nixon: The hon. member wants to know how much longer I have, Mr. Speaker. I'm not sure, but it's quite a bit. I'm happy to help, but the Clerk may be better off to tell you.

You cannot tell the people on this side of the House, who have a responsibility, like you do, Mr. Speaker, and like every member of this House does, to our constituents and to the people of Alberta, that you consulted on a piece of legislation that you are doing basically overnight and bringing into this place. You're not ready, and if you're not ready, how do we know you're not making mistakes? How do we know a bill of this magnitude, a big, thick bill with lots of complicated issues, has actually been thought out?

They wanted us, Mr. Speaker, to take their word for it when it came to Bill 6, a very similar area of law or legislation, that they had consulted about it. I remember it clearly that week: they consulted. They talked – it was the same thing. It was the same type of bill. It came in here. It hadn't been prepared in advance. It came the night before. We began to read it, and then we went home, those of us who represent large farm communities, like me, whose neighbours were ranchers and were farmers. We went to our constituency offices, and the phones were ringing and the e-mails were coming. Every major player in the agriculture industry was saying: "We never knew about this. We never saw it." That's not consultation.

It's no different with this bill. There's no difference with this bill. They brought forward a bill with good intentions, lots of it. Parts of the bill, just like, you know, parts of Bill 6, were with good intentions but not properly consulted with the industry, no time taken to make sure they got it right, no time to have a discussion about what impacts there will be. In this case the big hot-button issue became family farms. This bill will be something different because there is no time to address it. The government took forward the piece of legislation.

When you have a track record like that, Mr. Speaker, as this government has, a track record of not consulting Albertans, of not consulting the people their legislation impacts – and then they continually want to come into this House and say: "Hey, it's okay. Hey, it's okay. It's okay. It's fine. We consulted. Take our word for it." Well, I apologize. I'm done taking the government's word for it. I'm done taking the government's word for it. This side of the House is done taking the government's word for it. If they're not willing to do the job, then we will have to continue to do the job for them, which is why we're bringing forward an amendment like this to say: "Stop. You have not done your job. Send this to a group of people that can do the job. Make sure that experts get to participate in the process. Take your time."

What is so wrong with that? What has taken place in the last couple of days that would require this government to try again to ram through a piece of legislation like this in the dying hours of a session before Christmas? What has taken place that would take that to a level of emergency? I'll tell you why I ask, Mr. Speaker, because this side of the House would be happy to take that part out once we understand it and get it passed immediately in one day and then take time to get this right.

Now, I get passionate about it because I'm concerned about the people it will impact. I also happen to think that probably in about, you know, 18, 19 months this government will be fired by the people of Alberta. That's up to them, but that's what I think is coming.

Ms Fitzpatrick: I don't think so.

Mr. Nixon: They don't think so. That's fine. We have an election.

But my point is that I think that they will be sent a very clear message at the polls largely because of stuff like this. Then this side of the House has to go over to that side of the House and fix the mess they made. In the meantime people, real people, are being impacted by the legislation that they write. Employers are being impacted by the legislation they write.

That doesn't mean that I don't want employers to make sure that they work on safety. I think safety is important. I've been on job sites where I've seen people lose their lives. I get it. It's important. I've got a son right now who's working in construction back home, my oldest son. I would not want to see him get hurt. I would, certainly, when I go home this weekend – he lives just inside Sundre near me, and if I stop to visit him, I hope that he is there, just like I know you would for your daughters or your grandkids. We all do. That's not what is at argument here. Keeping people safe, making sure that the system evolves, that we take safety seriously, that we continue to give tools to the industry, that we continue to say as a province that we demand that mom and dad get to go home after work: nothing wrong with that. But why not take the time to do it right?

Why take two big issues, WCB and OH and S, and jam them all into one? Why? It's a good question, Mr. Speaker. I'm sure you wonder. Why move legislation through at the last minute? If this was such a big issue and a priority for this government, why did the government not have this ready at the beginning of the session? Why did the government not send it to one of our standing committees to begin to have discussions and make sure that we were talking to the people in the industry? Why am I getting e-mails from occupational health and safety officers who work for the government saying: "Oh, my gosh. Have you read this part of the bill? Do you understand what this means? Do you think the government has?" That's the most common one I'm getting right now: do you think the government, the NDP and the bureaucrats that are involved in this legislation, understand what the implications are of what they've brought forward? That's pretty scary, that occupational health and safety officers are feeling the need to reach out to an opposition MLA and say: whoa, you've got to go talk to them.

We're going to talk about a lot of those details as we go through this legislation, the concerns they have. I'm on a reasoned amendment, so I'm going to focus on why this needs to be stopped for the time being and go back to being consulted with Albertans. But we will talk about some of this, and we will try to change some of the most significant issues that the industry and people have with this legislation. It will be determined at that time, Mr. Speaker, if the government wants to co-operate with that. I don't know. I don't want to guess that until we see what happens.

Occupational health and safety: big act. You know, the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon spoke the other day on this bill, and he pulled out a little book that they hand out, usually called an OH and S handbook. This one had a blue cover, which is similar to the Occupational Health and Safety Act's actual cover. There are other books that are red that come out from different safety associations, and they summarize the act. It's a big book, and he was showing you, Mr. Speaker, at the time, and I'm not actually sure how you let him get away with using a prop like that, but he was on my side of the House, so I didn't argue. They've got this book. It's big. It shows the significant components of this end, you know, of occupational health and safety. That wasn't even the act. That's a handbook. If you were a superintendent on a job site right now or a foreman working with a drywall crew, that's the handbook they give you to try to summarize the act. I've got the act still sitting on my deck – or on my desk. It's not on my desk; otherwise, it would probably be wet. It's pretty snowy there. It's old because I've been out of the industry for a long time. I know the act has been updated since then. It's like this. That's what we're talking about right now.

The opposition now knows that the government hasn't consulted with people because we've heard from the people that they should be consulting with saying: we haven't even been talked to. We've seen the government stand in this House and talk about things that they would have known if they had talked to anybody in the industry. Now we have to go through this legislation and find out everything that they got wrong on behalf of Albertans. We have to reach out to the stakeholders that are impacted by it – safety organizations, safety officers, construction companies, road companies, and the list goes on and on – because we know that they didn't do it. That's why I have to bring an amendment like this, Mr. Speaker, to this Assembly, to give a chance for that to happen.

The question for the minister, in my mind, is: why was this consultation not done? Why the speed? Why, if this was so important, are we not dealing with at least two pieces of legislation so that we can get it right? Why mix it all together and complicate the issue? Is the goal, Mr. Speaker, to have a good piece of legislation at the end of this? It's a good question. If it's not the goal, I don't know what the government is doing here, but I want to give them the benefit of the doubt. If that is their goal, then why not do it? Why not do it right? Why not separate these issues? Why not deal with these in separate pieces of legislation? Why not send it to a standing committee with a reasonable period of time, get people to that standing committee, let them present?

Let's make sure that we get it right. Let's make sure that the next government doesn't have to clean up a mess. Let's make sure that there are not some consequences that are going to cost more jobs or hurt different industries. Let's make sure that the ability is in place to make sure that we go beyond those two young men that I told you about, Mr. Speaker, that refused to do unsafe work, and do other things to make sure that we're putting money into education for our young workforce and that we're teaching people about their rights so that they understand that on a workforce. I could support that. But what I can't support is bringing forth a massive bill that's been prepared, basically, the night before, dropped on the opposition's desks, hot off the presses.

An Hon. Member: The night before?

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, some of the hon. members are laughing about me saying: the night before. I suspect that is because it was being printed the morning of, but fair enough. The night before is maybe a little bit too generous. I've had legislation of late in this House that still felt hot from the photocopier. That's what we're dealing with at the end of the session.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, we were sitting in our seats, the opposition, eagerly excited to be at work, and the government is adjourning the Legislature hours early because they haven't got a bill ready. Now here we are at the end of the session – and we're going to talk a lot about some of the other bills between now and February or whenever we'll be able to finally get this work done – and we're talking about this one, and this is a big bill. Nobody on this side of the House can argue with me about the size of this legislation. It is a big bill, a big bill that we now know the government never consulted on with any large number of people.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

I suspect that they get excited and they say that they consulted with people, but I've talked to the people that they should have consulted with, and they say that they haven't. I don't know, Madam Speaker – welcome to the chair – if that's just because they were only consulting with occupational health and safety officers that have the NDP world view. I don't know if that's because they're only consulting with employers that were friendly to them about this legislation. The question that's being heckled at me and that I'm going to try to answer is: do these occupational health and safety officers not care about safety? That just proves, again, the problem.

These occupational health and safety officers work for the government. They're responsible for enforcing the rules. They're responsible for investigating up to even when people have been killed. It's a pretty big responsibility.

Madam Speaker, maybe I heard the member wrong, so I want to be careful about that.

An Hon. Member: You did.

Mr. Nixon: Okay. It sounds like he's saying that I misheard him. It wouldn't be the first time. My wife says that I do that quite often. So I will apologize to the hon. member.

The point is that we are here again with large legislation that needs to be sent to be properly consulted on with the people that are impacted by it. The problems with the legislation itself, Madam Speaker, will take several hours and days of debate to address. We will bring amendments in good faith to try to help deal with the mistakes the government has made in this legislation. But the right thing for this House to do is to pass this amendment. Stop this bill from being read a second time, get it to a standing committee, make sure the industry gets to participate, and make sure the people responsible for enforcing the laws get to participate because they're actually the ones that have the biggest concerns right now with the legislation. That's troubling.

Then we can start talking about the WCB, because I don't think the government is going to split these apart. I don't know what they're trying to do, but they're mishmashing the whole mess together and creating a superbill. The same point stands on that amendment. Send it away. You have not properly consulted. Through you, Madam Speaker, to the government side of the House: they have not properly consulted. They have not done their job.

Have you seen, Madam Speaker, an economic analysis on the decisions of this legislation? [interjection] The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway is pointing out that in his time in the Legislature he probably hasn't seen one ever from the government, which is why we have to spend so much of our time standing up talking about referral and reasoned amendments.

An Hon. Member: Except for the leaked ones that they send us.

Mr. Nixon: I do appreciate that, Madam Speaker: except for the leaked ones that we do get. The government really should be careful about where they leave their documents lying around, but I do appreciate it.

This government has a responsibility to do that. This amendment says that they have not. I'll give you a couple of reasons why they have not. I'm going to give you some more before I sit down, but the purpose of this amendment that I brought before this House is to stop the process because the government has not done its job.

I think it's also important that the members of the government who rise to speak to this legislation who imply that because we have concerns over on this side of the House, we don't care about the safety of workers or that we don't want to see safety advance or that we want to see, you know, construction sites and petroleum sites in our province stay in the Dark Ages correct that tone as well, Madam Speaker, because that's not what we're saying. I've been very clear in my presentation today that we support many aspects of this bill, including more protections for workers, clarification of issues around workers' compensation, making sure that workers can't be punished for exercising their rights.

As I said briefly earlier, Madam Speaker – you weren't in the chair at the time – putting in the ability for employers to get help while navigating the WCB system is something that was not there before. It can be very complicated for employers as well as they're dealing with the system, extremely complicated, particularly when you get to large employers and complicated injuries and those types of things. I think we all agree that we want that to work better.

Now, I spent a lot of time, Madam Speaker, talking about the occupational health and safety side of it, but let's talk about workers' compensation. One thing that's interesting is that the NDP and my former legacy party, before we were the United Conservative Party, the Wildrose Party, agreed that the WCB was broken. It was one of the few things that I think both of these parties agreed on very, very openly. It's why at the time we were shocked that the NDP was going to take that broken system and put it on the farmers and ranchers that we represent despite the fact that they had better private insurance at the time that was taking better care of their employees.

At the time, Madam Speaker, I'm sure you heard from some of your constituents that the biggest concern they had was that they had better coverage and fewer problems, because of the problems that we're talking about here today with WCB, and they were also protected in bed. They weren't just protected at work; they were protected in bed or when they were on vacation or when they were driving their quad or when they were doing other things, for less than the WCB cost their employer. That was the biggest thing on the WCB side of Bill 6. They were scared that they were going to lose all that coverage. Employers were going: man, I'm going to have to pay way more, and my employees are going to be less protected.

Mr. Gill: It doesn't make any sense.

Mr. Nixon: It doesn't make any sense. The system is broken. The minister is trying to address some of those issues with the system, and I agree with that. But, again, now you've got a complicated system that has now been forced upon the farmers and ranchers that I represent, that the rest of the industries in our province are forced to work under, that is broken. The government's intention to fix something that has been going on for decades and that is a mess in some cases is to bring that forward by printing the legislation the morning of or the night before – between the heckles earlier I'm trying to figure out which one it was; but, either way, within 24 hours – bring it in here hot off the presses, and say: "Pass it. It's going to be good. The whole system is busted. It's broken. We've been complaining about this situation for years, and rightly so. So have you. It's all good. We fixed it."

An Hon. Member: Trust me.

Mr. Nixon: "Trust me. It's good, Jason." Oh, sorry; I said my own name, Madam Speaker. "It's good, hon. member. All good. Your constituents are fine. I've got you covered. I've got you covered." We don't accept that.

This is the party that the last time they were talking about WCB had bureaucrats or at least some people that were associated with them telling farmers of ours not to put their bulls out with their cows at nighttime so the calves would come in the day. I can tell you that if you consulted a rancher, they'd tell you that's not how it works. I suspect that if you consulted a few other people, they may be able to help with that as well.

No, we don't trust them, Madam Speaker. It's not our job to trust them. It's not our job to come to this place and say: "Sure. Give us 200 pages of legislation overnight, and we'll let it go through. We'll let it go through. Nah, you don't need to consult on something as important as workers' compensation. Why would you consult on that? That's silly."

Occupational health and safety: something that governs and puts forward rules that make sure workers and employees are safe at work in places where they could die at work. And this side of the House wants us to go: "It's all good. They've got it." Madam Speaker, we don't think they've got it, and that is the point of the amendment. If you don't even know that workers already have a right to refuse unsafe work, then you have not done your job. You have not done your job. All you've done is reword it, which is fine. It's cool. I think the wording is fine, the new wording. But to imply that that is some major difference and why you're trying to bring this legislation through the House is ridiculous.

In fact, Madam Speaker, I think tomorrow I will begin tabling safety orientations from all across the province. I will table the current act, that says that you have the right to refuse unsafe work, and then we can move forward from that. [interjections] Because you do. They laugh. I have met and interviewed two 18-, 19-year-old men that are still here because they knew that they had the right to refuse unsafe work and did. They did. They exercised their right to refuse unsafe work.

They consulted, Madam Speaker? They didn't consult, because this government doesn't consult on anything. This is a problem. But it becomes a bigger problem when you're dealing with legislation of this magnitude. It becomes a significant problem when you're dealing with legislation that impacts people's livelihoods. It becomes a significant problem when you're dealing with legislation that impacts people getting compensation after they've been hurt at work and they're trying to pay their family's bills. It becomes a significant issue when you're addressing legislation that is associated with individual workers that will climb up on large buildings tomorrow and expect to still be able to come home to their families, and rightly so. They should expect that, but they should also expect this government to consult properly before they bring in legislation like this.

They should also expect this government not to bring forward legislation with almost no time left in a sitting. We're happy to be here as long as it takes, Madam Speaker. I want to be clear on that. In fact, I was a little bit shocked in the last few days by how frustrated the NDP appeared to be that session was going late, particularly given that they tabled a piece of legislation like this and many more in the last days of their scheduled sitting after they never brought any legislation forward for days and days and days and kept adjourning the House early, early, early because they weren't ready.

If this bill was really consulted on – I want you to think about this, Madam Speaker – if there was extensive consultation done on this bill, certainly I would know people that had been consulted. I've worked with many people in the industry. I've talked to them as recently as today. I think that at least a couple of my colleagues would have heard of some organizations and stakeholders that they've been talking to that had been consulted. I certainly think that our shadow minister in charge of this issue would have heard from many stakeholders that had been consulted.

I know that they would have been ready to bring in the bill at the beginning of the sitting instead of sending everybody home sometimes as early as 4 o'clock in the afternoon because they weren't ready. Why was that? Because the legislation was not ready. They did not take the time. They're ramming this through, like they always do before Christmas, legislation that impacts people's lives. It is so ridiculous that this keeps happening in this place, which is why I moved this amendment. The government has not done their job. They have not consulted. They have not done economic analysis. They have not shown Albertans that they know what they're doing. Why does this keep happening? Why?

If the minister was serious about this legislation, it would have been handled, actually, a lot like the government handled the MGA: proper consultation, taking the time to talk to people, making sure things are being discussed. Now, in that case, they still should have gone to a proper, full committee, made sure it was addressed in a democratic way, let the opposition talk to certain experts that only the government has access to to make sure that we're getting this right. But they got closer with it, certainly a lot closer than with Bill 6. What scares me here, Madam Speaker, is that we see the government now going back to where they were with Bill 6.

Now, there are not as many problems with this piece of legislation as with Bill 6 from what we've seen so far. The content itself is different, but the consultation portion of it is the same problem. It's the same problem, and over and over and over we have to rise in this House, stand up and say: why are you not doing your job? That's what this amendment does, Madam Speaker. It says: "Stop. You have not done your job. Stop this. Make sure it is not read a second time. Properly consult some people."

I mean, here are some questions. Has the minister – she may have; I don't know the answers to these questions, Madam Speaker – consulted with the Alberta Construction Safety Association? Has the minister talked to the Manufacturers' Health & Safety Association? Has the minister talked to the petroleum health and safety association? Has the minister talked to the new association that is trying to start up for farmers and ranchers as a result of the legislation that was forced through this House by the government with their supermajority? Those are fair questions. The people we're talking to associated with those agencies do not feel that they have been consulted.

Has the government talked to representatives and a variety of different levels of officers in occupational health and safety? Has the minister met with front-line occupational health and safety officers and asked how this would impact their work? It's a fair question. If you haven't, you haven't consulted. It seems logical to me that those would be people that you would address. Has the minister met with some of the leading experts on law in occupational health and safety? What about the Canadian Society of Safety Engineering? Have you met with the Canadian registered society of safety professionals? I'm talking to many people in their leadership that say: no, but we're here.

The WCB side. Have we talked to workers that have been impacted about the consequences of their frustration with the system? Have we brought in large employers or representatives of different levels of employers and talked about how these changes will impact their businesses? Have we made sure that we put in proper portions of this legislation to make sure that we're going to educate people associated with these changes? Do we know that we've fixed the problems?

Here's the one I'd really like to know, Madam Speaker: did they identify the problem they're trying to fix? In my time in the Legislature most of the time the government has not identified the problem they're trying to fix. They're just randomly fixing stuff, and they end up making it worse. The focus so often for this NDP government, just like it is now, is on the ideological portion. When you're dealing with just ideology, you'll sometimes get parts of it right, but you'll be blinded, and you won't realize the other stuff that's going on because you don't want to hear the other part, the other concerns, the things that aren't the NDP world view or don't fit in with the manifesto. Did they identify a problem?

Why is this important, Madam Speaker? Let's talk about Bill 6 because it's a good comparison. We are now two years or so away from the Bill 6 debates. We've still got committee messes, and nobody knows what's going on with Bill 6, but put that aside. The government never clearly identified the problem they were trying to fix at that time. They never made it clear what would be accomplished as a result of their legislation that at the time was going to crush the family farm until the opposition showed up and the good farmers and ranchers of this province came to this place and forced the NDP to pass an amendment. But they never put forward clear objectives and said what they were attempting to fix with this legislation. So do we know if Bill 6 is a success? I would argue that it was not. Nothing has really happened with it because it's bogged down in committees, just like we said it would be. But we would not know.

How do we know how to judge this legislation in the future? How do we know or how does the next government know or how do the next people that sit in these seats know which way they've got to go to adjust what we did? They could say, "Hey, they got that part right; they recognized that issue; that one worked, but they were trying to fix it for this issue, and it didn't work," and they could make adjustments. How do we know? I mean, we just come here and we have a government that continues every day to stand up and randomly throw out legislation without consulting people and then tells the opposition, "Hey, we consulted people." Then the opposition gets called and told: "No. We weren't consulted." Then we're, like: "Oh. Well, which one is it? What's real here? Were they consulted? Were they not consulted?" They try to balance that. Then you come to the Legislature, and you hear the government get the current law so wrong that you get confused.

Then we have a responsibility. We have a responsibility to hold you accountable for the legislation that you're bringing forward, to make sure that you consulted Albertans, to make sure you're bringing in proper legislation, to make sure you're doing it right. If you're not talking to the people that are impacted by it, we don't know if you're doing it right. Then we're getting called by the people that are impacted. They're saying: "No. They're not getting it right. They're not listening to us. They're not talking to us. They only want to talk to people with the NDP world view."

This is too important. This is too important. I get really offended when hon. members across the way get up and try to imply that because we're doing our job and saying that you guys didn't do your job, that means that we don't want people to be safe or that we don't care about safety in workplaces. I remember the first time I was on a large construction project. The tower crane operator took two two-by-sixes and put them across to the building we were working on – and we were probably up 18, 19 storeys by that time – and was walking across them on the flat, back and forth from this tower crane. I remember looking at that and going: "Oh, my gosh. That guy has got a wife and kids at home, and he needs to get home." I want people to get home from work. I care about them. I've got family members who are working out there now.

But this government wants to ram through their ideological portions, only focus on certain aspects of it that are a priority to them. It's fine that it's a priority to you – there's nothing wrong with that – but you've got to recognize that it has other impacts, and you've got to make sure it's right. You know, in my experience, the problem that this government, the NDP Party and the NDP members across the way, has is that they meet with stakeholders, and when the stakeholders say, "No, we don't agree with you; you have this wrong," instead of listening and saying, "Oh, that's an interesting aspect to that; they have a different view of that; what does this individual do for a living, and what experience do they have with that?" they go, "We want nothing to do with you."

They live in a bubble, Madam Speaker. They live in a bubble, and they prove it time and time again, and they've proven it again with this legislation, that they don't want to expand out and hear from other people. And it's sad, because there are many parts of this legislation that are good, that I support. I would like to be able to support the whole thing, and maybe I will be given the opportunity if we go to committee. Assuming that the government is going to continue with their pattern and vote down my reasonable amendment to get this to consultation, then we will continue to do our jobs to try to make this legislation better. Because this government is not listening to the people they should consult with, we will do it for them.

That's what we've been doing the whole time, but it is a heck of a lot more effective if the government does it the right way, if the government includes everybody in the process, if the government takes their time, gets legislation right, makes sure that this will be in place for many years to come and will have the positive impact that they want, and, even better yet, Madam Speaker, as I've already said, if the government identifies the problem they're trying to fix before they fix it.

In my view, the NDP in their time in power have created more problems than they've fixed. It is our responsibility to try to prevent that. We are sent here to hold them accountable, to hold them accountable for ramming through legislation at the end of a sitting and hoping that the opposition just goes: oh, we want to go home. You know what I find funny about that, Madam Speaker? They've been in here with us long enough that they should know we aren't going to go home when we still have to stand up and do our job for constituents. Not one member on this side of the House is scared to consult with people. Not one member on this side of the House is scared to stand up in this House and do his job. Now that we've gotten there, you may try to ram through legislation hoping that we're tired. We'll stay here all night, and we'll do it again tomorrow, because that is our job, and we're proud to do it.

Mr. Barnes: I bought you your Christmas present.

Mr. Nixon: Perfect.

It won't work. You'd think they would learn. I get how they tried that the first time. They thought: "Wow. A rookie opposition, the first fall sitting, heading towards Christmas, and they're missing their families." Most of our members, like some of their members, including you, Madam Speaker, are far away from their families and their homes and their kids. They thought that we would cave on behalf of our farmers and ranchers. They learned, without a doubt that we weren't caving, that we would stand with our farm and ranch community, and we won't cave on this piece of legislation either. We will continue to stand up.

Here we have a piece of legislation and an amendment from me that says: hey, let's stop. That doesn't mean that we don't pass this legislation. That doesn't mean that this is not important or that we don't take the time or that we don't actually accomplish this in the end. What this means is that we say: stop, get it to the right group of people, make sure everybody gets to participate that will be impacted by it, and let's get a good piece of legislation. I strongly think that if this went to a committee process and everybody was allowed to participate, we would have a better law. We would have better legislation that would have a better impact on the people that we're trying to help with this legislation. I also think that if you sent it to a committee, very quickly you would separate the WCB and the occupational health and safety aspects of this bill and deal with them in two different components so that you could do a really good job.

Maybe I'm wrong. Maybe we would go through a consulting process and I'd realize: "Oh, this makes sense. This is a good idea. We should put these two pieces of legislation together." I don't know. I can't see it right now, from the limited time that we've had with this legislation, but if we went through a proper process of consultation, there may be very reasonable reasons for going that way. That's why you consult.

Madam Speaker, when I talk to people about the work that we do here in Edmonton and they realize that legislation could come forward on a Monday and clear this Assembly by Thursday or Tuesday, but often within a week, before any of us who work for the people back home – okay. I work for the people of Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre. The members across the way do not work for the Premier. They work for their constituents and do a good job of it. I don't agree with some of the ways they do it, but I'm sure they're trying to represent their constituents. Then their constituents find out – I know they feel the same way as mine – that they don't even go home and talk to them about a bill as big as this, that this government expects the opposition just to fold and say: yeah, let's pass that.

The minister said: "Don't worry. I called them. It's good. Good, hon. member. We're good to go." Then I'm always so disappointed because my phone starts ringing off the hook, and they say: "No. They don't get it. They missed it completely." We have to continue to stand in this Assembly and do the same thing over and over. It's important that we do it. But what would be more effective is if the government actually took the time, listened to a reasonable amendment like this, and then said: yeah; you know, the opposition has got a point.

The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre pointed out a bunch of people that I had never even thought about that would want to be consulted on this legislation. Some people over on the other side of the House have some expertise in this issue as well. It would be good to hear from some of the people that the hon. member is pointing out. Let's send this through a committee process. Let's make sure that we get this legislation right, and then we can pass it in January.

Until the government can stand up in this House and say, "Here is the economic analysis, here is what we've figured out, this is the impact that it's going to have on people, here are the people that we've properly consulted with, here are their concerns, here is what we're trying to accomplish, here is the purpose of this legislation, this is why we printed a multiple-hundred-page bill in the morning and threw it on your desks and asked you guys to pass this," they haven't done their job.

The biggest question is: why did this legislation take so long to get here in the sitting? They weren't ready. They were putting this legislation together, Madam Speaker, in the middle of the sitting. Hence, why we were going home at 4 o'clock in the afternoon was because the government was not ready to proceed. Then they put that legislation on our desks and said: "Pass it. Trust us. Everything is fine." It's not like the biggest blow-up, the biggest mistake that this government ever made, wasn't already a WCB and occupational health and safety bill. "No, no. Forget about that. We learned our lesson from this one."

When I heard it was coming, the day before, Madam Speaker, I thought: "Oh. Maybe they did learn their lesson. This is going to be interesting. It's going to be interesting to see who they talk to and if they have taken the time to do the job right this time, if they have learned from their mistakes, if they have learned better ways to proceed with this type of legislation." I was sorely disappointed. The same thing.

Less content problems with the bill. There's some really good stuff in this legislation. There was not much in Bill 6 that you could stand up and say was good. In this bill, though, we can stand up and say that some of it is good, but there are problems with it. The government still has not shown that they've consulted, which is why a reasoned amendment has been brought forward in this House by me. Through you, Madam Speaker, to the members across the way: you have not done your job. You have a responsibility. Do your job. There's nothing wrong with taking your time and doing your job right.

If there was an urgent reason in this legislation that this needed to be passed immediately, life and death or significant consequences that were associated with parts of this legislation, why is that not identified and passed right away and then proper work done on this legislation? Why do we go halfway all the time with the NDP government? Why? We're here, two years into their mandate, and we're still losing 12,000 jobs in a month because they're going halfway. They're not doing their job. They're not admitting the problems. They're not identifying the problems and then trying to fix them. They're just randomly throwing out pieces of legislation not fully thought through and then rushing it through the legislative process.

Madam Speaker, if we were in Peace River today, you and I, and we sat in a coffee shop and we told them that the government expected legislation of this magnitude to be passed with only a few hours and a couple days of debate, I know, without a doubt, that they would be shocked to find out that our system works like that. They would be shocked. Most of them would think the government was going through a proper process, was taking time, was consulting with people. Most of them would think that there would be independent experts and people that understand the legislation that we're working with, that would have come as witnesses and would have addressed these issues with members, allowed members to ask questions. Most of them would have thought that we together would go through this bill and go, "This line here: I think there's a mistake here; this doesn't work," through a committee process.

That doesn't happen here. Instead, the government plays games. They put through a couple of bills at the beginning of a sitting. They adjourn, send everybody there, and then they get it all, load it all up, hundreds and hundreds of pages of legislation, dump it all on the members' desks, and then say: "Okay. Let's get out of here. We were scheduled to be out of here on Thursday."

I can tell you that the hon. members of the government, the hon. NDP members across the way, that had the responsibility and the privilege of sitting in opposition in this place in the past didn't like this either. They recognized the problem, rightly so at the time, when the Progressive Conservative government would do this to them. It's not right. Often what we see when we talk about these types of issues is that the hon. members rise, and they say: well, the PCs did it to us.

Madam Speaker, my kids do that to me sometimes. My daughter threw a little toy car at my son the other day when I was down in the basement. When I asked her why, she said: well, he did it to me. What? I get that from 11-year-old twins, but from the government, "The PCs did it to us"? They were wrong when they did it to you. That's why the PCs don't have a party in this House no more. [interjections] That's why the PCs do not have a party no more.

Mr. Coolahan: Because you joined them.

Mr. Nixon: That's correct. I actually want to help the members across the way. They are correct. There is one member who is identified as a PC member in this House, but they do not have a political party no more. I know. I wrote the agreement that oversaw that.

Anyways, the point is that it was wrong. Albertans didn't like it, so why would the NDP continue that behaviour? Their only justification to Albertans – forget about the partisan politics – is: oh, the PCs used to do that, so we'll keep doing that. I mean, it's the oldest story in the book. Two wrongs don't make a right. A lot of people have tried to figure out how to make two wrongs make a right, but it doesn't usually work out. In fact, all of us have probably done it. It doesn't work.

We're talking about something as serious as this, an issue that impacts Albertans, impacts workers, employers. It deals with life and death. When I was last working in safety – it was a long time ago. I left safety a long time ago, Madam Speaker. There used to be a workplace injury or death every three – I could have these stats wrong, but it was high. A workplace death almost every three days – that would have included long-term illness that was associated with work, cancer and those types of things – and an injury, I think, every three minutes. So it's serious. We recognize that. We also recognize if you don't get it right.

I'd like to close with another topic. There is a lot of stuff to talk about in this bill, and we're going to talk about a lot in the days to come, but that's the near-miss aspect of this. The government has talked about near misses as part of this legislation. I think near-miss reporting is important. They used to call it the iceberg kind of idea, that so many near misses would be floating down below like an iceberg, and then the accidents you can see above. It's an important thing. But now with mandatory we went too far, it appears, with what we're doing in this legislation. Do you know how many near misses would get reported on a job site? It's part of it, near misses. You're going to go too far. Then what's going to happen is that organizations are going to try, but employees aren't going to report. There has to be a threshold of what type of near miss; otherwise, that iceberg thing will happen.

So a hammer falls off a scaffold, doesn't hit anybody: that's a near miss.

An Hon. Member: It has to be reported.

Mr. Nixon: Yes. Absolutely. It's already in the safety protocol for the company to report it but not to occupational health and safety.

You know, here's the problem that they're not understanding. I represent one of the largest constituencies in this province, okay? Many provincial parks, two national parks, some of our most precious wildlife resources are there. Our headwaters, waters to almost every town in central and part of southern Alberta, flow through my constituency on the way to the towns that you represent. A big, big area, a beautiful area. Lots of you guys vacation there. I talk to you guys when you go there on rafting or canoe trips. It's a beautiful place to represent. Do you know how many fish and wildlife officers are covering these areas that are larger – larger – than most European countries? Do you know how many are left? One or two in those areas. Occupational health and safety: how many officers are going to be able to come in and deal with hammers falling off a scaffold? These are reasonable questions to ask.

Reporting near misses is important. It's already being dealt with within the safety protocols of companies. Again, you cannot pass a core audit if you do not have a near-miss reporting process in your organization, one of the very first things that an auditor will check when he does a safety audit in order to get your core audit. It already exists. Now you take it so far. What are the consequences of it? Now, there may be a reason. Let's talk about it.

Have we priced out what the increase will be to occupational health and safety as a result of this? Have we priced out what the impact will be to the taxpayer? Then what will be the benefit? It seems to me it would be cheaper to continue to allow the safety associations to address that in their audit protocols and make sure that near-miss reporting is happening and being followed up on. But maybe there's a reason. I would have enjoyed being in the committee and would have heard about the reason. Instead, I'm standing here tonight with a big piece of legislation and being asked to pass it on faith. I'm not going to pass legislation of this magnitude on the faith that this government has got it right because I haven't seen them get almost anything right yet.

This is a government that has been in power for over two years that has had more of a negative impact on the communities and the people that I represent than any government in the history of our province. If they thought that I stood up in this Assembly and just rubber-stamped their legislation on their word, I would sure have a problem in the Sundre A&W Friday, when I get there for a visit. That's not our job, and it's not their job either, Madam Speaker.

Their members who are not in cabinet should be asking the same questions. They should be demanding the same proper consultation process from the government on behalf of their constituents.

We've seen this on so many issues that relate to this. The crime thing was the most recent example, where you've got one side of the House standing up and representing constituents that are being devastated by a situation taking place, and the other side of the House, I know, is worried about it. I know they're worried. I've talked to rural members across the way. I've talked to people from the community. I know they're worried about it. They should be. It's terrible what's happening to people. But they're not up on their feet saying to the government: get it right; fix it.

No different with this bill. They're taking the government at their word. They're taking the hon. minister, who I have a tremendous amount of respect for, completely at her word that she got this right. Open your e-mails. Call your constituency assistants and find out what they're hearing from people on the ground. Talk to some of your largest employers. Talk to some occupational health and safety officers. Call in some national construction safety officers. See how this impacts them. That's your job. Their job, Madam Speaker, is no different than our job, and I think they forget it a lot in this House. I think that's unfortunate. I really hope that this side of the House, when and if they are given the privilege of forming government, don't forget that. It is our job to hold the government, those front seats, accountable for their decision. It is our job to make sure that they make the right decision, that they consult the people in Alberta, that they get legislation right, that they do not go halfway.

Madam Speaker, the members of the NDP Party that are not in government should be just as offended by this process as I am. They should be just as offended that this legislation was dropped on their desks and that they were asked to make decisions for their constituents without proper consultation. They should be just as offended that they don't get to participate to make sure this legislation is done right. They should be just as offended and insulted, in fact more because it's their own party that's doing it to them, bringing in this legislation and demanding that they pass it on trust and showing nothing that they did their job right, showing no economic analysis, showing nothing about consultation, no clear consultation process, all done behind closed doors. Who was consulted? That's not consultation, Madam Speaker.

We spend so much time talking about this in this House, it's ridiculous, but it's become the theme of the NDP government. It's become the theme of the NDP government. We don't consult. We just live inside the dome. We just live inside the dome. We talk to people. I'm just assuming now at this point, Madam Speaker, but they talk to people outside the dome that already believe what they've heard. They limit the people that they communicate with because if they were communicating with the same people that I communicate with all across Alberta, not just in my constituency, they would be hearing these same concerns because I hear it everywhere.

This party on this side of the House just underwent two major campaigns in the last year all across the province: one, to unite the conservative party, to bring like-minded conservatives together, something that has happened in the House; and, second, then to elect the new leader of the United Conservative Party and the next Premier of Alberta, the Hon. Jason Kenney. From one side of the province to another all of us have travelled during that process campaigning for different candidates, campaigning for unity, standing in town halls. I've been in many town halls along the way, and the theme is constant. I've got 22 counties and towns and school boards in my constituency, not counting the small ones like hamlets and stuff, and every one of their councils feels the same way, no consultation. No consultation.

This government is making it up as they go, and they're in charge of one of the largest economies in the world. It's scary. Start doing your job. Madam Speaker, through you to them: start doing your job. For the backbencher MLAs that are across the way, start doing your job. There's nothing wrong with saying: we expect better. There's nothing wrong with saying that when you want to bring a piece of legislation to this House, you will make sure that there's enough time to properly debate it. You won't complain when the opposition does their job and debates it. You will make sure that there are committees and that the job is done right. And most importantly, you will consult Albertans before you bring in laws that apply to them and impact their lives and their livelihood.

That doesn't mean that what you're trying to do is wrong. In this case I think that most of it is pretty good. What's wrong is that you're not doing it right. You're not doing it right. Instead, you come to this House every night once we get to this stage, and you sit there frustrated because we talk too much. Again, Madam Speaker, my wife will probably agree with that.

Well, get up and start talking. Get up and start asking your cabinet ministers what they're doing about this. Get up and start asking what's going on with this bill. Demand better. Demand that the right people are consulted with. Demand that your constituents are consulted with. Demand that this goes to committee. That's what this amendment does. And if the members across the way vote for this, that's what they're doing, saying that we expect better.

The Deputy Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), the hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I know what it's like to be standing in this Legislature speaking, be in the middle of a thought, and then have the timer run out. So I just want to give the member some extra time to finish his thoughts and continue on. Thank you.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you. I think that a few more minutes is helpful. I felt a little bit tight on time there. You know, my point as I was closing, Madam Speaker, to the hon. member's question – I appreciate it – was on the need for all of us, no matter what our political stripes are, which side of this House we sit on, for those of us MLAs that are private members of this place, that are not in cabinet, to have a responsibility to do our job in this place. I don't get in my car on a Sunday night and drive from my beloved Sundre to this place, for a week away from my wife and three kids, my horses, my farm, the places that I love, to sit here and just talk.

We have a responsibility. We have a responsibility to say to ministers when they bring legislation forward here: "Did you get this right? Did you do this? What is going on with this? I think you got this wrong. This is what I've heard from my constituents." That is our job, and it's their job, too, and that's why we're bringing an amendment like this. When a minister, who I respect, brings forward a bill like this and then we find out from many people that they weren't consulted with and we hear comments from their backbencher MLAs that show that they haven't been consulted with, then it is our job, no matter if you're NDP, Alberta Party, or United Conservative Party, to stand up and say: "We expect better. Do better."

We are not going to take bringing in a piece of legislation like this and trying to force it through and then we're just going to rubber-stamp it. The people that elected to send us to this place would be offended, and rightly so, if they thought that's what we were doing. It is not our job to rubber-stamp on this side of the aisle, certainly, and it is not the job of members across the way to rubber-stamp either. They have constituents, just like you and I do, Madam Speaker. They have a responsibility to those constituents to fight for those constituents, to make sure that things are being done right for those constituents, and certainly, at the very least, to represent them in this place and to make sure that they're being consulted with before legislation is passed.

They should be offended, in my mind, Madam Speaker, like I am, which is why I moved this amendment, that this legislation was not properly consulted on. They should be offended that there is no clear economic analysis of the consequences of decisions in there. They should be offended that there is no clear objective with this legislation. They should be offended that the minister and the NDP government have not articulated what they're trying to fix so that we can make sure that the bill, that they propose will fix it, will fix it. They're essentially just saying: "Here's a bill. Pass it." Well, we say: "What are we doing with the bill? What are we trying to fix?" And they say: "Oh, it's good. We talked to people." They should be offended by that.

They should stand up in the Legislature, and they should stand up for their constituents. I'm not saying that they're not representing their constituents back home in their ridings. I don't know that. I assume that most of them are doing that. What I'm saying is that in this place they have a responsibility. They don't get paid to drive here to just sit and do nothing. Their job is to hold the government to account, just like us, and they have a better ability to do it than we do. We will continue to do our responsibility as the Official Opposition, but government private members should do their job, too.

Demand better from your cabinet ministers. Demand better from the government. You guys make them the government. Your Premier is not the Premier if you don't say that she is, so you can demand better from her. You can demand that we get the job done right in this place. Or you can continue doing what you've been doing, which is rubber-stamping legislation without even a peep, which is standing by when important things like rural crime are just punted away or bills like this are put in front of this Chamber without proper consultation. Those are the two choices that are before every member of this House.

The members on this side of the House continue to stand up, and we will right up until the next election is called. I believe, Madam Speaker, that Albertans will fire that government and replace them with this side of the House because of that. But even that – even that – is not why you should do it. You should do it because you took an oath in this place to do it, and you should do your job. You should do your job and not continue to allow this behaviour to go forward.

That is what I was talking about. That is what I think is important. I think that it is a fair point, and it speaks directly to this amendment that I have brought forward in this House.

The Deputy Speaker: On the amendment, the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Are we under 29(2)(a) here? [interjections] We're speaking to the amendment?

The Deputy Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Coolahan: Okay. I will speak to the amendment, then. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

I have to say that that was really impressive from the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre. It was really impressive.

It felt like it was a long, blustery summer's evening, but what ended up happening was that that bluster turned into a tornado. You know how a tornado acts in an urban area, where it hits one house, it misses a few, and then it hits another one? Well, that's kind of what happened there. He got one thing right, got a few things wrong, got one thing right, got a few things wrong. So let's talk about that. [interjections] That was pretty good.

Mr. Gill: That's very disrespectful. Homes are getting affected every day.

Mr. Coolahan: Okay. Anyway, I don't think that was disrespectful at all. I'm telling you that he got some things right and he got some things wrong. That's just the way it is. [interjection] Just calm down over there.

Talking about the amendment here, you know, of course, I don't want to stop. We need to carry on with passing this legislation. Again, we need to talk about that this is not radical, Madam Speaker. It's not radical. This is bringing much of this legislation up to speed with the other provinces. That's not radical whatsoever.

A few of the things that the member got wrong, when I said that he was missing those houses in the tornado, were that, you know, he said it was silly of me to say earlier that because legislation is put forth on harassment, it actually helps the employers, that they couldn't do the job without it. I mean, come on, Madam Speaker. Have you not seen that every other week there is an article in the paper about harassment at a different workplace? Like, two weeks ago there was a series on it. It was huge. Clearly, it's not working, the unlegislated harassment policies in these workplaces. So we are helping employers in that respect, and we are helping employees so that they're safe at work.

The other thing that I believe was incorrect was when he talked about how we already have a right to refuse work, and that is not the case. The actual wording prior to this bill was that an employee has a duty to refuse imminent danger at work. At the risk of repeating myself – I talked about this the other day, too – it's a nuanced difference, and words are very important. So duty and right are very different. We know that from legislation. We know that from collective agreements and from contracts.

What changes when you call it a right rather than a duty is that when workers are assigned a duty to refuse unsafe work as it was, it effectively shifts the responsibility from employers to workers. That's the big difference. Establishing a right to refuse unsafe work improves the ability of workers to protect themselves and others from unsafe work. The changes also protect workers from reprisals for exercising these rights and complying with workplace health and safety laws.

You know, we need to move forward with this legislation. And I understand that the opposition is complaining a lot about this being a big bill, okay? Again, at the risk of repeating myself, WCB and OH and S are intrinsically connected, and it's very logical to put these together. They want to not read this a second time. It's about three pieces: consultation, economic impact, and potential negative impact. I'm going to disagree with that.

In terms of economic impact, administering a joint health and safety committee should not cost employers any more money other than meeting time with employees. Also, I mean, we understand fully that for every one dollar spent on training and safety in the workplace, three dollars are saved because we don't have time off in the workplace for workers.

We need to move forward with this. Sometimes, Madam Speaker, you just need to do the right thing. This is doing the right thing. You know, this all started with Bill 17, the changes to the labour code.

Economic impact, too. I mean, lives are priceless, Madam Speaker. That's why we need to enhance our health and safety policies. You can't put a price on a life. You can't put a price on your husband or wife coming home from work. You can't put a price on your children coming home from work. I mean, really.

We know there will be some costs to WCB, and we are working on that. Most of that won't be implemented until June anyway, six months down the road. So there will be time to work on that.

Again, you know, this is not radical legislation. It does drive me a bit crazy when the opposition talks about how, you know, these are ideological changes. I mean, every government in Canada, do they enhance their . . .

The Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, hon. member, but the House now stands adjourned until 7:30 tonight.

7:30 p.m.

Wednesday, December 6, 2017

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 33 Electoral Divisions Act

Mr. Stier moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 33, Electoral Divisions Act, be amended by deleting all the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 33, Electoral Divisions Act, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the descriptions of electoral divisions referenced in the bill and described in the DVD tabled as Sessional Paper 624/2017 do not adequately provide for the effective representation of rural Alberta.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment December 5: Mr. Loewen]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. When I was last talking on this bill, I was going through, I guess, some of the trials that we see with some of the boundary changes and, in particular, some of the sizes of the rural constituencies. When I look at the minority report from Gwen Day, I want to point to one of her numbered comments here. It says:

3. Unnecessary disruption. In spite of population growth, many existing ridings could have remained unchanged and been within allowable variances both positive and negative. Because of the perceived need to reach voter parity, the final maps include significant changes to most rural and urban boundaries. This disruption, in my view, was unnecessary given the provision in the Act for justifiable variances.

Madam Speaker, the other day I tabled some maps where simple changes were made . . .

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order (29)(2)(a).

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. My hon. colleague got caught there in the middle of a sentence. I wondered if he just might like to finish it.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you. I would love to finish my comments on that. These maps that were tabled in the Legislature the other day redrew the boundaries with minimal disruption. It basically took eight maps to change 21 constituencies, so 66 constituencies remained unchanged. There wouldn't have to be any name changes because there weren't any significant enough changes to change any names, and all of these ended up within the variances that legislation allows. So when we talk about unnecessary disruption, obviously there were simpler ways to do this job and still come up with the same result, which, of course, is making sure that we're within the variances of the legislation.

Now, when we talk about the commission and how they listened to different people that presented, well, I hardly know anybody that's happy with these constituency changes. I don't even think the people in urban Alberta are happy with these changes because they've done a lot of changes that were unnecessary. I think, you know, there are a lot of problems with this and, like I say, unnecessary disruptions, of course.

Now, I do want to point out one thing here. Like I say, when I was speaking before, I talked about the size of my constituency and how I could drive to the Legislature in Edmonton in the same amount of time I could drive to the furthest community in this new constituency, and I'm not even in the furthest south community in the constituency. For me to drive to the Legislature is about a three-and-a-half-hour drive, and to drive up to the Worsley area is three and a half hours the other way. That gives you an idea of the size. Of course, Fox Creek is an hour's drive south of me, so to drive from the furthest communities within the constituency is actually four and a half hours. That doesn't take you to the farthest reaches of the constituency, but they're the furthest communities.

Again, like I mentioned the last time I was speaking, I'm not complaining about my job and what my job would entail. I'm happy to do my job. I'm happy to travel. I'm happy to visit the areas that I represent within the constituency. But I do think somebody should take into consideration the people that are being represented and the communities that are being represented and how they feel about having an MLA that has to represent 71 different communities – 71 different communities – eight different MDs and counties, four First Nations reserves, and this huge expanse of area. Of course, the main point is that it didn't have to be that way.

The relativity of this constituency as it's been redrawn: as far as how the communities relate to each other and travel corridors and different things like that, there's no relativity in it anymore. There isn't anything that the people of Fox Creek, let's say, have with the people of Worsley. Of course, they're all Albertans. They have a lot of things in common, but there isn't anything that they would be doing to ever meet up or have anything, you know, that would correspond with each other.

Now, when I read through the interim report, I was interested to read about some of the people that presented in the report and some of the complaints they had with it. I was interested to read about the Member for Calgary-Klein and what he said about his constituency. I'll just read a couple of paragraphs: while I have no real objection to the proposal of adding the communities on the east side of the Deerfoot, both north and south of 16th Avenue, I do believe that the commission should consider the fact that, like 16th Ave, Deerfoot is a natural boundary that, again, generally is not crossed to participate in school activities. So here he is concerned about crossing the Deerfoot within his constituency. The Deerfoot, for some reason, is this grand barrier, but 400 kilometres is nothing, I guess. I guess I don't understand.

But it goes on. It gets even better, actually: what's more, adding the communities east of Deerfoot and south of 16th Avenue makes the two farthest points at either end of the riding a great distance. It was interesting to look at the map and actually calculate how great a distance this is. Would you like to know how great a distance this is? Well, let me tell you how great a distance it is. Ten kilometres. Ten kilometres.

An Hon. Member: How much?

The Deputy Speaker: He's keeping the House in suspense.

Another speaker to the referral? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to an amendment by my colleague from Livingstone-Macleod in regard to Bill 33, the Electoral Divisions Act. I know that this bill will get passed here. It's just a matter of time before somebody waves the white flag and the government votes on this and the bill gets passed. But I have a job, to represent my constituents of a rural constituency, and I'm going to do my job and try to speak up for rural Alberta.

Madam Speaker, Bill 33 does a disservice to rural Albertans, and for that reason this Chamber should not proceed further with reading of this bill. I'm sorry to have to take this stance, but the Electoral Boundaries Commission took a tack that creates an unfair disparity between rural representation and urban representation. Should we approve the boundaries as proposed by the commission, it will result in a shift from which rural Alberta will never recover.

The crux of the issue is that the commission has decided that voter parity – that is, the principle of one person, one vote – is the be-all and end-all when it comes to redrawing the boundaries. As a result, representing rural Alberta will become more challenging after the next election, and it'll continue down that road in future redrawing of boundaries for the commission is setting a direction for future reviews, too. In other words, Bill 33 makes it impossible for rural MLAs to provide their constituents with the level of representation that they'll want to offer. Bill 33 indicates that it's not just okay, but it will apply in the future, too, because the most important factor for redrawing the boundaries is that populations remain relatively the same between all ridings in Alberta, rural and urban.

This is the first time a boundary commission has taken that stance. Previous ones made an allowance, as the court permits, and the reason for that allowance is that effective representation has been and should continue to be the paramount factor when redrawing boundaries. This report, however, dismisses the challenges of rural representation versus urban representation and even went so far – and all of us know how ridiculous this is – to suggest that rural MLAs could hire staff to drive them around so that the member could work in the vehicle while travelling. When you have statements like that and then you have the commission's first draft, that creates constituencies that run from just outside of Edmonton's border to the Saskatchewan border, you know that there are underlying problems.

Then, Madam Speaker, the commission went back to the drawing board, and while making some admittedly better rural constituencies from the trading patterns and common community interests, it continued the error of holding up population density as the most important factor. A result was the loss of rural constituencies, with growth in urban constituencies. But the real problem is that rural members will have to cover an even larger geographic area as we all know that there's no money to hire staff to drive them around, and if there were, taxpayers would not be happy.

The solution would have been to make effective representation the priority for both urban and rural residents. With that in mind, the boundaries would only have needed some tweaking. Since it is the members in this Chamber who know better than anyone the challenges of this job, it is now our job to correct the wrong that Bill 33 is foisting upon Albertans.

Madam Speaker, Bill 33 should not proceed any further. Alberta is better off with its current boundaries, and the precedent that this bill sets is simply wrong. We must put a stop to it now, or rural Albertans in the future, after the next election and further down the road, will not have the representation that they deserve. Making this assertion takes nothing away from urban Alberta as representation is markedly different and presents its own challenges in our cities. Geography, though, isn't one of those challenges. For the commission not to consider geography as a considerable factor and, in fact, dismiss it in an offhanded manner bodes so poorly for rural Alberta that we must deal with it now, before it is too late.

Now, Madam Speaker, you know, I don't blame the commission. I think they did their good work, and they meant well. I think that if you look back in Hansard to when this commission was set up, I said in this House that, you know, when you're setting up a commission to represent and draw the boundaries for all of Alberta, it would be nice to have people on the commission from all over Alberta. There wasn't one member on that commission from rural, northern Alberta. There are two from the government side, two from the opposition. That has nothing to do with representing all of Alberta. I think that in the future, if the commission was set up to have representation from all over the province, it might do a better job of trying to decide what's best for the province.

You know, not to be partisan or disparaging to any member in the House – I know that everybody works hard – but maybe just something to think about. I know it's been brought up lots, about the sizes of the constituencies in Alberta. We've heard of constituencies from 90,000 square miles to six square miles. Distance has been talked about lots, Madam Speaker, but something else I want people to think about – just think about it – is that the city of Calgary has 14 councillors that represent all of the people in the city of Calgary, and they actually deal with issues affecting the people of Calgary, you know, on a more direct basis than having to deal with the people, yet there are 21 MLAs representing the city of Calgary. So if 14 councillors can do the job, why does it take 21 MLAs?

I know that there are lots of rural constituencies that you can refer to, but I know mine the best. Grande Prairie-Wapiti has 51 councillors that represent that same area and one MLA. So I guess that one rural MLA does the work of 51 councillors whereas in the city it takes 21 MLAs to do the work of 14 councillors. I don't know. You draw the conclusions from that. I don't mean to be partisan or disparaging, but when you just think about what I just said and the numbers, maybe you'll think that this should be done a little differently.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Speaking as one of the former 14 councillors, between 2001 and 2010, as it turns out, I'm not the only one in the House who's a former councillor in Calgary. The government's Finance minister and President of Treasury Board is also a former councillor.

You know what, Madam Speaker? I will say that the hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti has made some good points, and I think they really need to be considered carefully. I would say to the member – I would ask him to say when I give him a chance here: what things are you concerned about? Let me say, because probably nobody else in the world calls it that but me, that it was the 2012 election, when I first came to this place, that I believe was the first time in the history of Alberta that urban ridings outnumbered rural ridings. I refer to it as the TSN turning point. I don't mean to be light about it, but the fact is that it's a shift in the balance of power.

Here's the problem with that. Cities where I represent need to be represented, but rural ridings need to be represented, too, because if Alberta is going to be strong, we need to remember that we're interdependent. While most of the wealth that's generated in Alberta gets administered within the cities, almost all of it gets generated in rural Alberta. So if rural Alberta suffers, Alberta suffers. If urban Alberta suffers, rural Alberta suffers, and then all of Alberta suffers.

I would ask the member if he could enlighten the rest of us here about whether members or citizens in rural Alberta feel the same way, and maybe he could talk about some of their concerns. As this urban member of this House really believes, we need to look after all of Alberta, not just my riding. All of us in all 87 ridings need to worry about all 87 ridings even though we need to get elected in one. I'd like the hon. member to reflect on that if he would.

The Deputy Speaker: Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Good questions. Like I said, I don't mean to be disparaging to MLAs from Calgary or Edmonton or any urban area. I'm just trying to point out that there's a huge difference, and we have to be careful that just population isn't the only reason for drawing constituency boundaries. I mean, I've got seven municipalities. I go to municipal council meetings every year. I meet with all the councillors one on one.

But in rural Alberta my focus isn't to go door-knocking. I get caught up, and I go help some of my colleagues, but in the cities you go door-knocking. If I went door-knocking in rural Alberta, I'd be driving 10 miles, and at every door I went to, I'd have to go in and be a guest for an hour and have a coffee. You don't get anywhere. Madam Speaker, this last weekend I was in a Santa Claus parade. I go to auction sales. There's nothing better in rural Alberta than an auction sale. You get to talk to a thousand of your constituents, and you do it all year round. When it comes to election time, door-knocking isn't where it's at in rural Alberta.

If you do your job for four years and meet the people, get around your constituency, go to rodeos and fairs and auction sales and trade shows, that's how you meet the people. But when I go to a trade show in my constituency, every person there is from my constituency. When you go to a trade show in Calgary, there might be 10,000 people there. Maybe, if you're lucky, there would be a thousand from your constituency, so you don't even know if you're talking to your constituents or whoever you're talking to. In rural Alberta, if you go to an auction sale, you know that everybody there that you're talking to is your constituent. There's a lot better connection.

But if you stretch that out and make it impossible, like I said in my speech, if you start down that slope and we get a little bit this time and next time, you know – I don't know – it might take 20 or 50 years, but pretty soon there are only going to be a couple of us left representing all of rural Alberta. And, as my colleague said, that's where the resources are, that's where the riches are, that's what's growing in Alberta, and that's what's important to building this province. All the oil revenue doesn't come out of the cities even though Calgary thinks they're the oil capital of Alberta. The oil comes out of the rural area.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Good evening. It is a pleasure to rise during the most wonderful time of the year and speak to Bill 33. We have heard a lot of very, very, very good arguments – maybe that's an overstatement – very good encouragement and discussion around this very important issue that's before the Chamber. I want to just encourage all members to think about the impacts and decisions that we make.

You know, oftentimes when we debate particular issues, it's very easy for us to get focused on how it affects the constituency that we represent the most. And while that's a very important role that we have – we're elected by those individuals in our constituency to represent those constituents, to speak on their behalf. We're not addressed by our names but addressed as the name of our constituency because we speak for those constituents. I understand that that's a very important part of our role.

Particularly when we're talking and thinking about Bill 33, it's quite easy to think about how it affects the constituency we represent. But this evening I'd like to encourage members of the Assembly to take a very broad view, not just thinking about the nuances of their constituency but of our whole province. How does it have a positive or negative impact on our province? Certainly, this particular piece of legislation has a major, major impact on rural Alberta and, as such, a major impact on our entire province. I encourage members to think about that as they are voting on this particular motion, this motion that essentially states that the Electoral Divisions Act be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the descriptions of electoral divisions referenced in the bill and described in the DVD tabled as Sessional Paper 624/2017 do not adequately provide for the effective representation of rural Alberta.

I think it's important that as we take a look at that motion and consider the fact that the commission – while I appreciate the work that the commissioners did, it is important that we consider what it means for rural Alberta, not just for rural Alberta but effective representation, which in many respects is a tenet of our Westminster democracy. It is so, so, so critical that we maintain those traditions that have been enshrined both in legislation as well as in case law and then through Supreme Court rulings to make sure that this very important clause of effective representation is considered.

You'll know, Madam Speaker, from being part of the debate over the last number of days, that many strong cases have been made that effective representation is not, in fact, a key tenet of what the commission did. I think that we ought to take some time to fix this problem. One of the ways that we can do that is to not make Bill 33 into law. Some would say that because the commission did their report, because the commission went out and travelled around the province, we only have the option of accepting the report. Well, that's just not true.

I think that we need to focus on what our job here is to do, and that is to represent all Albertans. In this case the legislation said: effective representation. That is not what has been delivered. So I think that we owe it to Albertans to make sure that that's what we deliver. I encourage all members of the Assembly to vote in favour of this motion so that we can make sure that over the next generations effective representation remains an important tenet here in our Westminster democracy.

Let's just talk a little bit about rural Alberta and what that means and why it remains to be important. I think that in Commissioner Day's minority report she did a wonderful time, or a wonderful job – I'm sure she had a wonderful time – of describing the importance of rural Alberta and what it brings to the mosaic that is Alberta. And she does a wonderful job speaking specifically about the Charter and case law that lays the foundation for this effective representation tenet. It's a tenet that really has built our democracy. I know that folks in the city – and not all folks in the city, so that was a widespread generalization. But I know that there are a number of folks in the city who believe that because they have a slightly larger population in any one electoral division or another, there is a disproportionate amount of representation, but in fact the legislation provides for variances.

I'd like to talk a little bit about those variances and how they impact rural Alberta compared to the constituency size. If you look at a constituency, Madam Speaker, like Calgary-North, it has a population variance of minus 16; Calgary-North East has a population variance of minus 14; Calgary-South East, minus 14 as well. Just in the name of fairness, there are a couple of constituencies inside Calgary that have a population variance of plus two digits as well: Calgary-Bow, plus 10; Calgary-Falconridge, 13. Those are the only two in that case.

I don't want to just highlight the minuses, but in this case you have a double-digit minus population variance in three constituencies in the city of Calgary. While I can appreciate that some of those constituencies will grow between now and the next Electoral Boundaries Commission, I also have some significant reservations that when you compare it to some more rural constituencies – even Spruce Grove-Stony Plain is a 10, Bonnyville-Cold Lake, that I've highlighted on a number of occasions, is plus 15, the largest population variance of all constituencies, with a population of 53,809. Not only is it the largest population, but it also is in the top third of largest land areas. That should be concerning for all of us, that we're not going ahead and utilizing the population variances in rural Alberta to be minuses or slightly minus, making up for some of the additional tasks and the amount of travel that a rural MLA has to do.

As such, Commissioner Day spoke specifically about these variances and the use of these variances and how Supreme Courts have found these variances to be reasonable and within the limits. I just believe that in order to make sure that Alberta remains strong, all of the sectors of Alberta need to remain strong, and by sectors I mean regions, urban, rural, and what I like to refer to as rural as well, these smaller cities that have significant impact on rural Alberta or that service large portions of rural Alberta.

When you have a strong rural Alberta, you have a strong urban Alberta, and I think that making sure that we don't diminish the value and the voices in rural Alberta but that we celebrate those is so critical to the success of our province. Even if you look from an industrial perspective, the industries that fund so much of our government, including the foundations of that – the education system, our health care system, our social services, this very Assembly – much, much, much of the revenue that is generated is, in fact, generated in rural Alberta. So it's important that we have this effective representation in rural Alberta.

You know, so much of Alberta's prosperity can be tied back to the amazing hard work and dedication of our folks in rural Alberta, and overreliance on voter parity and keeping the variances within 5 per cent in the cities – and I think Edmonton is a great example of that: Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, minus 1; Edmonton-Castle Downs, minus 1; Edmonton-City Centre, 2; Edmonton-Decore, 5; Edmonton-Ellerslie, 3; Edmonton-Glenora, minus 3; Edmonton-Gold Bar, minus 3; Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood, minus 7; Edmonton-Manning, 3; Edmonton-McClung, minus 5; Edmonton-Meadows, the only double digits in all of Edmonton, 11; Edmonton-Mill Woods, 7; Edmonton-North West, minus 3; Edmonton-Riverview, minus 3; Edmonton-Rutherford, 1; Edmonton-South, minus 2; Edmonton-South West, minus 2; Edmonton-Strathcona, zero; Edmonton-West Henday, minus 8; Edmonton-Whitemud, zero.

This overreliance on getting these city numbers so close to parity has actually come at a cost for rural Alberta, three seats in rural Alberta. In fact, rural Alberta has been weakened as a result of it. You don't have to just take my word for it. You can take the words of the AAMD and C, who spoke about this very issue and some of their concerns around the weakening of rural Alberta and about what fewer voices around the cabinet table or around the government table or even around the legislative table means for rural Alberta. This is at a time when our economy is already in turmoil. Much of the turmoil has been created by the government, and I can tell you – I mean, I don't have to tell you. You know, Madam Speaker, being from a rural riding – and members of the government know that rural Albertans are feeling like this government doesn't take them seriously.

I get that the government didn't write the report – I'm not suggesting that they did – but the government does have the ability to say: "You know what? No. We're not going to accept the report as it was presented." Then they have some decisions to make about whether or not we go back to the drawing board, we have a new commission, we decide to delay the whole process until after the next general election and keep 87 members, whether we ask to reduce the number of constituencies. There are a lot of options, but rural Albertans have a real sense that the government doesn't take them seriously, and I know that we've highlighted a lot of issues in this Chamber about that.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: You know, in hearing my colleague explain to this Legislature that rural Alberta is critical and that we need to make sure we get this right the first time, I have to say that it's disappointing to see this bill, like the other bills that have just come in right at the end. What we're looking at here are some very large bills all coming in just before we finish the sitting of the House. That means that we don't have time to actually be able to take this bill in its final form – because there were changes made. Albeit they were minor changes, still changes were made to the recommendations the boundary commission had put forward.

Now, in our case I have to say that I actually will thank the House leader for co-operating on one of those changes, which was to make sure that "Bonnyville" was added to the name of the new constituency. I'm thankful for that. Thank you, Minister. In the end, it was named Cold Lake-St. Paul, and the new name is now going to be Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul. Again, you know, I do see that the government was willing to work with some of the MLAs that had significant townships lose their description within the boundaries commission, and it's good that they were willing to work with us on that.

What's disappointing here is that they're not willing to work with the fact that our boundaries have changed so significantly, especially with Bonnyville-Cold Lake, that it now makes it almost impossible for an MLA to effectively represent their constituency. You heard my colleague. He was outright saying that the new constituency of Bonnyville-Cold Lake-St. Paul is now going to be the largest constituency within Alberta for population over average. That's unbelievable. It's unbelievable that we have constituencies in rural Alberta that are larger than the provincial average. Not only is it unbelievable that it's larger, but it is the largest constituency above the provincial average. How a commission can justify that and sleep at night is beyond me. I will tell you that when it comes to effective representation, Bonnyville-Cold Lake's change goes against everything that I believe the commission should have brought forward.

If there is a legal challenge when it comes to Alberta's boundaries, it's going to be my constituency that's going to lead that charge because of what's been done by this boundary commission. It's shameful. We need to step back. We need to vote for this reasoned amendment, that says that this is not okay, that this whole boundary commission report is treating rural Alberta unfairly. I will admit – I will admit – that the commission worked very hard on this report, but putting voter parity first, above all else, was not doing an adequate job when it comes to making sure that effective representation is for all Albertans.

To the member: do you feel that we are moving in the right direction? Have we set a precedent that Alberta now will follow, where rural Alberta is treated unfairly?

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Cooper: Well, I thank you for your comments. I'm not entirely sure about the precedents, particularly because each commission does get to be the master of their own domain, but I do think that we are on a very dangerous road if we don't take proactive steps to ensure that rural Alberta remains a strong, vibrant voice in the province.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's my honour to stand and speak on Bill 33. Every member of this House should take this seriously – I'm sure they all do – not only for the sake of their own political and personal future but, rather, because they care about the future of Alberta. I've no doubt that every member of this House, from all sides, does care very much about the future of Alberta. Otherwise, they wouldn't be here.

That's kind of the nature of what I'd like to talk about here, what is in Alberta's best interest. What's in Alberta's best interest politically is to have people represented well across the province so that every voice is heard. Every voice matters, and every voice has value, and that can be demonstrated and represented in this important House, in this important room where we are right now. One needs to consider more than one variable when you're talking about that, and therein, I believe, lies the problem.

The boundaries commission, bless their hearts, did what we asked them to do. We asked them to look at all of Alberta, to take submissions from across Alberta and put together a plan to set boundaries for the next election, and they were successful in doing that. On that basis, we should say thank you to them.

Part of the issue there – and it's not their fault, but I think that this is a lesson for us. The next time this happens, perhaps we should give the boundaries commission a little bit more detailed instruction than what we gave them this time. What I mean by that is that they felt free to – and they were free to – make the decision on the boundaries almost exclusively on the one variable about the population variance between ridings. I have no doubt that in their minds and in their hearts they really felt that that was the right approach to take. You know, an argument can be made that all votes are equal, so that is expressed in the same number of voters per elected MLA.

The problem is, Madam Speaker, that that's actually not the reality. The problem is that out of 87 ridings, some probably had 40 per cent voter turnout – I know the statistics are in the report – and some probably had 60 per cent turnout. So right there the Albertans that expressed their franchise by voting, if they happened to be voting in a riding where only 40 per cent voted, would actually have their vote, just on that one variable alone, having more weight than somebody voting in a riding that had 60 per cent of people coming out to the polls.

Why do I say this? I say this to demonstrate, I think quite obviously, that parity in the number of voters does not guarantee equality of weight of the vote for the people that exercise their franchise by coming out to the polls and making an X beside the candidate of their choice, of their selection. There are other examples I could give, but time is short. I have more to say than the time allows. I'll live with that one illustration to prove, in my view, that the same number of voters in each riding is in and of itself and all by itself not a guarantee of the equal value, the equal weight of each vote.

The other thing that needs to be understood and, I believe, embraced and dealt with is the idea of access, access of the voters to their MLA, access of the MLA to their voters. This matters. If you look at the report, they do make some comments about my presentation when they were in Calgary. I expressed to them then that in my riding of Calgary-Hays I can essentially walk across my riding in two and a half hours the long way and in probably one hour the short way, because it's not a perfect square or a perfect circle. Well, there are ridings in this province where, if you were to walk across it, it might take a season. It might take three months. In fact, it would take longer to drive across some ridings than it does to walk across mine. Why is that important? It's not about me. I used the example of my riding simply because it's obviously the one I know best because that's where I work to represent the people there.

The problem is that if you want to express your concerns to your Member of the Legislative Assembly, even in this age of voice mail and video chats and video calls, sometimes, many times, actually, there is no replacement for a face-to-face conversation in private with somebody about things that matter to you, because all the members of this House know that when people come to our offices, they don't just talk about wanting a road or a bridge or a hospital or a school – and all those things are hugely important – but sometimes they want to talk privately about: "My family member can't get into the hospital for an operation that my family member needs, and it's life or death." Sometimes you want to look the person in the eye that you're having that conversation with, and sometimes it's helpful to the MLAs to look the constituent in the eye when they're having that conversation so that they can really empathize – feel the joy, feel the pain, feel the concern, whatever the case may be – with that constituent, and you just can't do it unless there's access for the people to their MLA and for the MLA to the people. So distance matters a lot.

I mean, there's a bill in front of the House now, which I won't discuss. I'm not going into another bill, but as an example, Workers' Compensation Board claims: when somebody comes in with a personal Workers' Compensation Board claim, sometimes there are personal details involved that somebody may not feel comfortable doing over a video call, over a fax machine, or over an e-mail. Sometimes they're more comfortable if they can sit with their Member of the Legislative Assembly and know that that member is giving them their full and undivided attention by looking them in the eye and being in the same room with them.

In a small urban riding it's fairly simple as long as you can get an appointment with your MLA and your MLA shows up for the appointment because you can probably get there, if you live in the riding, if you have access to an automobile, in some cases, in many cases in 10 minutes and in most cases in no more than half an hour. But if you are from a part of Alberta that's on the border of British Columbia, on the border of the Northwest Territories, on the border of Saskatchewan, or on the border of the United States, you can't necessarily get there easily in half an hour, to where your MLA's office is. Further to that, it gets doubly complicated because your MLA may well be coming back from Edmonton after a sitting or a meeting in the capital and the MLA isn't even in their own riding as much because they have to travel four or six hours to get back, where they can have that access.

This report did not seem to give any weight to those many, many, many circumstances. The person with the WCB claim in Slave Lake is just as important as the person with a WCB claim in downtown

Edmonton and equally as important as the person in Rocky Mountain House, the person in Milk River, or Pincher Creek. All those files are equally important, yet they don't have equal access to their MLA as the riding gets bigger and their MLA gets further from the capital, and this report has ignored all of those important considerations.

That's why I say that the next time we do this, we probably need to give the people doing the report a little bit more instruction, to say: these things matter, too. We didn't, but because we didn't doesn't mean we should approve a report that is gravely short in consideration of these things, because if we do, we're saying to those Albertans that live near the geographical edge of the province – I think many of us consider where we live to be the centre of the universe, whether you're on the Alberta-Montana border or you're in downtown Edmonton, but the fact is that you are farther away from your MLA and have a tougher time talking about your health considerations, getting access to child care support, getting medical attention.

It's not the same, and this report treats it the same, which makes the report flawed, which makes the report not adequate. It actually doesn't disparage but it shortchanges rural Alberta in a very big way. And even those of us in urban Alberta that represent urban ridings, as I do, should care about this, should give it their full consideration, their full care, the full weight of their thought before they vote on this.

I know there are members on the government side that voted against the other report. The only comment I'll say about that is that I know there are members on the government side that I believe have the same concerns that I do. I'd like to think every member on the government side has the same concerns that I do, and I'm prepared to believe that they do. I'm prepared to believe that they do. I'm prepared to believe that every member on the government side cares as much about rural Alberta as they do urban Alberta because, whether you're asleep, whether you're awake, whether you live in urban or rural Alberta, all these issues matter. Correct, members?

That's why I would ask members to think, before they support this report, which has so many important shortcomings, of how this is flawed, how we can do better, how members of this House can say that this report isn't good enough. The rural members can say, "Darn it; I'm going to stand up for my constituents because it isn't fair to them," and the urban members can say: "Darn it. Sure, I support most directly the people that vote for me, but I take responsibility for all 4.3 million, approximately, Albertans because the considerations in this House affect all 4.3 million Albertans, and I do not want my Alberta brothers and sisters shortchanged." I really believe that that is something that we should all consider heavily.

There are so many examples, Madam Speaker. You know, I touched on some of them. You don't necessarily – in fact, it may not even be a family member. It may be yourself as a constituent, that you have some medical issue that's quite personal. A lot of medical issues are. I'm not going to be indelicate here, and I'm sure you're all grateful for that. The fact is that some things are personal. With some things, it's a lot to discuss it with one other human being, let alone over a telephone line, over an e-mail, over even a video call. Sometimes you actually need to look your Member of the Legislative Assembly, who works for you, in the eye and say: you need to understand how much that means to me, how much that means to my family, how much that means to my community.

The equality of that access is barred by the current form of this report. I know for sure that wasn't the intention of the people that wrote it, at least as sure as I can be without spending hours talking to them, because I'm making the assumption that all their intentions were good. Surely they did the job we asked them to do in terms of producing a report, and, bless their hearts, they produced a report. But they don't have the same experience as the people in this Legislature do. Consequently, they couldn't possibly know how important it is to have access between MLAs and their constituents, between constituents and their MLAs. This report falls woefully short. Not a little bit short; way short.

You know what? Again, I've talked to several members of my riding who are comfortable with the position I'm taking, that say: "No. We think that with 20-odd MLAs in Calgary and 20-odd MLAs in Edmonton and otherwise, there is a very high chance that urban Alberta's interests will be represented adequately." I haven't had one yet that said: "To hell with rural Alberta. Let 'em not be represented." No one feels that way, yet this report opens the door to treating rural Albertans that way.

That is why we ought not support the report in its current form, because Albertans understand that we're in this together. They understand that if rural Alberta fails and gets poor service, that hurts urban Alberta, and they understand that if urban Alberta fails and gets poor representation, that hurts rural Alberta. It's not an us-and-them thing. We ought not make it an us-and-them thing in this House.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. My colleague was cut off during his sentence there. I would love to hear the rest of it.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I was waiting for you to recognize me. I just want to say that I feel so strongly that we should have what I believe is the same heart as Albertans. They don't want to put themselves in front of their fellow Albertans. I think they're happy to work with their fellow Albertans as a province to win or lose, to succeed or fail, to swim or sink, however you want to put it, as a group. I believe that Albertans, being the generous-of-spirit people that they are, the kind, caring, compassionate people that they are, do not want to see another part of their province suffer for their own benefit.

I'll tell you what else they don't want. They don't want to see another part of Alberta suffer to not give them more benefit. If you talk about the urban-rural comparison right now, urban Alberta already has, before we make any changes, more than half of the seats. You know, in a democracy it goes by the weight and the power of the votes, so urban Alberta already has, by virtue of population, the upper hand, if you will. I haven't heard any urban Albertan clamouring to me, saying: let's take it to those rural Albertans. Rather, they would say: "Let's work together. We want our rural partners to succeed. We want our rural partners to have adequate representation for health care, adequate representation for education, adequate representation for social services, adequate representation for transportation and infrastructure building."

They want their fellow Albertans to be well looked after because, on top of everything else, Albertans are pretty social people. I think you'd be hard pressed to find somebody in rural Alberta that doesn't have somebody they love in urban Alberta, and I think you'd find it almost impossible to find somebody in urban Alberta that doesn't have somebody they love in rural Alberta. So since Albertans don't want this to be an us-or-them thing, why would we make it an us-or-them thing in this House? It's not what the people we represent want. I don't think it ever has been. I don't think it ever will be.

This an opportunity for us representatives of all Albertans. Yes, we all represent our own ridings, but every single one of us also represents all of Alberta. This is an opportunity for us to reflect the Alberta spirit of holding together, pulling together, working together, getting access to their elected people together, getting services that matter to Albertans together. Why would we not support that? I don't think there's anybody that's elected in this House that doesn't care about the whole province, yet if we pass this report, we're allowing a report to be passed that really favours one part of the province heavily over the other. That alone is a reason not to support this bill as it is.

It's not the government's fault. The government, like us, should have perhaps given different instructions to the committee. The opposition should have jumped up and said: we need to give them different instructions. You know what? We're all in this together. None of us did that. Even in this, we're together. Even in this, I can't say that it's the government's fault. In my view, even in this, the government can't legitimately say that this is the opposition's fault.

But what we can do together is to look at the report. What we can do together is to care about all Albertans. What we can do together is to say to Albertans: you all matter. There are no spare Albertans. There are no Albertans that can wait a little bit longer to get their question answered on health care, on education, on social services, on infrastructure, on child support payments, whatever it happens to be that we do. We all know what the important files are because we all have people coming into our offices every week dealing with these important files. I'm telling you that this urban representative in this House doesn't have any problem voting against this report to make sure that rural Alberta doesn't get trampled. All urban members of this House should vote against this report out of solidarity with their urban colleagues, with their urban fellow citizens. This is our opportunity to do just that. Please don't support this report.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other hon. members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Well, I have to say that I believe that this commission – while I feel that they believe they did the right thing, I want to go through why I believe they have failed my constituency.

Now, I want to start with the fact that in the commission's report it starts off with something that is important to recognize, legal requirements. Legal requirements are right underneath there, on page 7 of the boundaries report.

In undertaking this work, the Commission is obliged to meet the requirements of the Act and to give due consideration to decisions of the various courts, including the Supreme Court of Canada and the Alberta Court of Appeal, regarding the creation of electoral division boundaries.

You know, I'm going to go through section 14. This is a clear sentence here on direction that I believe this Legislature gave this commission. I don't believe that there was a lot of leeway in this, the leeway they took, so I want to go to 14.

In determining the area to be included in and in fixing the boundaries of the proposed electoral divisions, the Commission, subject to section 15, may take into consideration any factors it considers appropriate but shall take into consideration . . .

And then it goes into (a) to (h). Very clear: "shall." It must – it must – take these into consideration. These were not optional. I believe that we gave a clear direction to this boundaries commission, which it ignored, and that is failure.

Now, I'm going to start with (a), which is effective representation, "the requirement for effective representation as guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms." I along with seven colleagues wrote an article, that I will table tomorrow, that was called Effective Representation. We actually put some thought into this after the interim report. I'm not going to read the whole thing because I don't believe that that's going to help, but I will read parts of it.

Electoral boundaries are supposed to be determined by two things – population and extenuating circumstance. To calculate an average population per riding, the people who establish electoral boundaries take the total population and divide it by the number of ridings allowed by the legislature. This average is intended as a start-point or rough guideline only.

The second thing Alberta's electoral boundary people must do is obey the law, which obligates them to propose electoral boundaries that ensure "effective representation." This rule makes provision for extenuating circumstances such as distance, geography, etc. This is so important that Alberta's Electoral Boundaries Act actually says that to accommodate this objective, the population from one riding to another can "vary" by as much as 25%.

It's pretty clear.

Moving on further down in this article that we wrote:

"Effective representation" simply recognizes that some urban MLAs can drive across their constituencies in half an hour or less, and often have no requirement to interact with town councils, school boards, or junior governments. Conversely, in many rural ridings, not only is distance a factor, but [the] MLAs may have dozens of town councils with whom they have to interact, plus several school boards, [municipalities] or county councils, and multiple hospital boards.

The failure of Alberta's [Electoral Boundaries Commission] to establish "effective representation" in its recent recommendations for constituency changes prior to the next Alberta election has some observers suggesting that the Commission has circumvented an earlier decision by the Supreme Court of Canada. This was a 1991 ruling recognizing the importance of "effective representation." The EBC is proposing changes that would eliminate two rural ridings while increasing the size of rural districts.

That is what effective rural representation is. I don't believe that this commission adequately took that into account.

[Mr. Sucha in the chair]

Now, moving on to (b), "sparsity and density of population," it's clear what they did. They divided our province, the population, by 87 and said: this is where we need to be. Clearly, this is the only factor that they have used. That's what it appears to me.

"Common community interests, community organizations, including those of Indian reserves." I have to say that when I presented before the commission, I had said that St. Paul and the Saddle Lake reserve needed to be put into the same constituency because they interact with each other. They have common interests. But also we've got a lot of area around St. Paul. What the commission did was that they lumped St. Paul and Saddle Lake into my constituency. Wonderful people. I'm honoured to represent them possibly one day, but the question is: is it effective representation? I'll tell you that my constituency right now is 15 per cent above the average population when you would expect a rural constituency to be below. That's truly shameful.

The other thing is Métis settlements. You need to be considering Métis settlements. I have two of those in my constituency.

Moving on to (d), it's talking about Edmonton and Calgary, which isn't relevant to my speech.

“Wherever possible, the existing municipal boundaries.” What happens here is that we need to be saying: can we take counties and municipal districts and put them within one constituency boundary? One constituency boundary. In that way, we’re not splitting one MD between several different MLAs. One common interest, one common voice.

Now, “the number of municipalities and other local authorities.” This is actually in it. It says that we need to consider this, that we need to consider the number of municipalities and school boards and hospital boards and all these other boards that are within these constituencies. It’s unfortunate that they ignored this.

“Geographical features, including existing road systems.” Well, I can tell you that my constituency almost, if not for sure, doubled in size. They doubled the size of my constituency. That’s unbelievable.

Let’s talk about the last one, “the desirability of understandable and clear boundaries.” This is another one that is important. This is something that says that we need to clearly make sure that people understand the boundaries they’re in.

To go through this, the boundary commission said: “Well, you know what? We’re going to explain away what we believe is important.” Number 1 on the general reasons for majority recommendations – you’re not going to believe this – is relative voting power and voter parity.

The majority supports the following recommendations because they result in minimum variance from the provincial average electoral division population after consideration of all other relevant factors related to the effective representation within Alberta.

They’re saying that this is the biggest, the most important thing, and that is not what section 14 says. Section 14 says that there are a lot of very important things that need to be considered. That’s why I am saying that this commission has failed horribly.

Now, I’m going to go on to some of the rural concerns. This is number 2. What we’ve got here are direct quotes from the boundary commission, Mr. Speaker.

While increased geographic size will likely increase the number of elected officials, community organizations and others with whom an MLA must connect, the majority is not satisfied that the resulting demands have been shown to significantly exceed those placed on MLAs serving [in] smaller geographic areas, including those in cities. Each riding, no doubt, imposes its own particular claims on an MLA’s time and resources; the majority does not accept that these demands increase only with an increase in geographic size.

This actually says the exact opposite of section 14, what they were mandated to follow. They actually put this in here. It’s unbelievable.

Now I’ll go on to another one.

While consideration of “common community interests” is such a factor, most existing electoral divisions outside of Edmonton and Calgary do not contain a single common community in total, or individually. These existing 43 electoral divisions together contain 16 cities, along with the large metropolitan areas [such as] Sherwood Park and Fort McMurray. Some are primarily agricultural in focus, but others [are] oil and gas . . . or a forestry, mining or tourism focus or some combination of all these factors. As a result, the majority could not conclude that those Albertans living outside of Edmonton or Calgary share a common community of interest for that reason alone or that each of these 43 constituencies share a common . . . interest one with the other.

So they literally just said, “I’m going to ignore more of section 14,” more of the mandate we gave them. It’s unbelievable that they even put this in the report because it actually says the exact opposite of what we gave them as a mandate. It’s unbelievable. It’s truly unbelievable.

What we’ve got here is the next one.

The core concern that a reduction in the number of constituencies located in rural areas [within] the province will reduce the rural “voice” in the legislature, with the result that rural concerns will command less attention and fewer resources than they have in the past, was frequently raised. The inevitable result of applying the principle of representation by population as a relevant factor to constituency design is that as population shifts, the electoral divisions will also shift to ensure that all Albertans are effectively represented. To do otherwise would be to make some voices disproportionately louder than others, defeat the principle of representation by population and impede the effective representation in urban constituencies.

They literally, again, hammered section 14. This is unbelievable, that this is even in their boundary commission report. How can you say that your mandate is to follow section 14 yet throw out everything you don’t like other than voter parity?

Now I want to go on to the one that I think is most important.

Further, where constituency size is large, satellite offices can be opened within it. This assumes that sufficient budget has been provided to their MLAs to allow for the hiring of staff and paying of additional expenses to meet these needs. While the funding model for MLA office budgets is well outside the jurisdiction of this Commission, improvements addressing the specific costs of additional staff and the operation of satellite offices for remote constituencies would certainly help voters in geographically large electoral divisions feel that they can more easily access the services of their MLAs.

Wow. They actually just mandated us to do something. That’s remarkable. The commission had the incredible – they feel they have so much power in this that they can ignore section 14 and totally disregard it, and then they mandate us to do something, that we need to give more money to rural Albertans so that we can do our jobs. You know what? In the end, it comes down to the fact that they had decided that voters per electoral division was of the utmost importance. How? How can they justify this report?

The Acting Speaker: Questions under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, I think we can just about all agree that our Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake is certainly passionate about the Electoral Boundaries Commission and what happened to his riding. I’d certainly like to hear, as I think we all would, some more of what went on and what he believes has happened.

Thank you.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I’ve kind of explained what happened with my constituency, but you know what? Unless you hear some of the numbers, hear what the actual boundaries commission wrote about Bonnyville-Cold Lake, it’s hard to actually believe how poorly they’ve treated my constituency and other rural constituencies across Alberta.

It is recommended that the boundaries of the electoral division of Cold Lake-St. Paul be as shown on Map 56, resulting in a population of 53,809 [people], 15% above provincial average population size. The majority believes this variance can be supported as this is an area where future population growth is likely to fall . . . below the provincial average.

I don’t remember seeing in the boundaries commission’s mandate to start speculating on where populations were supposed to go. I understand that they are allowed to consider other things, but they disregarded most of section 14, in my opinion. Yet somehow they have made the determination that my constituency is going to shrink. I cannot believe that they can do this, make a determination without actually backing it up with any factual evidence.

I can tell you that I put forward factual evidence to the committee, when I presented before them, that my constituency was going to grow beyond the provincial average – that was during the interim report period – yet somehow they determined that my constituency was going to shrink. Now, the only reason that I can come up with is that they determined that the NDP government's attack on my energy centre in Bonnyville-Cold Lake was going to literally put me out of business, if you will. It literally will destroy the towns and cities within my constituency. That's the only determination that I can come up with. It's unbelievable that they were allowed to make a determination like this with no facts. Unbelievable.

It is also a constituency that would be relatively small in geographic size, with the uninhabited Air Weapons Range being a large part of its geography. It is expected that by the time the electoral boundaries are next reviewed, the constituency population will be at or below the provincial average.

So now they're saying that because I had a smaller rural constituency, that makes up for the fact that they added a whole bunch of population to it, not the fact that a smaller rural constituency just has a lot more people in it.

The fact that we have a diverse group of different, incredible cultures within my constituency: this all was ignored. This was all supposed to be part of the government making a decision. This is why I'm telling you that should there ever be a court challenge on the validity of the boundaries commission and this report that they put out, they're going to use Bonnyville-Cold Lake to do that court challenge because what they've done to my constituency is an abomination. Fifteen per cent above the average population in Alberta is just unreasonable. Making unfactual determinations was well outside of the mandate.

It is unbelievable that we are here at this time debating this. What we should have done is vote down the motion that brought this forward. We should have said, "Let's throw this out; let's go with the old constituencies," because at least that's something we can work with. I'll tell you that I believe this boundaries commission dropped the ball, and it literally threw a ton of rural constituencies to the mercy of the wolves.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The Member for Peace River.

Ms Jabbour: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I felt that I had to say something tonight given that I'm the MLA representing the largest by square kilometres constituency in the province, which has now become even larger. It now, in fact, is larger than the island of Newfoundland, which I think gives some people pause.

That said, I don't personally have a lot of disagreement with the recommendations for my own constituency. Grimshaw was added, which makes sense. They already come to my office in Peace River because it's much closer for them. It's only, like, a 20-minute drive as opposed to an hour's drive to get to Fairview. Tallcree First Nation: it's the same thing with them. It's much more convenient for them to come to Fort Vermilion, and I have these interactions. So the changes make sense, but it doesn't make sense to make it so big that it makes it even harder for me to be an effective representative. I do absolutely agree with the mover of this motion that the changes recommended "do not adequately provide for the effective representation of rural Alberta." But at the same time I'm torn, and I'll tell you why I'm torn.

I have to say, though, about the commission that I attended their very first hearing up in Peace River. I didn't go to make a presentation. I just simply was going to be there to support it. But when they discovered that the local MLA was there, they had all kinds of questions. I tried, in answering their questions, to give them a sense of what it is like to be a rural MLA and to represent such a large area. I tried to give them a sense of the hours and hours and hours that I spend on the road driving. My constituency easily – and this is when roads are good – is six hours from south to north, six hours from east to west. That's just to get from one end to the other. That's not counting all of the areas in between. In winter you can multiply that by whatever, just depending on what roads are like. So it's huge. Recently I think I logged 2,000 kilometres over one weekend.

Those are hours where I'm not being an effective MLA because I'm in my vehicle driving. Yes, I listen to books on tape. I convert reports and things so that I can listen to them. I'm trying to learn French. I'm trying to be productive with it. But it's not me representing my constituents when I'm travelling on the road. I know that that's true of the other rural MLAs as well, so it's a huge consideration. I did try to help the commission understand that, and I believe that they were really, sincerely trying to do their job. I respect what my colleague here from Calgary-Hays has said, that, really, they were working with what they were given. They were given a mandate, and this is how they interpreted the mandate.

I also explored with them possibilities of some alternative things. If you're representing a large rural constituency, what other ways could you be effective? Could you do it with technology? I said that, absolutely, you could. There are ways to do those things. That's also true, though, of urban constituencies. You can use technology. You don't have to be face to face. In rural constituencies technology isn't all that reliable, and I did tell the commission that. There are areas of my constituency where we still have unreliable cell coverage. There is a large stretch where I drive where I have no cellphone, no Internet, nothing for hours at a time. So, you know, to say that that would replace it is simply not realistic.

We talked about having multiple offices and having constituency assistants do mobile offices, which mine do. However, there is a misunderstanding among many urban residents – I don't know about MLAs – that those of us in rural constituencies get extra budget to cover several offices, that our budget is large enough to cover two or three offices because we don't pay as high a rent as in the cities. This is simply not the case. We pay comparable amounts of money, and our staffing costs are identical. I cannot pay two full-time staff. I just do not have the funds for that in my budget.

I think this is maybe where the boundaries commission came up with the notion of recommending more funds to help support us, which, as my colleague from Bonnyville-Cold Lake says, is quite outside their mandate. But, you know, certainly, it's worthy of consideration if it's something that we could do. I think they were trying really hard to do the right thing. I kind of hoped that they really got the message when they were stranded in Peace River because of bad weather and couldn't go to Grande Prairie the next day, because that's what we all put up with, but that somehow didn't really seem to get the message across. Again, I think that was no fault of theirs.

There are limitations when you don't live in a large rural constituency or even part of the province. You really don't understand what it's all about. I didn't. When I used to live in Edmonton, I never went to West Edmonton Mall because it was too far to drive. Now I think nothing of driving back and forth three hours from Peace River to High Level several times a week. It's just part of my life. But if you come from an area of the province where you don't see that, it's hard to comprehend. Any time ministers come up, I try to make sure I get them on a road trip so they get a feel for what we're putting up with, and I think many of them who have come do understand that. I think that they're very, very sympathetic to the concerns that all of us here in rural constituencies are bringing up and my colleagues on this side of the House as well.

I think the question is: what does it mean to be an effective representative, and what does that really constitute? As I've already said, spending hours in your vehicle driving; that's not being effective. But there are a few other challenges that I don't know if they've really been identified yet. For a rural constituency like mine I have three distinct, very large industries that I must represent and lobby for their interest, communicate with. I've got agriculture, I've got forestry, and I've got oil and gas. In a town, say Calgary, for example, if you want to advocate for something like the green line, several MLAs can get together and work together and advocate for one project. I have multiple projects at any given time that I have to advocate for. Is it easy to be an effective representative? Well, I do my best, but it's a challenge.

We work collaboratively. I work with my colleague over in Dunvegan-Central Peace-Notley. I work with my colleague down in Lesser Slave Lake. We try to cover events for each other because there just aren't enough of us to go around. My constituents understand that. They're very, very patient. They know that if I'm at High Level for Canada Day, they're not going to see me again for another four years because I just can't get around to every community. Again, that doesn't mean that that's effective representation, you know. It really doesn't. I feel like the commission's report really has let us down in rural Alberta. It does really concern me, and I have to add that I have heard a lot. I've heard a lot from my constituents. I've heard a lot at AAMD and C, a lot at AUMA. I know that there are many, many in the province in rural Alberta that feel exactly the same way, and they're really asking: what can we do?

This is where I come up against the problem and why I'm torn. What can we do when we strike a commission that is independent and we ask them to make a report that affects every one of us here in this House quite profoundly, both negatively and positively, when it comes to political advantage? If we strike a commission, which happened some years back in the province – an independent commission was struck to recommend changes to salaries for MLAs. If that commission comes back and the MLAs say, "We don't like what you said, so we're not going to listen to it; we're going to do things the way we want it," what, really, does that say? That really concerns me. That's where I'm sort of in the middle here thinking: really, how effectively can we do this? Can we say to the commission, "Thank you; we appreciate the work you did, but we don't like the result, so we're going to go back to the drawing board"? Or do we find a way to live with what we've been given and ensure that rural Alberta is represented as effectively as possible through other means?

That's kind of where I'm standing on this issue. I'm hoping that we're going to be able to find some kind of a compromise, maybe, that will help those of us in rural constituencies be as effective as we can, because we certainly do need and appreciate that support.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker: Questions under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I really want to thank the Member for Peace River for her words. I was recently up in her constituency for the first time over Thanksgiving because my partner's family lives up in High Level, and it is very different driving. My partner lives in Hinton, so I did Calgary to Hinton. Then we did Hinton to Grande Prairie and then Grande Prairie to High Level and then back, High Level straight to Hinton. It's a hell of a drive, I can say. Sorry. That's unparliamentary. But I can just tell you all that if you've never done that drive, it takes quite a lot out of you. I really appreciate everything that the member said, and I really appreciate the work that she does for her constituents. I know it's very difficult for many of my colleagues who are in rural ridings, who have to drive, like the member was saying, six hours from bottom to top. The member is right on the border of the Northwest Territories and goes right close to Grande Prairie. Most Albertans and nearly I'd probably say 90 per cent of Calgarians have not gone that far north.

So I really appreciate all that she does. I really appreciate her bringing the concerns of her constituents here to the House and just her words today to remind us all that this was an independent commission, that it was an independent commission that was hired by this House, and that we as members have a choice of whether we accept the commission's report or not. However, if we do say no, where does that put us? Where does that put us for future separate committees whom we have to hire, whether it be the next boundary commission or other commissions that we call? We can call as many commissions as we like and constantly say that we don't like their reports. That seems to be quite a waste of money. It seems like we are not agreeing – well, it's definitely not agreeing with their report, but it's also making them feel like we're just wasting their time. Pretty soon, if we keep doing that and we make a habit of doing that and this House makes a habit of doing that, it's going to be very difficult for us to find people who are willing to sit on those commissions.

That was a bit tangential. But I just once again want to thank the member for her words and thank her for the work that she does.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you. I was interested in your example about MLA wages. Now, let's say that we gave the commission, this independent commission, a mandate to look at MLA wages that said plus or minus 5 per cent, and the commission comes back with a 40 per cent increase in wage. Do you think that you would agree with that commission, or would you say, "You went well beyond what we mandated you to do"? That is actually what has happened with the boundary commission that we see with this act in front of us today.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Ms Jabbour: I have to say that that's a really good question. I don't have a real easy answer for that. I think, though, again, that that's the risk that you take when you strike an independent commission to do something. You may get something back that you like; you may get something back that you don't like. You know, I do want to reinforce that I think it's really, really important that we not forget that rural Alberta is so incredibly important and that we find a way, all of us here in the room, to support the needs of rural Alberta, however that might look.

Thank you for that comment.

The Acting Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing and hearing none, anyone wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you very much. Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for allowing me to speak. I'm sure everybody is waiting with bated breath for the speech I have before me. I want to thank the hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake as well as the Member for Peace River. You know, I think it's important for all of us urban MLAs to understand that rural representation – I don't want to state the obvious – is not the same as urban representation. Certainly, in my experiences with my rural colleagues, there certainly is a demand upon them to be at every event, every school, every graduation more so than maybe us urban representatives.

The other thing that I think we need to really understand here, which nobody has mentioned and I will from the urban perspective, is the toll on the family. The hon. Member for Peace River mentioned six-hour drives. When we think about it, you know, we're here from Monday to Thursday, and then there may be events on Friday and Saturday and Sunday. What is the time that these members are spending with their families? We talk about jurisdictions that are the size of Newfoundland, jurisdictions larger than Prince Edward Island. I mean, we're talking about areas within Canada that have their own governments, and here we have a single representative representing the provincial government, a single representative also representing the opposition side of a provincial party.

There's a toll. There's a toll on husbands, wives, partners, children. We have to take that into consideration when making this very, very important decision. Effective representation, yeah, absolutely, is important. It's hugely important. But so is the family. The family is hugely important as well. I, of course, support my colleague from Livingstone-Macleod in regard to Bill 33, the Electoral Divisions Act, and this amendment because of the toll it takes on the families, because of the toll it takes on the constituents.

Let's put this in perspective, right? I mean, we have colleagues here who are trying to ensure that the needs of his or her constituents are satisfied but also to balance work and life. You know, what's really sad is that if the hon. Member for Peace River indicates that a family member requires her to be somewhere and she's unable to make an event that maybe those people had been waiting for for months, is she the bad person here? No, not the bad person. She has a responsibility to her family member, but she also has a responsibility to her constituents.

You know, for me, I'm in a constituency where it's shaped like a nice little square. To be quite frank, I could probably go for a good run and cover pretty much the entire constituency, as I'm sure you can, Mr. Speaker, right? I mean, again, the demands that you or I have are not the same as what our rural colleagues have. So for those of us speaking out against this amendment who are from urban ridings, I think we really need to put this in perspective for our rural colleagues, the demands that they are facing through their constituents but also the strains on their families, which are quite intense.

I do of course represent the constituency of Calgary-West. I've listened with interest to all my rural colleagues and the difficult demands that these MLAs are facing. But the main concern that I as well as the UCP caucus have with Bill 33 is that the boundary commission chose to make this voter parity rather than effective representation, and that's concerning. In fact, in its report the commission repeatedly dismissed the challenges of travelling long distances for rural members: as I previously stated, six hours.

You know, I think about just from Calgary to Edmonton – and I'm sure that's nothing to you, hon. Member for Peace River. The first thing on my mind when I leave here tomorrow is getting to my family. That's still a three-hour drive. I just want to make sure that I'm there in time to tuck my kids in at the end of the night. I can only imagine having to drive the distance that you have to drive or that the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake or my friend the hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti has to drive.

Quite frankly, when I got here from our previous legacy party and the Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti was the whip, I actually thought he lived closer to Edmonton than I did in Calgary. I'm a born-and-raised Albertan – right? – but again I don't travel that far north, which is to his point, why having northern representation input on this committee should have been very vitally important. We need to understand.

I don't dismiss what the commission was trying to do. I believe that they had great intentions. I think that they did the best that they could do, but if we are going to have proper representation, proper work-life balance, we have to have input from all stakeholders from every corner of this province. Although I think there were attempts made, from what I have heard from my friends from northern Alberta, maybe there could have been better input from them. Maybe the commission could have consulted a bit more, Mr. Speaker. I think that's very important. It's very, very important that we hear from our friends from northern Alberta and even my friends from southern Alberta.

I mean, I've heard the same stories from my friend from the Medicine Hat area. There are great distances. I can tell you that my friend from Strathmore-Brooks, when he and I were doing a couple of events regarding unification, Mr. Speaker, I remember commenting to him the great distance of travelling from Strathmore to Brooks. I couldn't imagine. Even then, that was only a portion of his riding. It is a huge riding, so to imagine that that riding, which I think is going to be broken up into Chestermere-Strathmore – then you have Brooks, and I think Brooks goes all the way to the Saskatchewan border.

These are long distances to travel, and we haven't even talked, as my friend here from Peace River did, about weather conditions. We haven't even talked about the safety concerns about having no cellphone coverage, about no Internet. It's not about doing work while you're driving. Let's just talk about general safety. To be in a position where you are travelling in northern Alberta with no cellphone coverage in areas where the weather is bad: that's unsafe. Are we talking about a bill when we talk about work conditions and being safe? That's not safe. For this member here to travel six hours when at times, as we get in northern Alberta, there's less light, right? So we're talking about in darkness, poor road conditions, cold weather, no cellphone coverage. Boy, I hope you've got a new vehicle, and it better be working properly. What else have we got, you know? Buses break down, too. No cellphone coverage.

I mean, you're going to have your driver. That was one of the most ridiculous, to be honest with you, things that I've heard. For some reason our friends in rural Alberta are going to require a driver, and they can sit in their car and do whatever work needs to be done. I mean, again, that's just not reasonable. That's really not reasonable.

I think that if we have that effective representation, we have to make sure that my friend from Peace River, my friend from Bonnyville-Cold Lake, my friends from all these other rural ridings can get from point A to point B within a reasonable amount of time – I know that's subjective – during a day and a reasonable amount of time to get home. I think that's another thing people need to really take into consideration. When I go and do what I have to do in my job as an MLA, as a representative, will I get home to be with my family at the end of the night? From what I've seen listening to my friends here in rural ridings, the answer is no. You're not going to be able to get home. Is that reasonable? That's not reasonable. Selfishly, in my urban riding there are things I can do across the street, right? I went to a school opening that, really, was within walking distance. Two, actually, were within walking distance. Again, you know, people need to understand the difference between rural responsibilities and urban responsibilities.

I think that for all of our friends here who are representing urban ridings, before we're quick to pass judgment in support of this bill, each and every one of us from an urban riding really needs to sit down and talk with our friends in a rural riding and understand, you know: what are the challenges that you guys face that we don't face, and how is it that we can have that effective representation? We have to make sure that our constituents are represented properly.

When I hear stories about, you know, July 1 and "Maybe I'll see you in a couple of years" – and I know that she's talking about just to July 1 and stuff like that. But, for example, you know, for me, I attend an event for Remembrance Day in my constituency, and I've got nearly 2,000 people showing up, right? At the end of the day I just go home. Quite frankly, the longest part of my day is standing there and giving my two-minute speech. For you, hon. member, I'm sure it's the six-hour drive, if you can get there, and then doing what you have to do. Then, of course, because through no fault of your own you're there when you can be, every person wants to grab your attention – right? – whereas, for me, I'm just a guy in the crowd. A few people say hi. A few people thank me. But I understand.

We talk about rural representation. I talked to the Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti, right? When he's at an event – I mean, we all know he's a wonderful guy – I can tell you that every single person wants to talk to him, wants to have that engagement with him. That takes time. When we're talking about such large jurisdictions, again, let's put this into context. The size of Newfoundland: that, to me, just blew me away. And to think about you going from part of your constituency to the other part of your constituency in I think you said six hours: that's probably going slightly above the speed limit, right? I mean, let's be honest. If we're doing the speed limit, I'll give six and a half. My point is that that's a long drive. I think that if we are going to have this effective representation, if we are going to ensure that we have a work-life balance, ensure our families are taken care of, it is vitally important that every single one of us in this Chamber sit back and reflect. It's no disrespect to this commission, absolutely.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Cyr: You know, I'm always honoured to represent my constituents, and I'm willing to put the hours in, to make sure that my constituents are heard, but I'll tell you that it is an impact to my family life, and I can tell you that I expect to hear from all of the rural MLAs out there that it's the same thing for them. It's ironic that that's not the first thing that I thought of, that it had to be an urban MLA that pointed that out, that this has an impact on me and my family.

Mr. Ellis: Children first.

Mr. Cyr: Children first. Exactly. I have to thank him for doing that and pointing out that there are more things than just being an MLA even though I feel so much honour to be elected.

Now, I was curious. My colleague has brought forward a lot of passion for family life. I guess my question to him is: if you were you to trade places with a rural MLA for even a week, what do you think that would end up like, sir?

The Acting Speaker: The Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Wow. That's a great question because, to be honest with you, that is something that I have actually thought of, and sadly I think that what comes to my mind is the word "divorce." You know, my wife – and I say this with all due respect. For me to be away from her and my kids as it is puts a real strain on any relationship. I'm no different than anyone in this Chamber. Think of more time away, more driving time, you know, having to go to an event where it's not to give a quick speech, say a few words, and you're out but to have to go there and talk to everyone because, quite frankly, as a rural MLA you're important to that community. I mean, again, this is their opportunity to speak to a representative on a provincial level, so each one of these people – and you have to do this. I get it. You have to do this. You have to take the time to talk to every one of those constituents. I can tell that every single one of the rural MLAs here – and I've never heard anything bad about anyone who does not take the time as a rural MLA to talk to their constituents.

You know, as my friend from Grande Prairie-Wapiti said – I mean, we were talking about this just earlier – he has 51 councillors. Is that correct, sir? Fifty-one councillors. I have one that I share with, I think, two or three other folks in this Chamber, and I have, you know, one MP that I deal with, right? This is apples to oranges as far as I'm concerned. It's not the exact same representation.

Now, I will say this. From an urban perspective, I'm sure that I have challenges on a daily basis that are not the same as what rural folks have, right? I mean, I'm not saying that it's, you know, easy. I just have different challenges. I think that all the urban folks here just need to recognize that our friends from rural Alberta have challenges.

I'm not sure that this piece of legislation is completely fair or representative of our friends in rural Alberta, again, from a work-life balance perspective. That's serious. We all talk in this Chamber about how much we care about our families. This is supposed to be family friendly, right? This is what it was touted to be, a family-friendly Chamber. I don't see anything family friendly for my friend from Peace River. I don't see anything family friendly for my friend from Bonnyville-Cold Lake. I see challenges that each one of them has on a daily basis. I can only imagine what my friend here from Peace River has to do this weekend even to get to one event – well, first of all, to get home but then to get to one – let alone, you know, two or three. In my constituency we talk about challenges. Yeah, I get invited to a lot of things, so I, like you, Mr. Speaker, may go to two or three in a night. For my friend here from Peace River, you're lucky if you get in that one in a day, maybe two on the weekend.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The chair will recognize the hon. Member for Strathmore-Brooks.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to speak to this bill. First, I want to begin by thanking the Electoral Boundaries Commission for their work. They've put in a lot of time on this bill. I want to thank the minister responsible for democratic renewal – or was that Justice? – for bringing this forward.

An Hon. Member: Transportation.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Well, it's the thought that counts, Mr. Speaker.

I also want to thank the Member for Calgary-West for his comments. He has come with me to Brooks quite a few times and has managed to see in just a small way the demands which rural MLAs have. He also, I thought, brought a good perspective forward on the different demands that urban MLAs have. I'm greatly sympathetic to the urban MLAs and rural MLAs who represent constituencies that are overpopulated.

There is a need to have an Electoral Boundaries Commission about every two elections. That's our general principle here. As much as possible we want the populations to be roughly equal when we're going to the polls. The Member for Calgary-South East represents a massive constituency that is almost the size of a federal constituency in terms of population. That is a need. I as a rural MLA can sympathize with him and other MLAs here who represent overpopulated constituencies and the demands it places on them. But I'm asking for some understanding from the MLAs representing urban constituencies here, for them to understand the very different demands placed upon rural MLAs. I'll speak about that in a second.

The Electoral Boundaries Commission was agreed to unanimously by all members of this House, all parties, even when we had more parties at the time, and my hope was that it was going to be able to do its job correctly. Now, I have some personal insight on this. My father-in-law actually served on an Electoral Boundaries Commission a number of years ago. I think that it was in the '90s or early 2000s, when Premier Klein was still in office. He was appointed to the Electoral Boundaries Commission.

I remember I had questioned the independence of the Electoral Boundaries Commission around him. I didn't make the joke at the time because I didn't see it, but I would have said, if it was now, that it's about as independent as I am. Now, he scolded me greatly. My father-in-law might be an older guy, and he was quite sick at the time, so you might think he's not particularly feisty. But I can't use words that are parliamentary to describe what he almost did to me when I accused the process of not being particularly independent. If it was independent or not, he certainly believed that it was, and he put the fear of God in me of ever questioning that again. I spent a great deal of time talking to him about the process and understanding it.

Now, it is inevitable that politics come into it. It's inevitably a political document. We all have vested interests in it. Three members are appointed by the Premier, two members by the Leader of the Official Opposition. We would be fooling ourselves to believe that there is nothing political about that. It is, nonetheless, a significantly more independent system than you see in the majority of the states to the south, where the politicians themselves draw the borders and gerrymandering is a horrible, horrible problem. In blue states Democrats gerrymander it for themselves. In red states Republicans gerrymander it for them. It actually bleeds through onto the federal level because these things are somewhat intertwined. That is possibly the worst possible system. If you're going to have a single-member plurality or first past the post system, you need to have a relatively independent way of drawing these boundaries. The United States is possibly the best argument I've ever seen for proportional representation, and I say this as someone who does not believe in proportional representation.

Our system in Canada, both federally and in Alberta, is significantly more independent and, I think, well thought out than in the United States, but it is not without its flaws. I think it behooves us to understand that, that it's not perfect. These are humans on the Electoral Boundaries Commission, and humans are not perfect. They're capable of making mistakes. They're capable of not getting it right.

To the members of the Electoral Boundaries Commission's credit, they recognized that they got quite a bit wrong in the first draft and committed to trying to get it right in the second. Now, unfortunately, I think they actually got the second worse than the first, particularly in some regions. I think that in the cities they did a pretty decent job. I think it's admittedly easier to draw the boundaries within the two large cities. You've got neighbourhoods that you try to keep together, but you're really moving boundaries around, generally, a couple of blocks one way or a couple of streets the other. It's not radically different. I think they did a very good job, with a few exceptions perhaps, within the cities, but in rural Alberta they made some very, very significant mistakes.

They are humans. There are five people, a commissioner and two others from each side of the aisle, and they inevitably can't know everything on the ground. One I think was from Acme, another one from possibly Clearwater county, one from Calgary, and possibly another from Calgary. They don't have someone in Brooks who knows the lay of the land, which is why in the first report, for my own constituency, they made quite a mess out of it. They separated Strathmore and Brooks, which had been together since the 1993 election, I believe it was. They took Strathmore, connected it with Drumheller. That wasn't an outrageous proposition. That was actually kind of a reasonable match.

It was everything else they did with the counties that was unreasonable. They took a small slice of Vulcan county and added it in. They threw in Siksika Nation, which was reasonable. But they took a slice of Vulcan county, just a couple hundred, maybe a thousand people in the Arrowwood and Mossleigh area, and threw it up into the new constituency for Strathmore and Drumheller. They sliced those people out of Vulcan county. They would have essentially alienated them from the vast majority of the population representing their municipalities. Then in the north they took slices of Stettler county but not all of it, roughly half of it, and added it in. They threw in the special areas and a whole bunch of other smaller municipalities that were cut up in that dog's breakfast of a constituency.

Then on the southern side they proposed something similar to what they've come up with in the second draft for Brooks-Medicine Hat, but they took Newell county and, for some odd reason, took a small slice out of it, the Rainier, Scandia, Rolling Hills area. The Member for Strathcona-Sherwood Park knows the area pretty well. Other than that, I think that very few people have heard of these places. They're hamlets with about 150 to 200 people. They don't appear on the map unless you zoom in really close on Google. But there are real people who live there with real needs, and they were sliced off and thrown into a different constituency.

What were they going to call it? It essentially went into Little Bow. Taber-Vulcan was what they proposed for that one. The Member for Little Bow right now was looking forward to getting some really good Conservative voters out of my neck of the woods for it. Alas, they put them back in with Brooks. It was just a few hundred people, again, that they had just taken out of the constituency in Newell county and thrown onto the other side of the Bow River. As hard as the Member for Little Bow works, it would be hard to blame him, if he's the MLA for there, if he was not able to pay these few hundred people the attention that he would pay to the people in Vulcan county, who have more homogeneous issues. At the same time, it would have thrown a few people from Vulcan county, at the northern end of his county, back up into the other end of my remaining constituency, alienating them.

So it wasn't a very good proposal. I provided a very detailed submission to the Electoral Boundaries Commission when they came through Brooks. I think the Member for Lethbridge-East was there, if I'm not mistaken. Little Bow, I think you were there. The Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat was there and Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Schneider: And Lethbridge-East.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Yeah. Lethbridge-East was there.

We provided a very, very thorough submission about what to do on a regional basis. Strathmore-Brooks was the only large rural constituency in southern Alberta, out of the large rural ones, that actually had the appropriate population. We were within a few hundred people of being smack on the exact number of the average population of Alberta. There was no need to change Strathmore-Brooks.

Strathmore is a growth node. We've got a lot of hamlets on the west side of Wheatland county that are growing. Lyalta, Carseland, Speargrass, and Strathmore itself are growing quite quickly. So it was going to keep up with population growth around the province. There was no need to touch Strathmore-Brooks. All of those counties were intact. It was a really nice, watertight constituency. You had Strathmore with Wheatland county and everything in Wheatland county in a single constituency, then the same with Brooks and everything within Newell county. It made really good sense. I'll speak in a moment about why that's so important, and I'll discuss that with my urban colleagues. The demands on us are very different, especially with local municipal issues.

I had recommended keeping Strathmore-Brooks together, but we ought to deal with, obviously, the population disparities in the other constituencies surrounding us, so we put forward a thoughtful submission that would have corrected some of this. It would have taken what the boundaries commission had proposed for the rump of Drumheller-Stettler, so minus the town of Stettler but the rest of that riding, moved it down, continued south of the special areas into parts of Cypress county that they proposed to put with Brooks, and then move Siksika Nation and the sliver of Vulcan county back into Taber-Vulcan and given back to Brooks that section of Newell county that had been cut off.

Now, my counties and towns were all in agreement. They said that if you're going to separate Strathmore and Brooks, at least keep the counties together. The outlying communities identify with the larger centre in the middle, and it makes no sense to cut it off, and it's important.

The second round of the Electoral Boundaries Commission made things significantly worse, though. They restored the integrity of Newell county – they put those hamlets back in – but then they did something that not a single person presented in person on the Strathmore side of the constituency. For the first time in the modern history of Alberta they combined Strathmore and Chestermere, not a generally natural pairing. Strathmore is a rural town, with some commuters into Calgary. Chestermere is more of a suburban Calgary community with some of its own – they're different communities. Strathmore and Brooks were probably a more natural pair.

That wasn't unreasonable, though, to put Strathmore and Chestermere together, but what was unreasonable was that they cut Wheatland county, which for the last two decades had been in a single constituency. Wheatland county, only a couple of thousand people: they cut it into four separate constituencies. Now, the winner in this lottery is the Member for Airdrie, who would get some constituents of mine from the rural areas, in Nightingale and some little hamlets there. Again, most people here have probably not heard of these areas, but they're good people. She's getting some pretty solid conservative voters out of there. I go duck hunting there pretty regularly, so she'll have to invite me to her territory if this is what goes through. But there are just a couple of hundred people at most – it's a very unpopulated area – and they identify with Strathmore.

Now, I'd chance to say that a large number of the people there who are going to be put into the Airdrie-East constituency under this proposal have never been to Airdrie other than perhaps a stop-through on the way. No offence to Airdrie – I mean that with all respect to the Member for Airdrie and her constituents – but many of the people from Wheatland county, the area north and northeast of Strathmore going to Airdrie-East, have possibly never been to Airdrie for more than a few minutes. They don't identify with Airdrie in any way. There's not a main transportation route to there. It's completely bogus.

Then there are the areas on the east end of Wheatland county: Hussar, Standard, Rockyford. We've got the village of Rosebud there. It's got some of the best theatre in Alberta. Its new executive director is the former short-term Member for Calgary-Elbow, Mr. Gordon Dirks. That area there, though, eastern Wheatland county, has been put into Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills. They'll become outstanding constituents of Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, I suppose.

Rockyford, Hussar, Standard, in that area . . .

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Questions under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you. I would like to hear the rest of my colleague's statement there because I was very interested to hear what happened to his constituency. It sounds like he has a lot of the same challenges that I have in Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Thank you, sir.

Mr. Fildebrandt: I wanted to hear the end of my speech, too, Mr. Speaker. I'm sure all members look forward to it with bated breath.

But this area, these are a couple of little villages and some rural farms. I'm willing to bet 20 bucks to any member in this House that the majority of people in Hussar, Standard, or Rockyford have never been to either Olds, Didsbury, or Three Hills. They will be very surprised to learn that they'll be a part of a constituency that is named for places very, very far from where there are. It's going to disenfranchise them in many ways.

Then, the craziest of all are the hamlets of Gleichen and Cluny. They've been put into the – you can't call it Little Bow. You can't call it Vulcan-Taber. You can't call it anything but the hourglass of Montana or Montana's hat. It is shaped as an hourglass, and it goes from the Montana border at a pretty wide spread, comes in, gets real skinny on both ends as it squeezes its way past Lethbridge, and then it bursts out again, shaped as an hourglass, and comes all the way up and takes in the hamlets of Gleichen and Cluny, not more than a few hundred people. With all due respect to the Member for Little Bow – with all due respect – it's a couple hundred people. They're not going to be able to be effectively represented, no matter how excellent the MLA for that area is. They need to be with Wheatland county.

Now, the demands on rural MLAs are radically different. I did some back-of-napkin math, so bear with me. I travel about 38,000, 40,000 kilometres a year for the job. That works out to – at two kilometres a minute I spend approximately 13 days a year in my truck, 13 days a year just driving. I warn you to stay clear.

Now, the Member for Calgary-West explained about work-life balance. I actually didn't really realize how much I was working until I had a little more time on my hands. You know, I've got a young daughter, and she had her first words just the other week, and I got them while I was in Edmonton, here. It was, you know, just FaceTime Live-ing her, and I managed to be there for that moment of her first words even though I'm very far away.

An Hon. Member: What were they?

Mr. Fildebrandt: It was "dada." Mama was not happy. I got to be there for that moment even though I'm very far away.

But I've realized in the last few months just how much I'm gone from my family, and I cannot imagine having to be gone even more. With these constituencies that are far flung, all the way to Saskatchewan in some cases, from areas that are nowhere close to it, we need to be aware of the human cost to this. But it's not about us. We need to be aware of what this does for our constituents.

You know, I'm going to say something that – it is parliamentary, but it's pushing the line. The hon. Leader of the Opposition said this to me once. Bear with me. He said: the difference between an urban and rural MLA is that we keep toilet paper in our truck.

Now, I keep jerry cans in my truck, and New Year's is coming up.

An Hon. Member: Happy New Year.

Mr. Fildebrandt: Happy New Year.

I have to keep jerry cans in my truck, and I'm sure the vast majority of rural MLAs have to as well, because, you know, I've had some pretty close calls. I'm very glad I keep at least one or two jerry cans in the back.

But these are issues that I just really want my urban colleagues of all parties here to appreciate. You have your own unique challenges that we need to appreciate, especially oversized constituencies, and that's an issue that needs to get fixed, but I think that this boundaries commission got it very, very wrong. There is never going to be a perfect report. There's never even going to be a right report. I know previous ones have got it wrong, too, and I won't tell that to my father-in-law. I fear him now. But this commission got it very wrong, and we need to go back to the drawing board.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The chair recognizes the hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the chance to rise and talk in support of the reasoned motion on Bill 33. First of all, I too would like to echo thanks to the five people on the Electoral Boundaries Commission and thank them for their effort.

I would also like to say to my colleagues that have spoken earlier on this that I'd very, very much like to thank them all and for the shared duty that we have to our constituents and to the province of Alberta and the hardship of a bigger constituency, of the long distance from Edmonton and the travel that that can take, and, you know, all the opportunities that this job provides but all the costs and the losses that it has as well. So again I thank all my colleagues for being so cognizant, both rural and urban, of what each of us has to go through to do our very, very best at being the best representatives that we can be for our constituents.

This reasoned amendment to stop this makes total sense. Mr. Speaker, there are three other things that I want to talk about that I don't think I've heard here tonight.

First of all, with this constituency boundary report it changed so much from the interim report to the final report. Of course, that final report was just given to us and given to the people of Alberta sometime around the end of October. We've been here, other than a one-week constituency break, almost inclusively, so we haven't had much time to talk to Albertans. We haven't had much time to talk to our constituents about what they think.

It's easiest to speak about first-hand experience. Cypress-Medicine Hat and Brooks-Medicine Hat, what was Medicine Hat and what was Cardston-Taber-Warner, have changed so much from what they were in the 2015 election to what they were in the first report to what they were in the final report that I maintain, I have the absolute belief that this final report is so different from their interim report that they need to consult with Albertans again, that they need to start the process over. Because of what we're hearing tonight from NDP colleagues and opposition colleagues, there are so many areas where the report is lacking. Whether it was in the initial engagement and where they were supposed to start or whether it was in the implementation of trying too hard to make all the constituencies with the same population or have a crystal ball into the future as to what some populations may or may not become, Mr. Speaker, we've heard many, many reasons just in the last hour, hour and a half why, if this report goes ahead, it will go further to hurt democracy in Alberta than if it doesn't. That's why this report needs to end.

I want to talk about how badly it started. I want to talk about the confusion that that led to, and I need to focus on Medicine Hat and Cypress-Medicine Hat because that's obviously the area I know best. The report came to us on a Thursday at 4 or 4:30 in the afternoon. For some reason the headline in the Medicine Hat News that morning – Mr. Speaker, I'm talking about the morning before the report came out – was something like: Medicine Hatters should be happy we're going to get three MLAs. Again, I'm talking eight or 10 hours before the report came out. Okay. I'm thinking: what the heck? We sort of have two. We do have two, but for those that didn't know, the Speaker represents just Medicine Hat, about 80 per cent of Medicine Hat. Cypress-Medicine Hat is 20 per cent of Medicine Hat, roughly, Redcliff, Foremost, Bow Island, Cypress county, Forty Mile county. Okay. From two to three: that sounds like a good thing.

When the report came out that day, I was flabbergasted. I was shocked. I was amused because Medicine Hat was becoming one big constituency. The north part of Cypress county was going to be joined with Redcliff and Brooks, if I recall correctly. For the south part of Cypress county, so all around the south of Medicine Hat – and we're talking from the Montana border, Saskatchewan, Alberta, so right at Montana-Saskatchewan-Alberta – it was going to run all the way at kind of a 45-degree angle to 20 minutes from Calgary. It was going to go past Vulcan, past Milo, past Mossleigh. It was going to be, like, a four and a half hour drive at 70 miles an hour. Yeah, we sort of had three. Only one had the name Medicine Hat in it, and two of them didn't represent any part of Medicine Hat, but it sort of looked like what was leaked was accurate.

Okay. The facts were still the facts, and this was just a newspaper headline. But, my goodness, Mr. Speaker, the confusion that that created in Medicine Hat, the confusion everywhere I went for a week or two. "We're going to get three MLAs": nobody saw the report. I would spend some time, and I would tell them exactly what the first report said and how it really wasn't and how, as a mid-sized Alberta city, the best mid-sized Alberta city – we're a ways away from Edmonton, but if you've never been there, it's a wonderful place. We are competitive with the Red Deers, the Lethbridges, the Grande Prairies. We want everybody to do well, but we want to do well, too, and it hurt our feelings that all of a sudden we were only going to have one constituency with Medicine Hat in it where Lethbridge was going to have two, Red Deer was going to have two, Grande Prairie was going to have two, Fort McMurray was going to have two. There are 62,000 of us. People weren't happy.

What this led to was that everywhere I went, councillors – I believe that the entire council of the city of Medicine Hat, I believe that the council of the town of Redcliff, Forty Mile county, Cypress county, I believe that Foremost and Bow Island, of all the municipalities in my constituency, sent a letter to the boundary commission review saying: leave it the way it is; leave it the way it is. A lot of them followed up with: at least make sure that we have two constituencies with the name Medicine Hat in them. Now, the board listened to that, and I'm glad they did.

One of the other examples I want to tell you about to show how flawed this was: when they came for the second time around, one or two people that presented pointed out that maybe instead of this great, great big constituency that ran all the way from Montana-Alberta-Saskatchewan to where you'd be voting with people from Calgary who just live on an acreage on the edge of Calgary, perhaps we were better aligned with people from Brooks. What the committee wasn't aware of, though, is that under the federal boundary changes Brooks had just been taken from the federal constituency and moved into a different one, and our Medicine Hat area had been put in more with the Cardston-Raymond area. That's fine. That's great the way it is. But there were some people that disagreed with that, and I think that's where the idea of being with Brooks came from.

I'm going to say to you again that the committee didn't do their job in looking at why that was being suggested. It was being suggested by people who maybe were unaware of how there are 87 MLAs but only 36 or 38 MPs and how it made some difference in the size of a federal riding compared to a provincial constituency. Mr. Speaker, I'm coupling this with the fact that something came out wrong, that was erroneous, that made it so that people in Cypress-Medicine Hat didn't understand the true way that this constituency boundary report was. Secondly, the committee didn't hear fully as to what the changes were, and we ended up with a report that doesn't really reflect what's best for us.

I want to go, though, to what I heard second. Everywhere I went, people said to me all through Alberta that it was just wrong to take out three seats from rural Alberta. Mr. Speaker, when you're in my constituency and you're standing in the Bindloss school after wildfires have just killed hundreds of cattle, hurt hundreds of lives – Maury, who was 89 and born in his house, was pulled out of his house with five minutes to spare before the house burned down. You're standing in the gym of a school. The school hasn't been open for 10 or 15 years, but that gym is still like you could play basketball in it tomorrow.

When you go down to Manyberries and you have the same instance, where you're standing in a school that is still in pretty good shape but there hasn't been a student in there for 10 years, when you go to Foremost or Bow Island and you know the changes that were made to the Medicine Hat diagnostic lab – now it's unclear as to whether the Foremost people can get their treatment for their diabetes and their blood needs under the new structure, and it takes months to get an answer – Mr. Speaker, you know darn well why rural people are very, very concerned about losing their representation and their ability to have support. It's not because they want an advantage on anybody in Calgary and Edmonton. It's not because they want extra representation. They just want to make sure that they get treated like all Albertans. They just want to make sure that they have access and their children and their friends and their families have access to the things that, because of more people, because of more government sometimes, urban Albertans have more access to. They know that losing three seats – three seats in rural Alberta – will disenfranchise them, will make it so that they are less involved in the prosperity and the growth of Alberta. That is going to hurt us all. That is going to hurt us all.

The third thing I want to talk about. I don't really have to say much more. Mrs. Gwen Day, one of the five members, wrote a dissenting opinion. She said it all. One out of five people on this committee said: my committee got it wrong; all the constituencies don't have to be the same population. There are court cases. She put in one from Saskatchewan and one from Prince Edward Island where the Supreme Court said: no; you don't need exactly the same population in each one. There are other factors. You know, there are other factors that make it important and make it necessary as to why the rural seats, because of their size, because of their distance from Edmonton, because of the fact that the primary industries, forestry, agriculture, and oil and gas, where wealth is first created, are principally in the rural constituencies – maybe we've got to make sure that rural Albertans don't lose their voice.

Mr. Speaker, I want to end with a funny story. I got talking to several rural Albertans who were very upset and very concerned, somewhat despondent about this. "Okay. Here we go. Rural Alberta is taking it on the chin again. We're going to lose more. What do we do?" One of them, with jocularity and humour, as much as he hates the Canadian Senate, thought the only way to make sure that we had adequate representation for rural Alberta is if we go so far as to have a Mike Duffy and a Senate, as dysfunctional as that one is. My colleagues, I'm telling you – I'm telling you – that's how dissatisfied, that's how disengaged rural Albertans are right now, and this report exemplifies that.

So let's do the right thing. Let's put it on hold. Let's give all Albertans the opportunity to have their voice heard like they deserve to be heard. Let's do our best to ensure that they have the same level of service that all Albertans have. Mr. Speaker, thank you very, very much for listening to me. With that, I'd like to ask that we adjourn debate on this for the night, please.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At this point I would like to move that we adjourn until 9 o'clock in the morning.

9 a.m.

Thursday, December 7, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Good morning.

If each of us could pray or reflect, each in our own way. As we conclude another full week of work in this Assembly, may we reflect on the hard work of our peers and what has been accomplished and commit ourselves to reaching agreement by recognizing that our objective is not to win or lose but, rather, to reach an agreement. Let us also continue to support each other and find mutual respect in our diversity.

Please be seated.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 32

An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta

Mrs. Pitt moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, be amended by deleting all the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Debate adjourned on the amendment December 6: Mr. Strankman speaking]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Well, good morning, sir. Good morning, all. It's a pleasure to be joined by 87 of my closest friends and colleagues, some more friends than colleagues, some more colleagues than friends.

An Hon. Member: Are you counting yourself as a friend, then?

Mr. Cooper: Yeah. You've got a friend in me.

Ms McLean: Apparently, you have a colleague in me.

Mr. Cooper: Well, you also have a colleague in me, particularly the Minister of Service Alberta.

It is a pleasure to rise this morning and speak to Bill 32, and by pleasure – I mean, I always enjoy rising, but it is with some great concern that I rise this morning, Mr. Speaker, with respect to Bill 32. I had the opportunity to speak to this bill yesterday and identify a number of challenges that are in Bill 32. Just as I said yesterday, there are a number of really positive steps forward in Bill 32. Those include some of the discussions around the funding of third-party advertisers and how that is going to be co-ordinated and worked upon. Those include the use of voter assist terminals. They include some of the work to be done around advance polls.

But as I mentioned yesterday, I have some significant reservations around the speed at which this bill is likely to proceed, so that's why I was so, so, so pleased with the good work my hon.

colleague from Livingstone-Macleod did to recommend referring this piece of legislation to committee.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, because I'm sure that you've read it with great anticipation and excitement, this bill is over 200 pages long and was dropped as if it was hot just days before the scheduled end of the session. In fact, it was hot when it was dropped because it had just come off a photocopier in the backrooms of the Legislative Assembly. It was done so because the government wasn't even ready to get it introduced and it hadn't come back from the printers. But I think that we've provided this account of how it actually arrived here yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, one of the more concerning things about this piece of legislation is the lack of consultation that has taken place with the primary stakeholder. You know, the Chief Electoral Officer is entrusted as the keeper of democracy in our province. He or she is mandated under the current Election Act to

- (a) provide guidance, direction and supervision respecting the conduct of all elections, enumerations and plebiscites conducted under [the Election] Act.

The Chief Electoral Officer has a significant role and requirement inside our democracy to ensure that direction and supervision respecting the conduct of elections are considered.

In this case he is required to

- (b) enforce fairness and impartiality on the part of all election officers in the conduct of their duties and compliance with [the Election] Act and the Senatorial Selection Act;
- (c) issue to election officers any guidance, direction and information the [CEO] considers necessary to ensure the effective carrying out of their duties under [the Election] Act and the Senatorial Selection Act; investigate matters that might constitute an offence under the Election Act; reach out to political parties or representatives concerning the election process. Mr. Speaker, the list goes on and on about what the Chief Electoral Officer's responsibilities and duties are.

My point here, Mr. Speaker, is to highlight the fact that the powers of the CEO are not to be understated. This individual is essential to the keeping of our democratic system. He's essential to keeping our democratic system accountable and the rules enforced at all times.

One would only assume that if you were going to be making significant structural changes to the Election Act, you might want to reach out to the individual who is primarily responsible for the enforcement of that act, say, the definite subject matter in this case. One would assume that you would want that individual to be quite involved or at least approached in crafting any legislation that pertains to areas he oversees; namely, the Election Act, the Senatorial Selection Act, and the election finances and contributions act.

So you can only imagine my surprise, Mr. Speaker, when said individual, the CEO, Mr. Resler, provided the following letter to the minister of democratic reform.

Mr. Stier: I was shocked by it.

Mr. Cooper: I was shocked myself. I was.

He issued a letter yesterday to the minister responsible for democratic renewal and very kindly CCed members of the Leg. Offices Committee. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Chief Electoral Officer reports directly to that Leg. Offices Committee.

I might just premise, Mr. Speaker, that my comments today are providing very specific reasons why we should be sending this bill to committee as recommended by my colleague from Livingstone-Macleod.

First and foremost is, Mr. Speaker, that the Chief Electoral Officer provided his opinion, essentially stating that he hadn't been consulted with respect to Bill 32. Don't take my word for it; take his. I'll be able to provide significant portions of the letter this morning. But in this case he concludes his letter with:

Since I provided recommendations to the Special Select Ethics and Accountability Committee, I have not ...

Emphasis on "not"; my emphasis, not his.

... been consulted in relation to policy direction leading up to Bill 32.

Holy smokes, Mr. Speaker: a piece of legislation that dramatically changes the way that we do democracy in Alberta. Now, in the name of full disclosure, many of those things are a positive, but you would think that you would want to ask the individual who enforces, provides guidance, direction to that particular piece of legislation.

Let me provide some more context for you, Mr. Speaker, with respect to what Mr. Resler actually said. He says:

I have had a chance to review Bill 32 after first reading.

I am pleased to see that some of my recommendations respecting the residency requirements for electors, flexibility in hiring election officers, the ability to set remuneration of election officers, and the increase in accessibility provisions for electors to be able to vote anywhere and with voter assist terminals have been incorporated into Bill 32: An Act to ... Protect Democracy in Alberta.

While I applaud the spirit behind the proposals about advance polls and special mobile polls, I wanted to bring to your attention potential unintended consequences of these particular proposals. If passed in its current form, I am concerned that Bill 32 will deteriorate the service provided to electors and increase the timelines for communicating results.

Mr. Speaker, the Chief Electoral Officer is concerned that Bill 32 will deteriorate the service provided to electors. Here the government claims that the legislation is going to strengthen and protect democracy, but the Chief Electoral Officer, who's responsible for the delivery of that service, says that Bill 32, if passed in its current form, will actually do the opposite, deteriorate service.

He continues:

The most notable areas of concern include the change in advance polling ... and the absence of the authority to utilize vote tabulators for advance polls, special mobile polls and Special Ballots.

He goes on to speak about a number of different changes. I don't believe I'm going to have the opportunity to read the entire letter this morning because of some time constraints, but I'm certain that some of my colleagues will be able to provide some additional content around this particular issue.

But let me highlight a few key areas of the letter, Mr. Speaker, because I know that you will share – I would never presume what you would share or not share with me, but I can only imagine that you will share some of my concern.

Mr. Speaker, the Chief Electoral Officer identifies a number of issues in this letter with respect to advance polls and his inability to get where-to-vote cards printed and sent to electors. He speaks at length about his concerns around where-to-vote cards. These where-to-vote cards play a very, very important role in ensuring that electors know where they can vote. Now, it may be great that you can vote in the advance polls anywhere in the province – it's an idea that I support – but we have to give the Chief Electoral Officer the tools to be able to communicate to Albertans and for the Chief Electoral Officer to be able to report timely results to us as well.

Mr. Speaker, with respect to the official results, the Chief Electoral Officer says:

I had recommended ... the time for the official results from 10 days to 7 days after polling ... This recommendation was premised on either status quo for voting, or vote-anywhere combined with tabulators. A vote-anywhere process without the ability to automate the sorting and counting of ballots comes with additional requirements that will result in an increased timeline for processing Special Ballots, advance poll ballots and special mobile poll ballots. The proposed amendment to section 55 to change the announcement of the official results from the 10th to the 7th day following polling day shortens the allowable timeline. It will be a challenge, if not impracticable, for returning officers to comply with section 55 if the other amendments noted above remain unchanged.

The Chief Electoral Officer is essentially saying that it will not be possible for returning officers to comply with other sections of the act.

You would think that if you were going to be introducing a piece of legislation in the Chamber, you would have at least asked one of the most important stakeholders when it comes to this bill. Mr. Speaker, don't worry, though. The Official Opposition is here to help, particularly my hon. colleague from Livingstone-Macleod, who said: we've got a solution for this problem; let's send this bill to committee so that the Chief Electoral Officer can come and present the facts to this government.

Mr. Speaker, I'm sure that you will recall in question period when the Premier stood in her place and made a claim that the opposition likes to ready, shoot, aim. Was there ever a more clear example of ready, shoot, aim than the Chief Electoral Officer not being consulted with respect to the primary piece of legislation that affects him? If there's anyone inside this Chamber that is a superstar at ready, shoot, aim, it is the government. Time in and time out, time and time again this government is proposing legislation where they haven't consulted with Albertans, haven't consulted with the stakeholders. Certainly, in this case – and I'll say it again – the Chief Electoral Officer concludes his letter with:

Since I provided recommendations to the Special Select Ethics and Accountability Committee, I have not been consulted in relation to policy direction leading up to Bill 32, the bill that primarily he will be responsible for delivering. He has not been consulted in relation to policy direction leading up to Bill 32. I don't know if the government members remember or not, but it was well over a year ago that the government killed that committee.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Stier: Well, thank you and good morning, Mr. Speaker, and good morning, all. You know, this new bit of ...

The Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), hon. member?

Mr. Stier: Yes. Thank you. This new bit of information that has just come to our attention by the elections officer is, I think, a crucial point in our argument that we've been presenting for the past few days. I would urge members to pay a little bit of attention to what we have to say because I think this is vitally important to the discussion regarding sending this to committee. I have a prepared speech that I'll probably go into later on, Mr. Speaker, but with this new information, I think this is critical, and I think it is important that we hear some more details that the hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills was about to say. If that's the case, I'd like to ask him to carry on, please.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Why, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was about to say that I'm speechless, but clearly I am not. I have a few more things to say. How is it possible that this government thinks that they didn't need to consult with the province's leading expert on the matters on this issue when they are so critically important? Why is it that they didn't think that they needed to consult in relation to policy direction leading up to Bill 32?

You know, Mr. Speaker, in this piece of legislation the government has taken a number of recommendations from the Chief Electoral Officer, and he acknowledges that. The problem is that they are creating a wide, wide swath of unintended consequences that are going to prevent and limit the ability of the Chief Electoral Officer and his team to comply with this very act. It makes absolutely no sense. I was shocked that the Chief Electoral Officer hadn't been consulted in relation to policy direction leading up to Bill 32. How is it that the government could bring forward legislation that fundamentally alters the way that our democratic elections are run without first consulting the Chief Electoral Officer on the ramifications of that issue?

Ms McLean: Table the letter.

Mr. Cooper: Oh, I would be more than happy to table the letter.

Ms McLean: I'd love it if you read the whole thing.

Mr. Cooper: I wish I had time to read the whole thing.

This is a perfect example, Mr. Speaker – a perfect example – of why this legislation must be referred to committee. We cannot possibly fix this legislation before the end of the session if we haven't heard from the experts. You know what will happen? We will pass this legislation, it will be a train wreck, and then we'll have to come back and fix the problems that the government created. In fact, a case could be made that that's what we're already doing here. If they had continued the special ethics committee, we could have discussed a wide range of issues, including those that affect third-party advertisers, which we were happy to do, but this government shut down the committee because the time ran out. I don't know if the government had the ability to extend the time or not, but they chose not to because they don't want to listen.

The Chief Electoral Officer has raised some significant concerns. In this letter, Mr. Speaker, he hasn't even identified his concerns with enumeration, that he identified at Leg. Offices just two weeks ago, and the additional costs. He has not spoken specifically about the independent elections commissioner and whether or not the way that the government has proposed it is, in fact, the best path forward. I'm just speculating here, but my guess is that he would say that it isn't. I also believe that the government hasn't asked whether or not he thinks it's a good idea. The reason why I would say that is because they didn't ask about policy direction leading up to Bill 32.

Mr. Speaker, this government clearly – clearly – has not taken the right path to strengthening and protecting democracy in Alberta. The Chief Electoral Officer indicated in his letter that it will do the exact opposite.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Highwood.

Mr. W. Anderson: Good morning, everybody, and good morning and thank you, Mr. Speaker. First off, I just want to thank my hon. colleague for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills for his elaborate dissertation on the documentation from the Chief Electoral Officer. It's quite enlightening to know that this government did not consult with someone who has such great power and authority.

I stand here to support the motion from the member to refer Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, to committee for further review and consultation. Since the hon. member mentioned the document from the Chief Electoral Officer, it's fairly obvious that one should definitely now or at any time consider this. I think that when we're talking about the topic of electoral integrity and protecting our democracy, we need to stop and think for a minute about the seriousness of anything we choose to do.

As members we know that our democracy in this province and in this country is an inheritance that predates the existence of Canada as we know it. As this parliamentary tradition that we have is our most sacred institution, I want us all to think about its history whenever we contemplate legislation that will affect our democracy.

Just two short years ago this Legislature had the honour to host what is perhaps the most sacred secular document in history, the Magna Carta, the Great Charter. It was the original guarantee of rights and liberties that we all enjoy and hold fairly dear. Today, if you go to that small village surrounded by green fields across the ocean, thousands of kilometres away, there is a small monument, one that on the scale of human structures might be hardly noticed by unknowing passersby, and on that memorial, amongst others, there are three words that stand out: "Freedom under Law." These three words, that capture the pillars of our free society and our democracy, convey the fundamental rights and liberties of the individual, they imply the rule of law, and, yes, also represent the very beginnings of our parliamentary democracy.

While most think of the Great Charter as simply a statement of rights and liberties, an early bill of rights, it's actually so much more. It required that the king gain consent of his royal council in order to levy taxes. It is this royal council that became the Parliament of England, the world's first parliamentary democracy. This, in turn, became the Parliament of Great Britain and eventually the Parliament of the United Kingdom. It is from that document, written more than 800 years ago, that the Westminster parliamentary tradition was developed and to where the Parliament of Canada and this Assembly trace their roots.

It is also important to remember that for hundreds of years this tradition and its institutions stood alone as a pillar of freedom and democracy in a world where most people were subject to the arbitrary rule of tyrants or despots. Still today, for the billions of people who live under the oppressive regimes of the world, Legislatures like this stand as a beacon of hope and freedom.

Again, I want all of us in this House to consider these facts, the exceptional history and significance of our democracy, before we make legislative changes that will affect it. I would suggest that this kind of consideration cannot happen in the few short days in which this government intends to pass this bill.

Above all else, if there are changes that deserve the review and the legislative scrutiny and the greater consultation that is allowed by sending this bill to committee, they are changes that affect our democratic process. Mr. Speaker, I realize that to some my words may seem like the kind that should be reserved for great constitutional changes, but it is vital to recognize that the changes in this bill could have impacts on so much more than just electoral technicalities.

This brings me to the name of the bill. If this Legislature is going to pass this legislation claiming to strengthen and protect democracy in Alberta, we should be absolutely sure that it does not contain measures that end up doing the exact opposite, and if it appears that it does, we should take steps to review them and amend them. To me, while there are good measures contained in the bill, there are also some significant problems with this bill. We need to address these. Some of these are matters of practicality, and others are matters of principle. Let me start with the former.

I'm curious as to how the government came to the conclusion that the province-wide door-to-door enumeration ahead of the next election was a practical idea. The recommendation by Elections Alberta was that selective in-person enumeration accompanied by mail-outs would be the most effective and efficient manner in which to accomplish this goal. For many reasons going door to door can be difficult, not to mention extremely expensive. This is a situation where it would be worth while to go to the committee, look into the best practices, and try and find the best way to go about future electoral enumeration.

While I'm speaking about the duties of Elections Alberta, I would also like to address the proposed establishment of the new, independent elections commissioner. The stated purpose of this new office would be to oversee matters related to third-party advertisers. This is a role that has been administered by Elections Alberta in the past, something, I would suggest, that should be the case going forward. Albertans have confidence in the administration of our elections and the excellent people who have done and continue to do this. In addition, Elections Alberta has the budget and the expertise to execute a wide range of duties, including the ones that this bill proposes to be dealt with by this new office.

At a time when we desperately need to restrain new spending and expanding government, I see no reason why we need to create a new office and no reason why we cannot continue to place our trust and confidence in the women and men at Elections Alberta, under the leadership of the Chief Electoral Officer, someone we should have consulted with. If the government has a legitimate argument why this should not be the case, they should bring it to committee and share it with the rest of us.

Moving on, I would also like to suggest that there should be a second look taken at the list of exemptions that this bill would allow in regard to the ban on government advertising during elections. To me these exemptions are far too broad rather than prohibiting this kind of advertising during an election. Instead, give the government a road map on how to spend taxpayers' dollars during an electoral period. It is absolutely critical to ensure that taxpayer money is not used to give unfair advantage to one party in an election. The integrity of our democracy demands that we go back and take another look at this to close any loopholes that currently exist.

While I'm speaking about democratic integrity, I also want to raise the elimination of the residency requirements as a condition of voter eligibility. It should go without saying that only residents of Alberta should be able to vote in Alberta elections, and it is established in practice that an extended period of time is required to establish residency. This is no different than requiring one to be the age of majority and a Canadian citizen, requirements that are rightly being retained.

This bill as it stands opens a door to unacceptable outside interference in Alberta elections. While I know that the NDP is discovering that they don't have a whole lot of supporters left in this province, I would suggest that if they wish to change that, they should seek to better serve Albertans instead of changing the long-established rules on elections. Frankly, I think that if more Albertans were aware of this provision in the bill, there would be widespread and justifiable outrage. This piece of legislation, that has the appearance of trying to influence the outcome of free and fair elections, should be subject to absolute scrutiny. That part of the legislation alone should justify the referral motion at hand in order to better inform and consult Albertans.

A significant part of this bill is the new restrictions and expanded definitions in regard to third-party advertisers. I believe that this is an area where we also need to tread carefully. When you think about it, what is a third party? Is it a party that is involved that is not contesting an election itself? In a way, this makes every single Albertan a third party. When we talk about advertising, is it clear that this is also a form of speech and expression? In this case, is it of a political nature? The regulation and restriction of political speech is a topic on which the Supreme Court of Canada has suggested that legislators exercise extreme care and caution. In this case, where we are applying these rules to those who are not themselves political parties and candidates, we should be even more aware of the potential impact on freedom of expression.

If we boil it down to a very basic example, if your average Albertan is concerned about a political issue and they compose and print off some flyers to post around their neighbourhood, should they be subject to restrictions by government? I would think that the nearly universal answer is no. Say this person is too busy to accomplish their goal themselves, and they want to spread their message beyond their local community. What if they hire someone to write and design their literature? What if they print off thousands of copies? What if they need to pay for envelopes and postage to get their message to Albertans across the province? Is it reasonable for the government to restrict this person's fundamental right to freedom of expression?

What if our hypothetical, politically-engaged Albertan finds a number of like-minded people who want to express their opinion on the same issue? Do the rights of the individual diminish because their idea is popular? What if this group of people find that there is a political party or a politician who shares their concern, or what if they find that there's a political party or politician working against their interests? Do their rights to organize and support or oppose like-minded people end if those people are seeking or hold elected office?

Of course, we know that one of the arguments is that Albertans should be restricted depending on their financial capability and capacity to spread their ideas. I would caution that restrictions based on these factors, while they may seem to be based on a principle of fairness, are in fact a form of censorship on a group of Albertans. Mr. Speaker, restricting the political speech of Albertans is something that should be done rarely and reverently. It is certainly something that deserves more than a few rushed days at the end of session. It is something that cannot happen without deep deliberation and consultation, the kind that could happen in the setting of a committee.

Mr. Speaker, to close – and I'm sure everybody appreciates it – I would just like to repeat one idea, that whenever we seek to change the rules of our democratic process, we should remember the potential significance of what we're really doing. We should remember that in our political tradition the primary defenders of our rights and liberties are the parliamentary bodies like this Assembly. As such, I would urge all members to help fulfill our duty as legislators and support the motion to refer this bill to committee for further scrutiny and consultation.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Cardston-Taber-Warner, under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. Hunter: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to thank the Member for Highwood for waxing poetically on this important referral motion, and I want to thank him for his reasonable argument for why this needs to go to committee. I think that this morning already we've heard some very good arguments that would indicate the need for this government to take a sober second thought, to send it to committee, and to provide Albertans with an opportunity to have a more fulsome discussion on this issue. I think Mr. Resler's indication that this is a rushed process and that he has not been consulted is evidence enough of why this needs to go to committee and have a more fulsome discussion.

I'm very interested to hear from the hon. Member for Highwood how important it is for Albertans to feel like the democratic process that they are engaged in will have the best efficacy in terms of its application and that the process of that democracy is as strong as it can be. I would like to ask the member if he would be willing to share his feelings on this process of being able to make sure we get this right for Albertans, who are aware of the importance of democracy in our society.

The Speaker: The Member for Highwood.

Mr. W. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks to my hon. friend from Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Cooper: Easy for you to say.

Mr. W. Anderson: Yeah. It's early in the morning for Wayne.

Mr. Cooper: Names, names, names.

Mr. W. Anderson: I apologize.

Further to my colleague's question, the part that I find really disturbing is when we received the letter from the Chief Electoral Officer stating that he was not consulted with effectively. That, in its own right, should be a definition that this bill has to go back to committee. We have to consult with those of authority. I have a lot of respect for the Chief Electoral Officer, and given his words in his document, I think it's imperative that we have the opportunity to reconsider the democratic process that we're currently involved with and send this bill back to committee. My constituents in Highwood as well as constituents in other constituencies, obviously, are concerned about our democratic process, and they want to ensure that we do this the right way. Therefore, thanks to my hon. friend from Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills for highlighting the point that our illustrious Chief Electoral Officer was not consulted with and that we need to move forward and take this bill back to committee.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Any other comments or questions under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing and hearing none, is there anyone wishing to speak to amendment REF1? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you. I rise to support my colleague's motion to refer Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, to committee. Mr. Speaker, we see it again. Days from when this House is scheduled to rise, this NDP government introduces another piece of omnibus legislation that demands thorough review and broad consultation. How many is this now? Thirty, 31, 32 – and the list goes on – 33, 34? I don't know if there are more yet. We don't even know. They introduced one yesterday. Is there one today? We don't know.

Let me explain the massive undertaking that is Bill 32. Many of the concepts and proposals in this bill were previously discussed in committee, which ran out of time when the government refused to extend its mandate. We have a very clear idea of the complexity of discussions that need to occur on this bill, and they cannot be done in the waning hours of this session. Mr. Speaker, for that fundamental reason, Bill 32 must go to committee.

What does committee allow us to do? To begin with, it allows us to consult, and consultation is a critical part of our job. We must ensure that we're reflecting the views of Albertans when we come to this House to review and amend and to pass legislation that will benefit all Albertans. Clearly, that is a challenging job, and we do not take any piece of proposed legislation lightly. We need to carefully review it, ask many questions of stakeholders, see how it affects them, and then determine potential ways of improving it.

This is our task for every piece of legislation. But when we have short sessions, with bills introduced practically every day of it, clearly that cannot happen, and this is not happening. We need to look at each piece of legislation with an eye to determining if it has forged the right balance of Albertans' differing views. Some bills are simple, but Bill 32 is not. This bill begs study, and the place to do that is in committee. This is a critical part of being a legislator. We need to thoroughly understand the proposals in every bill, for none of us want to pass something and then have a passed flawed bill.

Mr. Speaker, let's look at the complexity of Bill 32. The NDP want to create a new independent office of the Legislature. We don't know why, but we do know that these offices cost millions of dollars. Sending this bill to committee would allow us to explore this concept.

Bill 32 proposes to allow Elections Alberta to launch a door-to-door enumeration before every election. That might be a great idea, but the cost is, once again, massive. Sending Bill 32 to committee would allow us to look at the justifications and determine if that expense can be justified at every election. Perhaps it can, but right now we do not know. Yet we will have to vote on this within days.

Then there are the seemingly minor amendments such as the length of time a voter needs to live in Alberta before being eligible to vote in an election. Is that minor? Mr. Speaker, sending this bill to committee would allow us to ask Albertans what they think of that change. Perhaps they would want longer residency requirements.

Here's another good one. Bill 32 eliminates portions of the Senatorial Selection Act, that the NDP let fall by the wayside. Those elections were a big step for Alberta. They sent an important message to the federal government at the time, and Albertans may well want to keep those sections. Mr. Speaker, the NDP may not realize it, but Albertans care about elections and voting processes. They care very much, and pushing this bill through this House in days, as the NDP clearly intend to do, is wrong.

I haven't even touched on its size, but let me remind everyone that it's over a hundred pages long. These are not just technical amendments. They will change the nature of voting and elections in Alberta.

Some of the amendments in Bill 32 are good. I applaud the modernization aspects of this bill, easing up rules for advance polling and allowing for the use of new technologies. I'm sure that in typical fashion the NDP will only market those positive aspects of the bill to Albertans but fail to mention the more contentious changes.

Mr. Speaker, sending this bill to committee will allow the public to engage in this process, too. We rely on them, and they need to rely on us. Let's do the right thing here. I look to all of my colleagues to support this referral motion.

Mr. Speaker, this is the third time, I think, that this government has brought in amendments to the Election Act, you know, in their short time in this House. And here we go again with another version that's rushed through here with flaws in it, so I guess they'll be bringing back some amendments in the next one. I don't know if every session will have an automatic elections amendment act – I guess that could be – but maybe we should take our time and consult and do it right. Even the last time when this went to committee, a bunch of the changes proposed today were recommended in that committee and voted down, and now here the government brings them back.

You know, they said that they took big money out of politics. That was the last idea that they had. Well, maybe they did take big money out of politics, but at least it was transparent, and everybody could see what it was. They took big money out, and now they're talking about dark money, so they turned big money into dark money, I guess. You took big money out and put it underground . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, come on.

Mr. Drysdale: You know, they took big money out, put it underground in the form of PACs and unions – it's all included in there – and now they call it dark money. Well, they created the dark money. Now they're going to try and take the dark money out. I don't know what colour the next money will be.

You know, Mr. Speaker, any time they change these rules without proper consultation, this is what happens, and then they'll have to make more amendments. Now they're going to propose to take dark money out, which, if you're going to get rid of the PACs, which they helped create, includes unions. I hear there are paid union workers out door-knocking in Calgary-Lougheed. I mean, that's PACs. That's dark money, so get rid of it, I guess.

We need to consult on this and make sure that it's done properly, Mr. Speaker. That's why this bill needs to be referred to committee. Thank you.

The Speaker: Member for Calgary-Hays, under 29(2)(a)?

Mr. McIver: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you for recognizing me. And thank you to the hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti for really enlightening the House on this bill. Really, to the hon. member through the Speaker, I was very taken by you pointing out what I think is obvious. This is another example where the NDP is bringing forward a bill to undo the damage that previous NDP bills have created. There are so many examples in this session alone. They say that they've taken away big money, and now they say they're going to take away dark money. The only money they're not interested in taking away is the orange money. They want no one else to be able to raise money but themselves, and that is actually, I think . . .

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Okay. I thought you were standing to shut me down, Mr. Speaker. I see you're just changing seats. That's never happened before. That's why I was so surprised.

As I shift gears, Madam Speaker, to the hon. member, I'm grateful that you pointed out that this bill is just another of many examples of the NDP having to create a bill to undo the damage and the harm that they did with the last bill and by the gang that can't shoot straight that hasn't got it right in the past.

This time I also thank you for pointing out that they want to create a new independent officer, which is going to cost, I would think, at least a million dollars a year, just based on what other independent officers cost – if it's a half a million or 2 million, the fact is that it's a bunch more money – presumably so that they can consult with that officer. And I thank you in your remarks for pointing out that they haven't consulted with the officer that they have now.

In fact, the smoking gun that shows this – and I thank the hon. member through the Speaker for pointing that out – is where in the letter from Mr. Resler, the one sentence in the last paragraph says,

"I have not been consulted in relation to policy direction leading up to Bill 32." To the hon. member, I have to wonder how he feels about the fact that this government claims over and over and over again, including on this bill, that they've consulted with everyone, yet one would think that the Chief Electoral Officer would be on the top three list of who they ought to consult with if they're going to consult with anybody. It would appear that the government hasn't even consulted with the person on probably the top three list of people they ought to consult with.

Madam Speaker, the hon. member has really made a powerful point here about the big difference between what the NDP says and what the NDP does, even down to the subject of the bill. So I want to talk to the hon. member about how he even feels about the title of the bill, which is actually typical with this NDP government. What the big print giveth, the small print taketh away. Now, the big print sounds pretty good. To the hon. member, I'd like to know how he feels about the title of the bill that says – it's very poetic – An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta. I can't think of a better thing to do than to strengthen and protect democracy in Alberta, but the hon. member pointed out that that's the opposite of what the bill does and, in fact, has pointed out that one of the top three people they ought to talk to, the Chief Electoral Officer, has said in writing that that officer of the House hasn't been consulted whatsoever. His words; not mine.

A smoking gun here, folks, and somebody from our party will table it in the House here shortly although I'm sure the government is well aware because the letter was addressed to the minister that moved this bill, the minister responsible for democratic renewal. Again, what the big print giveth, the small print taketh away with the NDP. You just can't trust even the titles of the bills. You just can't trust them.

To the hon. member, I'd like you to reflect on the title of the bill and how absolutely opposite it seems to be to the effect of the bill, and also if I could get you to reflect on the obvious hypocrisy of wanting to create a new officer of the Legislature when the current officer of the Legislature has taken the trouble to send a letter to say that that officer hasn't even been consulted. I wonder, to the hon. member, how you think the government is going to make an excuse out of creating a new officer when they're ignoring the one they have already. [The time limit for questions and comments expired] Oh, my goodness. I wanted to hear that answer. I'm sorry, hon. member.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am pleased to rise and speak in favour of referring Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, to the Legislative Offices Committee on the grounds that this bill covers a lot of ground in its attempt to tip the balance of the electoral system in favour of the governing party.

The purpose of our committees is to foster debate on proposed legislation and issues facing our constituents. Committees allow us to host public forums and take submissions from private citizens, businesses, boards, trade associations, and the list goes on, all the while getting a better understanding of how we can better represent the needs and interests of those who will be affected most by the final decisions that we make in this House.

Given that Bill 32 is extensive in size and scope and given that we don't get to see the bill before it's released and given that the government only released this bill days before this House was scheduled to rise, it follows logically that we send this bill to the Legislative Offices Committee so that we as members are extended an opportunity to further examine the merits of this omnibus bill.

I want to rewind for a minute and go back to the overall size of this bill. This is an omnibus piece of legislation. The members opposite are going to argue that they did the proper consultation before tabling it. But we all make mistakes. Yes, even members on this side of the House make mistakes. So why would it be a bad idea for more eyes to review this bill, especially eyes outside the walls of this hallowed House?

Now, one of the parts of this bill that was very disconcerting to me when I first read this part of the bill was stripping the right of Albertans to be able to vote for our senators. I remember this being a very important issue for Albertans. We have, I believe, fought for the right of being able to have equal and fair representation by elected senators in our province. In these people we have – I actually feel very proud of those senators that we've elected and sent to Ottawa. More importantly, Madam Speaker, is that they were elected. Our senate system is broken in this federation in that it's not elected. I believe that an elected senate is very important.

Now, we led out in this argument and in this case of being able to say: "You know what? In Alberta we're going to do it right. In Alberta democracy will reign supreme. We will have the opportunity to be able to say who our senators will be through the election process, through democracy." It is unfortunate that there were not more provinces that followed the example of Alberta to elect their senators. However, it doesn't matter whether or not everybody else follows that good practice. The fact is that Alberta led out. We led out in showing our federation that electing their senators is the right thing to do because we believe in an elected senate.

So for an NDP minister to put this part into this bill, I found completely offensive to the work that has been done in the past. I think it's only incumbent upon this government, if they feel that this is the right thing to do, to take that to committee, to send this bill to committee so that they can actually hear what those Albertans who fought so hard to get senators elected and to have that piece of legislation where we had the right to elect those senators stripped away from them – they need to have the right and their day in court where they can actually speak their mind, tell this government and that committee why they think it is a good idea or a bad idea. If they think that this is the right approach, then I don't see why they wouldn't want to have Albertans have their say on this.

But I can tell you, I believe that the government and especially the minister do not want to have this brought before Albertans because they know what the answer will be. They know that Albertans were passionate about this issue and that Albertans are still passionate about this issue and that they would reject this part of the bill. I have no doubt in my mind that the government will not send this to committee, will not give it a second sober thought, based upon the idea that they know what Albertans are thinking.

How can this be the path that this government is taking? I think that the polls show very well what Albertans think about this path.

By trying to ram this bill through in the dying days of session, the government is telling the members of this House and, frankly, all Albertans that: we know better than you, and we don't make mistakes. We are not being afforded sufficient time to consult stakeholders, draft amendments, and give this bill fair debate. That's why we should refer this bill to committee.

Madam Speaker, we also need to be honest with ourselves about the timing of public interest. There is this idea that what is salient is important, and saliency as far as politics and the public are concerned usually comes with the interest of the media after a bill is actually tabled. Prior to that, most people aren't paying attention to the little details involving the government, reading government websites, filling out surveys, or attending public forums.

We must give the media the opportunity to be able to disseminate the information about these bills so that people can make an informed decision, and I have to say that the process that we have seen – and I will admit that I am new to this House, being two and a half years into it. As I've watched and seen what that process is and recognized that these bills can go from inception and introduction to completion within a week, how does that give our public the opportunity of being able to take a look at what is in these bills, especially the stakeholders? In this situation democracy itself is being redefined. I think that it's important, as a democracy-loving citizen, that the people should have the right to be able to take a look and have a say in how this thing is drafted.

The government could say that the public needs to pay more attention, but that's not fair given the thousands of other things nonpolitical people juggle in their days. People are busy, Madam Speaker. You know that. I think that when we allow the media to disseminate that information to the general population, then we have an opportunity of really getting true and fulsome feedback from Albertans.

All this to say that the e-mails, letters, calls, and meetings with private citizens don't usually flood in until the bill is knocking at their door. Unfortunately, by this point their feedback isn't given much attention unless the bill is referred to a committee, where those concerns are brought forward.

Now, I've spoken before about the necessity of even committees being able to hear the arguments and hear from their stakeholders. As I said before in another speech, I was in a committee meeting with Resource Stewardship where there were stakeholders that had been waiting for two and a half years to be able to come in and speak to this Resource Stewardship Committee, and the government side of the committee had blocked their ability to be able to come in and see them and talk with them. We gave them a great opportunity to be able to say: yes, you have the right to come in. We were going to create a working group.

The reason why I say this, Madam Speaker, in terms of context is that unfortunately the NDP government have created a pattern, are showing a pattern that rather than actually wanting to hear what Albertans have to say, they believe that they have it right and that they don't need to listen to what Albertans say. This is a dangerous, dangerous path to take, and I believe that when that happens, Albertans decide at elections that they no longer will accept that government.

I've heard of constituents concerned about the infiltration of outside influence into our elections by way of fake votes if this bill is passed. Bill 32 eliminates the six-month residency requirements for Alberta voters in general elections. You know, I believe that when the six-month rule, which I believe is fairly universal in terms of a democratic system, was implemented, it was implemented to fix a problem of people coming in and having undue influence in elections where, in terms of Alberta, we need to hear from Albertans, whether or not they accept the mandate that has been presented by each party and elect their representatives in that way.

Now, the concern that I have with them taking away this part of the six-month residency requirement is that potentially it could allow our elections to be influenced through outside influence. These constituents' concerns are that their votes will count for less in the next election. Again, I don't believe that Albertans deserve that. I believe that Albertans deserve the right to vote and to be able to vote for who they want to have govern them in the next four years after that.

This is all assuming the government calls the next election in the spring of 2019, based on the Election Act, so I guess we'll have to see on that. The point here is that concerns like this would never have come in during public consultation. I bring this up to highlight that there are likely countless other submissions just like this one flooding our constituency offices. All these concerns are legitimate and should be given due consideration.

One thing that I've been very interested in over the last two and a half years as I've listened is that I have yet to hear one NDP MLA, whether it's a backbencher or whether it's a government official, stand up in this House and table or send negative feedback that they've received. Now, I can tell you, especially on other bills that we've seen, that if my office is receiving this negative feedback, I'm sure that their offices are receiving it as well. Why would they not want to represent all of their constituents?

This, again, is a dangerous precedent that they've set, and I think that they are going to be punished in the next election for that. Furthermore, if the government was to send this bill to committee and allow for more input from the public, wouldn't it give the government side of the House more licence to pass bills like this? I know they have already heard from their list of stakeholders, but imagine how much approval a bill such as this could have with extensive input from the concerned Albertans that I've been hearing from.

I'd like to pose a question to the government and to the government side. What is their fear of sending this bill to the Legislative Offices Committee for a review? Is the government afraid of the feedback it might get from the 11 committee members, from the stakeholders, and from the countless Albertans that want to have a say in this regard, or does the government not trust this committee to make the right choice? I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that the public trusted these individuals to make good choices by electing them, so is the government saying that it doesn't trust the decisions of the electorate?

This is not a stretch. The Standing Committee on Legislative Offices does not have the mandate to approve changes to legislation, but these 11 members could certainly discuss this bill, take feedback from the public, give it more consideration, and debate the recommendations for the rest of us to discuss. How can this be considered a bad thing?

Now, earlier I heard the Deputy Premier say: how many times did you do it? She was referring to, I would assume, the PC governance model in terms of omnibus bills. My question to her is: do two wrongs make a right? I mean, if you promised Albertans and said to Albertans, "We want to do things differently," then if you're throwing these omnibus bills, if you're not consulting, then, really, are you not doing what you supposedly were condemning in the past? Whether you believe that it's your right to do this because you have . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills under Standing Order 29(2)(a).

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just appreciate the member's comments. I have two very quick questions, actually. One of them: in your remarks you suggested that perhaps the government thinks that they know better than Albertans or that the government knows best. I'm just curious to know what your thoughts might be around: do you think that they also have concluded that they know what's better for the Election Act than the Chief Electoral Officer, who is responsible for delivering results on that Election Act?

The second question that I have for you is around the Senate. Do you think that this government thinks that they know better than what Albertans want with respect to elected senators, and is that why they chose not to bring the Senatorial Selection Act back to the Chamber for debate so that under the cover of darkness that bill would expire, because they were concerned about the push-back that may have come from Albertans?

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to thank my esteemed colleague for what I believe are the quintessential questions about this bill. I'd like to address the first one first of all, you know, the question: does the government know best? Now, I would not presume to assume what the government is thinking on this bill. But in terms of actions and outcomes I would have to say that they have shown a propensity to believe that they know best about what Albertans want and what they think they want. This, again, in my opinion, is a dangerous precedent and a dangerous path to take.

Albertans in 2015 were decisive in how they felt about that. Whether it was perceived or actual, Albertans made a decision. It is incumbent upon any government, whether you are a Conservative government or an NDP government or a Liberal government, that you have got to consult with Albertans, that you have to really try to understand what the will of the people is and then govern in that way.

When it comes to the second question that my esteemed colleague asked, about the Senate, the loss of the Senate, I do believe that this is a very important question to Albertans. I do believe that they would love to have the right to discuss this issue and to bring it to committee so that people can come in and present their beliefs on whether it's important or whether it's not.

Again, as I said before to the Deputy Premier, this approach that the government is taking, the approach that, "Well, the previous government did it; therefore, we can do it," won't fly with Albertans. Albertans will reject it, and they will say: "No. We want you to consult with us. We want you to figure out what the will of the people is, and then we want you to govern accordingly." Again I have to say it, and I've said this before. I believe that the polls indicate that Albertans don't feel that this government is doing that. They're not following that course of action of consulting with Albertans, of making sure that Albertans' views, the views of the general population, are represented here in the House.

With that, Madam Speaker, I just hope that the rest of my colleagues will send this bill to the committee so that we can have sober second thought. Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Livingstone-Macleod.

Mr. Stier: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker, and, once again, good morning, all. It's a pleasure to be here again this morning on a bright day. I see we have some wonderful schoolchildren in here today to witness our process. Everybody can wave. They're here to see democracy in action this morning.

Madam Speaker, we're talking this morning about a very important part of democracy, and that's Bill 32, which is titled An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta. We're working on an amendment here that we want to send it to committee because we believe it needs to be rethought, and we think it needs some refinement, and we think it needs, with some new information that we just recently obtained, a little revamping.

You know, there's also been a lot of conversation this morning about a lack of consultation and so on and so forth. As we've seen many times in the past few years that I've been here, this seems to happen time and time again, but most often it is within the past two years that I've seen this go on and on and on. So I feel sometimes I'm like a broken record every time I rise to speak in the House, asking and cajoling and pleading that this government consult on legislation that they're proposing. Here I am again asking that another massive NDP bill be referred to committee in order for there to be consultation on the impacts.

And it is a big bill. Stacked here on my desk are some of the bills we've got. This is the bill we're talking about.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. member, I apologize for a moment.

We're not in committee, and all members are required to be sitting in their own seats. Thank you.

Go ahead.

Mr. Stier: Thank you. The Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock is welcome to take his seat in front of me. I don't mind.

To go on, anyway, Madam Speaker, as was pointed out earlier, we got a couple of copies of this Bill 32. It's a pretty big one. It's 105. I guess they had to bring it out in a rush before they made it that way because we got a big stack of paper a day or two ahead of that. It's something that I think indicates that this government wasn't ready on this one. I don't think that they had all their ducks in order when they brought this one out.

As I've stated before in debate on other bills and sometimes in statements and questions under consideration by the House, there's a difference between asking stakeholders about an idea versus asking them to consider a very specific change, as is articulated in this bill. This government needs to ensure that if it gets the legislation right, it doesn't end up being tied up in the court as various stakeholders and other parties challenge the constitutionality of various aspects of the bill.

The best way to ensure that legislation it is considering is constitutional is to ask the experts. By referring this bill to the committee, we will have the ability and opportunity to ask those experts to come before the committee and provide their expert testimony to consider when it writes its final recommendation on how the Legislature should proceed on the bill.

In that set of phrases I'd like to take a bit of a break from my prepared statement by just looking at something from the expert that we were talking about earlier today. I'm speaking of the letter that was addressed to the minister responsible for democratic renewal. It has been written by the Chief Electoral Officer, Glen Resler, as was mentioned by the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills earlier, and I think it is probably something that when the government received it, they probably stepped back and said: "Uh-oh. We might have goofed here. We might have missed something." I'd like to take a moment beyond my prepared statement to say a few words and to read some of the statements made by the electoral officer because I think that there's a classic example of a true expert.

The second paragraph down he says:

While I applaud the spirit behind the proposals about advance polls and special mobile polls, I wanted to bring to [the attention of the House] potential unintended consequences of these particular proposals. If passed in its current form, I am concerned that Bill 32 will deteriorate the service provided to electors and increase the timelines for communicating results.

Now, how many times have members and how many people in here have participated in elections and wound up with some very, very, very angry voters when they've had difficulties with the voting process? This is important. If the electoral officer of Alberta has concerns, you can bet that Albertans will have concerns.

He goes on to say:

The most notable areas of concern include the change in advance polling days and the absence of the authority to utilize vote tabulators for advance polls, special mobile polls and Special Ballots.

Those are important things that were mentioned in this bill, and the Chief Electoral Officer is very concerned about this, folks.

With regard to advance polling days he says:

While I support increased availability of advance polls, the earlier advance polling days do not leave sufficient time to notify electors adequately of the locations through the Where-to-Vote cards or to have candidate ballots printed.

He's very concerned about that process. Well, I would be concerned if the people of Alberta aren't given proper notice so that they have the time to consider where they're going to vote.

It goes on. He's now talking about where-to-vote cards.

Where-to-Vote cards are produced for . . . elector addresses that include the dates, times and locations of all polling places, including for advance polls. Because Alberta does not have a fixed election date, our returning officers cannot arrange polling places before knowing the voting days. The soonest that Where-to-Vote cards can be sent to print is Day 7 post-writ. This results in the cards being received by electors between Day 15 and 20, which is likely to fall [well] after the first advance poll days.

Well, that certainly can't work. That doesn't make any sense for this bill to contain something like that. It must be amended.

In regards to ballots, the nomination period must close [by] (Day 10) prior to sending ballots to be printed with [the proper] candidates' names on them. Opening advance polls earlier results in as little as [only] four days to proof, print, and make ballots available to . . . advance poll locations. With rural and more remote areas, this timeline could not be achieved.

I underline that, ladies and gentlemen. He's saying that with rural and more remote areas this idea could not be done, yet it's in the bill. I cannot understand us proceeding with this bill in the fashion that we're doing, without sending it to committee so that we can get these corrections obtained but, moreover, hearing from the gentleman that has written this, the Chief Electoral Officer of Alberta.

Another concern he has is voting anywhere without tabulators. He's saying:

Proposed amendments to section 99 (Advance Polls) and proposed new sections . . . [regarding] (Special Mobile Poll), allow electors to vote for the candidates in their electoral division without being present in their polling subdivision. These changes are in alignment . . .

with what we were hoping to see as it goes.

However, without the ability to utilize tabulators and a tabulator ballot, the goals of improving efficiency and service to the elector will be eroded. The utilization of the vote tabulator would have allowed for ballot on demand to be printed at each location, and the tabulator could be programmed to read and report results from the 87 electoral divisions. Without authority for the use of tabulators, as noted above, a blank ballot may need to be utilized, and a manual method of noting and sorting the correct electoral division will need to be developed.

Imagine trying to sort that out at some or other voting station.

This process is anticipated to add additional timeframes and the results of elections across the province will likely be delayed.

As a matter of fact, he says:

In the recent BC provincial elections, this resulted in a delay in counting the "vote anywhere" ballots to 10 days after polling day.

It's absolutely ridiculous if we pursue this method of polling.

He also talks about voter assist terminals. He understands that there are some amendments to section 4 in regards to the use of . . . assist terminals [that] are intended to make voting more accessible to voters with a functional limitation that prevents them from voting independently.

That sounds like a good idea as it is.

10:20

He says, though:

Currently, the only voter assist technology that exists is specific to marking a tabulator ballot.

Without the ability to use those vote tabulators we just talked about, the provision for voting with assist terminals will not be able to be done. Uh-oh.

Mr. Cooper: Uh-oh.

Mr. Stier: Sounds to me – and the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills, I think, seems to agree – that this seems like a major problem.

He goes on. The last point I'll make with regard to the comments from the electoral officer is this.

The proposed amendment to section 55 to change the announcement of the official results from the 10th to the 7th day following polling day shortens the allowable timeline. It will be a challenge, if not impracticable . . .

I'll say that again.

It will be a challenge, if not impracticable, for returning officers to comply with section 55 if the other amendments [he's talked about] remain unchanged.

He concludes with this, Madam Speaker, in his remarks. He has provided special remarks to the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee, but he has not been consulted in relation to these problems in Bill 32. What more do we need in evidence to suggest that it's time to pull the string on this one, put on the brakes, and refer this to a committee?

Now, there are a number of points in the legislation that will strengthen voter engagement in Alberta and involve Alberta's newest voters through education and outreach. Those things, I think, we can support in this bill. But even if you do support the bill overall, as I've just outlined and I say again, there are still an awful lot of reasons to send this to committee. I don't think any member here would want to argue with the Chief Electoral Officer in Alberta on this point.

Madam Speaker, that concludes my remarks for this segment of my presentation. I think it's solid evidence that I have now presented – and it was introduced earlier by the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills – that we need to do a proper consultation on this for a change, not follow the normal NDP way of reviewing matters, pay attention to what the expert, the Chief Electoral Officer, has said, and vote positively to send this bill to committee.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a) the hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, Madam Speaker. You know, I'd just like to thank my colleague from Livingstone-Macleod for his comments and remarks. One thing that I found particularly interesting is how he wrapped up his speech speaking about the normal NDP way. This NDP government has become a say one thing, do another government. I think that is very, very clear in Bill 32 with respect to their lack of consultation with the Chief Electoral Officer that you, Member for Livingstone-Macleod, so eloquently indicated.

Another area where this NDP government is such a say one thing, do another government is that this NDP government likes to talk about getting dark money out of politics, but the reality, Madam Speaker, is that some of the biggest dark money in politics is NDP money. I'd just like to highlight that with some actual facts with respect to third-party advertisers. I know that my hon. colleague is also very interested and, quite likely, would like to provide comment if there's any time.

You know, Madam Speaker, in the first two quarters of 2017 the United Nurses of Alberta contributed over $120,000 to the Alberta Federation of Labour's PAC, or third-party advertiser, as they actually are. [interjections] Just wait. We'll get there. We'll get there. The Health Sciences union contributed $100,000 in the first two quarters; UFCW local 401, $70,000 in the first two quarters; CUPE local 30 . . . [interjection] Pardon?

Mr. Clark: How much is in Alberta Can't Wait?

Mr. Cooper: Oh, I don't know. A lot. But we'll get there. There's a lot.

The good news is that for all third-party advertisers they're required to disclose their contributions, just like all third-party advertisers are. My point here is that the government likes to say one thing and do another. They have their PACs. They have their PACs, and they like to pretend that they don't.

Mr. McIver: That's orange money.

Mr. Cooper: This is orange money.

ATU local 583, over $15,000 in the first two quarters; UFCW local 1118U, Red Deer, over $12,000; CUPE local 30, Edmonton, just over $10,000; CUPE local 37, Calgary, $9,000, oh, just about $10,000; communication workers union, Burnaby, British Columbia, outside of Alberta, Burnaby, Alberta, maybe – I wonder how the Telecommunications Workers Union of Alberta feels about Trans Mountain pipeline; I'm not sure – just over $7,000. This all appears to be very, very, very dark money, Madam Speaker.

Ms McLean: That's not dark. It's right there.

Mr. Cooper: I hear the Minister of Service Alberta say that that's not dark money. Well, guess what? All PACs are required to publish their contributions.

Imagine that. Imagine, Madam Speaker. The government continues to say one thing and do another. I take great interest in the comments from my colleague from Livingstone-Macleod about how he has observed another area of the government saying one thing and doing another with respect to not consulting the most . . . [The time limit for questions and comments expired] Oh. That's unfortunate.

The Deputy Speaker: You've already spoken to the bill, hon. member; 29(2)(a) is finished.

Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It is a pleasure to speak to the referral amendment on Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta. I am a firm believer in sending Bill 32 to the Legislative Offices Committee and to do proper due diligence on this and to ensure that we have full transparency on the process and full input from Albertans on the direction that we hope to take their democracy forward with. I have the pleasure of serving on the Legislative Offices Committee, so we've heard a number of times from the Chief Electoral Officer.

I also had the privilege of serving on the Ethics and Accountability Committee, with an intent to improve the way our democracy functions within Alberta. What I found so disconcerting with the Ethics and Accountability Committee was that the government was very much on a track of: we're going to move forward only on the stuff that we're definitely in favour of. We saw many times where we had a committee that ended in a tie vote with the chair breaking the tie in favour of the governing party members on that committee. I think what was quite evident was how the government was in the process of trying to stack the deck against the other parties within the democratic process in Alberta and in the meantime has created even more consequences that they were even warned about.

When we look at the discussion that we had in committee with regard to handing over the electoral system to possibly third-party entities – and that was brought out very clearly. I spoke on that in the September 19 meeting last year, what the government was proposing with regard to spending contribution limits coming across all parties, $4,000 across all parties, and how it was very difficult to even enforce that. It was not only coming across all parties; it became $4,000 limits on the party, on constituency associations, on nomination candidates, on leadership candidates.

Government sticking its fingers very much – a lot of overreach into all these different entities that helped to move our democracy forward in a very credible manner, and that's through political parties. Not only was the government intent on – and I believe that all parties were very much in favour of limiting political donations to a political party. But it becomes very difficult to all of a sudden work on policing or enforcing, for the Chief Electoral Officer to enforce the rules that were being put on the Chief Electoral Officer when it was cross-parties. So we were setting ourselves up to fail.

When we look at, then, the spending limits that were being put in place for individuals, for leadership candidates, for party candidates that are going to run an election process, those limitations in my opinion are tying the hands of individuals within constituencies to actually voice their concerns or to promote their freedom of expression. When we limit the amount that they put forward – agreed; we don't want to put it into the hands of a few within Alberta with large donations. But when we limit the ability of the political parties and the political candidates to fully utilize the money that they've been given for the purpose of spreading the message of that party or that candidate, I believe that's when you all of a sudden create the consequences that we're seeing before us now.

You know, I find it really quite concerning that now we get a letter from the Chief Electoral Officer with his concerns. We spent a lot of time with Mr. Glen Resler in the Ethics and Accountability Committee. He put forward many good recommendations that were being debated and discussed. He gave us a lot of good, credible front-line-worker type of feedback on how this can actually be implemented.

When I received this letter yesterday as a member of the Legislative Offices Committee – and to see that the consultation had not even gone as far as to ensure consulting with the Chief Electoral Officer on the ability to go forward in a way that has good policy and good policy input: I believe that there is a breakdown in consultation here. I believe that we have a situation where now the government is deciding that they know better. We've seen it in many different aspects where the government knows best. This NDP knows best. We had it many times in the Ethics and Accountability Committee on advice from the Chief Electoral Officer and others that were witnessing in the committee that – we would have the Wildrose Party, PC Party, Alberta Party, Liberal Party all very much in alignment with concerns that were being proposed, yet it would be voted down. This NDP government knows best.

Now we have a situation here where it's come to the attention that AFL has become a third-party PAC with some very significant contributions, and I just wonder if the United Nurses, all the nurses in Alberta, recognize that in this year they were contributing $132,000 to the Alberta Federation of Labour's political action committee. I just wonder if the Health Sciences Association of Alberta is being transparent enough with their members and if all of their members recognize and are informed that they gave $111,000 in this year to the Alberta Federation of Labour political action committee.

What's really interesting about this report that we have before us from the Chief Electoral Officer is that all that money was primarily given in quarter 1 and quarter 2 this year, and all of a sudden it dried up in quarter 3. It leads me to question. Hmm. I wonder if this political action committee has received information from the government that they would make a decision that: well, we've got all the money that we're going to be able to spend, so we better just not bother taking any more donations. You've got to wonder where that money is going now. The concern we had in the Ethics and Accountability Committee was that the spending limits that we were putting on the political parties, the units that we have utilized within our democracy over the last hundred and some years, those spending limits would drive that money to other entities and possibly take it out of the realm of political parties, and I believe that is possibly what we're seeing here.

The NDP is promising to remove dark money from politics, and you would think the NDP are also going to remove the in-kind, personal support of staffers of the Alberta Federation of Labour from working on Alberta NDP campaigns or perhaps also the in-kind support the AFL provides the NDP by sitting on the NDP board. I sure would like to get Gil McGowan in here to committee and question him on these matters. After all, the NDP is restricting the AFL's ability to act as a political action committee, so I think it's prudent for us to get the feedback from the AFL as to what their concerns might be with Bill 32. There is a concern with Bill 32, if it does not go to committee, that we're not going to get transparent consultation and that Albertans will not get what I believe is the accountability of government to move forward in a very transparent manner.

So how about it? Let's send Bill 32 to committee so we can get Gil McGowan in there and talk to him about how the Alberta Federation of Labour perceives Bill 32 and possibly even ask the question of why the Alberta Federation of Labour's political action committee money all of a sudden dried up for quarter 3. Was there any kind of information that Gil McGowan had that most others did not have that made them decide to do business in a different manner?

The NDP want Bill 32 to go after something called super PACs. Super PACs are something that we see, I believe, in the United States. Very significant political donation units have possibly gotten in the way of good democracy, but I believe what we're doing here is the government trying to fix legislation that they had already presented and promised to Albertans that was going to fix big money. We called it at that time big money. Now it's all of a sudden become dark money. We have dark orange money. We have dark blue money, apparently. We've got all kinds of different coloured money. I believe that we have a duty to send this, refer this to committee so this discussion can be had in an open, transparent way and that all Albertans can have the ability to have some input into the discussion.

The NDP want to set the spending limits for third-party advertisers so that beginning on December 1 prior to an election year to the day the writ is dropped they can only spend $150,000, and of that, no more than $3,000 to any electoral division. That means third-party advertisers can only play in 50 of the total 87 constituencies. I'm not sure how that makes sense to the government and if they just took these numbers out of the sky, but you would think that they would have the ability to spend the $3,000 in all 87 constituencies. I believe this is blatantly unfair and that the dollar amount should be raised by $111,000, at least, to $261,000 for a level playing field.

Again, we look at having a level playing field right across Alberta. We are talking in another bill with regard to rural-urban voice and effective representation, and now we are driving limits that will possibly change the playing field. We could raise it to $435,000 and make the limit $5,000 per constituency. I believe that could even be fair also. But to have limits in place and that political action committees are going to make decisions based off where they want to pursue their activity: I think we need to open the door, that they can actually fully utilize the money that's given to them and put forward, that they can fully be a voice for the people that are contributing their money and spread it right across Alberta without any hindrance.

The NDP also want to change the spending for the writ period. The day the writ is issued to the end of polling day the spending limit is, again, a mere $150,000 and, again, no more than $3,000 of that to any electoral division. I believe there, again, we have the numbers that don't quite jibe with what should probably be where they have the ability to spend equally across all constituencies without hindrance.

The NDP also state that third-party advertisers will now be prohibited from incurring an expense that would be a campaign expense . . .

The Acting Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hawkwood.

Connolly: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I just want to correct a couple of things that the member said and that have been said a couple of times across the way. I just want to preface this by saying that I've never been a member of any of the unions that are associated with the AFL. Actually, I was a member of Unifor for about a month when I worked with Château Laurier in Ottawa, but that was about it.

Mr. McIver: Which is it, yes or no? Yes or no? You said no, then you said yes.

Connolly: I've never been a member of a union in Alberta, which is all the unions that give money into the AFL. Because I was only there for a month, I think I paid $3 in union dues, so there you go. [interjections]

The Acting Speaker: Hon. members, Calgary-Hawkwood has the floor.

Connolly: However, what I want to say is that I have been to the AFL convention as an MLA, and I can tell you that in order for them to give money to their political action committee – to begin with, the political action committee is not a part of the NDP, and we can show you this because the political action committee has done several campaigns against things that this government has been doing. That shows you that the money that's being spent by the AFL does not always support what this government does. It does support whatever the AFL would like to do, and that's what the political action committee is for. It's also voted on by the members of the AFL at the AFL annual convention, and all those unions who are members have to vote on whether or not to give money to the AFL through the political action committee. So there you are.

Mr. Nielsen: So they have to give permission?

Connolly: They do have to give permission. Thank you, Member for Edmonton-Decore. They have to give permission. They have to vote on it. It's a very democratic process.

And the reason you have the numbers on how much each union gave to the AFL is because it's very clear on the Elections Alberta website and because they are very open and transparent with not only their members but all Albertans.

So just all of that to say that we still do not know who Jason Kenney's donors are. If the opposition wants to talk about dark money and they are saying that we have the darkest money, the only reason they know about that money – it's not even going to us, and it's not even always associated with us or helping us – is because they can find it on the Elections Alberta website. If you are a member of a union that is a member of the AFL, you can just ask the AFL what their money is being spent on. It's very open, very transparent.

We don't know who's giving money to Alberta Can't Wait. We don't know who gave money to Unite Alberta. We don't know who gave money to almost all of those PACs that have been helping Jason Kenney and the UCP.

An Hon. Member: It's so dark that we can't see it.

Connolly: Exactly. It is so dark that we cannot see it.

They are not transparent to Albertans. They have been very untruthful to Albertans when Jason Kenney said that he would disclose his donors to Albertans several times. I am very concerned that the United Conservative Party don't actually know what they're talking about when it comes to this. They keep saying: dark money. They don't even understand what dark money means because they are the darkest party in this Legislature and, I would say, in all of Canada. We don't know who any of their funders are, and that is why we're putting this bill forward. We're not putting this bill forward to help us. We're not putting the bill forward to help the Alberta Party, the Liberals, the UCP. We're putting the bill forward to help all Albertans. We are making sure that this province is open and transparent with Albertans, that everything we do is seen by them, and that every single one of them is able to know who funded every campaign, who ran campaigns against each candidate, and how much money that candidate spent.

An Hon. Member: Albertans can't wait for Kenney to disclose his donors.

Connolly: Exactly.

Mr. Speaker, I'm very proud to support this bill, and I'm very concerned by the things that are being said.

An Hon. Member: It's garbage.

Connolly: Yeah, the garbage that's being spewed by the opposition. Quite frankly, it's untruthful, and they should be ashamed of themselves.

The Acting Speaker: Hon. member, refrain from using terms like "untruthful." It's been cited by a previous Speaker.

Connolly: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I will do my best.

Quite frankly, Albertans deserve to have elections decided on the basis of who has the best ideas and not on who has access to the most money, and that is why we made our election system fairer by banning union and corporate donations and imposing strict spending and contribution limits. Now, they keep saying, "We know who sends the AFL their money" and "Do the union members know that their unions are sending money to the AFL?" Yeah, because they have to vote on it at the AGM.

The Acting Speaker: I'll recognize the Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak on one of my favourite topics. One of the first things that we had the opportunity to do in this Assembly very shortly after the 2015 election was participate in the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee, an all-party committee tasked with reviewing all aspects of Alberta's campaign finance laws, our Election Act, and the Conflicts of Interest Act. There were many, many different aspects of that committee. Now, it was a committee that was given one year in its mandate, and we, sadly, didn't get very far, unfortunately, before the committee was allowed to run its course.

What is so profoundly disappointing to me is that that committee is precisely where we should be having these sorts of discussions. The objective of a committee like that, an all-party committee of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta, should be to provide thoughtful consideration to all aspects of the legislation that is before that committee. One of the reasons that we send that sort of legislation to those sorts of committees is that they have the time to consider all of the possible consequences one way or the other, intended and otherwise.

We bring in experts, we listen to the Chief Electoral Officer, we listen to the Ethics Commissioner, we solicit input from the people of Alberta in terms of how they would like to see the election laws in this province changed and updated. Let me be very clear. After 43 and a half years of PC rule, it was long overdue to update those election laws. I don't think, actually, that anyone in this Chamber would disagree with that fact, that they had become out of date. They biased large organizations, allowed donation limits far in excess of what I think most Albertans would have considered reasonable. These are things that we were grappling with, but when we make those changes, changes have consequences. Sometimes those consequences are intended and stated and clear, sometimes those consequences are accidental and unintended, and sometimes those consequences are very intended but kind of hidden, secreted away. And perhaps sometimes when changes are made, those changes are made for reasons that a particular governing party may think are in their best interest.

That, I think, is what's happened in this case. The government used their majority on the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee to stack the deck in their favour or try to do so. [interjection] They tried to do that. They tried to do that, and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that members on the opposition side, all of us – the Member for Calgary-Mountain View, the members from what is now the UCP, and myself – although we didn't agree on every single aspect of the changes that we would have preferred to see, we tried our utmost to hold the government back and say that with the changes you're making, while you might think they're in your best interest in doing so, there are some real risks to the changes you're making. That is why we are here debating Bill 32.

Bill 32 is a voluminous, large, wide-ranging, enormous, and very big attempt to fix the unintended consequences. What it is trying to do – this government, in restricting political activity in the way they did, created a monster. That monster is called PACs, or, colloquially, third-party advertisers according to the act. Having created a monster, we need to try to put that genie back into the bottle because these guys couldn't get their ducks in a row. I can't think of any other analogies. Maybe: put lightning back in the bucket, whatever – I don't know – whatever it is.

The problem, Mr. Speaker, is that when these changes are made, they create knock-on effects and wide-ranging knock-on consequences. That has allowed PACs to spring up and what we refer to as dark money. Albertans know that's wrong. The challenge is that in a free and democratic society it's very difficult for a government to restrain or to constrict or limit an Albertan's ability to freely express themselves or freely associate with other people. So now here we are, trying to put this genie back into the bottle, and it's a really difficult thing to do now that they've been created.

I do have some concerns about this bill, about whether the limits on spending for third-party advertisers dating back to December 1, before the fixed election period, are in fact going to withstand a court challenge. I hope it does. I think it's not an unreasonable attempt to restrict third-party advertising leading into an election period, but it may not succeed given past precedent.

What is so troubling, Mr. Speaker, is, as we learned, the Chief Electoral Officer having written to the minister responsible for democratic renewal expressing his grave concerns about some aspects of this bill. What I am troubled to learn is that the Chief Electoral Officer was not actively consulted through the creation of Bill 32. I think one of the reasons we can see that that may be is that this government rushed to put some changes in place. One of the ways that we know that, a little hint as to how we know that this bill was so rushed, was that the bill was printed out on eight and a half by 11 paper. It was whacked together at the last minute.

Bill 30, on the other hand, is printed in the proper bill format, so we know that that's work that's been ongoing for a long time. We have some concerns with that. We can deal with that when debating Bill 30.

But Bill 32 was put together hastily, and in being put together hastily, the government either didn't have the opportunity or chose not to consult with the very people, the very organization that will be required to actually implement these proposed changes.

We're here debating the referral motion for Bill 32. I feel strongly that this government should have taken the opportunity, should have availed itself of the opportunity it had through the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee, which had very capable members from all sides of the House on it willing and able to work very hard to think through the potential changes, to really work that through. This government had a generational opportunity to make lasting change that would positively impact democracy in Alberta by saying: "We're not just going to make changes that are to the benefit of the New Democratic Party. We're not going to make changes that we think are going to undercut other parties. No. We're going to do the right thing because it's the right thing to do."

This change, these changes, this bill that they brought forward to make the changes that we find ourselves with now had the opportunity for them to say, "This isn't about us; this will stand the test of time; these changes are going to serve Albertans" and defy the opposition to vote against it, because the opposition would have been a part of actually making those changes. For those of us on this side, although we may not have agreed on absolutely everything, if we had seen this government taking thoughtful time to actually make meaningful change that was in the best interest, truly, of the people of Alberta, of democracy, we would have voted enthusiastically in favour of those changes. This government would have deserved the praise it received for doing the right thing because it's the right thing to do, but they didn't do that.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

They decided to stack the deck and put rules in place they thought were to their benefit. What they did was that they created a monster called PACs. We have these millions of dollars flowing into Jason Kenney's PACs and UCP PACs, even Alberta Together, this Alberta Together group, which has no formal affiliation with the Alberta Party. I don't want Alberta Together to exist. I don't think it should have to exist.

I think Albertans know what political parties are. I think the Alberta Party should attract donations from Albertans. We should report those donations publicly. Our job is to elect MLAs. Our job is to form the next government. Albertans understand what that is. That's our job. We shouldn't have to have these shadow organizations. I don't like that they exist. I want nothing to do with it. I think the UCP and Jason Kenney and all of that group should also feel like those things shouldn't have to exist either. All the organizations that support the NDP shouldn't have to exist either. Political activity should exist within the political system as governed very strictly and appropriately by Elections Alberta.

But here we are. We have a bill before us, and we have a referral motion, which we're debating, on whether or not this should be referred to committee. As much as I think that we should take some time and should have taken the time back a year and a half, almost two years ago to really thoughtfully go through Alberta's election laws, we have to bring this bill to fruition in this session because there are changes that exist in this bill, especially as it relates to third-party advertisers and PACs, which will at least constrain those activities somewhat. It fixes things, sort of.

Now, we're spending a lot of time here at second reading on many different bills, this bill included, and I can assure you that we intend to bring forward some amendments to Bill 32. I would encourage other members to do the same because there is a lot that needs to be improved here.

Again, the Chief Electoral Officer has brought forward a number of points, I understand, in some correspondence with the minister very recently specifically as it relates to advance polling and a number of other things. He's used the words "unintended consequences," and I just want to reflect on that briefly. Where an officer of the Legislative Assembly is using words like "unintended consequences," they don't do this lightly. Their job is not to pick sides. They are the least partisan organization in this entire province. Their commitment is to democracy. They care about free and fair elections. They care about a fair process. That's all they care about. So to hear those sorts of comments while a bill is before the Legislature is actually quite remarkable. It is actually quite remarkable, and I look forward to digging a little deeper into that.

I just want to identify a couple of areas that, once we get this bill out of the referral and finally through second and into committee, I think we need to tackle. I'd like to see a definition of PAC. What exactly is a political action committee in the eyes of Elections Alberta? I understand that a third-party advertiser is a thing defined by the act, but I think those organizations that exist only to foster political activity should also be defined as distinct from political action committees.

Let's define even further what PACs can do and not do as it relates to political parties. There's an effort to address that in this bill by saying that the PACs cannot sell memberships, cannot fund raise, cannot do those sorts of things. I get that.

Another area that we talked a great deal about in the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee and one of the reasons that I find myself the MLA for Calgary-Elbow, I firmly believe, is the very necessary step to restrict government advertising during by-elections and general elections. I'm sure you will all recall the story, in the 2014 by-election, of announcements of school portables being made in my constituency by the then government. It actually happened in two different schools in Calgary-Elbow. It's funny; the one that seemed to get all the news attention was the school that my kids went to, interestingly enough. That was quite an experience. That was quite an entrée into politics, I can assure you.

Ultimately, interestingly, it didn't work, actually. The polls around the school where most parents sent their kids actually voted more for me than they voted for the Minister of Education at the time, interestingly enough. Even then it didn't work. Ultimately, here I am, and he's not.

Government advertising. You know, one of the things that we need to think about is that while a by-election is on, this bill would restrict what the government can announce specific to a constituency – fair; I think that is certainly a very good idea – but it doesn't restrict broadly enough, I don't think, what governments can advertise outside of the constituency. For example, as we look at the Calgary-Lougheed by-election, the government has not made any specific announcements relating to what might be happening in Calgary-Lougheed, but there has been some talk about the cancer centre and those sorts of things that would perhaps seek to influence the voters of that constituency notwithstanding the fact that it might not be directly in that constituency. I'd like to see some more restrictions on that.

Spending limits, as I talked about earlier, around the election period may in fact be problematic as it relates to the courts. Again, governments created this monster, which is tough to deal with.

One way to help deal with that, I would suggest, is a fixed election date, not a range of dates. I think that will help. I suspect that if the courts look at the potential range of December 1 of the year prior to the fixed election period – we could be having an election as late as May or June according to the fixed election period. I suspect that the courts may say that that six-month window is probably too long.

I would like some clarity on whether out-of-province donations are, in fact, banned for third-party advertisers, how exactly that may work.

In the end, I don't actually support the referral motion. I will vote against that because I feel that the changes that this bill brings forward, the opportunity for us to bring further changes and amendments at the committee stage, should we find ourselves ever actually at the committee stage on this bill or any other bill that's currently before the Legislature – should that day eventually come, there is some opportunity here, I think, to make some very substantive and substantial improvements to this bill. We certainly intend to bring some amendments forward, and I suspect and wonder if perhaps the government would also consider the same given the feedback from the Chief Electoral Officer. But I don't feel that it's appropriate at this stage to kick the can even further down the road.

I do wonder what the agenda of the UCP is in bringing in the referral motion. Perhaps they would like to continue benefiting from the many PACs that back both their leader as well as their party.

You know, I don't think that I have any more time, so I'll sit down.

The Deputy Speaker: Under 29(2)(a), the hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm Calgary-Hays, just for the record. Yesterday when I tried to correct that, I got a few things wrong, too, so I'll just leave that right where it is if that's okay.

Let me just say that I was interested in the remarks. I was particularly interested in the fact that the hon. independent Member for Calgary-Elbow first started arguing, really, in favour of the referral and then said that he wouldn't support it. You can hardly blame any of us in here for wondering what he was actually saying. It wasn't quite as confusing as the member opposite saying that he was in a union one second and not in the union the next second and never ever clarifying that.

But I'll go back to the hon. member that just finished speaking because he's talking about what the motivation for people is, and I would wonder if he'd like to reflect on the fact that it's possible that people's motivation is to, within the law, give their money to the political party, group, or individual that they support. I did say "within the law," which is important.

I wonder if the hon. member would like to reflect upon whether the problem is that the government, through this and past pieces of legislation, is looking for a way to look like they're doing the right thing while trying to cut off all the money, except for the money that's going to come to them, by trying to outlaw methods of people giving that want to give to other parties but don't want to give to them while looking like they're supporting democracy.

It's no wonder that they're on their second or third piece of legislation to do it because it's actually hard to do that, and I'd like the member to reflect on whether it's actually people's will to find a legal means to give money to the party and the people they support. I wonder if the hon. member wants to reflect upon the fact that the third-party advertisers, euphemistically called PACs – I'd like him to reflect upon whether the PACs are a result of people actually wanting to give money to the parties and people that they support rather than the parties and people that they don't support.

I'd like him to reflect upon the fact that even with the third-party advertisers – it's clear from those that I think are targeted by this legislation that at least some of the third-party advertisers actually have chosen to want to support the previous speaker's group. Good for him. Good for him. Some have wanted to support the party that I belong to, and good for them. And as it turns out, some actually, much surprisingly, to me – but that's the great thing about democracy – want to support the governing party. [interjections] I'm shocked at that, too. I appreciate the government members pounding on their desks. Apparently, not only me but the government members are surprised by that. They should be happy about that.

I'd ask the member to reflect upon whether people give money directly to a candidate, a campaign, a party, a third-party advertising group, or a PAC – I think that's a fairly legally undetermined word, to my knowledge, although I'm happy to be corrected on that. The fact is that, whether we should be looking for ways to allow people to legally express their support for a political party or person or whether the legislation is actually designed to cut off all but the orange money, certainly it seems like again the government is having a hard time looking democratic while trying to be self-serving. And while the member is reflecting upon that, I would like him to think about: if the third-party advertising is cut off, what model would the hon. member prefer . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka on the amendment.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I consider it an honour to be able to rise and speak to the current referral motion before the House, asking the House to actually refer Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, to committee so that it might be more fully and appropriately discussed and there might be some good progress come as a result of it.

I'd like to sort of focus my comments based on some of the insights received in the letter from the Chief Electoral Officer. The very first paragraph, which actually is a single sentence set aside and set apart by itself, is actually quite stunning. I used to read, way back in literature class, that the first sentence of a book is the most important sentence. Well, if the first sentence of a letter is the most important sentence, I truly commend the Chief Electoral Officer for what he's done here.

I would like to quote that first paragraph in one sentence. He says, "I have had a chance to review Bill 32 after first reading," period. That is an astounding statement, that the Chief Electoral Officer himself had not seen this bill until after it was presented in this House for first reading. That leaves me stunned. I find that unbelievable. I think that because of it, the Chief Electoral Officer was pushed to a desperate movement of having to actually write this kind of a letter to the government. It's almost unprecedented that the government's own chief agent in a particular portfolio needs to write and protest the actions of the government and what it's doing.

I'd like to actually reflect on that sentence a little bit and ask some questions about it. He says, "I have had a chance to review Bill 32 after first reading." If the Chief Electoral Officer has not seen the content of this bill until after it was presented in the House for first reading, I just wonder: who did see it first? I mean, this letter is addressed to the minister responsible for democratic renewal. So if she did not even permit him to see it, in what dark room did this thing get written? Why was he not actually involved in the concepts that were to craft the bill? I can't believe that the person most responsible to deal with this wasn't even given the opportunity to proofread it. In fact, he says, "I . . . had a chance to review [the bill] after first reading."

There is a serious disconnect here, that the very person in this province who is the most knowledgeable about elections and democracy in this province isn't even a part of the discussion. The reality is that this government may have a lot of zeal, but obviously the person who is the most knowledgeable, the most experienced, the most capable person to help them in writing the bill was excluded. A lot of zeal on the other side there but not much knowledge, obviously. A lot of mistakes result when those kinds of things happen. As the previous speaker just pointed out, we're now correcting with this bill the mistakes of the previous bill, and we're probably going to be correcting this one with another one.

If the Chief Electoral Officer had nothing to do with writing this bill, then I'd like to know who did. I just wonder if the minister that's supposedly responsible for democratic renewal could tell us that, but unfortunately I don't think that's going to happen. I don't know where they are. The reality is . . . [interjections] My apologies. Fine.

Who did contribute to writing the bill? I suspect that maybe it might have been a group of backbench MLAs, and while many of them may have had some significant career experience, I don't think, from their profiles, that any one of them could claim that in their previous career experience they're an expert in elections administration. I don't know who wrote this bill, but it certainly wasn't anybody from the Chief Electoral Officer's office who actually knows how this system works in this province.

The other reality here is that in a very, very clear way – and this is why this bill absolutely needs to go to committee – this government has not consulted. They don't consult with anybody about anything. It started with the very first of the bills that they presented. You know, there are a lot of groups and individuals in Alberta who have felt like they haven't been consulted but weren't really quite sure. The government keeps saying: oh, we consult; we consult with everybody. But the reality is that many agencies have experienced this lack of consultation, and it's not their imagination. This is the reality. They don't consult. While we have a government that wants to plainly consult, obviously they haven't here.

While we have a government that wants to hand out platitudes and praise for our hard-working civil service, the reality is that they completely disrespect them. The one person that should have been at the elbow of the minister writing this bill wasn't even shown the thing until after it hit the floor in first reading, after it's all written, kind of sloppily printed on a photocopied bunch of paper because they're in such a rush to get it out. They save it till the end of session. They try to ram it through with morning sittings, afternoon sittings, night sittings. Next thing we'll probably have is weekend sittings. They push it through so quickly in such zeal to try and proclaim that they're making democracy better that nobody has time to even look at it, including their own experts.

I would like to actually look at some of the concerns of the Chief Electoral Officer. He says in his last paragraph, actually, as a wrap-up to his first sentence: "I have not been consulted in relation to policy direction leading up to Bill 32." So he not only didn't see it, as he says, but he makes it very clear that he was not consulted. Then he says in very diplomatic and careful language, but he says it anyway: "I have, however, had the opportunity to provide feedback on the workability of various proposals. The concerns I set out here reflect some of that feedback."

So here's his opportunity. After the thing is all said and done, he finally has to write a letter to this government. They won't sit down in a room with him and talk with him, so he puts it in writing and sends it to them with regard to the workability of this bill. Then he spends three pages detailing how it won't work, how it's so impractical and so poorly thought through that it just simply won't work. He is trying to provide feedback on what might make it work, but obviously it isn't going to work. So in order to try and make his point, he even attaches a detailed schedule, as an example from a by-election, of what has to happen on every single day in order to get an election process properly managed and properly cared for. He tries to provide some recommendations respecting all of these things but has some struggles.

Yeah, there are a few good things in the bill. There is a serious attempt here, I think, to try and improve the reality, but in fact the workability of it is dysfunctional, and I'm afraid that in many cases that's going to be the theme of NDP legislation. While it's got a lot of zeal behind it, a lot of passion to fix the world and change everything, it's so unworkable that even their own Chief Electoral Officer spends three pages writing and pointing out ways that the bill needs to change in order to make it something that's actually workable. This isn't the kind of legislation that Albertans are in need of. This is challenging.

He talks about the advance polling days. He refers to the fact that Alberta has a 28-day election period and there are a lot of activities that have to happen during that 28-day period, that some things cannot happen until other things happen, and that there's a very strict number of things that really need to be pushed through on this. With regard to the advance polling days he points out that the changes of pushing two new advance polling days two weeks before is actually almost entirely undoable because in order to get the ballots printed and everything created and to go through the proper – well, it starts with the nomination of candidates, and that has to be open for a certain period of time, and then it closes on day 10. Then they've got, like, just a couple of days and the ballots start to arrive at the returning officers' offices, but already, according to the schedule, there's supposed to be two advance polls happening.

So here we're going to have people supposed to be showing up for advance polls, but the notifications haven't gone out. The ballots aren't necessarily even properly printed. He quite simply says: "While I support increased availability of advance polls, the earlier advance polling days do not leave sufficient time to notify electors adequately of the locations through the Where-to-Vote cards or to have candidate ballots printed." How are people supposed to show up at an advance poll when there hasn't been time to notify them of where it is and there's not enough time to print the proper ballots? What are they supposed to put their vote on, a ripped up piece of paper? How are they supposed to know?

I mean, this isn't me making this up. This is from the Chief Electoral Officer, who has to make this work. He says that it can't be done in a reasonable, respectful way. We're going to have people expecting to be able to vote, and there won't be proper ballots for them. They don't even know where to go, and they want to know. There's no time to notify them because you have to have a nomination process, and it takes time to get all these things done. It's going to create chaos.

As the Chief Electoral Officer says, these are issues of workability. They have nothing to do with politics or parties or visions of grandeur for some new democratic regime. It's unworkable. That's his point. How is this supposed to work? He's frustrated. I mean, I'm baffled by this, that we can create these kinds of bills that are so shoddy and unpolished. It's like the declining math skills in Alberta. The competency level is falling. We've got bills being pushed forward where even the most important person in the province to deal with this says that it isn't workable. That's my point.

Then he goes on and talks about the where-to-vote cards and the fact that because we don't have a fixed election date, the whole thing, again, is going to create chaos and is not going to work. He says that the soonest the cards are being received by the electors is between day 15 and 20, but on day 15 they're already supposed to be voting. Unbelievable. This is going to create chaos at election time for Alberta voters. This isn't a functioning, operable kind of idea here. It just isn't going to work in a very practical kind of way.

I mean, this bill has to be referred to committee. We have to give the Chief Electoral Officer, finally, the opportunity to engage in the process, to talk about what's possible and what's not possible. While I get that there are all kinds of zeal to somehow create this idea of a bill that claims to be an act to strengthen and protect democracy, in fact it's going to throw democracy into chaos. Many voters are going to feel cheated. Many voters are going to feel like the system is rigged against them because they didn't know where to vote on the day that they had to vote and there were not proper ballots. The whole system is going to lead to accusations of mismanaged voting and ballot process and procedure. This is a serious problem.

Then he talks about the ballots part and the requirement of 10 days for nominations to close, the process of figuring out, then, through that who the candidates are, putting on the candidates' names, getting them all printed up and created on a ballot. And he says, "Opening advance polls earlier results in as little as four days to proof, print, and make ballots available to all advance poll locations." That means everywhere in the province, not just here in the urban areas. And then he specifically identifies, "With rural and more remote areas, this timeline could not be achieved."

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. You know, I have to say, listening to my passionate colleague discuss some of the concerns that the Chief Electoral Officer is bringing forward, that when it comes to the fact that I spent so much of my time on the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee with this gentleman, I've come to realize that this man isn't a passionate man. He's a man that will answer straightforward and be direct. He's not a guy that will overreact and try to get into the newspapers. [interjection] I'm talking about the Chief Electoral Officer, sir. The Chief Electoral Officer. I apologize if there's confusion.

The Chief Electoral Officer is a man that I spent almost a year with in committee meetings talking about ethics within Alberta, and for him to write a letter to government with concerns that he has not been consulted with is unbelievable. Now, I understand that he is independent. But you would think that what the government would do is it would take this proposed legislation and maybe see if it fits with what Alberta's current legislation requires moving forward. It's him that has to live with this legislation, so you would think that he would be involved, clearly, with the drafting portion of this or at least give an opinion on it. What we end up seeing, though, is a government that quickly pushed this legislation into a bill. The opposition repeatedly brought forward a lot of the concerns that were in this legislation, and now the government is shocked and dismayed that they're there.

Now, my question to the hon. member is: do you feel that this government has in any way, shape, or form done its due diligence and consulted with the stakeholders, especially the Chief Electoral Officer? I believe they have failed terribly when it comes to this.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Absolutely not. They have not consulted. The Chief Electoral Officer himself clearly complains about that, so I think that the problem there is patently obvious. No need to reinforce it. But what I would like to add to that is that neither have they consulted in terms of true democracy with regard to rural people. As the Chief Electoral Officer points out in his letter, with rural and remote areas this is absolutely impossible. It cannot be done. He says that it cannot be achieved.

This is an ongoing attack on rural people in Alberta. On one hand, we have an Electoral Boundaries Commission that clearly favours urban areas with five more MLAs even though they have lower numbers of individuals per riding and much smaller geographic areas to cover. [interjections] They have five more ridings in Edmonton and Calgary than all the rest of the province. [interjections] All right. I'll defer to three. It may be my mistake.

The reality is that not only do we have a lack of representation there; now we have discrimination when it comes to voting because there's going to be even more chaos in those rural areas. The Chief Electoral Officer says that it cannot be achieved. This is just not equitable. It's not just. We see this lack of equity for rural Alberta over and over and over again. It's true in the lottery funding that goes to them, it's true in the allocations of health care spending across the province, it's true in terms of electoral representatives, and now we have it coming true again here in terms of voting. Madam Speaker, this is an injustice that is being perpetrated again and again and again by this government that continually tramples on the rights of rural people and puts them at a disadvantage to the people in the urban areas.

Again, the Chief Electoral Officer has pointed it out to us, and I think it's something that absolutely has to go to committee because of that. I truly would think that any members on the other side who are not just being whipped by their own party would take an honest look at this and realize that there are significant challenges here with the workability of this thing. It will not work, it cannot work, and the Chief Electoral Officer has made that very clear.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other hon. members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to speak. I am in favour of the referral motion with respect to Bill 32. I have so many things to say. I just don't even know where to start. It's been very, very interesting being in here this morning and listening to all this.

I just want to start off with a couple of things. This is what the last week and a half looks like in paper: Bill 30, almost 150 pages. The reason why I'm bringing this up, Madam Speaker, is to speak to the necessity for referral. One of the things on Bill 30 is – and there'll be a consistent theme, here – government overreach, leading questions within consultation, and specific letters coming into my office on lack of consultation.

Let's go to Bill 31. This one is the better deal for consumers. I think, probably, I can't even speak about this as well as I'd like to because the member for Vermilion spoke about that so beautifully. I'm sorry that I'm saying his area wrong right now. It'll come to me in a second here.

An Hon. Member: Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Mrs. Aheer: Lloydminster. Thank you.

The impact of his words – because I don't know much about veterinary work, other than I love my veterinarian, and I think that he's, like, one of the best people I've ever met in my life. Our little fur babies in our household are very, very important to us, so those people are heroes in my mind, actually, in some respects because of what they've been able to do for our animals.

Having said that, though, the most important piece of that is that veterinarians were not consulted. There's another theme there, no consultation and, again, dropped in our laps in the last week and a half. This one is not quite as long; however, the impact of these things is huge. There we go.

Then we have Bill 32. I've got that one right in front of me, too. This came to us like this, ended up like this. Wow. That's recycling paper, and I have four of these on my desk, I might add.

Bill 32 is particularly interesting. We'll get to this one because it's what we're talking about today, but that's the weight of this one, again, in the last week and a half. The weight of these, just the weight: we'll get to that.

And then, interestingly enough, we've got Bill 33, which isn't as big; however, the impact of that bill is massive, not to mention the fact that we've had several applications not only from this side of the House but actually throughout the House about changes and amendments and things that need to happen within the electoral boundaries division to be able to make sure that this is a good decision.

I might add on that bill just one little thing, and I'm sure I'll have a chance to talk about that again. Taking three ridings from rural areas: we've all described why we think that that's not a good idea. I'd like to ask the urban MLAs how they would feel if that decision was reversed and we took three from you and put them with us. Just asking. It might have been something you wanted to think about within the consultation. Just saying. Those are 32 and 33.

Then we just got Bill 34. The reason I bring this up is because this is a massive amount of legislation and not minor legislation. We're talking about massive changes. We're talking about impacts.

Fundamentally, to go back to the beginning, this is not about us, folks, not about a single MLA in here, not about us at all. This is about the people we represent. I think what's so frustrating for me is that I – and I believe everybody in this House feels the same way – legitimately want to represent the people of the constituencies that we are privileged to represent. I don't doubt for one minute that every single person in here wants to do that. It can't only be on the opposition side that we have an issue with this, Madam Speaker. I am absolutely certain that opposition are not the only ones that are receiving a tremendous number of e-mails asking about this legislation, asking about the impact that it's going to have on them.

Just to give you an example, in Bill 33, in the electoral boundaries for the riding that I represent, this is the third major change in that riding in the last three changes. The third. And one of the things that the commissioner had said in the minority report, not that that's going to be listened to, is that consistency is important. Actually, that brings up my next point about listening to the experts.

There's one particular point I'd like to speak about, and that's with respect to the list of exemptions on the prohibition of government advertising during an election. These are really, really lengthy and extremely generous. I mean, oddly enough, it makes sense because it helps out the government. Essentially, the government is given this humongous amount of wiggle room. Actually, the member had mentioned earlier that there are these situations – for example, I mean, we have a by-election going on right now. Obviously, you can't announce that there's a school in that area. That is good. However, there are other announcements that are not within those areas that can be made in order to help out the government.

Now, if the government has a problem and an issue with things that have come before in other governments or anything like that, you know, it's fair to look at it and see if there is a way that you can change that to make the process more fair. I don't think any of us are going to dispute that. But when you're actually making the legislation be more accessible for the government and to be able to use taxpayer dollars to do that, I find that highly unethical. There are so many things that need to change, but, as the Member for Calgary-Elbow said, there's a huge monster at the end of this. A huge monster.

If we're truly, truly wanting to look at how funding is impacting how we run elections – I don't know – I would have asked the Chief Electoral Officer. You know what I find particularly interesting? The government now wants to have an independent electoral officer. What makes this any different? Are they going to listen to him or her, that person? Are they going to listen to that person? They're not listening to the one person right now who has a very, very thoughtful and common-sense approach to this entire process.

I was in my very first Legislative Offices Committee meeting last week. Very interesting. These are some of the most competent people I've ever met in my life. You know, they are working under very, very stringent budgets. They're completely transparent and accountable to every single dollar that goes across their plates. We are completely grateful to these folks and the work that they do with respect to the offices that they represent.

I find it interesting that we have an electoral officer that really, really gave some good feedback with respect to what the changes are and what was working and what's not. Then to not listen to him, and then to want to invoke another person to do a job that – I mean, an independent office is not a small undertaking. This is a good amount of money. The Member for Calgary-Hays was mentioning that just having a person that is called an independent even within the office is a million dollars. To set up an entire other office – I mean, I'm going to quote the government here in just a little bit – is a whole lot more.

As you can see and anybody who's watching at home who wants to see, this pile of paper: there's a really, really, really big theme here of a lot of very, very large and complicated and life-altering legislation. These aren't even the private members' bills. We have really excellent private members' bills that are also here, coming from the government and our side, that are mixed in with all of this legislation. I can't begin to explain how frustrating it is from the perspective of consultation on our part. Certainly, to be able to reach out and talk to people about the impacts it has on the people we represent is very, very difficult and certainly very frustrating.

One of the things I'd also like to bring up is that – again, I'd like to focus on the automatic registration of young voters. This piece is very, very interesting to me. I have some questions about that. I think probably most of us have had an opportunity to do this. You get invited into school, and you get to speak. Quite often, you know, they're asking you not only about what it is that you do and how you participate – you know, all of us get a chance to talk to these young people about the electoral process and about the right to vote and the importance of voting. Quite often what I'll say when I'm in those classrooms is that I talk about the country where my dad and my father-in-law and my mother-in-law originated from, which is India, and we talk about the electoral process there and about how democracy works in different countries. It's imperative that people understand how important it is to vote. I think we can be quite complacent here at times when it comes to voting because we're so privileged in this country. We're so lucky.

There are a lot of people, at least in my family as well, not able to read or write in any language, including their own. So when they are given the opportunity to vote, quite often there are things that are involved with getting their vote. Quite often they can't even write their names on anything signifying – they use an X or some sort of symbol in order to acknowledge who they are as human beings because they can't read or write in any language. You can imagine what that looks like from the democratic process. Quite often they may even not have the ability to go and vote as a result of the system that fails there. It fails especially people in poverty.

I tell this story to these young people in schools specifically to tell them and to explain to them about the importance of voting. I really like the idea that the government is wanting to engage at the ages of 16 and 17 to do that, but my question is: as well as understanding the privilege of being able to vote for the elected representatives, how are we within this legislation making sure that the youth are also receiving a balanced approach to the information from all parties? It's really important. I mean, when we go into schools, we want to really encourage people to vote, not necessarily to vote for any particular party, right? For most of us, if we're in our ridings and we were elected there, there are going to be a lot of people that are sort of onside with the stripe that you represent, at least largely, but our responsibility is actually to explain the process – right? – and the right to vote and the ability to vote and all those kinds of things.

So I'm curious. If we're talking about the information and about the young voters and their ability to vote, I'd like to ask these questions: how is that information being collected on these young people; by who; and what kind of information as a result of that will be provided to all political parties? Most importantly, that everybody has an understanding of how that data is being collected, not necessarily that it's being collected – because again I agree with the government; I think it's really important to engage these people – but just in terms of transparency and accountability that that information is shared with all parties in terms of the collection of that data.

Will the programming be made available to the public ahead of time for consultation and feedback just to ensure that there are no inherent biases? Now, if I was in government, I would expect that the opposition would ask me that as well, too, because if we're talking about all of these other things like money in politics and all of these other things, these dark horses, as they were, I think that it's a fair question to ask to make sure that this is a very balanced approach with our youth and that taxpayer dollars and advertising on behalf of the government are not being used to in any way influence. If that's not the case, then that's great and I'd love to stand corrected, but I just think that there needs to be things in place to make sure that that doesn't happen. The other piece, too, as we are dealing with 16- and 17-year-olds, is: how is that information going to be safeguarded, Madam Speaker?

The reason why I'm asking these questions is because these are things I think that should go through the Chief Electoral Officer in a committee to actually make sure we can reach out and talk to people maybe about other jurisdictions that have had success with this but also about some of the problems that we could have and the sensitivity around collecting data on our youth. We have a lot of space right now where we're very, very careful about how we collect data.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills.

Mr. Cooper: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise and just respond ever so briefly to the comments made by my hon. colleague the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View. You know, she raised some very, very important points this morning about the quality of individual that is the Chief Electoral Officer; about the importance of being respectful of private information, particularly that of minors; about how all of these things fit together, in particular how the government will engage with the process of making significant changes to the Election Act and the election contributions act. What we've seen from this government and what I think the member did such a great job of highlighting is a real lack of respect for the legislative office, in this case the legislative office of the Chief Electoral Officer.

You know, I know that I've had the pleasure of sitting on the Legislative Offices Committee over the past couple of years, and I know that Mr. Resler has done a fantastic job of guiding us through this important period of significant reform. I will be the first to acknowledge that we have changed a number of things around the way political parties are funded, around the way political parties can spend money, around nomination contestants, leadership, and the list goes on.

Some of those things have been very positive. In particular, a lot of the changes that are positive took place when the government listened to the Chief Electoral Officer. When they haven't listened or they've stopped listening to others, as was the case in the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee, particularly when we arrived at the point of third-party advertisers, which is right around the time that the government decided to rush through the end of the committee and then not extend the mandate of the committee, they, in turn, wound up creating a lot of unintended consequences.

I find it so interesting that the Chief Electoral Officer in his letter to the minister spoke specifically about unintended consequences.

I wanted to bring to your attention potential unintended consequences of these particular proposals. If passed in its current form, I am concerned that Bill 32 will deteriorate the service provided to electors and increase the timelines for communicating results.

Many times when the government has actually listened to experts and legislative officers, they wound up getting many things correct. When they don't listen – and there are plenty of examples of them not listening – is exactly when the government gets themselves into a bad spot. That's exactly where we are today. The government goes around talking about how they'd like to strengthen and protect democracy in Alberta, but in actual fact they are going to deteriorate the services provided to electors. One might suggest that you could change the title of this particular piece of legislation to An Act That May Deteriorate the Services Provided to Electors because that's exactly what the Chief Electoral Officer has said. He says that if this is passed in its current form, it will end in exactly that.

I'm just curious to know if my hon. colleague from Chestermere-Rocky View would be willing and able to provide a few additional comments about some of the challenges around . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The time for Standing Order 29(2)(a) has expired.

Are there any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Calgary-Foothills.

11:50

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to speak to this referral motion brought in by a very competent colleague of mine . . .

An Hon. Member: Highly competent.

Mr. Panda: Yeah.

. . . from a mofussil town of my city of Calgary. She won't like it if we say that because for her Airdrie is the centre of the universe. She has been doing a great service to the public in the Airdrie constituency.

I commend her for bringing in this referral motion because the whole premise of it is to have greater consultation within the committee. Most of the previous speakers talked about having a quality debate in this House. Madam Speaker, yesterday we heard our House leader spend 90 minutes trying to, you know, bring that point out about having a quality debate.

Mr. Cooper: The best 90 minutes of my week.

Mr. Panda: Yeah.

I know that the opposite side, you know, when our House leader tried to request yesterday in this House – he said that they have an obligation to represent the constituents that elected them, not to rubber-stamp what the front bench is saying, including the Deputy Premier trying to influence their backbenchers. That's not what they're supposed to do.

Ms Hoffman: What?

Mr. Panda: They're not supposed to rubber-stamp what the frontbenchers tell them to do. They are here to add value to the debate.

Having said that, Madam Speaker, I don't know how seriously they took that suggestion from our hon. House leader, but our deputy House leader is trying to do the same thing through this referral motion, explaining the importance of having consultation. This is the first time I heard that one of the important stakeholders, who is the Chief Electoral Officer of Alberta, who is supposed to be front and centre in these discussions, is not even aware and is not even consulted. That's an insult to democracy.

Mrs. Pitt: It's scary.

Mr. Panda: It's really scary. It's really scary to somebody like me, who came from the largest democracy in the world to a western democracy, where things should really work better for the sake of democracy, to preserve democracy. But these kinds of things shake the confidence of new Canadians like me, who come to these countries, western countries, with the hope of having a thriving democracy. It's not the case, it looks like.

I don't know why the government chose to do this. Like I said, our job is not to rubber-stamp, not even, you know, do that soft cushioning like the independent member, one of the previous speakers here, tried to do. Our job is to critically evaluate each and every bill that comes in front of this House and provide constructive feedback, which we are offering, but it's up to them whether they want to take it or not.

Ms Hoffman: Let's get it to committee.

Mr. Panda: Yeah. So why don't you accept to put it to the committee?

Ms Hoffman: To the stage of committee.

Mr. Panda: No. I'm talking about the standing committee. Our hon. deputy House leader is asking us to refer it to the standing committee, where we can have a quality debate like we had on the time change bill . . .

Mr. Cooper: Time waits for no man.

Mr. Panda: Yeah.

. . . that your colleague brought in. Why are you afraid of that? Why are you afraid of that?

You're trying to bring in rules telling people that you care about democracy, that you care about closing the loopholes. Look at the CBC article. [interjections] Yeah. Your favourite, CBC. You saw it. Just google it. It will tell you that you're trying to arm-twist the chair of OHS to donate to your party. The chair of OHS has received letters from the NDP asking him to donate to your party. That shows the gap in your intentions.

Mr. Cooper: Sounds like dark money.

Mr. Panda: Yeah.

An Hon. Member: Shameful.

Mr. Panda: Yeah.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, please.
Hon. member, through the chair, please.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Madam Speaker. That gentleman actually spoke to the media, saying that he felt pressurized from the Premier's office that if he wants to continue in that arm's-distance position, he has to play ball with the ruling party. That tells something here. That actually tells that this party wants to do the same shady business, but then they want to tell the public, Albertans: "It is Jason Kenney's UCP which has something up there. We're trying to stop that." But in practice those are the ones who are actually doing things like this.

Like our hon. whip mentioned before, if Albertans are willingly contributing to a particular party, if they like the policies of that party and you are trying to artificially, you know, stop that party, that's not good democracy. Those things happen in countries like India, where I came from – I can understand that – but not here. I didn't expect that. Albertans deserve, really, better democracy.

We are a mature democracy. Canada is celebrating 150 years. We all said happy birthday to Canada on July 1, and today we are here in December, just before Christmas – everyone is in the Christmas mood here – and this government brings in these kinds of bills, hundreds of pages of bills that are rammed through here, putting undue pressure on the Official Opposition and on their own private members, backbenchers, to just overlook all the shortcomings and just rubber-stamp their legislation.

They don't have any time to consult anybody, including the Chief Electoral Officer. I was told by the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake – I've never met this gentleman, the electoral commissioner. But it seems my colleague from Bonnyville-Cold Lake worked with him for the last year on a particular committee. He seems to be a decent gentleman who is not there just to get some cheap publicity. He is there to contribute to preserve democracy. He is trying to do his job, and he's willing to contribute to this bill to make this bill better.

Mr. McIver: He's got to be included in the conversation.

Mr. Panda: Yeah.

Without including him in the conversation – he is supposed to be a main stakeholder. He's the one who is actually going to execute the rules they want to bring in, but if he's not at the table and if we are doing the same thing with him as we are doing with our colleagues in this House, not giving them enough time – I mean, for someone like me, coming from business, what I would like to see . . .

The Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt, hon. member, but pursuant to Standing Order 4(2.1) the House stands adjourned until 1:30 this afternoon.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Thursday, December 7, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon.
Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Ms Jabbour: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today on your behalf to introduce to all members of the Assembly our constituency staff. Your constituency staff and their families: Laura Deschamps, Denis Deschamps, Danielle Deschamps, Della Kirkham, Stephen Bjarnason, Sam Bjarnason, and Jack Bjarnason, who are visiting us from Medicine Hat.

Laura Deschamps works in the Medicine Hat constituency office. She recently received her bachelor of social work through the University of Calgary and enjoys curling in her spare time. Denis Deschamps has been a district manager in the oil and gas industry for the past 35 years and enjoys hockey, fishing, and riding his motorcycle. Danielle Deschamps is in her third year of studying education at the University of Alberta. She is an avid Edmonton Oilers fan and enjoys recreational hockey, travelling, and participating in volunteer work. Della Kirkham recently joined the Medicine Hat constituency office but has had the privilege of knowing the Speaker for almost 15 years. Stephen Bjarnason is a career research scientist for the federal government and is acting centre director for Defence Research and Development Canada at CFB Suffield. Jack Bjarnason is 16 and, when not studying or video gaming, practises trumpet and is preparing for the spring track and field. Sam Bjarnason is 13, and he plays the trombone and is on the football team and wrestling team. The constituency staff and their families are all standing up. I would like them to receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

In addition, I would also like to welcome my constituency staff, Evan Gardner; a constituency staff member for the Deputy Chair of Committees who is up there as well, Page Moniz; and Kevin. My apologies, Kevin. We really rely on all of you, and it's a particularly difficult balance because you have to work so closely with the Speaker's staff as well and support us in our multiple roles. Thank you so much. We really appreciate you being here.

The Speaker: Welcome and thank you.
The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you a young, inspiring Albertan, avid volunteer, and community and, perhaps, political leader of the future, Ms Kinga Nolan. Kinga is a graduate from Dr. E.P. Scarlett high school in the wonderful constituency of Calgary-Fish Creek who's been politically active since she was four years old, from volunteering on political campaigns to, more recently, promoting youth political engagement. In high school alone she volunteered nearly 20 hours a week for various causes and was awarded the Premier's citizenship award as a result. Kinga's hard work also led to her being one of the winners of 50 national Schulich leadership scholarships, valued at $80,000, to study science in university. However, Kinga's success hasn't been without challenges. Several years ago she suffered a severe head injury and has since become an advocate for increased safety and resources surrounding these types of injuries.

She would like to see a form of Rowan's law, a bill addressing head injury safety originally passed unanimously in Ontario, adopted in Alberta. As well, she hopes that Alberta Health Services will dedicate support to the 10,000 Albertans diagnosed with head injuries annually as well as those who continue to suffer symptoms. I would ask Kinga to rise and remain standing to receive the traditional warm welcome of this House.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Dr. Starke: Well, thanks, Mr. Speaker. It's a great pleasure for me today to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly the three ladies who have the hardest job in the world, and that is trying to make me look good. They're, of course... [interjections] Yes. I can already hear the Member for Olds-Didsbury-Three Hills starting to hum The Impossible Dream from Man of La Mancha. Now, these three ladies staff the constituency offices in both Vermilion and Lloydminster. They provide outstanding service to the constituents of Vermilion-Lloydminster, but I can say that while they do bring me coffee, they've given up trying to write speeches for me, and they have never brought me lipstick. It's my pleasure to introduce – and I'll ask them to stand – from my Vermilion office, Susan Hodges Marlowe and Emily Dye and, from the Lloydminster office, Kathy Bootsman. I'd ask my colleagues to give them the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome. You would have to have been in this House at 2 o'clock in the morning to pick up on the intent of his comment about lipstick.

The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my profound pleasure to be able to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly Angela Strojwas. Angela is my constituency assistant in Taber and has tirelessly worked with me for the past two and a half years. As members come and go in this government, great staff that can withstand the test of time and change are hard to come by. Angela has done just that, serving diligently with a smile in the constituency office for the last 20 years. We know in this House that our jobs are made tremendously easier when we have excellent staff working tirelessly behind the scenes. I would like to express my sincerest gratitude to Angela for her decades of dedication to the residents of southern Alberta. I ask Angela to stand, as she has, and receive the traditional warm welcome of this House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for St. Albert.

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my honour to rise and introduce to you and through you some very special guests. Inspector Pam Robinson assumed command of the St. Albert RCMP detachment this summer. She's an 18-year member who's been a member of Project Kare and has been the acting officer in charge of ALERT. With her are Corporal Laurel Kading, a 33-year member of the RCMP who's done everything from guarding foreign embassies to investigating crime; Constable Patrick Lambert, a 9-year member of the RCMP who is an investigator with the St. Albert community policing section; and Auxiliary Constable Shelly Ullery, a retired member of Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry whose current work as a volunteer auxiliary constable is an integral part of community policing in St. Albert. I'd ask my very special guests to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Labour and minister responsible for democratic renewal.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm honoured to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly Derrick Schulte from the Alberta Regional Council of Carpenters and Allied Workers. The council represents more than 12,000 carpenters, scaffolders, millwrights, roofers, ISM mechanics, drywallers, and floor layers in our province. Derrick is a 30-year journeyman carpenter and scaffolder who has helped build and maintain Alberta's refineries and plants across the province. He has recently been made executive secretary treasurer of the Alberta Regional Council of Carpenters and Allied Workers. I'd like to express my congratulations to him. He's especially proud of the new members who voted in a secret ballot this week for union representation, seeking better wages, benefits, and working conditions. I'd like to ask the Assembly to give him the traditional warm welcome of this House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you today to all members of the Assembly the seva community, formerly known as the seva food truck, which operates in Edmonton and Calgary. Seva is a charitable community initiative spearheaded by the Sikh community. Their programs look to build a greater good for all. They work with schools to provide children with a free-of-charge extracurricular meal and workshop program, and they reach out to vulnerable inner-city residents in my constituency with a free weekly meal program. Here today are Manjit Nerval, Zora Jhaggi, Kulmit Sangha, Bean Gill, Nasra Adem, Gagan Hoonjan, Parminder Nerval, Jessy Nerval, Rick Gill, and Sheena Gill. I ask them all to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Mr. Sucha: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. This introduction was actually a little bit of an argument in the Leg. cafeteria between the Member for Calgary-Bow and the Member for Calgary-East, but I won this one. My CA Katie Snut would be very excited to see this gentleman who's in the gallery today. I'd like to introduce Mr. Mark Laycock, who's the director of Métis Calgary Family Services, which provides human services for persons requiring indigenous-specific services. He also does a lot of work with urban indigenous populations within Calgary. I'd ask that he please rise and receive the warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Minister of Health and Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker. It's my absolute privilege to introduce to you and through you to all my colleagues two visitors who are in the members' gallery. I invite them to rise as I introduce them. They are Joshua Perez and his mother, Myla Perez. Joshua is a grade 6 student at Our Lady of Peace school in my constituency of Edmonton-Glenora. He has a knack for drawing and submitted a most beautiful image, that I am proud to put on my Christmas card this year to send to many constituents and others from around Edmonton-Glenora. His art is featured in this card. I'm so proud of him and his artistic skills, and so is his mother. It's an honour to be able to share it with the constituents. I want to wish Joshua, his mother, and all residents of Edmonton-Glenora a very Merry Christmas. Please join me in extending our welcome.

1:40

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my pleasure to introduce to you and through you to members of the Assembly Mr. Frank Garritsen. He is a tremendous advocate for the community of Fort Saskatchewan. Frank was basically born in Fort Saskatchewan before we had a hospital out there, so in Edmonton. He was raised his whole life in Fort Saskatchewan and spent 27 years as a corrections officer and also served two years on city council. Frank incurred PTSD and attempted suicide as a result of working in corrections. That has led Frank to be a brave voice advocating on behalf of himself and fellow corrections officers working to get presumptive PTSD legislation coverage for corrections officers. Back in 2012 it was introduced by our Premier to try and amend the legislation at the time to include them as first responders because they see murder, assault, suicide, and all manner of other things that the rest of us can never really fully appreciate. I thank him for his service. It's my honour to be able to call him one of my most valued and best friends, and I hope to see Bill 30 fully clarified before we pass it because corrections officers are first responders.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to rise to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Chamber, in the government gallery, I believe, Mr. Greg Herzog, a farmer from Delia, and Ms Rhea Brady from the wonderful town of Drumheller. Would they please rise and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is my supreme privilege today to introduce to you maybe the best constituency office manager in the province. [interjection] Yeah. Absolutely. Anyways, Cheryl Christie, thank you for being here, and please stand and receive the warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, it's my pleasure to rise today and introduce to you and through you two very special guests. Alberta has tremendous, great constituency assistants who do many, many things for us. Three of them are helping constituents that have a need or an idea, helping a constituent that has fallen through the cracks, or helping a constituent that just needs somebody to listen. Cypress-Medicine Hat is very, very fortunate to have two of the best. I would like to introduce to you, first of all, Shelley Beck, that has worked very, very hard for me for over five years, and, secondly, Michaela Glasgo, who for two years has worked very hard and is a great fiscal conservative although she still owes me two deer steaks. I would like to ask both ladies to please rise and accept the traditional warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to stand and introduce to you and through you and to correct some of the members, because I actually have the best office staff in Alberta, Sharon Christensen and Nancy Pratch. My office staff are very good at their job and are very consistent in helping our constituents navigate the infuriating waters, sometimes, of our provincial ministries. As well, I'd like to take this moment to introduce my wife, who is, in my humble opinion, the hottest grandma in Alberta, Donna Hanson. If you'd all please rise.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Bow.

Drever: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. How can I top that?

I would like to introduce to you and through you a special guest of mine, the president of my EDA, Lizette Tejada. She's a wonderful advocate for the community of Bowness, and I'm so happy she's here to watch question period. I ask her to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Hon. Member for St. Albert, I understand you have another guest.

Ms Renaud: Yes, I do. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and through you Mr. Tom Genore, who is a constituent and the president of our constituency association. I'll ask him to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the House.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Peace River.

Ms Jabbour: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you a very important group of individuals in the galleries today who play a key role in the democratic process in the province of Alberta. Our constituency assistants are often the first point of contact for people in the communities we serve. Their jobs can be rewarding, but they're very demanding and very difficult, and I have to say that at this time of the year, when their MLAs are getting tired and we've been sitting for a while, I'm sure that they're extremely difficult. Thank you so much. We know how hard you work on our behalf.

They are all here today participating in the winter constituency employee learning and development seminar, which is developed each year with their unique roles and requirements in mind. The seminar provides them with an opportunity to network with each other and obtain an overview of numerous programs and services that are available through the Legislative Assembly Office.

Each year the service and contributions of these individuals are celebrated with an employee recognition dinner, which you will be hosting, Mr. Speaker, later on this evening. There are over 85 constituency office employees here with us from all corners of the province. I'd ask that they all please rise and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly. [Standing ovation]

The Speaker: It doesn't happen very often in here that we can get all of you folks to agree on one thing, that being that you may think you have the power, but the power really is up there.

Hon. members, are there any other introductions? The Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have three sets of introductions today. Firstly, I'm pleased to introduce to you and through you to all members of this Assembly a group of fantastic partners in serving children and families in southern Alberta. Zakk Morrison is the director of the Barons-Eureka-Warner FCSS and parent link centres, serving 13 southern Alberta communities. Zakk has with him two parent coaches from the Taber, Barnwell, Vauxhall parent link centre sites, Jackie Fiorino and Kim Forchuk. I ask that my guests receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

For my second introduction I'm so pleased to have with us today representatives from the Intercultural Child and Family Centre here in Edmonton, one of Alberta's early learning and child care centres, where, thanks to our government's support, they offer affordable, accessible, high-quality child care for only $25 a day. I ask my guests to rise as I call their names and receive the warm welcome of the Assembly: Jasvinder Heran, Mary Lynne Matheson, Kate Kidd, Ellen Genchez, and Ernie Yamniuk.

Lastly, my third introduction is an individual I met while meeting with residents of Sherwood Park interested in child care and early learning. Paola Ruiz talked to me about the need for more affordability, something I've heard from parents, providers, and experts across the province. Paola, please stand and receive the warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Energy Policies

Mr. Nixon: Lucky for us that this government is so incompetent that it leaves its own internal analysis on the impact of disastrous oil and gas regulations lying around for anyone to find, and every so often the NDP also shows their true colours. While responding to a question yesterday, the Minister of Economic Development and Trade justified the government's heavy-handed rules by saying that they were moving in a direction of more ethical oil. To the Premier: is it really your government's policy or your government's thoughts that Alberta does not have ethical oil, or will you apologize for your minister's comments?

1:50

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. [interjections]

The Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Bilous: Our energy industry is the most ethical and responsible in the world. Our partners in oil and gas deserve enormous credit, and they have unwavering support from their government. We've introduced new carbon competitiveness incentives that will spur a race to the top. They'll allow us to reduce emissions, spur new investment, and get a pipeline to tidewater, something that that side could never do. I am proud to stand in this House, Mr. Speaker, every day in support of our industry.

Mr. Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, it would be nice if the minister would apologize.

Let me be very clear about the record of the government that is across from us right now. They have two cancelled pipelines, another one that is on the ropes, and over and over and over they show their true colours. They try to mislead Albertans or hide it from them, but then it slips out like it did in question period. Instead of the minister standing up and reading his talking points, he should stand up and apologize for his comments to the people that work hard in Alberta's oil and gas industry. The question to the minister is: will you stand up and apologize for your ridiculous comments yesterday? [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I believe I've answered the question, but it's not surprising that the member keeps asking. After all, the mind of a UCP member is a scary place. In recent days we've learned that they think socialists eat dogs, that marijuana leads directly to communism, and that Pinochet's reign of terror was "a success story." You can't make this stuff up, but if the UCP wants to keep talking, be my guest.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, they actually did make that stuff up.

Here is what has happened here today. We brought up a clear example of what the minister said that is in Hansard. The minister said that about our oil and gas industry, and instead of acknowledging that what he said was wrong and apologizing for it, he deflected and tried to avoid the issue. Again, Mr. Speaker, through you to the minister: will you stand up and apologize for your ridiculous comments about our oil and gas industry and the people that work in it?

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, the members opposite may talk about supporting Alberta jobs, but their own leader, Jason Kenney, takes money from a PAC that is openly supporting Saskatchewan, which is cutting off access for Alberta construction workers. If Kenney won't stand up for Alberta now, when will he? Perhaps he should be running in Saskatchewan. We will stand up in support of our workers. We will take the government of Saskatchewan to court if we have to. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, I know you have a lot of fans in the gallery, but I can sense that today will be one of those robust events that we share with each other, so I would ask that all of you continue to practise that respect across and minimize the verbiage from one side of the House to the other.

I think we're on the second main question.

Provincial Response to Pipeline Opposition

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, let's be very clear. Jason Kenney and this side of the House think what has happened in Saskatchewan with the licence plate issue is ridiculous. The question that comes from that is that this minister came out within five minutes to stand up against that issue, but five months ago an NDP antipipeline government was elected in B.C., and still this government has had nothing but words and has not threatened any consequences for what's happening. So put your money where your mouth is, Minister. Are you going to do that or not?

Ms Hoffman: I am so proud to have a Premier who has gone to the Members of the House of Commons in Ottawa and told the NDP: "You need to smarten up. You need to have a plan that keeps workers top of mind." She told the Conservatives: "You guys need to listen up. You need to stop acting like you're living on an island and work with our neighbouring provinces." And she told the Liberal government, "You need to make sure that you're working with us, that you're stepping up," and that's exactly what they've done. They're standing with us to make sure we get access to tidewater, they've joined our call, and we will get that pipeline built. You can mark my words. [interjection]

The Speaker: Hon. member. Just stop. That's all you have to do, stop.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, talk is cheap. The Premier can stand up in this House and the NDP can stand up over and over and say things, but they are not doing the same thing in B.C. They are not bringing forward serious consequences as a result of the action in the B.C. government that's taking place. The B.C. Premier confirmed that when he met with Alberta's Premier, she did not even try to persuade him on pipelines. How is that for standing up for this serious project? Are the minister's words yesterday against our oil and gas industry actually how this government feels?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, the members on the other side are trying to spin. They're trying to create tantrums. You know what? If you want to behave like grown-ups, you have to sit at the table and act like grown-ups, and that's exactly what our government is doing. This week we worked with industry to make sure that we're working with Kinder Morgan, with the NEB to work to resolve the dispute in Burnaby. And you know who joined us there? The federal government, because we're acting like grown-ups. We're treating them with respect, and we're working to protect our industry and our workers. It's about time the members opposite stopped playing politics and making stuff up and started standing up for Albertans and Alberta jobs.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, to question the B.C. Premier's direct quote to a newspaper – I will take him at his word. I disagree with his position, but I take him at his word and would not deny it in this House. Again, you watch the anger machine across as they completely try to avoid the issue. What, if anything, has this government actually done, concrete, with the B.C. government and when was the last time that they did it to get this pipeline built?

Ms Hoffman: Well, exactly one week ago today the Premier was in British Columbia, and she was making that very case. We continue to have diplomatic, respectful relationships to make sure we get our products to tidewater. Guess what? On that side of the House their leader treaded water in Ottawa for 20 years, and guess what? It got him nowhere. It got Alberta nowhere. Instead, we take calm, measured actions to support Kinder Morgan and our partners while that side wants to yell, whine, complain, light their hair on fire. Frankly, they sound like Donald Trump. They're building walls. We're building a pipeline. [interjection]

The Speaker: I would encourage you to contain your comments, hon. member.

I think we're at the third main question. Please proceed.

Mr. Nixon: Well, let's talk about walls, Mr. Speaker. The government across from me has allowed a complete attack on us by letting the Liberals block and use upstream and downstream emissions to stop our projects and our pipelines. That's building a wall around our largest industry.

The question, though, that I ask, the last question, Mr. Speaker, is: why did the Premier not try to persuade B.C.'s Premier on pipelines? Why did the Premier not even raise this important issue with the B.C. government the last time that she was in Vancouver? Why? That is a simple question. Don't stand up and call people names. Stand up and answer the question. We're asking about your government and what they are doing to get this pipeline built. It's nothing so far.

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, on this side we are not afraid of anything, and on this side we will stand up for the people of Alberta. Every time we have an opportunity to talk to our partners from across this country, we make a good case for Alberta, and we make a good case for Canada because it's in the national interest to make sure we get our product to tidewater, to make sure we get a fair price for the owners of that resource, Albertans, and to make sure that employers, industry, and the people of Alberta have good access to markets, a good environment. On this side of the House we're getting results. That's why we got two pipeline approvals when you guys failed to get any. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

Mr. Nixon: This government has two pipelines that are cancelled. That's all they have under their record. They have another one that's on the ropes. When something goes wrong between Saskatchewan and Alberta, they come out in five minutes and start to rightly defend our province on that issue. But when something is going wrong with the B.C. government and they're blocking a major construction project to get our product to market, this government will do nothing except for saying one thing in Alberta and saying another thing when they meet with the B.C. government. When will you start saying the same thing to the B.C. Premier as you are saying in this House? When, Premier? [interjection]

The Speaker: Hon. member.
The Deputy Premier.

2:00

Ms Hoffman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On this side of the House we stand with working people, we stand with the environment, we stand with our industry to make sure we get results so that we can all stand and be proud. On that side of the House they're sitting at the kids' table, throwing tantrums, and wanting to behave in a petulant way. You know what that gets you? Zero. We saw it after 20 years of their leader being in Ottawa. On this side of the House: two pipeline approvals, and we're proud of that.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, again, this government has two cancelled pipelines under their watch. My leader, when he was in Ottawa, had many pipelines built, which I have listed before in this House. But we see the Deputy Premier trying to dodge the question yet again.

The fact is this. When the Premier went to B.C. and met with the leader of the NDP Party in B.C., she did not even try to persuade him about this pipeline project. My question is: why not, has she since then, and if not, when is she going to start working with the B.C. government and put serious consequences down if they keep blocking our pipelines?

Ms Hoffman: Mr. Speaker, we've made it very clear time and time again that we will stand up for the people of Alberta. We will stand with the town of Beaumont, not the mayor of Burnaby. I know that the members on the other side are cheering for failure. They're cheering. They can't wait. They really want Alberta's economy to tank. But on this side of the House we're working. We've gotten approvals, and things are looking up. Drilling is up, housing starts are up, and car sales are up. You know what? Up, up, up. I feel like Shania.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow. [interjections]
Order, please. Order.

Valuing Mental Health Report Recommendations

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Nearly two years ago the Valuing Mental Health report made 32 recommendations to improve Albertans' access to mental health services. In June of this year we received an update on the government's progress in implementing those recommendations. Unfortunately, although the government says that it's a work-in-progress, there have been very few concrete outcomes. To the Minister of Health. One of the most straightforward recommendations was to create a performance-monitoring framework, but those measures are nowhere to be found on the Alberta Health website. What is the status of that framework, and when will Albertans see results?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Our government has made mental health and addictions treatment a priority, not just for Health but across ministries. Community leaders and service agencies are key partners in this work and were central to creating the Valuing Mental Health: Next Steps action plan, which includes the evaluation framework the member opposite referred to. We've invested over $80 million for mental health and substance use supports this year, including $15 million specifically dedicated to implementing Valuing Mental Health: Next Steps.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, Albertans are incredibly frustrated by this government's slow pace of implementation. Albertans are waiting and in some cases dying from the lack of an integrated mental health care system. Here's another straightforward recommendation that should have been easily implemented. The report calls on government to create a comprehensive list of mental health services available in this province. Again to the Minister of Health: in the nearly two years since the report was released, have you created this listing, and if so, where can Albertans find it?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Better, faster access to mental health services and supports for those using substances, like new detox beds, treatment spaces, and supervised consumption sites, is important work, as is early intervention for children and youth. To that end, we've created connections with primary care networks as part of whole-person and team-based care. [interjections] Mental health should not be stigmatized and treated as something separate. If any Albertans have any questions about mental health supports in their community, I encourage them to contact 211 or Health Link through 811 and ask to be connected to the mental health support line. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, they have the Internet on computers now, and it's possible to create these things and put them online, so I'd expect to see a list.

Mr. Speaker, the most recent Health business plan contains only a single measurable goal when it comes to mental health. While outpatient addiction treatment is certainly an important aspect of mental health, it is only one narrow part of a much larger problem. Again to the Minister of Health: why have you included only one of 32 recommendations from the Valuing Mental Health report in your 2017-20 business plan, and what does this say about your government's commitment to mental health?

The Speaker: The associate minister.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Speaking of the Internet, I would also like to highlight a website that's been launched by our government called help4me.ca – that's the number "4" – which specifically lists resources for young people and children and their families. Our government has, with Valuing Mental Health: Next Steps, implemented a majority of the recommendations from the Valuing Mental Health report, working with community partners to make sure that we're able to target investments that will make the most impact for Albertans and their families, which is a far cry from what members opposite would do when they call for deep cuts to undermine . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Saskatchewan's Construction Site Ban on Alberta Licence Plates

Mrs. Schreiner: Mr. Speaker, given that the province of Saskatchewan said that they were banning Alberta plates on government road projects and given that the government of Saskatchewan made unsubstantiated allegations that Saskatchewan workers in Alberta feel pressured to switch over to Alberta plates when working on construction projects here, can the Minister of Economic Development and Trade clarify for this House and for the province of Saskatchewan: what is the requirement here?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There is no requirement for Saskatchewan workers on government construction sites to switch plates. Now, unlike those who want to build walls, we want to work together with other provinces to increase trade. I understand why workers from Saskatchewan would want to come to Alberta to look for work, with our economic growth that's leading the country. The fact is that a worker from Saskatchewan can drive across the border today, work on the southwest Calgary ring road, and not have to get Alberta plates.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mrs. Schreiner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: beyond the unsubstantiated allegations, why do you think the government of Saskatchewan imposed such a ban on Alberta plates?

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, the Premier of Saskatchewan is trying to distract from the fact that their economy is lagging behind. You see, Brad Wall, during a downturn, chose to make reckless and extreme cuts, the same cuts that Jason Kenney is calling for. Saskatchewan's GDP growth was revised downward, small-business confidence is down, and full-time jobs are down. Now, let's compare that to here in Alberta, where we chose to invest in infrastructure and protect public services Albertans rely on. Our GDP growth is the fastest in the country. Jobs are up, wages are up, and manufacturing is up. Our plan is working; their plan is not.

The Speaker: Second supplemental. [interjections] Order, please.

Mrs. Schreiner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that there are trade agreements between provinces that govern the mobility of labour and given that Saskatchewan's move appears to have contravened the trade agreement, to the same minister: what is our government doing to fight back against Saskatchewan's protectionist move and stand up for Alberta workers?

Mr. Bilous: Mr. Speaker, we made it clear that Premier Wall needs to smarten up, kill this restriction, or we'll take them to court. We told them that they have one week to do so yesterday, so the clock is ticking. [interjection]

The Speaker: Hon. member.
Please continue.

Mr. Bilous: We told them that they have one week to do so yesterday, so the clock is ticking. They have six days to comply.

Mr. Speaker, we have the backs of Alberta workers, but the opposition and Jason Kenney have been buddy-buddy with Premier Wall for some time, so I want to ask them: when will you stand up for . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister. Thank you.

Mr. Nixon: Point of order.

The Speaker: Point of order noted.

The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Dr. Starke: Mr. Speaker, I'm very proud to represent Canada's border city, Lloydminster. With our biprovincial status, it is critical that the governments in Regina and Edmonton be on good working terms. That's why the current brouhaha over licence plates is of such concern. When the provinces aren't getting along and are feuding like schoolboys, it's the people of Lloydminster that suffer. To the minister of economic development and tirade . . .

Mr. Bilous: Point of order.

Dr. Starke: . . . yesterday you told the Premier of Saskatchewan to smarten up. I'm sure that if one of their ministers said the same thing to our Premier, Albertans would be outraged, so will you withdraw your intemperate remark and apologize to Premier Wall and the people of Saskatchewan?

2:10

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wonder when the hon. member who posed that question will apologize to Alberta workers and businesses for an unfair, non trade compliant restriction that the government of Saskatchewan has brought in. They're attacking Alberta businesses. Our government has the backs of Alberta businesses and Alberta workers, and we're going to fight back. Their ridiculous restriction is non trade compliant. They know that. We know that. They've got six days to do the right thing.

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, an NDP minister trying to out-Trump Trump and out-Kenney Kenney.

Mr. Speaker, given that the people of Lloydminster rely on collaboration between the provinces for the seamless delivery of health care, education, social services, policing – and the list goes on – and given that every time there is a spat between the two governments, that should be allies, it's the people of Lloydminster who suffer, to the minister of economic development and blockade: when you made your little outburst yesterday, did you even give a moment's thought about the negative effects it would have on the people of Lloydminster?

The Speaker: Hon. member, I cannot cite the exact standing order, but in the many orders that I've read, I believe that there is a practice in the House that you use the specific title of the minister when you are addressing them. I would appreciate that. [interjections]

Hon. members. [interjection] Hon. member.

I would ask that all of you practise that in the future.

The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, I do understand the premise of the member's question and his concern as far as Lloydminster being a border town and how important trade is. I can tell you that trade is extremely important. My hope is to work collaboratively with Saskatchewan and British Columbia to enhance trade and our trade corridors. But when the government of Saskatchewan makes allegations with no merit behind them and tries to build walls around their province and hurt Alberta businesses and Alberta companies, I will not apologize for standing up for the people of this province.

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, given that any ongoing disagreement between our provincial governments hurts the people of Lloydminster and given that name-calling and threats of legal action do nothing to solve those issues and given that the real solution is an open and constructive dialogue between the provinces, something that we're pretty good at in Lloydminster, to the Minister of Economic Development and Trade. I understand that you've called Saskatchewan – so you can call the 306 area code on your phone – and received no answer. Minister, I see Saskatchewan from my front door, and they do answer my calls. Do you want me to call and have a chat with them for you?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wonder which side of the border the hon. member lives on. He's clearly cheering for Saskatchewan.

I can tell you that we will continue to argue and fight and stand up for Alberta workers. Now, what I can say is that we've seen this story before, and we know how it ends. Earlier this year Premier Wall was trying to use Saskatchewan tax dollars to offer incentives to lure Alberta businesses there. He had to walk back from it because it was non trade compliant. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that their actions are not trade compliant. We will continue to stand up for Alberta workers and Alberta businesses, and I will not apologize.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Greenhouse Gas Large Emitter Regulations

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, earlier this week the government announced changes to the specified gas emitters regulation, and unfortunately it's just more bad news for our oil and gas sector. Given that the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers estimated that the changes will cause a fivefold increase in costs to our industry, it is no wonder that investors' confidence in Alberta is in free fall. To the minister: will you please explain how increasing industry's costs five times will lead to increased investment and more jobs?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'll encourage the member to take a look at his notes because I think they're a little outdated. I can tell you this much. The world is changing, and members of Alberta's oil and gas industry understand that better than anyone, and they want to be a part of that change. Cenovus Energy said that our plan is, quote: an important step forward in addressing climate change as it will incent those facilities with the lowest emissions intensity. End quote. Our stakeholders are calling our approach thoughtful, fair, and smart, and I can tell you that by investing $1.4 billion in innovation, we will continue to be the world leader.

Mr. Barnes: Given that the Premier is raising corporate, personal, carbon, and producers' tax rates, capping oil sands development, introducing onerous new regulations, and generally driving this province's economy into the ground and that our neighbour and largest competitor is implementing broad reforms, including cutting taxes and repealing burdensome regulations, to the Premier: how does creating jobs in Texas and Oklahoma help the tens of thousands of unemployed Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I find it interesting that the members opposite want to continue to take advice from a Premier and a government that are seeing their economy in free fall. Their economy is shrinking. Job losses are up. You know, what their Premier did do was increase their PST to 6 per cent. That's not something that we're doing. We're not bringing that in. We stand with industry. Let me tell you what Jonathan Moser, who is the head of environment and public affairs at Lafarge Canada, said of our plan, quote: it will allow us to still be competitive to make the cement that we make every day to support the infrastructure we enjoy in Alberta, where we work, play, and live. End quote. Our made-in-Alberta solution . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, yesterday I, too, was deeply disappointed to hear the Minister of Economic Development and Trade imply that our province's oil and gas industry is operating unethically. It was a slap in the face to tens of thousands of Albertans working in the safest and the most environmentally sensitive resource industry in the entire world, a record all Albertans can be very, very proud of. Will the minister do the right thing, withdraw the offensive comments, and actually apologize to all Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know what? We are proud of our energy industry. We know that our industry is top of class. We are the most sustainable oil and gas producing jurisdiction in the world, and we are very proud of our industry. You know what we're doing? We're investing $1.4 billion in innovation so we can bump that bar even higher. We know that we come up with solutions here in Alberta. Our oil and gas sector is cutting-edge. We're proud of the work they do, and we're going to support them to continue to be the world leader.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Energy stated over a year ago that "shovels will be in the ground within the year" with respect to the Kinder Morgan pipeline. A year later still no shovels, and Kinder Morgan will be spending 2018 getting local permits and losing $75 million a month for the delays. To the Minister of Energy. The energy industry does not need any more challenges at this time. Why do you plan to take $1.3 billion annually from the energy sector with your so-called carbon competitiveness incentives plan?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Economic Development and Trade.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, I'll encourage the members opposite to maybe have a conversation with industry from time to time because what they will hear is that industry recognizes that we need to invest in innovation to ensure that they're doing two things. One, we are reducing our greenhouse gas emissions, and we are shrinking our environmental footprint while at the same time they're reducing their costs and making them more competitive. We are proud of our energy industry. We're proud to work with them.

We've been working with them for over two years on this plan. We have their backs, unlike the members opposite, who want to stick their heads in the ground.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

2:20

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, given that the carbon competitiveness incentives plan for Alberta was estimated by the government to have more job losses than the coal phase-out and given that Tim McMillan, head of the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers, said that it looks like the carbon tax is going up fivefold on the industry and that capital is fleeing to the U.S.A. and other places, to the Minister of Energy: if this was one of the most incredible, engaging rounds of consultation ever conducted, why are CAPP and so many others unhappy with the results? [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Calgary-Hays, can it.
The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The new carbon competitiveness incentives will support large industrial emitters to be more competitive while reducing their emissions and encouraging investment in renewables. Rather than pay lip service to reducing emissions, something members opposite in their former time in government often did, our approach rewards the best in class for large emitters. This is going to encourage a race to the top through new investment in new facilities, improvements to existing facilities. Now, we know that this is going to take time. That's why we listened to industry and are phasing in improved rules over three years.

Mr. van Dijken: Mr. Speaker, CNRL, Imperial, and the electricity industry are not pleased with the government's carbon competitiveness incentive plan. Given that the Premier stated to the Vancouver board of trade that there is not a school, hospital, bus, road, bike lane, or port that doesn't owe something to a strong energy industry – and now this minister is calling our industry unethical – can the minister explain why this government is perpetuating this sustained attack on our energy industry, the industry that provides a high quality of life and transfer payments to the rest of Canada?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know what? Our made-in-Alberta solution rewards the kind of new construction investments that are going to keep Alberta competitive in a global market. Doing nothing is no longer an option. We are an export economy. We must adapt to the changing global landscape. But don't take my word for it. This is Dawn Farrell, the CEO of TransAlta.

TransAlta is pleased that the Alberta government is recognizing the value of existing and new renewable energy, including hydro. Hydro has been an integral part of the Alberta power system for decades and will continue to be a critical component as we reduce emissions and transition to clean power generation.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Economic Development and Trade accused the opposition of being offensive because we questioned his policies, but what's really offensive is that the same minister suggested that Fort McMurray's oil industry is unethical. This government likes to say that all of its anti oil sands opinions have been reformed to pro-oil stances, but clearly that isn't true, not to mention that it's not NDP policy. To the Premier: is this message of unethical Alberta oil one that you're promoting on your taxpayer-funded business trips, and what is the minister of environment saying in Minnesota right now?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Just because the opposition says it three times – Beetlejuice, Beetlejuice, Beetlejuice – doesn't make it true. Just because you say and assert that things happened on this side of the House, it means, actually, just that you're saying and asserting things. The truth is that on this side of the House we stand with industry, we stand with employers, and we stand with workers. That's why Cenovus, Lafarge, Canadian Manufacturers & Exporters, TransAlta – we've had Shell and others onside – are supporting things like our climate leadership plan, the OBAs. On this side of the House we get results for Albertans. That side of the House wants to pretend Ottawa will take care of it. Well, you know what? Their leader was in Ottawa . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, given that oil sands companies are very active in reclamation and that these reclaimed sites are thriving and given that Fort McMurray's air quality is better than Vancouver's or Montreal's, not to mention that we don't dump sewage into the water, and given that oil sands companies are often at the forefront of clean technologies, to the minister: will you come up to Fort McMurray and explain to my constituents why our oil and our industries are unethical?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again, our government, our Premier, our Minister of Energy all stand with industry. We are proud of the work that our oil and gas sector does. In fact, last month I was in Abu Dhabi for ADIPEC, the second-largest world oil and gas trade show, with 50 Alberta companies. Let me tell you that there is significant interest to invest in our oil and gas sector. They recognize we have the technology, the expertise, and that some of the most qualified people in the world are here in Alberta.

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, they chased all the internationals out of Fort McMurray.

Given that Fort McMurray and Alberta's oil sands are economic drivers in this province that create jobs for thousands of people not just in Alberta but across our country and given the fact that this industry also invests heavily in the nonprofit sector and that they continue to help Albertans while this government continues to impose harmful policies and regulations on them, to the minister: will you come up north and explain to my constituents your comments? I demand that you apologize to them.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think the member needs to check his facts because just two months ago JACOS, a Japan oil and gas company, announced a new $2 billion expansion of their existing oil sands facility up in Fort McMurray. Drilling activity is up, with 64 per cent more wells drilled this year. Husky energy announced that they're going to boost their capital spending. Last month we learned Chevron is ramping up spending in the oil patch, investing up to a billion on the Duvernay shale basin. Cenovus Energy has more than doubled its production this year. CNRL has also increased production. Suncor reported their best quarterly results since oil was $100 a barrel. [interjections]

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister. Thank you.

Hon. members, how many of you are looking forward to gifts in your socks at Christmastime? Please. We've got a lot of late nights, folks, and we need to keep each other together.

Public Service Pension Plans

Dr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, many of my constituents are part of a public-sector pension such as the local authorities pension plan or the Alberta teachers' pension plan. A few years ago, under the previous Conservative government, there was a great deal of uncertainty about the viability of these plans. To the President of Treasury Board and Minister of Finance: what is our government doing to ensure the ongoing functionality of these vital pension plans for Albertans?

Mr. Ceci: Our government believes, Mr. Speaker, that all Albertans deserve a dignified retirement. That's why we supported common-sense and phased-in changes to CPP that will benefit Albertans.

As for the public-sector plans, I'm pleased to report that excellent strides have been made towards full funding of those plans. The public-sector pension plan is at 90 per cent funded, and the local authorities pension plan is 94 per cent funded.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the minister. Given that I understand from my work on the Alberta heritage trust fund committee that our pension plans' investments are managed by AIMCo and that AIMCo has had good returns for these investments, what effect will that have on prospective pension contribution rates for my constituents and for the government?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you. The public-sector pension plan and the local authorities pension plan are tremendously important to thousands of Alberta workers and retirees. AIMCo does an excellent job, and I would just say that their 10-year anniversary is tonight, Mr. Speaker. They've done an excellent job investing funds on behalf of Albertans, and I want to thank them for their hard work. These plans had been unfunded liabilities for some time before, but it looks like that gap is closing. AIMCo's sound investment decisions are part of closing that gap.

Dr. Turner: Given that nurses, teachers, and municipal workers are among my constituents who provide exemplary public service to Alberta and that they deserve a dignified retirement, to the same minister: how is the government ensuring the ongoing viability of public service pensions?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. Our government is committed to helping ensure Albertans have a secure retirement and that public-sector pension plans are sustainable and well run. As I mentioned, both the PSPP and the LAPP are close to being fully funded. As a result, the pension contribution rates have been reduced for both of those pension plans, which saves government and workers money. That is making life more affordable for all Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Cold Lake Area Unemployment

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A leaked memo from the NDP government specifically mentions that the Cold Lake region will see job losses. My constituency is already reeling from high unemployment, and now we hear from this memo that we can expect greater job losses than what we have already witnessed in the coal phase-out. To the minister: how am I supposed to tell my constituents that their mortgage-paying jobs are at risk and that they are going to be treated worse than can be expected in Hanna, Forestburg, and other coal communities? This is unbelievable. This needs to have an answer, Minister, please. Are you putting my constituents out of work?

2:30

The Speaker: The hon. minister of economic development.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know, the only thing that's unbelievable is Jason Kenney when he was part of a federal government that brought forward regulations to close coal and phase out coal, with no plan to help workers transition, no plan to support communities. I don't know if Mr. Kenney even visited the coal-affected communities. But I'll tell you what. Our government has their back. We not only created a $40 million fund to help workers transition; we've also created a $4.5 million fund to identify economic diversification opportunities for communities. We are working with the communities as they transition off coal, and we're excited at the opportunities the companies . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
First supplemental.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that Jason Kenney has visited my constituency and given that a month ago I asked both the environment and Energy ministers what they are doing about projects in my constituency and they both potentially pushed forward policies that will hurt the oil sands industry, to the Minister of Energy and the minister of environment: will you confirm today the number of job losses that Alberta will sustain due to your policies? Is it a thousand as per the memo, is it worse than we can expect, or is it the 7,000 that CAPP quoted just last month?

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, I hope that Mr. Kenney apologized to them when he was visiting them.

What I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, is that we've been working very collaboratively with industry: with CNRL, with Imperial, with Husky, and with all the other oil sands juniors. They have identified and said to us that we need to be investing in innovation, that the government of Alberta needs to be a partner with them. We have done that. We've come to the table to say: we know that our oil and gas sector is the best in the world, the most responsible. We're going to continue to work with them to drive down their costs, lower their emissions, and continue to remain competitive to attract investment back here in Alberta.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The only apology that we need to see is from the economic development minister, who said that my constituency is creating unethical oil. Will you apologize, Minister? Yes or no?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You know what? We're very, very proud of our energy industry, and we know it is the most ethical and responsible in the world. We know that through investments and innovation, including the $1.4 billion that we announced earlier this week – that is going to go a long way to ensure that industry continues to develop solutions, reducing their costs, improving the way that they extract and refine, and ensuring that we are a world leader – Alberta will continue to be a world leader because our government is investing in our industry.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Energy Industry Opposition

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Last year the government appointed known outspoken oil sands opponent Tzeporah Berman to its oil sands advisory group, who then went on to compare the oil sands to Mordor, the fictional hellish, scorched land in the Lord of the Rings. Given the recently leaked document which states that new emissions rules will put forward a cost to industry of $900 million in the coming year and then $1.2 billion in the year 2020, to the Premier: how much influence did Ms Berman have on this initiative?

The Speaker: The Deputy Premier.

Ms Hoffman: Thanks again, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question and the opportunity to clarify again that the research that was shared publicly was research based on a plan that was months old that was never implemented. The plan that did move forward was created completely independently from the work that Ms Berman was involved with in the past. We're really proud of the work that we're doing. That's going to make sure that we continue to be leaders, that we continue to have good jobs, and that we continue to make sure we work hard for the people of Alberta.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, Alberta's oil and gas industry continues to come under attack by this government. Given that as recently as yesterday Ms Berman referred negatively to the oil sands again as tar sands and since working for the NDP government on OSAG she has gone on to actively protest pipeline expansion in B.C., to the Premier: how is it feasible that this government is advocating internationally for the promotion of our ethical resource development when they are following the advice of environmental activists?

Ms Hoffman: Well, Mr. Speaker, if we want to talk about people we've had past relationships with, I warn the members opposite that those who live in glass houses may not want to pick up those stones because we've certainly seen what happens when people who were formerly associated with them get up, shoot off their mouth, go into the middle of racist incidents, and incite violence. Certainly, I think it's important that we think about the people we have relationships with and the work that this government is doing and the policies we have. If you want to talk about past relationships, we're certainly happy to discuss relationships members opposite have had with Rebel media and others, but, you know, we're here to discuss government policy and opposition policy, and I look forward to doing that.

Mrs. Aheer: Well, Mr. Speaker, the taxpayer is on the hook for this particular relationship.

Given that Ms Berman and Ms Mahon have continually and continue to actively protest the oil and gas sector, that provides the amazing quality of life for Albertans, and given that the NDP believes that our oil and gas industry is behaving unethically, to the Minister of Economic Development and Trade: how can Albertans have any confidence in the recommendations of these activists when they're working against the well-being and the prosperity of Albertans? Please apologize to Albertans.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, Albertans and the world can have confidence in the fact that investment is continuing to occur here in the province. As I mentioned earlier, we've got: Husky Energy announced they're boosting their capital spending; CNRL increased their production; Suncor as well took its first steps to set up two cogen units at its oil sands base plant. Steve Williams, the CEO of Suncor, said: "We believe that bold, ambitious action is required by all of us to effectively tackle the climate change challenge." I can tell you that the opposition wants to stick their head in the ground and pretend like this doesn't exist. We're . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Postsecondary Education Funding

Mr. W. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, the postsecondary tuition freeze implemented by the NDP government is unsustainable. Budgeting for students in institutions for future years seems impossible with this government's refusal to make any decisions. This government seems to have little thought for poor students and upfront grants and has budgeted more for student loans, setting the stage for something, but who knows what? There seems to be no timeline, and the minister keeps shifting his responsibilities onto the taxpayers of this province. To the minister: when will you announce the funding review so that students and institutions can plan for years to come, not just semester to semester?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was proud to announce last week our government's continuation of the tuition freeze that will keep tuition among the lowest in the country, which was not the case when we became government. Of course, under those guys opposite we had the highest tuition in the country. We don't believe that that's the way we create opportunities for our students. We want to make sure that no student chooses to not go to school because they can't afford it, which is why we're continuing with the tuition freeze. Of course, we'll have more to say about our policies around tuition and student aid in the very near future.

Mr. W. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, we know that since continuing the tuition freeze, the rate of inflation gap continues to grow exponentially each year by keeping tuition rates at 2015 rates, and given that the cost of this continued freeze will be either forced onto taxpayers or students in the future, is the minister buying time to set up political scoring points from students for the next election?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we recognize that the cost of delivering higher education goes up, which is why we've backfilled the difference between the tuition increase and the tuition freeze that we've announced for three out of the four years of the tuition. Of course, you know, the members opposite are so concerned about future generations; however, they have no concern at all for the current generation of students who wouldn't be able to afford tuition under their policies.

The Speaker: I remind you again and yet again that statements like "not true" are not acceptable.

2:40

Mr. W. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, given that the minister has repeatedly promised frustrated administration and the students a funding model review that keeps getting pushed to the side and into the future and given that the minister can't use time and the freeze to keep Alberta students pacified and use international ones for the sustainable budgeting purposes, is the next item on the agenda to downgrade tuition costs entirely to Alberta taxpayers for all Alberta students and thus lower the quality of education and the completion rates here in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we continue to have some of the most highly ranked universities in the whole country here in Alberta, and that will continue under the policies of our government. Not only that, but we're making it much more affordable for our students to get that high-quality education right here in the province. Under their plan they would close the doors to additional students. They would jack up tuition so that it's unaffordable for most students. We don't believe that that's the way to promote higher education in the province of Alberta. Our plan will support students.

The Speaker: In 30 seconds we'll continue with Members' Statements.

Members' Statements

Official Opposition and Government Policies

Mr. Westhead: Mr. Speaker, the winter season has inspired me to write a poem based on Robert Frost's Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening.

Whose words are these I think I know:
Gays can marry, not each other though;
Reproductive rights aren't respected here.
Those words are Jason Kenney's prose.

Lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, or queer,
In my Alberta, you're all welcome here.
Human rights aren't give and take,
Who you love not cause for fear.

We give our collective heads a shake,
That access to abortion is at stake.
Not a word from UCP, not a peep.
When it comes to caring, they are fake.

What they sow they too shall reap.
A talent pool more shallow than deep.
Far less cunning than a rabid fox.
Wolves in wolf clothing, eating sheep.

To say the cancer centre is a box.
To patients, an insulting shock.
"Cannabis causes communism": so absurd.
They should think before they squawk.

Reckless cuts by them preferred.
Ideology makes their vision blurred.
I find their world view rather strange.
They like the facts, not stirred.

Denying hope and climate change,
Future generations would be shortchanged.
Carbon dioxide's on an upwards slope.
UCP priorities must be rearranged.

But don't despair and do not mope.
Alberta's Premier, she brings us hope.
Building pipelines east and west.
Could Kenney build them? The answer's nope.

Our Premier's plan is the best.
Keeping promises, she's never stressed.
And to fulfill them we will not rest.
And to fulfill them we will not rest.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Interprovincial Relations

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that. Yesterday Saskatchewan announced it was banning Alberta licence plates from government infrastructure projects. The Minister of Economic Development and Trade rightly stood up for Alberta, very UCP-like. He cited existing trade agreements among the reasons why this action cannot stand and threatened legal action if Saskatchewan doesn't rescind their policy within a week.

Now, that's tough talk, Mr. Speaker, and we in the UCP always support standing up for Alberta's workers. But I wonder when the NDP changed its mind about free trade. It was this summer when a national trade panel found Alberta's beer subsidies to be in violation of our interprovincial trade obligations, yet the Finance minister, the minister of microbrews, chose to double down on his protectionist policies. It seems the NDP is only for free trade when their NDP friends give them permission to be.

Another example, Mr. Speaker, is the NDP action, or should I say inaction, on pipelines, specifically when it comes to blatant attempts by the B.C.'s NDP Premier to block Kinder Morgan's Trans Mountain project. In this case we've seen no tough talk from anybody on the government side, no threats of legal action, no willingness to stand up for Alberta against an NDP government standing in the way of a project so critical to our economic prosperity. In fact, Horgan himself said that the Premier didn't even try to convince him on pipelines when they had dinner a year ago. Didn't even try.

Mr. Speaker, this NDP government is more than willing to get tough with a conservative government in Saskatchewan but not with their pals and partners over in B.C. It's all starting to make sense now. The fact is that the UCP is the only party willing to stand up for Alberta's interest in every case, not just when it's easy or convenient. We are the only party willing to get tough on B.C. when it comes to pipelines, and we're the only party that's truly looking out for Alberta's interests.

Mr. Speaker, the NDP is not standing up for Albertans. The UCP needs to take over so they will have somebody in their corner.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Albert.

RCMP St. Albert Detachment

Ms Renaud: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Inspector Pam Robinson, Constable Patrick Lambert, Corporal Laurel Kading, and Auxiliary Constable Shelly Ullery are RCMP members from the St. Albert municipal detachment. All too often we don't recognize and celebrate their work and dedication until we are reminded of their heroism because of a tragedy. St. Albert is all too familiar with that kind of tragedy, so today I'm celebrating the women and the men who currently serve in St. Albert.

I'd like to share a few reasons why. I'd like to draw particular attention to Constable Lambert's role in St. Albert. In addition to patrolling, Constable Lambert works closely with the community to develop meaningful relationships that ultimately result in a stronger, more resilient community. Constable Lambert is a member of the St. Albert Neighbourhood Watch crisis management and outreach team. He also facilitated the implementation of the violence threat risk assessment model for St. Albert schools.

Spend some time in St. Albert during the warmer months and you'll run into RCMP members patrolling the parks and paths and playgrounds on bikes and golf carts. Our members collectively attended 150 block parties this year. They know the value of relationships, and they invest their time developing them.

Our members joined the collective earlier this year to do essential outreach in Lions park to the young people struggling with addictions and homelessness. This year we attended a city-wide block party, and of course one of the most popular events was Constable Lambert with his car. The kids were just clamouring all around him, wanting to turn on lights and sirens, but he took every moment and every opportunity to interact with the children and young people to teach them a little bit about how things work, and they always flock to him.

For all of these reasons and so much more, I extend my sincere gratitude to the men and women of the RCMP, who give so much every single day to all of us.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek.

Habitat for Humanity Edmonton-Mill Creek Project

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very excited today to share with you all a special occasion coming up for nine Alberta families. On December 21 these nine families will be receiving the keys to new houses in Carter Place.

Now, it's a common belief by many of us that everyone in Canada deserves the right to a safe, affordable, and decent place to live, yet many families do not have that. Habitat for Humanity, of which I've previously spoken, works diligently and extensively to enable families who cannot afford to buy a house using the usual mortgage system to purchase their own homes.

In the summer of 2017 Habitat for Humanity began work on a new build in the constituency of Edmonton-Mill Creek, starting with the interfaith building component and then moving to the site construction at the Carter Place location. The project involved the building of 58 homes and was named Carter Place in honour of Jimmy and Rosalyn Carter, who take part in the annual Habitat for Humanity work projects. The Alberta government and the city of Edmonton teamed up with former U.S. President Jimmy Carter and Rosalyn Carter and many volunteers on one of the biggest Habitat builds ever undertaken. Now, a short six months later, nine of the houses are completed and ready for occupancy.

This project illustrates the power of collaboration and compassion. The project created an important benefit for people in need and was inspirational for those doing the building. Seeing the houses take shape and rise up from the efforts of so many, including the future owners, showed the power of working together and the strength of determination.

I'll be conveying good wishes to the new homeowners for long and happy occupancies and best wishes for a happy holiday season.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-South.

2:50 Red Deer Regional Hospital Emergency Services

Ms Miller: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to salute a dedicated group of people, the staff of the emergency department of the Red Deer regional hospital. An emergency department is not where anyone wants to be, but it is a place where I had to spend some time recently, and I was impressed by the efficiency and professionalism of the staff at the hospital.

I took someone to the hospital after a fall down the stairs. We arrived about 8:30 p.m. and within 10 minutes were triaged and assessed. While we waited, 11 ambulances arrived. Even with this sudden influx of patients, the staff was compassionate and efficient. Within two hours we were in a room awaiting X-rays. It was determined that a CT scan was necessary and that an overnight stay was required.

The staff, with all the incoming and checked-in patients, was stretched to the limit, yet they never stopped showing how much they cared for patients. From porters to nurses to doctors to X-ray technicians, each of them demonstrated respect and compassion in every interaction. When we face a medical emergency for ourselves or our loved ones, we are at our most vulnerable, and it is at times like this that the compassion and care of our medical professionals mean the most to us.

I want to recognize Red Deer regional hospital and their emergency room and other staff today because they are the front line, Mr. Speaker. They are the people that this government pledged to protect during our campaign in 2015, they are the people who look after Albertans around the clock every day, and they are the people who deserve our support and respect in return.

Thank you.

Rural Crime

Mr. MacIntyre: Mr. Speaker, we're in the season of Advent, during which time we look forward with anticipation to Christmas. Children eagerly await Christmas morning, when they will finally find out what lies beneath that wrapping paper.

Well, in rural Alberta residents have a different kind of anticipation, one filled with dread and one that, while it may sound exaggerated, is nothing but reality. Across rural Alberta residents are cowering as thieves and assailants wander freely. There is no silent night here, there are very few merry gentlemen, and all five golden rings along with the one-horse open sleigh have been stolen. Afraid to leave home yet afraid to stay, what are they to do? As parents tuck their children into bed, they pray that not a creature is stirring, but they have learned that that is often too much to hope for. While children hope that St. Nicholas soon will be there, their parents are concerned that someone else will be. Albertans should not need to wonder if their presents will still be under the tree come Christmas morning.

Last week, while this side was fighting for rural Albertans, including those 100 that came to the gallery, three Red Deer schools were getting robbed, Mr. Speaker. Last weekend yet another break and enter in Red Deer is turning into an attempted murder charge. Tell the people of Red Deer and Red Deer county that there is no emergency.

Mr. Speaker, the NDP members of this Assembly may not think that rural crime is an emergency, but the United Conservative Party does, and we will not let up. I have been tabling terrified constituents' letters for eight days straight, and I'm not done. We have been meeting with rural crime watches and Albertans to listen to and to find solutions so that everyone, especially those in crime-stricken rural Alberta, might have a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

Presenting Petitions

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I stand today to present a petition signed by over 430 Albertans. The petition reads: "We, the undersigned residents of Alberta, petition The Legislative Assembly of Alberta to pass a Bill banning all trophy hunting within the province of Alberta." The petition was created by a group in Edmonton called Voice for Animals Society and originally held more signatures. However, some of them were from outside of Alberta and therefore were, unfortunately, out of order.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Hanson: Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

The Speaker: Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: That's okay, Mr. Speaker. I've got five copies. Yesterday, during debate on Bill 32, I referenced that many union members are forced to donate a portion of their union dues to the Alberta Federation of Labour. I have a report from Elections Alberta that shows that just in the first three quarters of this year AFL donations were $503,267.38 on the backs of union members.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I, too, have five copies of a letter from the Minister of Service Alberta to the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association members. I'd just like to put that on the record.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to present some more letters that have been coming to me from people who have suffered crime. This one – it's from a resident in Red Deer county – says: "I am afraid of being home alone day or night. I am afraid of leaving my home unattended. I am afraid . . . my children and grandchildren [are going to be] hurt."

Another one, from Sue and Doug: "We believe that we are no longer safe in our own home. We are [terrified]."

This is another one, from Alisha, who says that she suffers from anxiety every time someone comes in the yard and that her three-year-old son has recently started hiding his toys so the bad guys won't find them the next time they come back.

Mrs. Pitt: But it's not an emergency.

Mr. MacIntyre: But it's not an emergency, of course.

Also, I referred to two incidents in my member's statement, one regarding the attempted murder and home invasion in Red Deer and another one regarding three break-ins in Red Deer schools.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gottfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table two sets of correspondence. One is from Dr. Julie Schell, a veterinarian in Calgary-Fish Creek, in which she states that "Bill 31 is dangerous to animal patients because," and then she lists five different reasons why that is the case.

I also table some other correspondence, from Christian Hansen-Jones, also a veterinarian in Calgary-Fish Creek. "I am writing to express my grave concern with recent proposed amendments to the Veterinary Profession Act . . . contained in Bill 31."

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Tablings to the Clerk

The Clerk: I wish to advise the Assembly that the following documents were deposited with the office of the Clerk: on behalf of the Hon. Ms Sigurdson, Minister of Seniors and Housing, responses to questions raised by Mr. Smith, the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon, and Mr. Clark, the Member for Calgary-Elbow, on April 13, 2017, Ministry of Seniors and Housing 2017-18 main estimates debate; pursuant to ministerial order 001/2016 the office of the Seniors Advocate of Alberta annual report 2016-17.

The Speaker: Hon. members, I believe we are at points of order. I understand that the first point of order was withdrawn.

The second point of order was by the Minister of Economic Development and Trade. The Deputy Government House Leader.

Point of Order

Referring to Proper Titles

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I understand that you actually did call the member for Lloydminster to order during your statements at the time. Perhaps if the member for Lloydminster would simply stand up and withdraw the remarks. Otherwise, I could speak to it further, but perhaps we could resolve it quickly.

The Speaker: I'm sorry. Could I just understand the . . .

Mr. Feehan: During question period you yourself made comments to the member about the comments that he had made during his questions. As such, I believe he's been already called to order, so perhaps if he'd just apologize.

Mr. Hanson: What's the citation?

Mr. Feehan: Okay. That's fine. I will make the full point of order. I thought we were going to be able to get through that a little bit quickly instead because the Speaker has already commented.

Under section 23(h), (i), and (j) I would like to comment on the violation of the rules – sorry; I should read that out: "uses abusive or insulting language of a nature likely to create disorder." And, of course, the violation of the rules of order under House of Commons Procedure and Practice, page 613: "A Minister is [always] referred to by the portfolio he or she holds."

3:00

In this particular case the member for Lloydminster referred to our Minister of Economic Development and Trade as the minister of economic development and tirade and subsequently as the minister of economic development and blockade. Both of these are a clear violation of the rules of order in this House, and as such I believe that it's quite right that the member from Lloydminster stand and withdraw the remarks and apologize.

Thank you.

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, I'm very happy to respond to that. I'll start by responding that if I'm supposed to be doing that, perhaps you could get my constituency name correct. I'm the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster, not the member for Lloydminster, and the people from Vermilion would like that recognized.

Mr. Speaker, I have to say that I find it a little bit rich that the folks from that side suddenly reply with righteous indignation when a turn of phrase is used against them because when they sat over here – in fact, the Minister of Economic Development and Trade, back in the day when he was the Member for Edmonton-Beverly-Clareview, when he sat over here, used these techniques on a regular basis. They were, in fact, the stock-in-trade, and I would even say that the Member for Edmonton-Highlands-Norwood was widely regarded as the Zen master of these techniques.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, the words that I used were neither nonparliamentary, nor were they abusive. In fact, the words that I used were chosen very carefully to reflect the minister's actions. You will note that the word "tirade" and the word "blockade" and the rather cleverly selected word that I had for my second supplemental all would have reflected exactly on the minister's activities yesterday.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I can understand that if words are used to disrespect a minister, they perhaps should be called out of order, but one of our weapons, one of the tools we have to use as parliamentarians is the English language. If we are restricted from using the tools of the English language, if we are restricted from using idioms and turns of phrase to get our point across because the thin-skinned ministers on the government side can't handle it, yet at the same time they can quite easily misname our constituency names, which is the only name that we are to go by, well, there's a double standard going on here. Certainly, there's a double standard, considering that when I sat over in those chairs, we regularly had to hear these sorts of charges from the folks sitting especially in this corner of the House. Now that they're over there, suddenly something has changed.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly followed the directive that you gave me. I changed the language that I would have used in my second supplemental, but with specific reference to the point of order that has been raised here, I do not agree that this is a point of order. I do not agree that the citations that the Member for Edmonton-Rutherford, the Minister of Indigenous Relations, has used are, in fact, relevant in this case.

While it is correct that we should use the names of the ministers, that is a convention. It is not a rule of order. To state that somehow the standing orders and the rules that we have here have somehow been violated because I chose a specific turn of phrase that was intended to get a point across in the 35 seconds that we are proffered in this House to do that, to suggest that that is somehow against the rules of order, well, Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that this government needs to grow a little thicker skin.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will comment on the 23(h), (i), and (j). You know, far be it from me to take the government's side, but on this rare occasion they're correct. It's a rare occasion.

You know what? I will say that the hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster – I hope I got that right; I certainly intended to – has some points about the disrespect that comes from the government side on a regular basis. To be clear, Mr. Speaker, I think it's fair to say that we could all perhaps use a lesson here. There are enough things to fight about, there are enough things to disagree about, there are enough things to debate about without debasing one another's names. I'm of the opinion that we don't need to do that.

I will say, in fairness, that the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster is a master of the English language, and I believe he's quite capable – I believe he's more than capable – of calling out the government when he needs to without debasing their names. I would suggest to you that you ask the member to withdraw that remark and find ways to call out the government, as he ought to do and is very good at doing, without debasing their names.

The Speaker: Are there any other members who wish to speak to this?

To the Deputy Government House Leader: I thought the point of order you may have made was with respect to another comment that the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster made. However, that was not the case. As I recall – and I don't have the exact Blues in front of me – the point that the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster made was that he referred to the minister as "economic development and blockade" if I recall exactly. I rose on the point and asked him not to repeat that, which he did not.

To the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster, an experienced member of this House and, as said, very knowledgeable about the rules and procedures in this House: I know that he knows that his broad statement about that use of the English language is the only tool that – in fact, I think I heard you say "weapon." Isn't it unfortunate, members, that we have to use words like "weapon" in this place? So I beg to disagree with the hon. member with respect to the use of English.

To the Official Opposition House Leader: I hear your point about disrespect, and well intentioned it is. However, I think that in this instance I asked that the member not repeat that. He did not again.

Also, as you see on occasion in this room, I have not always been successful in terms of identifying the constituency names. I believe twice today I called one member a different constituency.

In this particular instance I don't believe there is a point of order, and I would suggest that we go to Orders of the Day.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

Bill 31

A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act

Mr. Loewen moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Families and Communities in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment December 5: Mr. Hunter]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: Any hon. members wishing to speak to the amendment?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

Mr. McIver: No. Sorry, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Madam Speaker, we didn't hear the announcement of what bill is forward right now, please. That's why nobody knows which amendment this is. As soon as we hear which bill it is, we'll ...

The Deputy Speaker: I do realize there was a little bit of distraction, but it is important to pay attention. The responsibility is on each member. I will, however, reinforce the bill that we are working on. We are on second reading of Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, and the debate was adjourned on the referral amendment by Mr. Hunter.

Does any member wish to speak to the referral amendment? The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to the referral motion to Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act. My colleagues have brought forward a lot of excellent points on a variety of topics, and I think it's important that I take a few minutes to expound on that.

Madam Speaker, you've been here as long as I have, which means you've heard this government talk about the importance of consultation just as much as I have, and I think you'd agree with me that without proper consultation nothing gets done properly. The thing with consultation, though, is that it's relatively simple to determine whether or not it's actually happened. Certainly, the government can point us to an online survey released this summer. This would be a good first step if only the questions weren't so heavily weighted towards getting the government the answers it needed to justify what's going on with this piece of legislation.

For example, who wouldn't want to know how much they need to pay before they have to pay? Just because the question appears on their survey doesn't mean that the practice is not already being followed. We have heard it here in this very Chamber from the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster that those conversations are frequently, if not always, had over the phone before a procedure takes place. Price shoppers, as he noted, exist in every industry.

It's an interesting thing to note that we deal with dentists as well, and there are concerns around the whole fee guide. Again, there's the motor vehicles act, the private member's bill that came across in our first term. I mean, there's an underlying sentiment about costings and billings and things that impact consumers, but I can't help but wonder if we just simply need some basic education for consumers as well as for all these businesses, to provide that freely, or for a consumer to ask for this information, to be a responsible consumer.

But I digress. We mustn't forget that veterinary medicine is not an industry. It's a profession, and the people that we're dealing with when we take our pets to the clinics are professionals. To suggest that they're trying to pull the wool over their clients' eyes I think is preposterous. I can certainly attest to my own experiences with veterinarians with my own canine. I've always been well informed. I think I've used three different ones over the life of my pet familiar there, and they've always been upfront with me. They've always explained what the procedures are, how much it will cost. They took the time to educate me, and I've always respected and appreciated that. I've never had any issues with veterinarians.

Consultation is not true consultation if it's not entered into by both sides with respect and in good faith, yet based on feedback from dozens and possibly hundreds of vets, this did not happen. Now, who do we believe? The minister, who has promised consultation, whose government has already proven time and time again that it does not quite grasp what that means, or do we trust independent people, groups, and associations who may have received a phone call or may not have heard from the minister at all? For my part, I think that the volume of correspondence speaks volumes. What's more, these are not form letters that are being sent out but personal letters that describe personal situations and interactions. Again, we're dealing with veterinarians, a very professional crew.

Madam Speaker, you know as well as I do that the committees of this Legislature exist for a purpose, and that is to provide further venues to engage with the public, to engage with the government, and to engage with legislation. Committees provide an additional venue for questions to be asked and, at least theoretically, answered. They provide a place for stakeholders to take their concerns, either in person or via written submissions. There is, at times, more time available to devote to matters at committee than in the House, especially when the government is frantically trying to push through whatever legislation suits its fancy.

It is so important that we get consumer protection right because it is something that necessarily affects Albertans. Maybe someone isn't an animal lover, but they might love to attend a hockey game or a concert. Maybe some prefer home cooking to eating out. I mean, there's no need to write a review, good or bad, but they might be in the market for a car or require the repair of one.

Madam Speaker, I know that one of the hon. members has previously mentioned the good work that comes from sending a bill to committee. I've forgotten who that was now, but they referenced the Alberta Standard Time Act, the one that went through committee, and the members of the committee were given the opportunity to hear directly from stakeholders and to mull over the bill in greater detail and at greater length. This took an entire summer. There were several meetings held throughout that summer, and there were good responses coming in. The government put in the effort to go online through social media, mail-outs. They engaged so many various operators and influencers of the industry, and they came to a great, thorough conclusion that a lot of that legislation already existed. There were venues and means where a lot of it could be addressed already.

But the point is that committees are an integral part of this Legislature, and we have some experience recently in seeing the good work that they do. We have to remember, again, that even at the federal level, with our federal cousins, everything goes through committee because it is truly a fair way of ensuring that all sides get input, get the same information from stakeholders, from the public, and that they participate in that process. Basically, all sides are given time to accumulate that information.

This legislation also includes a section on computer software and bots. Now, this is something I like the sound of. Again, at face value it seems like a very noble and good thing to do, but we also have to remember that this is hard to track down. We don't know if we even have the resources to identify it and combat these large bulk purchases of tickets to events. We have to recognize that for these companies that do provide these services, these large ticketing agencies, it is not in their best interest either to have private vendors buying all the tickets and then reselling them at increased rates. That does not benefit the primary ticket sellers. They also recognize that it is a hard thing to track, but they do try, as they've stated clearly. We have to wonder if you have to make a rule for something that they are inherently trying to combat already. Perhaps some fines. I don't know.

This is another reason why we need to send this bill to committee. Let's take a look at the details. Let us see if maybe we can tweak the language a little bit to ensure that what we have is not just a benefit to consumers but also doesn't put our law and justice systems into an impossible situation. Again, it is about identifying the situation, addressing it, and finding how to penalize these people. In the end, we will have a hard time addressing that when already the major ticket companies do struggle with that, but they continually try, and they continually evolve. They are inherently doing it within their own systems. Unfortunately, for every lock that is created, there's always someone who'll figure out how to pick that lock, and it keeps on going on and on.

Madam Speaker, with that, I'm going to wrap things up here. I just need to say one final thing. The government truly has nothing to lose by sending this to committee. Fuller conversation and consultation can only benefit the legislation and Albertans, and I think all of us here can appreciate the ability to get some legislation done properly and correctly to the benefit of all Albertans.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. Some comments, if I may, on the hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo's interesting argument in favour of sending this to committee. Certainly, he wants to repeat, say, the federal government's practice of referring things to committee, which had a terrible track record of actually getting things done for the benefit of the people of Canada.

Of course, we are a government that is keen to get things done for the people of Alberta, and we have a proud track record of doing those things. Just moments ago the NEB sided with the government of Alberta and decided to grant Trans Mountain the ability to build its pipeline without needing permission from the city of Burnaby, a significant accomplishment for our government, one that the people of Alberta can be proud of and one that the Premier can certainly be proud of. I look across the aisle, and I see some fallen faces. I know that their electoral hopes were really pinned on that project failing, Madam Speaker.

My point, Madam Speaker, is that we have heard for the last days, again, their deep commitment to not getting anything done for the people of Alberta. They want to send all four of the bills that are currently before the Legislature to committee. I'm just asking the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo why it is that he thinks that the people of Alberta don't deserve to get anything done from the Legislature. Why does he think that we need to continue the failed policies of the federal Conservative government, who failed to get any pipelines built? Why does he need to continue the practice of sending those bills to committees for endless examination – right? – without any commitment at all to getting things done that will benefit the people of Alberta, much like what our government has done with promoting the approval of the Trans Mountain pipeline, Madam Speaker?

I ask the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo why it is that he feels that the people of Alberta don't deserve a government that's actually interested in doing things for the benefit of the people of Alberta. Why does he want to sequester the good members of this Legislature into a windowless committee room in the Federal Building so they can pore over the pieces of legislation, perhaps stare at their navels for a little while – right? – and repeat the practices of their heroes in Ottawa, who sat in Ottawa for 10 years and failed the people of Alberta every single year when it came to getting pipelines built? Why don't they want to adopt our approach of actually getting things done for the people of Alberta? Why don't they want to adopt our approach of a government that's working to make ...

Mr. McIver: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: I will hear your point of order. Go ahead, hon. member.

Point of Order Factual Accuracy

Mr. McIver: Well, Madam Speaker, under 23(h), (i), and (j). Listen, the hon. minister is clearly grasping at straws, and with the lack of any cogent argument on the legislation he's just slinging mud. He's saying things that aren't true. Certainly, as we've said in the House and demonstrated with documents, when our leader, Jason Kenney, was in Ottawa, three pipelines were built and another one approved, two of which have been cancelled since this government has gotten in. He talks about nothing positive being done during 10 years of a government, that he knows is not true, that actually was very positive towards Alberta, had an Alberta Prime Minister, something that we should be proud of.

The hon. minister, with the lack of any arguments to defend his indefensible legislation, stood here for the last five or 10 minutes and did nothing but sling mud and sling it, honestly, inaccurately. I won't use the L-word although it would be appropriate here. It was inaccurate. He should be called to account on that. He should be asked to address the legislation and stop trying to disturb the House with unfounded allegations.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I think what we have here is not, in fact, a point of order but, rather, just a disagreement on the facts. The minister is putting forward his opinion about the circumstances over the last number of years that have occurred while certain members were in this House or while some of their friends were in Ottawa. The opposition clearly disagrees with that. We could spend all day arguing whether or not those facts are true. In fact, it is quite legitimate in this House to have a disagreement on those facts. That does not constitute a point of order. I think that in this particular case we would ask that you rule that way.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any others wishing to speak to the point of order? The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just wish to point out that part of the responsibility that rests upon your own shoulders is to uphold I will call it the sanctity of the proceedings that take place in here with regard to parliamentary procedure. That member slagged accepted, long-standing parliamentary procedures of sending bills to committee for study, for testimony from the citizens of the countries in which we have the Westminster parliamentary system. That hon. member slagged that process and those long-standing procedures in a parliamentary procedure that has cost thousands and thousands of lives over the years to protect, to uphold, and to sustain. I take offence and I think the chair should also take offence at anyone that would slag a long-standing parliamentary procedure such as sending bills to committee.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the point of order?

Seeing none, I'm prepared to rule. I think it's been a long week, and I think everybody is starting to really feel things quite intensely here, which is leading to this. I've heard many, many comments from both sides about pipelines, no pipelines, cancelled pipelines, pipelines not approved. It just goes on and on and on. So I'm inclined to think that this is really just a dispute over interpretation of the facts.

Just to add to your point, hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake, there was nothing I heard in the minister's comments that was criticizing the parliamentary process, because we do deeply respect that here in this House. It was more that he was criticizing individual players within that that he felt perhaps had not lived up to that responsibility.

That being said, there was no point of order, and I would encourage us to all stick to the matter at hand. Let's try to get some work done here in the next hour and move some things forward in this House.

Please continue, hon. minister.

Debate Continued

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I very much appreciate your incredibly wise ruling on this matter. Of course, I just wanted to reiterate that I have nothing but the greatest respect for the procedures that we follow here in the Legislature. We all have to keep in mind that we've been sent here by the people of Alberta to actually get a job done, and that is to pass legislation – right? – that will make the lives of the people of Alberta better, which is what we have before us right now. That's under debate.

It is, of course, my view, my comment on the comments made by the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo, my opinion that he doesn't seem to be interested in proceeding quickly with this legislation, that we want to delay and repeat the track record of not achieving outcomes for the people of Alberta that their idols in the federal Conservative government have in 10 years. It was interesting that the Member for Calgary-Hays stood up and tried to articulate the things that the federal government achieved for the people of Alberta and couldn't actually name a single thing. I'm hard pressed to also name anything that the federal government under the Conservatives achieved for the people of Alberta.

It's my view, of course, that our government has a proud track record of getting things done for the people of Alberta, that have made their lives better. Many of these are presented in the legislation that is before us for debate today. You know, our track record includes getting the Trans Mountain pipeline approved, as we just found out, and it's our view, Madam Speaker, that the time of the member . . .

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise on the referral motion to Bill 31. Now, I understand the government's reluctance to put this bill into committee because I believe that we've dealt with two of these issues in previous private members' bills this year. I mean, they were referred to committee, where they were shot down, yet here we go again.

They tucked them into something. You know, they tend to throw in these little nuggets that you can't really argue against like ticket resale and bot sales. You know, it's very, very difficult to talk against or vote against a bill with that kind of thing in it, but then they tuck in AMVIC, that was dealt with in Bill 203 earlier, and also the veterinarian act and the attack on the professionalism of our veterinary industry. I find that a little bit hard to swallow, and that's why I would like to get this bill in particular sent to committee, where it, again, can be quashed by the committee on a recommendation.

Now, what frustrates me about the veterinarians and their professionalism is that they talk about, you know, upfront estimates. I don't think we've ever taken any of our animals to a veterinarian or called them on the phone and said, "How much would it cost for you to come out and do this?" where they weren't very up front with the costs. Sometimes, when they realize they hear a hesitation in your voice, "Oh, boy," they'll even offer a payment plan or some other way of coming out, because their concern is about the animal. I know that the hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster can attest to that, that most of these people aren't just: oh, this is a big money-making business. It's because they love the animals, and they love the patients that they deal with.

I really think that it's shameful that we're throwing this portion of the bill in amongst the other stuff and that we couldn't just leave it out, where it was quashed on Bill 207.

Now, I'd also like to brag a little bit. My daughter-in-law is also a veterinarian, and to suggest that she and other veterinary professionals are somehow unethical in the fees that they're charging is a little bit ludicrous.

An Hon. Member: That wasn't said.

Mr. Hanson: It is absolutely what they're saying.

You know, attacking an industry that tends to be highly populated by young women – if you look at the enrolment into Saskatchewan and in Calgary, I would say that probably upwards of 80 per cent, 80 per cent or higher, are young women. We talked about the loss of some of the seats that were going to Saskatchewan and the lack of veterinarians. We have young women that are in the prime of their life going into a profession, and a lot of times, while they're in university or shortly after, they get married and decide to have children. They want to take their maternity leave and work at raising their children, and they need good professionals to be able to stand in and fill in those spots. This is really an industry that, as far as supporting young women in our province, is a very, very important industry.

Add to that the fact that the veterinary industry also hires a lot of young ladies that are veterinary assistants or receptionists that work in the offices. They've got X-ray equipment to pay for. You know, it's not a cheap industry where you can just hang out a shingle and all of a sudden you're going to work: bring in the animals, and we're going to charge you through the nose and make a whole bunch of money. It's very, very expensive to set up a veterinary practice, and I think that they're doing an absolutely amazing job working and with all the employees that they have and the expense of the building rental, the natural gas, and I'll throw the carbon tax in there just for good measure. They're doing a very good job at keeping the costs down to treat these patients.

Another thing is that, you know, you talk about a veterinarian. When they're dealing with some of these animals that come in, these animals aren't always having their best day, and they're not always on their best behaviour, so there is a certain amount of risk involved as well.

To suggest that the veterinary industry isn't being ethical or isn't being up front with costs is quite surprising to me, actually, and I would really like to see this go to committee, where we can have this dealt with, have the veterinarians come forward, as the suggestion was in the letters that we got on Bill 207, the absolute uproar. I find it very surprising – well, actually, not surprising at all – that this government would try to sneak this in in an omnibus bill like Bill 31 and try and hide it behind something as devious as bot ticket sales. I can't believe that they actually have lumped the veterinarians in with that kind of an industry.

I want to relate a little personal story if I might. We had a very active young black Lab dog running with the horses out in the snow one day. I didn't even know it was possible, Madam Speaker, but dogs' back knees are built very much like human knees. They can blow them just like an athlete can. Our black Lab blew the left knee, I think it was, and it required surgery to reattach it. While he was healing up from that with his cast on, he was putting so much stress on his other leg that – guess what? – he blew the other one, too. So now we've got a dog that has very powerful front legs and chest because when he goes outside to do his business, he's got to balance on two front legs. It's quite amazing.

You know, we could have very easily accepted a dog that was going to limp for the rest of his life, but we chose to bring him in to the veterinarian. We had the surgeries done. I'll tell you what. This veterinarian was so visibly heartbroken when one of the surgeries didn't take and he had to go in and do it again. I think this dog ended up having four surgeries or possibly even five. At least one of those surgeries the doctor did for free because he was more concerned about the patient than he was about making money. He wanted to make sure that this dog had a good, long, productive, healthy, active life.

Again, Madam Speaker, we need to push Bill 31 to committee, remove these clauses from it completely. I have no problem dealing with the ticket resales, but I'm sure that there are people in the industry that would probably have something to say about that as well. My concentration would be on the attacks on the veterinary industry, that I find really shameful. We already dealt with them in Bill 207. They shouldn't even be part of this bill. Like I said, I was surprised, but really not surprised, that this government would try to pull a fast one on the veterinary industry again and slide this into Bill 31.

I'd be very happy to answer any questions under 29(2)(a) if there are any. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any questions or comments under Standing Order 29(2)(a)? The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Strankman: Thank you. It's a pleasure to rise and talk about this interesting component, the idea of taking a piece of the legislation to committee. I'd like to speak to the member's comments about what I would call the compassion that was shown by the veterinarian. I wonder if he had any further experiences in regard to other animals that he's taken to veterinarians. In the case of other animals, I've experienced it widely in the case of bovines. As you may or may not remember, Madam Speaker, a few nights ago the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster had people, actually, in the gallery here overseeing the situation, and the member talked about that at that time. I was wondering if the Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills could expand on the compassion shown by the veterinarian profession.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. With pleasure. I could definitely add to that. You know, one thing I'd like to mention is that, especially in rural Alberta – and I know that there are a lot of veterinary clinics in Edmonton, emergency clinics as well as private, smaller clinics. Out in St. Paul we have a veterinary clinic. There's another one in Bonnyville. There's another one in Bellis, that deals more with horses, and I know that we've used that one, taken our horses there. People with animals, and with pets especially, will travel from one town to another, and it's not because they're trying to save a buck. It's not because they're trying to save a buck. I can get a procedure done in St. Paul for $25, or I can get it done in Bonnyville for $22, but it's going to cost me $35 in gas to get there, so it doesn't make any sense. But I know people that will travel from St. Paul or from Two Hills all the way to Bonnyville because that veterinarian has the patient care and the respect of the people. They're not concerned about it.

I know that it happens here in Edmonton as well that there are veterinarians, just like in any other profession, that are good and bad. When people go specifically to them, they're not as concerned about whether the rates are 5 per cent or 3 per cent higher or lower than the other guy. They're there because of the way their animal gets treated, the way they get treated when they walk in the door, the way the receptionist is, the way the vet techs are.

You know, to answer the question there from the Member for Drumheller-Stettler, it is a profession. These are very, very respected people in our communities. Like I say, lumping them together with robot ticket sales is a little bit surprising.

I know that the veterinarians are very well respected. I know that my daughter-in-law is very respected. She did her training in Saskatchewan and really liked that school. To be honest, it was very good training that she got there. She's very well respected in all the places that she's worked at. Because of my son being in med school, they've lived in Edmonton as well as Red Deer. She's worked at, I think, three or four different veterinary clinics within the Edmonton area and the Red Deer area and always has been very well accepted, and they're very happy with her work. She is a very good professional veterinarian, and I respect her for that.

I think that all of our veterinarians and their veterinary assistants deserve a lot more respect from us and this government than they seem to be getting at this moment, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Once again here we are in the dying days of session, and the government introduces another large overarching and possibly overreaching piece of legislation. Here we are just beginning to talk about it, trying to appropriately and intelligently consider it, consult with our constituents – that's a novel idea – all of this with just a few days left in our legislative calendar.

Madam Speaker, this bill introduces sweeping changes that will affect consumers, businesses, all without any consideration for the economic impact or cost to many struggling business owners in Alberta, and I speak to many of them. In fact, this summer I spent time with virtually all of the small businesses in my constituency, talking to them about some of the challenges that they're facing in terms of survival, in terms of sustainability, in terms of viability, in terms of retaining staff, in terms of making payroll, in terms of not dipping into their personal savings, in terms of not having to mortgage their home to save their business.

Madam Speaker, taking the time to diligently review, consult on, and study legislation like this should not be treated with hostility or derision by this government. We are, after all, here to put forward the best possible legislation to advance the best interests of Albertans and, by extension, Alberta employers and entrepreneurs, who contribute to the vibrancy, resiliency, and health of our communities and the economy.

Madam Speaker, if improving a piece of legislation means that it ends up being addressed in a more detailed manner in committee and then passed a few months hence with potential improvements and with reflection on the economic impact and cost to both consumers and business through more robust consultation, that might just make the difference between mediocre legislation, with a plethora of unintended consequences, or improved and appropriately vetted policy, regulation, and legislation.

Madam Speaker, at the end of question period today I tabled two letters from veterinarians right in my own constituency. As the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster has stated, veterinarians, from what I can tell from the correspondence I've received, are not happy with Bill 31. I would just like to read a few of the follow-up comments from one of the veterinarians in my area which were not contained in that letter. In fact, we had multiple e-mails back and forth with one particular veterinarian. The Alberta Veterinary Medical Association has as a regulated, governing and disciplinary profession, many steps in place to have [vets] obtain informed consent from their clients before [proceeding with] procedures . . . Bill 31 . . . is a road block to veterinarians who are in surgery having to make immediate life and death decisions. [Having] to wait for every single detail to be pre-approved and signed off by a client [may] put the pet [their patient] at risk [in these situations].

Madam Speaker, make no mistake: informed consent is important. Vets already have a disciplinary body within the ABVMA who have the ability to manage those who contravene this policy. I cannot see a single proposed change that would improve the client-patient experience, the outcomes, or the quality of care offered in the field of veterinary medicine.

This vet who I corresponded with is also concerned that there is an increasing trend that the profession of veterinary medicine is beginning to be viewed as a commodity, and I think that the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster would think and agree that the services he has provided are not a commodity. They are given with professionalism, with a heartfelt approach to their patients, Madam Speaker, as a professional service which requires an extremely high level of skill, investment, and training.

Madam Speaker, they would like to know why the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association was not consulted before Bill 31 was drafted – not consulted – which brings me back to why this bill should be sent to a committee of this Assembly. Strengthening legislation should be the key objective of debate in this House and in associated committees, and there is no better way to strengthen legislation, particularly of this nature and depth, than by sending it to a focused all-party committee for scrutiny, improvement, and recommendations. Sending it to a committee allows for robust discussion amongst all parties and for further consultation with key stakeholders, some of those who were not consulted prior, the people that were not consulted. We're hearing from the industry that they were not consulted before this was tabled in this House.

What we have here is a bill drafted by the government, for the government, and only for selected friends of this government, which they intend to ram through this Legislature in just a few short sitting days without consultation with those stakeholders that have been missed in the process. Sending it to a committee of this Legislature and allowing for due process allows for thorough stakeholder consultation. Thorough stakeholder consultation. That process is far superior to that which occurred prior to the introduction of this bill because it would allow all parties in the Assembly and independent Albertans and Alberta employers and employee groups to bring forward their opinions, those of themselves and the people they represent. It would allow government and this Assembly to consult thoroughly and in greater depth with stakeholders, the veterinarians.

I'm also hearing from motor dealers who say that they were not consulted. Does that not allow for us as legislators to better understand what might be the unintended consequences by talking to real people, real Albertans, about the legislation we enact? Do the members opposite really care about the impact on Albertans at large? It would seem perhaps that the answer to that may be no.

Sending a piece of legislation to committee is all about thoughtful, informed, thorough, and robust consideration of legislation before it is passed into law. Take that word seriously, "law," that all Albertans will then have to adhere to – individuals, businesses, and the list goes on – that they must adhere to. Let's take that with the importance that those words imply and that they will have the effect of having on all Albertans.

Madam Speaker, let's use the committee system and process for what it was intended: to study legislation in greater depth, to consult, to consider, and to improve. We owe that to Albertans. This would yet again, as suggested for Bill 31 ahead of this, be an excellent opportunity to demonstrate that all members of this House are willing to use the time-honoured – I think that was mentioned by one of the members here – nonpartisan committee process when it actually makes sense, not politicizing the issue or legislation at hand but fully and comprehensively addressing it for the betterment of all Albertans.

Further, the government can prove that they have no interest in politicizing this issue nor avoiding the input, feedback, and concerns of Albertans by sending it to an all-party committee. Again, as already noted, at that stage a multitude of presenters and stakeholders, both individual and organizational, can be brought into the process to discuss how this legislation will actually impact everyday Albertans and what it will cost Alberta businesses and business owners both on the employee and employer side, somewhat in lieu of the economic impact study that does not seem to form a part of the work leading up to the moving of this bill.

Further, as already noted, this government has an abysmal track record when it comes to unintended consequences with various pieces of legislation. This government needs to be more considerate and respectful in the introduction of far-reaching legislation and take the time to actually listen to all stakeholders. All stakeholders. I'll say it again: all stakeholders, Madam Speaker. Then they may have the ability to prevent the fallout that we continue to see to this day from many past bills behind us, where that process was not followed, which again brings me back to my original concerns.

This legislation has a wide-ranging and far-reaching impact on individuals and businesses, and at what cost? No economic impact study to give us that information, no consultation with the veterinarians, no consultation with the motor dealers, no consultation with other businesses that we haven't even discussed here in this House, which again brings me back to some of my original concerns. This legislation will impact people and businesses of this province, virtually every single employer in this province and virtually every single employee in this province.

Madam Speaker, committee is a perfect place to thoroughly address those concerns and to allow all impacted stakeholders the opportunity to come before that committee, a committee of this House, that nonpartisan group, where we are instructed to act in a nonpartisan way to do what's best for Albertans and to allow the stakeholders the opportunity to come before us in that committee and share their concerns. Yes, again, the radical thought of creating an opportunity for input, consultation, and engagement of those most affected: is that too much to ask? I ask the members across the House here: is that too much to ask to ensure that we enact the best possible legislation in this Legislature?

Some of the experiences I've had in committee as well: it's not always time that I think has necessarily been well spent. But, in reflection, we talked about daylight savings time in our committee, the Economic Future Committee, and we gave that private member's bill due consideration, I think, respectfully across party lines in committee, respectfully with Albertans who came forward across this province: Grande Prairie, Edmonton, Calgary, and Lethbridge. After doing online consultation, we did personal consultation, and we heard from Albertans. We heard from individuals. We heard from organizations.

We actually heard some of the economic impact and some of the strategic impact that would deeply impact opportunities for this province. We were able to balance that impact, that economic impact, with the personal desires of many, and we did come to a consensus at that committee and bring back recommendations to this House on that particular piece of legislation. Can we not bring that same process to a bill which has even more far-reaching impact on the economics, the fragile economics, of this province, Madam Speaker?

Again, I think we owe it to Albertans to be that thoughtful, to be that considerate, to be that diligent to ensure that we can bring forward the best legislation for us to vote on in this House, where we can all put on our hats, our thinking – we're not allowed to wear hats – which we bring into this House, and say that we represent all of our constituents. We think about those constituents when we come into this House. We think about the feedback we received from the veterinarians, from the motor dealers, from the individuals that come into our offices day after day, those constituency managers and staff that we had here today, who listen to them, day in and day out, who I receive letters from that are forwarded to me on a daily basis so that I can understand the concerns from my constituents, my honoured constituents, who are my bosses, to ensure that they are communicating.

Every time I send out a newsletter, every time I'm in a meeting, I ask my constituents: "Please, don't sit on issues that come up. Don't stew about them. Don't worry about them. Contact me. Let me be your voice in this Legislature. Let me talk on your behalf." I'm doing that now, Madam Speaker. I'm doing that because my constituents are saying: "I was not consulted. I want to be consulted. If this bill passes and I'm not consulted, how will you make the best decisions on behalf of Albertans?"

I'm not sure how we'll do that, Madam Speaker. How can we do that when we don't consult with people? When I'm getting, in what might be the dying days of us being able to vote on this bill, which may be passed in this Legislature irrespective of and disrespecting the voice of many of constituents telling us they have not been consulted – is that the right thing to do? I throw that question back at the members opposite as well. Is that the right thing to do? Are you hearing from veterinarians? Are you hearing from motor vehicle dealers? Are you hearing from other businesses? If you are, I'm not hearing it in this House. Are you representing them? I'm doing my best to do that.

Honestly, if somebody came to me and said, "I support this bill; it's a hundred per cent great; I've been consulted; I'm feeling great," you know what? I would tell you that, and I hope you would tell us the opposite as well. You know what? I'm an honest person. If they came to me and told me that, I would tell you that. I challenge all of you. If you're getting those e-mails, bring them to the table. Table them in the House. Bring them forward and table them in this House and show us that you're representing your constituents, all of your constituents.

An Hon. Member: They deleted them all.

Mr. Gotfried: Did that go with the 800,000 e-mails?

The Deputy Speaker: Standing Order 29(2)(a) allows five minutes for questions and comments. The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I want to thank the hon. member for his comments this afternoon about consultation and about how that brings good legislation.

You know, as a former social studies teacher I can remember talking to my kids about the fact that in a democracy the legislation that we bring into our House should have at least three components to it. It should have the input of the people. I mean, if the legislation doesn't have the input of the people, what are we doing this for? Secondly, it should reflect the majority opinion of the people. Whatever legislation that we pass through this House, we should be able to say and be able to show that it reflects the majority will of the people of this province. The third piece that I said we really ought to be able to see out of any piece of legislation that comes out of the House is that it also respects the rights of Albertans. That's why consultation – I think that's the point we're trying to make – is so really important. It helps you to figure out: what do Albertans really want? What is their input? Does it represent the majority will of this province, and does it respect the minority rights of the people of this province?

So, I guess, in light of some of the comments earlier today by the Minister of Advanced Education, the hon. Member for Edmonton-Gold Bar, about his concerns with sending something to committee for referral, I was wondering if you could explain to us again and maybe help to educate this Chamber as to why strengthening legislation is so very important, why a robust discussion about these kinds of issues is so very, very important, why stakeholder input and sending it to a committee and referring it to committee should be so very important.

You know, when I look at the track record of this government on consultation, I get worried. I get worried because we read in the news just today that consultation obviously didn't occur on Bill 32 because the Chief Electoral Officer was saying that he was never even asked.

I've seen the value of consultation when I remember Bill 203, the fair trading amendment act. That was sent to the Families and Communities Committee. We brought in a wide range of stakeholders, we had a chance to listen to the feedback of the stakeholders, and at the end of the day the committee and the hon. member that placed forward that private member's bill, Bill 203, took it off the plate because of the consultation and that it didn't meet those three standards.

Madam Speaker, I would like to hear the hon. member's comments with regard to the importance of consultation on these kinds of issues if we could, please.

The Deputy Speaker: Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you to the member for his very thoughtful comments and questions. It reminds me that the stakeholders that we're talking about – and we use that term quite loosely here – are Albertans. They're our constituents. They are the people of this province, who we are here to serve.

Your comments about the majority will: I take those to heart as well. Yes, we have to ensure that the majority will is represented in that engagement, that consultation, but as importantly you mentioned the minority voice. I think the minority voice there is something that we all – again, we represent all constituents in our constituencies, every last one of them. I'm diligent about that, and I make myself available – and I hope every member in this House does – to listen to them. You may agree or disagree with them. They may sway your view. They may actually turn your thinking around, or you may inform them about your perspective, and you may agree to disagree and still maintain the respect that you have there. Those are very important things to do.

We talked about the unintended consequences and if we don't consult. Madam Speaker, if we don't consult – I think that consulting, the most important part of that, is what? It's listening. It's hearing our constituents and listening to our constituents and embracing what they're telling us. They're not wasting their time to gratuitously spew something just because they want to talk. They actually want to be heard. They want to be heard. They want to be consulted. I don't think we've given them that opportunity with this piece of legislation, by not consulting them.

By putting it to committee – again, I encourage all members of this House to support this amendment, not because it came from this side or that side or somewhere else or another side or one of the independent members but because we owe it to our constituents individually to do so.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the proposed amendment?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment REF1 lost]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 4:02 p.m.]

[Fifteen minutes having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

[Motion on amendment REF1 lost]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drumheller-Stettler.

Mr. Strankman: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to rise and make an amendment to Bill 31 if I could. I have the requisite copies for that here. I'll await your direction for further information regarding that motion as we distribute it.

The Deputy Speaker: Reasoned amendment RA1.

Go ahead, hon. member.

4:20

Mr. Strankman: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The members should have or are going to be receiving from the pages a copy of the amendment. I hope the Clerk has the original at the desk there.

I move that the motion for second reading of Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the government did not adequately consult with the veterinary professionals across Alberta, including the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association.

With that, Madam Speaker, I think it's important – and we have been taking great pains and considerations – to try and come forward with as much democratic conversation as we can. I just would like to comment that in looking through the bill, not particularly referring to the veterinary section of the bill, I highlighted some nine different sections: the Fair Trading Act, the Consumer Protection Act, ticket sales and resales, automotive sales and repairs, the high cost of credit, court action by consumers. Part 15.1 just is entitled General. That's the number 7 point that I have. Number 8 is fees, authorization for veterinary medicine.

Part of my time in the Legislature and dealing with these things is a frustration that we keep adding all this legislation. We stack it up. In this case the legislation is, I believe, some 26 pages long, but we've had legislation – I think Bill 30 or 33, one of the two, was 150 pages long. The phone book in my district isn't that thick, Madam Speaker. It's important that this continual onslaught of legislation needs to be reviewed, I think. In some jurisdictions they call it a sunset clause. I'd like to see the addition of a review for legislation as we proceed.

Madam Speaker, I think it's important to comment that the first time I saw this bill, I had the hope that the government was seeking to regulate itself. In fact, I didn't see a section in there, though, in this whole long list, on the regulation of garage sales. You know, there may be some materials that are sold at garage sales which may not meet some regulation, and it's unfortunate that maybe the government needs to regulate that. Part of a review process would be, in the case of this government, that we would do that so that we can be more safe and secure in Alberta, particularly in the view of an NDP government.

I've lived right beside the social experiment called Saskatchewan previously, which had an NDP government, and only recently did they actually see significant growth and fervour. As I travelled to Saskatoon, the growth, Madam Speaker, in that town is marvellous. Even in the past I've used Saskatchewan for veterinarian services and had marvellous and excellent service in an open fashion.

I find it interesting that the government is wanting to elicit a vast umbrella of coverage, so it's somewhat frustrating. You know, this bill, on its face, Madam Speaker, is attempting to do some good things, and maybe the inclusion of garage sales or farm auctions or whatever they might see would be a greater inclusion if the government wants to try and regulate that. You know, they seem to have a wont to do that. I don't know. Is it going to make it absolutely safer? We've got onerous legislation: OH and S, Bill 6. The government had an interesting reaction to that, mostly negative.

It's interesting that the legislation targets some commercial areas where many Alberta consumers find themselves frustrated, areas like automotive repair. Madam Speaker, in the rural areas, where I come from, the qualities and the profusion of automotive repair is based on the number of vehicles that the operator has parked in his lot. A lot of people do it on a simple level of word of mouth, and the quality of the work travels by word of mouth. It doesn't travel by government legislation. That's the code of professional businesses. Word of mouth sometimes is far more prominent than legislation. Legislation comes after the fact, but the work is done, in many ways, based on personal contracts.

The problem that you see, Madam Speaker, is that when you look at legislation like what we have before us, many of these bills are brought forward by the government but are riddled with problems and unsound thinking, leading to unintended consequences, and we see that in many pieces of legislation. This kind of legislation, in my view, is embodied by the government that we have at hand. It rests on the assumption that businesses in A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, like veterinarians in this case, in one portion of this act, may be out to singularly attack consumers. It implies that consumers should be treated like children rather than responsible adults. Just like I was using the example of the local automotive repair people, their profession, their skills travel widely in many areas by word of mouth. Even in the area of Edmonton I found that to be the case.

Madam Speaker, at this time I'd like to take the opportunity to adjourn the debate.

[Motion to adjourn debate carried]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Feehan: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Noting the time on the clock, I would seek the unanimous consent of the House to adjourn until Monday at 1:30.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 4:28 p.m.]

Bill Status Report for the 29th Legislature - 3rd Session (2017)

Activity to Thursday, December 7, 2017

The Bill sponsor's name is in brackets following the Bill title. If it is a money Bill, ($) will appear between the title and the sponsor's name. Numbers following each Reading refer to Hansard pages where the text of debates is found; dates for each Reading are in brackets following the page numbers. Bills numbered 1 to 200 are Government Bills. Bills numbered 201 or higher are Private Members' Public Bills. Bills numbered with a "Pr" prefix are Private Bills.

* An asterisk beside a Bill number indicates an amendment was passed to that Bill; the Committee line shows the precise date of the amendment.

The date a Bill comes into force is indicated in square brackets after the date of Royal Assent. If a Bill comes into force "on proclamation," "with exceptions," or "on various dates," please contact Legislative Counsel, Alberta Justice, for details at 780.427.2217. The chapter number assigned to the Bill is entered immediately following the date the Bill comes into force. SA indicates Statutes of Alberta; this is followed by the year in which it is included in the statutes, and its chapter number. Please note, Private Bills are not assigned chapter number until the conclusion of the Fall Sitings.

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Monday, December 11, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Speaker: Good afternoon.

Let each of us reflect or pray, each in our own way. May we find strength and courage to speak thoughtfully and expressively. May we guide ourselves with patience, understanding, and respect for each other and for the people each of our members represents.

Hon. members, ladies and gentlemen, we will now be led in the singing of our national anthem by Mr. Robert Clark.

Hon. Members:

O Canada, our home and native land!
True patriot love in all thy sons command.
Car ton bras sait porter l'épée,
Il sait porter la croix!
Ton histoire est une épopée
Des plus brillants exploits.
God keep our land glorious and free!
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.
O Canada, we stand on guard for thee.

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to introduce to you and to the entire Assembly some of the smartest and hardest working students in the entire province of Alberta, from the humble constituency of Edmonton-Gold Bar the students of Forest Heights elementary school. They are joined by their teacher, Mr. Dean Jaster, along with a chaperone, Resa Chyz. If they would please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Do you have a second introduction, hon. minister?

Mr. Schmidt: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Thank you very much. It gives me great pleasure to rise and introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly the government of Alberta's hard-working Alberta Cannabis Secretariat. They are seated high in the gallery. With them are . . . [interjections] These guys are a little bit slow. It takes them a while to catch on. Seated in the gallery are Kim Capstick, the executive director of engagement and outreach; Ethan Bayne, executive director of strategy and planning. Another member of the executive team, who couldn't be here today, is Andy Ridge, who is the executive director of policy. As well, there is a whole bunch of other members of the secretariat too numerous to name. I'd ask them to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly and our thanks for making cannabis legalization so successful.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Ms McKittrick: Mr. Speaker, I have three introductions. It's a pleasure for me to rise today and introduce to you and through you Ms Nadia Houle and Tracy Bradley, who are founders of Indigenous Birth. Indigenous Birth is a not-for-profit society that advocates for the provision of high-quality maternity care options for indigenous families residing in treaties 6, 7, and 8 and Métis nations throughout Alberta. Ms Bradley and Ms Houle are passionate advocates for increasing the breadth and availability of indigenous midwifery care. I would ask both of them to rise to receive the traditional warm welcome from the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Ms McKittrick: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise today to introduce to you and to all members of the Assembly two constituents of mine from the wonderful community of Sherwood Park, Blaine and Donna Alexander. They are here to view our proceedings in the House, and I want to thank them for taking the time to attend today. I will ask Blaine and Donna to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome from the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Ms McKittrick: Finally, Mr. Speaker, it is with so much pleasure that I rise to introduce to you and through you two individuals from the Strathcona Christmas Bureau. Deborah Mahaux is a board member and liaison with the Strathcona Food Bank, and Carol Everest is a depot manager. Carol used to work for Hansard and is also a professor of medieval studies specializing in medieval medicine. The Strathcona Christmas Bureau, that I will speak to you about in my member's statement, provides food and gifts to qualifying residents in Strathcona county. Deborah and Carol can also be found in the summer at the Brooks Medieval Faire teaching people about the medieval days. I would like to ask Deborah and Carol to please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome from the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to introduce to you and through you to the members of this Assembly three members of my family. I have previously introduced my wife of 32 years to you. She's my closest companion, and I could not do this job without her support. I have yet to introduce to you and to this Assembly my parents, Wayne and Marlyn Smith. I received my love of teaching and music from my mother, who was a music teacher and has been involved either as a teacher, a choir member, or a director for most of my life. I received my passion for politics and sports from my father. My father has run many elections and has never lost a campaign. When I ran in the last election, my father agreed to be my campaign manager on two conditions, first, that I understood that he was my campaign manager and not my father and, secondly, that if I lost, it was my fault. I'm here. All three are foundation stones in my life and help to make me a better person every day. Could Lisa, Wayne, and Marlyn please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Edmonton's Food Bank has been working with Edmonton's Sikh and Punjabi community for many years. In the last 10 years over $400,000 and thousands of kilograms of food have been donated as a part of the birthday celebration for Guru Nanak Dev Ji. This ongoing support of the food bank and friends helps vulnerable members in our community. We have several of the members of the Sikh community from Gurdwara Mill Woods, Gurdwara Singh Sabha, the Punjabi Media Association, and of course, a member from Edmonton's Food Bank. I'd ask that they please stand and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Christmas Spirit

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have been influenced in how I view Christmas by the time I spent in Phnom Penh, a devastated city beginning to rebuild after the fall of the Pol Pot era. I spent Christmas Day in the province of Prêy Veng, the most heavily bombed area of Cambodia during the Vietnam War. On that day I visited a hospital struggling to provide care with limited and unreliable supplies. I met many Cambodians who had lost limbs to the millions of antipersonnel mines scattered in their rice fields and ate rice that, while it had been carefully sorted, still had weevils in it with the governor of the province. The night before I had asked the Cambodians working where I was staying what they thought about Christmas. They all commented on the extravagant parties that marked Christmas for the French and American foreigners they saw. No one understood that Christmas celebrated the birth of Christ and that it was a holiday of generosity and compassion.

1:40

I am grateful that the real spirit of Christmas is alive in communities throughout Alberta, including my own. Last week the information and volunteer centre hosted a party, with dinner and gifts for families struggling this Christmas. Trinity Baptist church hosted a Blue Christmas event for people feeling alone and challenged at Christmas. Next week the Strathcona Christmas Bureau will deliver hampers to over 500 families under the leadership of the two ladies I introduced earlier. They ensure that every child gets at least one item on their wish list and a complete dinner, ready for Christmas Day.

This is a community-wide effort of generosity and empathy. It reflects what I believe is the thankfulness that many of us feel at Christmas when we are able to have enough not only for ourselves but to give to others as well. Acts of generosity and thankfulness are happening throughout our communities, in our schools and in our businesses. Others contribute overseas, be it through the Rotary or through their favourite relief and development organization.

Having celebrated Christmas both close to family and far away, with rich food and poor-quality rice, with friends and alone, I use Isaiah 9:6-7 as a reminder of the meaning of Christmas and the call to justice and righteousness.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake. No?

Mr. W. Anderson: A changeup. Sorry.

Postsecondary Tuition

Mr. W. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This government's ideology needs a serious overhaul. This government knows that freezing tuition is unsustainable in our current economic situation. With the government's tuition review currently and continually being pushed to the back burner and increases in taxes in different forms, we have to wonder what will happen next.

Nothing is free. Everything comes at a cost. The cost has to be transferred to someone, but to who? Other countries are offering so-called free postsecondary education to domestic students. The thing is that these countries are using a variety of approaches to fund higher education, which is something this government is lacking. Some of them do not choose and they do choose to impose excessive taxes on their taxpayers, regardless of if you have a student in your home or not. Many of the countries are choosing to fund higher education by making use of their significant oil and gas resources. The problem is that this government isn't supporting our oil and gas industry, and with the economic situation the province is in, who has the money to pay for it? Well, someone is going to have to pay, and that cost will have to be off-loaded onto the taxpayer with an increase in taxes, whether this government calls it a tax or not.

The student will receive lower quality education. There are no regulations put on international students. Institutions may be forced to free up more international space, leaving less for Alberta students. Promises of tuition being lowered and off-loaded costs onto taxpayers create the impression that there is no cost. Studies have concluded that completion rates are lower when higher education is off-loaded. Persistence among students decreases. Institutions struggle to keep the best professors and resources by making necessary budgetary cuts. Mandatory fees increase, and this does not solve occupational shortages.

There are too many questions unanswered. While there may be a push to off-load tuition onto taxpayers, we need to think through all of the unintended consequences, which this government has not had a good track record of doing.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Ellerslie.

Guru Nanak Gurburab

Loyola: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Every year the Sikh community celebrates the birth of Guru Nanak at the beginning of November. The community here in Edmonton highlights this day by collecting donations for Edmonton's Food Bank. The Gurdwara Siri Guru Singh Sabha in my riding of Edmonton-Ellerslie plays a central role in organizing this important fundraising endeavour along with the Punjabi Media Association of Alberta, other gurdwaras and organizations, and the entire Sikh community.

Guru Nanak was the founder of Sikhi and the first of the 10 Sikh gurus. His birth is celebrated world-wide as Guru Nanak Gurburab. Guru Nanak has been called one of the greatest religious innovators of all time. He travelled far and wide teaching people the message of one God, who dwells in every one of His creations and constitutes the eternal truth. He set up a unique spiritual, social, and political platform based on equality, fraternal love, goodness, and virtue.

I am always encouraged when hearing about the three pillars of the Sikh faith: to constantly remember the oneness that unites us all, to work with integrity while earning an honest living, and to share that wealth with all those in the broader community.

Mr. Speaker, over the last several years I have developed a number of great friendships in the Sikh community. There are often times when I'm welcomed with wide-open arms by members of the community when I visit their events and places of worship. I feel embraced and that I am like family. I know this community very well, and I know that they are incredibly generous and dedicated to fulfilling the tenets of the Sikh faith. They are proud to call Alberta and Canada their home and often bend over backwards to help those who are in need, no matter what their background. I can attest that we all share the same values, values such as dedication to one's family, profession, and community and being compassionate to those most marginalized. Today I stand in this House along with my colleagues to say thank you to the Sikh community. Thank you for joining us today and for the valuable work that you do in helping others in our province. It is communities like yours that make Alberta a wonderful place to call home.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Cold Lake Legion Permission to Serve Moose Milk

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's always a good thing when government and opposition can work together to solve problems, and I'm happy to share such an example from my constituency of Bonnyville-Cold Lake from only a month ago. Canada's Armed Forces have played and continue to play a significant role both within and outside our national borders. It was also the valour of our troops in the First World War that helped Canada gain an international identity and procure a seat at the League of Nations. Our forces went on to secure critical victories in the Second World War and play key roles in the Korean War, peacekeeping missions, and the war on terror in Afghanistan.

At home our legions provide a place for our military veterans to gather together, educate others, and celebrate Canada's victories. One such tradition within the Royal Canadian Legion is the consumption of something called moose milk, a distinctly Canadian alcoholic drink that is served in Legion halls to celebrate military events. Shortly after Remembrance Day the AGLC shut down the Legion's ability to serve the traditional moose milk in my constituency. I should be clear, though, that the AGLC was just carrying out their job, as they should. I was able to contact the Deputy Premier and the Minister of Finance about this important problem that we had and have a conversation, and when I sat and visited with the Legion only a short time later, I was told that the issue had been resolved. Thank you.

Mr. Speaker, it's important that we honour our veterans and that we take the traditions into consideration when we make decisions. It's also important that we work together as government and opposition to find solutions. I am always proud to stand up for my constituents of Bonnyville-Cold Lake and to say thank you to our veterans, and I was happy to work with the Deputy Premier and the Minister of Finance to continue to accomplish this.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-North.

Emergency Responders

Mrs. Schreiner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As the fall session draws to a close, many of us look forward to the holiday season, when we can spend time with the people we cherish the most. As we enjoy the season, let us also think of all those individuals who sacrifice their holidays to ensure that we are kept safe. Fellow members, I am speaking about the emergency responders, who dedicate themselves to fighting for the health and lives of Albertans, the valiant individuals who brave winter weather and miss holiday dinners to ensure Albertans have access to the health care and other emergency services they need.

Let us thank the doctors, nurses, paramedics, and other health professionals who forgo their own families to help Albertans throughout the province. When we talk about Christmas gifts, there is no greater gift than to give of themselves to protect the lives of others. Let us also thank our law enforcement officers and firefighters who stick to their stations during the holidays to keep us safe. Mr. Speaker, I have witnessed not only their integrity in providing emergency service but also their awareness of the impact these situations have on helpless family members. This is my personal thank you to those who responded immediately to the health needs of my father. This is my appreciation of their thoughtful understanding and patience for my mother and how their commitment enables my family to create more memories this holiday season.

Mr. Speaker and fellow members, I am fortunate this holiday season and, more, so thankful to live in a province and country where such commitment and dedication are woven into the fabric of our shared values. On behalf of all of my colleagues I would like to wish all responders and their loved ones a very Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

Thank you.

Christmas

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, in the not-too-distant future we will be privileged to join our families and loved ones in my favourite celebration of the year, Christmas. In my humble opinion, it's truly the most wonderful time of the year. My fondest memories are centred around sleepless nights waiting in anticipation for Christmas morning and the wondrous gifts, food, and fun that awaited us as children. Now at this stage of my life I bask in the squeals of delight from my grandchildren as they, too, discover the wonders of this joyous season. Great memories are created, and strong, familiar bonds are forged. Maybe that's the secret of why it's enjoyed by so many, religious and nonreligious alike.

1:50

But for over 2 billion people around the world this time is not just a holiday season. No, Mr. Speaker, for Christians it is a most hallowed occasion. For Christians the season is marked as Christmas, emphasizing the reason for the season, the baby Jesus born in a stable. If anyone finds themselves offended by someone wishing them a Merry Christmas, I invite them to reflect upon a few words of the ever-perspicacious Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

I heard the bells on Christmas Day
Their old, familiar carols play,
And wild and sweet
The words repeat
Of peace on earth, good-will to men . . .

And in despair I bowed my head;
"There is no peace on earth," I said;
"For hate is strong,
And mocks the song
Of peace on earth, good-will to men!"

Then pealed the bells more loud and deep:
"God is not dead; nor doth he sleep!
The Wrong shall fail,
The Right prevail,
With peace on earth, good-will to men!"

May we all remember to be a little kinder to each other. May we remember that no matter which side of the Legislature we sit on, it is within each of us to spread Christmas cheer and warmth to those in need.

With that, Mr. Speaker, from the bottom of my heart and from my colleagues I would like to wish you, Albertans, and all of my colleagues here in the House a very Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

The Speaker: First of all, to the last member, on behalf of all of us thank you for your blessings and greetings to us all.

Speaker's Ruling Improper Inferences

The Speaker: Hon. Minister of Advanced Education, I sense entirely that you were making humour in your comments with respect to the intellectual capacity of the House. I understand that that was not your intention, but it has been received as an issue where, in fact, the intelligence of all of the House as well as potentially of a family member – it's very sensitive to the families. So I would ask that all of us, because the next few days that we're together are going to be extremely sensitive, be conscious of that as we move forward and continue to be conscious of each other.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition.

Federal Equalization Payment Negotiations

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, today the federal equalization program is being discussed at a meeting of federal, provincial, and territorial Finance ministers. This is an opportunity for the provincial government to fight for a fair deal for Albertans. We can all agree that Alberta should not be transferring billions of dollars to other provinces if those provinces are actively working to stop important resource projects that will help to grow Alberta's economy. To the Premier: is your government fighting for Albertans in these talks, or do you intend to just be the orange doormat for Ottawa?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In fact, as the member opposite will recall, when the federal government first rolled out their proposal for a 50-50 split on the excise tax, as chair of the Council of the Federation I was very quick to dismiss that suggestion and to say that it was not acceptable and that there was no way that the provinces would accept that. My understanding is that now a different deal has been negotiated, one that does two things. It splits it 75-25 and also puts a cap on the overall amount that the federal government is allowed to collect so that the remainder goes to the provinces. So I think we actually did a pretty good job.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I think the Premier is talking about something different. I was talking about transfer payments.

Last month this government chose to defeat common-sense motions right here that asked them to prepare for these equalization renegotiations. Equalization is what I'm talking about. We wanted them to update the Assembly on their preparations. At that time the Premier treated it as a joke. They chose to defeat this motion instead of being transparent with Albertans and helping to stand up for an issue that is very, very important to Albertans. Again, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Premier: are you doing something to stand up for Albertans in the equalization negotiations?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The matter has been discussed to some degree at the Finance ministers' meeting. I don't think it has been concluded yet. The position that Alberta has taken, of course, is that what we need to do is allow for protection of provinces like Alberta when there's a tremendous amount of volatility. That's one of the things that's not addressed properly in the formula, so that is the matter that our Finance minister is taking to Ottawa and that we are representing on behalf of all Albertans.

Mr. Nixon: It's important to Albertans that their government enter these equalization renegotiations from a position of strength. I hear about that all the time. Albertans know that they have lost $200 billion to the federal coffers through equalization programs. It's important that this government seize the opportunity to correct existing imbalances in this program. I think that is clear. Mr. Speaker, to the Premier: will your government be putting forward a concrete proposal for a new formula on these negotiations? Yes or no? If the government does not play ball, will you take constitutional action through the courts to make sure that they do?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I said, the conversations are just beginning on this matter. As the member opposite will recall, the fact of the matter is that one of the things that's actually hurt Alberta through the recent downturn was the rule that was brought into play by former Prime Minister Harper and the leader of the UCP right now, Jason Kenney. As a result of that, Alberta lost hundreds of millions of dollars from what they would have received. That being said, we're doing everything we can, as I just said, to bring about a better formula, that will allow for the volatility that we experience in Alberta, to ensure that we get the best support that we can when we need it.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, actually, the independent Parliamentary Budget Officer said that Albertans gained under those changes.

Now Albertans need a provincial government that will continue to fight for them on fairness in equalization. This is one of the number one issues that all of us hear outside this House. I know that members on all sides are hearing this issue. Albertans are not satisfied with where we are at with equalization, so will the Premier stand up and actually show a concrete plan to make sure she will force the federal government to come to the negotiation table and fix this problem once and for all?

Ms Notley: Well, again, Mr. Speaker, the last time this was negotiated, there was a Conservative government in Ottawa and a Conservative government in Alberta, and it is quite true that we did lose money as a result of the tweaks to the formula made by the Conservative government in Ottawa and the Conservative government in Alberta. So we are going to work very hard on behalf of Albertans to fix those mistakes, but it's a bit of a hill to climb thanks to the Conservative government in Ottawa and the Conservative government in Alberta.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, again, the independent Parliamentary Budget Officer said that Albertans gained under those changes. The Premier is now standing up and saying that the Parliamentary Budget Officer is wrong. Can she justify that explanation and be clear about how she thinks that that is true and why she thinks the Parliamentary Budget Officer is not telling the truth? What is her point?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It is absolutely true that the Parliamentary Budget Officer suggested that we gained if the price of oil continued to be high, but if something happened like that it went down again, which, of course, we should have all imagined might happen because that's kind of the way it's been for the last 50 years, if it went down, we'd hit a floor. We did not go below that floor, so we could not get additional support when that happened. That is why the member opposite should look at both sides of what the Parliamentary Budget Officer said, and that is why Albertans did not do as well as they could have, and that's why we're going to try to fix it.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the point, though, is still very, very clear: Albertans want a fair deal on equalization. This government continues to dodge that point. My question is: will the Premier fight, even through the courts if we need to, to make sure that resource-based revenue is removed from the equalization formula? Yes or no?

Ms Notley: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the member opposite that our government will do everything we can to advance the best case we possibly can for Albertans. I think I've said that several times now. There is no question that we will continue to do that because we know that, quite frankly, all of Canada benefits greatly from the prosperity that we have here in Alberta even now, after the recession. We need to ensure that Albertans also benefit, and we will be sure to remember that that's who we are here for.

The Speaker: Third main question.

Carbon Levy Increase

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, in three weeks' time the NDP government plans on imposing a 50 per cent hike to their job-killing carbon tax. To date the carbon tax has not moved a single voice of no to yes when it comes to much-needed pipelines. All it has done is make it more expensive to live in Alberta and to do business in Alberta. No matter how much the NDP yell about that, it is still a fact that this is costing Albertans a lot of money. Has this government done any proper analysis of the economic impact of this 50 per cent hike to the carbon tax?

2:00

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In fact, I would urge the member opposite to look at the documents that were released by the government of Alberta, first, when we introduced the climate leadership plan, and then, subsequently, when we introduced the levy last year because at that time there was an economic analysis done. The economic analysis was done for the first phase of the carbon levy, and the economic analysis was done for the second phase of the carbon levy. Interestingly, we are outperforming the projections already with respect to that economic analysis. The work was done, and we know that we're on the right path.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the NDP government did not campaign on their carbon tax. They misled Albertans on the carbon tax. It was not on any page of their platform but is now on the books as a massive tax on Albertans. When the 50 per cent carbon tax hike hits next month, transportation costs will go up for trucks and trains shipping grain, shipping livestock, and shipping crops. To the Premier: do you prefer that your hard-working producers absorb these costs or that it be passed on to Albertans in the form of their grocery bills?

Ms Notley: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, denial ain't just a river in Egypt; it is a good, solid part of the UCP caucus over there. I will tell you that it does not help this conversation here or anywhere else in Canada when significant members of the UCP front bench continue to promote climate hoax conspiracy theories, as they did over the weekend. When will the members opposite stand up and tell Canadians that they believe climate change is real and that we should actually do something to combat it?

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, it's the Premier that is in denial of what this is costing Albertans.

The carbon tax makes it more expensive to heat barns. The carbon tax makes it more expensive to heat other buildings that our farmers and ranchers use. The carbon tax makes it more expensive for our farmers and ranchers to transport their products. And now this government is intent on raising the carbon tax by 50 per cent. Mr. Speaker, not rhetoric, just clear facts. Has this government bothered to do an analysis on the impact of their latest increase to the carbon tax on farmers and ranchers, or are they too busy coming up with one-liners and talking points to try to avoid the facts that they're costing Albertans a tremendous amount of money?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I know the members opposite struggle with the facts, but I'm pretty sure I actually gave them the facts in answer to that question two questions ago.

What I will also suggest, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to facts, is that Albertans want to know whether the Finance critic for the UCP believes that climate change is a hoax or not. Will they come clean?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Ms McPherson: Thank you. I'll try to be facty.

Viscount Bennett Centre

Ms McPherson: Mr. Speaker, it was recently announced that Chinook Learning Services' operations at the Viscount Bennett Centre in Calgary will cease at the end of August 2018. CBE also announced plans to reduce its upgrading capacity by a quarter, or 500 students. Viscount Bennett has served as a hub for high school upgrading since the '50s, providing an essential service to adult learners. To the Minister of Education: how can your ministry justify closing the Viscount Bennett Centre when the school's enrolment has doubled since 2014?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to rise and answer this question on behalf of the Minister of Education. You know, our government has invested much more money in teachers, smaller class sizes, and additional learning supports for students in Calgary. Despite this, we've been concerned with reports from the Calgary board of education about budget deficits, and we've also heard from parents who are concerned about changes to various other things with the Calgary board of education. Our immediate priority remains to make life better for Calgary families, and we're looking at ways to do that. I'll commit on behalf of the Minister of Education to provide more information.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

First supplemental.

Ms McPherson: Thank you. In today's economy it's an advantage for those seeking employment to possess at a minimum a high school education. However, a traditional K to 12 environment doesn't suit everyone, and many have to upgrade high school marks in adulthood. Upgrading can change lives for people who have had challenges completing school. With a reduced upgrading capacity divided across several high schools, how will the Minister of Education ensure continuity and quality of service for all upgrading students?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, it's important to remind the member and all members of this House that since our government took office, we've increased the funding to the CBE by over $63 million – that's the operating funding – we've provided them $18 million to fully cover the cost of reducing instructional and transportation fees, we've provided them $13 million in additional funding to classrooms as part of our classroom improvement fund, and we've invested more than $100 million in capital investments for new and modernized schools this year. Nothing is more important to this government than to give every Albertan the opportunity to receive a high-class, high-quality education in this province, and we're continuing to work to do that for the students.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Ms McPherson: Mr. Speaker, the closure of Viscount Bennett means that many teachers and staff are concerned about layoffs, and reducing the number of classes will likely mean an increase in the size of classes. This is going to make it even harder for people who want to complete their diploma. When will the Minister of Education provide a plan to ensure that increased class sizes will not mean increased barriers to success for adult learners?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, again, I would refer the member to the previous question about the increased investments that we've made in the Calgary school board since we've become government. I think I would take the opportunity to remind the member and all members of the House that cutting 20 per cent out of the Education budget would not do anybody any favours in providing opportunities for students, nor would it do anything to enhance the quality of education in Calgary or anywhere else, and I think people should remember that when choosing their government.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek.

Mental Health Long-term Care

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Alberta Hospital Edmonton previously had a unit devoted to transition support and care for long-term psychiatric patients. The patients have now been moved to smaller community-based facilities. To the Associate Minister of Health: what information is available from the staff as to how this change is working?

The Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to report that this summer two homes have been renovated, in partnership with Aspire homes, and that 10 clients have been successfully housed with supports from mental health. A third home with an additional five beds will be opening in January. Eligible patients are able to rejoin the community and have support building relationships and routines, which is beneficial for their mental health. Our government supports care in the community where appropriate for patients, and we continue to support the vital work of Alberta

Hospital Edmonton as part of our mental health system. You've heard us say it before, that as long as there is an NDP government in this province, Alberta Hospital Edmonton will remain open.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the same minister: what is the government doing to ensure that the staff at these facilities are able to provide adequate and appropriate supports to permit patients to integrate effectively into their new communities?

The Speaker: The hon. associate minister.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The staff with this program provide 24/7 AHS support for patients in the community, again, helping them to build those relationships and routines and helping to keep them out of hospital. We know that connecting people to the supports that they need where they live is making their lives better. That's why we're making important investments in both the mental health system and in primary care, with over $80 million for mental health care supports this year alone. Those connections would be severed if our health care system is forced to endure the drastic billion-dollar cuts like members opposite are calling for, and people would suffer.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. People with mental health issues deserve to have support as they continue to live with their issues and move toward recovery. To the same minister: what is the government doing to support ongoing care for long-term psychiatric patients?

The Speaker: The hon. associate minister.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very proud of the community of care offered at Alberta Hospital Edmonton, where health practitioners continue to find meaningful ways to engage with their patients. Just recently I had the honour of joining the hospital staff to participate in an indigenous healing ceremony. For the patients involved, this connection to cultural practices is an important way to address trauma and support long-term recovery and mental wellness. We are committed through the work of the valuing mental health implementation team and throughout our health system to make patients' lives better through whole-person care.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

2:10 Provincial Fiscal Policies and Cash Flow

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Over the past few weeks I've heard constituents and other individuals who do business with the government say that they're getting paid slower than they used to. Others tell me that cash designated for approved projects is being pushed further into the future or being cancelled altogether. To the Finance minister or the Premier: is your government out of money, or do you have a cash-flow problem currently?

The Speaker: The Minister of Infrastructure.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member. I think the member knows full well, certainly, how things work, especially in Infrastructure. We reprofiled funds to line up with the cash flow on projects. For some of these projects it is to match federal and municipal funding and timelines. We are investing in infrastructure in this province, and our plan is working, and it is working well. One of the things I can certainly say, having been through AAMD and C and AUMA in the last number of weeks, is that we heard from so many municipalities, and they are beyond pleased with the infrastructure dollars they got for their communities, which are making a difference.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that that was a government-wide question and not an Infrastructure question, I'd still like the answer about the cash flow, and given that the NDP has been reckless with facts, telling an exaggerated version of the UCP policy on cost control, and given that the NDP promised to balance the budget by 2023 with no details attached, again to the Finance minister: with a $54.7 billion budget, a $10.3 billion deficit, which is about 20 per cent of the budget, what spending reductions are you planning to introduce so that you can actually balance the budget as you said you would?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Our government is carefully and compassionately controlling spending to balance the books by 2023. That's only one year later than Mr. Kenney, but the opposition loves to make hysterical predictions. They predicted the economy would tank. We're leading Canada in growth. They predicted jobs would vanish and never return. We're creating tens of thousands of jobs and counting. The opposition frantically tried to talk the economy down, but here are the facts: Alberta's economy is looking up.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, given that the NDP deserves no credit for the positive details that are out there and given that with Keystone XL and Trans Mountain, even if they're built, the royalties won't be near enough to cover the $10.3 billion deficit this government is running and given that the government through their carbon tax, minimum wage, corporate taxes is making it harder for businesses to create more revenue for the government and given that the minister has no plan to reduce spending, again to the minister: with no plan to reduce spending and with you making it harder for businesses to increase revenue, what is your plan to balance the budget, and will it ever happen?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Bilous: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. You know, most of what the hon. member said in there is actually quite far from the truth. As far as encouraging investment and our government's participation in it, when we were faced with the largest downturn in generations, we introduced our Alberta jobs plan, investing in infrastructure, supporting our public services, and supporting our businesses. In the last six months alone we have Amazon, RocketSpace, Swoop, Champion Petfoods, Pinnacle, Google, and Cavendish Farms all coming to Alberta.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Carbon Levy and Pipeline Approvals

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The other day the environment minister, who is the minister with the most radical policies Alberta has ever had, denigrated the Hon. Jason Kenney for daring to criticize her ministry's policies, yet it is her ministry that is costing Albertans billions of dollars and thousands of jobs. Minister, since 75 per cent of Albertans already reject your, quote, pretty darn moderate carbon tax, will you commit to scrap it?

Ms Phillips: Well, Mr. Speaker, the short answer to the question of whether this province is going to move forward with the climate leadership plan, which secured the approval of two pipelines, is a very short yes. We are moving forward with that set of policies, and here are some of the results. Drilling activity is up sharply, 64 per cent more wells drilled this year than last year. Baytex Energy just announced an 80 per cent increase in heavy oil drilling, which might interest the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster. It's in his region. Husky Energy announced this week that they will boost capital spending, ramping up Tucker thermal and Sunrise. There's more on this list, and I will be happy to share it with the House.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the minister might want to start saddling up her unicorn to ride off into the sunset in 2019 since she insists on maintaining the fantasy that Albertans won't even notice the 50 per cent hike to the carbon tax that is coming in just 20 days and given that the carbon tax fits with the NDP's Leap Manifesto, which Albertans totally reject, Minister, since not a single pipeline opponent has been moved from no to yes as a result of your carbon tax, why won't you abandon it?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, a year ago when the Prime Minister approved two new pipelines, he explicitly said that it was on the strengths of Alberta's climate leadership plan. Any claims that Alberta's economy or oil and gas industry is suffering as a result of the climate leadership plan flies in the face of the facts. Cenovus Energy has more than doubled production this year. CNRL has also increased production. Now they're considering adding a 30,000- to 40,000-barrel-a-day expansion at Horizon. Suncor reported their best quarterly results since oil was at a hundred dollars a barrel, and now they're proposing a new oil sands project.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Second supplemental.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the minister is calling our industry unethical and accuses the UCP of spreading fake news, let me share some real news here. Given that according to a Sun article on December 7, the Alberta Advantage is Dead and Buried, and that CAPP expects the CCI will put some existing facilities at competitive risk . . . [interjections] The government members think it's funny. It is not. Minister, since your job-killing carbon tax is destroying our ethical industry and it hasn't gotten Alberta any social licence, will you apologize to Albertans and cut this carbon tax?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, this fall we celebrated a $2 billion oil sands expansion project by JACOS, which means good jobs for Albertans. As we move forward through the pipeline approval process, I was very glad to learn that Trans Mountain will be proceeding in the Lower Mainland. That's a fantastic development for the tens of thousands of jobs that rely on market access, which this side of the House secured with our approval of two pipelines. Now, Mr. Kenney sat on his hands in Ottawa for a long time and did not secure pipeline approvals. Our government got the job done.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

Milk River Irrigation District Water Supply

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, certain farmers from my constituency rely on water from the Milk River to irrigate over 7,000 acres of crops. A water-sharing agreement from Montana dating back over a century ensured both sides have enough water throughout the season. In 2001 this agreement was formalized with a letter of intent between Alberta and the U.S. However, last year this government decided not to honour this agreement, leaving farmers in southern Alberta without water, jeopardizing millions of dollars of crops and farm infrastructure. To the minister: will this government honour the letter of intent between the province and Montana?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. There are a few items in that question that perhaps require a little bit of clarification from the Department of Environment and Parks, and I will be pleased to provide that information to the member so that he may appropriately communicate with his constituents, and we can clear up any misunderstandings that may arise.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, given that the letter of intent sets out an interbasin transfer of water in Montana to divert water from the same areas to the Milk River and given that Alberta already approved a separate interbasin transfer for water in St. Paul, diverting water from the North Saskatchewan to the Beaver River basin, and given that an interbasin transfer from the St. Mary River to the Milk River is the best-fit solution to this issue, to the minister: will you approve an interbasin transfer to avert the impending water crisis in the Milk River irrigation district?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm pleased to arrange a briefing for the hon. member and any of the municipal or other officials that would like to have some clarification on this matter. It is much, much different to be doing an interbasin transfer in a basin that is not closed as opposed to one that is, which is the South Saskatchewan. We have an agreement with Montana. We are moving forward with a number of improvements to that agreement and to supporting farmers and ranchers in southern Alberta as best we can to ensure that we have safe and adequate supplies of water to grow the economy in southern Alberta.

2:20

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, given that in good faith these farmers built the pivots, the irrigation system to make the desert bloom down in that area and given that this government continues to say that they're all about diversifying the economy – as you know, farming surely fits that bill – to the minister: are you willing to meet with these disenfranchised farmers to tell them to their faces whether they will have irrigation water next year or not?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did have the honour of spending some time in the hon. member's constituency this summer to discuss these matters. Of course, this province invests in irrigation infrastructure and other water management techniques. I believe it's $19 million annually in the capital plan into irrigation infrastructure, and in fact it was this province's support of farmers in southern Alberta and our support for irrigation and associated infrastructure that secured the largest private-sector investment in southern Alberta history, which is, of course, the expansion of the Cavendish Farms facility. That is going to open up new markets for potato farmers and others.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Water Act Enforcement

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. While the Minister of Environment and Parks spends her time finding new ways to make life more difficult for Albertans with the job-killing carbon tax, she is neglecting her existing ministerial responsibilities pertaining to administering and enforcing the Water Act. All too often individuals, corporations, or other government entities will conduct work in or around waterways and block the flow and natural hydrology, causing impacts like flooding a neighbour's farm upstream. Can the minister advise the House: how many Water Act enforcement actions has the department brought against individuals and corporations to date in 2017?

The Speaker: The hon. minister of parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's always refreshing to hear the Conservatives from across the way bring forward a spirited anticorporate message into this House. Be that as it may, I'm happy to follow up with the hon. member to provide him the information that he seeks. I do know that, for example, there was an audit of sand and gravel operations recently that did uncover some contraventions of the Water Act, and the department is taking all measures for redress in those areas.

Thank you.

Mr. Hanson: Mr. Speaker, it's nice to see the minister has her finger on the pulse of her own ministry.

Given, Mr. Speaker, that there have been 11 enforcement actions this year and that another situation in my constituency, if not resolved, could result in the erosion of a graveyard and overland flooding of a golf course as well as many residences, can the minister advise: once an enforcement order has been issued under the Water Act, how long does an individual or a corporation have to get back into compliance, what can be the consequences, and why aren't the laws being enforced?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, enforcement orders, inspections, all of those aspects of the Water Act, have top priority on this side of the House, and that is why we have stabilized our budgets in Environment and Parks so that our operations staff, our approval staff, our inspection, our enforcement staff have the tools they need to do the job. You know what wouldn't help? A 20 per cent across-the-board cut to Environment and Parks staff. That's exactly what folks out there on the landscape who want us to protect the air, land, and water don't need from this government, and they won't get it.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the town of St. Paul has asked numerous times over the last few years for enforcement of the Water Act on an individual in my constituency and given that Alberta Environment and Parks does not seem to follow up to ensure actions are carried out or move in a swift and timely fashion even after issuing a very strict and time-sensitive enforcement order and there appears to be no incentive for noncompliant individuals or corporations to follow the rules, will the Minister of Environment and Parks stand up for the environment and enforce the Water Act?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm very pleased to take the information that the hon. member has shared with the House and endeavour to get back to him in as timely a fashion as possible. But you know what wouldn't help? Some of the private members' bills that we've seen in this House, for example, to deregulate everything. This is exactly what members have in mind when they talk about red tape reduction. It's the type of rules that protect our air, land, and water, and on this side of the House we take them seriously. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Educational Curriculum Redesign

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This eye-rolling and name-calling government has been continually disrespectful in their language about Albertans. When the government was first elected, we heard them call the hard-working people of this province embarrassing cousins. Albertans are not falling for the hyperbolic NDP attacks. This weekend the NDP's by-election candidate accused concerned parents of being melodramatic about recent changes to the curriculum. To the Premier: does your government agree with your candidate that concerned Alberta parents are just being melodramatic? Yes or no?

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member has mischaracterized many things in that preamble, I would suggest. You know, certainly, we have the greatest respect for parents and the concerns that they have. We are not here to fight their by-election for them, and if the member wants to talk about government policy, we'd be happy to answer her questions.

Mrs. Aheer: The government may not be backing their own candidate, then, because that was a quote.

Mr. Speaker, given that parents are concerned about massive changes to the curriculum and the lack of consultation and given that parents are the primary educators of their children and bear the brunt of any changes that occur and given that as parents we care so deeply about our children and their education, why is the government so eager to dismiss our perfectly reasonable concerns about the extensive recent changes to the Alberta curriculum and name-call Alberta parents as melodramatic?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education. [interjections]
Go ahead.

Mr. Schmidt: Oh, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our current curriculum has enabled students to achieve at a world-class level, but we recognize that some of it is over 30 years old. A modern K to 12 curriculum will empower our children with the skills that they need to realize their dreams, and we believe that it's time for a common-sense curriculum update that builds on our strengths. We're not going to let Jason Kenney's conspiracy theories ruin the work of thousands of parents and teachers to modernize curriculum. We're focused on providing constructive answers for the people of Alberta.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Second supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. Evidently the parents are wrong, so let's try this one, then. Albertans are adamantly opposed to the carbon tax, and given that the government has shown a pattern of behaviour in dismissing the concerns raised by Albertans and the opposition and given that the Premier and her friends spend more time hurling character assassinations at our leader and caucus than governing, when did the government decide that it was acceptable to call Albertans extremist and melodramatic for simply asking questions about really bad policy?

Mr. Mason: Well, Mr. Speaker, when I hear the word "melodrama," I think of Snidely Whiplash, you know. I just don't understand why this hon. member ... [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. member.

Please continue.

Mr. Mason: Well, that was melodramatic, Mr. Speaker.

I just want to suggest to the hon. member that we are not here to fight a by-election. Why can't her own candidate speak for himself in this by-election without needing her to do it for him? [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members. How late do you suppose you're going to go tonight? Taking wagers?

The hon. Member for Calgary-Currie.

Calgary Cancer Centre

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Calgary cancer centre is a much-needed facility for people across the province who are struggling with the realities of battling cancer. Albertans deserve to have the best possible care when they are quite literally fighting for their lives. Given that Calgary families have waited years for a cancer centre to be constructed in our city, to the new Minister of Infrastructure: could you please provide Calgarians with an update on this important and much-needed project?

2:30

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Infrastructure.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for that excellent question. We're pretty excited about this project in Calgary. In October 2015 the Calgary cancer centre project was approved and announced, including the site selected for the facility. The contract for design/build was awarded in June 2017. On September 6, 2017, the site was partially mobilized to begin early construction. It's actually ahead of schedule, which is a wonderful thing. On October 16, 2017, full mobilization to the site occurred. I was lucky enough to attend the groundbreaking along with a number of my colleagues, which was actually fantastic.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

First supplemental.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's good to hear that the project is ahead of schedule. Members opposite would have you believe that all that Albertans are getting for their $1.4 billion is a fancy box.

An Hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Malkinson: Shame indeed.

To the same minister: how will the new cancer centre lead the way in providing important clinical services?

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is not a fancy box. This is an extremely sophisticated build that is going to provide stellar, state-of-the-art cancer care for Albertans. It has outpatient cancer clinics, more than a hundred patient rooms [interjections] – and I really would like to be able to say these words without heckling – more than a hundred chemotherapy chairs, double the space for clinical trials, research laboratories, 12 radiation vaults, double the capacity to treat patients with the best technology, a massive new underground parking structure so families can come and visit. It's really quite . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Malkinson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A billion dollars goes a long way in rebuilding our infrastructure deficit. To the same minister: how many good-paying jobs are being provided to my constituents and those around Calgary because of this project?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Jansen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, the Calgary cancer project will add about 1,500 jobs to the Calgary economy over the next six years. But here's something more important than that: the legacy of collaboration from cancer patients. A quote from Will Morlidge, a Calgary cancer centre patient and family adviser:

My wife Rebecca's legacy lives on in what she wanted the new Calgary Cancer Centre to be: a place of openness and [a place of] healing [and an] environment where patients will be given every possible chance to overcome their illness, and a place that radiates hope.

[interjections] I would have hoped to have gotten that quote out without heckling from the opposition.

Air Ambulance Service in Southern Alberta

Mr. Barnes: Albertans have become accustomed to code reds, but the problem is about to get worse for southern Alberta. Fixed-wing air ambulance service in Medicine Hat will be in jeopardy on March 31. The government has been forced to extend current provider Integra Air's service agreement once, and with the extended contract about to expire and the winner of the new contract without hangar space, despite that being a clear condition of receiving the contract, Mr. Speaker, will the government admit that their plan has always been to centralize air ambulance services at the risk of southeastern Alberta lives?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We're making life better for Albertans with an upgraded and modernized air ambulance system. This means newer, faster, safer aircrafts equipped with the latest technology. Can-West Charters began operation in eight of 10 base communities on September 1, 2017. AHS has extended the contracts of existing providers in Peace River and Medicine Hat until next spring. These are nonpolitical processes. Air ambulance service will continue unaffected come what may.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, given that AHS has confirmed that a new provider is taking over the air ambulance service in Medicine Hat beginning April 1 and that it had, quote, managed to secure necessary hangar space at the Medicine Hat regional airport – end of quote – AHS has not provided specifics on where this hangar is. All they will say is that the contractor has guaranteed that they will have a hangar and that their word is good. Is this government's due diligence good, or is the NDP playing roulette with the lives of southern Albertans based on a handshake? Yes or no?

Ms Payne: Mr. Speaker, AHS and our government are working with all of the relevant parties to ensure that air ambulance services are unaffected and will continue as Albertans expect, come what may, which is different than what the members opposite are promising, with their reckless 20 per cent cuts to everything.

Mr. Barnes: Mr. Speaker, given that transporting patients from Medicine Hat to Calgary is only half of the equation and that in cases where medical personnel are needed in southern Alberta, there is supposed to be a flight-ready airplane at the Calgary airport – however, there have been a growing number of reports that this is not always the case – and given that service is critical when the patient is too injured to make the trip to Calgary, as is often the case when it's a newborn or a small child, to the minister: in the past year how many days have there been when an airplane was not flight-ready to transport necessary medical personnel to southeastern Alberta?

Ms Payne: You know, Mr. Speaker, I think this really points to why it is so very important that our government is committed to modernizing air ambulance. The members opposite, when they were in charge, allowed the fleet to age. We are modernizing air ambulance. They threaten communities with closure and consolidation while we are working with all 10 base communities. They're trying to scare people with cheap political points, and we're ensuring that service levels remain constant.

Officers of the Legislature

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, this government has shown disdain and disrespect for Albertans by imposing a carbon tax that they didn't campaign on. Now they're showing disdain and disrespect for the independent officers of the Legislative Assembly. The Privacy Commissioner has repeatedly had her powers undermined by the government's interfering in the FOIP process, the Auditor General has been frustrated with the slow-moving process of this government, and now last week we saw the office of Elections Alberta speak out because they were not consulted on policy direction that specifically affects their office's responsibilities. The question is: is it safe to say that this government considers independent officers of the Legislature to be inconvenient figureheads?

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.
The Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Of course, Albertans deserve to have elections decided on the basis of who has the best ideas and not on access to dark money. We know that the opposition is bringing this forward because of their hiding behind what Jason Kenney is not exposing in terms of his donations. We certainly work very closely with the Chief Electoral Officer and have listened to many of his recommendations and incorporated them into the changes.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, given that the Chief Electoral Officer has said that they didn't work very closely and, in fact, in his letter from last week stated that he was not asked for policy direction or input on this very piece of legislation, can the minister of democratic renewal please explain why the Chief Electoral Officer was not consulted on policy direction on the very foundation of the election process or why he was not even asked for his input?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. While the opposition wants to be quick to mischaracterize the CEO's letter, the CEO does note that he did provide feedback on policy proposals for Bill 32. In fact, officials from Alberta Justice met with the CEO several times in the development of Bill 32 to discuss his recommendations and how they would look in practice. We're committed to making elections fair and making democracy robust in Alberta, and we're doing exactly that.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, given this government's track record on consultation or perhaps their lack of consultation and given the public discontent that we've seen from multiple independent officers of the Legislature, my question is: has it now become government policy to not consult with legislative officers, or is this just current government practice?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Once again, I just want to say that we listened very closely to what the CEO of Elections Alberta brought in, and we incorporated some of his recommendations. Others we didn't. We continue to work closely with them, but we know that, moving forward, Alberta will have a very robust democracy, making citizens have more opportunity to be involved and have easier voting. We're very proud of those changes.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

2:40 Crime in Bonnyville-Cold Lake Constituency

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Residents in rural Alberta are not only tired of being broken into; they're tired of the catch-and-release practice that is being exercised right now. At the recent crime forum in my constituency, in Bonnyville-Cold Lake, residents expressed gratitude for the work of our law enforcement but frustration that the perpetrators are back on the street as quickly as they are brought in, a revolving door if you will. To the minister. Our justice system continues to fail. When can my residents be assured that the justice system is actually acting on their behalf and taking a hard stance on criminal activity within the constituency of Bonnyville-Cold Lake?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for the question. Of course, nothing is more important to this government than making sure that every Albertan lives in a safe community. That's why we've continued to invest in police services all across the province, and we continue to invest in hiring more Crown prosecutors as well as building a courthouse in Red Deer. You know, with respect to the member's question, of course, the integrated crime reduction unit is operating in central Alberta, and we have other initiatives with the RCMP across the province to make sure that criminals are off the street.

The Speaker: The first supplemental.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that many of the initiatives that the hon. member was talking about happened in central Alberta and given that when residents were asked, "What should be done to fight crime?" the overwhelming response from my constituents was to impose tougher penalties and bail restrictions and given that I'm being asked, "Why are we letting criminals back on the street to continue committing crimes?" and given the sentiment echoed by residents in central Alberta, to the minister. Our courts are still so backed up. When are my constituents...

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The Minister of Advanced Education.

Mr. Schmidt: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, we continue to press the federal government to appoint judges to the Court of Queen's Bench so that we can deal with the very backlog that the member references. If he's worried about why we're backed up, I think he should ask his leader, Jason Kenney, why they didn't appoint additional members to the Court of Queen's Bench. He should also ask why he decided to cut funding for ALERT, which provides valuable police operations all across the province and puts the bad guys behind bars.

The Speaker: The second supplemental.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given the Cold Lake Regional Chamber of Commerce and the MD of Bonnyville each had online surveys which identified that up to 63 per cent of respondents had been victims of property crime and given the e-mail that I received shows constituents think that, quote, the NDP government is turning a blind eye on this – end quote – to the minister: when will you start engaging in meaningful discussions with my residents to hear their concerns regarding rural crime so that we can work together to solve this problem in northeastern Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Schmidt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, I met with the guests in the gallery who were here from central Alberta a week ago, and I committed to meeting with them at the earliest opportunity in the very near future. Of course, if the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake would like to organize such a meeting, I will endeavour to make that as soon as possible as well. With respect to turning our backs on communities, Jason Kenney turned his back on Albertans when he was in the federal government by cutting ALERT funding, making sure that our government had to step up and put the funding in, as well as neglecting to appoint any additional judges to the Court of Queen's Bench.

The Speaker: Hon. members, we've had a request for unanimous consent to introduce a guest.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to introduce to you and through you to the members of the Assembly Dr. Liu, professor and chair of the department of occupational therapy at the Faculty of Rehabilitation Medicine at the University of Alberta. Dr. Liu provided very helpful feedback regarding private member's Bill 210 and has worked closely with other stakeholders providing key information around seniors, dementia, and missing persons that helped to inform the silver alert bill before the House later today. Accompanying Dr. Liu is her associate, Noelannah Neubauer. Noelannah is a PhD student in rehabilitation science at the University of Alberta. She is doing her thesis on critical wandering in persons with dementia. Would Dr. Liu and Noelannah Neubauer please rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

In just 10 minutes we'll continue. [interjections] In 10 seconds. Ten minutes would be better.

An Hon. Member: Upping the bar.

The Speaker: That's right, upping the bar.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: I'll recognize the Member for Edmonton-South West.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Some days I could use a 10-minute break, too.

Today I have one tabling for you. It's an article from the Edmonton Journal entitled Proposed Law Offers Protection to Alberta Pet Owners. The article tells a story of pet owners who have been taken unawares and how the veterinary changes could avoid some of these heartbreaks. One pet owner is quoted as saying in this article, "Seniors are [particularly] vulnerable because they have these very strong ties to these animals."

The Speaker: The Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'm just going to table an enforcement order that I referenced in my question today. It was issued in August. It was totally ignored by the person in noncompliance for blocking the flow of a creek. Not only that, but the department actually waived the minimum days for him to put in an appeal. I'd just like to see it dropped.

Thanks.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have two online surveys and 17 letters that I'd like to table here. The first one is from my local chamber of commerce. A couple of key points are that 63 per cent of the respondents were the victims of property crime; 84 per cent of the respondents had some security measures in place when the crime happened; the estimated losses from the crimes vary all the way from $1 to $100,000. It's significant.

The second one is a crime survey done by the MD of Bonnyville. What's important here is that we're seeing large numbers of victims of crime within our MDs.

I'd like to point out that I have Lois, who wrote a letter saying that she's been a victim of crime twice in the past year, in 2017.

I have Lindsay: "Our home and garage were both entered by smashing windows and kicking in doors."

I have Kimberly, who is constantly living in fear.

I have Susan, who has the assailant on video stealing from them, but it appears that that's of no value.

I have Amber: "I worry throughout the day wondering if we will be next."

I have Sandra: "In September 2017 we had our one ton dualie stolen."

I have Rita: "My house was broken into resulting in over $3000.00 [worth of] damages."

I have Eleanor: "Two break ins in the last 2 weeks."

I have Corrine: "My hubby and I were victims around Easter of 2016 . . . I do not feel safe in this area."

I have Jerry: "We were broke into Sept. 3, 2016 . . . I felt totally violated."

I have Corrine, a different Corrine: "Someone's package stolen right off [our] porch . . . in broad daylight."

I have Robert: "I fear that the break ins are going to turn [into violence] soon."

I have Barrie: "On Halloween night thieves stole every blow up yard ornament." Now, that sounds humorous, but these things are actually very, very costly.

What Mark has to say: "I had a truck, trailer and quad stolen."

I have Rachel: "We estimated a total of approx. $38000.00 worth of belongings taken from our home."

I have Jess: "We have been victims twice. Twice in one year."

We have Lee, the final one: "We have been a victim several times."

This is tragic, Mr. Speaker.

Speaker's Ruling Tabling Documents

The Speaker: Hon. members, I just want to encourage that, no question, we need to be assured that all citizens of our province have the right to pass this information along. Particularly in this window, it's a balance between hearing that and the amount of time to get legislation approved. I'd urge all of you to be conscious of that when you table so many documents at one time. I'd appreciate that.

2:50

The Speaker: The Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The letters continue to roll in. I have Dolores, who suffered a home invasion at 3 o'clock in the morning, locked herself in the bathroom. It took 45 minutes for the police to arrive.

Another individual here from my riding was robbed three times. This individual's response from the RCMP on all three occasions was: "[Well, just] come to the detachment and [file] a report." There was no on-scene investigation completed.

This is a request to the minister from Karen saying that criminals were out the next day. "Now is time for [this] Minister of Justice . . . to keep these criminals off the street."

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table a letter from Kerry Tremblay, president of the Bowmont Seniors' Assistance Association, to the MLA for Calgary-Bow and the Minister of Seniors and Housing. This letter asks for two members to support Bill 210, and I will be quoting from it when we debate the bill this afternoon. I have the requisite copies.

The Speaker: The Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have the requisite number of copies of a postcard that has shown up in the mailboxes of Edmonton residents trying to instill fear in them over their water source and advocating for the sterilization of vast tracts of land in the area of the foothills known as the Bighorn from oil and gas, mining, agriculture, and forestry development, greatly damaging rural economies. This postcard was funded by the Yellowstone to Yukon Conservation Initiative, the Canadian Parks and Wilderness Society, and Love Your Headwaters, a group . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, have you got a shorter version of that?

Mr. Panda: Sure. That was funded in part by the Edmonton Community Foundation, the Calgary . . .

The Speaker: That's great. Thank you very much.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Orders of the Day

Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders Second Reading

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Bill 210

Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to move second reading of Bill 210, the Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017.

Madam Speaker, I would like to first recognize my former legislative co-ordinator, Maureen Gough, who is in the gallery this afternoon. Without Maureen this bill would not be here before us today. She was the one who brought the idea of a silver alert bill to me when she was caring for her mother, Anne McIntosh, who had advanced dementia.

This bill also would not be possible without the assistance and the input of the following individuals: Inspector Patty McCallum of the Calgary city police; Kim Savard, program manager with CARYA, formerly Calgary family services; Dr. Lili Liu, professor and chair, department of occupational therapy, Faculty of Rehabilitation Medicine at the University of Alberta; Dr. Sheree Kwong See, Alberta's Seniors Advocate; Raymond Swonek, president of the Alberta Seniors Communities and Housing Association; and Irene Martin-Lindsay, executive director of the Alberta Seniors Communities and Housing Association.

In addition, I would like to thank Kerry Tremblay, president of the Bowmont Seniors' Assistance Association, for sending a letter in support of this bill to the Member for Calgary-Bow. I tabled this just a little bit earlier and will be quoting from it as we move through this reading today.

Madam Speaker, all of these individuals added integral parts to this bill, and I would like to offer each and every one of them my most sincere thanks.

Bill 210 builds on work done by some of these individuals, who came together in Calgary and formed a steering committee to organize and host conversations with key stakeholders to gauge the interest and the capacity to develop a missing seniors response for the city of Calgary. Ultimately, this group is developing a framework for the community area's silver alert program, which brings together many organizations and falls now under the leadership of the Age-Friendly group from the city of Calgary. Expanding upon this fantastic work to allow all Albertans access to this potentially life-saving alert system is something that I believe will be extremely beneficial to Albertans. It will allow for the greater ability to protect the health and well-being of Albertans who are potentially very vulnerable.

Madam Speaker, our seniors population is rapidly expanding in Alberta. In 2016 there were roughly 500,000 Albertans aged 65 and older. By 2031, as the tail end of the baby boomers reaches 65 years of age, Alberta's seniors population is projected to reach about 1 million people. This number will continue to grow, and by 2041 it is projected that 1 in 5 Albertans will be 65 or older.

A decline in cognitive functioning is associated with aging, and the risk of dementia doubles every five years after age 65. In Calgary the Alzheimer's Society estimates that more than 13,000 Albertans are living with Alzheimer's disease or related dementia in that city alone, and for every person diagnosed with Alzheimer's or related dementia, 10 to 12 people are directly impacted. These would be family members, friends, and caregivers.

The Alzheimer's Association indicates that 6 out of 10 people with dementia will wander at some point. When individuals wander away from their homes and get lost or go missing, it can lead to increased risk of injury or death. The quicker we are able to locate these vulnerable individuals and return them home safely, the more likely we are to avoid a tragic accident.

Bill 210 seeks to address this problem by building on the Amber Alert system, which is already in place. Amber Alert is a voluntary, co-operative partnership between Alberta Justice and Solicitor General, the Alberta Emergency Management Agency, participating radio and TV stations, police services, and the public.

The reasons vulnerable adults and seniors go missing generally are different than the circumstances that lead to missing children and Amber Alerts, so the approach has to be different to be effective. This silver alert system will provide a framework to enable police to send out a notice via local media when a senior citizen or another adult with cognitive impairment, a mental disorder, or a medical condition which may result in them being vulnerable goes missing. The goal is to begin the search locally unless there is evidence that the missing person is using some sort of public or private transport, which would necessitate a broader application of the broadcasts. To quote the letter of support from the Bowmont Seniors' Assistance Association, "This Bill will ensure that the relevant authorities have additional tools to employ to help locate and return individuals to safety in as efficient and effective a manner as possible."

Passing this bill puts Alberta at the forefront in Canada in terms of tabling legislation to protect our senior and vulnerable adult population. Manitoba has previously passed a silver alert bill; however, it is yet to be proclaimed. There have been many attempts in British Columbia to bring something like this online; however, all of the attempts to launch the systems have proven unsuccessful.

Several provinces, including B.C., have partnerships with an American program called project lifesaver. With this program citizens who are enrolled wear a small transmitter on their wrist or ankle that emits an individualized frequency signal. If an enrolled client goes missing, first responders will use this frequency to locate that individual. However, the downside to this program is that the cost of the program, which includes an initial fee and a recurring monthly fee, is borne by the individual, which is why I think the silver alert program is a more sound option for providing safety to vulnerable adults. This bill makes safety procedures available to all Albertans using resources that are already in place. As Bowmont Seniors' Assistance Association noted in their letter of support, this “is a critical issue that affects almost all agencies providing social services.”

In closing, passing this bill will allow for a province-wide system to be brought online, which will allow vulnerable Albertans a far greater likelihood of being returned home safely. I believe that this is an issue that crosses political boundaries, and I encourage all members of this Assembly to support this bill.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to offer wholehearted support for Bill 210, the Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017. As the UCP critic for seniors it is important for me to speak on this important act and applaud the work of my colleague the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon for bringing this piece of proposed legislation before this House. Thank you very much, sir, for doing this work.

The heart of every Albertan clenches, as we know, Madam Speaker, when we hear an Amber Alert, but we also know how effective they are because as a community we also celebrate when the missing child is found using the collective eyes of our community and using this Amber Alert tool. We feel that all sides of this Chamber should support my colleague's bill to use the same system for seniors who have gone missing.

How many times do we hear on TV, radio, and media reports that a senior, often one prone to wandering due to dementia, particularly Alzheimer's, has disappeared? I mean, it's very common these days. It is easy to envision them alone, walking in surroundings that at one time might have been familiar but now, because of those medical conditions, are confusing. They can travel a long way, especially because many Alzheimer's patients can retain their health, Madam Speaker, into much later years, because their disease often does prompt wandering. Just as we are crushed with worry when a child goes missing, we face a similar worry when an elderly person is missing on the streets and wandering on the streets, often in the dark, in the cold, or even driving until they run out of gas in their vehicles. These are the common stories we have all come across in this part of the province and also in other parts of this country.

The simplicity of Bill 210, in my opinion, is brilliant. The Amber Alert process is already in place. It is bolstered by social media to make it even more effective. We all know that it has saved lives. We know that; we experience that whenever the Amber Alert is used and the child is found safe. Children are vulnerable, and society bonds together to take care of them when we have an Amber Alert. I think it's no different for elderly Albertans or for Albertans with special challenges. I think Albertans want to help and that amber and silver alerts empower all of us immediately.

With so many initiatives that rise to the provincial level, local communities led the way in creating these kinds of alerts. The concept has been tested at a community level out of necessity, and we know it works, Madam Speaker. With the Amber Alert program so effective provincially, all of the safeguards are already in place to ensure processes will also translate to elderly and other vulnerable Albertans. This is a common-sense bill that builds on an existing framework and expands on it. I mean, we already have the framework, and we can just expand it to benefit the people of Alberta. The sooner we approve this bill, Madam Speaker, and allow it to get off the ground, the sooner we can start saving lives in our communities and start saving the lives of our seniors.

In closing, from the bottom of my heart I want to first thank the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon for his hard work and congratulate your vision in bringing this important piece of legislation into this House. For your commitment towards this House and towards this province I thank you. You have displayed your diligence as a legislator. As we all know, Madam Speaker, this hard-working Member for Drayton Valley-Devon consulted many, many stakeholders, looked at the different initiatives in other provinces, and came up with a wonderful solution to a heartbreaking problem.

In closing, I urge all members of this House that we all support this very important bill so we can all start saving lives. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek.

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Seniors built this province, and we do want to and need to support them in their retirement and every stage as they age. We know that seniors are a critical part of our communities. In fact, I found this fact interesting, Alberta seniors volunteer more than any other province across Canada. Now, while many seniors live healthy lives, some, as they age, will experience natural declines in cognitive functioning. It's for these individuals that silver alerts will help.

I am very pleased right now to be able to speak in support of this bill because I know how important it is. My father had Alzheimer's, and of course you experience some changes in behaviour. People go from being very alert and aware and having good cognitive functioning to people that need some supports. To provide a way to be able to save them from being in dire straits if need be is a good move.

Now, the Alzheimer's Society, Calgary, notes that more than 13,000 individuals are living with Alzheimer's disease or related dementias and that for every person diagnosed, 10 to 12 people are directly impacted. I thought that that was a very interesting number because in my experience, again, it is true, if not more people.

Researchers, of course, have identified a number of situations where a senior may wander away and go missing – I found that an interesting list – on a normal activity, but not returning. My father loved to drive and was so independent that you never, ever told him how to get anywhere, and he never used a map. He would visit regularly from central B.C. Then one day he was hours and hours late on arriving, and here he'd gotten lost. Right then the bell went off. He didn't get lost. He was a person who couldn't, but he did. That's one when the confusion hits or starts to hit.

Exiting the home setting when the caregiver is distracted by other tasks. That is a real occasion that happens. Somebody turns their back for a few minutes, and the other person will wander away, the person with dementia. Leaving the home-care setting when upset: that can happen. People don't always agree with everything that's being done for them, to them, with them. Becoming separated from the caregiver while out in community and just exploring the exercise of autonomy, just going for a walk. You've had a full adult life. You've done what you thought was necessary and wanted to do. You have seen no reason for stopping to do that. That can be a problem at this stage in a person's life. And so on.

Most research indicates that missing-senior incidents occur as a result of an independent trip to a usual activity which goes awry somehow. It's very critical in these instances that our communities and law enforcement have the tools that they need to ensure that a missing senior is brought home safely. There are many things to consider when issuing an alert. Of particular concern is that we protect an individual's autonomy, self-determination, and privacy, but first and foremost we need to try to protect their safety.

I support this bill, and I'd urge my colleagues in the House to do the same. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak in support of Bill 210, the silver alert act. I think it's an important piece of legislation. I will take my brief time here speaking to this bill to just speak broadly about the challenges that dementia and dementia care present for our province and, of course, most especially for the people who face dementia and their family, loved ones, and caregivers.

You know, as I talk to my constituents and Albertans around the province, I hear repeatedly about the magnitude of the gaps in dementia care in this province and the lack of knowledge and understanding about dementia and what it actually means. The hon. member speaking immediately before me talked about some of the impacts. For every 1 person who is diagnosed with dementia, it has an impact on 10 to 12 people on average, and in many cases that's even more than that.

I find it curious that this province does not have a provincial dementia strategy, something I've been pushing for for some time now, dating back to the spring, when I asked the Minister of Health about that. At that time she indicated that we would see a provincial dementia strategy coming, quote, unquote, within a couple of weeks. That was back in the spring. We saw no action on that. Again in the fall I was told that we would see a provincial dementia strategy with the funding associated with that sometime this fall. Well, we're still waiting, Madam Speaker.

A provincial dementia strategy is something that other provinces have taken on. Ontario has committed $100 million over three years to a provincial dementia strategy, and that is in addition to $20 million that they have allocated to respite care. Those sorts of funding commitments and an overall strategic framework are entirely missing from this province, so while we talk about Bill 210 and the importance of that, it is important that we understand the context in which we're debating this, and that is that there is no provincial dementia strategy.

The government has said in the past that more long-term care beds are coming. That's good. That is one important piece of dementia care, but it is by no means the sum total of what the provincial government ought to be doing. Yes, it's an important piece, but not every person in a long-term bed has dementia, and certainly long-term care would not be an appropriate setting for every single person with dementia, particularly true of those with early onset dementia who are in the early stages of this progressive illness. It's certainly not something that should be considered a replacement for a provincial dementia strategy.

As I think of the silver alert legislation, one of the reasons I'm so strongly in favour of it is the story of our neighbour Ken. Ken was in his early 80s and, unfortunately, had progressively worse Alzheimer's and would wander. He was still able to live at home. He's lived in the neighbourhood for almost all of his life and was born and lived in Calgary and moved to that neighbourhood when he was a small boy. Our house was his friend Graham's house, and he would come and knock on our door on a regular basis. He would wander through the neighbourhood, but those of us in the neighbourhood were able to look out for Ken and make sure that he was able to always find his way home. When I think of the importance of legislation like this, I think of Ken, and I would say: may Ken rest in peace. I had a nice opportunity to speak with Ken's wife last night at a community holiday event.

Dementia does touch all of us in this province, Madam Speaker. It's incredibly important that we support this legislation, and I do urge all of my hon. colleagues to do so.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's a pleasure to rise today to speak to Bill 210, Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017, put forward by my hon. colleague from Drayton Valley-Devon. I'd like to commend my colleague for putting his time and his efforts and a lot of research into this piece of legislation that we see here before us today.

I think that many Albertans, in fact I might even be so bold as to say that most Albertans would certainly agree that having the ability to issue a silver alert is an important signal in our society. Anything that we can do in this Legislature that protects vulnerable persons and aids in finding missing persons is certainly a good step forward that we can all take here together today, Madam Speaker, in second reading.

I won't say much. I won't take up much time. I do support this piece of legislation. I think it is an excellent step forward in assisting in protecting and having the backs of our vulnerable seniors in this province, where dementia and other deteriorating diseases like that are a reality and where wandering off happens. It's no one's fault, and it is what it is, but having the systems in place that can help these people find a safe way home is a good step forward.

I will certainly be voting for this piece of legislation, and I urge all members in this House to do the same. Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon to close debate.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just want to have a couple of comments here. Again, thank you to all of the people that helped put this bill together. I think we all have been touched by people that we love who have wandered off and who need assistance, and if this bill can move us forward in that direction and towards safeguarding the lives of some of our Albertan citizens, then I think it's an important bill that we should all support.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 210 read a second time]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm rising to seek unanimous consent that notwithstanding Standing Order 8 the Assembly will move into immediate consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill 209, the Radon Awareness and Testing Act.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to request the unanimous consent of this Assembly to waive Standing Order 8(7) to allow the Assembly to proceed to Committee of the Whole on Bill 210, Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017.

[Unanimous consent granted]

3:20 Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders
Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: Hon. members, I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 209
Radon Awareness and Testing Act

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Chair. I just want to say again to the member: thank you so much for bringing this bill forward. The best part of the bill coming forward has been the education that we've all gotten in this House about radon. I'm very, very grateful that you've brought this to all of our attention. Thank you so much for that.

One of the things, going through just a little bit of consultation over the last week, since the bill was presented, was that we're not sure about the testing piece of it. The reason I'm bringing this up is because, as you know, there are a lot of little, tiny businesses all over Alberta that run day homes. With the legislation presently, as we know, if you have fewer than eight children in your home, there is no need to get any sort of certification to have a day home, but for any more than eight children it becomes a process of certification. This is just the legislation that presently is, how it works right now in terms of a day home.

The reason I bring this up, Madam Chair, is that one of the things that's so important to our small communities and, actually, even to the larger urban centres is the ability for people who would like to stay home and take care of children to actually be able to do that. It's a beautiful way that communities come together. They take care of each other's children. It's a wonderful way for a single person at home to be able to stay home even with their own child while taking care of other people's children. It's a wonderful homegrown business. Of course, sometimes it starts off pretty small and grows into a larger number of kids.

With respect to the larger facilities, I think one of the best things that will come out of this is that a larger facility that is going to be housing a daycare can be required – any person who's going to start a business there, within a larger facility, can request that this testing be done before they move into that facility. That can be part of their lease agreement or whatever that is going into that facility, especially, again, if there are over eight children. I think that's fantastic, not only for the daycare, but the facility will benefit from having that testing done. Obviously, if there are any concerns with radon, if they're finding any of this radioactive material, they're going to want to make sure and eradicate that as soon as possible.

We have a lot of families that live in the same dwelling. They've lived there for many years. Like I said to the member last time, you don't go to your home, your safe place, assuming that you've been breathing in anything poisonous. Again, it just was such a mind opener. I really, really, really appreciate the thoughtfulness behind this legislation.

With that, on the flip side we also want to make sure that people who are trying to start up these small businesses are not caught within a ton of regulation and red tape in order to do that. So I just wanted to bring forward an amendment if I may. I'd like to thank the member very much for helping me with this amendment. I appreciate it very much.

Are we all good?

The Chair: This will be known as amendment A1.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you. I was having a little panic moment there.

I would like to move that Bill 209, the Radon Awareness and Testing Act, be amended (a) in section 2(1) by striking out "coming into force of this Act" and substituting "coming into force of this section" and (b) by striking out section 6 and substituting the following:

Coming into force

6(1) This Act, except sections 3, 4(c) and 5, comes into force on Proclamation.

(2) Sections 3, 4(c) and 5 come into force 18 months after the date on which all remaining sections of this Act have been proclaimed in force.

Basically, what we're asking for is that there is a small exemption time for folks who have already got these spaces set up, especially small businesses. So if they're having difficulty finding the ability to be able to do this testing, the member will allow, hopefully, by accepting this amendment, small businesses the ability to have a small exemption, going forward, upon proclamation. That just gives a little bit of time for people to understand what the legislation is about, what the go-forward is with that. Like I said, we want to make sure with these small businesses that we're not putting in more red tape. Also, there are many different places within Alberta, some that have issues with radon and some that don't, depending on where these day homes and houses are built.

Also, one of the things that the member had expressed – and I agree with her completely – is the fact that we are looking at lung cancer. I mean, we can't take this lightly. It's not about putting off a decision. It's just about being thoughtful in how to process the decision and making sure that people have time to be able to absorb this legislation and be able to move forward.

I hope that everyone will be able to support this amendment. I thank the member again for this legislation and for taking a look at this amendment.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Yeah. I just wanted to thank the member for bringing forward this amendment and for working with me around her concerns, particularly around smaller day homes. I know I have a number of day homes that operate in my riding. My neighbour operates one.

One of the things that we sort of discussed in this is, really, the randomness of where radon occurs, whether it's a small day home that has, you know, eight kids in it or whether it's a larger facility, if you're inside. Radon can really accumulate anywhere inside a building, so I think it is really vital – and it's a vital piece of this legislation – to require child care facilities to test.

I absolutely agree with the member. Giving them some time to adjust, to make sure that they're aware of what the new regulations are and to educate themselves on the best ways to test and to maybe, if they need to, save up a little money, even though tests generally are very inexpensive, is all right with me.

I would hope that everyone supports this amendment.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to this amendment? Seeing none, I'll call the question.

[Motion on amendment A1 carried]

The Chair: Any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to Bill 209? The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Madam Chair. I just want to bring forward an amendment quickly as well. Here are the required copies of that amendment, and I'll wait till it gets passed out to speak about it.

The Chair: This will be known as amendment A2.

Go ahead, hon. member.

Ms Luff: Okay. I did a fair amount of consultation when I was working on this piece of legislation, particularly with real estate brokers and realtors in the province. I spoke with RECA and AREA and several folks on their own, and they are absolutely aware of this issue. I've been really impressed with their willingness to work with me to make sure that we have awareness of this issue here in the province. It's something that they've really taken up thoroughly recently, but there were some concerns around sort of being overly prescriptive in some of the spots in this bill.

3:30

What this amendment does is that it strikes out clause (g), which just removes the definition of what a real estate broker is. Then section 2 is amended by striking out subsection (4), and instead of requiring the minister to provide materials directly to real estate brokers, it just allows the minister to make the materials available in a manner the minister considers appropriate. What this is is that it's just making it slightly less prescriptive.

I want to make sure that we're working with our real estate brokers, and I want to make sure that they're happy with this piece of legislation. That is what this amendment is for, and I would hope that everybody supports it.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A2? The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Madam Chair. Thank you to the hon. member for doing the legwork, the groundwork in the creation of this bill and being willing to work with industry in amending areas of concern. Really grateful for this.

I don't see any issues with this amendment. I think it's probably helpful given the consultation that the member had with industry stakeholders, and I think it's something that I can certainly support.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment?

Seeing none, I'll call the question.

[Motion on amendment A2 carried]

The Chair: Are there any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to Bill 209? The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm really happy to rise today in support of Bill 209, the Radon Awareness and Testing Act. Like most members of the House, I admit that I had very little idea about radon until I attended a Breathe Alberta event in the Legislative Assembly, I think, about a month ago, where this organization helped us to understand the impact of radon on health and had free kits available to all members who did show up. I'm really glad that I did show up to this event, that was held down on the first floor of this building. I did take a radon kit home with me, and I'm in the process of discovering if my house is affected by radon gas and the potential health hazard to myself.

It really has taught me a really good lesson. It has taught me that it's really important for me as an MLA to take all opportunities around free education that are available to me when organizations do come to the Leg. and want to inform MLAs, because if I hadn't gone to that event, I wouldn't have understood the importance of the bill that my colleague has just put forth in this House. I will make sure now that I always attend those kinds of events, and I'm hoping that everyone in this Assembly does so, too.

The reason I really like this bill is that very often as private members we can put forth bills that change things a little but really make it better for all Albertans and safer. In this Assembly over the last month or so we've done a number of things to make things safer for Albertans. We introduced Bill 19, that made life safer for gas and convenience store workers, and we passed Bill 26 around the control and regulation of cannabis, which is going to ensure that when cannabis is sold, it's out of the hands of children. It's going to protect public health by limiting where it can be smoked, and it also ensures safety on our roads.

This bill from my colleague from Calgary-East is another aspect of the commitment of government and private members on this side of the House to make life safer for all Albertans. I was particularly interested in the part of the focus of this bill that was around child care. I no longer have children in child care, but our kids spend a lot of time in child care facilities. The fact that this bill does deal with providing radon testing for all child care facilities I think is another good move on the part of members of this government to make life safer for all Albertans.

I'm happy to support this bill. I'm really hoping that after this bill is passed, every single MLA in this Legislative Assembly will bother to go to the Breathe Alberta site and get a free radon kit so that we can all have our houses tested and that we will encourage places where our kids go, such as child care facilities or other facilities, to also go and get a free radon kit so that they can be tested. By the passing of this simple private member's bill, we're going to all work collectively to make life safer for not only our families but for Albertans throughout the province.

Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm delighted to be able to support this bill.

The Chair: Any other questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to stand and talk in favour of Bill 209. You know, I think it's important to realize, of course, that Health Canada has deemed radon a serious health risk, so obviously we're dealing with something that can affect each of us as Canadians, as Albertans in our homes or in our businesses or wherever we are.

Since we know that radon is cancer causing, then I think it's prudent that we have the proper educational materials for it. I know that education is so important in the health and safety of the people in Alberta, and that's why I did appreciate the amendment that was made to make the educational materials available to the public. I think that's really important. This is something that I've learned more about just because of this bill being brought forward.

It's similar to, of course, public safety with asbestos that we've learned about over the years and carbon monoxide poisoning. I do have a little bit of personal experience with carbon monoxide poisoning. It must have been about 25 years ago. This was in 1993. I went to a home to find out why some people hadn't shown up to work, and I found, actually, that three people had succumbed to carbon monoxide poisoning. Also, there was one person that was able to get out of there that survived. Of course, having that kind of experience with a situation like that makes a person a little bit more aware of situations like this.

Again, this is something that's maybe not quite as – the results aren't as fast as, you know, the situation with carbon monoxide, but these effects can affect people's lives down the road. I think that it's great that we can get the public aware of the concerns with radon poisoning so that we can work on this and make sure that we, you know, reduce the risk to Albertans.

I guess there's a 1 in 20 chance of developing lung cancer if exposed to high levels of radon over a lifetime. Of course, smoking can increase that rate, but that's a pretty horrific statistic in itself. Now, it says that in Canada 16 per cent of lung cancer deaths are attributed to radon exposure, so that's obviously very, very significant, too.

Now, of course, radon can't be seen, it can't be smelled, and it can't be tasted. It can be in your home, and you'd be completely unaware, which is very similar to carbon monoxide. Of course, the reports also say that children are at a greater risk than adults for certain types of this kind of exposure, so that's important to realize, too, how we need to protect our children. As adults we've already been exposed to this for years, but for our children, if we can reduce their exposure to it now, throughout their lifetime that prevents a lot of potential risks to health.

Of course, once the public is more educated about this, it will save lives. It will save health care costs and different things like that. But it's just so important to have this awareness, to know the risk of this. Now that the act will require radon testing to be done in child care facilities, they can have radon detector tests done, and that'll help children that are in daycares or child care facilities.

You know, Health Canada has already suggested that homeowners check to make sure that the service provider they choose to perform radon measurement services can be certified under the Canadian national radon proficiency program. It's our hope that the definition of radon measurement specialist in regulations can be held to those standards.

I think this is a good bill. We have to be always conscious of the different health concerns that Albertans can be exposed to without knowing it. Again, awareness is so important. Myself, I just had never thought of radon and had never thought of these health concerns, but now having had an opportunity to hear the discussion on this and hear the debate, I think it's a great opportunity for us to become aware and help our children, help all of us as Albertans to be aware and be able to help prevent serious health concerns that can result from radon.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to this bill?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[The remaining clauses of Bill 209 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Opposed? That's carried.

Bill 210

Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017

The Chair: Any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise today to move an amendment to Bill 210, the Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017. I will wait for the amendment to be distributed before I continue.

The Chair: This will be known as amendment A1.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 210, the Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017, be amended in section 3 by striking out "July 1, 2018" and substituting the word "Proclamation."

Madam Chair, this amendment was brought to us by the government and proposed to us by them. They have requested that the act come into force on proclamation instead of the originally intended date of July 1, 2018. This is a change that I believe everyone in this House can support, including the opposition.

We understand that the date of July 1, 2018, was chosen originally because we thought that it would provide enough time for the government to be able to determine how to implement the bill and any of the associated costs that would come with it. From conversations we understand that – because the system is going to be piggybacking on the original Amber Alert system, we believed and we still believe that the cost of this should be relatively minor, but we understand the government's rationale for wanting this relatively minor change of changing this to proclamation.

We know that there are a number of steps and processes that are going to need to be followed as we bring forward this piece of legislation should it be approved by the House. Whenever the government introduces a new program or plan or policy, these steps need to be followed. So if it helps the government to move this to proclamation, then we can support that without any difficulty.

Madam Chair, I'd like to thank the minister of seniors for suggesting this change. We agree that it will make the legislation easier to implement. I'd like to thank her as well as her staff for taking the time to review this bill. We very much appreciated the chance to meet with the minister's staff to discuss this bill and to put forward our idea to the minister, and we very much appreciate the respectful and collaborative manner in which this piece of legislation was approached.

At the same time, we would like to thank the Minister of Justice. We hope that she is getting some well-deserved rest, that she's enjoying this new little one that she has, and we look forward to her coming back into this Legislature and maybe giving us the chance to see this little one for the first time. We believe and we understand that this bill actually falls under her purview, so we just want to say thank you, again, to her department. We have confidence that she and her department will be able to implement this bill in the most effective and efficient way possible.

Madam Chair, this bill is one of those times, I think, when all of the members of this Assembly can come together in a collaborative way, that we can support this amendment. In order to allow the government greater ease in implementing a silver alert system in this province of Alberta if indeed this bill passes third reading, we would recommend support of this amendment.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A1?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[Motion on amendment A1 carried]

The Chair: Are there any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to Bill 210? The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gottfried: Thank you, Madam Chair. I just wanted to take this opportunity to rise and speak in support of Bill 210, which I believe is a great initiative on behalf of the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon. It looks like, thankfully, we have unanimous support thus far in the House, and I hope that everyone will take the opportunity to support this bill. When I look at the opportunity for us to do something very positive in the community in terms of protecting vulnerable individuals, I'm always very heartened by that approach and that thought.

Again, I thank the member for his initiative in moving forward in his consultation and conversations with some of the people in the continuing care communities who deal with this day in and day out where they're having to monitor individuals who are prone to wandering the community. They do their best to ensure that that does not occur, but it does occur, and when it does occur, we also have to face the fact that we live in a harsh climate. That harsh climate is not forgiving, and sometimes a matter of hours can be the difference between life and death of an individual through no fault of their own, through a disability or through dementia or other mental health issues that may cause them to wander into danger.

That could be just in an urban environment, but it could be, we often hear, in close proximity to more natural areas. I say that as the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek. We have had a number of occasions in the past. I was looking up some of the news, and we have had seniors wander off into Fish Creek park. Although it's a wonderful urban environment, a natural environment in an urban setting, there are residents down there that are somewhat known to the wild, cougars and lynx and bobcats and other types of predators that could also affect these individuals, coyotes as well. In fact, my son, when he was about 13 years old, was stalked by a pack of coyotes just along the edge of Fish Creek park, and some watchful neighbours actually somewhat rescued him at the time. So vulnerable individuals can be taken advantage of on those occasions.

I was also looking up a very sad story just this past summer in Calgary, which involved not Fish Creek park specifically but a natural area around Calgary. It was the elder brother of a high school friend of mine. He was missing for three weeks before they found him in a natural area. His family was extremely diligent. They did fan out through the community. They engaged friends and local volunteers to do so. Unfortunately, he was found deceased in a wooded area not far from where houses were. I think, again: if we'd had that silver alert in place at that time, would we have been able to save that individual before his cellphone died? I was just reading that he actually had made a call or had sent a text at some point during the early part of his disappearance. Had it been taken to the authorities who had the technology to find that individual at an earlier stage, perhaps he would still be with us today.

That individual had had a brain injury a number of years prior and lacked short-term memory and had some other issues that he was addressing as well. Some of the things that go along sometimes with dementia or brain injuries can be things like depression and other issues which can cause people to also be more vulnerable when they wander off.

I'm very, very supportive of this bill. Again, I thank all members of this House for their thoughtful amendments to improve it. I think that's a positive move in this House. I think maybe we could be doing a bit more of that as time goes forward on all types of bills, where we bring all the best thoughts and research and scrutiny to legislation, that allows us to have the best legislation that we can bring out of this House, Madam Chair.

You know, when I look at some of the opportunities here for us to collaborate with the authorities but also with the media and the broadcast community, it takes me back to a situation that I found myself in back on Boxing Day 2004. I happened to be on a small island on the coast of Thailand. Of course, we experienced something that nobody ever wants to experience, which was the Indian Ocean tsunami. On that occasion many of the authorities around the world said: "Well, we knew it had happened. We knew that there was an earthquake, and we knew that it was likely to cause a tsunami. But we didn't have a system in place."

Madam Chair, there is a system in place. It's called CNN and BBC and all the media networks that we have here. There's always somebody watching that at any hour of the day, almost anywhere in the world. In fact, all they needed to do was to reach out to the traditional media. We didn't need some fancy alert system. We didn't need to spend millions of dollars on some new system, although that would have helped. In fact, somebody sitting in their hotel room who had jet lag at 2 o'clock in the morning and saw that on BBC probably would have gone down to the front desk at their hotel and told everybody to get off the beach. That did not happen – it was actually 9 in the morning – but that would have saved people. People were on the beach. People could have been warned, and people were not warned because they didn't use the systems and media that were in our hands, that were there for us.

I think that this bill says: let's use the media; let's use the traditional media who reach out with us. That silver alert allows us to work with the community. It allows us to work through social media. We have so many tools at our disposal now. We have those alert systems that we can put on Twitter. We can put it on Facebook. We can put it out through the traditional media. We can broadcast it onto radio and television and other things. We might save that one life or those numbers of lives per year. I would suggest that we will. I think that that's the positive thing that we can do with a bill like this. This is not about paper. This is not just about words. This is about what we can achieve through taking this legislation and enacting it in our communities across this province with the support of all of us in this House.

I'm very, very heartened to see this. I think that this is a very practical approach to a problem that, unfortunately, we are seeing more of. We're seeing more early onset dementia with many individuals. We also have an aging population. We will have close to 25 per cent of the population in this province that will be senior citizens within the next 14 years. Over 900,000 individuals will be seniors. Some of us in this House will be in that.

I think that this will be an opportunity for vulnerable people. It's not everybody who is going to have it, but there are going to be vulnerable people. Vulnerable people of all ages will benefit from this bill, and the opportunity for us in this House is to do the right thing through the enacting of this legislation, through empowering the authorities, empowering families to protect the members of their household, the aging members of their household or those that are specified in this bill as being more vulnerable, and engaging the broader community and our broadcast industry and those that are already doing it, as we've noted with the Amber Alert. Again, I think that if we look back on the statistics, we have saved lives with that program, and I think that there's an opportunity to do that again.

I would encourage everybody in this House to support this private member's bill. I thank those that have proposed and passed amendments thus far and thank the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon for his initiative in taking his very valuable private member's bill to do this in consultation with all members of this House and members of the community and the broader community, the seniors community, and the vulnerable communities that we're addressing. I encourage everybody to support this.

Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[The remaining clauses of Bill 210 agreed to]

[Title and preamble agreed to]

The Chair: Shall the bill be reported? Are you agreed?

Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chair: Opposed? That's carried.

Mr. Westhead: Madam Chair, I move that the committee rise and report.

[Motion carried]

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Mill Creek.

Ms Woollard: Thank you, Madam Speaker. The Committee of the Whole has had under consideration certain bills. The committee reports the following bills with some amendments: Bill 209 and Bill 210. I wish to table copies of all amendments considered by the Committee of the Whole on this date for the official records of the Assembly.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the Assembly concur in the report? Say aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

The Deputy Speaker: Any opposed? So ordered.

The hon. Member for Calgary-East.

Ms Luff: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm rising to seek unanimous consent that notwithstanding Standing Order 8 the Assembly move into immediate third reading consideration of Bill 209, the Radon Awareness and Testing Act.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise to request the unanimous consent of this Assembly to waive Standing Order 8(7) to allow the Assembly to proceed immediately to third reading on Bill 210, the Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I rise to request the unanimous consent of this Assembly to waive Standing Order 77(1) to allow the Assembly to debate third reading on Bill 210, the Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Public Bills and Orders Other than Government Bills and Orders Third Reading

Bill 209

Radon Awareness and Testing Act

Ms Luff: I'd like to move third reading of Bill 209, Radon Awareness and Testing Act.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to this bill?

Seeing none, the hon. Member for Calgary-East to close debate.

Ms Luff: If no one else is going to say anything, I just want to take a minute here to thank everyone for their support for this piece of legislation. I really appreciate it. I would particularly like to thank the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud, who has been very enthusiastic about this particular bill. I would like to thank all of the people who I consulted with and who support this piece of legislation: AREA, the Alberta Real Estate Association; RECA; Dr. Aaron Goodarzi, without whose research I would never have, you know, found out about this whole thing; Erin Dowell, a woman in Calgary who was very concerned about this issue and with whom I had long chats on the phone; the Lung Association, Alberta and Northwest Territories; and CARST, which is the Canadian Association of Radon Scientists and Technologists, as well as Build Alberta.

4:00

The things that I really want people to take away from this piece of legislation are just that radon is a colourless, odourless gas and is the second leading cause of lung cancer in Canada; the location of radon is random, and 1 in 8 houses in Calgary have tested above the Health Canada limit of 200 becquerels per metre cubed. So it is something that is an issue here in the prairies particularly. It doesn't matter what kind of house you have. If you have a newer house, you're actually slightly more prone to radon because the seals on the house are done so well. The third thing that I want folks to remember is that children are more susceptible because they have smaller lungs and they breathe faster. That's why the child care testing piece of this piece of legislation is so important.

Just a fact that I didn't hear in any of the debate was that exposure over the recommended limit is often equivalent to taking 200 X-rays a year or smoking 40 cigarettes a day, so this really is a very serious public health issue, and it's something that people need to be aware of.

I want people to know that testing is relatively cheap, or it could be free. You can contact the Lung Association of Alberta to get a free kit if that's something that you're interested in. It should be done over the winter months, so now is actually a fantastic time to test for radon, when your doors and windows aren't open, because this is a time when you're more likely to accumulate more radon in your house. When you are doing the testing, you should put the test in a place in your home where you're spending more than four hours a day, so whether your children are sleeping in the basement or whether your family spends most of their day on the ground floor of your house, that's where the test should go.

I also want people to know that mitigation is relatively cheap. It can cost around $2,500 to have your house mitigated, but mitigation is very effective. It works really well, and I think the cost is probably worth knowing that you're not exposing your family to a carcinogen that's likely to cause lung cancer.

I just want to urge everyone to please test, to please educate your friends and family, to please let everyone know that this is something that's important and that they should do.

I just want to thank everyone again for their support. I'm very happy to have been able to put forward this issue to educate Albertans about the dangers of radon and to hopefully prevent some cases of lung cancer in the future. Thanks to everyone.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

[Motion carried; Bill 209 read a third time]

Bill 210

Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to move third reading of Bill 210, the Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017.

Madam Speaker, this is one of those times when I believe that we see Albertans being well served by our government, working across partisan lines for the common good of all Albertans. I believe that the ones that are going to be most well served by the passing of this bill, should it pass, are the seniors that live in this province, so those who care for them will perhaps have some of that burden lightened just a little bit.

As I said earlier, Madam Speaker, we know that the idea for this bill was brought forward to me by my former legislative co-ordinator, Ms Maureen Gough, who at the time was caring for her elderly mother, Anne McIntosh. I can remember the conversations that we would have in my office and as we drove, where Maureen was telling me about the life that she had with her mother as she went into her later years and when she first began to realize that perhaps there was an issue in her mother's life.

Before Maureen was able to find, really, an appropriate or a secure facility for her mother, her mother, Anne, had been living with Maureen on the weekends while spending the weekdays at her sister's house. There were instances there of wandering and just the sheer panic that accompanies that realization that, you know, someone that you love so very dearly is no longer where you expected them to be and just how much of a sick feeling you've got in your stomach when you realize that your mom has gotten out in the middle of the night and could be wandering through the last of the winter days and wondering how safe she was going to be until you could find her.

Now, one of the amazing things about seniors that suffer from dementia and sometimes Alzheimer's and advanced senile dementia is that they can often be very creative. Their capacity for figuring out how to get out of a room or down the stairs or out of a locked front door and into the wider world and into the neighbourhoods around them can be quite creative, and it's amazing what they can do. I know that my mother-in-law, who suffered from the same thing – it just about killed my father-in-law trying to make sure that the person in his life that he loved the most was safe. When he was sleeping, what would happen? When he was maybe cleaning the house or cooking supper, she could just slip out quietly, and that is going to be something that is obviously very concerning for everyone that has somebody that they love that is suffering from senile dementia.

Now, the last time, I believe, that Mrs. McIntosh was out of doors, she was without any outdoor clothing, and it was 15 degrees below zero. That was a huge concern. She was eventually returned safely, but the experience that Maureen had is multiplied many times over across the province.

You know, I was talking with a constituent, actually, a town councillor in Thorsby, and he was talking about the fact that just about a month and a half ago he was driving down a country road outside of Thorsby and saw a vehicle that was driving very slowly, fairly erratically. It eventually made its way into Thorsby, where, again, it almost had a couple of accidents, almost went off the road. He had been following it, and in the process of trying to follow this car, he had phoned the RCMP. They had suggested, "Well, just keep following him until we can get there." It took about 15, 20 minutes for the RCMP to be able to let him know: "Okay. You can break off. We're not far away. We'll find the vehicle." He got a phone call at the end of the day, and it was, again, an elderly gentleman who had left Red Deer in his vehicle and had been reported missing, but the RCMP had had no way of knowing that that was going to be the case and that this gentleman had gone all the way from Red Deer all the way up to Thorsby.

It highlighted for me why, again, we needed this piece of legislation, this silver alert. I believe it's flexible enough that should the individual go missing locally, it will be dealt with locally, but should the RCMP believe that the situation desires and needs a wider range of visibility across the province, then it's the RCMP that can step in and can call a silver alert. In this particular case, this would have been of a great deal of value to the people of Red Deer and to the family from Red Deer as it would have brought forward their father's case much more quickly to the people of Alberta.

You know, the story ended well, but it doesn't always. We know that this is a growing issue, and according to the Bowmont Seniors' Assistance Association:

Unfortunately, in 2015 in Calgary alone, almost 200 seniors were reported as missing to the Calgary Police. Many more – possibly as many as 2,000 – were believed to have wandered and their families and friends had to search for them. This problem will only grow as our seniors' population increases over the next decades.

That is the truth, Madam Speaker. As we move forward through the next 15, 20, 30 years, the population of seniors in this province is only going to continue to grow. I believe that this piece of legislation will allow us as a province the capacity to step in and to proactively address an issue before it becomes even more of an issue within our society.

You know, the fear of the potentially disastrous results that prompted my legislative co-ordinator to look into this issue took her to other jurisdictions to see what currently was being done in the province of Alberta and indeed across the country of Canada. What she found was that no province yet had legislation in place to provide a framework for attending to the safety of seniors and other adults vulnerable to critical wandering. I believe, Madam Speaker, that this bill in a reasonable way addresses this issue of wandering.

This bill certainly was developed, I believe, through the consensus of people that are currently engaged in seniors' issues, people that have in many cases significantly more input in and more understanding of the wandering issue in seniors' lives than what I personally had before we began doing stakeholder work in this area. You know, I consulted with seniors' advocates like Sheree Kwong See and her staff, and I would like to thank them for the afternoon that we spent, for the time that we spent together looking into this issue and into the insights that they brought into this complex issue around seniors and the issue of critical wandering.

Among other things from them I learned of a community-based program in Calgary that is developing a strategy to address both prevention and education to ensure that we learn more about the needs of seniors and how to address those needs using current community resources. Sheree was so very helpful in her very gentle but strong way in addressing some of the concerns that we had and putting us into the right direction so that we could make sure that this bill addresses the needs of seniors in this province.

We contacted Kim Savard and Inspector Patty McCallum. They were part of the steering committee for that project, and we talked with Dr. Lili Liu at the University of Alberta, who is addressing the needs for research into critical wandering as part of that community initiative that is there to try and keep our seniors safe. You know, we had the chance in our conversations over the course of our stakeholder discussions to really see the common sense of people with experience. I think of Patty McCallum and Kim Savard as they gave us feedback and as we had the discussions about whether this was going to be . . . [Mr. Smith's speaking time expired]

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wish to speak to this bill? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Yes, I'd like to speak to this bill. I think we all are familiar with the Amber Alert system, where if children are missing or the parents can't find them or whatever, they can send an Amber Alert out to notify people through the media and through various other means to help locate these children. Of course, these children could have just wandered away and may be lost, or maybe they could have gotten lost in a city or in the country, or maybe they were abducted or something more serious like that. But, obviously, when the Amber Alerts come out, I think people pay attention to that because they know that there's a child out there that could be in some serious trouble.

I think that as soon as those Amber Alerts come out through the media and everything, people immediately, especially if they're in the area where this Amber Alert comes from, start looking for children. They start noticing things, whether they're driving down the street in their vehicle or if they're at work or if they're at the park or whatever. They start noticing children. I think that's why this is so important for seniors and adults that maybe suffer from dementia or something like that, that as soon as a silver alert comes out, people will have that same kind of consciousness as far as what they'll be noticing.

I think we go through our lives a lot of times just not really paying attention to details and the different things that are happening around us, but when things like this come out, things like an Amber Alert or now possibly a silver alert, I think people will start noticing and paying attention to details. Those details could make the difference between life and death in these situations.

You know, when an Amber Alert comes out, people are looking for children, somebody a little smaller, maybe a child that doesn't have an adult with them in an unusual spot. But, of course, if we have a silver alert come out, then people will be looking for somebody bigger in size, probably older, and seeing if there is something unusual about what this person is doing. I think it's a very good idea to have this opportunity to have these silver alerts. This is truly something that could save lives. People could go missing day or night, and at night with the darkness it's harder to find people. With the weather we have in our area here, in particular in Alberta, even in the summertime the nights can be cold enough for hypothermia to set in very quickly, especially if we have any kind of rain or anything.

Of course, in the wintertime it's even more severe, where we could run into serious situations with people wandering outside without proper clothing or spending extended periods of time outside. Hypothermia could set in, and that could be life threatening. I think it's a great opportunity to have this system so that we can take care of the people of Alberta that, like I say, suffer from dementia or anything else, any kind of cognitive problems, that may wander off and not really know what they're doing or how much trouble they could be getting themselves into. Adults and seniors: they are larger than children, so they can maybe reach a door handle easier than a small child could and get outside, or they could possibly get in a vehicle and drive because they would have that knowledge and skill set within them to do that.

I think there are several things that make this bill very important as far as helping the people of Alberta and particularly the people that have these problems that get into an area or into a situation that could be life threatening and could have serious consequences.

Now, I looked up a few things here. The B.C. Silver Alert mentions looking for vulnerable missing people: people suffering from Alzheimer's, dementia, developmental disability, cognitive disabilities, autism, Down syndrome. They are the people that they really want to be aware of, people that can get themselves into some serious trouble without being fully aware of what they're doing. The goal of the B.C. Silver Alert is to "provide a valuable public alerting system so that specific, targeted alerts can assist first responders to locate missing people who meet the criteria for urgency and vulnerability." Of course, that's the key there, to make sure that first responders have an extra tool to help people in need. These first responders can be helped by the general public with these alerts, and I think that's the key, to have even more eyes out on the landscape looking for the people that could be in some serious trouble.

I just checked out another article here, and it says that Canada's aging population and the growing prevalence of neurodegenerative diseases that cause dementia could see more seniors wander away from their homes and families. Experts say that half of those missing for more than 24 hours will suffer serious injury or death. That's a horrible statistic, that after more than 24 hours the possibility of having serious injury or death increases dramatically. Of course, actually, with the weather we have in this part of the country, we could run into problems in three or four hours, even less than that. We need to have this opportunity to respond quickly and to reduce the opportunity for people to run into serious injury or death.

It goes on to say that over half a million Canadians are currently living with dementia. Can you imagine that? Over half a million. That's a huge number of people that are suffering from dementia. That figure is expected to reach close to a million in the next 15 years, so this problem isn't going to get better over time. It's going to get worse, the numbers are going to grow, and we need to have something like this to solve these problems before they get even larger.

It says that more than 60 per cent of adults with Alzheimer's disease or dementia will wander according to researchers at the University of Alberta. Over 60 per cent of them will wander at some point and put themselves in that situation where they could risk serious injury or death.

It says that B.C. has the highest population of people older than 65 outside of the Maritimes and Quebec according to Statistics Canada. That fact, combined with the province's rugged terrain, is a rising concern among search and rescue officials. Of course, we have some of that same rugged terrain. We have the Rocky Mountains to the west in Alberta, and we have extensive forests in the north. You know, after slipping away in those areas, it would be very hard to find people and to recover them.

I just wanted to go on to another article here. Now, the United States has the silver alert, too. It says that silver alerts use a wide array of media outlets such as commercial radio stations, television stations, and cable television to broadcast information about missing persons. In some states silver alerts can use variable-message signs on roadways to alert motorists. We have these same kinds of signs on the highways in Alberta, where they could put out these silver alerts, too, and give an opportunity to travelling motorists, who maybe don't have the radio on or are listening to satellite radio or whatever, to actually be alerted to a situation.

Again – and this is relating to the U.S. silver alerts – it goes on to say that in cases in which a missing person is believed to be on foot, silver alerts have used reverse 911 or other emergency notification systems to notify nearby residents of the neighbourhood surrounding the missing person's last known location. Silver alerts can also be used for children who are missing without being in danger of being abducted. So they've actually used this for children, too, which, of course, we have the Amber Alert for.

It goes on to say that supporters of silver alerts point to the U.S.A.'s growing elderly population as a reason to support new programs to locate missing seniors. They go on with the same statistics as we have here, that 6 out of 10 dementia victims will wander at least once. Of course, that's a staggering statistic when you think that we have half a million people suffering from dementia in Alberta. If you think that 60 per cent of them will wander at one time or another, that's a staggering number of people. If we don't have every opportunity we can to find these people as quickly as possible, of course, we risk, you know, serious injury or death with these people out there on the landscape.

I just want to carry on here. We have a lot of, you know, good opportunity here. I think this is a good bill that has, really, a good premise as far as being able to help Albertans, save lives, and make the recovery of these people, to bring them back home, faster. This bill is patterned on the Amber Alert, and it amends the Missing Persons Act to create a silver alert. This would be issued when a represented adult or an adult with a cognitive impairment or who is otherwise vulnerable due to mental or physical health concerns goes missing. This bill also makes provisions for police to work with local broadcasters to alert the public if an adult with a cognitive impairment or who is otherwise vulnerable has gone missing.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I am truly honoured to speak on this bill. I know that my colleague has worked very hard at promoting the safety of seniors within Alberta, and I know that his time as the shadow minister for Seniors and Housing gave him an opportunity to really look at this file and really show that dedication to make sure that our seniors across Alberta are handled in a respectful way.

Now, when it comes to the treatment of our seniors in our dementia care units, this is something that I personally and that I know a lot of my colleagues, both across the aisle and within the opposition, see is important. I myself make sure, whenever there is a concern brought forward by a family member about dementia care, that I take it very seriously, and I contact the unit that is taking care of that senior. I know that we all end up in seniors' facilities at one point in our life.

Now, I know that, for myself, I visit every seniors' facility within my constituency on or the next day after Mother's Day. It's important, you know. I take my wife and my two children, and I'll tell you that when we go and we meet with these seniors and we actually give them a rose, it brightens their day. It shows them that there are caring people out there. Specifically with the dementia patients, going to this bill, you can feel the love from those individuals, and this is good. I had one of the dementia patients at one of my facilities who hugged my oldest daughter and didn't want to let go. You know what? My oldest daughter stood there for about five minutes hugging that elderly woman. It warmed my heart that my daughter could bring comfort to that woman.

Now, what happens is that these individuals don't have, a lot of times, the ability to defend themselves. This is why it's so important that, should they go out and find themselves alone outside of facilities or outside of family members' care, we have an ability to be able to notify people that we have somebody missing.

Now, I've got an older article, but it's very relevant to a lot of the points that I'm going to be trying to make. The article's name is 5 Tips for Tracking Missing Persons with Dementia. This is by CBC News in B.C. This was December 11, 2013, when this article was posted. Remarkably, that's four years from today. Unfortunately, this is a sad story. This is a very sad story. What we've got is a 76-year-old woman in a north Vancouver park that wandered away from her facility. What happened here is that somehow she had left the facility without her electronic tracking bracelet. She went missing on a Friday, and the family, friends, firefighters, police, and volunteers all joined in the search, a huge operation, to try to find this woman. Now, despite all these efforts she passed from hypothermia. She was found two days later. The family of this senior say that the searchers did all their best, but there is always going to be the lingering question: could they have found her sooner? Could they have found her sooner?

Now, we do have a research expert in this article. His name is Robert Koester. I apologize to the gentleman if I didn't get his last name correct. In this article it goes on to say that "in a database that he keeps, he's found that 22 per cent of cases of missing persons with dementia end with the patient found dead." This is stunning. It's a rate that is far too high, and I understand that my colleague sees from this fact that when our seniors wander away from a facility or from family members, there is a distinct possibility that that senior's life is at incredible risk.

Now, they go on and say that there are things that we can do to help find these seniors, and that's where special training comes in. What happens is that by creating a silver alert, we will have professionals ready to go that specifically will know how to find people with dementia. This is why this is so important.

Now, they've got five points in the article, and it's important to list them out, not only for trying to describe how hard it is to find these seniors but also to bring recognition that there are ways of tracking these seniors. But you know what? I didn't know them until I read this article. I'm sure a professional out there understands that these ways of finding our seniors are imperatives to get into the volunteers' hands.

4:30

Now, the first one is:

They'll go until they get stuck.

That's number one.

He said persons with severe cases of dementia will head out an exit door, keep going until [there's] a barrier or a bend in the road [that] redirects them and, if not found soon enough, they will eventually head off into the bush or into a water feature, where they get stuck, and stay.

I would have never thought to walk straight out the exit door to find a senior that had wandered off, but this is where the training would come in.

Water can be a draw.

Finding the nearest water source can be a draw for seniors. Now, I like the quote that Mr. Koester – and I apologize again if I didn't get his name right – put here. He's got a very clear quote on this one.

I don't even know if they perceive water for what it is.

So what we've got here is that water is a natural – it's something that attracts the seniors. I understand that. Water is beautiful.

Number three:

Searchers may be ignored, or avoided.

Now, in this he quotes:

They tend not to respond to searchers' shouts . . . They're living so much in the [past], they can watch a search team walk right by them.

It's important to know that screaming their name probably isn't enough.

Number four:

Look to the past.

More moderate cases of dementia will see the patient trying to find their way around a neighbourhood, thinking they are [still] in a different location from their past, and seeking . . . familiar-looking features.

This is important. This is why you need to contact the immediate family as soon as you can, saying: what is familiar to the senior?

The last one, number five:

Each case is unique, but [they're] always the same.

This is interesting. In the quote he says:

If you've met one dementia subject, you've met one dementia subject.

And it goes on to say:

But while there is no general pattern of behaviour that catches all cases, the inability to form short-term memories does guide a wanderer's path.

So what we can do is to make sure our seniors are taken care of. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to this bill? The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I rise to speak at third reading of Bill 210. There are a couple of things I wanted to note. I guess the first is just the tone of the House this afternoon and how refreshing it is that we've been able to move through two very important pieces of legislation and show Albertans that it is, in fact, possible for those of us in this Assembly, on both sides, to work together when it is to the benefit of the people of Alberta. And I would really hope – perhaps not expect but hope – that this could be an example of how we conduct ourselves in other matters even when we don't agree as clearly as I think we do on these two very important pieces of legislation.

You know, as I've been listening to the debate – another situation, that occurred in my constituency, that you may remember, very sadly and very tragically, unfortunately, played out in the summer. One of my constituents, Kelly Flock, a 68-year-old, went missing in Marda Loop, and his family and friends and the community undertook a very significant poster campaign and a lot of searching for Mr. Flock. It sounds like the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek was connected to the family as well. He touched many, many, many lives. I just wonder. We'll never know if things may have been different. One wonders: if this bill were in place, if there were, in fact, a silver alert at the time, perhaps the word would have gotten out sooner. I know that the family and the community rallied very quickly and did a tremendous amount of work to search. It's just, I think, a good example of what benefit this bill may have.

Let's hope that these sorts of situations, which, unfortunately, do play out all too frequently in our province – whatever we can do to help avoid such a situation again in the future, obviously, I think we need to get behind enthusiastically, and this bill will certainly do that.

Another note is that this will be the first bill of its type passed in our country, as I understand it. There is no Canada-wide system. I understand that in B.C. there is an informal program that aims to get the word out through social media. But where we have the tools at our disposal in the traditional media, I think, especially when talking about seniors who may not – not every senior I know is on Twitter. Some I know are on Twitter, and they're active social media users. But, certainly, using all tools at our disposal, especially and including mainstream media, I think, is a very important thing, and this bill, I think, will help us achieve that.

We know our population is aging in this province and in this country. You know, some statistics which are sobering: in addition to the fact that we know that for every person with dementia, 10 to 12 people in their lives, on average, are impacted – again, sometimes that's more – 1 in 10 Albertans aged 65-plus is dealing with some form of dementia. That number rises to half – fully half of people aged 90-plus deal with some form of dementia. Not all will be subject to wandering, but certainly many will. As I said in my earlier remarks, I have some personal experience in helping a neighbour through a situation like that and seeing the community rally around him. It was really heartening. But it was not, certainly, easy on his family.

That's not the situation that every person would find themselves in. Unfortunately, in our community, as communities get larger and we perhaps aren't as connected with our neighbours as we once were – and not everyone will wander only in a defined area. Perhaps they'll expand that out or get on the bus or even get in their car and, unfortunately, may find themselves in unfamiliar surroundings. Those around them may themselves not realize they're lost. Again, a silver alert system, I think, will really make a big, big difference in the lives of Albertans and bring some peace of mind to their families.

I understand that in our country over half a million Canadians are currently living with dementia. The scale of this challenge is quite immense, and unfortunately it's only going to get higher. Nearly a million Canadians will be afflicted with some form of dementia in the next 15 years, and more than 60 per cent of adults with Alzheimer's disease or dementia will wander, according to research out of the University of Alberta. So these are tremendous challenges that we face in our country, and I think we clearly have a duty and a responsibility to make sure that we have structures in place. This is one of them.

It is an opportunity. You know, one of the things I'm always proud of in our province is when we have an opportunity to lead the rest of the country. This is certainly one of those opportunities. I think the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon and his assistant Maureen should be commended for their work in bringing this forward. It really is wonderful to see the member's family here and members of the research community here as well to witness the passage of this bill. I would hope that this is something that the rest of the country would take up, perhaps a national system, or other provinces perhaps would see this as a beacon of hope, if you will. So it is really good to be part of something that is leading the country and solving a really important problem that we have in our communities.

I also hope this is an opportunity for us all to take this message back to our constituents. As we talk with our local media, as we talk with our constituents, as we do those newsletters that I hope we all do, it is an opportunity, I think, for us to talk about something that we should all be proud of. We've made a big difference by passing Bill 209 earlier today. That is something we should be proud of, and as we move forward with Bill 210, I think this is also something we should be proud of. It is an opportunity to show our constituents, to show Albertans that, in fact, it's possible for us to work together, that when issues unite us, the issues that matter to Albertans, we can come together, united as an Assembly, and do very good work in passing legislation that will make a tremendous difference in the quality of life of Albertans.

Again, I hope that we take this as an opportunity to reflect on the tone of the House this afternoon, that, in fact, it is possible for us on both sides of the House, even though there are a great many things, I think, that we disagree on, even when we do disagree – it would be nice if the tone of the Assembly was a little more like this and a little less fractious. As far as I know, I don't believe there's been a single point of order this afternoon, and maybe the House leaders are welcoming that as well, that we don't need to worry about those sorts of things. So I do think it's possible, Madam Speaker, that we work more collegially and perhaps take this as an opportunity, even when we disagree, to adopt some of this tone.

With that, Madam Speaker, I'm without question rising to support Bill 210 at third reading, something that I think each of us in this Assembly ought to be very, very proud of, and encourage all the members to support Bill 210.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Red Deer-North.

Mrs. Schreiner: Well, thank you, Madam Speaker. It is my absolute pleasure to rise today and speak in favour of Bill 210, Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017. Each and every time that I have the opportunity to visit one of the many long-term care or supportive living facilities in my community, I absolutely take advantage of that. I just have to speak about why that means so much to me.

As a teenager my mother worked in a supportive living facility, and on the weekends she would allow me to come and work with her. She would always steer me towards a resident that she felt needed a little bit of extra care, someone that maybe was a little lonely, someone that needed someone to talk to. One particular woman I remember very well. After breakfast she would go into her room, and she'd go into her closet and take out her suitcase, and she'd very carefully fill it up with all of her belongings and put on her coat and drag this suitcase to the front door, where she would sit and wait for her son to come and pick her up. My mother used to have me go and sit with her and strike up a conversation, and the next thing you know, we're going to the dining room and sharing a cup of tea together and taking her suitcase back down the hallway and unpacking it. The resident is happy. She's had someone to talk to, and then I could go on with the next resident.

I think that's what gave me my love of seniors, being able to volunteer in that setting. I absolutely looked forward to each and every weekend when I could volunteer and sit and have a conversation with the seniors. One of my favourite questions was to ask them: tell me what it was like in the olden days. Of course, they would absolutely love to sit and bend my ear for as long as I would sit with them. I think that's what began my career in working with seniors as an adult. In my community I have worked in long-term care and supportive living. I think I've worked in just about every facility in Red Deer. I absolutely loved my work. I loved the seniors.

Some of the facilities had bracelets that the residents would wear. It was maybe for residents that the facilitators, the operators, the nursing staff, or the families were fearful would wander off out of the building. They would put a bracelet on them if the resident would wear one. Sometimes we would put it on their walker. When they would get close to the door, to an exit, an alarm, just a quiet alarm, would go off, and the door would lock. It wasn't always foolproof because sometimes when a visitor or a staff member was coming into a building, the resident would be leaving at the same time, and all of a sudden you have a resident that is outside and walking around, maybe looking for home, maybe looking for a relative, maybe just going for a walk.

There were a handful of times over the years where I found myself in the car driving around looking for a resident. Sometimes it was late at night, it was dark, the resident maybe didn't have a sweater on, or it was a little bit cooler in the evening. Of course, you can imagine how frightened the family members – they would have been notified – and the staff and the police were that were all out looking for a resident. I do have to say that each and every time we did find the resident and brought them home safely. I'm very, very happy about that. But I'm sure that there are stories that maybe didn't go quite so well.

I just have to say that I'm so happy with this act. I'm very proud that we're doing this here in our wonderful province of Alberta. I know that it would have been nice to have this act in place many, many years ago. I'm happy that, hopefully, we will all be in favour of this act and that, going forward, this will be an extra piece of protection for our seniors, who made this country, made this province the best province, the best country in the world to live, work, and raise a family in.

I want to thank the member for introducing this bill. I fully support it and hope that everyone in the House today supports it as well.

Thank you, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? Calgary-Bow.

Drever: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to support Bill 210, the Missing Persons (Silver Alert) Amendment Act, 2017. I would like to thank the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon, who brought this bill forward.

I meet with a bunch of stakeholders in my riding that work with seniors. We try to meet on a monthly basis. I have a high population of seniors in Calgary-Bow, and the point of the meetings is so that we can work collaboratively to see what we can do to help improve the lives of seniors who live in the community. One of the things that was brought up was people who wander off from facilities and how we can combat that issue. I met with CARYA. It's a group in Calgary that works with seniors. She did bring up the fact that she had talked with the Member for Drayton Valley-Devon, who was going to bring forward this private member's bill. I actually was very excited to hear that because it would improve the lives of so many seniors not only in my constituency but all over Alberta.

I remember that in 2015, during the campaign, I was driving down to Bowness. There's a seniors' facility there. I remember seeing a senior wandering around by herself. I thought to myself: well, that looks a little strange. So I decided to pull over and ask her if she was okay. Actually, she was a little confused, and she didn't know where she was. It was a good thing that I pulled over to talk to her. If I wasn't there, you know, who knows what would've happened to that woman?

I'm glad that this bill is now in third reading, so hopefully it's going to pass. I feel that there is going to be unanimous consent in the Legislature, which is really a refreshing thing to see.

I just wanted to say that I support this bill, and I want to thank the member for bringing this forward.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Castle Downs? No?

Any other members wishing to speak? The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Now we know what a deer in the headlights looks like, when you're asked to speak and you have no intention of speaking.

I'm pleased to rise today to speak to Bill 210, a private member's bill. I have a short amount of time, I'm told.

Yeah. Silver alert. I'm just going to relay a short little personal message. My mother fell down a set of cement stairs, oh, goodness, three years ago, I think. Now, of course, she had lived in the same community for 60 or 70 years, probably 70, so she spent a lot of time walking to work and back. Everybody in town knew who she was, and she fell down this set of stairs. She phoned me the morning after she'd fallen. She'd actually gotten herself home, and she called and said: "There's something wrong. I don't know what it is, but there's blood everywhere, and I can't remember what happened." I went in to see what was going on, and she was bleeding from her nose, her lip, and bleeding from her ear. I thought: well, this is bad. We did get her to the hospital to find out how bad things were. At the end of the day, she had suffered a concussion, of course, and her cognitive ability started to slowly wither within the next year.

We worked on trying to find a place for her once we knew that it was going to become more serious than she could handle. She was living by herself. She had for several years, and there was no issue. She was able to clean her home and made sure that, you know, she could clean herself, have a bath and cook for herself, et cetera, et cetera. When we were trying to find a place to put her, it had to be a place with a dementia wing because not just anyone will take someone who's starting to have dementia. We do know that it isn't dementia because it hasn't gotten any worse.

At any rate, she continued to walk downtown to get the mail, continued to walk downtown to go to the stores, but as time progressed, she began to change her route a little bit. I mean, the woman had grown up – not grown up, but from the day she got married, when she was about 18, she certainly knew every inch of the town. The fact that she was changing her route either to or from where she was headed started to indicate some things.

I started to get some phone calls from folks in town that said, "Your mother is walking, like, down elevator row," or something to that effect. That was not something that she had historically done. She was probably looking for my wife. She knew that she worked down there somewhere, but she couldn't find her. She'd turn around and come back. People would call and say: "Your mother is standing in my back alley here, and she looks like she might be lost. I've never seen her in this alley before."

At any rate, there wasn't a silver alert. We're talking about a small town here, but I can understand. We did have a person that checked on her three times a day. I was trying to farm the farm, and my brother lives in British Columbia. We were doing the best we could until we could place her.

I've got one minute left. There was no seriousness with the Amber Alert. Everybody knows everybody in a small town. That's why I was getting phone calls from people that I've known all my life and that certainly knew her. They were advising me that she was doing strange things that she hadn't been doing in her life previously.

If something like this had happened in a city – and it's hard to place people. It's certainly hard to place seniors who have a little bit of dementia or the onset of it if they can't actually move in with you or another sibling or something. What we did in a small town was that we hired somebody to come morning, noon, and night to make sure she took her medication, make sure she was ... [interjection] Are we done? I'm afraid I have to quit. Sorry.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the bill?

Seeing none, I'll call the hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon to close debate.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to start by thanking everyone that provided information and the stakeholders that provided us with the experience and the knowledge to be able to craft this bill. I want to thank my legislative assistant. I'd like to just thank her for her insight and for all of the things that her mother helped us understand about this bill moving forward. In some ways I'd like to dedicate this to the memory of Anne McIntosh. All of these conversations solidified for us that this would be an important piece of legislation to bring forward in this House.

I believe that the Bowmont Seniors' Assistance Association said it pretty well, that Bill 210 will be a vital link in the successful implementation of our community-developed version of Silver Alert programme. The ability of our front-line workers to release and access information about a missing, vulnerable senior in a timely manner will save lives.

I think that just about says it all, Madam Speaker. This is about saving lives. It is about dealing with the people that we care about when they reach their senior days.

Thank you very much.

[Motion carried; Bill 210 read a third time]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Mr. Westhead: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Just seeing the time, I would move to call it 5 o'clock and get to Motions Other than Government Motions. I need unanimous consent for that.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Motions Other than Government Motions

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Concussion Awareness and Prevention

511. MLA McPherson moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to recognize a day each year to promote the awareness and prevention of concussions.

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It really is an honour to bring forward Motion 511. A concussion is a traumatic brain injury that affects brain function, and it can happen when there's a hit to the head or the body that causes the head and brain to move rapidly back and forth. Everyone likely knows someone who has had a concussion, and any measures that can be taken to reduce the number of concussions that occur to Albertans and to improve the outcomes for those who do receive concussions are important in improving the quality of life of the people of our province.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

It's difficult to quantify the problem. While some statistics are available for sports-related injuries – on average 3 to 5 per cent of all sport and recreational injuries are head injuries – this number doesn't reflect the other ways concussions can occur, like workplace injuries or accidents in the home or head injuries from motor vehicle accidents. What we do know is that even a mild concussion can be very serious, and repeated concussions have been shown to result in chronic traumatic encephalopathy, a neurodegenerative disease associated with repeated brain injury.

We regularly see stories in the news of former professional athletes who've suffered the effects of CTE, grappling with depression, diminished cognitive capacity, and personality changes. CTE is only diagnosed on autopsy of the person suffering from it. The disease is often associated with hockey and football players, and both the NHL and NFL have developed protocols to begin to address the issue. Ty Pozzobon, the 2016 Professional Bull Riders Canada champion, took his own life in January of this year after suffering the effects of 13 concussions in the pursuit of his dream.

Education and awareness are vital to preventing devastating outcomes like this. Today in Alberta there is a gap in the information available to diagnose and treat concussion and in the instructions concussion patients receive, and there's a lack of awareness of concussion treatment protocols among people who are most likely to be on-site when someone gets a concussion.

Concussions aren't necessarily life threatening, but they are serious. Even a mild concussion can mean months of recovery and rehabilitation, and the symptoms of concussion are not easy to deal with: convulsions or seizures, inability to wake up, unremitting headache, weakness, numbness, decreased co-ordination, vomiting, nausea, confusion, slurred speech, loss of consciousness. Some of these symptoms can appear right away while others can show up days or months or even years after the traumatic event. Symptoms of concussion can be different in small children than they are in other people.

Rowan's law was passed in the Ontario Legislature in 2016. This private member's bill, introduced by MPP Lisa MacLeod, came about as the result of an inquest into the death of a 17-year-old young woman there, Rowan Stringer, who was a loving, nurturing person who was also an avid rugby player. Rowan died on Mother's Day, 2013, after suffering two concussions that week.

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Recently backers of Rowan's law, including Eric Lindros, who quit the NHL because of concussion injuries, Montreal Canadiens' physician Dr. David Mulder, and Nepean-Carleton MPP Lisa MacLeod, who introduced the legislation in Ontario, released an open letter to federal, provincial, and territorial health ministers, calling for their jurisdictions to follow Ontario's example of enacting legislation aimed at preventing and identifying youth concussions, particularly in sport.

Establishing a provincial concussion prevention and awareness day that is observed every year is an important step in closing the gap between the information that is available to prevent and diagnose and treat concussion and getting that information to the people who can help to prevent concussions from happening and to the people who are on the scene when they do occur, like minor sports coaches and parents and teachers in our elementary, junior and senior high schools.

We all know someone who's had a concussion; some of us have likely had our bells rung ourselves. Concussion is far too common, and the effects are often devastating. By passing this motion, we help people facing concussion in the future and, hopefully, prevent some of them from occurring at all.

The Deputy Speaker: Other members wishing to speak to the motion? The hon. Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo.

Mr. Yao: Thank you, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to rise and speak on Motion 511. I'd like to add my voice to that of the Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill in urging the government to recognize a day each year to promote awareness and prevention of concussions.

Concussions often occur after blows to the head, when the brain is jostled and hits the inside of the skull. While sometimes there are external signs of injury such as scrapes, cuts, or bruises, other symptoms are silent and unnoticeable or can be confused with less severe situations such as headaches, fatigue, or sleep disturbances. As you know, concussions are no laughing matter. Concussions are brain injuries, and in some cases they result in complications, either within the first 24 to 48 hours or even weeks later. This clearly shows the severity of concussions as they can manifest themselves over many days and weeks after the initial concerns have dissipated.

Fortunately, we're in a time that is seeing increased attention paid to concussions. There is much more information, research, and data available these days that help to guide the discussion around prevention and treatment of concussions. For example, we've seen professional sport leagues institute concussion protocols. The National Hockey League, of which I'm confident we at least have a handful of fans here, updated their protocols just over a year ago. After a hit is taken, if the club's staff is concerned, they have the ability to remove a player from the game to ensure that he is all right. There are additional staff available as well, from on-ice officials to in-arena league spotters and also central league spotters. This is meant to ensure multiple checks to try and keep players as safe and healthy as possible.

In 2009 the NFL, the National Football League, first instituted their concussion protocol, and they've made continual adjustments since then to try and ensure best possible practices. Again, a club has a responsibility to immediately remove from a field any player who is identified as possibly having received a concussion. If there is such a suspicion, the player is brought to the locker room for a full assessment.

The Canadian Football League, the CFL, also has a concussion protocol, that includes an injury spotter monitoring every game and the ability of a player to request a second opinion. There are also restrictions on padded practices in place and a commitment to further research and education.

It's quite something to see these professional sport organizations take such a hard stance on concussions. It's probably helped in large part by the sheer number of athletes who have suffered from concussions, players such as Keith Primeau, Paul Kariya, Steve Moore, Eric Lindros, Pat LaFontaine, to name a handful of former NHL players. Or you may be aware of some seriously concussed NFL players such as Aaron Hernandez, Frank Gifford, and Kevin Turner.

It's important to remember, however, that professional athletes are not the only ones that suffer from concussions. Seniors and children are also at risk. The University of Calgary's Cumming School of Medicine has reported that over 1,000 children and adolescents visit the Alberta Children's hospital emergency department every year with concussions. I don't need to remind you that that is one hospital. CBC has recently reported that elderly people are suffering concussions due to falls. As a person ages and becomes less stable, they are at greater risk of falling and therefore at greater risk of brain injuries, including concussions.

More and more people are becoming aware of the severity of concussions and the importance of not only early diagnosis but education and prevention. I spoke just a few minutes ago about the spotters in place within professional sport leagues whose sole job is to identify potential concussions. You and I don't have the advantage of having someone with acute knowledge of concussions watching our every move to ensure that we take the appropriate steps after we may have experienced a concussion-causing event. Public awareness in Alberta has been largely spearheaded by professional groups such as the Sports Medicine Council of Alberta and the Brain Care Centre. They've been doing much good work on this front. While the government site supports the brain injury initiative, it does not have the comprehensive awareness program in place that's specifically centred around concussions.

I must note that people do tend to think that concussions are solely due to major sports injuries and whatnot, but I'd like to emphasize to people that in this winter weather, though, with the icy roads and icy sidewalks, some of the major head injuries can occur just by slippage and falling the height of your person. That five-foot drop is enough to severely damage your head, and people have died as a result of that, from internal bleeding and whatnot.

In closing, Madam Speaker, I think that it's important that our government strongly consider taking further steps to promote awareness and education about concussions. I therefore strongly encourage all of my colleagues in the Assembly to support this motion.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Sherwood Park.

Ms McKittrick: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's really a pleasure today to rise in support of Motion 511. About two years ago I got woken up in the middle of the night by my son, who was living in Egypt at the time, because he had been hit once again with a basketball. He was a teacher at the time. While we had thought that the damage caused by previous concussions had gone away and that he was going to be okay, the time that he was hit by a basketball just brought all the symptoms back again. There followed for me as a parent and for him 10 months of really, really difficult time. I thought that I might have to go to Egypt to take him back home because the symptoms were so extreme. He had received one too many concussions. The symptoms did not go away. He barely could teach his last term at school, and when he came back to Canada, he couldn't function. He basically needed to spend time in a darkened room, he wasn't able very often to be fully coherent, and he had excruciating headaches. It was only with six months of rest and some treatment in a specialized institute in Victoria that he found some balance in his life.

I know what happens to people who have concussions, and I know the danger that happens when somebody has had a number of concussions. In his case, it was because he was involved in high-risk sports. He was involved in rugby, where he never, never, never decided to play it safe but always was right there in the tackle, and he was a goalie in hockey. His concussions were because he was involved in those sports.

I am thankful that the motion calls for the annual recognition of concussion awareness and provides an opportunity for the public to become more aware of concussions and the fact that concussions do not result in symptoms right in the time after they happen but also can last a very, very long time in the person's life. I know that for my son, even though he seems okay now, the fact that he had so many concussions is going to have an impact on his life throughout his career. I'm thankful that now he takes a lot more precautions when he's coaching sports and basketball. I am also hoping that he plays hockey a lot safer than he used to.

I like the idea of proposing a recognition day because that recognition day would highlight all of the efforts that are going on in the province at this time around concussions. I understand that there are efforts under way at the moment to develop a pan-Canadian approach for concussions, and this work is being led by a federal-provincial-territorial working group. Alberta is represented by the Ministry of Culture and Tourism under the Member for Calgary-Cross.

I also know that there are injury prevention programs at Alberta Health Services and that the Injury Prevention Centre is working to reduce the incidence of injuries, including concussions. I'm also very well aware that in a lot of the sports teams, especially hockey, rugby, and those sports that are more likely to result in concussions, there's a lot of prevention that has been happening and the coaches, the players, the parents are all aware of the danger of concussions. As I've seen very often, because we're taking it seriously, if a child does fall on the ice, for example, there is a system to ensure that the child is followed up with by a doctor. Very often they end up in an emergency just to make sure that it is not a concussion or that if it is a concussion, the parents are fully aware of what to do, which includes watching the kid for the next 24 hours and making sure that they're not left alone when they're sleeping.

I would like to suggest to the member, if the member is open to that, that the recognition day could be declared in June because this is also Brain Injury Awareness Month. This would strengthen the linkage between concussion and the work already going on in terms of brain injury awareness, so there could be a synergy of activities happening at the same time.

I also appreciate the fact that concussions are not just as a result of playing sports, as in the case of my son, but, also, that it happens to a lot of the people involved in our heavy industries and seniors. My mother was hit by a car. She fell backward, and she had a concussion. In her case the concussion resulted in the loss of the senses of smell and taste. While she did recover, her senses of smell and taste never did. I appreciate the discussion this afternoon, that we are not just concentrating on concussions that are caused by active participation in sports but that we recognize seniors who fall on the ice, as the Member for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo mentioned, and that we're also recognizing that a lot of our labour force may be prone to getting concussions and that, just like young people, they may have symptoms due to concussion for the rest of their lives.

Passing this motion that was proposed would make Alberta a leader in concussion awareness. For that as a mother and as a daughter I am very, very grateful, that our province would really take concussions seriously and that we would understand that concussion and the resulting brain injury are something that lasts for a person's lifetime, so it's a very important thing to be aware of. No other provinces so far have declared a day to recognize concussions, so if this motion passes, we will make Alberta the first province to do so. I really do believe that this motion is an important step in reducing the occurrence of concussions. I would like to suggest that, as is already happening, all parents make sure that for the activities that their kids are involved in, there is very strong concussion prevention awareness, either through the staff or coaches having received training or through the young people themselves understanding the consequences of getting a concussion and how you prevent getting a concussion when you're active in sports.

I just wanted to end by suggesting to my colleagues in this House that we need to support this motion and that we need to support all efforts to prevent concussion. We also need to support the recognition that concussions last for a person's lifetime and that sometimes a person's behaviour may be the result of a concussion.

Thank you very much.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. It's a real honour to rise to speak in favour of this motion brought forward by my hon. colleague the Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill. It's been interesting listening to the debate, and I'm pleased to hear that it sounds like we're all in agreement in this Chamber that this is a very important motion and that the issue of concussions should be taken very seriously.

We live in a time of increased awareness of concussions. It is interesting to note that professional sports leagues like the NHL and the NFL and, of course, the CFL as well as Major League Baseball have taken steps. I think any credible sports organization, professional or amateur, is now realizing the potentially devastating and negative consequences of concussion. But even though the awareness has increased, I think that it's very important that we move forward with supporting a specific day to recognize. I think that although there has been a lot of great work done, even more work is needed.

I note that my daughter's figure skating club this year has a poster on the wall and specific leaflets about concussion. They've adopted a specific concussion protocol, and it gives me great comfort as a parent to know that they've taken this issue seriously. But even more awareness is needed, and more awareness will help. As many members have noted already – but I think it's worth repeating – it is not just an issue that affects pro athletes. It's not even an issue that affects just athletes. There are any number of reasons why people may find a concussion befalling them.

I think of a constituent of mine, in fact, someone who worked tirelessly on my campaign. He missed the bottom step in his house and fell down, hit his head, and for the last two years has just not been right. He hasn't been able to work. It's been a really terrible, terrible journey for them. Recognizing that concussion has a tremendous impact on our community, the impact on his quality of life has been dramatic and, of course, the impact on our economy. He's been unable to work for that two-year period of time. It is not just athletes, and so much more work is needed in terms of research. It's heartening to know that a lot of research is under way, but even more needs to be done. Of course, the best form of cure for a concussion is prevention in the first place, so more research and work going on into helmets in professional sport and an overall culture of safety in the workplace as well are going to help.

I'm pleased to hear the Member for Sherwood Park rise to support this motion. I would encourage all members of the government side, all members of the opposition side to support this motion. I was also pleased to hear the Member for Sherwood Park propose a potential date, sometime in June. While a private member's motion, of course, can't compel the government to actually take action, merely urge the government to do so, I would hope the government does take the advice of this Assembly seriously and if, in fact, we do pass this motion today, finds a date that we can promote awareness and prevention of concussions. I think that finding a date in June, Brain Injury Awareness Month, would be very appropriate. Given that it is now December, I would hope that perhaps the government would find a date to mark this important promotion of awareness and prevention of concussions as soon as June of next year.

I would encourage all my hon. colleagues to vote in favour of this motion, and I thank once again my colleague for bringing this forward.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to thank the Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill for bringing forward this motion. Concussion prevention and treatment is an issue of concern for many Albertans, especially given the potential for lasting physical, emotional, and cognitive effects. This is something that we've heard about a fair deal in my riding as well. We have a constituent who has visited us a few times. His son had a brain injury a couple of years ago, and it has had a really tremendous effect on the son as well as on his parents and on their family and their quality of life. It's completely changed this young man's personality as well as his future, the fact that he suffered this concussion.

As members may be aware, young people are at particular risk for concussion-related injuries, and youth aged 10 to 19, both boys and girls, have the highest rates of emergency department visits due to concussion. Approximately 10 to 15 per cent of individuals with concussions require access to specialist rehabilitation services, mental health care, and physician specialists. We know that many of these injuries can be prevented in simple ways, by learning to protect yourself and others and by taking precautions to create safer environments. People living with brain injury are more vulnerable to mental health disorders, including anxiety, posttraumatic stress disorder, and depression.

This summer I had the opportunity to tour some of the incredible facilities devoted to brain injury and rehabilitation across Alberta. I also had the chance to meet with people living with brain injuries, families, and volunteer supporters, who are doing so very much to support people in their communities.

One that I would particularly like to highlight is the Central Alberta Brain Injury Society, located in Red Deer, where I had the opportunity to sit not just with members but also the volunteers and some of the individuals who have suffered from a brain injury and to speak with them at length about the experiences that they and some of the membership have had. I had the opportunity to meet with patients, family, and caregivers and hear about some of the programs offered such as family and peer support groups as well as caregiver supports.

I also had the opportunity to meet with the Southern Alberta Brain Injury Society in Calgary and tour the brain injury program at Foothills hospital. Patients of the brain injury program have access to a team of mental health professionals, who work to address their mental health concerns and provide support and guidance around available resources within the community. I also had the opportunity to meet with the Banff sports medicine foundation along with the Member for Banff-Cochrane.

Other health supports that are offered in our province include the Injury Prevention Centre, which provides safety guidelines for activities in school and for fall prevention amongst seniors as well as the complex concussion clinic at the Glen Sather Sports Medicine Clinic, which offers long-term supports for patients with prolonged concussion symptoms from a multidisciplinary health care team.

I'm extremely proud of the work that my ministry is doing along with the Ministry of Culture and Tourism and the Ministry of Community and Social Services to advance research and care for Albertans with brain injuries, including concussions. The Alberta brain injury initiative provides province-wide access to supports for adults with acquired brain injury to live, work, and participate in their communities. It consists of a network of 14 agencies across Alberta to assist survivors and caregivers in accessing supports from various programs and community resources.

There's also Campus Alberta Neuroscience, which is a network that brings together Alberta's neuroscience research community with clinicians, patient groups, funders, and policy-makers to facilitate strategic collaborations and alignment in education, research, and translation of health solutions. I was very pleased to join this group at the kickoff of their annual conference this fall.

It is clear that this is an issue that our government takes seriously and one that Albertans will continue to emphasize with me. The more work we can do to bring awareness to the issue of concussion safety, the better. For these reasons, I am pleased to support this motion.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat.

Mr. Barnes: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just want to take two or three minutes and thank my colleagues that have spoken so far. I want to thank the hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill for bringing this motion forward: "Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly urge the government to recognize a day each year to promote the awareness and prevention of concussions." I one hundred per cent, wholeheartedly agree with everything I've heard said about protecting our youth, protecting our athletes, protecting seniors and people that had a fall, and I want to add one more element that I'm aware of.

I'm grateful in this position to always have the opportunity to meet people and learn. About 25 miles from Medicine Hat we have the Suffield military base, and at the Suffield military base we have the defence research establishment Suffield. About five years ago I had the opportunity to be given a tour and a chance to see a lot of the research that they were working on. Something that I had absolutely never thought of, something that I was absolutely, completely unaware of is that one of the big things that our soldiers face when they're fighting is concussions from the shock waves, concussions from bombs and stuff, artillery that doesn't necessarily hit them but land nearby and, of course, has waves and shocks and serious, serious ramifications for our men and women in uniform.

My goodness, we owe so much to them. We can't thank them enough for what they do for us to protect our ability to live free lives and to stand in here and have the opportunity to talk about this. [some applause] Thank you.

So, hey, in some small way, if a day like this can help a military person or help somebody understand what a military person may be going through, I would say that it would be very, very rewarding and a very, very good step. Because of that and all the other reasons mentioned, I will be supporting this, and I thank my colleague for bringing it forward.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the motion? The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I just wanted to speak briefly on this just because, again, it's another motion today that I think is touching us all personally in many, many ways. I think all of us probably know members of our community and constituents that have suffered concussions, some of them silently and some of them having been more aware. I think this is an opportunity to increase that awareness so that when people have concussions or potential concussions, there's a greater awareness of those around them. Sometimes they're in a bit of a daze and not able to think clearly because of that injury.

I have a dear friend whose mother had a fall on a skating rink about 20 years ago, and she still suffers to this day. She's in her late 70s and still has many challenges that she faces both mentally and physically in terms of her ongoing rehabilitation, now even 20 years later, in terms of her ability to speak and reason and certain things like that. That's been a real impact on her life. Her husband, who was very helpful, passed away a number of years ago. Now she's living independently.

Another friend of mine's son was riding in a quad, and it came to an abrupt halt. He was thrown out of the vehicle, actually landed on his feet, fell back, and hit his head. He suffered a concussion and, in fact, maybe a little bit beyond that, a brain injury that took him a couple of years to recover from.

Just last week I had a young individual, a young constituent of mine, Kinga, who was introduced here in the House as well, who suffered a sports injury. She's now 18 years old and was diagnosed with a sports injury that she didn't even really know that she had specifically when she was 15, wasn't properly diagnosed or treated. She struggled, as she shared with me, with this invisible illness.

Few people understand the effects of concussions and don't take them seriously. Of course, the symptoms are imperceptible other than that somebody is having challenges sometimes with their schooling or with their lives or with work or other things like that. Sometimes those symptoms can be chalked up to other reasons, and in fact their lives can be very seriously affected in more ways from that.

She shared with me that there are 10,000 new concussions in Alberta alone each year, the leading cause of death and disability for those under the age of 44, so a huge issue for youth. She also said that some of the most vulnerable are girls between the ages of 14 and 17, for whatever reason. She indicated that there's a prolonged recovery period that she's been suffering through as well. Of course, there are sports injuries, vehicle accidents. Sometimes, again, what may not appear to be a serious accident could result in a concussion.

You know, in fact, even one of our caucus staff, who is on medical leave, had an injury also. Again, a very, very odd situation. She banged her head getting into a vehicle, a hard hit, and has suffered now for a number of months with light sensitivity and inability to concentrate. Of course, for those of us that work on computer screens, all too often that's not an easy thing to recover from. We certainly have a great deal of compassion for those situations where someone wants to be fully productive and work and get on with their lives, but through those injuries and the prolonged recovery it can be a problem.

Madam Speaker, this is another great initiative today. I echo the sentiments of the Member for Calgary-Elbow that we've addressed some really positive and, I think, some uplifting issues here today. I'm quite happy to support this motion so that we can raise awareness for all individuals. It obviously happens from a very young age right through to seniors, and this can be very debilitating. If we can raise awareness and, as importantly, raise identification of when those injuries occur and how we can address those as quickly as possible, I think that's a very positive thing.

I will be supporting this motion, Madam Speaker. Thank you for the opportunity to speak.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the motion?

Seeing none, the hon. mover of the motion, Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'd like to take a few minutes to thank some people this afternoon. I'd like to start by thanking everyone who took the opportunity to speak in favour of the motion this afternoon: the members for Fort McMurray-Wood Buffalo, Sherwood Park, and everyone else that . . .

Mr. Clark: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms McPherson: Yes, the Associate Minister of Health.

There was Cypress-Medicine Hat and Calgary-Fish Creek. I really appreciate it. I can tell that concussion really resonates with a lot of people. It's affected a number of people.

I'd like to take the opportunity to thank some of the people that I consulted with in coming up with the motion. The first one is Dr. Mylène Hopf from Calgary. It was a conversation with her talking about concussions, patients that she saw in her own practice, and a lack of consistent information about concussion, both prevention and treatment. What she said to me was that a number of her patients didn't understand the instructions that were given to them, which makes sense because one of the symptoms of concussion can be confusion. So it makes a lot of sense that she would end up seeing people who were struggling with those symptoms.

She also related to me that she'd love to see some sort of way to disseminate information across the province, well, actually, with a few different groups, medical personnel and front-line medical workers, to have consistent information to share with patients, to have consistent education for people who are going to be dealing with situations where concussions might occur – minor sports is one area; teachers, coaches, parents are going to be attending those kinds of events – to have consistent information in the form of a brochure or an education program that would help people in those circumstances know what to do and also consistent information for patients so that when they have spoken to medical personnel, they're able to refer back to the information that they've received because it's very difficult for them to retain the information.

I'd like to acknowledge the hard work of the MPP for Nepean-Carleton in Ontario for her private member's bill Rowan's law. That established the Rowan's Law Advisory Committee to review jury recommendations made as a result of a coroner's inquest into the death of 17-year-old Rowan Stringer. The act required the committee to provide advice to the government with respect to head injury prevention and treatment. The report was tabled earlier this fall, and it contains 21 recommendations to address concussions.

Also, the Alberta Concussion Alliance and the Sport Medicine Council of Alberta have come together to provide direction about the prevention of and safe recovery from sport- and recreation-related concussions.

I also want to thank the numerous individuals I spoke to about their concussion experiences, how it affected their lives and continues to affect their lives, how long it took and is taking them to recover, and especially to Barb Currie from the Alberta Party caucus for generously sharing her family's experiences with concussion.

What this motion can do is create more awareness, prompt more education, hopefully spur more research about concussions, and ideally prevent some concussions and the associated suffering from occurring. I think it's an important motion, and I encourage everyone to support it.

[Motion Other than Government Motion 511 carried]

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. I think we will move on to private member's Motion 512 next week if we're here, so I would move that we call it 6 o'clock and adjourn till 7:30 this evening.

[Motion carried; the Assembly adjourned at 5:37 p.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

7:30 p.m.

Monday, December 11, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Please be seated.

Government Motions

The Speaker: The hon. Government House Leader.

Statutes Repeal

36. Mr. Mason moved:

Be it resolved that, pursuant to section 3 of the Statutes Repeal Act, SA 2013, cS-19.3, the Legislative Assembly resolves that the following statutes, appearing on the list of statutes to be repealed which was tabled in the Assembly by the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General on April 3, 2017 (Sessional Paper 126/2017), not be repealed:

1. Black Creek Heritage Rangeland Trails Act (2004 cB-2.5);
2. Forest Reserves Amendment Act, 2004 (2004 c9) s8;
3. Health Professions Act (RSA 2000 cH-7) ss155(1)(c), 156(n), (u), (aa), scheds. 1, 13;
4. Health Professions Amendment Act, 2008 (2008 c34) ss12, 13, 15;
5. Wilderness Areas, Ecological Reserves and Natural Areas Amendment Act (RSA 2000 c34 (Supp)) s8 (adds s8.1(3)).

Mr. Mason: Thank you very much. I'm sure all members fully understand this and will support this very clear and simple motion, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Are there any members who wish to speak to Government Motion 36?

Seeing and hearing none, the Government House Leader does not want to close debate?

Mr. Mason: Do you want me to close, Mr. Speaker?

The Speaker: That would be wonderful.

Mr. Mason: Mr. Speaker, I don't think that that's necessary. I think the motion is self-explanatory.

The Speaker: I wanted to hear it all again.

[Government Motion 36 carried]

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 30

An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans

Mr. Nixon moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be amended by deleting all of the words after "that" and substituting the following:

Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the government has not provided Albertans enough time to be consulted on the specific changes being proposed and, further, has not provided assurances that a full economic impact analysis has been completed detailing any potential negative impact on the economic well-being of Albertans.

[Debate adjourned on the amendment December 6: Mr. Coolahan speaking]

The Speaker: Are there any other members who wish to speak to Bill 30? The Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to rise and speak in the House with regard to the reasoned amendment on Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans. There are a multitude of reasons why this bill should be moved to a reasoned amendment, a lot of strong reasons why it shouldn't be read now, quite frankly. Once again, I think one of the primary reasons is because we have the NDP here pushing through a piece of legislation on a very tight timeline, a very large piece of legislation that actually needs significant opportunity to be examined, to be reviewed, to be understood, to be introduced to the public so that they can understand it. But none of that is going to happen. It just seems that from day one of this session there has been a process, an attempt to make sweeping legislation changes toward the end of the session with little or no public scrutiny. I think Albertans deserve more, really should have more.

For instance, let's just look at some details here. The current legislative logjam here is a result either of the inability or else deliberate manipulating by the current government to push everything to the end. Since the fall session began on October 31, this government adjourned debate early 11 times in the first 10 days. So for the first 10 days the government itself adjourned debate early, stretched things out, took their time, filibustered their own bills, and then at the very end here introduced five bills, totalling more than 565 pages, in the last seven days. That is a logjam, Mr. Speaker.

The NDP had little or no legislation at the beginning of the session, and now we're trying to ram significant bills through, as I said, 565 pages' worth, in less than seven days or about seven days. These are hundreds and hundreds of pages of new laws just in a few days that make it extremely difficult for Albertans to understand what's going on, to have opportunity to hear about it, for the media to focus on it. For that reason alone, I quite frankly think that this bill needs to be set aside for now and opportunity taken to look at it.

It really should have been, as the previous motion, sent to a standing committee, but we're past that stage now. It was defeated by this government because, again, I believe they just want to push it through. They're more interested in their ideology than anything else and particularly not interested in hearing from Albertans. A study by all parties on some sort of standing committee and from various stakeholders from around the province could have had a say except that that was defeated. Unfortunately, the reality is that that does take time, and it seems to me that that is not what this government is willing to take in order to get good legislation in Alberta. To get a bill of this size right, with so many pages, it needs to be mulled over. It needs stakeholders to consult on it. But once again we see very little evidence of consultation, no economic study to prove the bill's value or costs or any of that.

Just like the consultations a while back that took place in the middle of the afternoon, when all the people in the coal communities were at work – they do them in the middle of the afternoon so nobody can come. It doesn't work out to be consultations. Remember that little piece not long ago? We heard about it from the coal community. The call for a consultation when everybody is at work: this is the type of consultation this government too often likes. Bringing in diverse groups, though, with diverse ideas, bringing in some real facts to an all-party committee is definitely not their style.

The reality is that mines, power plants, and many other industrial workplaces actually have an incredible culture of working safety. Hard hats, safety vests, steel-toed boots, permission to refuse work: so many of these things are already in place. I actually wonder how many of them were consulted on this bill and what they would actually have to say about Bill 30 although I doubt that they had the opportunity to even know it's coming. I doubt that that's the crowd that this government really wanted to hear from.

We found out on December 6 that there were going to be close to 200 layoffs beginning as early as April 1, when TransAlta mothballs Sundance 3, 4, and 5, taking 1,100 megawatts of electricity offline. I want to know how pleased Albertans are with the layoffs that have been perpetuated by the NDP in addition to the changes to OH and S and the WCB brought forward in this bill. It's supposed to be a bill to protect workers, Mr. Speaker, but the act won't protect workers if they have no work because they won't be at work. This all ties together. There needs to be the kind of policies and regulations that actually encourage workers to be able to have work, give them good jobs, and keep them safe. That's the objective, but clearly that's not going to be the unintended consequence. I don't think that's the type of change that Albertans voted for.

Sadly, though, this government is not intent on listening. If it's not on their agenda, they'll not listen, and they've proven time and time again that they aren't interested in listening. It's really quite a shame that they voted down the committee amendment because I'm not sure that the Workers' Compensation Board itself was even consulted on this bill.

There are some good pieces of thought in this legislation, but there are some big kinks in it that need to be worked out, ones that could cost the province dearly if not discussed. Unfortunately, all of the omnibus bills this government has pushed forward will cost the leaders of future generations time to redo and fix.

There are many people from our province, from different paths in this province, who work in the interest of workers and the interest of employers and those who work in the interest of the public. They could have been consulted. We're reminded that the Chief Electoral Officer was not consulted. He said so in writing. I seriously doubt that the WCB was consulted either on this particular bill. The very people who have to administer it probably didn't have any opportunity to put input into it, to say anything about it because that is the pattern and the established way that this government works. I also know that the Alberta Roadbuilders & Heavy Construction Association was not consulted. They put it in writing as well. So I have some serious concerns about the level of consultation and public engagement not conducted by the government on these bills.

7:40

In fact, a letter was sent just recently to the Minister of Labour from the Alberta Roadbuilders & Heavy Construction Association. That letter expresses strong concerns with Bill 30 and straight out requests that third reading of the bill be delayed until there's time for consultation. How many stakeholders from various companies and government agencies would actually come forward, if they had time to hear about the bill, and express concerns regarding the many problematic areas? We could have time to fix this thing right if it was done right. Therefore, due to the many complexities it should not proceed.

The amendment that my colleague has brought forward calls for the bill to not be read a second time because the government has failed once again to provide any assurance that a full economic impact analysis has been done, as is the pattern. We can almost be confident that there has not been one done, or if it was and the government's own staff warned about the cost but the NDP buried the report, only after we FOIP it will the warning come to public light, much after they've been able to push this bill forward.

Mr. Speaker, the lack of consultation, the lack of openness and transparency, the urgency to push many bills forward in the last seven days of this whole session: for those reasons, this bill really should not be advanced past this stage. We really don't know how this bill is going to affect the well-being of Albertans, and quite truthfully that's pretty sad. Our own government has no idea how the changes in this legislation will affect Albertans' jobs in this province and how many people will lose their jobs. People's livelihoods are at stake, yet this government doesn't know what the outcome of implementing a bill of this magnitude and size will be. That truly is tragic.

The government needs to do some due diligence to get things right. They need to take a look in their own backyard and see the devastations they themselves have been inflicting. Maybe the reason the NDP voted down the referral amendment was because they didn't want us digging too much into the annual report of the WCB and into the reality that of 163,718 claims this last year, only 3,041 received a review request. Less than 2 per cent – it's actually 1.8 per cent – of all claims were even requested to have a review. A pretty small number. The begging question is: where did the urgency for these kinds of sweeping changes come from? Who was asking for it? Who was pushing for it? Who stepped forward publicly for these things? It wasn't there. It's driven by ideology.

Or maybe the year-end funded ratio for claims, 133.8 per cent: is that something that needs to be covered up by this government, so they're rushing through? At 133 per cent that's a pretty good average of, you might call it, overfunding.

Or the fact that the WCB has over $10.5 billion in funded assets against only $7.9 billion in liabilities. There's a lot of extra money sitting there. Last year, in 2016, the WCB took in almost a billion in revenue from employee-paid premiums, $994 million. The fund also, though, at the same time earned $750 million on investment income. Now, imagine if the investment income displaces the premiums and becomes even greater than that. There are just so many things about this bill that need to be looked into and considered.

I could also ask the question: is a cap of $98,000 realistic – or maybe I should say sustainable – in terms of maintaining the ability of the WCB to stay solvent? The average wage in Alberta is just over $60,000. Where did the need for almost $100,000 to be funded by employers come from, and is it a sustainable number? I don't know. Many things need to be asked about this bill.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, it's no wonder the NDP would not take Bill 30 to committee, with no thought to provide the potential economic impact, no consultations. This is a huge load on the small businesses of Alberta primarily, and the small businesses are our primary job creators and innovators. This is a download of more costs on the municipalities and the nonprofits, that are the lifeblood of so many communities large and small, and they, too, are going to be bearing additional costs here that nobody has even stopped to think about or ask about. We know the government will demand that they comply with the bill, but they'll provide nothing to help them with the costs. Are they supposed to fund raise from donors to support the government's grand schemes? Is this how you tax people even more after the grand carbon taxation plan? All of these questions are just as important as the changes to OH and S and the WCB that the NDP have proposed.

With that, I give you even more reasons why this bill should not proceed, and I encourage all members of the Assembly to vote in favour of the reasoned amendment because it's the only reasonable thing to do. Thank you.

The Speaker: Any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)?

The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I rise today to speak to Bill 30, I'm honoured to do so, and it was a pleasure to walk through the courtyard between the Federal building and this building.

The Speaker: My apologies. I didn't see the other member. There was a question under 29(2)(a). Is that correct?

Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes, under 29(2)(a). I was enjoying the member's speech here in talking about how the government had brought this legislation in. He talked about how in 10 days at the beginning of the session the government ended the days earlier. That's 10 days, so I guess four days a week. That's actually two and a half weeks we spent in this six-week session ending early. Of course, now we're near the end of the session, and all these big bills have been dropped on our desks here to review.

Obviously, you know, we have members on the other side saying how important this is. After 15 years this needs to be done, of course, but they seem like they want to ram it through, and they want to ram it through at the end of the legislative session. They don't want to have any committee work done on it. They don't want to do any proper consultation. The businesses, the government that's going to be affected by this, the workers who are going to be affected by this: nobody has had a chance to look at this and have input on this because this has just been brought in at such a late time in the session here. Of course, now the government is bound and determined to get this pushed through.

He mentions these things, and I just wanted to know if he could maybe continue in that vein and just talk a little bit more about how this is going to affect business and how pushing this through without proper consultation – now, of course, they talk about what they did beforehand, before they built this legislation, but now that they've created this bill, there should be more consultation because now we see exactly what the government wants to do. The businesses and the departments of the government can now look at this and say: "Okay. Now we understand where the government is going with this. Now let's look at it and let's see what the cost is going to be to businesses, what the cost is going to be to the organizations and to government and how it's going to affect the individuals that are affected by this." I wonder if he could maybe just continue in that vein a little bit and just give us a little bit better understanding of what that means and how it's going to affect us as we go forward.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes, I do think it's a very concerning situation we have, just a rush job to literally logjam all of the big, important bills into the last few days of session. It truly pushes legislation through so quickly that there isn't time for the important stakeholders to even know that it's out there, let alone scrutinize it. There's a real lack of accountability and transparency that occurs because of it. The biggest risk, quite frankly, is going to be to Alberta's recovery. We have a government that wants to create innovation, that wants to diversify our economy, that wants to grow our economy in lots of ways. Yet when you continue to push these kinds of bills through that do in effect create real costs on the backs of businesses, that really slow down their ability to do that, the reality is that that innovation, that new business creation, that opportunity gets squelched with the load that they have to carry.

In western society the reality is that it's because of the freedom of wealth and the freedom to explore beyond the bare means of survival that we're actually able to develop so many new and creative ideas and the arts and all kinds of things. If we take that away from our small businesses, we will lose that innovative reality, and we will lose our strongest employers, which are our small businesses.

The unintended consequence – I don't say that this is deliberate. The reality is that these will be unintended consequences that have not been thought about, that have not been measured. Instead of fixing the system, they may in fact make the climate for our businesses, our employers, and our innovators even more difficult and could end up breaking up our system even more than we have seen from the economic downturn.

The reality is that it isn't just the economic downturn; it's the policies that go with it that have hampered our businesses. While the goal of this bill should be to ensure that Albertans, all Albertans, who work hard every day, are safe and healthy. As I said, if they don't have a place to go to work, it doesn't do much good. We really do need to think through the consequences of what this bill could do with regard to costs and the burdens that it's going to place on business. Now, in a downturn is really not the time to be doing that, when many of them are having a very hard time surviving as it is.

I understand the need to change, to review, to update things, but let's do it in a meaningful and thoughtful way. Let's take the time rather than ramming a whole bunch of bills through in the last couple of days. Let's take the time to do it.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

The hon. Member for Calgary-South East.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is an honour to come to this House this evening to speak on behalf of Albertans. I was reminded of that honour as I walked here through the courtyard from the Federal building. To see all the children and the families taking in the Christmas spirit: it's just a reminder of what we're really here for and who we're meant to serve. It is an honour, and it is an honour to rise and speak on behalf of my constituents about Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans.

I'd like to start by again thanking the government for extending the presumptive coverage to paramedics who suffer a cardiac event just coming off shift or within 24 hours of their shift.

I also understand that much of this bill is bringing about changes to the Occupational Health and Safety Act and the Workers' Compensation Board that are overdue. It's essentially, in many cases, evergreening those policies. While I support this initiative to update the legislation and I'll be voting for the passage of this bill given the chance, I do have some concerns . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member, I would just remind you that you're speaking to the amendment. Are you aware of that?

Mr. Fraser: Yes.

The Speaker: Yeah. Great. Thank you. Keep going.

Mr. Fraser: This is why it is important when we're speaking to this amendment tonight – and I urge the government to listen to what the opposition is saying to them. It's important to recognize that their policies do affect Albertans in many ways and certainly our small businesses. I hope that the government, if they were to pass this bill, don't just walk away, that they would maybe listen in committee to some of the suggestions from the opposition, the third party, and other members about this crucial bill. I hope that the government will continue a dialogue with business to make sure that they can bear the additional costs – there are additional costs – and ensure that we're not making it too burdensome for small businesses to succeed, especially in this fragile opportunity to recover. We know that business confidence is up.

Again, speaking to the reasoned amendment and this bill, I hope that the government would listen to opposition members as they continue to speak about it. Even if, in the end, the government passes this bill, I hope that they continue to consult with businesses to make sure that businesses can actually afford the extra costs of this bill. Small businesses are definitely the backbone of our economy, and we need to foster them. We need to encourage them and help them grow.

The other piece of this, as I understand the legislation, is going to help Albertans that are on workers' compensation and occupational health and safety, to protect them. Again, the government needs to show Albertans that they can continue to be nimble and adjust course if these bills do not plan on working or they don't pan out and work. It's important to consult and make sure that this passage is serving the very people, with additional supports, that I believe Bill 30 is intended to help, with the Workers' Compensation Board. Again, as part of the reasoned amendment I do think it's important to pass these rules and make sure that they're in place to serve Albertans, but I would also caution the government to listen to the reason of the reasoned amendment to allow things. I hope that things would go to committee on a more often basis in this House so that we can truly serve Albertans in a much better manner.

Mr. Speaker, it was my honour, again, to speak to the members of this Chamber. Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any comments or questions under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Calgary-South East?

Speaking to the amendment, Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise in the House today in support of the reasoned amendment to Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans. That was put forth by the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre on the grounds that the government has not provided Albertans enough time for consultation on the specific changes being proposed and, further, has not provided assurances that a full economic impact analysis has been completed detailing any potential negative impact on the economic well-being of Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, due diligence is a business term that means proper research and analysis is complete before steps are taken to complete the transaction. In law it means exercising reasonable care to avoid harm to other persons. There is a reason law firms make lots of money performing due diligence: because it takes a significant amount of time while all factors are being taken into consideration to protect a client, the public, a business, or whomever they may be representing. Due diligence takes time, something this government has not spent enough of in reviewing this bill with the public now that it has been tabled in this House.

Since this bill was tabled, businesses, interest groups, private citizens, and other organizations have been flooding members on this side of the House, asking for help and telling us how badly this bill will impact them. I have to assume that the members opposite are also getting the same feedback, so why haven't they been listening? The government knows it's not enough to simply do public consultations before the bill is written. Much of the push-back comes after it has been introduced.

I'm realistic that the government isn't going to rewrite this bill, but as we have discussed over the past week, members opposed to this bill have been scoffed at and ridiculed for a number of reasons, and many of us are simply highlighting the initial feedback we have received from our constituents. The government may not agree with what we have to say, but will they go as far as mocking Albertans for commenting on a bill they don't like? I can't imagine it. Nevertheless, it's true.

Given that the government has failed to consider the economic impact of this bill, it stands to reason that Bill 30 must not proceed to second reading. An economic impact study takes into consideration three factors: direct impacts, indirect impacts, and induced impacts. Combined, these impacts equate to the total economic impact that a potential action might have on the economy locally, provincially, and nationally. When considering Bill 30, what are the direct impacts? What will the immediate results be from this piece of legislation? How will this bill affect employees, employers, the injured, and WCB and OHS industry workers? What about the indirect impacts? How will the bill affect the families of workers or employers? How will the supply side of this manage procedural changes and buying patterns? Finally, the induced impacts. What will the bill do to local economies that are dependent on the small and medium-sized businesses that this bill will affect most? A full economic impact study accounts for questions like these and countless others, which is why you can imagine such a process takes a long time to complete.

Mr. Speaker, the government is going to tell us that they have already accounted for all this. They're going to tell us that they already did the due diligence, but in response I ask: how? How did you consult Albertans in all 87 constituencies over the past week? I certainly haven't heard anything about the government visiting the people in my own riding. It's impossible. The government has been here since tabling this bill, with the exception of the Premier, who has been on her social licence, let's copy the UCP and Jason Kenney because pipelines finally matter tour, to select cities across Canada.

Preconsultation is only a part of the process. Many Alberta businesses and private citizens are just now waking up, and they are just now seeing the damaging effects this bill is going to have. If the government isn't going to listen to these people now, then the only option there is that I see is to refuse this bill a second reading.

We tried to have this sent to committee, but of course the government voted that down. There was an opportunity that we could have taken it to committee, where we could have brought in experts, we could have brought in industry, we could have brought in government, we could have brought in individuals. We could have brought in all those different people to have the input, looking at this bill as it stands right now, which is substantially different than the consultations before the bill was drafted.

Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of things this government could have done to make this a far more open and transparent process and to have the proper consultation that's needed. We don't know what the unintended consequences will be because this government hasn't looked into them yet. We've seen other bills pass in this Legislature, multiple bills passed in this Legislature, where we on this side of the House warned the government of the negative consequences of their actions, what this could do, and we've seen this government over and over pass those bills, ram them through. Then we've seen them come to the Legislature again with other bills to correct the damage that they created in the first bill, and if that isn't enough, then they'd have to pass another bill to solve the problems created by the second bill that was supposed to fix the first bill. We've seen that in this Legislature.

This government, as much as they can stand here and say, "We've looked at it all. We've got it all under control. It's great. Just trust us," Mr. Speaker, it doesn't cut it. It doesn't cut it. It won't cut it for Albertans. So we need to have this chance to review these things properly.

Obviously, economic impact assessments: those are things that we can see what the cost will be to businesses, what the cost will be to government and how it will affect things that people just can't see at a quick glance. That's why industry wants to see this. We've seen the Chambers of Commerce. They wanted this to go to committee. Obviously, I would expect the government must have consulted with them, and after seeing this, the Chambers of Commerce still says: we want this to go to committee.

Mr. Speaker, I think there's a lot of work that could be done to this yet. I know the members opposite have talked about how long it's been since this was last reviewed, 15 years. That's a long time. I'm sure it needs to be reviewed. I'm sure there are things that can be corrected. But with this, the way it's been done, it doesn't give that opportunity to be done properly. There's just not the time that is required.

Now, in this bill we've seen the government members talk about refusing unsafe work and how important that is and how it's so great that it's covered in this legislation. But, Mr. Speaker, I had a chance to go on a website here the other day, and this is actually the Canadian Union of Public Employees website, CUPE. This is their website. This is an article from June 12, 2014, on the website. Now, June 12, 2014 – that's a year before this government was elected, so long before they were elected, a long time from this period of time right now – they're talking about how great this is, giving the workers the right to refuse unsafe work. I'm going to read this.

The right to refuse unsafe work is one of the three basic health and safety rights achieved by the labour movement, along with the right to know about the hazards in your workplace, and the right to participate in workplace health and safety decisions.

Here's this organization, the Canadian Union of Public Employees, lauding the work that they've done to give workers the right to refuse unsafe work. So this isn't something new.

In fact, they say here – look at this:

Order wallet-sized right to refuse cards for your local for free in our web store.

You could even get little cards to pack around that can remind you about the right to refuse unsafe work. Again, Mr. Speaker, this is from June 2014, a year before this government was elected.

Now, it does go on to break it down province by province. Province by province I'll start with Alberta, of course, and this is what it says about Alberta.

The law in Alberta states that you shall refuse all unsafe work if you believe there is an imminent danger (that is not normal for the occupation or activity) to yourself or others caused by a tool, appliance, equipment or work procedure at the worksite, according to Section 35 of the Occupational Health and Safety Act.

There it is. Again, this is from the Canadian Union of Public Employees website, 2014, how it spells it out.

It goes on to say:

Here's how you can refuse unsafe work:

- (1) Notify your employer at the worksite that you are refusing work because you don't think it is safe, and state your reason for refusal.
- (2) The supervisor must investigate and take action to eliminate the danger. There must be a written record of your notification, the investigation, and action taken. A copy of the report must be provided to you.

That seems pretty clear: notify, supervisor investigates, paper trail. Looks like it's covered fairly well there.

- (3) If, in your opinion, a danger still exists, you can file a complaint with a government occupational health and safety officer.

So if you're still not satisfied, you still have opportunities and options.

- (4) The officer shall investigate the complaint, and document actions taken in a written report. A copy of the report must be provided to you.

Again, another report on the same situation.

- (5) If you are not satisfied with the officer's report . . .

So if you're not satisfied with the first report and not satisfied with the second report

. . . and recommendations, you must legally return to work, but may appeal the report within 30 days.

Still an opportunity to appeal.

And it says here:

You cannot be disciplined or dismissed for complying with the legislation, according to Section 36 of the Act.

There it is, Mr. Speaker, how it's spelled out as far as refusing unsafe work in Alberta, again, long before this government was elected.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Member for Edmonton-Decore got up and talked about there having been no review in 15 years, and when I hear that, I think: it should be done right, then. If it hasn't been done in 15 years, there's no reason to ram it through in just a few days. Do it right. Do the proper consultation.

The Member for Calgary-Klein said that this has been a government priority; it's long overdue. Ramming through legislation at the end of the session: is that how this government treats its priorities? I would hope not. I would hope that if this is a priority, it should get all the due care and attention that it could possibly get.

I'm no expert on any of this stuff, but there are people that are experts. I don't believe there are any experts in this House. But there are experts out there. There are experts that would come and present to a committee. They would be happy to be consulted by this government, to give their input. [interjections] Unfortunately, it seems like the government, from the chatter here on the other side, think they're experts on this, Mr. Speaker, and that's a pretty sad state, when we think that we have all the expertise we need in this House for such wide-ranging legislation as this.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I talked earlier about this. You know, during the first part of the session the government shut down our days early. We didn't even have evening sittings. In the afternoon we were getting sent home early. Either they didn't have their work prepared for this Legislature, or they were delaying bringing in the most important and biggest legislation for the end of the session so that they could ram it through before Christmas. I don't think that's the way we should be doing business here.

This is no way to prove accountability to the Alberta people. This is no way to prove transparency to the people. We don't know what the costs will be with this because the government hasn't done that economic analysis. What are the costs to the WCB? What is the cost to small business? What is the cost to the government? They'll have to abide by this, too. Every time you have more legislation, you have more costs. I don't believe that this government, of course, has looked at anything about reducing regulation anywhere, regulation that doesn't make sense. It's outdated. I don't see any removal of anything that's outdated or anything. All I see is more regulation and more cost to the WCB. And without the proper analysis I don't think that we can say that we are doing our due diligence here.

Now, the Member for Calgary-Klein suggested at one time that it would be insulting to workers to send this to committee. Well, no. I think it would be insulting to workers to ram something through that hasn't been properly vetted and hasn't been properly dealt with and hasn't been properly consulted. That's what would be insulting. We're not delaying safety here. We want to make safety better. We have an opportunity to make things better here. I mentioned earlier about the Chambers of Commerce. That would have been one of the organizations to consult with.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any questions for the Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My hon. colleague from Grande Prairie-Smoky was talking about consultations and due diligence and the number of issues that we are trying to address in this bill. I know there is a valid reason why we brought in this amendment, to have more meaningful consultations, so I would ask my hon. colleague to continue to share his thoughts on this.

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you very much. Yes. We know that this government has had problems in the past with unintended consequences. I talked about that earlier, too, where they would come up with a bill and we would warn this government about the consequences of that bill, the unintended consequences, what would happen if they passed this legislation. Of course, they would pass it anyway. Then, of course, they would come back in the next session with another bill to pass to solve the problems that they created with the first bill they passed.

Then, of course, there were situations where the government ended up in lawsuits over legislation that they passed, where they were suing Albertans because of legislation they passed. We told them: be careful what you're doing; you need to look at the whole picture here. The government seemed to think that contracts written in black and white were somehow – I don't know – some sort of underhanded deal or something. The contracts that they were dealing with were black and white. They were written. They passed legislation that caused these companies grief, and then of course the government ended up suing them. In fact, they were suing Albertans, using Alberta tax dollars to sue Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, that's why this government needs to do the proper consultation. It needs to look at these bills and needs to allow people to look at these bills after they're produced. It's one thing to go consult with them before and then create a document and then say: I hope you're happy with it. I guess that's what they're saying. What they need to do is go back to those same people and say: this is what we've come up with based on what we heard from a wide range of people. I'm sure that not everybody they consulted with agreed with every single thing in this bill, but now that they see what the government wants to do, I'm sure they would have an opinion about every single thing in this bill if they had the opportunity to look it through and have some sort of opportunity for input, but obviously there's no opportunity for input when this government sets this legislation down on the table near the end of the session and starts pushing it through with multiple big bills all at the same time.

Of course, they consider every single one of these a priority, but if they're priorities, why aren't we taking care of them properly? Why aren't we properly consulting? Why aren't we taking the time to do this right?

We've seen the situation where the Member for Edmonton-South West, I think, brought forward a bill, and I think the consultation number he was talking about was that around 30,000 people had responded. You know what happened to that bill, Mr. Speaker? That bill went to committee afterwards. After all that consultation it went to committee for more consultation in order to try to get it right. Now this government brings this bill here, which is substantially larger – I'd probably say a hundred times larger – and they've dropped it on the table here and said: hey, we're done consultation; we've got this under control; just pass it. Well, I don't buy it, and I don't think Albertans are buying it, and I don't think small businesses in Alberta are buying it. They don't have any time at this time of the year to look and see what the costs of this will be to them.

Some of this bill comes into play January 1. This legislation hasn't even passed yet, and within two weeks they're going to be implementing some of this bill. And this is through the Christmas season, when either some businesses are incredibly busy or some businesses want to shut down and finally have a break to spend time with their families. Instead, they'll be going through 150, 200 pages of a bill to try to decide how it's going to affect their business. Mr. Speaker, I don't think that's fair to Albertans. I don't think that's right for Albertans. I think there's an opportunity for this government to do the right thing and help to pass this amendment so that we can have the proper time to consult, so that Albertans can be consulted, and so that small business can decide how they feel about it.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Any members who wish to speak to amendment RA1? The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It's a tremendous honour for me to be able to rise to speak to some elements, to an element of this bill, anyway, because I'm very proud of our government for bringing it forward on behalf of the people of Alberta, the working people of Alberta and, frankly, their families and pretty much everybody who lives in the communities with those people. This is a very, very long, long overdue step forward on behalf of workers in this province.

You know, let me begin with just a few of the points that have been made. There are people out there saying, "Well, no one in this building is an expert on the matter," and there's no question that that is definitely true. No one is an absolute expert. But many people on this side of the House do have some experience with this matter, Mr. Speaker.

I was privileged when I was at law school to help work with a professor who wrote the Canadian textbook on workers' compensation law. I was privileged here in Alberta to be appointed to the Appeals Commission and to serve on the Appeals Commission and to hear appeals of workers' compensation cases. I, of course, spent many years representing injured workers, and of course, when I was in B.C., I also had the opportunity to sit on a panel of three that rewrote the health and safety legislation in B.C. So I've got a bit of experience on it. Of course, I along with our caucus members all understood that this was an area that had been long overdue and forgotten and neglected in Alberta at the profound expense of working people in Alberta and in a way that was absolutely unacceptably different than the standards that existed in the rest of this country. That's why it makes me personally very proud to be here.

The members opposite right now are playing the game of suggesting that this is really about more consultation. Let me say very clearly – and I will certainly talk about that in a moment – that this is not about the need for more consultation. This is about the members opposite not wanting to take these important steps forward to protect workers, to protect their families, and to keep them safe. That is the decision that is being made here right now by the members opposite as they engage in these ridiculous conversations about the need to delay.

But before we talk about why it is that that's not really an issue, let me just talk a little bit about some of the statistics and some of the people that I've come to know in my time who've been subjected to the laws here in Alberta. You know, there was a time, back in the '90s, when we had a certain health and safety regime, and under the old PC government they decided that they would change the rules, and they created this new thing called deeming. It meant that when a worker was injured and they were permanently injured as a result of an unsafe workplace, they weren't necessarily entitled to compensation for the duration of that injury even if it meant that a disc was permanently ruptured, or maybe they'd gotten a steel bar in their back and were told by their doctor that they would never lift more than five pounds ever again in their life. Even if that was the case, they couldn't anticipate having benefits for the rest of their working life.

I mean, I had so many cases that I worked on, but I remember in particular one lovely woman who was a nurse. She had trained as a nurse for two years in England. She'd gotten her nursing degree back at the time when you could become a bedside nurse with a two-year degree. She worked bedside in England for about 20 years, taking care of patients. She moved to Canada, and she continued that work at one of the hospitals here. She was getting close to retirement. She worked bedside, giving medications, moving patients, helping them to walk up and down the hall, all the things that nurses do. One day a patient fell, and she reached in to stop that patient from falling, and she put out her back. She had to go get surgery, and she was never to be the same. She was about 55 years old. She hadn't lived in Canada long enough to be eligible for CPP.

She was told that there was a job in Calgary as the director of community services nursing, where she would have 300 nurses reporting to her, and that she, because she was a nurse, could get that job. Therefore, she experienced no earnings loss, and they cut her off. That is what happened to her. That was the kind of ridiculous stuff that was happening under the previous piece of legislation.

We walked in and said: "You know what? You have a duty to accommodate. You have a human rights duty to accommodate." Not only did the employer say, "No, we don't," but the Workers' Compensation Board said: "No, we don't. What's the duty to accommodate? That's not our issue." It's a function of the human rights code, Mr. Speaker. It's the function of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. But systematically – systematically – our Workers' Compensation Board thought it was a bit inconvenient to actually give workers the benefit of that right, so that woman was left. Now, thankfully, we were able to appeal and take it all the way to the Appeals Commission, and ultimately she got her benefits. But for every worker that had to go all that way to get those benefits, there were five others who simply gave up in the fight.

Let me tell you a little bit about economic consequences. You know what happens when that happens? That problem doesn't just disappear into the ether never ever to be something to be measured as an impact on our community, on our economy, if you want to talk about economic consequences. That problem remains in our community. It is a person who is suffering, who has had their rights taken away from them, and they are still our neighbour. They are still our co-worker. They are still our relatives. That's the thing.

Just as a little, interesting sidebar, we have AISH in this province, and we have reasonably generous – most people on AISH wouldn't say that, but relative to the rest of the country it pays more than most. I would say that at least a third of the claimants on AISH right now are people who have been unable to secure the benefits to which they are entitled under the Workers' Compensation Board. Mr. Speaker, what that means is that the taxpayers of Alberta are paying the cost for employers who are not putting in place the kind of safe work practices that would stop these injuries from happening in the first place.

Mr. Speaker, let me be clear. This is not just something that happens because people are – what was it? – "stupid is as stupid does." I'm still waiting for the apology from the UCP for that because you owe it. You deeply owe it.

Nonetheless, it is not because of that. It is because we had a system that was not fairly compensating injured workers. How do we know that? Well, if you look at it statistically, people will say: "Oh, well, we don't have as many injuries in Alberta per capita. There are not as many. They're not reporting them to the WCB, so clearly it's not a problem." But, of course, claims can be suppressed, as was identified in the report that preceded this piece of legislation. When claims are suppressed, the stats are invalid. The only claims that cannot be suppressed, the only stats that cannot be hidden are when people die. Interestingly, Alberta has the highest fatality rate in the country for the very reason that we have not taken health and safety seriously and we have not taken compensation seriously. It has been an injustice that has gone on for decades in this province, and the folks over there should be ashamed at trying to delay us finally moving forward on it.

We are nonetheless moving forward, Mr. Speaker, and we are doing so after a tremendous amount of work ensuring that Albertans know what we are doing. I believe it was in the fall of 2016 that a WCB panel issued a discussion paper and went to all Albertans and said: "Here are the issues that we are looking at right now. Please give us your input." And, of course, they did, by the hundreds, by the thousands. Merit Contractors bought billboards, starting in the middle of 2016, telling everybody: "Go. Make sure you get in there, because the government wants to change your WCB." I mean, they were out there campaigning up the yingyang, fund raising off it, no doubt. The reality is that that's what they were doing, and that was out there in the summer of 2016.

As a result of that, in the spring of 2017 a final report was completed and released. But that was not enough – no, no – because the commission went further. They released their report, and they put it out again. They said: "Okay, folks. Here's what we heard from the thousands and thousands of people that engaged. Here's the report that we've written. We're going to put it out to you again. What do you think?" From June 2017 to September 2017 off they went. They consulted again, and people had more time to look at the finished report. This act that you see now is the product of that process, a year and a half. For the love of God, do you want to send it to another committee? Come on, people.

You know, the fact of the matter is that there are recommendations after recommendations from decades ago begging the government of Alberta to step up and to fix this system. There were judicial inquiries from fatalities saying: step up and fix this system. They've been trying. All these folks did was ignore it; they did everything they possibly could. Now they want to put it off even further because they just don't want to see finally some fairness for workers on this important issue.

Do you know what else, Mr. Speaker? We are the only province in the country – the only province in the country – that doesn't have mandatory joint work-site health and safety committees. The reality is that anybody – any working guy, any working woman, any working person out there – knows that the way to create safety in the workplace is to have the front-line worker sitting in a room with the employer, who has the ability to make the decisions about resources, has the ability to make the decisions about the tools, has the ability to make the decisions about the work process. Those people have to be in the room, and the workers, who understand how it makes them unsafe, have to be in the room, and they have to be on a level playing field. They have to work out the way to make the job safe. That's how you create safety in the workplace. That is how workers and employers have been working to create safe workplaces from Newfoundland to B.C. to the Yukon, everywhere except in the province of Alberta under the leadership of those guys over there.

What they want us to do is wait even longer – wait even longer – make it even harder, stand by while more families suffer the consequences of fatalities and injuries at the work site. I just don't know how you look your constituents in the eyes. I just don't know how they do. I mean, we're all MLAs. All of us know that the single biggest thing that you will hear about from your constituents are the injustices that they experience as the result of things going wrong at the Workers' Compensation Board. It's a nonpartisan issue, for heaven's sakes, and if you think people are just making it up when they come to your office, give your head a shake. It's real. It is absolutely real.

We have an opportunity, all of us, to come together thoughtfully, carefully, to move forward, to get this legislation passed. We do not need to dither any longer, Mr. Speaker. We had decades of dithering over there. We have now had more than a year and a half of thoughtful consultation, collaboration led by experts, with massive amounts of engagement from unions and employers and workers and experts across the board. There is absolutely no reason to delay this. There is every reason to move forward and to do so in the best interests of and for the best outcomes for Albertans because, as you may have heard, we're really interested in making life better for Albertans, and this will do it.

For those people – I'm sure not many but maybe one or two members opposite – who think that the strategy here is to engage in the Chicken Little routine and claim that this is somehow going to put everybody out of business, rest assured that the WCB has engaged in an analysis of this. They tell us that the cost increases will be minimal and in the long term perhaps even less because of the prevention that we're going to be seeing through health and safety. But, in any event, they will not go any higher than what they were in 2010, which, to be clear, was still about half the national average, Mr. Speaker.

Costs are not the issue here. Safety is the issue, fair compensation is the issue, justice is the issue, supporting those families of injured workers is the issue, supporting our communities is the issue, and it's time to get the job done.

Thank you.

8:30

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky under 29(2)(a).

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, it was very disappointing to hear the Premier speak just now. She, of course, had to start off by saying that this side of the House does not want to implement safety and protection. Very, very, very wrong. If she says that this side of the House is wanting to delay the implementation of safety and protection, then she is also saying that the Alberta Chambers of Commerce is against safety and protection of workers. You know what? That's very, very disappointing, to have the Premier stand up in this House and accuse the Alberta Chambers of Commerce of not caring about their workers. That is absolutely shameful.

Now, in our constituency offices we hear lots of complaints about the WCB. We want to see the WCB fixed. Now, the Premier herself has said that the system is broken, but do you remember what happened two years ago, Mr. Speaker? This very government passed Bill 6, and you know what they did with Bill 6? They forced every farmer in Alberta into WCB ... [interjections]

The Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Loewen: ... a system that she herself said was broken. That's what they think of farmers, to put them in the same situation as the rest of Albertans, in what she claimed or said was a broken system.

Now, she said that we should be ashamed of delay. Mr. Speaker, this Legislature started sitting on October 30. October 30. What are we at now? We're at December 11. We're sitting here considering this legislation on December 11. This government has been in power for two and a half years. So when they accuse somebody of dithering, who's dithering? Two and a half years of dithering; six, eight weeks of dithering. We had the opportunity to send this to committee, and we could have been dealing with this right now in committee already, but you know what happened? This government turned it down. They turned it down. They voted it down, the opportunity to go to committee and have more input and make this legislation better. There are some very important parts of this legislation – very important parts – but there are parts that could use some improvement.

I know that organizations like the Chambers of Commerce want to have more input. They want to have the opportunity to have more say in this. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that the Alberta Chambers of Commerce wants to see their workers hurt? Do you think they want to see them suffer from a system that's broken? I don't believe so. I don't believe so. I know those people in the Chambers of Commerce. I do business with them. I meet with them. I sit down with them a lot. Their members are a community. They do not want to see their workers hurt. They don't want to see them mistreated by the WCB or anybody else.

Now we have an opportunity to fix this, Mr. Speaker – we really do – but let's fix it right. Let's not ram it through at the end of the legislative session. Let's not wait till the end. That's dithering. Dithering is sending us home early the first two and a half weeks of the session, and then in the last session we're here till 10 o'clock, midnight, whatever. Happy to do our work. We'll be here till 2 in the morning if we have to be. I don't care. I'll be here till 4 in the morning if I have to be, but let's get this right. Let's not sit here and throw comments like that back and forth. That's not right. That's not helping the workers of Alberta.

What's helping the workers of Alberta is if we'd look at this properly, have the proper input, the proper consultation. That's what will help the workers in Alberta. Mr. Speaker, we had an opportunity to see other bills brought forward by government members, with months and months of consultation, tens of thousands of people having input on it, and then going to committee. I would like to see this so-called consultation. What did I hear? Eight round-tables? Wow. Wow. And 1,300 in an online survey or something like that? I mean, come on.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Anyone else who wishes to speak to the amendment? Calgary-Foothills.

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to speak to the amendment to Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans. On this side of the House we are all for more protection and benefits for injured workers. On this side of the House we are all for employers' access to assistance during appeals. On this side of the House we want to protect the workers from reprisal for complying with the act. There are so many good things that we'd like to support.

Today we saw some spirit of co-operation in this House, Mr. Speaker. When the Deputy Speaker was in your chair, we debated the bill brought by my colleague from Drayton Valley, and that was passed in collaboration with the government benches. The same with the other one, brought forward by the MLA for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill, my neighbouring riding. We were so happy. We thought that this government was on the path of listening and collaboration. Now here we go. The Premier comes and started lecturing. [interjections] Yeah, yeah. She's asking for an apology. You know who should be apologizing? [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members.

Mr. Panda: She should be apologizing for calling Albertans sewer rats or Chicken Little . . . [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. member, I want to . . .

Mr. Panda: . . . or embarrassing cousins.

The Speaker: Hon. member, please.

Speaker's Ruling Language Creating Disorder

The Speaker: Need I remind everyone that, particularly at this late time in the evening, continuously we hear – I'm trying to remember the exact clause.

Some Hon. Members: Standing Order 23(j).

The Speaker: Standing Order 23(j). Continuously I hear that. I don't think that the kind of rephrasing of words like "sewer rats," which was already mentioned in this House in an earlier session, helps at all with respect to the debate. Again I want to urge you all, particularly the hon. member, to be careful about using those kinds of words because they do cause disruption in the House.

Please continue.

Mr. Panda: Mr. Speaker, you just heard Madam Premier calling, "Chicken Little," and there was no objection to that. When you talk about disorder, there are so many things that would cause disorder. We're not starting it, but we are responding to it. Just to be on the record.

Debate Continued

Mr. Panda: As I said before, Mr. Speaker, we are here to support the good clauses of the bill, but like my colleague explained before, our job is to do due diligence, not to rubber-stamp whatever the Premier and the cabinet bring to this House. That's not why we are here. There are so many reasons, explained by the previous speakers. When the Premier says that we are not interested in that, that's not entirely correct. We are actually interested in passing good legislation, but don't expect us to rubber-stamp. Like the previous speaker explained, we're not delaying it. They had the opportunity to bring this bill much earlier. We're willing to go as long as it takes to make this bill better, so don't blame us for your incompetence and inefficiency.

8:40

Mr. Speaker, I also have a legal background with these workers' issues. When I worked in oil and gas, I was first surprised to hear that in this country, in this province workers have a right to refuse the work if it is unsafe to do. That's much before this Premier or this government or any of us. That was the culture. That was the work culture in this country, which I'm very proud of. I was pleasantly surprised, when I worked at Suncor, when I learned about that on the sites I was working at. So to say that workers don't have that right, as if they are the first ones to, you know, tell them that they have the right to refuse, is totally not correct.

There are so many things to complain about on these ones, but our job is to work collaboratively with them if they're willing to listen to the stakeholders. Don't listen to us, but don't insult stakeholders like the chambers of Alberta – the Calgary Chamber and all those guys – when they're telling you that there are clauses in this bill that will devastate the economy. You know, the Premier said that we should be helping workers. We'll help them if they have work to do, but if you're killing jobs, if there is no place for these Albertans to go to work, how are you helping them?

When we bring in stakeholders, we're not just saying to bring only the companies the Premier mentioned. You know, even Mr. McGowan can bring his colleagues and identify the improvements to this bill. We are all open for it. That's why we're saying: have a proper consultation.

With that, I think, Mr. Speaker, I'm going to vote in favour of this amendment. Thank you.

The Speaker: The Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky under 29(2)(a).

Mr. Loewen: Yes. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We've talked a lot here this evening about the speed at which this has been pushed through and that, you know, this government is talking about, in fact the Premier just talked about how any kind of delay is just, I guess – I don't know. I'm not sure what the problem with it is to get it right. Anyway, she doesn't seem to be too supportive of having any more consultation on this.

I just want to read from a letter dated today to the Minister of Labour from the Alberta Roadbuilders & Heavy Construction Association. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Premier just talked about how anybody who wants to delay this at all obviously doesn't care about safety and protection of the workers, but of course we just talked about how the Chambers of Commerce would like to have seen this go to committee. I'm very certain myself – and I hope the Premier would agree – that the Alberta Chambers of Commerce does not want to see their workers hurt. It doesn't want to see them suffer because of poor WCB claims.

Now, let's just read what the Alberta Roadbuilders & Heavy Construction Association said just today. Mr. Speaker, this is an organization that obviously has a lot at stake in this, and they finally looked through this and have given it the time they could and have written a letter just today. That's how little time the organizations that would view this bill as importantly as this group – and they're just finally getting a letter to the Minister of Labour today because it's such a huge bill and there's so much concern for it and how it could impact them.

I'll just read one paragraph here.

We are concerned at the speed at which Bill 30, introduced on November 27th, 2017 is moving through the legislature and request time for a full costing analysis . . .

Now, a full costing analysis sounds like an economic impact analysis. I think we've mentioned that once or twice here today and over the last couple of days, Mr. Speaker. They're asking for the same thing.

... to be done by the Department before the Bill proceeds to third reading.

They're asking for the department to do a full costing analysis to see how it's going to affect them and the department.

We want to work with the Government of Alberta...

That doesn't sound very adversarial to me. They want to work with the government of Alberta.

... to ensure the changes presented in Bill 30 enhance workplace safety...

That doesn't sound like they want to dither around, like the Premier is suggesting, you know, possibly make people suffer or whatever the Premier was suggesting. That sounds like they care.

... while supporting a sustainable and economical structure for the Government of Alberta...

They're concerned about a sustainable and economical structure for the government of Alberta.

... workers and employers.

Mr. Speaker, this is a group, obviously a very large group, that's got a lot at stake here with this bill, with a lot of workers involved in this. I would hope that nobody on the other side is going to get up and suggest that the Alberta Roadbuilders & Heavy Construction Association doesn't care about safety and their workers. I would hope that they're not going to suggest that. Very clearly, the Alberta Roadbuilders & Heavy Construction Association would like to see this full costing analysis done because they want to see sustainability. They want to see an opportunity. They don't want to see their businesses fail. They don't want to see the government fail. They want to see success. Their businesses rely on success both with the government and themselves.

We see here that these organizations, even to this day, are still giving input to the government on this legislation. I don't see how the government can sit here and claim that they have consulted fully with everybody when organizations like this are sending letters today expressing their concerns. One of the concerns is the speed at which – Bill 30 was introduced on November 27. Mr. Speaker, this bill could have been introduced on October 30. In fact, if the government felt the need to, they could have started the session earlier, and we could have been dealing with it earlier.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any other individuals who wish to speak to RA1? Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yes, I rise to speak on RA1, reasoned amendment 1, that Bill 30... be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the government has not provided Albertans enough time to be consulted on the specific changes being proposed and, further, has not provided assurances that a full economic impact analysis has been completed detailing any potential negative impact on the economic well-being of Albertans.

Mr. Speaker, let's be clear. There are good things here in Bill 30 – I'll give that to the minister, for sure – but there are also some things that raise significant concerns not just for myself and my colleagues but for many from industry and for many that are on the front lines. Whether it be the construction industry or any other businesses within Alberta, they are concerned.

Part of the reason that we raise concerns is the fact that we're dealing with such a large bill, and it does take time to fully digest it and analyze it. You know, today the minister was sent a letter by the Alberta Roadbuilders & Heavy Construction Association – I believe everybody has received a copy of that – to get the Alberta

Roadbuilders & Heavy Construction Association's take on Bill 30 and some of the concerns they have.

The Premier stands up and talks about the fact that the WCB review has taken over a year and a half, but at the same time Bill 30 is not just with regard to the WCB. It also includes the OH and S Act. I do believe that we need to ensure that we are doing what's right on both of these aspects. It is disappointing for me to see that Bill 30 comes forward, an omnibus bill which could have easily been split into two bills.

Yet this government has decided that they know best and that they don't need to do the transparent and accountable consultation that Albertans expect. They are willing to come forward with legislation, try to ram it through right at the end of session. That makes Albertans and that makes employers and employees suspicious of what this government's intentions are with regard to Bill 30. I believe that we would have done a lot of good if we had moved into committee with it.

It's interesting, Mr. Speaker. This morning I was driving to work shortly after 7 o'clock, and on the radio they were talking about I believe it was Bill 203, the Alberta Standard Time Act. They were discussing how sunrise was at 8:24 this morning and could you imagine if Bill 203 would have been passed, if the daylight savings time bill would have been passed? They said that we wouldn't have sunlight until 9:24. It's a good thing that it didn't get passed, they said. So, you know, committee work is important.

For this government to think that Albertans are happy with the process that's being proceeded with here, I think that they underestimate Albertans, and they are also doing a disservice to Albertans. At least, we could take the time to get this right, slow down Bill 30 so that the homework can be done on it, homework in a very transparent manner.

I believe that we need to ensure that Albertans have an open and transparent method of input towards legislation such as this. I'd be curious to see from the Chambers of Commerce their response and their input on what they're happy about with Bill 30 and also the things that they're concerned about with Bill 30. I would also like to hear from the Alberta Federation of Labour, Gil McGowan, get his perspective on Bill 30. But, of course, because we didn't refer it to committee, we're not afforded that opportunity.

They are doing it again, implementing changes to the Workers' Compensation Act and the OH and S Act at the same time. This large, complex bill could easily be split into separate pieces of more manageable legislation. All of these bills need the appropriate amount of scrutiny. Mr. Speaker, there are risks involved, and that's why it's important that this reasoned amendment comes forward.

You know, I was part of the hog industry, the pork industry. Over the 25 years that I was a producer of livestock, I saw it change a lot, some of it very reasonable changes, some of it a lot of red tape that was just paperwork that began to become excessive. Mr. Speaker, it does have implications because, at the end of the day, individuals are in the business to try and make a profit in order to keep their farms successful. When we started to implement more and more red tape, then many individuals – and we've seen it right across this province – decided that they were not prepared to do that any longer, and the hog industry restructured.

Actually, Mr. Speaker, we produced more hogs in this province in 1950 than we do today, on very small operations. Now, we get operations with 4,000 or 5,000 sows. Back in the day you had operations with 10, maybe 20 sows, and they were actually producing more pork at that time. You know, it's interesting to see the transition where we start to get farm-raised pork being a very hotly pursued commodity and how many people are looking for that fresh, farm-raised hog now, very similar to the hog that was raised in the 1950s.

On some of the red tape that has come into the industry, I'll relay a story. I'm sure you'll find this amusing, Mr. Speaker. My brother-in-law was in the livestock hauling/transportation industry for over 30 years. It was to his dismay that — he was helping out a friend, a friend that had turned sick and needed a load hauled down to the plant in Red Deer. He got there, and he was not allowed to unload those hogs because he didn't have the paper to prove that he was trained to be able to unload those hogs safely. My brother-in-law had over 30 years of experience, in years previous to that, working on other cattle ranches and that type of thing, yet because he didn't have that piece of paper, he was deemed unqualified to unload livestock.

Now, in my opinion, that's red tape that's gone maybe a little bit too far. These types of things do present a risk to businesses staying in business and also to those that would like to start a new business. They look at it and they think: wow. At the end of the day, they decide that it's not worth the risk, that it's not worth the effort of trying. So then those businesses do not get off the floor. And, yes, I do believe that rules are needed, but definitely there can be overreach.

Mr. Speaker, I will leave it at that. There are many more aspects that we could reflect on in some of the responses we've had from different businesses. I do agree that the government has not provided Albertans with enough time to be consulted on these very specific changes that are being proposed in Bill 30. I do believe that it's important that Albertans have the opportunity to respond to what the government has presented, not just that we debate it in this House amongst colleagues but that we are able to receive full consultation from the people that are in the field and on the front lines in industry.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Any questions to the Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing and hearing no one, the Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill.

Ms McPherson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm happy to rise this evening to speak to the reasoned amendment to Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans. Bill 30 is a timely piece of legislation. It acknowledges that some Albertans face difficult working conditions, and it strengthens their safety net. While I'm happy to support the bill, I'll also comment on some of its limitations and outline some of the bill's strengths as these are the reasons I'm not supporting the reasoned amendment.

If passed, Bill 30 would inaugurate a number of changes to the Workers' Compensation Act and the Occupational Health and Safety Act, pieces of legislation that haven't been amended in a decade and a half. This bill would enshrine into law many aspects of occupational health and safety that employers in the public and private sectors have already incorporated into their HR policies, including the right to refuse unsafe work, the right to remain informed about potential hazards and have access to basic health and safety information, and the right to participate in health and safety discussions and committees. Equally important, if Bill 30 should pass, survivors' benefits for spouses of workers killed on the job will be consistent, and the definition of a child or dependant will be updated to include students, reflecting the needs of many modern families in Alberta. These are positive changes that will surely benefit Albertans, and I commend my colleagues across the House for proposing them.

Two positive aspects of the bill I would like to speak about in particular are the mandated changes regarding the refusal of unsafe work as well as the extended coverage for PTSD. Unfortunately, in many work cultures it's frowned upon to refuse unsafe work where such a policy exists, and many employees don't feel safe coming forward with a work refusal. This can be attributed to a number of reasons like fear of retribution from supervisors or colleagues. However, with the law more clearly on their side, many will feel more comfortable coming forward. This is a crucial part of the bill, and the reasoned amendment would prevent this. The extended coverage for PTSD is a huge step forward, and I am very happy to see it, Mr. Speaker. I've been a vocal proponent of PTSD care in the House, and it is time that we acknowledged the trauma that many Albertans experience on the job, especially our first responders.

I do have some concerns regarding this bill. In particular, I am concerned about nonprofit organizations' costs that they could incur in establishing health and safety committees. The legislation in question seems to omit this key sector of our workforce in that it does not specify whether not-for-profits will have to take on extra expenditures related to occupational health and safety that may be too much for an organization with limited funds. The legislation mandates joint work-site health and safety committees for workplaces with 20 employees or more that are responsible for inspecting work-site hazards, helping employers respond to health and safety concerns, helping to develop health and safety policies and safe work procedures, and more. These added tasks are going to be really large additions to the workload, and I'm wondering how a nonprofit that relies on government grants or donations is going to set up and pay for committee members and liaisons to take on all of these extra responsibilities.

Overall, Mr. Speaker, Bill 30 is an excellent bill that would be beneficial to multiple Albertans. Certainly, there are issues that need to be cleared up, but on the whole it's a bill that the Alberta Party is able to support. For these reasons, I cannot support the reasoned amendment.

The Speaker: Any questions or comments to the Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill under 29(2)(a)?

Anyone else wishing to speak to the reasoned amendment?

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion to go to one-minute bells.

[Unanimous consent granted]

Mr. Nixon: Question.

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment RA1 lost]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 9:03 p.m.]

[Motion carried; Bill 30 read a second time]

Bill 31

A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act

Mr. Strankman moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, be amended by deleting all of the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, be not now read a second time because the Assembly is of the view that the government did not adequately consult with veterinary professionals across Alberta, including the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association.

[Adjourned debate on the amendment December 7: Mr. Strankman]

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to . . .

The Speaker: I've been advised that you had spoken before. The hon. Member for Calgary-Fish Creek.

Mr. Gotfried: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to speak to Bill 31 and to share my concerns on this bill, some of the arguments and conversation we've already heard, with respect to the rushing of some of the legislation that we're seeing in this session but also in terms of lack of consultation and stakeholder engagement.

It seems, Mr. Speaker, that once again we're seeing this government trying to legislate part of its job description, some of the things that they're supposed to be doing just as part of their day-in-and-day-out responsibilities. The minister can already draft a consumer bill of rights. It doesn't need to be an act of this Legislature, particularly when the consultation is not done adequately at this point in time.

The enforcement that we're seeing here with respect to ticket purchasing and bots: how is this being handled, and how has this been tested, and how has it been discussed with the stakeholders?

Auto repairs. I've got a letter here, actually, that I'd like to share from one of the motor dealers, Mr. Speaker, showing some deep concerns. This is actually from the executive manager of the Calgary Motor Dealers Association, who has not been adequately consulted before this legislation. He says:

Bill 31 speaks to several changes to industry, most of which are standard operating procedures for our Dealers.

Standard operating procedures already. Does that sound like something needs to be regulated or overregulated?

The changes we are most concerned with are with respect to AMVIC.

The proposed changes are unclear until of course the regulations are drawn up, but it certainly looks like Government wants to take control of the Compensation Fund (of which Dealers collected the funds for).

It also appears that changing this over to a public Board, industry will be losing our voice on the Board . . .

Voice, not control but their voice, on the board.

. . . of which we collect a majority of the funds to keep AMVIC funded.

They've funded it. They administer it. It's part of their opportunity to demonstrate their goodwill as businesses to the customers, that don't come back to them unless they treat them fairly.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

The Government also mentions that any changes will not cost taxpayers any additional funds. They seem to forget that Auto Dealers and all of [their] employees also pay taxes.

They're members of the community. They're philanthropists. They give back to the communities. I see many of the motor dealers and car dealerships in my community. I've got six of them in my constituency, representing those businesses well within the community. I see them at schools. I see them at community events. I see them supporting community associations.

These are just a few of our concerns regarding changes that Service Alberta is proposing.

Thanks for taking the time to read this email.

This is from Mr. Jim Gillespie, executive manager of the Calgary Motor Dealers Association. We've heard from them that they have not been consulted on this legislation, yet they are a significant part of this legislation and will be significantly impacted. But, as importantly, they've noted that some of these will impact their customers as well, Madam Speaker. That's where we're seeing again this repeated approach, which is a heavy-handed, heavy regulatory approach to things which will, actually, ultimately impact the consumer by increasing costs.

Now, there was an independent review that was completed by AMVIC with 23 recommendations that have yet to be implemented. Implementation of these recommendations should actually negate the need for any increased government control. Government controls mean government expense, mean government administration and bureaucracy to address this. Yet, again, we have not seen an economic impact study. We have not seen the costs, not only internally in the government applied to this but costs to business, costs to jobs, costs to economic activity.

Interestingly enough, the minister neglected to fill empty seats on the board of AMVIC for up to two and a half years, including seats she added after the independent review came out. This includes a time period of six months where there were no public appointees on the board at all. Even now there are two more public seats that need to be filled. So we're seeing an existing board that is not being filled, yet we now have to set up a new administration to oversee something that that minister had the opportunity to appoint more people to, to ensure the appropriate oversight of that organization.

Madam Speaker, changing AMVIC to a government agency creates uncertainty for the industry and uncertainty in terms of adequate representation on the new board of the government agency, which creates concerns about the ability to educate the public members about AMVIC's role and responsibilities. So you're going to have people who are not experts in the industry. I actually like to consult experts in the industry in everything that we do in this Legislature to ensure that we have that stakeholder engagement, not just from the public members and from the public and from the consumers but also from members of the industry who will be impacted.

We have a delicate balance right now in our economy, Madam Speaker, in that anything we do that layers on top of these businesses may affect the employment decisions that they make going forward, so again an economic impact that we have not tested nor measured.

Madam Speaker, stakeholders are concerned that this minister has historically shown a lack of understanding as far as the AMVIC compensation fund goes, and they're going to take over this fund, which is, actually, as we've heard, funded primarily by industry, yet industry is not going to have a say in that even though, from what I understand, they have been good and reasonable stewards of that fund up until this point.

Within this legislation we're also hearing a concern about the veterinary profession. I think we're going to hear more about that in the future from my colleague for Vermilion-Lloydminster, who also happens to be a veterinarian and probably can speak to some details on that. The question is: what consultation has been done there? Are there concerns that we're unaware of, and can we have those tabled to us so that we can understand why there's such concern about the veterinary profession? Or does the government have something against veterinarians? I guess we can find that out as well in the future as we address this in more detail.

The government is taking steps to take more control and influence over self-regulating bodies. That is of serious concern to me. Madam Speaker, I think that when we work with industry, we create self-regulating organizations, and we trust that those businesses for the most part mean well in the community. They create jobs, they pay taxes, they employ people, and, yes, they need customers that believe in them and trust them and come back. That's how they do their business, through repeat customers. When we allow them to self-regulate, we put that opportunity in the hands of the experts. Yes, we have to monitor that, and, yes, they must be accountable, but in that accountability we also give them some responsibility for ensuring that their industry is one that is sustainable both economically and in terms of being able to address the needs of customers, whether that's motor dealers, whether that's veterinarians or some of the other groups that are touched by this bill.

Madam Speaker, we've seen this and we've talked in this House numerous times over the last few weeks about consultation, about stakeholder engagement, about listening to Albertans and Alberta businesses, about not rushing legislation through this House at the last minute, about not getting these sorts of documents that are stapled together, not even to the legislative printer's office on time to be properly bound for us.

What's happening here is that we're seeing a rush towards getting these things rushed through. We're hearing that it's about time and that we should rush these through and that we need to address these issues and move forward for the sake of Albertans, but what we're seeing is rushed legislation here. We're seeing that lack of consultation. We're seeing: let's hurry up and get it done. Well, Madam Speaker, I'd like us to get it done, but I'd like to ensure that we consult Albertans, that we consult the stakeholders, that we understand the economic impact of what we're going to be doing here, that we understand how it's going to affect jobs, that we understand how it's going to affect sustainability of the industries that we're touching, and, yes, of course, that we understand the positive impacts on consumers and the cost of achieving that.

It seems to me here that we're rushing this through. We're going to try and get in and out of here within a matter of a few weeks, rush this legislation through, as was mentioned by some of the previous members. We had a break in the middle. Why? We weren't ready? The government wasn't ready to bring this legislation forward, and now all of a sudden we're going to hurry this up and be ready to get out of here before Christmas? Madam Speaker, it's been mentioned by some of my colleagues. I'm prepared to stay in here until Christmas Eve if we have to, till midnight, because we need to ensure that Albertans' best interests are being met here, and I'm not getting the feeling that that's what we're actually addressing here or that is the outcome that is being sought by this government in terms of legislation we're addressing.

Madam Speaker, it concerns me deeply that the consultation and the stakeholder engagement – we've had opportunities here to send this legislation to committee. We're now trying to reason with the government here to ensure that this can be addressed in a proper way, that we have an opportunity to take a look at this legislation in a way that demonstrates, as we did earlier today, that through consultation and some collaboration and focus on developing the best legislation that we can in this House, we could actually do what we've been elected to do in this Legislature. We can work closely together in achieving that without looking at amendments to legislation and casting a negative eye on those just because they weren't authored on one side of the House or the other. Again, we've seen that opportunity here that we can actually do that on occasion. Maybe we should do it more often.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Mr. Speaker, this concerns me. We've got several other pieces of legislation that are being rushed through. I know that I want to represent my constituents in the best way I possibly can, that we put adequate attention, consultation, stakeholder engagement on each piece of legislation that we address in this House, and I'm not sure that we're achieving that. I would like every member in this House to look inside themselves and say: "Are we achieving that? Are we doing this? Have we rushed this through with limited stakeholder engagement? Are we listening to all of the people that can be affected by this to the best of our ability?" If we can't say that to ourselves, that we've done that, then maybe we should be tapping the brakes a little bit on this to ensure that we have the opportunity to talk to our stakeholders, talk to our constituents.

We have a limited opportunity to go back to our constituencies and to talk to those people. As we're seeing, we're getting letters from various organizations, from motor dealer associations, from veterinary associations, from various other stakeholders here telling us that they have not been consulted adequately, that they're concerned about the costs, that they're going to see other costs coming, just after Christmas ironically, on January 1, increasing the carbon tax, an increase in so many other costs to them over the past year, increasing the minimum wage, all at a time when our businesses in this province are showing signs of modest recovery.

We're not seeing the robust sustainability that we'd like to see in this province in terms of many of the businesses I talk to day in and day out. I've talked to virtually every small business in my constituency, and we're hearing concerns because they're going to have increased costs. Even if their rent hasn't gone up, they're going to have increased operating costs passed on to them by their landlords, the employees that they've had for a number of years. They've had a couple of – and more to come – increases in terms of the minimum wage that they may or may not be able to absorb. I'm seeing small-business owners taking equity out of their homes, running up their credit cards, and working much longer hours themselves and sometimes hardly taking a wage themselves because there's no money left over at the end of the day or at the end of the week.

Now they're being layered with additional costs of regulation and this legislation, which is going to cost them more money in terms of administering and meeting some of these regulatory requirements that we're seeing. We saw it in the past bill and Bill 30 as well.

These are costs to business, Mr. Speaker. I urge us to choose . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any questions under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek?

Anyone wishing to speak to amendment RA1? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise in the Assembly today in order to support the reasoned amendment from my colleague in regard to Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act. I must say that when I first saw the name of this bill, I had a brief hope that the government may be seeking to regulate itself as it seems to me that the best deal for consumers and businesses in Alberta would be to remove the NDP interference from the free commerce of enterprising Albertans.

You can imagine, Mr. Speaker, my disappointment when, after reading the bill, I came to find that it seems to be yet another measure to give the minister more powers of regulation under the cover of helping consumers. Why I say this is because on its face this bill seems to be attempting to do some good things. It targets some commercial areas where Alberta consumers often find themselves frustrated, areas like automotive sales and repair, high-cost credit, and ticket resales.

The problem is that when you look a little closer, like many bills brought forward by this government, it is riddled with problems and unsound thinking. This kind of legislation, in a way, embodies the thinking of the NDP. It rests on the assumption that businesses are out to get consumers. It implies that consumers should be treated like children rather than responsible adults, and it is emboldened by the idea that the government is the solution to all problems. The reality is that the vast majority of commerce can be left to free and voluntary exchange between individuals and businesses without the involvement of overbearing regulation from government.

Now, of course, we can recognize that there are some instances where regulation may be prudent or necessary, but even in these situations we must ensure that those regulations are thoughtful and targeted so that they are both effective and efficient in their outcomes. This kind of scrutiny of regulation is exactly the reason why my colleague's amendment is so important. Every time we apply new regulations to the way in which consumers and businesses interact, we must carefully examine the potential outcomes and ensure that we are not needlessly inhibiting economic activity or making Alberta an uncompetitive place to do business. If the government will not allow us to do that, then this bill should be set aside.

We have to remember that these kinds of regulations, which are framed by some as tools to help fight for consumers, are often as harmful to consumers as they are to businesses. Consumers and businesses by and large exist in a symbiotic relationship, where their interactions are of mutual benefit, where the pursuit of interests by one party often ends up benefiting another party. The inverse is true as well. If government comes in with heavy-handed regulation for businesses, the consumer can be harmed to an equal or worse degree. While it is certainly important to be aware of the cost that regulations impose on businesses and their profits, it is critical to recognize the impact that they have on prices and choices for the consumer.

In the context of this legislation, we should consider the effects that it might have on the areas to address. Do we want to increase the price of and decrease the availability of tickets for resale to Albertans? Do we want to increase the cost or reduce the choices that you face when fixing a car or purchasing a new one? Do we want to prevent some Albertans from accessing credit because they cannot qualify for lower rate options? How about making it more expensive to take your pet to the vet? All the above would be unintended consequences if we don't get this legislation right. Albertans expect us to have the full picture of the effects of legislation before we pass it. We cannot let a well-intentioned attempt to help consumers end up harming them instead.

This brings me to another vital consideration, ensuring a competitive and open marketplace. When discussing regulation of businesses, we must always keep in mind the proportional burden that they impose. When new regulations come into effect, it is much easier for large businesses to absorb new costs and adapt to the new rules than it is for small and medium-sized enterprises, not to mention that they provide barriers to entry for those who want to start new businesses and provide their fellow Albertans with more choices. Mr. Speaker, those are some of the unintended consequences, that some of this regulation could inhibit new businesses from starting out, which would give Albertans more choices and more competition. Let's think about the real impacts that these regulations could have. Think about the friends who want to open up a mechanic shop together in Calgary. Think about the veterinarian who might be struggling to get by in High Level. Think about the couple who missed out on getting tickets to see their favourite band at Rogers Centre and need to buy them on the secondary market.

Serving Albertans is what we do in this place, and we need to make sure that by adding additional regulations, we are not creating excessive burdens unintentionally. To ensure that we get this legislation right, I would encourage the members of the government caucus to support my colleague's reasoned amendment and come back when they have something worthy of Albertans. Mr. Speaker, I'm sorry if this sounded a bit like an economics lecture. While my intent is to make sure that we get an opportunity to scrutinize this bill in greater detail, it occurs to me that helping the government to improve their understanding of economic principles might serve to help this and future pieces of legislation as well.

I will now try to get to some more specific areas where I think this bill could use some improvement and rethinking. If we look at the new regulations that will be placed on the sale of tickets for concerts, sporting events, and other events in Alberta, we can find a few areas of concern. This bill attempts to provide regulation to prevent the practice of using computer software to circumvent security measures in place to both prevent automated purchases and limit the number of tickets sold to a single person. Now, this seems like a reasonable proposal, trying to increase access to tickets for those who will use them rather than those who will seek to resell them in large numbers in order to make a profit.

The problem is how the government and minister believe that they will be able to enforce this. These kinds of operations are almost always outside of Alberta and often outside the reach of any legal judgment made here. The reason that they are able to make a profit is because they stay ahead of the technology designed to detect and prevent them. This kind of legislation has been passed in other jurisdictions and has proven to be unsuccessful in stopping those which it intends to. Should we really be passing legislation telling Albertans that we are taking action when evidence shows that it will not produce the outcomes that it purports to? What is the point in this kind of empty measure?

Another part of the section that addresses ticket resales mandates the refund of tickets which are purchased from a secondary seller but end up being invalid and unable to be used. This is undoubtedly a good and fair proposal. If a person buys a ticket and the product provided does not fulfill its promise, a refund is the logical solution. Why, then, does the minister reserve the power to exempt certain businesses from complying with this provision? In what circumstances would a person not be able to obtain a refund? Does this create the possibility of the government interfering in the legitimate ticket resale market and threatening the integrity of a level playing field? All questions that we need answered, Mr. Speaker. If the government has answers to these questions, they need to provide adequate explanations to Albertans. Until they are willing to do so, this legislation should not be passed.

I would also like to take this opportunity to address the section of this bill that deals with AMVIC. The bill seeks to change AMVIC from its current form into yet another arm of the government, placing even greater powers of regulation in the hands of the minister. When I look at AMVIC's role, it says here on their website regulate the motor vehicle industry in Alberta. This responsibility is delegated to AMVIC by the provincial government. The delegation agreement gives AMVIC authority to enforce the Fair

Trading Act and regulations that apply to the automotive industry.

Mr. Speaker, their roles are very clearly spelled out on their website.

Now,

AMVIC reviews every complaint if the complaint is related to one of the following:

- A registered automotive salesperson
- One of AMVIC's licensed automotive businesses
- automotive business transactions carried-on by unlicensed dealers (curbers)

When AMVIC suspects a compliance issue related to an automotive business transaction, the complaint is referred to AMVIC's enforcement arm.

If the complaint falls outside of AMVIC's regulatory authority, consider referring to these additional resources . . .

AMVIC exercises the powers, duties and functions as delegated by the Minister of Service Alberta. These responsibilities include enforcement of matters, automotive business matters that fall under the Fair Trading Act, the Automotive Business Regulations, the Cost of Credit Disclosure Regulation and the Internet Sales Contract Regulation.

It spells out pretty clearly what AMVIC's role is. It's a delegated authority of this government.

Now, it is interesting that when the government engaged in an independent review of AMVIC meant to address many legitimate concerns, the report following specifically looked at the idea of making it a government agency. It concluded that it would not be the best solution. Mr. Speaker, that was the review that was an independent review that was already done. We've had lots of time to talk about independent reviews recently in this House. Of course, the government, on one hand, sometimes says of an independent review: well, we've got to pass that because it's an independent review. On another hand, we look at an independent review, and they say: well, no, we ain't going to do nothing that it says in that one; I mean, why would we do that? It just seems like there's a little bit of picking and choosing as far as this government when it comes to independent reviews. Now, I know that expanding government at every opportunity is standard practice for this government, but I would hope that if they are going to engage experts to do an independent review, they would at least listen to their conclusions.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring up what has perhaps been the most controversial part of this legislation, the new regulations on Alberta's veterinarian profession. I, for one, have no idea how these proposed changes ended up in this piece of legislation. Here is a profession that helps Albertans and their pets every day, often saving lives in the process. Why does this government think that consumers need protection from medical professionals? By all accounts, the number of issues and complaints associated with Alberta's veterinarians is extremely low. There doesn't seem to be any logical reason behind this proposal.

Now, I do have a letter from a veterinarian from my constituency. I'll just read a couple of parts of it.

I'm writing to express my grave concern with the recent proposed amendments to the Veterinary Profession Act contained in Bill 31 made by the Minister of Service Alberta. As a member of a self-regulated profession I take pride in upholding the high standards of veterinary medicine made possible by a professional regulatory framework developed by veterinarians and veterinary technologists that safeguards the public interest in animal health and welfare.

Then she goes on to say:

I echo the serious concerns of my colleagues in the ABVMA that proposed amendments to the Veterinary Profession Act constitute an alarming overreach and intrusion into the veterinary profession's ability to self-regulate and were made without consultation with ABVMA.

Here we have again the government, no consultation.

I urge you to please contact the office of the Minister of Service Alberta to help get these proposed amendments withdrawn from Bill 31 as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, again we have this situation where this government fails to properly consult with the people affected.

Now, I just want to talk a little bit about the people in vehicle sales and repair. Mr. Speaker, just last week I had my car to the shop to have some repairs done to it, took it into the dealership to have the repairs done. Quite often I'll have repairs done at a local mechanic shop, not at a dealer's shop. These businesses are doing their best to provide good service to the people they serve. There's nothing wrong with that. I've bought new cars from salesmen, I've bought used cars from salesmen, and honestly I felt like I was fairly dealt with at all times. I'm sure that isn't the case with absolutely everyone, but every profession has its people that they may have problems with.

But, Mr. Speaker, a bill like this, that comes before this Legislature without proper consultation, without proper thought going into it – we tried to do the amendment to get it to committee so we could consult with the veterinarians, consult with the people in these industries that would be affected. Of course, the government voted down that opportunity to go to committee. It leaves us in the situation here now where we want to do this reasoned amendment so that we can put this off and take some time so that we can properly consult and do justice to Albertans and actually do what could help them instead of just ramming through some legislation that's kind of haphazard and not thought out properly.

Mr. Speaker, I think that we need to support this reasoned amendment. We need to be able to pass this and move on.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Under 29(2)(a), are there any questions or comments for the Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky?

Seeing and hearing none, the hon. Member for Edmonton-South West on the amendment.

Mr. Dang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will speak very briefly to the amendment put forward by the Member for Drumheller-Stettler. I think that there's been a lot said about this, so I want to just speak specifically to the reasoning given in the amendment, and I think we'll get very clearly what I believe we should do about this amendment.

We know that veterinarians are trusted professionals, and Albertans look to them to provide quality care for their pets and their animals. This proposed legislation will help pet owners find that high-quality care for their pets. I know that the ministry met with the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association on several occasions as well as with the Alberta association of animal health technologists, the Western College of Veterinary Medicine, and also met directly with several vet clinic owners. Now, Mr. Speaker, we heard their feedback and concerns. In fact, that is why we are focusing the proposals of this legislation on veterinary services for household pets.

Over the past several months we have heard from ordinary Albertans who told us that they want to be better informed when looking for veterinary services for their pets. A recent Edmonton Journal and Canadian Press article, that I tabled today, stated:

Davida Marantz got an unwelcome surprise when she got out of hospital in 2014 and went to pick up her beloved Sheltie Libby from friends.

The dog needed $4,800 in dental surgery while the Edmonton senior was gone, an amount she felt obligated to pay back.

"They were so generous in taking her and caring for her and doing a really fine job that there's no way I would leave the dog with them and the bill with them," said Marantz.

She's 70 years old.

But when she checked with other clinics after paying the bill, she found that the surgery could have been done for thousands of dollars less.

That's why she applauds legislation introduced last week by the Alberta government that cracks down on the way veterinarians communicate their fees.

That's the end of the quote, Mr. Speaker.

The same article further states:

Kath Oltsher, co-founder of Zoe's Animal Rescue in Edmonton, also likes the proposed guidelines. The animal rescue takes in unwanted animals and attempts to help those with low incomes pay for the cost of veterinary care.

Oltsher said she's had positive experiences with veterinarians who provide services to the shelter. She doesn't want the profession to think that the changes are meant to be adversarial.

"It does come like we're coming after you," she said. "But I don't know how else to make a change happen."

Our proposals in Bill 31 are to require disclosure of all fees before administering any veterinary service or treatment for household pets except those fees exempted in regulation and to require customer approval prior to administering veterinary services for household pets unless exempted in the regulation; for example, Mr. Speaker, in case of emergencies. Currently ABVMA's bylaws speak to informed consent but do not define what that means or explicitly state that this includes the disclosure of fees in that process. We are simply enabling the advertising of those fees and the disclosure. It's something that veterinarians in Alberta are prevented from doing currently but is allowed in other jurisdictions.

I think that when we look at the clauses that are being brought forward in this amendment, we can see that there was consultation done; in fact, there was consultation done with thousands of Albertans. That's why I'm going to be urging all of my hon. colleagues on both sides of the aisle to vote against the amendment.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Are there any questions or comments under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Edmonton-South West? Under 29(2)(a), hon. member?

Dr. Starke: Yes, under 29(2)(a). The member mentioned the AAAHT in his address. I'm curious to know whether the member realizes that the AAAHT does not exist anymore.

The Speaker: The hon. member?

Are there any others under 29(2)(a) to the Member for Edmonton-South West?

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, as long as we're at it, I'm curious to know. The member mentioned that there was consultation with the Western College of Veterinary Medicine. I find that curious because the Western College of Veterinary Medicine was not consulted when it had its funding yanked by this government back in October, but if there was a meeting with the Western College of Veterinary Medicine specifically, I'd love to know what the date of that meeting was, who attended, and what was discussed.

The Speaker: The question's response?
Any other questions under 29(2)(a)?

9:50

Mr. Mason: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Thank you very much for the opportunity. You know, I want to just recognize the importance of our veterinary community and the very important role that they play. I know that members, particularly those who represent rural ridings, have a very strong attachment to the veterinarians – it borders on an emotional experience – and I can understand why, because it's so critical to the functioning of our agriculture in this province. The large-animal veterinarians have played a very, very critical role and continue to do so. I want to just indicate that the government has the greatest degree of respect for the veterinary profession and is certainly strongly in favour of that profession being able to essentially regulate itself in the same way that other professions are able to do.

The bill, however, deals with the instances of smaller animal veterinarians, pets and so on. I know that those veterinarians also provide a very valuable service, and I know how much our pets mean to us. You can see that wherever you go, whether, you know, it's a dog lover or a cat lover or, in some cases, both – it's rare, but it does happen, Mr. Speaker – or other animals. I know, when our cat got on in age, just how important it was to have a good veterinarian so that she could live a comfortable quality of life and that her passing was peaceful. I also feel quite a bit of emotion with respect to that.

What the bill does, Mr. Speaker, is simply ensure that people are able to compare fees and compare prices. I think that as we've adopted, you know, a free-market system when it comes to veterinary care, certainly not equivalent, really, to the kind of care that our health care system offers for humans, it's important that consumers have the ability to know what the fees are for the various services and so on. I think that instances where veterinarians don't always provide the lowest cost option are rare, but I can tell you that we personally have experienced a situation where, when our veterinarian retired and sold his practice, the new veterinarian in a partnership certainly had a real practice of upselling. We switched veterinarians, and we found a very, very satisfactory one. But I think it could be avoided. That may in fact be a rare instance. But consumers have every right to know the level of fees that the different veterinarians charge for the various services that they do have. [The time limit for questions and comments expired]

I'm sorry, Mr. Speaker. Out of time.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Are there any other members? You're speaking to the reasoned amendment?

Dr. Starke: Yes. I'm speaking to the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Well, Mr. Speaker, thank you. It's once again a pleasure to stand and speak to Bill 31, in this case to the reasoned amendment. I want to focus my comments this evening specifically to the wording within the amendment. I appreciate the Member for Edmonton-South West going after that specific area but was certainly disappointed that two of the references he gave in his speech he could not substantiate upon questioning. It concerns me if that sort of quotation is being made in the House, if it's stated that the AAAHT, which is an organization that no longer exists, was consulted with, if it's stated that the Western College of Veterinary Medicine was consulted with, yet we don't have dates, we don't have names, and we don't have any information. I can assure the Member for Edmonton-South West, in fact I can assure all of the members on both sides of the House that I have had more recent communication with the Western College of Veterinary Medicine than probably anybody else in the House has had, and, yes, that includes you, Minister of Advanced Education. I've chatted with them since your meeting.

Mr. Speaker, what this amendment hinges upon, really, is the word "consultation." That is a word that, my goodness, gets tossed around here a lot. The concern that I have is that it seems that the word means different things to different people. So I went back to sort of the days when I was in high school debating. In every high school debate, when you had a debate, you had a resolution. Then the first thing you did: the first affirmative speaker had to define the terms. I said: you know, that would be a good idea; let's see if we can at least settle on what consultation means.

I did some checking in some different dictionaries. There are a number of them, but there is not that much variation. Basically, consultation means, according to the Cambridge Dictionary of English, for example, "the act of exchanging information and opinions about something in order to reach a better understanding of it or to make a decision, or a meeting for this purpose." I said: okay; that seems reasonable. In fact, the example that they used was: "We hope to work in consultation with Congress on how the law should be interpreted." Sort of makes sense.

The second definition, also from the Cambridge English dictionary: "the process of discussing something with someone in order to get their advice or opinion about it." I said: well, that certainly makes sense; consultation seeks opinion from the other person. Certainly, consultation implies a two-way exchange of information: somebody seeking information, somebody providing that information, and then going back and forth. I think that it's fair to say that you cannot reasonably call something a consultation if there is only a one-way flow of information. A consultation involves an exchange. A consultation is two-way. It's interesting that the example for the second definition that I gave was this: "The policy change was presented to us as a fait accompli, without consultation or discussion." Does that sound familiar?

I think that it does sound very familiar because, in fact, in talking to many, many stakeholder groups – and the veterinary profession is only the latest of those stakeholder groups – this government has fallen into a trap of dictation rather than consultation. I've talked to many stakeholder groups where they say that representatives from the minister's office brought them into a room, sat them down, told them what was coming, turned on their heels, and left the room. There was no opportunity for questions; there was no opportunity for exchange. That would happen once, usually shortly before the introduction of a bill. Not always. Not always. But I have heard of that pattern of behaviour time and time and time again from this government.

Now, that concerns me, and it should concern you folks because that does not engender trust. That, in fact, endangers trust. That does not engender a good working relationship. When we specifically talk about Bill 31 and the consultation during the course of debate on second reading, on the motion for referral, there's an exchange between myself and the Minister of Service Alberta. The Minister of Service Alberta said the following. This is in Hansard on page 2266.

I just want to touch again on the veterinary piece of this legislation. We consulted. We had two in-person meetings with the association. We had an additional phone call with the association. I'm told that this is, in fact, more consultation than what was done when there was the amalgamation of the technologists and the vets. You know, there was good and substantial consultation.

Well, Mr. Speaker, there's a basic problem when you make a statement like that. Veterinarians keep very good records. It's part of what we do. We record stuff. To give you an idea of the comparison of the consultation on Bill 13 and Bill 31, that we're discussing right now, there is the sum total of the documentation on the consultation on Bill 31. Most of this I've tabled already. Now, I'll be tabling this. This is one copy of the consultation documentation on Bill 13. One copy.

The consultation on Bill 13, in fact, extended back to even before this government took office. I know that because when it was first considered to bring technologists into the veterinary profession, guess who was consulted by the then minister of jobs, training, and labour? Myself. I was consulted as to whether that would be a good idea, and I told the minister: "Yes. Absolutely, it would be a good idea. The veterinary profession certainly supports it. Animal health technologists are trusted professionals that work shoulder to shoulder with us, and we would very much like to see them as equal partners within our association." So, yes, there was consultation back then.

You know, I will say – and I said this before – that the hon. Minister of Labour, who became minister in January 2016, four months later was able to pass Bill 13. In those four months she had 12 separate instances of communication with the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association. Twelve separate instances of communication: e-mails, phone calls, face-to-face meetings, and the exchange of no fewer than four draft copies of the proposed legislation. Four were exchanged back and forth between the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association and the minister's staff. That exchange and that work together engendered a sense of trust. The Alberta Veterinary Medical Association trusted the Minister of Labour and understood the rationale behind what was going on with that legislation. As a result, for those of you who recall, the debate on Bill 13 was rather uneventful. Pretty much everybody agreed on it because it was good legislation. It was legislation that had passed the test of consultation, a two-way discussion, a two-way dialogue that occurred.

Now, I'm sorry that the minister, it appears, has been given bad information, but when the minister is given information that says that the consultation on Bill 31 was, in fact, more robust and more complete than the consultation on Bill 13, it simply isn't true. You know, I find it interesting because the minister in her opening remarks on Tuesday afternoon said that there had been misinformation. In her very first paragraph in Hansard – this is on page 2265 – she said:

There seems to be a lot of misinformation being communicated throughout the House as well as outside of this House, so I would like to take another opportunity, in addition to the comments that I made upon introduction of second reading, to provide further clarification.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I guess my question is: where is the misinformation coming from, and who is disseminating it? You know, a number of my colleagues have now received the same form letter response from the minister with regard to this bill. That form letter response has in and of itself within it five major inaccuracies – five – and it's a short letter. It's interesting because members of this Legislature, private members and members of cabinet, in the government caucus have been using that exact same letter over their signature to reply to constituents. A form letter, and it's easily recognizable because the form letter contains the same five errors.

Mr. Speaker, this has done nothing to improve the level of trust between the Alberta veterinary community, including veterinarians and registered veterinary technologists, and this government. I'm also seeing that in the copies of letters I'm getting from many former supporters of this government, people who formerly voted for the NDP, people who had intended on voting for the NDP. But they won't be making that mistake again. This piece of legislation, in fact, is changing votes, at least in my profession. Now, this government may well have made a calculation: there are only 3,000 of them, and we can afford to lose that many votes; you know, that's all worth while. We may well be the sacrificial lambs on their altar of what? What exactly are they trying to accomplish?

Now, the Member for Edmonton-South West repeated once again the situation of the senior with regard to her dog. You know, I certainly feel for her. Clearly, it was a difficult situation that she was in. But I will also tell you that if somebody asked me to review a dentistry bill of $4,800, I would never offer a competing price quote without knowing exactly what was done on that animal and what was involved. If those other price quotes were given without that information, well, then that's part of the problem. That's part of the issue with the whole situation of price transparency, which the Government House Leader talked about. We're not talking about sacks of potatoes here, Minister. We're not talking about: this is the same as this, is the same as this. Every patient is unique, every single one, and to post a singular price that is supposed to be a one-size-fits-all – medicine doesn't work that way. Medicine doesn't work that way.

Mr. Speaker, this is the problem that we have with regard to consultation, and this government has completely broken the trust. They're acting with the input from whom? We were told: with the input of the AAAHT. Well, the association doesn't exist anymore. Input from WCVM: whom did they talk to? They said: several veterinary clinics. I'd love to know who. I'd love to know who in the veterinary community is saying that they actually disagree with the ABVMA on this.

You know, he gave two anecdotes regarding fees that seem to be unreasonable. Well, Mr. Speaker, I took statistics in university, and one thing I learned is that the plural of anecdote is not data. You collect together some scattered anecdotes, and you figure that you've got a strong case. Unfortunately, that's not the case.

Now, if there was an issue with that bill or any other bill, we have a very well-established disciplinary and ethics procedure within our profession, as do all other self-regulated professions. I've talked in this House before about how that works. I've also talked about how that is not a very busy part of our association. But if this government feels that there is something rotten in the veterinary profession – and clearly they do because otherwise they wouldn't be bringing this forward – if they think there's something so flawed within our current self-regulatory body, then I encourage them to open a dialogue with the Veterinary Medical Association and not what they're doing right now, and that is completely ignoring all requests for dialogue. The Minister of Service Alberta has never met once with the association or with its president.

The Minister of Labour, to whom we are actually responsible, came to the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association annual general meeting and spoke to that body. That's how you engender trust. You don't do it by doing this and undercutting a group of professionals that has self-governed successfully for over 111 years. I find it absolutely baffling that this government, under the guise of consumer protection, can reverse 111 years of successful self-governance and basically decide that they know better for the veterinary profession than the group of professionals that are actually involved in it. It is sad, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, again, I'm going back to a letter that we received from the Minister of Service Alberta on November 3 in which she said that no legislative changes would be contemplated without consultation and engagement with the veterinary association. The next time we heard from the minister was the day before introduction of the legislation, at which time she was not willing to share. It wasn't her; it was one of her . . .

The Speaker: Hon. members, under 29(2)(a)? Lacombe-Ponoka.

Mr. Orr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really appreciate the knowledge and the awareness of the actual facts of the reality that the member has been presenting. I'd love to hear him continue with what he was going to say. I have one question for him. As a veterinarian how does he feel about being lumped in with unscrupulous ticket resale scammers, supposedly honest automobile crooks, and high-cost credit groups who are sharking people? How does he feel as a veterinarian being lumped in with that group in one bill?

Thank you.

10:10

The Speaker: The hon. member.

Dr. Starke: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the member for the question. I mean, what I can tell you is that what maybe doesn't matter so much is how I feel because somehow my feelings don't matter according to the minister. It's bad to say anything negative about being grouped in. But I think what is important is how my colleagues feel, how the 3,200-plus members of the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association feel about being placed in a bill that is specifically intended to deal with scammers.

That word, "scammers," was used by the minister in her introductory remarks to this. Because this bill deals not with the fringes of veterinary medicine – you didn't decide to go after the people who practise veterinary medicine without a licence, the unscrupulous people who provide what are veterinary services by definition but have never studied veterinary medicine, are not licensed, and if something goes wrong, the owner of the animal has no recourse to the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association. You didn't go after those folks. Those are the scammers.

But no. Instead, you decided to go after the core of our profession. The very core of the veterinary profession is the target that you have decided to take with this legislation, and I wonder: who's next? Should the Member for Edmonton-Whitemud be concerned because the medical profession is next? Should the Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake be concerned because the accountants are next in the crosshairs of this government?

Mr. Speaker, I'd like to once again quote. This is quoting from the letter that our association president received on the 3rd of November, some two and a half months after she asked the minister for clarification as to why this bill was coming forward.

Based on the consultation results, should the Government of Alberta determine this is an area of focus, further consultation and engagement with industry stakeholders would be necessary to develop the details of any potential legislative or regulatory amendments.

As responsibility for the Veterinary Profession Act falls under the Ministry of Labour, I would refer to my colleague, the Honourable ...

And it gives the minister's name.

... Minister of Labour, for her consideration.

Mr. Speaker, none of that happened. None of that happened in the space of time from November 3, when this letter was received, to December 4, when, I believe, the bill was introduced. Actually, it was introduced before then. It was introduced on November 29. There was zero consultation with the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association. There were not two in-person meetings and one phone call. There was one in-person meeting and two phone calls. I know that because that's what our medical records say, and I trust those medical records. We've already shown that some of the information that's been given to the Minister of Service Alberta is incorrect, so it comes down to who I and who my colleagues trust as far as providing accurate information.

This reasoned motion, Mr. Speaker, provides and states that this bill should not be read a second time because veterinarians across our province haven't been consulted. I think it is pretty clear that that hasn't happened because you've all been receiving letters from my colleagues right across this province, from one end to the other.

The second reason is because the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association was not adequately consulted, and I can tell you that it was not. It was a massive departure from our experience with Bill 13, and that's why it is so disappointing.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of this reasoned amendment. I know the word "consultation" gets tossed around here a lot, but I can tell you that consultation is a two-way dialogue in which both parties feel they were equal participants. In this case that test has failed. This was not a consultation, and this amendment should pass accordingly.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Under 29(2)(a)?

The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow on the reasoned amendment.

Mr. Clark: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Thank you very much. I will rise and speak briefly to this amendment because there is absolutely no way I could outdo my colleague from Vermilion-Lloydminster and his expertise in this area. I do rise to speak in favour of the reasoned amendment on this, specifically because the focus of this reasoned amendment is on the veterinary profession, and I think that it doesn't have any place within this bill. I think, as my hon. colleague very eloquently laid out, it is comparing the veterinary profession, which is governed under its own legislation, with people who would seek to scam others, be they unscrupulous ticket resellers or high-cost credit providers or perhaps some unscrupulous auto dealers, which, I would suggest, is the minority of that group as well. Regardless, it doesn't fit. I think that given that, we need to send this back to the drawing board on this particular issue specifically.

[Ms Sweet in the chair]

There are aspects of this bill that I like. I certainly think that it is important that we protect consumers from the things we listed earlier, whatever we can do to protect Albertans from unscrupulous ticket resellers. I'm certainly curious as to how the government feels they will be able to successfully achieve that where so many others have failed, but I admire their attempt to make an effort there. I have some sympathy for those who are targeted by high-cost credit providers, and certainly I enthusiastically supported this government's changes to payday lending. I think this bill offers some similar opportunities there.

I have at least one constituent that I know about that was scammed by Treadz Auto. If this bill can in fact fix that situation specifically or prevent future situations like that, I'm certainly very enthusiastic and supportive of that.

But adding in the veterinary profession and lumping them in with those different groups doesn't make any sense. It's very clear from the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster's previous comments that the veterinary profession was not adequately consulted.

The question I'll ask the government on this is the question I asked them so many times: please quantify the problem that you're trying to solve. Provide us with real, actual, tangible data, not just one or two letters from people who had a bad experience. I want to acknowledge that that bad experience, I'm sure, was a very real situation for them and not to be diminished. But does the Legislative Assembly of Alberta need, in fact, to step in and deal with what I think are very rare exceptions when there are many other mechanisms that already exist to allow people to address unscrupulous – if there is a concern or a billing issue or a question that comes up in the provision of veterinary services, there are already mechanisms dealing with that. So it just simply doesn't fit, Madam Speaker, with the rest of this bill.

For that reason, I stand in support of the amendment. Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

Seeing none, are there any other members wishing to speak to the reasoned amendment? The hon. Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It was brought to my attention by table officers that when I moved my motion earlier today, I may not have been clear in my intent, which was to move to one-minute bells for the entire night. So, in the interests of clarity, I would like to move that motion again.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Acting Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It's always an honour to rise in this House and speak. I rise today to speak to this reasoned amendment for Bill 31, A Better Deal for Consumers and Businesses Act, to go to committee. Once again with this NDP government bill we get a mixed bag of goodies, a mixed bag of unconnected legislative changes. It's too ripe for unintended consequences.

It certainly has some good points such as attempting to gain some kind of control over those who use ticket bots to unfairly escalate prices, although in typical NDP fashion it sounds better than it is because the new laws are unenforceable. More regulations for door-to-door sales or high-credit lenders can also be positive in this bill, but this bill prompts too many questions for it to continue through this House.

Let's start with the consumer bill of rights. What exactly does it do? This was a campaign promise of this NDP government, and I guess Albertans can decide if it fulfills anything other than taking up space on paper. The bill of rights reminds me of Bill 1. We all remember the jobs bill. As my hon. colleague from Calgary-Hays always reminded the minister, that bill created one job. The consumer bill of rights also does nothing. Calling something an act doesn't make it an act, but the NDP have become awfully good at playing that game and claiming that all those policies are going to change Albertans' lives and make life better for Albertans. [interjection] I expect that Albertans see through it, actually. Government House Leader, they see through it, sir.

Let's move on to a substantial part of the bill and pose some serious questions. An immediate red flag that we have questions about is the inclusion of veterinarians in this bill, like our colleague from Vermilion-Lloydminster spoke about in depth. I don't think I can go into that depth, by any stretch of the imagination, on this topic.

I note that during the consultation the NDP had indicated an interest in addressing talent agencies and moving companies, a plethora of other entrepreneurial-type businesses. I'm not suggesting that they needed to include them in this legislation, but it seems strange that they dropped these kinds of businesses yet included veterinarians, who are governed by their own professional association. If my memory is still okay at this time, I think the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster said that the association was, like, 111 years old. The NDP government wants to reach and strike at the self-governance by allowing cabinet to make regulations.

I remember last week on this thing we talked about that horses don't have gallbladders. That was interesting to know. We learned that. Today we learned that the AAAHT doesn't exist anymore.

An Hon. Member: It changed its name.

Mr. Gill: Well, I mean, like, if you're reading it so passionately, at least do your homework when you're reading.

It makes no sense: a group of people with no knowledge about a professional association that has done a good job for over a hundred years governing itself and cabinet is going to interfere with that. I just don't understand the rationale behind it. The question is: why? We haven't heard an answer, but we have heard that the Alberta Veterinary Medical Association was not consulted. That's what we know.

We tried to send this bill to committee to allow a fulsome consultation. Again, we just got a definition of consultation. I think it would serve a good purpose to all the stakeholders, to all Albertans to have consultation. There's only one common-sense path now because sending this bill to consultation, to a committee, which this NDP government doesn't want to do – Madam Speaker, the only other way to do it is to just vote this down as soon as possible. Veterinarians are justifiably upset over changes they didn't expect, and we have no idea who is asking for those changes. Let's end this now.

Madam Speaker, this government is also proposing to turn AMVIC into an agency. AMVIC, as we all know, has been a topic of interest for some time now. An independent review made 23 recommendations about AMVIC's fate. Not one of them – not even one of them – said: turn it into an ABC. We look forward to hearing from the Minister of Service Alberta about why she has chosen this route, but we have heard no explanation like the other consultation, the other legislation. No explanation.

Once again, Bill 31 could have gone to committee for a fulsome review, but, no, that's not what this government believes in. No explanation. Greater costs and oversight. We don't know why and we'll likely never know why they're making AMVIC an agency. What do we do? Bringing AMVIC under the umbrella of the ABC creates an unnecessary instability for the industry. That is a completely different route than what the independent review recommended, with no reason.

Auto repair is another dicey area for government to involve itself in. It tried once before with Bill 203, if we all remember, and had to step back from that mess of legislation. Now they're at it again. As far as we know, the NDP has not consulted with the industry. Again, is that a surprise? Certainly not to this side of the House. It's wrong because every time the government members talk, they claim that, you know: we're making life better for Albertans. So let's include Albertans in consultation.

Automotive shops are small businesses. They're in every community in Alberta, so let's include them. They have had a hard enough time surviving with this NDP's other bad policies. They don't need more unnecessary burdens. You never know what the breaking point is in their businesses. It has happened to too many businesses already in this province, so let's call a time out. Let's put a halt to unnecessary legislation and focus on the issue that matters to Albertans.

Madam Speaker, we can start today by voting for this reasoned amendment. I hope the members from the government side will also support this amendment.

Thank you.

The Acting Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any members wishing to speak under 29(2)(a)?

[The Deputy Speaker in the chair]

Prayers

The Deputy Speaker: Good morning.

Let us reflect. We are well into the holiday season, a time of sharing, generosity, family, goodwill. As we continue our work for this week, let us focus on kindness, on being good to one another, always remembering that we are here for something other than ourselves.

Please be seated.

Government Bills and Orders

Second Reading

Bill 32

An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta

Mrs. Pitt moved that the motion for second reading of Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, be amended by deleting all the words after “that” and substituting the following:

Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, be not now read a second time but that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices in accordance with Standing Order 74.2.

[Debate adjourned on the amendment December 7: Mr. Panda speaking]

The Deputy Speaker: Any members wishing to speak to the bill? The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I would like to speak today in support of the referral motion pertaining to Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta. Now, this motion is just common sense, and while we know that it isn't a concept the government generally seeks to embrace, I hope that my colleagues and I may have some success in convincing them to let it be their guide today. I don't know why any person would be opposed to listening, to hearing what Albertans have to say on this bill, nor can I understand why anyone would be opposed to spending a little more time to review the details and intricacies of this 212-page piece of legislation. In fact, I think the apparent opposition from the NDP in regard to this motion is an example of a government saying one thing and doing another.

I think it is worth reminding this government of the positions and statements of their own party when it comes to legislation on democratic changes. As members of this House may recall, under the tenure of the previous federal government there was an electoral reform bill passed by the House of Commons. I would like the members opposite to listen carefully and try to recognize a few statements. Quote: the hotly debated legislation should receive more scrutiny. End quote. That sentiment came from the then leader of the NDP. I know they later threw him out, but – who knows? – maybe it was because the party decided his views on legislative scrutiny would be inconvenient for this government.

Now, I can guarantee that this will be a rare occurrence for members on this side of the House, but I want to cite Mr. Mulcair again just for the benefit of this House. He said the following in April 2014 in regard to legislation that changes the rules for democracy, quote: never before in the history of Canada has a government tried to use its majority to unilaterally change Canada's election laws. End quote. How ironic is it that the party whose leader said this is now seeking to change Alberta's election laws by ramming through a bill in just days before the end of the session?

Madam Speaker, I think it may be worth while to look at and compare a little further this bill at hand now with the one that sat before the federal parliament a few short years ago. At the time, the NDP were outraged at the state of affairs. The bill needed amendment, they said. The bill needed further consultation. It seems, now they are in a position of government, that words like “consultation,” “amendment,” and “scrutiny” have magically disappeared from their vocabulary.

Now, one might argue that this is just a standard way of doing things when in government, that you ignore consultation and opposition to pursue your agenda. Well, it may be standard practice for the NDP governments, but I can tell you that the Conservatives actually heed their own words. When the federal Conservative government first sought to introduce electoral reform in 2013, it was in response to recommendations made by the Chief Electoral Officer. When the NDP went to introduce this legislation, they didn't even bother to consult with the Chief Electoral Officer.

In 2013, when Conservatives realized there were some issues with the legislation they intended to introduce, the minister chose to postpone its introduction and, quote, take the time necessary to get the legislation right. End quote. When it was brought up that there are issues with this NDP legislation, they decided to ignore the concerns and press ahead. When Conservatives passed this kind of legislation, they took it to committee. There were 29 committee meetings, more than 100 witnesses, and dozens of amendments passed. Conservatives took 135 days from the introduction of the bill until it was passed. This NDP government seems intent on not having one single committee meeting, not one witness's testimony, and not one single amendment. The NDP has forgone their legislative duty and not allowed for more than a few days of debate.

Madam Speaker, I think this speaks to the divide between this side of the House and the government benches. On this side of the House we want to take the time to produce the kind of legislation that Albertans deserve. On this side of the House we want to listen to what Albertans have to say. On the other side of things, like with most bills, the government is blinded by their ideology, driven by their partisan interests, and spurred by the ticking clock that counts down until Albertans get to return to the ballot box and turn the page on this accidental socialist government.

Madam Speaker, this bill is about democracy. It is about the rules that govern it. But for this government there are large pieces that don't appear to have anything to do with strengthening or protecting it. There are pieces of this legislation that seem to be all about the NDP's fear of the democratic will of the people of this province.

While it seems unlikely that we will gain support from the government for this referral, in order to properly examine it and gain input from Albertans, I will continue. I intend to use the time that is afforded me by the mandate to represent my constituents so that I may try and bring attention to the deep flaws that I see in this bill.

I will start with a portion of this bill that has received less attention than others but deserves to be highlighted. Some members may forget, but when it comes to positive democratic reform in this country, in past years Alberta was a trailblazer and a leader within Confederation. Long before the scandals and the intense public scrutiny Albertans knew that the Senate of Canada needed to change. Albertans knew that the status quo of unelected, unaccountable Senators was unacceptable. The body was supposed to provide regional representation, yet too often Alberta's appointments were made by an out-of-touch government in Ottawa pursuing an agenda that Albertans did not support. That is why in this province we decided to pass the Senatorial Selection Act, so that Albertans could directly provide their input on who should fill the seats for our province. At the end of last year the NDP chose to allow this legislation to expire, and now they seek to repeal the remnants of this act.

Now we find ourselves with another out-of-touch government in Ottawa. But this time, instead of the provincial government seeking to empower Albertans, it has decided to take away the voice they had. Now, I understand that the NDP supports the abolition of the Senate, and that is a perfectly reasonable position to have, one shared by a number of Conservatives even. However, as long as the Senate exists in the unequal, ineffective, and unelected form that it does, surely the government of Alberta would seek to preserve any tools of opposition to the appointment of Liberal partisans by Justin Trudeau.

Madam Speaker, we have a situation here where this government has brought forward a bill called An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta when they're actually taking away democracy from Albertans, an opportunity that we had and we took advantage of to elect people to go to the Senate. It doesn't stand to reason as to why this government – they seem to hate the Senate, and that's their position. They want to see it abolished. Whatever. But why would you take away the opportunity for Albertans to choose who goes there in a bill that says that it's to protect democracy in Alberta? Well, I don't know what anybody else thinks, but when I hear of democracy, I think of the ability to choose who represents you. I believe that's the basis of democracy. But this government has taken away that opportunity for Albertans. Why would they do such a thing? Why would they take away that opportunity for Albertans to choose who represents them in the Senate?

In 1989 Albertans made history through the appointment of Stan Waters, Canada's first elected Senator, but now, in 2017, the NDP seems content to abandon Albertans' position of leadership on reform. At the very least, the government could have gone out and asked Albertans if they supported this move. If they were willing to send this bill to committee, we could get this input and make a more informed decision based on the wishes of Albertans. Informed decisions are important, Madam Speaker, and Albertans expect the legislation that we pass to reflect this sentiment.

I would then ask how many members of this House know the reason why the government has chosen to ignore the expert opinion of Alberta's Chief Electoral Officer in regard to the matter of how enumeration should be conducted in our province ahead of the next election. Bill 32 would require full door-to-door enumeration rather than the strategy suggested by the Chief Electoral Officer, which would have consisted of targeted in-person enumeration accompanied by a full mail-out to cover the majority of people. This is a strategy that has been shown to be successful in other provinces and would serve to save Alberta taxpayers millions of dollars.

As we have discovered, the Chief Electoral Officer wasn't consulted by the government ahead of introducing this legislation. I'm sorry, Madam Speaker, but that just seems bizarre, that they wouldn't have done that. I would urge the government to help remedy this error by supporting this motion so that we can hear that expert testimony and make sure that we are making an informed decision.

Madam Speaker, I would also like to draw attention to the portions of this bill that address the prohibition on government advertising during elections. The intent of this legislation is clear. Governments should not be able to use taxpayer dollars to give themselves any advantage in an election. This is common sense in a free and fair democracy. Unfortunately, this legislation does not take effective steps to eliminate this practice. When this government was in opposition, they were rightly against the use of tax dollars to create electoral advantages, yet now that they're in government, they have done nothing to close remaining loopholes. Why has the government refused to tighten up these rules when they had a perfect opportunity with this bill, that is supposed to be taking actions like this to strengthen and protect our democracy?

There would be a very easy way to look at the changes that need to be made. That is to send this bill to committee, like my colleague has suggested. This government has a choice on the message that they send to Albertans. Will they vote for this referral motion and commit that they will end the practice of government spending announcements during elections, or will they continue to ram this bill through and send a message that they don't really care about fairness in our democracy?

Speaking of fairness in democracy, we also need to talk about the removal of the residency requirements for voting in provincial elections. Madam Speaker, this is a very basic principle. Only Albertans should be able to vote in Alberta elections. Our representatives should be elected by those who have a long-term interest in our province and its communities. It is not at all unreasonable to require a term of residency in order to vote. This proposed change could cause serious harm to public confidence in our democracy. The legitimacy of our elections cannot become a matter of debate, and opening the door to the possibility of nonresidents voting in our elections is not acceptable.

The members opposite will surely tell us that this is not the case and that there is no risk in this change. Unfortunately for them, Albertans have had enough of taking the NDP at their word. The law needs to be strict and clear in order to mitigate any risks there might be. [interjections] It's interesting to hear the members opposite here, the government MLAs, laughing and joking about democracy in Alberta. I find it pretty shameful that they would sit there and do that. [interjections] They continue on, heckling and laughing and ridiculing democracy in Alberta. It's shameful. They continue on. They continue on. Madam Speaker, I don't think that democracy is funny; I think it's serious. That's why we live here in this free country. We respect democracy. The members opposite don't seem to care about that.

Again, Madam Speaker, I think that the people of Alberta have had enough of this government. They don't trust them anymore. They've heard one thing and seen another thing over and over from this government. When they were in opposition, they railed against things like this over and over again, but what do they do when they're here? They just ram it through. If this government wants to make this change and they have some other way of proving that they can maintain absolute electoral integrity, then they should come to the committee, tell Albertans what their thinking is, and provide evidence to support it.

If the government does not provide a detailed explanation to Albertans, it may raise questions on potential ulterior motives. Some may ask if enabling out-of-province voters is a hidden attempt of this change. Again, these questions could serve to erode the confidence of Albertans in our democratic process, which is exactly the opposite of what the bill purports to do. It doesn't seem to me that this would do anything to strengthen and protect our democracy and would in fact create an inherent weakness, one at risk of exploitation.

It is for the many reasons that I have mentioned above that I cannot support this bill as it stands.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), any questions or comments? Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you for the opportunity to ask a question. I just wanted to thank my colleague for, I think, his very respectful approach to trying to understand what this legislation is about. Lookit, it's not always easy to ask difficult questions, and difficult questions quite often would get interesting responses. But what I find very interesting is that there's a lot of commentary coming from the government, lots in fact, especially when it comes to the piece about residency, which is probably one of the larger reasons why this bill needs work.

As my colleague was saying, there is an imperative piece, especially with a piece of legislation like this, that Albertans feel not only that their voice is heard but that it is their voice, that it's Albertans, people in this province, the ones who pay taxes here. Even for those who are living here – we have students that are living in our province; we have out-of-province workers that are living here – we want to make sure all of those folks have the ability to vote. That six-month space gives lots of time for anybody who's in the province to actually be able to do that.

The question remains, though – and my colleague was doing, I thought, a very good job of trying to at least ask the question – about why a government would feel it necessary to have a person be able to come across the border of our province and, by being able to be vouched for by a person who says that they live here, be able to vote.

My goodness, if I am misunderstanding that, I would absolutely love for one of the members across the way to correct the record. Honestly, with all my heart, Madam Speaker, if we are wrong, if we have misinterpreted this legislation, please, I would ask that one of the members stand up and explain that to us. If we're wrong, great. That's fine. I would prefer to find it out in here, and I'd prefer to discuss it in here. However, the interesting part is that with all of the yelling and all of the heckling and all of the commentary, we've yet to hear somebody actually stand up and explain to us, explain to Albertans, and actually put to rest any fear that this is a concern.

It's not just this government. Whatever government follows this government will have access to that same thing, and that's one thing to keep in mind. I mean, these pieces of legislation aren't just for right now. They have long-term effects, ripple effects, on the democracy of this province. Honestly, I'm terribly sorry if we have offended the government by asking difficult questions. That is absolutely our reason for being here at this point in time. Quite frankly, it's fine for with them if they're offended, but we need to ask those questions. I'm very grateful that my colleague brought up some very difficult – and to tell you the truth, Madam Speaker, I think what's most disconcerting is that these are the questions we're actually getting at our offices. It's very difficult to believe that they're not getting those questions as well.

If they've answered the questions for their constituents, do tell. Please share that information with us. Please explain it. If I'm not understanding, I am more than happy to be corrected and happy to share that information with my constituents. I've written quite a few bits and pieces about this. I've tried to look into it, tried to understand the mentality of what's happening here. There are lots and lots of opportunities to actually discuss it – that's why we're here, right? – and that's why we're in the House right now. There's no reason to be offended. That's the whole reason we're here, to ask these questions. If it is a question that can easily be answered, please, I really look forward to the response from the government to my colleague's questions and his concerns about this. I'm sorry that the government is not as concerned as we are. This is one of those big things for me, the question of residency, the question of authentic voting within our province.

Again, you know, what's really, really magnificent about our country and about our province, Madam Speaker, is that we try our very best to make sure that people have the access to vote. It's actually one of the most massive privileges of our country. If you've travelled and you've been to other places around the world and understand the way voting works in other places around the world, we're very fortunate here.

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre.

Mr. Shepherd: Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is indeed an absolute pleasure to rise this morning to speak to this bill on electoral reform within the province of Alberta and indeed to honour the request of the Member for Chestermere-Rocky View to discuss the issue of residency and the changes that are proposed in this bill.

Now, over the weekend, Madam Speaker, there has been much discussion about this, sparked largely by some unfortunate misinformation on the part of the United Conservative Party of Alberta and, of course, their leader, Mr. Kenney, Hon. Mr. Kenney, noting claims that we were removing the requirement for residency in the province of Alberta. Now, there were some interesting suggestions from members across the aisle, including the Member for Cypress-Medicine Hat and some others, indeed the Member for Calgary-Fish Creek, suggesting that perhaps these changes were in order to bus in large numbers of supporters from outside the province, an absolutely ludicrous proposal. It reminds me of some of the ridiculous claims we've heard from south of the border about phantom suggestions of mass voter fraud, which all seem to come from the same side of the political spectrum.

Now, Madam Speaker, to be clear, the rules within the province of Alberta, as noted, I should note, by the mainstream press – indeed, CBC Edmonton yesterday posted a very clear explanation of how these changes work. Perhaps the member has not had the opportunity to read that article yet. I would suggest that she perhaps would like to take a look.

But it makes it quite clear that what is happening in this legislation is as was requested on more than one occasion by the Chief Electoral Officer of the province, and I will say that as the chair of the Standing Committee on Legislative Offices I have deep respect for the expertise that is in fact offered by those legislative officers. Indeed, I will note, Madam Speaker, that the CEO, in fact, himself noted that he was consulted on several occasions about specific pieces that were brought forward in this legislation.

On this particular note, which is in response to his request based on a legal case which found that it would be against the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to deny somebody the opportunity to vote, we are proposing to remove the requirement that somebody be ordinarily resident. Again, Madam Speaker, that is a specific definition that is provided on the Elections Alberta website, which, again, the members can read if they wish to educate themselves on this issue, and a term that is used in other areas. For example, in determining whether someone is eligible for the Alberta health care insurance plan, they also have to demonstrate that they are ordinarily resident within the province of Alberta. As long as that is the case, we are simply removing the fact that that has to be the case for six months, something which the Chief Electoral Officer has clearly stated was difficult and at times impossible to prove.

The members opposite are very fond of saying that we need to cut red tape and needless regulation. The CEO himself identified that this was a requirement that often could not actually be proven, so he recommended that we make this change and reduce it to the one item which is simple and basic to prove: is the individual who is wishing to vote ordinarily a resident of the province of Alberta? That is done, Madam Speaker, by that individual providing photo identification with their address or providing other identification as required under the act and clearly noted and explained on the Elections Alberta website. Or, in a particular case, if an individual does not have said ID – and in fact this is the case for some folks in my constituency who are homeless, who may not have access to identification and other things – an individual who knows that individual and who themselves produces the ID that is required, which shows who they are and that they are ordinarily resident in that particular electoral district, can vouch for one and only one other individual, sign a legal declaration stating that they are vouching for this individual. That individual then makes a legal declaration that they are, in fact, ordinarily resident in that area, and then that person is allowed to vote.

If this, Madam Speaker, is a mass conspiracy for voter fraud, it's a hell of an inefficient one. I apologize for my use of that word. I retract that word.

Mrs. Aheer: Angry.

Mr. Shepherd: Yeah. You know what? The Member for Chestermere-Rocky View observed that I'm angry. Indeed, Madam Speaker, I am angry because of this abuse of the facts, this incredible, as was noted by Graham Thomson of the Edmonton Journal in his editorial yesterday, this constant, extreme massaging of the facts by the members opposite and by their leader. In fact, this has increased exponentially since they acquired this new leader. Of course, that does make me angry. Albertans deserve better. Albertans deserve representatives that are able to discuss these issues based on facts, and the kind of fearmongering we're hearing from the UCP anger machine does a disservice to the people of Alberta.

Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm happy to have this opportunity to put the facts out there.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Mr. Loewen: Yes, Madam Speaker. It was actually good to see that one of the government members would actually stand up and speak. Now, of course, he had – I guess he was angry. He said that he was angry. I'm not sure what he's angry about. What I thought was interesting is that he said that he had a deep respect for the Chief Electoral Officer. Well, I would think that a deep respect would involve some sort of communication with the Chief Electoral Officer and would involve something of . . .

Mr. McIver: Make a call.

Mr. Loewen: Yeah. Maybe make a call to him. Maybe have a little chat.

Now, he did say that there was a lot of communication. Well, that's funny because the Chief Electoral Officer clearly said that that's not the case. He provided it in writing actually, Madam Speaker. I think that might be – what did he call that?

Mr. McIver: Abuse of facts.

Mr. Loewen: Abuse of facts: that is the term the member used. The abuse of facts, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker, I don't know where to go with this, really. This is just bizarre. Now, one thing I found interesting is that the member quoted Graham Thomson, and I know the Member for St. Albert also quoted Graham Thomson. From the exact same article I want to quote Graham Thomson for the record, too.

Some even consider the Alberta Federation of Labour something of a PAC. It raised the largest amount in donations of any third-party group in the second quarter of this year with $230,000.

I think that while you're quoting Mr. Thomson, you should quote all of Mr. Thomson and listen to what he says about the Alberta Federation of Labour.

He goes on to say, if we want to talk about Mr. Thomson's article, in this very same article that this member quoted and the very same article that the Member for St. Albert quoted:

The courts have already supported PACs under Charter rights to free speech. Simply banning PACs isn't possible. Placing severe restrictions on their activities at all times, not just during election campaigns, would likely be deemed unconstitutional.

Madam Speaker, this government wants to get what they call dark money out of politics, but maybe they need to do a little more homework, which is why we brought these amendments forward, so they could do a little bit more homework and find out if we're going to have court challenges and everything on this.

Now, I did get a note from the Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose here. It says: my copy of Bill 32 has only 105 pages, not over 200; how did your copy double? Well, Madam Speaker, I just want to, I guess, look at Bill 32. This is the copy the government provided me. Maybe what the member hasn't done is that he hasn't looked at the page numbering carefully. I'm open at page 71, and it says 71 on this page and on this page.

Mr. McIver: That whole math thing.

Mr. Loewen: It's that math thing where you have to figure it out. The last page on this is 105, but that isn't how many pages are in the bill.

Now, Madam Speaker, on one side it shows what's being amended in the original bill, and on the other side is what they're changing it to. That's normally how this is set up. But if you want to read the bill and you want to understand the bill, you have to see what it's changing. You don't just look at what it's going to be without seeing what it was before. That only makes sense.

I'll go back to Graham Thomson, another quote here: "In fact, Alberta government sources are expecting a legal challenge of Bill 32 ahead of the next provincial election." Madam Speaker, the government is even expecting this legal challenge, so don't you think that they should have taken the time to do a little more research and try to avoid things like legal challenges? Legal challenges are expensive, and what happens if you lose? If you lose, then all of a sudden you have limited options.

Madam Speaker, it was just, I thought, very rich to hear the Member for Edmonton-Centre get up and go on this huge rant, this angry rant. Of course, we've been listening to enormous amounts of heckling coming from the other side throughout this whole debate.

I think it's actually very, very – honestly, it's ironic that An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta actually takes away from democracy in Alberta. It just doesn't even make any sense. Now, of course, if this democracy . . . [Mr. Loewen's speaking time expired]

Thank you.

The Deputy Speaker: Just a reminder, hon. member, please, to table the documents you were quoting from later on.

The hon. Member for Little Bow.

Mr. Schneider: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I rise today to speak to the referral motion on Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta. This motion, proposed by my colleague from Airdrie, would in accordance with Standing Order 74.2 refer this bill to a standing committee, and that's exactly where it should happen.

Now, sometimes I like to use the phrase "déjà vu" in this Chamber. Actually, my favourite, if you're a little bit of a baseball fan, is déjà vu all over again. I like that one. But today I use it again because it's with that feeling that I have to mention that once again we find ourselves late into session and the government has dropped a bill on us that, quite frankly, should have probably been served up as two distinct bills. Actually, there's another bill that is made up of two rather large pieces of legislation that could have been divvied up into two bills that was also introduced in the dying days of the fall session. So this isn't anything new for this session. It may be odd, but it's not new.

Bill 32 is several pages long, rather than debate whether the numbers are correct, and was dropped just days before the scheduled end of session. How many times have we seen that, huge bills that everyone will likely know will have to be debated a lot, probably require a lot of amendments from this side of the House, huge bills that are just set up to be pushed through this House? Bill 17 of the spring session comes to mind. Bill 6 from the First Session since we were all elected comes to mind, too.

Anyway, yes, the two main areas of Bill 32 delve into the subject dealing with rules around elections, but this several-page bill documents two distinct parts that deal with areas that could fall under a broader title, possibly election finances and election reform. The point I'm trying to make here is that we need to ensure, with legislation this important and vital to democracy, that the bill is right. We need to ensure that anyone in the province of Alberta that takes issue with any parts of any piece of legislation that is put before legislators of this House that is this important has the ability to make a comment, to make a comment in their own words, not necessarily words that are chosen by the government of the day on an Internet site.

Isn't that kind of what democracy is all about? What harm can be done by moving this proposed piece of legislation to committee, as the MLA from Airdrie suggested and made in her motion? You know – good grief – we're talking about elections here, among other things, of course. Elections, if I may be so bold, are the primary decision-making process of any democracy. We need to ensure that we have done due diligence and taken the time and care to make this piece of legislation solid. My colleague's amendment helps ensure just that. Let's consult Albertans. Let's engage Elections Alberta and their staff. Let's make sure we get this right.

I remember Bill 203, the Alberta Standard Time Act. While it may have been a private member's bill, the Legislature saw fit to refer it to Alberta's Economic Future Committee. There was a lot of fanfare about the bill as it went to committee, but the fact was that after hearing from submitters all across Alberta and in the boardrooms in the Federal building, the committee recommended to the Legislature that the bill not proceed. I'm not naive enough to believe that there weren't some politics involved on the government side either, but it slowed things down a little, and we got to consider more points of the bill than just making sure that a piece of legislation was rammed through the House.

Now, for a moment I'd like to speak about a comment that I made a few minutes ago. Let's engage Elections Alberta, among others, to make sure that we get this right. I think it's been said quite a few times in this House – and it may be said a few more yet – that, once again, we are seeing that some consultation may indeed have been used in the creation of this bill, but it was not an in-depth account, the likes of which should be used when creating a bill that is this important.

I'm sure that consultation of some sort may have been used, but as we have seen and many of my colleagues have already talked about, the very first organization on the list of potential consultees, if that's a word, was not consulted, let's say, fully. I say fully because Mr. Glen Resler, the Chief Electoral Officer, no less, of Elections Alberta stated in the letter that he wrote to the minister responsible for democratic renewal that he was pleased to see that some of his recommendations were incorporated into Bill 32.

Now, nobody from my side of the House was involved in the consultation process, obviously, but Mr. Resler did use the word "some" in his letter to the minister, which leads those of us from this side to believe that he may have actually proposed more than the bill considered. The Member for Edmonton-Centre claims that this side of the House is telling part of the story, claims that this side of the House is abusing the facts and is massaging those facts.

At any rate, Mr. Resler wanted to bring to the attention of the minister the potential unintended consequences of the proposals about advanced polls and special mobile polls contained within the bill. I believe, Madam Speaker, that that letter has been tabled to the House already. If not, I'd certainly be happy to do so. To continue, he believes that "if passed in its current form . . . Bill 32 will [tend to] deteriorate the service provided to electors and increase the timelines for communicating results."

Now, I don't know. That may seem kind of trivial, but when the Chief Electoral Officer writes a letter to the minister who has created a bill that somehow affects elections in the province suggesting unintended consequences to that bill, I've got to believe that in the best interests of Albertans he may need to be listened to. His letter contains a lot of information, but that sentence or two alone are a good enough reason to refer this bill to committee. Chances are that there are lots of Albertans that have an opinion or an idea that may be beneficial to the legislation. That's why it should be sent to the committee.

Speaking of getting it right, I can see that there are portions of this bill that appear, on the surface, to have been gotten mostly right, and there are some that I think may not have been quite as accurately portrayed. I'm uncomfortable with the idea, for example, that someone who has just moved to Alberta could, under these proposed changes, within a day simply appear and be allowed to vote in an election.

While some of the more politically engaged folks may think that this is great – and don't mistake me; I certainly want as many Albertans as possible to become politically engaged – I can't help but feel that perhaps at least 30 or so days of residence should be a minimum standard for residency. That's just my own opinion. Again, what is the perfect number? We haven't determined that. This bill states one. Is it 30 days, 60 days, six months? Maybe that was the right number. That's why this referral amendment needs to pass, Madam Speaker. These things can be worked out in the standing committee, with opinions sought and stakeholders engaged.

Another part of this that has kind of irked me is this topic of government announcements during an election or a by-election. Now, nobody's hands are clean on this one. Governments have always skirted the line on this issue, and the present government has not disappointed despite how they make a great deal of outrage about this exact topic and how much outrage they made while sitting in opposition seats. While they have tried to take steps to fix this issue, it's clear from the laundry list of exemptions that they don't seem to have the seriousness to fix it. A token resistance perhaps.

Why so many exceptions? Why do we need the ability to grant government such a wide discretionary grey area? It seems to me that the potential for abuse is too great in that instance. The grey area of keeping the Alberta public informed is so vague that it would simply be better to allow committee to look at this a little more in-depth and see if we can get this list down to a lot shorter list, deal with the announcements required by law or even ones that are vital for public safety. I would think that Albertans are certainly savvy enough to understand when an announcement is strictly done to further partisan interest during a by-election, but fine-tuning this act in committee would help alleviate that doubt, Madam Speaker.

When my caucus mate from Drumheller-Stettler talked about door-to-door energy sales, he made the point about how people are reluctant to open doors to strangers these days. With the rampant rural crime rate and property crime increasing everywhere, how effectively could a mandatory door-to-door enumeration prior to an election fare if folks are afraid to come to the door? I have concern about the cost of a mandatory full door-to-door enumeration in every riding in the province prior to the next election. Elections Alberta priced out the potential costs for this option, and it came up with the number of $11 million.

In the last election 60 per cent of returning officers had difficulty recruiting enumerators. Those enumerators also expressed concerns and are now required to travel in pairs, which, of course, is leading to skyrocketing costs for door-to-door enumeration with the doubling up of staff for safety reasons. So it's not just the homeowners who don't feel safe. Elections staff feel uncomfortable out on the streets as well. The fix to this is to take the advice of the CEO and allow for targeted enumeration combined with a full mail-out, which has been proven to yield more accurate results and will cost approximately $5 million. That's a lot more palatable than the $11 million number being bandied about.

It's supposed to be more effective in engaging the public as well. The standing committee could continue to engage with Elections Alberta and see what else could be done to alleviate the concerns and maybe find more efficiencies in both process and cost. You know, I guess that we're not going to know until we try, and that's why passing this amendment matters.

I hope that the reluctance isn't, as my friend from Grande Prairie-Smoky mentioned, the same as when the government-dominated Committee on Resource Stewardship defeated his motion to take extra time to engage stakeholders simply because they weren't willing to put in the work. You know, Madam Speaker, that perception could easily change with the passing of this amendment. I know that they will disagree with this assessment, and that's fair, too. Sometimes politics comes into play.

You have to wonder if that's why this government turned down our old legacy caucus when we asked not once but on two different issues to create an independent office of the Legislature that would advocate for the disabled on one occasion and seniors on the other. In that instance, both were turned down as the government deemed them too costly, yet we see that the government is now interested in establishing an independent office of the Legislature in the form of an independent elections commissioner that would investigate complaints, recommend prosecutions, and conduct investigations on third-party advertisers. It appears that the government wants to very clearly define the difference between the administration of an election and investigations resulting from an election.

Okay. Now, I may be able to get behind the concept but not the flow through. At a time when I think we all need to be reducing the spending that government makes, it seems that this could be an unnecessary and redundant office that would be very expensive. Alberta already has a Chief Electoral Officer, that oversees matters like this, and that office comes with a very large budget. There seems to be no conflict of interest between the Chief Electoral Officer and the proposed elections commissioner that would require them to operate independent of each other, so why incur the expense?

Madam Speaker, too many complexities and too many nuances need closer scrutiny, and without a doubt that can be accomplished in committee by the standing committee. So I ask all my colleagues in this House: why not pass this amendment, and we can fix this bill once and for all?

I'll encourage everyone in the House to do so. I thank you very much, Madam Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 29(2)(a), the hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I'm grateful for this opportunity, and I thank the hon. member for his thoughtful reflections on the amendment before this, the reasoned amendment to move this to committee for some – I won't even say additional consultation, probably for some initial consultation in some areas. I say that advisedly because I'm sure they talked to some people.

The hon. member mentioned in his remarks that the government wants to create a new independent officer of the Legislature having to do with elections, which is kind of interesting because in the letter that we received from the current head of Elections Alberta, he made it clear that the government never talked to him about the legislation. Yes, it makes it clear in the letter that there was discussion in the previous committee that got shut down, but during the time the government actually was putting together the piece of legislation that's before us, they never consulted with him, never asked him how he liked it, what he thought of it. He said that in writing.

I wonder, to the hon. member, if the government has either lost the phone number of the current head of Elections Alberta or has just chosen to leave it in the Rolodex or their smart phone or wherever it happens to be. I wonder how anxious they'll be to actually find the phone number of the new independent officer of the Legislature when the phone number of the old, current independent officer of the Legislature was so darn hard to dial. There are, after all, 10 digits. That will take – what? – a minute, and these people are busy. They're busy. They're busy not talking to Albertans. That's what they're busy doing.

I'll ask him to reflect a little bit, too, on the massaged facts from the Member for Edmonton-Centre, in regard to the residency requirement, when he talks about the fact that no one would ever do this. In fact, Madam Speaker, it is true that a good part of our electoral system is based on the honour system, and I think all members of the House would think that, for the most part, that's good. But I would ask the member to reflect on whether we shouldn't leave ourselves absolutely open to widespread abuse without really any effort by those people that do it for the same argument that while most of the people are honest in the world, I still lock my door. And I imagine most of the members on the other side lock their doors at the same time as believing that most people are honest.

In the same way that we lock our doors to keep honest people honest, I would ask the hon. member whether he thinks having a residency requirement of longer than a day might actually be the equivalent of locking your door though most of the people out there are honest, you know, and whether he thinks it's probably common sense and would be an example of showing good judgment, especially for something as valuable as democracy.

Well, I'm not a wealthy man – I don't know if anybody in here is; it's not my business – but I don't own anything that's worth more than democracy. I don't own anything that's worth more than democracy, and I would ask the hon. member whether cheapening democracy by unlocking the door on the front of it is an example of the government showing good judgment or, indeed, whether it's an example of the government showing something other than good judgment.

The hon. member also reflected upon the title of the bill to strengthen democracy. Again, Madam Speaker, what I've often said here is that with the NDP legislation what the big print giveth, the small print taketh away. While they're talking about protecting democracy, they're actually taking away Alberta's ability to vote for their next Senators. Now, I would ask the hon. member to reflect upon whether that actually increases democracy or whether that actually reduces democracy for the very Albertans that we are here to protect, that we are here to represent, and whose voice we are here to strengthen, or whether indeed it diminishes their voice.

The Deputy Speaker: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Wonderful. Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. First of all, thank you to members who have previously spoken on this referral. I, of course, rise to support my colleague from Airdrie in regard to Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta, and the referral to send this to committee.

I think that before I get started, I just, you know, want to acknowledge, of course, the importance of committees. I certainly have had the opportunity to be a part of a couple. Certainly, I've worked with the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, and I've worked with the hon. Member for Calgary-Klein, and I will say that both of those individuals are more than capable of dealing with anything that is brought forward to them, especially something as important as this. I believe that they do have the ability to deal with these complex matters, and I certainly recommend that – especially in the case of Edmonton-Centre, if he ever had the opportunity to successfully get this referred to his committee, I believe that he'd be more than capable of dealing with this.

I also want to touch a little bit here, Madam Speaker, in regard to the identification that the hon. Member for Edmonton-Centre, of course, brought up. I guess that maybe I come from a slightly different perspective, again, from that law enforcement perspective. I believe my hon. friend here from Calgary-Hays brought this up.

You know, I was very humbled to have been the only law enforcement officer ever appointed to the Alberta Secretariat for Action on Homelessness and very proud of the work that I did back in the day. One of the things that I was able to assist with during that period of time was helping those in vulnerable positions get identification, because there were challenges. There were challenges, especially in the Calgary drop-in centre, for people to obtain identification. Some of them, sadly, may have been victims of crime, and some of them may have lost their identification. Of course, that hindered them in their ability to at times find work and get some of the necessary services that they need.

There was a process that was put into place by the minister at that time which assisted those who were vulnerable in getting identification, but I can tell you that it was longer than a one-day process where a friend swore an affidavit saying that you were who you were. It was actually a very extensive process that was put into place whereby the person is of course saying that they, you know, are a name, a particular date of birth, and then there was an investigation that took place.

That investigation was quite extensive. It was thorough. It required at times background checks that went on. In some cases, when people had come here who had no identification but were from a jurisdiction, you know, let's say, in eastern Canada, the process was to call and do their investigation in eastern Canada or wherever that person was alleged to be from, again, to confirm that they are who they are because of the importance of handing out government-issued ID. Of course, like my friend from Calgary-Hays said, for the importance of democracy, we have to be sure that that person is who they say that they are before they are issued a piece of government identification, before they vote, quite frankly.

You know, I can tell you that from my experience, again, as a police officer, using the computer system that we had available to us at the time, it could take me 30 seconds, 10 seconds, however long it takes for the computer to boot up, for me to confirm somebody's identity, but that's the police. That's dealing with an investigation on a criminal matter. We're not talking about criminal matters. We're talking about people and their ability to vote. We're talking about confirming people's identification, and that will take longer than a day. We have to be sure about who somebody is before we give them the opportunity and the right to vote. I hate to say this, but it does open itself up to fraud.

[The Speaker in the chair]

Sadly, again, you know, in my previous career, when I used to hand out – Mr. Speaker, good to see you, sir. You know, if I charged somebody with a criminal offence and maybe I gave them an appearance notice or a promise to appear, maybe sometimes there were conditions associated with that, and I had people signing that in good faith, which is the reason I chose that form of release for that individual. I believed that that person was going to show up to court, or I believed that that person was going to abide by their conditions. However, sadly, in some cases, not all cases but in some cases, people didn't show up to court. People didn't abide by their conditions. They weren't honourable on their sworn piece of paper that they signed. So we have to be cautious about this. I think we have to err on the side of caution when it comes to this, and I think that's extremely important.

You know, again, I mean, there are parts of this bill that are good, and there are parts of this bill that I think just require a little bit more consultation. I think they require a little bit more tweaking in order to make it even better.

You know, I do have some concerns, especially from the Chief Electoral Officer, and I'll quote Mr. Resler when he said, "Since I provided recommendations to the Special Select Ethics and Accountability Committee, I have not been consulted in relation to policy direction leading up to Bill 32." That's concerning to me, and I think that is concerning enough to me to where we should be taking a pause. We should be allowing those who are the experts to come in and talk about this.

I mean, I can tell right now, you know, that most people in this Legislature other than the two ministers – actually, I don't believe the hon. Calgary-Hays was even a minister at the time. Certainly, the Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti might have been the only one in this Legislature that is aware that there was a process of identifying people who did not have identification but, again, a process that takes longer than a day.

One of the other things, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to bring to your attention again comes from the Chief Electoral Officer, I think, when he stated, you know:

While I applaud the spirit behind the proposals about advance polls and special mobile polls, I wanted to bring to your attention potential unintended consequences of these particular proposals. If passed in its current form, I am concerned that Bill 32 will deteriorate the service provided to electors and increase the timelines for communicating results.

You know, it's a concern, Mr. Speaker, and I think, again, that has to do with a lack of consultation, especially with those who are in a position to best know our electoral system; i.e., Mr. Resler and his expertise as the Chief Electoral Officer. Those are concerns, and I think that it's very important that we, again, bring it back to what the hon. Member for Airdrie had indicated, that it goes back to committee for consultation with, again, committee chairs, who are more than capable of dealing with this issue that would be brought forward to them.

The other thing I would like to touch on, Mr. Speaker, of course, is the Senate. You know, I understand what the members opposite are saying. I understand what the folks on this side are saying. Yes, in the end, they are appointed. I get the impression from both perspectives that not everybody is happy with appointed. On reflection, I'm not sure I really agree that an appointed body has the right to overrule or stand in the way of or be a barrier to an elected body.

But Albertans, I can tell you – and I know some of the government members, well, have been here for about three years but at the time were fairly new to Alberta, and Albertans are very proud of this opportunity to elect or have the ability to elect a candidate who would then possibly be appointed to the Senate. So, no, it's not being directly elected to the Senate – we all get that – but Albertans were very, very proud, just proud of the fact that they had an opportunity to elect a Senator to stand to be appointed, potentially be appointed. You know, that's going to be taken away from them.

As somebody that's been here all my life, certainly, and talked with many of my friends and my colleagues and those who I've worked with, I remember when Albertans had that first right to vote for their Senator. It was thought of just as a step in the right direction – a step in the right direction – Mr. Speaker, whereby, hopefully, one day we would have that right to vote in our Senators, and to think that it's regressing and taking that step back is certainly a concern for Albertans. It's a concern for the constituents to whom I have spoken.

You know, I remember heading back to the constituency on the weekend and attending one of the hockey games. It seems to be my part-time job, doing that, with my son playing hockey all the time. But just in talking to some of the parents, one of them brought this up in regard to: "Hey, is that right? We won't be allowed to vote for the opportunity to have a Senator anymore?" They were concerned with that, and I think that their concerns are valid ones. I think that we should be progressive when it comes to this and not go in the opposite direction.

You know, Mr. Speaker, when I see a bill such as this – again, I don't want to get in an argument as to the page numbers – certainly, something that is a large bill, that is dropped on us a week before the session was supposed to end, it's concerning to me. I think that in order for us to make sure that this can be the best bill possible for all Albertans, I believe that we really need to send this to committee and give the opportunity for the experts to come in and give their opinions on what really, truly is going to matter.

It cannot be stressed enough that the Chief Electoral Officer is somebody – and that's fine. I mean, everybody makes mistakes. You know, as my friend said, although he was being funny, they may have lost the Chief Electoral Officer's phone number. But, quite frankly, what's important is that he needed to be consulted on this, and we really needed to have his input. I can tell you that for anybody in my constituency, anybody in the election that I have been a part of, the Chief Electoral Officer is the first point of contact, and I think that for the government the Chief Electoral Officer should also be the first point of contact.

Mr. Speaker, I can't stress enough the importance of sending this to committee. I want to thank you and all the members for this opportunity.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Any questions for Calgary-West under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member. A couple of things I'd like to bring up and comment on with respect to some things that were said earlier.

The Speaker: Hon. member, we're under 29(2)(a).

Mrs. Aheer: Yes, sir. Thank you so much.

With respect to what the member was saying, he was speaking specifically around the electoral officer. One of the things that, again, is very, very interesting about this bill is the piece on consultation, which the member was speaking about. The Member for Edmonton-Centre had said that they had spoken with the Chief Electoral Officer on many, many occasions. But, again, oddly enough, and like the member was saying, specifically around the piece that the independent officer – and I believe the Member for Calgary-Hays was also mentioning this as well – was never consulted, it's interesting that there are certain pieces that were consulted on and certain ones that weren't. I find that a little bit confusing.

One of the things I wanted to bring up as well is in response to some questions that I had asked earlier with respect to the residency pieces. I mean, to Mr. Resler's credit – and the member was mentioning this as well, around the six-month residency piece. He's asked for that change, for the six months to be removed because it is hard to prove, very difficult, which is what the member was mentioning. It's difficult to prove. Why is it difficult to prove? Because it's easy to abuse. It's easy to abuse because it is hard to prove. I know it sounds silly to say it back and forth. But that's the actual reason.

Now, does that mean that you stop the ability to have a body of proof? No. As the member had said, you have to have identification. We get that. My question, then, ultimately is – and hopefully the member will have a chance to answer this – does that mean that with removing that six-month piece, if a person is here for one day and has the ability to have somebody vouch for them, then indeed are they able to vote?

Further to that, on the other side of things, if you remove the six months, which other provinces have – and I get that – don't you think that it would be easier and better for Alberta voters and voters that have the right to vote in this province because they are residing here to have a little bit of time to be able to go get their documentation together, to be able to present at election that they do indeed live here?

I mean, obviously, if you're a student from another province, that's going to be slightly different, but you would have a piece of mail that came to your residence or whatever that is. The issue of proof – and I'm sure the member will be able to elaborate on this a little bit more – is actually always going to be an issue, so if we want to create the ability for accountability, which we do, especially within the electoral process, if we want to make sure that residents feel protected, that they feel safe, that we're actually strengthening the legislation, don't we want to make, at the very least, the ability for the average Albertan or the average resident to make sure that they have all their ducks in a row before they go to that process?

And then, I mean, to the Member for Edmonton-Centre, like he said, there are people that do not have the ability or the means, or they don't have this identification and need somebody to vouch for them. We understand that. The question is, though, and the interesting piece is when I'd ask the question – and I ask the question to the member here – that Mr. Resler brought this forward not because of anything other than that it is hard to prove. So we're basically saying that because we can't prove it, that's the reason to remove it. In my opinion, if anything, fine; make it smaller; do whatever you need to do with it.

If I could ask the member to please respond. If you could tell us, from your perspective, in terms of safety, in terms of making sure of accountability: how do you feel with respect to that?

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you. Thank you, hon. member, for the question. It is hard to prove. It's hard to prove six months. It's hard to prove. Again, that's why those checks and balances were put into place many years ago when dealing with people who have lost their identification. When people were challenged with being able to prove who they were, that was not something that could be done in a day. But the same to your argument as well. We couldn't prove six months or a year.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there members who wish to speak on the referral amendment to second reading of Bill 32?

[The voice vote indicated that the motion on amendment REF1 lost]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 11:14 a.m.]

[Fifteen minutes having elapsed, the Assembly divided]

[Motion on amendment REF1 lost]

The Speaker: Are there any members that wish to speak to Bill 32? The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my pleasure to rise and speak to Bill 32, An Act to Strengthen and Protect Democracy in Alberta. I will reiterate that when the NDP does legislation, what the big print giveth, the small print almost always taketh away. This is just one more example of where that is indeed the case. In fact, I'm going to reflect for a few minutes. The Premier came into the House to speak on this bill last night, and that was highly entertaining. In fact, the Premier got a standing ovation from members on her side. The members on that side of the House are excited about this bill, but I have to tell you that there are lots that ought to concern Albertans, because democracy matters.

There are several issues here. First of all, let's just talk about democracy. The fact is that what the bill does is reduce democracy. Right up until now, until this NDP government showed up, Albertans had the ability to periodically vote for Albertans that might after that be appointed as Senators. This government has repealed that ability. Rather than strengthening democracy, this government has said that Albertans' voices are not important. That, actually, should be concerning to everyone in Alberta, the fact that their government doesn't want their voice heard.

It should also be a concern – we talked about the residency requirement. The residency requirement of six months has been repealed. Now, Mr. Speaker, when I take a vacation in Mexico, I don't get to vote for the government there, and if I take a vacation in Arizona, I don't get to vote there either. I would hate for people to think that they could come to Alberta for the weekend or the week and manage to vote. I think that is something that becomes a realistic possibility under this legislation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know that members on the other side are feeling tender about this. In fact, one earlier today said that he was angry that he had to talk about this. I suppose that if a group of people I was connected to brought this forward, I might be angry, too, like the member opposite, having to defend such a piece of legislation. Then again, anger is the normal situation across the way. The fact that the six-month residency requirement has been taken away I think will be a concern for a lot of Albertans. I have to tell you that since this has been in the public discourse – you probably won't be surprised, Mr. Speaker – I don't judge what people really think.

Mr. Dach: Why do you want to disenfranchise people who want to come here to work?

The Speaker: Hon. member.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is so enthusiastic about democracy that he can't wait his turn. I hope that when he gets his turn, he will stand up and be just as enthusiastic about democracy, more enthusiastic than he's allowing Albertans to be that want to vote for their Senators, for example, much more than that.

Mr. Speaker, there's a discussion here about the possibilities. It's been talked about – and I don't know whether it's true or not – that there could be a Charter challenge here. Here's the concern. The government is going to take away some people's ability to speak: PACs, third parties, this or that. There's a school of thought – and I'm not a lawyer, I'm not a judge, so I don't know whether this is right or not – that that might be considered unconstitutional. The government seems to realize that, but they're going ahead anyway.

What's common with this, as with several other pieces of legislation that they have passed with sections in that are widely thought to be unconstitutional: I can't help but wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether the government knows this, whether the government thinks that they might lose, but they just want it in place for one more election because if it's a constitutional challenge, it may well take more than a year and a half to get there. I'm questioning the government's motivation here and wondering whether, indeed, they're hoping to have these rules in place just for one more election, before a challenge could be mounted and concluded. I don't know. Perhaps some member of the government will stand up and make that clear one way or the other, but you can hardly blame me for wondering.

You can hardly blame me for wondering about the government's sincerity about listening to Albertans when they are trying to add a new independent officer of the Legislature when they're not talking to the current officer of the Legislature, Glen Resler, as he has made clear in a letter to the minister on December 6, 2017, where he says that he wasn't consulted. Yes, he says that he gave testimony at the committee that ended – I don't know – several months ago, whatever, but during the time the government was putting together this piece of legislation, the independent elections officer makes it clear that he was not called during that time.

Consequently, one really has to wonder about the government's sincerity in wanting to create another independent officer when they don't talk to the independent officer that they already have. You would think that they would pick up the phone and call. You would think one of them has access to e-mail. You would think that somebody has time to go and have a cup of coffee and knock on the door and say: hey, independent officer who is responsible for this area of legislation and democracy in Alberta, perhaps you should be included in the conversation. But, no, that's not what the government did. They ignored that independent officer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you really have to wonder about their sincerity when you've got these inconsistencies, severe inconsistencies, in the bill. You've got to wonder about the fact that they've been warned after the fact, nonetheless. I'll resist the urge to reflect on the vote we just had because that would be out of order, but you do have to wonder about the fact that you've got so many pieces of this legislation that so many people haven't even talked about that are going to change the way, indeed, in which we pick our next government. You've got to wonder whether this is yet one more attempt by this NDP government to try to put themselves in an advantageous position in the next election. It's consistent with previous legislation where they set the spending limits based, generally speaking, on what's their own highest donation limit and below everybody else's. It's a great example, where they set the election donations limits at the place that would be most advantageous specifically for the NDP as compared to the other parties.

You know what, Mr. Speaker? As an Albertan anybody listening to this should be very concerned. I am concerned, too, which is why I'm on my feet talking about this, because whether they pick our party to be the next government or some other party to be the next government, I just want to know that the contest has been fair. I may not like the fact that the current government is the government. The fact is that they were elected, and they have the right to be that government. I want every election to be fair and unbiased and not weighted to one side or the other. I can't help but wonder whether this is one more attempt by this government to weight things in their own favour.

Now, again, the fact is that the cost of enumeration has been talked about by Elections Alberta, $11 million, and it's been noted that it probably won't be effective. In other words, why spend the money if you can't get the job done? It doesn't make sense, yet there it is in black and white. You know what, Mr. Speaker? It may not have been in there had the government actually talked to somebody who was in the know on these things. As we are sure of, that is not the case.

Now, the government has taken some steps to prohibit government announcements during the elections, to not use taxpayers' dollars. Unfortunately, the exemptions for this portion of the bill are too extensive and leave too much room for government discretion and potential abuse. In other words, what the big print giveth, there's a risk that the small print may taketh away. We think that the government has designed this in such a fashion that they could do an end run on it and basically put themselves in a position where others may not be able to advertise but they may. This is another reason why we should be concerned about this bill and another reason why Albertans should wonder about this government's intentions and whether they have any belief in indeed strengthening democracy and any interest in protecting democracy, which is really odd because they're here as the result of a democratic process that went their way. Yet they seem to want to tip the playing field in their favour as they go forward.

Now, the government also needs to provide clarity on the legal definition of, quote, the administration of political parties to ensure that the legislation is not unconstitutional given its regulations outside the writ period. This ought to be clarified before this legislation is put in place, Mr. Speaker. It's not one of those things that we should leave to hope and chance and leave to any party's discretion but this one's in particular, that has shown a real propensity for tipping the scales in their own favour. To have them decide after this legislation is beyond this House is most inadvisable for Albertans and, by extension, most inadvisable for this government.

The way that we're governed matters. The way that we choose those people that make decisions that everybody else has to follow matters a great deal. This is an example of ignoring those important issues. Now, this bill increases the maximum penalty for general offences under the Elections Act from $500 to $5,000, which, actually, may turn out to be a good idea. But I haven't really heard any explanation from the government side members of why that's the right number. I might even be prepared to agree with them. But the fact is that when they trot out a bill of such core importance to Alberta a week before the Legislature was scheduled to end – and thank goodness the opposition caused the Legislature to go longer so that we could at least attempt to debate this – and when it arrives on an eight and a half by 11 sheet rather than going to the printer, Mr. Speaker, it really shows that the government didn't have their act together, didn't have it planned out, and was jamming things in there at the last minute. It really shows that their claim to wanting to strengthen and protect democracy is a fleeting one indeed, especially when you consider that the House went many, many months between sittings after the spring session. We didn't get back in here till October, and during all of those months out of here the government didn't actually put enough effort into this, probably the most important bill because it has to do with the way we elect our governments, to have it ready before the day before they introduced it, which was almost the day before the Legislature was scheduled to recess.

The work hasn't been done. They haven't done the work. They haven't done the preparation. They haven't put the thought into it, and they're going to throw Alberta into the next election under the guidance of a government and an effort that is so haphazard, so slipshod, so half-baked that they ought to be ashamed of themselves. Instead, they're just angry that some people are questioning their shoddy workmanship when, in fact, they ought to be ashamed of their shoddy workmanship.

There are just too many things to be concerned about here. Now, again we're on the main motion, so I'll mention again the residency requirement. Mr. Speaker, I lock my front door; I imagine that you lock yours. I don't know. But there is a saying that you lock your doors to keep the honest people honest because dishonest people will come in whether your door is locked or not.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Are there any questions or comments under 29(2)(a)? The Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Yeah. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to focus specifically on the hon. member's comments about the residency period. You said that the way we're governed matters. You know what else matters? Facts, actual facts, matter. I have some concerns with this bill. There's absolutely no question that I have concerns with this bill. I have concerns with how rushed it is. I have concerns with the fact that they didn't allow the Select Special Ethics and Accountability Committee last year to do its work, which would have avoided many of the problems that this bill seeks to undo.

But to attempt to deceive Albertans to think that somehow we're going to be overrun by hordes of Saskatchewanians and British Columbians and people from Prince Edward Island and wherever who just swan in one day to vote in Alberta and then take off again – it's factually incorrect. It is not true. It is the kind of fact-free, divisive, negative, pandering, dog-whistle politics that is infecting our province. It is unhelpful. It's worse than unhelpful, Mr. Speaker. It is a threat, frankly, to our democracy. It is not true that someone could simply show up in Alberta one day and vote.

Mrs. Aheer: Yes. It is true.

Mr. Clark: It is not true. You need to be ordinarily resident.

Why is this bit in the bill? Why is this in the bill? Because the Chief Electoral Officer suggested that it be in the bill. Why? Because the Ontario Court of Appeal, in a decision called, I believe, the Frank decision, ruled on the six-month residency requirement, okay? That is now before the Supreme Court of Canada. You need to declare that you are ordinarily resident in Alberta and provide identification to substantiate the place of residence. If you simply fly into the province and declare that you're ordinarily resident, you are not.

So to suggest that this is going to lead to widespread voter fraud, frankly, smacks of the kind of untruths that we see coming out of the United States right now. It isn't true. It isn't true, Mr. Speaker. [interjections] It isn't true. There was not widespread voter fraud in the United States, and there will not be widespread voter fraud in this province. It simply isn't true. People who come to this province and who are ordinarily resident should be allowed to vote. [interjections] It is problematic. How do we prove six months?

I have concerns with this bill, and I'm not going to defend every aspect of it, but the residency period and the way that the UCP has gone about using this as a divisive, dog-whistle wedge are not the kinds of things that I want to see infect politics in my province. It is disingenuous to do so. So I would encourage the hon. member and I would genuinely encourage the UCP to rethink their strategy on this. To suggest that there is widespread voter fraud even in the United States appears to be completely untrue, and it certainly is untrue in Alberta. We do not have widespread voter fraud here. We will not have people who are fraudulently or illegitimately voting because of this bill. It simply will not happen, Mr. Speaker, and I think that it does not serve democracy, it does not serve the process for the UCP to suggest that that will happen here. I do fear for the tone of politics that we have seen recently in this province, and I fear that it's going to only get worse.

With that, I believe my time is nearly up. I look forward to finally moving on to the committee phase of this bill because we certainly have some changes that we'd like to propose. I would hope the government would actually take the opportunity to hear what the Chief Electoral Officer has to say as well and to . . . [interjection]

The Speaker: Hon. member.

Mr. Clark: . . . bring in some of the changes in Committee of the Whole and actually amend this bill and do so in this term, Mr. Speaker.

With that, I'll end my comments under 29(2)(a) and look forward to moving forward with the bill. Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Yeah. The gentleman just voted against listening to the Chief Electoral Officer less than 10 minutes ago, 15 minutes ago. You can't believe a thing that the hon. member has to say when he's so definitely inconsistent with what he says. [interjections] You know what? No one . . .

The Speaker: Hon. member. Just a caution about personal comments, with respect.

Mr. McIver: Thank you for that caution. I will be careful, Mr. Speaker.

In fact, no one has said that there will be widespread voter fraud. I said: you lock your doors to keep the honest people honest. We ought to lock the electoral door just enough to keep the honest people honest, too, because democracy matters.

Mr. Westhead: Mr. Speaker, I would like to request unanimous consent, if there happens to be a division before noon, that the bells be shortened to five minutes, please.

[Unanimous consent granted]

The Speaker: Members wishing to speak to Bill 32?

[The voice vote indicated that the motion for second reading carried]

[Several members rose calling for a division. The division bell was rung at 11:52 a.m.]

Legislative Assembly of Alberta

1:30 p.m.

Tuesday, December 12, 2017

[The Speaker in the chair]

The Speaker: Good afternoon. Please be seated.

Introduction of Guests

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster.

Dr. Starke: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It's my very great pleasure to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly guests that are attending today from St. Jerome's school in Vermilion. I will point out that St. Jerome's school was one of the schools that was tagged for a significant refurbishing under our government, and it was completed under the current government, and I do want to thank especially the Minister of Education for that. It would have been done on time, but the principal, Mr. Chase, is really particular, isn't he? Yes. They're all nodding up there.

They are students from St. Jerome's school, and they're led by Rolanda Beaudette and Mr. Ted Wheat. Ted and I have a history because he used to bring cows into my clinic, usually late at night, and would provide me with consulting information on how to improve my practice, which he provided free of charge. I do want to acknowledge that, and I won't make any comment on what that consulting information was actually worth. Mr. Speaker, I would ask my colleagues to join me in giving the traditional warm welcome of the Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Hon. members, there are no other school groups?

Seeing and hearing none, the Member for Lethbridge-East.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to introduce to you and through you to all members of the Assembly members of the Alberta Federation of Labour's child care working group. The working group has representatives from 13 different unions and is responsible for the Fair Start Alberta campaign, which is calling for the implementation of universal early childhood education and care. Here today to watch the tabling of their petition are Siobhán Vipond, Chris Gallaway, Susan Cake, Ron Palmer, Fangfang Xiao, Allison Alberto, and Sam Nuako. I ask them now to rise and receive the traditional warm welcome of this Assembly.

The Speaker: Welcome.

Members' Statements

Energy Efficiency Alberta Programs

Dr. Turner: I'm very proud to be the MLA for Edmonton-Whitemud. This House will have heard me describe it as the nicest part of Edmonton. We are blessed with a diverse population who live in Edmonton-Whitemud because of the fine schools, churches, community leagues, and recreational opportunities. We value using our natural areas year-round such as the bank of the North Saskatchewan, Whitemud Creek, Snow Valley, and the Larch sanctuary.

I know that residents of Edmonton-Whitemud, like all Albertans, have participated in our government's energy efficiency programs at record levels. Recently Energy Efficiency Alberta shared that over 150,000 Alberta households have registered for the residential no-charge energy savings program. That's 12 per cent of all single-family Alberta households. This enthusiastic response has been confirmed at the doors, at community events, and particularly by students at the schools that I visit in Edmonton-Whitemud.

Alberta's future leaders know that the most important thing that we can do to protect our environment is to take direct action to reduce our carbon footprint. These students know to make smart choices like choosing transit and ensuring homes are as energy efficient as possible. These students are going to buy net zero homes, drive electric cars, and limit their air travel. They're going to invest in corporations that participate in global warming mitigation to market their products like Suncor, La Maison Simons, Ford, Volvo, PepsiCo, and Tesla.

I'm very proud to be associated with Alberta's climate leadership plan. It has facilitated the approval of two major pipeline products, and it will pay off by heading off climate damages, reducing health problems, and creating thousands of jobs in alternative energy. Previous governments have put off acting, and now the risks of severe storms, forest fires, glacial melting, and food insecurity are severe. We Albertans can be leaders in dealing with climate change while protecting our economy so that we can continue to enjoy our quality of life. We must continue focusing on energy efficiency and helping our vulnerable populations. The human-caused problem of climate change needs to be human solved. It's the least we can do for those that come after us.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Lac La Biche-St. Paul-Two Hills.

Industrial Heartland Petrochemicals Industry

Mr. Hanson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Albertans should be proud of the heavy industrial designated land area known as the Alberta Industrial Heartland, established to be the petrochemical hub of the province, where oil and gas pipelines converge. If we can't get our product to market via pipeline, the heartland can get our product out on rail by converting oil and gas to petrochemical and fertilizer products. In the heartland one person's waste is another person's feedstock.

Last week news broke that Alberta-based NOVA Chemicals will be building a brand new facility. Unfortunately, it'll be in Sarnia, Ontario. NOVA will be expanding their Corunna cracker by 50 per cent to provide ethylene feedstock to a new polyethylene facility. Their second AST2 facility will increase polyethylene production capacity by 450 kilotonnes. Completion is expected in 2021.

Mr. Speaker, this is a project that should have been built here in Alberta's Industrial Heartland, but current government policies are not aligned to attract investment. Hundreds of billions of dollars in investment in new petrochemical projects are forecast globally. Alberta is being considered, but close only counts in the game of horseshoes. Coming in ranked at number 2 or 3 means no investment, no new jobs.

Alberta has some disadvantages over other jurisdictions when it comes to petrochemicals. We have a long, cold winter. It is cold to construct here, and thermodynamics come into play, adding layers of engineering and driving up costs. We're also not at tidewater, which enables global shipping at the lowest cost. We have to rely on rail, and rail service has been identified as problematic in the heartland in the past but is improving.

We had good news when royalty credits were announced for two projects under the petrochemical diversification program, but too many other projects did not get credits. New policy options need to be considered in order to get the marketing and the development of the heartland fully under way.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Glenmore.

Collaboration

Ms Kazim: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Collaboration is a necessity for building strong communities, and collaboration and community development go hand in hand. With our increasingly diverse population, community development involves the collaboration of people from different cultural backgrounds, articulation styles, and various ideological, emotional, pragmatic, and professional perspectives. Collaboration means working together, not shouting down other people's opinions.

My constituency has nine vibrant community associations. Each one has dedicated, diligent, and devoted community leaders and residents, who volunteer day and night to make our communities better. Even though each one is different, they all form strong communities because they all collaborate. I was thrilled when I sat down with the presidents of the community associations of Calgary-Glenmore to listen to the vision they hold for the communities and how willing and open they are to collaborate to strengthen relations with each other as well as our neighbour Tsuut'ina Nation.

I was also honoured to meet with Chief Lee Crowchild of the Tsuut'ina Nation. My gratitude for Chief Crowchild's generous time to meet with me and the hon. Minister of Indigenous Relations is beyond words. It was an inspirational experience meeting with him and learning about his vision for the bright future of the Tsuut'ina people, which embraces truth, fairness, collaboration, and strong neighbourly relations among all treaty people.

The only way we can create this brighter future is through understanding each other's differences and collaborating with one another. Those who practise the politics of division will never build a strong society in which everyone participates and everyone benefits. I would like to thank all of our community leaders for being amazing citizens and for moving our province and our society forward.

Thank you.

Provincial Debt

Mr. Gotfried: Mr. Speaker, by 2020 every last Albertan irrespective of age, race, creed, colour, gender, or religion will be the proud owner of over $16,000 of public debt. That translates into just over $66,000 of debt per family of four, and that debt, paid out over 25 years, will cost that same family almost $50,000 in interest, for a total of $115,612 repaid over that same period. The alarming part is that this will cost that household 385 after-tax dollars, or about $500, off their paycheque per month to repay that debt so that they don't have to pass it on to the next generation, and they will do that 300 times over that period. But as alarming as that is, that same $385 invested in low-risk investments for the same period would yield about $226,000 in long-term savings.

1:40

So what does that mean to the family of four who this government promises to make life better for? Well, let me tell you what those dollars might buy: a mortgage paid off; a modest recreational property or a nice camper; nine new cars, six new light trucks or SUVs or vans, or transit passes forever; $180,000 in RRSP savings plus $23,000 in RESP savings per child; 105 seasons of hockey registration and brand new equipment each year; 26 brand new Yamaha quads for those inclined; 25 years of family ski passes with new equipment every year for the whole family, with tens of thousands left over; 452 years of dance classes; 194 years of family fitness memberships; or maybe a modest holiday or road trip to expand your family's horizons or just make great memories as a family every few years; better, more nutritious food on the table; or maybe just leading a better, less stressed life.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the members opposite: is your reckless spending and irresponsible approach to public debt truly making life better for Albertans or mortgaging our future and the future of generations to come due to fiscal mismanagement of this great province we call home? I want us all to have a Merry Christmas not just today but for years to come for hard-working Alberta families, to sustain our province, to provide world-class public services, with a realistic commitment to care for our seniors and the vulnerable. That is, to me, what making life better for Albertans is truly all about.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Wetaskiwin-Camrose.

2017 Provincial Legislation

Mr. Hinkley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As we near the end of another session, I am proud that once again we have put forward a positive, progressive slate of bills. There is no greater gift that we as legislators can give to the people of Alberta than progressive legislation which makes life better for Albertans. For the record here are some of those: An Act to Reduce School Fees; An Act to Remove Barriers for Survivors of Sexual and Domestic Violence; An Act to Strengthen Municipal Government; New Home Buyer Protection Amendment Act, 2017; An Act to Support Orphan Well Rehabilitation; An Act to Cap Regulated Electricity Rates; Fair and Family-friendly Workplaces Act; Child Protection and Accountability Act; An Act to Protect Gas and Convenience Store Workers; Alberta Human Rights Amendment Act, 2017; An Act to Support Gay-Straight Alliances. There were 34 acts which received first reading and 15 private members' bills presented. Despite the ideological differences of the members of this Assembly I would like to thank everyone for their dedication to Albertans and all members for their diligence in looking at both the pros and cons in every debate.

I would like to thank all my constituents who provided input into my private member's bill, looking for consumer protection for their utility bills. We will strive in the future to tackle the issues of rising administration, transmission, and distribution costs. Likewise, thank you to all our committed caucus staff, who worked hard helping me to meet deadlines and edit the drafts and message notes, and thank you to all of the Legislative Assembly staff.

In closing, I just want to wish everyone all the best for this Christmas and holiday season, and I look forward to our spring session. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Government Policies

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Here we are at the tail end of a fall session, and this NDP government is desperate. We have seen these kinds of personal attacks before, and we recognize them for what they are, a sign of a very desperate government. This government is continuing down its typical path of making decisions on its own, without consulting with Albertans. We have seen it again in this session: bills 30, 31, 32, and 33. No consultation, yet this NDP government fully expected to see these bills approved in just days.

We've also seen it with this government's latest heavy-handed emission rules, which it announced last week. Let me quote the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers from a December 6 Globe and Mail article.

By seeing a substantial increase in the costs to industry, that as a standalone – regardless of the model – I think is something that may position us to be less competitive at a time when we need to be substantially more competitive.

Despite this criticism from a key stakeholder the NDP imposes new emissions regulations anyway.

Who are we trying to entertain here? We all come here, Mr. Speaker, to serve our people, and this government never misses an opportunity to say that they have families' backs. Which family are they talking about? I don't know whose life they are trying to make better, definitely not Albertans'. Hopefully, in this new year this government will change and learn and truly do things to make Alberta a better place to live, work, and raise a family. In the meantime on behalf of my colleagues I want to wish a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year and from the other side a Merry Christmas with a 50 per cent increase in the carbon tax.

Tabling Returns and Reports

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The opposition seems to not be aware that their leader, Jason Kenney, is calling for 20 per cent cuts across the board, so I rise today to table the five requisite copies of an article from CBC News entitled Jason Kenney Proposes Drastic Cut to Alberta's Per Capita Spending, where it quotes him as saying that he would "exercise a period of sustained restraint in spending in order to get us down . . . to [B.C.] per-capita spending over time," spending . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member. I think we got the message.
The hon. Member for Lethbridge-East.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. All children deserve a fair start in life, and I am proud today to rise and table the requisite five copies of a document signed by hundreds of Albertans from across the province. This document was prepared by the Fair Start Alberta campaign. It calls on the government to expand the Alberta early learning and child care centre pilot project to take action to ensure an adequate workforce is trained and to ensure good working conditions for child care workers in Alberta.

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. member.

Ms Fitzpatrick: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This morning while talking about Bill 32, I did reference a letter, which was from the Chief Electoral Officer, Glen Resler, to the hon. Minister of Labour responsible for democratic renewal. In essence, he did indicate that he had "not been consulted in relation to policy direction leading up to Bill 32." Anyway, I have the necessary five copies that I would like to table to you.

Thank you very much.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have 13 letters from business owners from across Alberta that are concerned about bills 30 and 31. A couple of quick facts.

"It is clear to me that my voice as a citizen, business owner, and taxpayer has not been heard": this is from Scott, not the same one that's in front of you.

Greg is saying, "Bill 31 is an entirely worse bill from the automotive industry's perspective."

We've got Steve: "Another cost to be borne by the employers."

Bob: "The goal needs to be simplification and premium reduction, not adding further layers of administration."

Don: "These bills propose huge increases financially to the consumer and to the businesses."

Jason: "Please can I be consulted?"

John says, "Proposed changes were the result of the very biased and slanted on-line survey."

Jerry says, "Are being subjected to over regulation interference from your government."

Jim: "We were not made aware of any changes moving forward."

Paul says, "The consultation that the government did on the WCB changes was done by invitation only."

Daniel says, "Without consultation from Automotive Dealerships."

Colby says, "These changes will make it harder and more expensive to do business in Alberta."

Lastly, I have – I apologize – a Colin: "If Bill 31 passes, we may no longer have a voice as an industry."

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Oral Question Period

The Speaker: The Leader of the Official Opposition.

Carbon Levy Increase

Mr. Nixon: In a few weeks' time this government will hike the carbon tax by 50 per cent on Albertans. That means that it will again cost families more to heat their homes, again cost families more to fill up their cars, and again cost families more to buy their groceries. In return, not a single pipeline opponent has been moved from no to yes, but Albertans' bills are moving from high to higher. To the Premier: given the frail economy, why is it that you are raising the carbon tax right now?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, I will take the UCP House leader's question today, but I want to say that given what we learned today, I think the House leader needs to carefully consider his role in the House and the message the UCP is sending to women. Instead of defending a woman who complained to him about sexual harassment, two days later he fired her. This is not an allegation; this is a finding of fact. Even more troubling, today we've learned that Jason Kenney, UCP leader, is defending this action. To all women across Alberta I say that I'm very deeply sorry that this is happening amongst the leadership in this province. I will, however, also say that this government on this side of the House will stand for women's rights and for their right to be protected in their workplace.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the United Conservative Party caucus and I take harassment in the workplace seriously. We think it's a serious issue, and we will continue to stand up on the issue. As I have said outside of this House and I will say inside this House, I deeply regret some of the decisions that were made by myself and my organization while handling that human resources issue. We were very, very disappointed with what happened to Ms Harrison. It was not right then, and it is not right now.

But my question, Mr. Speaker, was about my constituents and the increased cost of the carbon tax and if the Premier will cancel her carbon tax.

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Again, I will say that the member opposite needs to reconsider his position and whether or not the position of the members opposite with respect to Bill 30 under his leadership is one that Albertans can have faith in given the information that we learned today.

With respect to the matters around the carbon levy, Mr. Speaker, our government is committed to ensuring that we move Alberta forward as a responsible, sustainable energy producer. As a result, we will continue with the plan that has gotten us the pipeline approved so far to date.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the United Conservative caucus supports increased harassment legislation and making sure that we stand strong on that issue as a province and that we stand with employers who are trying to deal with those issues as well as with people that are being harassed.

But, again, Mr. Speaker, my question was about the carbon tax and the cost to Albertans, the significant increase in cost to Albertans. Will the Premier recognize that and cancel the carbon tax?

Ms Notley: Well, Mr. Speaker, the world is changing, and Alberta industry is very keen to work with us to lead the charge to continue to be one of the most sustainable and responsible energy producers in the country. It doesn't necessarily help, however, as I said yesterday, when the UCP Finance critic, another member of that illustrious front bench, promotes climate conspiracy theories as he did over the weekend. The fact of the matter is that our plan is investing in innovation, our plan is focused on cutting emissions, our plan is phased in over three years. All of that will ensure that we are able to succeed in getting that pipeline built.

The Speaker: Second main question.

Carbon Levy and Charitable Organizations' Costs

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, winter is already a busy time for Alberta charities. Last month Inn from the Cold in Calgary said that they have been at or above capacity since April. They've had to open their overflow shelters more than 25 times already, but the NDP government chose not to exempt charities from their carbon tax grab. To the Premier: Charities like homeless shelters provide a valuable service to vulnerable Albertans. Why is the Premier making it more expensive for them to keep the lights on?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In fact, what our government has done is a great deal of work to support a number of different nonprofit organizations. Of course, one of the things in relation to the climate leadership plan is that there is a rebate that goes to low-income families and low-income households that actually assists them with those costs. And, in fact, they end up coming out ahead because those households tend to use less carbon than others. In addition, our government has not moved forward with 20 per cent cuts to the programs that support these charities and the people that these charities work with, and that's how we are supporting them.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, winter is already a challenging time for those living on the streets and a challenging time for those operating shelters. Two years ago many charities and nonprofits cited the economy as a reason for reduced donations yet higher demands for their services. The carbon tax now makes it more expensive for those charities to keep the lights on and as another tax on Albertans reduces capacity for giving to those charities. To the Premier: why are you making it harder for our charities to keep the lights on this winter?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. In fact, our government created the nonprofit energy efficiency transition program, which provides a grant to nonprofits for energy efficiency audits. In addition, through Energy Efficiency Alberta we've introduced the business, nonprofit, and institutional energy savings program. Up to this point we've had 137 different organizations successfully screened to participate in the program. The fact of the matter is that we are working with all elements of the community collectively, collaboratively to help us bring down our emissions because unlike the members opposite we believe climate change is real and we need to take action to stop it.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the Calgary Food Bank says that their client numbers have rarely been higher than they are this year, 8 per cent higher than last year, but this government's carbon tax and their latest carbon tax hike make it more expensive to keep the lights on, more expensive to transport food, more expensive to buy groceries that can't be donated. To the Premier: why is this government putting a 50 per cent carbon tax on charities that provide a valuable service to vulnerable Albertans?

Ms Notley: Well, again, Mr. Speaker, what our government has been doing is working very closely with charities across this province to help them in the work that they do to support vulnerable Albertans. Again, it is just so contradictory and hypocritical for the members opposite to advocate for 20 per cent cuts to things like income support, health care, education, the kinds of things that support these communities and support these people, and then to talk about these issues with respect to the carbon levy. Their plan would actually create real hardship. We are standing up against that. We have the backs of Albertans, all Albertans, including women.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Chestermere-Rocky View.

Provincial Response to Federal Policies

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Equalization was on the agenda at the recent meeting of the provincial, federal, and territorial Finance ministers. Ontario's Liberal government was already vocal last week about the impact of the proposed changes for them. B.C.'s NDP government was already vocal last week about the impact of proposed federal changes for them. Alberta's government was nowhere to be seen as the Finance minister continued his tour of breweries and distilleries. To the Premier: did her Finance minister even bother raising Alberta's concerns at the recent meeting, or did she just instruct her minister to rubber-stamp the feds' changes?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance and President of Treasury Board.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much for the question and opportunity to speak on this, Mr. Speaker. You know, Alberta is recovering from one of the worst downturns in a generation. At a time when revenues in this province dropped $6.5 billion, we went to the federal government and said: there's a program there, the fiscal stabilization program, that needs to have our back. It didn't have our back. I raised that in the meeting with the ministers from across the country. We got 4 per cent of the revenues that we lost. That's inadequate, and we're going to change that.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. While Albertans are transferring billions to other provinces who obstruct much-needed resource projects that create Canadian jobs and actually contribute to overall prosperity, the Finance minister said that he was agnostic on equalization. It was not something that as the Finance minister he's focused on. That might explain why her Finance minister is more interested in going to breweries, as great as they are, than Alberta's finances. To the Premier: what did her Finance minister contribute to the discussions on equalization at the recent meeting, or is she too agnostic to take a hard look at the equalization formula and make it fair for Albertans?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Ceci: Thank you very much. You know, that quote was from over a year ago, Mr. Speaker. A lot has changed in a year. There were two parties here, both on the right side, but they were here, and things have changed.

Dr. Starke: Still are, Joe. Still are. Still here, Joe.

Mr. Ceci: Good. I'm glad you're over there.

Mr. Speaker, I stood up for the views of Albertans with regard to equalization. It is a federal program. We have contributed as this province to the health of this country significantly. I stood up and I said that the FSP doesn't work. It needs to change. The floor there needs to change.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mrs. Aheer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Well, equalization wasn't the only thing on the agenda. There were other concerns that this Finance minister could have also raised. The CFIB called on the provincial Finance ministers to raise concerns about the new federal rules on, I know, small-business taxes. They said that one of the largest tax changes for small-business owners in 40 years goes into effect in three weeks, and the federal government has provided zero detail or implementation advice to business owners or tax professionals. To the Premier: did her Finance minister raise these questions on behalf of Albertans? Premier, have you raised them with the federal government?

Mr. Ceci: You know, Mr. Speaker, Jason Kenney loves to tell Albertans that he will stand up for them, but the Fraser Institute report – yes, the Fraser Institute report – spells it out clearly. A rule change when he was in government, in the federal cabinet actually, hurt Alberta's interest and hurt Alberta's interest in the downturn we were just in. Jason Kenney did nothing to support Alberta when he was in cabinet. He's doing nothing now. [interjections]

The Speaker: Hon. members, a little of the ho, ho, ho continuum would really be helpful.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Workplace Bullying and Harassment

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. What used to be hidden in the shadows has finally started to come to light. For far too long women who have been sexually assaulted or harassed in the workplace have been silenced or dismissed. Finally, our society is coming to terms with this injustice, and increasingly women are being heard, but it's only the beginning. To the Premier: how does the government of Alberta support women and all people who have faced harassment to seek assistance, and do you have confidence that the current process is adequate?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and thank you to the member for that very, very important and timely question. Let me say that our government knows that we have more work to do, and I look forward to being able to talk about some of the things that we will do.

I will say that going forward, should there be a change in government in a year and a half such that the UCP was in charge, I am deeply, deeply concerned about what will happen to women in this province. I am deeply, deeply concerned that almost 10 years after the member opposite was found to have fired somebody illegally for raising sexual harassment, they now come forward and say: oh, we are remorseful. I am not at all – I have no faith.

The Speaker: Thank you.
First supplemental.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, earlier today I reviewed the respectful workplace policy that applies to government employees. My concern is not so much with the policy itself but whether there is an adequate education process to ensure that these policies are widely known and understood. Again to the Premier: will you commit to ensuring that there is a strong emphasis on education to ensure that all employees know about the protections available to them and that they can confidently come forward to report incidents of harassment and bullying?

The Speaker: The hon. Premier.

Ms Notley: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Yes. I absolutely can commit to that. As a result of the ultimate passage of Bill 30, of course, there will be stronger rules in Alberta with respect to sexual harassment policies. In addition, while we already have those policies in the government of Alberta, they can definitely be stronger, and we can definitely do a better job of promoting and educating about them. Our government has already taken steps to expand that work outside the government of Alberta with the I Believe You campaign, for instance, that the minister of women's issues has dealt with, and we will . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. Premier.
Second supplemental.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now, when I looked at the government of Alberta's respectful workplace policy, I was concerned to see that there is a 14- to 30-day limit to report an incident. Again to the Premier: in light of how long it can take individuals, especially women, to feel comfortable reporting harassment, will you review this limit to ensure that anyone can come forward in their own time?

Ms Notley: Well, indeed, we absolutely will do that. Our practice right now is to allow for complaints to come forward after that period of time, but obviously if you've got those rules in place, people would be discouraged. So we will be changing that immediately. As well, Mr. Speaker, you'll know that we changed the law to allow for victims of harassment to file claims going back much further than they were before. That was a change that we made earlier in the session. It is fundamentally important that all members of this House understand that if people are the victims of harassment, they can complain about it, raise it, and not have to worry . . .

The Speaker: Thank you.

The hon. Member for Calgary-Shaw.

Condominium Property Regulations

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Statistics Canada recently reported that nearly 22 per cent of Calgarians live in condos. That number is second in the country, only behind Vancouver. This shows that more and more Calgarians, including many of my constituents, have chosen to live in condos. To the Minister of Service Alberta: how will the recently announced regulations to the Condominium Property Act protect these consumers?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. This government cares about everyday Albertans and believes that Albertans deserve to be protected when they make a purchase as large as a home. I am proud to say that we recently announced new rules that will improve protections for buyers of new and converted condominium units. These new protections will provide more information for buyers at the time of purchase, give the option to cancel a contract if the unit doesn't look like what they were promised, and protect Albertans' money by putting deposits in a trust.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. While the new regulations will protect people buying a condo, to the same minister: what is the government doing to protect those already living in condos?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Service Alberta.

Ms McLean: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We are currently consulting on the second phase of regulations that will address living in a condo, including condo governance. This summer we invited Albertans to open houses across the province to tell us in person how we could improve condo living. Based on what we heard, we launched an online survey to continue this important conversation. The survey also included a variety of topics, including condo governance and proxy voting. The survey closed on November 10, and we look forward to reviewing the answers to create condo regulations that will make life better for Albertans.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Sucha: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the proposed regulations aim to improve the quality of condo living and that we know conflicts will arise between condo owners and condo boards and given that currently the only resource for two parties is through the courts, to the same minister: what is the government doing to allow Albertans a low-cost alternative to resolve conflicts?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms McLean: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. As part of the third phase of the regulations we are also consulting on a dispute resolution mechanism for Albertans, including the determination of a tribunal's jurisdiction and structure. Albertans want and need a more efficient and less expensive way to resolve condominium disputes than having to proceed through our court system. The dispute tribunal is intended to provide them with that alternative.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Postsecondary Education Funding

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. NDP fiscal mismanagement has come home to roost. After two years of promising stable funding, yesterday we learned that the Minister of Advanced Education has given Alberta postsecondary institutions just two weeks to come up with cutbacks, cuts that will directly harm Alberta students' futures. To the Minister of Advanced Education: why now? What frills and optional extras do you think our universities and colleges have today that they didn't have before?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Seniors and Housing.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, our government is carefully and responsibly finding cost savings while increasing front-line support for students. I certainly appreciate along with the Minister of Advanced Education the important work that postsecondary institutions do. There is certainly leading-edge work done on campuses, and every single day we're very proud of the work they do. We're supporting them with a 2 per cent investment and, certainly, are working very closely with them at this time.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the timing of this request is absurd. Given that the adult learning review is more than a year overdue, it's insulting to give these institutions only two weeks to respond. Again to the Minister of Advanced Education: how do you know that the cuts will be targeted in the right areas if you don't have a proper strategy, and will we ever see the results of the adult learning review?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Not only is our government making education more affordable by extending the tuition freeze for another year; we're also providing universities with backfill funding. We're working closely with institutions across this province to make sure that they are supported and that there is affordable education for the students of Alberta. Two hundred and fifty thousand students save an average of $1,500 each because of the tuition freeze. We're certainly working very closely with advanced education.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, this is incredibly frustrating. Given that the government told us for the longest time that cuts were irresponsible and given that instead of prudent fiscal management from the very beginning you chose to rack up huge amounts of debt but, as always happens, you hit the wall and given that you created an expectation that money is infinite but now you realize that money actually has to come from somewhere, again to the Minister of Advanced Education: which programs will be cut, and which students will have their education compromised by your poor planning?

2:10

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Sigurdson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I'll just reiterate that our government is carefully and responsibly finding cost savings. We're working with the postsecondary institutions to do that. We want to make sure that education is affordable for students in this province, and we want to make sure that postsecondary institutions have the support to be able to offer the world-class programs that they do. We're working very closely with them, and we're proud of what we're doing in this sector.

Thank you.

Conklin Industrial Landfill Site Application

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, the residents in the hamlet of Conklin are concerned that their voices are not being heard by this government regarding a proposed industrial landfill only two kilometres from their community and Christina Lake. Part of the reason for the concern stems from the fact that, although public meetings have been held, there's been one hundred per cent opposition to this proposed landfill. To the minister of environment: what percentage of constituent opposition is required before this government takes notice and makes a decision on this site, or do you care?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks and climate change.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did have the privilege of meeting with the hon. member's constituents on this matter and the regional municipality of Wood Buffalo, and they did share their concerns about this particular application for an industrial landfill. Those concerns have been heard, and we will be in touch with the constituents on the various options that are open to them. Certainly, our government is open to hearing from communities around large projects, and we will continue to do so.

Thank you.

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, considering that the site this landfill is planned for impinges on an area that has historic and traditional land use for the Conklin Métis, including harvesting food and culturally important roots and medicines, and considering that there has already been a decline in the traditional uses of land around Conklin, to the minister: why are you delaying this decision? What is the delay?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can assure the hon. member that the regulatory process is moving forward as it should. It will unfold in due time, in the fullness of time to ensure that we have heard from all of the affected community members, including the appropriate indigenous consultation.

Thank you.

Mr. Yao: Mr. Speaker, this government has a lot of plans for land around this small community, including processing an application for an oil sands site. Considering that such development could increase local growth in the area but that the addition of an industrial landfill next to town could discourage new settlement into that community in favour of more commuting, to the minister: is your objective to promote commuting over rural growth and development?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm not exactly sure how the hon. member's constituents are served by this kind of line of questioning. The fact of the matter is that there is a regulatory application in place. I have heard from the communities, certainly. There is a regulatory process in place so that all community members can be heard. What doesn't help is undermining the confidence in the regulatory process. I'm not sure how the hon. member thinks that regulatory processes unfold, but it's certainly not how he has characterized it.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky.

Carbon Levy and Energy Industry Investment

Mr. Loewen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the environment minister said "the Prime Minister approved two new pipelines, [and] he explicitly said that it was on the strengths of Alberta's climate leadership plan." Of course the PM said that, because he wants to increase the carbon tax. He's selling the same failed social licence scheme that the NDP is. This government continues to deny the damage it is causing to Alberta's economy. Well, the truth is clear. Two cancelled pipelines, and large corporations are fleeing Alberta. The climate leadership plan is leading all right, leading investment away from Alberta to other jurisdictions, and this government keeps piling it on with caps, taxes, and red tape. When will this government stop holding Alberta's economy down?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, hardly a day goes by without another piece of economic good news coming to Alberta, you know, new investments in the oil and gas sector. I'm looking over and seeing folks who are looking a little glum today, but let me give you some good news: $30 billion of new investment in the Duvernay area, including in the Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre area, where people are being put back to work. This is because we have created a stable investment climate, and as the price of oil recovers, so too does the economy. It doesn't help when the Conservatives talk Alberta down.

Mr. Loewen: Given that any increase in activity in the oil and gas sector is a result of increased oil prices and given that the NDP said over and over again that they do not control the price of oil – so, therefore, they can't take the blame for losses from it and therefore cannot take the credit for any economic benefit from the rise in prices – and given that the minister claims that companies buying out each other is new investment in Alberta when really it is just recirculation, will the minister come clean with Albertans and admit that her climate plan is destroying investor confidence and that the government's numbers are just a shell game?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, our government's approach to the royalty review resulted in a large increase in drilling at a time when Albertans needed to be put to work the most in the oil and gas sector. The fact of the matter is that the Conservatives and certainly Mr. Kenney would take us back to the boom-and-bust cycle. That's not what Albertans are looking for. They're looking for diversification. They're looking for good jobs in the oil and gas sector. They're going to get both from this government.

Mr. Loewen: Given that the minister said that Cenovus Energy has doubled production and that realistically this was just the addition of the production of the company it bought out, not new production, and given that Cenovus and other investors have cancelled projects – one company said about the cancellation that, quote, the project is further burdened with regulatory uncertainty around the climate leadership program and its potential impacts on the project, from carbon tax to the emissions cap, end quote – and given that the projects that are coming online now are projects planned and started before this government was in power, will the minister just admit that the NDP plan is a failure and cancel her economy-killing climate plan?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, only a Conservative with a loose grasp of the facts would try to allege that nation-leading economic growth, both this year and next year, is something to be ashamed of. We are not ashamed of the kind of growth that we are seeing here in Alberta. We are seeing 4 per cent growth. We are seeing tens of thousands of new jobs. If the members opposite want to continue to wave their pom-poms and cheerlead for Alberta's demise, we on this side of the House are going to celebrate the growth of this province and the tremendous number of new jobs that are being created as a result of our work.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Airdrie.

Rural Crime

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Albertans remain profoundly disappointed by this government's behaviour when it comes to the serious problem of rural crime in Alberta. On November 17 in rural Airdrie three people assaulted a homeowner with bear spray, stealing his property. On November 23 two people broke into a residence just west of Airdrie. Crime is escalating and not just in my community but all across this province. On November 27 more than a hundred Albertans spent their time and resources to travel to this Legislature in hopes of watching their MLAs in an emergency debate to consider solutions. Minister, do you have any regrets for not holding that emergency debate? Yes or no?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Children's Services.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I know that Albertans are concerned about rural crime, and we are, too. We're working with our police partners to reduce crime in rural areas, including through the Alberta RCMP's crime reduction program. One of the initiatives that's part of this program is the new integrated crime reduction unit in central Alberta. That unit has already led to the arrest of three individuals, and those individuals were responsible for roughly 300 calls to the RCMP prior to their arrest.

Mrs. Pitt: Mr. Speaker, given that the NDP had the nerve to say about the motion for emergency debate, "Whether or not it's serious or even extremely serious is not the question; the question is: is it an emergency happening now, or is it something that's happened over a longer period of time," and given that an emergency is still an emergency if it has been happening over a long period of time and given that the problem is only getting worse and given that Albertans are desperate for solutions, Minister, when we return home to our constituencies, what explanation should we give to our frightened constituents?

Ms Larivee: Mr. Speaker, we certainly are all confined to the rules around how this House is conducted; that does not change that we take rural crime incredibly seriously. ALERT is a key part of an integrated province-wide response to serious and organized crime, and it works with smaller rural communities to share intelligence and help stop rural crimes. For example, in the MLA for Cypress-Medicine Hat's community ALERT's month-long operation led to 20 individuals being charged with drug-related offences and 29 individuals charged with stolen property offences, including over a dozen vehicles. We will continue to support our police partners to reduce crime in rural areas, a concern that we continue to take very seriously.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mrs. Pitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that rural Albertans feel stifled by this NDP government, including those in NDP ridings, given that business owners are sleeping in their shops out of fear at night, given that Albertans are setting up and meeting in town halls to discuss possible solutions, given that law enforcement agencies are proactively encouraging crime prevention techniques like the 9 p.m. routine in Airdrie and Edmonton, Minister, it's clear there is a problem that Albertans are eagerly trying to fix. What specifically are you doing to address their concerns? What you're doing right now is certainly not working.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Our police officers are hard-working, dedicated, caring individuals who leave their homes every day to protect Alberta families. That's why we continue to work with them, to listen to our police forces and Albertans to reduce crime. The RCMP have told us that reducing crime in Alberta cannot be achieved through policing alone. They've told us that we need a co-ordinated approach. That's why we're also investing in mental health supports and addiction services, to break the cycle of crime in this province.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Whitemud.

Energy Efficiency Initiatives

Dr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Larch sanctuary at the confluence of the Whitemud and Blackmud creeks is in my constituency. The sanctuary is protected by Edmonton's first conservation easement and is a collaboration between landowners, the city of Edmonton, and the Edmonton and Area Land Trust. It's a prime place to connect with nature. Melcor has developed Larch Park, a community of net zero homes, a construction waste recovery program, LED street lights, and a community garden. To the Minister of Environment and Parks and minister responsible for the climate change office: what programs does your ministry operate that would foster more examples of this type of sustainable development that contributes to climate leadership?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. In support of the climate leadership plan, in October 2016 the government of Alberta updated seven building codes. We did this because emissions from Alberta houses and buildings are responsible for about 19 megatonnes of greenhouse gas emissions, or about 7 per cent of our overall emissions profile. The National Research Council Canada estimates that switching to even just energy efficient windows can save homeowners about 18 per cent on their heating costs. Changes to the building code and some of the incentives that we have put forward as part of Energy Efficiency Alberta help homeowners and businesses permanently reduce their energy use and their monthly utility bills.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Dr. Turner: Thank you. Given that another current example of inspired redevelopment by the private sector here in Edmonton is the new La Maison Simons store in Londonderry, which has solar panels on its roof and an innovative parking structure with solar panels that leads to an electric vehicle charging station, to the same minister: how can our government foster more of this sort of environmentally responsible business development in Alberta?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. How the climate leadership plan is proceeding is that we are taking the price on pollution and reinvesting it into the world we want, and part of that world is solar PV. We are doing so on farms, we are doing so in indigenous communities, and we are doing so in the commercial sector. For example, the Simons system that we see at Londonderry in the hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore's riding will generate 55,000 kilowatt hours per year of solar power. That project alone created 300 jobs. Those are good jobs that the folks across the way would eliminate.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Dr. Turner: Thank you again. As I said in my member's statement, many of my constituents have signed up for the efficiencyalberta.ca programs. Can the minister give the House plans for this program in 2018 and '19?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. We're very pleased that Energy Efficiency Alberta has been able to reach so many Albertans and find ways for everyone to be able to reduce their utility costs, whether it's on farms or in small businesses or in indigenous communities. Also schools, municipalities, and businesses both large and small have benefited from these programs. Alberta was the last jurisdiction in North America to adopt energy efficiency programming, and we will be moving forward with even more of these programs in 2018-2019 as we move the economy forward, as we diversify the economy, and save people . . .

The Speaker: Thank you, hon. minister.

The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Social Studies Curriculum

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I had the opportunity to go down to Calgary-Lougheed on Friday to door-knock, something I know the Minister of Education has done recently, and during my time door-knocking, I happened to meet a social studies teacher. This teacher expressed serious concerns about the new social studies curriculum. They are troubled that the new material does not include enough historical knowledge or content for the students to make informed decisions, yet the government is asking them to be activists. To the minister: how can you ask our children to become activists when you're not providing them with the context and the knowledge to make their own decisions?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm certainly very proud of the curriculum work that we're doing in all subject areas, in all grade levels over the next five years. The work that we're doing is foundational at this moment, and certainly we have perhaps the biggest interaction with not just teachers and those working groups but the general society as well, including banks and energy institutions and forestry, 4-H clubs, you name it. We're building a curriculum that reflects who we are as Albertans in 2017. I'm very proud of that work, and so are the thousands of Albertans who are contributing to that work.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that this teacher also expressed concern that the new social studies curriculum lacks the chronological information about historical influences and events required to understand the context of any major historical event and given that this contextual information is foundational to studying and understanding history and social studies, again to the minister: why is this basic foundational information being left out of the current rewrite of the social studies curriculum?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Eggen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, as a social studies teacher myself – and the member opposite is as well – we know that it's important not to make conclusions based on one, single person talking about the social studies curriculum, which is not even written yet. Certainly, we know that we're going to have a very strong foundational work in history. We know that you cannot study the present and the future without knowing what happened in the past. I mean, that's part of the reason that Albertans chose to have a new government, because they knew that 44 years of conservatism just was not bringing the sort of diversification in the economy that we need to prosper in the future.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that we've now heard concerns about this curriculum rewrite from thousands of parents and that we are now beginning to hear this same message from teachers as well, not just one, and given that the NDP's by-election candidate characterized these concerns as constant misinformation and melodrama, again to the minister: do you stand with concerned parents and teachers or with your candidate and his disrespectful comments?

Mr. Eggen: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, I think that Jason Kenney and his distortion of the idea of how we're building our history curriculum is anything but thousands of Albertans. We know that 35,000 Albertans contributed to the first round of building our curriculum, and we will continue in the spirit of building with history, critical thinking, and a respect for tradition and culture in this province. The UCP are scared of critical thinking because once people achieve that goal, then they certainly won't believe a single word that these people are saying.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Grande Prairie-Wapiti.

Lyme Disease

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One of my constituents paid to go to the United States to get tested for Lyme disease. The test came back positive, but now she's fighting to find a doctor who will treat her in Alberta. She's become desperately ill, and she has considered travelling to B.C. or the U.S. for treatment. To the Minister of Health: will you confirm that Lyme disease is present in our province and taking a toll on the health of Albertans?

The Speaker: The Associate Minister of Health.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. I would encourage the member to reach out to our office, to our MLA contact about the specifics of his individual constituent's case as we don't discuss individual health concerns in this Chamber.

Thank you.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that the test administered in Alberta does not provide definitive results, yet a better one exists and is used in other jurisdictions, and given that the minister has previously confirmed that ticks carrying Lyme disease exist in Alberta and that she certainly knows that Albertans are also contracting it elsewhere, to the minister: why are Albertans not able to receive proper diagnosis and treatment in their own province for this debilitating infection?

2:30

The Speaker: The associate minister.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and to the member for the question. Our government makes decisions about which tests are and are not available upon the advice of doctors and the medical experts. I will certainly, as I said, be happy to follow up with the member about the particular question.

That said, I would also encourage any Albertans to be mindful of ticks and to follow the advice that is available through the Alberta Health website. Further, if you ever have any concerns about your health condition or any potential health concerns, I would really encourage Albertans to reach out to Health Link or their family doctor. You can reach Health Link by calling 811 and speak to a registered nurse.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Drysdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Given that my constituent told me that there's one doctor in Alberta who treats chronic Lyme disease but he has hundreds of patients and is not taking any more and given that forcing Albertans to seek treatment in other jurisdictions creates a two-tiered health system, to the minister: can you confirm that only one specialist treats chronic Lyme disease in Alberta, and if there are more, why won't someone in Alberta Health help my constituent to find one?

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Payne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker and again to the member for the question. As I said earlier, we'd be happy to connect with him about his particular constituent's concerns. Further, any Albertans who have any questions about treatment or concerns about a particular disease should talk to their family doctor for a referral. Additionally, they can reach out to Health Link and have their symptoms evaluated by a registered nurse and receive recommendations for next-steps treatment.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Police Preparedness for Cannabis Legalization

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Canada is just seven months away from legalizing marijuana. Many provinces and police, including the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, are urging Ottawa to delay legalization because their enforcement services do not have time to properly train officers. To the Minister of Justice: what are Alberta's police services telling you about their ability to be prepared for July 1?

The Speaker: The hon. minister

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Again, I have to say that our government's key priorities for cannabis legalization have been working with our partners to keep cannabis away from children, to keep profits away from criminals, and to protect our roads, workplaces, and public spaces. We continue to be committed to working with our police services to ensure that we can achieve those objectives together. We're very thankful for the relationship we have with the people who work so hard to keep our communities and our homes and our roads safe.

Mr. Ellis: I'm talking about preparation, Minister.

Given that Albertans are naturally concerned about the potential of more drug-impaired drivers on the roads as of July 1 and given that Alberta will need many more police officers trained as drug recognition experts to perform specialized impairment testing, again to the minister: how many drug recognition experts does Alberta have today? Minister, you should be able to provide a number for this question.

Thank you.

The Speaker: The hon. minister.

Ms Larivee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Once again, we take the safety of Albertans very seriously. That's why we continue to work with our partners. We'll continue to have conversations with them and to work with them to identify what resources they need and what the challenges are. We'll move forward together to implement a plan to ensure that as cannabis becomes legal, we are able to keep our roads safe, keep our children protected, and keep money from getting in the hands of criminals.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ellis: Albertans want answers to these questions, Minister.

Given that it takes time to train officers for this highly specialized work and they have to travel to the United States to receive it and given that Ontario estimates it will need double the number of drug recognition experts, which means that Alberta is facing a similar scenario, and these experts will be needed throughout our province, to the minister: how many trained drug recognition experts will be accessible to all police services throughout Alberta on July 1?

Ms Larivee: Mr. Speaker, once again I'll reiterate what I said earlier. Our police officers are hard-working, dedicated, caring individuals. We're very thankful for the sacrifices they make in leaving their homes every day to protect our families. We, again, work with our police forces in order to keep Albertans safe, and we'll continue to trust their expertise and to work with them to ensure that they have the resources they need as we go forward.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Greenway.

Carbon Policies

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. We have a standoff in Alberta. The NDP says that its new emissions regulations won't cause Alberta's energy sector any problems, but professionals in the industry such as Imperial Oil say, quote: there's no question that any increased costs on industry impact competitiveness, especially in the current challenging overall business environment. End quote. To the minister of environment: can you tell us for the record who is not telling the truth? Both of you cannot be right.

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Environment and Parks.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the output-based allocations system that was announced last week that will replace the specified gas emitters regulation starting in January was the result of two years of very careful consultation work with industry, not just in the oil sands but across the economy, in petrochemical upgrading, in fertilizers, cement, other forms of mining. The system is actually designed to protect jobs, to ensure that our trade-exposed industries remain vibrant and competitive in this province, and we expect that to happen.

The Speaker: First supplemental.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, Given that this NDP government is insisting on increasing the carbon tax despite our fragile economy and high unemployment, especially in our two largest cities, and given that this government is trying to slip in the hike in the carbon tax quietly over the holidays, Minister, why are you not letting Albertans know that they should brace for a 50 per cent increase in the carbon tax with zero net gain?

The Speaker: The minister.

Ms Phillips: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. Of course, only Jason Kenney's Conservative caucus would cheer for Alberta's demise. Only Jason Kenney's Conservative caucus would characterize two pipeline approvals as not being a net gain for this province. The thousands of people that are getting back to work in the oil and gas industry know better. Of course, the way that we are pricing carbon at our large industrial facilities, in our oil sands facilities is part of making sure that we move this province forward in a way that prices carbon in a way that is intelligent, that is thoughtful, and that recognizes that climate change is real.

The Speaker: Second supplemental.

Mr. Gill: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Minister, this is the biggest failure of a tax in Alberta history. Given that this NDP government has the opportunity to perform a nice deed this Christmas by cutting the carbon tax and given that this tax hasn't performed the task the NDP claimed it would – that is, buying social licence for pipelines; not a single pipeline opponent has been moved from no to yes, not a single opponent – Minister, why are you continuing with this tax increase, knowing that seniors will have to pay more to heat their homes this winter? [interjection] I know your caucus member thinks it's funny. It is not funny.

Ms Phillips: Mr. Speaker, this is just another set of questions that are designed to essentially cast doubt on whether we can trust what the Conservatives say. Here's what some folks are saying about the veracity of some of the statements that come from across the House: "Mr. Kenny seems to be making exaggeration and rhetorical overreach an art form. There is hardly a speech or even a comment" – I would add "a question" – "from this caucus that doesn't include a fact that has to be given a deep muscle massage." That's what we've come to expect from these Conservatives.

Trades Career Preparation for High School Students

Ms McKittrick: Well, Mr. Speaker, we've finally reached the last question. This morning I took part in a ceremony at the North West refinery celebrating the first barrel of diesel oil that was produced there. As our economy recovers, it's important for our education system to prepare young people to be those tradespersons who are working in our economy. One of the most important things that our education system does is to prepare students. To the Minister of Education: what program exists in the K to 12 education system to help students transition into the trades?

The Speaker: The hon. Minister of Education.

Mr. Eggen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly, we've been working hard over the last two and a half years to make sure that we increase our reach into dual-credit programming. We've brought in $16 million in order to have more dual-credit programming so that kids can go and get trades training and then get college credit for that as well. We have the registered apprenticeship program. We have the green certificate program, which we are now fully financing for students to be working in agriculture. So, yeah. We reach across to make sure that kids are getting the widest, most balanced education possible to prepare them for our future economy.

Ms McKittrick: Mr. Speaker, I have heard that the number of women entering the trades has plateaued. This morning at NWR I was pleased to support them in their partnership with Women Building Futures, that encourages young women to go into the trades. Again to the Minister of Education: what are you doing to ensure that girls know that they can pursue a career in the trades?

Mr. Eggen: Certainly, Mr. Speaker, we've been working hard, again, with the registered apprenticeship programs and so forth and also with industry. I know that a couple of weeks ago I went out to Dow in Fort Saskatchewan. They have very strong programming to ensure that women are being hired in trades and in these professions. You know, we have to make sure that we are always providing confidence and programming in high schools. When I was in Centennial high school yesterday in Calgary, they talked about the importance of career and technology studies to help prepare young women to work in a wide variety of future careers.

Thank you.

Ms McKittrick: Given that the career and life management program in high school is meant to help students learn about the possibilities for career development, again to the Minister of Education: how will the curriculum review ensure that students have the information that they need to make decisions about their future careers?

Mr. Eggen: Thank you so much for the question. Mr. Speaker, it's very important that we are always upgrading and updating our curriculum. We have some areas that are more than 30 years old. As I said before, the curriculum has to not just reflect the composition of who we are as Albertans but make sure that we're catching a point of interest so that students are engaged in their studies every step of the way and can see the continuity of study from year to year. We're working very hard to do that. We're engaging with literally tens of thousands of Albertans in that enterprise, and we're very proud of that.

The opposite correlation to that, of course, is that if you make deep cuts to education, then you get none of the above.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Barrhead-Morinville-Westlock.

Mr. van Dijken: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to table the requisite number of copies of a letter I received and referred to last night in discussions on Bill 30 from the Alberta Roadbuilders & Heavy Construction Association with concerns at the speed at which Bill 30, introduced on November 27, is moving through the Legislature.

The Speaker: Hon. member, we'll just wait for about 10 seconds, and then we'll continue.

The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to table five copies of section 35 of Occupational Health and Safety. I was assured by the Member for Rimbey-Rocky Mountain House-Sundre that the right to refuse unsafe work was enshrined, and I was dismayed to find out that it was not. I table those five copies.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Bonnyville-Cold Lake.

Mr. Cyr: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I mentioned in my Bill 33 speech effective representation, and I needed to table a kitchen table talk, Effective Representation, an article that was created by myself and seven other MLAs.

Thank you, sir.

The Speaker: I believe that we had one point of order today.

The hon. Government House Leader.

Point of Order

Reflections on a Decision of the Assembly

Mr. Mason: Yes, Mr. Speaker. During question period the Member for Airdrie put some questions to the Minister of Children's Services with respect to a decision of the Assembly. It was purported that this had to do with rural crime, but the first question and I believe the first supplemental, at least, had to do with a decision of the Assembly with respect to a request from the Official Opposition for an emergency debate.

Now, according to Standing Order 23:

A Member will be called to order by the Speaker if, in the Speaker's opinion, that Member

- (f) debates any previous vote of the Assembly unless it is that Member's intention to move that it be rescinded.

In the House of Commons Procedure and Practice, chapter 13, rules of decorum, on page 617 it says:

Members may not speak against or reflect upon any decision of the House. This stems from the well-established rule which holds that a question, once put and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again.

Mr. Speaker, you yourself have ruled on this matter on May 9 of this year.

I also will read from House of Commons Procedure and Practice on the question of questions, Mr. Speaker, on page 502. It says:

In summary, when recognized in Question Period, a Member should:

- ask a question;
- be brief;
- seek information; and

- ask a question that is within the administrative responsibility of the government or of the individual Minister addressed.

In more general terms, Mr. Speaker, it's been held that question period affords the opposition and private members an opportunity to ask questions with respect to government policy and certainly with respect to matters relating to rural crime and others. If it was limited to that, that would be within the area of government policy. However, demanding that the minister account for a decision of the House with respect to her request for an emergency debate is clearly outside of the rules of this place for question period. I would hope that you would so rule and in the future intervene so that these questions cannot be repeated in the House.

Thank you.

The Speaker: Hon. Government House Leader, you referenced a May 9 decision of this year. Could you elaborate on that?

Mr. Mason: I can read it to you, Mr. Speaker.

I cite Standing Order 23(f) and page 617, House of Commons Procedure and Practice: "Members may not speak against or reflect upon any decision of the House." In other words, an allegation or question concerning how a member has voted is offside.

The House has made a decision on the matter. I believe there was a point of order in this situation, and I would caution again all members to – it may be good politics at times to do that, but respect and honour in this House is [to be] determined by each of us.

That was on May 9, 2017.

The Speaker: The hon. Member for Calgary-Hays.

Mr. McIver: Well, thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to rise on the point of order. I would say through you to the Government House Leader that the answer resides within the hon. Government House Leader's question. Standing Order 23(f) says – and I will repeat it because even though the hon. Government House Leader said it, it's important to hear it right now:

debates any . . . vote of the Assembly unless . . .

Unless.

. . . it is that Member's intention to move that it be rescinded.

That is exactly what the member suggested to do. They can remember that as part of her question she said that the emergency is not over, the suggestion being that the government can still rescind it.

Mr. Speaker, as further evidence to this I would draw your attention to questions that our hon. House leader has asked in the last few days, where he has more than once, I believe, asked the government to rescind that decision. It's still the opposition's opinion, and it holds true that it's still an emergency. We would still want the government to rescind that decision and allow the emergency debate on rural crime because it's still an emergency. That was indeed what the hon. Member for Airdrie was suggesting. As such, I believe that there is no point of order here.

The Speaker: Hon. Member for Calgary-Hays, could you say again the rescinding action that you're suggesting? Could I ask that you elaborate a little bit more on what you mean by that?

Mr. McIver: Well, Mr. Speaker, it's our opinion that the hon. House leader, I believe, in the last few days has actually asked questions. He was asking the government if they'll change their decision on not allowing the emergency debate on rural crime. Rural crime is rampant. It's my assessment that the hon. Member for Airdrie today was actually suggesting that the government does rescind that decision and allow the emergency debate on rural crime. I believe she made it quite clear in her question that it is still an emergency and it's still ongoing, the suggestion being that the government ought to rescind that decision. I think that's entirely within the bounds of what 23(f) suggests is acceptable. Consequentially and, I hope, respectfully, I would suggest to you that it wasn't a point of order.

The Speaker: Hon. members, is there any other additional information?

Dr. Starke: Well, Mr. Speaker, there is a basic problem here. The request to rescind the decision is not the government's decision; it was your decision. Now, it just so happens that I disagreed with it. Nonetheless, we can't be asking you to rescind the decision. There's no way to move a motion to rescind a Speaker's decision. While the argument that the Member for Calgary-Hays puts forward is true if it was a decision by the government – and trust me, they've made a number of lousy ones – but in this particular instance that was your decision, no doubt influenced by the arguments made by the Government House Leader at the time; nonetheless, that was your decision. So there would be no motion of rescinding here.

I would like to point out, though, Mr. Speaker, that in this regard there are lots and lots of references made in speeches all the time about past votes and past members and past results of those. We hear it regularly when we're told: well, if you vote against the budget, you're voting against teachers and you're voting against nurses. Of course, that's balderdash. You know, in terms of referring to past votes and that sort of thing, that's a slippery slope. But in this particular instance where the question is only in order if it's calling for a rescinding of a decision that's been made by the House, I'd be fine if it was the House that made the decision, but in this case you made the decision. We can't call for your decisions to be rescinded unless you decide to reverse them.

Well, I'll leave that up to you as to whether you decide to make that decision.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Let me just share the Blues. This is the statement made by the Member for Airdrie.

On November 27 more than a hundred Albertans spent their time and resources to travel to [the] Legislature in hopes of watching their MLAs in an emergency debate to consider solutions. Minister, do you have any regrets for not holding that emergency debate? Yes or no?

I believe there may have been an additional reference to an emergency debate in the first supplemental.

Let me also share a small part of the November 27 ruling, that the Government House Leader and the Member for Vermilion-Lloydminster – that, in fact, it was I who dealt with the matter. And I will quote:

Accordingly, I do not find the request for leave in order, and the question will not be put.

Had this matter have been dealt with in a more historical sense rather than more recently, I may have been persuaded that a different decision should result. Nonetheless, I believe in this instance that there is a point of order, and I would ask that the Member for Calgary-Hays withdraw the comment on behalf of the Member for Airdrie.

Mr. McIver: Mr. Speaker, as you have ruled, I on behalf of the member will withdraw the comment that you found to offend the point of order.

The Speaker: Thank you.

Orders of the Day

Government Bills and Orders Committee of the Whole

[Ms Jabbour in the chair]

The Chair: I'd like to call the Committee of the Whole to order.

Bill 30

An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans

The Chair: Are there any questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'm very proud and pleased to be able to speak to Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, at Committee of the Whole. Bill 30 is long overdue. Bill 30 would continue our work to keep workers healthy and safe and to make sure that sick or injured workers get the supports they need to get healthy and return to work.

The Occupational Health and Safety Act was first enacted in 1976, and it has not had a significant update since. The last comprehensive review of the Workers' Compensation Act was more than 15 years ago. With this bill our government intends to make good on the basic foundation of health and safety and workers' compensation rules in Alberta, rules that have been left untouched for far too long. We will make sure that workplaces are safer, healthier, and free from bullying, harassment, and sexual harassment.

Since the 1970s legislators have been told that all workers need three basic rights, the three Rs: the right to know, the right to refuse, and the right to participate. Madam Chair, I'm so proud today to say that if passed, Alberta's workers will finally have all three of those rights enshrined clearly in our law.

Albertans will also know what their obligations and duties are. Whether you are an employer or a worker, a contractor or a supplier, your obligations would now be clear.

If passed, Bill 30 will also make important changes to the way Albertans are treated within the WCB. Of course, we will do everything we can to keep workers safe through education, participation, training, and prevention. Unfortunately, some workers still get hurt, and sometimes tragedy strikes and families lose a loved one on the job. When that happens, we need to make sure our WCB system is there: that it's there, that it's compassionate, accessible, focused on supporting injured workers and the families of workers that have been impacted by tragedy.

There has been much debate on the bill so far, and I'd like to, through these opening comments, address a few of the questions and comments I've heard, and then I look forward to continued debate in Committee of the Whole.

I've heard quite a few comments during second reading about consultation, and I would like to state for the record that there were significant amounts of consultation done on Bill 30, not just on the WCB side but on the OHS side as well.

We launched the OHS review in the summer, and I was very pleased to see the response from Albertans on that review. Alberta Labour received more than 1,300 online survey responses, nearly 90 written submissions, and conducted eight in-person round-table discussions with more than 200 in-person stakeholders across Alberta. Our government consulted with a range of Albertans, including employers, workers, labour groups, municipalities, health and safety technical experts, and safety associations. These included face-to-face meetings, where we had an opportunity to hear ideas and take different views into account. Beyond that, we also consulted with our OHS officers and staff, the amazing folks who are on the front lines, making sure that workplaces across the province are meeting proper safety standards. A total of 141 staff were consulted, and feedback from the session was compiled and fed into the changes proposed in Bill 30.

On the WCB side an independent panel completed the 18-month review of the WCB in June of 2017 to ensure that the system continued to supply Albertans and it continued to remain sustainable and affordable. The panel's recommendations for our workercentric system were posted online July 6, 2017, and Albertans had until September 30 to provide feedback. On the WCB there were two rounds of consultation and feedback gathering. By the end of the panel process the panel received more than 1,700 questionnaires, 200 written submissions, 67 workbook responses. Over 60 responses were submitted in response to the panel's report as well: lots of consultation, lots of opinions, and lots of Albertans who participated. The WCB review panel members did a lot of work to consult with Albertans as well, and we are moving forward with positive changes.

I also wanted to address the costs of implementing changes to the WCB system, as the members opposite have spoken about. To be clear, these costs will not be passed on to employers in 2018 through an increase to premiums. In fact, the WCB has just recently released the premium rates for 2018, and lo and behold the average industry rate is remaining flat at $1.02. So no change, no increase at all in 2018.

In addition, $355 million in surplus from the accident fund was credited to employer accounts earlier this month, so the employers who fund the system are receiving the surplus through credit offsets. Employers will not see anything in this bill that means that the government is directing financial decisions at the WCB. None. What employers will see is an improved system that is effective, sustainable, and remains one of the most affordable in Canada.

Madam Chair, in my experience as Labour minister it's become all too common to hear: it's not broken; don't fix it. Well, I stand here in the House today with all confidence to say that in a province where workers didn't have the right to participate in making sure their workplaces are safe, we are fixing that. In a province where workers have the duty but not the right to refuse unsafe work, we are fixing that. In a province where injury benefits were out of step with real earnings, we are fixing that. And in a province where workers are not fully protected against harassment, we are fixing it, and we are fixing it now.

Now, I'm very interested in working with this House, through amendments and through the debate process, to make sure that Bill 30 is the best bill that it can be. To start that process, Madam Chair, I would like to table an amendment to Bill 30 that does the job of clarifying certain items within the bill and a little bit of housekeeping to it. I have the requisite 95 copies of this amendment, and I will pause there.

The Chair: This will be known as amendment A1.

Go ahead, hon. minister.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. This amendment will make housekeeping and clarifying changes to further strengthen health and safety protections and clarify the government's intention to improve OH and S and WCB legislation.

Please let me know, Madam Chair, if you'd like me to change how I'm doing this, but I will just speak to each section, as to what it is.

Part A of the amendment will ensure that workers who are employed in a private dwelling are protected under the OHS Act. For example, this change will ensure that live-in caregivers are covered by the OHS Act if passed. That would include the duties, essentially, that are defined in the act.

Part B will ensure that the OHS director can designate a prime contractor as responsible for a number of work sites in an industry. This will create another efficiency in the process for contractors working with OHS. The reason we use "class of work sites": an example industry, Madam Chair, would be logging, for example, where there are multiple work sites, but we would want the ability to designate a prime contractor.

Part C makes a change to the definition of domestic worker to make sure that we are including workers who live in a private dwelling and to ensure there's no ambiguity and that they have basic OHS protections.

Part D is a clarification change, simply ensuring that the deeming provisions of section 98 come into force on June 1, 2018. This part would be amended by striking out "96, 97 and 98," and substituting "96 and 97,".

Part E. This change will ensure there's clarity that our intent is to recognize correctional officers and emergency dispatchers as eligible for presumptive coverage for PTSD under the WCB. Madam Chair, this is in keeping with our government's policy direction. We spoke to this when we introduced the bill. Through the bill we have given ourselves the ability to make this change through regulation, but since the introduction of the bill we've heard directly from correctional officers and emergency medical dispatchers that the clarification that would come from having this in the legislation directly rather than through an update to regulation later would be quite meaningful to this group of Albertans, and as this was a recommendation from the WCB panel originally, we are happy to make this amendment and make sure that that clarity is there for these important workers.

Part F. This part of the amendment repeals section 41 of schedule 2, which makes reference to maximum assessable earnings. Making sure we're removing this reference is part of the decision to remove maximum insurable earnings from the Workers' Compensation Act. The section referenced is no longer required.

Madam Chair, overall, this is a set of housekeeping changes to increase clarity in the bill. I'm happy to answer questions that there may be on this amendment, but I certainly hope that all members of this House will support the amendment that I have put forward.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. I would like to rise and speak to the amendment as proposed by the minister. I actually had an opportunity – and I appreciate the minister sending it to me and having me take a look at it before. I appreciated that. I have actually no problems supporting this. There were some important corrections that needed to be in here, especially the definition of what corrections officer meant, being that it's a peace officer. Peace officers, obviously, as well as emergency dispatchers need to have that added in there. I appreciate that clarity and that being put in there. I think that these professions will need to have that added protection as well.

I guess the only thing that I'd like to say to the minister on this amendment, Madam Chair, is: look, I don't have a problem with the fact that you have put forward this amendment as it is a housekeeping amendment. I guess the problem that I have – and this goes back to the original questions that we had – is about why you needed the amendments now. I mean, we've just been introduced to the bill, and we already have the amendments.

I do get the idea about the peace officers and corrections and dispatchers. There should have been, really, one line item in there that should have been changed, but what we see here is multiple sections that needed to have changes made as housekeeping changes, which speaks to the problem that we've been addressing for probably the last few days, and that is that the consultation process was rushed. The problem that we have faced: I've talked to many stakeholders, Madam Chair, that say that this was a very rushed process, that they did not feel that they had the opportunity to be able to speak to the issues fulsomely enough.

So here we are right now. We're dealing with a situation where shortly after the bill was introduced, the ministry recognizes that it was not written properly and that there needed to be housekeeping amendments done. Because of that, I think that it shows we need to step back from this bill, we need to give it the proper time needed, and we need to make sure that we hear from enough of the stakeholders, the 160,000 some-odd businesses that are actually contributing to WCB and that will be affected by these OH and S changes.

Let's be clear once again: these are not simple changes. We're talking about an extra hundred pages being added to the Occupational Health and Safety Act. Think about what that will do to small and medium-sized businesses. They have to wrap their heads around the idea of these extra hundred pages that they have to deal with now, and they've got to be able to understand it because ignorance of the law is not an excuse.

We know a few things. We know that under this government the penalties will be the highest in Canada. Small, medium, and large businesses have got to really move quickly to be able to get their heads around what all these changes are, again, a hundred pages of occupational health and safety added onto the Occupational Health and Safety Act. Knowing that there are the highest penalties in Canada, knowing that ignorance of the law is no excuse, we now have a situation where they are putting a lot of stress on the businesses. That's really a concern that I've heard a lot when I've talked to the stakeholders.

That being said, I have a lot to say about this bill, but in terms of this amendment I will be supporting this amendment because, again, it speaks specifically to an important correction, which is talking about the peace officers and the emergency dispatchers being added to that part. But I do believe, once again, that because there are these housekeeping issues, it shows that the reality is that we have pushed too fast for this bill and that we should actually be slowing down.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment?

Ms Gray: Just briefly. Thank you very much to the member for the support for this amendment, and I appreciate your comments. Similar to what we were talking about with the correctional officers and emergency dispatchers, when the bill is introduced into the House, although we've consulted with so many stakeholders and we were able to talk to them about potential policy direction and whatnot, the introduction of the bill is often the first time for safety associations, business groups, and OHS experts to read the details. The process of allowing the bill to be debated and for stakeholders to be able to reach out to us or to the opposition to talk about potential amendments or changes is exactly how this is supposed to go. I'm very pleased that we were able to work with stakeholders on this and now with this House to make these housekeeping amendments to the bill.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I'm really happy to be able to stand and speak to this amendment to Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans. This amendment captures something I've been working on with correctional officers and their families since the election. They have been struggling with an extra five years now of not being entitled to presumptive PTSD coverage, and that has left what is a multiplying effect of cost on our society, on our province.

There are careers where, unfortunately, PTSD is more prevalent, and it's because they see traumatic things. I had the opportunity to introduce someone the other day, Frank Garritsen from Fort Saskatchewan, who had been working for 27 and a half years in corrections, and he had seen all manner of horror: slashings, hangings, murder, sexual assault. Something awful that I had never heard of was something where an inmate would take a bottle and mix together feces and urine and would explode it on a corrections officer as they passed their cell. Things that I had never even heard of were brought to me.

That's one of the many reasons why I knew it was really important to fight for this for the last two and a half years even though it's taken a really long time to go through really fulsome consultation with all of those that are affected, whether it's the public service or workers or industry. It's taken this long to make sure that it's comprehensive and looks after those things that, you know, I wouldn't refer to as housekeeping.

The point of having Committee of the Whole is to be able to bring forward amendments as a matter of going through the legislation and having an eye for it that maybe someone else didn't have, because we all represent just different constituencies in Alberta and different concentrations of a certain industry or worker. There are a lot of nurses in my constituency. There are a lot of corrections officers in my constituency. There's a lot of RCMP. There's a lot of Edmonton Police Service. There's a lot of military. I have the opportunity to hear those stories and struggles that they have as part of my role.

So when I have legislation come forward, you know, I'm seeing it for the first time, too, but I know that I've been part of this conversation for two and a half years. This isn't the first time that I'm hearing about these subjects and these issues, so I, knowing that there was this review happening, actively talked to people to be able to get a sense of what, like, work had been done before and reached out with questions about where things are so that I can get a really good sense of the things that might need redress when I see a bill.

This is one of those things. It's a very confusing thing. If someone were to say, "Oh, you know what? Corrections officers are covered in presumptive PTSD legislation," I might have read it initially, the original legislation, that had been passed in 2012, and thought that that made sense. That's, in fact, what happened in Frank Garritsen's case. He took his case to the WCB, and they opened up, you know, the legislation and said: "Oh, you're a correctional peace officer. It says it on your badge, says it on your paperwork. It makes sense that peace officers are covered." In fact, it took a year for them to figure out in the legislation that it is not correctional peace officers; it is peace officers defined as sheriffs. Sheriffs need protection, too, absolutely, but corrections officers have really high incidence of posttraumatic stress disorder because of those awful things that we ask them to tend to.

You know, we're legislators that create laws that put people in the corrections system, and then we're not thinking about the people that are behind those walls, that are keeping society safe. That was a real, real hole that was left five years ago. It's troubling when people are dying. These corrections officers: it's not some faraway story. These are our friends. These are people that I have talked to via Twitter and Facebook and e-mail because they have heard about the work that we've been doing.

The idea that this needs to be put on hold is just flabbergasting to me and flabbergasting to the people who have these stories. I shared the story of someone named Isaac McNeill, who was happy to share his story on the record. He tried to cut his throat and woke up in a pool of blood. Like, this isn't some faraway thing that needs six months more or whatever number you want to put on how much longer you want to consult. This is happening. These people are in your communities, so this needs to happen now. This is not the time to dither.

Why did it take so long? The Premier, when she was sitting as an MLA in 2012, tried to put forward this amendment, tried to include correctional peace officers in the legislation, and she made very sound arguments, as she made last night. She was talking that there are issues when you create a class of workers and say, you know, that we're going to hold only certain people – and people that do incredible work. I mean, the first responders that are included and going to be included, including emergency dispatchers, do incredible work on behalf of Albertans.

But what it did was that it made people in the corrections field feel like second-class citizens. That was what I heard over and over again. When they would go through the WC process, they would feel like they had just been traumatized all over again. They would tell me that they just felt like the whole system was throwing them away like garbage. That's, unfortunately, what we heard concerns about, that the WCB Act did not focus enough on the needs of workers, so there was a lot of work that needed to be done.

Sorry. I wrote a lot of notes that are kind of in front of me because it's something that I am very passionate about, so I'm having just a slight trouble reading through my notes.

The struggle of posttraumatic stress disorder is serious. It interferes with everything. It creates difficulty in being able to form relationships with trust. It has hypervigilance as a part of it, which is just exhausting. We're starting to understand more about it so that we can better support them, and that's really important.

You know, it doesn't matter if you are attending an emergency in jail or if you are attending a car crash, trauma is trauma is trauma. I know that we have other regulations that will be able to protect the public-sector workers, but this is a really important piece that recognizes that corrections officers suffer at rates sometimes two, two and a half times police officers' because they are immersed in that place, in that environment full-time. Full-time.

There has been a basic lack of respect paid to these corrections workers. When they experience this psychological injury, this mental injury, it impacts their ability to take care of their families. They're not looking for any sort of special recognition, any special thanks. They just want to be able to put food on the table for their family when they get home. That's what is so important about having good legislation that protects workers because, you know, a worker should have the right to do that. They look after the rest of us, and then they just want to be able to go home and look after their family, too. So we need to make sure that we continue to do this work. I'm really glad that we have the time to debate this now to make sure that these things have been seen to.

I want to thank the minister for tabling this amendment. I know that she knows how much this means to the workers that it represents. I'll leave it there, but I just want to make sure that everybody here knows that it is the right thing to do.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. I just have a really quick question that I hope someone could give me an answer to. I heard the member opposite say that they've been working on this for about two and a half years. I guess the question that I have is – the minister talked about the process of how this thing actually rolls out, and she talked about how they had to work for a period of time. In terms of the consultation process there were 1,300 online survey responses, 90 written submissions, eight in-person facilitated round-table discussions, and then 200 stakeholders that were representing employers, workers, OHS professionals, health and safety associations, and academics. Just to be clear, that two-and-a-half-year-period process – and then she said that then once we go through that process of being able to draft the bill, at that point we have the opportunity to be able to bring it forward so that people can give us their feedback.

To the minister: does she believe that it is fair to go two and a half years in drafting this bill, which is over 200 pages, to be in a situation now where she is giving seven days to stakeholders, to people who are affected by this to actually just read the bill, a 200-page bill, digest it, and try to be able to come up with some reasonable responses to it? Seven days versus two and a half years to be able to draft this: I wonder. I just have to ask the minister: does she really believe that that is a reasonable amount of time to be able to make sure that the stakeholders, the people who will be affected by this, especially small-business owners, by what the unintended consequences will be, especially them, have had the proper time to be consulted and get their feedback during this important process?

The Chair: The hon. Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville.

Mrs. Littlewood: Thank you. I just wanted to clarify that I said that I had been working on this amendment for two and a half years. I know that, you know, government never really stops working, so there is work that goes on in the department all of the time. That is its nature. But the draft report itself went out in July and therefore was available for review, feedback, further input between July and September. That was the second round of the review.

The Chair: Calgary-Klein.

Mr. Coolahan: Yeah. Just quickly, Madam Chair, as my colleague said, the draft report was out in July. We have to remember, too, that this isn't reinventing the wheel. We were playing catch-up with the other provinces, so we were able to take from some of that legislation as well. As this is rolled out next year, too, there is going to be a lot of support for small, medium, and large businesses and owners in terms of training, and we'll be able to discuss what is required to make their workplaces safe.

Thank you.

Mr. Hunter: I just wanted to clarify the point that I was trying to make. In this amendment they've identified peace officers and emergency dispatchers, that had been left out. Now, over a two-year to however long it was, a year and a half, two years, whatever, that they were working on this – we were able to figure that out in about seven, well, actually, three or four days. The question that I have for them is: is the seven-day period that they're actually providing us with enough time to make sure that we've got the proper representation of the people who might be left out or might have been missed? Do they actually have enough time to be able to read the bill, know whether or not it affects them, and actually be able to give proper feedback and say: "Yeah. You know what? You forgot us." That was my question.

The Chair: Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Chair. You know, I think we want to quickly just review about the consultation that had occurred. They had pointed out some of the things that happened, but it was just on occupational health and safety – okay? – 1,300 online surveys just for occupational health and safety, 90 written submissions just for occupational health and safety. I can go on. The WCB. We've forgotten to continue to add the 1,700 questionnaires around the WCB, the 200 written submissions, and the 67 workbook responses. That was before the panel had submitted their report, which then got an additional 60 responses with that.

3:30

But what I wanted to quickly focus in on with regard to the consultations – I'm not too sure if there's some confusion here about the extent of just how far this went. There were, you know, 200 stakeholders across Alberta. Some of those stakeholders represent a very large number of working Albertans, and I think we'd be remiss if we didn't point out just some of them – I don't have time to go through all 200 of them here, but we can touch on just a few of them – you know, a stakeholder like Keyano College, which has 341 staff, with approximately 2,800 full-time students there, being consulted with on the bill. Bethany Care Society: 262 full-time employees, 1,147 part-time employees, approximately. The Centre for Newcomers Society of Calgary: 760 staff and volunteers.

You know, it's one thing to consult in just one little area. What we tried to do was to create a very wide net to capture as many of the stakeholders as possible. Red Deer Airport was a part of that, with approximately 240 employees. Red Deer chambers of commerce participated. They represent approximately 800 members.

Maybe I'll just quickly pull a page from the Member for Grande Prairie-Smoky. I'm hoping that we won't dismiss some of these stakeholders that are being mentioned that are not able or capable of representing their memberships' views and their employees' views. These are the people that we consulted with in coming up with the bill.

Royal Dutch Shell, which, you know, could also be known as Shell Scotford Alberta, with approximately 1,300 employees. Edmonton Exchanger & Manufacturing: approximately 1,000 employees. We have the Medicine Hat chamber of commerce with 825 members. Enmax has approximately 1,825 employees. Alberta Beef Producers: Madam Chair, 18,000 producers were consulted. The Alberta Construction Association: representing an impressive 3,000 members, encompassing approximately 226,000 employees. Alberta Health Services, with approximately 124,000 employees. Alberta Sand and Gravel Association: 125 members. Building Industry and Land Development Alberta Association represent approximately 1,900 members. Edmonton public schools, with approximately 8,640 employees.

PCL Construction Group has approximately 14,400 employees. UFA Co-operative Ltd.: a very, very impressive 110,000 active members. Alberta Ready Mixed Concrete Association, representing 270 companies in their capture zone. Cargill Ltd.: total employees of approximately 8,100 Canada-wide. I think this is where it's very, very important to point out that some of these companies now are in other jurisdictions, where these changes that we're making already exist. I'm sure that some of these organizations, you know, have experience at this. Again, I think the Member for Calgary-Klein said that we're not reinventing the wheel. These are things that these members are already looking at.

Operating engineers local 955, you know, has more than 13,000 members. UFCW: 32,000 members, and of course they're representing the workers for Loblaws or Superstore, which have a very impressive number of employees working for them across Canada.

So I think when we're talking about the amount of consultation that has taken place, I think it very clearly demonstrated here that that net is cast very, very wide. There are amazing numbers of results that are being pulled in, which have formed this, which is why I think, you know, as the minister who brought forward the amendment said, again, it was to just quickly clean up, a little bit of housekeeping. I'm happy to support that. I think as we move forward, using consultation as an excuse to delay this bill, like the Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville mentioned, would do a disservice to some of the people that we're looking to protect.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake.

Mr. MacIntyre: Thank you, Madam Chair. As impressive as the list of participants in the survey is from the hon. member opposite, here we are right now with an amendment that says: oops; we forgot somebody. That is the point, that as impressive as that survey may have been and all the consultation may have been, we have an amendment right now before this House that essentially says: in spite of all that, we missed somebody. That is the point, that it's one thing to survey and consult before a piece of legislation is actually crafted, but once the thing is written and there it is bound and stapled together, that's the document people need to look at. That is the fruit of all of the consultation. That isn't something in a complete form that people got to read through ahead of time and give feedback on. The point that we're trying to make is, "All right. Now we've got this bill. Now let's take a second look at it and see: is there someone else that's been forgotten?" just as these amendments indicate is the case. That is the point.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Calgary-West.

Mr. Ellis: Thanks, Madam Chair. Thank you very much for all the comments that I've listened to, and I've certainly listened with intent. I especially want to thank the Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville for, of course, bringing this sort of information to the government, which brings this amendment forward, which I of course do support. You know, I'll point out, as my friend the hon. Member for Innisfail-Sylvan Lake pointed out, that, to the point, clearly a couple of folks were forgotten, which is why we have an amendment here, which is concerning.

You know, I've spoken to this House previously in regard to a few of my we'll say opportunities within the police service. But corrections officer and emergency dispatcher: I certainly have not specifically been a corrections officer in a corrections facility; however, I was a judicial interim release hearing officer for two and a half years and performed the role of a corrections officer within the city jail in the city of Calgary. I can tell you that for at least two, almost three winters there were times when I did not even see any daylight. That takes a toll on an individual. Some of the things that I had to witness were – well, honestly, Madam Chair, I probably cannot even speak about them within this House, which is how disturbing some of the things that I have seen were. But my point is that those experiences take a toll on people.

In having conversations with people who are corrections officers – I mean, I did that for two and a half years, to the point where I had to get out so I could have some peace of mind. Some of these guys and ladies do not have an opportunity to get out. In fact, they will do 15 years, 20 years, 25 years, 30 years, and I can only imagine what it's like to be in a facility for that long a period of time. You know, really, you're dealing with people who have been convicted of crimes, and it does take a toll. There is a disproportionate number of those workers who commit suicide, who have mental health concerns, and those people need to be protected, but as my friend indicated, clearly they were not thought of in the original bill, which is why the amendment is being brought forward. Well, who else have we forgotten?

You know, they touch on emergency dispatchers. A lot of people tend to forget about emergency dispatchers. I will tell you that I certainly commend this government and whoever specifically it was who brought emergency dispatchers in as part of this amendment. I can tell you that emergency dispatchers are your first point of contact when people call 911 or the nonemergency line. It is then determined at that time whether or not that call is going to go within a city, within a rural municipality. It'll be determined whether it is fire or EMS related, whether it is police related because there are specific skills that those folks have.

I can tell you that my wife was an emergency dispatcher for EMS and fire. We talk about posttraumatic stress disorder, and we talk about some of the challenges that those folks face which sometimes people don't understand. As a police officer visually am I the first one on a scene? Have I seen people in traumatic situations? Have I seen things that would make everyone here cringe? Yes, I have. However, I can tell you that my wife, what she experienced – and notice I used the past tense – was as traumatic as things that I had to experience while working the street.

In fact, she was involved in a situation. She dispatched in the Calgary surrounding area in the rural communities. Sadly, somebody had committed suicide, and a wife was the first upon the scene. Well, my wife had to counsel that lady for 30 minutes to 45 minutes before emergency services could even get to her. That took a toll on her. That was a very traumatic situation. My wife's past: she had a close friend when she was much younger that committed suicide, and then as a result, it compounded the incident that occurred at work.

I'm enjoying listening and hearing we'll call it the progressive nature of this type of legislation because I can tell you that her commander at that particular time – it was very disappointing to hear what his response was. That commander was having the attitude that my wife needed to really just kind of get over it, not knowing what her history was, not knowing the actual trauma of the call that she experienced as well. As a result of that experience, my wife could not continue working for emergency services as a dispatcher.

I think what was even more disappointing was the way that she was treated by the employer despite her having this posttraumatic stress disorder, them not recognizing and, in fact, them not really even caring, quite frankly. I mean, she was obviously lucky that she was in a position where she could eventually wipe her hands clean of that. We, of course, have small children, and she did think of another career that was less impactful than working as an emergency dispatcher.

You know, I can tell you that those two jobs, emergency dispatcher, corrections officer: people don't realize what these people go through. People don't realize that the experiences that they have are equally if not as traumatic as what the police officer on a scene sees, what the fireperson sees, what the EMS worker sees. They are just as much a part of that call. In fact, when we do debriefs in emergency situations – critical incidents is what we call them – as a former commander I would always include the emergency dispatcher in our debrief. Why? Because they were an integral part of that call. What they were experiencing when that person who called in had trauma – that person was there. Although they were listening to my command, I can tell you that their point of contact was integral to that call.

For that reason, of course, I support this amendment. Again, I agree with my colleagues on this side. You know, these two critical, critical positions in our province, the people that I would say certainly have a role as a responder, almost like that service that people don't even seem to know about – right? – the kind of hero that doesn't really get recognized: those two individuals, those two jobs, were not mentioned in the first bill. I think that's why it's so critical to make sure that we get this sort of stuff right.

I would like to again thank the Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville, and I would like to thank the government for putting this amendment forward. But, you know, really, folks, we have to make sure that we get this sort of stuff right and include everybody. I appreciate the comments made by other stakeholders that were included, but we have to make sure that we don't miss anybody, especially that provides critical services to our community.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Are there any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to speak to the amendment on Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans. I want to thank the member for bringing forward the amendment because rarely is there perfect legislation. If we remember yesterday, we had the opportunities to rise and join together as a House to speak to some private member bills, to come to consensus, to have some amendments brought forward, to agree on those amendments, and to support them and make legislation better. I think that's the goal of this House, obviously, to provide the best legislation that we can potentially have for the people of Alberta. I don't believe that Bill 30 is any different. I rise, Madam Chair, to speak in favour of this amendment because any time that we can make a piece of legislation better, I believe that we have a duty as legislators to do so.

Now, you know, some of this amendment here, some of the parts of this amendment, are housekeeping, to be sure. When we have to define that a worker in a private dwelling is covered by OH and S or that workers that live in a private dwelling are called domestic workers, I would suggest that that probably is a housekeeping measure. But some of this amendment actually speaks to some important issues that have already been brought up by the Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville. We can see that when we're dealing with issues like posttraumatic stress disorder, including correctional officers as peace officers and including emergency dispatchers as first responders is an important amendment that needs to be included in this act.

Madam Chair, I used to have to try to explain to some of my students what the words "to amend" mean. I would have to explain to them that it was to change and hopefully to bring about change that was progressive and that was better. When we talk about this in a political sense, we are amending or changing a piece of legislation in order to try to promote and to deal with some of the issues that perhaps speak to a need for improvement.

I was very pleased to hear the Minister of Labour say that when we go through this exercise of the Committee of the Whole, new ideas are brought up from both sides, that a part of our debate is ensuring that stakeholders' points of view and ideas that will improve a bill are brought forward and are put forward before the House. I would hope that that is a consensus of the government, that this is a process not just for the government to put forward amendments but for this House to bring forward amendments. Just as there was an appeal to the Official Opposition to listen and to consider and to support those amendments that would make a bill better, we plan on bringing forward amendments that will also, in our position, from our point of view, make this bill a better bill. I was very happy to hear the Member for Fort Saskatchewan-Vegreville say that she believes that this process brings a new eye to legislation. We would argue, as we move forward and we provide amendments to this bill, that the House would consider those wise words.

Madam Chair, we have had the hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner ask a question. After taking two years to draft and consult on this piece of legislation, why are we only taking seven days to debate this bill? We have an opportunity to bring forward amendments, and this is a good amendment. This idea of addressing correctional officers and emergency dispatch individuals were important issues that needed to be addressed and to be added into this bill. It shows us that there are times when the government and when the opposition identify issues and that this is the time, Committee of the Whole, to bring forward these ideas for the consideration of this Legislature. I would ask and suggest that the question of my hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner is a good question. Why the rush? Why the rush?

We can see that there are some concerns for our stakeholders in the opposition that we've talked to and government stakeholders that they've talked to, that even now they're bringing forward new ideas. I would argue and ask this House to not only support this amendment but to give serious consideration to the amendments that will be coming forward as we move through this piece of legislation.

Thank you very much, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment?

Are you ready for the question?

[Motion on amendment A1 carried]

The Chair: Are there any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to Bill 30? The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. It's an honour to rise and speak to Bill 30. Before I go any further, I will just present an amendment here to you, and then we will move on.

The Chair: This amendment will be amendment A2.

Go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Moved that Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be amended in schedule 1 in the proposed section 16(5) by striking out "and" at the end of clause (c) and adding the following after clause (c):

(c.1) whether the employer is a non-profit company or society, and

The bill itself proposes to make workplaces safer for all Albertans. I think that's an important goal, certainly one the Alberta Party supports, but it must and will include workplaces that are comprised primarily or entirely of workers in the not-for-profit sector. This amendment seeks to allow some discretion for not-for-profit organizations to pool their resources in a way that allows them to comply with the new legislation but to do so in a way that doesn't have a very detrimental impact on their finances.

As I'm sure most of you know, not-for-profit organizations are rarely funded through grants for administrative costs, and that includes the human resources costs required to comply with the requirements of Bill 30. In addition, not-for-profits having 20 or more volunteers at a work site would now be required to comply with the legislation. Now, I know and have worked with not-for-profits that are certainly rich in people but less so in finances. This clause as it stands now before the amendment would have a disproportionately negative impact on them. It certainly could. Our amendment to section 16 of schedule 1, on page 26, of this bill would enable directors of inspection to consider an employer's nonprofit or charitable status and, hence, their financial capacity when working with organizations to build capacity to establish and operate joint work-site health and safety committees.

It's very important to the Alberta Party and to me personally that workers and volunteers at not-for-profits and charities are protected and are safe. We are looking for constructive and creative ways that those in government responsible for work health and safety can work with nonprofits. It's very important to work with nonprofits and charities to improve worker and volunteer safety in sustainable ways that work for everyone. That way not-for-profit and charitable workers that are under some of the unique constraints of nonprofit and charitable organizations and those who work in unusual work environments can enjoy the full protection of this bill, just like workers in commercial workplaces that might have more resources to build human resources capacity to meet the requirements of this bill. We see this amendment as a practical action we can take to make this bill work better for Alberta's nonprofit and charitable organizations and for the people who both work and volunteer for those organizations.

Now, we did share this amendment with the government in advance, earlier this week. I would hope that they would make a commitment and would be able to support it and make that same commitment to Alberta's tens of thousands of smaller nonprofits and charities, who would be protected if this amendment is passed from the unintended consequences – I certainly hope that the consequences and imagine that the consequences would be unintended – of the bill. The not-for-profits that I deal with in Calgary-Elbow and beyond are asking for assurances that the administrative parts of this bill not drive them out of the business of serving Albertans or impair their ability to serve Albertans because it would drive up the administrative costs of doing business for those not-for-profits.

So I ask the government and all members to please vote now in favour of a very clearly common-sense amendment that would in fact make things better for not-for-profits, for charities, and, most importantly, for the Albertans that those nonprofits and charities serve.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the member bringing forward the amendment. As we know, as it's spelled out in the act, there are certain duties around safety that are required of all employers. As we know, with all the great work that our charities do, they are still employers. You know, such groups as the United Way do fantastic work. They do have a lot of employees and are required to still provide a safe work environment for those employees, as spelled out. There are always potential things that can be looked at with regard to the regulations, but right now, of course, we are just talking about the bill itself. I do thank the member for bringing this forward and making sure that we are talking about charities, but at this time, respectfully, I will urge members to not support this amendment.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[Motion on amendment A2 lost]

The Chair: The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

4:00

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to move an amendment.

The Chair: This will be amendment A3.

Go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be amended in schedule 1 in section 41 as follows: (a) in clause (c) by adding "the regulations and the OHS code" after "review this Act and its administration" and (b) by striking out clause (d).

Now, this amendment proposes that the government initiate a review of OH regulations at the same time the entire act is reviewed, every five years. As I talked to different stakeholders, I realized, you know, that adding another hundred pages to the Occupational Health and Safety Act is going to be very cumbersome to them – it's going to be tough for them to be able to get their heads around this – and then adding on the regulations as well. They indicated to me that having this moved from a three-year period review to a five-year period would be a lot less cumbersome on them, so they asked that I move this amendment.

Now, one of the things that it says in this section that the government is actually proposing is that publishing a three-year OH and S review each year will create unnecessary work for this ministry. The concern that I have is that they're going to publish every year. They're going to be publishing a three-year OH and S review and then whatever regulations might come with that. This is going to add more onto not just businesses, small businesses especially and mid-sized businesses, but it's also going to be affecting the ministry because they will be the ones who will have to be reviewing this every three years as well.

The other thing that I heard was that the costs of these revisions can be anywhere up to a thousand dollars for each change for each of these organizations as they have to reprint and change the practices, the printed material, to go around to the different people who are in charge of safety. Now, that, I think, would be considered as one of the unintended consequences as I do believe that the government had the best intentions of being able to make things safer for employees. But remember that this is actually a symbiotic relationship between both the employee and employer and that we need to make sure that we don't chase small businesses out of business because of overregulation and more paperwork to do.

I am concerned that if we don't move it to a five-year period, they will not have the opportunity of being able to just move forward with the changes that need to be done until after the third year, that they've got to go right back through it and do it again.

These are some of the concerns we had and that we had heard from our stakeholders, and I would recommend that all members of the House vote in favour of this amendment.

The Chair: The hon. Member for Edmonton-Decore.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Madam Chair. I appreciate the member bringing forward the amendment. What we're talking about here is a requirement on behalf of the minister to come up with a plan every year when looking to review every three years, and that doesn't necessarily mean that it's going to be a full-blown review at any time. You know, we can do this by sections here, so it's not felt that this will be too onerous on companies. They'll very easily be able to work with the minister. The minister is very adamant about making sure that there is co-operation on behalf of the ministry in order to help businesses move forward on this.

Again, I'll thank the member for bringing this forward at this time, but I won't be able to support this, and I'll ask members to not support this as well.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment?

Seeing none, I'll call the question.

[Motion on amendment A3 lost]

The Chair: Are there any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. I would like to move another amendment.

The Chair: This will be known as amendment A4.

Go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be amended in schedule 2 in section 6 by striking out clause (a).

Now, this amendment – I would like to first of all just point out that when we actually take a look at the bill, what we've tried to do is to look at what the overarching position of this one point is, and then we've tried to talk about the background, about why we felt the minister was trying to go in this direction. We looked at, you know: why the need for the change? Then we also talked about what jurisdictions this was brought from and maybe took a look at some of the successful or not-so-successful positions in those different jurisdictions.

With that, I'd like to just point out that this amendment proposes that the government strike out the new section regarding WCB Board of Directors appointments, leaving it as it is currently written in the WCB Act. The WCB Board of Directors is currently comprised of members appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. These members are selected based on merit after a rigorous third-party audit of potential candidates. The board cannot consist of more than three representatives supporting the interests of employers, employees, and the general public.

Bill 30 maintains that three members be selected from groups representing employers, employees, and the public. However, these candidates are no longer selected by merit. Rather, seven candidates are nominated by each group, and the Lieutenant Governor is required to choose from this small selection of candidates. Merit is no longer a requirement for selection to the WCB Board of Directors with these three appointments.

Now, the one thing that I like about the current system that WCB employs is that this current system includes a layer of oversight by a third-party auditor. The jurisdictions that use the current Alberta system are Manitoba, Ontario, and Nova Scotia. I point this out because it's important to remember that a lot of these changes, from what I understand, came from a person that actually came from Manitoba, so I guess the question I have is: of the recommendations that were brought forward, where did this one come from? I can see how some of the bill came forward from this person that came from Manitoba and then some would come from industry and from the stakeholders, but I don't understand this one, why we would be taking merit out of the selection process. WCB's selection process is audited. It's an arm's-length process, and I don't think that we should be meddling in an arm's-length organization in this way.

Now, I guess the other question is that this could lead to a board that is overly partisan to certain interests, which could lead to a less effective board if members are there to fulfill an agenda rather than protect workers and employers. Appointments to the board of directors should be made based on merit – and I've stated that before – not nomination by organizations. I don't understand where this recommendation would come from. I imagine it would not come from stakeholders in industry because they believe that it's very important, first of all, to have that arm's length in this selection process, and they also believe that it's important to make sure that the people who are on there have the merit to be on that board.

I think that it's problematic that this is in the bill and that the best way, in my opinion, to be able to move forward is to strike out clause (a) and to make sure that we go back to the system that workers' compensation has been operating on for some time. Remember, once again, that the jurisdictions that are using the current system we have here in Alberta are Manitoba, Ontario, and Nova Scotia, Manitoba being where the individual who came up with all these ideas – I think that it's interesting that he would come up with this idea even though Manitoba is using the system we have today.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A4? The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. Essentially, what we are doing with this is making sure that, going forward, the Workers' Compensation Board and the members who make up the board are representative of the interests that the WCB seeks to balance, which are the interests of workers and the interests of employers. When we struck the WCB panel, we had a representative of workers, a representative of employers, and a neutral chair.

Similarly, the board chair at the WCB is intended to be kind of a neutral party whereas the members – in this case, we've put forward a system where there will be a nomination from representative organizations. Labour, for example, can nominate people to then move on to the Workers' Compensation Board. We did this for a couple of reasons, and this is a change that I think both labour and employers, from the consultations that I've done and the conversations that I've had, are supportive of. What we found with some nominees in the past is that someone would be on the board as a representative of labour because they had been a shop steward 20 years earlier in their career but hadn't been engaged with labour in the province in recent history. So making sure that there are representative interests and making sure that we go and talk to employers about who they would like to see on the board as far as that makeup is concerned is a priority for us, and it gives more say, essentially, to the members of that board on the interests that are being represented.

This is very similar to the labour board, and that is probably the most direct linkage that I can point the member to as far as where this is coming from. In both situations you want two different interests to be well represented so that balanced solutions can be provided, and then we get that sustainable system that provides good rehabilitation for injured workers and benefits all Albertans. All employers want to have healthy and safe workers and want an injured worker to be able to return quickly, and all workers want essentially the same thing.

Looking at how the Labour Relations Board appointments are done, making sure that we're giving that enhanced power and influence to the stakeholders involved is what we've done with that.

I hope that answers the member's questions. I will not be supporting his amendment because I think that having nominated candidates representative of interests serves the system very well.

The Chair: Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair, and I appreciate the comments of the minister. I guess the only question that I have, once again, is that you've addressed some important points, but you haven't addressed the issue of merit. My question to you is: do you consider, in the appointment of these onto the board, merit being an important part? If so, is there another mechanism where this merit is going to actually be established? That's, I guess, the question that industry would want to know. You know, can you just appoint anybody on there? Will there actually be that merit that we need?

Ms Gray: I appreciate the member's questions. Both labour and representatives of workers and employers and representatives of business care deeply about making sure that there is a sustainable and quality workers' compensation system. To that end, I know that they will be thinking of the skill sets that are involved when they're making those nominations. That being said, they are nominating more candidates than are needed for the number of positions, allowing an appointment process to take place that will provide an assessment of the people who have been nominated. Essentially, we're giving them the ability to have some control over who is representing their interests, something that I've heard strongly from stakeholders that they appreciate and would like. We are making sure that we can still go through the board appointment process or review as well as do interviews and some of those other steps that currently take place, but the pool of candidates, we will know, represents the interests involved. So absolutely making sure that there is good suitability is something both I as the minister and the stakeholders who are nominating people will have an interest in and will be thinking about through this process.

The Chair: Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Sorry. I probably didn't ask the question properly, Madam Chair. Maybe I'll ask it one more time here. The current process of being able to present potential candidates is through a rigorous third-party audit at arm's length. My question is: with changing this, are you getting rid of the rigorous third-party audit, which is at arm's length? That's my question.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, hon. member. With this change, we are essentially giving more power and say to the stakeholders, whom we are interested in representing. We will continue to use the appointing processes that our government has put into place that continue to work towards increasing diversity on our board, making sure that there are quality appointees and making sure that we have kind of that independence piece to it.

In this case we are allowing the stakeholders to nominate, so essentially that is independent from government because it is either labour or the business community that would be making that nomination, allowing us to have that say in that way. That is where the independence comes from, giving more control and more influence to the business stakeholders and to labour to be able to nominate people. I mean, that's as independent as you can get, saying: please go and look at the qualified candidates within your pool of interested people and make sure that you have people on the Workers' Compensation Board that will represent your positions and your perspectives as a business owner, for example, and make sure that they will contribute to the overall Workers' Compensation Board in that way.

I hope I've answered your question there. Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. I rise to speak to the amendment, and I will be speaking in favour of the amendment. When we start looking at appointing individuals to agencies, boards, and commissions, there are really some very foundational perspectives that can be brought to these positions and to these appointments. One is a mindset that believes that merit should be the primary consideration, that experience and expertise, education, knowledge, all of these combine to provide the individual with the capacity and the merit to make wise choices on this agency, this board, or this commission. When you have that right person, that person that has the experience and the education and the knowledge and the expertise, when you've chosen that person and that person is well chosen for the position, then you get sound judgment, and then you get a committee that is bound together by people that have the experience and the knowledge and the expertise to be able to make good decisions and to provide balance to decisions when it comes to making decisions, in this case the WCB, the Workers' Compensation Board.

Another way of looking at these kinds of decisions and choosing who's going to be a part of these commissions and these agencies and these boards is to group people into groupings and to look at them not from the position of merit but from the position of the group that they represent, whether that's an employer or an employee or whether it's the general public. We've heard the hon. minister stand up and say, "Well, we need to make sure that we have somebody from the employers and from the employees," and I guess that's what concerns some of us and why I'll be speaking in favour of this amendment. We believe that these appointments shouldn't be about the group that you belong to as much as it should be about the experience and the knowledge and the education that you bring to this board or this commission.

When you start to think of people as coming and looking at them from the point of view of a group and that being a primary consideration, that's when you get political ideology and when the process becomes politicized and where the group that you represent is more important than the merits needed for the job and the position and the decisions that are going to be made.

Presently the Workers' Compensation Board Board of Directors is appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council but selected on merit. We cast a net province-wide looking for applicants. We're looking at those applicants through the mind of the executive firm that is retained, that screens and shortlists these applicants, a neutral third-party auditor that isn't going to be looking so much at what group they belong to as looking at their experience and their expertise and their education and their knowledge whereas Bill 30 brings in this concept of: we need to have somebody from the employer, and we need to have somebody that's representing employees. That in many ways sets up the Workers' Compensation Board so that almost sometimes it could become a dysfunctional board because they're more concerned with the group that they fit in with rather than applying their expertise, their knowledge, their education, and their experience to making sure that we get good judgments and that we get good decisions and that we have balanced decisions coming out of this board.

I would suggest that the current system gives the Lieutenant Governor the freedom to be able to choose board members with a limited amount of political influence and where politics doesn't enter into the situation as clearly and as easily. The current system provides a layer of oversight, that third-party auditor, that allows the decisions to be outside of the realm of politics. We can see that this has done not only Alberta a good service over the last 20 years or so but the provinces in the rest of the country like Manitoba and Ontario and Nova Scotia, where they use the same or a similar system for board appointments.

We would suggest that this proposed amendment will allow the Workers' Compensation Board to be filled with members who are qualified to be there and that this amendment would lead to a board that is not overly partisan, that is capable of considering the needs of the worker and where the board becomes an effective agent for all that are coming before it.

I would speak in favour of this amendment. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to the amendment? The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'm going to be brief because we obviously have a fundamental difference of opinion on how the WCB should work. Right now we have board members that are representative of the interests of workers and board members that are representative of the interests of employers. The problem we are solving is that we heard from stakeholders that there was a lack of transparency, that there was a lack of understanding about: "How does that person represent me? I wasn't involved in their recruitment, in their appointment process." So we have introduced as a method the ability for groups to nominate people because we need representative interests on the WCB. That is how the WCB finds balance. We need people who are representing workers, who are representing the public, and who are representing employers. This is not a new concept. We are not introducing this with Bill 30. This is how it works now, but there was a lack of trust that the people appointed were actually doing that.

We are solving that problem. We are increasing the transparency. We are making sure that through the call for applications, through the screening process and whatnot, the representative stakeholders are involved in that. I think I will leave it there because I think there's a misunderstanding about what we are doing when we are looking for people for the Workers' Compensation Board. It's very important that we do have people who represent various interests on that board, thinking of those interests as decisions are being made. It was important to our stakeholders that they have transparency and that they be involved in the appointment process. We currently select now for the three groups. We're just making sure that the interests that we are trying to represent are involved in this process. We've looked to the Labour Relations Board and other systems where that happened successfully. We've brought that to the Workers' Compensation Board, and I'm very proud of that change.

I will be rejecting the amendment. Thank you.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A4?

Seeing none, I'll call the question.

[Motion on amendment A4 lost]

The Chair: Are there any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I will propose an amendment to Bill 30.

The Chair: This will be known as amendment A5.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. My amendment is as follows. I am moving this on behalf of my colleague the Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill, that Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be amended in schedule 2, section 9, in the proposed section 9.2 by adding the following after subsection (4):

- (5) The Board shall measure and evaluate the effectiveness of the Code of Conduct annually in informing all workers and employers of their rights in their interactions with the Board and take steps as the Board considers appropriate to improve awareness of those rights, including developing strategies for overcoming language, information and physical or mental capacity barriers.

Again, Madam Chair, the objective of this amendment, which we had shared with government, is truly, I hope, if taken in good faith and in a true desire, to make the bill better, to improve the bill. I would hope that members of both the government side as well as the opposition would see the merit in supporting this amendment.

As a principle, Bill 30 proposes to add to or expand the scope of work for several groups and initiatives that will advance worker safety and rights. Those include the Appeals Commission, the fair practices office, the code of rights and conduct, and the Workers' Compensation Board itself. There are tens of thousands of Albertans who stand to benefit each year from those, including Albertans who will take the time to learn about their rights and protections, Albertans whose employers and representatives do take the time to do outreach, and Albertans who are fortunate enough to work with well-informed peers.

Unfortunately, not everybody in this province has the privilege of working in such environments. Unfortunately, every year we see or hear stories of vulnerable Albertans or even just ordinary, rank-and-file working Albertans who don't practically or in reality actually enjoy all of the legislated rights that they should as workers. There is, unfortunately, abuse and bullying that goes on in some workplaces, and it is a significant minority of employers who allow such a thing to go on. That's important to emphasize, that that really is the minority. But there are some who would take advantage of workers' lack of knowledge about their rights – they take advantage of workers' lack of capacity with the English language or the capacity to learn about their rights – and who would threaten to fire or, in some cases, even deport employees who would seek to assert their legislated rights.

You know, one of the things that this bill has is various coming-into-force dates. That presumably is to allow time for education of workers as well as employers about the new provisions in here.

Now, the other thing I want to emphasize is how important it is, in all aspects of what government does, that we measure what we do. This amendment seeks to have the government measure and evaluate the effectiveness of the code of conduct annually and their success in informing workers and employers of their rights in their interactions with the board. That also would compel them to take steps that the board considers appropriate to improve the awareness of those rights, including developing strategies for overcoming the barriers that we've talked about: language, information and physical or mental capacity barriers.

I'm sure that the Workers' Compensation Board, that the various different – the Appeals Commission, the fair practices office, the code of rights and conduct, and WCB itself: I'm sure that they will do that work. I have no doubt they will. That is their core mandate, and I'm certain it will happen. Having said that, "How do we know?" is an important question that we in this Assembly, as the governors, ultimately, of organizations like WCB, should be asking ourselves.

This, to me, Madam Chair, is a common-sense amendment that I would hope the government would support. It takes into account the most vulnerable employees in this province or those in the most precarious position. The amendment makes it very clear that the thousands of people who don't necessarily have time to pore over the 100 some-odd pages of this substantial bill or the 100-plus pages of the Workers' Compensation Act don't really understand their rights. Now, I recognize that there are poster campaigns and websites and other education programs, but this amendment is, I believe, a practical action that will make the bill work better for Alberta's most vulnerable workers, that are often the most at risk. I would certainly ask that all members of this Assembly vote in favour of what I hope is a thoughtful amendment to make this bill genuinely better.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

4:50

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Chair, and thank you to the member for reviewing Bill 30 and looking for ways to potentially improve it, particularly given the number of changes that we see in Bill 30 and some of the new pieces that have been introduced.

The code of conduct is one piece that was specifically recommended to us by the panel to articulate the rights of workers and employers and their interactions with the organizations and to articulate in detail how the WCB commits to operate in recognition of these rights. We want this code of rights and conduct to be developed by the WCB Board of Directors and to involve the stakeholders so that we make sure that people understand their rights in the system and to really shift the culture. That's what this code is intended to do, to help shift the culture towards one more worker centred. That being said, this code of conduct as well as a number of other measures will need to be evaluated.

The accountability for these changes needs to be in place, and we feel that it is, that the accountability mechanisms are there in the reporting responsibilities to the minister. As well, we will be working closely with the new fair practices office, that reports to the minister. In this case, I appreciate the member's amendment, but I feel that we have the ability to measure the effectiveness of these changes and we have the mechanisms in place without needing to accept this legislative change.

Thank you to the member, but I will not be supporting this amendment.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A5?

Seeing none, are you ready for the question?

[Motion on amendment A5 lost]

The Chair: Any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. I would like to propose an amendment, please.

The Chair: This is amendment A6.

Go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be amended in schedule 2 in section 18 in the proposed section 24.3 as follows: (a) by striking out subsection (1)(b); (b) by striking out subsection (2); (c) in subsection (7) by striking out "and may pay remuneration to those members referred to in subsection (2)."

Now, this bill establishes an occupational disease and injury advisory committee. This board must consist of the director of medical services for OH and S, who will be the chair; a physician; an employee of the Department of Health; an employee of Alberta Health Services; and an employee of Covenant Health. These people, obviously, make sense. What is not clear is why the minister may also be allowed to appoint a union representative, an employer representative, and a member of the public. The purpose of the committee is to propose recommendations to the minister about the act and regulations as they pertain to occupational diseases.

It's not clear how these three additional members appointed by the minister are qualified to do that. This goes back to the last amendment that I was talking about, talking about the concept of merit, the merit of those people, the competency, the ability of those individuals to be able to bring forward recommendations, to be able to bring forward reasonable and valued advice to this occupational disease and injury advisory committee or to the minister. If the minister has to choose from the list of three persons that are not nominated through an independent process or through a small pool of applicants, we risk people being on the committee that would only hinder it, not help it.

This amendment is to ensure that the occupational disease and injury advisory committee consists strictly of qualified individuals. Again, as I mentioned about the last amendment that I brought forward, this is about being able to have qualified people who have the ability to do what they need to be doing in a way that's going to be good for both the workers and the employers. So I would recommend that all the members of this House vote in favour of this amendment. I do believe that it's going to make this bill better.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. For reasons similar to the previous debate's, I disagree with the member opposite, and I'm not in favour of this amendment. It also removes the ability to provide reasonable travelling and living expenses for members of this occupational disease and injury advisory committee, which I am not in support of because it's really important that we make sure that our occupational injury and disease information is kept up to date.

This advisory committee was recommended to us by the panel and, I think, is a very important piece of Bill 30, making sure that we have up-to-date occupational disease and injury information. Given that right now we are dealing with a list of diseases that was crafted in the '80s and hasn't been updated, making sure we have that up-to-date information is important. Having the small and reasonable travel and living expenses be able to – oh, sorry. It's just the remuneration that they are striking out with this amendment. My apologies. I'm incorrect there. Not allowing the government to pay remuneration to the members, I'm not supportive of.

Who we want on the occupational disease and injury advisory group: it's going to be people who are physicians, who are representative of the three interests, as we've talked about. Making sure that we can have committed people who are able to advise us on the occupational disease and injury advisory committee is important, so I will not be supporting this amendment.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

[Motion on amendment A6 lost]

The Chair: We're back on the main bill. Are there any further questions, comments, or amendments? The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I have an amendment to present.

The Chair: This will be amendment A7.
Go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much. I'm moving this amendment on behalf of my hon. colleague the Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill, that Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be amended in schedule 1 in section 75(1)(a) by adding the following after clause (iv):

- (iv.1) evaluation of worker safety training, education and research with respect to effectiveness and accessibility by all workers in Alberta;
- (iv.2) translation of worker safety information and outreach with respect to workers who do not speak English or speak English as a second language.

Madam Chair, this amendment would add to the creative sentencing options for employers who do not respect or protect the safety of their workers. It explicitly adds to the list of available creative sentencing options to fund translation, outreach, and evaluation in support of worker training, safety, education, and other initiatives.

I note that the existing section 75(1)(a) and the subsequent subsections allow for the court to use a variety of different measures, including:

- (i) training or educational programs regarding the health and safety of workers;
- (ii) research programs into the diagnostic, preventative or remedial aspects of worker health and safety;
- (iii) any worker health and safety initiative by a non-profit organization;
- (iv) the establishment and maintenance of scholarships for educational institutions offering studies in occupational health and safety and related disciplines;
- (v) any other purpose that furthers the goal of achieving healthy and safe work sites.

The reason we've moved this amendment is to be very explicit that there are certain workers in our society who, with language, knowledge, or job security barriers, are among the most difficult to engage. It's very important that we have specific and explicit programs to engage such workers because those are the workers that often have the most reason to not rock the boat, Madam Chair. Again, this is an authentic – I hope the government sees it as really a genuine attempt to make this bill better, to actually improve it, to bring it to a place where it can genuinely help the most vulnerable workers in our society.

It is important that any employer who would ever consider preying on vulnerable workers should be shown a path or, frankly, compelled to be on a path where they can actually help those workers to access the information that they need and that they no longer would abuse workers in that way. If they have been found, in fact, to have done so, it's important that they're not only punished and penalized, held accountable for that, but they are put on a path where they could actually improve, which is why we would seek to amend this legislation to explicitly allow outreach and evaluation of worker safety initiatives to be one of the available creative sentencing measures. It would emphasize and reinforce that employers and others who have responsibilities to protect worker safety and rights also have responsibilities to work together to identify and reach the most vulnerable workers, who may not be well served by broad-based campaigns.

The amendment here to the proposed section 75 in schedule 1 is a practical action that those of us in this House can take to make the bill better and make it work for Alberta's most vulnerable and least integrated workers. Again, we shared this with the government ahead of time, and I would hope that they would see this as a genuine and common-sense effort to make the lives of some of the most vulnerable workers in Alberta better. Again, I would genuinely hope that the government would accept this amendment and ensure that Albertans are best served by this important piece of legislation.

Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Chair, and thank you to the member. I would like him to know that I do see this as a genuine effort on his part to make positive amendments and to think about Alberta's workers and their needs, which I appreciate. He recognizes correctly that there are many vulnerable workers in Alberta, and we have been working hard to make sure that we serve them and their needs. I'm very proud of the work that our occupational health and safety team has been doing recently with the vulnerable worker inspection program, which I'd be happy to tell him more about at another time.

Specifically in this amendment, though, what he is suggesting is essentially covered in the clauses that we already have around education as well as allowing the court to decide how to use funds. So while I appreciate his genuine intent with this and the amendment that he's proposed, I will not be supporting it just because we already have what we need from these tools, making the amendment redundant.

I do want the member to know that I share his concerns about protecting Alberta's vulnerable workers. I think it's one of the key priorities for me as minister. The department has been working along those lines very well, and I'm quite proud of the work our occupational health and safety team does in these areas. Thank you to the member.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A7?

Seeing none, I'll call the question.

[Motion on amendment A7 lost]

The Chair: Any further questions, comments, or amendments with respect to this bill? The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. I'd like to propose an amendment, please.

5:10

The Chair: This will be amendment A8.
Go ahead, hon. member.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. I move that Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be amended in schedule 1 in section 25 by adding “or the employer” after “When an officer inspects a work site, the officer.”

This amendment proposes that a representative of the employer, be it a lawyer or a member of a safety committee, et cetera, be permitted to accompany an OH and S officer during a work-site inspection. Now, this amendment will ensure that a representative of the employer is permitted to accompany inspectors while on the job site. Bill 30 eliminates the Occupational Health and Safety Council and transfers that authority to the Labour Relations Board. In doing so, occupational health and safety officers are granted extended powers, enumerated in section 51 of the bill. Given that officers have more authority, it is important that employers are protected and know their rights when an inspection is happening.

I want to point out here that I recognize that the difficulty with this bill is to be able to strike the right balance between employee and employer needs. If they become too draconian with regulations and with this bill on occupational health and safety and workers' compensation, then the problem is going to be that employers will just shut down. They'll just say, “We can't comply; we're not going to be able to continue on in our business,” and then they shut down. The concern that I'm bringing forward with this amendment, Madam Chair, is to be able to try to find the right balance.

With these extended powers given to the inspectors, I think that it is only right and fair that someone who's appointed by an employer have the ability to walk around with the inspector. This kind of shows more of a collaborative approach between the inspectors and the owners, supervisors, and so forth. So I would hope that the minister would consider this, I think, reasonable request in order to be able to provide that balance between the employee and the employer. Once again this is about being able to try to find that balance.

With that, I would hope that all members of this Assembly would vote in favour of this amendment.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, and thank you to the member for this amendment. One of the challenges that I heard during the consultation, quite frankly, was from workers who felt that they were not engaged when an occupational health and safety officer is inspecting a work site. Section 25 specifically allows the officer to request the joint work-site health and safety committee co-chairs or their designates or, in a workplace with less than 20 people, a health and safety representative to be present at an inspection.

One of the co-chairs of the health and safety committee is the employer representative, meaning that the employer representative has been included in this process already. Making sure that the employer is aware of an inspection taking place and is present is the general practice now. What we want to do going forward, particularly now that we have joint work-site health and safety committees, is that we want to make sure that these bodies, who are responsible for understanding health and safety on their work sites, dealing with a potential incident or near miss, and working productively, are able to be included by an officer during an inspection of a work site.

I appreciate very much the amendment from the member opposite. I will not be supporting his amendment because one of the co-chairs of the health and safety committee is the employer representative or the designate, as this section refers to.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A8? The hon. Member for Drayton Valley-Devon.

Mr. Smith: Thank you, Madam Chair. I want to thank the member for bringing forward this amendment. The purpose of amendments, as we said earlier today, is to bring forward additional changes, improvements to a bill. I believe that this amendment will do so, so I will be speaking in favour of this amendment.

Now, rarely does proposed legislation come before this House in a manner that is perfect. We can always bring in new ideas. The hon. Minister of Labour even spoke to that earlier today, saying that debate brings forward stakeholders and members of this Assembly on both sides to be able to address and to take a look at the bill and to be able to propose changes and amendments that will benefit it. I would argue that this does exactly that.

This amendment proposes that a representative of the employer, be that a lawyer or a member of the safety committee, be permitted to accompany the OH and S officer during a work-site inspection. Madam Chair, the inspectors have additional powers under Bill 30. Officers are granted those extended powers, and they're enumerated in section 51 of the bill. For instance, inspectors can instruct that equipment be operated or that equipment be confiscated or dismantled on-site. A representative of the business side of the equation would allow and would ensure that there is a proper cause for such a request.

Madam Chair, we're just coming out of, you know, a very deep recession, one in which many of the businesses in this province have suffered greatly. We've seen that in my small town of Drayton Valley. A third of our warehouse space is now empty as businesses have had to close their doors. We can see that it's going to be imperative, if we want to continue to see a recovery from this recession, that we ensure that businesses – small, medium, and large businesses – have the capacity to be competitive, have the capacity to make sure that there's a collaborative atmosphere as we move forward.

When it comes to Bill 30, we would suggest that making sure and ensuring that an employer is accompanying the OH and S officer would allow for these businesses to ensure that there are no shutdowns or equipment being confiscated or dismantled without good and reasonable and strong reasons for doing so. Having the employer there would allow them to feel that they are respected, that they're represented during an OH and S inspection. It could reduce, at the end of the day, instances of appeal. These things would allow business and OH and S to work together in a collaborative fashion. We would believe, you know, that the employer is not there to tamper with an investigation or to become an impediment to it but, rather, to observe and to advocate on behalf of the employer.

That's going to be very important if we're going to move forward and ensure that both the employer and the employee have a balanced relationship and that the capacity is there for the business to move forward in providing a working atmosphere that is both safe but also profitable. That's an important thing to have happen, Madam Chair, because if, at the end of the day, the employer is not profitable, then there won't be too many employees. We need to ensure that that relationship is solid and balanced and that we have the capacity, through this amendment, to ensure that that is indeed the case.

I would speak in favour of this amendment. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. I just wanted to point out a little bit of clarity on this issue to the minister, and that is that it says in section 25: “When an officer inspects a work site, the officer may request the joint work site health and safety committee co-chairs.” The question that I have here is that they “may request” that. It doesn’t mean that they will or that it will happen. By adding the words “or the employer,” it allows the employer to possibly have requested a joint work-site health and safety committee co-chair be present at the inspection as well.

This is a just a way of being able to, again, find that balance so that they have that ability as the employer. They may choose not to, just as the inspector may choose not to. But that word “may” I think is really what has got industry and our stakeholders a little concerned. They have requested that we add “or the employer” so that it gives that balance, so that when they provide this, they have the balance of being able to say: “Okay. Well, if the inspector doesn’t feel it’s important” – they may not feel it’s important – “the employer may not feel it’s important as well.” I just wanted to make sure. That is important.

I think this is a very reasonable amendment that strikes the proper balance in this act and bill. Thank you.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I just want to be very clear. The normal procedure for OH and S is for the officer to go through the site with an employer representative. That is what happens most often, but it is not required. If an OH and S officer sees a concern, they are able to go onto a site and look at or address that concern. Similarly, it’s not required for the joint work-site health and safety committee to go along either.

I really want to be clear that the normal procedure is for officers to go through a site with an employer representative. What we are doing here is to allow that the officer may engage the joint work-site health and safety committee – again, a mandatory concept introduced with Bill 30 – or the designate or a health and safety representative.

I would note that by making an amendment that says “or the employer,” it becomes optional, either the joint work-site health and safety committee or the employer, which I’m not sure is even the intent of what the member opposite is attempting to do with this. What I’m hearing, what I understand the policy intent is, is that employers should be and are part of any interaction and that employers are critical to occupational health and safety. Occupational health and safety officers work with employers very, very closely.

I will not be supporting the amendment because we currently already work with employers quite closely, and the amendment as drafted doesn’t do what I think the member opposite is hoping it would do, which is to require that employers be part of it because it is an optional “or the employer” here. But thank you to the member for your thoughts on this.

The Chair: Are there any further questions, comments, or amendments? The hon. Member for Cardston-Taber-Warner.

Mr. Hunter: Thank you, Madam Chair. I would like to make another amendment. I’m actually quite hopeful on this one.

An Hon. Member: I love your enthusiasm.

Mr. Hunter: The night is still young.

The Chair: This will be amendment A9.
Go ahead.

Mr. Hunter: I move that Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be amended in schedule 1 in section 77 by renumbering it as section 77(1) and by adding the following after subsection (1):

(2) Any financial support provided by the Minister for the purposes of subsection (1) must be distributed equally between organizations representing the interests of employers and organizations representing the interest of workers.

(3) The Minister shall publish annually, on the public website of the Minister’s department, a list of the agreements entered into under subsection (1) and the amount of financial support, if any, provided pursuant to each agreement.

Now, section 77 of Bill 30 allows the minister to enter into an agreement with any person, government, agency or organization for the purpose of

(a) carrying out research [about] the health and safety of workers and creating training and operating programs in things like first aid and emergency medical services. The proposed amendment attempts to ensure that resources allocated for this purpose are not distributed in a disproportionate way to groups that are more inclined to support the government such as unions and that if any money is distributed, it is publicly accounted for on the minister’s website. This is an issue of, first of all, making sure that the distribution of any funds is done equally, and the second point to this is that there is transparency.

5:30

The minister has spoken quite eloquently, in defeating one of my other amendments, about the importance of transparency, but I will say that this is an opportunity. If the minister has the same belief that that transparency needs to be there, then she will support this amendment because this amendment says that whatever money is distributed needs to be distributed equally, and most importantly it needs to be published on the minister's website.

The government is attempting to carry out ongoing safety training and research to keep up with emerging trends in occupational health and safety. The provisions outlined in section 77 of this bill will help to accomplish this goal. However, our primary concern is that there is no cap on spending or resources that can be allocated. Once again the question: this amendment actually didn't specifically talk about a cap, but it specifically said that we need to make sure that both sides of the equation are equally represented, nor is there a limit on who can be engaged by the minister to carry out work. Furthermore, there is no public discourse required for any money that is given out.

Once again the issue here, in my opinion, is transparency, to make sure that for this money that can potentially be given out to any of these organizations – boards, commissions, agencies – that money will be transparent, that we will know where that money is going. Rather than having to ask during committee, that could be presented to all Albertans at a moment's glance as they look at the website.

Now, one of the things that I've been following the last little while is the argument of dark money. It's a very interesting term. If the government votes against this amendment, they are voting against transparency, the transparency of where the money is going and who it's going to. The whole concept of dark money, according to the definition that I've heard from the members opposite, is: we just don't know where it's coming from or where it's going. If the members opposite decide to vote against this one – that's why I say that I was very, very excited about presenting this amendment, because I'm actually speaking to some of their greatest concerns about getting rid of this dark money concept. So I think that it's important, incumbent upon the members opposite to continue the narrative, to continue to make sure that they support that kind of a concept, the concept that they are against dark money, by voting for this amendment and making sure that there is no dark money in the operations of this government.

I would hope that all members opposite would be very supportive and that members on this side would be supportive of this amendment. Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Chair, and thank you to the member for bringing forward this amendment. The first thing I'd like to say is that this section is essentially a bring-forward from the previous OHS Act since it's not changed. It just continues something that currently happens. Within that process this paragraph, or this section, which is considered fairly standard so that the department can provide funding to fulfill the mandate, provides transparency through the Public Accounts process. We already have a mechanism through which questions can be asked, and this information can be shared around how research and educational programs are being supported.

I would mention that the member opposite talked about giving more support to one type of person or group than another. This is work that the department has been doing for, I assume, decades but has also been doing since I've become minister. This is not something that comes up to me directly. Rather, it's work of the department, and the transparency is provided through the Public Accounts process.

For those reasons, I will not be supporting this amendment, but I thank the member for bringing it forward.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A9?

Seeing none, I'll call the question.

[Motion on amendment A9 lost]

The Chair: Any other further questions, comments, or amendments? The hon. Member for Calgary-Elbow.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I have an amendment to Bill 30, which I will hand to the page. I will await your receiving of this and await your instruction.

The Chair: This is amendment A10.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Madam Chair. I move on behalf of my colleague the hon. Member for Calgary-Mackay-Nose Hill that Bill 30, An Act to Protect the Health and Well-being of Working Albertans, be amended in schedule 1 in section 39(1) by adding the following after clause (c):

(c.1) development of educational materials and strategies explaining the rights of workers under this Act.

Madam Chair, this amendment is along the same lines thematically as my previous amendments here today. Really, what it does is that it proposes to ensure that the most vulnerable workers and those in most need of intervention and improved safety, who are also among those who actually have the least capacity to find out about and assert their rights under worker legislation – the occupational health and safety advisory council is there to enhance worker safety. That council as set up in Bill 30 has the ability to advise the minister on a variety of occupational health and safety matters. It's a good move by the government to create such a council or to provide it with the mandate that they have through this legislation, but again I think it's very important that we are very specific and more explicit about what exactly the duties of that council are. We know that the vulnerable and underrepresented workers in this province may lack the time, the language skills, the knowledge, or simple confidence to assert their protections and rights, so a direct and proactive outreach from the occupational health and safety advisory council is required to ensure that vulnerable workers are well reached and well protected by this legislation.

The amendment on pages 43 and 44 of Bill 30, section 39(1) of schedule 1: again, it's practical action that we can take to make this bill work better for the most vulnerable and least integrated workers. We want the occupational health and safety advisory council to explicitly focus on outreach and education especially and, again, explicitly to those workers who would receive, clearly, the most benefit from such education and outreach. I'm certainly not suggesting that the ministry or her department or any of the good people in the occupational health and safety group would ignore these workers. I know that they certainly do not, but we want to make sure. I think it's important, both for legislative and practical purposes but also symbolic purposes, to focus explicitly on that the occupational health and safety advisory council does in fact have an obligation to reach out and educate those workers on these matters.

I imagine the minister will tell me that these are things that are intended already through the bill or enabled already through the bill that, in fact, her ministry already does. If that's the case, I applaud that. Given that, though, there's no reason not to accept this amendment and no reason not to include it in the bill. One of the lessons I hope this government learns from, shall we say, the difficulties of Bill 6 was that there were a lot of things implied by what was missing. It allowed a vacuum where people could just simply fill in whatever concerns they had, whether that was, in fact, what the government intended or not. This I see as actually the reverse of that, where the government will apply, imply, or suggest that certain education will happen – no need to actually put it in the bill – but we need the assurance that that actually will happen.

I would encourage the government, please, to support this amendment. It's a good, common-sense amendment that will proactively truly improve the lives of vulnerable Albertans and marginal workers across our province, which, I would hope, would be in keeping with both their philosophy and the intent of this bill. I would encourage all members on both sides of the House, please, to support this amendment.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

The Chair: Any other members? The hon. Minister of Labour.

Ms Gray: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker, and thank you very much to the member for once again thinking of Bill 30 through the lens of vulnerable workers and how we can best reach out to those workers and engage with them. He suggested – and he is correct – that this is work that the ministry and the department does, but they are only a piece of the puzzle. It's also work that nonprofit organizations like the Workers' Resource Centre and the Workers' Health Centre in Edmonton and Calgary do. There are other groups that are doing this work as well.

He says: well, then, why not also ask the council to do that? The reason is that the council is not set up for outreach. It is a part-time organization with members who really are only doing a little bit of work each month. These are not people who have a full-time job just sitting on the council. Because it's a part-time organization, it won't have the skill set or the resourcing to be able to engage in the development of educational materials and strategies explaining the rights of workers under this act.

That being said, making sure that vulnerable workers understand their rights is critical and something that the department takes very seriously, something that I take very seriously. We'll continue to work towards all methods that we can to engage with vulnerable workers and all Albertans, particularly now that, I hope, through Bill 30 we will have an updated occupational health and safety code. We want all workers to understand the three fundamental rights that they have. We want all workers to be able to know how to contact an occupational health and safety officer if there are concerns in their workplace. Outreach will be a very important piece of it, but giving that role to the council, which has more of an advisory nature, does not make sense. For that reason, I won't be supporting this amendment, but again I thank the member for his concern for vulnerable workers and reviewing this bill through that lens.

The Chair: Any other members wishing to speak to amendment A10?
